Since the first publication of Hrotsvit's oeuvre in 1501, her reception has always been quite ambiguous, especially the evaluation of her style, moreover the authenticity of her work continues being debated to the present day. Some of the problems of appraising this author arise from the fact that she established not only the beginnings of Ottonian literacy but also of medieval drama. As Berschin puts it, Hrotsvit virtually stepped out of nothing with her metrical legends and, therefore, is a witness not only for the education of medieval women but also for the individuality and novelty of the Ottonian Renaissance.

KATRINETTE BODARWÉ

References and Further Reading

- Bodarwé, Katrinette. Sanctimoniales litteratae: Schriftlichkeit und Bildung in den ottonischen Frauenkommunitäten Gandersheim, Essen und Quedlinburg. Quellen und Studien vol. 10. Münster: Aschendorff, 2004.
- Cescutti, Eva. Hrotsvit und die Männer. Konstruktionen von "Männlichkeit" und "Weiblichkeit" in der lateinischen Literatur im Umfeld der Ottonen; eine Fallstudie (Forschungen zur Geschichte der älteren deutschen Literatur 23), Munich: Fink, 1998.
- Hrotsvit. Opera omnia, edited by Walter Berschin. München and Leipzig: Saur, 2001.
- Hrotsvit. A Florilegium of Her Works. Translated with introduction, interpretative essay and notes by Katharina Wilson, Woodbridge and Suffolk: Brewer, 1998.
- Nelson, Janet. "Gender and Genre in Women Historians of the Early Middle Ages," In The Frankish World 750–900. London: Hambledon, 1996, pp. 183–197.
- Weston, L. M. C., "Gender Without Sexuality: Hrotsvitha's Imagining of a Chaste Female Community." In The Community, the Family and the Saint. Patterns of Power in Early Medieval Europe International Medieval Research 4, edited by Joyce Hill and Mary Swan. Turnhout: Brepols, 1998, pp. 127–142.
- Wilson, Katharina M., edited by Hrotsvit of Gandersheim "Rara Avis in Saxonia"? A Collection of Essays Compiled and Edited. Medieval and Renaissance monograph series 7. Ann Arbor, Mich.: MARC Publ., 1987.

See also Drama; Literacy and Reading: Latin; Monasticism and Nuns; Ottoman Royal Women; Women Authors: Latin Texts

HUMANISM

From about 1300 to 1650, humanism was the characteristic and primary intellectual movement of the Italian Renaissance, diffusing also to other regions of Europe mainly after 1500. It consisted of the diligent study, imitation, edition, and translation of Latin and later Greek classical and Christian texts, which in turn fueled new genres of literary expression, promoted new avenues of Western thought, and created a new pedagogy. This activity affected subsequent developments including the Reformation, the discussion of New World encounters, the querelle des femmes (debate about the nature of women), the Scientific Revolution, and modern concepts of the state. Although humanism was largely created by male scholars, individual humanists also concerned themselves with the education of women and women's roles; and a few women themselves acquired humanist educations and participated in the humanist movement.

Origins of Humanism, Ninth to Fourteenth Centuries

Attention to the ancient literary tradition surged several times in the West: during the Carolingian Renaissance of the ninth century; during the Twelfth-Century Renaissance, and especially during the Italian Renaissance, which permanently reintegrated the study of ancient thought in the secondary and university curricula. From the late thirteenth century, a circle of scholars centered in Padua launched the latter movement by consciously imitating Latin authors in poetry and prose.

In the next century, the tradition they started reached an early culmination in the work of Francis Petrarch (Francesco Petrarca, 1304–1374) and Giovanni Boccaccio (1313–1375). Also important for his contributions to vernacular literary traditions, as a humanist Petrarch discovered, collected, studied, and imitated Latin texts, and composed important historical, rhetorical, and moral philosophical works whose expressive eloquence derived from his imitation of the finest authors, especially Cicero. Boccaccio, too, was a renowned author in the vernacular (most notably, his collection of stories, the Decameron), but at the same time, as a humanist, wrote in defense of the study of ancient pagan classics and compiled the pioneering collective biography On Famous Women.

Later in the century, Petrarch's student, Coluccio Salutati (1331–1406), in his role as chancellor of the republic of Florence, employed his humanist skills to save his city as a defender of liberty against the enemy state of Milan, depicted as tyrannical. Salutati also fostered many talented young Florentines and foreign visitors who became the leaders of the next generation of humanists. In that effort, he invited to Florence the Byzantine diplomat Manuel Chrysoloras (1353–1415) who, during a three-year stay, taught Greek to aspiring scholars, thus inaugurating Greek studies in western Europe where they had virtually not existed, except on the peripheries, since antiquity.

The Fifteenth Century

During the fifteenth century, the humanist program became firmly established. Humanist teachers such as Pier Paolo Vergerio (1370–1444) defined as the five disciplines of the studia humanitatis (the “studies of humanity”) poetry, grammar (the study of literature), rhetoric (the study of composition), history, and moral philosophy (the one branch of philosophy that tended to be nonsystematic and closely related to literature). These were the disciplines (replacing those of the medieval schools) they taught to the children of urban patricians who became the leaders of Renaissance Italy, patrons of the arts, and amateur writers themselves in the humanist genres; among them was, for example, the Venetian nobleman Francesco Barbaro (1390–1454). From the fifteenth through the nineteenth century, the humanist curriculum dominated secondary education.

Other humanists were “secretaries,” such as Poggio Bracciolini (1381–1459) and Leonardo Bruni (c. 1370–1444), the bureaucrats of city-states and the church who employed their literary skills to compose letters and speeches defining public policy. Still others were employed by rulers to write on matters of interest to the monarch, including Lorenzo Valla (1405–1457), whose attacks on the church matched the interests of his employer, a papal rival.

Humanist authors of all types—teachers, secretaries, and amateurs—employed their knowledge of classical texts to examine matters of interest in the civic world of the Renaissance. They wrote on nobility, political rule, poverty, and the family, and recovered the history of ancient Rome and composed new histories of their own Renaissance cities. They composed treatises as well on the “dignity of man,” as did Giannozzo Manetti (1396–1459) and Giovanni Pico della Mirandola (1463–1494), reconceptualizing human nature, based on classical learning, as uniquely active and creative.

Humanists employed their knowledge of Greek to translate the works of Plato, largely unknown in western Europe, the accomplishment of Marsilio Ficino (1433–1499) and to explore Greek philosophy, science, and mathematics. They developed the scholarly methods of textual analysis still important today, and wielding these, readied for the new printing presses (established in Italy from the late 1460s) editions of all the Greek and Latin classics. Once matured, humanist themes and style were imitated in the vernacular by such authors as Niccolò Machiavelli (1469–1527) and Baldassare Castiglione (1478–1529).

Women and Humanism

Humanism's embrace of the values of human worth and freedom attracted women to the movement as well. In the Middle Ages, those few women who acquired advanced educations did so generally in the convent, and their literary product was religious. In Renaissance Italy, some tens of women of the patriciate and nobility acquired humanist educations. A handful of these entered into literary exchanges with male humanists, and contributed notable Latin works in the standard humanist genres of the treatise, dialogue, oration, and letter. Most notably, Isotta Nogarola (1418–1464) defended Eve against the charge fundamental to a misogynist ideology that she had sinned more than Adam in the Garden of Eden, and thus bore the blame for the punishment of Original Sin; Cassandra Fedele (1465–1558) argued for the benefits of humanist study for women even if they gained no public recognition for their achievement; and Laura Cereta (1469–1499) encouraged women to strive for excellence in those studies that exalted humankind, while she criticized both the men and the women who mocked women's attempt to pursue that goal.

Male humanists, as well, took notice of women. Boccaccio's On Famous Women, although displaying misogynistic elements, introduced the issue of women's capacity and accomplishments into the mainstream of intellectual discourse. The letters of Leonardo Bruni and Lauro Quirini (1420–1480/1481) to, respectively, Bartolommea Montefeltro Malatesta and Isotta Nogarola map out a humanist curriculum for women which, though not exactly the same as that required for males, was nonetheless ambitious. The works by Francesco Barbaro and Leon Battista Alberti (1406–1472) on, respectively, marriage and the family highlight women's important roles in these settings.

The Diffusion of Humanism

The diffusion of humanism north of the Alps began in the fifteenth century. Italians traveling on diplomatic missions brought the movement to Spain, France, England, and the Empire; notable humanist emissaries include Poggio Bracciolini (to England), then serving as papal secretary; and Aeneas Sylvius Piccolomini to Scotland before serving in the imperial chancery. Equally, northerners traveled to Italy to attend universities and make contacts with literary circles there, as did such figures as the German cleric and philosopher Nicholas of Cusa (1400–1464); the English scholar John Colet (1467–1519); and the learned Hungarian and German poets Janus Pannonius (1434–1472) and Conrad Celtis (1459–1508). Early in the sixteenth century, from 1506–1509, the Dutch-born Desiderius Erasmus (1469–1536) visited Italy, shortly before composing his renowned Praise of Folly. Erasmus became the principal figure of northern, and Christian, humanism, who mastered the Italian tradition and developed it as a European phenomenon. From 1500–1650, established in the courts and cities of Europe, humanism helped shape the Reformation, the debate over women, vernacular literary genres, and the curriculum of the schools. It was a factor in the development of modern science, political theory, and perceptions of the New World (the Americas).

MARGARET L. KING

References and Further Reading

- Baron, Hans. The Crisis of the Early Italian Renaissance: Civic Humanism and Republican Liberty in an Age of Classicism and Tyranny. 2nd ed. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1966.
- The Erasmus Reader*, edited by Erika Rummel. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1990.
- Grafton, Anthony. Leon Battista Alberti: Master Builder of the Italian Renaissance. New York: Hill & Wang, 2000.
- Hankins, James. Plato in the Italian Renaissance. 2 vols. Leiden: Brill, 1990.
- Her Immaculate Hand: Selected Works by and about the Women Humanists of Quattrocento Italy*, edited and translated by Margaret L. King and Albert Rabil Jr. 2nd ed. Asheville, N.C.: Pegasus, 1992.
- Jardine, Lisa. "Women Humanists: Education for What?" From Humanism to the Humanists: Education and the Liberal Arts in Fifteenth- and Sixteenth-Century Europe. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1986, pp. 29–57.
- Kristeller, Paul Oskar. Renaissance Thought and Its Sources, edited by Michael Mooney. New York: Columbia University Press, 1979.
- Nauert, Charles G. Humanism and the Culture of Renaissance Europe. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995.
- Parker, Holt N. "Women and Humanism: Nine Factors for the Woman Learning." Viator 35 (2004): 581–616.
- Trinkaus, Charles. The Poet as Philosopher: Petrarch and the Formation of Renaissance Consciousness. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1979.
- Witt, Ronald G. In the Footsteps of the Ancients: the Origins of Humanism from Lovato to Bruni. Leiden and Boston: Brill, 2000.

See also Boccaccio, Giovanni; Cereta, Laura; Defenses of Women; Education, Lay; Fedele, Cassandra; Italy; Literacy and Reading: Latin; Nogarola, Isotta; Petrarch

HUMILIATI

The late twelfth and thirteenth centuries saw the proliferation of novel religious movements throughout Europe. The moral and ethical ambiguities caused by a new profit orientation motivated society during the burgeoning commercial revolution, and created a desire by members of the laity to follow an apostolic life centered on mendicant activism and community service. Such groups comprised both men and women who could not find fulfillment in traditional cloistered, contemplative orders. In addition to the familiar Franciscans, Dominicans, and Poor Clares, these new orders also included a wide variety of lesser known groups such as the Premonstratensians, Beguines, and the Humiliati of northern Italy.

There is evidence the Humiliati were organized as early as the 1170s in the textile producing region around Milan. Pope Lucius III condemned them in 1184 for suspected heresies. However, they persisted, and in 1201 Innocent III approved the order with some stipulations, including an injunction against Humiliati sisters' active participation in the public sphere. As hundreds of Humiliati houses were already established by this time, his attempt to impose order on the group suggests a desire to rein in the increasingly popular movement.

The Humiliati were divided into three orders. Members of the first and second orders mirrored other mendicant groups, living in small group houses. First-order houses included canons and canonesses who enjoyed the greatest ecclesiastical privilege. The third order most closely resembled tertiaries of other mendicant groups or even confraternities. Mostly made up of wool workers, they lived in their homes, often remaining married, but following the apostolic lifestyle of the Humiliati. Members of all social classes joined the Humiliati, however, entrants donated all their worldly goods and practiced communal poverty, making the Humiliati a tool for social leveling.

A partial inventory of 255 first- and second-order houses taken in 1344 indicates there were a total of 2,752 members in the order and 1,146 of these were brothers and 1,606 were sisters. These inventories indicate that women tended to live in sister-only houses, whereas men lived almost exclusively in mixed gender houses. Forty-one percent of the houses housed only sisters, whereas in only 1.4 percent of the houses were there only brothers. This evidence for a female majority indicates the desire for apostolic living and community service was strong among women, even in the highly patriarchal climate of medieval Italy and suggests a comparison with the Beguines of Flanders.

The Humiliati were well known at the time for the production of panni humiliati. This coarse, usually undyed wool was produced for sale or contribution to the poor, and was meant to counteract the escalating prices of wool in the commercial market. Ignoring Innocent's injunction, women of the Humiliati were also actively engaged in a number of very public, civic-centered occupations. Benefiting from the bequests of entrants, they owned land, acted as landlords, loaned money at a low interest to the poor (to counteract the high interest charged by the bankers and merchants), administered hospitals, and coordinated poor relief.

SALLY M. BRASHER

References and Further Reading

- Andrews, Frances. The Early Humiliati. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1999.
- Bolton, Brenda. "Sources for the Early History of the Humiliati." In Studies in Church History 8 (1971): 125–133.
- . "The Poverty of the Humiliati." In Poverty in the Middle Ages, edited by David Flood. Werl/Westfalen: Dietrich-Coelde-Verlag, 1975, pp. 52–59.
- Brasher, Sally. Women of the Humiliati. New York: Routledge Press, 2001.
- Grundmann, Herbert. Religious Movements in the Middle Ages, translated by Steven Rowan, edited by Robert Lerner. South Bend, Ind.: University of Notre Dame Press, 1995.
- Little, Lester. Religious Poverty and the Profit Economy. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1978.

See also Almsgiving and Charity; Artisan Families, Women of; Beguines; Canonesses; Confraternities; Cities and Towns; Double Monasteries; Heretics and Heresy; Investment and Credit; Italy; Lay Piety; Laywomen, Religious; Monasticism, Women's; Papal Policy; Poverty, Religious; Premonstratensian Order; Tertiaries; Textile Production for the Market; Work

HUMILITY OF FAENZA

Humility (also known as Umilt or Umilit) of Faenza (1226–1310), Vallombrosan abbess, is among the minority of religious women in the Middle Ages who openly preached to her nuns. In 1250, after nine years of marital life and the death of her two children, she entered the double Benedictine monastery of Saint Perpetua of Faenza while her husband joined the brothers of the abbey. In 1254, she became a recluse at the Vallombrosan church of Saint Apollinaris. There she received spiritual guidance from the Vallombrosan abbot Crispin, while she gave spiritual counsel to the local community from her cell. Attracting numerous followers, in 1266 she established the first Vallombrosan nunnery, Santa Maria at Malta near Faenza. The convent flourished until 1281 when the Guelfs destroyed it. Consequently, Humility moved to Florence and founded the Vallombrosan nunnery of St. John the Evangelist in 1282, where she was abbess until her death. Her role as religious mentor is one of contradiction. Her Latin vita claims that Humility's ability to read Latin was miraculous. Moreover, in her sermons, which she dictated in Latin to a female scribe, Humility indicates that the author of her homilies was not she but God speaking through her. Nonetheless, her ability to read Latin and preach on profound theological themes indicates a deeper learning than she or her hagiographers explicitly reveal. Her sermons, which survive in two eighteenth-century copies based on a fourteenth-century edition no longer extant, are the most significant indicators of the depth and breadth of this monastic educator.

CAROLYN MUESSIG

References and Further Reading

- Biagio. "Vita S. Humilitatis." edited by Daniel Papebroch. In Acta sanctorum, May, vol. 5. Paris, 1866. Paragraphs 1–32, pp. 207–214.
- . "Life of St Umiltà, Abbess of the Vallombrosan Order in Florence." English translation in Elizabeth Alvilda Petroff, Consolation of the Blessed. Millerton, N.Y.: Alta Gaia Society, 1979, pp. 121–127.
- . Le Vite di Umiltà: Agiografia trecentesca dal latino al volgare, edited by Adele Simonetti. Florence: Edizioni del Galluzzo, 1997.
- Holloway, Julia Bolton. Beata Umiltà: Sguardo sulla Santa Umiltà: Contemplating on Holy Humility. In Italian and English. Florence: Editoriale gli Arcipressi, 2004.
- Humility of Faenza. Sermones S Humilitatis de Faventia, edited by Torello Sala. Florence: Calasantiana, 1884.
- . I sermoni di Umiltà da Faenza: Studio e edizione, edited by Adele Simonetti. Società internazionale per lo studio del medioevo latino. Biblioteca di "Medioevo latino" 14. Spoleto: Centro italiano di studi sull'alto medioevo, 1995.
- . The Sermons of Humility of Faenza, translated by Catherine Mooney. Boydell and Brewer, Forthcoming.
- Mooney, Catherine. "Authority and Inspiration in the Vitae and Sermons of Humility of Faenza." In Medieval Monastic Preaching, edited by Carolyn Muessig. Leiden: Brill, 1998, pp. 123–144.
- Petroff, Elizabeth Alvilda. Body and Soul: Essays on Medieval Women and Mysticism. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1994.
- . ed. Medieval Women's Visionary Literature. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1986.

See also Abbesses; Education, Monastic; Hagiography; Literacy and Reading; Latin; Sermons and Preaching

HUNTING AND FALCONRY

In poetry and art, women were associated frequently with falconry. High social estate was expressed with examples from nature, identifying raptors as lords of the sky. Flying hawks at heron, pheasant, partridge, larks, hare, and rabbit seemed the quintessence of courtly elegance. It required the utmost patience to train birds in loyalty and to tolerate their quirks in the hunt, and so the quality of one's character was on display to all. Female birds grew bigger than tiercels (males) and were preferred as the keener hunters. Ladies flew both long-winged (true falcons, such as the peregrine) and short-winged hawks. The peregrine, which was flown in open country with good visibility, either soared aloft and "waited" for game to be flushed from the ground or flew from the fist in a winding ascent until she reached altitude (the "tower"), from which heights she "stooped" upon her prey. Goshawks and sparrowhawks were launched from the fist in wooded country directly at low-flying birds and ground game. The marginalia of Queen Mary's Psalter show women in pairs flying hawks together. Gace de la Buigne (Roman des Deduis) depicts falconry as offering edgy competition as well as fellowship. In one vignette a company of men of diverse social ranks and trades bond for a week of falconry, trying out each other's birds, dining on their catch, and telling funny stories. In another, a mixed company of courtiers ambles through the countryside at a pace allowing leisure to socialize and flirt. Men and women depicted together with hawk or hound inevitably evoked veneration of the venerable kind.

Illustrations in the Manesse Codex show couples hawking and enjoying amorous pleasures; in the same book the poet of K(ren)berg declares women easy to lure like the falcon, and (speaking in an ambiguous persona) tropes a once-loyal lover as a tamed falcon flown away. As in erotic allegories of the hunt, sex was troped as the kill, whereby there remained latitude for the feminine subject to voice agony or desire. Hunting, which was practiced with more variety of means and method, saw women engaged in many roles. The par force chase of deer with hounds, which involved complex tracking, hazardous riding, and the high ritual of slaughter, was supported by establishments staffed by men. The Taymouth Hours (which, as has been argued also for Queen Mary's Psalter, may possibly have been made for Isabella of France, queen of Edward II) uniquely depicts women hunting deer and boar, handling trophy heads and butchering game; its owner was a lady of the Neville family, who had filled the office of England's chief forester for much of a century. The official culture, however, was deeply masculine. The hart and buck were the preferred quarry. Treatises specified techniques and nomenclature for male game including their antlers. The honor portion of the kill (for the lord of the hunt) was the liver and testicles. Ladies nonetheless rode with or behind the main rout, sitting their mounts astride and riding singly or in pairs and couples. Their influence as onlookers, as at tournaments, cannot have been negligible. The Boke of Huntynge in the Book of St. Albans, ascribed to Dame Juliana Berners (Barnes?), though her identity and authorship are questionable, speaks in the persona of a mother instructing her son how to chase deer, hare, and boar par force. Edward of Norwich commends his treatise The Master of Game to gentlemen, as well as ladies, advising that their hunting keep the custom of the king's house in remembrance. His chapter on the bow-and-stable reflects the hunt women most favored: Shooting driven game with bow or crossbow from a stand, and coursing deer and hare with greyhounds. The former requires skill with a weapon, the latter a command of game-lore and jargon. Queen Mary's Psalter shows ladies blowing signals on a horn, shooting deer, and hunting rabbits with ferrets and nets. The common work of subsistence hunting, such as rabbiting in warrens, was shared by men and women. Poaching was mostly left to men.

WILLIAM P. MARVIN

References and Further Reading

- Almond, Richard. Medieval Hunting. Phoenix Mill: Sutton, 2003.
- Cummins, John. The Hound and the Hawk: The Art of Medieval Hunting. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1988.
- Edward of Norwich, 2nd Duke of York. The Master of Game, edited and translated by W. A. and F. Baillie-Grohman. Forward by Theodore Roosevelt. New York: Duffield, 1909. Reprint New York: AMS, 1974.
- Hands, Rachel, ed. English Hawking and Hunting in The Boke of St. Albans: A Facsimile Edition. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1975.
- Rooney, Anne. Hunting in Middle English Literature. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell Press, 1993.
- Thiébaux, Marcelle. The Stag of Love: The Chase in Medieval Literature. Ithaca N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1974.

See also Noble Women

HUSBANDS AND HUSBANDRY

Historians of women's experience in the Middle Ages have understandably written a great deal about marriage, because becoming a wife was important for most women, providing the most common means for respectability and some measure of security. We should not overlook, however, the corresponding importance of marriage for men's adult identities. The vast majority of men sought to become husbands and to remain married.

This subject was long ignored, partly due to the much later development of interest among historians in questions of masculinity in the Middle Ages. Another reason is that, at least in the High and late Middle Ages, there was somewhat more room for unmarried men than for unmarried women. The church provided, for ambitious, well-connected, and fortunate men, a way to make a living without a wife, especially after the eleventh-century Gregorian reforms, when clerical celibacy began to be enforced. Holy orders opened doors to literacy, higher education, political influence at various levels, social respectability, and even prominence, and, for the lucky few, wealth and comfort, while also satisfying the spiritual needs of those who felt called to the religious life. (In comparison, far fewer women were ever able to live as celibate nuns.) Yet we must not exaggerate the degree to which average men would have expected these things from a religious career, nor their willingness to forego marriage in order to have a chance at them. Most clerics remained poor parish or chantry priests, and only a minority could ever aspire to the desirable offices higher up in the church hierarchy.

Marriage, in contrast, was the only practical option in a traditional society like medieval Europe for men with the typical wishes and goals of their time and place. Simply put, most men could not hope to make a manageable life for themselves without a woman, which generally meant a wife. Only by marriage could a man become the head of a household, the marker in most European societies of mature masculinity, as the use of the word Mann in German to mean both "husband" and "adult male" reminds us. The stigma generally attaching to nonmarital relationships meant that a man could not really have a respectable household with a woman he was not married to. Women's work—the array of domestic and agricultural tasks that fell to women by custom—was so important in everyday life that a household had great difficulty functioning without a woman. Moreover, wives were not only workers but also managers, who supervised the other members of the household: children, labourers, and servants. While, as in every age, some men fathered children out of wedlock, marriage was the only way a man could have legitimate children to whom to pass on the property (whether land, movables, or money) he had worked hard to preserve. Children would also be likely to offer some care in old age. Along with such practical considerations, we must also take into account the basic human needs and desires for sexual activity, affection, and companionship. Indeed, given the high risks of pregnancy and childbirth, and the consequent rate of female mortality, it was quite common for a man to become a husband more than once.

The English word husband, different in emphasis from German Mann and from those languages (mari, maritus, marito) where husband literally means "married male," has an instructive history. According to the Oxford English Dictionary, the uses of husband to mean “the male head of a household” are the earliest (c. 1000). Those implying “a man joined to a woman by marriage” are contemporary with those conveying household management (fourteenth to sixteenth centuries). The related word husbandry is first found to mean “domestic economy” about 1290 and to mean “careful management” in 1362. So in medieval England, these meanings were very much intertwined, and it is likely that the same values were connected in other European cultures.

This makes the word husbandry a useful one for understanding mature masculine identity. Good husbandry denoted the prudent management of a man’s own: wife, dependents (children and servants), money, and property. To abuse, misuse, or waste any of these valuable components diminished husbandly and, therefore, masculine identity, as surely as did allowing them to escape one’s own governance. The self-command required to maintain this balance was related to the same values some men of the upper and middling classes learned as boys in courtesy literature, even though that literature says very little explicitly about being a husband. A masculine identity was maintained in the eyes of a man’s social peers, who kept an eye on every aspect of his husbandry, and that social opinion constituted the honour a man had to preserve. Neighbours and kin might ridicule one kind of bad husband as a cuckold, or they might withdraw from another who abused what was his own. Law and custom assumed that a husband was the ultimate authority in his own household, and granted him considerable freedom to discipline his wife and dependents as he saw fit. Yet husbandry was a nuanced business, which we cannot simplistically characterize as the exercise of “power,” “control,” or “dominance.”

DEREK NEAL

References and Further Reading

- McSheffrey, Shannon. Love and Marriage in Late Medieval London. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Medieval Institute Publications, 1995.
- . “Men and Masculinity in Late Medieval London Civic Culture: Governance, Patriarchy, and Reputation.” In Conflicted Identities and Multiple Masculinities: Men in the Medieval West, edited by Jacqueline Murray. New York and London: Garland, 1999, pp. 243–267.
- Neal, Derek. “Masculine Identity in Late Medieval English Society and Culture.” In Writing Medieval History, edited Nancy F. Partner. London: Hodder Arnold, 2005, pp. 171–188.

See also Demography; Division of Labor; Domestic Abuse; Family (Earlier Middle Ages); Family (Later Middle Ages); Household Management; Marriage, Christian; Remarriage; Sexuality: Extramarital Sex; Sexuality: Sex in Marriage

I

---

IBERIA

In medieval Iberia Christian, Muslim, and Jewish women lived concurrently for centuries. When Arab and Berber invaders swept away the Visigothic Kingdom in 711, Christian refugees fled to the mountainous north and established small kingdoms and counties that resisted the emirate-caliphate of Córdoba (until 1031). Smaller states (taifas) supplanted the caliphate and were strengthened from time to time by militant Berbers from the Maghrib, but they gradually lost ground to the strengthening Christian powers. Thus began the Reconquest of Muslim Iberia (al-Andalus), a long process characterized by aggressive warfare, strategic defense, and many displacements of population, which affected women in particular. By 1300 the peninsula was ruled by five kingdoms: Castile (with Asturias, Galicia, and León after 1230), Aragon (with Catalonia after 1134), Portugal, Navarre, and Muslim Granada. During the thirteenth century Castile, Aragon, and Portugal had made deep conquests south into al-Andalus, but Castile became the dominant member of the quintet and covered two-thirds of the peninsula with a population that had grown to 4,500,000 by the time it seized Granada in 1492. By the marriage of Queen Isabel (v. 1474–1504) and King Fernando (v. 1479–1516), Castile and Aragon joined to become the dynastic unity we call Spain.

Women in al-Andalus (711–1492)

After 711 most Christian women in the south married Muslim invaders, converted, and became Arabized in culture and religion. The caliphate, however, respected groups of practicing Jews and Mozarabs (Christians living under Muslim rulers), and the latter preserved several monasteries of female and male religious. Some of the zealous martyrs who rebelled against the rulers of ninth-century Córdoba were women, but only a handful are known among later Mozarabs, mostly monks, who fled north to Christian Iberia in reaction to the intolerance of newly arrived Berbers. We hear no more of Mozarabs after about 1200, apart from a significant remnant in Toledo, which was also home to an important Jewish community.

Muslim women wore traditional Middle Eastern garb, blue if in mourning, and a married woman wore a veil on the rare occasions she left her house, perhaps to visit a bathhouse, a mosque, or a cemetery, which in some cases she had founded. Polygamy was too costly for all but the powerful and died out by the twelfth century, but concubinage and repudiation were practiced. Courtesans and mothers of rulers' heirs were well educated and are remembered for their poetry and the books they copied, as well as for knowledge of music, medicine, law, and theology. Slave women who were singers or trained artisans were especially valuable. Both Muslim and Christian armies and raiding parties took prisoners of both sexes. Northern Christian women were sold in Muslim cities as slaves suitable for the fields, households, and harems of al-Andalus. Some were ransomed. Others escaped or were rescued, reputedly by Saint Dominic of Silos. Captives also converted to Islam, bore Muslim children, and otherwise contrived to evade the auction block, deep dungeons, and laborious suffering that awaited.

Muslim Women in Christian Iberia

Female slaves (moras) with Islamic names appear in ninth- and tenth-century documents, and captive slaves continued to outnumber free Muslims in Castile until the end of the Middle Ages. Mudejars (free Muslims living under a Christian ruler) originated in the areas of Iberia annexed by Christian states. They were proprietary subjects of Christian rulers, as were Jews, and lived in aljamas (communities) protected and taxed by royal and seigniorial officials. Most Mudejars were poor peasants and artisans with skills in agriculture and construction. They were very numerous in the Ebro Valley and Aragonese Valencia, but in Castile the Mudejar population of about 600,000 in 1300 dwindled to no more than 25,000 by the end of the Middle Ages as most left for Granada or Africa. Muslim women in Castile were banned from working as servants in Christian homes in 1258, and Christian servants could not work in Muslim homes. Those who converted to Christianity were called Moriscas, but conversion was very gradual until it became mandatory beginning in 1502. Muslim lore of special interest to women, about cosmetics, perfumes, gardens, and women's health, continued to slip through the porous frontiers between Muslim and Christian Iberia and survives in late medieval recipe books.

Jewish Women in Christian Iberia

There were perhaps 50,000 Jews in the Peninsula in 1300, although there may have been 80,000 by 1492. Their communities were highly respected in both Muslim and Christian Iberia through much of the Middle Ages, and they enjoyed considerable independence in private matters. A Jewish woman's position was determined by the patriarchal structure of the family as defined in Talmudic Law: status depended upon her being a wife or mother. The property she brought into marriage belonged to her husband, and the oldest son was preferred in inheritance over his widowed mother and sisters. Jewish ordinances of 1432 in Castile, however, increased daughters' and widows' rights of inheritance and weakened arbitrarily coerced marriages.

Jews were mainly tradesmen and artisans, and many women shared the work of their families, particularly in provisioning and textile trades. A few female doctors are reported in Aragon, but midwives were much more common. Poor Jewish women found work as mourners, prostitutes, and purveyors of creams and potions. Many Jewish women worked as servants, as did Christians, but thirteenth-century law prohibited Christian women from working in Jewish homes. Jewish or Muslim men who had sexual relations with Christian women risked the death penalty, and all wet-nurses were supposed to suckle only infants born to their own faith.

Influential Jews were tax collectors and money lenders, and sometimes their widows continued to make loans, although not to collect taxes, which required involvement in public finance. In the late fourteenth century the wealth of some Jewish families from these activities inflamed popular resentment among Christians already embittered by war and bad times. Lavish dress, especially that worn by Jewish women, despite royal and ecclesiastical laws restricting it, angered many. After 1391 Jewish neighborhoods were subject to widespread looting and violence. Many Jews were converted by persuasive Christian preachers and became Conversos, but Conversos also antagonized the rabble, who suspected their sincerity as new Christians. Particularly incriminating for women were Jewish dietary customs and domestic rituals, which Converso women were thought to observe secretly. Growing suspicion and the need to prevent Jews from weakening the resolve of the newly converted led to the establishment of the Inquisition in Castile (1478) and, eventually, to the Expulsion (1492).

Christian Women

The Reconquest valued men for their skills in warfare and strength in forging new settlements, but women were necessary to establish permanent communities in a new land. Men who brought their brides to a place received tax exemptions and deferments, and a married man had to establish a primary residence with his wife and children in order to qualify for citizenship. Directly beneficial to women were customs governing the transmission of property. Husbands headed households officially, but Castilian wives shared work and responsibilities and were entitled to half of the property acquired during marriage. Partible inheritance encouraged population growth by dividing family possessions equitably, if not absolutely equally, among all the children. Substantial favoritism toward one child was illegal until the end of the fourteenth century, when a noble could obtain a royal license to give most of his property as a mayorazgo (entailment, an inalienable and indivisible assignment of property) to one of the children, usually his eldest son. Mayorazgos sometimes fell to daughters, and mothers frequently took advantage of bilateral inheritance to bestow their own property on daughters and younger sons. Consolidated and agnatic inheritance, however, was distinctly unfavorable to daughters, as it was in other parts of Europe. Girls might now receive not an equitable distribution but a dowry designed to attract a suitable husband, or a somewhat smaller sum needed to enter a monastery.

Endogamy was common among many groups, especially among the royalty and nobility of the Christian kingdoms. Noble cousins inevitably intermarried, since so many were kin to at least one royal or noble line, like the innumerable descendants of King Alfonso IX of León (d. 1230), who had married queens from both Portugal and Castile and fathered at least eighteen legitimate and illegitimate children. Multiple marriages of men and women were common, owing to deaths of men in warfare and women in childbirth. Yet seven or eight children were far from unusual, and in the fifteenth century some of the children, boys or girls, took the mother's patronymic, especially if she was prominent. Such a woman was the heiress Leonor de Albuquerque (d. 1435), known as rica fembra (grand lady), who became Queen of Aragon. With the right connections, one's daughter might secure a position in such a lady's household. In 1505 Mencía Manuel, Duchess of Medinaceli, employed many ladies, young girls, pages, servants, and slaves. In such a household a good marriage might be arranged, or beautiful courtesans, like the famed fourteenth-century sisters Inés and Juana de Castro, might be found.

Women managed their own and family property at all levels of society, from queens to tradeswomen who ran shops and businesses in towns and cities. Great ladies often governed fortresses, towns, and monasteries as señora (lady), and several such places were repeatedly included in endowments given to royal brides, usually in hostage to matrimonial agreements reached across political boundaries. Talavera de la Reina west of Toledo adopted its title from its señora, the prudent Queen María de Molina (d. 1321). Señoras were not invariably respected. The imperious Teresa, dowager countess of Santa Marta (d. 1470), was attacked by her Galician townsmen of Ribadavia, who dragged her through the streets and stabbed her in the town square.

Many queens and infantas (princesses) set examples by their piety. The infanta Elvira "the Nun" of León (d. 986) was a benefactor of monasteries and esteemed as a royal counsellor, as was the devout and long-lived infanta Sancha of Castile (d. 1159), who promoted widespread ecclesiastical reforms. Admired for piety and charity were Teresa of Portugal (d. 1250) and the saintly Portuguese Queen Isabel of Aragon (d. 1336). Women like Elduara, mother of the tenth-century Galician monastic reformer San Rosendo, emulated royal dedication to good works, which included the foundation and patronage of monasteries for women. The ranks of women in religious life were filled primarily by the aristocracy until the thirteenth century, especially in royal foundations like Las Huelgas at Burgos and Tordesillas on the Duero River. More and more frequently, nobles of lesser rank and townswomen took vows in appropriate convents, and, in the fourteenth century, townswomen called beatas began joining together for prayer and devotions. The beaterio (house of devout women) accommodated those who had neither the dowry nor the social connections needed for many monasteries. They also avoided full monastic enclosure, which ecclesiastical authorities were demanding anew. Emparedadas ( anchoresses) chose to live walled up in cells at churches, where they received food and gifts from the urban populace and dispensed wisdom through small windows. Such a cell survives at the parish church of San Esteban in Astorga.

Daughters were schooled at home or, like the infantas of Navarre, educated in a convent. Vernacular literacy in women was rather commonplace by the thirteenth century, but Latin was fading even as a documentary language. King Alfonso X of Castile wrote a letter in the vernacular to the Benedictine nuns of San Pedro de las Dueñas in 1253, explicitly to permit all the sisters to understand him. Knowledge of Latin was revived in the fifteenth century when a learned woman might own a multilingual library. Whatever its contents, she frequently bequeathed her most personal devotional books to a close kinswoman.

The most typical women residing in towns and cities were tradeswomen: bakers, laundresses, weavers, tailors, shopkeepers. Privileged noblewomen, wives of knights and gentlemen, rich widows who trafficked in the land market, and many poor ones seeking charity inhabited established towns. Domiciled mistresses of young men and priests, as well as prostitutes, were characteristic residents, as were women in the Jewish and Moorish quarters. Some women had come with their families when the town was first settled, or they were recent arrivals. The hard-working peasant women from villages nearby, who came to sell produce or attend a fair, did all kinds of farm work at home alongside men, especially at harvest. These largely anonymous peasants were the majority of Iberia's medieval women, but they, too, gravitated to the Peninsula's many towns and cities to join those who lived within the walls.

HEATH DILLARD

References and Further Reading

- Beceiro Pita, Isabel. "La relación de las mujeres castellanas con la cultura escrita (siglo XIII–inicios del XVI)." In Libro y lecturas en la Península Ibérica y América, siglos XIII a XVIII, edited by Antonio Castillo Gómez. Salamanca: Junta de Castilla y León, 2003, pp. 15–52.
- Cantera Montenegro, Enrique. "La mujer judía en la España medieval." Espacio, Tiempo y Forma: Revista de la Facultad de Geografía e Historia, serie III: Historia Medieval, vol. 2. Homenaje al Profesor Eloy Benito Ruano. 1989, pp. 37–63.
- Del Moral, Celia, ed. Árabes, judías y cristianas: Mujeres en la Europa medieval. Granada: Universidad de Granada, Seminario de Estudios de la Mujer, 1993.
- Dillard, Heath. Daughters of the Reconquest: Women in Castilian Town Society, 1100–1300. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984.
- Durán, María Angeles and Cristina Segura Graino, eds. El trabajo de las mujeres en la Edad Media hispana. Colección Laya, 3. Madrid: Al-Mudayna, 1988.
- Fonquerne, Yves-René, and Alfonso Esteban, eds. "La condición de la mujer en la Edad Media: Coloquio hispano-francés." Actas del Coloquio celebrado en la Casa de Velázquez, 5–7 Noviembre 1984. Madrid: Casa de Velázquez–Universidad Complutense, 1986.
- García Herrero, María del Carmen. Las mujeres en Zaragoza en el siglo X. 2 vols. Cuadernos de Zaragoza, 62. Zaragoza: Ayuntamiento de Zaragoza, 1990.
- Graña Cid, María del Mar, ed. Las sabias mujeres. 2 vols. Colección Laya, 13 and 15. Madrid: Al-Mudayna, 1994–1995.
- López Beltrán, María Teresa, ed. Las mujeres en Andalucía. Actas del 2º encuentro interdisciplinar de estudios de la mujer en Andalucía, vol. 2. Biblioteca de Estudios sobre la Mujer, 8. Málaga: Diputación de Málaga, 1994.
- Muñoz Fernández, Angela, ed. Beatas y santas neocastellanas: Ambivalencias de la religión y políticas correctoras del poder (SS. XIV–XVI). Madrid: Comunidad de Madrid, Dirección General de la Mujer, 1996.
- Muñoz Fernández, Angela, and María del Mar Graña Cid, eds. Religiosidad femenina: Expectativas y realidades (SS. VIII–XVIII). Colección Laya, 7. Madrid: Al-Mudayna, 1991.
- Navas, Carmen Caballero, ed. and trans. Una compilación hebrea de saberes sobre el cuidado de la salud y la belleza del cuerpo femenino. Textos: Lengua Hebrea. Granada: Universidad de Granada, 2003.
- Pallares, María del Carmen. Iduara, una aristocrata del siglo X. 2nd ed. rev. Galicia Medieval: Estudios, 4. A Coruña: Seminario de Estudios Galegos, 2004.
- Pastor, Reyna, et al., eds. "Textos para la historia de las mujeres en la Edad Media: al-Andalus y reinos occidentales cristianos medievales." In Textos para la historia de las mujeres de España, edited by A. M. Aguado, et al. Historia, serie minor. Madrid: Cátedra, 1994, pp. 123–221.
- Segura Graino, Cristina, et al., eds. Las mujeres en las ciudades Actas de las Terceras Jornadas de Investigación Interdisciplinaria. Colección de Estudios de la Mujer 7. Madrid: Seminario de Estudios de la Mujer, Universidad Autónoma de Madrid, 1984.
- . La voz del silencio. 2 vols. Colección Laya, 9 and 11. Madrid: Al-Mudayna, 1992.
- Stone, Marilyn, and Carmen Benito-Vessels, eds. Women at Work in Spain, from the Middle Ages to Early Modern Times. New York: Peter Lang, 1998.
- Surtz, Ronald E. Writing Women in Late Medieval and Early Modern Spain: The Mothers of Santa Teresa of Ávila. Middle Ages Series. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1995.
- Viguera, María J., ed. La mujer en al-Andalus, reflejos históricos de su actividad y categorías sociales. Actas de las V Jornadas de Investigación Interdisciplinaria, 1: al-Andalus. Colección del Seminario de Estudios de la Mujer, 13. Madrid and Sevilla: Ediciones de la Universidad Autónoma de Madrid and Editoriales Andaluzas Unidas de Sevilla, 1989.

See also Anchoresses; Artisan Families, Women of; Berenguela; Castro, Inés de; Cities and Towns; Concubines; Dowry and Other Marriage Gifts; Education, Lay; Heiresses; Inheritance; Isabel I; Isabel of Aragon; Jewish Women; Ladies-in-Waiting; Landholding and Property Rights; Lay Piety; Literature, Iberian; López de Córdoba, Leonor; Monastic Enclosure; Monasticism and Nuns; Muslim Women: Iberia; Noble Women; Prostitutes; Queens and Empresses: The West; Slaves; Teresa de Cartagena; Urraca; Women Authors: Spanish Texts

ICONS, BYZANTINE

In Byzantium the word icon (eikon) refers to portable portraits of Christ, the Virgin, and saints or scenes from their lives in metal, enamel, ivory, and steatite, as well as tempera or encaustic on wood panels. In terms of technique (tempera or encaustic on wood), the icon's origin has been traced back to the funerary portraits in Roman Egypt. Yet, unlike these images of the deceased that functioned in the burial rites and visualized the transport and mystical transformation of the individual in the afterlife, Christian icons were understood as commemorative images, protecting the community. The rise of icons is also connected with the cult of relics and miraculous acheiropoiatoi (images not made by human hand).

Relics became established in the Holy Land by the second half of the fourth century, while acheiropoiatoi emerged in the second half of the sixth century. Both relics and acheiropoiatoi carry sacred energy, for they are extensions or imprints of the divine body. Icons, by contrast, are portraits lacking the touch of the sacred body and energy. With Byzantium's loss of the Holy Land to the Arabs in the seventh century, the obstructed access to holy sites and relics must have catapulted icons into the former position of relics, i.e., as means through which to obtain access to sacred energy. It is this spiritual claim placed on the icon that precipitated Iconoclasm (730–843), a crisis over the validity of images and relics in the Christian cult.

The Virgin Hodegetria (“The One Who Leads the Way”). Byzantine icon, second half of the fourteenth century. Location: National Museum, Belgrade, Serbia and Montenegro. Credit: Erich Lessing / Art Resource, N.Y.

With the triumph of orthodoxy in 843, the icon in Byzantium was strictly defined as an imprint of the visible characteristics of Christ on matter: typos (impression, mold), sphragis (seal), and signon (seal). It is this concept of the icon as imprint rather than painting that became fully expressed in the post-Iconoclast relief icon. Rendered in metal repoussé, ivory, steatite, and enamel, the figures project from the surface into physical space and engage the viewer. The relief icon thus fully answers the Byzantine interest in tactile visuality.

Contrary to the established belief that liturgical and imperial processions in Constantinople frequently included icons, textual evidence as well as the small size of post-Iconoclast icons suggests that these objects were in fact reserved for a private cult throughout the ninth and early tenth centuries. They were not carried in public processions, although they were displayed in churches and private homes. It was only in the eleventh century that icons started to be integrated into public processions, and it is possible to conjecture that, during this period, a new demand for larger-scale icons arose. This need was met by the creation of large processional icons, which consisted of images painted on wood panels covered with expensive silver-gilt revetments. These jewel-encrusted covers integrated the aesthetic of the former small-scale luxury private icons, but expanded their size.

Several important processional icons emerged in Constantinople in the course of the eleventh and twelfth centuries; among these were the icons of the Virgin known as Blachernitissa (of the Blachernai monastery of the Virgin) and Hodegetria (“The One Who Leads the Way”). The Hodegetria gradually became the most powerful icon in Constantinople, protector of the emperor, the city, and the state. It had a litania (procession) on Tuesdays through the streets of the city and was also annually brought to the tombs of the emperors at the mausoleum of the monastery of Christ Pantokrator. Although the emperor thus laid an exclusive claim to Hodegetria, the local aristocracy found ways to gain access to this panel by offering it gifts of silk cloths (encheiria) with prayers inscribed on them. Thereby, a singular luxury object, the Hodegetria, was commoditized and, in a sense, multiplied to meet the growing needs of the urban elite.

The role of women in the promotion of icon veneration in Byzantium has been a debated subject. Judith Herrin has argued that women played a key role in the defense of icons. Supporting her thesis is the evidence of two empresses who reestablished icon veneration (Irene in 787 and Theodora in 843) and the fact that women feature in the accounts about the icon of Christ at the Chalke gate in Constantinople. Robin Cormack has raised objections to this argument by pointing out the ideological character of the legends of Christ at Chalke and inconsistency regarding the identity of the protagonists. In some of the earlier versions, the story of the image of Christ at Chalke enlists the help of noble citizens who protected the image; in other accounts women are enlisted; and finally in the later tenth-century sources the protagonist emerges as a nun, named St. Theodosia. These texts do not give reliable historical evidence on which to reconstruct fervent female devotion to icons. At the same time, the absence of icons from the cathedral and stational (weekly or annual processions in which the stages of the Liturgy are celebrated at different churches along a set route) liturgy and from imperial ceremonies argues for the private function of these images before the late tenth century. Therefore, it is plausible to suggest that, in fact, women were likely involved in the promotion of icons, but to transform them into leading defenders of images is misleading. Further support for this neutral position is offered by the historical circumstances under which icon processions arose; the first public ceremonies with icons were imperial triumphal processions, promoted by the emperor in order to lay claim to the throne by means of his military victories. John I Tzimiskes (969–976) was the first emperor to place an icon of the Virgin on his triumphal chariot and take it through the streets of the city. It was again an emperor, John II Komnenos (1118–1143), who promoted novel imperial commemorative services at the Pantokrator monastery, through which he consolidated the imperial cult.

Aside from the issue of patronage and promotion of icon veneration, an interesting question emerges regarding the gender of icons. Again based on Byzantine image theory, the icon is understood as female; just as the maternal body of Mary has received the divine Logos and given it a material form, so too the icon has received the imprint of the Spirit on its surface. At the same time, the address of the icon, its gaze, is male. In a typical icon of the Virgin holding the Child, the eyes of Mary frequently evade the gaze of the viewer and direct attention to her Child. By contrast, the gaze of the Christ is straightforward, addressing the faithful and offering a response: his blessing. Through gaze and gesture, the icon presents a pictorial affirmation of the success of the prayer; it is a figural, visual assurance of future divine favor.

BISSERA V. PENTCHEVA

References and Further Reading

- Barber, C. Figure and Likeness: On the Limits of Representation in Byzantine Iconoclasm. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 2002.
- Belting, H. Likeness and Presence: A History of the Image Before the Era of Art. Bonn, 1990. English translation, E. Jephcott, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1994.
- Bierbrier, M., ed. Portraits and Masks: Burial Customs in Roman Egypt. London: The British Museum Press, 1997.
- Brown, P. The Cult of Saints: Its Rise and Function in Latin Christianity. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1981.
- Byzantine Icons: Art, Technique, and Technology*, edited by M. Vassilaki. Heraklion: Crete University Press, 2002.
- Cormack, R. Writing in Gold: Byzantine Society and Its Icons. London: George Philip, 1985.
- . Painting the Soul: Icons, Death Masks and Shrouds. London: Reaktion, 1997.
- . “Women and Icons, and Women in Icons.” In Women, Men and Eunuchs: Gender in Byzantium, edited by Liz James. London/New York: Routledge, 1997, pp. 24–57.
- . “The Eyes of the Mother of God.” In Images of the Mother of God: Perceptions of the Theotokos in Byzantium, edited by M. Vassilaki. London: Ashgate, 2005, pp. 167–174.
- Doxiadis, E. The Mysterious Fayum Portraits: Faces from Ancient Egypt. London: Thames and Hudson, 1995.
- Eastmond, A., and L. James, eds. Icon & Word: the Power of Images in Byzantium. Studies Presented to Robin Cormack. London: Ashgate, 2003.
- Grabar, A. Martyrium. Recherches sur le culte des reliques et l'art chrétien antique, 3 vols. Paris: Collège de France, 1943–1946.
- Herrin, J. “Women and the Faith in Icons in Early Christianity.” In Culture, Ideology and Politics. Essays for Eric Hobsbawm. London: Routledge, 1984, pp. 56–83.
- Pentcheva, B. “The Supernatural Protector of Constantinople: The Virgin and Her Icons in the Tradition of the Avar Siege.” Byzantine and Modern Greek Studies 26 (2002): 2–41.
- . Icons and Power. The Mother of God in Byzantium. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 2005.
- Walker, S., ed. Ancient Faces: Mummy Portraits from Roman Egypt. New York: Routledge, 1997. Reprint, 2000.

See also Byzantium; Devotional Art; Gaze; Irene; Mary, Virgin; in Art

IDA OF BOULOGNE

Saint Ida of Boulogne (c. 1040–1113), daughter of Godfrey the Bearded, duke of Lorraine (d. 1059), was wife of Eustace II, count of Boulogne (d. 1089), and mother of Eustace III, count of Boulogne (d. 1125), as well as Godfrey of Bouillon (d. 1100) and Baldwin of Boulogne (d. 1118), leaders of the first crusade and rulers of Jerusalem. She maintained relations with Anselm of Bec, Hugh of Cluny, and Bishop Osmund of Astorga. She was buried at the priory of Le Wast, where her Life was probably composed (1130–1135) at the request of her granddaughter Matilda (d. 1152), wife of King Stephen of England, who claimed she was cured at Ida's grave.

Thus, Ida was connected to royal saints like Margaret of Scotland, Matilda's other grandmother, related to Edward the Confessor, king of England (d. 1066), and descended from Stephen, king of Hungary (d. 1038). As protector of the Church and the needy in Boulogne and England, Ida was a perfect model for Christian princesses. She was pictured as a new Maria, a holy mother, not only of outstanding sons but of all Christians. She left a dominant mark upon the self-identity of the House of Boulogne. Since the late twelfth century, she has been remembered mainly in relation to the first crusade and her heroic son Godfrey. Then, probably at the instigation of another Matilda of Boulogne (d. 1211), granddaughter of the Matilda mentioned earlier, and her husband Henry of Brabant (d. 1235), the legend of the Swan Knight, who supposedly was Ida's father, was included in the French Cycle de la Croisade.

RENÉE NIP

References and Further Reading

- Anonymous. "De B. Ida, Vidua, Comitissa Bononiae in Gallo Belgica." In Acta Sanctorum, edited by Godfrey Henschen and Daniel Papenbroch. April 13th, Paris and Rome, 1866.
- Duby, Georges. Mâle moyen age: De l'amour et autres essais. Paris: Flammarion, 1988.
- Nip, Renée. "Godelieve of Gistel and Ida of Boulogne." In Sanctity and Motherhood, edited by Anneke B. Mulder-Bakker. New York and London: Garland Publishing, 1995, pp. 191–223.
- Tanner, Heather J. Families, Friends and Allies: Boulogne and Politics in Northern France and England, c. 879–1160. Leiden and Boston: Brill, 2004.

See also Crusades and Crusading Literature; England; Flanders; France, Northern; Hagiography; Literature, Old French; Margaret of Scotland; Marriage, Christian; Noble Women

ILLEGITIMACY

Those born out of wedlock are illegitimate. That principle was understood in Roman and Germanic law, by the medieval church and governing bodies. The differences among them revolved around determining what was a valid marriage (and, in consequence, who exactly was illegitimate) and what restrictions or disabilities attached to illegitimacy.

For secular law, marriage was a matter of formal legalities that differentiated a marriage from informal concubinage and temporary or thoroughly illicit (adultery, incest) sexual relationships. Standards of legality, however, were not always clearly defined; local opinion could count heavily for deciding what couple was indeed married. Church law, following Gratian (c. 1140) and the important decretals of Alexander III (1159–1181), muddied the waters by asserting the validity, if not legality, of clandestine unions in the interest of offspring. Prohibition of divorce also precluded serial monogamy and the legitimacy of resultant offspring. The triumph of clerical celibacy entailed the illegitimacy of all clerical children.

Illegitimacy mattered because it resulted in penalties for the illegitimate. By canon law and penitential teaching, illegitimacy sprang from sinful actions on the part of the parents. That sin, parallel to the sin of Adam and Eve, set a stain (macula) on the children. That mark justified the lesser status and disabilities that fell on them. It also heightened the sense of shame or embarrassment at the illegitimate pregnancy and birth. The greater the sense of stigma attached to illegitimacy, the greater the penalties.

For the Church the chief penalty was barring illegitimates, including the children of clergy, from clerical offices. However, dispensations were made available, wholesale purchase of which became a considerable source of income for some bishops and the papacy by the eve of the Reformation. Conversely, from a concern for the humanity of the bastard child, the Church affirmed rights to sustenance that were not found in Roman or Germanic laws, where the abandonment of children and infanticide were more prominent avenues by which to deal with unwanted children.

The major disability falling on all illegitimates was the curtailing or total removal of rights to inherit from their fathers. Paternity was not certain or admitted for many illegitimates, in contrast to maternity. Even legitimate paternity seemingly required the harsh rules and high value placed on women's virginity before marriage and marital fidelity. Where illegitimate maternity was evident or conceded, succession rights were not automatic.

In areas of Roman law influence, children born of concubinage, where parents were otherwise single and cohabited with a "marital affection," but without formal legalities and property arrangements, were termed natural (naturales). They had a limited right to succession. In the absence of legitimate children, they could inherit, and they were legitimated to full inheritance by subsequent marriage of their parents. Such a device was not available to other categories of illegitimates (the spurii or bastardi), whose father was either unknown or had a relationship to the mother that was brief or, worse, adulterous or incestuous. For these, possibilities of inheritance, even in the absence of legitimate children, sometimes even despite a legitimation by imperial rescript, were minimal or nonexistent. Canonists denounced the occasional secular laws allowing such children succession rights on the grounds that, by mitigating penalties for them, parental sin was encouraged.

Included in succession rights were those to hold office or exercise authority, but here a vital distinction must be drawn between institutional offices and dynastic succession. City-states or guilds could effectively preclude illegitimates from office. Venice notably supervised patrician marriages with an eye to keeping bastards from office. For families, when the direct legitimate line failed, in contrast, an illegitimate provided an alternative blood continuity. From William the Bastard, conqueror and king of England (1066–1087) to several Este lords of Ferrara, and many more, royal and princely lines survived on illegitimate succession and built marriage alliances with illegitimate, as well as legitimate, offspring.

The lived realities of illegitimates' lives varied by place, but maybe more by social status. The wealthy could afford, symbolically and financially, to flaunt laws and social mores and thus recognize and raise illegitimate children. Many, like Leon Battista Alberti (1404–1472), ended up in clerical careers; a few enjoyed the same advantages as legitimate siblings. On the lower end of the social spectrum, some illegitimates suffered few consequences of appearing prior to their parents' wedding; many others were left to foundling homes, where available, or abandoned. In general, the fate of illegitimates served to remind legitimates how fortunate they were. On both ends of society, moreover, gender played a crucial role. Illegitimate girls were more likely to be abandoned or so neglected that they appeared significantly less often among identifiable surviving illegitimates.

THOMAS KUEHN

References and Further Reading

- Bestor, Jane Fair. "Bastardy and Legitimacy in the Formation of a Regional State in Italy: The Estense Succession." Comparative Studies in Society and History 38 (1996): 549–585.
- Brundage, James A. Law, Sex, and Christian Society in Medieval Europe. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1987.
- Kuehn, Thomas. Illegitimacy in Renaissance Florence. Ann Arbor, Mich.: University of Michigan Press, 2002.
- Laslett, Peter, Karla Oosterveen, and Richard M. Smith, eds. Bastardy and Its Comparative History. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1980.
- Leineweber, Anke. Die rechtliche Beziehung des nichtehelichen Kindes zu seinem Erzeuger in der Geschichte des Privatrechts. Königstein: Peter Hanstein, 1978.
- McDevitt, Gilbert Joseph. Legitimacy and Legitimation: An Historical Synopsis and Commentary. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America Press, 1941.
- Schimmelpfennig, Bernhard. "Ex Fornicatione Nati: Studies on the Position of Priests' Sons from the Twelfth to the Fourteenth Century." Medieval and Renaissance History 2 (1979): 1–50.

See also Celibacy; Clerical and Priests' Concubines; Concubines; Honor and Reputation; Infants and Infanticide; Sexuality; Extramarital Sex

IMMACULATE CONCEPTION, DOCTRINE OF

Western belief that the Virgin Mary was conceived without original sin is rooted in the conviction of Augustine of Hippo that the effects of the Fall are transmitted by contagion through sexual intercourse. This remained the predominant opinion in the West despite the argument of Anselm of Canterbury (d. 1109) that sin lay in the will, not in the body. Traditional theology attributed Jesus's sinless nature to the Virgin Birth, removing him from the transmission of original sin. Only later would the same argument be applied to Mary. Since there was no Biblical material on Mary's conception, Latin Christians turned to apocryphal infancy gospels. These texts spread the idea that Mary's parents, Anna and Joachim, conceived her by an embrace before the Golden Gate of the Temple in Jerusalem. This later story, transmitted through the entry for the Feast of Mary's Nativity (September 8) in the Golden Legend of Jacobus de Voragine, became a motif in Western art, but the story is largely ignored by theologians.

Commemoration of Mary's conception on December 8 had become common by the twelfth century. England was a seat of this devotion; Eadmer of Canterbury, Anselm's biographer, wrote a book extolling Mary's excellence, including her purity, as surpassing that of any other creature and another claiming that the Virgin was created in her mother's womb by the action of the Holy Spirit and thus free of original sin. This devotion became common enough in France for Bernard of Clairvaux to rebuke the canons of Lyon for celebrating the feast of Mary's conception. Bernard regarded such an emphasis on Mary's sinless nature as detracting from Jesus's role as redeemer and limiting His uniqueness. He also regarded this feast as contrary to both reason and tradition. Bernard did argue that Mary was purified in her mother's womb. His intervention against the feast of Mary's conception did not end its celebration or defense of the belief that Mary was conceived without the stain of original sin.

The early Scholastic theologians, however, did not advance any idea of Mary's pure conception. They, including Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) and Bonaventure (d. 1274), believed Mary was conceived with concupiscence in her soul but was cleansed in her mother's womb. They also affirmed that the Virgin lived a life free from sin. This was the predominant theological opinion until the English Franciscans William of Ware and Duns Scotus (d. 1308) advanced arguments for Mary's having been conceived without the stain of original sin. Their arguments equated what God could have done to cleanse Mary at conception with what was fitting and hence what purification must have occurred. Many later Franciscan theologians became insistent that this cleansing had indeed happened. They looked less to the Golden Legend or the New Testament than to Old Testament texts to support their arguments. Mary became identified with Wisdom and, more significantly, with the Bride in the Song of Songs. The reference to the Bride as "without stain" (sine macula) [Cant.4:7] was applied to Mary.

The Franciscan argument that Mary's conception was free from original sin evoked a hot response from many Dominicans. They argued that Saint Thomas was correct in believing Mary was conceived with the human stain of concupiscence but cleansed in Anne's womb. (Dominican devotion to Mary focused elsewhere, including on the Rosary.) Questions about Mary's conception became common in academic disputations of the later Middle Ages. This issue, however, was not limited to Scholastic debates. Confraternities honoring Mary's conception also were founded, usually under Franciscan auspices.

The Franciscans found many allies in this debate, the most important one being the University of Paris. Jean Gerson, the university's chancellor in the early fifteenth century, was among the defenders of the doctrine and the feast that celebrated it. Dominicans were expelled from the university for refusing to conform to Marian belief and practice. In 1439, after it had broken with Pope Eugenius IV (1431–1447), the Council of Basel (1431–1449) attempted to declare Mary's sinless conception a dogma of the church. This council's failure placed the Immaculists on the defensive, but a Franciscan became pope as Sixtus IV (1471–1484). He commissioned liturgical offices in honor of Mary's conception and issued decrees that made opposition to the feast and its doctrine more difficult. It was at this time that the term Immaculate Conception became common. Despite this development, most Dominicans remained hostile to the belief that Mary was conceived without the stain of original sin until well after 1500.

The iconography of the Immaculate Conception remained fluid during the Middle Ages. Only later was the "woman clothed with the sun" (Rev. 12:1–17) definitively identified with Mary Immaculate. Nor did musical compositions specially intended for the Feast of the Immaculate Conception become common until later. The Immaculate Conception was only defined as dogma in 1854.

THOMAS IZBICKI

References and Further Reading

- Ellington, Donna Spivey. From Sacred Body to Angelic Soul: Understanding Mary in Late Medieval and Early Modern Europe. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America Press, 2001.
- Graef, Hilda. Mary: A History of Doctrine and Devotion. Westminster, Md.: Christian Classics, 1985.
- Izbicki, Thomas. "The Immaculate Conception and Ecclesiastical Politics from the Council of Basel to the Council of Trent: The Dominicans and Their Foes." Archiv fur Reformationgeschichte 96 (2005): 145–170.

See also Anne, Saint; Gerson, Jean; Holy Kinship; Jacobus de Voragine's Golden Legend; Mary, Virgin; Mary, Virgin: in Art; Scholasticism; Theology

IMPOTENCE

Although the term impotence is occasionally used to characterize the inability to engage in sexual intercourse, by either men or women, it most commonly refers to male sexual incapacity. Impotence should not be confused with infertility, which refers exclusively to the inability to conceive or engender a fetus. In medieval texts, the terms impotentia (impotence) and frigidity (frigidity) are used virtually interchangeably, irrespective of the sex of the subject. Most commonly, however, these terms refer to male sexual dysfunction.

Causes and Consequences

In men, impotence can originate from either physiological or psychogenic causes. A variety of diseases, including prostate cancer and diabetes, can result in impotence. The inability to achieve or sustain an erection can be a natural part of the aging process. As well, a man's state of mind, including stress, fear, or general mental preoccupation, can inhibit his ability to perform sexually and thereby result in temporary impotence.

Discussions of impotence figure prominently in medieval works on law, theology, and medicine, and in the literature associated with the sacraments, particularly marriage and penance. Among clerical writers, impotence was an important issue owing to their concern with the role of sexual intercourse in the formation of the marriage bond. Over the course of the twelfth century, two opposing views of marriage were debated. According to the great Bolognese canonist Gratian, sexual relations consummated the marriage, rendering it a permanent and indissoluble sacrament. In contrast, the Parisian theologian, Peter Lombard, argued that all that was required to establish the sacramental bond was the consent of the man and woman. In the last half of the twelfth century, canonists, theologians, and popes sought to reconcile these competing views and arrive at a common understanding of marriage. The final compromise stated that while the couple needed the capacity to engage in sexual relations, they did not need to have sex in order to form an indissoluble marriage. Thus, impotence was recognized to be an impediment to the very formation of the bonds of marriage.

The canonist Huguccio (d. 1210) identified three types of impotence: that caused by physical incapacity, such as disease or a malformation of the genitals; that caused by mental incapacity, such as insanity or an aversion to women; and that caused by both, such as in the case of a prepubescent child. Another method used to distinguish types of impotence was whether it were natural, such as impotence caused by illness, aging, or genital malformation, or supernatural, that is, impotence caused by maleficium (sorcery). The latter provided a useful explanation for psychogenic impotence, for which there was no external or identifiable cause. Impotence could also be permanent or temporary. It was possible, for example, that supernatural impotence could be temporary and that a spell could lift it or it could be counteracted by prayer and penance.

Supernatural impotence might also render a man incapable of intercourse with any woman or only with one specific woman, most often his wife or paramour. The Church taught that if the impotence extended to one woman alone, the afflicted man could marry another woman. If the impotence was judged to be permanent and extended to all women, the man was prohibited from entering into marriage. If he was already married, the union was declared null on the grounds of permanent impotence. The sexually capable woman was free to marry but the man was prohibited from doing so. If the impotent man subsequently regained sexual potency, this was taken to indicate that the earlier marriage had been annulled in error and the couple was required to resume their marriage, even if the wife had married another man after the declaration of nullity. For this reason, canonists and theologians urged couples to endure in their marriage, despite the husband's impotence; it was preferable for them to remain together, living as brother and sister.

The Childless

While much of Christian theological and canonical literature focused on minute distinctions of timing and interpretation, these were, in fact, relevant to average medieval people, given the social, political, and economic importance of engendering children, whether to inherit a kingdom or a croft. For elites, the absence of children could lead to disputed succession and even civil war. For even the poorest folk, children played a vital economic role, contributing to the household economy and providing care to elderly parents. Finally, sexual intercourse and heirs were an external sign of a man's virility; potency was an indication of power and manliness. To be impotent—or to be accused of impotence—was a disgrace that could be accompanied by a charivari or other types of public shaming.

An example of the anxieties and complexities that could result from impotence is found in the memoirs of the eleventh-century French abbot Guibert of Nogent (1053–c. 1124). He reports that his father was unable to consummate his marriage for seven years. During that period, relatives urged his mother to seek a declaration of nullity and marry someone else. Guibert reports that his father was bewitched by a jealous relative. Given that his father was able to have sexual relations with a concubine during this period, the impotence was clearly considered to be both of supernatural origins and of a specific nature. Eventually, Guibert's parents did consummate their union, but he portrays a situation that was fraught with tensions, accusations, and recriminations.

Belief in the supernatural causes of impotence endured through the Middle Ages and into the early modern period. Women were almost exclusively considered to be the agents of the spells and charms that caused impotence. The most common method was believed to be by tying knots in string, known as an aiguillette. By the end of the Middle Ages, witches were believed not only to render men impotent, but also to make men's penises seem to disappear. The link between female malice, impotence, and witchcraft was discussed at length in the Malleus maleficarum (Hammer of Witches), written in 1486. This work is sensationalist, but it does highlight the close alignment that was believed to exist between women, magic, and impotence.

Legal Recourse

Records from ecclesiastical courts, from as early as the thirteenth century, reveal that people did, in fact, petition the courts to have their marriages declared null on the grounds of impotence. Indeed, there are cases from across Europe that illustrate how the various theological and canonical teachings were implemented and enforced in practice. For the courts, evidence of impotence was particularly difficult to assess, especially if an unhappy couple undertook to collude in order to end an unsatisfactory union. Physicians might examine the man's genitals to ascertain that they were suitable for intercourse. Midwives or matrons would similarly examine the woman; if she were found to be a virgin, the allegation of impotence was considered to be proven. Neighbors and relatives could be asked to testify or swear that, by common repute, the man was considered to be incapable of consummating the marriage.

The usual judgment for proven cases of impotence was a declaration of nullity, the woman receiving a license to remarry, while this was prohibited to the man. There is evidence that some men did remarry as well, and consummate the second union and father children. Evidence suggests that sometimes the original union was reinstated. In other cases, the first union was confirmed to be null on the grounds of supernatural impotence vis-à-vis the first wife, and the second unions were confirmed.

One of the more controversial and problematic means the courts used to ascertain whether a man was impotent was through public proof of sexual incapacity. The man and woman were placed in a bed and, in the presence of witnesses, they were expected to attempt to have sexual intercourse. Evidence from ecclesiastical courts for this practice has been found as early as a thirteenth-century case from the diocese of York. Sometimes termed “trial by congress,” some scholars have denounced this as a particularly immoral practice. It is important to bear in mind that different notions of privacy prevailed in the Middle Ages and few activities occurred in private. Birth and death were public acts attended by friends and family, and a husband and wife might well engage in sexual activity while children and servants slept nearby. Visits to brothels were social outings, with friends sharing food, drink, and prostitutes together in a chamber. Consequently, until more is understood about the everyday sexual practices of medieval people, it is not possible to assess the implications of “trial by congress,” beyond noting that it did provide the courts with independent evidence of a man’s sexual incapacity.

Impotence was both a social and religious issue in the Middle Ages. A man’s sexual incapacity excluded him from marriage and entry into full adulthood. The inability to consummate a marriage and render the conjugal debt could make a man the subject of gossip, rumor, and public shame. Ultimately, a man could be brought before the courts and his virility could become the subject of legal proceedings. Because the ability to consummate lay at the heart of both the secular and religious purposes of marriage, impotence was a topic that received serious attention and practical analysis. It also opened a man to public ridicule and shame, as revealed in the fabliaux and other genres of popular literature.

JACQUELINE MURRAY

References and Further Reading

- Brundage, James A. “The Problem of Impotence.” In Sexual Practices and the Medieval Church, edited by James A. Brundage and Vern L. Bullough. Buffalo: Prometheus Books, 1982, pp. 135–140.
- . “Impotence, Frigidity and Marital Nullity in the Decretists and the Early Decretalists.” In Proceedings of the 7th International Congress of Medieval Canon Law, edited by Peter Linehan. Vatican City, 1988, pp. 407–423.

Reprinted in Sex, Law and Marriage in the Middle Ages, edited by James A. Brundage. London: Variorum, 1993, Article 10.

- Darmon, Pierre. Le Tribunal de l'Impuissance. Paris: Seuil, 1979. Translated by Paul Keegan as Trial by Impotence: Virility and Marriage in Pre-Revolutionary France. London: Chatto & Windus, 1985.
- Guibert of Nogent. A Monk's Confession: The Memoirs of Guibert of Nogent, translated by Paul J. Archambault. University Park, Pa.: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1996.
- Jacquart, Danielle, and Claude Thomasset. Sexuality and Medicine in the Middle Ages, translated by Matthew Adamson. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1988.
- Kramer, Heinrich, and James Sprenger. Malleus Maleficarum: The Classic Study of Witchcraft, translated by Montague Summers. 1928. Reprint, London: Bracken Books, 1996.
- Le Roy Ladurie, Emmanuel. “The Aiguillette: Castration by Magic.” In The Mind and Method of the Historian, translated by Siân Reynolds and Ben Reynolds. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1981, pp. 84–96.
- Murray, Jacqueline. “On the Origins and Role of ‘Wise Women’ in Causes for Annulment on the Grounds of Male Impotence.” Journal of Medieval History 16 (1990): 235–249.
- Stephens, Walter. “Witches Who Steal Penises: Impotence and Illusion in Malleus maleficarum.” Journal of Medieval and Early Modern Studies 28.3 (1998): 495–529.

See also Charivari; Conjugal Debt; Divorce and Separation; Fabliau; Guibert of Nogent’s Mother; Honor and Reputation; Infertility; Law, Canon; Magic and Charms; Marriage, Christian; Marriage, Impediments to; Midwives; Records, Ecclesiastical; Remarriage; Sexuality: Sex in Marriage; Witches

INCEST

Both historical and literary sources indicate that there was great concern about incest in the Middle Ages. The church was anxious not only to save souls but also to exercise control over the marriages of the laity; violence against women and child abuse, however, were not significant issues. Incest was defined much more broadly than it is today, and the definitions changed considerably over the course of a thousand years. Medieval literature is mostly concerned with incest within the nuclear family; historical sources are much more concerned with the extended family.

Church Views

From Augustine (354–430) on, Christian theologians agreed that the incest taboo was a social construction for the benefit of humankind. By the eleventh century it covered seven degrees of consanguinity (relationship by blood) and four degrees of affinity (relationship by marriage or illicit sex). Affinity included all in-laws, and was created by any sexual relationship, however brief. Since the spiritual family was considered as important as the biological family, another taboo area was spiritual incest. This included sexual relations between godparent and godchild, and their immediate families; between a priest and his parishioners; between a lay man and a nun; and between two ecclesiastics.

Effectively marriage was forbidden between two persons related in any way; for many people it must have been almost impossible to avoid breaking the law. The pope could give dispensations, and kings and nobles exploited the rules to make and break marriages for both political and personal reasons, including to contract desirable marriage alliances, to get rid of barren wives, and to legitimize mistresses. Some ecclesiastics took the view that incestuous marriages of long standing should be tolerated if they had been contracted in ignorance, and if the spouses were not too closely related. At the Fourth Lateran Council of 1215 the forbidden degrees were reduced, on the grounds of hardship, to four degrees of consanguinity and one degree of affinity.

The rationale for the medieval form of the taboo is much debated by modern scholars. One factor is the statement in Genesis 2:24 that husband and wife become one flesh, which seems to have been a justification for the wide range of prohibited degrees of relationship through both consanguinity and affinity. Other explanations proposed by modern scholars include the projected increase in legacies to the church when marriage partners are hard to find (Goody), and a desire to reduce household rivalries over marriageable women (Herlihy). The consequences of inbreeding are rarely mentioned in medieval sources.

Documentary Evidence

It is very difficult to estimate rates and instances of incest in the Middle Ages. Given the lack of birth control, the frequent pregnancies of married women, shared beds, and the lack of privacy in medieval bedrooms, it seems very likely that nuclear family incest was as common as it is in our own society. It rarely appears in court records, but this is hardly surprising in a patriarchal society. Few young women would have dared to bring charges against an abusive father or brother, and families would have been anxious to avoid scandal and dishonour. There are records of cases involving more distant relatives such as cousins, godparents, in-laws, or affines through intercourse, and a few high-profile cases of uncles and nieces, and even siblings. There is almost no reference to incest as child abuse; in literary texts female victims of incest are usually old enough to marry and bear children, and sons are old enough to impregnate their mothers.

Polemical accusations of incest were often made against kings and even popes, against religious minorities and heretics (e.g., the early Christians, the Albigensians), and against ethnic groups who had been or were about to be invaded and conquered (e.g., the Irish and Welsh). But charges of incest were not confined to marginal or unpopular rulers or groups; both Charlemagne and Arthur were said to have slept with their sisters, and Judas with his mother. Confessors' manuals include questions (always phrased for male confessants) about incest and the precise relationship of the sinners. It is uncertain whether these manuals and the collections of penances known as penitentials can be taken as representative of actual medieval sexual behaviour. For instance, it is surprising that there is almost no reference to father–daughter or brother–sister incest in the penitentials, since these might be expected to be among the most common instances (there is some evidence for them in legal cases of infanticide).

Literary Sources

The lawcodes, manuals, and penitentials express no particular concern for women's vulnerability as victims of incest. In exemplary literature, where incest stories are used to emphasise the dangers of dying unconfessed and the power of contrition and grace, mothers are sometimes presented as complicit or responsible. A popular exemplary theme is the widowed mother who shares a bed with her teenage son until she becomes pregnant by him, and in some versions kills their baby. The story focuses entirely on her; usually she confesses and dies saved, sometimes through the intercession of the Virgin. In the context of medieval misogyny, such stories may not seem surprising. But these knowingly incestuous mothers were useful examples because they transcend their sinful carnality through confession and repentance. Incestuous fathers usually die violently and without contrition or confession, such as Antiochus in the popular story of Apollonius of Tyre, which was widely translated and adapted. (Gower included it in his Confessio Amantis, and Shakespeare dramatized it as Pericles.)

In both religious and secular literature, the most frequent form of incest is parent–child, perhaps because it is the most shocking and thus the most useful for didactic purposes. Variations on the Oedipus plot are found both in exemplary texts and in romance. In exemplary versions the moral is usually that the Christian should resist despair and trust in the power of contrition and divine grace. Sometimes the incestuous son ends up as a pope or a saint, as in the legend of Pope Gregory; sometimes his mother has already knowingly committed incest with her father or brother, so that the incest motif is doubled. Even so, it is the son rather than the mother who is glorified in the spiritually happy ending. In romance, mother–son incest is usually averted at the last moment, and the male protagonist becomes a successful and happily married knight; less attention is paid to the mother.

The heroine is very much the centre of the plot, however, in the popular Flight from the Incestuous Father group of stories, such as the old French Mane Kine and the Middle English Emaré, in which the threat of incest is the crucial catalyst for the adventures of the heroine. She is exiled, or flees, after rebuffing the unwelcome advances of her widowed father. After many ordeals and adventures, including false accusations and sometimes the loss of one or both hands, she is reunited with her husband, and sometimes with her repentant father too. In these stories the focus is on the victim rather than the villain, but not on her psychological state or on the long-term effect of incest on her subsequent life as a wife and mother. The moral is usually the need for faith, rather than the avoidance of incest. In Christian terms, suffering can be seen as positive, and as a test of virtue; this may account for the popularity of these stories of persecuted daughters.

In some exemplary stories incest is glossed as original sin, so it is paradoxical that throughout the Middle Ages the Virgin Mary was widely described as the daughter of her own son, Christ, and thus the mother of her own father. She is the one exception to the taboo. In allegorical texts, incestuous classical heroines may be interpreted in surprisingly positive and Christian ways; in the Ovide Moralisé, Myrrha, who in Ovid's Metamorphoses seduced her own father and was turned into a myrrh tree, is understood as a type of the virgin, the perfect woman. Some medieval writers were able to imagine genuine romantic love between close relations, and in literature the children of incest are often beautiful and heroic. But incest was nevertheless an especially shocking form of lust, and a deadly sin.

ELIZABETH ARCHIBALD

References and Further Reading

Archibald, Elizabeth. Incest and the Medieval Imagination. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 2001.

Duby, Georges. The Knight, the Priest and the Lady: the Making of Marriage in Medieval France, translated by Barbara Bray. London: Allen Lane, 1984.

Goody, Jack. The Development of the Family and Marriage in Europe. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1983.

Herlihy, David. Medieval Households. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1985.

Neel, Carol, ed. Medieval Families: Perspectives on Marriage, Household, and Children. Medieval Academy Reports for Teaching, 40. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2004.

Rank, Otto. The Incest Theme in Literature and Legend, translated by Gregory C. Richter. Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins University Press, 1992.

Tubach, F. Index Exemplorum: A Handbook of Medieval Religious Tales. FF Communications, 204. Helsinki: Suomalainen Tiedeakatemia, 1969.

See also Domestic Abuse; Family; Godparents; Kinship; Marriage, Christian; Marriage, Impediments to; Misogyny; Mythology, Medieval Reception of; Patriarchy and Patrilineage; Rape and Raptus; Remarriage; Sexuality: Extramarital Sex; Sexuality, Regulation of

INFANTS AND INFANTICIDE

Oddly, the history of medieval infancy is best known for an argument that the very category of infancy did not exist in the Middle Ages. The argument, attributed to the early modernist Philippe Ariès, has so permeated the scholarly and popular understanding of the subject that most medievalists devote inordinate amounts of time to refuting the argument (Ariès, chapter 2; Shahar, introduction). The fact that Ariès never emphatically made such claims about the existence of a medieval category of infancy did not dissuade advocates or detractors of the theory from voluminous debate over the issue.

Medieval Definitions

In discussions of the “ages of man” found in medical and moral texts from at least the seventh-century writer Isidore of Seville onward, the category of infantia was generally identified as distinct from pueritia or childhood. Some writers conflated the two, but most defined infancy as extending from birth to the age of seven. Regardless of the boundary between infancy and what followed it, many writers followed Isidore in his (unusually correct) assertion that the word infant derived etymologically from the pre-verbal status of the infant (qui fari non potest, “one who cannot speak”).

Medical writings provide some of the most extensive material on medieval views of infancy. From the eleventh century onward, writings on gynecology and more general medical compendia give considerable attention to the development of the fetus, birth, and neonatal care. We encounter a strong concern for the safety of mother and child before and during birth. The processes of bathing, shaping, swaddling, teething, and especially feeding the infant receive considerable attention and were all generally performed by women, whether the midwife, the mother, or the wet nurse. In fact, the wet nurse is singled out for particular attention, both in her selection and in her regimen.

Beyond medical writings, a wide variety of sources tell us much about the treatment of infants. The aristocratic practice of hiring a wet nurse was common, despite the advice found in medical and moral treatises. (The sources on noble children are strongest in England.) The early years of every noble's life were associated with the care of women, as attested to by many sources from Guibert de Nogent's memoirs to the life of Christina of Markyate or, in an extreme example, the tales of Perceval by Chrétien de Troyes and Wolfram von Eschenbach.

While infancy in the highest levels of society has long been studied, only fairly recently has the diligent research of social historians such as Hanawalt and Finucane opened up the world of the peasantry and their attitudes toward infancy. Through coroners' inquests and miracle stories, the perils and emotions surrounding poor infants are readily apparent: accidents or neglect of an infant lead either to death and sadness, or to a miraculous cure and rejoicing.

Death rates for medieval infants are assumed to have been very high, as many as a third of all births (the statistics are sketchy at best). While accidents, malnutrition, and other similar factors may explain most of the deaths, medieval sources also provide some scattered evidence of infanticide. Boswell has argued that medieval Christianity generally provided a humane alternative to the classical abandonment or killing of unwanted children: the offering of the child to the church as an oblate. While many infants were offered publicly to the monastery, others were unceremoniously and surreptitiously left for the monastic community to find, as Marie de France's La Fresne illustrates. Some late medieval Italian institutions for foundlings had revolving hatches that permitted the mother to retain anonymity while leaving a child to be raised by the religious community. Far more disturbing to religious authorities was the murder of infants. Penitential literature of the early Middle Ages burdens the infanticidal parent, most often identified as the mother, with heavy penances. Intriguingly, many penitentials reduce the penance if the mother is too poor to support the child. Infanticide was apparently not common, and was roundly condemned as an abomination in the moral, legal, and theological sources.

Symbolism of the Infant

Medieval Christian Europe inherited a number of powerful and positive attributes associated with the infant. Most importantly, interest in the infant Jesus began to expand from the twelfth century onward, as figures such as Aelred of Rievaulx and the lesser-known Konrad von Fußesbrunnen (Die Kindheit Jesu) attest. A renewed interest in other Biblical and apocryphal passages mentioning infants, from the Massacre of the Innocents to Jesus's multiple blessings of infancy, appears in theological texts from the same period onward, as well as in saints' lives and antiheresy writings. The baby Jesus became an omnipresent artistic subject, and the Slaughter of the Innocents was depicted with increasing frequency. The soul was often personified and depicted as an infant, and medieval mystics and monastics metaphorically imagined themselves as infants suckling at the breast of Mary and, more strikingly, Jesus or abbot. From the mouths of babes and nurslings, the central and later Middle Ages found a powerful metaphor and model for innocence and purity.

WILLIAM F. MACLEHOSE

References and Further Reading

- Alexandre-Bidon, Danièle, and Didier Lett. Les Enfants au Moyen Age, Ve – XVe siècles. Paris: Hachette, 1997.
- Ariès, Philippe. Centuries of Childhood: A Social History of Family Life, translated by Robert Baldick. New York: Vintage Books, 1962.
- Baschet, Jérôme. Le sein du père: Abraham et la paternité dans l'Occident médiéval. Paris, 2000.
- Boswell, John E. The Kindness of Strangers: The Abandonment of Children in Western Europe from the Late Antiquity to the Renaissance. New York: Pantheon Books, 1988.
- Bynum, Caroline Walker. Jesus as Mother: Studies in the Spirituality of the High Middle Ages. Berkeley, 1982.
- Demaitre, Luke. "The Idea of Childhood and Childcare in Medical Writings of the Middle Ages." Journal of Psychohistory 4 (1976): 461–490.
- Finucane, Ronald C. The Rescue of the Innocents: Endangered Children in Medieval Miracles. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1997.
- Giallongo, Angela. Il bambino medievale. Bari: Edizioni Dedalo, 1990/1997.
- Goodich, Michael. "Bartholomaeus Anglicus on Child-Rearing." History of Childhood Quarterly 3 (1975): 75–84.
- Hanawalt, Barbara A. The Ties That Bound: Peasant Families in Medieval England. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1986.

- MacLehose, William F. A Tender Age: Cultural Anxieties Over the Child in the Twelfth and Thirteenth Centuries. New York: Columbia University Press, forthcoming.
- McLaughlin, Mary Martin. "Survivors and Surrogates: Children and Parents from the Ninth to the Thirteenth Centuries." In The History of Childhood, edited by Lloyd deMause. New York: Psychohistory Press, 1974, pp. 101–182.
- Orme, Nicholas. Medieval Children. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 2001.
- Sears, Elizabeth. The Ages of Man: Medieval Interpretations of the Life Cycle. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1986.
- Shahar, Shulamith. Childhood in the Middle Ages. London: Routledge Press, 1990.

See also Abortion; Body in Literature and Religion; Breastfeeding and Wet-Nursing; Crime and Criminals; Demography; Gynecology; Oblates and Oblation; Penitentials and Pastoral Manuals; Pregnancy and Childbirth: Christian Women; Pregnancy and Childbirth: Jewish Women

INFERTILITY

Infertility (the inability of a man and woman to produce offspring together) may have been a private matter for some people, a personal disappointment. For many others it was a very public disgrace and a serious concern provoking the attention of kin, medical practitioners, and ecclesiastical as well as civil law. Although infertility has only recently received more than passing attention from social scientists, it is clear that it is a major issue for most human populations throughout the world. It is also becoming clear that, although both men and women can be infertile, the differential social impact of infertility on women's social status is often significant.

From humble women all the way up to the queens, noblewomen, and urban elites of Europe, both women and their families often aggressively sought intervention in overcoming infertility from saints and magic, wise women, and male physicians. In the late 1150s or early 1160s, a noblewoman from Burgundy journeyed to see Hildegard of Bingen bearing a letter from five Cistercian abbots begging the German abbess to intercede with God and allow this woman to conceive again (Letters LXX and LXXR). A fourteenth-century Christian male practitioner in southern France was convicted of fraud and necromancy for having promised (but failed) to cure women's infertility by magical means while, around the same time, a Jewish physician was writing a detailed diagnosis and therapy for his infertile brother-in-law and his sister.

In both Jewish and Muslim communities, infertility was considered legitimate grounds for dissolving a marriage. For Christians, at least after the ninth century, only impotence (the inability of the male to sustain an erection) or certain other defects of the sexual organs (such as obstruction of the vagina or hermaphroditism) could be grounds for annulment since in such cases the defective spouse was incapable of fulfilling the "conjugal debt" (engagement in sexual intercourse upon demand). Infertility may thus have been somewhat less threatening to Christian women's social status, but the prevalence of quests for offspring in miracle stories suggests that it was no less a concern.

From a modern perspective, the causes of infertility were no doubt as varied as they are today. Among women generally in southern Europe, and among upper-class women in northern Europe, early marriage and sexual activity may have produced both psychic barriers and physical defects (whether due to trauma in childbirth or infection) that affected later fertility. Nutritional levels were probably often a factor, as perhaps were sexually transmitted diseases; medical writers speak of a disease they call the "white flowers," a vaginal discharge, a full century before syphilis seems to have hit Europe at the end of the fifteenth century. Physiognomy (the determination of character from a person's physical features) was sometimes employed to assess potential fertility before marriage. Biblical examples of infertility and its long-awaited alleviation formed the focus of prayers and religious interventions, which were likewise used to counteract infertility caused by magic. Traditional cultural practices, like the use of Sheela na gigs, were also inspired by fertility concerns. Even quite orthodox works of art may have been employed as apotropaic means to avert or reverse infertility.

Medical views about the causes of infertility were similar in the cultural traditions of Jews, Muslims, and Christians. An Arabic work on pregnancy was composed in Muslim Spain in the tenth century and the works of other Arabic writers like Avicenna (Ibn Sina) would become influential in Europe in the thirteenth century. Nevertheless, the main European medical traditions on infertility seem to have begun independently. The Christian physician Richard the Englishman, writing in the late twelfth or early thirteenth century, describes how all the medical powers of the Salernitan physicians had been called on to treat the sterility of the Queen of Sicily. He was probably referring to Queen Joanna (d. 1198), daughter of Eleanor of Aquitaine and Henry II of England, who married William II of Sicily at age eleven or twelve and then had to suffer the ignominy of sterility for twelve years. Richard considered medical treatment of infertility futile, but his pessimism was not universally shared. Beginning around the year 1100, writers at Salerno had already begun to incorporate chapters on infertility into their general medical compendia and the first specialized treatise on infertility was written there in the late twelfth century. No less than seven such works came out of the medical school of Montpellier in the fourteenth century. In 1444, a physician from Toulouse composed a work aiding fertility and birth for Count Gaston IV of Foix, and in 1488 a Parisian physician composed a special work for Anne of Beaujeu (1460–1522), elder sister of Charles VI of France. Even if from our perspective few of these recommendations could have significantly enhanced the chances of conception, they all show the depth of concern that reproductive disruptions generated among women and men in medieval societies.

MONICA GREEN

References and Further Reading:

- ‘Arib ibn Sa’id. Le Livre de la génération du foetus et le traitement des femmes enceintes et des nouveau-nés, edited and translated by Henri Jahier and Nourredine Abdelkader. Algiers: Librairie Ferraris, 1956; Arabic text with French translation.
- Barkai, Ron, ed. and trans. A History of Jewish Gynaecological Texts in the Middle Ages. Leiden: Brill, 1998.
- Baumgarten, Elisheva. Mothers and Children: Jewish Family Life in Medieval Europe. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 2004.
- Conde Parrado, Pedro, Enrique Montero Cartelle, and M.<sup>a</sup> Cruz Herrero Ingelmo, eds. Tractatus de conceptu; Tractatus de sterilitate mulierum. Lingüística y filología, 37. Valladolid: Universidad de Valladolid, 1999.
- Constantine the African (attributed). “Impotence as a Result of Witchcraft,” translated by Henry Sigerist. In Henry E. Sigerist on the History of Medicine, edited by Felix Marti-Ibañez. New York: MD Publications, 1960, pp. 146–152.
- Finucane, Ronald C. The Rescue of the Innocents: Endangered Children in Medieval Miracles. New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1997.
- Green, Monica H., ed. and trans. The ‘Trotula’: A Medieval Compendium of Women’s Medicine. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001.
- Inhorn, Marcia C., and Frank van Balen, eds. Infertility Around the Globe: New Thinking on Childlessness, Gender, and Reproductive Technologies. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2002.
- Jolly, Penny Howell. “Jan van Eyck’s Italian Pilgrimage: A Miraculous Florentine ‘Annunciation’ and the Ghent Altarpiece.” Zeitschrift für Kunstgeschichte 61.3 (1998): 369–394.
- El libro de la generación del feto, el tratamiento de las mujeres embarazadas y de los recién nacidos de ‘Arib ibn Sa’id (Tratado de ostetricia y pediatria hispano árabe del siglo X)*, edited by Antonio Arjona Castro. Cordoba: Publicaciones de la excm. diputacion provincial, 1983; Spanish translation.
- Makowski, Elizabeth M. “The Conjugal Debt and Medieval Canon Law.” Journal of Medieval History 3 (1977): 99–114.
- Montero Cartelle, Enrique, ed. Tractatus de sterilitate: Anónimo de Montpellier (s. XIV). Attribuido a A. de Vilanova, R. de Moleris y J. de Turre. Lingüística y Filología, 16. Valladolid: Universidad de Valladolid and Caja Salamanca y Soria, 1993.
- Montero Cartelle, Enrique, and María Cruz Herrero Ingelmo. “Las Interrogaciones in cura sterilitatis en el marco de la literatura médica medieval.” Faventia 25.2 (2003): 85–97.
- Musacchio, Jacqueline Marie. The Art and Ritual of Childbirth in Renaissance Italy. New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 1999.
- Park, Katharine. “Medicine and Magic: The Healing Arts.” In Gender and Society in Renaissance Italy, edited by Judith C. Brown and Robert C. Davis. London: Longman, 1998, pp. 129–149.
- Savonarola, Giovanni Michele. Il trattato ginecologico-pediatrico in volgare ‘Ad mulieres ferrarienses de regimine pregnantium et noviter natorum usque ad septennium,’ edited by Luigi Belloni. Milan: Società Italiana di ostetricia e ginecologia, 1952.
- Shatzmiller, Joseph, and Rodrigue Lavoie. “Médecine et gynécologie au moyen-âge; un exemple provençal.” Razo: Cahiers du Centre d’Études Médiévales de Nice 4 (1984): 133–143.

See also Abortion; Conjugal Debt; Contraception; Demography; Divorce and Separation; Gynecology; Hermaphrodites; Hildegard of Bingen; Law; Magic and Charms; Menstruation; Miracles and Miracle Collections; Pregnancy and Childbirth: Christian Women; Pregnancy and Childbirth: Jewish Women; Sheela Na Gigs; Trota of Salerno

INHERITANCE

Inheritance was the most important form of succession to social position and property in the Middle Ages. Most manorial, feudal, and urban property passed through people’s hands according to norms of inheritance. These norms were thus crucial in the reproduction of social order and shaped women’s place in that order. Rules of inheritance existed not for the sake of the deceased but for the living, both the heirs and those around them. It is important to remember that people inherited not just real property or even titles. They inherited legal status, rights and obligations, and debts and credits.

These rules came from a variety of sources, notably from Roman law and Germanic customs, but these were further elaborated through legislation and learned jurisprudence. The law of inheritance that developed in Italy on the basis of Roman civil law, with additions from Lombard and canon law, differed profoundly from the inheritance rules developed within the common law of England, or even simply from what jurists knew as feudal law. One indicator of the differences among inheritance rules was the degree to which written testaments were available to modify and adapt the general rules of intestate succession to fit individual preferences, perceptions, and interests. Nor should inheritance be taken as solely tied to the moment of death. Different points in the domestic developmental cycle allowed for the intergenerational transmission of property. An important example is the degree to which a woman's dowry was considered in statutory law and in social practice in Italy and southern France as her portion of the patrimony of her natal family. Dowered women were excluded by legislation and custom from inheriting from their fathers, brothers, or other close male agnates, if such males survived to inherit.

Testate and Intestate

Roman law devised a large and complex body of rules regarding inheritance, much of it revolving around the testament. Male property owners, and increasingly females too, enjoyed broad powers to dispose of their property as they wished, provided a portion was reserved for direct heirs (children generally). The Christian Church encouraged the testament in practice throughout Europe, as it was a singular device for channeling property to ecclesiastical institutions. Beyond a testament, property passed by a prescribed set of rules of intestate succession according to degree of consanguinity to the deceased, with preference to agnates (those related on the father's or male side).

Germanic inheritance systems originally did not admit the testament. All inheritance was intestate. Germanic fathers had no control over property from beyond the grave, as Roman fathers might, and Germanic heirs had no option to refuse an inheritance, as Romans did, a right called repudiatio. Germanic schemes of devolution also tended to advantage sons over daughters, whereas late Roman rules provided for equal division per capita among brothers and sisters. However, Germanic inheritance per stirpes (by line) also meant that, for example, a daughter with no brothers would inherit from her father in preference to his brother (her uncle). Some Germanic inheritance customs, such as those of the Lombards, drew a distinction between inherited property and acquired goods. Inherited property was expected to pass within the lineage; acquired property could be more freely disposed of after death. From this basis, when wills were introduced into English inheritance practices in the Middle Ages, they could be used only to dispose of chattels, not land. In England wills functioned not to pass property within the family but to endow outsiders, such as the church, or to provide for younger children where impartibility was otherwise the norm.

Testaments held the potential to advantage women's property rights in comparison to intestate rules. In Florence, for example, well-to-do testators bequeathed property to their wives (otherwise excluded in intestacy, or the lack of a legal will, of husbands) to encourage them to remain as widows and raise the couple's children. In England and northern France, widows' dower rights provided the same result without recourse to a will, so there wills were used at times to take away from those rights. The bias toward agnation (favor agnationis) was highly marked in southern Europe, to the point that relations of consanguinity traced through women were essentially expunged from genealogical memories and from inheritance rights.

Where and when lineage mattered most in inheritance (in southern Europe, among the nobility, and increasingly toward the end of the Middle Ages everywhere), the property brought to a marriage by husband and wife remained separate funds on which no conjugal rights were necessarily recognized. Widows did not have ownership or even authority over the conjugal estate, nor did husbands have freedom to dispose of marital property as they wished. Conversely, where the conjugal unit was at the heart of legal concerns, surviving spouses had succession rights, as was the case in the Picard–Walloon regions of northern France and Belgium. There wills were used to get around such inheritance customs and privileges, such as the claims of agnatic lineage in the later Middle Ages.

Partible and Impartible

Roman and Germanic inheritance rules were based on partibility—equal division of the property among all those of the same degree of relationship to the deceased. The disadvantage of such a scheme, especially with the potential morcelization of land holdings over generations, was apparent. However, it also responded to deeply rooted sentiments in favor of equality among siblings.

Impartibility—directing all or the greater part of an estate to one heir, most frequently in male primogeniture—made sense to kings, feudal lords, and peasants alike and became more common, mainly in northern Europe, after the eleventh century. Continuity of a productive holding over generations was possible, although problems were bound to arise in providing for younger children. In contrast, partibility did not necessarily lead to fragmentation of holdings. Co-heirs could continue to hold their property in common, as seen with the feudal nobles of the Mâconnais and with patrician families in a number of Italian cities. A sense of kinship and lineage continuity, as well as economic self-interest, could discipline individual ownership rights.

INHERITANCE

Conscious strategies of heirship, taking advantage of testamentary devices such as the substitution of heirs of second and third instance after the initial heir, allowed Italian, Spanish, and southern French elites to construct a form of impartibility in the face of prevailing rules and sentiments favoring partibility. In these schemes women's inheritance could be endlessly postponed in favor of male agnates of even distant degrees of relationship. Such practices, however, did not begin to become widespread until toward the end of the fifteenth century. Prior to that point, depending on local rules of intestacy, women stood to inherit with reasonable frequency in the absence of close male heirs.

By and large, however, women in Roman law areas were less likely to be heiresses than their English counterparts, as legislation and testaments alike tended to direct inheritances to other male agnates in preference to daughters or sisters. These women usually had dowries, however, and they could direct the flow of some or all of the dowry by means of a testament.

Certainly a substantial percentage of instances did not fit the simple functional ideal by which property would pass to one son (minus dowry or other provision for a married daughter). Wills, gifts, and other legal options provided flexibility to deal with potential problems. But the effects of such devices were not predictable; norms do not unequivocally describe the transmission of property, especially against conflicts and lawsuits that erupted constantly and contributed to the further elaboration of legal rules. These included claims advanced by or through women. Nor was there any clear correspondence between forms of inheritance and forms of kinship or domestic units.

THOMAS KUEHN

References and Further Reading

- Carlier, Myriam, and Tim Soens, eds. The Household in Late Medieval Cities: Italy and Northwestern Europe Compared. Leuven: Garant, 2001.
- Cohn, Samuel K., Jr. Death and Property in Siena, 1205–1800: Strategies for the Afterlife. Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins University Press, 1988.
- Goody, Jack. The Development of the Family and Marriage in Europe. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1983.
- Goody, Jack, Joan Thirsk, and E. P. Thompson, eds. Family and Inheritance: Rural Society in Western Europe, 1200–1800. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1976.
- Herlihy, David. Medieval Households. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1985.

- Howell, Martha C. The Marriage Exchange: Property, Social Place, and Gender in Cities of the Low Countries, 1300–1550. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1998.
- Klapisch-Zuber, Christiane. Women, Family, and Ritual in Renaissance Italy, translated by Lydia Cochrane. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1985.
- Spring, Eileen. Law, Land, and Family: Aristocratic Inheritance in England, 1300 to 1800. Chapel Hill and London: University of North Carolina Press, 1993.

See also Dowry and Other Marriage Gifts; Family (Earlier Middle Ages); Family (Later Middle Ages); Gender Ideologies; Heiresses; Kinship; Law, Customary: French; Law, German; Patriarchy and Patrilineage; Wills

INTERCESSION

In the ancient and medieval worlds, it was often difficult for ordinary people to get access to powerful figures whom they believed could help solve their problems. One way in which they could sometimes get this access was through the help of intermediate figures, people who were more powerful than the person needing assistance, but not as powerful and remote as the one who held the power and could actually solve the problem. If the intermediate figure, or intercessor, had some means of influence over the powerful figure, so much the better for the petitioner.

In ancient Roman society, political intercession was institutionalized in the form of the “patron–client” relationship. Men who wanted to hold political office would gain influence with the populace by doing favors for them, and they were rewarded by the votes of those whom they had helped. Having a large crowd of clients meant that one was a successful patron, and this perceived success attracted more clients, and thus more votes. But access to powerful figures could also be gained in less formal ways. In Homer's Odyssey, Odysseus tells his shipwrecked crew members, who have washed ashore on an island, that he knows that if he approaches the female relatives of the island's king, explains their predicament, and gains the women's sympathy, they will persuade the king to help the unfortunate party.

In Christian society, ordinary believers began to ask others to pray for them, believing that intercessory prayer would strengthen their petitions. Martyred Christians were believed to go directly to Heaven, where in the presence of God their aid could be invoked to persuade God to help the community of believers on earth. In the high medieval period, the most powerful of these heavenly intercessors became the Virgin Mary, mother of Christ and Queen of Heaven.

Earthly as well as heavenly queens were often recognized as having power over their royal spouses. In many cases, a royal woman's success at court was dependent upon maintaining the perception that she had influence over her husband's actions. Some courts and court rituals even featured staged acts of intercession, where the queen would approach the king publicly to ask for some previously agreed upon action. At other times, queens would act on their own at the request of a petitioner. Studies of surviving petitions for the queen's intercession have shown that both nobles and commoners were aware of her potential influence over the king and that they were eager for her help. Queens were sometimes financially rewarded for successful acts of intercession. Churchmen wrote to them, urging that they use their powers of intercession only in positive ways. These churchmen often drew on the examples of Mary or the Old Testament's Esther as examples of women who used their influence over men in a proper manner.

It was not just queens who were seen to have some sway over their spouses. Churchmen also recognized that ordinary wives could influence their husbands. In his manual for confessors, the thirteenth-century theologian Thomas of Chobham argued that women should use persuasion, feminine wiles, and even deception in pursuit of holy purposes. He admitted that "no priest is able to soften the heart of a man the way his wife can" and urged that women always think of themselves as "preachers" to their husbands.

There is no doubt that medieval women practiced intercessory behaviors on a regular basis. Some women became very skilled at using intercession to their own gain and advantage. Scholars, however, have pointed out that the prevalence of the "woman as intercessor" motif in medieval writings only underscores their exclusion from the normal circles of power. In medieval intercession narratives, the woman often appears unexpectedly in a place where she would normally not be expected to be and her behavior is always deferential to the real source of power, a male figure. Women are often shown as able to modify or correct their husbands' decisions in extraordinary ways, but not able to participate in the original decisions. Further, narratives and advice from clerical writers about women's intercession became much more prominent in the later Middle Ages, when women were less likely to be regularly present at court and other centers of decision making, than they had been in the earlier medieval period. It appears, then, that female intercession in the medieval period was often an adaptive behavior practiced by women who were increasingly isolated, either within the family or in royal or noble courts, from centers of power and decision making.

LOIS L. HUNEYCUTT

References and Further Reading

- Farmer, Sharon. "Persuasive Voices: Clerical Images of Medieval Wives." Speculum 61.3 (1986): 517–543.
- Huneycutt, Lois. "Intercession and the High Medieval Queen: The Esther Topos." In Power of the Weak: Studies on Medieval Women, edited by Jennifer Carpenter and Sally Beth MacLean. Urbana, Ill.: University of Illinois Press, 1995, pp. 126–146.
- Parsons, John Carmi. "The Queen's Intercession in Thirteenth-Century England." In Power of the Weak: Studies on Medieval Women, edited by Jennifer Carpenter and Sally-Beth MacLean. Urbana, Ill.: University of Illinois Press, 1995, pp. 147–177.
- Strohm, Paul. "Queens as Intercessors." In Hochon's Arrow: The Social Imagination of Fourteenth-Century Texts. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1992, pp. 95–119.

See also Diplomacy and Reconciliation; Mary, Virgin; Petitions; Queens and Empresses: The West

INVESTMENT AND CREDIT

Medieval notarial registers, charters, court rolls, and other medieval records are filled with evidence of women making investment and credit transactions. Although women's investments and loans were fewer and smaller on average than those made by men, they were a regular part of the everyday medieval economy. The level and frequency of women providing funds for capital formation or commercial enterprises and women offering or receiving consumption loans varied considerably due to legal, economic, and social factors.

Female moneylenders and pawnbrokers, especially Jewish women, served the domestic market by offering small, short-term consumer loans. Often lending to other women, they supplied emergency capital to meet household needs, creating what William Chester Jordan describes as networks of sociability. Although nuns or wealthy widows might offer loans as an act of charity, female moneylenders normally charged interest on these small, short-term extensions of credit. This routine small-scale lending between women was so commonplace that it generally went unimpeded by social controls established for loftier transactions.

In fourteenth-century Paris, the widowed Jewish pawnbroker Précieuse made a series of very large and secret short-term domestic consumption loans to the powerful Jean, duc de Berri. At the common level, female pawnbrokers regularly made quick consumer loans to women and men who could offer collateral. Resentment created by perceptions of social imbalance produced tensions and violence within this network of sociability.

Women were generally attracted to stable investment opportunities that promised financial security in old age, such as real estate or annuities. In return for an endowment, some female monastic houses offered female investors a financial package (called a corrody) that included lodging, an annuity, and death benefits. Women also secured term or life annuities from cities and towns by purchasing municipal bonds.

By the twelfth century, the Commercial Revolution had opened up new investment opportunities for urban women, especially in Italy and the Low Countries. Urban families with surplus movable property could realize significant profits through participation in maritime commerce. Notarial records from Genoa, a major center of Mediterranean trade, show women actively investing in commercial ventures that spanned the sea, from Morocco in the west to Syria in the east.

Women appear in nearly one-quarter of all extant Genoese overseas commercial (or commenda) contracts from the late twelfth and early thirteenth centuries. Genoese women invested their own property and also brokered investments for family members, usually their husbands and sons, but also siblings, cousins, and other relatives of both genders. Acting as home partners while their merchant husbands were off at sea, Genoese wives reinvested past profits in new ventures with other traders. Widows, named as trustees in their late husbands' wills, worked to increase their children's inheritance through maritime commerce, often investing property of their own as well. Through these efforts, women played a key role in the business strategies of both their natal and marital families.

In Genoa, as in most Italian cities, merchant families engaged in intense political and economic competition. The ability of so many Genoese women to invest movable property in maritime commerce may be due in part to an increasing desire by urban families to maintain control over real estate. By the twelfth century, merchant families across Italy had begun to enforce two significant changes in marriage and inheritance customs. Many cities enacted laws that eliminated the Germanic custom of guaranteeing a widow a fixed portion (usually one-quarter or one-third) of her late husband's estate and families increasingly considered a cash-only dowry as a woman's entire share of her paternal estate.

This desire to prevent the loss of control over strategically precious real estate diminished female influence within the family economy. But increased access to liquid assets meant that women gained greater control over investment capital at a time when Western society remained relatively cash poor. Through investment in maritime commerce, Genoese women kept family resources in steady circulation to maximize the potential for profits. Contemporary records from some other Mediterranean ports show similar patterns of female investment in maritime commerce.

By the later Middle Ages, the focus of overseas trade began shifting north to the burgeoning commercial centers of Flanders and the Rhine valley. In fourteenth-century Bruges, women commonly owned and managed money exchanges and other businesses. Women were active in Ghent as moneychangers and moneylenders during the same period. In fifteenth-century Cologne, women played a prominent part in that city's long-distance commercial enterprises.

MARK ANGELOS

References and Further Reading

- Angelos, Mark. "Urban Women, Investment, and the Commercial Revolution of the Middle Ages." In Women in Medieval Western European Culture, edited by Linda E. Mitchell. New York and London: Garland Publishing, 1999, pp. 257–272.
- Howell, Martha C. Women, Production and Patriarchy in Late Medieval Cities. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1986.
- Hughes, Diane Owen. "From Brideprice to Dowry in Mediterranean Europe." In The Marriage Bargain: Women and Dowries in European History, edited by Marion A. Kaplan. New York: Haworth Press, 1985, pp. 113–158.
- Jordan, William Chester. Women and Credit in Pre-Industrial and Developing Societies. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1993.
- Murray, James M. "Family, Marriage and Moneychanging in Medieval Bruges." Journal of Medieval History 14 (1988): 115–125.
- Nicholas, David. The Domestic Life of a Medieval City: Women, Children, and the Family in Fourteenth-Century Ghent. Lincoln, Neb.: University of Nebraska Press, 1985.

See also Business; Consumption; Dowry and Other Marriage Gifts; Inheritance; Jewish Women; Merchant Families, Women of; Widows

IRELAND

The history of women in medieval Ireland is laden with romance and poetry. Perhaps this is because the modern study of Irish women's past began in the nineteenth century, in the decades when William Butler Yeats and Lady Gregory were writing their verses and plays, and the Irish were recovering their native language and culture after centuries of colonialist suppression. Patriotic antiquarians such as T. F. O'Rahilly and Eoin MacNeill colluded with poets in producing an ideal Celtic Woman of the Irish past who was independent, aggressive, beautiful, and mysterious—much like Maud Gonne, the rebel of 1916, and also the sexy, cattle-rustling warrior Queen

Medb (Maeve) of the early medieval epic Táin Bó Cúailnge (Cattle Raid of Cooley).

The Evidence

Yet the main reason for the persistence of Celtic stereotypes in the history of Irish women is the medieval literary tradition, of which the Táin is just a small part. Beginning not long after their fifth-century Christianization, Irish scholars and storytellers began composing in their native language, Europe's oldest written vernacular, as well as in their new language of scholarly Latin. Authors deployed a diverse range of female characters, including spell-chanting druidesses, shapeshifting war goddesses, mysterious queens of the Otherworld, powerful saints, and fierce women like Medb who ruled historic territories. These heroines were the match of any men; the Táin itself describes Medb as "a tall, fair, long-faced woman with soft features" and a head of yellow hair who "carried a light, stinging sharp-edged lance in her hand and held an iron sword with a woman's grip over her head."

But the literate elite also left a more prosaic body of evidence for women's lives that includes secular and religious laws, gnomic texts, saints' lives, theology, astronomy, and documents from many other genres. These texts, along with evidence from archaeological excavations, help historians understand where and how real women lived, worked, and worshipped. The experience of women in medieval Ireland was less like that of the mythical Queen Medb than like that of women living elsewhere in Christian Europe. Ireland was intensely rural, with no real cities until the Vikings arrived around 800 to build trading ports. Throughout the thousand years of the Middle Ages, most families occupied isolated farmsteads or lived in small clusters of huts attached to kings' forts or monastic communities. Queen and slave girl alike spent most of their days at domestic tasks in houses usually made of branches and mud, roofed with thatch, encircled by ditches and palisades. Only later in the Middle Ages did the wealthiest families build fortified stone houses, complete with doors, windows, and separate floors, for themselves.

Legal Status

Women worked with their men to raise crops and herd sheep, pigs, or cows. They also kept farmyard animals, ran the dairy and kitchen, and took the sheep to high pastures in the summer. They greased the wool, combed and spun it, dyed yarn, and wove it into wool. In poor weather, they sat inside and sewed clothing and linens for their households. The early medieval laws ordered that the daughters of kings be taught sewing. The laws also declared that one of the most valuable jobs a woman could do was the fine needlework that adorned the cloaks and tunics of the nobility. The legal status of a druinech, or professional embroideress, was higher than that of a queen. Even more valuable, though, was women's job of bearing and raising children. Kinship was the basis of all Irish law, property ownership, and political organization, and the Irish could not maintain kinship groups without the reproductive labor of women.

Women's legal status and social identity depended upon their families until they were officially of marriageable age, around thirteen, and then upon their husbands or other sexual partners. All native medieval Irish law was negotiated law, based not on distinctions of civil and criminal law but upon the assumption that every human being had a calculable worth to his or her family and society (honor price, in Irish lóg n-enech, eneclann, or díre). If a person were harmed or killed, that value could be paid in goods or, if necessary, in blood and vengeance. Until the age of seven, freeborn girls and boys had the same legal value, calculated as half that of their male guardian's value; at age fourteen, however, a man gained his full adult value while a woman was always worth only half what her father, husband, or other guardian was worth. Even noblewomen could not participate fully in society as economic actors. They could not make contracts without male representation. As the eighth-century legal text known as the Díre-tract put it, "A woman is not capable of selling anything without the consent of one of those who has authority over her: her father looks after her when she is a girl; her spouse looks after her when she is a married woman; her sons look after her when she is a widow with children..." Officially, women could not inherit family land, which went instead to any living male relatives; however, it seems likely that loving fathers and mothers tried to provide for their daughters in other ways, such as dowries or gifts of property. Women could not become the noble clients of kings and lords because they could not swear oaths in witness to support their lords in legal conflicts. Royal women achieved fame and power only in literature, for in real life queens ruled only as the wives of kings.

Marriage and Divorce

Despite such limitations, women's marriage rights were more extensive than those of women elsewhere in medieval Europe. A good marriage contract secured a woman's position in local society, although the Irish interpreted legal unions differently from modern definitions of marriage. Irish laws allowed for many types of lánamnai or contracts of sexual partnership, ranging from a contract between a woman and man of equal nobility and wealth, to the arrangement between a woman who lived at home with her parents and was visited periodically by her mate; even unions brought about by rape or made by two mentally defective individuals could be legalized. Jurists who made these laws were not concerned about the desires of true lovers or the rights of women, but with the status of offspring and children's rights to family property. Rich noblemen who could afford more than one kind of partner often married a chief wife (cétmuintir) as well as maintaining other legal sexual partners whose children competed with those of his wife for inheritance. A mother's job, meanwhile, was to shield her children from the ambitions of her husband's other women, helping her sons and daughters to make social alliances with their maternal kin and foster families.

In addition, Irish laws allowed for divorce and remarriage at the instigation of either partner, despite the opposition of Christian theologians and ecclesiastical rulemakers. A woman could leave a man who abused her, who became impotent or insane, who decided to become a celibate churchman, or who was caught in a homosexual act. She could dissolve their contract just because he insulted her or betrayed the secrets of their sex lives together. Women of very high status took advantage of these options, switching husbands when their families or their own political ambitions demanded. Even after the Anglo-Normans invaded Ireland in the late twelfth century, and despite the ecclesiastical reforms sweeping Europe in the same period, the Irish continued their practices of divorce and polygamy all through the Middle Ages. Despite women's disenfranchisement and their limited political powers, they still played influential roles in Irish society. Some of the most powerful women were avowed Christians.

Saints and Abbesses

The same rhetorical exaggeration that surrounded mythological women also attended Ireland's female saints. St. Brigit of Kildare (c. 450–525) could supposedly control the weather, commune with animals, move rivers, raise the dead, and prophesy. Her monastery and its cathedral were among the wealthiest and most populous pilgrimage centers in Ireland until at least the twelfth century; she remains one of the island's three patron saints today. Her abbess successors were said to be the only women in Ireland who could "turn back the streams of war," that is, engage in diplomacy and enforce peace among feuding kings. Other abbesses were said to have performed miracles, too. St. Íte had visions of nursing the baby Jesus and was so serious a faster that, when pricked with a pin, she had no blood left in her body to bleed. Even nonsaintly women could achieve power and status as the noble abbesses of major nunneries. The monastery of Cell Craobhnat (Kilcreevanty) near Tuam in County Galway was founded in 1200 for the daughters of O Conor kings. When it was dissolved with other Irish monasteries in the sixteenth century, the abbess held about a thousand acres of land, along with fourteen rectories, seven chapels, and a castle.

The romance associated with some women in Irish literature was balanced by a strong misogynistic streak running through the documents, both secular and religious. The same body of laws that allowed women to divorce classed them legally with fools, slaves, and children. The secular stories about warrior queens also depicted horrible hags who brought good kings down for the mere pleasure of an evil deed. The hagiography of female saints has to be weighed against the stories of male ascetics who fled the company of women and disdained to teach them or hear their advice. Proverbs and advice texts such as the Tecosca Cormaic (Advice of Cormac) dismissed all women as angry, lustful, shiftless, manipulative, greedy, and whining. Worst of all, women never shut up; "save us," St. Patrick had supposedly pleaded, "from the spells of women, smiths, and druids."

The Anglo-Norman Invasion

The major change for women and men alike in medieval Ireland came with the Anglo-Norman invaders and immigrants of the twelfth and later centuries. These newcomers expropriated property and reorganized it into a system of dependent farms focused on the manorial estates of the nobility. They also brought a social and political hierarchy occupied, at the top, by the king of England and his English-born knights. These men imposed a body of laws and a system of taxation upon the Irish that conflicted with native systems.

The conflicts that ensued in Ireland between 1172 and 1500 had several important gender implications. To begin with, women often became participants at the highest levels in games of social and political alliance. The first Irish princess known to marry a Norman invader was Aoífe, daughter of Diarmaid Mac Murchadha, who wed the Norman knight Richard FitzGilbert de Clare (called Strongbow). It was a good move for Aoífe, since her husband claimed her father's kingdom of Leinster by rights of inheritance; normally, under traditional Irish law, she would not have inherited any land. Children of unions such as that of Aoífe and Strongbow acquired mixed English–Irish names and customs along with their ancestry, thus promoting some kinds of assimilation between conquerors and conquered.

Second, the immigrants brought with them a market-based urban economy with effects that reached deep into the Irish countryside. Women who were born in, or moved to, coastal towns could take up new professions in the craft and service industries of this more complex economy, just as Irish men could.

Finally, with more sustained contacts with England, especially its centrally organized church bureaucracy, Irish and Anglo-Irish clerics alike could pursue Christian reforms more vigorously than in the dispersed parishes and monasteries of early medieval Ireland. Although the initial impulses of monastic and episcopal reorganization preceded Strongbow's appearance in Ireland, it was only when church and colonial politics coincided that bishops in Ireland were able to enforce monogamy, clerical celibacy, and the claustration of Irish nuns, among other strict canonical measures. They also introduced new monastic orders, including the Arrouasian, Franciscan, and Dominican rules for nuns.

In more important ways, however, the experiences of women probably changed little over the long thousand years of the Irish Middle Ages. At the end of the period, when Tudor monarchs were pioneering new methods of conquest and the Protestant reformation fuelled yet another assault on native Irish culture, most women were still wives and mothers, farming and herding for a living, praying to Saint Brigit for strength and health, and listening in the evenings to stories of warrior-queens and otherworldly women.

LISA BITEL

References and Further Reading

- Binchy, Daniel A., ed. Corpus Iuris Hibernici. 6 vols. Dublin: Dublin Institute for Advanced Studies, 1978.
- Bitel, Lisa M. Land of Women: Stories of Sex and Gender from Early Ireland. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1996.
- Bourke, Angela, et al, eds. Irish Women's Writing and Tradition. The Field Day Anthology of Irish Writing, vols. 4–5. New York: New York University Press, 2002.
- Cogitosus. Vita Sanctae Brigidae. In Patrologia Latina 72, edited by J. P. Migne. Paris, 1844–1864.

- Findon, Joanne. A Woman's Words: Emer and Female Speech in the Ulster Cycle. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1997.
- Hall, Dianne. Women and the Church in Medieval Ireland, c. 1140–1540. Dublin: Four Courts Press, 2003.
- Kelly, Fergus. A Guide to Early Irish Law. Dublin: Dublin Institute for Advanced Studies, 1988.
- Kinsella, Thomas, trans. The Tain. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1970.
- Meyer, Kuno, ed. and trans. The Instructions of King Cormac Mac Airt. Todd Lecture Series 15. Dublin: Royal Irish Academy, 1909.
- Monasticon: Ireland. Monastic Matrix. <http://monasticmatrix.org>.
- Ó Corráin, Donnchadh. "Women in Early Irish Society." In Women in Irish Society: The Historical Dimension, edited by Donnchadh Ó Corráin and Margaret MacCurtain. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1979, pp. 1–13.
- Ó Cróinín, Dáibhi. Early Medieval Ireland 400–1200. London: Longman, 1995.
- Thurneysen, Rudolf, ed. Studies in Early Irish Law. Dublin: Royal Irish Academy, 1936.

See also Abbesses; Brigit; Divorce and Separation; Literature, Irish; Monasticism and Nuns, Celtic; Supernatural Women

IRENE

Irene (c. 752–803), empress of Byzantium, was born probably in Athens to a local family named (Tes) Sarandapechys, and in 769 became the bride chosen for Leo, son of the iconoclast emperor and theologian Constantine V (741–775). Thirteen months after their marriage, Irene gave birth to a son named Constantine. Following the premature death of her husband Leo IV in 780, Irene assumed the role of regent for her nine-year-old son. She summoned an ecumenical council to Nicaea in 787, which reversed the policy of iconoclasm and acclaimed her as "a new Helena" to her son's "new Constantine."

From 790 to 797 Constantine tried to reduce Irene's influence, but she arranged to have him blinded and thus disqualified from ruling. She then ruled alone (797–802), issuing gold coins with her title basilissa and her own image on both sides, and two laws as emperor (basileus). In 802 her finance minister Nikephoros overthrew her and she died in exile one year later.

During her five-year reign, when she relied on two rival eunuch advisers, defeats by Caliph Harun al-Rashid and Charlemagne reflected Byzantium's military weakness. But Irene extended imperial administration in the Balkans (Macedonia) and founded churches (St Sophia, Thessalonike) and monasteries with philanthropic functions. In 800 Pope Leo III crowned Charlemagne "Emperor of the Romans," a title not recognized in Constantinople. But Irene proposed an alliance with him, which he seems to have welcomed. Irene's experiment in female rule provided a later model for Theodora (regent for Michael III, 842–856) and later Byzantine empresses.

JUDITH HERRIN

References and Further Reading

- Herrin, Judith. Women in Purple: Rulers of Medieval Byzantium. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 2001.
 Treadgold, Warren. The Byzantine Revival 780–842. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1988.

See also Byzantium; Empresses; Byzantium; Eunuchs; Icons, Byzantine

ISABEL I

The princess who would become known to history as Queen Isabella the Catholic (1451–1504) was the only daughter of King Juan II (1406–1454) and his second wife, Isabel of Portugal. In her father's will Isabel was named third in line for the throne of Castile, after her older half-brother Enrique, but also, on grounds of gender, after her younger brother Alfonso (b. 1453). Enrique succeeded his father in 1454, ruling as Enrique IV.

In the 1460s the infante Alfonso was thrust into the forefront of an aristocratic revolt against Enrique. The grandees and their ecclesiastical allies deposed Enrique in effigy and impugned the legitimacy of his sole heir, Juana of Castile. When Alfonso died in 1468, the rebels quickly adopted Isabel as their leader. The seventeen-year-old princess resisted their pressure to proclaim herself queen, declaring her loyalty and obedience to the legitimate king. At the same time, however, she was actively engaged in disseminating rumors about her brother's impotence and her rival Juana's illegitimacy. She was also choosing a husband suitable to her ambitions, against the express wishes of Enrique, who wished to marry her off to his own advantage. These activities demonstrate the strength of character, independent spirit, and appreciation for protocol and propaganda that would enable her rise to power and characterize her rule. When Enrique died in 1474, Isabel precipitously had herself proclaimed queen, ignoring Juana's legitimate claim.

Isabel's choice of spouse was arguably the most important decision of her life. Despite her determination to rule Castile in her own right, Isabel could not choose to remain unmarried. Given the circumstances of her rise to power, Isabel had to marry and produce a legitimate, preferably male heir. Among her many Spanish and European suitors, she chose Fernando, heir to the throne of Aragon (1479–1516). Fernando was known for his military prowess, which proved crucial to the successful completion of the war of succession that began a few months after Isabel's coronation. Together they defeated the Castilian nobles loyal to Juana and their Portuguese allies. Well aware that if Juana were to marry, any child of hers might contest Isabel's succession, the queen made it a condition of the peace treaty that Juana enter a Portuguese convent. She remained there until her death in 1530.

It is a historiographical myth that the marriage of Isabel and Fernando signified a strong and equal union of their respective kingdoms. In reality, she made certain that her proprietary and hereditary rights over Castile were never compromised and placed strict limitations on Fernando's governance and inheritance rights in her kingdom. Likewise, Aragon maintained its own, more contractual monarchic institutions and laws, and Isabel was there considered Fernando's consort. Nevertheless, major policy decisions of her reign appear to have been made jointly.

Immediately after the war of succession's end in 1479, Isabel set about crafting the military, judicial, and administrative bases necessary to transform Castile into a modern nation-state. She reduced the political power of the aristocracy, strengthened the royal council and chancery, and instituted a national brotherhood to ensure law and order throughout the land.

Isabel was an avid patron of learning and the arts. She cultivated a close relationship with the University of Salamanca, Spain's distinguished center of humanist studies. She engaged several Salamancan professors to educate her children, especially her son, Prince Juan, the long-awaited male heir born in 1479. The queen also commissioned many books, paintings, and tapestries and facilitated the spread of print culture in Spain by prohibiting taxes on booksellers. Although she left no written work besides official documents and a few personal letters, she was apparently well read. Her extensive library reflected the burgeoning vernacular humanism characteristic of late medieval culture in Castile, and included moral and religious treatises, chronicles, and romances.

Isabel's most important act of patronage by far was her funding of Christopher Columbus's voyages of exploration, starting in 1492. Historians agree that it was she, not Fernando, who understood the potential for economic gain and religious evangelization in the Italian navigator's audacious plan.

In addition to Prince Juan, lovingly groomed for the throne, Isabel and Fernando had four daughters, Isabel, Juana, Maria, and Catalina (Catherine of Aragon). Juan's death at the age of nineteen meant that Isabel would be succeeded by another woman, her oldest daughter Juana, dubbed "the Mad." Juana's troubled marriage to Philip of Burgundy, a Hapsburg, produced Carlos I, who became Holy Roman emperor and transformed Spain into a far-flung world empire.

Isabel was a master propagandist, employing several court chroniclers to craft the official story of her reign. Probably no more nor less pious than any other noblewoman of her time, she cultivated a pious and ascetic demeanor, reflecting and enhancing the messianic fervor expressed by her supporters. They believed that the queen had been sent to fulfill a providential plan: to pacify the kingdom, curtail the abuses of the grandees and prelates, conclude the Christian “Reconquest” of Muslim-held lands, and safeguard religious orthodoxy. It was her success in the latter two endeavors through the institution of the Holy Office of the Inquisition (1478), the conquest of the Muslim kingdom of Granada, and the Edict of Expulsion of the Jews (both in 1492) that earned Isabel the title of Catholic Queen, bestowed upon her by Pope Alexander VI.

BARBARA F. WEISSBERGER

References and Further Reading

Liss, Peggy. Isabel the Queen: Life and Times. 2nd edition. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2005.

Weissberger, Barbara F. Isabel Rules: Constructing Queenship, Wielding Power. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 2004.

See also Iberia; Queens and Empresses, Consorts of; Queens and Empresses: The West

ISABEL OF ARAGON

Born in the Kingdom of Aragon, Isabel (1271–1336) (also known as Elizabeth of Portugal) was the daughter of King Pedro III and the granddaughter of Emperor Frederick II. Named for her great aunt St. Elisabeth of Hungary, Isabel’s pious upbringing was to define her life and works. She was married to King Dinis of Portugal when she was twelve. Although known for his meritorious works in his country’s service, Dinis “the Worker” was a violent man and the father of several illegitimate sons, whom he sometimes favored over the children that Isabel bore him. She nevertheless accepted them and raised them with her own. Relying on piety to endure her personal hardships, the queen dedicated her life to charitable causes: she founded orphanages, a school for girls, hospitals for the indigent, and monasteries where she paid the dowry for poor women of religious vocation. Historians agree that the king so admired her unflinching religious devotion and personal goodness that he improved his personal conduct later in life.

Isabel was known as a peacemaker. When her son Afonso declared war on his father for favoring his natural sons, the queen traveled to the battlefield and sat on horseback between the two armies, thus preventing the conflict. Shortly before her death Isabel went to Castile to stop the fighting between Afonso (then King of Portugal) and Ferdinand IV.

After Dinis’s death in 1325 Isabel lived the rest of her life at a convent of Poor Clares that she had founded in Coimbra. She died there in 1336. In 1625 Pope Urban VIII canonized Isabel. She has become known as the patron saint of countries plagued by civil war.

NANCY MARINO

References and Further Reading

Ackerlind, Sheila R. King Dinis of Portugal and the Alfonsine Tradition. New York: Peter Lang, 1990.

de Sousa, Manuel. Reis e rainhas de Portugal. Mem Martins, Portugal: Spor Press, 2001.

See also Diplomacy and Reconciliation; Elisabeth of Hungary; Hagiography; Iberia; Queens and Empresses: the West

ISABELLE OF FRANCE

Isabelle (1225–1270) was the daughter of Louis VIII of France and Blanche of Castile. She refused several marriages arranged by her family, dedicating herself instead to charity and virginity. In the 1250s Popes Innocent IV and Alexander IV praised her piety and urged her to act as an example to others. Utilizing this support, Isabelle founded the Abbey of the Humility of Our Lady, better known as Longchamp, just west of Paris in 1260. Together with a team of leading Franciscans, including St. Bonaventure, she helped author a new rule for Longchamp that balanced strong institutional links to the male Franciscan order with increased autonomy for the abbess and nuns. It was approved by Alexander IV in February 1259, making Isabelle only the second woman after Clare of Assisi to compose an approved monastic rule. In July 1263, with her brother Louis IX’s help, she gained Urban IV’s acceptance of a revised rule that fulfilled her demand that her nuns be known as Sorores minores (Sisters minor), a controversial female analogue to the male Franciscan Fratres minores. At least a dozen other houses in France, England, Spain, and Italy had adopted this rule by the fourteenth century. Isabelle resided at Longchamp during the last decade of her life but did not become a nun. Agnes of Harcourt, third abbess of Longchamp, composed a vernacular biography around 1283 that detailed Isabelle's pious activities, her miracles, and the posthumous veneration that a wide range of people from the north of France accorded her.

ISABELLE OF FRANCE

SEAN L. FIELD

References and Further Reading

- Jordan, William Chester. "Isabelle of France and Religious Devotion at the Court of Louis IX." In Capetian Women, edited by Kathleen D. Nolan. New York: Palgrave, 2003, pp. 209–223.
- Lynn, Beth. "Clare of Assisi and Isabelle of Longchamp: Further Light on the Early Development of the Franciscan Charism." Magistra 3 (1997): 71–98.
- Field, Sean L., ed. The Writings of Agnes of Harcourt. Notre Dame, Ind.: University of Notre Dame Press, 2003.
- . "Gilbert of Tournai's Letter to Isabelle of France: An Edition of the Complete Text." Mediaeval Studies 65 (2003): 57–97.
- . "New Evidence for the Life of Isabelle of France." Revue Mabillon. New Series 13 (2002): 109–123.

See also Blanche of Castile; Hagiography; Monastic Rules; Monasticism and Nuns; Poor Clares Order

ISLAMIC WOMEN

See Muslim Women: Iberia

ISOLDE

This legendary Irish princess (also known as Isolt, Ysot, Yseut, Iseut, Iseult, and Isotta) becomes bound by an overpowering mutual passion with Tristan, the nephew of her betrothed, King Mark of Cornwall, when the two mistakenly consume a love potion intended for the wedding couple and are constrained to violate the most sacred social and religious taboos. Isolde deceives her husband, while Tristan betrays his uncle and lord; the importance of the maternal uncle in the Middle Ages even introduces a note of incest. Though they are hardly to blame, the lovers feel acutely the weight of the sanctions resulting from their liaison and make every effort both to escape death and to maintain their roles in society.

Considered one of the founding myths of Western culture, the legend was extremely popular throughout the Middle Ages in both literature and art. The earliest extant narratives are two Anglo-Norman poems, preserved in fragments, dating from the last quarter of the twelfth century. The first, by Beroul, recounts the portion of the legend that details the lovers' attempts to live their double life in Cornwall, where Mark's jealous barons spy on them and repeatedly denounce them, resulting in Tristan's eventual banishment. The second poem, by Thomas of Britain, recounts Tristan's exile in Brittany, his ill-advised (and unconsummated) marriage to Isolde of the White Hands, his furtive return visits to Cornwall, and the lovers' poignant death. Two shorter poems from the same period, the Bern Folie and the Oxford Folie, and one of Marie de France's lays, Chievrefoil, recount moments when the clever lovers manage a temporary reunion.

Three long verse redactions, two in Middle High German, by Eilhart von Oberge, c. 1190, and Gottfried von Strassburg, c. 1210, respectively, and one in Old Norse, by Friar Róbert, 1226—all originally inspired by the Anglo-Norman poems—allow us a glimpse of the protagonists' lives before the potion reordered their priorities. Isolde has inherited her mother's gift for healing, which enables her to revive the ailing harpist whose boat has washed up on the Irish shore. She is also depicted as a strong-willed woman whose fury is ignited when she learns that the "harpist" is none other than the knight who slew her maternal uncle in combat. Isolde's anger reminds us that in Celtic society women wielded considerable power and independence. In a Celtic analogue of the legend, the ninth-century Irish tale of the elopement of Diarmaid and Gráinne, Gráinne, enamored with her husband's nephew, casts a spell (geis) on him that obliges him to flee with her. By contrast, the use of the potion in the continental versions of the legend reflects an abrogation, in a patriarchal culture, of the heroine's right to choose her mate freely.

Starting with the extraordinarily popular French prose Tristan (c. 1230), the legend was transformed significantly as the focus shifted increasingly to Tristan's adventures as a knight-errant. The prose Tristan influenced all the prose romances of France, Italy, Spain, and England, notably Malory's Morte D'Arthur (1469–1470), which includes The Book of Sir Tristram de Lyones. In these works Isolde becomes a more generalized love object: her great beauty sparks the undying love of many other knights. When Tristan is drawn into the Arthurian orbit and joins the Round Table, his prowess is seen to rival Lancelot's, as Isolde's beauty rivals Guinevere's. The potion is less important in the prose Tristan, where the lovers fall in love before drinking it. However, in the Tavola Ritonda (Italian, second quarter of the fourteenth century), which returns the love idyll to the fore, the philter is a highly potent force that transforms the chaste friendship of the virtuous protagonists into unbridled desire, simultaneously elevating them to the status of secular martyrs and depriving the world of its brightest stars.

The legend experienced an important revival in the modern period, triggered by the success of Wagner's "music-drama" Tristan und Isolde (1865). This romantic reinterpretation, which decisively influenced that of Denis de Rougemont (L'Amour et l'Occident, 1939), depicts the lovers as imbued with a death wish, clearly seeking the realm of Night and Death as a refuge from an oppressive society. This thoroughly modern concept of the legend, as attractive as it is, gives a rather false idea of the medieval lovers who, though famous as star-crossed lovers, were celebrated primarily for their surpassing beauty, boundless ingenuity, and consummate fidelity.

JOAN TASKER GRIMBERT

References and Further Reading

- Bédier, Joseph. Le Roman de Tristan et Iseut traduit et restauré, with a preface by Gaston Paris. Paris: H. Piazza, 1900. Translation by Hilaire Belloc, completed by Paul Rosenfield, as The Romance of Tristan and Iseult As Retold by Joseph Bédier. Vintage Classics. New York: Random House, 1994.
- Bérout. Le Roman de Tristan, edited and translated by Stewart Gregory. Amsterdam and Atlanta: Rodopi, 1992.
- Blakeslee, Merritt R. Love's Masks: Identity, Intertextuality, and Meaning in the Old French Tristan Poems. Cambridge: Brewer, 1989.
- Eilhart von Oberge. Tristrant, edited by Kurt Wagner. Bonn, Germany: K. Schroeder, 1924.
- Gottfried von Strassburg. Tristan. Critical edition by Reinhold Bechstein and Peter Ganz. 2 vols. Deutscher Klassiker des Mittelalters, 4. Wiesbaden, Germany: Brockhaus, 1978.
- . Tristan, with Surviving Fragments of the 'Tristrant' of Thomas, translated with introduction by Arthur Thomas Hatto. Baltimore: Penguin, 1960. Reprint, 1972.
- Grimbert, Joan Tasker, ed. Tristan and Isolde: A Casebook. New York and London: Garland Publishing, 1995.
- Lacy, Norris J., ed. Early French Tristan Poems. Arthurian archives; 1-2. Woodbridge, Suffolk, and Rochester, N.Y.: D. S. Brewer, 1998.
- Malory, Sir Thomas. Morte D'Arthur, edited by John Matthews. London: Cassell, 2000.
- Marie de France. "Le Lai du Chievrefoil." In The Lais of Marie de France, translated with an introduction by Glyn S. Burgess and Keith Busby. Harmondsworth, Middlesex, England: Penguin Classics, 1986.
- Ménard, Philippe, ed. Le Roman de Tristan en prose. Textes littéraires français. 9 volumes to date. Geneva: Droz, 1987–.
- . The Romance of Tristan. The Thirteenth-Century Old French "Prose Tristan", translated with an introduction and notes by Renée L. Curtis. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1994.
- Rabine, Leslie W. "Love and the New Patriarchy: Tristan and Isolde." In Reading the Romantic Heroine: Text, History, Ideology, edited by Leslie W. Rabine. Ann Arbor, Mich.: University of Michigan Press, 1985, pp. 37–74.
- Rasmussen, Ann Marie. "'Ez ist ir G'Artet von mir': Queen Isolde and Princess. Isolde in Gottfried von Strassburg's Tristan und Isolde." In Arthurian Women: A Casebook, edited by Thelma S. Fenster. New York: Garland, 1996, pp. 41–57.
- Rougemont, Denis de. L'Amour et l'Occident. Paris: Plon, 1939. Translation by Montgomery Belgion as Love in the Western World. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1983.
- Tavola Ritonda, o l'istoria di tristano*. Critical edition by Filippo-Luigi Polidori and Luciano Banchi. 2 vols. Bologna, Italy: G. Romagnoli, 1864–1866.
- Thomas. Le Roman de Tristan suivi de La Folie Tristan de Berne et La Folie d'Oxford, translated with presentation and notes by Emmanuèle Baumgartner and Ian Short; texts edited by Félix Lecoy. Paris: Champion, 2003.
- Tristan and the Round Table. A Translation of 'La Tavola Ritonda'*, translated and annotated by Anne Shaver. Binghamton, N.Y.: State University of New York Press, 1983.
- Wagner, Richard. Tristan und Isolde. Complete orchestral score. New York: Dover Publications, 1973.

See also Arthurian Literature; Gottfried von Strassburg; Romance, French; Romance, German

ITALY

The history of women in medieval Italy reflects the fragmented nature of the country's premodern political history. Their sociolegal status varied from region to region and over time, and the relatively late acceptance of women's history within the Italian academy has meant that work on medieval Italian women is uneven and often highly localised. It has also been held back by the centrality of the Italian city-republics of the north in major narratives of Italian medieval history. Oriented towards tracing the emergence of civic government and the revival of Roman law in the twelfth century, this historiographical tradition has largely ignored women, for whom public office was not an option and whose property rights were eroded in successive waves of civic legislation.

Sources

Italian legal historians have long been interested in the problem of women, especially the issues surrounding the institution of the mundium, or legal guardianship by an adult male (usually the father and then, on marriage, the husband) and the property arrangements made at the time of marriage. Legal sources (Roman and Lombard law codes, Carolingian capitularies and civic statutes) still form the basis for much work on women's status. They have been joined by documents of practice (charters recording property transactions, wills, etc.) and, increasingly, by careful analysis of narrative and literary sources.

The vast majority of the extant charter material prior to 1200 (and an only slightly lesser proportion after that date) is preserved in ecclesiastical archives, and so often reflects the concerns of the church rather than those of the lay people with whom ecclesiastical institutions regularly interacted. A preponderance of the donations to the institution somewhat skews the picture of how women's property was managed, but women might use gifts to the church as an effective strategy to avoid pressure to remarry when widowed. Donations of land were often accompanied by collections of documents relating to its history prior to the donation. These provide at least some glimpses of family relations and enable the reconstruction of often substantial genealogical information. Because women's right to some property, be it in the form of a dowry or a portion to be held on widowhood, was largely upheld in law, their consent was often required to their husbands' transactions. They also, as later medieval examples demonstrate, had the right to sue insolvent husbands if their own property had been dissipated without their consent.

In narrative sources, family histories can be more fragmented, but a picture can be built up of both clerical and lay views of women. Hagiography and canonisation procedures, for example, can offer considerable incidental evidence of social practices as laypeople recounted their interaction with the sacred. In contrast to their very circumscribed role as witnesses in secular court cases, women's testimony was admitted when ecclesiastical inquisitors were collecting evidence of miraculous interventions by the prospective saint. In describing the circumstances of the miracle (the healing of a sick child or a crippled husband, for instance), women's accounts reveal details of their work patterns, and how far they were willing or permitted to travel in search of a cure. It is notable, however, that their actual testimony was often corroborated by male interlocutors.

Civic chronicles, which offer laymen's accounts of their city's history alongside the clerical viewpoint in many records, frequently provide evidence of how women played key roles in Italian family politics. Incidental information surrounding public, family rituals such as wedding or funeral processions reveals the attention paid to female honour, and women's role in the mourning process. Chronicles and other historical narratives, once mined solely for the deeds of rulers and their political power, are increasingly being explored not only for the information they provide on women as rulers and wives of rulers (for example, Queen Amalasantha, Empress Constance, and Joan I), but also for signs of female patronage. Aristocratic women often intervened to shape the narrative to suit their own or their family's interests. For example, it is likely that the Lombard princess Sichelgaita of Salerno had a major say in the chronicle of Amatus of Montecassino, recording her Norman husband Robert Guiscard's conquests in southern Italy. Her patronage ensured that the narrative favoured her own son's claim to succeed his father ahead of Robert's son by his first marriage.

Moving into the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, the emergence of civic government in the north and the centralising Kingdom of Sicily in the south brought with them increasing attempts not only to regulate their citizens through law codes and statutes, but also to record individual households and their economic value in the form of tax registers. Demographic historians have used such sources to try to reconstruct patterns of family formation and the composition of households. Such work is aided by the concern on the part of the nascent commercial classes to record their own family histories and company transactions in family diaries or libri di ricordanze. Here male and female memories combined, and although the majority of surviving texts were composed by male household heads, there are also isolated examples of female-authored works.

Peasant Women

The history of women in medieval Italy is therefore based on rich source materials: also extant are letters, sermons, and estate surveys. The latter, alongside charters, open up the world of Italian peasant women. Male and female peasant cultivators are visible in our evidence throughout the Middle Ages, but while slave cultivators were still a regular feature of agricultural activity at the start of our period, especially in the south, by the end of the Middle Ages the only slaves visible in charters and chronicles were female domestics. There also appears to have been a difference in the relationship between landlord and tenant between north and south. In the north, ties of direct dependence based on service on monastic and secular estates are visible. Surviving early medieval court cases suggest that such ties did not go unchallenged, but women are largely silent in such evidence, and ecclesiastical landlords preserved only the records of cases that reinforced their tenants' lack of freedom. Later, such ties gave way to a relationship based on commercial transactions: land leased in return for a proportion of its produce, the mezzadria. The latter pattern is visible from an early date in the south, but in fact may have given way to lighter ties of dependence after the Norman conquest. Certainly documents from the twelfth century onwards refer to "villeins" with their wives and children. In all cases, although the preference for male tenant cultivators is clear, women are also recorded taking on (and giving up) plots of land.

More frequently, the wives of peasants might be involved in small animal husbandry, tending gardens, caring for children, and producing textiles. Female outworkers are sometimes recorded in late medieval statutes and guild records, although these sometimes explicitly excluded women from such activities as well as regulating them. Work on women's economic roles has shown their relationship with artisanal guilds to have been ambivalent: they were rarely granted membership, and any support they received seems to have been associated with the membership of a male relative.

Land Owners

Further up the social scale, women are ubiquitous throughout the Italian evidence as property owners, based on grudgingly granted inheritance rights (sons were universally preferred to daughters) and on the dowry at marriage, which by the twelfth century was clearly seen as a substitute for a portion of the patrimony. Alongside this trend was one to limit the amount of land a daughter might take out of her natal family's property, and moveable or cash dowries became the norm (a trend shared with other parts of Europe). In addition, wives were granted a share of their husband's wealth to support themselves and their children in widowhood. In Lombard law this was known as the morgengab and limited to no more than one quarter of the husband's wealth. Versions of this portion were given across Italy, but again the twelfth century saw moves to restrict widows' claims: in Genoa in 1143 their right was taken away almost completely.

Depending on where they lived, women had a greater or lesser right to manage their property. In the commercial cities of Venice, Amalfi, and Genoa, from the tenth century onwards, we see women actively engaging in the burgeoning trade networks within and outside the peninsula. Such autonomy appears to have reached a peak in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, before civic legislation in the north and increasingly repressive imperial measures in the south combined to marginalise women and reduce them to a state of dependence on their natal families or husbands.

There were always exceptions to this general rule, especially in cases where women were the sole heirs to their families' fortunes. The spectacular career of countess Matilda of Tuscany (d. 1115) was based largely on her inherited wealth, which she used to great effect in supporting the reformist aims of Pope Gregory VII and in resisting German imperial claims to her lands. Eventually forced to capitulate, she nevertheless appears in numerous documents managing her estates. Initially she left her lands to the Church, but later left them to the Empire.

Religion

Women's spiritual life is in fact a key theme in Italian evidence, and took a variety of forms. Early, small-scale, private monasteries for women, founded and run by their families, were joined by larger, royal foundations. Some of the latter, such as that of SS. Salvatore and Giulia at Brescia, succeeded in winning patronage from successive rulers of the kingdom of Italy. As already mentioned, women donated property both to monastic and episcopal churches, and used such donations to gain both spiritual benefits for themselves and their families and, if widowed, some pecuniary support for themselves and their dependent children. Donations were frequently made on the condition that the property support the donor for life. Aristocratic families might found and patronise several houses in the same city, as the Theophylactans did in tenth-century Rome. Such houses provided places of retirement and refuge for male and female members of the clan. There is evidence to suggest that some women's monastic houses suffered displacement at the time of monastic and church reform in the tenth and eleventh centuries. At the same time, new forms of spiritual devotion, such as taking the habit but remaining at home as a vowess, begin to be documented.

Alternative forms of monastic life grew up around charismatic leaders in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, but it is noticeable that the Poor Clares, the female equivalent of the mendicant Franciscans, established by Clare of Assisi (1193–1253), were not permitted the freedom of movement accorded their male counterparts. The distinction between alternative forms of religious life and practices condemned as heretical was a fine one. Women participated enthusiastically as Cathars, Waldenses, and Humiliati, finding an outlet for their piety in such movements. It has been shown that the attraction of these groups probably did not rest upon the prominent role they accorded women, but the church's increasingly restrictive stance must have persuaded some women to turn to the heretical sects in order to express their religious devotion. For example, the practice of living at home as a vowess had been viewed with constant disapproval. The popularity of the heretical movements may well have led to the church's reconsideration of its position—certainly the Humiliati gained belated recognition and papal approval for their penitential life from Pope Innocent III.

On an individual level, the impulse to devote one's life to God eventually led to the emergence of female mystics in Italy, as elsewhere in Europe, and the recognition of some women as saintly. There were two peaks of mystical activity, first in the late thirteenth century (notably the careers of Umiliana dei Cerchi, Angela of Foligno, Guglielma of Milan, and Clare of Montefalco) and then after the Black Death in the fourteenth century, including the life of the most famous mystic, Catherine of Siena (1347–1380). Many achieved saintly or beatified status, notably Zita of Lucca (1218–c. 1275) for her charitable acts, but others, such as Margherita of Trento (d. 1307) and Mayfreda de Pirovano (a follower of Guglielma of Milan) were burned as heretics for their beliefs.

Although the population of medieval Italy was predominantly Christian, it is possible to trace the histories of its Jewish and Muslim communities. In both of these, women were largely subject to the male members of their families, but the consumption patterns of the former, at least, can be traced from Jewish merchants' letters. More work needs to be done on the social histories of these minorities in order to add a different facet of gender history in Italy.

PATRICIA SKINNER

References and Further Reading

- Bornstein, Daniel, and Roberto Rusconi, eds. Women and Religion in Medieval and Renaissance Italy. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1996.
- Casagrande, Giovanna, ed. Donne tra medioevo ed età moderna in Italia: ricerche. Perugia: Morlacchi Editore, 2004.
- Herlihy, David. "Women and the Sources of Medieval History: The Towns of Northern Italy." In Medieval Women and the Sources of Medieval History, edited by J. T. Rosenthal. Athens, Ga.: University of Georgia Press, 1990, pp. 133–154.
- Hughes, Diane Owen. "Invisible Madonnas? The Italian historiographical tradition and the women of medieval Italy." In Women in Medieval History and Historiography, edited by Susan Mosher Stuard. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1987, pp. 25–57.
- Klapisch-Zuber, Christiane. Women, Family and Ritual in Renaissance Italy. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1985.
- Kuehn, Thomas G. Law, Family and Women: Toward a Legal Anthropology of Renaissance Italy. Chicago, 1991.
- Medici, Maria Teresa Guerra. I diritti delle donne. Naples: Edizioni Scientifiche Italiane, 1986.
- . L'aria di città: donne e diritti nel commune medievale. Naples: Edizioni Scientifiche Italiane, 1996.
- Muzzarelli, Maria G., Paola Galetti, and Bruno Andreolli, eds. Donne e lavoro nell'Italia medievale. Turin: Rosenberg and Sellier, 1991.
- Naso, Irma, and Rinaldo Comba, eds. Demografia e società nell'Italia medievale. Cuneo: Società italiana di demografia storica, 1994.
- Pereira, M., ed. Né Eva né Maria: condizione femminile e immagini della donna nel medioevo. Bologna, 1981.
- Wemple, Suzanne F. "S. Salvatore/S. Giulia: A Case Study in the Endowment and Patronage of a Major Female Monastery in Northern Italy." In Women of the Medieval World, edited by Julius Kirshner and Suzanne F. Wemple. Oxford: Blackwell, 1985, pp. 85–102.

See also Amalasantha; Angela of Foligno; Beatrice; Boccaccio, Giovanni; Caterina Sforza; Caterina Vigri; Catherine of Genoa; Catherine of Siena; Cereta, Laura; Clare of Assisi; Clare of Montefalco; Compiuta Donzella; Constance of Sicily; Cornaro, Caterina; D'Este, Isabella and Beatrice; Dante Alighieri; Datini, Margherita; Dogaresse; Epic, Italian; Fedele, Cassandra; Fina of San Gimignano; Griselda; Helena; Literature, Italian; Marozia of Rome; Matilda of Tuscany; Nogarola, Isotta; Petrarch; Poor Clares Order; Rose of Viterbo; Slaves; Strozzi, Alessandra; Tornabuoni de' Medici, Lucrezia; Trota of Salerno; Women Authors; Italian Texts; Zita and Other Servant Saints

J

---

JACOBUS DE VORAGINE'S GOLDEN LEGEND

Jacobus de Voragine's Golden Legend is the most famous anthology of readings about the saints and major festivals of the medieval Catholic Church. Compiled in Latin by the Italian friar Jacobus de Voragine (c. 1228–1298) (or Jacopo da Varazze), probably during the 1260s, this work was originally entitled simply Legenda sanctorum, or “material to be read about saints,” and evidently was designed as a reference book for students and preachers of Jacobus's own Dominican order. However, it eventually reached much wider audiences. Indeed, it became so popular that it acquired the honorific adjective aurea (golden) and survives in over nine hundred Latin manuscripts, many augmented with chapters on additional saints. Jacobus's book also gave rise to numerous translations and adaptations in medieval vernacular languages, and its popularity lasted until the Reformation. In the late fifteenth century it was still in such demand that it became a great bestseller for the new printing industry, which issued at least eighty-seven Latin editions and sixty-nine vernacular ones between 1470 and 1500.

Despite its prominence in its own time, the Legenda has proved resistant to modern critical assessment because of its encyclopedic nature and its complex relationship with other sources. Jacobus's contribution was not that of an original author, but a well-read and selective editor. He chose memorable stories and useful information from earlier legends and works on liturgy and church history, arranged this material in convenient chapters that follow the liturgical year, and abridged it according to his own priorities. Hence his positions on most issues are hard to distinguish from those of other ecclesiastical sources except in terms of emphases and proportions.

With regard to gender issues in particular, the Legenda's selectivity initially seems contradictory. On the one hand, the book makes some gratuitous digs at women—as, for example, when the chapter on the Purification of the Virgin digresses to explain why Leviticus prescribes a longer period for purification after a daughter's birth than after a son's. In this passage the purification period is identified with the time between conception and the completion of the fetal body (forty days for a male child, eighty for a female), and the supposed biological difference is allegorically interpreted as a sign that women are greater sinners than men and more wearisome to God (Ryan translation, pp. 143–144).

On the other hand, women comprise a sizable proportion of the saints in the Legenda, and the book allows its female saints to exercise some surprisingly masculine kinds of agency and power. Its numerous virgin martyrs are not portrayed as silent, helpless victims of male violence, but as heroes who boldly defy the authority figures ranged against them, prove impervious to every diabolical temptation and torture their enemies can devise, and nearly always get the last word. Among the female saints in the book one also finds intrepid mothers and wives who inspire their loved ones to stand fast and die for the faith, just as they will do themselves; “holy transvestites” who disguise themselves as men, join monastic communities, and become better monks than their male counterparts; at least two outstanding scholars (Paula and Catherine of Alexandria); and a number of eloquent and fruitful preachers, most notably Mary Magdalen, apostle to Provence.

The conclusion to be drawn from these strong portrayals of women is not that Jacobus was some kind of feminist. As the Legenda occasionally suggests and his sermons confirm, he assumed that women were naturally weak and corruptible creatures. Female saints, however, often served as role models for religious men, and Jacobus's own Order of Preachers was particularly attached to Mary Magdalen and Catherine. One of Jacobus's goals in the Legenda, moreover, was to arm preachers to combat heresy and disrespect for the clergy; and the chief weapons he provided were dramatic stories demonstrating the power and authority of God's representatives on earth and the inevitable defeat of their enemies. In this context, his portrayals of female saints may have been intended to illustrate the miraculous extent to which frail human vessels are transformed when they are serving God's purposes. As critics such as Jocelyn Wogan-Browne and Karen Winstead have shown, however, once such legends became available in the vernacular they were readily appropriated for a variety of other uses, from supplying precedents for young women who wanted to avoid marriage to "subvert [ing] the authority of the clergy over the laity and... challeng[ing] other traditional relationships of domination and subordination—for example, the authority of husbands over wives or of masters over servants" (Winstead, pp. 65–66).

SHERRY L. REAMES

References and Further Reading

- Boureau, Alain. La Légende dorée: Le système narratif de Jacques de Voragine (†1298). Paris: Cerf, 1984.
- Dunn-Lardeau, Brenda, ed. Legenda Aurea: Sept siècles de diffusion: Actes du Colloque international sur la Legenda aurea: texte latin et branches vernaculaires. Cahiers d'Études médiévales, Cahier spécial 2. Montreal: Bellarmin; Paris: J. Vrin, 1986.
- , ed. Legenda aurea—la Légende dorée (XIIIe–XVe s.): Actes du Congrès international de Perpignan. Le Moyen français 32 (1993).
- Fleith, Barbara, and Franco Morenzoni, eds. De la sainteté à l'hagiographie: genèse et usage de la Légende dorée. Geneva: Droz, 2001.
- Guidetti, Stefania, ed. Il Paradiso e la terra: Iacopo da Varazze e il suo tempo: Atti del convegno internazionale [Varazze, 24–26 sept 1998]. Florence: SISMEL, Galluzzo, 2001.
- Jacobus de Voragine. Legenda aurea. edited by Giovanni Paolo Maggioni. 2 vols. Florence: SISMEL, Galluzzo, 1998; 2nd ed., with the text also on CD-ROM, Florence: SISMEL, Galluzzo, 1999.
- Jacobus de Voragine. The Golden Legend: Readings on the Saints, translated by William Granger Ryan. 2 vols. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1993.
- Reames, Sherry L. The Legenda Aurea: A Reexamination of Its Paradoxical History. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1985.
- Vitz, Evelyn Birge. "From the Oral to the Written in Medieval and Renaissance Saints' Lives." In Images of Sainthood in Medieval Europe, edited by Renate Blumenfeld-Kosinski and Timea Szell. Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1991, pp. 97–114.
- Winstead, Karen A. Virgin Martyrs: Legends of Sainthood in Late Medieval England. Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1997.
- Wogan-Browne, Jocelyn. "Saints' Lives and the Female Reader." Forum for Modern Language Studies 27 (1991): 314–332.
- . "The Virgin's Tale." In Feminist Readings in Middle English Literature: The Wife of Bath and All Her Sect, edited by Ruth Evans and Lesley Johnson. London: Routledge, 1994, pp. 165–194.

See also Catherine of Alexandria; Hagiography; Margaret of Antioch; Mary the Egyptian; Mary Magdalen; Mary, Virgin: in Literature; Ursula and Her Companions; Virgin Martyrs

JACQUELINE OF BAVARIA

Jacqueline (Jacoba) of Bavaria (1401–1436), only child of William VI (Count of Hainault, Holland and Zeeland, Lord of Friesland) and Margaret of Burgundy, was the widow of John of Touraine, at the time of his death in 1417, dauphin of France. She succeeded her father after his death in 1417. King Sigismund of Germany did not agree and supported the claim of her father's brother, John of Bavaria (d. 1425). This struggle became interwoven with the factional struggle between Cods and Hooks that, from the death of Count William IV in 1345 and the following war of succession, until 1492, tore apart the counties of Holland and Zeeland repeatedly.

To strengthen her position, Jacqueline married her cousin, John IV, Duke of Brabant (d. 1427). However, Pope Martin V did not recognize the marriage as legitimate until 1428. When her husband came to terms with her uncle in 1420, Jacqueline declared the marriage illegal and married Humphrey of Gloucester, brother of King Henry V of England. Still waiting for papal approval, Humphrey retreated in 1425. John of Brabant received support from Philip the Good, Duke of Burgundy (1419–1467), his cousin, as well as Jacqueline's. In 1428, Jacqueline and Philip concluded a peace treaty that she broke by secretly marrying Frank van Borsselen. As a result she was forced in 1433 to resign in favor of Philip the Good. Three years later she died childless.

Under extreme circumstances Jacqueline had to accomplish a task—ruling a county—usually reserved to men. Later historiographers often explain her failure as resulting from female fickleness and weaknesses proven by her multiple marriages. As a widow Jacqueline had full power. However, she needed to marry to provide offspring, which meant that her husband took over the defense of her interests. When John IV of Brabant failed, she used papal irresolution to reject him, and looked elsewhere for support. Her last marriage was possibly part of an anti-Burgundian conspiracy.

RENÉE NIP

References and Further Reading

- Löher, F. von, Jakobäa von Bayern und ihrer Zeit. Acht Bücher niederländischer Geschichte. 2 vols. Nördlingen: Druck und Verlag der C. H. Beck'schen Buchhandlung, 1862, 1869.
- Nip, Renée. "Conflicting Roles: Jacqueline of Bavaria (d. 1436), Countess and Wife." In Saints, Scholars and Politicians, edited by Mathilde van Dijk and Renée Nip. Turnhout: Brepols, 2005, pp. 189–207.
- Smit, J.G. Vorst en onderdaan: Studies over Holland en Zeeland in de late Middeleeuwen. Louvain: Peeters, 1995.
- Vaughan, Richard. Philip the Good: The Apogee of Burgundy. London/Harlow: Longmans, 1970; reprint, Woodbridge: Boydell Press, 2002.

See also Burgundian Netherlands; Marriage, Christian; Marriage, Impediments to; Noble Women; Succession, Royal and Noble

JADWIGA

Jadwiga, younger daughter of King Louis of Hungary and of Poland, Hedwig (in Polish: Jadwiga) (1374–1399) was betrothed to William of Habsburg, and together they were intended to rule both Hungary and Austria. However, Elizabeth, the queen mother disregarded Louis's arrangements and had Mary, the older daughter, crowned "king" of Hungary. Jadwiga inherited her father's other kingdom. She was crowned "king" of Poland (rex Poloniae) in Krakow in 1384. The smooth transition of power following the king's death attests the stability of the Angevin regime and the popularity of Louis's long rule. Female inheritance was without precedent in east-central Europe, where women did not have the right to inherit land at all, even less entire kingdoms. A legal fiction had to be therefore created: Mary and Jadwiga "changed sex," and were regarded and addressed as "kings" rather than queens.

Jadwiga was an intelligent young woman and an accomplished scholar as well as renowned for her blonde beauty. The Polish nobility prevailed upon her to marry Jagiello, grand duke of Lithuania, the last pagan ruler in Europe. On February 15, 1386, Jagiello converted to Catholicism with his people and was baptized Wladyslaw. With her marriage, Jadwiga took on the role of numerous other queens who had converted their pagan husbands and her representation was henceforth determined by the rules of hagiography. Her image therefore differs markedly from that of her sister, Mary of Hungary. Mary is presented by the chroniclers as the paradigm of bad government in Hungary, proving that "women are not fit to rule": a weak young thing influenced by her mother, Mary provokes the resistance of the Hungarian nobility and a series of tragic disasters. As opposed to her, Jadwiga was a lover of the poor, a benefactor of churches, and an active patron of learning. She founded the bishopric of Wilno (Vilnius), refounded the University at Krakow, and endowed a college in the University of Prague for Lithuanian students. In 1399, Jadwiga died in childbirth. Venerated as a saint already in her lifetime, she was beatified in 1987, and canonized in 1997 by Pope John Paul II, former archbishop of Krakow. Her relics are kept in the cathedral of Krakow.

MARIANNE SÁGHY

References and Further Reading

- Davies, Norman. God's Playground: A History of Poland. New York: Columbia University, 1982.
- Dlugosz, Jan. The Annals of Jan Dlugosz. Translated and abridged by Maurice Michael. Charlton: IM Publications, 1997.
- Halecki, Oscar. Jadwiga of Anjou and the Rise of East Central Europe. Highland Lakes, N.J.: Social Science Monographs, 1991.
- Przybyszewski, Fr. Boleslaw. Saint Jadwiga, Queen of Poland (1374–1399). translated by Bruce MacQueen. London: Veritas Foundation Publication Centre, 1997.

See also Conversion, Religious; Eastern Europe; Hagiography; Mary of Hungary II; Queens and Empresses: The West

JEROME, INFLUENCE OF

Jerome (331–420) was born to a Christian family of Stridon, a town on the border of the Roman provinces of Dalmatia and Pannonia. The nearest center of Roman culture was Aquileia, at the top of the Adriatic Sea, but when Jerome was an adolescent, he was sent all the way to Rome to study at the school of the famous grammarian Aelius Donatus. Jerome graduated from the school of Donatus and moved on to one of Rome's famed rhetorical schools. The curriculum included Latin literature, public speaking, a smattering of philosophy, and perhaps a little Greek. Jerome was probably baptized in Rome, but it was not until he spent some time in Trier, the northern capital of the Emperor Valentinian I, that he first studied Christian texts. A period of years in Aquileia followed, in a circle of Christian intellectuals that included Rufinus of Aquileia, who was later Jerome's bitter rival.

About 373, apparently as a result of a break with his family, and under accusations from an unknown enemy, Jerome set out for the eastern Christian world. For the next decade, he associated with some of the most important Christian leaders of the century. In Antioch, he was befriended by Apollinaris of Laodicea, who was later accused of Christological heresy. Here, Jerome learned Greek and studied the works of Porphyry and Aristotle. He also became increasingly conflicted about whether he should concentrate on classical or Christian learning; at one point, in a feverish sleep, he had a dream that changed his life. As he later described it in Epistle 22 to his protégée Eustochium, a judge in a blaze of light asked him who he was. "I am a Christian," Jerome answered. "You are lying," the judge retorted, "you are a Ciceronian, not a Christian, for where your treasure is, there your heart is too" (Matthew 6:21). Jerome promised on the spot to never again possess or study secular books. He could hardly have kept this promise, but its spirit did send him out into the Syrian wilderness, where he lived as a hermit. Around 377, he returned to Antioch, where he may have begun to study Hebrew. In 379–380, he was in Constantinople, where he became a friend of the new bishop, Gregory of Nazianzus, studied Greek Christian works, and was present at the Council of Constantinople in 381, where the final version of the Nicene Creed was drafted and where Apollinaris was condemned. From 381 until 384, Jerome lived in Rome, where he was a close confidant of and sometimes the assistant to Pope Damasus.

In spite of this spectacular success as a leader of the Christian world (his name was mentioned as a possible successor to Pope Damasus I), Jerome's attraction to asceticism remained. The Roman women of the Aventine Circle shared this enthusiasm. They were perhaps influenced by the visit to Rome in 334 of Athanasius of Alexandria, an important proponent of Christian asceticism, and by the publication of his Athanasius's Life of Antony in Latin in 356. If so, the trend had already begun when Jerome was studying in Rome, but he only came face-to-face with it following his own exposure to ascetic traditions in Aquileia (where he had convinced his sister to take the veil) and Antioch. The Aventine women were members of the most important Roman families; most were married with children, but they managed in various ways to champion sexual chastity. They included Marcela, Melania, Fabiola, and the woman who became Jerome's closest friend, Paula. Some of these women later became part of the circle of the British preacher Pelagius; after the sack of Rome by the Goths in 410, a few fled to their country estates in North Africa, where they shocked Augustine with their spiritual independence, and inspired his articulation of the doctrine of original sin.

In this heady ascetic atmosphere, as the favorite of the pope, Jerome began his greatest scholarly achievement, a new Latin translation of the Bible from the original Greek and Hebrew sources, the version known as the Vulgate. Predictably, when the first parts of this were made public, they were greeted with indignant criticism. This was the first part of Jerome's fall from grace. The second had to do with his enthusiasm for the new ascetic culture: not only did he encourage Paula's daughter Eustochium to become the first consecrated virgin of Christian Rome, he also engaged in a vicious dispute against Helvidius, a layman who, alarmed by this surging tide of sexual renunciation, had the courage to write in defense of the Christian married state, even suggesting that Joseph and the Virgin Mary had been in a normal marriage. Jerome ripped into this position with withering satire. Finally, in 383, Pope Damasus died, and was succeeded not by Jerome but by the unsympathetic deacon Siricius. Jerome then became the focus of so many accusations that once again he was forced to leave town. In 385, he set sail for the east, eventually settling in Bethlehem. Here he was joined by Paula, Eustochium and, eventually, Paula's granddaughter, Paula the Younger. This Paula was consecrated to chastity at birth and sent from Rome to be raised in Bethlehem, but she arrived only after her grandmother's death in 404.

Jerome lived in Bethlehem until he died in 420. In these years he finished the Vulgate Bible translation, wrote a number of important commentaries on books of the Bible, and engaged in various theological controversies, including disputes with Rufinus and Augustine.

Jerome never mitigated his feisty and contentious nature, but he did continue a close relationship with Eustochium, who died just a year before he did. His long letter to her about the life of consecrated virginity, Epistle 22, was one of the most widely read of his works in the Middle Ages. Although Jerome never wrote a commentary on the Song of Songs, he used those enigmatic poems throughout this letter, urging Eustochium to think of herself as a Bride of Christ. His spiritual advice to Eustochium became one of the most important sources for the articulation of women's consecrated virginity. Jerome's writings against Helvidius were used in support of both consecrated virginity of women and the defense of the perpetual virginity of Mary. In the ninth century, Paschasius Radbertus cast his treatise on the defense of the virginity of Mary in partu (that is, at the moment of the birth of Jesus, a doctrine that did become part of official medieval theology) as a letter from Jerome to Paula and Eustochium. Jerome quite possibly would not have minded this at all, but perhaps the ultimate irony of his life is that his writings on gender and sexuality were later used to restrict women rather than to give them the spiritual freedom he had in mind.

E. ANN MATTER

References and Further Reading

- Barr, Jane J. "The Influence of Saint Jerome on Medieval Attitudes to Women," In After Eve: Women, Theology and the Christian Tradition, edited by Janet Soskice. Basingstoke: Marshal Pickering, 1990, pp. 89–102.
- Clark, Elizabeth A., "The Uses of the Song of Songs: Origen and the Later Latin Fathers," In Ascetic Piety and Women's Faith: Essays on Late Ancient Christianity. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 1986, pp. 386–427.
- . "Theory and Practice in Late Ancient Asceticism." Journal of Feminist Studies in Religion 5 (1989): 25–46.
- Hinson, E. Glenn, "When the World Collapsed: The Spirituality of Women During the Barbarian Invasion of Rome," Perspectives in Religious Studies 20 (1993): 113–130.
- Jerome. Letters. translated by Charles Christopher Mierow. Ancient Christian Writers, Westminster, Md.: Newman Press, 1963.
- Kelly, J. N. D. Jerome: His Life, Writings, and Controversies. New York: Harper & Row, 1975.
- Oppel, John. "Saint Jerome and the History of Sex." Viator 24 (1993): 1–22.
- Yarbrough, Anne, "Christianization in the Fourth Century: The Example of Roman Women." Church History 45 (1976): 149–165.

See also Asceticism; Augustine, Influence of; Bride of Christ; Imagery; Church; Letter Writing; Literacy and Reading; Latin; Mary, Virgin; Theology; Virginity

JESUS/GOD AS MOTHER

Extended comparison of Jesus to a mother first occurred in devotional texts of the twelfth century and reached its fullest expression in the Showings (also known as The Revelations of Divine Love) by the fourteenth century English mystic and theologian, Julian of Norwich. References to God and Jesus as a mother in the Bible and by patristic writers of the early Church, however, provide warrant for this comparison.

Several Old Testament verses describe God as a mother who gives birth to humanity and nurtures the Israelites as children. Deuteronomy 32:18, for example, chides the Hebrews for forgetting "the God who gave you birth." Isaiah 42:14 warns that after a long period of restraint, God will "cry out like a woman in labor, / I will gasp and pant." God claims to have given birth to the house of Israel in Isaiah 46:3; and his love for the Hebrews is compared to the love of a nursing mother in Isaiah 49:15 and 66:13. In Hosea 11:3, the Lord speaks of himself as a mother who teaches her children to walk and feeds, heals, and loves them.

Warrant for the comparison of Jesus to a mother comes from the female figure Wisdom who appears in Proverbs and the apocryphal books Ecclesiasticus and the Wisdom of Solomon, now included only in the Catholic Bible. In Ecclesiasticus 24:24 DV, Wisdom proclaims, "I am the mother of fair love, and of fear, and of knowledge, and of holy hope." Wisdom asserts in Proverbs 8:22–30 and Ecclesiasticus 24:5–11 that she was with God before time and participated in the creation of the earth: "I was with him forming all things" (Prov. 8:30 DV). The speaker in Wisdom 7:22–27 praises her as "a vapour of the power of God, and a certain pure emanation of the glory of the almighty God...For she is the brightness of eternal light, and the unspotted mirror of God's majesty, and the image of his goodness" (Wis. 7:25–26 DV).

In the New Testament Wisdom's qualities lead to her identification with Christ as Logos, the Word of God is invoked at the beginning of John's Gospel. Paul confirms this identification by referring to Christ as the power and wisdom of God (1 Cor. 1:14) and asserting that the Son, like Wisdom, participated with God in creation (Col. 1:15–17).

Drawing on these allusions in the Old and New Testaments, the Fathers of the Church, especially Augustine of Hippo, and medieval theologians continued to attribute to Christ the creative and nurturing characteristics of a mother. However, they did not comment on the gender implied by this analogy.

From the twelfth through the fourteenth centuries, Western Christians developed a greater sense of the humanity of Jesus and expressed a broader range of emotion in their devotions. This affective piety encouraged a fuller exploration of the feminine qualities of Christ. In his prayers, for example, Anselm of Canterbury refers to Jesus as a mother who endures the labor pains of the Passion to give new life to his children, who nurses them, and who protects them like the mother hen of Matthew 23:37. Mystics, such as Bernard of Clairvaux; Marguerite d'Oing; and the three nuns of Helfta, Gertrude the Great, Mechthild of Hackeborn, and Mechthild of Magdeburg, also attribute maternal characteristics to Christ.

The fullest comparison of Jesus to a mother is developed by Julian of Norwich, who reported on a visionary experience she had in 1373 and the understanding she achieved after twenty years of meditation in the two versions of her Showings. Julian's account of the three maternities of Jesus, in creating, in recreating, and in working, appears in Revelation 14, chapters 52 through 63 of the long text. Alluding to the Wisdom tradition, Julian depicts Jesus, the Logos or Word of God, as mother in creation because he incorporates the soul with its image of God into the body. Jesus is mother in re-creation because he takes on human flesh to make atonement to God the Father and redeems humanity through the labor pains of the Passion. Jesus is mother in working because he nurtures and protects his children on earth, feeding them with his own body and blood in the Eucharist. Julian of Norwich's concept of Jesus the Mother develops the feminine characteristics of God implied in Biblical and patristic texts and emphasized by affective spirituality.

DENISE NOWAKOWSKI BAKER

References and Further Reading

- Bradley, Sister Ritamary. "Patristic Background and the Motherhood Similitude in Julian of Norwich." Christian Scholar's Review 8 (1978): 101–113.
- Bynum, Caroline Walker. Jesus as Mother: Studies in the Spirituality of the High Middle Ages. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1982.
- Heimmel, Jennifer. "God Is Our Mother": Julian of Norwich and the Medieval Image of Christian Feminine Divinity. Elizabethan & Renaissance Studies, 92.5. Salzburg: Universität Salzburg, 1982.
- Newman, Barbara. "Some Mediaeval Theologians and the Sophia Tradition." The Downside Review 108 (1990): 111–130.

See also Gender Ideologies; Gertrude the Great; Julian of Norwich; Mechtild of Hackeborn; Mechtild of Magdeburg; Theology; Wisdom

JEWELRY

Jewelry inflects the body's significance, signaling status, identity, and personal history. Byzantine empresses and Scandinavian chiefs might communicate their authority with earrings or bracteates (arm bands). Popes and kings might, on acceding to their thrones, be granted rings or coronets as part of their regalia. Merchants could seal documents with their rings, while their daughters received rings and brooches at marriage. Pilgrims might affix modest mass-produced badges or amulets to their cloaks or hats, recording their visits to holy sites.

Fourteenth-century brooch with fleur-de-lys motif, from the Treasury of Saint-Denis, MR345. Photo: Peter Willi. Location: Louvre, Paris, France. Credit: Réunion des Musées Nationaux / Art Resource, N.Y.

Owing to the widespread practice of burial with luxury items in early medieval Mediterranean cultures, many jewels survive from this period. Gold was prized, as was enamel work. In later medieval Europe, with changes in burial practices, fewer jewels have survived. Used as a form of currency, jewels were regularly traded, reduced to precious materials, and refashioned.

Gems, which until the thirteenth century were polished, not cut, were especially valued, both for their economic worth and for their mystical properties. Various lapidary tractates like Albertus Magnus's De Mineralibus and Marbod of Rennes's De Lapidibus catalogued the talismanic and alchemical characteristics of various gems (sapphires, emeralds, diamonds, rubies, etc.) as well as pearls and coral. Certain combinations of settings and gems were thought to ensure good health, happiness, or power.

Although both men and women wore jewelry, preachers and moralists railed mainly against the frippery of women, seeing their jewels as seducing men; sumptuary legislation also sought to limit such finery. Such responses indicate the importance of jewelry in medieval culture. As recipients and donors, purchasers and wearers, women exercised considerable control over this communicative medium and form of capital.

ADRIAN RANDOLPH

References and Further Reading

- Lightbown, Ronald W. Mediaeval European Jewellery. London: Victoria and Albert Museum, 1992.
- Walker, Alicia. "Myth and Magic in Early Byzantine Marriage Jewelry: The Persistence of Pre-Christian Traditions." In The Material Culture of Sex, Procreation, and Marriage in Premodern Europe, edited by Anne L. McClanan and Karen Rosoff Encarnación. Palgrave, 2002, pp. 59–78.

See also Betrothals; Clothing; Coinage; Death, Mourning, and Commemoration; Dowry and Other Marriage Gifts; Grave Goods; Magic and Charms; Sumptuary Law

JEWISH MYSTICAL THOUGHT, BODY AND SOUL IN

Medieval Jewish thought about body and soul can be understood in terms of a conversation among rabbinic traditions, philosophical reinterpretations of those traditions, and mystical thought sometimes attempting to synthesize these two strains, and sometimes drawing on Neoplatonic traditions to elaborate ideas quite different from either of these. The female imaging of body and soul is axial in the mystical synthesis of these traditions. In Hebrew, "body" is designated with the word guf or Gufa, female-gendered terms. In the Hebrew Bible and the Midrash, the following five words commonly referred to the soul: nephesh (blood), ruach (wind or spirit), neshamah (disposition), jehidah (the only one), chayyah (living soul). Each of these terms is gendered female, and as Tova Rosen asserts, "this is no superficial linguistic bias" (p. 83). Female engenderment of body and soul draws on a wide range of roles traditionally associated with women.

Understandings of the nature of the human body were related to communal conception of the divine body, because they are linked in the creation narrative of Genesis 1:26–7 "And God said, 'Let us make man in our image, after our likeness...'" Rabbinic literature generally preserves anthropomorphic conceptions of God's body, even up to the ninth century. For example, Robert Bonfils presents evidence that Carolingian Jews believed God had a form like humans but incalculably larger. This begins to change with the emergence of Jewish philosophy in the tenth century. Like their Muslim counterparts, Jewish philosophers worked to systematize Jewish thought by establishing divine unity, dependent upon divine incorporeality. Thus beginning with Sa'adya Gaon (b. 882 Fayyûm, upper Egypt, d. 942 in Baghdad) they worked to reinterpret as metaphorical biblical and rabbinical references to the divine body. This divested the human body of significance deriving from its resemblance to the divine form.

Medieval Jewish philosophers drew on classical traditions of representing the body as feminine to express its radical unlikeness to God. Maimonides, a rationalist philosopher (b. 1138 in Cordova, Spain, d. 1204 in Egypt), uses the metaphor of prostitution to describe the embodied state; in his Guide of the Perplexed he famously declares that "matter is a married harlot," expressing simultaneously the body's radical difference from the divine and its flawed connection to God. He also made a similar separation between God and the soul. Once this break was made, medieval thinkers use feminine metaphors both to conceptualize separation, and to imagine the possibility of reconnecting with the divine.

Some mystical sources worked to repair this rupture, using different figurations of the female body. The Zohar, the thirteenth century core kabbalistic compendium, expresses three main viewpoints on the body. The first accords with the Maimonidean perspective, asserting that it is evil beyond redemption, and must be broken and humiliated. The second holds that it is predisposed to neither good nor evil, but capable of improvement and redemption by proper performance of the mitzvot (divine commandments central to Jewish practice). The third, more radical view holds that the human body is modeled after the sefirot, the ten emanations of God. In this view the body itself assists humans in their attempts to reach the divine (see Tishby).

In the second point of view, the body is treated as a tool. Used correctly, it is restorative, and its female gendering serves mimetic purposes. The male mystic is "improved" by a narrative and imaginative transgendering so that he resembles a greater, female-gendered entity, the community of Israel, a plurality enacting Jewish scriptural ideals. Here, when the male enacts Jewish ideals, he loses his individual status and imagines himself as a representative of the community of Israel, a female-gendered entity, which relates to God through structures of the covenant sometimes imagined as a marriage.

In the third point of view, the body is treated as a text. Believing the body is modeled on the sefirot, male writers imagined themselves as the Shekhinah, a female aspect of the divine, and the lowest of the sefirot. By identifying with her, humans "join" the divine pleroma, the members of which are understood to relate to one another in sexual terms. For example, the Shekhinah sexually "receives" divine outflow from her supernal bridegroom, Tiferet. In this way, divine influence is transmitted downward to the created world. By identifying with and imaginatively joining the Shekhinah, the male mystic is able to receive the divine outflow as well. Here the male mystic uses feminine imagery to redeem the body, imaginatively transgenerating it, and reassimilating it to the divine pleroma.

Similarly, Maimonides posited a fundamental alienation of the soul; he claimed that human efforts toward self-perfection did not affect the divine. His view radicalized rabbinic beliefs that the soul was created in the celestial realms, but outside the divine realm proper. Kabbalists countered by asserting that the neshama, the highest part of the soul had a divine origin, and that the tripartite soul (nefesh, ruach, neshama) served as a model of the sefirot, and in this, God. They believed that neshamot derived from the divine substance, descended the sefirotic tree, and gestated in and emerged from the womb of the Shekhinah. To kabbalists, perfecting one human soul changed the nature of the divine. In this case then, the feminized soul was both the object of formation and the agent of change.

In each of these cases the writers use female-gendered images of body and soul to conceptualize a reconnection with the divine. Writers believing that the body is not redeemable dramatized these beliefs by imagining themselves as abject women—widows or abandoned wives. In these circumstances they use images of broken sexual union to dramatize the rupture between the embodied human and the divine, and they imagine its repair through metaphors of sexual reunion after death. Finally, kabbalists reimagined the feminized soul as a microcosm for the sefirot, or the divine form. Female engenderment of body and soul served simultaneously to emphasize the radical divide between God and embodied humans as it also imagined sexualized channels for their reunion in life and after death.

MARLA SEGOL

References and Further Reading

- Bland, Kalman. "The Well-Tempered Medieval Sensorium." In The Artless Jew: Medieval and Modern Affirmations and Denials of the Visual. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 2000.
- Boyarin, Daniel. Carnal Israel: Reading Sex in Talmudic Culture. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1993.
- Eilberg-Schwartz, Howard. People of the Body: Jews and Judaism from an Embodied Perspective. Albany, N.Y.: SUNY Press, 1992.
- Hecker, Joel. Mystical Bodies, Mystical Meals: Eating and Embodiment in Medieval Kabbalah. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 2005.
- Rosen, Tova. Unveiling Eye: Reading Gender in Medieval Hebrew Literature. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2003.

See also Body in Literature and Religion; Shekhinah; Soul

JEWISH WOMEN

This entry surveys the history of Jewish women's experiences as unmarried daughters, wives, and widows, especially their legal and economic statuses. Dispersed throughout the Mediterranean and Islamic worlds during the early Middle Ages, by the high medieval period Jewish communities were established in northern Europe as well. These communities remained strong through the 1200s when expulsions began, 1290 from England, 1306 from France, and eventually 1492 from Spain. Afterwards Jews remained in some Italian cities (experiencing periodic mini-expulsions), and northern European Jews wended their way east, eventually creating a vibrant community in Poland. Although northern European settlements were culturally and numerically significant, the largest and most stable communities for the high medieval period were those in Iberia and Islamic regions.

All Jewish communities valued gendered roles for men and women. If it were economically feasible for men to study, the normative ethic that education went hand in hand with morality meant that they did so. Men were also religiously obliged to marry and father children. Similarly women were expected to marry, excel at domestic duties, care for their husbands and look after their children, with some flexibility in cases where they ran their own businesses. Broadly defined, the Jews of Christendom had much in common with each other in terms of local culture and interpretation of Jewish law, as did those Jews who lived under Islamic rule. Although Jews could not settle unless their rights to live in autonomous communities under Jewish law were respected, they never lived in a vacuum. They spoke the language of the majority culture and interacted with Christians and/or Muslims frequently in their day-to-day lives. Even matters that used to be classified as beyond the influence of majority culture, such as inheritance and marriage, are increasingly understood to have been shaped by local majority customs. For instance, consider the Jewish women of the Islamic world (in particular of Fustat/Cairo for which thousands of documents in Hebrew script, most from c. 800–1200, were preserved in a Geniza, or burial repository for sacred writings). Cairene women were not as strictly enclosed as their Muslim women neighbors, but they experienced less physical mobility than Jewish women of Christian Europe. The Cairenes were also significantly more likely to find themselves married to a man who practiced polygyny, or even polygamy, while bigamy was banned among northern European Jews, if occasionally practiced in Iberia.

Regional Differences

Within the Christian political sphere the Jewish communities of northern Europe (German, northern France, and England) and southern Europe (Iberia, southern France, and Italy) viewed women's status somewhat differently. Jewish women living in northern Europe experienced the most autonomy in their economic activities, including the ability to travel for business; and they were more likely than their southern counterparts to be found functioning as guardians for their children and as business partners, or even supervisors, for their adult sons. The banker Licoricia of Winchester acted as the matriarch of her family until her murder in 1277, managing extensive commercial transactions with the king of England and other powerful Christians. Northern Jews married off their sons and daughters when they were equally of an early age, perhaps as young as twelve or thirteen; while some southerners, such as those of Catalonia in northeastern Iberia, waited until between sixteen and eighteen for both men and women; and Italians adopted the customs of the Christian majority by marrying men in their late twenties to women between fourteen and eighteen. Divorce was permitted to Jews in all communities, although it probably occurred less frequently in the north where a woman could not be divorced against her will.

In general in Jewish communities daughters did not come into their inheritances before marriage. They had rights to a dowry and to maintenance by their fathers until married when they were transferred to the legal jurisdiction of their husbands. Poor, young Jewish women sometimes served as domestic servants in Jewish homes. Community leaders and scholars of Jewish law like Moses Maimonides (1135–1204), leader of the Jewish community in Cairo, encouraged their coreligionists to employ Jewish girls (especially orphans) instead of purchasing domestic slaves who were not Jewish.

In contrast to the passive roles of unmarried daughters, some Jewish wives were financially active, especially in northern Europe. Dolce of Worms, was celebrated by her husband Rabbi Eleazar for her efforts to earn a good living, her needlework, and her support of Eleazar and his students in religious study. While married, Preciosa de Villemagne of Perpignan was one of the most active moneylenders in this thriving town on the Pyrenean frontier and probably served as her husband Isaac's economic partner in the absence of a son. Other southern European Jewish wives, however, are far less visible in the historical and economic record. When the translator Judah ibn Tibbon (an immigrant from Islamic Spain who fled to Lunel in southern France) extolled the virtues of his unnamed daughter-in-law, they were all domestic: housekeeping, nursing her child and husband in illness, and balancing the household budget.

Widows

Even more than wives, Jewish widows were active in many commercial spheres. Banking and moneylending predominated among northern European women, as they did among Jewish men in that region. Jewish widows also served as active and effective guardians for their minor children. Some widows, such as Regina (or Reina), widow of Bonjuses Asday, the most successful woman banker/moneylender in thirteenth-century Perpignan, increased their own independent financial prospects through business connections made as widowed guardians. Wealthy Jewish widows amassed fortunes and made significant charitable donations to their communities. Sara de Cabestany also of Perpignan, born in Béziers and with family ties to another southern French community in Narbonne, set up a charitable trust through her Latin testament to provide dowries for poor girls and enable poor boys to study. Still others remained financially passive, such as Astruga ibn Dalal, of Barcelona, who was reluctant to take up guardianship responsibilities and chose instead to reside with her children while leaving their financial matters in the hands of male relatives. Adult sons and brothers of Jewish widows throughout the medieval Jewish world had the potential to control their mothers and sisters in commercial matters. Sons in the southern regions probably looked after their aging mothers more often than they were guided by them. Some widows were economically vulnerable and the absence of children, especially of sons, contributed to their suffering.

Economic and Religious Roles

Overall Jewish women were active in many different occupations; money lending and banking have already been mentioned, but medicine education, and trade in womanly crafts were also their professions. When Jewish women practiced medicine their clients were limited neither to obstetrical patients nor to women. For instance, Rabbi Judah Asheri, of Toledo, claimed that, as an ailing baby his eyesight would have been saved if only he had remained in his hometown in Germany under the care of a Jewish woman practitioner there. Maimonides corresponded with a woman who founded and maintained her own school for younger children, with the help of her elder son. One substantial Cairene businesswoman (and divorcée), active during the early twelfth century, was called “Karima” or “Al-Wusha.” She worked as a broker of textiles and other women’s embroidery work.

Religiously there seem to have been more opportunities for women’s involvement in northern Europe than existed in the south. While some elite women of Worms were said to have led the female members of their community in prayer, the scholars of Catalonia were perplexed because women were supposed to recite the Grace after meals, but few women with whom they were acquainted actually did so. Thus, although there were a few exceptions, such as Qasmina Bint Isma’il of late eleventh- or early twelfth-century Islamic Granada in Iberia who wrote Arabic poetry, in general even elite Jewish women were not very learned. In particular, they do not seem to have been taught Hebrew along with their brothers.

Sexual Transgressions

Most Jewish women followed the customs of their families and the moral dictates of their communities and led respectable married lives, but sexual liaisons across religious lines occasionally occurred. Jewish leaders viewed the seduction of Jewish women by gentiles as an acutely demeaning sign of their inferior status vis-à-vis the dominant community. A few relations across religious boundaries resulted in marriage. The Cairo Geniza preserves a request for aid from a female convert from Christianity who claims to have been the widow of Rabbi David Todros of Narbonne; and it was technically permitted in the Islamic world for Muslim men and Jewish women to marry. The Roman Catholic Church feared miscegenation and legislated against it repeatedly, but sex between Jewish women and Christian men seems to have occasionally occurred in Christian Europe. In the 1260s, Goigs de Pallafols, banker to King James I of Aragon, petitioned her royal creditor for permission to continue living with her Christian lover, and the king probably allowed this, hoping for her eventual conversion. Count Theobald of Blois’s extramarital relationship with Polcelina (Pullcelina) of Blois was the purported cause of his wife’s false ritual murder accusation against the Jewish community. The Count subsequently massacred Polcelina and thirty other Jewish people in 1171. When such relationships surfaced, although this happened extremely rarely, they often served to demarcate the precariousness of Jewish minority existence.

REBECCA WINER

References and Further Reading

- Adelman, Howard. “Italian Jewish Women,” In Jewish Women in Historical Perspective, 2nd ed. edited by Judith R. Baskin. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1998, pp. 150–168.
- Assis, Yom Tov. “Sexual Behavior in Medieval Hispano-Jewish Society,” In Jewish History: Essays in Honor of Chimen Abramsky, edited by A. Rapoport Albert and S.J. Zipperstein. London: P. Halban, 1988, pp. 25–59.
- Baskin, Judith R. “Jewish Women in the Middle Ages.” In Jewish Women in Historical Perspective. 2nd ed, edited by Judith R. Baskin. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1998, pp. 101–127.
- Baumgarten, Elisheva. Mothers and Children: Jewish Family Life in Medieval Europe. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 2004.
- Goitein, S. D. A Mediterranean Society: An Abridgement in One Volume, edited by Jacob Lassner. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1999.
- Grossman, Avraham. Pious and Rebellious: Jewish Women in Medieval Europe. Waltham, Mass.: Brandeis University Press, 2004.
- Hebrew Ethical Wills*, edited and translated by Israel Abrahams. 2 vols. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America, 1926.
- Jewish History*, 51 (1991) and (2002).
- Jordan, William Chester. Women and Credit in Pre-Industrial and Developing Societies. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1993, pp. 11–49.
- Klein, Elka. “The Widow’s Portion: Law, Custom, and Marital Property among Medieval Catalan Jews.” Viator 31 (2000): 147–163.
- . Medieval Sourcebook: Reciting the Grace after Meals: The Status of Jewish Women, from Berakhot, chap. 7: <http://www.fordham.edu/HALSALL/source/jewishwomen-grace.html>.
- Melammed, Renée Levine. “Sephardi Women in the Medieval and Early Modern Periods.” In Jewish Women In Historical Perspective, 2nd ed. edited by Judith R. Baskin. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1998, pp. 128–149.
- Nirenberg, David. “Chapter 5. Sex and Violence between Majority and Minority,” in Communities of Violence: Persecution of Minorities in the Middle Ages. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1996.
- Rambi: The Index of Articles on Jewish Studies, sponsored by the Jewish National and University Library, Hebrew University, Jerusalem, <http://jnul.huji.ac.il/rambi>.
- Schereschewsky, Ben-Zion (Benno). “Divorce,” “Dowry,” “Husbands and Wives” and “Widow.” In Encyclopedia Judaica, Jerusalem Encyclopedia Judaica 1971, 16 volumes, yearbooks, and decennial books and CD-ROM.
- Shatzmiller, Joseph. “Women in the Medical Profession.” In Jews, Medicine, and Medieval Society. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1994, pp. 108–112.
- Stow, Kenneth R. Alienated Minority: The Jews of Medieval Latin Europe. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1992.
- Tallan, Cheryl. “Opportunities for Medieval Northern European Jewish Widows in the Public and Domestic Spheres,” In Upon My Husband's Death: Widows in the Literature and Histories of Medieval Europe, edited by Louise Mirrer, Ann Arbor, Mich.: University of Michigan Press, 1992, pp. 115–127.

Winer, Rebecca. Women, Wealth, and Community in Perpignan c. 1250–1300: Christians, Jews, and Enslaved Muslims in a Medieval Mediterranean Town. Aldershot: Ashgate, 2005.

See also Dolce of Worms; Investment and Credit; Jewish Mystical Thought, Body and Soul in; Jewish Women: Latin and European Vernacular Literature; Law, Jewish; Literature, Hebrew; Marriage, Jewish; Mikveh; Pregnancy and Childbirth: Jewish Women; Qasmūna Bint Ismāʿīl; Widows as Guardians

JEWISH WOMEN: LATIN AND EUROPEAN VERNACULAR LITERATURE

It is striking to note how different the representations of Jewish men and Jewish women were in medieval literature. The Jewish man was the quintessential Jew: blind to Christian truth, committed to the law and the letter of the Bible, easy associate of the devil, partner in “deicide,” usurer, cruel abuser of Christians and their religion. Visual representations often marked the Jew with a pointed Jewish hat, a swarthy appearance, or a bodily deformity. Conversely, Jewish women were above all women, and most frequently mothers and wives. Medieval narratives represented the Jewish woman as a passive witness to abuses perpetrated by her husband, or as a potential convert to Christianity. The pervasive belief in the malleability of female personality, its openness to influence, suggested that a Jewish woman could be turned into a good Christian, while the Jewish male mind (tutored in the Talmud) and body (marked by circumcision) were more permanently different, immutable.

Exemplary Jewish women appeared in early medieval liturgy: Rachel's lament was incorporated into liturgical drama, Judith's heroics came to be seen as prefiguring Mary. Jewish women appear more frequently in the tales known as exempla, narratives that conveyed moral truths in a colorful manner and aimed to correct common errors. These stories were widely used in sermons and pastoral writings, in Latin and in the vernaculars. A widely known tale was that of the Jewish Boy, a story with Greek origins, known to Gregory the Great and Bede, and which became part of the corpus of Marian miracles that coalesced in the twelfth century. The story tells of a Jewish Boy who had taken communion with Christian schoolmates and suffered cruel punishment once he told his father what he had done. The story has the Jewish father throw his son into a furnace, but all versions emphasize the Jewish mother's grief. When the story was illustrated, artists emphasized the Jewish mother's pain and suffering in dramatic gestures. The dramatic denouement had the boy saved by the Virgin Mary in the furnace, the father thrown into it, and the mother, son, and Jewish community converted to Christianity. By the thirteenth century the story was known in Anglo-Norman, French, and Gallician translations of Marian miracles.

Stories and images of the Virgin Mary offered a niche within which the Jewish woman could be explored. Mary had, after all, been a Jewish woman, as the apocryphal writings about her life, expressed in liturgy and art, made clear. Narratives related to Mary often led to conversion, to the realization of Christian truth. Thus Cantiga 107 of the Cantigas de Santa Maria is a story of the saving conversion of a beautiful Jewish woman by the Virgin Mary. The Dominican writer Thomas of Cantimpré collected hundreds of miracles stories—old and new—in his Bonum universale de apibus (The Universal Good Thing about Bees) (written between 1256 and 1263). He recounts a contemporary tale about a nun from the Parc des Dames Cistercian house, a woman of great piety, whom he had met and interviewed about her earlier life. The nun Catherine had been a little Jewish girl, Rachel, who discovered Christianity through the Christian names that seemed so different from Jewish ones. She claimed to have loved above all the name of the Virgin Mary. After a period of instruction in Christianity, she received a vision of Mary, dressed in white like a Cistercian nun, and this finally confirmed her desire to convert and to become a religious.

The deepening polemical nature of ideas and representations of Jews in the later Middle Ages led to a sharpening of the difference in representations of Jewish men and women. The figure of the Jewish woman was affected by the evolving figure of Mary, a Jewish woman too. It was possible to make the Jew more menacing by the absorption of his female counterpart into spheres of love and tenderness associated with motherhood. Geoffrey Chaucer (d. 1399) had his pilgrim Prioress recount the story of the killing of a young Christian boy by a Jew in the Jewish quarter of an oriental city. The child's anxious mother enters the quarter to look for her son. Miraculous intervention by Mary led to the discovery of the boy and to the punishment of the Jewish man. Jewish women were drawn into the sphere of mercy and motherly love around the Christian mother and the Virgin Mary, a sphere menaced by the cruel Jewish man.

European literatures thus treated the Jewish woman as women above all, and most frequently as matrons and mothers. Occasionally a nubile Jewish woman is represented as a figure who might lead a Christian man astray, but the Jewish woman remains passive, attractive for her beauty alone. Stories from Iberia are more explicit about the sexual crossing of religious lines, and in them the Jewish woman is a bit more seductive. It is striking how few of the misogynist traits attributed to women—seduction, dissimulation—were applied to Jewish women. The Jewish woman was a cipher for female submission; here too some “drift” from the image of Mary may be at work.

By the High Middle Ages most Jewish families lived in towns and cities, though from the thirteenth century several regions of Europe expelled their Jewish communities, and this often forced Jews to find their homes in new areas, in central and eastern Europe, often in small towns where they engaged in small trade and subsistence lending. Jewish women worked alongside their husbands, fathers, and brothers in family workshops and businesses. Their life was contained within the streets and quarters inhabited by Jews, where they may have been encountered by non-Jews as vendors and moneylenders. Little of their life-worlds is portrayed in medieval literature; but they inhabited the imagination as alluring figures: female, exotic, somewhat out of reach, yet ripe for dynamic remaking at the hands of a Christian man, lay or priest.

MIRI RUBIN

References and Further Reading

- Aizenberg, Edna. “Una judva muy hermosa: The Jewess as Sex Object in Medieval Spanish Literature and Lore.” La Coronica 12 (1984): 187–194.
- Lampert, Lisa. Gender and Jewish Difference from Paul to Shakespeare. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2004.
- Mirrer, Louise. “The Beautiful Jewess: Marisaltos in Alfonso X’s Cantiga 107.” In Women, Jews and Muslims in the Texts of Reconquest Spain. Ann Arbor, Mich.: University of Michigan Press, 1996, 31–44.

See also Chaucer, Geoffrey; Exemplum; Jewish Women; Mary, Virgin; in Literature; Miracles and Miracle Collections

JOAN I

Joan I (1326–1382), as the only surviving child of Charles of Calabria (d. 1328) and Mary of Valois (d. 1331), held the titles of Countess of Provence and Forcalquier, titular queen of Jerusalem and Sicily, Princess of Achaia, and Queen of Naples. She inherited the throne of the kingdom of Naples from her grandfather, Robert the Wise (d. 1343), who groomed her to succeed to the throne, allegedly allowing her to receive men of state even from a young age. Once she had inherited the royal office of the far-reaching kingdom of Naples, Joan was positioned to be one of the most powerful rulers of her time. But her reign is depicted as one of chaos, plagued with the same kind of constant political and military disruptions, some of which her grandfather had faced, especially with Hungarian factions vying for control in a kingdom ruled by a woman. Her biographers, from contemporaries on, have ridiculed her life as one full of political missteps and sexual intrigue. Her marriage to Andrew of Hungary had been arranged in 1334, and had been supported by Pope John XXII, who eagerly sought the union of the two branches of the Angevin family. This union was short-lived. Resenting her grandfather’s stipulation that Andrew would share in the royal title, Joan most likely ordered the assassination of Andrew of Hungary in 1345. Andrew’s brother Louis retaliated by trying to annex Naples. To secure stability for the kingdom, Joan subsequently entered into a series of strategic marriages with Louis of Taranto (d. 1362), James of Majorca (d. 1375), and Otto of Brunswick (d. 1398), but had no surviving children, causing a crisis in royal succession. In the schism of the Church, she sided with the Avignonese pope, Clement VII, over the Roman pope Urban VI, bringing on the public disappointment and criticism of the public mystic, Catherine of Siena, who urged Joan in letters to support the Roman papacy. Joan’s volatile rule ended with her murder at the hands of a political rival, Charles III of Durazzo, in 1382.

DARLEEN PRYDS

References and Further Reading

- Gil, C. Jeanne de Naples, Comtesse de Provence et Le Grand Schisme d’Occident. Paris: Les éditions le semaphore, 2001.
- “Johanna I,” An Annotated Index of Medieval Women, edited by A. Echols and M. Williams. Oxford: Berg and Princeton: Markus Wiener, 1992, pp. 268–269.
- Kiesewetter, A. “Giovanna I,” Dizionario Biografico degli Italiani, v. 55, Rome: Istituto della Enciclopedia italiana, 2000, pp. 455–477.
- Raia, C. Giovanna I d’Angiò Regina di Napoli. Naples: T. Piranti, 2000.

See also Catherine of Siena; Italy; Queens and Empresses; The West

JOAN OF ARC

The lasting reputation of Joan of Arc (called Jehanne in French and variously surnamed Darc or Day) (c. 1412–1431) rests on her glorious but improbable military victory at Orleans in 1429, which broke the culture of defeat then affecting the French since their loss at Agincourt and turned the tide of The Hundred Years’ War. The unexpected presence of a mounted, armor-clad, teenaged girl on a fifteenth-century battlefield created a stir that was heightened by Joan’s claim that whoever executed her military dictates followed the will of God. Her skill at turning battlefield action and soldiers’ behavior into acts that pleased or displeased God emanated from Joan’s understanding of herself as divine messenger.

Joan of Arc: folio with miniature from “Vie des femmes celebres” (Lives of Famous Women) by Antoine Dufour, Ms. 17. French, c. 1505. Location: Musée Dobrée, Nantes, France. Credit: Giraudon / Art Resource, N.Y.

According to the testimony of family and acquaintances, nothing in Joan’s early life at Domrémy foretold her later mission. Only a rather forceful piety distinguished her from others. From about the age of thirteen, however, according to Joan’s own testimony, she heard a heavenly voice and vowed from that experience to maintain her virginity. (It remains unclear whether, by her vow, she was playing to a contemporary prophecy stating that “France would be ruined through a woman, and afterward restored by a virgin.”) With the passage of time, Joan understood that God was giving her messages intended for her king, Charles VII, whom she must go to seek in France. Her father, suspecting that something was afoot, threatened to drown her if she left town in the company of men. But he misinterpreted his daughter’s yearnings; they were fixed on “Messire,” which was what she called God, although, in truth, her piety was always mixed with the worldly impudence of a female adventurer.

One of the most interesting aspects of Joan’s career was how she convinced Charles to place trust in her words, upon her arrival at Chinon in early March 1429. Already in February, at Vaucouleurs, and with the help of a relative, she had cajoled Captain Robert of Baudricourt into providing her with a horse, men’s clothes, and a small retinue. (The male dress, which seems to have been no more scandalous than the daring venture itself, was practical, as well as a necessary disguise.) After a dangerous journey through war-torn France, the Maid arrived at Chinon to seek audience with King Charles. At this point, the drama could have gone either way. The king's council and trusted advisers wanted to avert any episode possibly ending in ridicule for the French, but Joan made promises "advantageous" to the realm, namely that she was sent by God to restore Charles's kingdom. Joan was not adopted by the court without reservations. The theologians, convened by the king to test her, were anything but accommodating, principally because she had produced no miracle to validate her divine inspiration. She was fitted with armor only when she promised to raise the siege of Orleans in evidence of a miracle.

Orleans

When the siege of Orleans was lifted after a mere eight days, attention focused on Joan as proof of God's intervention. She was especially lauded by the townspeople, who flooded the streets in a nighttime procession to celebrate her victory. During the preceding weeks, however, the English commander, the earl of Salisbury, had been killed, demoralizing the English soldiery, while the duke of Burgundy, in a fit of pique, had withdrawn his troops from the siege. These events, as well as the English army's inability to close off supply routes into the city, played their part in the miracle. Nevertheless, the Maid's influence is indisputable. She threatened the English with divine retribution in her Letter to the English and engaged in brazen verbal exchanges with enemy soldiers at close range, seemingly further immobilizing the will of an already demoralized English army. She roused her own troops by placing their military assignment more or less under the mantle of a crusade. En route from Blois to Orleans, the army was led by priests intoning the Veni Creator Spiritus as Joan rode along bearing a standard displaying angels, the king of Heaven, and the words "Jesus Maria." Although Joan had been excluded from strategy sessions, where some were undoubtedly jealous of her amateur military involvement, credit for the victory was almost uniformly given to her.

The Maid's religious mission, while primary and all encompassing, should not obscure her political importance. The much-debated secret that Joan revealed to the king in her private interview was likely the same message she later broadcast in the Letter to the English; namely, that Charles, the only surviving son of Charles VI and Isabeau of Bavaria, was "true heir." This statement challenged the dual monarchy of France and England, formulated in the Treaty of Troyes of 1420, which, in order for the Lancasters to claim the French throne, depended on Charles being disinherited for his responsibility in the murder of John the Fearless, duke of Burgundy. At her trial Joan acknowledged the murder was "a great tragedy for the kingdom of France," but added: "Whatever there had been between them [John and Charles], God had sent her to the help of the king of France." Joan, then, did more than simply bolster Charles's confidence. Her role was rather to affirm Charles's political legitimacy, on the authority of God, despite the murder of the duke of Burgundy, and thus to repudiate the Treaty of Troyes that depended upon it.

The Campaign after Orleans

When Joan pleaded with the king to extend the Orleans campaign into the Loire valley, the strategy was self-evident and was advocated by other commanders. The English were quickly routed from Meung, Beaugency, and Patay, and the enemy's strength in the region was neutralized. At that point, bolstered by recent victories, the French faced a choice of where to go next. Should they mount a campaign for Normandy or Paris, or push deep into Burgundian territory, as the Maid urged, for a royal coronation at Reims? The Reims campaign, decided upon by Charles, is perhaps the first time the record clearly illustrates Joan's influence on military decisions. Rather ill-equipped in terms of artillery and supplies, the army was reminded outside Troyes, by one of their own, Robert le Maçon, that the campaign had not been undertaken based on the strength of the army, or even because the campaign seemed possible, but "solely at the recommendation of Joan the Maid...because it was the desire and the will of God."

On July 17, 1429, Charles was crowned at Reims with Joan at his side, while her parents, guests of the king, watched in admiration. It was Joan's final triumph. The day of the coronation, Charles negotiated a secret truce with representatives of Philip the Good, duke of Burgundy. Joan, whose "counsel" had ordered the march on Reims in preference to the march on Paris, was unable to penetrate the walls of Paris when she, the duke of Alençon, and a small army finally attacked on September 8, 1429. Whether events were too disheartening or too uneventful for French chroniclers to record, few interesting details survive about the Maid between the failure at Paris and her capture at Compiègne on May 23, 1430. In this period she was badly undersupplied, as an urgent letter (still extant), sent to the inhabitants of Riom for munitions of war, underscores. The numbers of her small company were increasingly swelled with Italian mercenaries. Perhaps to avoid the shame that her “voices” had given her wrong counsel, Joan was by then leaving military decisions to the commanders. Her ardor on the battlefield, however, remained undiminished, as attested by her reckless presence in the rearguard, outside the walls of Compiègne, the day she was captured. There, the maid from Domrémy was pulled from her dapple-gray charger by the panels of her splendid cloth-of-gold huque (surcoat).

During the summer and fall of 1430, Joan was led from prison to prison across the north of France until she reached Rouen, where her trial for heresy took place over the first five months of 1431. Pierre Cauchon, the bishop of Beauvais, whom the University of Paris lauded for his “concern for the public safety,” mounted the case for the prosecution and eventually convicted Joan for her “heretical” resumption of male clothing against court order. The Anglo-Burgundian judges wanted nothing but to see her burn, in order to break the grip of fear that immobilized the everyday English foot soldier, to punish Joan’s female impudence, and finally, to erase her memory from history. In a serious miscalculation, however, they conserved the minutes of their “beau procès” (literally, handsome trial) through which her indomitable spirit continues to survive. Political vindication for the Maid came in 1456 when the French nullified bishop Cauchon’s sentence, but her ecclesiastical vindication occurred only in 1920 upon her canonization in the Catholic Church.

Gender Issues

Joan seems to have resisted being portrayed as a simple shepherdess, not so much because of connotations of sweet passivity, as because it was not generally true. But she did not disdain having been taught household skills by her mother, and even bragged about her prowess as a seamstress. Her love for the exclusive fraternity of soldiers, however, despite her often tangential and controversial membership in it, is documented by her imperious advice to Catherine de La Rochelle, a would-be competitor, to whom she said: “Go back to your husband, look after your household, and feed your children.” Joan is known, too, to have broken a sword against the backs of a pair of camp followers. Beyond that, the record of Joan’s relations with other women, especially noble women, is harmonious. She submitted to two tests of her virginity, maintained cordial relations—in at least two known cases—with the mother or wife of comrades at arms, and sent a small gold ring, as a token of her affection, to the elderly widow of the great French warrior Bertrand du Guesclin. No one disputes that part of Joan’s fame owes to her transgressions of her sex, but those who knew her well appear to have lingered only a short time over that aspect of her multifaceted personality and career.

DEBORAH FRAIOLI

References and Further Reading

- Barrett, Wilfred Philip, ed. and trans. The Trial of Jeanne d'Arc: Translated into English from the Original Latin and French Documents. With Pierre Champion, “Dramatis personae,” translated by Coley Taylor and Ruth H. Kerr. New York: Gotham House, 1932.
- de Pizan, Christine. Ditié de Jehanne d'Arc. Edited by Angus J. Kennedy and Kenneth Varty. Medium Aevum Monographs, new series, 9. Oxford: Society for the Study of Mediaeval Languages and Literature, 1977.
- Fraïoli, Deborah. Joan of Arc: The Early Debate. Woodbridge: Boydell Press, 2000.
- France, Anatole. The Life of Joan of Arc. Translated by Winifred Stephens. 2 vols. Reprint, Amsterdam: Fredonia Books, 2004.
- Margolis, Nadia. Joan of Arc in History, Literature, and Film: A Select, Annotated Bibliography. New York: Garland, 1990.
- Pernoud, Régine. Joan of Arc: By Herself and Her Witnesses. Translated by Edward Hyams. New York: Stein & Day, 1966.
- Pernoud, Régine, ed. and J. M. Cohen, trans. with preface by Katherine Anne Porter. The Retrial of Joan of Arc: The Evidence at the Trial for Her Rehabilitation. New York: Methuen, 1955.
- Pernoud, Régine and Marie-Véronique Clin. Joan of Arc: Her Story. Revised and translated by Jeremy duQuesnay Adams. Bonnie Wheeler, ed. New York: St. Martin’s, 1998.
- Quicherat, Jules-Etienne-Joseph, ed. Procès de condamnation et de réhabilitation de Jeanne d'Arc dite la Pucelle. Publiés pour la première fois d'après les manuscrits de la Bibliothèque Nationale, suivis de tous les documents historiques qu'on a pu réunir et accompagnés de notes et d'éclaircissements. 5 vols. Paris: Jules Renouard, 1841–1849; reprint, New York: Johnson, 1965.
- Scott, Walter Sidney, trans. The Trial of Joan of Arc: Being the Verbatim Report of the Proceedings from the Orleans Manuscript. Reprint, London: The Folio Society, 1968.
- Sullivan, Karen. The Interrogation of Joan of Arc. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1999.
- Warner, Marina. Joan of Arc: The Image of Female Heroism. New York: Knopf, 1981.

See also Christine de Pizan; Cross-Dressing; France, Northern; Gender Ideologies; Warfare

JOSEPH, STEPFATHER OF JESUS

Although long neglected in western Christian piety, Joseph was extensively rehabilitated between 1250 and 1500 by Italian and French clerics who portrayed his holiness as the masculine equivalent of Mary’s and declared his superiority to her in their spousal relationship. Minimal references to Joseph in the Gospels, descriptions of his parental ineptitude in the apocrypha, assumptions of his advanced age, and his lack of a role in Jesus's conception limited his importance in the first twelve centuries of western Christianity. Twelfth- and thirteenth-century theologians began reversing Joseph's fortunes when they resolved earlier arguments that a virginal marriage could be a genuine marriage. As they confirmed both Joseph's sexual purity and the validity of his unconsummated marriage, writers such as Hugh of St. Victor and Albert the Great facilitated interest in Joseph's sanctity. Nonetheless, the long-accepted Aristotelian position that the male embodies the generative principle made it hard to define virginal Joseph as a masculine figure until Rupert of Deutz (d. 1129), Bernard of Clairvaux (d. 1153), and several Franciscan writers transformed the understanding. They built on an idea expressed by Augustine of Hippo and other fourth-century writers that presented Joseph as such an excellent nurturer of Jesus, and such an effective protector, that he could be called Jesus's father despite his lack of biological contribution. Following early- and high-medieval writers, such as Bede (d. c. 735) and Peter Damian (d. 1072), who associated fathering with affection as well as authority, Franciscans such as Peter John Olivi (d. 1298) defined Joseph's gender as masculine in spirit, both virile and virginal.

While some have argued that medieval writers understood Joseph to be imitating Mary in his treatment of Jesus, it appears that the majority of texts in Latin, Italian, and French linked Joseph's nurturing with masculinity. In his protection of Mary and Jesus and his demonstrative embraces of Jesus, the Joseph of Franciscan treatises and sermons unified tenderness and masculinity. Bernardino da Siena (d. 1444) and his followers quoted Olivi's and Ubertino da Casale's (d. c. 1329) assertions that Joseph provided such brave and loving service as husband and father, and received such sweet affection from the child Jesus, that he should be Christians' model and their most important intercessor with Mary and Jesus. Bernardino da Siena and his successors presented emulation of Joseph as a solution to moral problems of their day, including marital infidelity and sodomy, and also emphasized Mary's obedience to Joseph. The French cleric Jean Gerson (d. 1429) seems to have borrowed from Franciscan sources in his descriptions of Joseph's authority over Mary and solicitous care for Jesus. Gerson echoed previous Franciscan and Servite calls for Joseph's selection as the patron of the Church.

Approving descriptions of Joseph's masculine nurturing did not quickly penetrate vernacular culture, for fourteenth- to fifteenth-century English mystery plays, French poems, and works of art still portrayed him as a comical elderly cuckold; contemporaneous German cradle plays caricatured Joseph's nurturing role by showing him fumbling domestic tasks. In northern Europe as late as 1350, vernacular and artistic portrayals of Joseph depicted him as weak and unsuccessful in his paternal and spousal roles. However, the efforts of Franciscan friars and other clerics to portray Joseph as a model of perfection for men in particular, and all Christians in general, flourished: Joseph received a feast day (March 19) in 1479, and by the early sixteenth century additional writers produced sermons and hagiographies, often in the vernacular, ascribing to the saint a holiness very nearly equivalent to that of Jesus and Mary. Joseph's appeal to both men and women is evident in the Josephine devotions of the fourteenth-century Italian mystics Margherita of Cortona and Margherita di Città di Castello. By around 1550, Joseph was patron of several Italian cities; religious societies and churches were dedicated to him; and the use of "Joseph" as a baptismal name demonstrated his influence on lay people.

Franciscan preachers such as Bernardino da Feltre (d. 1494), who depicted Joseph as the holiest of all saints except Christ and Mary, and clerics such as Gerson, who recommended Joseph as a model for husbands and young people, offered him in symmetry with Mary, a masculine counterpart who apparently was intended to rebalance a religious culture strongly influenced by female saints and feminine piety. Joseph's cult evinced late-medieval and early-modern admiration for the nuclear family in which the male is leader, provider, nurturer, and the head of the wife. Depictions of Joseph thus hold an important place in the history of Western definitions of paternal and spousal roles, masculinity, patriarchy, and the family.

CHARA ARMON

References and Further Reading

- Armon, Chara. Servus, Pater, Dominus: The Development of Devotion to Saint Joseph in Medieval Franciscan Thought. Ph.D. Diss. Cornell University, 2003. Ann Arbor: UMI, 2003: 3104556.
- Bernardino da Feltre. "Dos sermones inéditos sobre S. José del beato Bernardino da Feltre." Edition and notes by Pedro de Alcántara Martínez Senderos. Archivum Franciscanum Historicum 71 (1978): 65–111.
- Bernardino da Siena. St. Bernardine's Sermon on St. Joseph. Translated by Eric May. Paterson, N.J.: St. Anthony's Guild, 1947.
- Gauthier, Roland. Bibliographie sur saint Joseph et la sainte Famille. Montréal: St. Joseph's University Press, 1999.
- Gold, Penny S. "The Marriage of Mary and Joseph in the Twelfth-Century Ideology of Marriage." In Sexual Practices in the Medieval Church, edited by Vern L. Bullough

- and James A. Brundage. Buffalo, N.Y.: Prometheus Books, 1982.
- Hale, Rosemary Drage. "Joseph as Mother: Adaptation and Appropriation in the Construction of Male Virtue." In Medieval Mothering, edited by John Carmi Parsons and Bonnie Wheeler. New York: Garland, 1996.
- Longpré, Ephrem. "Saint Joseph et l'école franciscaine du XIIIe siècle." In Le patronage de saint Joseph. Actes du Congrès d'études tenu à l'oratoire Saint-Joseph, Montréal, 1955. Montréal and Paris: Fides, 1956.
- Olivi, Peter of John. "Lectura super Matthaum." q. i, in "Pierre de Jean Olivi, o.f.m. Sa doctrine et son influence." Edited by Aquilin Emmen. Cahiers de Joséphologie 14 (1966): 209–270.
- Sheingorn, Pamela. "Joseph the Carpenter's Failure at Familial Discipline." In Insights and Interpretations: Studies in Celebration of the Eighty-Fifth Anniversary of the Index of Christian Art, edited by Colum Hourihane. Princeton, N.J.: Index of Christian Art, Department of Art and Archaeology, Princeton University, in association with Princeton University Press, 2002, pp. 156–167.
- Ubertinus de Casale. Arbor vitae crucifixae Jesu. Introduction by Charles T. Davis. Torino: Bottega d'Erasmus, 1961.
- Walsh, Walter. "Divine Cuckhold/Holy Fool: The Comic Image of Joseph in the English 'Troubles' Play." In England in the Fourteenth Century, edited by W. M. Ormrod. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell Press, 1986, pp. 278–297.
- Wilson, Carolyn. St. Joseph in Italian Renaissance Society and Art: New Directions and Interpretations. Philadelphia: St. Joseph's University Press, 2001.

See also Chastity and Chaste Marriage; Cuckold; Family (Later Middle Ages); Femininity and Masculinity; Gender Ideologies; Gerson, Jean; Husbands and Husbandry; Mary, Virgin; Patriarchy and Patrilineage

JOUARRE AND CHELLES

Jouarre and Chelles were the most important foundations for religious women in the Frankish kingdom that had been founded under the influence of the Irish missionary Columban (c. 615). Both were conceived as double monasteries headed by an abbess, but the monks' houses soon were converted into communities of canons. Jouarre, in the Ile-de-France, was built around 630 on the initiative of the nobleman Ado and his stepmother Moda. The first nuns came from Faremoutiers. Of the first churches constructed for Jouarre in the seventh century, a crypt survives with the graves of both founders, as well as of the first three abbesses. Soon Jouarre became well known as an important center of education. From here nuns were sent to found the community of Notre-Dame in Soissons in 667 and, around 660, to revive the monastery of Chelles near Paris. According to legend, it had been Queen Chrodechild, wife of the Frankish king Chlodwig, who, as early as 511, founded a small religious community for women near the palace (villa regalis) of the Merovingian kings in Chelles. The (re)foundation however, was initiated by the widowed Frankish queen Balthild. The well-educated Bertila (c. 702–704) from Jouarre was installed as the new abbess. Her fame assured that both monasteries attracted Anglo-Saxon nuns and monks looking for education and Christian instruction or looking for books. In the eighth century even Merovingian princes were educated at Chelles. The biographies of both founders, Bertila and Balthild, were presumably written at Chelles, as well as the so-called Annales Mettenses Priores, a kind of family chronicle of the Carolingians, dating from around 804–806 that demonstrates the far-reaching connections of Chelles in the Merovingian and Carolingian periods.

Under abbess Gisela (757–810), sister of Charlemagne, Chelles was in contact with the most famous scholars of the Carolingian court, like Alcuin, who wrote a commentary on John for her. The monastery also maintained a scriptorium that produced books for the community's use but also for persons outside the nunnery, such as the archbishop of Cologne. Not only is their quality outstanding; but also the nuns, rather untypically, signed the written quires with their names, which allows us to define their works as the product of women. Apart from Bible commentaries and sacramentaries—among others the most famous Gelasian Sacramentary (Vatican, Reg.lat.316)—the books produced at Chelles also contain council records, encyclopaedic works of Isidore of Seville, and the writings of Eusebius in the version by Rufinus. Furthermore, Jouarre is presumed to have had a well-organized scriptorium, if indeed one typical style of writing (the so-called b-minuscule) is correctly ascribed to it.

Through the Merovingian and the Carolingian period, and down to the eleventh century, both monasteries, as royal possessions, were frequently visited and given the privileges of holding markets and issuing coinage. Often they were used as refuges for widowed or banished women of the royal families. Around 1500, Chelles was reformed by the order of Fontevrault, while Jouarre remained a house of canonesses. Both houses were suspended during the French Revolution. Due to the complete destruction and overbuilding of Chelles, the layout of buildings and churches remain unknown, but more than a hundred inscribed early medieval relics survived, including the so-called "tunic of Balthild." Overall the history of both monasteries, their role in the diffusion of liturgical books and saint cults, as well as their educational status, deserves further studies.

KATRINETTE BODARWÉ

References and Further Reading

Atsma, Hartmut, and Hayo Vierck. "Chelles." In Reallexikon der Germanischen Altertumskunde. vol. 4. Berlin: de Gruyter, 1981, cols. 422–430.

Berthelmer-Ajot, Nadine. "Chelles à l'époque mérovingienne." Revue du Nord. 68 (1986): 345–360.

Chaussy, Y., ed. L'Abbaye Royale Notre-Dame de Jouarre. 2 vol., Paris: Bibliothèque D'histoire et d'archéologie chrétiennes, 1961.

Laporte, Jean-Pierre, and Raymond Boyer. Trésors de Chelles. Sépultures et reliques de la reine Bathilde (vers 680) et l'abbesse Bertille (vers 704). Chelles: Soc. Archéologique et Historique, 1991.

McKitterick, Rosamond. "Nun's Scriptoria in England and Francia in the Eighth Century." Francia 19.1 (1992): 1–35.

———. "Women and Literacy in the Early Middle Ages." In Books, Scribes and Learning in the Frankish Kingdoms, 6th–9th Centuries, edited by Rosamond McKitterick. Aldershot and Brookfield, Vt.: Variorum, 1994, pp. 1–43.

Mcquenem, Claude de. "Les cryptes de Jouarre (Seine-et-Marne). Des indices pour une nouvelle chronologie." Archéologie médiévale 32 (2002): 1–30.

See also Abbesses; Education, Monastic; Literacy and Reading; Latin; Monasticism and Nuns

JUDITH

The story of Judith is originally found in the Book of Judith, composed after the Hebrew Scriptures were canonized. Unlike most Old Testament women, Judith is active and assertive and inspires the citizens of Bethulia to repel an Assyrian invasion by reminding them of the times God saved Israel and then decapitated the Assyrian general, Holofernes. There are two versions of Judith in Old English, a homily by Ælfric (active c. 955–c. 1010) and a poem found in the Nowell Codex (copied c. 1000) as the companion of Beowulf. Both are free translations and emphasize that Judith's brave deed galvanized the timorous Jews so that they fought the invader and saved Israel, and both seem intended to teach the English about resistance to the invasions of the pagan Danes. Ælfric's homily emphasizes historical facts that have figural significance, especially chastity and faith. In contrast, the poem depicts the combat between Judith, the heroic woman, and Holofernes, the evil invader. It uses the formulaic language of heroic Old English poetry and characterizes Judith as a warrior woman in the tradition of the benevolent valkyrie, emphasizing that Hæfde ða gefohten foremærne blæd/ Iudith æt guðe (122a–123a) "Judith had then won very illustrious glory by fighting in the battle." There is a Middle English version of Judith in the 18,372 verse Middle English Metrical Paraphrase of the Old Testament, and images of Judith were popular among the painters of Renaissance Italy. A modern version is Siegfried Matthus' opera Judith, whose American premier was in 1990 at Santa Fe.

ALEXANDRA H. OLSEN

References and Further Reading

Dobbie, Elliott van Kirk. Beowulf and Judith. ASPR, vol. 4. New York: Columbia University Press, 1953.

Judith. The New American Bible. New York: Catholic Publishing Co., 1970, pp. 485–500.

Lee, S. D. "Ælfric's Homilies on Judith, Esther, and The Maccabees." <http://users.ox.ac.uk/~stuart/kings>.

Nelson, Marie, ed, and trans. Judith, Juliana, and Elene: Three Fighting Saints. New York: Peter Lang Publishing, 1991.

Peck, Russell. The Middle English Metrical Paraphrase of the Old Testament. Kalamazoo: Medieval Institute Publications, 1991.

See also Beowulf; Jewish Women; Literature, Old English

JULIAN OF NORWICH

The first English woman identified as an author, Julian of Norwich (c. 1343–1416), composed two versions of her Showings (sometimes titled The Revelations of Divine Love) in response to a visionary experience she had in May 1373. The first version or short text, probably completed soon after the event, recounts the revelations she received over the course of the day as she lay near death midway through her thirtieth year. Corresponding to the first twelve revelations of the long text, this first version includes only brief hints of what became the very original Thirteenth through Sixteenth Revelations of the final version. The long text, completed around 1393 after almost twenty years of meditation, significantly expands the short text to elucidate the theological implications of her visionary experience.

This woman is known as Julian because, at least after 1394, she was enclosed as an anchorite in the Church of St. Julian in Norwich, England. The only surviving medieval copy of the short text begins with a scribal note so identifying the author and indicating that she was still alive in 1413. Four wills dating from 1394 to 1416 include gifts to the anchorite of St. Julian's. Furthermore, Margery Kempe, a holy woman from nearby King's Lynn, recounts a visit she paid to Dame Julian around 1413 in her own book, the second one known to be composed by an English woman.

Near the beginning of the Showings, Julian says that prior to May 1373 she had asked God for three gifts: a vision of Christ's Passion; a life-threatening illness; and the three metaphoric wounds of compassion, contrition, and longing for God. Her visionary experience develops these themes. After losing sensation in the lower part of her body on the eighth day of her severe illness, Julian, staring at a crucifix held before her by a priest, suddenly sees the events of the Passion reenacted before her eyes. These “bodily showings” arouse Julian’s compassion for the suffering Savior and incite her contrition for sin and longing for God.

Although all three themes occur in the short text, Julian explores these last two themes with great originality in her additions to the long text. In Revelation Thirteen she returns to the dilemma of evil that she first poses in Revelation Three as she asks how an omnipotent, omniscient, and benevolent God could allow sin to exist. In response to this question, Julian receives the auditory revelation: “Sin is necessary, but all will be well, and all will be well, and every kind of thing will be well” (Rev. 13, chapter 27). Through the rest of this Revelation Thirteen, Julian explains the pedagogic function of sin, and she presages the mysteries of the godly will of the elect that protects them from sin and the ultimate possibility of universal salvation for all.

In Revelation Fourteen, Julian resolves the problem of evil through her retelling of the biblical story of the Fall in the parable of the lord and servant in chapter 51. Julian’s version revises this narrative about the origins of sin in several significant ways that indicate why she believes that all will be well despite the fall of humankind. The servant does not disobey, but rather falls into a deep valley while hurrying to do the lord’s bidding. The lord is not angry, but feels only pity for the servant’s suffering. After indicating that she puzzled over this obscure showing for almost twenty years, Julian interprets the servant as both the first Adam and Christ, the second Adam, whose fall to earth and incarnation lead to the redemption of humankind.

In the subsequent chapters of Revelation Fourteen, moreover, Julian presents her unique accounts of the inextricable bonds linking humankind to the deity, the nature of the human soul, and the motherhood of Jesus. Since God the Father creates the soul from his own substance, its higher part, or substance, remains in God, the ground of being. However, Jesus the Mother in creation unites this substance with the lower part of the soul, the sensuality, in the process of embodiment and remains within the higher part as the imago Dei (image of God). Julian also regards Jesus as a mother in recreation and in working. Through the sufferings of atonement, Jesus, like a mother, gave new life to sinful humankind. And like a mother who protects and nurtures her child, Jesus continues to sustain Christians throughout time.

DENISE NOWAKOWSKI BAKER

References and Further Reading

- Baker, Denise Nowakowski. Julian of Norwich’s Showings: From Vision to Book. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1994.
- Jantzen, Grace. Julian of Norwich: Mystic and Theologian. 2nd Edition. Mahwah, N.J.: Paulist Press, 2000.
- Julian of Norwich. Revelations of Divine Love (Short Text and Long Text). Translated by Elizabeth Spearing. New York: Penguin Books, 1998.
- McEntire, Sandra, ed. Julian of Norwich: A Book of Essays. New York: Garland, 1998.

See also Anchoresses; Jesus/God as Mother; Kempe, Margery; Mysticism and Mystics; Mystics’ Writings; Women Authors: Middle English Texts; Theology

K

---

KATHERINE GROUP

The “Katherine Group” is the name given to a collection of texts written in the west midlands of England in the early thirteenth century. Their explicit address is to anchoresses, though their actual audience was probably more varied. The group comprises lives of three virgin martyr saints, Catherine of Alexandria, Margaret of Antioch, and Juliana of Nicomedia; an allegorical narrative, Custody of the Soul; and a treatise extolling the spiritual and material advantages of virginity, Holy Maidenhood. Linguistic, thematic, and manuscript evidence connects these texts and links them also with a set of passionate poetic meditations known as the Wooing Group and with Ancrene Wisse, a guide for anchoresses that has long been recognised as a milestone in early Middle English writing. The author of Ancrene Wisse was certainly a cleric, and the author(s) of the Katherine Group and Wooing Group were probably also clerics, but unless further evidence should be discovered, their identity will remain unknown. Critical interest in the texts has shifted from the elusive author to the audience, so that the Group, though male-authored, is regularly discussed in the context of histories of female spirituality.

Anchoritism was a form of religious life that attracted more women than men and thus was a fertile ground for the production of vernacular literature. Anchoresses needed guidance on their conduct and material for meditation. As they were, at least notionally, solitary, such matters could not be conveyed orally and in practice as they would be in a nunnery, and hence were put into writing, which had to be in the vernacular for a female audience unlikely to be educated in Latin. The anchorhold was intensively imagined in Ancrene Wisse as a womb in which the inhabitant was reborn and a tomb to house one who was dead to the world. The anchorhold is symbolised in the prison scenes of the saints’ legends of the Katherine Group as a space that enables communication between heaven and earth: in their prisons the saints speak to angels and, literally, face and defeat their demons. Care of the Soul imagines the self as a household that bears some resemblance to an anchoritic community, and its narrative treats of the alternations of hope and anxiety that form the rhythm of contemplative lives.

The Katherine Group’s central assumption is that virginity is in every way a superior state to marriage. In expanding on this, it conveys much information about the conditions of women’s lives. Holy Maidenhood vividly sketches a series of contrasts between the life of a married woman and that of a virgin anchoress. A wife must obey her husband, submit to his sexual demands and expect regular domestic violence; pregnancy is revolting, childbirth painful and terrifying, and children themselves rarely worth the trouble. A virgin’s life is elegant, decorous, and peaceful, and she can look forward to special privileges in heaven, where the company of crowned virgins will dance joyfully together for eternity.

The three virgin martyr legends share a standard plot: a beautiful, noble young Christian virgin refuses to marry a pagan and/or renounce Christianity; she then steadfastly suffers a series of increasingly horrible tortures until finally beheaded and welcomed in triumph to heaven by Christ, her beloved bridegroom. There are also some individual elements. Juliana includes a parody of contemporary romance in the portrayal of Eleusius's degeneration from courtly suitor to sadistic tyrant, plus a scene of low comedy in which the saint flings a cowering demon into a dungheap. Katherine features a debate in which the highly educated heroine converts fifty pagan philosophers and also has a sequence of military metaphors that identify her as Christ's knight, fighting for her faith. Margaret has a particularly striking set of demonic encounters, including one in which the saint is swallowed by a dragon that explodes when she makes the sign of the cross from within its belly.

All three saints are eloquent and active, due to their virginity, which is represented as a source of earthly and spiritual power. Virginity enables the saints to resist the wishes of their fathers, suitors, and judges; it makes them brides and imitators of Christ. The legends focus intently on their bodies, beautiful and violated, but somehow preserved by virginity from actual dismemberment. Modern readers who do not share this commitment to virginity may instead consider the scenes of torture to indulge fantasies of sexual violence; nevertheless, there is evidence that the genre appealed to many medieval women readers.

SARAH SALIH

References and Further Reading

- Anchoritic Spirituality: Ancrene Wisse and Associated Works*, translated by Nicholas Watson and Anne Savage. New York: Paulist Press, 1991.
- Dobson, E. J. The Origins of Ancrene Wisse. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1976.
- Hassel, Julie. Choosing Not to Marry: Women and Autonomy in the Katherine Group. New York: Routledge, 2002.
- Medieval English Prose for Women from the Katherine Group and "Ancrene Wisse,"* edited by Bella Millett and Jocelyn Wogan-Browne. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1990.
- Millett, Bella. "The Audience of the Saints' Lives of the Katherine Group." Reading Medieval Studies 16 (1990): 127–156.
- . "The Origins of 'Ancrene Wisse': New Answers, New Questions." Medium Ævum 61 (1992): 206–228.
- Robertson, Elizabeth. Early English Devotional Prose and the Female Audience. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1990.
- Salih, Sarah. Versions of Virginity in Late Medieval England. Cambridge: Brewer, 2001.
- Wogan-Browne, Jocelyn. Saints' Lives and Women's Literary Culture, 1150–1300: Virginity and its Authorizations. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001.

See also Anchoresses; Ancrene Wisse; Audience, Women in the; Bride of Christ: Imagery; Catherine of Alexandria; Devotional Literature; Hagiography; Literacy and Reading; Vernacular; Margaret of Antioch; Spirituality, Christian; Virgin Martyrs; Virginity

KEMPE, MARGERY

The Book of Margery Kempe recounts the spiritual life and travels of Margery Kempe (c. 1373–after 1438), a middle-class woman from Lynn, England, during the first third of the fifteenth century. Dictated by Kempe between 1436–1438, the text exists in a single manuscript that was copied from the lost original c. 1450. Housed for a time at Mt. Grace Priory, a Carthusian monastery in Yorkshire, the manuscript made its way into private hands where it remained, virtually forgotten, until it was rediscovered in 1934. Although several short mystical extracts from the Book were published c. 1501 by printer Wynkyn de Worde, few details of Kempe's unusual life were known until the manuscript's reemergence.

In what is often called the first autobiography in English, Kempe's spiritual history is told in localized and homely terms, with accounts of religious rapture anchored in anecdotes about her travels and her conflicts with male authorities. Beginning with an account of a postpartum depression, c. 1393, following the birth of the first of fourteen children, the "treatise" first describes Kempe's worldly vanities and failed occupations as a brewer and a miller, as well as her negotiations with her husband for a chaste marriage. Loosely organized by memory, place, and topic, the Book then recounts her conversations with Christ, her interactions with local priests and fellow parishioners, and her travels. These include, between 1414 and 1433, three trips overseas, one to Italy and the Holy Land, one to Spain, and one, much later in her life, to Danzig and Aachen. The book also records domestic travels to major towns in England for audiences with well-known mystics, such as Julian of Norwich, and with important figures in the church hierarchy, first for special privileges, such as the right to choose her own confessor and to receive weekly communion, and later to defend herself against charges of heresy.

Throughout the Book, Kempe presents herself as cherished by Christ but misunderstood and reviled by the world. Kempe's relationships with others, including church authorities as well as fellow parishioners and pilgrims, are often adversarial. She is repeatedly rebuked for wearing white clothes, the garb of consecrated virgins, and publicly reviled for her boisterous weeping and roaring when spiritually moved. At Leicester, York, and Beverly she is interrogated for Lollardy, a condemned heresy, charges that she effectively counters. Her consistent advocate is Christ, who often speaks to her, advising her to go on pilgrimage or to wear white, a visible sign of her "revirginizing," and reminding her of his special love for her. An intimate of Christ, she depicts herself as Christ-like, a victim of a world that fails to recognize her sanctity and attempts to keep her silent. The accounts of uncontrollable weeping, coupled with the Book's anecdotal structure, have led to widely divergent critical receptions. Many early readers, disappointed by the Book's difference from the mystical meditation of Julian of Norwich, dismissed it as slipshod, unruly, or even hysterical. Recent readers, however, reevaluating the Book in the light of research on embodied female spirituality, have reexamined those assessments.

Although the Book reads like a memoir in its rambling organization and its use of homely and localized detail, it is also a carefully crafted treatise that borrows broadly from mystical texts, spiritual instruction, and saints' lives, all popular genres in late medieval England. Hope Emily Allen, one of the Book's first editors, recognized its deep debts to traditions in contemporary female mysticism. Kempe's uncontrollable tears when she thinks of Christ's Passion echo the religious weeping or gift of tears that is also recorded in other well-known lives of holy women, among them Marie of Oignies (c. 1177–1213) and the Blessed Angela of Foligno (c. 1248–1309). As a married woman committed in midlife to a public spiritual vocation, Kempe seems to model her life broadly on Birgitta of Sweden (1303–1373), named at several points throughout the Book. And, while Kempe presents herself as illiterate or at least unable to write, familiarity with popular contemplative practices, such as those described in The Meditations on the Life of Christ, and echoes of devotional writings by Richard Rolle suggest that her illiteracy may be at least in part a fiction.

The conflation between contemporary detail and commonplaces of late medieval spirituality invite us to read the Book as a carefully constructed spiritual "life," one shaped by Kempe, as well as by her scribes. There are no known records of Kempe's audiences with important clerical figures, and indeed, few records of her life beyond the Book. Since Kempe dictated her text to two scribes, as stated in the prologues, we also cannot know how accurately the final product represents her actual life or even uses her own language. Irrespective of these questions of authorship and facticity we can confidently read the Book as a complexly mediated social commentary. Through an account of a middle-class woman who challenges marital norms, travels widely, engages in spirited discourse with men on all levels of the social stratum, and preaches as a public holy woman, the Book leaves a rich record of the gendered spiritual landscape of fifteenth-century England.

SARAH STANBURY

References and Further Reading

- Kempe, Margery, The Book of Margery Kempe, edited by Sanford Brown Meech and Hope Emily Allen. Early English Text Society. London: Oxford University Press; reprint Woodbridge, Sussex: Boydell and Brewer, 1997.
- . The Book of Margery Kempe, edited by Barry Windeatt. Harlow, Essex: Longman, 2000.
- . The Book of Margery Kempe, edited and translated by Lynn Staley. Norton Critical Edition. New York: W. W. Norton, 2001.
- Lochrie, Karma. Margery Kempe and Translations of the Flesh. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1991.
- Raguin, Virginia, and Sarah Stanbury. "Mapping Margery Kempe: A Guide to Late Medieval Material and Spiritual Life." <http://www.holycross.edu/departments/visarts/projects/kempe/>. (10 May 2006).
- Staley, Lynn. Margery Kempe's Dissenting Fictions. University Park, Pa.: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1994.

See also Angela of Foligno; Birgitta of Sweden; Chastity and Chaste Marriage; Hagiography; Heretics and Heresy; Julian of Norwich; Lay Piety; Literacy and Reading; Vernacular; Lollards; Marie of Oignies; Pilgrims and Pilgrimage; Women Authors; Middle English Texts

KHARJAS

See Woman's Song

KINSHIP

Marc Bloch commented that in the Middle Ages "true friendship only occurred between peoples linked by blood" (Bloch, 184). His insight has acted as the starting point for modern historical discourse on kinship, leading to new interdisciplinary studies, which have explored the relationships between kinship and the political order in societies in which the power of the state was circumscribed. These approaches have drawn upon the social sciences, including legal studies and anthropology. For instance, Levi-Strauss's discussion of the exchange of women in archaic society has been used to analyze kinship and marriage among the medieval nobility (Levi-Strauss, pp. 305–326), while Goody's materialist approach continues to provoke medievalists into setting out new models on the transformation of kinship and the family (Goody, pp. 399–422). Collectively this work has led to the view that kinship during the earlier Middle Ages differed substantially from its counterpart during the later Middle Ages, with the year 1000 often being taken as the turning point. This contrast arises in part from differing types of evidence studied, and the domination of different national historiographical traditions in the shaping of general perceptions of particular periods. This differentiation continues to provide a helpful model for understanding medieval kinship.

Early Medieval Kinship

Understanding of the organization of early medieval kinship has been based upon prosopographical studies of the names recorded in continental libri memoriales, conducted mainly at the universities of Freiburg-en-Brigau and Münster. By closely studying the ways in which names of persons were grouped together in Salzburg, Pfäfers, St. Gall, Reichenau, Remiremont, Brescia, and Corvey commemorative records, Schmid and his colleagues highlighted the central importance of the Sippe, or “cousinship.” In short, an individual belonged to several different groups, each interlocking with one another, and was part of a household unit (familia), which comprised the head of the family, his wife, concubines, children born of these unions, parents of the preceding generation, and slaves. Links between cousins commonly gave power to a superior kinship grouping, which is referred to in the medieval sources as gens, genus, progeniens, or prosapia. For instance, the gens nobilis Ayglofinga, which was defined by its descent from King Agiulf (d. 457), had subgroupings in northwest France, the Rhine and Moselle valleys, Lombardy, and Bavaria, and included among its descendants the kings of Lombardy and the counts of Meaux (Le Jan, pp. 387–395).

It is important to stress that the Sippe did not function as a corporate unit, unified by the rituals, mutual consent, or the domination of patriarchs. Here it is helpful to consider anthropologist’s studies of genealogies in segmentary societies. A common genealogy reaching back to a founding ancestor will embrace all descendants, but the structure does not function mechanically. Rather, it operates according to a formula of alternate oppositions and solidarities. The related groups springing from the same stock are in opposition among themselves, but are associated together within the immediate superior unit, which itself is in opposition with its relations. The political implications of these connections appear in the historical record in accounts of wars, feuds, and other political encounters, with, for example, the “Agiolfides” being defined in part through their opposition to the “Pippinides.”

The kinship of the Sippe was cognatic, whereby family links and descent were traced through both sexes, with the result that children were regularly given the names of maternal ancestors. A son of Megingaud, count of Oberrheingau, was named Robert in order to draw attention to his maternal descent from Count Robert the Strong (d. 866), ancestor of the Capetian royal house (Le Jan, p. 183). Women were a source of renown and nobility, with marriages of Carolingian royal daughters into the Udalrichid, Guelph, and Bosonid dynasties establishing the kinship identity and descent of these kindreds. In short, kinship provided the parameters by which the European imperial nobility of the earlier Middle Ages (Reichsaristokratie) was defined, and ensured that Königsnähe, which bound men to the king, dominated the political order in localities and centers of political power.

Women also carried out vital political functions that maintained the power of the Sippe. For instance, they were the guardians of the memories of the family’s ancestors. The origins of the Carolingian dynasty were recorded in the Annals of Metz because of the initiative of Giselle, sister of Charlemagne (Le Jan, pp. 54–56), while Ealdorman Æthelweard the Chronicler (d. c. 988) thanked his cousin Abbess Matilda of Essen, granddaughter of Emperor Otto I (d. 973), for the information that she had provided on their ancestry and dedicated his version of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle to her (Campbell, p. 1).

Patterns of inheritance also meant that women came to exercise a powerful role within the Sippe. Property was divided between sons and daughters, and if women survived childbirth they could expect to receive extensive dowers in the form of lands, livestock, and treasure. The custodianship of this property was not a passive issue. The supervision of this wealth entailed the exercise of administrative skills, while bequests of property from the deceased enabled women to reorder power relationships within kindreds. The position of women was, moreover, reflected in status markers, such as the Anglo-Saxon “morning-gift.”

Later Medieval Kinship

In spite of the controversies surrounding the “feudal transformation,” it still serves as a useful historiographical construct in order to understand the transformation in the organization of the European family between the late ninth and twelfth centuries. The model suggests that the breakdown of public order, notably in the generations immediately before and after the year 1000, led to the disappearance of cognatic kinship in favour of agnatic descent, traced exclusively through men, and the establishment of lineages. Henceforward kinship was defined only through descent via men (agnatic kinship), while filiation (i.e., ties linking father to son) replaced cousinship as a defining principle in family organization.

These changes, however, cannot be viewed in isolation from the transformation in the medieval landscape and wider frameworks of social development. The heads of families based in castles took over the public rights formerly exercised by local royal agents, linked to the exercise of violence in order to protect their estates and their dependants from predatory neighbours, also based in castles. A linkage was soon established between the military solidarity of the lord and his warriors with the prestige of his lineage. As a result it became common practice for families to adopt surnames derived from their caputs (heads) and castles, and for Christian names to be chosen from those used by paternal ancestors. For instance, in the last quarter of the eleventh century, three-quarters of the surnames used by noble houses in the Maconnais were derived from toponyms associated with landed demesnes and castles (Duby, p. 397).

These developments were not confined to those areas that suffered from the violence associated with the feudal transformation. Duby and others have argued for a diffusion model. Thus, Frankish aristocracies who established themselves in the peripheries of Europe, such as the British Isles and the Spanish march, introduced new systems of agnatic kinship that replaced early medieval kinship organization. Meanwhile, these new patterns were adopted by other social orders in rural and urban contexts, with the exception of Jewish households and communities.

The feudal transformation model is easy to understand and has clear conclusions that can be related to a wider series of changes in European society, but it should not be taken as fact, either in terms of its explanations, or in terms of the practical manifestations of the processes that it identifies in relation to the transformation of the family. For instance, a regional case study from the British Isles suggests that commemoration and remembrance was responsible for the establishment of lineages, at variance with the hypotheses put forward by the feudal transformation model (Wareham, 61–77), and in many regions of Europe “lineages” continued to retain a matrilineal dimension. Yet there is no doubt that the organization of kinship in Europe among the aristocracy and the peasantry by the close of the twelfth century was substantially different from its counterpart during the earlier Middle Ages. The change, though, can also be explained by perspectives from other historical schools, which draw upon sources such as the laudatio parentum, which record the approval of kinsfolk in bequests to the church in western France.

Above all a distinction needs to be drawn between norms in terms of common practice, and rules, as set out in legal treatises. During the twelfth and thirteenth centuries lawyers, whether basing their work upon Roman law or Common law, began to codify inheritance practices, and thereby to shape the dynamics of kinship. Thus, in an English legal treatise of c. 1188, it was established that lords in England could not alienate more than one-third of their inheritances, and by the early thirteenth century daughters were not allowed to receive more than one-third of paternal wealth in Normandy (Green, pp. 341, 365). The move from custom to law served to weaken the position of women within kinship groupings, most notably of all when primogeniture became the established practice. For instance, in England in the century after 1066 primogeniture became accepted practice in regulating the descent of inherited estates (patrimony) from fathers to their eldest sons at the expense of widows, younger brothers, sisters, and wider kin. The contrast with the earlier Middle Ages is striking, with consequent results upon the position held by women.

Yet the differences between the early and later Middle Ages should not be pushed too far. Ties of kinship, lordship, and neighbourhood shaped the dynamics of political power across the Middle Ages, and thereby provided women with opportunities to take on roles regardless of sex. The 917–918 campaigns of Æthelflæd of Mercia in Derby and Leicester, and her construction of a network of fortified boroughs in the wars against the Vikings, arose from her status as the daughter of Alfred (d. 899), king of Wessex, and the wife of Æthelræd, lord of the Mercians (Swanton, 101, 105). Her actions and circumstances can, moreover, be compared with Sybil Bordet, who defended Taragona (Spain), and Isabel de Conches, who went on campaign, according to a twelfth-century monastic historian (Chibnall, pp. 105–121).

The bond between kinship and politics was a key feature of medieval society, and provided women with a vehicle to express abilities and ambitions.

ANDREW WAREHAM

References and Further Reading

- Bloch, M. La société féodale. 6th ed. Paris: A. Colin, 1978.
- Campbell, Alistair, ed. The Chronicle of Æthelweard. London: Nelson, 1962.
- Chibnall, Marjorie. “Women in Orderic Vitalis.” Haskins Society Journal 2 (1990): 105–121.
- Crick, Julia. “Women, Posthumous Benefaction, and Family Strategy in Pre-Conquest England.” Journal of British Studies 38 (1999): 399–422.
- Duby, Georges. Hommes et structures du Moyen Age. Paris: Mouton, 1973.

- Goody, Jack. The Development of Family and Marriage in Europe. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1986.
- Green, Judith. The Aristocracy of Norman England. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997.
- Le Jan, Régine. Famille et pouvoir dans le monde franc (VIIe-Xe Siècle): Essai d'anthropologie sociale. Paris: Publications de la Sorbonne, 1995.
- Levi-Strauss, Claude. Les structures élémentaires de la parenté. Paris: PUF, 1949.
- Ruiz-Doménec, J., "Système de parenté et théorie de l'alliance dans la société catalane (env. 1000–env. 1240)." Revue Historique, 532 (1979): 305–326.
- Schmid, K. Geblüt, Herrschaft, Geschlechterbewusstsein. Grundfragen zum Verständnis des Adels im Mittelalter. Sigmaringen: J. Thorbecke, 1998.
- Swanton, Michael, ed. The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle. London: Routledge, 1998.
- Wareham, Andrew. Lords and Communities in Early Medieval East Anglia. Santa Barbara, Calif.: Woodbridge Press, 2005.
- White, Stephen. Custom, Kinship and Gifts to Saints: the Laudatio Parentum in Western France, 1050–1150. Chapel Hill, N.C.: University of North Carolina Press, 1989.

See also Aethelflaed; Death, Mourning, and Commemoration; Family (Earlier Middle Ages); Family (Later Middle Ages); Inheritance; Matilda and the Monastery of Essen

KOMNENE, ANNA

Anna Komnene (1083–c. 1150s) is one of the best known of Byzantine women due to her authorship of the Alexiad, a history of her father's rise to power and subsequent reign. Translated into many languages today, the Alexiad unveils one medieval woman's experiences.

Anna Komnene was born in the royal palace in Constantinople, two years after her father took the throne. She died probably in the 1150s, having lived her entire life in the capital city of the Byzantine empire. Known simply as "the city" to its inhabitants, it abounded in beautiful palaces and magnificent churches and was home to many artists, authors, rhetors, architects, and monks, who were drawn to its imperial and patriarchal courts.

Anna Komnene was fitted by birth and education to take part in the rich culture into which she was born. Educated in the trivium (grammar, rhetoric, and dialectic), she had access to the quadrivium (further studies, normally reserved for boys, in geometry, arithmetic, astronomy, and music). The extent of her literary education is revealed in the Alexiad, which is written in high-style archaizing Greek and abounds in literary allusions. She was involved to some extent in other literary endeavours, such as the commentaries on Aristotle produced by an educated circle meeting in the nunnery of Kecharitomene, where Anna lived much of her life.

Most of Anna's life was lived in a nunnery due to politics. After Anna's father died in 1118, she attempted to take the throne from her brother John. He was younger than Anna, and she had imperial ambitions. As a child, before John's birth, she had been betrothed to the future heir to the throne. That engagement was broken off and the young man died, but Anna seems never to have abandoned the idea of ruling the empire. That ambition says much about the effect on women of the change in the empire's political character during the eleventh century. At that time the great families came to play a significant role in the acquisition and exercise of power. Women gained a role not only as partners in the all-important scheme of marriage alliances but also as architects of these alliances. The most notable eleventh-century example was Anna's paternal grandmother, Anna Dalassena. She created a web of alliances that supported Alexios Komnenos's coup in 1081. Anna Dalassena then controlled the civil government of the empire while Alexios spent years fighting on the frontiers.

After Anna Dalassena retired, Alexios' wife Eirene Doukaina became the most powerful woman at court, even traveling with Alexios on military expeditions. In this climate of powerful imperial women it is not surprising that Anna should aspire to rule. Eirene did not support Anna Komnene's outright rebellion against John in 1118, but she had lobbied Alexios on her behalf before his death.

Anna's rebellion failed, and John exiled her to Kecharitomene, where she lived in the royal quarters and interacted with the educated men who flocked there to read, write, and recite. There she wrote her Alexiad, a book that does not mention her rebellion but is full of her undeclared claim to be her father's heir.

Anna has been accused of perpetuating unfavourable stereotypes about women in the Alexiad. She does comment that women are weak and her highest accolade of praise is to describe a woman as "manly." However, although Anna did not analyse and criticise her society as modern feminists or anthropologists do, she did value women as women. She included herself and her unusual experience in womanhood, merely expanding the meaning of the word to encompass it. None of the women in the Alexiad are portrayed as weak; they all deal with the individual crises they face with courage and vision. They all display self-control, regarded as the eminent virtue by men and women. Anna was elitist, and class is perhaps a greater signifier than gender for her. For her, the gender of the heir to the empire was less important than his or her family name.

Anna's family pride and her literary achievements are her most defining characteristics. Many questions surrounding her are debated: did Anna really write the Alexiad; how true is her account; and how does her gender affect her writing and presentation of her times? What sort of literature is the Alexiad, and is it any good? What did Anna think about women and men, and can we ever know? How much is she a product of her times and how much an exception? The breadth of the discussion communicates Anna's importance to history.

BARBARA HILL

References and Further Reading

- Angold, Michael. The Byzantine Empire, 1025–1204: A Political History. 2nd Ed. London: Longman, 1997.
- Buckler, Georgiana. Anna Comnena. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1929.
- Garland, Linda. Byzantine Empresses: Women and Power in Byzantium AD 527–1204. London: Routledge, 1999.
- Gouma-Peterson, Thalia, ed. Anna Komnene and Her Times. New York: Garland, 2000.
- Hill, Barbara. Imperial Women in Byzantium, 1025–1204. London: Longman, 1999.
- Komnene, Anna. The Alexiad of Anna Comnena. Translated by E. Sewter, Baltimore: Penguin, 1969.
- Mullett, Margaret E., and Smythe, Dion C., eds. Alexios I Komnenos. Vol 1. Belfast: Belfast Byzantine Texts & Translations, 1999.

See also Byzantium; Empresses: Byzantium

KOTTANER, HELENE

Helene Kottaner (Kottannerin) (c. 1400–1457) wrote an invaluable vernacular memoir from the perspective of a lay woman of the fifteenth century. She described in rich detail the intricate high politics of Central Europe and certain intrigues at the court of Elizabeth of Luxemburg (d. 1442), queen of Hungary, daughter of King-Emperor Sigismund (1387–1437), and widow of Albert V (II) of Hapsburg, King of the Romans (r. 1437–1439). As a lady of the bedchamber and nurse-governess to Princess Elizabeth of Hapsburg (1436–1505), later queen of Poland, Kottaner was an eyewitness to and participant in the events that led to the contested coronation of Ladislas Posthumus (1440–1457) as king of Hungary. Her memoir is the first prose narrative composed in German by a woman.

Lady Helene, daughter of Peter Wolfram (d. after 1435), a member of the Austrian lower nobility, married twice: first to the Hungarian Peter Székeles, lord mayor of Sopron (d. c. 1430); then, in 1432, to Johann Kottaner, chamberlain to the cathedral provost of Sopron. Of her children, Wilhelm Székeles and Katherina Kottaner are known by name. She entered Albert's court c. 1436 and moved with it to Hungary. Albert's early death left her mistress, Queen Elizabeth, in a precarious situation. Elizabeth was pregnant, hoping for a male heir; but a large faction of Hungarian nobles wanted her to marry sixteen-year-old King Władisław III of Poland, whom they could then elect king.

Lady Helene played a vital role in the queen's service. She courageously stole the Crown of St. Stephen for the queen and held twelve-week-old Ladislas at his coronation (May 15, 1440). The queen's opponents prevailed in a civil war, eventually forcing Elizabeth out of Hungary. Helene's later fortunes are obscure, and she is thought to have died in Vienna (c. 1457).

Helene's narrative is preserved in an incomplete fifteenth-century manuscript. Scholars believe it was composed between 1445 and 1452. The author dictated a first person account to a secretary. She may have intended to inform young King Ladislas of the events leading to his coronation and seek his favor for past services. It is focused on events in 1439–1440 in western Hungary and Austria. Helene wrote a vivid, if partisan, narrative; and the account of stealing the crown is particularly colorful. Helene reached the queen just before the moment of Ladislas' birth. Helene goes on to recount the coronation and later events. Her memoir is more valuable for its reflection of the assumptions and folkways of her time.

JAMES ROSS SWEENEY

References and Further Reading

- Bak, János. "The Late Medieval Period, 1382–1526." In A History of Hungary, edited by Peter F. Sugar. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1990, pp. 54–82.
- Bijvoet, Maya C., trans. "Helene Kottaner: the Austrian Chambermaid." In Women Writers of the Renaissance and Reformation, edited by Katharina M. Wilson, Athens, Ga.: University of Georgia Press, 1987, pp. 327–349.
- Carney, Jo Eldridge. "Helene Kottaner (1400–after 1457), Austria, Writer of Memoirs and Royal Servant," in Carol Levin et al. Extraordinary Women of the Medieval and Renaissance World. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2000, pp. 157–159.
- Mollay, Karl. Die Denkwürdigkeit der Helene Kottannerin (1439–1440). Vienna: Bundersverl, 1971.
- Sweeney, James Ross. "The Tricky Queen and Her Clever Lady-in-Waiting: Stealing the Crown to Secure Succession, Visegrád 1440." East Central Europe 20–23, part 1 (1993–1996): 87–100.

See also Ladies-in-Waiting; Queens and Empresses: The West

L

---

LADIES-IN-WAITING

The role played by a noble woman in the late-medieval court grew in importance after the thirteenth century. The queens' and princesses' feminine entourages increased and became more luxurious as courts developed in a long process that would carry on throughout the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. Ladies-in-waiting would become an elite group among these noble women who served royalty, not only in their daily life but also in court ceremonies.

These ladies were the daughters or wives of the kingdom's great noblemen. They generally lived in the great lady's household with their children and their own servants. Besides carrying out the characteristic household chores of their position, they served the queen or princess so that she could appear in society and exercise her royal power as was fitting.

Just as there were different positions among men within the court and chivalrous hierarchy, we also find these hierarchical differences among courtier noble women. A lady was equivalent to a knight within the court hierarchy, as was a damsel to a squire. As it is evidenced by some contemporaneous writings, like Christine de Pizan's, whereas damsels belonged to the lower nobility, ladies were members of the high nobility; their position was equivalent to gentlemen's. The difference between men and women is that it was not women's achievement to gain power, as they depended on the status that their husbands acquired in the court.

On the other hand, it is also important to consider that, after the thirteenth century, the terms lady and damsel were also used in a generic way to refer to a married noble woman and to a young noble maiden, respectively, and so this expression could be misleading. Therefore, this entry analyzes this terminology in a hierarchical sense: the lady as a position within the court service's hierarchy, as the "lady-in-waiting."

Concerning the function of a lady at court, the main evidence dates back to the end of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, when the different occupations and court positions had been defined in detail. Books like those of Christine de Pizan, or Alienor de Poitiers' Les honneurs de la cour evidence the role played by ladies in ceremonial and court life near the great lady. As regards court and chivalrous ceremonies, each lady had a precisely defined function. There are many testimonies of queens' or princess' entrances, where the great lady arrived surrounded by her ladies, who rode horseback as if they were horsemen. They established a certain parallelism between the king's entourage and the queen's.

In regard to domestic life, ladies were in charge of waiting on queens and princesses and followed a refined protocol, not only in their daily activities but also in the most delicate moments of life, including pregnancy, childbirth, and death—in fact, they organized royal family members' funerals. All of the women, great ladies and their attendants, spent every day together: sewing and embroidering, tasks typically reserved for noble women.

In addition to these assignments, ladies were responsible for educating princesses and princes. In the earlier years of their life, infants lived in their mother's household and they grew up with all these women. Girls continued living in the queen's household with the women of her entourage and often became part of it. On the other hand, boys around the age of seven left their mothers' households, either for their own or their fathers'. Thus, many ladies had the role of governess to princes and princesses; they were in charge of instilling good manners and religious devotion in royal children and, if it was possible, they taught them to read and to write. For girls, these governesses also taught embroidery, dancing, and other knowledge that a lady must have.

Therefore, ladies held a very responsible position in the court in regard to protocol and education. All princes and future kings grew up in their lap, so to speak; they also provided the queen needed company and an entourage, with which to display her Majesty amid multicolored, sumptuous robes and courtiers' gestures, in a society completely immersed in chivalrous literature.

MARÍA NARBONA-CÁRCELES

References and Further Reading

- Aurell, Martí dir., and María Narbona Cárcelos, ed. and trans. La dama en la corte bajomedieval. Pamplona: Eunsa, 2001.
- Herlihy, David. Opera Muliebria: Women and Work in Medieval Europe. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1990.
- Narbona Cárcelos, María. "Woman at Court: a Prosopographic Study of the Court of Carlos III of Navarre (1387–1425)." Medieval Prosopography 22 (2001): 31–64.
- Paviot, Jacques, ed. "Les Etats de France (Les honneurs de la cour) d'Eleonore de Poitiers," in: Annuaire-Bulletin de la Société de l'histoire de la France, 1996, Paris, 1998, pp. 75–137.
- Pizan, Christine de. Le livre des trois vertus, edited by Cannon Willard. Paris: Honoré Champion, 1989.
- . Le livre de la Cité des dames, translated and introduced by Éric Hicks and Thérèse Moreau, Paris: Stock, 1992.

See also Noble Women; Queens and Empresses: the West

LANDHOLDING AND PROPERTY RIGHTS

Although women were able to acquire land throughout the Middle Ages, they did not usually have full control over it. Thus in Anglo-Saxon society, a bride might be given land as her "morning gift," but it stayed in the hands of her husband during his lifetime: he managed it and received its revenues. Even as a widow, although she could now enjoy the revenues, she could not alienate it and, on her death, it passed to her husband's heirs. Only a very few women held any sizeable agglomerations of property in their own right and those were always members of the upper aristocracy or a royal house.

Inheritance

Thus in England in 1066, no more than five percent of the total area of land recorded in the Domesday survey was in the hands of women, and of that five percent about half was in the hands of three female members of the family of Earl Godwin. The rules or principles governing inheritance and the size of a widow's portion were still extremely flexible and depended a great deal on the wishes and power of a girl's father and/or his lord. It was not until the Angevin king, Henry II, undertook extensive legal reforms, that the rules governing property administered by common law became more standardized and clear-cut.

By the end of the twelfth century the claim of women to inherit land in the absence of direct male heirs was recognized; daughters might inherit if there were no sons and sisters if there were no brothers. If more than one daughter had survived, the land was to be equally divided among them. A widow could be given one-third of her husband's estate (her dower), but she had only a life interest in it. At first she received just the lands that she had been given at the church door at the time of the marriage, but after the issuance of Magna Carta, this was expanded to include a share of all the lands that her husband had possessed at any time during the marriage. A widow, however, had to claim her share from the heir, but, if he failed to provide it, she could bring a plea before one of the royal courts. These pleas reveal that a number of second and third wives were forced to litigate with the sons of first wives. Even though judgment was often given in favor of the widow, the process of securing a dower could be an "engrossing, time-consuming business" (Walker).

Jointure and Widowhood

During the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, women's rights in land were profoundly affected by new legal developments. First land could be given to husband and wife to hold jointly. A widow could keep this land and enjoy the revenues even if she remarried. Furthermore since technically she was already in possession of the land, she did not need to go to a court to claim it and thus might avoid some of the problems previously discussed. On the contraction of a marriage among common law tenants it became increasingly common for the bride's family to provide a marriage portion of money and/or goods and the groom's family to provide a jointure in land.

At the level of manorial courts (which governed land held by customary tenure), similar legal procedures arose virtually in tandem with what was happening in the common law courts. In the early Middle Ages landed provision was made for the widow in accordance with the custom of a particular manor—a widow might receive a third, a half, or the whole of her husband's estates in different areas. Unlike the aristocracy, however, the widow could keep this customary land only so long as she remained chaste and unmarried. Gradually it became more and more common to grant some land jointly to both husband and wife, but sometimes with a reversion to a named heir. Joint tenure had distinct advantages for the future widow. She did not forfeit the land if she remarried and most of the necessary fees payable to the lord had already been paid. If the land had been granted without a reversion the widow was free to do with it what she willed, including sell it to non-kin.

Uses and Deathbed Transfers

The most important change, however, affecting common law property was the rise of "the use." Lands were granted to trustees known as "feoffees to uses," who became for most legal purposes the owners of the land, although the previous owner continued to receive its income. Dower could still be assessed on any land that had not been transmitted by enfeoffment to use, but dower could not be claimed from any land that had been granted to feoffees before a marriage. A man, however, usually instructed his trustees, through his last will and testament, to grant his wife a portion of his estates. This might be more than the one-third to which she would be entitled under the common law provision for dower, or it might be much less. Although some widows became extremely wealthy, enjoying a generous dower and jointure, others were granted no more than maintenance and house room and had to rely on a slim jointure. A few were even pressured to give up their allotment of land in return for an annuity that was not always paid on time.

Similarly in the manorial courts, a new type of conveyancing—the deathbed transfer—appeared in the fourteenth century, which allowed a man to make an oral disposition of his landed assets if he was too sick to attend the regular court. Such transfers might benefit a widow if she was granted land that she would not otherwise have received, but in many cases she lost out, if her husband granted land to noninheriting children or added a reversionary clause to land that was held jointly.

Urban Property

Within towns, real estate, held under the form of law known as burgage tenure, could be freely sold or bequeathed. A merchant could give a townhouse to daughters even if he had sons or to a sister instead of a brother. Yet, although an unmarried daughter could become a rentier or run a business on her own, very few actually did so. Once a woman married, any inherited property would be managed and controlled by her husband, and with her consent, could be, and often was, alienated during her lifetime. Widows could claim a share in the house in which they had been living and a half or third share of their husband's lands, tenements, and goods. In addition urban women, as with other widows, could hold property jointly with their husbands and keep these tenements after the men's deaths.

How comfortably an urban widow could live depended a great deal on her social status. In the case of mercantile widows, where the husband's wealth might take the form of bales of wool or cloth, or debts owed to him, the widow's share could be extremely valuable. She might also hold several houses, shops, and land on which rents could be collected. In contrast the widow of a small-scale artisan, such as a carpenter, weaver, or glover, might inherit very little in the way of moveable property. The family frequently lived in rented accommodation, so that the widow had no claim to real estate. Many were forced to move to cheaper lodgings on the edge of town. In every study that has been carried out—Coventry, Exeter, Southwark—the households headed by women were poorer than those headed by males and many widows were living in extreme poverty.

MAVIS MATE

References and Further Reading

- Archer, Rowena E. "How Ladies Who Live on Their Manors Ought to Manage Their Households and Estates": Women As Landholders and Administrators in the Later Middle Ages." In Women is a Worthy Wight, edited by P. J. P. Goldberg. Wolfeboro Falls, N.H.: Alan Sutton, 1992, pp. 149–181.
- Walker, Sue Sheridan. "Litigation as a Personal Quest: Suing for Dower in the Royal Courts circa 1272–1350." In Wife and Widow in Medieval England, edited by S. S. Walker. Ann Arbor, Mich.: University of Michigan Press, 1993, pp. 81–108.

See also Dowry and Other Marriage Gifts; Economy; England; Inheritance; Law, English Secular Courts of; Widows

LANGMANN, ADELHEID

Born into a socially powerful patrician family in Nuremberg, Adelheid Langmann (c. 1312–1375) was betrothed to Gottfried Teufel at the age of thirteen. He died shortly thereafter and in her spiritual autobiography, Adelheid describes an intensely difficult spiritual struggle following his death. In 1330, she entered the Franconian Dominican cloister of Engelthal, a prosperous and renowned convent housing the daughters of many of the wealthy burghers of the area. Among them was Christina Ebner, who also wrote a lengthy spiritual autobiography and was known by bishops and kings. Both Adelheid and Christina were cloistered at Engelthal when King Charles IV, who would later be crowned as emperor, visited the monastery in 1350 seeking spiritual advice.

Like many of her Dominican sisters in Germany, Austria, and Switzerland, Adelheid was educated in Latin and learned to read and write in her vernacular German dialect. Perhaps inspired by Christina Ebner's mystical text, Adelheid began to write, recording her visions and revelations. She also composed a lengthy prayer dedicated to the Trinity. Adelheid's Revelations, along with the Prayer, are extant in three manuscript variations. The narrative of her spiritual journey, Revelations, is written in a Bavarian dialect and chronicles her cloistered life from 1330 to 1344. Although the text is essentially autohagiographical, narrating Adelheid's own experience of the divine, there are stylistic similarities and thematic parallels with texts written by Christina Ebner, Margaretha Ebner, as well as the myriad of lives narrated in the Dominican "Sister-Books." Influenced by biblical sources, especially the Song of Songs, Adelheid's ecstatic mysticism reflects the bride and mother mysticism of the High Middle Ages.

ROSEMARY DRAGE HALE

References and Further Reading

Hindsley, Leonard P. The Mystics of Engelthal: Writings from a Medieval Monastery. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1998.

Die Offenbarungen der Adelheid Langmann: Klosterfrau zu Englethal. Edited by Phillip Strauch. Strassburg: Trubner, 1878.

See also Autohagiography; Bride of Christ: Imagery; Ebner, Margaretha; Mysticism and Mystics; Sister-Books and Convent Chronicles

LAUGHTER

Medieval attitudes toward laughter were ambivalent. Monastic rules often forbade laughter because of its association with the sin of pride and because Jesus was said never to have laughed. Physicians and some church writers, however, welcomed laughter in moderation for its power to restore the spirits and to enliven otherwise dull sermons. Writers who valued laughter emphasized the importance of moderation, influenced both by Arab writers on laughter and the medical understanding of the body as composed of four humors that should be kept in balance. Moderate laughter was encouraged in both men and women, but concern over the potential for excessive laughter was heightened for women, as evidenced in much conduct literature instructing women not to laugh too loudly or too long, not to speak too often, and not to move their bodies or look around in an immodest way. This concern stemmed first from the view that women were less able to control the emotions because of their inferior rational faculties and bodily predisposition toward shifting moods. In both medical and popular texts, women were said to laugh and cry more often, or even simultaneously. Another reason laughter was discouraged in women can be explained by a longstanding association between laughter and aggression. Women were educated to be passive and obedient; laughter signaled resistance to these norms and could thus jeopardize a woman's reputation and desirability as a potential spouse. The telling of jokes or humorous tales was also censored more often in women. Whereas men were encouraged to demonstrate their intellectual wit and thus establish power within political circles, such skills were generally not deemed appropriate to women, whose public roles were less important. Sexual humor, in particular, was discouraged because it compromised a woman's modesty, a concern dramatized in Giovanni Boccaccio's Decameron, in which female storytellers are reluctant to tell tales with sexual content (see especially the discussion before Day VII). Women were instructed not only to avoid sexual language, but also to avoid laughing at sexual jokes, for fear this would expose their knowledge of sex.

Investigations into humor by women in modern times have attempted to ascertain whether women have a sense of humor that is distinctly different from men's, a proposition that has been criticized as essentializing. In the Middle Ages, the lack of comic texts known to have been authored by women makes this issue yet more difficult. It has been claimed that authors such as Christine de Pizan and Marie de France demonstrated a sense of humor, but humor is far from central in their works. Representations of women laughing in medieval texts do tend, however, to parallel anthropological studies showing that women throughout the world are more likely to laugh and tell jokes in women-only settings. The anonymous French Evangelies des Quenouilles [Gospel of Distaffs] and William Dunbar's poem The Tretis of the Tua Mariit Wemen and the Wedo, for example, show small private groups of women laughing raucously and telling jokes, especially about the failings of men.

There has been much debate about the attitude toward women in medieval comic literature. Genres such as the short rhymed narratives called fabliaux are said to be misogynistic because the female characters who trick their husbands are libidinous and deceitful. Others argue that fabliaux women are more clever and resourceful than the dull-witted men of the tales, who have in some way deserved the humiliation they suffer; women end up "on top" in these narratives. Similar ambiguity is found in visual humor such as the manuscript marginalia and wood carvings of women "wearing the pants" or beating their husbands with distaffs. Theoretical contexts informing this debate include anthropological analyses of rituals of misrule and Mikhail Bakhtin's concept of carnival. Medieval authors themselves are a far from satisfactory guide in how to interpret these ambivalent figures, since their narrators both praise and blame women's use of wit. The female character who best embodies the medieval author's ambivalence is the Wife of Bath, from Geoffrey Chaucer's Canterbury Tales. The Wife defends herself against centuries of antifeminist writings by manipulating scripture and Church writing to fit her own defense of women, and she brags of her control over her five husbands. While some scholars view her as a negative portrait of feminine excess and believe that laughter was at her expense, others see more sympathy in Chaucer's portrayal, and believe that readers laugh along with the Wife rather than at her. It is important to note that the wit of female characters may be promoted by male authors and enjoyed by audiences for reasons other than promoting a defense of women. For example, the shepherdess of the pastourelle who ridicules and spurns the inappropriate advances of the passing knight highlights differences in class and parodies courtly discourse.

LISA PERFETTI

References and Further Reading

- Apte, Mahadev L. Humor and Laughter: An Anthropological Approach. Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1985.
- Barreca, Regina. They Used to Call Me Snow White But I Drifted: Women's Strategic Use of Humor. New York: Penguin, 1991.
- Bremmer, Jan, and Herman Roodenburg, eds. A Cultural History of Humour from Antiquity to the Present Day. Cambridge, U.K.: Polity Press, 1997.
- Fenster, Thelma. "Did Christine Have a Sense of Humor? The Evidence of the Epistre au dieu d'Amours." In Reinterpreting Christine de Pizan, edited by Earl Jeffrey Richards. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1992, pp. 23–36.

Joubert, Laurent. Treatise on Laughter, translated by Gregory David de Rocher. Tuscaloosa, Ala.: University of Alabama Press, 1980.

Olson, Glending. Literature as Recreation in the Later Middle Ages. Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1986.

Perfetti, Lisa. Women and Laughter in Medieval Comic Literature. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 2003.

Verberckmoes, Johan. Laughter, Jestbooks, and Society in the Spanish Netherlands. New York: St. Martin's, 1999.

See also Boccaccio, Giovanni; Conduct Literature; Evangiles des Quenouilles; Exemplum; Fabliau; Festivals of Misrule; Proverbs, Riddles, and Gnomonic Literature; Wife of Bath; Woman on Top

LAW

Medieval legal systems impacted women in all times and places. Early medieval society distinguished between persons (Roman and barbarian) whereas later society was divided into regional political entities (kingdoms, principalities, and cities) with their own systems.

All regions had customary law, much of it reduced to writing. All too were influenced by Roman law and canon law. These were taught at universities, and their graduates influenced the practice of law across the continent. Even English common law was influenced by Roman norms, usually through the church courts. Jewish law governed a substantial minority within the larger context of "Christendom." Islamic law governed much of the Iberian Peninsula until "Reconquest" by Christian kings reduced it to minority status. Where these jurisdictions clashed, Christian norms tended to prevail.

Roman law treated marriage as a dissoluble contract and provided for the support of marriage by dowries. Barbarian legal systems also recognized divorce, and customary law gave the family of a woman considerable control over her marriage choices. Canon law, however, inserted Christian norms, including the developing belief in marriage as a sacrament, into local practice. Sacramental marriage was supposed to be indissoluble; but a union might be voided if it had been contracted within close degrees of kinship or ignored other legal impediments.

Canon law emphasized the consent of the couple, not consummation, as ratifying a marriage; and this emphasis extended to accepting clandestine unions as valid. A woman did have an equal right to sexual satisfaction, the so-called conjugal debt. Nor could one spouse enter a monastery without the other spouse's consent. All such matters were adjudicated in church courts.

Women held secondary status in any medieval system of law. Under the barbarian codes, a woman's wergild was less than that of a man of equal social status but highest in her child-bearing years. Her property rights were adjudicated in lay courts according to customary norms or those of Roman law. Women might inherit property in some systems, but their husbands tended to enjoy its fruits. Women might transmit claims to power and property, but they rarely ruled or exercised power directly. An heiress might become the ward of a powerful man who could marry her off to his own political or financial advantage.

Systems of dowry provided by the bride's family were developed—replacing the dower a husband provided—to support a married woman while protecting the family's patrimony from any claim she might make on it. A widow might enjoy greater freedom of action and choice of a subsequent husband, but efforts were made to protect her children from the previous marriage and their father's family from her departure with the assigned dowry. Dowries also were shielded from a husband's insolvency. (A nun too was expected to bring her monastery a dowry.)

Women's legal rights were most restricted in the public forum and became more limited over time. A woman's testimony was of limited value in a court of law, especially where her own interests were not involved. In all public matters, a woman was expected to act through a male relative or some other man. Even an abbess, acting within the canon law courts, was expected to stay cloistered and to act through male agents. Women could, however, make wills; and these might be probated in church courts, especially in regions not dominated by Roman law.

THOMAS IZBICKI

References and Further Reading

- Bellomo, Manlio. The Common Legal Past of Europe: 1000–1800. translated by Lydia G. Cochrane. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America Press, 1995.
- Brundage, James A. Medieval Canon Law: An Introduction. London and New York: Longman, 1995.
- Medieval Women and the Law*, edited by Noël James Menuge. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell Press, 2000.

See also Barbarian Law Codes; Crime and Criminals; Feme Coverte; Feme Sole; Law, Canon; Law, Customary; French; Law, English Secular Courts of; Law, German; Law, Jewish; Law, Roman; Legal Agency; Marriage, Christian; Marriage, Impediments to; Sumptuary Law; Wardship; Wergild; Witches

LAW CODES, BARBARIAN

See Barbarian Law Codes

LAW, CANON

The origins of the Church's claims to a separate jurisdiction over all faithful go back to the disciplinary decisions in the Acts of the Apostles. The law of the Church developed through practice and legislation over the next millennium and formed a coherent, if confusing, body of rules by the eleventh century. The systematic analysis of canon law received a boost with the Investiture struggle of the eleventh century, but gained irresistible momentum as a result of the compilation and publication of Gratian's Concordia Discordantium Canonum (c. 1140), which soon became known as his Decretum. In this collection of nearly 4,000 canons, Gratian discussed the relevant texts for understanding the position of the law of the Church on a number of legal topics and suggested ways in which the apparent contradictions of the practices of the preceding millennium could be explained or dissolved.

Gratian's text presents arguments for and against the position that he proposes and ranges widely, utilizing all types of ecclesiastical authority: Scripture, the Apostolic canons, ecumenical and local councils, papal decretals, and patristic texts. In the first part, the distinctiones, he defines the nature of law, while part two, the causae, includes discussions of matters concerning the clergy, such as simony, episcopal authority, the life of monks and clerics, ecclesiastical property, legal procedure, confession, and marriage. Part three of the Decretum deals with sacramental and liturgical matters. Gratian's discussion bears the hallmarks of being a teaching text and, though it was hugely influential, some of his discussions drew conclusions that made sense in a classroom situation but left much to be desired in terms of their application in a (Church) court. This was particularly the case in his discussion of marriage—an institution that affected all of Christendom—which left unclear the exact moment when a marriage came into being. Gratian's solution to the contradictions in the canons of the Church was that marriage was a two-stage process incorporating an initiated and perfected marriage—an unwieldy and difficult concept.

Gratian's solution was superseded by a much simplified model—the so-called Parisian model—that only required the parties to speak certain words for a marriage to be created. Alexander III's undated decretal, known as Veniens ad nos, had legal force immediately during his reign (1159–1181). This decretal was included in 1234 in the Decretales Gregorij, also known as the Liber Extra, which was the first comprehensive officially promulgated collection of canon law in western Europe. This compilation was different in nature from Gratian's Decretum.

It consists of almost 2,000 chapters, most of them being papal decisions taken in individual cases sent to the Curia either as appeals against decisions by local church courts or requests for advice in difficult cases heard by these courts.

The thirteenth and fourteenth centuries saw a rapid development of the courts, both in terms of personnel, legal framework, and complexity. Conciliar and synodal legislation in the early thirteenth century increasingly provided a framework for the regular preaching and implementation of the doctrines and canons of the Church to the laity. The thirteenth century also witnessed the emergence of a number of offices that became central to the running of the church courts, and, with the Second Council of Lyon (1274), church courts were admonished to keep written records of their decisions. The courts became professionalized, and their personnel were expected to meet certain minimum standards. One or two judges were in charge of the courts and had law degrees. Advocates advised the judges and pleaded cases orally, while proctors represented parties in cases and provided the written documentation in pleadings often by employing the court scribes and notaries to compose these. The courts provided a comprehensive system of implementing canonical rules and afforded groups who had few other opportunities to litigate, such as women and children, a venue for their pleas.

Because the medieval Church claimed jurisdiction over all cases involving the salvation of souls, they came to hear a higher proportion of cases initiated and conducted by or on behalf of women than most other courts. The courts claimed jurisdiction over cases for two reasons: by reason of the person and by reason of the subject matter. Thus church courts heard all cases that involved either the fabric or the personnel of the Church and all cases that had to do with the salvation of souls. The former cases included disputes amongst clerics, disputes between clerics and laity, and all cases that involved transgressions against members of the Church.

As survivals of court documentation are at best haphazard and at worst nonexistent, it is difficult to establish litigation levels. Analysis is further complicated by the fact that record-keeping was not consistent across Europe. It has been suggested, for example, that procedure in marriage cases varied in England and France, the former recording them as civil instance cases (initiated by the parties to the marriage), the latter recording them as criminal cases (initiated as the result of an investigation by the court itself). The surviving documentation for medieval English dioceses allows us to speculate that church courts were popular instruments of justice—particularly for women—in Europe. They heard a large number of cases, and the survivals are only the tip of a very large iceberg. The archives of the archdiocese of York show a remarkably sudden rise in preserved litigation (some 3,000 cases in the sixteenth century compared to only around 600 for the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries). The few surviving fifteenth-century York consistory act books recording the daily business of the courts indicate that they may have heard as many as 20,000 cases during the course of the fifteenth century. One third of the preserved fourteenth-century York consistory court cases deal with disputes between clergy or clergy and lay men, the remaining two-thirds include marriage disputes, testamentary and defamation litigation, and breach of faith cases. The majority of the latter group of cases dealt with the enforcement of marriage. In the rare cases when it is possible to analyze the litigants' understanding of the complex rules of the Church and their use of the procedure of the court, it is striking that lay people appearing before the courts were either very well informed about the content of the law or very well advised by legal counsel.

FREDERIK PEDERSEN

References and Further Reading

- Adams, Norma, and Charles Donahue, Jr. Select Cases from the Ecclesiastical Courts of the Province of Canterbury, c. 1200–1301. Selden Society, 95. London: Selden Society, 1981.
- Brundage, James A. Medieval Canon Law and the Crusader. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1969.
- . Law, Sex, and Christian Society in Medieval Europe. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1987.
- Donahue, Charles, Jr. "The Policy of Alexander the Third's Consent Theory of Marriage." In Proceedings of the Fourth International Conference of Medieval Canon Law, edited by Stephan Kuttner. Monumenta Iuris Canonici, Subsidia 5. Vatican City: Bibliotheca Apostolica Vaticana, 1976, pp. 251–281.
- . "The Canon Law on the Formation of Marriage and Social Practice in the Later Middle Ages." Journal of Family History 8 (1983): 144–158.
- Fournier, Paul. Les officialités au moyen âge: étude sur l'organisation, la compétence et la procédure des tribunaux ecclésiastiques ordinaire en France, de 1180 à 1328. Paris: E. Plon., 1880.
- Helmholz, R. H. Marriage Litigation in Medieval England. Cambridge Studies in English Legal History. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1974.
- . The Spirit of Classical Canon Law. Spirit of the Laws. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1996.
- Kuttner, Stephan. Harmony from Dissonance: An Interpretation of Medieval Canon Law. Latrobe, Pa.: Archabbey Press, 1960.
- Pedersen, Frederik. Marriage Disputes in Medieval England. London: Hambledon and London Books, 2000.
- Winroth, Anders. The Making of Gratian's Decretum. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997.

See also Children, Betrothal and Marriage of; Crime and Criminals; Dowry and Other Marriage Gifts; Law, Customary: French; Law, English Secular Courts of; Law, German; Law, Islamic; Law, Roman; Legal Agency; Marriage, Christian; Marriage, Impediments to; Penitentials and Pastoral Manuals; Records, Ecclesiastical; Records, Rural; Records, Urban; Sexuality: Extramarital Sex; Sexuality: Female Same-Sex Relations; Sexuality: Male Same-Sex Relations; Sexuality, Regulation of; Sexuality: Sex in Marriage

LAW, CUSTOMARY: FRENCH

The earliest law codes to be written down in French, as opposed to Latin, date from the thirteenth century, and consist largely of customs (i.e., judge-made law established in actual cases). Customary law compilations deal with both procedural and substantive matters, and cover such topics as crimes, the transfer of property inter vivos and by inheritance, judicial duels (trial by battle) wills, contracts, market regulations, notaries' fees, and many other matters. Many of the codes are unofficial, in the sense that they were not handed down or approved by the local lord, but recorded by lawyers and judges to guide their memories. Since the customs were valid only for small areas, and could change over time, it is impossible to make general statements about all Old French law. It is dangerous to assume that the law of one area of what is now France can explain a problem occurring in another area or at another time. Furthermore, Roman law influenced customary law more and more as time went on, and in the southern portion of France, Roman law virtually replaced customary law. Accordingly, many of the following remarks must be qualified with adverbs such as usually or generally. That said, common practices and attitudes may be found in several or most of the codes.

Only a few of these customs deal exclusively with women, but many aspects of customary law do include provisions that concern both sexes. For the most part, female criminals were treated like male offenders, but punishment might take a different form: for example, a woman who slandered someone might be fined only half as much as a man. In the southwest (Guienne), punishment for convicted men and women adulterers was identical: they were paraded around the town, naked, and tied together with a rope. In business, women usually had to obtain their husband's or father's permission to conduct business, file lawsuits, etc. Women could not be witnesses in most lawsuits, save in exceptional circumstances, such as for proving virginity or live births.

Customary law codes devote a good deal of space to inheritance. The rights of women to inherit land were usually inferior to those of their brothers. The oldest son generally took a third of the deceased father's real property, no matter how many older sisters he had. The remainder might be shared among the other sons, or the other sons and daughters. A daughter who had married and been given some property at her wedding could not share in her father's or mother's estate, unless she brought back to the distribution what she had been given earlier. When a man left only daughters, the estate was usually distributed in equal shares to the surviving daughters (this method of distribution is discussed in Chrétien de Troyes's romance Yvain). The affairs of widows (and orphans) usually came under the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical, rather than the secular courts, so that the customaries do not deal very much with such issues.

While women could inherit and own property, they were usually not permitted to manage their own property, whether real or personal, if they were unmarried living in their father's home, or married and living with a husband. The men generally were entitled to manage their wives' or daughters' personal property. Sometimes this property was protected, for example when a man was fined by confiscation of all his personal property, his wife's share might be spared. A woman's real property, such as land, fruit trees, vines, etc., that she brought to a marriage as a dowry or subsequently inherited, was treated separately from her husband's, so that for example if a couple died childless, the woman's land went back to her nearest blood relative, while the man's went back to his nearest blood relative. Likewise when her husband died, the widow had a life interest in a portion (a half or a third, depending on the district) of her husband's property, which then reverted to the heir when she died in her turn. In some respects, a widow was in a good position, for she was able to manage her own affairs; but when she had land that owed feudal service, she had to find someone to perform the military duties that she could not, and she had to be careful to manage her land wisely, or the heir could have her ousted in his favor.

In Old French customary law, then, while a few provisions concerning women were spelled out, their status and powers were subordinated to men's. Only a few laywomen, of the highest class, were able to play an independent role in society.

F. R. P. AKEHURST

References and Further Reading

- Akehurst, F. R. P., trans. The Coutumes de Beauvaisis of Philippe de Beaumanoir. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1992.
- Archives départementales de Lot-et-Garonne. "Livre des statuts et coutumes de la ville d'Agen/MS 42."

<http://www.cg47.fr/archives/coups-de-coeur/Tresors/tresors-archives.htm>.

Jacob, Robert. "Beaumanoir v. Révigny: The Two Faces of Customary Law in Philip the Bold's France." In Essays on the Poetic and Legal Writings of Philippe de Remy and His Son Philippe de Beaumanoir of Thirteenth-Century France, edited by Sarah-Grace Heller and Michelle Reichert. Lewiston: Edwin Mellen Press, 2001, pp. 221–276.

Strayer, Joseph R. "Law, French: In North"; and Reyerson, Kathryn L., and John Bell Henneman. "Law, French: In South." in Strayer, Joseph R., ed. Dictionary of the Middle Ages. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1983.

See also Dowry and Other Marriage Gifts; Family (Later Middle Ages); Inheritance; Law, Canon; Law, Roman; Noble Women; Sexuality; Regulation of; Widows

LAW, ENGLISH SECULAR COURTS OF

Medieval England knew various legal jurisdictions and courts. Church courts, which administered canon law, had jurisdiction over the validity of marriage and testaments of personal property; they co-existed with secular courts. The common law was not the only secular law, and the royal courts were not the only secular courts. There were also seigniorial courts, held by a lord for his vassals, and manorial courts, governed by manorial custom and held for free and unfree tenants of a manor. Boroughs and towns had variously named courts using local law based on custom and local statute.

Common Law

But the common law as administered in the royal courts effectively became the law of England. It evolved in the twelfth century, centered in the king's courts at Westminster, which came to be known as King's Bench and Common Pleas. More locally there were the shire (county) courts, presided over by the sheriff, and the still more local hundred courts (a hundred was an area within a shire). Additionally, the judges based at Westminster traveled through the shires on circuit between law terms, hearing both civil and criminal pleas at sessions, which came to be called the assizes. All these were royal courts, and all used common law.

A woman's ability to sue or be sued in a non-criminal matter in any of the common law courts depended on her status: free or unfree, single or married. An unfree (villein) woman, like an unfree man, was, with few exceptions, limited to the manorial court for all except criminal law.

Single Women

A free unmarried woman was able to hold both land and personal property and could bring an action in a common law court for injury to either, or for challenges to her possession or ownership. If she committed a trespass (a noncriminal wrong) she was liable, and, if she was injured in her person, she could sue for damages, again in a common law court. She could also sue or be sued in debt. In none of these cases was it necessary for a male to be named as coplaintiff or codefendant. A woman plaintiff or defendant could be present in court but was (like a man) commonly represented by an attorney—a person who "stood in her place" so that she was not in default and who handled procedural matters. Neither men nor women argued their own cases; in the thirteenth century pleaders, or litigators, were already employed. A single woman accused in a criminal matter was subject to the same procedure as a male defendant, with few exceptions.

Married Women

A married woman stood in an entirely different position. At common law, under the fiction of coverture she was feme covert, meaning that her legal existence was merged into her husband's. She did not hold personal property; any she had owned (including inheritance from a first husband) became her husband's upon their marriage. Real property (land and buildings) she had held fell under her husband's control, although he could not sell it or give it away without her consent, and it was returned to her at his death. Therefore, a suit concerning personal property that had been a woman's before her marriage was brought by or against the husband; it was not necessary to make the wife a party. A suit concerning her real property was brought by or against both husband and wife. A wife was required to come into court to be examined apart from her spouse concerning her consent to proposed alienation (sale, gift, or exchange) of her land, in order for the alienation to be effective—a procedure probably not entirely useful given that the woman had to live with her husband after her court appearance. However, in the thirteenth century the writ cui in vita was devised, providing an action by which a widow could seek to recover land, alleging that her late spouse had alienated it without her consent.

A married woman was not responsible for her debts; her husband was liable for not only those she incurred while married but for those incurred before the marriage. Therefore, a creditor's suit necessarily named him as defendant. She was responsible for her trespasses, but because she would have had no way of paying damages, a suit had to name her husband as a defendant with her. Both husband and wife had to sue for injury done to a wife and any damages belonged to the husband. At criminal law, despite the fiction of coverture, a married woman was not liable for her husband's acts. She was sometimes not liable for her own criminal act committed in her husband's company, because there was a presumption that it was done at his command.

Widows

A widow was considered an unmarried woman for most purposes and had in addition several actions unique to her, the cui in vita and the action of dower. At common law, by the decades following Magna Carta, a widow had the right to a life interest in one-third of the real property that a husband had held in fee during the marriage. There were specific writs for claiming dower and, in the thirteenth and earlier fourteenth centuries, dower suits were very common and quite successful. Actions later became less common because dower's effectiveness was compromised; there were various reasons, but an important one was that dower rights did not pertain to land held in trust for a husband (common law did not recognize trusts and regarded the trustee as beneficial owner) and therefore, a man was able to prevent dower rights from attaching to his land by deeding it to trustees before marriage.

Chancery Court

The most significant royal non-common-law court was Chancery, which arose as a court late in the Middle Ages. It was presided over by the chancellor, who was, until the sixteenth century, a cleric. It was said to be a court of conscience, to promote equity, and in its "English side" jurisdiction, so called because proceedings were in English rather than Latin, it received petitions in cases where common-law rules of substance or procedure would provide no remedy or would work an injustice. While it was of no help to widows in securing dower (because dower was a common-law action), by the fifteenth century the court of Chancery did enforce "uses," that is, the early form of trusts. In addition, its judges were sometimes willing to make exceptions to the common law fiction of coverture. This combination of factors eventually provided a means for protecting some of the property of married women. A father or other donor could put land or other assets in trust for the benefit of a woman married or to be married and Chancery would enforce the arrangement, thus restraining a husband's control. However, courts were suspicious of trusts of money to the wife's "separate use"—effectively giving her an income of her own—and were reluctant to enforce them as such until well after the medieval period ended.

Also in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, the court of Chancery seems to have been used by widows seeking goods or money left them by the provisions of a will, or relief from the claims of a late husband's heirs or executors. Women claimed, for example, that they had been deceived or coerced into signing away rights as executrix or forgoing suit for rights under a will, or that heirs had fraudulently seized assets.

In most areas of common law, however, the position of women did not change greatly between 1200 and the sixteenth century, and where it did—as, for example, with dower rights—it was generally not to their benefit.

JANET S. LOENGARD

References and Further Reading

- Baker, J. H. An Introduction to English Legal History. 4th ed. London: Butterworths, 2002.
- Hanawalt, Barbara A. "The Female Felon in Fourteenth Century England." In Women in Medieval Society, edited by Susan Mosher Stuard. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1976, pp. 125–140.
- Hawkes, Emma. "[S]he will protect and defend her rights boldly by law and reason . . .": Women's Knowledge of Common Law and Equity Courts in Late-Medieval England." In Medieval Women and the Law, edited by Noël James Menuge. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell Press, 2000, pp. 145–161.
- Kermode, Jenny, and Garthine Walker, eds. Women, Crime, and the Courts in Early Modern England. Chapel Hill and London: University of North Carolina Press, 1994.
- Loengard, Janet Senderowitz. "Legal History and the Medieval Englishwoman: Some New Directions." In Medieval Women and the Sources of Medieval History, edited by Joel T. Rosenthal. Athens, Ga.: University of Georgia Press, 1990, pp. 210–236.
- Palmer, Robert C. The Whilton Dispute 1264–1380: A Social Legal Study of Dispute Settlement in Medieval England. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1984.
- Pollock, Frederick, and Frederic William Maitland. The History of English Law before the Time of Edward I. 2nd ed. with introduction by S. F. C. Milsom. 2 vols. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1968.
- Spring, Eileen. Law, Land and Family: Aristocratic Inheritance in England 1300–1800. Chapel Hill and London: University of North Carolina Press, 1993.

See also England; Feme Covert; Feme Sole; Heiresses; Landholding and Property Rights; Law, Canon; Single-women; Widows; Wills

LAW, GERMAN

Germany followed its own oral laws that only gradually became influenced by Roman law, far later than in France. Our sole record of these legal customs and procedures is the vernacular Sachsenspiegel or Saxon Mirror written by Eike von Repgow (c. 1225–1235), an experienced lay judge (Schöffe). Containing both land law (pertaining to serfs, freemen, and nobles in rural areas) and feudal law (pertaining to the obligations between lords and vassals, especially military duty), the Mirror was intended to guide the next generation of lay judges in Saxony but had no authority. Nevertheless, it filled such a great need for consistency in rendering judgments that it was adopted as the authoritative reference in all German-speaking territories from the North Sea to the Italian Alps. Over three hundred extant manuscripts from the thirteenth to the sixteenth centuries record both the stability of the legal framework and the additions and changes in law over time. The following applies to the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries.

Several portions of the customary law refer to the specific situations and concerns of women, such as control and inheritance of property, pregnancy, and economic support during widowhood. The status to which a woman was born remained with her even if she married someone of higher or lower status. Women lacked full legal capacity; like priests, women were not members of the judiciary, the body of all adult freemen that provided consensus in order to validate a judgment without which there is no customary law. Consequently women could not speak for themselves, take a cleansing oath, or initiate a court suit. A guardian represented them in any legal action, but the Mirror specifically assigns them additional safeguards and rights. A woman had the right to bring a charge of rape, to own real property, and to claim her morning gift (received after the marriage was consummated) upon her own oath once she was widowed. No one could remove a widow from land legally designated for her lifelong use, and no one could evict a pregnant widow from any of her property. Upon divorce, the woman retained her morning gift. Her husband or other guardian controlled her property but was not allowed to transfer it to another without her permission. She also had the right to prosecute her guardian directly if he misused her assets or otherwise betrayed his obligations.

If she proved her case, the court would assume guardianship and grant her control of her real property. In feudal law a woman was eligible to receive and hold imperial property. This gave her knightly status, and payment of military dues freed her from active service.

Despite these safeguards and rights, women still remained vulnerable to rape and accusations of adultery. When a woman brought an accusation of rape, a law stated that the building in which it occurred must be razed and all living creatures present must be beheaded. If enforced, this law may well have deterred women from bringing charges. Punishments for crimes were the same for men and women, but pregnant women could not be sentenced to anything more severe than flogging. Women present at the birth of an heir could be witness in court when the child was born after the father's death. The inability to swear a cleansing oath, however, also meant that women were subject to the ordeal when accused of a crime. Several poets with a strong legal background repeatedly apply the fire ordeal to women accused of adultery (e.g., Gottfried von Strassburg, Ebernand von Erfurt). In terms of the criminal tariff or wergeld, the value of a woman was fifty percent of her husband's wergeld, and each unmarried woman was allotted half the compensation for men of her status.

A woman's dowry and personal belongings—including sheep, geese, textiles, furniture, and books—were valued and passed to the woman's closest female blood relative if she had no daughter. The concept here is that the extended family was as significant a legal bond as marriage. The division of certain goods as belonging to the male line and others to the female indicates a household division of labor: raw materials produced by the husband were made into usable goods such as food and clothing by the wife.

Rights before the law were established according to birth status (unfree, free, lower and upper nobility) and its corresponding obligations. To the extent that women and certain men did not fully contribute to the legal process, they also had a justifiably smaller share in its privileges according to the legal thinking of the time.

MARIA DOBOZY

References and Further Reading

- Doboz, Maria. "From Oral Custom to Written Law: 'The Sachsenspiegel.'" In Festschrift für Evelyn Firchow, edited by Anna Grotans. Göppingen: Göppinger Arbeiten zur Germanistik, 1998, pp. 31–40.
- Ebernand von Erfurt. Heinrich und Kunigunde, edited by Reinhold Bechstein. Amsterdam: Editions Rodopi, 1968.
- Gottfried von Strassburg. Tristan. translated by A. T. Hatto. New York: Penguin Books, 1960.

LAW, GERMAN

The Laws of the Salian Franks. translated by Katherine Fischer Drew. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1991.

Huebner, Rudolf. A History of Germanic Private Law. translated by Francis S. Philbrick. Continental Legal History Series, 4. New York: Augustus M. Kelley Publishers, 1968.

Kisch, Guido. Sachsenspiegel and Bible. South Bend, Ind.: University of Notre Dame Press, 1941.

The Saxon Mirror: A Sachsenspiegel of the Fourteenth Century. translated by Maria Dobozy. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999.

Ziegler, Vickie L. Trial by Fire and Battle in Medieval Literature. Studies in German Literature, Linguistics, and Culture. Woodbridge, N.Y.: Camden House, 2004.

See also Barbarian Law Codes; Book Ownership; Crime and Criminals; Division of Labor; Dowry and Other Marriage Gifts; Germanic Lands; Gottfried von Strassburg; Inheritance; Landholding and Property Rights; Law, Customary: French; Law, Jewish; Law, Roman; Legal Agency; Peasants; Pregnancy and Childbirth; Christian Women; Rape and Raptus; Wergild; Widows

LAW, ISLAMIC: IBERIA

Although in general the new legislation of the Koran notably improved the situation of women in pre-Islamic Arabia, and made all Muslims almost equal in religious matters, such standards did not extend to the field of civil law. The Maliki School, the legal school in the Iberian Peninsula during the Muslim period (711–1492), adhered to this general principle established in the sacred text: women could not be considered as equal to men. Consequently there were several procedural norms that clearly show women's inferiority regarding blood-money, evidence, and inheritance (in relation to which a woman counted as half a man). This inferiority was also marked in the limited legal capacity given to women. In some moments of their lives, they were considered as handicapped and, therefore, they needed the intervention of a legal guardian, the nearest relative on the father's side, to act legally. The first task of the guardian was to arrange a marriage for his charge and, without his intervention, the marriage was not considered valid. The father could marry off his virgin daughter without her consent, although jurists did not recommend doing so. Women only acquired their full legal capacity when their marriage was consummated. However, in legal practice jurists admitted that fathers could extend their guardianship up to six years after the marriage of daughters.

Marriage, extensively legislated in Islamic law, was not only a possibility of acquiring full legal capacity, but also the moment in which women gained access to property. On the one hand, they received a dowry from the groom, a legally obligatory payment for the validity of Islamic marriages. On the other hand, local customs made equally important the payment of a trousseau or a dowry that parents had to give to the bride, thus improving her economic situation with regard to her husband. These economic payments and obligations can be explained as the consequence of two legal characteristics that make the marriage link somewhat unstable when compared with medieval Europe. These two characteristics are polygamy and unilateral repudiation by the husband.

According to Islamic law, a man could marry four women simultaneously. This was also allowed in al-Andalus, where evidence shows that polygamy was a common phenomenon. However, Islamic legislation obliged husbands to treat all their wives equally; and this was not considered possible for most families. Also, brides in al-Andalus, with the assistance of notaries, usually included in the marriage contracts a condition against the husband stipulating that she would divorce him if he took a second wife. Polygamy consequently was only affordable among the wealthy and provided that their wives agree with it.

Islamic law also gave the husband the possibility of repudiating his wife without legal reasons. This unilateral repudiation, undoubtedly frequent in Andalusian society, also obligated the husbands to respond to the needs of the repudiated women, providing them with maintenance and economic support while breastfeeding and the custody of offspring. Women had the right to ask for divorce only in certain cases, such as mistreatment, abandonment, or when the husband did not fulfill the conditions written in the marriage contract.

In Islamic law there is no community of goods between spouses, so that at least in theory, women could possess and administer their properties independently from their husbands. The only limit imposed by the law was related to charitable gifts and non-profitable transactions when they exceeded a third of her properties. For doing this kind of transaction women needed their husbands' permission. Nevertheless, in general, women acquired more freedom in terms of property rights after marriage, since they no longer were subject to their fathers' control. While the principles of Islamic law assert the inferiority of women, they also fully acknowledge that Muslim women are entitled to own and exercise control over property without interference from males. The implementation of women's property rights was made effective by mechanisms embedded in the Islamic legal system and also by the jurists in daily administration of justice. However, the sources also give us examples of attempts by family members to limit women's control of their own properties; and, therefore, women frequently had to pursue their rights and interests in court.

Scholars studying Islamic law as it applied to women understand that, together with the legal norms derived from the sacred texts, there was also a set of social and cultural norms and values, influenced by the patriarchal model, which shaped the general situation of women in Iberia during the Muslim period.

AMALIA ZOMEÑO

References and Further Reading

- Deguilhem, Randi, and Manuela Marín, eds. Writing the Feminine: Women in Arab Sources. London and New York: I. B. Tauris, 2002.
- López Ortiz, José. Derecho musulmán. Barcelona: Editorial Labor, 1932.
- Marín, Manuela. Mujeres en al-Andalus. Madrid: Consejo Superior de Investigaciones Científicas, 2000.
- Schacht, Joseph. An Introduction to Islamic Law. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1964.
- Shatzmiller, Maya. "Women and Property Rights in al-Andalus and the Maghrib: Social Patterns and Legal Discourse." Islamic Law and Society 2 (1995): 219–257.
- Zomeño, Amalia. Dote y matrimonio en al-Andalus y el norte de África. Estudio de la jurisprudencia islámica medieval. Madrid: Consejo Superior de Investigaciones Científicas, 2000.

See also Divorce and Separation; Dowry and Other Marriage Gifts; Iberia; Law; Legal Agency; Marriage, Islamic; Iberia; Muslim Women: Iberia

LAW, JEWISH

In medieval times significant populations of Jews lived in Muslim Iraq, Egypt, North Africa, the Middle East, and Spain; smaller enclaves lived in Christian Europe. Jewish communities everywhere exercised autonomy over their internal affairs. Jewish self-government followed the dictates of the Babylonian Talmud, which provided uniform patterns for Jewish family law in the division entitled Women (Nashim). The seven tractates of Nashim deal with issues connected with age of marriage, betrothal, marriage contracts and their financial details, marital obligations, a husband's right to benefit from his wife's property, the mechanics of marriage, levirate marriage, divorce, the rights of widows, and treatment of rebellious wives and women accused of adultery, among many other legal minutiae of human relationships. Additionally, legal issues connected with when women are and are not in states of ritual purity that permit physical contact with their husbands are discussed in tractate Niddah in the division

Tohoroth (Purities). Local environments also influenced legal and social norms, as Jews tended to assume the language, dress, and some mores of non-Jews, including some attitudes towards marriage and sexuality and appropriate gender roles.

Rabbinic Texts

The foundation texts of Jewish law were composed by authoritative scholars known as Rabbis (teachers) between the first and sixth centuries, based on exegetical expansions of biblical legislation and contemporary practices. Some of these legal traditions were composed in the land of Israel and incorporate Greco-Roman and Christian cultural influences. Others were shaped in Sasanian Iran and Iraq. This complex, multistranded body of Oral Torah (revelation, law) received sanctity in Judaism through the rabbinic insistence that it was part of the biblical revelation at Mt. Sinai and constituted the essential accompaniment to the Written Torah, the Hebrew Scriptures (Old Testament). The Rabbis were men and the ideal human society they imagined was androcentric. Almost no female voices are heard in rabbinic literature and women played no active part in the development of Jewish law. The earliest written document of rabbinic Judaism is the Mishnah, a Hebrew compilation of legal rulings organized into six subject matter divisions and sixty-three distinct tractates, edited in the land of Israel in the early third century CE. The Tosefta, a supplemental collection of legal rulings, follows the order of the Mishnah. In the centuries following the completion of these two works, rabbinic authorities in the land of Israel and in Sasanian Iraq, known to Jews as Babylon, produced extensive commentaries on the Mishnah known as Gemara, primarily written in Aramaic. The Gemara produced in the rabbinic academies of Babylon was far more voluminous than that produced in the land of Israel. Sometime in the sixth century CE, the Mishnah and this more extensive Gemara were combined and redacted to form the Babylonian Talmud, constituting the definitive compilation of Jewish law and tradition for the next millennium. The less comprehensive Talmud of the Land of Israel, completed at the end of the fourth century, also became part of rabbinic literature. Parallel to the Mishnah, Tosefta, and Talmuds are Midrash collections, exegetical compilations organized either as consecutive glosses on a biblical book or homilies on cycles of scriptural readings. The content of rabbinic literature falls into two categories: Halakhah (authoritative legal directives) and Aggadah (nonlegal, narrative traditions); both are found in the Talmuds. Although the halakhic mandates of the Babylonian Talmud reveal little about actual Jewish life in rabbinic times, they became normative for virtually all medieval Jewish communities.

Responsa* and Halakah Reflecting Cultural Changes

Between the mid-sixth and eleventh centuries, legal authority rested with the Geonim ([singular Gaon] Excellency), rabbinic leaders who headed the talmudic academies of Sura and Pumbedita, located in the area of Baghdad. Significant influence from Islamic law and cultural norms characterizes the Halakhah of this era, a time of rapid transition from an agrarian way of life to an urban commerce-oriented society. The Geonim adjusted Halakhah to changing societal realities through Takkanot ([sing. Takkanah] unilateral legal enactments) responding to specific circumstances, and Minhag (custom), institutionalization of prevalent practices that had no scriptural basis. The Geonim created Responsa literature to address distant constituencies; these Sh'ailot (questions) from all over the Jewish world and Geonic T'shuvot (responses) on virtually every aspect of life and scholarship circulated widely in small booklets and had the status of Halakhah. The dissemination and preservation of Geonic Responsa (five to ten thousand still survive), usually written in Aramaic but sometimes in Arabic, maintained the authority of the Geonim, established precedents for similar halakhic quandaries, and provide vivid glimpses of everyday Jewish life. One such seventh century example from Rav Sherira Gaon ruled that if a woman claimed in court that she could not bear to live with her husband, her husband could be coerced to grant her an immediate divorce, on the condition that she relinquish most of her financial privileges. One of the motives behind this ruling was to prevent Jewish women from bringing their marital disputes to Muslim courts. This question and answer mode of halakhic decision making remained popular throughout the Middle Ages and endures up to the present day.

By the eleventh century, the authority of the Geonim waned as local centers of Jewish learning were established elsewhere, both in the Muslim world (North Africa, Egypt, Spain) and in Italy, France, and Germany. This regionalization of Jewish governance led to increasing geographical discrepancies in legal practice and the emergence of distinctive Jewish communities, including the Sephardim (Jews of Iberian origin in Muslim lands) and Ashkenazim (Jews in European Christian realms). While Responsa literature remained significant, halakhic codes, a genre of legal digests originating in Geonic times, were an important contribution of Sephardic Jews in Muslim lands. These compilations of definitive Halakhah, organized in subject matter categories, combined rabbinic directives with legislative developments, Responsa, and customs post-dating the Babylonian Talmud. The most influential, comprehensive, and original medieval code is the Mishneh Torah of the Spanish-born Moses Maimonides (d. 1204), completed in Egypt c. 1178. The fourth section of this fourteen section work is entitled "The Book of Women" and deals with family law. At the end of the Middle Ages, the Shulhan Arukh (Set Table) of the Sephardic scholar, Joseph Caro (d. 1575 in Safed, Israel), became universally accepted as the authoritative code of Jewish law. One of its four sections, Even ha-Ezer, is devoted to the laws of marriage, divorce, and related topics. From the 1570s the Shulhan Arukh has been printed with a super-commentary by the Ashkenazic legal authority, Moses Isserles (d. 1572), called the Mappah (Tablecloth). Isserles' commentary reflected legal practice, including many details of family law, as it had developed in Germany and Poland and its presence made the Shulhan Arukh acceptable to the Ashkenazim, while the text of Caro was equally acceptable to the Sephardim.

Women's Status

Although medieval Ashkenazic Jewry also produced law codes, Takkanot and Responsa literature were more central in the evolving legal life of the community. The eleventh century Takkanah forbidding polygyny for Jews in Christian countries is attributed to Rabbi Gershom ben Judah of Mainz (c. 960–1028), who is also credited with the significant pronouncement that no woman could be divorced against her will. These rulings improving women's legal position, together with women's substantial dowries, are indications of Jewish women's high status and economic entrepreneurship in European communities. Important authors of Responsa include R. Jacob b. Meir in France, known as Rabbenu Tam (d. 1171), and R. Meir of Rothenburg (d. 1293). Also central were the biblical and talmudic commentaries of Rabbi Shlomo ben Isaac of Troyes (d. 1104), known as Rashi. His successors, the Tosafist scholars (twelfth and thirteenth century France), added novellae to Rashi's Talmud commentary, harmonizing apparent legal contradictions and inconsistencies. Their Tosafot (additions) appear in printed editions of the Babylonian Talmud, alongside Rashi's commentary. Throughout medieval times and beyond, there are no female contributions to Jewish law, beyond testimony about practices of esteemed male relatives in domestic matters.

JUDITH R. BASKIN

References and Further Reading

- Agus, Irving. Urban Civilization in Pre-Crusade Europe. 2 vols. New York: Yeshiva University Press, 1965.
- . The Heroic Age of Franco-German Jewry. New York: Yeshiva University Press, 1969.
- . Rabbi Meir of Rothenburg, 2nd edition. New York: KTAV Publishing House, 1970.
- Baskin, Judith R. "Jewish Women in the Middle Ages." In Jewish Women in Historical Perspective, edited by Judith R. Baskin. 2nd edition. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1998, pp. 101–127.
- Biale, Rachel. Women and Jewish Law. New York: Schocken Books, 1984.
- Brody, Robert. The Geonim of Babylonia and the Shaping of Medieval Jewish Culture. New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 1998.
- Goitein, S. D. A Mediterranean Society: The Jewish Communities of the Arab World as Portrayed in the Documents of the Cairo Genizah. 6 vols. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1967–1988.
- Grossman, Avraham. Pious and Rebellious: Jewish Women in Medieval Europe. Waltham, Mass.: Brandeis University Press, 2004.
- Hecht, N. S., B. S. Jackson, S. M. Passamaneck, et al., eds. An Introduction to the History and Sources of Jewish Law. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1996.

See also Jewish Women; Marriage, Jewish; Mikveh; Pregnancy and Childbirth, Jewish

LAW, ROMAN

See Roman Law

LAY PIETY

The phrase lay piety denotes the religious sensibilities of the vast majority of medieval Christian people: everyone who was not a member of a religious order of monks or nuns, or a cleric. The term laity is indeed so broad as to signify only in relation to its antonym, for it was the professionalization of religious orders from the eleventh century that brought the laity into being. By mandating clerical celibacy, advocating ordination of monks (once considered laymen), and, increasingly, hindering lay spiritual movements from incorporating as religious orders (especially after the Fourth Lateran Council of 1215), the church constructed a dichotomy between an elite who ministered by prayer, preaching, and the sacraments, and the recipients of their ministry, whose proper response was of "piety": an attitude of devotion and unquestioning faith in the Trinity, the Fall, the Incarnation, the Judgment, and other orthodox beliefs. Such piety might be patronized as ignorant and carnal by an exclusively masculine clergy or it might be idealized as superior to their own, more abstract religiosity. Either attitude reinforced an association between the laity and the feminine and a view of the laity as dependents, perpetual children nourished by the spiritual milk of simple faith, not the meat of formal theology.

Clerical feminization and infantilization of the laity is easy to criticize, but it did take into account something laypeople had in common: busy lives, in which the place of piety was limited to brief weekly or seasonal rituals and to times of transition: birth, marriage, illness, war, death. Especially at the end of the period, from when most records derive, there is considerable evidence that lay women and men were satisfied with a limited view of their spiritual potential, embracing a model in which church attendance, fulfillment of sacramental obligations, prayers to Christ, the Virgin, and the saints, and avoidance of damnable sins was all that was required for respectability in this world and salvation in the next. Membership of this body of mediocriter boni ("moderately good," rather than "perfect") Christians did not, after all, entail ecclesiastical neglect. On the contrary, from the invention of "crusade" as an innovative theological justification for knightly violence in the eleventh century (later taken up by Joan of Arc) to the formalizing of confession and the doctrine of purgatory in the thirteenth, official theology constantly modified itself in the interests of lay piety. Even late practices such as the sale of indulgences or the establishment of chantry chapels, where paid priests prayed for the wealthy dead, built on these modifications. Perhaps most successful of all was the reimagining of the church as the body of Christ after establishment of the feast of Corpus Christi around 1300. A celebration at once of local lay community—towns throughout Europe used the feast for mystery plays and other civic celebrations—and of lay membership of the "universal" community of the church by participation in the Mass, Corpus Christi sacralized lay "carnality" by associating it with the flesh in which Christ himself was incarnate.

Considered as social praxis, lay piety was firmly gendered: men and women sat on different sides of the parish church, facing images of saints of their own sex and bearing the brunt of different didactic topoi: sermons typecast lay men as fraudulent, violent, and unfaithful, women as vain, greedy, and talkative. Lay piety was also patriarchal, although not straightforwardly so. It is true that men had the responsibility to teach and discipline wives, while wives might counsel husbands but could only teach and discipline children. But the submission to earthly, as well as divine, authority implied by the term piety (originally a Roman civic virtue) was enjoined on all. Although the protagonist of the tale of patient Griselda—a type of lay piety—is a woman, the tale’s popularity may have been due less to male pleasure at her virtue or specifically female identification with her suffering than the fact that she represents men as well as women, all equally obligated to obey their superiors as an essential component of their obedience to God.

Not all laypeople accepted their subordinate status. The twelfth-century reform movement left an interstitial category of “semi-religious” anchoresses, Beguines, hospitallers, and others who followed informal rules but were treated as laypeople. Excluded from full membership of a religious order and from the resources associated with membership, these disproportionately female groups influenced the personal piety of the laity (Books of Hours were modeled on semi-religious devotional practice) and kept alive ideals of spiritual ambition and autonomy compatible with life in the world. Lay women such as Angela of Foligno, Margery Kempe, and Marie of Oignies, who defied standard notions of obedience and subjected themselves only to a confessor and to God, found more pertinent models among semi-religious than among nuns. Lay reform movements, from the Waldensians of France and Germany to the Lollards of England, the Hussites of Bohemia, and the Modern Devotion of the Low Countries, were typically organized by men (the Italian Gugliemites are an exception). But these movements, too, found themselves adapting vernacular materials first written for semi-religious women and asserting a similar independence from formal ecclesiastical structures and a similar belief in the primacy of the inner self over the obligations of outward obedience.

Perhaps this is another reason why lay piety was often perceived as female. Jean Gerson’s fifteenth-century promotion of a masculinity movement around the cult of St. Joseph acknowledges this fact even as it attempts to respond to the increasing influence of male lay elites in church affairs. But in so far as piety was private, it remained largely tied to domestic spaces in which women wielded power. Until the North European Reformation (and beyond it in the Catholic south), the central symbol of lay piety was Joseph’s wife, the Virgin Mary, caught at her prayers by the angel Gabriel: at once an obedient bourgeois woman and a saint daring enough to become the mother of God, her body and soul the highest thing in creation.

NICHOLAS WATSON

References and Further Reading

- Bynum, Caroline Walker. Holy Feast and Holy Fast: The Religious Significance of Food to Medieval Women. Studies in Cultural Poetics. Berkeley, Calif.: University of California Press, 1987.
- Duffy, Eamon. The Stripping of the Altars: Traditional Religion in England, 1400–1580. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1992.
- Grundmann, Herbert. Religious Movements in the Middle Ages: The Historical Links between Heresy, the Mendicant Orders, and the Women’s Religious Movement in the Twelfth and Thirteenth Century. translated by Steven Rowan. South Bend, Ind.: University of Notre Dame Press, 1996 [orig. pub. in German, 1961].
- Mulder-Bakker, Anneke B. Lives of the Anchoresses: The Rise of the Urban Recluse in Medieval Europe. translated by Myra Keerspink Scholz. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2005.
- Rubin, Miri. Corpus Christi: The Eucharist in Late Medieval Culture. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991.
- Swanson, R. N. Religion and Devotion in Europe, c. 1215–c. 1515. Cambridge Medieval Textbooks. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995.
- Vauchez, André. The Laity in the Middle Ages: Religious Beliefs and Devotional Practices. translated by Margery J. Schneider. South Bend, Ind.: University of Notre Dame Press, 1993.

See also Anchoresses; Angela of Foligno; Beguines; Books of Hours; Confraternities; Crusades and Crusading Literature; Devotional Practices; Devotional Literature; Exemplum; Family (Later Middle Ages); Gerson, Jean; Griselda; Joan of Arc; Kempe, Margery; Laywomen, Religious; Lollards; Marie of Oignies; Mary, Virgin; Modern Devotion; Mothers as Teachers; Parishes; Rosary; Sermons and Preaching; Spiritual Care; Spirituality, Christian; Tertiaries; Waldensians

LAYWOMEN, RELIGIOUS

Religious laywomen made significant contributions to the medieval church through a piety that was not only exercised in service to their communities, but was also expressed in a distinctly mystical focus on sacraments of penance and the Eucharist. These women, who from the late twelfth century were found in urban centers throughout Europe, actively participated in a wider religious revival that also involved itinerant preachers, reforming bishops and, from the beginning of the thirteenth century, the mendicant friars. Some of these women formed distinct associations with ties to religious orders or diocesan institutions, but for many the choice was spontaneous and private. While it is an acceptable academic practice to draw distinction between the Beguines of central and northern Europe, vowesses of England, penitents of Italy, and beatae of Spain, such regional differences were not clearly cut for contemporaries: the previous terms, as well as such generic expressions as religious women (mulieres religiosae) and holy women (mulieres sanctae), were interchangeably used of religious laywomen throughout Europe. The term tertiary, which in the modern era has come to denote the lay members of Franciscan, Dominican, and other Mendicant orders, came into use only late in the Middle Ages.

An independent life of piety offered a viable alternative to women who sought the social stability associated with religious life and opportunities for spiritual guidance, but who did not want to enter a monastery or who did not have the financial means to do so. While the Beguine life attracted some men, spoken of as beghards, and the Franciscan order absorbed laymen known for their active piety, the semi-institutional life of devotion never became a significant option among men who had more religious and secular choices from which to choose than women did. Among the mulieres sanctae were servants and practitioners of lesser trades, who traditionally had been pulled into religious life as monastic lay workers (conversae), but most of these women came from the lesser urban nobility and from merchant or artisan families. Religious life in the world was particularly appealing to widows, but it also attracted unmarried women and even some wives, such as Margery Kempe (d. c. 1440), whose vibrant autobiography enumerated the struggles of a wife turned into a pilgrim.

Many of these women lived with their relatives, some withdrew into urban anchorages (many of which were loosely associated with local churches), and others teamed up to form domestic partnerships or found uncloistered communities. Following Pope Boniface VIII's publication of the constitution Pericoloso in 1298, the church made several efforts to enclose the houses of religious laity, but open communal life persisted and was particularly important among the Beguines. The success of women's lay associations depended on their ability to attract privileges from the leaders of the church, especially after the Councils of Lyon (1274) and Vienne (1311–1312) attacked the independent religious life and accused many groups of the alleged heresy of the Free Spirit.

The Italian penitent women, or pinzochere, formed an exceptional group among the religious laity for their relatively peaceful blending into the landscape of the surrounding society. Unlike their northern counterparts, the Beguines, these women did not compete with men through their cloth production, teaching, or other semi-professional pursuits, nor did they form semi-autonomous religious centers, known as beguinages. They typically operated within family-based economies and lived at their homes or in loosely organized open communities. They also effectively contributed to the civic piety of the Italian communes, for the cults of famed penitent mystics were appropriated to advance the pursuits of Ghibellines, Guelfs, and other competing political groups. These civic and social factors created favorable circumstances for the penitents' cooperation with the mendicant friars, eventually leading to papal confirmation of the Franciscan penitent or tertiary rule in 1289 and that of the Dominican laity in 1405. Nevertheless, even in Italy the position of the religious laity was far from settled, and they were ridiculed by the poet Francesco da Barberino and other critics, who saw penitent attire merely as a convenient cover for otherwise ordinary, perhaps even licentious, lives. The ambiguity of this way of life was reflected in the fact that of the many famed Italian penitent mystics only Dominican tertiary Catherine of Siena (d. 1380) was canonized during the Middle Ages (1461).

Despite the ambiguous institutional status of the religious laywomen, they nonetheless refashioned Western spirituality through their experiential mysticism. Catherine of Siena, Beguine Mechthild of Magdeburg (d. c. 1282), anchoress Julian of Norwich (d. after 1413), and Franciscan Angela of Foligno (d. 1309), each produced vernacular theology that was anchored in Christ's humanity, but placed within the matrix of the salvation history. The intense penitential piety of religious laywomen was detailed in a uniquely rich body of hagiographic accounts. Despite their notably ecstatic slant, these women also excelled in practical, charitable, and even organizational endeavors. Their beneficiaries were typically other local women, but the Franciscan penitents Elisabeth of Hungary (d. 1231) and Margaret of Cortona (d. 1297), among others, founded charitable institutions of considerable stature. Catherine of Siena emerged from the margins of the Dominican order to become the beacon of the reform not only among the laity and the nuns, but among the friars as well. Birgitta of Sweden (d. 1373), a visionary and a widowed mother of eight, created her Order of the Holy Savior without ever taking a religious habit herself. Thus, the independent lay life, which in itself was amorphous, not only generated religious institutions, but also fueled the very orthodoxy that it was accused of eroding.

MAIJU LEHMIJOKI-GARDNER

References and Further Reading

- Angela of Foligno. Complete Works. Translated with an introduction by Paul Lachance. New York: Paulist Press, 1993.
- Bolton, Brenda. "Mulieres Sanctae." In Sanctity and Secularity: The Church and the World, edited by Derek Baker. Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1973, pp. 77–95.

- The Book of Margery Kempe*. translated by B. A. Windeatt. London: Penguin Books, 1985.
- Catherine of Siena. The Dialogue. Translation and introduction by Suzanne Noffke. New York: Paulist Press, 1980.
- Dominican Penitent Women*. Edited, translated, and introduced by Maiju Lehmijoki-Gardner with contributions by Daniel E. Bornstein and E. Ann Matter. New York: Paulist Press, 2005.
- Julian of Norwich. Showings. Translated from the critical text, with an introduction by Edmund Colledge and James Walsh. New York: Paulist Press, 1978.
- Lehmijoki-Gardner, Maiju. "Writing Religious Rules as an Interactive Process: Dominican Penitent Women and the Making of Their Regula." Speculum 79 (2004): 660–687.
- Makowski, Elizabeth. A Pernicious Sort of Woman: Quasi-Religious Women and Canon Lawyers in the Later Middle Ages. Washington, D.C.: The Catholic University of America Press, 2005.
- McDonnell, Ernst. Beguines and Beghards in Medieval Culture, with Special Emphasis on the Belgian Scene. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1954.
- Mechthild of Magdeburg. The Flowing Light of the Godhead. translated and introduced by Frank Tobin. New York: Paulist Press, 1998.
- Mulder-Bakker, Anneke B. Lives of the Anchoresses: The Rise of the Urban Recluse in Medieval Europe. translated by Myra Meerspink Scholz. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2005.
- Simons, Walter. Cities of Ladies: Beguine Communities in the Medieval Low Countries, 1200–1565. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001.
- Thompson, Augustine. Cities of God: The Religion of the Italian Communes 1125–1325. University Park, Pa.: The Pennsylvania State University, 2005.
- Vauchez, Andre. "Lay People's Sanctity in Western Europe: Evolution of a Pattern (Twelfth and Thirteenth Centuries)." In Images of Sainthood in Medieval Europe, edited by Renate Blumenfeld-Kosinski and Timea Szell. Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1991, pp. 21–32.
- . The Laity in the Middle Ages: Religious Beliefs and Devotional Practices. edited and introduced by Daniel Bornstein. translated by Margery Schneider. South Bend, Ind.: University of Notre Dame Press, 1993.
- Women and Religion in Medieval and Renaissance Italy*. edited by Daniel Bornstein and Roberto Rusconi. translated by Margery J. Schneider. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press, 1996.

See also Angela of Foligno; Beguines; Birgitta of Sweden; Catherine of Siena; Church; Conversae and Conversi; Elisabeth of Hungary; Hagiography; Julian of Norwich; Kempe, Margery; Lay Piety; Margaret of Cortona; Mechthild of Magdeburg; Monastic Enclosure; Spirituality, Christian; Tertiaries; Vowesses

LEGAL AGENCY

In the Western tradition, social and legal agency has been cast in terms of the person as author or owner of his or her actions. To take away or control those actions is to dominate or diminish agency. Widespread ideological depictions of women as intellectually weak or morally dangerous, along with evidence of women's lives marked by seclusion from public and commercial arenas, therefore, contributed to a bleak view of women's agency in the Middle Ages and elsewhere. Recent studies, however, have exposed a range of nuances, as they have revealed ways in which women manipulated or subverted rules and situations to mitigate subordination to men, the patriarchal household, and the patrilineage. Agency is not the same as autonomy, nor were women's interests always or even frequently different from those of men, who were their husbands, fathers, brothers, and sons. Women had rights and prerogatives in law, and in the life of virtually every woman who reached adulthood and had some property, certain occasions could bring these legal rights into play.

Classical Roman law restricted women with male guardianship (tutela mulierum) in order to protect men and agnatic (from the male side) transmission of property, not to protect women, who were seen not as inept and defenseless but rather as cunning, greedy, and self-interested. Women were able to obligate themselves before the law, but they could not stand surety for others. In later imperial Roman law guardianship over women came to be seen as a form of protection for them against an inherent weakness (imbecillitas) of their sex. By the time of Justinian, paradoxically, most legal disabilities on women had been removed, with the exception of the prohibition of standing surety and their exclusion from public and legal offices, including acting as witnesses. At the same time, Germanic peoples entering the empire brought with them forms of the mundium, an alienable power of control over women and minors, usually exercised by fathers and husbands. In time this form of protective control became equated with guardianship of minors in Roman law, especially as Roman law texts became prominent from the twelfth century onward.

There is a vital distinction between ownership of property and capacity to use or dispose of it. European legal systems conceded ownership to women, if only because they were left as heirs in the absence of men at times; but they were far more reluctant to grant them legal capacities over property. Any such capacities were situationally defined, varying by a woman's age and marital status. A widow with children necessarily needed sufficient legal capacity to manage property for the benefit of her household. Here is where, for example, women otherwise often kept from guild membership were accorded rights to carry on their deceased husbands' crafts, at least temporarily.

In northern Europe, where Germanic law set the rules with little influence of Roman law (except in the canon law, which defined mothers' capacities as guardians of their children), women's legal capacities were shaped to the conjugal domestic unit. In England, the common law produced the doctrine of coverture, by which marriage took the two persons of man and wife and turned them into one person, and that was the husband. Wives and their property disappeared in law as long as the marriage lasted. The legal effacement of wives, however, did not change the fact that in reality their husbands relied on them to manage households and contribute labor, as well as children, to the domestic enterprise. Women held valuable household roles throughout Europe, but it was largely in northern Europe that they held rights to manage household assets without reference to kin or under any form of guardianship after their husbands' deaths.

Where Roman law, with few disabilities on women's legal capacities, was fundamental, as in Italy, it was necessary for cities and principalities to enact laws regulating women's legal acts. Some placed them under the control of the husband; others demanded consent of kin. Florence peculiarly adapted the Lombard mundualdus (holder of the mundium) into a universal male guardianship of all women, but at the same time there were no liabilities or restrictions falling on the male guardian, so women could act, at least in the absence of fathers or husbands, or with their mundualdus's connivance.

If rules of legal agency restricted women, they also thereby restricted the men who were related to and interacted with them. Equally true was the fact that jurists and judges took seriously the protective function of the law with respect to women. Their actions might be voided and their property retrieved, even at the expense of men who otherwise asserted rights in regard to that property.

THOMAS KUEHN

References and Further Reading

- Brown, Judith C., and Robert C. Davis, eds. Gender and Society in Renaissance Italy. London and New York: Longman, 1998.
- Casagrande, Carla. "The Protected Woman." In A History of Women in the West, edited by Georges Duby and Michelle Perrot. Vol. 2: Silences of the Middle Ages, edited by Christiane Klapisch-Zuber. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1992, pp. 70–104.
- Chabot, Isabelle. "Lineage Strategies and the Control of Widows in Renaissance Florence." In Widowhood in Medieval and Early Modern Europe, edited by Sandra Cavallo and Lyndan Warner. London and New York: Longman, 1999, pp.127–144.

Cohn, Samuel K., Jr. Women in the Streets: Essays on Sex and Power in Renaissance Italy. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1996.

Kirshner, Julius. "Wives' Claims against Insolvent Husbands in Late Medieval Italy." In Women of the Medieval World, edited by Julius Kirshner and Suzanne F. Wempel. Oxford: Blackwell, 1985, pp. 256–303.

Kuehn, Thomas. Law, Family, and Women: Toward a Legal Anthropology of Renaissance Italy. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1991.

———. "Understanding Gender Inequality in Renaissance Florence: Personhood and Gifts of Maternal Inheritance by Women." Journal of Women's History 8 (1996): 58–80.

Schutte, Anne Jacobson, Thomas Kuehn, and Silvana Seidel Menchi, eds. Time, Space, and Women's Lives in Early Modern Europe. Kirksville, Mo.: Truman State University Press, 2001.

See also Feme Coverte; Feme Sole; Gender Ideologies; Household Management; Law, Canon; Law, Customary; French; Law, English Secular Courts of; Law, German; Law, Roman; Patriarchy and Patrilineage; Widows; Widows as Guardians

LEOBA

What we know of Leoba (Lioba, Leofgyth) (d. 779) is contained in the 836 Life written by Rudolf of Fulda and in correspondence with Saint Boniface, her kinsman and friend. She was born to a noble English couple, Aebba and Dynno, and dedicated to the church after her mother had a prophetic dream. She was named Thrutgeba but called Leoba, meaning beloved.

At the double monastery at Wimbourne, Leoba studied ecclesiastical writings and became widely known for her learning and holiness. She had a dream one night of a long purple thread that she pulled from her mouth and wound into a ball. This was interpreted to mean that Leoba would instruct many people in distant lands. In fulfillment of the dream, Rudolf writes, her kinsman Boniface summoned her, along with Thecla and Walburga, to join his missionary efforts in Germany. He made Leoba abbess of the Benedictine monastery Tauberbischofsheim, and Rudolf indicates that she had authority over all nunneries in Germany.

Leoba instructed many future abbesses at Tauberbischofsheim. She drew others to the church by word of her miracles of healing and protection. She also enjoyed privileges unavailable to other religious women—traveling widely and even counseling bishops in spiritual matters. Among the laity she was respected by Carolingian kings and had a close friendship with Charlemagne's queen, Hildegard.

Boniface held her in high regard and asked that they be buried in the same tomb. Although this wish was not carried out, Rudolf concludes the Life with a final miracle attributed to both of them—thus joining them in death spiritually, if not physically, to continue their missionary work.

HEATHER E. WARD

References and Further Reading

- Boniface, Saint. The Letters of Saint Boniface. Translated by Ephraim Emerton. New York: Columbia University Press, 1940.
- Hen, Yitzhak. "Milites Christi Utriusque Sexus: Gender and the Politics of Conversion in the Circle of Boniface." Revue Bénédictine 109.1–2 (1999): 17–31.
- Hollis, Stephanie. "Rudolph of Fulda's Life of Leoba: an Elegy for the Double Monastery." In Anglo-Saxon Women and the Church: Sharing a Common Fate. Rochester, N.Y.: Boydell, 1992, pp. 271–300.
- Rudolf of Fulda. "The Life of Saint Leoba." Translated by C. H. Talbot. In Soldiers of Christ: Saints and Saints' Lives from Late Antiquity and the Early Middle Ages, edited by Thomas F. X. Noble and Thomas Head. University Park, Pa.: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1995, pp. 255–277.
- Wybourne, Catherine. "Leoba: A Study in Humanity and Holiness." In Medieval Women Monastics: Wisdom's Wellsprings, edited by Miriam Schmitt and Linda Kulzer. Collegeville, Minn.: Liturgical, pp. 80–96.

See also Abbesses; Double Monasteries; Education, Monastic; Germanic Lands; Monasticism and Nuns

LEPERS

Often confused with other skin ailments, leprosy (Mycobacterium leprae) occurred throughout medieval Europe, Byzantium, and the Islamic world. In western Christendom, suspected lepers were typically examined by a priest, physician, or leper. If confirmed leprosy, they were often segregated from the community, sometimes by admission into a leper house (leprosarium). By the time of the Third Lateran Council (1179), these institutions had grown widely in number and geographic distribution. Founded and endowed in a manner similar to hospitals or religious houses, each was entitled to its own churchyard, chapel, and ministers. Due to the physical disfigurement associated with leprosy, which was believed to be hereditary, highly contagious, chronic, and incurable, many leper houses were situated outside urban settlements, where land was also inexpensive. However, often even "institutionalized" lepers were granted the right to beg in populated areas for alms, although in many locales lepers were assigned distinctive garb, clappers, bells, or other restrictions designed to prevent them from infecting others. By the late fourteenth century, many leper houses were converted to other uses, perhaps due to the impact of the Plague.

Some historians have claimed that the movement to isolate lepers was symptomatic of the formation of a "persecuting society" in Europe, that lepers were identified with heretics, Jews, prostitutes, and other deviants as potentially morally contaminating groups to be contained by distinctive dress and physical and legal segregation. Certainly leprosy was commonly associated with lust, unregulated sexual activity, and moral turpitude. Considered as living dead, lepers were often subject to legal disabilities, including the confiscation of their possessions. However, although leprosy was occasionally treated as grounds for divorce, various canon lawyers claimed that the mutual sexual obligation of spouses persisted even if one contracted leprosy. Liturgical services performed for some diagnosed as leprosy preparatory to entry into a leper house or a life of itinerant begging possessed a similar ambivalence towards the afflicted, graphically symbolizing their enforced renunciation of the world and preparation for death through rituals resembling funeral services. Yet depending on the period and whether leper houses were founded by civil, municipal, royal, or religious authorities, these institutions could provide not only sustenance and/or spiritual care, but also medical treatment including baths, special diets, blood-letting, and various medications, plasters, and ointments.

Lepers were often encouraged to transform the involuntary physical suffering and isolation associated with their disease into a special opportunity for purgation from sin, similar to the voluntary deprivations undertaken by regular religious or the tribulations of Job or their patron saint Lazarus (identified both with the divinely rewarded poor man of the New Testament parable and the Lazarus whom Christ raised from the dead). The Life of the leprosy Alice of Schaarbeek went so far as to depict her stigmatization and suffering as enabling her to intercede powerfully for sinners. In many leper houses, inmates were urged or required to adopt monastic practices including vows of poverty, chastity and obedience, a distinctive habit, and written codes for behavior. Depending on their health, the inmates joined the staff that cared for them in religious services and prayers, penitential practices, and general duties. Female staff and inmates typically nursed the debilitated, cooked, and laundered; men often engaged in farming, gardening, administration of estates, or soliciting alms. Some leprosaria became the equivalent of monastic double houses; segregation of the sexes among caregivers and patients was stressed, particularly because leprosy was thought to provoke lust. However, a sometimes involuntary admittance to an ascetic existence sat ill with some, whose brawling, drunkenness, and sexual transgressions were punished by imposed penances, fasting, or withholding of daily provisions, such as firewood and victuals.

Many laypersons viewed the squalor and stench of working with social outcasts as a unique opportunity for spiritual penance, compassion, and recognition of human infirmity. Some, including Saint Francis and devout women in Flanders-Brabant, viewed lepers as living exemplars of the ostracization and suffering endured by Christ that they sought to emulate through their own voluntary embrace of poverty, chastity, and physical suffering. Responsible for dispensing charity from their households, some pious matrons cared for lepers in their own homes or in local hospitals by bathing and kissing their ulcerous wounds, as a form of penance or as preparation for life as a regular religious. Individuals from the merchant and noble classes also founded leper houses. Matilda, queen of England (1080–1118) was known to personally minister to lepers during the Lenten season, and her foundation of the leper hospital of Saint Giles sparked a tradition of royal and noble patronage of leprosaria in England. Other women belonged to confraternities who sponsored or served in hospitals or leper houses. Yet similar to other hospitals, leprosaria sometimes became glutted with pensioners and donats (donors who also served in hospitals) or were transformed into other types of hospitals or houses devoted to contemplative prayer. The lives of women in leper houses could vary greatly. An oblate at the leper house of Cornillon, Saint Julienne, read theology and undertook occasional care of the ill as a voluntary penance, but in the penurious leprosaria where Yvette of Huy and Marie of Oignes engaged in backbreaking labor as laysisters, the struggle for subsistence meant little spare time for contemplation or liturgical services.

JESSALYNN BIRD

References and Further Reading

- Brody, Saul N. The Disease of the Soul: Leprosy in Medieval Literature. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1974.
- Cawley, Martinus, trans. The Life of Alice the Leper. In Lives of Ida of Nivelles, Lutgard, and Alice the Leper. Lafayette: Guadalupe Translations, 1994.
- Dols, Michael W. "The Leper in Medieval Islamic Society." Speculum 58.4 (1983): 891–916.
- Richards, Peter. The Medieval Leper and His Northern Heirs. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1977.

See also Conjugal Debt; Hospitals; Lutgard of Aywières; Marie of Oignes; Plague; Yvette of Huy

LESBIANS

See Sexuality: Female Same-Sex Relations

LETTER WRITING

The letters we have from the Middle Ages are mainly public letters in Latin, from one secular or religious ruler to another. Dealing primarily with public matters or matters of general interest, they were intended to be read or heard by the court or circle of the recipient and they were kept in archives or letter collections, which is why they still exist. Some of the correspondents were women in important positions, rulers, regents, abbesses, and their letters were sometimes kept in the archives or collections of men's letters. There are few collections of a woman's letters. Some of the men and women who corresponded were friends, whose letters may have a personal dimension, even when matters of political, religious, or intellectual interest are paramount.

Medieval letters were rarely written by the sender's hand. They were dictated to a secretary trained to make a "fair copy" who might also amend the language. Once they were sent, through a trusted messenger who might carry important parts of the message in his or her head, they became the property of the recipient, who could have them copied or even edited for preservation or other use. One cannot, therefore, assume that the words are precisely those of the sender, but in general, unless intentional deception was involved, they represent the views or purpose of the sender.

Letters can be an important resource for the study of women in the Middle Ages. They show, as few contemporary histories do, how big a role certain women played in the public life of their society, how much women who ruled in their own name or as regents or consorts were involved in day to day operations, how frequently learned religious women were consulted by their male colleagues. They are asked by other rulers to mediate disputes, by ecclesiastical authorities to combat corruption or abuse or even heresy; they pose questions to scholars that lead to important concepts or works.

There are at least two thousand letters to or from women known and published so far, with probably more to be found. There is space here only to mention a few of the more notable figures from whom we still have letters. Though there is correspondence for Byzantine empresses and other early rulers, like Brunhild who ruled Austrasia and Burgundy for thirty-eight years in the late sixth century, most of the extant material is later. Among the Ottonians in tenth century Germany, the empress Adelheid, regent for her son and grandson, her daughter, Emma, queen of France, briefly regent for her son, and her daughter-in-law Theophano, empress and regent for her son, were involved in correspondence about benefices, excommunications, political plots and shifting alliances, and requests for preference and promotion. Letters to one of their relatives, Beatrice of Upper Lorraine, from Adalbero of Reims underscore the political roles of these women: he asks her about a “colloquium dominarum,” a meeting of ruling ladies that apparently settled the regency for Otto III.

In the eleventh century, a descendant of Beatrice of Lorraine, Matilda of Tuscany, inherited and ruled a large body of land in northern Italy and Lorraine. One hundred thirty-nine of her letters and charters are extant, many of them delivering judgments, providing grants, and settling disputes between laymen and religious. The letters to her include requests from churchmen for support or intervention, or gratitude for her protection; some dedicate books she commissioned, others from the reform pope, Gregory VII, are more personal. Matilda and her mother, “Duke” Beatrice, were among his strongest supporters and he wrote frequently, declaring his faith in them above all princes, and looking to them for help in his differences with the emperor.

In England, from the beginning of the twelfth century, there are letters of royal women. The bulk of the correspondence of queen Matilda, wife of king Henry I, is with Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury; many were written while he was in exile. They range on her part from personal worries about his health and his excessive fasting to political advice to compromise so he can return to his people who need him; on his part, there are pleas to help England’s churches and to advise the king to consider God rather than men. Other bishops wrote seeking or thanking the queen for patronage. A pope corresponded about the situation with the archbishop, and an emperor about her mediations between him and her husband.

Her sister-in-law, Adela of Blois, who ruled for a quarter century as regent for her husband, Count Stephen of Blois, her brother-in-law, and her sons, received letters from her husband, describing his experiences on crusade and from one of her men reporting on a military situation, but most of them come from churchmen with whom she worked. Ivo, bishop of Chartres, wrote frequently and often critically about problems in their shared jurisdiction. Anselm of Canterbury wrote in gratitude for her hosting him in exile and for negotiating a truce for him with her brother, King Henry.

There are letters of “empress Matilda” as she was called from her first marriage, who was Henry I’s heir but lost her battle for the throne, as well as from her rival’s queen, Matilda of Boulogne, her son’s wife Eleanor of Aquitaine, and the queens of Eleanor’s sons, Berengaria and Isabel of Angouleme. The extant material increases through the thirteenth century with Eleanor, queen of Henry III, and her letters. Eleanor and her sister Marguerite, queen of France, were deeply involved in the affairs of their countries and in the relations between the two powers. (Marguerite’s mother-in-law, Blanche of Castille, who was far more involved in French affairs, as regent and as queen mother, than Marguerite, also left many official letters.) The sister-queens’ letters involve gathering armies and finding the ships to carry them, mediating disputes, negotiating loans, buying debts, pressing their claims in their home land, Provence, but occasionally there are personal matters as well, about family health, visits, and marriages. Some of the family letters are in French, among the first women’s writings to be recorded in the vernacular. From this period on, more and more vernacular letters were collected and kept, including those of the Paston women, an English gentry family.

Most of the women whose correspondence was preserved from the early and High Middle Ages are royal or aristocratic, but there is another large source of women’s correspondence throughout the period—that of religious women. From the friends of Jerome, Marcella, Paula, and Eustochium, in the fourth century, whose difficult Biblical questions led to many of his commentaries, the royal nun Radegund who exchanged letters and poems with Fortunatus in the sixth century, the English missionaries who worked with Boniface in Germany in the eighth, to Heloise whose letters impelled Abelard to most of his extant writing in the twelfth, religious men corresponded with religious women and, though we have few examples extant, religious women corresponded with each other.

There are two women in the twelfth century whose visionary powers were so revered that people wrote to them asking for advice and information and the responses were preserved. Hildegard of Bingen’s collected letters number 390; her correspondents include popes, bishops, kings, queens, abbesses and abbots, nuns and monks, laymen and women. She attacks corruption, suggests reforms, and gives administrative and personal advice and moral support to her fellow religious. Her younger contemporary and correspondent, Elisabeth of Schönau, left twenty-two letters, nine to women—mainly encouraging them to lead good lives, but also sharing her sufferings—to the men, she answers religious questions and gives personal and moral advice or reproof.

JOAN FERRANTE

References and Further Reading

- Beach, Allison L. "Voices from a Distant Land: Fragments of a Twelfth-Century Nun's Letter Collection." Speculum, 77 (2002): 34–54.
- Constable, Giles. Letters and Letter Collections. Typologie des Sources du Moyen Age Occidental 17. Turnhout: Brepols, 1976.
- Elisabeth of Schonau, The Complete Works*. Translated by Anne L. Clark. New York: Paulist Press, 2000.
- Epistolae: Medieval Women's Latin Letters*. <http://db.ccnmtl.columbia.edu/ferrante/index.html>
- Ferrante, Joan M. "Correspondent: 'Blessed is the Speech of Your Mouth.'" Voice of the Living Light, Hildegard of Bingen and Her World, edited by Barbara Newman. Berkeley: University of California, 1998, pp. 91–109.
- The Letters of Abelard and Heloise*. Translated by Betty Radice. Harmondsworth: Penguin Books, 1974.
- The Letters of Hildegard of Bingen*. Translated by Joseph L. Baird and Radd K. Ehrman. 3 vols. Oxford and New York: Oxford University, 1994, 1998.
- LoPrete, Kimberly. Adela of Blois, Countess and Lord. Dublin: Four Courts Press, 2005.
- Mueller, Joan. Clare's Letters to Agnes: Texts and Sources. St. Bonaventure, N.Y.: The Franciscan Institute, 2001.

See also Adela of Blois; Adelheid; Agnes of Prague; Amalasantha; Blanche of Castile; Brunhild and Fredegund; Clare of Assisi; Datini, Margherita; Education, Lay; Education, Monastic; Elisabeth of Schönau; Empresses: Byzantium; Heloise; Hildegard of Bingen; Leoba; Matilda of Tuscany; Ottonian Royal Women; Paston Letters; Queens and Empresses: the West; Radegund

LITERACY AND READING: LATIN

Broadly defined as the ability to read, comprehend, and engage texts, literacy necessarily allows for a wide variety of skill levels among various groups of people at various times—not least true in the Middle Ages, when Latin served as the principal means of scholarly written communication throughout western Europe. Although certain factors regarding medieval literacy applied equally to both genders (e.g., the effects of the Roman Empire's decline in the West; the use of barbarian tongues for informal administration of successor states; the predominant association of Latin with the Church; and the accompanying shift of literary tastes from classical to devotional), women in the Middle Ages encountered additional barriers to formal means of education and exposure to Latin that men did not. Nevertheless, several generations of scholarship have challenged the once-assumed exceptionality of women's proficiency in the era's lingua franca. Indeed, large numbers of medieval women are now known to have gained reputations for profound comprehension and creativity, and thereby access to an intellectual and political culture chiefly dominated by males.

Literate Expectations

Not surprisingly, a Latin education among females largely remained the restricted province of the nobility throughout the medieval period. Within this stratum, however, one finds a widespread expectation of literacy and accompanying examples of scholarly achievement. From the start, late antiquity featured the famous collaboration between Jerome and Paula (not to mention a host of fellow women researchers) in the monumental production of the Latin Vulgate. As the Roman Empire faded into memory, monastic institutions increasingly assumed the mantle of preserving literary culture in the West. While the sixth-century Rule of St. Benedict famously exhorted monks to read, this expectation also loomed large in several contemporary rules written specifically for nuns by Caesarius of Arles, Aurelian, and the anonymous author of the Regula cuiusdam patris ad virgines. Einhard's recollection of Charlemagne's wish that both his sons and daughters be given a proper liberal arts education is borne out by the esteem shown by several ninth-century writers for their royal female correspondents. The celebrated twelfth-century case of Heloise attests to a continued expectation of Latin accomplishment, as she had clearly obtained a fine grounding in the language well before beginning private lessons in philosophy with Peter Abelard.

The pedagogy prescribed to such women closely mirrored that of their male counterparts for much of the Middle Ages: A mastery of the grammars of Donatus and Priscian was to be accompanied by memorization of the Psalms and an appreciation for devotional patristics, including Boethius's Consolation of Philosophy, Augustine's Confessions, and myriad lives of sainted predecessors. Direction in these studies could come from a variety of teachers, male and female, but just as Louis the Pious's early ninth-century injunction barring males from nunneries indirectly testifies to the presence in those houses of able Latin mistresses, the subsequent prominence of learned nuns like Gerberga of Gandersheim and Hildegard of Bingen suggests a continued tradition of women learning Latin from each other. But even if most women received their linguistic training in a monastic setting (whether or not they intended to join the community in perpetuity), there is some evidence that such was not the only means of gaining access to Latin letters. The Carolingian-era author Dhuoda, for instance, may well have received private tutoring on her family's estates. If so, her adept use of scripture as well as the works of Ovid, Donatus, Prudentius, Augustine, Gregory the Great, Isidore of Seville, Venantius Fortunatus, and Gregory of Tours in composing a handbook for her son is all the more impressive.

Women may have gained at least some level of literacy through more informal means as well. The English craftswomen who wove the Bayeux Tapestry in the late 1060s, for example, would have become intimately familiar with the work's fifty-seven Latin inscriptions; the same might be said for those who viewed it and similar works in ensuing centuries. While it is impossible to know what kind of pedagogical impact this form of "writing" and "reading" may have had, it is tempting all the same to locate among these artists and admirers, too, at least a nascent Latin literacy.

Textual Engagement

As comprehension only partly comprises literacy, women's effectual interaction with Latin texts also merits attention. To be sure, most women in positions of authority (particularly abbesses or widows) made sure to wield adequate Latin skills, as the settlement of legal disputes often came down to which side was more adept at using the written word to back up its claims. Such acumen was also evident in the literary activities of authors and audiences, particularly with regard to works compiled specifically for women. One analysis of a seemingly disparate eighth-century scriptural florilegium has revealed a finely crafted composite text showcasing articulate and powerful biblical women in action. As the manuscript was almost certainly intended for a Saxon nunnery, the compiler must have believed its readers able to appreciate and incorporate such exemplars into their own spiritual lives. Similar high regard for the literate sensibilities of her fellow sisters was exhibited by Hrotsvit of Gandersheim, perhaps the most creative figure of the tenth century. Though most famous for her deft adaptations of Terentian models to her own dramas, she also composed the nuanced Deeds of Otto and The Founding of Gandersheim Monastery, works that would only have resonated with highly educated audiences. Much the same could be said for abbess Hildegard of Bingen a century later, whose mystical visions not only gained her entry into influential secular and ecclesiastical circles, but which also (along with her astute medical, theological, musical, and scientific observations) provided her own charges with vivid reading and contemplative material. One could also point to the practice of selective translation as a further illustration of textual engagement. Whereas the twelfth-century De institutione inclusarum of Aelred of Rievaulx exhibited precious little admiration for women's nature, much of its more blatant misogyny was intriguingly excluded from two late Middle English versions. And while such activity naturally reflects the growing eclipse of Latin by late medieval vernaculars, it also shows that the female translators were well able to transform Latin texts to fit their own views and the perceived aspirations of their audiences.

The Late Middle Ages

Despite an impressive record of Latin accomplishment, women increasingly chose to focus their literary activities, ambitions, and patronage on the vernacular realm from the late twelfth century onward, just as their male contemporaries began to take advantage of a budding "renaissance" in Latin letters and original philosophy. The strict exclusion of females from the expanding universities of Europe no doubt exacerbated this marked divergence—notwithstanding exceptions such as Trota, a twelfth-century woman who authored a widely respected medical tract in Salerno. It is not true, however, that Latin fell into utter disuse among female readers in the late Middle Ages. Despite the fact that late medieval English bishops often corresponded with abbesses in the written vernacular, a survey of library holdings in thirteenth-, fourteenth-, and fifteenth-century English nunneries has revealed that Latin was still commonly read and understood in many of these communities, and not solely for liturgical purposes. Likewise, the appearance of the accomplished Latin poets Isotta Nogarola, Alessandra Scala, and Costanza Varano in fifteenth-century Italy testifies to their capacity to read, appreciate, and emulate the works of Roman masters. Of course, such endeavors may more accurately reflect emerging Renaissance humanism than medieval literary culture, but the apparent acceptance by contemporaries of such activities would also seem to confirm women's enduring presence in the Latin literary culture of the Middle Ages.

STEVEN STOFFERAHN

References and Further Reading

- Bartlett, Anne Clark. Male Authors, Female Readers: Representation and Subjectivity in Middle English Devotional Literature. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell, 1995.
- Bell, David N. What Nuns Read: Books and Libraries in Medieval English Nunneries. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Cistercian Publications, 1995.
- Contreni, John J. "The Carolingian Renaissance: Education and Literary Culture." In The New Cambridge Medieval History, vol. II, edited by Rosamond McKitterick. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995, pp. 709–757.

- Dhuoda. Liber manualis, edited by Pierre Riché. Paris: Editions du Cerf, 1975.
- Ferrante, Joan M. "Women's Role in Latin Letters from the Fourth to the Early Twelfth Century." In The Cultural Patronage of Medieval Women, edited by June Hall McCash. Athens, Ga.: University of Georgia, 1996, pp. 73–104.
- Kellsey, Charlene M. "Lectio divina: Nuns and Reading in the Sixth and Seventh Centuries." M.A. Thesis: San Jose State University, 1999.
- McKitterick, Rosamond. "Women and Literacy in the Early Middle Ages." In Books, Scribes and Learning in the Frankish Kingdoms, 6th–9th Centuries. Aldershot: Variorum, 1994, pp. 1–43.
- Meale, Carol M. "...alle the bokes that I haue of latyn, english, and frensch": Laywomen and Their Books in Late Medieval England." In Women and Literature in Britain, 1150–1500, edited by Carol M. Meale. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993, pp. 128–158.
- Parker, Holt. "Latin and Greek Poetry by Five Renaissance Italian Women Humanists." In Sex and Gender in Medieval and Renaissance Texts: The Latin Tradition, edited by Barbara K. Gold, Paul Allen Miller, and Charles Platter. Albany: SUNY, 1997, pp. 247–285.
- Power, Eileen. Medieval English Nunneries, c.1275 to 1535. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1922.
- Ranft, Patricia. Women in Western Intellectual Culture, 600–1500. New York: Palgrave, 2002.
- Stofferahn, Steven A. "Changing Views of Carolingian Women's Literary Culture: The Evidence from Essen." Early Medieval Europe 8 (1999): 69–97.

See also Book Ownership; Dhuoda; Education, Lay; Education, Monastic; Heloise; Hildegard of Bingen; Hrotsvit of Gandersheim; Humanism; Letter Writing; Literacy and Reading: Vernacular; Literature, Latin; Monasticism and Nuns; Mothers as Teachers; Nogarola, Isotta; Trota of Salerno; Women Authors: Latin Texts

LITERACY AND READING: VERNACULAR

Literacy, in the Middle Ages, can be defined as a series of gradations. Full literacy entailed the knowledge of reading and writing, and of the Latin language. For many, though, it was possible to read and write in the vernacular, whilst for another group, literacy meant simply the ability to read. Paul Saenger's definitions of phonetic literacy and comprehension literacy are useful here. The former concept relates to the ability to follow a written text, in a language not understood, through recognition and vocalization of the constituent phonetic units of individual words. Hence it was possible for lay people to follow a religious service with the aid of private prayer books while, as the period progressed, rubrics to Latin prayers in vernaculars such as English, French, and Spanish occur, suggesting a more active role in worship. Comprehension literacy is self-explanatory, where sound is related directly to meaning in the eyes of the reader.

The Acquisition of Literacy

The means by which individuals acquired the skills of literacy is often a matter for conjecture, especially in the case of girls, who were excluded from many of the institutions—such as many song schools, some grammar schools, and all universities—open to boys and young men. In better-off families, especially those who employed a chaplain, some degree of education within the household is likely. Some nunneries also took boarders. In quattrocento northern Italy, the women who formed part of the humanist scholarly movement were usually taught by men—either fathers or tutors, although the situation differed in Florence a century previously, where women were often in charge of household "schools." Also in Florence, the chronicler Giovanni Villani stated that between 1336 and 1338 children of both sexes learning to read numbered 8,000 to 10,000.

Elsewhere, there is evidence of outside elementary school education. In parts of France the opportunities open to girls were comparatively good. It has been estimated that the ratio of schoolmasters to mistresses in Paris in the second half of the fifteenth century was two to one, boys and girls being educated separately. In contrast, the Flemish chronicler and poet Jean Froissart was educated a century earlier in the company of both boys and girls. In England, where there was no regulation comparable to that in France, references are sporadic and anecdotal, but no less important for that.

Dame Schools

The existence of "dame schools" can be deduced from such sources from different regions of the country. In London in 1406, there is reference to an "E Scholemaysterese" and in 1440, to one "Agnes doctrix puellarum." Also in the fifteenth century, Maria Marellete was recorded as "magistra scholarum" at Boston in Lincolnshire, while the 1558 will of an ex-member of the Salters' Company in London remembers his schooling during the 1480s in Norwich, under the tutelage of Dame Katherine Peckham, a sister of Norman's Hospital. For York, evidence from women's wills, in which they left bequests to choir schools, indicates women's involvement and their attainment of, perhaps limited, skills of literacy, while there was possibly a school for girls at St. Clement's nunnery in the city. In Germany the evidence is of a similar nature: in Emmerich in 1445, for example, there were at least two female teachers of girls. All of these references presuppose the existence of a system by which these women could be trained to teach, and which deemed it appropriate that they should do so. Certainly reading itself was a skill expected at all levels of society: the Chevalier de la Tour Landry, writing in late fourteenth-century France for his daughters, recommended it for spiritual purposes (his text was translated into English twice in the fifteenth century, secondly by William Caxton), while the Ménagier de Paris, in the early 1390s, assumes that his wife can read, not only for the necessities of household instruction and the learning of appropriate behaviour, but also for receiving private missives from him. Knowledge of the vernacular was important for women from many walks of life: the noblewoman and the bourgeois wife; the partners in mercantile enterprises; and the gentry woman in charge of her household.

Vernacular Literary Skills

The starting point for the acquisition of vernacular literary skills would seem to have been religious: the learning of the Pater Noster, the Ave and the Creed. In 1463, Margaret Plumpton of the gentry family of that name spoke “prattely and French, and hath near hand learned her sawter” in the household of her contracted husband, and it is probably no coincidence that in the late Middle Ages images of St. Anne teaching the Virgin to read from religious books proliferated in manuscripts and religious painting and glass: a case of art mirroring life, and vice versa. This method of inculcating the skill of reading is indicative of the primacy accorded to religious and devotional materials and undoubtedly accounts for the survival of such books and for the frequency with which they were bequeathed between members of families and close friends: they were (to generalize) by and large the most expensively produced volumes and their value was therefore double, incorporating the spiritual and the material. At the same time, the example of Margaret Plumpton emphasizes that in England there continued to be two vernaculars, English and French (or Anglo-Norman), and that their use was not restricted to members of the aristocracy, which explains the continuing circulation of French texts in England and the listing of books apparently in this language in wills of this period. This was, of course, the legacy of the Conquest, and where royalty and nobility were concerned throughout the medieval period, it is appropriate to talk in terms of a European culture, due to intermarriage and continuing familial connections thereafter.

Patronage, Ownership, and Reading

Women were famed as patrons from the eleventh and twelfth centuries onward. Matilda, daughter of Margaret of Scotland, who had her educated in a convent, was the first queen of Henry I; she and her sister-in-law, Adela of Blois, daughter of William I, were courted by the same poets and scholars. Hildebert of Lavardin, bishop of Mons, for instance, wrote of Adela that she was, like Maud, “litteris erudita”—the literacy of the two women probably extending beyond the vernacular. Over a century later, Eleanor of Castile, first queen of Edward I was dedicatee of Girart d’Amien’s French Arthurian romance, Escanor, featuring Gawain as its hero. Girart worked for patrons in other parts of Europe, which strengthens the case for arguing that at this high level of society, there was little insularity. This is a continuing feature of royal and aristocratic women’s reading: the book presented by the Earl of Shrewsbury to Margaret of Anjou on the occasion of her marriage to Henry VI in 1444/1445, for example, London, British Library Royal MS E.VI, contained French romances and work by Christine de Pizan, as well as a treatise on the Order of the Garter, of which the latter related specifically to the culture of her new home. It is a matter for debate as to whether such richly decorated volumes as these would have been individually read by their owners—their sheer weight would have entailed recitation from a lectern, and reading was, in any case, often a communal form of entertainment in which a number of listeners could participate. Perusal of illustrations, however, constitutes another form of “reading” that must be taken into account: columns of early French copies of the Lancelot, for instance, are punctuated by pictures which, prior to the introduction of tables of contents, serve both to orient the reader within the text and to provide a summary of the story. That women took pleasure in narrative itself, though, is clear from a French woman’s injunction to her scribe to hurry up with his copying of the Lancelot and skip portions to arrive at the point in the narrative where Lancelot and Guinivere exchange their first kiss (Rouen, Bibliothèque Municipale MS 1054).

Widespread Use of French

French was the lingua franca throughout Europe, not only in England but also in areas such as the Iberian peninsula: in 1339 King Pedro IV asked his sister to send him “un bel libro frances,” probably a romance, which he had learned she possessed. And romances themselves, second only to service books, are the volumes that are referred to most often as being in the possession of women readers and owners from all the literate classes. (Extant codices containing evidence of women's ownership, such as inscriptions, are rarer in every category of text than references in testaments and inventories.) Romances in French crossed national boundaries—those dealing with Arthurian themes and the story of Troy were particularly popular—but so, too, did works of religious devotion and instruction. Illuminated apocalypses, for example, written in French, retained their popularity throughout the Middle Ages and across countries, one of the latest recorded belonging to Cecily Welles, sister-in-law of Henry VII of England, whilst nuns (as well as monks) read instructional and devotional texts in French. Such works were equalled in popularity by mystical and devotional treatises in native vernaculars—in England, those of Richard Rolle and Walter Hilton, both of whom addressed some of their works to a female audience and, to a lesser extent, the writings of Continental women mystics. Certain categories of reading materials appear to have held less attraction for women, histories being a case in point. Nevertheless, there is ample evidence overall to suggest that women's tastes were as eclectic as those of their male counterparts. Research also indicates distinctive patterns of women's reading practices, based on familial and regional networks and this is but one of the rich veins of information about women's literacy in the vernacular that can be expected to yield new insights concerning their participation in literate culture.

CAROL M. MEALE

References and Further Reading

- Barron, Caroline M. "The Education and Training of Girls in Fifteenth-Century London." In Courts, Counties and the Capital in the Later Middle Ages, edited by Diana E. S. Dunn. Stroud: Sutton Publishing, 1996, pp. 139–153.
- Bell, David N. What Nuns Read: Books and Libraries in Medieval English Nunneries. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Cistercian Publications, 1995.
- Bell, Susan Groag. "Medieval Women Book Owners: Arbiters of Lay Piety and Ambassadors of Culture." Signs 7 (1982): 742–768.
- Clanchy, M. T. From Memory to Written Record: England 1066–1307. 2nd ed. Oxford: Blackwell, 1993.
- Dutton, Anne M. "Passing the Book: Testamentary Transmission of Religious Literature To and By Women in England 1350–1500." In Women, the Book and the Godly, edited by Lesley Smith and Jane H. M. Taylor. Woodbridge, Suffolk: D.S. Brewer, 1995, pp. 41–54.
- The Goodman of Paris (Le Ménagier de Paris)*, translated by Eileen Power. London: Routledge, 1928.
- King, Margaret L. Women of the Renaissance. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1991.
- Meale, Carol M. "'...alle the bokes that I haue of latyn, englisch, and frensch': Laywomen and Their Books in Late Medieval England." In Women and Literature in Britain, 1150–1500, edited by Carol M. Meale. 2nd ed. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996, pp. 128–158.
- Meale, Carol M., and Julia Boffey. "Gentlewomen's Reading." In The Cambridge History of the Book in Britain, vol. 3, 1400–1557, edited by Lotte Hellinga and J. B. Trapp. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000, pp. 526–540.
- Moran, JoAnn Hoepfner. Education and Learning in the City of York 1300–1500. York: Borthwick Institute of Historical Research, Borthwick Papers no. 55, 1979.
- . The Growth of English Schooling 1340–1548: Learning, Literacy and Laicization in Pre-Reformation Diocese. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1985.
- Saenger, Paul. "Books of Hours and the Reading Habits of the Later Middle Ages." In The Culture of Print: Power and the Uses of Print in Early Modern Europe, edited by Roger Chartier, translated by Lydia G. Cochrane. Oxford and Cambridge: Polity, 1989, pp. 141–173.
- Salter, Elizabeth. English and International: Studies in the Literature, Art and Patronage of Medieval England, edited by Derek Pearsall and Nicolette Zeeman. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988.
- Villani, Giovanni. Cronica Robert S. Lopez and Irving J. Raymond, eds. Medieval Trade in the Mediterranean World. New York: Columbia University Press, 1955, pp. 71–74.

See also Adela of Blois; Arthurian Literature; Audience, Women in the; Book Ownership; Christine de Pizan; Devotional Literature; Education, Lay; Education, Monastic; Letter Writing; Literacy and Reading; Latin; Margaret of Anjou; Mothers as Teachers; Patronage, Literary; Roman de Silence; Romance, English; Romance, French; Romance, German; Wills

LITERATURE, GERMAN

Among the few surviving examples of the literature of the ancient Germans are two magical incantations known as the Merseburg charms, one for freeing prisoners-of-war (or aiding women in labor) and the other for healing the broken leg of a horse. Both invoke the helping power of goddesses or human women with supernatural capabilities. The Merseberg charms were jotted down in the tenth century on the fly leaf of a Latin missal exemplifying the haphazard preservation of pagan, oral literature at a time when Latin was the language of writing and Christian monasteries were the centers of culture. The first known woman author from the German lands was a tenth-century nun, Hrotsvit of Gandersheim, who wrote Latin dramas. During the Old High German period (750–1050 CE) influential depictions of women are found in vernacular texts composed to spread the Christian faith, for example, the story of the Samaritan woman who proclaims Christ as the messiah to her community (John 4:5–42). One version of the story appears in a gospel translation by the monk Otfried (d. c. 867) from Weissenburg monastery in Alsace. Elsewhere in his Evangelienbuch Otfried highlights women's emotions, such as the desperation of the mothers of the slaughtered innocents, to heighten his story's impact. Otfried was encouraged to write by a noble woman named Judith whose identity remains unknown.

Most German literature from the Early Middle High era (1050–1170 CE) is found in three manuscripts including the Vorau manuscript whose texts are ordered programmatically to tell of the works of the Christian God in human history (Vorau, Styria, Stiftsbibliothek, cod. 276; late twelfth century). They include the acts of the biblical Judith written in heroic style (first third of the twelfth century); the works of the first known woman writer of German, Frau Ava (d. c. 1127); an anonymous woman's prayer in verse; and the Kaiserchronik (Chronicle of the Emperors) with the first version of Crescentia, the popular story of the unjustly persecuted and rehabilitated empresses. A German example of the international literature devoted to the Virgin is an epic based on her life completed in 1172 by Prester Wernher.

Minstrel Epics

Spielmannsepen (minstrel epics) were also composed in Early Middle High German. Though the name suggests entertainment for common people, minstrel epics were intended for elite audiences. Five of the six that have survived are bridal quests in which getting married is an adventure for the well-born groom that requires strategic help or moral support from the bride as well as international travel, an army of faithful retainers, wit, perseverance, and Christian piety. In König Rother (King Rother) both the bride and her mother aid the hero in his quest. Overshadowed by the romance in the thirteenth century, minstrel epics regained popularity in the later Middle Ages.

Middle High German Literature

An increasing volume of secular literature was produced for noble audiences in Middle High German from 1170 to 1273 CE. Gender was a pervasive concern of this literature whose preeminent genres were the Minnelied (erotic song lyric) and the romance. Singular works were also produced, for example, Wolfram von Eschenbach's illustrated Willehalm, whose heroine, a Christian convert, is tested when her infidel father wages war on her Christian husband.

The anonymous Nibelungenlied was composed in strophes close to 1200 CE in the vicinity of Passau. Based on Germanic tales from the distant past, the Nibelungenlied is also influenced by the romance, especially the introduction of its central character, Kriemhild, as a courtly princess who receives and reciprocates the love of the hero, Siegfried. Yet it raises its own, distinctive set of gender issues. For example, marriages in the Nibelungenlied come about through the exchange of brides between the male protagonists Gunther, King of the Burgundians, and the heroic Siegfried; but the political alliance that should bind these men fails due to the deceptions they perpetrate on their wives. Another issue involves the relationship between wealth, gender, and power. The Nibelungenlied recounts the systematic economic despoilment of Kriemhild by her brother King Gunther and his vassal, Hagen. Their actions are aimed at preventing the noble woman from using her wealth to attain justice through vengeance. Third is the issue of sexual violence, here presented as a means to master powerful women. Sexual violence is both literal (Gunther forces coitus with his Amazon-like bride Brunhild; Siegfried batters Kriemhild) and symbolic (Siegfried steals Brunhild's belt and ring after physically subduing her on her wedding night in preparation for Gunther). Finally debate swirls about the motivations of Kriemhild who, in the final scenes, incites the armies of her second husband to kill her brothers and their vassals. Is she moved by grief over Siegfried's death or by her own exclusion from power? The butchery of the final scenes raises questions about her ethical character. Is her vengeance in proportion to its cause? Or is its excess a comment on the dangers of women playing at men's political games?

Early manuscripts of the Nibelungenlied show that these kinds of questions are not merely modern concerns. One version of the text, the C version, sympathizes with Kriemhild more than the A and B versions by giving her an inner life. But C also undercuts her political agency. Moreover, in all the main manuscripts, the Nibelungenlied is paired with another, contemporaneous work called Die Klage (The Lament), a sequel that justifies Kriemhild by stating that she acted out of admirable fidelity to her murdered husband but also that the magnitude of the slaughter was due to her deranged mind. A condemnation of Kriemhild's character is found in the thirteenth-century Der Rosengarten zu Worms (The Rose Garden in Worms). Still married to Siegfried and still powerful, Kriemhild arrogantly compels heroes to battle to the death to prove Siegfried's superiority.

In a sixteenth-century manuscript the Nibelungenlied is paired with another epic, Kudrun (anonymous, 1230–1240). As in the Nibelungenlied the central character of Kudrun is a woman. This fact of transmission has led scholars to term them Frauenepen (Women's Epics). The term, however, says nothing about the gender of the authors nor does it imply that these epics have a feminist outlook. Kudrun is the story of a family across three generations. In the main section a mother with political acumen passes power to a daughter, Kudrun, who is an equally effective ruler. The epic stresses continuity between generations of women as they pass through life stages (secluded childhood, choice of spouse, authority through queenship). It also reflects a world in which women's social identity was derived from both maternal and paternal ancestry, not just the patriline. Kudrun's antagonist is female. For fourteen years, she resists coercion by her would-be mother-in-law to stave off a socially inappropriate marriage. In the end the heroine performs the role of peacemaker, as did some historical noble women, by forging good marriages to reconcile formerly warring parties.

Comic Tales

Short, often comic tales called Mären are the German contribution to a European literary trend that included the French fabliaux. There are 216 Mären dating from the mid-thirteenth through the mid-sixteenth century. Der Stricker (d. c. 1250) is considered the founder of the genre but Hartmann von Aue, who introduced the Arthurian romance to Germany, also wrote a Märe called In Der Arme Heinrich. In it a girl of the free peasantry volunteers to sacrifice her heart's blood to cure her lord of a deadly disease, but a miracle enables both to survive and happily marry despite their differences in status. The social rank of both Mären authors and audiences runs from the nobility through the educated middle classes of the German cities. Some professional poets composed Mären. For gender analysis the Mären are significant because many present women's sexuality beyond the bonds of marriage as a comic theme. Clever wives play central roles. The emphasis is put on the wit and capability of wives to arrange trysts with their lovers, avoid discovery, protect their lovers from harm, or convince suspicious husbands of their innocence. Women are sexually ambitious in many Mären and their sexual needs are frankly depicted. In some, wives ally with their husbands to expose an unwanted suitor. Other Mären examine marriage as an unstable hierarchy, sometimes giving wives the upper hand but sometimes reinstating the "normal" rule of the husband. Common women and men, such as servants, belong to the household settings. Beatings are prescribed for both disorderly wives and dominated husbands. Some Mären depict cruel forms of punishment for unruly women such as immurement, cutting, or being ridden like a horse. Although there is a consensus among literary scholars that Mären celebrate mental quickness one still needs to explain why the clever wives often represent the genre's most positive value.

It is common to speak of Mären as a single genre but in reality they are difficult to distinguish from other short narrative or discursive texts such as beast fables; pious tales; short stories of love and chivalry; discourses on love, ethical behavior, religious teaching, or the state of society. These frequently depict gender relations that are normative rather than subversive as in many (but hardly all) Mären. These various genres are mixed together in medieval manuscripts indicating that audiences enjoyed the conflicting or contrasting gender perspectives they offered.

SARAH ELIZABETH WESTPHAL-WIHL

References and Further Reading

- Ava, Frau. Ava's New Testament Narratives: When the Old World Passed Away. Introduction, translations, and notes by James A. Rushing, Jr. Medieval German Texts in Bilingual Editions, 2. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Medieval Institute Publications, 2003.
- Bornholdt, Claudia. Engaging Moments: The Origins of Medieval Bridal-Quest Narrative. Berlin and New York: Walter De Gruyter, 2005.
- Classen, Albrecht, ed. Women as Protagonists and Poets in the German Middle Ages: An Anthology of Feminist Approaches to Middle High German Literature. Göttingen: Kümmerle, 1991.
- Coxon, Sebastian. "Schröber Kunnen Liste Vil: Literate Protagonists and Literary Antics in the Medieval German Comic Tale." Oxford German Studies 31 (2002): 17–62.
- Edwards, Cyril. The Beginnings of German Literature: Comparative and Interdisciplinary Approaches to Old High German. Rochester, N.Y., and Woodbridge, Suffolk: Camden House, 2002.
- Frakes, Jerold C. Brides and Doom: Gender, Property, and Power in Medieval German Women's Epic. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1994.
- Gibbs, Marion, and Johnson, Sidney M. Medieval German Literature: A Companion. New York and London: Garland Publishing, 1997.
- Hartmann von Aue. "Poor Heinrich." translated by Frank Tobin. In Arthurian Romances, Tales, and Poetry: The Complete Works of Hartmann von Aue. translated with commentary by Frank Tobin, Kim Vivian, and Richard H. Lawson. University Park, Pa.: Pennsylvania State University Press, 2001, pp. 215–234.
- Historia Judith/The Story of Judith*. In Sovereignty and Salvation in the Vernacular 1050–1150. Introduction,

LITERATURE, GERMAN

- translation, and notes by James A. Schultz. Medieval German Texts in Bilingual Editions, 1. Kalamazoo, Mich: Medieval Institute Publications, 2000, pp. 142–155.
- King Rother*. Translated by Robert Lichtenstein. Chapel Hill, N.C.: University of North Carolina Press, 1962.
- Kudrun*. Translated by Marion E. Gibbs and Sidney M. Johnson. Garland Library of Medieval Literature, 79, B. New York: Garland Publishing, 1992.
- The Lament of the Nibelungen (Die Klage)*. Translated with an introduction by Winder McConnell. Columbia, S.C.: Camden House, 1964.
- The Nibelungenlied*. Translation by Arthur T. Hatto. 2nd ed. Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1969.
- Novellistik des Mittelalters: Märendichtung*. Editing, translation, and commentary by Klaus Grubmüller. Frankfurt am Main: Deutscher Klassiker Verlag, 1996.
- Rasmussen, Ann Maire. Mothers and Daughters in Medieval German Literature. Syracuse: Syracuse University Press, 1997.
- . “Fathers to Think Back Through: The Middle High German Mother-Daughter and Father-Son Advice Poems Known as Die Winsbeckin and Die Winsbecke.” In Medieval Conduct, edited by Kathleen Ashley and Robert L. A. Clark. Minneapolis and London: University of Minnesota Press, 2001, pp. 106–134.
- . “Emotions, Gender, and Lordship in Medieval Literature: Clovis’s Grief, Tristan’s Anger, and Kriemhild’s Restless Corpse.” In Codierungen von Emotionen im Mittelalter/Emotions and Sensibilities in the Middle Ages, edited by C. Stephen Jaeger and Ingrid Kasten. Berlin and New York: Walter de Gruyter, 2003, pp. 174–189.
- Schulz, James A. The Knowledge of Childhood in the German Middle Ages, 1100–1350. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1995.
- Starkey, Kathryn. “Brunhild’s Smile: Emotions and the Politics of Gender in the Nibelungenlied.” In Codierungen von Emotionen im Mittelalter/Emotions and Sensibilities in the Middle Ages, edited by C. Stephen Jaeger and Ingrid Kasten. Berlin and New York: Walter de Gruyter, 2003, pp. 159–173.
- Westphal, Sarah. Textual Poetics of German Manuscripts 1300–1500. Columbia, S.C.: Camden House, 1993.
- Winsbeckische Gedichte nebst Tirol und Fridebrant*, edited by Albert Leitzmann. Rev. Ingo Reiffenstein. 3rd ed. Altdeutsche Textbibliothek, 9. Tübingen: Niemeyer, 1962.
- Wolfram von Eschenbach. Willehalm. Translated by Marion E. Gibbs and Sidney M. Johnson. Harmondsworth: Penguin Books, 1984.

See also Ava; Bible, Women in; Conduct Literature; Fabliau; Germanic Lands; Gottfried von Strassburg; Hildegard of Bingen; Magic and Charms; Mary, Virgin: in Literature; Mechthild of Magdeburg; Minnesang; Romance, German; Sister-Books and Convent Chronicles; Women Authors, German Texts; Wolfram von Eschenbach

LITERATURE, HEBREW

Only a few medieval Jewish women are known to have composed literary works. Even the prolific Golden Age in Muslim Spain (950–1150) yielded only two Jewish women-poets: the unnamed wife of Dunash ben Labrat (Cordoba, mid-tenth century) from whom one Hebrew poem remains, and Qasmūna (allegedly the daughter of Samuel ha-Nagid, the eleventh century Hebrew poet and statesman from Granada). A single religious poem attributed to a woman was composed by a certain Merezina (Catalonia, mid-fifteenth century).

Inspired by Arabic literature, the male love poetry of the Hebrew Golden Age in Spain (written by rabbis, philosophers, and communal leaders like Samuel ha-Nagid, Ibn Gabirol, Moses Ibn Ezra, and Judah ha-Levi), glorified and idealized beauty—both female and male. The love-poets, who present themselves as weak and inferior, exalt an unyielding dazzling lady, while excusing her for being aloof, silent, tempting, and even lethal. In homoerotic poems the beloved is a young boy who has not yet reached puberty. The atmosphere and the love-objects (wine-bearers, often cross-dressed, and female singers and dancers) reflect the luxurious Islamic courts (where Jewish elite members often served as courtiers).

The voices of passionate maidens singing about love—consummated or forlorn—are heard in the kharjas (couplets in vernacular Arabic or Romance, appearing at the end of Hebrew poems of the Andalusian muwashshah genre). They are assumed to preserve (or counterfeit?) an oral tradition of old Iberian Romance songs of women. In wedding-songs brides are active in tempting bridegrooms; Eros is sanctioned, and married love looms as prelapsarian paradise.

The female voice of widowed wives, bereaved mothers, and dead daughters is heard also in ballad-like lamentations over the dead. The dialogues, the refrains, and the folkloric song-form suggest an oral tradition of women’s lamentations. (“Alas, my daughter, have you forgotten your abode?...Alas, my daughter, your loss is bitter”...“Alas, alas, my mother, that you ever gave me birth. How could you abandon me on this day?” Judah ha-Levi.) Moral epigrams advocate the disciplining (secluding, veiling, silencing, and even regular beating) of wives. (“Walls and castles were created for the woman; her pride is in spinning and weaving. / Her face is a pudendum exposed in the main road that has to be covered by shawls and veils.” Samuel ha-Nagid.)

Ascetic poems feature the allegorical figure of tevel in its capacity as Lady World or as Mother Earth. Embodying the world’s evil, tevel is a seducing—but rotten—prostitute, trapping men then devouring them. Shrewish wives (plaintive, gossipy, gluttonous, disobedient, and treacherous) appear in many rhymed narratives (of the maqama type or its cognates). In Judah al-Harizi’s sixth maqama (c. 1220) a beautiful bride turns into a monstrous wife. Her bodily description is allied with discharges, pollution, diseases, ugliness, beastliness, and demonic evil. Humor, parody, the grotesque, and witticisms were often used as misogyny's most effective tools. Misogyny and misogamy are at the center of "Judah the Women-Hater," a rhymed narrative by Judah Ibn Shabbetai (Toledo, 1208). His protagonist, a propagandist of misogamy, is lured into marriage; the bride is exchanged for a shrew; and a divorce trial takes place, where the author appears ex-machina to declare love to his real wife and children. Marriage is hotly debated, but woman is categorically debased. The tension between the positive value of marriage (and procreation) in Judaism, and the negativity of marriage (affected by Jewish and non-Jewish ascetic trends), results here in textual ambiguity.

"The Women-Hater" ignited a literary controversy that lasted through the thirteenth century. A certain Isaac (allegedly urged by the women whom Ibn Shabbetai had abused), wrote "In Defence of Women" (Provence, 1210), a tale about a virtuous wife and a perfect marriage. In "The Women's Lover" (Provence, 1295) by Yeda'aya ha-Penini, Ibn Shabbetai, the misogynist, descends from heaven to defend his work. A literary trial concludes with the sanctioning of marriage.

A poetic of women's adoration and condemnation prevails also in Hebrew literature in Italy. In the rhymed narratives (Mahbarot) of Immanuel of Rome (c. 1261–c. 1328) male poets conduct rhetorical competitions over women's virtues or vices. Influenced by the Italian novella, Immanuel's women figures are a mixture of misogynistic traditions and "the new sweet style." Throughout the sixteenth century, some dozen Hebrew poets (like their Italian peers) debated the nature of women, employing examples from the Bible, Greek mythology, and Roman history. Women participated in these debates as readers and patrons.

Several rhymed stories written in Spain (by Alharizi and Jacob ben Eleazar, thirteenth century) employ the theme of transvestism (female-to-male and male-to-female). A unique prayer, pleading to God to turn its male-speaker into a woman, was written in fourteenth century Provence by Qalonymos ben Qalonymos. ("Woe to me, my mother, that you ever gave birth to a male child!...Cursed be the man who informed my father: 'A male child was born to you!'...Our father in heaven! You, who did miracles to our fathers by fire and water...if only you would turn me from male to female! If only I were worthy of this grace of yours, I could have now been the lady of the house,...holding the spindle....")

Following traditions of biblical and midrashic allegory, liturgical poetry presents the Jewish nation as paramour of Israel's God. Exiled, politically oppressed, and inferior, Israel speaks as bereaved mother, widow, or abandoned wife longing for her husband. In liturgical-penitential poems, the human soul is allegorized as stray daughter, the body's maid, or a yearning gazelle. Menstruating and sinful "she" is called to purify herself from her female pollution and unite with (masculine) Intellect.

Women-martyrs feature in liturgical poems (and chronicles) written in Germany and northern France from the eleventh to the thirteenth centuries. The religious devotion and heroism of parents (especially mothers), who, faced by the choice of conversion or death by torture, took their children's and their own lives is glorified in these poems.

TOVA ROSEN

References and Further Reading

- Assis, Yom Tov. "Sexual Behaviour in Medieval Hispano-Jewish Society." In Jewish History: Essays in Honour of Chimen Abramsky, edited by Ada Rapoport-Albert and Steven J. Zipperstein. London: P. Hale Zan, 1988, pp. 25–59.
- Baskin, Judith R., ed. Jewish Women in Historical Perspective. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1991.
- Bellamy, James A. "Qasmūna the Poetess: Who Was She?" Journal of the American Oriental Society 103 (1983): 423–424.
- Carmi, T. ed and trans. The Penguin Book of Hebrew Poetry. New York: Viking Press, 1981.
- Cohen, Jeremy. Sanctifying the Name of God: Jewish Martyrs and Jewish Memories of the First Crusade. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2004.
- Cole, Peter, tr. and ed. Selected Poems of Shmuel HaNagid. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1996.
- Dishon, Yehudit. "Images of Women in Medieval Hebrew Literature." In Women of the Word: Jewish Women and Jewish Writing, edited by Judith R. Baskin. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1994, pp. 35–50.
- Fleischer, Ezra. "On Dunash Ben Labrat, His Wife and His Son: New Light on the Beginnings of the Hebrew-Spanish School" (Hebrew). Jerusalem Studies in Hebrew Literature 5 (1984): 189–202.
- Grossman, Avraham. Pious and Rebellious: Jewish Women in Europe in the Middle Ages. translated by Jonathan Chipman, Waltham, Mass.: 2004.
- Immanuel of Rome: Mahberot Immanuel Ha-Romi* (Hebrew). Edited by Dov Jarden. Jerusalem: Bialik Institute, 1957.
- Kaufman, Shirley, Galit Hasan-Rokem, and Tamar S. Hess, eds. The Defiant Muse: Hebrew Feminist Poems from Antiquity to the Present: A Bilingual Anthology. New York: 1999.
- Pagis, Dan. "The Controversy Concerning the Female Image in Hebrew Poetry in Italy" (Hebrew). Jerusalem Studies in Hebrew Literature 9 (1986): 259–300.
- Rosen, Tova. "On Tongues Being Bound and Let Loose: Women in Medieval Hebrew Literature." Prooftexts 8 (1988): 67–88.

LITERATURE, HEBREW

- . “The Muwashshah.” In The Literature of Al-Andalus, edited by María Rosa Menocal, Raymond P. Scheindlin and Michael Sells. Cambridge: 2000, pp. 165–189.
- . Unveiling Eve: Reading Gender in Medieval Hebrew Literature. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2000.
- Roth, Norman. “The ‘Wiles of Women’ Motif in the Medieval Hebrew Literature of Spain.” Hebrew Annual Review 2 (1978): 145–165.
- Scheindlin, Raymond P. Wine, Women and Death: Medieval Hebrew Poems on the Good Life (Hebrew/English). Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1986.
- . The Gazelle: Medieval Hebrew Poems on God, Israel and the Soul. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1991.
- Schirmann, Jefim (Hayyim), ed. Ha-Shirah ha-ivrit bi-sefard u-ba-provans (Hebrew Poetry in Spain and Provence). Jerusalem and Tel Aviv: Bialik, 2006.
- Stern, David and Mark Jay Mirsky, eds. Rabbinic Fantasies: Imaginative Narratives from Classical Hebrew Literature. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1990.

See also Dolce of Worms; Jewish Mystical Thought, Body and Soul in; Jewish Women; Marriage, Jewish; Qasmūna Bint Ismāʿīl; Shekinah

LITERATURE, IBERIAN

Isidore of Seville’s seventh-century description of woman (mulier) in his Etymologies is a fitting beginning for this panoramic overview, since it is one of the earliest representations of women in medieval Iberian literatures. Isidore links women to sweetness or mildness; he claims that women differ from men in their weakness, and he believes that women are defined by their “sex” (femineum sexum) and not their bodily corruption (chap. 11, bk. 2, vv. 18–20). His description in Latin is only one among numerous representations of women in Iberian literatures in Arabic, Hebrew, Latin, and Romance languages. In an effort to organize the array of portrayals in, for instance, medical treatises, poetry, historiography, and devotional writings, this entry is not exhaustive but is divided into six general thematic groups.

Law, History, and Legends

Legal codes and cases from kingdoms and municipalities throughout the peninsula depict women in domestic, occupational, and economic contexts, of which Alfonso X’s Siete Partidas are renowned (ruled 1252–1284). Chronicles and other historical writings, such as Alfonso’s Estoria de Espanna and General estoria, further portray women, although many of the same women characters are also found in legends and ballads (romances), including Count Julian’s daughter, Florinda who was frequently blamed for the fall of the last Visigothic king, Roderic, and for the subsequent invasion of the peninsula by North African troops in 711. Another prominent figure in legends and ballads is the noble woman doña Lambra, whose dishonor by the nephew of her new husband implicitly prompted the young nephew’s beheading, as well as that of his six brothers.

Love Relations, Sex, and Family

Love poems by and about women were plentiful early in the medieval period in Arabic and Hebrew. The eleventh-century Cordovan noble woman, Wallāda bint al-Mustakfi, is well known for her scathing compositions to Ibn Zaydūn, although many other women also wrote poetry; one such was Hamda Banāt Ziyād (twelfth century), who wrote an erotic poem about a naked woman by a river (Garulo, Rubiera Mata). Yishaq Ibn Jalfun, an eleventh-century male writer from Cordova, produced amorous compositions about men and women. In the eleventh century, Ibn Hazm of Cordova composed a treatise on love in his Tawq al-hamāma (The Dove’s Neckring), which contained portrayals of women. Muwashshah poems in classical Arabic and Hebrew and zajal poems in colloquial Arabic were invented in al-Andalus (Muslim-dominated Iberia) and often described women in panegyrics and in poems about love. These poems were accompanied by a single stanza called the jarcha (exit) in Romance and vernacular Arabic. Few Andalusi women composed written muwashshahs and zajals, although sometimes women were depicted as singers of the jarchas, where they lamented failed love or the absence of a lover (Rosen).

Women figure prominently in the illustrated, thirteenth-century romance in Arabic from Seville, Qissat Bayād wa Riyād, which tells the love story of a merchant’s son, Bayād, and a woman slave, Riyād. The jealous lady (sayyida) has an important role in the tale, and an old woman (ajuz) narrates the story and intervenes on Bayād’s behalf. The thirteenth-century romance in Castilian, Libro de Apolonio, also includes various women characters, namely, the daughter of the evil king Antíoco, who is raped by her father, and the captured Tarsiana, who staves off unwanted sexual relations with men by playing the lute. The anonymous Castilian epic, Poema de mio Cid (1207), contains one of the most inexplicable episodes of Iberian literature, when the Cid’s daughters, Elvira and Sol, are brutally beaten by their husbands and left to die in an oak grove. The familial emphasis in the Poema is completed by the inclusion of the Cid's wife, Jimena.

The Archpriest of Hita's fourteenth-century Castilian Libro de buen amor (Book of good love) recounts an archpriest's sexual exploits with women. Several women go-betweens aid the archpriest, but Trotaconventos (Convent Trotter) is his favorite and most successful intercessor. The go-between probably derives from literature in Arabic, but also exists in the thirteenth-century story collection translated from Arabic into Castilian, Kalila e Dimna, and is pivotal in the previously mentioned Qissat Bayād wa Riyād, as well as in Fernando de Rojas's fifteenth-century La Celestina, where Celestina's interventions result in the demise of many characters, including the lovesick Calisto and his beloved Melibea.

Women are the focus of late medieval stylized poetry in Castilian and Catalan. In the fifteenth-century, the Marquis of Santillana depicted peasant women (in poems called serranillas) who were desired by gentlemen riding in the countryside. A satirical, grotesque version of these women also appears in the Archpriest's Libro. Courtly images of women are important in the fifteenth- and sixteenth-century songbooks called cancioneros, as well as in chivalric tales, such as the early fourteenth-century Libro del Caballero Zifar, the fifteenth-century Amadís de Gaula, and the fifteenth-century Tirant lo Blanc in Catalan.

Devotional Literature

Devotional tales about the Virgin were popular in medieval Iberia, as evidenced by two thirteenth-century collections of Marian miracles in Castilian. The cleric Gonzalo de Berceo translated and adapted miracles from Latin in his Milagros de Nuestra Señora, where the Virgin saved errant monks, a Jewish child, and thieves. The Milagros begins with the author's presentation as a pilgrim in an allegorical garden. Alfonso X's scribal teams composed a plethora of Marian miracles in the Galician-Portuguese Cantigas de Santa María, which were sometimes accompanied by elaborate miniatures that retold the miracles in visual form. Women saints were further represented in hagiographies, such as Berceo's Poema de Santa Oria, or the anonymous Libro de los huéspedes, which included portrayals of Santa Marta and Santa María Egíçiaica. Fourteenth- and fifteenth-century writers and poets in Valencia, including Bernat Fenollar, also composed numerous praise songs to the Virgin in Catalan.

Leisure, Advice, and Insults

Medieval Iberians played a variety of table games during their leisure time, as evidenced by Alfonso X's illuminated Libro de ajedrez, dados y tablas (Book of chess, dice, and table games). Along with its written text, the manuscript contains illustrations of a range of people playing games, including noble women, servants, Arabs, possibly prostitutes, Jews, and King Alfonso himself. Poems that further indicate a more jocular view of life are the satirical, insulting thirteenth- and fourteenth-century Galician-Portuguese cantigas d'escarnho e de mal dizer, which were collected under the patronage of Alfonso X and Denis of Portugal and contain a variety of portrayals of women. Medieval Iberian nobles and royalty also sometimes required books that provided counsel, such as the antifeminist Sendebār (Libro de los engaños de las mujeres; Book of Women's Deception), which derives from Arabic and was copied in the thirteenth century under the patronage of Alfonso's older brother Fadrique. The Sendebār highlights the image of the evil stepmother who urges the king to kill his own son after falsely claiming that the son attacked her. Another advice book, Juan Manuel's fourteenth-century story collection, the Conde Lucanor, includes portrayals of women, such as the impetuous bride in story 35 who must be tamed lest her husband lose matrimonial control and possibly his own life. This story is often linked to Shakespeare's The Taming of the Shrew.

Medical Literature

A wide range of Iberian medical literature in Arabic, Castilian, Catalan, Hebrew, and Latin discussed women and their well-being, including treatises on cosmetics and works on general health, which provided information on menstrual ailments, coitus, and human reproduction. In his twelfth-century book on treatments, Kitāb al-Muyarrabāt (Book of medical experiences), Abū l-Alā' Zuhri, who practiced medicine in Seville and Morocco, discussed amenorrhea (the failure to menstruate), menstrual problems after abortion, and sterility in women. In the fifteenth century, a number of medical writers addressed women's well-being, including Johannes de Ketham (Compendio de la humana salud; Compendium of human health), Bernard of Gordon (Lilio de medicina; Iris of medicine), and Juan de Aviñón (Sevillana medicina; Medicine of Seville). The anonymous, fifteenth-century Catalan Speculum al foderi (The mirror of coitus) portrayed women as sexual partners and as go-betweens.

The Late Medieval Debate on Women

Many Iberian writers participated in the late medieval debate on women. In the fifteenth century, Isabel de Villena bolstered women's role in Jesus' life in her Catalan Vita Christi (Life of Christ), while Teresa de Cartagena ironically dignified women through their weakness and disease in the Castilian Arboleda de los enfermos (Grove of the infirm) and Admiraçion operum Dey (Wonder at the Works of God). The rise of misogynist literature in the fifteenth century included Alfonso Martínez de Toledo's Arcipreste de Talavera o Corbacho in Castilian and Jaume Roig's Catalan Spill o Llibre de les dones (Mirror or book on women). Both books connected their misogynist discourse to men's well-being, since book four of the Corbacho was a short treatise on men's physiology and health, while the Spill portrayed a variety of women in different professions who aimed to undermine men. In the Spill, for instance, a pastry cook and her daughter included men's body parts in their meat pies, while a woman healer provided women who wished to get pregnant with a "stable" of young men, thereby circumventing their husbands' paternity rights. Roig contrasted these malevolent women with the inimitable Virgin, whose moral and bodily integrity was constant.

JEAN DANGLER

References and Further Reading

- Alfonso X. Cantigas de Santa María. 2 vols. Madrid: Edición, 1979.
- . Prosa histórica, edited by Benito Brancaforte. Madrid: Cátedra, 1990.
- Arcipreste de Hita. Libro de buen amor, edited and translated by Raymond S. Willis. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1972.
- Dīwān de las poetisas de al-Andalus*, edited by Teresa Garulo. Madrid: Hiperión, 1998.
- The Electronic Texts and Concordances of the Prose Works of Alfonso X, El Sabio*, edited by Lloyd Kasten, John Nitti, and Wilhelmina Jonxis-Henkemans. Madison: Hispanic Seminary of Medieval Studies, 1997. CD-ROM.
- Haywood, Louise M. "Medieval Spanish Studies." In The Companion to Hispanic Studies, edited by Catherine Davies. London: Arnold, 2002, pp. 32–49.
- Las jarchas romances y sus moaxajas*, edited by Josep M. Solá-Solé. Madrid: Taurus, 1990.
- Leyendas épicas españolas*, edited by Rosa Castillo. Madrid: Castalia, 1969.

- Martínez de Toledo, Alfonso. Arcipreste de Talavera o Corbacho, edited by Michael Gerli. Madrid: Cátedra, 1992.
- Mirror of Coitus: A Translation and Edition of the Fifteenth-Century Speculum al foderi*. Edited and translated by Michael Solomon. Madison: Hispanic Seminary for Medieval Studies, 1990.
- Poem of the Cid: A Modern Translation with Notes* by Paul Blackburn. Edited by George Economou. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1998.
- Poesía de cancionero*, edited by Álvaro Alonso. Madrid: Cátedra, 1986.
- Poesía femenina hispanoárabe*, edited by María Jesús Rubiera Mata. Madrid: Castalia, 1989.
- Poetas hebreos de al-Andalus (siglos X–XII): Antología*, edited by Ángel Sáenz-Badillos and Judit Targarona Borrás. Córdoba: El Almendro, 1990.
- Rojas, Fernando de. Celestina: A Play in Twenty-One Acts Attributed to Fernando de Rojas. translated by Mack Hendricks Singleton. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1968.
- Rosen, Tova. "The Muwashshah." In The Literature of Al-Andalus, edited by María Rosa Menocal, Raymond P. Scheindlin, and Michael Sells. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000, pp. 165–189.
- Solomon, Michael. The Literature of Misogyny in Medieval Spain: The Arcipreste de Talavera and the Spill. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997.
- Textos y concordancias electrónicos del corpus médico español*, edited by María Teresa Herrera and María Estela González de Fauve. Madison: Hispanic Seminary of Medieval Studies, 1997. CD-ROM.
- The Writings of Teresa de Cartagena*, edited and translated by Dayle Seidenspinner-Núñez. Cambridge: D. S. Brewer, 1998.

See also Cosmetics; Defenses of Women; Epic, Spanish; Iberia; Mary, Virgin: in Literature; Medicine; Misogyny; Muslim Women: Iberia; Muslim Women: Western Literature; Patronage, Literary; Sentimental Romance; Teresa de Cartagena; Wallāda bint al Mustakfi; Women Authors: Spanish Texts

LITERATURE, IRISH

Few women in medieval Ireland actually composed works of literature. The bardic poets were exclusively male. To complicate matters, most poetry from early Ireland is anonymous, and the male poets often adopted female personae, particularly in love poems and laments. However, several women poets are mentioned in early medieval historical sources. Líadain, the fictionalized character in the ninth-century love story Líadain and Cuirithir, is mentioned elsewhere as a female poet. Another woman, Dígde, is said to be the speaker of the Lament of the Old Woman of Beare. It is possible that nuns composed some anonymous poems such as Ísucán ("Jesuskin"), about a vision of the baby Jesus, attributed to St. Íte. Several poems are attributed to the widowed Queen Gormlaith, and some of the dánta grádha (“poems of love”) were possibly composed by women.

Despite the dearth of verifiable female authors, medieval Irish texts include many female characters. Women appear in a variety of literary genres, including poetry, prose sagas, saints’ lives, place-name legends, wisdom literature, legal texts, and annals. The Banshenchas (lore of women), which lists the marriages and children of royal women, is an important pseudo-historical text. While most women in heroic, male-centred texts are marginal figures, a number of them play influential roles. Yet depictions of women often reflect the widespread misogyny of medieval European culture; wisdom texts warn of women’s faults, and in numerous dindsenchas (“lore of place-names”) tales, names of geographical features memorialize male–female conflict. The presence of strong women in medieval Irish texts led many nineteenth and twentieth-century scholars to assume that this reflected real-life respect for early medieval women. However, feminist analysis has challenged this view. When female characters do act and speak, they are often criticized, and even blamed for disastrous events. Even the late twelfth-century Acallamh na Senórach (Colloquy of the ancients), with its more chivalric ethos, is clearly uneasy about the dangerous power of the feminine.

Romantic notions about heroic women inherited from nineteenth-century cultural nationalism, and the pervasive use of mythological models have, until recently, hampered literary analysis of women in these texts. Mythic paradigms that stress vast time-spans divorce medieval Irish texts from the historical and cultural conditions in which they were composed, rewritten, and received. The mythological approach was fuelled by literary depictions of goddesses of war and death such as the Morrígan, and of supernatural women connected to a pagan Otherworld. Strong women were interpreted as reflections of pre-Christian goddesses, particularly the sovereignty goddess of the land who affirms the next ruler through sexual union with him, often appearing as a hag who transforms herself into a beauty (as in The Adventures of the Sons of Eochaid Muigmedon). Many women have been slotted into this paradigm without full consideration of the texts’ larger narrative concerns, resulting in simplistic, dehistoricized readings. The most obvious victim is Medb, the great warrior queen of the epic Táin Bó Cúailgne (Cattle-Raid of Cooley), whose dominant behavior was explained as typical of a sovereignty goddess.

The last two decades have seen a steady expansion of critical approaches to gender in medieval Irish texts. Herbert showed how the tragic heroine Deirdre could be read as a literary figure not constrained by the sovereignty paradigm. Ní Dhonnchadha’s work on The Lament of the Old Woman of Beare has suggested that the speaker is a historical woman rather than a goddess. Close readings of the Táin by Kelly, Dooley, Ní Bhrolcháin, and others have subjected the text to sustained gender analysis. Findon has analyzed a character with no links to the sovereignty goddess whatsoever: Emer, Cú Chulainn’s wife in the Ulster Cycle tales. Recent work has considered the women named Gormlaith, all connected to actual kings, as historical figures reshaped in literary texts in response to political concerns. Volume 4 of The Field Day Anthology presents numerous early texts by and about women in medieval Ireland.

Recent studies of saints’ lives have intersected with those focusing on secular tales to produce sensitive readings of women. While many female saints such as Brigit, Íte, and Monenna are depicted as strong characters, they are less likely to be censured for their “manly” speech and behavior than secular heroines, because a “masculine spirit” was a positive attribute in a female saint (as long as it did not undermine the male hierarchy). The application of feminist criticism, New Historicism, and other theoretical approaches to these texts is providing new insights into medieval Irish literature.

JOANNE FINDON

References and Further Reading

- Bitel, Lisa M. Land of Women: Tales of Sex and Gender from Early Ireland. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1996.
- Bourke, Angela, Siobhan Kilfeather, et al., eds. The Field Day Anthology of Irish Writing. Volume IV: Irish Women’s Writing and Traditions. Cork: Cork University Press, 2002.
- Clancy, Thomas Owen. “Women Poets in Early Medieval Ireland: Stating the Case.” In ‘The Fragility of Her Sex?’ Medieval Irish Women in their European Context, edited by Christine Meek and Katherine Simms. Dublin: Four Courts Press, 1996, pp. 43–72.
- Connon, Anne. “The Banshenchas and the Uí Néill Queens of Tara.” In Seanchas: Studies in Early Medieval Irish Archaeology, History and Literature in Honour of Francis J. Byrne, edited by Alfred P. Smyth. Dublin: Four Courts Press, 2000, pp. 98–108.
- Cross, Tom Peete, and Clark Harris Slover, trans. Ancient Irish Tales. Totowa, N.J.: Barnes & Noble, 1981.
- Dooley, Ann. “The Invention of Women in the Táin.” In Ulidia: Proceedings of the First International Conference on the Ulster Cycle of Tales, edited by J. P. Mallory and Gerard Stockman. Belfast: December Publications, 1994, pp. 123–133.
- Findon, Joanne. A Woman’s Words: Emer and Female Speech in the Ulster Cycle. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1997.
- Herbert, Máire. “Celtic Heroine? The Archaeology of the Deirdre Story.” In Gender in Irish Writing, edited by Tony O’Brien Johnson and David Cairns. Philadelphia: Open University Press, 1991, pp. 13–22.

LITERATURE, IRISH

- Johnston, Elva. "Transforming Women in Irish Hagiography." Peritia 9 (1995): 197–220.
- Kelly, Patricia. "The Táin as Literature." In Aspects of the Táin, edited by J. P. Mallory. Belfast: December Publications, 1992, pp. 69–102.
- Larson, Heather Feldmeth. "The Veiled Poet: Liadain and Cuirithir and the Role of the Woman-Poet." In Heroic Poets and Poetic Heroes in Celtic Tradition. CSANA Yearbook 3–4. Ed. Joseph Falaky Nagy and Leslie Ellen Jones. Dublin: Four Courts Press: 2005, pp. 263–268.
- Murphy, Gerard. Early Irish Lyrics. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1956.
- Ní Bhrolcháin, Muireann. "Re Tóin Mná: In Pursuit of Troublesome Women." In Ulidia. 1994, pp. 115–121.
- Ní Dhonnchadha, Máirín. "Cailleach and Other Terms for Veiled Women in Medieval Irish Texts." Éigse 28 (1994–1995): 71–96.
- . "Two Female Lovers." Ériu 45 (1994): 113–120.
- . "On Gormfhlaith Daughter of Flann Sinna and the Lure of the Sovereignty Goddess." Seanchas. Dublin: Four Courts Press, 2000, pp. 225–237.
- Ní Mhaonaigh, Máire. "Tales of Three Gormlraiths in Medieval Irish Literature." Ériu 52 (2002): 1–24.

See also Brigit; Hagiography; Ireland; Misogyny; Monasticism and Nuns, Celtic; Supernatural Women; Virile Women

LITERATURE, ITALIAN

The issue of gender is central in early Italian literature and is clearly posed by the texts themselves: Italian literary texts of this period feature male lover-poets and the female figures that they love. This entry sketches a paradigm for evaluating the treatment of women in this tradition, looking at Italian literature from its lyric origins to Dante, Boccaccio, and Petrarch through the lens of the competing ideological systems to which these authors subscribe: on the one hand, they subscribe to the ideology of courtly love, which permeates the beautiful love poetry for which the tradition is so well known, and, on the other, to an often violent, anti-courtly ideology that permeates their moralistic poetry. These two ideologies underwrite very different attitudes toward women and toward gender.

Courtly vs. Anti-Courtly

The dialectic between courtly and anti-courtly ideologies is a historical constant in this tradition: it is present not only in Dante, but in poets before Dante, like Guittone d'Arezzo, and it is a major feature of Boccaccio's work as well. Poetry based in a courtly logic is narcissistic and centered on the male lover-poet; the female object of desire serves as a screen on which he projects questions and concerns about himself. Whether we are speaking of the early courtly poetry of the Sicilian Giacomo da Lentini or the later theologized courtliness of Dante and his fellow stilnovisti (poets of the "new style"), including Guido Cavalcanti and Cino da Pistoia, the fundamental logic of the courtly poem remains narcissistic, as Dante acknowledges in the Vita nuova, when he sets himself the task of breaking from it. The didactic works of writers like Guittone d'Arezzo, Dante in his late moral canzoni, and Boccaccio, on the other hand, are marked by a utilitarian stamp: women are supposed to use this literature, to be instructed by it, to learn from it. These texts demonstrate a need to communicate with women, to treat them as subjects who can learn, rather than as objects to be desired.

The courtly conventions of troubadour love poetry—based on the notion of the lover's feudal service to midons (Italian madonna), his lady, from whom he expects a guerdon (Italian guiderdone), or reward—were transplanted to the court of Frederick II in Palermo. Palermo became the capital of the first group of Italian vernacular lyric poets, the so-called Sicilian School, whose leader was Giacomo da Lentini, most likely the inventor of the sonnet. At the heart of troubadour poetry is an unresolved tension between the poet-lover's allegiance to the lady and his allegiance to God, a conflict that Giacomo distills in the sonnet Io m'aggio posto in core a Dio servire, where the first quatrain identifies one pole of his desire—he wants to serve God, to go to paradise—while the second quatrain poses the problem: he does not want to go without his lady. The last verse brings together the two terms of the conflict (the lady and paradise) in a nonresolution that keeps the focus of the poem squarely on the "divided" (diviso) self of the lover-poet.

From Sicily the courtly lyric moved north to the communes of Tuscany, where it was cultivated by Guittone d'Arezzo, the caposcuola of the Tuscan School; Guittone writes love poetry in the courtly style, but unlike Giacomo da Lentini, he also writes moralistic poems like his didactic poem on female chastity, Altra fiata aggio già, donne, parlato. This canzone offers an early model of a paradigm that Dante will adopt, whereby paternalistic morality defeats courtliness and ironically enhances the status of women by conceiving them as moral agents. Women are moral agents in Guittone's canzone, albeit weak-minded ones, who need to be prodded and pushed in the direction of virtue. Although highest praise is reserved for absolute chastity, Guittone allows that a woman may choose marital chastity over absolute chastity, and he acknowledges a woman's right to desire a husband. Guittone is explicit about the double standard that applies to the sexes: carnal vice is bad in men, but much worse in women. The importance of cover is one of the topoi common to moralizing discourses on female conduct that we find in Altra fiata, along with the stress on appropriate speech and the caution against ornamentation. It is significant that Guittone directs his instructions on covering dress and modesty not to a male protector but directly to the woman, who is thus placed in charge of covering herself. Guittone ends Altra fiata, a poem that addresses women and “women’s issues” throughout, by affirming the moral value and utility of a discourse to and about women.

Dante

The utility of discourse is a theme common to texts addressed to women, as we see in one of Dante’s great moral poems, Doglia mi reca nello core ardire, a canzone whose signature anti-courtliness allows Dante to attack women for their “vile desire” of base men, rather than focusing—as courtly poetry does—exclusively on male desire. It may seem counterintuitive to read the harsh paternalism of Doglia mi reca in a progressive light, but Dante accomplishes a lot in this canzone. The ladies of Doglia mi reca are definitely off the courtly pedestal. They have more to worry about than the behavior of their male lovers: they have to take care of themselves, including their immortal souls, which Dante cautions are in danger of perishing. They have acquired the status of moral agents and although they do not yet speak—an activity for which we have to await characters like Francesca da Rimini in the Commedia, where Dante’s move to construe women as moral agents rather than as mirrors for male poets is fulfilled—they are expected to be able students, fully receiving and intellectually digesting the poet’s message. Whereas the courtly canzone frequently opens with a conventional address to ladies who then disappear from the poem (Cavalcanti’s Donna me prega, Dante’s Donne ch’avete intelletto d’amore), the female addressees whom Dante enlists in the struggle against vice in Doglia mi reca are summoned again at mid-canzone: “because I want my discourse to be of use to you, I’ll come down from the general to the particular, and to a lighter form of expression, so that it may be less hard to understand.” Dante here demonstrates a pedagogic pragmatism that may well be a hallmark of texts addressed to women: the emphasis on the utility of discourse—“perchè lo meo dire util vi sia”—anticipates the Decameron, a text addressed to women not once or twice but consistently and indefatigably.

Boccaccio

In the Commedia women explode the courtly code by becoming speakers, in the case of Beatrice a veritable Beatrix loquax, and in Boccaccio’s texts as well women are endowed with language. Boccaccio is the Italian author who explicitly places the category “woman” (rather than just a particular woman) at the core of his opus, which ranges from early courtly works in the vernacular to the misogyny of the later Corbaccio, also in the vernacular, and the Latin encyclopedic De mulieribus claris. At the center of this great woman-oriented literary production stands the Decameron. Boccaccio defends his targeting of female readers precisely on the basis of their greater need and his greater utility. Women are cloistered and enclosed, constrained by the wishes of their families and immured in their rooms, while men have access to a host of distracting activities: “men, if they want, are able to walk abroad, see and hear many things, go fowling, hunting, fishing, riding and gambling, or attend to their business affairs” (Proemio, 12). This dichotomy between the relative access of men and women to the benefits of human and social intercourse—including sexual—is the ethical template on which Boccaccio constructs his masterpiece.

The Decameron belongs to a specific tradition, which, if not feminist, is arguably the tradition in which feminism could later take root. This is the tradition in which female interlocutors are not just tropes, not just part of the poet’s self-construction, as they are for courtly poets. Standing between courtliness on the one hand and misogyny on the other, this tradition is moralizing, didactic, utilitarian, pragmatic—and truly addresses issues of women in society.

Petrarch

This tradition—starting with Guittone d’Arezzo and going forward to Boccaccio—is in my view the more open and progressive toward women. It is extremely interesting, from this perspective, that Petrarch did not write moralizing canzoni to women like Guittone’s Altra fiata and Dante’s Doglia mi reca. His vernacular output does not include such poems; when he turns Boccaccio’s programmatically ambiguous Griselda story (Decameron 10.10) into a treatise on female obedience he also translates it into Latin, indicating that his target audience is not female. Petrarch forged his identity against Dante’s by returning in his vernacular lyric collection Rerum vulgarium fragmenta to the courtly paradigm that Dante abandoned, thus institutionalizing a model of gender relations that endured for centuries and that, through the extraordinary network that was European literary Petrarchism, became a cultural trope. In another demonstration—this time in the area of gender roles—of what it means that Petrarch triumphed over Dante as the model for subsequent generations of Italian poets, we can hazard the following: the commitment to female historicity and selfhood that we find, for instance, in Dante's treatment of the damned Francesca da Rimini, is not a feature that we associate with Petrarch, and it is Petrarch who set the agenda for the subsequent Italian literary tradition.

TEODOLINDA BAROLINI

References and Further Reading

- Barolini, Teodolinda. "Le parole son donne e i fatti son maschi: Toward a Sexual Poetics of the Decameron (Dec. II 10)." Studi sul Boccaccio 21 (1993): 175–197.
- . "Lifting the Veil? Notes toward a Gendered History of Italian Literature." In Medieval Constructions in Gender and Identity: Essays in Honor of Joan M. Ferrante, edited by Teodolinda Barolini. Tempe, Ariz.: Arizona Center for Medieval & Renaissance Studies, 2005, pp. 169–188.
- Boccaccio, Giovanni. Il Corbaccio, edited by Giulia Natali. Milano: Mursia, 1992.
- The Corbaccio*. translated by Anthony K. Cassell. 2nd ed. rev. Binghamton, N.Y.: Medieval & Renaissance Texts & Studies, 1993.
- . Decameron, edited by Vittore Branca. Torino: Einaudi, 1980.
- The Decameron*. translated by G. H. McWilliam. London: Penguin, 1995.
- . De mulieribus claris, edited by V. Zaccaria. Vol. 10. 2nd ed. In Tutte le opere di Giovanni Boccaccio. Milano: Mondadori, 1970.
- Famous Women*. trans. Virginia Brown. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 2001.
- Dante Alighieri. La Commedia secondo l'antica vulgata, edited by Giorgio Petrocchi. 4 vols. Milano: Mondadori, 1966–1967.
- The Divine Comedy of Dante Alighieri*. translated by Robert M. Durling. 3 vols. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.
- . Rime, edited by Gianfranco Contini. 2nd ed. rev. Milano: Einaudi, 1965.
- Dante's Lyric Poetry*, edited and translated by Kenelm Foster and Patrick Boyde. 2 vols. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1967.
- . Vita nuova, edited by Domenico De Robertis. Milano-Napoli: Ricciardi, 1980.
- Vita nuova*. translated by Dino S. Cervigni and Edward Vasta. South Bend, Ind.: University of Notre Dame Press, 1995.
- Ferrante, Joan M. Woman as Image in Medieval Literature from the Twelfth Century to Dante. New York: Columbia University Press, 1975.
- Jordan, Constance. "Boccaccio's In-Famous Women: Gender and Civic Virtue in the De mulieribus claris." In Ambiguous Realities: Women in the Middle Ages and Renaissance, edited by Carole Levin and Jeanie Watson. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1987, pp. 25–47.
- Kirkpatrick, Robin. "The Griselda Story in Boccaccio, Petrarch, and Chaucer." In Chaucer and the Italian Trecento, edited by Piero Boitani. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1983, pp. 231–248.
- Miguel, Marilyn. A Rhetoric of the Decameron. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2003.
- Petrarca, Francesco. Epistolae Seniles 17.3. Italian translation: "Sulla straordinaria obbedienza e fedeltà coniugale." In Opere latine di Francesco Petrarca. 2 vols. edited by Antonietta Bufano. Torino: UTET, 1970, pp. 1313–1339. Petrarch: The First Modern Scholar and Man of Letters. Translated by Harvey Robinson. 2nd ed. New York: Greenwood Press, 1969.
- . Rerum vulgarium fragmenta. 2 vols. edited by Rosanna Bettarini. Torino: Einaudi, 2005.
- Petrarch's Lyric Poems*. translated by Robert M. Durling. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1976.
- Vickers, Nancy. "Diana Described: Scattered Woman and Scattered Rhyme." Critical Inquiry 8 (1981): 265–279.

See also Beatrice; Boccaccio, Giovanni; Chastity and Chaste Marriage; Conduct Literature; Courtly Love; Dante Alighieri; Defenses of Women; Education, Lay; Griselda; Italy; Literature, Occitan; Misogyny; Petrarch; Women Authors: Italian

LITERATURE, LATIN

At the turn of the third millennium, the field of medieval women's studies in general, and in particular the still quite under-researched subfield of Latin literatures, is very much in flux. Since the topic has only recently found serious scholarly attention, there are no definitive studies, but there is a great deal of activity, with an astonishing array of very high-quality collaborative ventures (essay collections, handbooks) leading the way. Recent studies have been opening up multiple new perspectives, and also complicating what we might mean by "women in literature," using newer strains of cultural studies, feminist theory, psychoanalysis, and queer theory, as well as new archival research, to rethink women's roles, and the gendering of medieval Latin literature in general.

A few initial cautions are necessary. First, it is debatable whether there is such a thing as "medieval Latin literature." Unlike the vernacular literatures, which have fairly tight geographical and even temporal boundaries, "medieval Latin" covers all of western Europe and as much as a thousand years, from about 500 to about 1500. Second, we need to consider what we mean by "literature." Since the vast majority of written texts in the medieval West are in Latin, by a broad definition—"all written texts"—"Latin literature" would cover almost the entire intellectual output of the millennium under consideration. By a narrow definition, on the other hand, modeled anachronistically on what we might expect to find in the “literature” section of our local bookstore—“nontechnical texts suitable for the serious leisure reading of educated persons”—the material under consideration would be fairly limited, and somewhat dispersed and fragmented, since Latin is for the Middle Ages the language of higher learning, of the church, of “clerical culture” in general; leisure reading, while by no means lacking, plays by definition a marginal role. (The vernacular literatures, by contrast, are dominated by the fictional, the sociable, the courtly, the nonclerkly, and “nonserious”; they come to technical and learned subject matters relatively late.) By the same token—Latin being synonymous with clerical culture—Latin literature is predominantly male in authorship, readership, and ethos. While the rise of vernacular literatures has often persuasively been linked to increased female patronage and readership, Latin has been called western Europe’s “father tongue,” with all the patriarchal overtones this implies. If Latin culture does not actively exclude women, it certainly does not actively seek to include them either.

For these reasons all studies of women in medieval literature oscillate between two opposite but not unconnected poles: describing, on the one hand, women’s undoubted marginalization in a male-dominated society, and in almost exclusively male ecclesiastical and educational structures; and seeking to emphasize, on the other hand, the strong and vibrant contributions women have managed to make all the same. Indeed, it has been observed that the older critical assumption that women were largely excluded from the high culture of the Middle Ages has in itself contributed to rendering women invisible. We tend not to find what we do not look for, and newer studies have indeed found far more female participation in medieval culture, including Latin culture.

Participation of Women in Latin Literary Culture

As recent research has shown, quite a few women—more than used to be thought—did acquire Latin literacy. Systematic instruction was sometimes available at monastic schools. Heloise was well-known for her exceptional learning, but she must have had classmates at Argenteuil who also achieved a certain level of education. Goscelin of St. Bertin not only assumes that Eva’s education at Wilton will enable her to read the difficult Latin of the Liber confortatorius he wrote for her, but in it he also outlines an ambitious reading program for her. Some women learned their Latin more casually, by daily exposure: Hildegard of Bingen, despite her prodigious output in Latin, remained unsure of her grammar all her life and had it corrected by an amanuensis. There were women who wrote in Latin; there were women who commissioned or sponsored Latin literature; there were women who could and did read it, and their involvement left a mark on the genres they touched, in particular epistolary and devotional literature.

Letters

Letters are a genre in which women are particularly well represented, both as addressees and as writers, and it shows particularly well the odd dialectic of exclusion and inclusion previously mentioned. Even though medieval letters are not the personal or informal genre we think of today, its more restricted range, more intimate nature, and quite often the involvement of male correspondents seem to make it easier for women to participate. Yet there are some limits. The influential patristic models of Ambrose’s and Jerome’s extensive correspondence with female friends and spiritual advisees set a pattern of male-female exchanges that, on the one hand, accords the highest respect to the female correspondent (usually a woman of some social standing), but also places her in the role of advisee, narrowly circumscribing her authority and the roles open to her even as they praise her. In the high medieval version of this set-up the male ecclesiastical writer (e.g., Hildebert of Lavardin) is at least nominally inferior to the abbesses, noble women, and queens with whom he exchanges letters. Some letters or texts with epistolary features—such as Baudri of Bourgueil’s long poem “To Countess Adela”—play with this status incongruence: it is a didactic compendium of history, geography, and the Seven Liberal Arts, written with the highest deference and lavish praise, but also with schoolmasterly authority and even sly seductiveness.

Even though medieval Latin scarcely participates in the fin’amors pattern of the courts, some scholars have detected notes of it in the patronage relationship of this sort of text. Longer works of spiritual advice—letters that expand into book length, such as Goscelin of St. Bertin’s Liber confortatorius for the recluse Eva, Aelred of Rievaulx’s De institutione inclusarum, addressed to his sister, or Abelard’s advisory correspondence with Heloise—further thematize and complicate these delicate relationships of deference and control.

But not all women’s letters are in this mold. Joan Ferrante’s online project “Epistolae,” has recently made available a magnificent sampling of medieval women's correspondence, often between two women. Hildegard of Bingen's huge correspondence includes political advice to the powerful, health and spiritual advice to anyone who requested it, and personal correspondence with female and male friends; yet Hildegard, in particular, struggles explicitly with the question of what sort of public teaching voice is appropriate and permissible for a woman. Epistolary expression can permit extensive self-statements and the beginnings of autobiography. Hildegard's is preserved in fragments in her secretary's account of her life; Heloise can be said to be writing a (partial) autobiography in response to and around Abelard's far more coherent and assertive one.

The Misogynist Tradition and the "Defense of Women"

Given the vastness of "medieval Latin literature," it is impossible to generalize about its "image" or even "images" of women. Nor is Latin literature clearly demarcated from the vernaculars; there is much cross-over in both directions. There is a strong and much-analyzed composite tradition of misogynist discourses, made up of biblical, scientific, patristic, and popular sources, which relentlessly reiterate, often in catalog form, the same antifemale images and themes. A chief source is Jerome's Against Jovinian. The manifestations of this genre range from brief jingles to lengthy diatribes such as Marbod's De matrona, antimatrimonial treatises like Walter Map's or the anonymous De coniuge non ducenda. Their counterparts, the "Dignities of Women," or what Blamires calls the "Defense of Women," are, for the most part, closely linked to the misogynist tradition; even though some (especially Abelard's letter on nuns) are eloquent and thoughtful, more often they are full of backhanded compliments and restrictive ideals of feminine virtue, and, above all, so closely based on the misogynist models that they tend to reinforce rather than counteract them. Besides, as the Wife of Bath and Virginia Woolf pointed out, the sheer mass of male professors' opinions on women, positive or negative, tends to be oppressive.

Hagiography

Needless to say, few genres so explicitly engage in blame and praise; most texts handle women's images, for better and for worse, in far more nuanced ways.

Hagiography, another genre where women figure prominently both as subjects and as readers (and to some extent as authors), can serve as a focus for our observations. It is by definition a formulaic genre, seeking to demonstrate a subject's conformity to certain types, and the schemata available for women are particularly limited. Yet medieval hagiography of women inherits from antiquity a few highly productive and artistically appealing prototypes, in particular the virgin martyr, a young woman proudly defending her faith and sexual integrity through torture and execution; and the desert ascetic and/or "penitent whore" derived from the Vitae Patrum literature that offers such intriguing figures as Mary Magdalen, Thais, or Mary of Egypt. (Hrotsvit of Gandersheim uses several of these stories in her tenth-century Latin plays.) Both types of figures seem to have been of interest to medieval women who chose lives of monastic virginity or contemplative seclusion, and such texts were often offered as reading matter to them. To what extent they offer strong role models (the brash virgin martyr talking truth to power and defending her physical integrity; the "desert mothers" achieving astonishing feats of asceticism and self-sufficiency, as well as great authority), and to what extent they are controlling, punitive, and even close to pornographic (graphic, often sexualized violence inflicted on the martyrs; the emphasis on humiliation and penance in the "penitent whore" type) is open to debate.

Besides hagiographies of historically distant saints, there are lives of more contemporary women that for all their references to hagiographical types develop some individual, biographical features. A prime example, now much studied and frequently taught, is the Life of Christina of Markyate. One can perhaps extend the genre to include biographical works on secular women, who sometimes figure as patrons as well as subjects of such texts: the English queens Emma and Edith both commissioned and probably oversaw the writing of biographical narratives that favored their political perspectives. In such texts, the interplay between hagiographic topos and biographical detail is often both illuminating and artistically intriguing.

The Virgin Mary occupies a place apart in female hagiography and devotional literature more generally. Prayers to the Virgin become a distinct subgenre of Latin devotional texts in the central Middle Ages. The collections of Miracles of the Virgin, of great popularity in most vernacular European languages, did begin in Latin; they furnish an extraordinary picture of an all-powerful yet emotionally accessible mother figure intervening on behalf of her childlike devotees—an image, it seems, at least as popular with male as with female readers.

Conclusion

This necessarily limited, selected, and unsystematic set of notes can only serve as a first appetite-whetting introduction to some of the questions researchers can ask. There are many fields of medieval literature (the secular lyric; prosopopeias or planctus inspired by Ovid's Heroides; drama, both secular and religious; Latin "romances," if that is not a contradiction in terms, and Latin epics; short narratives in collections like Walter Map's De nugis curialium, the Dolopathus/Seven Sages tradition, or in collections of preachers' exempla) that are not yet extensively studied at all, and would repay analysis from a gender point of view. Anyone interested in this line of research should not be deterred by the lack of comprehensive overviews, but rather be inspired by the wide range of approaches and leads in what is an open and exciting field.

MONIKA C. OTTER

References and Further Reading

- Blamires, Alcuin. Women Defamed and Women Defended. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1992.
- Dear Sister: Medieval Women and the Epistolary Genre*, edited by Karen Cherewatuk and Ulrike Wiethaus. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1993.
- Fanous, Samuel, and Henrietta Leyser. Christina of Markyate: A Twelfth-Century Holy Woman. London: Routledge, 2004.
- Ferrante, Joan M. "Epistolae: Medieval Women's Latin Letters." <http://db.ccnmtl.columbia.edu/ferrante/>
- . To the Glory of Her Sex: Women's Roles in the Composition of Medieval Texts. Bloomington, Ind.: Indiana University Press, 1997.
- Gold, Barbara K., Paul Allen Miller, and Charles Platter, eds. Sex and Gender in Medieval and Renaissance Texts: The Latin Tradition. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1997.
- Hemptinne, Thérèse de, and María Eugenia Góngora, eds. The Voice of Silence: Women's Literacy in a Men's Church. Turnhout: Brepols, 2004.
- Hollis, Stephanie, et al., eds. Writing the Wilton Women: Goscelin's Legend of Edith and Liber Confortatorius. Turnhout: Brepols, 2004.
- Townsend, David, and Andrew Taylor, eds. The Tongue of the Fathers: Gender and Ideology in Twelfth-Century Latin. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1998.

See also Christina of Markyate; Defenses of Women; Education, Monastic; Exemplan; Feminist Theories and Methodologies; Goscelin of St. Bertin; Hagiography; Heloise; Hildegard of Bingen; Hrotsvit of Gandersheim; Jerome, Influence of; Letter Writing; Literacy and Reading; Latin; Mary, Virgin; in Literature; Miracles and Miracle Collections; Misogyny; Patronage, Literary; Psychoanalytic Theory; Queer Theory; Virgin Martyrs; Wife of Bath

LITERATURE, MIDDLE ENGLISH

The emergence of Middle English as a literary language resulted from a complex series of interrelated social, political and historical factors following the Norman Conquest in 1066. English (Anglo-Saxon) lost its prestige as the language of cultural expression and the law, although it survived in spoken form. What may be called an antiquarian movement to preserve the language existed chiefly in monasteries in the west of England, but when early Middle English made its first appearance, it was characterized by a blend of converging linguistic and cultural traditions—Latin, French or Anglo-Norman, Welsh, and English—whether in actual content, or by influence. Even by the fourteenth century, when in 1362 English gained primacy as the language of Parliament, traces of cosmopolitanism remained, with some manuscripts being either bi- or multilingual in their selection of texts; and some authors, such as John Gower (d. 1408), choosing to write in different languages for different audiences and purposes.

Saints' Lives and Exemplary Literature

It is a happy coincidence for this volume that among the earliest flowerings of Middle English were texts about, and designed in large part for the consumption of, women, for example the so-called "Katherine Group." This collection dates from c. 1190–1230 and consists of lives of the virgin martyrs Catherine, Margaret of Antioch, and Juliana, supplemented by a letter given the modern editorial title of Hali Meidhad, a treatise persuading women to eschew marriage and childbirth, and an allegory, Sawles Ward, regarding the safeguarding of the soul. The lives, as internal references make clear, were intended for listeners, as well as readers. All are exemplary texts and are closely connected with the Ancrene Wisse, the ever-popular guide for anchoresses, written originally for three sisters in Herefordshire. The taste for saints' lives continued throughout the medieval period: The South English Legendary, including legends of many women, survives in different versions in over fifty manuscripts dating from the late-thirteenth to the early-fifteenth century; while the Gilte Legende, in large part a translation from the late-thirteenth-century Latin Legenda aurea of Jacobus Voragine, may be placed in between the late-fourteenth or early-fifteenth centuries: Among the women commemorated are Saints Dorothy, Thais, Pelagia, and Mary Magdalen. There is thus some overlap with the Legendys of Hooly Wummen by Osbern Bokenham, which he started compiling in 1443, and for which an element of female patronage is certain. The taste for exemplary texts for women, including ones from earlier centuries, continued late into the Middle Ages with, for instance, the two English translations of De institutione inclusarum written by Aelred of Rievaulx (1110–1167) for his sister. These survive in Bodleian Library MS Eng. Poet. a.1 (the Vernon MS) of the last decade of the fourteenth century and Bodley 423, copied by the scribe Stephen Dodesham, latterly in his life a Carthusian monk, who died 1481–1482. The audience for the first of these copies was probably women: perhaps nuns or a community of wealthy laywomen.

Courtly Lyric and Lovers' Complaints

In strong contrast to the devotional strain of writing is the ubiquitous, usually anonymous, courtly love lyric, written in a variety of verse forms. These typically follow a similar pattern and mode of expression: The male Lover complains of unrequited love, and there is an abundance of refined emotion and language. They thus constitute the opposite of those other lyrics, often ribald, voiced by women, which fall into the category of antifeminist literature. (An important exception to this general rule is the fifteenth-century "Findern" lyrics, apparently composed by women, which complain of a lover's or husband's absences.) There is a degree of overlap between the brief courtly lyric and the longer complaint: The Complaint of the Black Knight by the Benedictine John Lydgate (d. 1449), for example, is a tapestry of courtly motifs and emotions, and is deeply indebted to Chaucer's Boke of the Duchesse, in which the complaint of the Man in Black is embedded within an allegorical dream-poem concerning the hunting of the hart. The absent heroine, White, represents the epitome of the courtly Other, in her beauty, her modesty, and her ultimate inaccessibility—through death. Arguably the most ambitious of these types of poem is the series by Charles d'Orléans (d. 1465), which he translated into English from his French original while a prisoner of war. In this elegant series of ballades and roundels, Charles presents what can be interpreted as a narrative sequence recounting a relationship with a distant Lady, her death, and his subsequent courtship of another.

Among longer poems, Chaucer's Legend of Good Women (c.1386) breaks ground barely touched in English previously. Again framed within a dream in which Chaucer is ordered by the God of Love to write of steadfast women (a secular Legendary) in penance for having traduced the female sex by his portrayal of Criseyde, the nine women's stories which survive (the text may never have been completed) are sufficiently ambiguous for little critical consensus to have been reached over whether they are ironic or a genuine experimentation with a new form of writing. Whichever the case, while some of the women are treated with sympathy (Dido, for instance), others barely figure within their own tales. That of Medea, for example, scarcely features her notorious history, concentrating instead on Jason's perfidy. Gower's Confessio amantis owes much to Chaucer's notion of framing: Like the Legend, it utilizes Ovid, only here the tales are taken to illustrate moral behaviour inculcated in the complainant, the Lover, by his confessor, Venus, who finally advises him to retire from the pursuit of Love, on account of his age. Thus are the complaint and the exemplar fused.

Romance

Within the broad spectrum of texts that go to make up the unwieldy genre of romance are many texts in which women are not only the passive objects of desire, but also the active protagonists through whom the hero achieves his goal, leading to eventual union within marriage. That this is so from the beginnings of romance in Middle English is demonstrated by King Horn (c. 1225), translated from Anglo-Norman: Rymenhild's physical passion for Horn is fully legitimized within the text, and it is she who initiates his knighting by her father and thus the action of the poem. In Sir Degrevaunt (c. 1400) it is the heroine, Meliador, alone, who brings about reconciliation between the Arthurian knight and her father. John Metham, in his Amoryus and Cleopes (1448–1449), echoes Chaucer and Lydgate, and in the depiction of Cleopes there are reminiscences of Medea's story of her relationship with Jason, as Cleopes prepares Amoryus with advice on how to overcome a dragon that is destroying their country. Other women in romance may be described as strong because, like Griselda, they demonstrate steadfastness in the face of adversity. The tales which come under the heading of "the calumniated wife" include The King of Tars, Octavian (respectively early- and mid-fourteenth century), and Le Bone Florence of Rome (late fourteenth century). Connected with these is the fragmentary early-fourteenth-century Lay le Freine, a translation from the French by Marie de France, in which Freine is tested by her lover, who purposes to marry Freine's twin sister from whom she was separated at birth. Women's strength is not, however, always represented as a positive in the romances. In another translation from Marie's Lais, Thomas Chestre's Sir Launfal (second half of the fifteenth century), Launfal's benign fairy lover is counterpoised by a jealous and vindictive Guinivere, who tries to have the knight killed after he rejects her sexual advances. Perhaps the ultimate antiheroine is Morgan le Fay, King Arthur's half-sister who, in Sir Thomas Malory's Arthuriad, attempts to slay her brother, and destroy the Round Table.

Antifeminism and the Woman Question in Middle English

It was not solely in anonymous lyrics (such as those previously mentioned) and fabliaux, in which antifeminism was rampant in the Middle Ages. Debate still continues, for example, over the extent of Lydgate's antifeminism, demonstrated in lyrics such as "Horns Away," in which he decries women's fashionable extremes, and others in which he criticizes their lack of steadfastness. Elsewhere, due in large measure to the teachings of the church and medical theories as to the female constitution, women were all too often seen as the gateway to man's damnation. This is so even in devotional texts designed for their use. The author of Ancrene Wisse describes how the eyes and ears of Eve led to the downfall of mankind, because of her gaze directed to the apple and her willingness to listen to Satan; while the description of the physical deformity and torments of pregnancy in Hali Meidhad, although ostensibly designed for the higher purpose of preserving chastity, has a distinct element of misogyny in its revulsion at the female body. Yet it was not until Chaucer opened the way for debate with his fictionalized criticism of his depiction of Criseyde in the Prologue to The Legend of Good Women that the matter became a staple of literary discussion. There was no English Christine de Pizan and no high-profile quarrel over Le Roman de la Rose, as there was in France. Yet one of Christine's works was translated into English in 1402, which helped to spark a literary debate: Thomas Hoccleve, follower of Chaucer and a clerk of the Privy Seal in London, wrote his Letter of Cupid in 1402, in which he invokes the Legend, in itself a controversial act. And his translation did not apparently go down well in all quarters. In his "Dialogue with a Friend," written as part of the Series around 1419–1420, the "Friend" reprimands Hoccleve for abusing women in this work, for which reason they are still angry with him. The writer disputes the blame attached to him, but is advised to write to please women in the future. Nevertheless, the Letter was one of Hoccleve's most widely copied works, surviving in eleven codices, often in conjunction with other poems about women, not least various tales from Chaucer's Legend. Another text which finds its way into this manuscript collocation is the largely accurate English translation by Sir Richard Ros (d. 1482) of Alain Chartier's La Belle Dame Sans Merci, which itself had provoked controversy in the French court. The meaning of the poem is ambiguous, in that the disdainful Lady refuses the Lover's advances in terms reminiscent of Christine's advice as to the appropriate response to be taken against "avauntors" or boasters, but ends with the death of the spurned Lover from a broken heart. The contexts in which it survives, though, indicate the extent to which antifeminism was being actively challenged by audiences towards the end of the Middle Ages in England.

CAROL M. MEALE

References and Further Reading

- Boffey, Julia. Manuscripts of English Courtly Love Lyrics in the Later Middle Ages. Woodbridge, Suffolk: D. S. Brewer, 1985.
- . "Lydgate's Lyrics and Women Readers." In Women, the Book and the Worldly, edited by Lesley Smith and Jane Taylor. Cambridge: D. S. Brewer, 1995, pp. 139–149.
- The Cambridge History of Medieval English Literature*, edited by David Wallace. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1999.
- The English Works of John Gower*, edited by G. C. Macaulay. 2 vols. EETS ES 81, 82. London, New York, and Toronto: Oxford University Press, 1900–1901.
- Fortunes Stabilnes: Charles of Orléan's English Book of Love. A Critical Edition*, edited by Mary-Jo Arn. Binghamton, N.Y.: Center for Medieval and Early Renaissance Studies, State University of New York at Binghamton, 1994.
- Hoccleve's Works: The Minor Poems*, edited by Frederick J. Furnivall and I. Gollancz. Revised by Jerome Mitchell and A. I. Doyle. EETS ES 61, 73. Reprinted in one volume, London: Oxford University Press, 1970.
- Legendys of Hooly Wummen by Osbern Bokenham*, edited by Mary J. Serjeantson. EETS OS 206. London: Humphrey Milford, 1938.
- A Manual of Writings in Middle English 1050–1500*. Vol. 1: Romances, edited by J. Burke Severs. New Haven, Conn.: Connecticut Academy of Arts and Sciences, 1967.
- Meale, Carol M. "The Tale and the Book: Readings of Chaucer's Legend of Good Women in the Fifteenth Century." In Chaucer in Perspective: Middle English Essays in Honour of Norman Blake, edited by Geoffrey Lester. Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1999, pp. 118–138.
- Medieval English Prose for Women: Selections from the Katherine Group and Ancrene Wisse*, edited by Bella Millett and Jocelyn Wogan-Browne. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1990.
- Morse, Ruth. The Medieval Medea. Cambridge: D. S. Brewer, 1996.
- Pearsall, Derek. John Lydgate. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1970.

LITERATURE, MIDDLE ENGLISH

- . Old English and Middle English Poetry. London, Henley, and Boston: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1977.
- Poems of Cupid, God of Love*, edited and translated by Thelma S. Fenster and Mary Carpenter Erler. Leiden and New York: E. J. Brill, 1990.
- The Riverside Chaucer*. Gen. Ed. Larry D. Benson. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1987.
- Utley, Francis Lee. The Crooked Rib: An Analytical Index to the Argument about Women in English and Scots Literature to the End of the Year 1568. Columbus, Ohio.: Ohio State University, 1944.
- Women of the Gilte Legende: A Selection of Middle English Saints' Lives*, edited and translated by Larissa Tracy. Cambridge: D.S. Brewer, 2003.
- The Works of Sir Thomas Malory*, edited by Eugène Vinaver. Revised by P. J. C. Field. Third edition in three vols. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1990.

See also Anchoresses; Ancrene Wisse; Arthurian Literature; Belle Dame Sans Merci; Bokenham, Osbern; Chaucer, Geoffrey; Christine de Pizan; Constance; Courtly Love; Criseyde; Defenses of Women; Devotional Literature; Drama; Fabliau; Griselda; Guinivere; Hagiography; Jacobus de Voragine's Golden Legend; Julian of Norwich; Katherine Group; Kempe, Margery; Marie de France; Misogyny; Ovid, Medieval Reception of; Roman de la Rose and Its Reception; Romance: English; Translation; Wife of Bath; Woman's Song; Women Authors: Middle English Texts

LITERATURE, OCCITAN

Occitan, also known as Provençal, is the Romance language of the South of France made illustrious by the troubadours, lyric poets of the High Middle Ages. Occitan became recognized as a vehicle for lyric expression in Spain and Italy, and inspired imitation in northern France, Germany, and elsewhere. The term Provençal is now regarded as obsolete because of the inescapable suggestion that it refers to Provence, that is, the part of the Midi that lies to the east of the Rhône. Occitan (formed on the word oc, "yes") includes Provence as well as the regions to the west, roughly the southern third of modern France.

The earliest traces of written Occitan date from before the millennium. From the late tenth century we have Occitan blended with Latin in legal documents, charms for practicing folk medicine, and a brief narrative of the Passion, perhaps the text of a paraliturgical carol. From the eleventh century we have two narratives: the Boeci, which paraphrases Boethius's Consolation of Philosophy, and the Chanson de sainte Foy, the life of a child saint. We also have three short texts that anticipate troubadour lyric: a bilingual alba, or dawn song, with an Occitan refrain that seems to symbolize the resurrection of Christ, and two fragmentary secular lyrics. In one a lover imagines himself as a falcon that could fly to his lady; the other has been interpreted as an invective against lecherous nuns.

The era of the troubadours spans two and a half centuries, from about 1100 to 1350. The first whose works we have is Guilhem IX, duke of Aquitaine and count of Poitou (born 1071, died 1126), who ranges from declarations of passionate desire to sexual comedy to a moving song of departure from the world. In the so-called second generation were Jaufre Rudel, who sang his yearning for love from afar, which—very unlike Guilhem IX—he professed to prefer to love near to hand, and the mercurial Marcabru, a satirist of loose mores among the aristocracy who also wrote sympathetically of a girl whose lover has left her to go on Crusade, or of a shepherdess who skillfully parries the advances of a lusty suitor. The late twelfth century saw the apogee of troubadour art in the love songs of Bernart de Ventadorn, who sang his tortured feelings, his confusion, and his desire, and in the political songs of Bertran de Born, who urged the barons of Aquitaine to plunge into combat as a tonic for the soul. The satirical tradition continued in the thirteenth century with Peire Cardenal, the longest-lived troubadour, who for nearly seventy years sang of the corruption of the clergy, his sympathy with the Albigensian heretics, and his own orthodox faith. Late in the century Guiraut Riquier was a poet and a bureaucrat in the service of lords in Narbonne and Spain, who sang that he felt he had come too late. Even later, the cleric Raimon Cornet, in the early fourteenth century, wrote religious and comical verse.

In all the names of some 360 troubadours, who left about 2,500 poems, are known, including perhaps as many as fifty by trobairitz, or women troubadours. About ten percent of these poems are transmitted with notation of their melodies. It seems likely that many more had melodic accompaniment, though it is not certain that all of them were intended for musical performance. The medium of troubadour art probably moved from musical composition at the beginning in the direction of verbal art without music, which would flourish in the Italian poetry of the Sicilian poets, the "Sweet new style" of Dante and his friends, and Petrarch, who spent half his adult life in Provence. Petrarch, who returned to Italy in 1353, may be regarded as the last of the troubadours.

The narrative tradition continued with an Arthurian burlesque, the Romance of Jaufre; a verse chronicle of the crusade against the Albigensian heretics in the early thirteenth century, the Chanson de la Croisade, by two poets, Guilhem de Tudela, from Spain, who supported the crusading cause, and a more gifted but anonymous sympathizer with the Albigensians; and the Romance of Flamenca (late thirteenth century), a romantic comedy in which the heroine and her lover outwit her jealous husband. In the late fourteenth and fifteenth centuries poetry of the School of Toulouse became limited to poets of that city, and literary expression became restricted to religious themes.

WILLIAM D. PADEN

References and Further Reading

- Anthology of the Provençal Troubadours*. edited by R. T. Hill and T. G. Bergin. 2nd ed. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1973.
- Aubrey, Elizabeth. The Music of the Troubadours. Bloomington, Ind.: Indiana University Press, 1996.
- Ghil, Eliza Miruna. L'Age de parage: essai sur le poétique et le politique en Occitanie au XIIIe siècle. New York: Lang, 1989.
- A Handbook of the Troubadours*. edited by F. R. P. Akehurst and Judith M. Davis. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1995.
- Introduction à l'étude de l'ancien provençal: textes d'étude*. edited by Frank R. Hamlin, Peter T. Ricketts, and John Hathaway. 2nd ed. Genève: Droz, 1985.
- Lafont, Robert, and Christian Anatole. Nouvelle histoire de la littérature occitane. 2 vols. Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1970.
- Lazzerini, Lucia. Letteratura medievale in lingua d'oc. Modena: Mucchi, 2001.
- Limentani, Alberto. L'eccezione narrativa: la Provenza medievale e l'arte del racconto. Torino: G. Einaudi, 1977.
- Paden, William D. An Introduction to Old Occitan. New York: The Modern Language Association of America, 1998.
- . "Petrarch as a Poet of Provence." Annali d'italianistica 22 (2004): 19–44.
- Les troubadours*, [1:] Jaufre, Flamenca, Barlaam et Josaphat; [2:] Le trésor poétique de l'Occitanie. edited by René Nelli and René Lavaud. Bruges: Desclée de Brouwer, 1960–1966.
- The Troubadours: An Introduction*. edited by Simon Gaunt and Sarah Kay. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1999.
- Los trovadores: historia literaria y textos*. edited by Martín de Riquer. 3 vols. Barcelona: Planeta, 1975.

See also Dawn Song (Alba); Foy; Pastourelle; Petrarch; Roman de Flamenca; Trobairitz and Troubadours

LITERATURE, OLD ENGLISH

Old English literature is traditionally understood as poetry composed from the sixth through the eleventh centuries in English. It exists primarily in four late-tenth-century manuscripts, essentially anonymous or traditional, and represents just a fragment of the formal written and oral discourses that must have circulated in the Anglo-Saxon period. Beowulf, the most famous example, is discussed separately in this volume. This extant verse—altogether about the length of the Iliad alone—was inscribed within a monastic or clerical environment and so represents to some degree that element in the culture, many of the texts being deeply influenced by Latin and Greek sources. Though the society included pagan, Germanic, and possibly Celtic, as well as Romano-Christian beliefs and practices, those divergent beliefs were refracted through the lenses of ecclesiastically trained scribes, producing a vision of the culture very different from that revealed in laws, penitentials, and other nonliterary texts. The anonymity of the verse prevents our knowing whether women composed any vernacular verse, but literate women, such as Hild of Whitby and Leoba, played prominent roles in the early Anglo-Saxon church. Additionally, recent paleographic study has begun to reveal the depth and extent of women's involvement in the production of manuscripts (Brown). Whether composed and inscribed by women or by men, the texts show us not a single, hegemonic characterization of women or gender but rather portrayals addressing issues of political responsibility, pious heroism, and the procreative body and family.

In Genesis, Eve assumes responsibility for the well-being of her familial group, desires knowledge, and generally acts on a par with Adam. She is a sympathetic character, developed through extensive dialogue between Eve and the messenger sent by Satan, as well as her conversations with Adam. As with the other versifications of the biblical texts that comprise the Junius 11 manuscript (Genesis, Exodus, and Daniel, and Christ and Satan), a rich variety of Latin sources, as well as Germanic culture, has influenced her portrait, including the Old Saxon source from which this section is translated (Doane). In it the messenger tempts Adam before angrily turning to Eve with more persuasive rhetoric, offering her the possibility of seeing the whole world and God's throne, as well as of saving Adam from God's anger at having denied his "messenger" (lines 547–587). She succumbs not because of lust or pride but because of the devil's lies, remaining the "brightest" and "most beautiful" of ladies (626–634). The narrator concedes that "she did it through loyal intent" toward Adam as her lord (708–710). Some have suggested that this motivation derives from Germanic culture. In Christ and Satan, at the end of the manuscript, Eve also proclaims her own worth so as not to be left behind when Christ harrows hell, asserting through repeated dual pronouns that she and Adam (wit, "we two") acted together. She clinches her argument, however, through the special merit of motherhood, declaring to Christ, "Lo, you from my daughter, lord, were born," after which she herself "shove[s] the wretched monster into the profound darkness" and ascends with her kin to heaven (444–446).

The political powers of prominent mothers can be seen in Elene, a poetic version of the discovery of the True Cross. After a vision of the Cross enables the Emperor Constantine to win a crucial battle, he sends his mother “Elene” (Helen) on a journey to recover the Cross. After crossing the sea, she verbally combats the Jews to reveal the Cross’s location and converts one, Judas, who becomes St. Cyriacus. After delegating him to find the nails of the cross, she has the nails made into a war bridle for Constantine, promoting her son’s military ambition. The heroic formulas that name Elene’s actions show them to be as lofty as those in other poems in the Vercelli Book—Andreas, The Fates of the Apostles, and The Dream of the Rood—which focus on the heroism of Christ, his apostles, and the Cross. Though being the emperor’s mother largely defines her political role, her feminine sexuality does not shape the narrative.

The body’s sexuality and reproductive drives are deeply problematic in the clerical environment of the verse. The Old English version of the apocryphal book of Judith provides a rare representation. In a manuscript that has been thought to focus on “monsters” (including those of Beowulf), the overly passionate Assyrian general Holofernes is besieging the Hebrew town of Bethulia, where the pious yet sensually beautiful widow, Judith, resides. Heroically, she chooses to use her body’s attractiveness to be admitted to Holofernes’ inner chamber and so slay him as he lies in a drunken stupor. While lust saps strength from him and his army, Judith’s piety gives her strength to inspire her people to victory.

The Exeter Book takes on the reproductive body beginning with its opening verses celebrating Christ’s Advent. Developed from the Advent Antiphons, the lyrics celebrate Mary’s role in making God human but expose the Catholic doctrinal discomfort with reproductive sexuality. In a dialogue Joseph and Mary attempt to cope with the gossip about her pregnancy, and she reassures him that she is not so much pregnant as illumined with a light, that she is God’s “temple” (203–209). Mary then becomes the “golden gates” that God will “purify” in his passage to earth, after which she will be “locked” as before (317–325). Thus metaphor sublimates her pregnancy and birth canal. Yet, the sight of the child at Mary’s breast, presented without metaphor, gives hope to all who awaited his Advent. This tricky negotiation of reproduction is, of course, unique to Mary.

This miscellany later characterizes marriage, first via Saint Juliana who rejects marriage in order to “keep her maidenhood for Christ’s love” (30–31). Her act is politically and spiritually heroic, a defeat of the Roman Empire and of the devil whom she combats in her jail cell. In the last quarter of the book, Wulf and Eadwacer and, some thirty pages later, The Wife’s Lament represent conjugal relations for the more ordinary woman. These female characters rather than weaving peace between clans or tribes, suffer isolation from loved ones without spiritual consolation. Texts focusing on repentance immediately follow The Wife’s Lament, but generally these lyrics appear in the midst of about ninety-four riddles, including a few about sexual acts, as when a woman’s experience with an onion resembles intercourse, or dough rises under a cloth, or churning butter appears utterly heterosexual. Considering Mary at one end and sexual riddles at the other, we might mistakenly think this manuscript is about women and gender, whereas mostly it centers on male figures, or themes of wisdom or redemption applicable to humans generally.

While females do not dominate the manuscripts, they seldom play an abject role. Adultery, so prominent in later romances and antifeminist diatribes, cannot be found here. Perhaps this more positive representation of gender reflects the status of the Anglo-Saxon women who were scribes and illuminators, abbesses, and royal patrons of ecclesiastical establishments.

CAROL BRAUN PASTERNAK

References and Further Reading

- The Anglo-Saxon Poetic Records*. 6 vols. edited by George Philip Krapp and Elliott Van Kirk Dobbie. New York: Columbia University Press, 1931–1953.
- Anglo-Saxon Poetry: An Anthology of Old English Poems in Prose Translation*. Translated and edited by S. A. J. Bradley. London: Dent, 1982.
- Brown, Michelle P. “Female Book-Ownership and Production in Anglo-Saxon England: the Evidence of the Ninth-Century Prayerbooks.” In Lexis and Texts in Early English: Studies Presented to Jane Roberts, edited by Christian J. Kay and Louise M. Sylvester. Amsterdam: Rodopi, 2001, pp. 45–67.
- Chance, Jane. Woman as Hero in Old English Literature. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1986.
- Damico, Helen and Alexandra Hennessey Olsen. New Readings on Women in Old English Literature. Bloomington, Ind.: Indiana University Press, 1990.
- Doane, A. N. “Introduction.” The Saxon Genesis. Madison, Wis.: University of Wisconsin Press, 1991, pp. 3–202.
- Dockray-Miller, Mary. “The Maternal Performance of the Virgin Mary in the Old English Advent.” NWSA Journal 14.2 (Summer 2002): 38–55.
- The Exeter Anthology of Old English Poetry*. 2 vols. Revised edition edited by Bernard J. Muir. Exeter: University of Exeter Press, 2000.
- Hollis, Stephanie. Anglo-Saxon Women and the Church: Sharing a Common Fate. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell, 1992.
- Horner, Shari. The Discourse of Enclosure: Representing Women in Old English Literature. Albany, N.Y.: State University of New York Press, 2001.
- Lees, Clare A. and Gillian R. Overing. Double Agents: Women and Clerical Culture in Anglo-Saxon England. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001.

- Lionarons, Joyce Tally. "Cultural Syncretism and the Construction of Gender in Cynewulf's Elene." Exemplaria 10.1 (Spring 1998): 51–68.
- Lochrie, Karma. "Gender, Sexual Violence and the Politics of War in the Old English Judith." In Class and Gender in Early English Literature: Intersections, edited by Britton J. Harwood and Gillian R. Overing. Bloomington, Ind.: Indiana University Press, 1994.
- Old and Middle English, c. 890–c. 1400: An Anthology*. 2nd edition, edited by Elaine Treharne. Malden, Mass.: Blackwell, 2004.
- Pasternack, Carol Braun, and Lisa M. C. Weston. "Introduction." Sex and Sexuality in Anglo-Saxon England. Tempe, Ariz.: Arizona Center for Medieval and Renaissance Studies, 2004, pp. xix–xlix.
- The Saxon Genesis*, edited by A. N. Doane. Madison, Wis.: University of Wisconsin Press, 1991.

See also Abbesses; Beowulf; Bible, Women in; Book Ownership; England; Eve; Hagiography; Helena; Hild of Whitby; Judith; Letter Writing; Literacy and Reading; Latin; Leoba; Literacy and Reading; Vernacular; Mary, Virgin; Mary, Virgin; in Literature

LITERATURE, OLD FRENCH

In much of Old French literature, women are essential to the structures of the text, helping in part to define men's roles. Depictions of masculinity depend to some extent on the values inherent in a given genre. The hero of an epic tale, for example, must be first and foremost a successful fighter and loyal vassal. In romance he must add to his knightly prowess the refinement of chivalric behavior and appropriate language, and these last qualities are essential to his persona as a lover in lyric poetry. The portrait of women is perhaps less changeable, at least in the depiction of the noble lady. While the peasant woman of the fabliaux must succeed by her wits and the heroine of pastourelle by her simplicity and charm, the worthy noble woman, whatever the text, is virtuous, faithful, and beautiful. The unworthy lady, by contrast, embodies all the undesirable qualities so often ascribed to all women in misogynist traditions. What varies in the representation of women is primarily the nature and prominence of their role. The following discussion focuses on the major genres of epic and courtly literature as well as on the sustained debate concerning women's nature.

Chansons de Geste

Only in Old French epics, perhaps, are women truly dispensable to the agendas of that genre, which promote masculine, ideological, and dynastic concerns.

In chansons de geste women play very limited roles. They are defined by the men on whom they depend and function chiefly as prized tokens of exchange in advantageous alliances. The Chanson de Roland, the most admired of Old French epics, contains a striking example of this abbreviated literary existence for female characters. Beautiful Aude, sister of Olivier and fiancée of Roland, falls dead when she hears that her intended has been killed. She laments briefly, refuses to accept Charlemagne's son Louis in exchange for Roland, and dies at the emperor's feet. In other epic texts, noble women represent the point of cultural contact between Christians and Saracens, as in the William cycle, in which the hero Guillaume marries Orable, queen of Orange, once she converts to Christianity.

Lyric Poetry

Lyric poetry gives much greater importance to the lady than does epic, but, paradoxically, perhaps, her absence is more vital than her participation. The lover cannot experience the thrall of passion without a beloved or communicate his passion without an audience to whom to send his confession of love or lament. His lady must exist, therefore, but she does so largely outside the text as the object of his desire and the subject of his discourse. To the best of our knowledge, the Old French tradition does not include women poets equivalent to the trobairitz who wrote in Old Occitan. What we hear in Old French lyric, therefore, is almost entirely a male voice whose whole song is predicated on the existence of an admirable but silent lady. Will she be cruel and reject her suitor, or merciful and grant him the delights he seeks? Ostensibly the power is hers, but the hard-hearted woman risks disqualification from the ranks of those deserving of love. Her options are limited. Similarly, the malmariée (unhappily married woman) may yearn to escape her jealous husband and the maiden the strict surveillance of her family; but both are largely dependent on the advances of a suitable lover.

Romance

In the long narratives developed in romance, the lady can break her passive silence and assume a more active role. In Erec et Enide by Chrétien de Troyes (fl. 1170–1185), we find a dramatic example: ordered by her husband to be silent during the adventures they undertake together, Enide disobeys for love of him and helps overcome a series of formidable adversaries to the joy and well-being of all. The cross-dressed protagonist of the Roman de Silence (Romance of Silence) makes use of the freedoms available to men to fight, travel, and perform music before she reverts to more ladylike behavior and marries the king. More often, the romance heroine employs the skills and traits of the well-bred lady to further her case or thwart her adversaries. In Tristan, Iseut and her mother employ their healing arts to advance Iseut's love for Tristan. In the so-called "realistic" romances of the thirteenth century, Jean Renart's Roman de la Rose ou Guillaume de Dole, for example, shows Liénor using superior intelligence, logic, and rhetoric to defend herself against dishonor in the eyes of her future husband Conrad. Paramount among the assets a romance heroine can deploy is language, whether written, sung, or spoken.

Misogyny

The presence of women in Old French literature often overlaps with the presence of misogyny, whether programmatic (that is, an explicit goal of the text) or incidental. Even in courtly romance, a genre that of necessity includes admirable women, female characters are sometimes laden with the ideological freight assigned to their sex. The same Enide previously mentioned is perceived by other characters in the text as problematic, threatening masculinity. Caricatured misogynous utterances are placed in the mouths of the narrator and the English king in the Roman de Silence, even though the very plot depends on problematizing conventional notions about women's nature. Evil behaviors, such as malice, envy, and gossip can be marked as female, as in the case of Fresne's mother in Marie de France's Lai de Fresne.

The misogynist corpus, represented by such late-thirteenth or early-fourteenth century Old French dits as Le Blasme des fames (The Blame of Women), Le Chastiemusart (The Fool's Comeuppance), and La Contenance des Fames (The Ways of Women), is characterized by programmatic or "phobic" misogyny. It lays out in detail the vices supposedly specific to women, their faults of nature and behavior, their inferiority to men, and the need, therefore, for women to be subordinate to men. Such texts are often playful in their allusiveness, form, and variations on the conventions of misogyny, but playfulness or even parody does not palliate their content.

Such texts are often accompanied in manuscripts by defense texts such as Le Bien des fames (The Virtues of Women; late thirteenth century), building a virtual debate into the codex. To the detriment of the feminist argument, however, the debate is conducted within the parameters laid out by the misogynous texts. The defense texts tend to refute the claims of the misogynous ones primarily by denying the accusations made about women and foregrounding "womanly" virtues and merits, but not really challenging the assumptions underlying the denunciation of women. Jean LeFevre's translation into French of the Lamentations de Matheolus is followed by his long defense of women, the Livre de Leesce; but that comforting text marks no real advance over misogyny and is read by some as itself parodic.

A key text in the larger polemic is the thirteenth-century Roman de la Rose (Romance of the Rose), which displays but also challenges the repertoire of textual misogyny. Its ultimate meaning is sufficiently ambiguous to generate a powerful rebuttal more than a century later. Christine de Pizan (1364–1430) initiated the "Quarrel of the Rose" in the early fifteenth century, engaging some of the most influential Parisian male intellectuals of her day on such questions as the limits of appropriate speech and the nature of women. More than any other medieval author, perhaps, Christine proposed a programmatic defense of women in her large literary corpus, using the tried and true rhetorical strategies of her predecessors but also creating new allegorical structures and characters to support her experiential proof of women's goodness and worth. In her Livre de la cité des dames (Book of the City of Ladies), the Virgin Mary presides as queen over all women of virtue, here, as elsewhere, the only female figure in Old French literature completely immune to vilification.

BARBARA ALTMANN

References and Further Reading

- Blamires, Alcuin. The Case for Women in Medieval Culture. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1997.
- , et al., eds. Woman Defamed and Woman Defended: An Anthology of Medieval Texts. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1992.
- Brown-Grant, Rosalind, translated by Christine de Pizan. The Book of the City of Ladies. New York: Penguin, 1999.
- Burns, E. Jane. Body Talk: When Women Speak in Old French Literature. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1993.
- Cadden, Joan. The Meaning of Sex Differences in the Middle Ages: Medicine, Natural Philosophy, and Culture. Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University, 1993.
- Dronke, Peter. The Medieval Lyric. London: Cambridge University Press, 1977.
- Fenster, Thelma S., and Clare A. Lees, eds. Gender in Debate from the Early Middle Ages to the Renaissance. New York: Palgrave, 2002.

Fiero, Gloria K., Wendy Pfeffer, Mathé Allain, trans. and ed. Three Medieval Views of Women: La Contenance des fames, Le Bien des fames, Le Blasme des fames. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1989.

Wilson, Katharina M., ed. Medieval Women Writers. Athens, Ga.: University of Georgia, 1984.

See also Chrétien de Troyes; Christine de Pizan; Courtly Love; Defenses of Women; Epic: Old French; Fabliau; Femininity and Masculinity; Gender Ideologies; Isolde; Marie de France; Mary, Virgin; Mary, Virgin: in Literature; Misogyny; Pastourelle; Roman de la Rose and Its Reception; Roman de Silence; Romance, French; Trobairitz and Troubadours; Trouvères, Women; Woman's Song; Women Authors: Old French Texts

LITERATURE, OLD NORSE

The representation of women in Old Norse literature is distinctive on account of the range and nature of literary genres drawing on indigenous oral traditions that were preserved in Iceland and Norway during the medieval period. While ecclesiastical texts and hagiographic literature, and later romances, were translated into Old Norse, some of the earliest writers of the literate Christian period turned their attention to their own traditions and wrote down sagas of the founding families of the colony of Iceland (Íslendingasögur); sagas of the legendary heroes of the distant past (fornaldarsögur); and sagas of bishops and kings (biskupasögur and konungasögur). Before the 1260s, Icelanders were not subject to king or queen, but generations of Icelandic poets had done service at foreign courts composing praise poetry for princes; hundreds of the stanzas they composed are preserved within prose sagas, a record of a unique poetic tradition and a source of historically intriguing material. Not all these professional poets were men, and occasionally women commissioned verse or were the subjects of poetry quoted in konungasögur.

One such woman was Ástriðr, daughter of Óláfr, king of the Swedes, who began her own regal career by wooing the Norwegian King Óláfr Haraldsson, approaching him on three occasions before he accepted her proposal. A young Icelandic poet visiting their court is said to have composed a love-poem for Ástriðr which was, however, too amorous for the king's liking and has unfortunately not been preserved. After Saint Óláfr's death in 1030, Ástriðr took up the cause of her stepson, Magnús, addressing an assembly in Sweden and smoothing the way for him to become king of Norway. Three stanzas of a praise poem in her honor are extant, in which she is praised for her political nous (her advice is said to have been both sound and deep) and for her “manliness” in securing the throne for Magnús. Magnús was, by all accounts, grateful, and invited his stepmother to join his court. Their domestic tensions developed when his own mother, Alvhlidr (formerly Ástriðr's maid and Óláfr's concubine) insisted on a position of higher status than the queen. The affection of poets for Ástriðr is again recorded: Alvhlidr's presumption denounced in favour of Ástriðr's rightful place of honour. Ástriðr's story is gleaned from a number of narrative accounts and skaldic stanzas and demonstrates the wealth of social and political material about the lives of women in medieval Scandinavia that survives, often in fragmentary form, and often as sidelines to the main narrative.

Another notorious Norwegian king-maker, Gunnhlidr (known as the “mother of kings”), is depicted not only in konungasögur but also in Íslendingasögur where she crossed the paths of travelling Icelanders. Njáls saga describes the visit of an Icelander named Hrútr to Norway to claim his inheritance. At the court of King Haraldr “greycloak” Haraldr's mother, Queen Gunnhlidr, is said to have been attracted to the handsome young traveler and invited him into her bed. When, eventually, Hrútr wished to return to Iceland (to the fiancée he had not dared tell the queen about), Gunnhlidr bewitched him so that he might never experience sexual pleasure with the woman he was to marry. Again, the queen had her way, and Njáls saga details the process by which Hrútr's disaffected wife divorced him.

The Íslendingasögur are noted for their many portrayals of influential and independent-minded women, and one of the most perplexing is that of Hallgerðr, in Njáls saga, a young woman of exceptional beauty with glorious silky hair that came down to her waist. As is characteristic of saga narration, the first scene in which she plays a part concludes with a laconic comment by her uncle (the same Hrútr) to his brother, predicting that many will pay for her beauty and querying how “the eyes of a thief have come into our family.” The answer, we might assume, is through the female line, saga authors making much of family traits up and down the generations, whether for good, bad or just interesting. But the chiaroscuro depiction of characters in the sagas usually invites the withholding of judgment, even when events escalate to the tragic. In one of the crucial scenes of the saga, Hallgerðr's husband Gunnarr is defending himself with bow and arrow against the odds: his bow breaks and he asks Hallgerðr for two locks of her hair with which to improvise a bowstring. She refuses, reminding her husband in the last minutes of his life of the slap on the face he had once given her (for stealing, in fact). Strong-mindedness in saga women works just as often to consolidate family bonds: the redoubtable Auðr in Gísla saga, is shown defending her outlawed husband's honour to the point of gathering up the silver offered to her as a bribe to betray him, putting it into a purse and swinging it in the face of the one trying to bribe her, bloodying his nose. Her scornful words about his cowardice disgrace him, in the same way that goading women in many saga incidents remind their male relatives of standards of honour that they believe are in danger of lapsing.

Carol Clover has analyzed the way in which gender is inflected in the scene in which Auðr asserts control and from this analysis presents an illuminating discussion of gender roles in Old Norse literature. The heroines of saga literature are often cast in deep dilemmas, having to side either with their male kin against their husbands or with their married kin against their brothers, fathers, and nephews. Like their counterparts in the traditional, anonymous poetry of medieval Scandinavia (known as eddic poetry), their responses are often severe, almost always leading to tragedy, but frequently eloquent and thought-provoking. The eddic heroines Guðrún and Brynhildr declaim their sorrow in the same breath as their vengeful thoughts, goading their sons or husbands to murderous acts while lamenting their own unhappy fates. In the eddic poems set in the divine or semi-divine worlds, a number of potent female figures are depicted: goddesses, prophets, norns, and valkyries, all linked by their insight into fate and the future, and in some instances marked out for their wisdom and sound advice, a trait that, in turn, also comes through in many portraits of saga women, whether Icelandic farmers or Norwegian queens.

JUDY QUINN

References and Further Reading

- Anderson, Sarah M., with Karen Swenson, eds., Cold Counsel: Women in Old Norse Literature and Mythology. New York and London: Routledge, 2002.
- Clover, Carol. "Regardless of Sex: Men, Women and Power in Early Northern Europe." In Studying Medieval Women, edited by Nancy Partner. Cambridge, Mass.: Medieval Academy, 1993, pp. 61–85.
- Frank, Roberta. "Why Skalds Address Women." In Poetry in the Scandinavian Middle Ages, Atti del 12o Congresso Internazionale de Studi sull'Alto Medioeva, edited by Teresa Paroli. Spoleto: Presso la Sede del Centro Studi, 1990, pp. 67–83.
- Jesch, Judith. "In praise of Ástriðr Óláfsdóttir." Saga-Book of the Viking Society 24 (1994): 1–18.
- Jochens, Jenny. Old Norse Images of Women. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1996.
- The Poetic Edda*. translated by Carolyne Larrington. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1996.
- Quinn, Judy. "Women in Old Norse Poetry and Sagas." In Old Norse-Icelandic Literature and Culture, edited by Rory McTurk. Oxford: Blackwell, 2005, pp. 518–535.
- The Sagas of Icelanders*. translated by Katrina Atwood, et al. New York: Penguin, 2001.
- Snorri Sturluson. Edda*. translated by Anthony Faulkes. London: Dent, 1987.
- See also Prophets, Nordic; Scandinavia; Skaldkonur; Valkyries

LITERATURE, SPANISH

See Literature, Iberian

LOLLARDS

As England's sole popular heresy during the Middle Ages, Lollardy holds an important place in our understanding of religious life in late medieval England, even if Lollard adherents likely never made up more than a small minority of the population. Among the issues that a study of Lollardy elucidates is the nature and extent of medieval women's role in religious devotion and practice. Although some twentieth-century historians argued that heresy was inherently attractive to women as women, recent literature on Lollardy—as on other heretical movements—has challenged this contention. Women did not find in Lollardy a straightforward liberation from a repressive medieval Catholic patriarchy; indeed, women's attraction to the sect may not have been much different from men's. Women played important roles in Lollard communities, but scholars disagree about precisely how important.

Lollardy was born in the academic world of Oxford University from the teachings of the theologian John Wycliffe (d. 1384). Wycliffe, a scriptural fundamentalist, disputed nonbiblical sacraments, the power of the Catholic priesthood, and the cult of saints. He also championed the diffusion of religious knowledge in the vernacular. From the mid-1380s, Wycliffe's academic followers began to spread his ideas into various parts of England through active proselytization. They also produced a considerable corpus of English sermons, devotional works, and a vernacular translation of the scriptures that came to be known as the Lollard Bible.

The Lollard movement's strengths—its academic base at Oxford and growing support from a number of prominent Lollard gentlemen during the late fourteenth century—collapsed in the 1410s. A purge of Oxford University and the failure of a Lollard-associated revolt against the crown in 1414 left Lollardy largely without academic or aristocratic support.

Thenceforth, with a few exceptions, the Lollards who made their way into late medieval English records were laypeople of lower socioeconomic station. Followers of the heretical movement were still being uncovered by ecclesiastical authorities in the 1520s, when Protestant ideas began to circulate around England; in the following decades adherents of Lollardy were almost certainly absorbed into the new forms of Protestantism that developed.

The role of women in the early part of the movement—before the second decade of the fifteenth century—is largely obscure. While virtually the entire large corpus of Lollard writings originates in this period, relatively little survives concerning individual adherents, especially outside the leadership of male clergy and gentry. Unsurprisingly there is no evidence at all that women played a part in the academic wing of the movement. Women of the aristocracy and townswomen in the urban centers where Lollardy took hold almost certainly did become involved, but we glimpse this only obliquely in the surviving record. Anti-Lollard polemicists made intriguing accusations that Lollards allowed women, and even girls, to act as priests in heretical versions of the mass; as Margaret Aston has suggested, however, even if these contentions reflected actual Lollard practice (the evidence is slight, but it is possible), it remains an open question whether the playing of priestly roles by women or girls would have been meant as an elevation of women's roles or as an attack on the power of Catholic priests. Lollard writings addressed questions related to gender relatively little; when they did, they tended to reflect the norms of orthodox society, emphasizing, for instance, that God ordains the husband's rule over the wife.

As the social basis of the Lollard movement changed in the 1410s, so also did the record it left behind. While we have few if any later Lollard writings, much better survival of the records of prosecution for the period after 1420 and especially after the 1480s allows us to understand more fully the makeup of groups of Lollards—and to trace more clearly the involvement of women. Nonetheless, the evidence regarding women's roles in the movement remains incomplete and open to interpretation.

Of those who were named as Lollards in the records of prosecution, slightly fewer than one in three were women. A high proportion of these women were related to male Lollards: they were, in other words, mostly the wives, daughters, sisters, or mothers of men in Lollard communities. Lollard communities were centered on the household; Lollards gathered in the homes of their fellow adherents to listen to readings from the Lollard Bible and other religious works written in English. Some historians, such as Claire Cross and Margaret Aston, have seen the family and household basis of later Lollard communities as a source of women's power in the movement. Others, especially Shannon McSheffrey, have argued that the heretical communities tended to replicate the authority structures of the patriarchal household. All agree that Lollard practice afforded to some women, particularly widows such as Alice Rowley of Coventry, a central role in the heretical gatherings in their communities; what remains less clear—and a matter of dispute—is how we should extrapolate from such examples to generalize about women's significance in the movement as a whole. Was Alice Rowley, as an authoritative leader of the Coventry Lollard community, extraordinary, or were other women like her common in the movement but obscured in the surviving record? Did ecclesiastical authorities' preconceptions about female incapacity cause them to underestimate, and underinvestigate, women's roles in the heresy? Or did a more generalized ideology that accorded women less agency than men in late medieval English society tend to keep women in relatively marginal roles in the sect as well as outside it? Whatever the answer to these questions, the reflexive assumption that some historians held in the twentieth century—that heresies, as challenges to the medieval Church, were also challenges to medieval patriarchy and thus intrinsically attractive to women—no longer stands. Heresies were not all alike; nor, for that matter, were women. Yet even if only a tiny minority of late medieval English women participated in Lollard activities, for some this heretical movement provided a vital outlet for their religious devotion.

SHANNON MCSHEFFREY

References and Further Reading

- Aston, Margaret. "Lollard Women Priests?" Journal of Ecclesiastical History 31 (1980): 441–461.
- . "Lollard Women." In Women and Religion in Medieval England, edited by Diana Wood. Oxford: Oxbow Books, 2003, pp. 166–185.
- Cross, Claire. "'Great Reasoners in Scripture': The Activities of Women Lollards 1380–1530." In Medieval Women, edited by Derek Baker. Studies in Church History, Subsidia, 1. Oxford: Blackwell, 1978, pp. 359–380.
- Hudson, Anne. The Premature Reformation: Wycliffite Texts and Lollard History. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1988.
- McSheffrey, Shannon. Gender and Heresy: Women and Men in Lollard Communities, 1420–1530. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1995.
- Rex, Richard. The Lollards. Houndsmills: Palgrave MacMillan, 2002.

See also Cathars; Heretics and Heresy; Lay Piety; Waldensians

LÓPEZ DE CÓRDOBA, LEONOR

The noble woman Leonor López de Córdoba (1362/1363–c. 1412) is one of Spain's first women writers. Her Memorias (Memoirs) is the first autobiography written in the medieval Spanish kingdom of Castile. She witnessed firsthand some of the most salient—and horrifying—events of her time, including the Black Death, the fourteenth-century Spanish civil war, and the first organized and publicly authorized “pogrom” against Jews in Castile. Leonor was chief advisor and confidante to Queen Catalina of Lancaster, wife of Enrique III and regent for Juan II; a contemporary medieval chronicler comments that the queen trusted and loved her so much that she did nothing without Leonor's counsel. Leonor was, in fact, such a powerful figure in fourteenth century Spain that historians have seen her, during her years as advisor to Catalina, as the real arbiter of Castile's internal policies. Eventually Leonor was driven from court, accused of accepting bribes.

Leonor's Memorias suggests that she was conscious of herself as a woman writer. In the work she describes a feminized world, in which men are largely absent. While she identifies herself as wife and daughter, her focus is on life on her own; the male members of her family, she notes, have all left her, through death or self-imposed exile. Leonor invokes the Virgin Mary as a model in her writing, but her Memorias, unlike the works of some other medieval women writers, is not a spiritual biography. Rather her work is framed as a public record—so much so that some scholars have claimed it as a legal document or a confession. Interestingly, the text focuses on her personal quest for honor, rather than her time of power and glory in the public eye, describing a life of misfortune after her years at court with Queen Catalina.

LOUISE MIRRER

References and Further Reading

- Deyermond, Alan. “Spain's First Women Writers.” In Women in Hispanic Literature: Icons and Fallen Idols, edited by Beth Miller, 27–52. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1983.
- Ellis, Deborah Sue. “The Image of the Home in Early English and Spanish Literature.” Ph.D. diss., University of California, Berkeley, 1982.
- Estow, Clara. “Leonor Lopez de Cordoba: Portrait of a Medieval Courtier.” Fifteenth-Century Studies 5 (1982): 23–46.
- Frieden, Mary Elizabeth. “Epistolarity in the Works of Teresa de Cartagena and Leonor López de Córdoba.” Ph.D. diss., University of Missouri–Columbia, 2001.
- Kaminsky, Amy Katz and Elaine Dorough Johnson. “To Restore Honor and Fortune: ‘The Autobiography of Leonor Lopez de Cordoba.’” In The Female Autograph, edited by Doman C. Stanton and Jeanine Parisier Plottel, vol. 12–13, 77–88. New York: New York Literary Forum, 1984.
- McInnis, Judy B., ed. Models in Medieval Iberian Literature and Their Modern Reflections: Convivencia as Structural, Cultural and Sexual Ideal. Juan de la Cuesta Hispanic Monographs. Newark, Del.: Juan de la Cuesta, 2002.
- Mirrer, Louise. Women, Jews & Muslims in the Texts of Reconquest Castile. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1996.
- Sautman, Francesca Canadé and Pamela Sheingorn. Same Sex Love and Desire among Women in the Middle Ages. New Middle Ages. New York: Palgrave, 2001.
- Surtz, Ronald E. Writing Women in Late Medieval and Early Modern Spain: The Mothers of Saint Teresa of Avila. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1995.

See also Gender Ideologies; Iberia; Literature, Iberian; Queens and Empresses: the West; Women Authors: Spanish Texts

LOVESICKNESS

Erotic love as a sickness, a subject of medical and philosophical investigation since antiquity, has exercised much influence on Islamic as well as Western literature. Many medieval scholars now consider the Arab treatise on love by Ibn Hazm (994–1064), The Dove's Neck Ring, as the primary text that shaped the idea of love as pathology in literature. Drawing examples from all social classes, the book describes the nature and phenomenology of love and the joys and sorrows of lovers. This concept of love as sickness, or melancholia, is found in most Occitan (Provençal) poetry (early twelfth through mid-thirteenth century).

The next most prominent text on lovesickness is Andreas Capellanus' De Amore (c. 1185). The author states that love is an innate passion resulting from obsessive thoughts about the object of desire, causing sickness, fever, loss of vital strength, and even madness. Together with Ovid's Ars Amandi and Metamorphoses, the treatise remained influential throughout the Middle Ages. The association of love with melancholia (one of the four temperaments) can be also found in medieval French texts, as well as in works by Boccaccio (1313–1375) and Chaucer (1342–1400).

The first known poet writing in langue d'oc, William of Aquitaine (1071–1127), draws his metaphors from the world of feudalism to describe fears and emotions caused by love. The Lady becomes the lord and her suppliant lover is her faithful vassal. Bertrand de Ventadorn and the poets who came after him repeatedly describe the weakening bodily symptoms of male love: pallor, trembling, insomnia, sighs, cries. The male lover thus attributes to himself emotions usually ascribed to women. The women troubadours, like the Contessa de Dia and Castelloza, appropriate the language of the male poets, use feudal metaphors sparingly, but describe the same symptoms, suggesting that lovesickness erases the emotional differences between men and women.

Most Occitan poets are not men of action, therefore lovesickness keeps them static. They compose their songs and may even perform them, but they do not seek adventures and glory. However, from the eleventh to the fourteenth century, literary genres such as chansons de geste, romances, and lays abound in situations where lovers run into perilous adventures. Sickness is a constant theme whenever lovers are separated. In Flamenca (written in Occitan), Amadas et Ydoine, and Marie de France's Guigemar, the lovers show acute symptoms of lovesickness. Chretien de Troyes' Yvain loses his mind when his beloved rejects him. In the Folie Berne, Tristan is not simply pretending to be mad, he shows all the psychological traits of the melancholy man. In these texts lovesick women, however, may die of grief, but do not become insane. In this period, women who showed signs of madness were, rather, considered possessed by the devil and were either exorcised or burned at the stake as witches. Furthermore, the fate of lovesick men, at least in literary texts, allowed them to regain their sanity, change their lives, or succeed in being reunited with their beloved.

Although carefully described, physiological and psychological symptoms of lovesickness are linked with magic. But the development of the commercial revolution of the Middle Ages created a different world from that of courtly poetry and romances: suspension of disbelief could no longer be invoked. In La vita nuova, Dante describes his emotions according to the Occitan tradition, but takes a more scientific approach following Aristotelian natural philosophy. With few exceptions, Boccaccio (1313–1375), in his Decameron, anchors his tales in reality and in history. Boccaccio prefaces his collection of one hundred tales with a discussion of lovesickness and the different remedies available to men and women. He notes that lovesick men can find solace in traveling, hunting, gambling, and engaging in business. Women, on the other hand, are kept at home under the surveillance of their fathers, husbands, or brothers. Boccaccio dedicates his stories to women who have no access to recreation, thus turning literature into therapy.

Boccaccio's earlier works, the romances Filostrato (written in octaves) and Fiammetta (written in prose) illustrate the difference between men and women affected by melancholia. Betrayed by Criseide, lovesick Filostrato tries to forget his grief by going to war and dies on the battlefield. Fiammetta, precisely like the women described in the preface to the Decameron, cannot have a life of action; she then tells the story of her sufferings in first person to all women who have experienced betrayal and abandonment.

In Troilus and Criseyde, based on Boccaccio's Filostrato, Chaucer further elaborates the etiology of lovesickness as a physical, emotional, and moral phenomenon. Centuries later, melancholy caused by lovesickness will become one of the most salient themes of the Romantic age.

ESTER ZAGO

References and Further Reading

- Campbell, Donald. Arabian Medicine and Its Influence on the Middle Ages. London: Kegan, Trench, Trubner, 1926.
- Ciavolella, Massimo. La "Malattia d'amore" dall'Antichità al Medioevo. Roma: Bulzoni, 1976.
- Ferrand, Jacques. A Treatise on Lovesickness. edited and translated by Donald Beecher and Massimo Ciavolella. Syracuse: Syracuse University Press, 1990.
- Hildegard von Bingen. On Natural Philosophy and Medicine. edited and translated by Margret Berger. Cambridge: D. S. Brewer, 1999.
- Jacquart, Danielle and Thomasset Claude. Sexuality and Medicine in the Middle Ages. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1988.
- Klibansky, Raymond, Erwin Panofsky, and Fritz Saxl. Saturn and Melancholy. London: Nelson & Sons, 1964.
- Kristeva, Julia. Black Sun: Depression and Melancholia. New York: Columbia University Press, 1989.
- Lowes, John L. "The Lovers Maladye of Heroos." Modern Philology 11 (1914): 491–546.
- Olson, Glending. Literature as Recreation in the Later Middle Ages. Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1982.
- Siriasi, Nancy. Medieval and Early Renaissance Medicine. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1990.
- Wack, Mary Frances. "Memory and Love in Chaucer's Troilus and Criseyde." Dissertation, Cornell University, 1982.
- . Lovesickness in the Middle Ages: The "Viaticum" and Its Commentaries. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1990.
- Walter, Philip. "Tristan et la mélancolie." In Actes du 14e Congrès International Arthurien. Rennes: Presses Universitaires, 1984, pp. 646–657.

See also Courtly Love; Courtship; Doctors and Healers; Femininity and Masculinity; Gender Ideologies; Gynecology; Literature, Occitan; Madness; Sexuality: Extramarital Sex; Sexuality: Female Same-Sex Relations; Sexuality: Male Same-Sex Relations; Sexuality: Regulation of; Sexuality: Sex in Marriage; Trobaritz and Troubadours

LUTGARD OF AYWIÈRES

Lutgard of Aywières (1182–1246) was born in Tongres, Belgium, to a noble mother and a bourgeois father. She entered the Benedictine convent of Saint-Trond at sixteen and became its prioress in 1205.

A few years later, at the prompting of her confessor John of Lierre, she moved from the Flemish-speaking convent of Saint-Trond to the French-speaking Cistercian convent of Aywières situated near Brussels. Lutgard is remembered for her ascetic achievements, such as three long fasts each lasting seven years.

Lutgard's vita was recorded by the Dominican friar Thomas of Cantimpré. Thomas understood her bodily suffering as being spiritually effective, a process by which the pain and discomfort of a living, holy person diminished the time spent suffering by those in Purgatory; this theological phenomenon is also known as vicarious suffering. Thomas depicted Lutgard as an uneducated nun who could not master the French language, although she lived at Aywières for nearly three decades. Thomas juxtaposed this seeming lack of learning with Lutgard's intuitive understanding of the Bible, which resulted from her heart being mingled with the heart of Christ.

Lutgard was also recognized as an effective healer and prophet. Her respected reputation is attested by her numerous spiritual friendships. These friends included the holy woman Christina the Astonishing, who encouraged Lutgard to move to Aywières, the preacher Jacques de Vitry, who wrote letters to her while he was Bishop of Acre, and her Dominican hagiographer, Thomas of Cantimpré, who, after her death, wore a case around his neck that contained her finger.

CAROLYN MUESSIG

References and Further Reading

- Cawley, Martinus. "The Life and Journal of Lutgard of Aywières: Selections from the Life by Thomas de Cantimpré, Its Translation into Old French, and the Primitive Life." Vox Benedictina. 1.1 (1984): 20–48.
- Dinzelbacher, Peter. "Das Christusbild der heiligen Lutgard von Tongeren im Rahmen der Frauenmystik und Bildkunst des 12. und 13. Jahrhundert." Ons geestelijk erf. 56 (1982): 217–277.
- Hendrix, Guido. "Primitive Versions of Thomas of Cantimpré's Vita Lutgardis." Cîteaux. 29 (1978): 153–206.
- Jacques de Vitry. Lettres de Jacques de Vitry, edited by R. B. C. Huygens. Leiden: Brill, 1960.
- Lefevre, Jean-Baptiste. "Sainte Lutgarde d'Aywières en son temps (1182–1246)." Collectanea Cisterciensia. 58.4 (1996): 277–335.
- Merton, Thomas. What Are These Wounds? The Life of a Cistercian Mystic. Milwaukee: Bruce, 1950.
- Roisin, Simone. "Sainte Lutgarde d'Aywières dans son ordre et son temps." Collectanea Ordinis Cisterciensium Reformatorum. 8 (1946): 161–172.
- Thomas de Cantimpré. "Vita Lutgardis." Acta Sanctorum. 16 June. Tome 3. Anvers, 1701, pp. 234–262.
- . The Life of Lutgard of Aywières. Translated by Margot H. King. Toronto: Peregrina Publishing. Co., 1987.

See also Asceticism; Body, in Literature and Religion; Christina the Astonishing; Fasting and Food, Religious

Aspects of; Flanders; Hagiography; Monasticism and Nuns; Spiritual Care; Theology

LYING-IN

In medieval England and Europe, it was customary for a woman to withdraw from normal society when she gave birth to be tended by a midwife and her women relatives, friends, and neighbors until her churching (a ritual blessing at the church marking the end of her puerperal confinement, normally four to six weeks after the birth). During this lying-in period, the newly delivered mother was largely exempt from her normal household duties, such as cooking and marketing and her marital obligations, including sexual relations with her husband. Instead, she and her women companions, or gossips, gathered in the birthing chamber, a specially equipped and decorated room or curtained-off area, where they visited with one another and shared food and drink, including the spiced wine, or caudle, prepared at the time of the birth to ease the pains of labor.

This custom was remarkably similar throughout England and Europe, and it was practiced by women across the socioeconomic spectrum. Virtually all married women spent time lying-in. If circumstances allowed, unmarried mothers did also. Differences in socioeconomic status did affect the presence and number of companions, the nature and decoration of the birthing chamber, the type of refreshments, and the length of time before the new mother returned to her household and wifely duties.

Prior to the 1980s, medievalists focused on how this seclusion of a new mother with its prohibitions against cooking and sexual intercourse reflected and reinforced the clerical notions of female impurity which undergirded medieval gender stereotypes. In the 1980s, the focus shifted to the women participants and their roles in originating, shaping, and perpetuating the rituals and customs associated with childbirth. While it may have reinforced negative gender stereotypes, women also benefited from lying-in. It not only allowed a new mother time away from her normal duties and obligations to recover from childbirth, but it also provided a privileged women's space free from male intrusion. In the 1990s, the focus shifted to the relationships of power within the birthing chamber. Most notably, Adrian Wilson suggested that lying-in not only gave a new mother time apart to rest and recuperate but also actually inverted the normal pattern of relations in the patriarchal household. Under the watchful eyes of the women gathered around the new mother, a husband was subject to the authority of the midwife in his own home; he was expected to assume his wife's responsibilities in the household, and his conjugal rights were suspended, temporarily restoring a wife's control over her own body.

It is not only family politics that played itself out in the birthing chamber. Women from across the socioeconomic spectrum assembled around a newly delivered mother, brought together by a complex web of ties and allegiances, grounded in duty, friendship, and socioeconomic status. Medieval society was highly stratified, founded on mutual obligations, gifts, and favors. Through invitations and uninvited visitations, and the lending and borrowing of utensils and linens for the lying-in chamber, the new mother and the women gathered around her and affirmed, strengthened, and renegotiated their social networks.

Men rarely entered the birthing chamber, although they could be called upon in exceptional circumstances; and a king or male court official may have been present to witness the birth of an heir to the throne. Nevertheless, men's dynastic concerns and social politics made their way into that enclosed space, at least when the new mother belonged to the nobility or gentry. Women of the nobility and gentry played an important role in managing not only the family's households but also its estates and affairs. Those responsibilities entailed establishing and maintaining both female and male networks of influence. Hospitality, patronage, and gift exchange were the vehicles through which those networks were established and maintained. A noble woman or lady's confinement after the birth of an heir provided one more opportunity for her and her family, as well as their betters, peers, and acquaintances, to display and enhance their economic and social status through gifts, visits, and hospitality. The scarcity of sources has made it difficult to ascertain the extent to which lying-in served similar purposes for common folk.

Despite its ubiquity, there is little documentary evidence of medieval lying-in because it was a commonplace women's activity. Much of our knowledge of this custom is inferred from the more abundant legal records, diaries, letters, and autobiographies of the early modern period (the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries), although historians have made inroads into the silence surrounding the medieval birthing chamber by broadening the search to popular literature and drama, iconography, and material culture. The reexamination of familiar documentary evidence through the lens of gender analysis also allows glimpses into women's lives and activities, including childbirth customs and practices, as they intersect with men's lives and activities.

BECKY R. LEE

References and Further Reading

- Gibson, Gail McMurray. "Scene and Obscene: Seeing and Performing Late Medieval Childbirth." Journal of Medieval and Early Modern Studies. 29.1 (1999): 7–24.
- Haas, Louis. "Women and Childbearing in Medieval Florence." In Medieval Family Roles: A Book of Essays, edited by Cathy Jorgensen Itnyre. New York: Garland, 1996, pp. 87–99.
- Jacobsen, Grethe. "Pregnancy and Childbirth in the Medieval North: A Topology of Sources and a Preliminary Study." Scandinavian Journal of History. 9.2 (1984): 91–111.
- Jenstad, Janelle Day. "Lying-in Like a Countess: The Lisle Letters, the Cecil Family, and A Chaste Maid in Cheapside." Journal of Medieval and Early Modern Studies. 34.2 (2004): 373–403.
- Laurent, Sylvie. Naître au moyen âge: De la conception à la naissance: La grossesse et l'accouchement (XII<sup>e</sup> – XV<sup>e</sup> siècle). Léopard d'Or, 1989.
- Lee, Becky R. "A Company of Women and Men: Men's Recollections of Childbirth in Medieval England." Journal of Family History. 27.2 (2002): 92–100.
- Musacchio, Jacqueline Made. The Art and Ritual of Childbirth in Renaissance Italy. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1999.
- Pollock, Linda A. "Childbearing and Female Bonding in Early Modern England." Social History. 22.3 (1997): 286–306.
- Williams, Patricia. "Childbed Curtains and Churching Shawls: Ritual Cloths in the Czech and Slovak Republics." Ars Textrina 21 (1994): 65–83.
- Wilson, Adrian. "The Ceremony of Childbirth and Its Interpretation." In Women as Mothers in Pre-Industrial England: Essays in Memory of Dorothy McLaren, edited by Valerie Fildes. London and New York: Routledge, 1990, pp. 68–107.

See also Breastfeeding and Wet-Nursing; Churching; Conjugal Debt; Femininity and Masculinity; Feminist Theories and Methodologies; Gender Ideologies; Gentry, Women of: England; Gynecology; History, Medieval Woman's; Household Management; Illegitimacy; Infants and Infanticide; Midwives; Misogyny; Noble Women; Pregnancy and Childbirth: Christian Women; Pregnancy and Childbirth: Jewish Women; Private and Public Spheres; Procreation and Ideas of Conception; Sexuality: Sex in Marriage; Space, Secular: and Gender; Woman on Top

M

---

MADNESS

Madness is an inclusive term used to describe a variety of conditions in medieval Europe, from mental disorders (such as melancholy and mania, often referred as “woodness”) to hysteria, demonic possession, extreme religious zeal (manifested in visions and erratic behavior), and even conditions of the heart and soul—such as lovesickness, severe depression and despair caused by excessive grief, and spiritual sloth (this malady of accidie often afflicted male and female religious), as well as insanity triggered by anger and fear. The multifaceted nature of madness has sparked debate about exactly how it was understood by medieval people. Some scholars have argued that madness was mostly identified within the context of sin; some have argued it was an accepted (even functional) part of medieval society and that it was not until the 1500s that the mad began to be feared and confined; and some have argued that madness was empowering, allowing people to speak and act in ways normally considered taboo, as well as disempowering, when it was used to stigmatize and discredit.

Nonetheless, some general conclusions can be drawn about medieval madness. First, medieval people conceived of madness as behavioral rather than as chronic mental disease. Second, they distinguished among the types of madness, separating the mentally disturbed from those considered possessed by demons or divine spirits. Third, they usually cared for victims of madness within families and local communities; fourth, they often did not hold the mad criminally responsible for their actions. Finally, they considered madness a gender-inclusive condition—although eventually a shift in gendered ideas would associate madness more exclusively with women.

Several types of medieval sources discuss women and madness. Religious texts, such as sermon exempla, the lives of holy women, and miracle accounts from hagiography and pilgrimage shrines, often moralize women’s madness as either a consequence of sin or caused by a failure to confess sin. This madness was often temporary and frequently healed through prayer, confession, and divine intercession. Religious texts also reveal women who went mad after childbirth, women who acted mad because of religious fervor (some of whom, like Christina the Astonishing, became known as mystics and saints), and women labeled as demoniacs. Even though sin was a factor in some of these cases, such as with Margery Kempe, who went mad after giving birth and being prevented from confessing a sin, it was not always to blame. Demonic possession, for instance, was considered neither a sin nor as always caused by sin. Legal, medical, and ecclesiastical documents also reveal that women were diagnosed with mental disorders, that legal arrangements were made to protect the assets of madwomen, that a variety of treatments existed for the mad (from medical remedies, prayer, and pilgrimage to magic and charms), and that the mental sufferings of women were not always attributed to spiritual causes.

Although medieval men were just as likely to be afflicted by madness as their female counterparts, medieval sources began to posit a close association between women and madness. Female demoniacs increasingly outnumbered male demoniacs after the twelfth century; hysteria was believed to originate from the uterus; and misogynist ideas provided fertile ground to explain why women were especially susceptible to mental weakness. This connection between women and madness continued to progress, and, by the early modern period, women were considered predisposed to madness, and by the 1700s, madness had become a female malady. Thus, even though medieval madness was not exclusively feminine, it played a critical role in both the lives of medieval women and the course of women's history.

BETH ALLISON BARR

References and Further Reading

- Caciola, Nancy. Discerning Spirits: Divine and Demonic Possession in the Middle Ages. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2003.
- Chesler, Phyllis. Women and Madness. New York: Doubleday & Company, Inc., 1972.
- Clarke, Basil. Mental Disorder in Earlier Britain: Exploratory Studies. Cardiff: University of Wales Press, 1975.
- Dixon, Laurinda S. "The Curse of Chastity: The Marginalization of Women in Medieval Art and Medicine." In Matrons and Marginal Women in Medieval Society, edited by Robert R. Edwards and Vickie Ziegler. Woodbridge, U.K.: Boydell Press, 1995, pp. 49–74.
- Doob, Penelope. Nebuchadnezzar's Children: Conventions of Madness in Middle English Literature. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1974.
- Harper, Stephen. Insanity, Individuals, and Society in Late-Medieval English Literature: The Subject of Madness. Studies in Medieval Literature, 26. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 2003.
- Kroll, Jerome, and Bernard Bachrach. "Sin and Mental Illness in the Middle Ages." Psychological Medicine 14:3 (1984): 507–514.
- Lawes, Richard. "The Madness of Margery Kempe." In The Medieval Mystical Tradition: England, Ireland, and Wales, edited by Marion Glasscoe. Cambridge: D. S. Brewer, 1999, pp. 148–167.
- Neaman, Judith S. Suggestion of the Devil: The Origins of Madness. New York: Doubleday Anchor Books, 1975.
- Neely, Carol Thomas. "Recent Work in Renaissance Studies: Did Madness Have a Renaissance?" Renaissance Quarterly 44.4 (1991): 776–791.
- Newman, Barbara. "Possessed by the Spirit: Devout Women, Demoniacs, and the Apostolic Life in the Thirteenth Century." Speculum 73 (1998): 733–770.
- Showalter, Elaine. The Female Malady: Women, Madness, and English Culture, 1830–1980. London: Virago Press, 1987.
- Wenzel, Siegfried. The Sin of Sloth: Acedia in Medieval Thought and Literature. Chapel Hill, N.C.: University of North Carolina Press, 1967.

See also Christina the Astonishing; Exemplum; Hagiography; Kempe, Margery; Lovesickness; Miracles and Miracle Collections; Misogyny; Spirits: Discernment of and Possession by; Wild Women; Witches

MAGIC AND CHARMS

Many of the magical practices that were part of women's and men's lives in the Middle Ages had ancient precedents. Pagan incantations facilitated birth and ensured conception; pagan rituals surrounding the gathering of certain plants and spells could be cast to acquire a lover or extinguish a lover's desire for some other woman. Streams and well springs, special trees, millstones and natural rocks with holes in them, and shells and gemstones all played a part in women's magical practices before the Christianization of Europe. Some pre-Christian types of magic survive into the Middle Ages in a recognizable form, including amulets made of plants to cure specific illnesses and dice that are cast on shiny surfaces that are looked into to predict the future. More often occasions for women's magic, incantations, and amulets come to rely on Christian names of saints and of God, Christian symbols (the cross), and Christian narratives to achieve the same results sought by older forms of magic.

In medieval Europe, as early as the Anglo-Saxon period, we hear of women practicing magic. For example, mothers who attempted to cure a daughter's fever by placing her (briefly) in an oven or rid a child of an illness by drawing it under a bit of turf at a crossroads were expected to confess to church authorities. These and other practices are recorded in Penitentials and handbooks for priestly confessors, where they are censured as un-Christian acts. A young woman might comb her hair under a mulberry tree and tie the comb leavings to a twig to bring on or reduce her menses. A woman might seek a lover by magic. A pregnant woman might perform an incantation while stepping over a grave to expel a dead fetus or over her sleeping husband to ensure a healthy birth. Captured in the magical poetry of the Anglo-Saxons are images of powerful feminine forces capable of exhausting a luckless victim or driving out a sickness. Besides dangerous feminine magic, Anglo-Saxons recorded domestic rituals of the kitchen (e.g., to keep milk from spoiling or keep the fiend out of the house), as well as rituals to protect household goods and flocks from theft, ensure the fertility of the land, and cure sick animals. In later centuries, charms to rid barns of rats or keep the food of pigs from contamination and the like were evidently useful to the person to whom the duties of their care fell—man or woman.

Other medieval magical practices targeted sexual desires. A woman might feed a man his own semen in an attempt to tie his passions to her alone. In contrast, a fifteenth-century male conjuration of the powers of the plant vinca (pervinca in British Library, Add. MS 17527, fol. 17v) aims to inflame female desire, so that “whatever girl or woman that I touch while holding you (vinca) in my hand may burn inextinguishably with love for me and not love nor desire anyone else.”

If a man became impotent by woman’s magic, he might be cured by counteracting magic. Impotence was understood to be a sort of magical binding for which unbinding words or a ritual of unlocking was the best remedy. In one instance, the offending lock and key are located in two nearby water wells. In the curative act, they are retrieved. The lock is opened with the corresponding key and a spell, thus restoring the man’s power. From the twelfth century, learned (male) physicians in Europe offered other ways to cure impotence and foster conception, some no less magical. In Italy the famous translator of Arabic medicine Constantine the African recommended specific rituals to restore fertility lost due to a bewitched marriage chamber. Later, the scholastic physician Gilbert the Englishman supplied detailed instructions for making an amulet for conception, by which, if worn during intercourse by the woman, the couple would conceive a daughter, and, if worn by the man, a son.

As part of a woman’s medical care, charms were employed to stem excessive menstrual bleeding (by appeal to St. Veronica) and to facilitate childbirth. From earliest times, some healers recommended that amulets made of seeds or powerful words be tied on the thigh of a woman in labor. One frequently used array of charms to ease childbirth or speed delivery relied on the Christian traditions surrounding the Virgin Mary’s painless delivery of the Christ child—as well as those for other blessed mothers such as Elizabeth, mother of John the Baptist, Anne, the mother of Mary, and mothers of medieval saints. Another favorite motif for childbirth charms is that of Christ calling the child out to the light: “Lazarus, come forth”—words that mark a strong parallel with the scriptural miracle. Yet this manifestly Christian motif may be a medieval transformation of an ancient pagan incantation to speed delivery. Also common in childbirth charms is the palindrome and word square Sator Arepo Tenet Opera Rotas. This magical formula eludes literal translation. It was used by Romans in the first century, adopted by Christians, and later interpreted as an anagram of the Pater Noster plus alpha and omega.

Sometimes “birth girdles” were employed and passed down in families. These girdles were long strips of sewn-together pieces of parchment inscribed with scriptural texts, charms, and prayers. Also, in wealthy circles, beautifully adorned and highly valued prayer books, or Books of Hours, often acquired by noble women, contained, besides the Latin liturgies for worship in daily devotions, charms, and personal rituals for healing added in the hands of their owners.

Late medieval women’s magic drew condemnations from civil and church authorities based in part on an imagined type of the sorceress. As depicted in literature and art, the sorceress was an unattractive old woman who worked dangerous magic through enchanted herbs, images, amulets, and divination of one sort or another. She could foretell the future or locate a thief. She might raise hailstorms to devastate fields and forests, cause animals and children to sicken and die, and consort with demons. During the same period, cults of female saints flourished. Their stories and names were employed in incantations to heal and help. For example, charms invoked St. Apollonia to prevent toothache, St. Susanna to heal wounds and prevent headaches and other distresses, and St. Agnes, whose veil stopped a fire, to prevent lust. Male saints, too, such as St. Peter for toothache, Sts. Nicasius and Toby for the eyes, and St. Job for worms, supply motifs for healing charms. By the end of the Middle Ages, in a spirit of reform, women and men were tried and punished for such traditional religious practices.

LEA T. OLSAN

References and Further Reading

- Bozoky, Edina. Charmes et prières apotropaiques. Turnhout: Brepols, 2003.
- Hanson, A. E. “A Long-Lived ‘Quick-Birther’ (okytkion).” In Naissance et petite enfance dans l’Antiquité. Actes du colloque de Fribourg, 28 novembre-1er décembre 2001, edited by V. Dasen. Fribourg: Academie Press, 2004, pp. 265–280.
- Kieckhefer, Richard. Magic in the Middle Ages. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989.
- McNeill, J. T., and H. M. Gamer. Medieval Handbooks of Penance. New York: Columbia University Press, 1938.
- Meaney, Audrey. “Women, Witchcraft and Magic in Anglo-Saxon England.” In Superstition and Popular Medicine in Anglo-Saxon England, edited by D. G. Scragg. Manchester: Manchester Centre for Anglo-Saxon Studies, 1989, pp. 9–40.
- Olsan, Lea T. “Charms and Prayers in Medieval Medical Theory and Practice.” Social History of Medicine 16 (2003): 343–366.
- . “Charms in Medieval Memory.” In Charms and Charming in Northern Europe, edited by Jonathan Roper. Basingstoke and New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004, pp. 59–88.
- Rider, Catherine. “Magic and Impotence in the Middle Ages.” Societas Magica Newsletter 13 (2004): 1–4.

See also Hagiography; Lovesickness; Medicine; Pregnancy and Childbirth: Christian Women; Pregnancy and Childbirth: Jewish Women; Witches

MARGARET OF ANJOU

Born in Lorraine, Margaret (1429–1482) was the daughter of René, duke of Anjou. Her uncle Charles VII of France arranged Margaret's marriage to Henry VI of England (1422–1471) at the 1444 Truce of Tours. Her initially conventional queenship included support for the foundation of Queen's College Cambridge.

Following Henry VI's mental collapse in August 1453 and the birth of their only child, Edward, on October 13, 1453, she unsuccessfully petitioned to be made regent. Despite Henry's recovery at Christmas 1454, a vacuum of authority remained, from which Margaret emerged as the head of a Lancastrian court party in opposition to Richard, duke of York. In 1456 Margaret effectively moved the royal capital to Coventry and used her own household and that of her son to dominate government. Although her political significance was acknowledged in the Loveday reconciliation of March 1458, she could not maintain royal authority in the face of Henry's continued inactivity. Yorkist lords captured the king at Northampton on July 10, 1460. During the Wars of the Roses, forces loyal to Margaret were successful at Wakefield (December 30, 1460), killing Richard, and St. Albans (February 17, 1461), but the City of London's refusal to admit her troops in February 1461 enabled York's son to declare himself King Edward IV.

After Edward IV's victory at Towton (March 29, 1461) Margaret fled to seek support in Scotland and then France. In 1470 she allied with Richard Neville, earl of Warwick, to arrange the short-lived restoration of Henry VI. Her son was slain at Tewkesbury on May 4, 1471, and she was captured days later, but eventually ransomed to Louis XI. Henry was killed in the Tower of London shortly thereafter. Margaret died near Saumur on August 25, 1482.

JOANNA L. LAYNESMITH

References and Further Reading

Laynesmith, J. L. The Last Medieval Queens: English Queenship 1445–1503. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2004.

Maurer, Helen. Margaret of Anjou: Queenship and Power in Late Medieval England. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell Press, 2003.

See also England; Queens and Empresses: the West

MARGARET OF ANTIOCH

The virgin martyr saint Margaret of Antioch was believed by medieval devotees to have died in the early fourth century, although it is unlikely that she ever actually existed. Her cult is first found in the Eastern church, with the earliest lives dating from the ninth century, and it spread across western Europe in the next couple of centuries, becoming one of the most popular female saint's cults. One French version of Margaret's life survives in over a hundred manuscripts, and it provided common subject matter for altarpieces, church walls, books of hours, and other works of art. Relics of the saint were also to be found in many countries.

Margaret's status as an efficacious intercessor was underlined by the prayer she made just before death in which she asked God that all those who remembered her life and invoked her should be protected from harm. Although venerated by a wide variety of devotees, Margaret came to be particularly associated with the protection of women in childbirth. Some versions of her life survive in the form of amulets that were designed to be used by women in labor. This patronage derived from the episode in which she miraculously escaped from the maw of a demonic dragon, bursting it open when she made the sign of the cross. Several writers, including Jacobus de Voragine in the Golden Legend, explicitly described this incident as apocryphal, but it nonetheless became her chief iconographic emblem, serving as an expression of the power that she could wield on behalf of devotees.

KATHERINE J. LEWIS

References and Further Reading

Larson, Wendy R. "The Role of Patronage and Audience in the Cults of Saints Margaret and Marina of Antioch." In Gender and Holiness: Men, Women and Saints in Late Medieval Europe, edited by S. J. E. Riches and Sarah Salih. London and New York: Routledge, 2002, pp. 23–35.

Lewis, Katherine J. "The Life of St. Margaret of Antioch in Late Medieval England: A Gendered Reading." Studies in Church History 34 (1998): 129–142.

Voragine, Jacob de. "The Life of St. Margaret." In The Golden Legend: Readings on the Saints vol. 1, translated by William Granger Ryan. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1993, pp. 368–370.

See also Hagiography; Jacobus de Voragine's Golden Legend; Katherine Group; Pregnancy and Childbirth; Christian Women; Relics and Reliquaries; Virgin Martyrs

MARGARET OF CORTONA

The story of Margaret of Cortona (1247–1297), as told by her confessor, Fra Giunta Bevegnati, illustrates the peculiar status of penitent women (that is, women who were unenclosed, often unaffiliated with an order) in late-thirteenth-century central Italy.

As a teenager from a peasant family in Laviano in Umbria, Margaret left home to live with a local noble, Arsenio, by whom she had a son. When, nine years later, her lover was murdered, her stepmother prevented Margaret from returning to her ancestral home. With her nine-year-old son, Margaret trekked to Cortona, where two aristocratic ladies, out of pity, took her in and gave her a small room. Over time the newcomer, making her living as a midwife, became well known for her penitential piety and compassion for the poor. Sometime after 1278, when she entered the Franciscan Third Order, Margaret sent her son to a Franciscan friary in Arezzo. A forceful leader, she founded a confraternity and later a hospital. So renowned was she for her virtues that she wrote to the bishop of Arezzo chastising him for making war on Cortona. In 1290 she left her cell near the church of St. Francis and moved farther up the hill, where she remained as a hermit until her death in 1297.

Soon afterwards the town authorities made Margaret a patron of Cortona. But her process of canonization stalled, and she was not canonized until 1723. While she lived in Cortona many came to seek her counsel, prayers, and intercession before God. The cult associated with her tomb—a basilica was built on the hillside to accommodate it—continued to spread for centuries afterward. The vast iconography of Margaret throughout the centuries is testimony to her fame.

Although a Franciscan tertiary, her status in Cortona and central Italy offers an example of how an individual woman, with no social background, could attain a position of moral leadership in an age of turmoil. For the history of hagiography, Fra Giunta's lengthy biography, written in large part as a dialogue between Jesus and Margaret, is an invaluable source of then-current directions in medieval spirituality, such as the devotion to the suffering Christ.

THOMAS RENNA

References and Further Reading

- Bevegna, Giunta. The Legend and Life of Saint Margaret of Cortona, translated by Thomas Renna. St. Bonaventure, N.Y.: Franciscan Institute Publications, forthcoming.
- Cannon, Joanna, and André Vauchez. Margherita of Cortona and the Lorenzetti: Sienese Art and the Cult of a Holy Woman in Medieval Tuscany. University Park, Pa: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1999.

See also Canonization of Saints; Hagiography; Monasticism and Nuns; Mysticism and Mystics

MARGARET OF SCOTLAND

Margaret (c. 1046–1093), queen consort of the Scottish king Malcolm III “Canmore,” is the only Scottish saint officially recognized by the Roman Catholic church. Her father Edward, grandson of King Aethelred II, was a candidate for the English throne but was exiled when Cnut of Denmark captured the English throne in 1016. Edward traveled through Russia and eastern Europe, where he married Agatha, a relative of the Germanic emperor Henry II. The family returned to England in 1057, but Edward soon died, leaving three children, of whom Margaret was the eldest. Margaret and her family fled England and took refuge in Scotland after the Norman Conquest. She and Malcolm were married by 1070. Although her vita claims that Margaret entered the marriage reluctantly and would have preferred to remain celibate, the couple seems to have enjoyed an easy partnership, and Margaret emerged as an influential voice within the kingdom. Of their eight children, three became Scottish kings, and one became queen of England. A generous patron of the Church, Margaret established a Benedictine community at Dumfermline, assisted pilgrims and hermits, and promoted a series of reforms designed to bring Scottish ecclesiastical practices into conformance with continental practices. Her customary ascetic practices gradually put her into a physically weakened state, and she died soon after hearing news that her husband and son had been killed fighting in England. She was popularly regarded as a saint by the early twelfth century and formally canonized in 1249 or 1250.

LOIS L. HUNEYCUTT

References and Further Reading

- Baker, Derek. “A Nursery of Saints: St Margaret of Scotland Revisited.” In Medieval Women, edited by Derek Baker. Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1978, pp. 119–142.
- Bruce, W. Moir. “Saint Margaret and Her Chapel in the Castle of Edinburgh.” The Book of the Old Edinburgh Club 5 (1913): 1–66.
- Gameson, Richard. “The Gospels of Margaret of Scotland and the Literacy of an Eleventh-Century Queen.” In Women and the Book: Assessing the Visual Evidence, edited by Jane H. M. Taylor and Lesley Smith. London and Toronto: British Library and University of Toronto Press, 1997, pp. 149–171.
- Huneycutt, Lois L. “A Translation of the Life of St. Margaret of Scotland.” In Matilda of Scotland: A Study in Medieval Queenship. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell Press, 2003, pp. 161–178.
- Wall, Valerie. “Queen Margaret of Scotland (1070–1093): Burying the Past, Enshrining the Future.” In Queens and Queenship in Medieval Europe: Proceedings of a Conference Held at King's College London, April 1995, edited by Anne J. Duggan. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell Press, 1997, pp. 27–38.

See also Hagiography; Lay Piety, Patronage, Ecclesiastical; Scotland

MARGARET OF YORK

Margaret of York (1446–1503) was duchess of Burgundy. As the younger sister of King Edward IV of England, she was married in 1468 to Charles the Bold, duke of Burgundy, ruler of the Low Countries. Margaret must have felt it a great personal loss that she was unable to provide a male heir to the Burgundian dynasty. Her political activities were limited to representative appearances at diplomatic receptions at court and at the solemn gatherings of the representatives of the estates. Her most important political actions occurred during the crisis that followed the death of Charles the Bold on January 5, 1477. Together with her young stepdaughter, Duchess Mary of Burgundy, she introduced the first governmental measures during the following weeks of turbulence. It was Margaret who convinced Mary to honour the marriage arranged for her by her father to Maximilian I of Austria. The early death of Mary of Burgundy left Margaret with the task of caring for Mary's underage children and then her grandchildren, which resulted in a renewal of court life at her residence at Mechelen. Under the old laws, a widow enjoyed an independence that a woman could not have expected under any other circumstances. Seen in this light, Margaret of York behaved in a very different way during her marriage from how she did afterward. She then devoted herself increasingly to promoting strict observance in cloisters. In that sense, her widowhood sheds more light on her personality than do the years during which she actively devoted herself to her duties as a wife.

WIM BLOCKMANS

References and Further Reading

- Eichberger, Dagmar. Women of Distinction: Margaret of York: Margaret of Austria. Leuven: Brepolis, 2005.
- Weightman, Christine. Margaret of York, Duchess of Burgundy 1446–1503. Gloucester & New York: Alan Sutton, St. Martin's Press, 1989.

See also Burgundian Netherlands; Mary of Burgundy; Noble Women; Widows

MARGARET "THE CRIPPLE" OF MAGDEBURG

At age twelve, Margaret (c. 1210–c. 1250) (also known as the Lame [Contracta]) was enclosed as an anchoress near the cathedral of Magdeburg, where she was regarded with suspicion and contempt by the clergy. She was removed from her cell but managed to have herself enclosed at a Cistercian convent in the Newtown of Magdeburg, the quarter of merchants, artisans, and religious women, where she became a teacher of religion. According to the Latin Life recorded by her father confessor, John the Dominican, Mary, the Mother of God, took Margaret into her care and taught her to read. Mary became her instructor and teacher, doctrix eius et magistra. Margaret viewed herself as Mary's servant. Her task, as she saw it, was to assist the young citizenry in their striving for religious self-expression. Margaret mediated for them with God and taught them the basic tenets of the Christian faith, which she herself graphically put into practice in her own anchorhold. As John formulated it: "And often she called great public sinners to her and spent all her strength on them.... And she at times thought she had such great wisdom, that even if all the oppressed hearts of the world had stood before her, she would have comforted them all, each one according to his circumstances." In the group of people that gathered at her anchorhold we may recognize an informal community of discourse, to which Margaret transmitted the wisdom and knowledge she had gathered herself.

ANNEKE B. MULDER-BAKKER

References and Further Reading

- von Magdeburg, Johannes, O.P. Die Vita der Margareta contracta, einer Magdeburger Rekluse des 13. Jahrhunderts. Edited by Paul Gerhard Schmidt. Leipzig: Benno Verlag, 1992.
- . The Vita of Margaret the Lame. Translation by Gertrud Jaron Lewis and Tilman Lewis. Toronto: Peregrina, 2001.
- Mulder-Bakker, Anneke B. Lives of the Anchoresses: The Rise of the Urban Recluse in Medieval Europe. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2005, pp. 148–173, 255–263.

See also Anchoresses; Disabilities; Education, Lay

MARGINALIA, MANUSCRIPT

Marginalia is an art historical term that refers to images at the periphery, or in the margins, of a manuscript page. Such images feature most prominently in Gothic illuminated manuscripts of around 1250 to 1350, especially from northeastern France and Flanders, southern England, and (to a more limited degree) northern Italy, primarily Bologna. They are descendants of the human, animal, and fantastic beings that inhabited the decorated letters of earlier Gothic and Romanesque manuscripts, and are, like those earlier images, overwhelmingly secular in nature. Religious subjects occur, but themes from literature and daily life are more common. Favorite subjects include the hunt, chivalric activities, romance, music-making, clerics, and doctors; depictions are fairly conventional, though often given a satirical twist. Although the subjects are so often secular, marginalia are most often found in Christian devotional books, particularly Psalters and Books of Hours. The essential resource for the study of manuscript marginalia is Lilian Randall’s Images in the Margins of Gothic Manuscripts, which indexes and illustrates marginalia from no fewer than 226 manuscripts.

Anonymous, Fifteenth century. Witches leaving for the Sabbath. Marginalia of “Le Champion des Dames” by Martin Lefranc, 1440. Credit: Snark / Art Resource, NY.

The number of marginalia varies considerably from one manuscript to the next. In some they are limited to the elaborately decorated pages that signal important textual divisions. Such is the case with the well-known Ormesby Psalter (England, early 1300s; Oxford, Bodleian Library, MS. Douce 366). In others, such as the contemporaneous Gorleston Psalter (London, British Library, MS. Additional 49622), marginalia occur on every single page. As with other components of the decoration, such as the border, decorated and historiated initials, miniatures, and line endings, the marginalia would have represented an additional cost to the patron.

Marginalia can be classified both by type of activity and by character, the latter including men, women, animals (especially apes, dogs, and rabbits), and hybrids—composite creatures referred to as babelwynes in medieval documents. Women and female hybrids are depicted far less often than men, but they engage in activities as numerous and varied. In just one tiny early fourteenth-century Psalter made in Ghent (Oxford, Bodleian Library, MS. Douce 5 and 6), women carry wood, make and tend a fire, cook, churn butter, make wafers, clean, card and spin wool, fetch water, feed livestock, shear a sheep, mind children, pick flowers, groom themselves, dance, and play music. Most of the women in these episodes and in other manuscripts wear the decorous white head veil or have their hair bound in a net and fillet. Their most common attributes are the distaff and spindle, which they wield as weapons in some of the more humorous marginal scenes. They become a lance in parodies of the chivalric tilt, and in a favorite motif derived from the legend of Reynard, the outwitted housewife (or hybrid with a woman’s upper body) shakes a distaff at the wily fox as he makes off with her fowl.

Depictions of specific female figures also occur in the margins, including personifications, such as Ecclesia and Synagogue; and Power of Women motifs, such as Phyllis astride Aristotle, Salome, and Judith. But more prevalent in this category are episodes from the lives of female saints and the Virgin. In the Queen Mary’s Psalter (England, 1310 to 1320; London, British Library, MS. Royal 2. B.VII), there are thirty-six different miracles of the Virgin and multiple scenes from the lives of Saints Agatha, Agnes, Catherine, and Margaret, presented in consecutive series in the lower margins. Female patrons represent another category of recognizable women in marginalia. They are most often shown in prayer and are sometimes identifiable by blazoned robes or proximity to coats of arms. There are no fewer than thirty-three depictions of a young patron named Marguerite in the small Franco-Flemish Book of Hours (1320s; London, British Library, MS. Additional 36684, and New York, Pierpont Morgan Library, MS. 754) that inspired much of Michael Camille’s consideration of manuscript marginalia in the first chapter of Image on the Edge: The Margins of Medieval Art.

In several manuscripts, such as the Luttrell Psalter (England, c. 1340; London, British Library, MS. Additional 42130) and the Gorleston Psalter, there are direct relationships between some marginal images and certain words or phrases in the adjacent text. Just as often, however, marginalia appear to have no direct relationship either to the text or to other images on the same page. They are and were amusing, but to what degree they were also intended to elucidate or otherwise redirect attention to the text is still very much in question.

MARGOT MCILWAIN NISHIMURA

References and Further Reading

- Camille, Michael. Image on the Edge. Cambridge, Mass: Harvard University Press, 1992.
- Randall, Lilian M. C. Images in the Margins of Gothic Manuscripts. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1966.
- Sandler, Lucy Freeman. "The Study of Marginal Imagery: Past, Present, and Future." Studies in Iconography 18 (1997): 1–49.

See also Art, Representations of Women in; Books of Hours; Clothing; Courtship; Hagiography, Iconographic Aspects of; Heraldry; Household Management; Mary, Virgin; in Art; Nuns as Illuminators; Obscenity; Patronage, Artistic; Personifications Visualized as Women; Woman on Top

MARGRETHE

Margrethe (Margareta) (1353–1412) was queen of Norway and Sweden. She was the daughter of King Valdemar IV of Denmark and Helvig of Schleswig. Margrethe is, above all, famous for the unification of the Nordic monarchies at the end of the fourteenth century. It began in 1376 when she campaigned for her son Olav, heir to the Norwegian throne, to be king of Denmark. His challenger was Albrecht, of the German dynasty Mecklenburg, who was also Margrethe's nephew, and Valdemar's second grandson. When Margrethe's husband, King Håkon of Norway (and Sweden, 1362–1364), died in 1380, Denmark and Norway were united. As Olav was still a child, Margrethe became the real power, and she took the lead in the struggle with the Mecklenburgers for hegemony in Scandinavia and the Baltic. When Olav died in 1387, Margrethe managed to be elected regent of Denmark and Norway as well as leader of the Swedish opposition to King Albrecht. In 1389 she adopted her sister's grandson, Bugislav of Pommern-Stolp, who under the name of Erik was received as lawful heir to the Norwegian throne. The defeat of the Mecklenburgers in 1395 paved the way for Erik to be King of Sweden and Denmark. His coronation as union-king in Calmar 1397 marks the apex of Margrethe's career. Formally she resigned, though in fact she ruled until her death. After 1397 Margrethe worked hard to mold the three Scandinavian kingdoms into one state, and to reconquer lost border provinces such as Schleswig and Gotland.

Margrethe's political genius has never been contested, though her motives have been much debated.

In the first half of the nineteenth century she was portrayed as a Scandinavian idealist who wanted to counterbalance German influences. After defeat by the Prussians (1864) the image of Margrethe the Danish nationalist prevailed, because she fought for Denmark's domination over Scandinavia. In recent times depictions of Margrethe as an idealist and as a nationalist have both given way to Margrethe the Machiavellist, who primarily fought for power and dynastic interests.

STEINAR IMSEN

References and Further Reading

- Imsen, Steinar. "Late Medieval Scandinavian Queenship." In Queens and Queenship in Medieval Europe: Proceedings of a Conference Held at King's College London, April 1995, edited by Anne J. Duggan. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell Press, 1997, pp. 53–73.
- Olesen, Jens E. "Inter-Scandinavian Relations." In The Cambridge History of Scandinavia, I: Prehistory to 1520, edited by Knut Helle. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2003, pp. 710–770.

See also Queens and Empresses: The West; Scandinavia

MARGUERITE PORETE

Biographical details about Marguerite Porete (d. 1310) are scarce, and her identity as the author of the Mirror of Simple Annihilated Souls and Those Who Only Remain in Will and Desire of Love (written c. 1290) was obscured for more than six hundred years. The Mirror, which was first publicly condemned and burned in 1306, was read for centuries as the work of assorted male authors. Originally written in Old French, the text comes down to us also in Latin, Italian, and Middle English. In 1946, the scholar Romana Guarnieri reunited the text with its author, who had been burned at the stake as a relapsed heretic on June 1, 1310 in the Place de Grèves in Paris. Hers is the earliest recorded death sentence for mystical heresy in the history of Christianity.

Porete was an itinerant, solitary Beguine from Hainault in Belgium. She was also thought to be associated with the sect of the Free Spirit, and was thus connected with groups held under increasing suspicion by the papacy. Her sometimes radical theological speculations added to that cloud of suspicion. It seems she welcomed controversy as an uncloistered laywoman spreading an esoteric spiritual message in the vernacular. Although she secured the endorsement of three theologians, each of whom attested to the worth (and theological complexity) of her work, she could not sway church authorities. In 1306, Porete was arrested and her book was condemned and burned. She failed to heed a warning to cease spreading her message by spoken or written word, and in 1308 she was rearrested and imprisoned. She refused to speak to her inquisitors during her eighteen-month incarceration because, to Porete, worldly authorities had no essential power. The twenty-one church-appointed theologians at her trial declared her a heretic based on fifteen propositions taken out of context. In keeping with her convictions, Porete accepted this worldly defeat peacefully, and her calm demeanor in the face of violent death reportedly moved many in the crowd to conversion.

The Mirror is a dialogue primarily between “Love” and “Soul” in which they explore the doctrine of annihilation. Annihilation, or complete identity with God, is the culmination of a seven-stage path of increasing perfection. A “simple” soul “becomes what God is” in annihilation. For Porete, the point of God-given free will is to surrender that will entirely back to God in order to reach an embodied spiritual state of “knowing nothing, having nothing, and willing nothing.” This is the perfect state of being “without a why.” In annihilation, an earthly soul can realize its precreational state of complete union with the divine. Porete’s doctrine is decidedly esoteric and thus meant only for those who are themselves “simple souls.” This doctrine was never a mainstream theological doctrine before or after Marguerite Porete, although it has solid roots in Neoplatonic philosophy.

Porete’s claims were seen as a clear challenge to male-dominated scholastic theology, as well as to the traditional role of the institutional church in mediating the relationship between God and the soul. Her work is distinct from most other medieval women’s writings in several ways. For instance, many medieval women who wrote in vernacular languages espoused “safe” theological doctrines and refrained from making Porete’s bold claims. Porete also avoided the standard apologies for feminine weakness so common in the writings of her contemporaries. She had the courage of her convictions, despite (or perhaps because of) her lowly status as a woman. She found authority within herself and her true identity as a simple soul, not through visions or through the approval of the institutional church. Moreover, Porete steered her readers away from certain staples of lay piety and mysticism. She refers little or not at all to the imitation of Christ and its attendant penitential asceticism. She avoided bridal language and extended reference to the Bible. She also steered clear of scrupulous attention to sinfulness and referred only briefly to liturgical cycles and Eucharistic piety.

Porete was an anomaly in her time, and she remains so today as scholars try to understand her text and context. She has been “tried” and found guilty of heresy by some modern scholars, while others have attributed her execution to political machinations beyond her control. Still others have seen her primarily as a target for a church increasingly anxious about certain expressions of lay piety. More recent scholarship has focused on literary and theological motifs in her work, such as themes and images from the courtly love tradition. Others have examined her influence on others, most notably Meister Eckhart (d. c. 1328).

JOANNE MAGUIRE ROBINSON

References and Further Reading

- Hollywood, Amy. The Soul as Virgin Wife: Mechthild of Magdeburg, Marguerite Porete, and Meister Eckhart. Notre Dame, Ind.: Notre Dame University Press, 1995.
- McGinn, Bernard. The Flowering of Mysticism: Men and Women in the New Mysticism (1200–1350). New York: Crossroad Publishing Company, 1998, pp. 153–265.
- Newman, Barbara. “The Mirror and the Rose: Marguerite Porete’s Encounter with the Dieu d’Amours.” In The Vernacular Spirit: Essays on Medieval Religious Literature, edited by Renate Blumenfeld-Kosinski et al. New York: Palgrave, 2002, pp. 105–124.
- Porete Marguerite. The Mirror of Simple Souls, translated by Edmund Colledge, J. C. Marler, and Judith Grant. Notre Dame, Ind.: Notre Dame University Press, 1999.
- . Speculum simplicium animarum, edited by Romana Guarnieri and Paul Verdeyen. Corpus Christianorum: Continuatio Mediaevalis 69. Turnhout: Brepols, 1986.
- Robinson, Joanne Maguire. Nobility and Annihilation in Marguerite Porete’s “Mirror of Simple Souls.” Albany, N.Y.: State University of New York Press, 2001.

See also Church; Courtly Love; Heretics and Heresy; Scholasticism; Theology; Translation; Women Authors; Old French Texts

MARIA OF VENICE (MARIA STURION)

Maria of Venice (Maria Sturion) (1379–1399), a Dominican penitent in the last five years of her brief life, figures in the exempla literature of the later Middle Ages. Thomas de Antonio da Siena (Thomas Caffarini), a Dominican, composed a biography (legenda) of Maria shortly after her death in 1399. It figured among the materials forwarded by Thomas to obtain a rule for penitent women in Venice. That rule was granted in June 26, 1405 by Pope Innocent VII in his bull Sedis apostolicae.

Maria has been called the imitable saint because she performed no intimidating spiritual feats, underwent few extreme austerities, and was not a miracle worker; in other words, her life did not contain the heroic feats associated with Maria’s own role model,

Catherine of Siena. Maria came from a prosperous and supportive household, indeed one of the 120 wealthiest households in Venice, the wealthiest city in Europe. At fifteen Maria was married off to Gian-nino della Piazza, immediately experienced a conversion to penitent, and was deserted by her husband, who left to fight wars in northern Italy. Thereafter Maria expressed her spiritual calling largely through the outward signs of dressing humbly and attending church, where she listened raptly to the long sermons preached by Thomas Caffarini.

Maria's legenda had relevance to her society. As a deserted young wife with no legal recourse to resolve the impasse in which she found herself, Maria represented a growing segment of wealthy, leisured women for whom marriages did not serve to provide satisfactory lives. Some of these women could find spiritual guidance and solace as Dominican penitents. As her confessor, Thomas encouraged Maria's spiritual journey through confession and instruction, taught her to write, and before her death awarded her the garb of a penitent.

SUSAN MOSHER STUARD

References and Further Reading

- Bornstein, Daniel. "Spiritual Kin and Domestic Devotions." In Gender and Society in Renaissance Italy, edited by Judith C. Brown and Robert C. Davis. London and New York: Longman, 1998, pp. 173–192.
- , trans. "Thomas of Siena: The Legend of Maria of Venice." In Dominican Penitent Women, edited by Maiju Lehmijoki-Gardner. New York: Paulist Press, 2005, pp. 105–176.
- Elliott, Dyan. Proving Woman: Female Spirituality and Inquisitional Culture in the Later Middle Ages. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 2005, pp. 105–176.
- Lehmijoki-Gardner, Maiju. Worldly Saints: Social Interaction of Dominican Penitent Women in Italy, 1200–1500. Bibliotheca Historica, number 35. Helsinki: Suomen Historiallinen Seura, 1999.
- Sorelli, Fernanda. La Santità Imitabile: "Leggenda di Maria da Venezia" di Tommaso da Siena. Venice: Deputazione Editrice, 1984.

See also Catherine of Siena; Dominican Order; Hagiography; Italy; Laywomen, Religious; Spiritual Care

MARIE DE FRANCE

Marie de France is usually recognized as one of the most accomplished writers of medieval French literature and as the author of three major works: the Lais (written in the 1170s), the Fables (1180s), and the Espurgatoire Seint Patriz (St. Patrick's Purgatory, around 1190). A few critics have questioned the attribution of all three texts to the same "Marie." No manuscript contains the Lais, the Fables, and the Espurgatoire together, and only one manuscript, Harley 978, contains both Lais and Fables. It has even been suggested that the feminine signature "Marie" does not indicate a woman author. But most scholars concur that the same author composed Lais, Fables, and Espurgatoire, and many would agree that the works attributed to Marie display a high degree of authorial presence and share common thematic concerns, despite their evident generic differences. Feminist literary critics and historians of women and gender in the Middle Ages have long recognized the importance of Marie's complex works.

The historical Marie de France remains a subject of conjecture. Most likely, Marie was born in France and wrote in England; her literary and linguistic talents suggest that she was high-born. She dedicates the Lais to a king, probably Henry II Plantagenet, husband of Eleanor of Aquitaine. She presents the Fables to "Count William," evidently a member of the Anglo-Norman feudal aristocracy. The Espurgatoire was written for a lay audience. If Marie was a member of a religious order, as has been suggested, she composed her works for lay audiences beyond the monastery or nunnery, for women and men in courtly society. Marie's works attest to the high degree of literacy attained by some women in the Anglo-Norman aristocracy and to their active participation in cultural patronage and production.

The Lais

Marie's first extant work, the Lais, consists of twelve short narrative poems penned in octosyllabic rhyming couplets, which range from 118 lines (Chevrefoil) to over 1180 lines (Eliduc). In a fifty-six-line prologue, Marie describes her artistic project in terms that both convey her debt to classical and Christian culture and express her desire to do something new. Noting the duty of those who possess eloquence to reveal their talents, she invokes ancient poets who wrote "obscurely" or enigmatically so that their successors could provide their own commentary and interpretation. Marie announces that she will not translate from the Latin as others have done but will instead retell lays (Breton tales from the oral tradition that were sung or recounted). Marie's twelve short narratives transpose Breton fairy tales and magical adventures into a feudal setting with a courtly style that incorporates the rhetorical techniques and themes of classical authors, notably Ovid. Her narrator frequently addresses the audience, particularly in the tales' prologues and epilogues, thereby highlighting the author's transformative artistry. Marie's narrator composes in an elegant, concise style, and conveys compassion for her characters as she explores social tensions and psychic depths, often in an otherworldly setting. Scholars have remarked on the self-conscious stance of Marie as a female author in the Prologue and have noted the importance of women as readers, writers, and speakers throughout the Lais.

The twelve Lais recount from a variety of perspectives the adventures and suffering of men and women in love. The lai appearing first in the Harley manuscript, Guigemar, announces many of the collection's themes. A young nobleman, Guigemar, who is ostracized for his indifference to love, shoots an androgynous hind with an arrow that rebounds to wound the hunter in the thigh. The hind prophesies that Guigemar will be cured by a woman who suffers for him as much as he does for her. Transported by a magical ship to another land, Guigemar falls in love with a married woman who has been locked by her jealous old husband in a room with painted walls. Venus, goddess of love, is depicted casting one of Ovid's books on the constraints of love into ardent flames. Although Guigemar and the lady engage in an adulterous affair, their love is reciprocal, long-suffering, and faithful. After a painful separation, the couple rediscovers each other when only they can undo the knot and the belt that they have borne as tokens of their fidelity.

Marvelous animals, enchanted places, unhappily married women with jealous husbands, and Ovidian motifs will recur in many of the ensuing lais, often with surprising turns. Equitan, Bisclavret, Yonec, Le Rossignol, Milun, Chièrefeuille, and Eliduc tell varied tales of adultery. The adulterous king and the lady married to the king's faithful seneschal are evil characters in Equitan; they are punished when they are cast into a vat of boiling water intended for the husband. Marvelous or symbolic animals recur in Bisclavret, Laustic, Yonec, Milun, and Eliduc in a variety of guises. The marvelous creature in Bisclavret is a werewolf, but his behavior is more courteous than that of his wife, who acts like a beast when she betrays him. The weasel in Eliduc bears a medicinal flower that enables the hero to rouse his beloved from an unconscious state.

Unmarried maidens are featured in many lais. Le Frêne, Lanval, Deux Amants, Milun, Le Malheureux, and Eliduc portray single women who display resourcefulness and various degrees of autonomy, despite evident obstacles, as they struggle in love. Fresne, orphaned at birth, is socially marginalized, but her own act of generosity eventually reunites her with her birth mother. The lady in Lanval is a fairy who grants special powers to her lover, an ostracized knight. The young woman in Deux Amants is devoted to an overly possessive father and to her lover, who dies carrying her in his arms. Milun's beloved maiden bears a child out of wedlock but manages to save her honor and that of her son and his father, whom she eventually marries. In Marie's rich tapestry of personalities and narrative perspectives, no one thread easily summarizes the lai. The stories' intertextual echoes, intersecting motifs, and sometimes conflicting approaches invite the audience's reflection and the reader's comparative interpretation.

The Fables

To judge from the number of extant manuscripts (twenty-five), Marie's clever Fables were even more popular in the Middle Ages than her artful Lais. Aesopic tales—short moral stories often but not always featuring anthropomorphized animals, which were thought to have originated with the legendary Greek master Aesop—circulated broadly in Latin manuscripts in the Middle Ages and were an important part of the school curriculum. Marie's collection, the first extant collection of such fables in the vernacular, brings together forty stories from the fourth-century Latin Romulus Nilantilus tradition and sixty-two tales from other sources, including Arabic tales and some that Marie herself may have invented.

Scholars have described the many ways Marie transforms her sources and inserts her own authority as a female teacher. Although her women characters and animals are not immune from moral failings, she often shows sympathy for female creatures, as in her depiction of a pregnant sow or a bear who is raped. The ending moral to the tale is not always straightforward and does not always easily fit the story itself; readers must reflect on the stories' meanings. Many fables analyze feudal politics; the collection may have served as a manual of instruction for princes and noble families.

Saint Patrick's Purgatory

Marie's last work, Espurgatoire Seint Patriz (Saint Patrick's Purgatory) appears to be the most straightforward translation of a source, Henry of Saltrey's Latin Tractatus de Purgatorio sancti Patricii, the tale of the Irish knight Owein's return voyage to Purgatory. But in this text, too, Marie intervenes as a female author, consciously inserting herself into a masculine, clerical tradition and writing expressly for a lay audience. Owein's journey explores moral and physical sufferings that result from human foibles and offers the possibility of redemption. An exemplum appended to Owein's story recounts the tale of a priest who castrates himself to avoid sexually molesting the young orphan girl in his charge. As in Marie's other works, the Espurgatoire Seint Patriz examines dark or "obscure" regions of human nature in a way that invites critical reflection.

In different ways, each of Marie's works examines the conflict between personal desires and social communities, paying particular attention to relations between men and women. The Lais, the Fables, and the Espurgatoire Seint Patriz help to inaugurate a critical examination of gender roles within vernacular courtly and didactic medieval literature.

ROBERTA L. KRUEGER

References and Further Reading

- Amer, Sahar. Esopé au féminin: Marie de France et la politique de l'interculturalité. Amsterdam: Rodopi, 1999.
- Bloch, R. Howard. The Anonymous Marie de France. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2003.
- Freeman, Michelle. "Marie de France's Poetics of Silence: The Implications for a Feminine translatio." PMLA 99 (1984): 860–883.
- Jambeck, Karen. "Reclaiming the Woman in the Book: Marie de France and the Fables." In Women, the Book, and the Worldly, edited by Lesley Smith and Jane H. M. Taylor. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995, pp. 119–137.
- Maréchal, Chantal A., ed. In Quest of Marie de France: A Twelfth-Century Poet. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen, 1992.
- Marie de France. Espurgatoire Seint Patriz, edited and translated by Yolande de Pontfarcy. Louvain: Peeters, 1998.
- . Fables, edited and translated by Harriet Spiegel. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1987.
- . Fables, edited and translated by Charles Brucker. Louvain: Peeters, 1998.
- . Lais de Marie de France, edited by Karl Warnke and translated by Laurence Harf-Lancner. Lettres gothiques. Paris: Librairie générale française, 1990.
- . The Lais of Marie de France, translated by Robert Hanning and Joan Ferrante. New York: Dutton, 1978.
- . The Lais of Marie de France, translated by Glyn S. Burgess and Keith Busby. New York: Penguin, 1986.
- . Saint Patrick's Purgatory, translated by Michael J. Curley. Binghamton, N.Y.: Medieval and Renaissance Texts and Studies, 1993.
- Paupert, Anne. "Les femmes et la parole dans les Lais de Marie de France." In Amour et merveille: Les Lais de Marie de France, edited by Jean Dufournet. Paris: Champion, 1995, pp. 169–187.

See also Literature, Old French; Ovid: Medieval Reception of; Patronage, Literary; Translation; Women Authors: Old French Texts

MARIE OF OIGNIES

Independent religious women who tried to live holy lives outside the cloister (mulieres sanctae) became common in the southern Low Countries (especially in the diocese of Liège) in the early thirteenth century. Some of these women lived on their own, while others formed communities with varying degrees of institutional formality. One of the earliest known of these women who came to be called Beguines is Marie of Oignies. Married young, Marie made an agreement with her husband that they would live chaste lives. Starting c. 1191 they served at a leprosarium near Nivelles in Brabant. Marie later (c. 1207) became a recluse affiliated with the house of Augustinian canons at Oignies near Namur. There she earned a reputation for austerity, tearful penance, miracles, and visionary experiences before her death in 1213.

Marie's life and experiences are best known to us from the account written by Jacques de Vitry, a noted preacher who later became a cardinal. Jacques, who was ordained a priest at Oignies, served as Marie's confessor until her death. The life was written after Marie's death, and one must sift it carefully to distinguish biographical details from hagiographic conventions. Jacques was eager to defend Marie's reputation against those who thought her unorthodox or overwrought. Thomas of Cantimpré, who was converted by Jacques' preaching, became a monk but later joined the Dominican order. Among his writings was a supplement to Jacques' life of Marie of Oignies, which discussed the cardinal's relations with her (not always treating Jacques positively) and related such of her miracles for which he found credible evidence. These writings popularized not just Marie's reputation but the fame of the religious women of the Low Countries. Only later would official opinion about such women become more consistently suspicious.

THOMAS IZBICKI

References and Further Reading

- King, Margot H., and Hugh Feiss, trans. Two Lives of Marie d'Oignies. Toronto: Peregrina Publishing, 1998.
- McGuire, Brian Patrick. Holy Women and Monks in the Thirteenth Century. Toronto: Peregrina Publishing, 1999.
- Simons, Walter. Cities of Ladies: Beguine Communities in the Medieval Low Countries, 1200–1565. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001.

See also Beguines; Chastity and Chaste Marriage; Flanders; Hagiography; Laywomen, Religious

MARKET AND TRADESWOMEN

The position of women in medieval economy seems to be characterized by a gradual process of exclusion. The scale of this process is matter for debate. Some state that even in the High Middle Ages women could never aspire to gain access to entrepreneurial activity (Bennett), while others argue that the process was a cyclical one, whereby labor shortage and easier access to capital after the Black Death offered opportunities to move beyond traditional female tasks (Goldberg, Kowaleski). Moreover, there were strong geographical differences, associated with legal structures and social customs. The economic role of women in northern Europe seems to have been more important and highly regarded than in the Mediterranean. Nevertheless, women's work offered, generally speaking, low status and low pay (Howell).

There is no doubt that the hold of male-dominated guilds from the thirteenth century onwards strengthened the process of exclusion. Restrictions on women's participation in the guilds are, however, difficult to interpret. Manufacturing guilds and their hierarchical system of training and entrepreneurship were instrumental in pushing out women, but for retailing guilds the situation is less clear. Many women involved in retail were master's daughters, and their trade is evidence of life-cycle patterns, but their presence was substantial nonetheless. Iconographic and literary sources show trading women outside as well as within the boundaries of the formal market economy. Women traded both as their husbands' helpers and independently. Commercial income generated by women allowed a more efficient distribution of labor within the household. In fact, women's roles were defined by the interaction between the patriarchal structures in society and the requirements of a flexible economy.

Women engaged in trade were granted legal protection in municipal law from the eleventh century on. In thirteenth-century Augsburg in Germany, women were allowed to get involved in business activities independent of their husbands and to take their own disputes to court. In Flemish cities businesswomen acted on their own account as well as on behalf of their husbands. This legal framework originated probably not as a tool to emancipate women but as a means of freeing husbands from the debts and obligations of their wives.

Town and guild administrators were, therefore, not aiming at exclusion, nor did they enforce a strict division between the public (male) forum and private (female) space. Despite the greater stress on issues of public morality in the later Middle Ages, regulation remained often vague and ambiguous, or else extremely specific. Retail was clearly regulated less strictly than manufacture. In fifteenth-century Bruges, Belgium, guild statutes mention only occasionally specific conditions for women, and when they did, they aimed to limit concentration and "unfair" competition, rather than to exclude women.

We are quite uninformed about the exact scope of female involvement in marketing. Husbands and fathers cloud the activities of their wives and daughters; single women are underreported. Very often economic activity is only apparent when a wife was widowed and able, according to city law, to act independently. Nevertheless, there is no doubt that women made their own contributions to regional and local exchange, both on a small and a large scale, although mostly, but not exclusively, in less specialized, low-status activities. But women also could be involved in larger commercial ventures as associates of male relatives, as independent investors, or as widowed heirs of larger business ventures. Women also tended more than men to shift occupations according to their life cycle and they employed fewer (male) servants on a regular basis.

At the basic level, peasant women took agricultural produce to local markets, where they sold dairy, poultry, fruit, vegetables, and various processed goods (ale, textiles). By the thirteenth century a weekly market was likely to be within reach of most villagers. In the towns, women tried to make a living with various retailing activities. Often they were hucksters, petty retailers acting as intermediaries for (poor) consumers. These seem to have been particularly numerous in smaller towns. In larger towns, specialization and guild control were stricter. Many women were active as forestallers, buying goods from country producers before they reached the market and reselling them at a profit. The guilds, always trying to enhance market transparency, were notably suspicious of such activities. Although regular traders (shopkeepers and stallholders at the marketplace or in the commercial halls) tended to be male, women were also active in this trade, in particular as mercers (selling a wide variety of nonperishable goods). Some retailing activities were dominated by women, to the point that they were regarded as female (e.g., ale, bread, fish, poultry, dairy). In some towns, secondhand clothes were almost exclusively female (Nuremberg), and in others exclusively male (Antwerp). The great majority of linen stalls in the hall of medieval Bruges were rented by women, while the cloth stalls were in male hands. But in general the occupational division by sex was less clear-cut.

PETER STABEL and LAURA VAN AERT

References and Further Reading

- Bennett, Judith M. "Medieval Women, Modern Women: Across the Great Divide." In Culture and History 1350–1600, edited by David Aers. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1992, pp. 147–175.
- Goldberg, P. J. P. Women, Work, and Life Cycle in a Medieval Economy: Women in York and Yorkshire c. 1300–1520. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1992.
- Herlihy, David. "Women's Work in the Towns of Traditional Europe." In Women, Family and Society in Medieval Europe. Oxford and Providence, R. I.: Berghahn Books, 1995, pp. 69–95.
- Howell, Martha C., Women, Production and Patriarchy in Late Medieval Cities. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1986.
- Kowaleski, Maryanne. "Women's Work in a Market Town: Exeter in the Late 14th Century." In Women and Work in Preindustrial Europe, edited by Barbara Hanawalt. Bloomington, Ind.: University of Indiana Press, 1986, pp. 145–164.
- Stabel, Peter. "Women at the Market: Gender and Retail in the Towns of Medieval Flanders." In Secretum Scriptorum. Liber alumnorum Walter Prevenier, edited by Wim Blockmans, Marc Boone, and Thérèse De Hemptinne. Leuven: Garant, 1999, pp. 259–276.
- Wiesner, Merry E. Working Women in Renaissance Germany. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1986.

See also Business; Division of Labor; Guild Members and Guilds; Merchant Families, Women of; Work

MAROZIA OF ROME

Described by the pro-German bishop Liutprand of Cremona as "shameless harlots," Marozia of Rome (885–c. 938) and her mother Theodora have received little sympathetic attention from historians. Yet Liutprand's lurid account of Marozia's sexual liaisons with Pope Sergius III (by whom she had the future pope John XI), Alberic of Spoleto (producing another son, Prince Alberic II of Rome), and Guy of Tuscany masks the fact that Marozia needed to secure her family's future in Rome in turbulent early tenth-century Italy. The accession of Alberic II to power in Rome, driving off Hugh of Arles, king of Italy, in 932, suggests that his mother's and grandmother's unorthodox methods had succeeded. In fact, their story mirrors those of other dynasties in Italy at this time, for whom control of the local bishopric was a normal element of securing power. Liutprand's politically motivated account tells only the sexual story, heightened by the knowledge that the bishop of Rome was in fact the pope; the monastic patronage of the Theophylactan family throughout this period suggests that they sought numerous ways to enhance their status, and Marozia may in fact have retired to one of the family's houses.

PATRICIA SKINNER

References and Further Reading

- Buc, Philippe. "Italian Hussies and German Matrons: Liutprand of Cremona on Dynastic Legitimacy." Frühmittelalterliche Studien 29 (1995): 207–225.
- Hamilton, Bernard. "The House of Theophylact and the Promotion of the Religious Life among Women in Tenth-Century Rome." Studia Monastica 12 (1970): 195–217.
- Liudprand of Cremona. The Embassy to Constantinople and Other Writings, edited by J. J. Norwich. London: J. M. Dent, 1993.
- Llewellyn, Peter. Rome in the Dark Ages. London: Faber, 1971.

See also Celibacy; Clerical and Priests' Concubines; Concubines; Italy; Noble Women

MARRIAGE CEREMONIES

The early history of Christian marriage celebrations and ceremonies cannot be properly reconstructed, but there is reason to believe that the clergy were involved even in the Roman period (there is evidence in Tertullian). A fourth-century ban on clerical participation in banquets for second marriages is indirect evidence that they would take part if the couple were marrying for the first time. Other fourth-century evidence shows that a veil and a blessing could form part of a Christian marriage ceremony. Detailed evidence is sparse until the Carolingian period. From that period we have liturgical books containing a nuptial mass. We also have the Pope Nicholas I's (858–867) fairly full answer to a question about marriage put to him by the newly converted Bulgarians. He described an elaborate sequence of rituals reminiscent of Byzantine marriage ceremonies—there is a coronation, for instance. Significantly, though, he adds that many couples cannot afford all this and that for them consent alone is sufficient.

An elaborate set of rituals coalesced in Anglo-Norman rites around 1100, and in England and northern France the church door seems to have played an important part in the ceremony. Some features will seem familiar, such as the use of the marriage ring. (A remark in a sermon by Jean Halgrin d'Abbeville in the early thirteenth century shows that it was also normal for women to wear their engagement ring all their life.) The English Sarum rite presents us with an exceptionally detailed description of the marriage ritual, including the prostration of bride and groom before the altar during the canon of the mass, and a cloak's being held over them by four clerics. This last feature was apparently omitted when one member of the couple had been married before, as was a central element of an elaborate blessing after the canon and the Lord's Prayer. This omission has its origin in a ban on the blessing of second marriages, a ban that may have been much more thoroughgoing earlier on: perhaps implying that the priest should not participate in the ceremony at all (though this is a guess). The ban did not at any point mean that second marriages were illicit: second and subsequent marriages were common and regarded as perfectly moral and sacramental by the Church.

A religious ceremony was not part of the medieval western Church's definition of a valid sacramental marriage. Research has yet to establish a map of the law on marriage ritual. In some regions, notably England, marriage in church was a strict obligation. In others it was not. The rituals of upper-class marriage in Italy as described by Klapisch-Zuber contrast with the rituals analyzed by Brooke for England. There was certainly no general obligation imposed by pope or council to be married by a priest. The essence of a marriage was the mutual consent of the couple. This means that marriage in front of a notary (rather than a priest) did not necessarily have any anticlerical overtones at all.

What the Church did require was proper publicity. After 1215, every marriage was supposed to be preceded by a reading of the banns. Nevertheless many people ignored this rule and got married "clandestinely." The medieval Church abhorred such unions but recognized their validity as sacramental and indissoluble marriages, though the cost was high in terms of confusion and annulments on grounds of prior clandestine contracts. It would seem that the authorities doubted their power to make marriage by a priest necessary for validity, and it was left to the Council of Trent in the fifteenth century to cut the Gordian knot and declare marriage without the proper ceremony to be simply invalid.

DAVID D'AVRAY

References and Further Reading

- Binder, B. Geschichte des feierlichen Ehesegens von der Entstehung der Ritualien bis zur Gegenwart, mit Berücksichtigung damit zusammenhängender Riten, Sitten und Bräuche: Eine liturgiegeschichtliche Untersuchung. Metten: Gebrauche, 1938.
- Brooke, Christopher N. L. The Medieval Idea of Marriage. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1989.
- d'Avray, David. "Marriage Ceremonies and the Church in Italy after 1215." In Marriage in Italy 1300–1650, edited by Trevor Dean and K. J. P. Lowe. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998, pp. 107–115.
- . Medieval Marriage: Symbolism and Society. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2005.
- Duchesne, L. Christian Worship: A Study of the Latin Liturgy up to the Time of Charlemagne, translated by M. L. McClure. London: SPCK, 1919.

Klapisch-Zuber, Christiane. "Zacharie, ou le père évêque: Les rites nuptiaux toscans entre Giotto et le concile de Trente." Annales 34 (1979): 1214–1243.

Molin, Jean-Baptiste, and Protais Mutembe. Le Rituel du mariage en France du XII<sup>e</sup> au XVI<sup>e</sup> siècle. Paris: Beauchesne orbinian, 1974.

Ritzer, K., Formen, Riten und religiöses Brauchtum der Eheschliessung in den christlichen Kirchen des ersten Jahrtausends. Münster: Aschendorffsche Verlagsbuchhandlung, 1981.

Stevenson, Kenneth. Nuptial Blessing: A Study of Christian Marriage Rites. London: Alcuin Club Collections, 1982.

See also Church; Marriage, Christian; Marriage Preaching; Remarriage; Theology; Trousseau

MARRIAGE, CHRISTIAN

Marriage in medieval Latin Christendom was both a secular and a religious bond. The tension between the two realms constitutes a major theme of its history during the millennium, but there were many chapters to that long story and complex subplots in different social and geographic settings. There was no single secular imperative, but a mix of sometimes contradictory political, social, and economic needs, so that even as a purely secular arrangement, marriage took no single form. Marriage's religious meaning was equally unsettled. The Christian laws of marriage and their attendant ideology were slow to develop, slower still to become normative, and they contained contradictions that rendered them a potent force for further, unexpected, change. Thus, although any particular couple and their families were constrained by the laws, customs, and cultural expectations of the day, medieval people's marriages were not all the same and the range of meanings attached to marriage changed over time.

The Ability to Marry

As a secular bond, marriage was a sociopolitical alliance between families. For the nobility, this often meant that parents actually selected their children's spouses, and it always meant that the interests of family property, power, and position determined when and to whom a child was married. Boys and girls of this class were regularly betrothed as infants and formally married as adolescents, and by the later Middle Ages merchant families sometimes adopted similar practices. For ordinary people, however, such matters were less rigorously controlled, and the evidence we have indicates that both men and women usually married later in life, generally between 18 and 28. Nevertheless, children of free peasants, artisans, or merchants were expected to—and almost always did—marry someone whose property, skills, or connections could strengthen the natal family's position and secure the fortunes of the new household. Unfree people had even less choice. By the Carolingian period it was generally accepted that they could form valid marriages, but it was expected that they would have their lord's permission before marrying.

Because marriage was a social institution, entered in order to secure or acquire material benefits for the couple, for the couple's natal kin, and for any children to come, it was only the people who had access to such benefits that were able to marry. Inevitably, among the nonnoble class at least, it was those without property or the infirm who did not marry, simply because they could not establish a household, or it was those with alternative means of securing a social place, whether as religious, as servants in another household, or as dependents in a relative's household. Elites usually married at higher rates, for they had property and alliances to secure, but, as historians such as Georges Duby have emphasized, younger sons of the nobility tended not to marry once rules of primogeniture had become the norm, since they were now without sufficient means to establish a household worthy of their social station. In other settings, particularly in the mercantile cities of late medieval Italy, the "surplus" daughters of aristocratic families often entered monasteries rather than marrying.

Although a surprisingly large number of medieval Europeans never married, those who did spent a good part of their adult lives in the married state. In the north of Europe, widows with property regularly remarried, even within months of their husbands' death and even into advanced middle age. In the south, this was a considerably less common pattern; in fact, in places such as late medieval Florence, prosperous widows tended not to remarry because they would thereby lose rights to property left to them. Everywhere, however, men seem to have regularly remarried, even taking three, four, or five different wives during a long life and having children with each of them. The demographically "combined family" of the modern West was thus a common occurrence in medieval Europe, but the emotional dynamics in such families are hard to evaluate. Evidence from medieval court cases displaying children squabbling with their half-siblings or stepparents about inheritances and surviving folk tales featuring cruel stepmothers, absent mothers, and lost fathers suggest that combined families were sometimes unhappy, but other kinds of sources tell a different story. We also have wills and other property transfer documents showing that people often chose to give assets to step-relatives, and we have vocabulary suggesting that people then valued these relationships. The French, for example, called stepmothers belles-mères, even if they also coined the word marâtre to describe their evil twins.

Property and the sociopolitical rights that attended property were such fundamental features of marriages in medieval Europe that it is impossible to understand marriage without examining these arrangements. The property that each spouse brought into marriage or acquired thereafter was carefully controlled during the marriage by informal and formal rules about who could use it and for what purposes, who inherited it at the end of the marriage, and what rights the surviving spouse had to it during his or her remaining life. The range of possibilities was enormous, and a detailed map of the variations by class, region, or time would be almost unreadable. Using marriage contracts, statutes, and legal records of other kinds, most of which come from the post-1000 period, historians have, however, provided a rough sketch of the two principal patterns that characterized marital property law during the period.

The Separatist System

One system, which legal historians have labeled "separatist," kept the husband's and wife's property apart during the marriage and provided each of them different, and independent, property rights as widow or widower. In these systems, women entered marriage with property from their natal family, which was called the dos in Latin or dowry in English and which was usually considered a substitute for her inheritance. Although the husband managed the dowry during his life, he could not alienate it without her consent (or the consent of her male kin), and it returned to her in her widowhood. In most areas the widow also received an "increase" from her husband's estate. The husband also brought property to the marriage and frequently inherited more from his family in the course of the marriage, but his assets were not sequestered in the same way as his wife's, since all property in the marital household except that specifically marked for her or her beneficiaries belonged to him. Children were the normal heirs of these marriages, but in most regions parents had the right to distribute their estate unequally among their children, and even to will property to others.

The Communal System

The other major system was less separatist and more "communal" in nature. In these arrangements, the property either spouse brought to marriage or acquired in its course, whether through inheritance, gift, or their own labor, was merged into a common fund. The husband typically had full control over these assets during the marriage, even including the right to sell or otherwise alienate the property, but his widow had rights to some or all of the property, as her own, and in some areas the widow's survivor's rights gave her some authority over the common property fund during the marriage. The husband, in turn, had the same survivor's rights, as did his widow. In these systems, children were the automatic heirs of their parents, and in most areas each child, male or female, had equal inheritance rights. In some variations of the communal systems, children's inheritance rights superseded those of the widow and could even constrain the father during his life, thus assuring that the assets he was managing were kept intact for the children.

In structure, the "separatist" system was very different from the "communal." The former positioned the husband and wife as independent representatives of their respective natal families, while the latter created a radically unitary partnership, apparently breaking all property ties with natal kin and forming new ones between the spouses and the children they would have together. In practice, however, very few systems were purely separatist or communal, and in any case the practices in any region or among any social class could change over time. For example, in northern France, where it was customary for people to form common property funds at marriage, the nobility typically allowed only a small portion of movable goods to fall into that account. They placed their land and other valuable goods that had been brought to the marriage in separate accounts reserved for the husband and wife respectively, thus creating a hybrid system, neither communal nor separatist, but some of each. In the same region, it became customary for widows also to receive income from a portion of her late husband's assets—the dower, called the douaire in French. Thus the typical widow had three sources of support: her portion of the common fund, the special assets from her family that had been reserved for her at the marriage's inception, and her dower.

While marital property law was genuinely unstable for most of the Middle Ages, this does not mean that people had free choice in deciding the terms of their own marriages. Instead, they were bound by local custom, which until the later centuries was unwritten, and it was rare for any couple to exceed the boundaries of those customs by wide margins. That some did helps explain why changes occurred over time and why there was so much variation from place to place, but the changes happened slowly enough that in one person's lifetime they were usually imperceptible, and a couple marrying in, say, 900 or 1200 surely considered themselves to have little latitude. By the late Middle Ages, the structures were changing even more slowly. Territorial sovereigns and city governments were largely responsible for the slowdown, as they issued statutes to clarify and regularize local practices or empowered judicial systems to standardize the interpretation of customary traditions and the form of written agreements like marriage contracts. At the same time, people began to keep better written records, and that process alone also helped to stabilize law. While these developments did little to reduce complexity or to quickly eliminate the differences between one locality and its neighbors, they did slow the rate of change and eventually create uniformity across broad regions.

Although each of the two forms of marital property law typically contained elements reminiscent of the other, it is also true that certain regions, classes, and periods tended to prefer one form over the other. The customs of the nobility in the early Middle Ages were decidedly communal in spirit, while in the High and late Middle Ages the same class opted for more separatist arrangements. Southern Europeans, as a general rule, adhered more closely to separatist regimes, while northerners tended to preserve old traditions of communal property law. We also find that Europe's elites—its nobility and the rich merchants that emerged in the high and late Middle Ages—constructed more separatist arrangements, while ordinary people—peasants and artisans—tended to prefer communal systems. Thus, there can be little doubt that the instability and hybridity of marital property law was in part a measure of people's efforts to adjust the law to their individual circumstances and to structure their property arrangements to reflect social needs.

Exogamy

The attention medieval people gave to the property arrangements underpinning marriage reflected, in part, the fact that marriages were exogamous in that women typically were married out of their natal lines, taking property with them. This practice made it essential to clarify the terms of the property transfer in order to ensure that the transferred property was managed in ways that benefited the bride, her children, and her natal family. Until the High Middle Ages, however, what it meant to marry "out" was generously defined. Among the nobility, cousins married first cousins, brothers sometimes married their sibling's widow, and uncles took nieces as wives. We have little good evidence about the patterns among ordinary people in these early years, but it is reasonable to assume that in peasant communities people did the same, for the pool of marriageable people was too small to permit very strict rules about exogamy. This had changed by the High Middle Ages, however, for the church radically expanded the category of prohibited kinship, forbidding marriages between kin related by blood to the seventh and then, after Lateran IV in 1215, to the fourth degree, and between spiritual kin. The pool of eligible spouses was thus radically reduced, for the rules promulgated in 1215 meant that all descendents of a common great-great-grandparent were ineligible spouses, and it meant that one could not marry a godparent or the child of a godparent. While royalty and similarly high-placed elites were sometimes able to circumvent those rules, they nevertheless were generally observed, and even the elite had trouble obtaining the necessary exemptions.

There is some debate among scholars about the reasons for the church's insistence on such draconian rules of exogamy, but there is no question that these rules should be considered in the larger context of the church's evolving conception of marriage. Although during the earliest centuries of its history the Church was ambivalent about marriage and especially about sexual pleasure in marriage, that ambivalence had all but disappeared by the high Middle Ages. By the twelfth century, when canon lawyers had put in place the chief elements of marriage law, learned churchmen and preachers both consistently celebrated marriage's role in the earthly life, even if they typically offered only cautious endorsement of marital sex. By the thirteenth century, marriage was widely considered a sacrament, a vehicle of grace itself.

Consent

The central element of the mature doctrine of the medieval Latin church regarding marriage was the notion that consent, and consent alone, made a valid marriage. Although Europeans had long considered the bride's and groom's agreement to the match an element of the pact (as had the Romans, from whom canon lawyers took many of their ideas about marriage's form), the teachings promulgated by canon lawyers and theologians from the tenth century forward radically altered the significance of this agreement. By 1200 they agreed that a bride and groom giving their consent to the union were entering a covenant not unlike that Christ was meant to have made with humankind. Marriage was thus more than a "contract" that could be amended or abrogated; it was a quasi-sacred institution that bound each spouse to the other, exclusively and for life. Practices that had once been common in medieval Europe were thus made illegal under canon law, and by the twelfth century the church was in a position to enforce these laws. Divorce, once common in early medieval Europe, was banned; bigamy was rigorously defined so that even abandoned wives could remarry only after long years alone; separations were allowed only in cases of extreme cruelty, heresy, apostasy, or adultery; spouses were even expected to live with a leprous spouse (although they were exempted from the requirement that they fulfill the conjugal debt).

However firm church law and teachings were about the centrality of consent in making marriage, it took long decades to work out exactly what was meant by "consent." It was certain that the couple had to be of age to consent (conventionally, twelve for girls and fourteen for boys), but in the early years of the debates little more was clear. Prominent scholars struggled to decide whether a verbal promise to marry was sufficient ("I will marry you"), and if the promise was not enough (it was not), could consummation of the union serve as fulfillment of that promise? In the end, this question was decided affirmatively, but sexual intercourse alone, it was also agreed, did not constitute sufficient evidence of consent. It was also agreed that if consent had been rendered in the present ("I marry you"), consummation was not even necessary to make a valid marriage.

Clandestine Marriage

It is hard to overemphasize the significance of these rules for medieval Europeans' experience of marriage. It put the couple themselves in charge of marriage, thus creating the possibility of secret or "clandestine" marriages, made without witnesses of any kind. Thus, it was now possible for a couple directly to challenge the families' right over the marriage decision. Although the church remained firm in treating such marriages as real or "valid," and, as a result, outraging parents, church officials did not condone such marriages. In fact, they made a clear distinction between such merely "valid" marriages and those they deemed "legitimate." The latter were made in public and were blessed by a priest. It was in this context that the church instituted the tradition of the "banns," for the public reading of the banns (conventionally for three Sundays preceding the ceremony itself) served to inform the community of the plan to marry and gave its members a chance to introduce impediments to the union. The church also intensified its efforts to bring the marriage ceremony itself under its control, not only by generally requiring the priests' blessing, but also increasingly by insisting that the ceremony be performed in or in front of the church itself and that the priest not only bless the wedding but officiate at the ceremony.

However strenuously church officials urged a "legitimate" marriage, they nevertheless did not outlaw clandestine marriages until the sixteenth-century Council of Trent. And, in truth, it would have been difficult to have done so, because until the High Middle Ages, most marriages were conducted according to local customs that often had only a vague relationship to the formal rules of the church. Even if from that period forward most people considered Christian rituals essential to a proper marriage, there remained significant variation in practices across the social and geographic landscape. Such marriages did not, however, create serious tensions, for they were accepted by the community and few of them were challenged in church courts. Rather, the "clandestine" marriages that so threatened medieval society were the truly secret ones, that is, those made in private, out of the view of either the church or the community and without parents' approval. Because such marriages jeopardized family position and put their children's material future at risk, parents often took steps to minimize the damage caused by such unions, even if they could not prevent them. Their primary weapon was property, and in many regions customary or written law was changed to deny inheritances to children who had married without their parents' consent. Parents could wield the same weapon less formally as well, for they could effectively disinherit a son or daughter who married against their will by refusing the usual marriage gifts.

Although records from the period make it clear that most couples who married without witnesses did so against their parents' wishes and for romantic reasons, it is also clear that such marriages were fraught with dangers for the couple themselves, especially for the woman. A woman entering a clandestine marriage could not be sure that it would meet the test of validity if brought to court by a "husband" claiming that he had made no "promise of the future" but had only had sexual relations with her. And who was to know the truth if the supposed promise had been made in secret? A woman thus "unmarried" by the church courts would find herself mother of a bastard and without customary rights to her supposed husband's property. Court records also contain stories of women who claimed that their "consent" had been forced—but again, who was to know, if there were no witnesses? In relatively fewer cases, the tables were turned; the archives contain a number of stories of "wives" who protested that they had not pledged themselves to the men calling themselves "husbands," but intended another match. Again, who was to know?

Love and Marriage

Church law regarding marriage and the religious instruction that accompanied it thus had unintended consequences. Not only could marriage be taken out of the hands of families and put into a purely religious realm, it could also be brought into a private sphere inaccessible by either kin or the church. In this way, the notion of "consent" acquired the individualist meaning of "choice," thus providing the context for a more generalized idea of marriage based on personal desire or romantic love. Broader cultural developments fed this emerging ideology. The courtly love literature that circulated in aristocratic courts from the High Middle Ages forward not only provided an enduring image of such passion, it bequeathed the language to express the image. Although formulated as part of a narrative about heterosexual love outside marriage—indeed, it typically described adulterous passion—the trope itself was later easily inserted into a story about conjugal attachment. Even the plays, tales, and farces about marriage that belonged to medieval Europe's comic literature and were more closely associated with its ordinary people helped to formulate the new marital ideal. For all their misogynist and antimarriage thematics, these texts, with their obsessive attention to conjugal love, marriage, domesticity, and the relations between husband and wife, focused Europeans on marriage's emotional content and in the end gave conjugality new complexity and depth.

Both the church's teachings about marriage and the emerging discourse about romantic love in marriage worked, some scholars have argued, to improve women's position. While there can be no doubt that Europeans, once having decided that marriages should be based primarily on personal choice and romantic attachment, would later marshal this narrative to attack certain features of patriarchy, those changes came too late to have seriously dislodged the medieval gender paradigm. While this did not mean that medieval women universally experienced marriage as oppression, it did mean that throughout the medieval period, marriage remained a secure expression of the gender hierarchy of that age. According to the dominant ideology women were men's natural inferiors, constitutionally incapable of male honor and dangerous if not properly governed because they could not control their own desires. In some contradiction to this narrative, however, women were also valued for their labor, the children they could bear, and their ability to provide their husbands access to the resources of another male line. They were even praised for their capacity for gentleness, patience, and charity, but it was generally accepted that such virtues emerged only when women were properly governed—by men.

Issues of Control

In keeping with this ideology, husbands had control over their wives' persons. According to church teachings, both spouses owed one another the "conjugal debt," since marriage was considered a remedy for lust, and both were held to the promise of monogamy, but in practice women were much more severely punished for adultery than men were, and the records we have indicate that it was typically men, not women, who demanded payment of the conjugal debt. In many legal traditions of the age, men had the explicit right to beat their wives, and, even where law did not specifically allow it, wives were regularly beaten. Even the church, which counseled husbands to treat their wives gently, did not forbid them from using force, and secular law typically went no further than banning beatings that threatened a woman's life.

In effect, if not always in formal law, women also lost legal personhood when they married. They typically could not bring suit independently, they could not testify in criminal court without their husbands' permission, and, unless their property was formally sequestered from the marital fund, they could not conduct trade in their own name. Their property was also under their husband's management, even if in some legal regimes the husband was not able to sell or encumber his wife's property without her permission (or the permission of her natal family). In some areas of community property law, in fact, women had no formal property rights whatever during marriage; all that a woman had brought to the marriage or acquired during it was merged into the marital fund, and that fund was in effect her husband's, not hers.

So described, medieval marriage seems a bleak house for women. In reality, however, the system provided protections as well as restrictions, and in any case it was often less rigid in practice than in structure. As a result, marriage provided benefits that for many women, perhaps most, outweighed the disadvantages. Some regions allowed wives quasi-independent status in law; all legal regimes granted them important property rights either as wives or widows, if only to secure the assets for their male relatives; and in practice women could win power and respect as well as affection through their roles as mothers, household managers, representatives of their kin, and—perhaps most importantly—deputies for their husbands in the men's absence or at their death. It is impossible, however, to generalize for "women" as a whole. Both the limits to and the sources of women's power and pleasure in marriage were a function of class, law, and politics and, as is always the case, of age, health, and fecundity.

Rich women enjoyed special privileges beyond those bestowed by wealth and rank themselves, as representatives of their natal families and sometimes of their husbands' households, and as mothers of the sons that would carry on the patriline. The wives of artisans, peasants, and merchants were key members of their household economies, often serving as co-managers of what we would call the family business and in any case providing valuable and valued services as managers of the domestic space. Women also had extrafamilial resources, in the community, where they could establish networks with other women, and in the parish or the monastery, where they often found protectors, even refuge in extreme cases, or retreats in their widowhoods.

Widows

As widows, women typically regained their legal personhood, and in most legal regimes they took control of significant amounts of property and acquired the guardianship of minor children. So potentially powerful was the independent widow, however, that cultural norms and law itself often worked to contain them. Many of the stories that come to us from the late Middle Ages feature the ungoverned and sexually aggressive widow who, although surely more a cultural icon than a social reality, clearly evidences the threat a powerful widow posed in medieval society. In practice, law was often fashioned to limit widows' property rights, typically by giving her only the income on her dower property, by compelling her to manage her share of the common property in the marital household under the watchful eye of her children or their legal agents, or even by returning her dowry to her kin so that they could use it to arrange another marriage for her, or for another daughter. Even those widows positioned as independent heads of household with authority over children, businesses, servants, and apprentices seem not to have found their new position particularly comfortable, for most of them remarried. Some scholars have suggested that they missed male companionship, others that they feared the public scrutiny to which independent widows were subjected, others that they sought the familiar status of household mistress, others that they simply wanted help with the responsibilities of the household. Whatever the reasons, we are forced to conclude that many women considered marriage preferable to widowhood. Whether that says more about the pleasures of marriage or the disadvantages of widowhood is hard to say.

There was no “medieval” marriage, if by that we mean a fixed set of practices, rituals, and beliefs, and a common experience of conjugality. Instead, marriage’s meanings shifted throughout the millennium and always acquired different valences in different social settings. Even by the end of the period, when church law and Christian teachings had combined to give marriage a clearer legal form and new cultural significance, marriage remained a complex mix of often contradictory imperatives. The resulting tensions guaranteed not only diversity across the social and geographic landscape, but also continued change through time.

MARTHA HOWELL

References and Further Reading

- Bennett, Judith M., and Amy M. Froide. Singlewomen of the European Past, 1250–1800. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999.
- Brooke, Christopher N. L. The Medieval Idea of Marriage. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1989.
- Brundage, James A. Law, Sex, and Christian Society in Medieval Europe. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1987.
- Camille, Michael. The Medieval Art of Love: Objects and Subjects of Desire. New York: Abrams, 1998.
- Chojnaki, Stanley. “The Power of Love: Wives and Husbands in Late Medieval Venice.” In Women and Power in the Middle Ages, edited by Mary Erler and Maryanne Kowaleski. Athens, Ga.: University of Georgia Press, 1988, pp. 126–140.
- Duby, Georges. Medieval Marriage: Two Models from Twelfth-Century France. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1978.
- . The Knight, the Lady, and the Priest: The Making of Modern Marriage in Medieval France. New York: Pantheon Press, 1983.
- Erickson, Amy Louise. Women and Property in Early Modern England. London: Routledge, 1993.
- Esmein, A. Le mariage en droit canonique, 2 vols. Paris: L. Larose et Forcel, 1891.
- Goody, Jack. The Development of the Family and Marriage in Europe. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1983.
- Greilsammer, Myriam. L’envers du tableau: mariage et maternité en Flandre médiévale. Paris: A. Colin, 1990.
- Hajal, John. “European Marriage Patterns in Perspective.” In Population in History: Essays in Historical Demography, edited by D. V. Glass and D. E. C. Eversley. London: E. Arnold, 1965, pp. 101–146.
- Harris, Barbara J. English Aristocratic Women, 1450–1550: Marriage and Family, Property and Careers. New York: Oxford University Press, 2002.
- Herlihy, David. “Family.” American Historical Review 96.1 (1991): 1–16.
- Howell, Martha C. The Marriage Exchange: Property, Social Place and Gender in Cities of the Low Countries, 1300–1550. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1998.
- Hughes, Diane Owen. “From Brideprice to Dowry in Mediterranean Europe.” Journal of Family History 3 (1978): 262–296.
- Klapisch-Zuber, Christiane. Women, Family and Ritual in Renaissance Italy. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1985.
- Otis-Cour, Leah. Lust und Liebe: Geschichte der Paarbeziehungen im Mittelalter. Frankfurt am Main: Fischer Taschenbuch Verlag, 2000.
- Ourliac, Paul, and Jehan de Malafosse. Le droit familial. Vol. 3, Histoire du droit privé. Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1971.
- Sheehan, Michael M. Marriage, Family, and Law in Medieval Europe, edited by James K. Farge. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1996.
- Witte, John Jr. From Sacrament to Contract: Marriage, Religion and Law in the Western Tradition. Louisville, Ky.: Westminster John Knox Press, 1997.

See also Betrothals; Conjugal Debt; Courtly Love; Courtship; Divorce and Separation; Domestic Abuse; Dowry and Other Marriage Gifts; Gender Ideologies; Husbands and Husbandry; Inheritance; Landholding and Property Rights; Law, Canon; Legal Agency; Marriage Ceremonies; Marriage, Impediments to; Marriage, Islamic; Iberia; Marriage, Jewish; Marriage Preaching; Remarriage; Sexuality; Sex in Marriage; Social Status; Widows

MARRIAGE AND CONCUBINAGE IN SCANDINAVIA

The scarcity of sources makes our knowledge of marriage formation in medieval Scandinavia largely rest on patchy documents, laws, and—for Norway and Iceland—sagas. Scandinavia was not a single entity without geographical variation. Denmark stands apart from the other Scandinavian countries as her secular laws largely omit references to marriage formation because of ecclesiastical influence.

Scandinavian marriage was a public and formal series of legal acts involving two families. Bride wealth and the consent of the bride’s guardian at the betrothal were essential for ensuring the legitimacy of the union. Similarly, the public bedding of the couple at the wedding was important. Marriages of the poor may have been more informal, but in Iceland paupers were theoretically disallowed to marry. In most regions, slaves could not marry.

Concubinage, practiced especially among aristocrats, while more stable and long-term than a temporary liaison, was no formal legal institution involving property exchanges. A master having intercourse or concubinage with his own slave women was commonplace and did not threaten a possible wife's position as the mistress of the household. Concubines were status symbols and means of acquiring heirs in lieu of or in addition to wedlock. Moreover, in regions like Iceland, concubines were important instruments for establishing alliances between their kin-groups and the men. Some sagas (e.g., Egil's Saga and the Laxdæla Saga) also use concubinage as an element in the plot.

Although concubines often were of lower status compared to their partners, they were not regularly poor or of insignificant families. Clerical concubines may have been of more equal status and royal mistresses were frequently noble. The status of a concubine's children depended on that of their mother—and possibly also on the consent of her kin to the union. Publicly acknowledged illegitimate children had some inheritance rights. Royal bastards could and did become kings until the mid-thirteenth century. Between 1074 and 1154 all Danish kings came to the throne through illegitimate succession, while in Norway, only five of the twenty-four kings ruling in the tumultuous century 1130–1240 were legitimate.

Beginning especially in the thirteenth century, ecclesiastical marriage doctrine influenced Scandinavian practice by stressing the consent of the principal parties and ecclesiastical solemnization, including publication of banns. Divorce was prohibited. While forbidding extramarital sexuality, the Church's emphasis on consent and the personal bond made clandestine unions contracted without witnesses and parental consent possible. Private exchanges of consent could blur the demarcation line between concubinage and matrimony within the context of the witnessed formality found in traditional Scandinavian marriage customs.

Ecclesiastical marriage impediments created new reasons for concubinage. If an impediment precluded matrimony—especially for priests—concubinage remained an option. Indeed, clerical concubinage was practiced despite official ecclesiastical condemnation. Legal presumptions appeared, assimilating long-lasting concubinage with matrimony: women looking after the household and acting outwardly like wives were considered lawful spouses after three (Denmark) or twenty (Norway) years of public cohabitation. Lay couples were given the choice between interdict, separation, or matrimony.

Due to ecclesiastical influence, the position of illegitimate children declined. Many Scandinavian laws divided children into legitimate children, children of concubines, and adulterine children. Natural children enjoyed very limited inheritance rights, while adulterines—between whose parents an impediment existed—had none, unless a papal dispensation was received. Subsequent marriage legitimated the children of a concubine: the “bettering” of the mother ameliorated the status of the child(ren).

MIA KORPIOLA

References and Further Readings

- Arnórsdóttir, Agnes. “Two Models of Marriage? Canon Law and Icelandic Marriage Practice in the Late Middle Ages.” In Nordic Perspectives on Medieval Canon Law, edited by Mia Korpiola. Helsinki: Publications of Matthias Calonius Society, 1999, pp. 79–92.
- . “Marriage in the Middle Ages: Canon Law and Nordic Family Relations.” In Norden og Europa i middelalderen, edited by Per Ingesman and Thomas Lindkvist. Århus: Skrifter udgivet af Jysk Selskab for Historie, 2001, pp. 174–202.
- Carlsson, Lizzie. “Jag giver dig min dotter.” Trolovning och äktenskap i den svenska kvinnans äldre historia, I-II. Lund: Institutet för Rättshistorisk Forskning, 1965–1972. Rättshistoriskt bibliotek, 8 and 20.
- Dübeck, Inger. “Women, Weddings and Concubines in Medieval Danish Law.” Scandinavian Journal of History 17.4 (1992): 315–322.
- Frank, Roberta. “Marriage in Twelfth- and Thirteenth-Century Iceland.” Viator 4 (1973): 473–484.
- Jochens, Jenny M. “The Church and Sexuality in Medieval Iceland.” Journal of Medieval History 6 (1980): 377–392.
- . Women in Old Norse Society. Ithaca, N.Y. and London: Cornell University Press, 1995.
- Magnúsdóttir, Auður. Frillor och fruar: Politik och samlevnad på Island 1120–1400. Göteborg: Avhandlingar ifrån historiska institutionen i Göteborg, 2001. English Summary: 219–223.
- Nors, Thyra. “Illegitimate Children and Their High-Born Mothers: Changes in the Perception of Illegitimacy in Mediaeval Denmark.” Scandinavian Journal of History 21.1 (1996): 17–37.
- Sawyer, Birgit, and Peter Sawyer. Medieval Scandinavia: From Conversion to Reformation, Circa 800–1500. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1993.

See also Celibacy; Clerical and Priests' Concubines; Concubines; Illegitimacy; Literature, Old Norse; Marriage Ceremonies; Marriage, Christian; Scandinavia

MARRIAGE, IMPEDIMENTS TO

The Church law on marriage was one of the few areas in which the rights of women equaled those of men. Before practices were centralized and codified, necessary requirements for marriage, and impediments to marriage, varied from place to place and time to time. Rules and customs governing marriage are found in every society, since not all conceivable combinations of couples are considered free to marry. An obvious example is a mother and her son, or a brother and his sister. The primary reason for such laws must have been the preservation of the sanctity of the family and the peace of the community. Sometimes rules must have been extended to guarantee a safety zone (the fence-around-the-wall principle). In the case of consanguinity and affinity, there was a mix-up in computation: first cousins were related in the second degree by the Germanic method but the fourth degree by the Romans, so the Germans would have read a fourth-degree prohibition as applying to third cousins.

Gratian's Decretum (c. 1140) reconciled various requirements by distinguishing between legality and validity. For example, if a man or woman had taken a simple vow of chastity (permanent celibacy), it would be unlawful (illicit) and sinful to marry; but if the marriage did take place, and there was no more serious (invalidating) impediment, the marriage would be valid; however, the spouse who violated the vow would be subject to penance, whether private or public.

To take another example, marriages should not be secret, but secrecy itself did not invalidate a marriage. The first canon that Gratian cites against clandestine or secret marriage, Aliter (Cause 30, q. 5, chap. 1), states that marriage is not legitimate unless the woman's guardian permits it; she must be betrothed by her parents, given a dowry, blessed by the priest, accompanied by bridesmaids, and solemnly delivered to the groom, and the couple must spend the first two or three days in prayer, without sex; otherwise the union is presumed not to be marriage but rather adultery, concubinage, debauchery, or fornication—unless they actually exchange vows and thus get married. In other words, omission of the stated requirements made the marriage illicit, but not invalid.

What made a marriage valid was the unforced consent of a man and woman who were free to get married—that is, those who had no impediments. Nothing else really mattered, and eventually it was only secrecy (clandestinity) that was taken seriously as a punishable illicit offense in the making of a marriage.

The chief invalidating impediments were as follows (those encountered most frequently are treated first).

1. Precontract or Ligamen (Marriage Bond)

Obviously, if one of the intended spouses was currently married to someone else, a new marriage was not valid. Bigamous marriage was very common because of the widespread practice of secret marriage, and precontract was the most frequent reason alleged for annulment of marriage by the ecclesiastical courts.

The term precontract has caused confusion in modern times, because it is often wrongly taken to mean “preliminary contract” instead of “previous contract.” This mistake has led to the conclusion that in the Middle Ages mere betrothal (promise to marry in the future) invalidated a marriage to someone else.

Gratian held that if a person—say, Bertha—marries Peter but leaves him without consummating the marriage by sexual intercourse, and then marries Paul and does consummate the marriage, she commits a sin, but nevertheless the second marriage to Paul is valid. In other words, the consummated marriage dissolves the unconsummated marriage, and Peter is left free to marry someone else. Later Pope Alexander III (1159–1181) decreed that consummation had no effect on the validity of a marriage, and from then on even an unconsummated marriage (like that of Bertha and Peter) precluded any further marriage.

However, if Bertha was only engaged to marry Peter (betrothal in the future tense), even if she took an oath to marry him, she could still marry Paul (but would sin in breaking her oath).

2. Consanguinity

Persons related by blood could not marry. Early rules and practices varied, but in 1215 the Fourth Lateran Council restricted the prohibition to the fourth degree (that is, third cousins). The reason given was that in the higher degrees that rule could not be followed without grave detriment. The fourth degree was thought to be the appropriate limit for this corporal union because there are four humors in the body and the body is composed out of the four elements.

3. Affinity

One could not marry the kin of any sex partner, whether that partner was one's spouse or not. The prohibition of affinity, like that of consanguinity, was limited to the fourth degree in 1215, and other types of affinity were dismissed at that time.

Note that affinity was contracted by coitus, not marriage. Therefore it was caused not only by the consummation of a marriage, but also by illicit coitus: a man could not marry the sister (or up to third cousin) of a woman with whom he had sex. If a man had sex with his wife's sister or cousin, he contracted supervening affinity; it did not dissolve the marriage, but it prohibited him from demanding the marital debt (though he was required to pay it when his wife requested it).

MARRIAGE, IMPEDIMENTS TO

There was never any prohibition against parallel marriage—two sisters marrying two brothers, for example. Thus, if Martha married John, it was permitted for Martha's sister Mary to marry John's brother James. But Martha was prohibited by affinity from marrying James after John died. "Trees" of consanguinity and affinity illustrating the various degrees appear in many legal manuscripts.

4. Public Honesty, Justice of

This was the technical name of the impediment caused by betrothal and unconsummated marriage: it prohibited a person from marrying a person related to one's spouse or betrothed. For example, if Martha married John and John died before consummation, Martha was prohibited by public honesty from marrying John's brother or cousin. The same was true if Martha was only engaged to John.

5. Spiritual Kinship

Participation in baptism and confirmation created impediments; e.g., if you "lifted" a child from the baptismal font, you could not marry the child's parent, and the child could not marry you, or your child, or your spouse after you died (if your marriage was consummated at the time of the baptism).

6. Age

Marriage to a boy under fourteen or a girl under twelve was not valid (unless coitus was successfully performed). Such early marriage was treated as a betrothal, and it would automatically become marriage when the canonical age was reached, unless the union was repudiated beforehand.

7. Force and Fear

Unwilling consent made a marriage invalid.

8. Crime

Originally, marriage to a person with whom one had committed adultery was invalid. By the thirteenth century, such marriage was only invalid if both spouses knew about the previous marriage and if they machinated the death of the deceased spouse (or swore to marry after that spouse died).

9. Major Orders, Religious Profession

Once a man received the first major order (subdiaconate), he could never marry, and the same was true of solemnly professed male and female religious. As noted above, a simple vow of chastity, even when public, did not invalidate a subsequent marriage.

10. Impotence and Frigidity

Whether natural or attributed to sorcery, inability to perform coitus invalidated a marriage.

11. Error of Person or Condition

Mistaken identity or ignorance of servile state was cause for annulment.

12. Disparity of Cult

A Christian could not validly marry a Jew, Moslem, or other non-Christian.

13. Legal Kinship

No marriage was possible between adopter and adoptee, or between natural child and adopted sibling (while the adoption lasted), or between father and adopted son's wife, or between father's wife and adopted son, etc.

It was sometimes possible to obtain a papal dispensation from various impediments—for instance, consanguinity in the fourth degree, allowing third cousins to marry—but such dispensations were not common until the later Middle Ages.

The impediments in the Eastern Church were not as extensive or as codified as in the West (see Dauvillier and de Clercq).

HENRY ANSGAR KELLY

References and Further Reading

- Bride, A. "Empêchements de mariage." Dictionnaire de droit canonique, 7 vols. (Letouzey et Ané, 1935–1965), 5: 261–322.
- Brundage, James A. Law, Sex, and Christian Society in Medieval Europe. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1987.
- Burgh, John. Pupilla oculi (1385), Book 8 (Matrimonium), Chapters 6–13. (The edition of London 1510 is on microfilm in the series Early English Books, 1475–1640, reel 120, no. 8 [STC n. 4115], and also online in Early English Books Online.)
- Dauvillier, Jean, and Charles de Clercq. Le mariage en droit canonique oriental. Paris: Recueil Sirey, 1936.
- De Clercq, C. "Mariage en droit oriental." Dictionnaire de droit canonique 6:787–802.
- Esmein, A., Le mariage en droit canonique. 2 vols. Paris: L. Larose et Forcel, 1891.
- Helmholz, Richard. Marriage Litigation in Medieval England. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1972.
- Joyce, George Hayward. Christian Marriage: An Historical and Doctrinal Study. London: Sheed and Ward, 1933. Second edition, 1948.
- Naz, R. "Mariage en droit occidental." Dictionnaire de droit canonique 6:740–787.
- Wahl, F. X. The Matrimonial Impediments of Consanguinity and Affinity. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America Press, 1934.

See also Betrothals; Children, Betrothals and Marriage of; Divorce and Separation; Godparents; Incest; Law, Canon; Marriage, Christian; Rape and Raptus

MARRIAGE, ISLAMIC: IBERIA

In medieval al-Andalus, and under Islamic law, several conditions had to be fulfilled for a marriage to be considered valid, including primarily the signature of a contract of marriage between the two parties, and the payment of a dowry to the bride. The contract established the amount of the dowry, as well as other important regulations for the life of the couple. Usually, the dowry was divided into two parts. The first was paid to the bride at the time of the marriage, and was employed, at least partly, in buying her trousseau. The second part of the dowry could be paid either at a fixed date (for instance, two or three years after the marriage), in the event of a divorce, or at the death of the husband. In all these cases the dowry money was the exclusive possession of the married woman.

Andalusi legal documents attest to the existence of other clauses in the marriage contract. When the bride belonged to a high-class family, she would expect to have domestic help, and the marriage contract would establish that the servants' salaries had to be paid by the husband. Also, the contract stated the wife's right to visit her relatives and her former wet-nurse. But perhaps more important were three other clauses related to the place of residence of the married couple, the amount of time the husband could be absent from the conjugal home and, finally, the number of wives he could marry simultaneously.

In many marriage contracts, it was established that the husband could not compel his wife to change her place of residence, in what seems to have been a precautionary measure against the separation of a woman from her parents' family. When such a change of residence became necessary, the married woman could expect, according to her marriage contract, to receive compensation from her husband. The contract stipulated that a six-month absence of the husband might terminate the marriage; however, Andalusi men were allowed a three-year absence for the pilgrimage to Mecca, taking into account the long distance separating al-Andalus from Arabia. Finally, many marriage contracts included a clause by which the husband agreed not to marry any other woman during this particular marriage, nor to take a slave as a concubine. If the husband breached this clause, the marriage was terminated by a judge, and the wife could recover the second part of her dowry and remarry.

Historical accounts of the great number of consorts of several Umayyad rulers should not hide the fact that polygyny was not very common, being mainly practiced by sovereign families or the very rich. Divorce was probably much more widespread than polygyny, and affected the lives of married women more deeply. According to Islamic law, it was relatively easy for a man to divorce his wife, while she had to comply with several, strict conditions to put an end to her marriage, or to compensate her husband economically. Among the peculiarities of the Maliki school of law, predominant in al-Andalus, was the fact that wives could ask for divorce on the grounds of physical or financial mistreatment. After such a complaint, the judge would begin an enquiry among relatives and neighbours, to check the truthfulness of the wife's allegations; if those were proven, divorce was accorded to the wife.

While the provisions of Islamic law protected the status of the married woman, in the context of a medieval society like al-Andalus, it was not always easy for them to put these rights into practice. Access to legal counsel was easier for urban women belonging to well-to-do families, and more difficult in rural areas, where the use of written contracts was not so common. On the other hand, many legal issues depended on the testimony of relatives, friends, and neighbors, so many women leading secluded lives were at a disadvantage when fighting against powerful masculine social networks.

Although evidence of conjugal love is not lacking in historical and literary texts, marriage was above all a social alliance between two families. Ideally, both spouses should belong to a similar social and economic level, as reflected in the negotiations involved in the signing of the marriage contract. Unequal marriages were generally disapproved, especially if a high-born woman married a commoner. Ibn Hazm (eleventh century) bitterly criticized this practice among the Arab family of the de facto ruler of al-Andalus, al-Mansur. Men could, however, marry their women slaves, once they were manumitted. More unusual was the case of a free woman marrying a slave.

MANUELA MARÍN

References and Further Reading

- El Cheikh, Nadia Maria. "In Search for the Ideal Spouse." Journal of the Social and Economic History of the Orient 45 (2002): 179–196.
- Fórneas, José María. "Acercas de la mujer musulmana en las épocas almorávid y almohade: elegías de tema femenino." In La mujer en al-Andalus: reflejos históricos de su actividad y categorías sociales, edited by María Jesús Viguera. Madrid: Ediciones de la Universidad Autónoma de Madrid, 1989, pp. 77–103.
- Marín, Manuela. "Marriage and Sexuality in al-Andalus." In Marriage and Sexuality in Medieval and Early Modern Iberia, edited by Eukene Lacarra Lanz. New York: Routledge, 2002, pp. 3–20.
- . Mujeres en al-Andalus. Madrid: Consejo Superior de Investigaciones Científicas, 2000.
- Powers, David. "Women and Divorce in the Islamic West: Three Cases." Hawwa 1 (2003): 29–45.
- Zomeño, Amalia. Dote y matrimonio en al-Andalus y el Norte de Africa: estudios sobre la jurisprudencia islámica medieval. Madrid: Consejo Superior de Investigaciones Científicas, 2000.

See also Iberia; Law, Islamic; Iberia; Marriage, Christian; Marriage, Jewish; Muslim Women

MARRIAGE, JEWISH

In medieval Jewish communities, marriage was the expected norm. First marriages were usually arranged by the parents of the bride and groom, often with the help of a matchmaker. The bride and groom were usually quite young, around the age of twelve or thirteen. They had the right to reject the match their parents made for them and it was considered obligatory that they see each other before the marriage took place. Despite this right of rejection, the sources indicate that few agreed-upon matches were cancelled by the spouses.

The arrangement between the parents included complex monetary agreements: who would support the young couple during the first year or two of their lives together, where they would live, and the capital each of the spouses brought to the marriage. During the early Middle Ages, it was customary for the bride to provide the money with which the young couple began their life together in the form of a dowry. Her husband was expected to supplement this income at a later date, after he inherited money from his parents. These arrangements were recorded as part of the ketubbah—the marriage agreement in which the husband took authority over his wife and promised to support her in exchange for her fulfillment of obligations towards him. In the ketubbah a sum of money was also stipulated for the woman in case of divorce or the husband's death.

Men promised to clothe and feed their wives as well as provide lodging, cohabit with them (an obligation known as onah), redeem them if held for ransom, bury them upon their death, provide for their support as a widow, leave money to their children, and provide them with the ketubbah. Women were expected to cook, bake, wash, spin, nurse the children, and prepare their husband's beds, as well as meet sexual obligations. In addition, women's property was inherited by their husbands, and the usufruct of their property during marriage belonged to their husbands. The refusal of husband or wife to fulfill his or her obligations over a period of time provided grounds for divorce. A husband or wife who refused to cohabit with a spouse was called a mored or moredet (literally, "rebel").

In addition to first marriages, there are many accounts of widows and divorcees who remarried. While some sources point to discomfort with remarriage, it seems to have been a common phenomenon. Women were not allowed to remarry if they had already survived three previous husbands. If the husband died leaving his wife childless (known as yevama), the woman had two options: marriage to the brother of her husband (known as Levirate marriage or yibbum) or undergoing the ceremony of haliza (literally, "the removal of a shoe"), whereby she was released from the levirate tie. During the Middle Ages, haliza usually took precedence over the levirate tie, especially in light of the ban on bigamy that existed in Germany and Northern France. If the woman had children, she was free to remarry as she pleased.

During the Middle Ages, in Germany and northern France, substantial changes were introduced to the laws of marriage and divorce. R. Gershom b. Judah (known as the Light of the Exile, Me'or haGolah) and subsequent generations enforced two bans, the first forbidding bigamy, the second forbidding a man to divorce his wife against her will. Since divorce in Judaism is by law the right of the husband, and the wife cannot be divorced without his agreement, this statute was of tremendous import. Scholars have suggested these bans resulted from the Christian environment in which both bigamy and divorce were prohibited. Following the acceptance of these bans, it also became more difficult for women to initiate divorce on grounds such as impotence, which had previously been an often-used reason for divorce. Scholars have argued that divorce was very common within medieval Jewish communities and that many women initiated divorce by refusing their conjugal duties.

Additional changes introduced in medieval Germany and France included double monetary agreements in which the husband, in addition to the wife, brought income to the initial agreement between families. Furthermore, if one of the spouses died within the first two years of marriage without offspring, the monies were returned to their natal families. In medieval Spain and North Africa, bigamy was still accepted, although some ketubbahs contained stipulations against such marriages.

The process of marriage originally consisted of two stages: betrothal (erusin or kiddushin) and marriage (nissuin). In late antiquity it was customary for the couple to be betrothed for a period of up to a year. After betrothal the couple did not live together, but if they wished to dissolve their connection, they needed to divorce. During the Middle Ages the two stages were joined into a single ceremony. The term erusin then came to mean the making of the match and was sometimes known as shiddukhin.

Before the wedding the bride visited the ritual bath (mikvah) for the first time. The actual marriage took place in public and required two people to act as witnesses. During the Middle Ages it became accepted for the rabbi of the community to perform the ceremony. It was also understood that at least a quorum (ten males) should be present. At the ceremony the seven blessings of betrothal and marriage were recited, the groom transferred money symbolically to the bride by placing a ring on her finger, and announced that she was consecrated to him. The transferring of the ring also represented the consent of both spouses to be reserved for each other. The groom then gave the bride the ketubbah—the deed of marriage.

It was customary to perform the ritual under a huppah, a canopy. A number of customs were observed to ward off the devil, such as veiling the bride and breaking a glass. In addition, joyous processions and feasts were held throughout the week after the marriage. Wheat and nuts were thrown on the couple, and fish was eaten as a symbol of fertility.

ELISHEVA BAUMGARTEN

References and Further Reading

- Abrahams, Israel. Jewish Life in the Middle Ages. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America, 1920.
- Berger, Michael S. "Two Models of Medieval Jewish Marriage." Journal of Jewish Studies 52 (2001): 59–84.
- Cohen, Esther, and Elliott Horowitz. "In Search of the Sacred: Jews, Christians and Rituals of Marriage in the Later Middle Ages." Journal of Medieval and Renaissance Studies 20 (1990): 225–250.
- Eleazar ben Judah. Sefer haRokeah haGadol. Jerusalem: Weinfeld Press, 1960.
- Falk, Zeev. Jewish Matrimonial Law in the Middle Ages. London: Oxford University Press, 1966.
- Freimann, Abraham Haim. Seder Kiddushin veNissuin Aharei Hatimat haTalmud. Mehkar Histori Dogmati beDinei Yisrael. Jerusalem: Mossad haRav Kook, 1945.
- Goitein, Shlomo Dov. A Mediterranean Society: The Jewish Communities of the Arab World as Portrayed in the Documents of the Cairo Geniza. 6 vols. Berkeley, Calif.: University of California Press, 1967–1993.
- Grossman, Avraham. Pious and Rebellious: Jewish Women in Medieval Europe. Hanover and London: Brandeis University Press, 2004.
- Horowitz, Simon haLevi, ed. Maḥzor Vitry. Nürnberg, 1892.
- Jacob b. Moses Mulin. Sefer Maharil. Minhagim (The Book of Maharil: Customs by Rabbi Yaacov Mulin), edited by Shlomoh J. Spitzer. Jerusalem: Machon Yerushalayim, 1989.
- Katz, Jacob. Tradition and Crisis: Jewish Society at the End of the Middle Ages, translated by Bernard Dov Cooperman. New York: New York University Press, 1993.
- Westreich, Elimelech. "Polygamy and Compulsory Divorce of the Wife in the Decisions of the Rabbis of Ashkenaz in the 11th and 12th Centuries." Bar Ilan Law Studies 6 (1988): 118–64.

See also Jewish Women; Law, Jewish; Marriage, Christian; Mikveh; Pregnancy and Childbirth: Jewish Women

MARRIAGE PREACHING

In the early Middle Ages there may not have been much marriage preaching, though it is hard to be certain. Not a lot of sermons dealing with marriage and intended as models for popular preaching have come to light so far. One text that might have provided material is the Regula pastoralis of Gregory the Great, where a section deals with the way to instruct marriage couples. The image of marriage it projects is relatively positive, an important fact in view of the assumption that the early medieval Church took a thoroughly negative attitude toward marriage and sex. There is a telescoped defense of marriage against antimatrimonial heresy at the start of a ninth-century homily by Haymo of Auxerre, but it was probably not intended for popular preaching, and the heretical views in question had almost certainly been dead for centuries. Although one can never be sure how much evidence has been lost, there was probably not a lot of marriage preaching in the early Middle Ages, at least compared with the period from c. 1200 on. During that period the situation is transformed.

The Franciscan and Dominican orders rapidly became an effective pastoral delivery system capable of turning Latin model sermons into “live” vernacular preaching; these Latin models were composed and copied in huge numbers. They are our main source for medieval marriage preaching. There are some sermons in the ad status genre (sermons to different sorts and conditions of people). The sermons in this genre by Jacques de Vitry have been presented in a widely read book by a famous French historian, so it is unfortunate that they are very untypical, presenting a negative view of women that is not common in medieval marriage preaching, to judge from the large number of extant sermons. Most of the surviving evidence consists of sermons for the Sunday when the passage about the marriage feast of Cana was read. We do not have any comparable corpus of sermons actually preached at weddings: in fact, hardly any are known. The “marriage feast of Cana” Sunday did however fall just after a time of the liturgical year when marriage rites were forbidden.

The two themes that predominate in these marriage sermons are the goodness of marriage and marriage symbolism, which was thus impressed on the lay consciousness through the pulpit. The defense of marriage may have been in part a reaction against the Cathar heresy, which reached its apogee in the early thirteenth century and frightened the orthodox very much. There are many varieties of Cathar belief but marriage seems to have been regarded as intrinsically evil in most of them. No Cathar sermons as such have survived, but in orthodox marriage preaching a whole range of arguments in favour of marriage are deployed. There are Aristotelian arguments of a logical and teleological character, deducing marriage’s goodness from its naturalness, and there are a series of more scriptural considerations. One of these was that Jesus Christ himself favored a marriage feast by his presence. Others looked to the origins of marriage, which was compared favorably with religious orders: marriage was founded in paradise, whereas even the greatest religious orders were not; orders had human founders, whereas marriage was founded by God. Like a religious order, marriage was subject to a discipline not easy to observe. There were restrictions on the timing and manner of sexual acts. Most sermons do not go into detail about such things, leaving that to confessional handbooks. The love that should bind husband and wife together is a strong theme.

The “marriage feast of Cana” genre of sermons continued in an unbroken stream long after the end of the Middle Ages. Some emphases changed and some new themes were introduced, but the essential excellence of marriage seems to have been more or less a constant.

DAVID D’AVRAY

References and Further Reading

- Bériou, Nicole, and David L. d’Avray. “Henry of Provins, O. P.’s Comparison of the Dominican and Franciscan Orders with the ‘Order’ of Matrimony.” Archivum Fratrum Praedicatorum 49 (1979): 513–514.
- . “The Image of the Ideal Husband in Thirteenth-Century France.” Revue Mabillon, new series 1, 62 (1990): 111–143.
- d’Avray, David L. “The Gospel of the Marriage Feast of Cana and Marriage Preaching in France.” In The Bible in the Medieval World: Essays in Memory of Beryl Smalley, edited by Katherine Walsh and Diana Wood. Oxford: Published for the Ecclesiastical History Society by Blackwell, 1985, pp. 207–224.
- . Medieval Marriage Sermons: Mass Communication in a Culture Without Print. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- . Medieval Marriage: Symbolism and Society. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2005.
- d’Avray, David L., and M. Tausche. “Marriage Sermons in ad status Collections of the Central Middle Ages.” Archives d’histoire doctrinale et littéraire du Moyen Age 47 (1980): 71–119.
- Schnell, Rudiger. “The Discourse on Marriage in the Middle Ages.” Speculum 73. 3 (1998): 771–786.

See also Cathars; Marriage Ceremonies; Marriage, Christian; Sermons and Preaching; Theology

MARY AND MARTHA

The sisters Mary and Martha occupied a significant place in medieval thought based on a conflation of several biblical passages in which the two appeared. In one scene—recounted in John 12:1–8 and Luke 10:38–42—Jesus visited the home of Mary and Martha in Bethany. In another (John 11:1–46), Jesus raised their brother Lazarus from the grave because he loved the three siblings. Mary and Martha thus entered the medieval imagination playing brief but vivid roles in the drama of Jesus’s earthly life. Their affective ties to Jesus and the combination of concrete actions with tantalizing brevity in their story made them favorite figures for moral and allegorical interpretation throughout the Middle Ages.

The most ubiquitous allegorization of the two sisters was based on Jesus’s words during the meal at their house. When Martha chided Mary for sitting at Christ’s feet listening to him rather than helping in the kitchen, Jesus defended Mary, saying she had chosen “the best part” (Luke 10:42). Early theologians, including Ambrose and Augustine, who were developing an ideology for the church in the fourth century, interpreted this passage as referring to the two kinds of life open to Christians: the contemplative and the active. In monastic exegesis, Mary became the powerful symbol of withdrawal from worldly concerns to focus on spiritual goals, while Martha stood for the life of worthy but less exalted practical service.

Later exegetes continued to use the figures of Mary and Martha as a convenient locus for defining the difference between the monastic life and that of canons or other clergy with pastoral and administrative duties. However, some theologians, including Bernard of Clairvaux, played down the contrast of the sisters, instead advocating an alternation, a progression, or even a necessary mixture of action and contemplation in many kinds of religious life. The Virgin Mary was often seen as combining in ideal fashion the distinctive features of both sisters.

After the twelfth century, this primary ecclesiastical signification was joined by others as audiences for interpretation broadened to include the laity. Mary and Martha became characters in late medieval dramas and models for women in conduct literature. Martha’s exemplary faith that Christ would raise her brother Lazarus from the dead was emphasized, as was Mary’s privileged role of first witness to Christ’s resurrection. They were both mentioned among the female followers of Christ whose loyalty and belief surpassed that of the male disciples.

Another set of interpretations focused on all three siblings as recipients of healing miracles by Christ, transformations that spiritually represented his ability to forgive sin and provide salvation. Alternatively, Mary, Martha, and Lazarus modeled family relationships and—since their medieval narrative made them aristocrats—the proper use of inherited power and wealth.

The traditional pairing of the two sisters also began to weaken. Mary was identified with the loving Magdalene—the sinner who shed penitential tears, had her demons exorcised, and in a spirit of true charity anointed Christ’s head and feet. As Mary Magdalene, she became independently popular and generated a major liturgical cult. With her role as preacher highlighted, Mary was known as “Apostle of Apostles” and many women mystics seeking social and spiritual authority identified with Mary’s charismatic leadership. Martha acquired a non-biblical legend of defeating the tarascon or dragon, and she was increasingly valorized as the pious and hospitable matron—a model for the bourgeoisie who wanted to combine spirituality with their active and affluent lives.

In the visual arts of the later Middle Ages, therefore, the sisters may appear together in the dinner at Bethany scene, or they may be represented separately. Mary is usually shown in worldly dress with her hair long and uncovered, symbolizing her life of sin and repentance. Martha holds a ladle, a dish, or keys, which sometimes stand allegorically for her works of mercy and at other times literally represent the gendered life of a model medieval housewife.

KATHLEEN M. ASHLEY

References and Further Reading

- Ashley, Kathleen. “The Bourgeois Piety of Martha in the Passion of Jean Michel.” Modern Language Quarterly 45 (1984): 227–240.
- Coletti, Theresa. Mary Magdalene and the Drama of Saints: Theater, Gender, and Religion in Late Medieval England. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2004.
- Constable, Giles. Three Studies in Medieval Religious and Social Thought: The Interpretation of Mary and Martha. The Ideal of the Imitation of Christ. The Orders of Society. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995.
- Couchman, Jane. “Actio[n] and Passio: The Iconography of the Scene of Christ at the Home of Mary and Martha.” Studi medievali 3rd ser. 26 (1985): 711–719.
- Kupfer, Marcia. The Art of Healing: Painting for the Sick and the Sinner in a Medieval Town. University Park, Pa.: Pennsylvania State University Press, 2003.

See also Bible, Women in; Conduct Literature; Hagiography; Mary Magdalene; Mary, Virgin

MARY MAGDALEN

The four Gospels contain a mere twelve references to the historical Mary Magdalene. In the early medieval period, this testimony was imaginatively refashioned to create a new St. Mary Magdalene for the ages. In 591, Pope Gregory the Great preached a sermon that fused together into one individual the identities of three distinct women described in the Gospels. Most significant was his amalgamation of Mary Magdalene and Luke’s unnamed female sinner (Luke 7:37–50). The unnamed sinner, whom Luke placed at the banquet of the Pharisee, theatrically washed Jesus’ feet with her tears and dried them with her hair. She was deemed to be a prostitute, in line with contemporary values. She was construed as such because conventional wisdom regarded women’s sins as sexual, i.e., those provoked by lust, while public expressions of sexuality were considered tantamount to prostitution. Accordingly, Mary called Magdalene (Mark 16:9) gained a preconversion identity as a prostitute. Gregory also grafted the figure of Mary of Bethany, sister of Martha, at whose beckoning Jesus raised Lazarus from the dead (John 11:1–45; 12:1–8), onto the figure of the Magdalen. Thus she acquired siblings (Martha and Lazarus) and became associated with the contemplative life. From the close of the sixth century Gregory the Great's composite figure was largely accepted in the West as St. Mary Magdalen. The Greek Church, however, never accepted Gregory's reformulated saint.

Textual Tradition

The development of Mary Magdalen's literary lives throughout the medieval period is no less complicated. A contemporary of Gregory the Great's, Gregory of Tours, chronicler of the Merovingian kingdom, mentioned Mary Magdalen only once in his opera omnia, to report (possibly following Byzantine tradition) that she retired to Ephesus where she died and was entombed. The venerable Bede (c. 720), also following Byzantine tradition, added Mary Magdalen's feast day, July 22, to his martyrology, from which it spread to Western liturgical calendars. The process of embellishing her vita began in earnest, however, with a legend (again probably of Byzantine provenance) that began circulating in ninth-century Italy. Known as the vita eremitica, it assimilated the Magdalen's vita into that of Mary of Egypt, an Eastern saint, who before her conversion had been a prostitute and afterwards withdrew to the desert to live as an anchorite. Mary Magdalen's identity as a prostitute had already been sealed by Gregory the Great; now the scene of her postconversion penitence was localized in the desert.

The first attempt to formulate a coherent vita for Mary Magdalen came in the text of a tenth-century homily known as the vita evangelica. Issuing from the Burgundian monastery of Cluny, where devotion to the saint seems to have been especially strong, it combined into one narrative sequence all the gospel passages relating to Mary Magdalen's life. In the late eleventh century, to explain the presence of the saint's relics at Vézelay, a legend known as the vita apostolica began to circulate. It claimed that Roman officials, irritated by the proselytizing of Jesus's followers, rounded up Mary Magdalen and a cohort of other disciples and set them adrift at sea in a rudderless boat. Providentially, they washed ashore in Marseille, where they evangelized the pagans of southern Gaul. Soon this vita was joined to the vita eremitica to form the vita apostolico-eremitica. It related how, after preaching and saving pagan souls, the Magdalen retreated to the "desert" outside Provence to spend the final thirty years of her life in ascetic contemplation.

Pilgrimage Sites

Like all important medieval saints, Mary Magdalen was the dedicatee of numerous medieval shrines. Her two major pilgrimage sites are located in Burgundy and Provence. The great Romanesque church at Vézelay was rededicated to the Magdalen in the mid-eleventh century, a few decades after it began claiming possession of her relics. (A legend known as the translatio posterior explained that her relics had been piously stolen from her sepulcher in Provence and transported to Vézelay to protect them from the periodic Arab incursions of the eighth century.) Situated along the major pilgrimage route that brought northern European pilgrims to Santiago de Compostela, Vézelay flourished as an international pilgrimage destination in the eleventh and twelfth centuries. Vézelay's apogee may well have arrived at Easter in 1146, when Bernard of Clairvaux preached the second crusade in the presence of King Louis VII and Queen Eleanor of Aquitaine. The crowds were so great and so fervent that a reviewing stand collapsed as Bernard was handing out crusader insignia to those vying to take up the cross. That no one was injured was credited by chroniclers of the event to the intercession of the Magdalen.

As the patron of Vézelay, Mary Magdalen was an active wonder-worker. Her miracles included spectacular cures, the raising of the dead, assistance with matters of fertility and childbirth, and the liberation of prisoners, all of which were appended to her various vitae. Jacobus de Voragine, author of The Golden Legend, the celebrated thirteenth-century compendium of saints' lives, drew on these miracle stories as well as various vitae to construct his definitive vita of Mary Magdalen, which enjoyed wide readership in the late medieval and early modern periods.

Vézelay, it seems, had already experienced its heyday when The Golden Legend was completed: in 1279, the Angevin prince Charles of Salerno rediscovered the relics of St. Mary Magdalen at the church of St. Maximin outside Aix-en-Provence. It was the coup de grâce for Vézelay, a blow from which it never recovered. Henceforth pilgrims transferred their allegiance to the new shrine at St. Maximin, where the saint soon began performing miracles, memorialized by Jean Gobi the Elder in his miracle collection, compiled c. 1315. The Provençal sanctuaries of St. Maximin and La Sainte-Baume (the "desert" cave where Mary Magdalen was believed to have retired) now attracted crowned heads of Europe, saints, and other notables, among them Birgitta of Sweden and Petrarch. The discovery of the Provençal relics and the installation of the Dominican Order as caretakers of the shrine are duly chronicled in the Dominican Legend, written in the mid-fifteenth century.

Attributes

Through preaching, the liturgy, devotional books, hymns, sacred plays, and the visual arts (Mary Magdalen's visual attribute is an alabaster jar of oil), the legend of Mary Magdalen was disseminated throughout Christendom. Each of her personae—sinner, penitent, contemplative, and preacher of the Resurrection—was harnessed for didactic ends by preachers and moralists. Fire-and-brimstone preachers such as Berthold of Regensburg and Bernardino of Siena used her preconversion sinfulness to inveigh against the sins of vanity and lust. Due to her association with these sins, Mary Magdalen became the patron saint of repentant prostitutes, whose houses of refuge were frequently named in her honor. She became as well the patron of those catering to the luxury trade, such as drapers and glovers. The Magdalen's exemplary tearful conversion at Christ's feet taught an important lesson to sinners about the efficacy of the sacrament of penance. Confraternities devoted to the penitential discipline of self-flagellation made her their patron saint, while handbooks for preachers cited her as the model penitent.

Her penance was so expedient that many moralists argued in the late medieval era that it returned her to a virginal state. As such, pious matrons, such as Margaret of Cortona, worried about their compromised bodily condition and its consequences for personal salvation, took Mary Magdalen as their special patron. But nuns too adopted Mary Magdalen as their advocate. Her contemplative persona of Mary of Bethany, Jesus's attentive student, who according to legend spent the last thirty years of her life in mystical ecstasy, provided a model for cloistered nuns whose lives were spent in contemplative prayer. Finally, the Magdalen's role as herald of the Resurrection (John 20:18), along with her legendary apostolate in Provence, was regarded as a model for active engagement in the world, earning her the title apostolorum apostola (apostle of the apostles), an honorific bestowed on her by twelfth-century scriptural commentators. Catherine of Siena praised Mary Magdalen's preaching and took the saint as a model for her own active apostolate. The Dominican Order, to which Catherine belonged, strove to balance the active and contemplative lives in perfect harmony; as such, it took Mary Magdalen as protector in 1297.

The medieval Church considered Mary Magdalen's feast day so important that it was ranked as a solemn feast, a day on which all work stopped. Tridentine reformers began to distinguish between the Mary Magdalen of the Gospels and the saint of legend, and Gregory the Great's composite saint was challenged by humanist scholars of the sixteenth century. It was not until 1969 that the Roman Church officially released the historical figure of Mary Magdalen from the bondage of her legend. Though the Roman liturgical calendar now venerates her as a "disciple of Christ," nonetheless the image of Mary Magdalen that perdures is that of Luke's sinner, now glorified in heaven. As such she was and continues to be a symbol of hope: through penitential conversion a great sinner became a great saint. Equally, however, the Middle Ages bequeathed to later generations a female saint venerated for her important role in salvation history. After Christ had risen, he chose not to appear first to his male disciples, but rather to a woman. Mary Magdalen, therefore, was doubly privileged: she was both the first witness to the Resurrection and the apostle of the apostles, entrusted by Christ to proclaim the good news, the central tenet of Christian faith.

KATHERINE LUDWIG JANSEN

References and Further Reading

- Bériou, Nicole. "La Madeleine dans les sermons parisiens du XIIIe siècle." Mélanges de l'École Française de Rome (Moyen Age) 104/1 (1992): 269–340.
- Coletti, Theresa. Mary Magdalene and the Drama of the Saints: Theater, Gender, and Religion in Late Medieval England. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2004.
- Duperray, Eve, ed. Marie Madeleine dans la mystique, les arts et les lettres. [Actes du Colloque international Avignon 20-21-22 juillet 1988.] Paris: Beauchesne, 1989.
- Faillon, E.-M. Monuments inédits sur l'apostolat de Sainte Marie-Madeleine en Provence et sur les autres Apôtres de cette contrée, Saint Lazare, Saint Maximin, Sainte Marthe. 2 vols. Paris: J.-P. Migne, 1859.
- Fiorenza, Elisabeth Schüssler. In Memory of Her: A Feminist Theological Reconstruction of Christian Origins. New York: Crossroads Press, 1983.
- Garth, Helen Meredith. Saint Mary Magdalene in Medieval Literature. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1950.
- Gregory of Tours. Glory of the Martyrs, translated by Raymond van Dam. Translated Texts for Historians. Latin Series III. Liverpool: Liverpool University Press, 1988.
- Gregory the Great. "Homilia 33." In XL Homiliarum in Evangelia. Patrologia Latina 76: 1238–1246.
- Hänsel, Hans. Die Maria Magdalena Legende. Eine Quellen Untersuchung in Greifswalder Beiträge zur Literatur und Stilforschung, 16.1. Greifswald: Hans Dallmeyer, 1937.
- Haskins, Susan. Mary Magdalen: Myth and Metaphor. London: HarperCollins, 1993.

- . Legenda Aurea, edited by Giovanni Paolo Maggioni. Florence: SISMEL, 1998.
- Iogna-Prat, Dominique. “Bienheureuse polysémie: La Madeleine du Sermo in veneratione Sanctae Mariae Magdalena attribué à Odon de Cluny (Xe siècle).” In Marie Madeleine dans la mystique, les arts et les lettres, pp. 21–31.
- Gobi, Jean. Liber Miraculorum B. Mariae Magdaleneae, edited by Jacqueline Schlafer. Archivum Fratrum Praedicatorum 63 (1993): 113–206.
- Jacobus de Voragine. Golden Legend, translated by William Granger Ryan. 2 vols. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1993.
- Jansen, Katherine Ludwig. “Mary Magdalen and the Mendicants: The Preaching of Penance in the Middle Ages.” Journal of Medieval History 21.1 (1995): 1–25.
- . “Maria Magdalena: Apostolorum Apostola.” In Women Preachers and Prophets through Two Millennia of Christianity, edited by Beverly Mayne Kienzle and Pamela J. Walker. Berkeley, Calif.: University of California Press, 1998.
- . The Making of the Magdalen: Preaching and Popular Devotion in the Late Middle Ages. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 2000.
- . “Like a Virgin: The Meaning of the Magdalen for Female Penitents of Later Medieval Italy.” Memoirs of the American Academy in Rome 45 (2000): 131–152.
- . “L’arrivée de Marie-Madeleine à Vézelay.” Monde de la bible 143 (2002): 35–37.
- La Maddalena tra Sacro e Profano*, edited by Marilena Mosco. Milan: Mondadori, 1986.
- La Madeleine (VIIIe-XIIIe Siècle). Mélanges de l’École Française de Rome (Moyen Age) 104/1 (1992).
- Lobrichon, Guy, ed. “Le dossier magdalénien aux XIe-XIIIe siècles.” Mélanges de l’École Française de Rome (Moyen Age). 104/1 (1992): 163–180.
- Malvern, Marjorie. Venus in Sackcloth: The Magdalen’s Origins and Metamorphoses. Carbondale and Edwardsville, Ill.: Southern Illinois University Press, 1975.
- Montagnes, Bernard. In “La légende dominicaine de Marie-Madeleine à Saint-Maximin.” Mémoires de l’Académie de Vaucluse, 7th series, 6 (1985): 73–86.
- Ricci, Carla. Maria di Magdala e le molte altre. Donne sul cammino di Gesù. Naples: D’Auria, 1991.
- Saxer, Victor. Le Culte de Marie-Madeleine en occident dès origines à la fin du moyen-âge. 2 vols. Cahiers d’archéologie et d’histoire, 3. Auxerre-Paris: Publications de la Société des Fouilles Archéologiques et des Monuments Historiques de l’Yonne-Librairie Clavreuil, 1959.
- Sebastiani, Lilia. Tra/Sfigurazione: Il personaggio evangelico di Maria di Magdala e il mito della peccatrice redenta nella tradizione occidentale. Brescia: Queriniana, 1992.
- Vita evangelica*. [Once attributed to Odo of Cluny.] Sermo II (In veneratione Sanctae Mariae Magdaleneae). Petrologia Latina 133: 713–721.
- Wilk, Sarah. “The Cult of Mary Magdalen in Fifteenth-Century Florence and Its Iconography.” Studi Medievali, 3rd series 26 (1985): 685–698.
- Witherington III, Ben. Women and the Genesis of Christianity. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1990.

See also Bible, Women in; Hagiography; Hagiography, Iconographic Aspects of; Mary and Martha; Mary the Egyptian; Miracles and Miracle Collections; Pilgrims and Pilgrimage; Prostitutes; Relics and Reliquaries

MARY OF BURGUNDY

Mary (1457–1482), duchess of Burgundy, was ruler of the Low Countries and Franche-Comté. Daughter and sole heir of Duke Charles the Bold and Isabel of Bourbon, after 1468, she was educated by her stepmother Margaret of York. In 1476, her father betrothed her to Maximilian of Habsburg, son of Emperor Frederick III. Charles’s death on the battlefield before Nancy, January 5, 1477, left Mary and Margaret in a turbulent situation. His territories suffered from French invasions of Burgundy, Artois, and Hainault, and some people were angered by Charles’s harsh government, trampling on privileges and requiring levels of taxes and military service beyond any precedent. The recently annexed territories Guelders and Liège immediately reclaimed their autonomy, while Luxembourg remained autonomous until 1480. The core principalities in the Low Countries, however, meeting in the States General, inaugurated Mary as their legal princess and granted military aid against French invasion, after she had fully subscribed to all the petitions and grievances the cities and states’ assemblies had submitted to her. The general tendency of the dozens of charters she granted to cities, territories, and the whole of the Low Countries—the “Great Privilege” of February 11, 1477 was the first constitutional act for this region—was the restoration of local and regional privileges and customary law Charles had overruled by centralising measures.

Her subjects’ support for the young and inexperienced heiress helped to keep the French out of the core territories of the Low Countries, which, under this pressure, united more closely. Nevertheless, Mary had to face scores of local revolts (within the duchy), mainly targeted against those administrators who were seen as responsible for Charles’s oppressive regime. By June, calm returned after wide-ranging concessions by the government. In the meantime, Mary had informed Maximilian that she still saw him as her future spouse, inviting him urgently to come and marry her and take up governmental responsibilities. The marriage, on August 18, 1477, implied the end of Mary’s personal government. She gave birth to two surviving children, Philip the Fair and Maximilian, who played major roles in European politics. Mary’s choice of a Habsburg introduced this dynasty as rulers of the Low Countries for more than three centuries.

WIM BLOCKMANS

References and Further Reading

- Blockmans, Wim, and Walter Prevenier. The Promised Lands: The Low Countries under Burgundian Rule, 1369–1530. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1996.

Cazaux, Yves. Marie de Bourgogne. Paris: Albin Michel, 1967.

See also Burgundian Netherlands; Heiresses; Margaret of York; Noble Women

MARY OF HUNGARY I

Mary of Hungary I (1255–1323), the daughter of Stephen V, king of Hungary, wed the future Charles II of Anjou, king of Naples, in 1269. Mother of eight sons and five daughters, Mary actively promoted the dynastic interests of her family. It was through her that the Neapolitan Angevins inherited the kingdom of Hungary. Mary sported the coat of arms of the Árpáadian dynasty on numerous works of art and monuments commissioned by her, from her silk throne carpet to the panel of Simone Martini representing Saint Ladislás of Hungary. She was a generous patron of the church, especially of the Franciscan Order.

After the death of her eldest son, Charles Martel, a learned prince and a friend of Dante in 1294, who was supposed to inherit the kingdoms of Naples and Hungary, Mary fought for the succession of her grandson to the Hungarian throne. With the strong financial support of the Neapolitan court, the Franciscan Cardinal Gentile da Montefiore, papal legate to Hungary, managed to have Charles Robert recognized by the Hungarian estates as king in 1312. The chapel of Saint Martin in the lower church of Assisi is a testimony both to Cardinal Gentile's mission and to Mary's efforts in furthering the interests of her dynasty through her generous patronage of the arts. The paintings of Simone Martini represent not only the story of Martin, a native of Pannonia (later Hungary), but also the "blessed family" (beata stirps) of the Árpáadian dynasty, from Saint Stephen via Saint Henry and Saint Ladislás to Saint Elisabeth and Saint Margaret of Hungary. Mary was buried in the church of Santa Maria Donna Regina built by her sometime between 1307 and 1320. Her tomb, a masterpiece of Tino di Camaino, is decorated with the four cardinal virtues, Prudentia, Temperantia, Iustitia, and Fortitudo.

MARIANNE SÁGHY

References and Further Reading

- Church of Santa Maria Donna Regina: Art, Iconography and Patronage in Fourteenth Century Naples*, edited by Janis Elliot and Cordelia Warr. Aldershot: Ashgate, 2004.
- Hoch, Adrian S. "Beata stirps: Royal Patronage and the Identification of the Sainted Rulers in the St. Elizabeth Chapel at Assisi." Art History 15.3 (1992): 279–295.

Léonard, Émile G. Les Angevins de Naples. Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1954.

Klaniczay, Gábor. Holy Rulers and Blessed Princesses: Dynastic Cults in Medieval Central Europe. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.

See also Italy; Patronage, Artistic; Patronage, Ecclesiastical; Queens and Empresses: The West

MARY OF HUNGARY II

Daughter of Louis the Great, king of Hungary and of Poland (1342–1382), Mary (1371–1395) was crowned "king of Hungary" (rex Hungariae) in 1382. The first woman to rule Hungary, where daughters were generally excluded from inheritance of land, Mary was called rex feminus. Thanks to this legal fiction, a new status was created for her in this unprecedented situation that also allowed for a distinction from the reginae, the consorts of kings. According to King Louis' original plan of succession, Mary, betrothed to Sigismund of Luxembourg, son of Emperor Charles IV, was supposed to rule Poland together with her husband. However, the order of succession was successfully challenged by Elizabeth, the queen mother. The Polish throne was inherited by Mary's younger sister, Hedwig (Jadwiga). Elizabeth became regent of Hungary and ruled with her favorite, the palatine Nicholas of Gara.

The government of the queens proved to be a disaster. The baronial leagues possessing large estates in southern Hungary and Croatia wanted to continue the lucrative Italian wars of the late king and follow the Adriatic, "maritime" orientation set by him rather than complying to the new, Czech-German "continental" perspective offered by Sigismund, whom they hated and despised. In 1386, the Gara league murdered the pretender, Charles of Naples, invited to the Hungarian throne by the Horváti clan; in the same year, Garai was killed and the queens kidnapped by János Horváti, the leader of the faction. Elizabeth was strangled under the very eyes of her daughter in 1387. Mary was liberated from her prison in Croatia by her husband. Instead of showing clemency, she took revenge on her assailants by executing Horváti, to whom she had earlier promised safe conduct. Mary then conferred the government on Sigismund and was reduced to the status of consort. Being a plaything in her own mother's schemes, she never possessed her own political authority. Later she was able to devote her life to charity. In 1395, the pregnant queen went riding, fell and died. Mary was buried in the church of Saint Ladislás in Nagyvárád (Oradea).

MARIANNE SÁGHY

References and Further Reading

- de Thurocz, Johannes. Chronica Hungarorum, edited by E. Galántai and G. Kristó. Budapest, 1985.
- Erik, Fügedi. Könyörülj, bánom, könyörülj... Budapest: Helikon, 1986.
- Laurentius, Monacis. Chronicon de rebus Venetis ab u. c. ad annum 1354. Accedit ejusdem Laurentii carmen de Carolo II rege Hungariae. Flaminius Cornelius, Venetiis, 1758. Hungarian translation, Sándor Márki. Monaci krónikája Kis Károlyról. Budapest: Anthenevm, 1910.
- Sághy, Marianne. "Aspects of Female Rulership in Late Medieval Literature: The Queen's Reign in Angevin Hungary." East Central Europe/L'Europe du Centre Est 20–23.1 (1993–1996): 69–86.
- Sándor, Márki. Mária, Magyarország királynéja (1370–1395). Budapest: Méhner Vilmos Kiadosa, 1885.

See also Eastern Europe; Jadwiga; Regents and Queen-Lieutenants; Succession, Royal and Noble

MARY THE EGYPTIAN

The archetypal figure of the penitent woman made her first appearance in Christian literature in Luke 7:36–50, where she washed the feet of Jesus. Tradition identifies her with Mary Magdalene. In the following centuries four other "holy harlots" took their places in the Vitae patrum collections: Mary Meretrix, Thaïs, Pelagia, and—most famous of the four during the Middle Ages—Mary the Egyptian.

The authoritative Greek prose life of this saint is attributed to Sophronios (c. 600: PG 87, pars 3: 3697–3725). It was translated into Latin in the ninth century by Paul the Deacon of Naples (PL 73:671–690). The story begins with a monk of Palestine, Zosimas, who makes a Lenten journey into the desert and encounters an old woman, entirely nude, her body blackened by the sun. She tells him her story: as a youth she was a courtesan in Alexandria; converted miraculously by the Virgin Mary, she traveled into the desert, where she has lived alone on just three loaves of bread for the past forty-seven years. She instructs him to return to his monastery, but he is to meet her the following year to give her the Eucharist. He does so, and eventually buries her dead body, with the help of a providentially appearing lion.

By the middle of the twelfth century short versions of the tale appeared in Latin collections of miracles of the Virgin. These anthology treatments relegate Zosimas to a secondary role and bring Mary herself to the foreground of the legend. The late-twelfth-century Anglo-Norman verse life (version T, as it is called) realizes fully the literary implications of this change. Stylistic and thematic echoes associate this poem with other Anglo-Norman works of the period, including Clemence of Barking's life of St. Catherine, the Gracial by Adgar, and the Tristan romance by Thomas. Versions deriving from T in the following centuries include that of Rutebeuf and the Spanish Vida de santa María Egipcíaca. The Golden Legend reverts, however, to the older, "Zosimas-centered" narrative, which may be said to predominate in the literature thereafter.

J. DUNCAN ROBERTSON

References and Further Reading

- Cazelles Brigitteo. "Modèle ou mirage: Marie l'Égyptienne." French Review 53 (1979): 13–22.
- Dembowski, Peter F., ed. La vie de sainte Marie l'Égyptienne: Versions en ancien et en moyen français. Geneva: Droz, 1977.
- Robertson, Duncan. "The Anglo-Norman Verse Life of St. Mary the Egyptian." Romance Philology 52 (1998): 13–44.
- Ward, Benedicta. Harlots of the Desert: A Study of Repentance in Early Monastic Sources. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Cistercian Publications, 1987.

See also Clemence of Barking; Hagiography; Jacobus de Voragine's Golden Legend; Mary Magdalen

MARY THE YOUNGER

Mary the Younger (c. 875–c. 903) was a pious woman of Armenian origin who came to be venerated as a saint. After marriage to a military officer named Nikephoros, she spent most of her married life in the Thracian town of Bizye. She bore four children, two of whom died young. She was assiduous in her private devotions, engaged in fasting, and was noted for her charitable activities and kind behavior towards slaves. She died young, as a result of abuse by her husband. Some months after her burial, healing miracles began to occur at her tomb; her vita attests to her miraculous cure of twenty-one men and eleven women. She was also commemorated in an icon, together with her two surviving children and a maid-servant, by a painter from Rhaidestos who was informed of her likeness through a dream vision. The cult of Mary seems to have remained a local development; she was not included in the Synaxarion of Constantinople and no icon of her survives. Her anonymous vita, preserved in two late manuscripts (fourteenth and fifteenth centuries), was probably written in the eleventh or twelfth century.

Mary the Younger was a rare example of a Byzantine married woman who worked miracles and achieved sanctity, even though this was considered impossible by the local bishop. She is usually grouped with a small number of other married holy women, such as the empress Theophano (d. 895 or 896) and Thomaïs of Lesbos (fl. first half of tenth century), who became saints without ever taking monastic vows.

ALICE-MARY TALBOT

References and Further Reading

Laiou, Angeliki E., trans. "Life of St. Mary the Younger." In Holy Women of Byzantium: Ten Saints' Lives in English Translation, edited by Alice-Mary Talbot. Washington, D.C.: Dumbarton Oaks, 1996, pp. 239–289.

Mango, Cyril. "The Byzantine Church at Vize (Bizye) in Thrace and St. Mary the Younger." Zbornik Radova Vizantološkog Instituta 11 (1968): 9–13.

See also Byzantium; Domestic Abuse; Hagiography; Icons, Byzantine; Lay Piety; Miracles and Miracle Collections

MARY, VIRGIN

Since the fourth century, devotion to the Virgin Mary, mother of Jesus, has been an integral part of the piety and worship of the Christian Church. An interest in Mary had already begun to appear in the second century. Afterward, her popularity steadily increased until it reached a high point in the twelfth century from which it never declined for the remainder of the Middle Ages. Indeed, the fifteenth century, the last of the medieval period, witnessed the production of some of the most lyrical hymns ever written to celebrate her role in the Christian drama. One of these hymns, "Adam lay y-bounden," comes from an anonymous English hymn writer who chose to express love for the Virgin Mary, Queen of Heaven, by giving thanks for the original fall into sin in the Garden of Eden, because it seemed obvious that, without that fall, Mary could never have attained her prominent place in the heavenly court. The hymn asserts, "Ne had the apple taken been, the apple taken been, Ne had never Our Lady a-been heavené queen. Blessed be the time that apple taken was." Without mentioning Eve specifically, the hymn calls to mind one of the oldest and most popular themes of both ancient and medieval Marian devotion: Mary as Second Eve. The idea is as old as the second century, when St. Justin Martyr, in his Dialogue with Trypho, contrasted Mary's obedience to the will of God with Eve's disobedience. By consenting to become the mother of the incarnate Word, Mary had made possible the eventual overthrow of the very serpent who had tempted Eve, becoming herself the bodily gateway of salvation. Justin's theme was soon adopted by other Christian writers like Irenaeus of Lyons, who expanded its possibilities even further.

The Emergence of Marian Doctrine and Piety in the Early Church

The theological consideration of Mary demonstrated in the work of Justin and Irenaeus is only one aspect of the emerging interest in the Virgin that first began to appear in the second century. This new focus on Mary occurred within the context of veneration for the early martyr-saints of the church that was rapidly becoming an important aspect of Christian worship. By the end of the second century, the Protevangelion or Early Gospel of James was written to supply the need for additional information about Mary's life not provided in the four Gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John. These Gospels assumed a place of authority within the early Christian community over the course of the second century, but they included only a few specific references to Mary herself. Although the Protevangelion was never seriously considered for inclusion in the canon by the Church, it became quite popular and provided a number of the stories that eventually would be woven into the tapestry of medieval Marian devotion, including Mary's dedication to the temple at the age of three and support for Mary's virginity in partu (in giving birth). Most important of all, the Protevangelion relates the story of Mary's conception. An angel announces to the childless couple, Anne and Joachim, that they will soon have a very special daughter. In outline, the account resembles the story of Hannah's conception of Samuel in 1 Samuel. It therefore continues a practice begun by Luke, whose version of Mary's song of praise, the "Magnificat" (Luke 1), is clearly modeled on that of Hannah.

While some aspects of Marian devotion developed as early as the second century, there is general recognition that Mary first became the object of widespread theological consideration and piety in the fourth century. Much of this new attention occurred in connection with the heated theological debates surrounding the person of Christ. Athanasius of Alexandria, ardent defender of the divinity of Christ both before and after the Council of Nicea in 325, expressed the veneration for Mary common among theologians of the Alexandrian tradition by referring to Mary as Theotokos (God-bearer). This title praises the Virgin, but it was used even more to demonstrate Jesus' divinity from the moment of his conception. Mary, then, was the one who carried God incarnate for the nine months of her pregnancy and then bore God into the world in the person of Jesus.

The fourth century also witnessed the first recorded prayer to Mary, the Sub tuum praesidium (Under Thy Protection), although some scholars have dated it as early as the later third century. The beautiful hymns of the Syrian deacon Ephraem, known as “the Lyre of the Holy Spirit,” further testify to the fervent devotion felt by Eastern Christian writers of the day. Equally important for Mary’s place in future medieval piety is the fact that, by the fourth century, Mary had become the model for all Christians, especially women, who sought to live a life of virginity. Assuming no sexual relationship with her husband Joseph, Church fathers, including Athanasius in the East and Ambrose of Milan in the West, asserted that Mary had always lived a quiet contemplative life at home—she seldom went out and, never wanting to be seen by men, was continually engaged in prayer and good works. Mary thus became the symbol for the ascetic lifestyle that would remain the Christian ideal throughout the medieval period.

The ecumenical councils of the fifth century, called to settle the crucial Christological issues concerning Jesus’s humanity, officially established some of the most central doctrines and titles in Marian piety. The Council of Ephesus (431) formally approved Mary’s title Theotokos. The Council of Chalcedon (451) next proclaimed her as Aeiparthenos (Ever-Virgin) when it adopted in its entirety the Tome of Pope St. Leo I, which contained this doctrine.

Immaculate Conception and the Assumption

There was no consensus in the early church, however, regarding the degree to which Mary participated in the sinful condition of the rest of humanity. The belief that Mary had been preserved from original sin, the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception, remained in dispute. There were theologians, including John Chrysostom, who were convinced of Mary’s participation in original sin, and some, including Ambrose, who clearly believed her to have been preserved from all actual sin. They stopped short, however, of arguing for her preservation from original sin as well. It is a testament to the strong belief in Mary’s holiness that even Augustine of Hippo, who so stressed the universal power of original sin, was capable of speculating that Mary had never sinned.

The first celebration of a feast of Mary’s conception took place in the seventh century in the Eastern church, but was not widely introduced into western Europe until the twelfth century. Debate regarding the Immaculate Conception continued throughout the Middle Ages in the West. The doctrine was always popular among the people, who are usually credited with ensuring its eventual acceptance; but there were famous theologians arrayed on both sides of the debate. The Dominican St. Thomas Aquinas opposed the Immaculate Conception as a belief that detracted from Christ’s role as savior of all people; and, for this reason, the Dominican friars tended to follow his lead. The Franciscans, on the other hand, became major defenders of the doctrine, although their more cautious preachers, like San Bernardino of Siena, preferred to wait until the Church made a final decision before asserting it in sermons. The Immaculate Conception was destined to remain simply a popular belief until Pope Pius IX proclaimed it a dogma of the Church in 1854.

As with Mary’s conception, Eastern Christians were the first to demonstrate an interest in Mary’s death and bodily Assumption into heaven. Early Syrian and Greek documents like the Obsequies of the Holy Virgin and the Pseudo-Melito suggest that Mary either died or “fell asleep” and that afterward both her soul and her body were taken up into heaven. By 600, August 15 was set aside by the Eastern Emperor Maurice to commemorate the Virgin’s death; and by the seventh century, the feast was established in Gaul under the title the Feast of the Dormition. In the West, the feast came to be known as the Assumption during the ninth century and acquired a popularity rivaling Christmas and Easter. Never as controversial as the Immaculate Conception, the Assumption also had to wait for modern definition as official doctrine. It was finally proclaimed to be a dogma by Pope Pius XII in 1950.

Relics

There is one final aspect of Marian devotion yet to appear in the earliest period of Christian history: relics. Belief in the special holiness of the bodies of saints can already be detected in the New Testament (Acts 19:11–12) and was especially associated in the early Church with the bodies of martyrs such as St. Polycarp, executed around the middle of the second century. Fairly widespread acceptance of Mary’s Assumption would appear to eliminate the possibility of true Marian relics; nevertheless, there is evidence of them by the sixth century, when Gregory of Tours mentions a number of Marian relics already being venerated in Frankish Gaul. Relics of the Virgin included things such as locks of her hair, pieces of clothing, and above all, her milk, perhaps the single most popular relic associated with Mary’s cult. Vials of her milk could be found at many popular pilgrimage sites; and Mary’s milk is the one Marian relic popular in the many miracle stories involving her intervention on behalf of sinners. Indeed, there were several miracle stories telling of Mary's miraculous appearance to those who sought her in prayer, so that she could reward them with a few drops of her milk. Mary's milk came to symbolize her power to intercede for sinners. This intercession was often depicted both in sermons and in art works using a theme known as the "double intercession." The Virgin kneels before her Son in heaven, revealing to him the breast with which she had nourished him as a child, reminding him of her care for him, and asking him to be merciful to sinners. Jesus, in turn, reveals to the Father the wound in his side, suffered on behalf of sinners, beseeching him also to show mercy. In the art works the physical gestures of mother and son are portrayed as virtually identical. A few places possessed Marian relics, including Walsingham, England, which had a vial of her milk by the thirteenth century. Paris had a lock of her hair, while Chartres could claim the sancta camisia (holy chemise), the garment worn by Mary when she gave birth to Christ. This relic was a gift to Charlemagne from the Byzantine empress Irene. Also popular were various dwellings associated with Mary. Walsingham became one of the most visited pilgrimage sites in Europe because of the Holy House of Walsingham, believed to be a replica of Mary's house in Nazareth, revealed in a vision to the twelfth-century Norman woman Richelde of Fervaques (c. 1130). The Holy House of Loreto, Italy (1295) claimed to be the very house in which Jesus was conceived.

By the early Middle Ages, most of the permanent elements of Marian doctrine and devotion were already in place. The particular historical developments and devotional trends of medieval Europe then molded these elements into something quite distinctive and complex.

The Middle Ages: The Flowering of Marian Piety

Even though Marian piety was fully integrated into Christian worship by the early Middle Ages, nothing could have anticipated the tremendous outpouring of devotion Mary received in the twelfth century. Under the combined influence of feudalism and the French courtly love tradition, Mary was celebrated by her own troubadours as Notre Dame (Our Lady), the Queen of Heaven, who was to be served and honored with a purity of love and service due to no merely earthly lady. Mary became the subject of numerous hymns, among them the beautiful Marian antiphons such as the Salve Regina (Hail Holy Queen), which were soon incorporated into the liturgy. It was also during the late eleventh or early twelfth century that the first half of the most popular prayer to Mary in Western Christian piety, the Ave Maria (Hail Mary), first entered widespread usage. By the early thirteenth century, the Ave Maria was so well established that the Church encouraged Christians to memorize it along with the "Our Father" and the "Apostles' Creed." If songs and prayers were not tangible or permanent enough, Mary was also immortalized in stone, in the Gothic cathedrals all over France, and throughout the rest of Europe, that were dedicated to her, including Notre Dame de Paris and Notre Dame de Chartres; and in addition, there were the statues of Mary, usually holding the infant Jesus, sculpted to adorn the buildings.

Against this backdrop of a society familiar with the customs of feudalism and courtly love, Mary's role as intercessor was often depicted as that of a Queen Mother, helping to preside over the court of her son and always ready to present to him the requests of the various suppliants who came seeking favors. There was no doubt that she would be especially bound to help those who had increased her own glory and honor at court through their plentiful offerings of prayer and praise. Indeed at times, preachers like Jean Gerson presented Mary as the Queen of the Court of Mercy while Jesus presided over the Court of Justice. Those who feared to approach the throne of Christ directly because of their sins could first make their supplications at Mary's court.

Twelfth-century Marian piety also influenced biblical interpretation and in some cases altered the text of Scripture itself as it was used in the liturgy. Beginning with Origen's commentaries and homilies on the Song of Songs in the mid-third century, the Song of Songs had been interpreted as an allegory depicting the relationship between God and the believer or God and the Church. As early as the ninth century, however, when the Assumption first acquired widespread popularity, certain passages from the book were being used in the liturgy and in biblical commentaries to speak of Mary's Assumption into heaven. Paschasius Radbertus's work Cogitis me (You Compel Me) changed the Latin word progreditur (advances) of Song of Songs 6:9 to ascendit (ascends). The verse would now read: "Who is this who ascends like the dawn," fitting perfectly the Assumption of Mary. Because most people of the High Middle Ages believed Paschasius' work had been written by St. Jerome, the alteration in the text was accepted as authoritative for some time. By the twelfth century, authors began to interpret the entire Song of Songs as a depiction of God's love for Mary. The Seal of Blessed Mary (c. 1100), by Honorius Augustodunensis, and Reupert of Deutz's Commentary of the Song of Songs (c. 1125) were the first works to do this. The use of the Song of Songs in a Marian context eventually led to the portrayal of Mary as the bride of Christ in many popular sermons. She became Christ's beloved, whom he sought out specifically as his partner in the Incarnation because of her beauty, her humility, and her virginal purity.

Role of the Mendicant Orders

Some of the most significant contributions to popular and scholarly devotion to Mary were made by the two new mendicant religious orders of the early thirteenth century, the Franciscans and the Dominicans. Together they were responsible for most of the public preaching heard by people of the High and late Middle Ages. Through their sermons, the Franciscans encouraged the people to embrace a more human vision of the Virgin Mary, who, like themselves, had experienced all of the joy and pain of earthly life. The Franciscans first established the Angelus as a popular prayer among the people. This initially involved the custom of reciting the Ave Maria each evening when the bells rang to announce the city's curfew. Based on the angel Gabriel's Annunciation to Mary, the Angelus eventually developed into a series of short statements about Mary's role in the Incarnation interspersed with the Ave Maria. The Dominicans also supported the custom of the Angelus, and in addition to being popular preachers, were instrumental in developing theological doctrines concerning Mary in their role as university professors.

Finally, the recently rediscovered works of Aristotle, which so influenced the direction of scholastic thought in the universities during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, created an interpretation of Mary's role in the Incarnation destined to become one of the commonplaces of later medieval Marian piety and preaching. Certainly, Aristotle was not needed in order to affirm Mary's concrete role in the Incarnation or her logical connection to the doctrine of transubstantiation established in 1215; but his biological concepts made possible the development of a particularly rich symbolism regarding her bodily unity with Christ. Aristotelian biology taught that a woman's menstrual blood was transformed into the body of the child by the male seed, which brought form and life to the inert matter. In addition, Aristotle believed that the woman's blood was transformed into the milk with which she fed the child. Women were therefore seen as sacrificing their own blood first to form the child's body and then to provide nourishment for the newborn infant. Aristotelian biology enabled medieval theologians and preachers to make frequent references to Mary's "very pure blood" as the source of Jesus' body. Preachers asserted this connection whenever they wanted to stress the holiness of the body of Christ, whether his body hanging and suffering on the cross or his body received in the Eucharistic host. They would nearly always point out that his body was made "from the very pure blood of blessed Mary." It is also true that those, like the Franciscans, who sought to magnify Mary's physical role in the Incarnation often preferred to use the biological teaching of Galen, who believed that women and men made roughly equal contributions to forming the child in the womb. In any case, the Virgin's bodily connection to Jesus allowed her to be seen as the ultimate provider of the most revered object in late medieval religious devotion, the Eucharistic host. She thereby became the source of nourishment for Christian believers, her spiritual children, as she had been for Jesus. Tabernacles used to store the consecrated host were at times designed to represent Mary, containing once again within her own body the Eucharistic body of her Son. Plays that were staged during Corpus Christi festivals also associated Mary with the host by focusing on the glorification of Mary's body at her Assumption. The body whose transformed substance is received in the Eucharist was rightly preserved from corruption at her death.

The Unity of Mary and Jesus

The mystical bodily unity of Mary and Jesus was in fact the inspiration for virtually all devotion to Mary in the later Middle Ages. By the fifteenth century, it even allowed prominent theologians and preachers to assert that Mary had experienced the same bodily pain as Jesus during his crucifixion. Motherly compassion for her suffering son became a sharing in the actual Passion of Christ itself, an intimate participation in the redemption that earned for her an unquestioned right to intercede with her son in heaven on behalf of sinners.

This concrete, sacramental, and incarnational Marian piety was eventually transformed into something more "spiritualized" and inward during the very late medieval and early modern period. The growth of literacy after the invention of printing (c. 1450) worked to create a greater sense of interiority and introspection, which often preferred to stress Mary's "spiritual" motherhood of Jesus through her faith in Gabriel's proclamation of God's intentions at the Annunciation. The previous focus on the bodily unity of Mary and Jesus became instead an emphasis on their oneness of heart and will. Meditative prayers such as the rosary, which acquired its final modern form during the sixteenth century, also contributed to the transformation. But the older tradition celebrating Mary's physical role in the Incarnation, her exalted position as Bride of Christ, and her connection to the Eucharist could still be found during the sixteenth century in the theology and preaching of men such as François de Sales and Lawrence of Brindisi.

Recent Trends in Medieval Marian Scholarship

There is, of course, a great wealth of scholarship covering every aspect of Marian piety and theology from the earliest period of Christian history to the present day. Very often, when historians have disagreed in their interpretations it has been in relation to the effect on women of the Church's teaching on Mary. Feminist scholars like Marina Warner have often argued that Marian piety acquired quite early its most essential elements and that they have remained fairly constant over time. For the most part, they have concluded that the presentation of Mary both in formal theology and in more popular venues was crafted exclusively by men and that overall it served to present women with either an impossible model of perfection for emulation or an example of the kind of quiet, passive, and obedient behavior they sought to encourage in Christian women. Certainly some churchmen have sought to employ Marian piety in just this way, but more recent scholarship, particularly that concerning women's experience of Mary in the Middle Ages, has begun to reveal the creative ways in which women have related to Mary in their devotional lives.

Caroline Walker Bynum has argued that ultimately it was Christ, not the Virgin, who was the focus of most medieval women's spirituality, while it was men who seemed most drawn to Mary. For women, Mary as representative woman was not especially central. Yet Bynum also concludes that, as the provider of Christ's body, Mary was necessarily important to mystics like St. Catherine of Siena and Hildegard of Bingen, who sought to identify more fully with Christ's suffering on the cross. Sensing the same mystical unity of flesh that caused late medieval preachers to proclaim Mary's physical suffering at Calvary, these women could experience a oneness with the Passion of Jesus because his flesh, like theirs, was female flesh.

Equally positive is the role played by Mary in The Book of Margery Kempe, the spiritual autobiography of the fourteenth-century Englishwoman Margery Kempe. Gail McMurray Gibson has shown that the richness of Margery's visionary life often expressed her sense of unity with the suffering of Christ generated through her own personal suffering, a theme that reflects Bynum's argument. At other times, however, Margery's visions reveal her desire to identify with Mary herself, becoming, like Mary, a servant of the Christ Child. Theresa Coletti has highlighted Mary's unique position as both Virgin and mother in medieval religious drama. She argues that this paradoxical role helped to create dramatic interaction between the characters in the plays that served to challenge society's assumptions about the bodies of ordinary women. Pregnancy and lactation were the common lot of all married women. Lactation was often portrayed as a result of the original fall into sin. The fact that Mary could be both pregnant and a Virgin, lactating and sinless, forced the viewer to reconsider the usual stereotypes. Also, instead of presenting Mary as remote, perfect, and therefore completely unlike other women, the plays depict Mary in exactly the kinds of situations that all women encounter. Finally, Ellington's study of late medieval Marian popular sermons argues that these sermons generally describe Mary as an active, vocal, and central participant in Jesus's life from his conception and birth to his Resurrection and Ascension. All in all, recent scholarship suggests that medieval Marian devotion was multifaceted. It could be used by some to try to control women or to demonstrate female wickedness by comparison with Mary's perfection, but it was also at times capable of enabling women themselves to transcend the image of all women as merely so many Eves, responsible for the human fall into sin. Women could instead identify with Mary as the Second Eve, whose participation in Jesus's Incarnation and suffering on the cross helped to reverse the fall, ensuring, in the words of the hymn, that she would become "heavené queen."

DONNA SPIVEY ELLINGTON

References and Further Reading

- Allen, Prudence, R.S.M. The Concept of Woman: The Aristotelian Revolution, 750 B.C.–A.D. 1250. Grand Rapids, Mich.: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1985.
- Bouman, Cornelius A. "The Immaculate Conception in the Liturgy." In The Dogma of the Immaculate Conception: History and Significance, edited by Edward D. O'Connor. South, Bend, Ind.: University of Notre Dame Press, 1958, pp. 113–159.
- Brady, Ignatius. "The Development of the Doctrine of the Immaculate Conception in the Fourteenth Century after Aureoli." Franciscan Studies 15 (1955): 175–202.

MARY, VIRGIN

- Brown, Peter. The Body and Society: Men, Women, and Sexual Renunciation in Early Christianity. New York: Columbia University Press, 1988.
- Bynum, Caroline Walker. Holy Feast and Holy Fast: The Religious Significance of Food to Medieval Women. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1987.
- Carol, Juniper B., ed. Mariology. 3 vols. Milwaukee: Bruce Publishing Company, 1955–1961.
- Coletti, Theresa. "Purity and Danger: The Paradox of Mary's Body and the Engendering of the Infancy Narrative in the English Mystery Cycles." In Feminist Approaches to the Body in Medieval Literature, edited by Linda Lomperis and Sarah Stanbury. Philadelphia: University of Philadelphia Press, 1993, pp. 65–95.
- Cunneen, Sally. In Search of Mary: The Woman and the Symbol. New York: Ballantine Books, 1996.
- Ellington, Donna Spivey. From Sacred Body to Angelic Soul: Understanding Mary in Late Medieval and Early Modern Europe. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America Press, 2001.
- Elliott, J. K., ed. and trans. The Apocryphal New Testament: A Collection of Apocryphal Christian Literature in an English Translation. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1993.
- Gibson, Gail McMurray. The Theater of Devotion: East Anglian Drama and Society in the Late Middle Ages. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1989.
- Graef, Hilda. Mary: A History of Doctrine and Devotion. 2 vols. New York: Sheed and Ward, 1964.
- Johnson, Elizabeth A. "Marian Devotion in the Western Church." In Christian Spirituality: High Middle Ages and Reformation, edited by Jill Raitt. New York: Crossroad Publishing Company, 1987, pp. 392–414.
- Manoir de Juaye, Hubert du, S.J. Maria: Études sur la Sainte Vierge. 8 vols. Paris: Beauchesne, 1949–1971.
- Matter, E. Ann. The Voice of My Beloved: The Song of Songs in Western Medieval Christianity. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1990.
- O'Connor, Edward D., ed. The Dogma of the Immaculate Conception: History and Significance. South Bend, Ind.: University of Notre Dame Press, 1958.
- Pelikan, Jaroslav. Mary through the Centuries: Her Place in the History of Culture. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1996.
- Sticca, Sandro. The Planctus Mariae in the Dramatic Tradition of the Middle Ages, translated by Joseph R. Berrigan. Athens, Ga.: University of Georgia Press, 1988.
- Warner, Marina. Alone of All Her Sex: The Myth and the Cult of the Virgin Mary. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1976.
- Wilkins, Eithne. The Rose-Garden Game: A Tradition of Beads and Flowers. New York: Herder and Herder, 1969.
- Winston-Allen, Anne. Stories of the Rose: The Making of the Rosary in the Middle Ages. University Park, Pa.: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1997.

See also Anne, Saint; Aristotelian Concepts of Women and Gender; Bride of Christ: Imagery; Catherine of Siena; Eve; Gerson, Jean; Hildegard of Bingen; Intercession; Irene; Immaculate Conception, Doctrine of; Joseph, Stepfather of Jesus; Kempe, Margery; Mary, Virgin: in Art; Mary, Virgin: in Literature; Mary, Virgin: in Music; Pilgrims and Pilgrimage; Relics and Reliquaries; Rosary; Song of Songs, Medieval Interpretations of; Theology; Virginity

MARY, VIRGIN: IN ART

By the late Middle Ages, the most revered holy figure in western Europe was the Virgin Mary, the Mother of God. Her power was conveyed through images large and small, made in many media. Some portrayed her as an intercessor with her son, others as the protector of individuals or cities. For example, Stephen Murray has connected the intense local devotion to the mid-thirteenth century Vierge Dorée of the south portal of the Cathedral at Amiens with a contemporary sermon that celebrated the great power of the Queen of Heaven and Bride of Christ. In the same century, following a victory over Florence attributed to her intervention, the Tuscan city of Siena affirmed its special relationship with the Virgin with a series of immense altarpieces depicting the Madonna and Child enthroned that culminated in Duccio's great Maestà placed on the altar of the Duomo in 1311, and, as Diana Norman has argued, went on to assert territorial control through other images of the Virgin dispersed into their contado.

Such medieval images of the Virgin do not fit the modern, post-Renaissance definition of "art," and are best understood in terms of their context and meaning as well as their production. Individual icons of the Virgin and Child and scenes from the lives of Christ and the Virgin functioned as conduits to the Virgin and to the events depicted. They were also organized into extensive cycles or programs. Executed in mosaic and fresco mural paintings, wooden panels, illuminated manuscripts, precious materials including gold, ivory, and gems, and sculpture in wood and stone, images of the Virgin can be surveyed chronologically, through iconography and style. But scholars also consider the religious, political, and social contexts in which images were made and the ways in which images of the Virgin, including miracle-working icons, conveyed meaning and produced power.

Virgin Mary With Child. Austria, Seitenstetten Abbey. Second half thirteenth century CE. M.855, f.110 v. Location: The Pierpont Morgan Library, New York, NY. Credit: The Pierpont Morgan Library / Art Resource, NY.

The Royal Virgin

Images of the Virgin appeared well before she was recognized as the Mother of God, the Theotokos, by the Council of Ephesus in 431. The Virgin with the Christ Child and the Prophet Isaiah at the Catacomb of Priscilla in Rome, usually dated to the second century, is often identified as the earliest extant image. Like others, it can be traced to pre-Christian sources, such as Isis nursing Horus, long identified as the model for the Virgin lactans. Some early images of the Virgin and Child enthroned with attendant saints and angels derived from Roman imperial iconography. Images at Rome from the sixth century on include versions of the Hodegetria in which the Virgin holds the child on her left arm and points to him with her right hand and of the Virgin as Advocate, with a supplicant gesture. Many, including the Hodegetria, named for the Hodegon Monastery, had prototypes in Constantinople, some of which were said to have been painted by the evangelist Luke. Copies of such venerated and miraculous images were thought to possess the efficacy of the original, and some acquired their own attribution to the evangelist. Another early type, almost exclusively Western, the Maria Regina, depicting the Virgin dressed in imperial regalia, was identified with the papacy and city of Rome.

By the early Middle Ages, images of the Virgin had spread north through Europe. The Venerable Bede recorded that in the seventh century Benedict Biscop, Abbot at Monkwearmouth, carried images from Rome to England, among them one of the Virgin and Child. Its form is not clear, but it may have resembled the enthroned Hodegetria in the Book of Kells, for which scholars have suggested a Byzantine or Coptic source. By the year 1000 new types had emerged, some functioning as relics or reliquaries. They included the sculpted Throne of Wisdom, in which the child sits frontally on the Virgin's lap embodying Holy Wisdom, who in the incarnation "built himself a throne," as Solomon had. And in the era of the Crusades, images in which the Virgin embraces the Christ Child appeared throughout Europe, based on the Byzantine Eleousa and Kykkotissa, which recall the Presentation in the Temple and thus stress the incarnation, coming Crucifixion, and the Eucharist. In the Virgin Misericorde or Schutzmantelmadonna, she shelters worshipers under her mantle. This type may also derive from Crusader circles. Described in twelfth-century Cistercian texts, it appears first in thirteenth-century Cypriote frescoes and Armenian manuscripts, and then in a panel by Duccio. Other new types were a response to interest in the Song of Solomon, including the Virgin as the Bride of Christ, the Sponsa/Sponsus, and the Virgin as Ecclesia. These representations lie behind the Virgin and Christ enthroned together as in S. Maria in Trastevere in Rome and the Coronation of the Virgin in numerous sculpture programs, including that of Chartres Cathedral. Like the Tree of Jesse found in manuscripts, stained glass, mural painting, and even ceiling painting, these new iconographic formulations first appear in the twelfth century in a period of increasing emphasis on the royal status of the Virgin and her identification with earthly queens, a period when the cult of the Virgin took hold in northern Europe, under the impact of Mediterranean imagery and the writings of St. Bernard of Clairvaux. This emphasis on earthly royalty and the Virgin's increasing role as a civic patron combined with the older incarnation imagery of the Throne of Solomon. The Virgin and Child on a Solomonic throne with lion bases appears throughout Europe, for example, in the thirteenth-century frescoes at Gurk. Comparable to the Roman formulation of the Maria Regina and the Constantinopolitan practice of processing with images to invoke the protection of the Virgin in time of war, European rulers and states used images to validate their rule and obtain her support.

Publication of the essential collection of icons at St. Catherine's on Mount Sinai and study of late Byzantine painting have transformed scholarly understanding of the development of images of the Virgin in both the East and the West. Among the most intriguing investigations have been those into the late-medieval European interest in Orthodox icons, literally an icon trade. Maryan Ainsworth has described the persistent power of certain types of images of the Virgin and the expectation of their efficacy in new works by painters such as Jan Van Eyck. In the same way, at the time of the counter-reformation throughout Italy, medieval images, both Byzantine and Italian, from the thirteenth century, were identified as the work of St. Luke, given elaborate new settings, and used to assert the power of the Roman church and of the Virgin in the face of the iconoclastic Protestant attack on the Virgin and on images described by Michael Camille, among many others. In a different way, late medieval and early Renaissance images such as St. Anne, the Virgin and Child, which emphasized the growing belief in the Virgin's immaculate conception, the Holy Kinship, and images focused on the Eucharist, like the Pietà, articulated church doctrine, while reflecting and promoting social values.

Naturalism and the Eucharistic Theme

Such analysis allows us to understand developments in a period generally considered a prelude to the Renaissance and its increasing naturalism. Both traditional and feminist scholarship reveals the liturgical and emotional depth of images of the Virgin. Barbara Lane has argued for a eucharistic interpretation of northern Renaissance images of the Virgin and Child. Fourteenth-century Sieneese images with increasingly natural infants carry many of the same references, in part in response to what Hans Belting has called the "living" icons of Byzantium. This enlivening can be seen in Gothic sculpture, likewise increasingly naturalistic by the late twelfth century. As Michael Camille noted, the sculpture seemed to move and come to life in personal encounters between images and worshipers. Such experiences were possible in all media and on all scales. The thirteenth-century Seitenstetten Missal, now in the Pierpont Morgan Library in New York and included in the 2004 exhibition Byzantium: Faith and Power, demonstrates the internationalism of such imagery. The Italianate ornamental and facial types reflect the impact of a Paduan atelier on painters in Austria, for the drapery, like the provenance, is central European. Here the Virgin nurses a child who holds his foot, a vision for the kneeling donor. The identification of her milk with the blood of Christ at the Crucifixion and the Eucharist has been stressed in recent scholarship, including that of Caroline Walker Bynum. These references are significant in the Seitenstetten Virgin, which forms a diptych with a facing Crucifixion, so that together they open the Canon of the Mass on the following folios. In addition, the emphasis on the child's foot, which will be pierced by a nail at the Crucifixion, and the juxtaposition of this page with a facing image of the Crucifixion underline that aspect of the Eucharist and the incarnation and remind the worshiper that the infant will be the crucified adult Christ. Hans Belting has noted that such images of the Virgin and Child function in prolepsis, anticipation of the future, and thus connect the early life of Christ to the passion. As icons they join worshipers with those portrayed, the events reflected, and the reality of the Eucharist itself. At the same time, Margaret Miles has suggested, scholars should consider the personal impact that such mothering images had on both male and female worshipers, despite a lack of contemporary documentation for these responses.

Narrative Circles

Along with the images of the Virgin and Child alone or with angels, donors, or saints, medieval worshipers encountered numerous images of the Virgin and Child in the scenes of infancy and passion cycles, including the Annunciation, the Nativity, and the Crucifixion, as well as those from the increasingly elaborate life of the Virgin, such as the embrace of her parents, Joachim and Anna, at the Golden Gate, her Marriage, and her Assumption. Often these scenes, derived from apocryphal texts, as well as the Gospels, are described simply as narratives, stories told in a Bible for the illiterate. But the formulation, selection, and juxtaposition of scenes and the organization of narrative cycles also conveyed carefully constructed theological and political messages. Like the eucharistic content of icons, they would have been recognized in part through a shared familiarity with hymns and liturgy, as well as preaching, but understood through the lens of personal experience and identity. Such cycles are found early in the fifth-century mosaics of S. Maria Maggiore in Rome, and in frescoes from the early medieval sites at Castelseprio and Reichenau, as well as romanesque Lambach and Prufening, among other examples. Elsewhere, infancy and passion cycles appear in stained glass, as at Chartres and Canterbury, and monumental sculpture programs as at Chartres, Paris, Reims, and Amiens.

Women and Images of Mary

Various approaches to investigating images of the Virgin and Child and infancy and passion cycles have expanded knowledge of the field. The relationship between Byzantine art and the art of western Europe provides some understanding of what medieval Europeans saw when they looked at images of the Virgin, and an appreciation of the practices that determined how worshipers saw images, including the experience of pilgrimage described in the work of David Freedberg and Michele Bacci. While some investigations of the meaning of images have been stylistic, iconographic, and theological, others have focused on political and economic factors. And feminist scholarship has vastly informed our understanding of images of the Virgin. Scholars such as Margaret Miles have addressed the role of images of the Virgin in articulating women's nature in the Middle Ages, especially in her unique contrast to Eve. Indeed, Miles has encouraged scholars to consider the impact of images of the Virgin and other female saints on female worshippers, noting that the Virgin, simultaneously a mother and a virgin, was unmatched in her perfection. Similarly, Madeline Caviness has argued that even where images of the Virgin were made specifically for women's use, women may not have had control over their content, and indeed some images may have been intended to mold female behavior. The power of the Virgin portrayed and the status of the possessor of an image did not necessarily translate into female agency in the production of images. Feminist perspectives have encouraged other scholars to pursue issues with innovative as well as traditional tools. Using texts and visual analysis, Amy Neff has provided important new insights into the childbirth imagery in the Virgin swooning at the foot of the Cross. In their rich analysis of Giotto's Arena Chapel, Anne Derbes and Mark Sandona have described the contrast between "Barren Metal and the Fruitful Womb," in the intercessory role of the Virgin and a visual explication of the sin of usury.

The Child and the Host

Important and extensive discussions have been carried out over eucharistic interpretations of both narrative and iconic images. To be sure, in some late medieval images, such as those specifically comparing the milk of the Virgin with the blood of Christ cited by Bynum, eucharistic content is easily identified. And references to the Eucharist and the incarnation are clear in Eastern Orthodox images of the Virgin, in part owing to texts defending icons by means of the incarnation, which emerged in the wake of the iconoclastic controversy. Byzantine church programs, like some in the West, often placed the Virgin and Child in the apse over the altar, but at times Byzantine apse frescoes were even more direct, depicting an infant in the paten in place of the host. For the most part, Western art lacks such literal statements of the relationship between images of the Virgin and Child and the incarnation, but scholars such as Ilene Forsyth, Barbara Lane, and Leo Steinberg have argued for it convincingly. Still, some refinement of these interpretations makes sense. For example, the argument that large-scale altarpieces depicting the Virgin emerged in Europe in the wake of the official identification of the host with the Christ Child in transubstantiation and the elevation of the host in 1215 has been overstated, as many have noted. The argument overlooks other factors that may have driven the gigantism of thirteenth-century painting, including the economic and demographic boom of the period, the increasing scale of buildings in Europe and of painted images, both icon and mural, in the Byzantine world, and the burgeoning cult of the Virgin.

Crucial studies continue to shape the investigation of medieval images of the Virgin and their meaning, above all the work of Caroline Walker Bynum. Although Bynum is not an art historian and has been criticized for her handling of images, her work and the body of literature, both positive and negative, that has emerged in response to it, have provided important insight into the making, meaning, and experience of images of the Virgin. For example, Kathleen Biddick's analysis underlines the importance of addressing the images directly in their larger contexts, rather than using them to accompany scholarly analysis as Bynum does. Above all Biddick stresses the effect of individual and group identities, gender, social station, and religion on the experience and production of images, for example, noting the anti-Semitic messages within some strongly eucharistic images and their intersection with the experience of gender identities of makers and worshippers.

REBECCA W. CORRIE

References and Further Reading

- Ainsworth, Maryan W. "A la facon grece: The Encounter of Northern Renaissance Artists with Byzantine Icons." In Byzantium: Faith and Power (1261–1557), edited by Helen C. Evans. New York, New Haven, Conn., and London: Metropolitan Museum of Art and Yale University Press, 2004, pp. 544–593.
- Bacci, Michele. "The Legacy of the Hodegetria: Holy Icons and Legends between East and West." In Images of the Mother of God: Perceptions of the Theotokos in Byzantium, edited by Maria Vassilaki. Aldershot: Ashgate Publishing, 2005, pp. 321–336.
- Belting, Hans. Likeness and Presence: A History of the Image before the Era of Art, translated by Edmund Jephcott. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1994.
- Biddick, Kathleen. "Genders, Bodies, Borders: Technologies of the Visible." Speculum 68.2 (1993): 389–418. (Also in Studying Medieval Women, edited by Nancy F. Partner. Cambridge, Mass.: Medieval Academy of America, 1993, pp. 87–116.)
- Bynum, Caroline Walker. Holy Feast and Holy Fast: The Religious Significance of Food to Medieval Women. Berkeley, Los Angeles, and London: University of California Press, 1987.

- Camille, Michael. The Gothic Idol: Ideology and Image-Making in Medieval Art. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989.
- Caviness, Madeline H. "Anchoress, Abbess, and Queen: Donors and Patrons or Intercessors and Matrons?" In The Cultural Patronage of Medieval Women, edited by June Hall McCash. Athens, Ga. and London: University of Georgia Press, 1996, pp. 105–154.
- Derbes, Anne, and Mark Sandona. "Barren Metal and the Fruitful Womb: The Program of Giotto's Arena Chapel in Padua." Art Bulletin 80.2 (1998): 274–291.
- Forsyth, Ilene. The Throne of Wisdom: Wood Sculpture of the Madonna in Romanesque France. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1972.
- Freedberg, David. The Power of Images: Studies in the History and Theory of Response. Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1989.
- Katz, Melissa, ed. Divine Mirrors: The Virgin Mary in the Visual Arts. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Lane, Barbara G. The Altar and the Altarpiece: Sacramental Themes in Early Netherlandish Painting. New York: Harper and Row, 1984.
- Lasareff, Victor. "Studies in the Iconography of the Virgin." Art Bulletin 20.1 (1938): 26–65.
- Miles, Margaret R. "The Virgin's One Bare Breast: Nudity, Gender, and Religious Meaning in Tuscan Early Renaissance Culture." In The Female Body in Western Culture: Contemporary Perspectives, edited by Susan R. Suleiman. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1986, pp. 193–208. (Also in The Expanding Discourse: Feminism and Art History, edited by Norma Broude and Mary D. Garrard. New York: HarperCollins, 1992, pp. 26–37.)
- Murray, Stephen. A Gothic Sermon: Making a Contract with the Mother of God, Saint Mary of Amiens. Berkeley, Los Angeles, and London: University of California Press, 2004.
- Neff, Amy. "The Pain of Compassio: Mary's Labor at the Foot of the Cross." Art Bulletin 80.2 (1998): 254–273.
- Norman, Diana. Siena and the Virgin: Art and Politics in a Late Medieval City State. New Haven, Conn. and London: Yale University Press, 1999.
- Schiller, Gertrud. Iconography of Christian Art. 2 vols., translated by Janet Seligman. Greenwich, Conn.: New York Graphic Society Ltd., 1971–1972.
- Steinberg, Leo. The Sexuality of Christ in Renaissance Art and in Modern Oblivion. Second Edition, Revised and expanded. Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1996.
- Vassilaki, Maria, ed. Mother of God: Representations of the Virgin in Byzantine Art. Benaki Museum 20 October 2000–20 January 2001. Athens and Milan: Benaki Museum and Skira, 2000.

See also Anne, Saint; Architecture, Ecclesiastical; Architecture, Monastic; Art, Representations of Women in; Bible, Women in; Body, Visual Representations of; Books of Hours; Breastfeeding and Wet-Nursing; Bride of Christ; Imagery; Cistercian Order; Devotional Art; Eve; Feminist Theories and Methodologies; Gaze; Gender in Art; Hagiography; Holy Kinship; Immaculate Conception, Doctrine of; Intercession; Mary, Virgin; Miracles and Miracle Collections; Patronage, Artistic; Pilgrims and Pilgrimage; Queens and Empresses: The West; Relics and Reliquaries; Virginity

MARY, VIRGIN: IN LITERATURE

The Blessed Virgin Mary was, from the earliest days of Christianity, the subject of mysterious legends and stories. She was often considered by ordinary believers to be a divine personage (although this view is not held by the Church), and the earliest preserved tales deal with her Assumption into heaven when her earthly life had ended. In the Middle Ages, especially between the eleventh and twelfth centuries, her role in literature was primarily that of intercessor between God and Man—a loving mother whose petitions made to Jesus on behalf of poor sinners were invariably granted. Generally, aid was proffered in the form of miraculous occurrences that often contravened the laws of nature and even Church dogma. Tales of such miracles were extremely popular and widespread, and generically form part of the repertory of saint's lives, although they are most succinctly described as illustrated sermons. What we call Marian literature refers simply to stories about Mary that were written down at some point and have survived to the present day. We can read them today as sermons, plays, poetry, and stories, although their delivery would have been oral in the Middle Ages, since common people—with very few exceptions—could not read or write. They would have heard the stories as exempla in sermons, or as public entertainment at pilgrimage sites, or would perhaps have seen liturgical dramas or heard songs about Mary. The impact of this orally delivered literature would have been reinforced by artistic representations of Mary in churches and shrines. Mary was omnipresent, often overshadowing Jesus as a bestower of grace and favor.

Religious and Political Pressures

The stern and even ominous tone of preaching in much of Europe during the late Middle Ages was a particular reason for the literary foregrounding of Mary in these tales. Many dissenting religious sects had arisen, creating an atmosphere of repression and defensiveness within the Church, and inflammatory preaching became a principal weapon against heresy. In preaching of this kind, Jesus tended to emerge more as spokesman for the law than as author of grace. The Virgin Mary as literary figure ideally filled the latter role. The Trinitarian structure of God—Father, Son, and Holy Spirit—made it difficult, if not impossible, for Jesus, who is one with the Father, to be the spokesman for exceptional grace when it was God the Father's law, dogmatically represented by the Church, that had to be constantly defended in such stern preaching. Mary, however, established outside the Trinitarian structure, could make such exceptional pleas on behalf of sinners.

Mary's Many Faces

While Mary, within the tales, was almost always an intercessor, her artistic depiction was as varied as the authors, preachers, and entertainers who undertook the telling of the stories. Two outstanding thirteenth-century Spanish collections of Marian tales were the Cantigas de Santa Maria (Canticles of Holy Mary), a very large collection of over four hundred tales set to music and illustrated under the auspices of King Alfonso X of Castile, and the Milagros de Nuestra Señora (Miracles of Our Lady), translated from an older Latin collection of tales by the priest Gonzalo de Berceo. In the Canticles of Holy Mary, which can reasonably be assumed to contain most of the miracle tales known to the many compilers, the Virgin appears in a variety of roles. She was most often a tender and solicitous female figure dedicated to facilitating salvation for the desperate. Yet she was occasionally shown as a facilitator of romantic relationships or even as an angry and vengeful deity exacting retribution. Occasionally, in the poems believed to have been written by King Alfonso himself, she appears as national patroness of Christian Spain (revered in that role in much the same way as the Virgin of Guadalupe is in Mexico today.) In Berceo's Miracles of Our Lady, translated by a doctrinaire and pious priest, her role is more nearly restricted to that of facilitator of miraculous salvation, especially for fallen churchmen and churchwomen, whose stories constitute a significant part of the collection. Such stories would have been useful in orienting new recruits to the realities of a communal religious life governed by austere practices, and the stories' happy outcomes would have been encouraging to readers.

In France, many medieval writers and preachers made use of Marian miracle tales. Three who stand out are Jacques de Vitry, Gautier de Coinci, and the minstrel Rutebeuf. The most artistically interesting collection to appear was Les Miracles de Notre Dame (Miracles of Our Lady), composed by the French monk Gautier de Coinci, whose elegant imagery is at times strongly sensual. A master of the conventions of amour courtois (courtly love), Gautier becomes a kind of troubadour, singing of his lady-love. Such writing is made possible by a sense of decorum that is particular to Gautier rather than generally the rule. It would be alien to the sensibilities of both Jacques de Vitry, the great preacher of thirteenth-century France, and the minstrel Rutebeuf. De Vitry's Marian exempla in his sermons invariably present Mary as a model of propriety and orthodoxy, and a popular entertainer such as Rutebeuf would have been in grave personal peril had he presented to a typical audience any but the most pious and commonly accepted attributes of the protagonists of the faith.

There were also theatrical representations of Mary in the commonly performed cycles of medieval mystery plays in England, and recent scholarship indicates that there may even have been an independent cycle of Mary plays early on, some of which were later grafted onto the English liturgical drama. These dramatic representations tended to stress the Virgin's role as miracle worker somewhat less while favoring her role as the Biblical Mary in well-known instances such as the Annunciation, Joseph's doubts, her acceptance of God's will, the flight into Egypt, the Nativity, her heart-wrenching witnessing of the Crucifixion, and her death and Assumption into heaven.

Psychological Analyses

The fact that the Virgin Mary in literature, especially in her role as intercessory miracle worker, appears most predominantly (although certainly not exclusively) in the Latin world has led some twentieth-century critics, basing their work on Freudian paradigms, to explore a possible relationship between this literature and Latin attitudes toward sex and gender relationships, especially the mother-son relationship. Some feminist critics have studied Mary's role in literature and Church preaching in terms of the Church's repressive attitudes toward women, while other critics see a more nearly traditional Mary and point to the fact that it is also possible to view Mary in literature and sermon as a "mother," representative not only of the "female" but also of the "feminine," a human characteristic that can be possessed by men as well as women.

The Broadest View

The Virgin Mary in literature is perhaps most simply (and least contentiously) viewed as a miracle-working saint with a unique connection to the Godhead, whose acts speak of love and grace in a time of anger and fear. If the real Mary's scriptural base is narrow, her attractiveness as a literary figure is both broad and deep, and this has contributed significantly to her enormous popularity within the Christian world.

DAVID A. FLORY

References and Further Reading

- Astell, Ann W. "Feminism, Deconstructing Hierarchies, and Marian Coronation." In Divine Representations: Postmodernism and Spirituality, edited by Ann W. Astell. New York: Paulist Press, 1994.
- Berceo, Gonzalo de. Miracles of Our Lady, translated and edited by Richard Terry Mount and Annette Grant Cash. Studies in Romance Languages, No. 41. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1997.
- Bynum, Caroline Walker. Jesus as Mother: Studies in the Spirituality of the High Middle Ages. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1982.
- Carroll, Michael B. The Cult of the Virgin Mary. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1986.
- Flory, David A. Marian Representations in the Miracle Tales of Thirteenth-Century Spain and France. Washington, D.C.: The Catholic University of America Press, 2000.
- Pelikan, Jaroslav. Mary through the Centuries. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1996.
- Scarborough, Connie L. Women in Thirteenth Century Spain as Portrayed in Alfonso X's Cantigas de Santa Maria. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 1993.
- Shoemaker, Stephen. Ancient Traditions of the Virgin Mary's Dormition and Assumption. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2003.
- Warner, Marina. Alone of All Her Sex: The Myth and the Cult of the Virgin Mary. London: Picador, 1990.

See also Exemplum; Hagiography; Hagiography, Iconographic Aspects of; Intercession; Mary, Virgin; Mary, Virgin: in Art; Mary, Virgin: in Music; Miracles and Miracle Collections; Sermons and Preaching

MARY, VIRGIN: IN MUSIC

Mary is represented in medieval secular monophonic song primarily as the Blessed Mother and as mediatrix between God and the troubled faithful. Two important large collections are Las Cantigas de Santa Maria, attributed to Alfonso el Sabio, and Les Miracles de Notre Dame, by the trouvère Gautier de Coinci.

The Western medieval liturgy was intended to be sung, mostly in Latin, by clerics, monks, or nuns. Mary's mention in the gospels, especially at Advent, Christmas, and Passiontide, was reflected in the liturgy from the earliest times. Most early surviving texts and musical compositions setting them are anonymous. Hildegard of Bingen, however, has left us antiphons honoring Mary, in comparison to Eve, under her name. The Magnificat (Song of Mary) became the concluding canticle of Vespers in the daily monastic offices.

As devotion to Mary increased, especially from the twelfth century onward, multiple feasts in her honor were added to the calendar, each with its mass and office. Votive masses celebrated on Saturdays might be sung. Major late medieval composers have left us extended polyphonic compositions in Mary's honor. One of the best known is Guillaume de Machaut's Messe de Notre Dame, intended for the Cathedral of Reims. Metrical hymns in Mary's honor were composed to be sung at the end of compline in the Divine Office. The most important are Alma redemptoris mater (Advent to Purification), Ave regina caelorum (Purification to Holy Thursday), Regina caeli (Easter-tide to Trinity), and Salve regina, which remains the most popular (the rest of the Year). Liturgical sequences, extended poetic compositions intended to be sung at festal masses, include Stabat mater, which commemorated in sung verses Mary's presence at the foot of the Cross. This tradition is associated with the planctus Mariae, the lament sung by the desolate mother in many liturgical plays. (This text also was translated into French.)

In her dual position as mother and mediatrix, Mary was seen as a uniquely accessible figure who could be addressed in special ways. For example, the motet Virgo dulcis atque pia asks the Virgin to play upon her trumpet to warn sleeping sinners, as she is "the 'trumpet' of her son."

In England, in particular, the designation or construction of special areas within the nave, called Lady Chapels, encouraged the composition of masses (called Lady Masses), as well as new poems and new music, both in chant and in polyphony. The texts of the newer polyphonic motets were often settings of passages in the Song of Songs, such as "Thou art most beautiful" (Tota pulchra es), for the feast of Mary's Conception. By the fifteenth century, the English manner of composing these new Marian motets, using cantilena melodic style and richer harmonies, became the foundation of a new "international" style that was the precursor of the sacred vocal music of the Renaissance. The most important example of this fundamental influence is the last of three settings of Ave regina caelorum (Hail, Queen of the Heavens), by Guillaume Dufay. Dufay also used the cantilena style to set Vergene bella, the first stanza of Petrarch's prayer to the Virgin.

A much simpler devotion was the Angelus, the practice of reciting the words of the angel Gabriel's salutation, Hail Mary (Ave Maria), when church bells were heard ringing. Medieval carols also commemorated Mary's maternal role, sometimes, as in the Coventry Carol, drawing upon legend to fill gaps left by the gospels in the Nativity story.

Mary had a deep-rooted place in the liturgy, and the music in her honor necessarily proliferated. Every aspect of her cult, from Conception to Assumption, was celebrated in song. Every style is represented in this repertoire, sung by both women and men.

VIVIAN RAMALINGAM

References and Further Reading

- Bloxam, M. Jennifer. "Plainsong and Polyphony for the Blessed Virgin: Notes on Two Masses by Jacob Obrecht." Journal of Musicology 12.1 (1994): 51–75.
- Cumming, Julie E. The Motet in the Age of Du Fay. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1999.
- Fallows, David. Dufay. Revised Edition. London: J. M. Dent & Sons, Ltd., 1987.
- Flisfisich, Mar'a Isabel. "The Eve-Mary Dichotomy in the 'Symphonia' of Hildegard of Bingen." In The Voice of Silence: Women's Literacy in a Men's Church, edited by Thérèse de Hemptinne and María Eugenia Góngora. Medieval Church Studies, 9. Turnhout: Brepols, 2004, pp. 37–46.
- Hoppin, Richard. Medieval Music. New York: W. W. Norton, 1978.
- Hughes, Andrew. Medieval Music: The Sixth Liberal Art. Revised Edition. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1980.
- Leech-Wilkinson, Daniel. "Le Voir dit and La Messe de Nostre Dame: Aspects of Genre and Style in Late Works of Machaut." Plainsong and Mediaeval Music (formerly Journal of the Plainsong and Mediaeval Music Society) 2.1 (1993): 43–73.
- O'Gorman, Richard. "The Stabat mater in Middle French Verse: An Edition of Paris, Bibliothèque nationale, fr 24865." Franciscan Studies 52 (1992): 191–201.
- Ramalingam, Vivian S. "The trumpetum in Strasbourg M222 C22." In La Musique et le rite, sacré et profane, edited by Marc Honegger and Paul Prevost. Volume 2: Communications libres. Strasbourg: Association des Publications près les Universités de Strasbourg, 1986, pp. 143–160.
- Robertson, Anne Walters. "Remembering the Annunciation in Medieval Polyphony." Speculum 70 (1995): 275–304.
- Selner, John C. "Our Lady in Music." In Mariology, edited by Juniper B. Carol, Volume 3. Milwaukee: Bruce Publishing Company, 1961, pp. 398–411.
- Sloyan, Gerard S. "Marian Prayers." In Mariology, edited by Juniper B. Carol, O. F. M. Volume III. Milwaukee: Bruce Publishing Company, 1961, pp. 64–87.

See also Hildegard of Bingen; Immaculate Conception, Doctrine of; Mary, Virgin; Nuns as Musicians; Petrarch

MASCULINITY

See Femininity and Masculinity

MATHILDA AND THE MONASTERY AT ESSEN

Mathilda (c. 949–1011), granddaughter of Emperor Otto I (r. 936–973) and his first wife, Edith of the West Saxons, was the first great abbess of the monastery at Essen. Although documentation of the monastery's founding is murky, most scholars agree that the community was founded somewhere between 850 and 860 by Altfrid, bishop of Hildesheim, on his own property, and was dedicated to Sts. Damian and Cosmas, as well as the Virgin Mary. Its first abbess was Gersuit, probably a relative of Altfrid. By the time Mathilda became abbess (c. 971), Essen had already amassed impressive manuscript holdings and probably had already developed its own scriptorium. Although no female-authored text is known to have come from Essen, manuscript holdings suggest a high level of Latin, as well as vernacular, literacy, with a strong emphasis on artistic, musical, and intellectual pursuits. Sumptuous sacramentaries also suggest a high level of piety, as well as monastic wealth. One noteworthy manuscript is Düsseldorf B.3, a compilation of scripture, exegetical commentary, and hagiography, probably compiled and written at the monastery. Most likely a schoolbook, the manuscript contains on a flyleaf a note from a novice to her superior asking permission to hold vigil with another nun, promising in exchange to be diligent in both studies and devotions through the night.

Mathilda was a powerful, politically engaged abbess, emulating her cousins, Abbess Gerberga II of Gandersheim (ruled 959–1001) and Abbess Mathilda of Quedlinburg (ruled 966–999). Though these communities seem to have been in steep competition for royal attention, charter evidence suggests that Otto III considered Essen a peer of Gandersheim and Quedlinburg. During her reign, Mathilda of Essen made considerable acquisitions of relics, properties, manuscripts, and rich devotional artworks. Among these are some of the community's most precious items: the Essen Madonna; a ceremonial sword; and a highly ornate processional cross. All of these items are the earliest surviving examples of their respective forms; all are made of gold, suggesting great wealth and at least a pretense to great power.

Among her manuscript acquisitions is the chronicle authored by her Anglo-Saxon relative, Æthelweard, most likely the powerful ealdorman who served the English king Æthelred the Unready (fl. 973–998). Probably commissioned by her, the Chronicle is essentially a Latin translation of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle (though it cannot be confidently connected to any extant version of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle) and tells the story of their common English ancestors up until the death of King Edgar in 975. The commissioning of the Chronicle by Mathilda is consonant with women's interests in history during the Ottonian period: Hrotsvit of Gandersheim wrote two historical epics for Abbess Gerberga; Widukind of Corvey wrote a history of the Saxons for Mathilda of Quedlinburg; in addition, one of her nuns wrote the Annales Quedlinburgenses at her request. The chronicle commissioned by Mathilda of Essen stands apart in that it memorializes Mathilda's Anglo-Saxon rather than Saxon line. She may have wanted to pay homage to her illustrious grandmother, Edith; she may also have wanted to set Essen and herself apart from her abbatial rivals.

HELENE SCHECK

References and Further Reading

- Bodarwé, Katrinette. "Roman Martyrs and Their Veneration in Ottonian Saxony: The Case of the Sanctimoniales of Essen." Early Medieval Europe 9.3 (2000): 345–365.
- Campbell, A., ed. The Chronicle of Æthelweard. London: Thomas Nelson and Sons, Ltd., 1962.
- McKitterick, Rosamond. Books, Scribes and Learning in the Frankish Kingdoms, 6th–9th Centuries. Aldershot: Variorum, 1994.
- Mecham, June. "Essen." Matrix Monasticon. <http://monasticmatrix.org/monasticon>. Accessed 7 March 2006.
- Stofferahn, Steven A. "Changing Views of Carolingian Women's Literary Culture: The Evidence from Essen." Early Medieval Europe 8.1 (1999): 69–97.
- Van Houts, Elizabeth. "Women and the Writing of History in the Early Middle Ages: The Case of Abbess Matilda of Essen and Æthelweard." Early Medieval Europe 1.1 (1992): 53–68.

See also Abbesses; Hrotsvit of Gandersheim; Literacy and Reading: Latin; Monasticism and Nuns; Patronage, Literary; Translation

MATILDA OF TUSCANY

Matilda of Tuscany (1046–1115) ruled over a vast territory in northern Italy and played a major role in the Investiture Controversy, supporting Pope Gregory VII and his reform party in their struggle against the German Emperor Henry IV. She was the sole surviving child of Boniface of Canossa and Beatrix, daughter of Frederick II of Lorraine. After Boniface's death in 1052, Beatrix married her cousin Godfrey the Bearded of Lorraine, a close kinsman of several contemporary reform popes. Just before her stepfather's death in 1069, the young Matilda married his son, Godfrey the Hunchback. Matilda left him after only two years in his duchy of Lorraine, refusing all efforts at reconciliation. She returned to her mother in Italy and began to share the duties of the ducal office. As tensions grew between pope and emperor over who had the right to appoint bishops, the ladies of Canossa attempted to mediate. In 1076, the unsolved murder of her estranged husband left Matilda a widow, while her mother's death left her sole ruler of Tuscany. The following year Matilda hosted the famous reconciliation between Henry IV and Gregory VII at her own stronghold in Canossa.

The peace was short-lived. When mediation failed, Matilda sided unwaveringly with Pope Gregory. In 1081 the emperor marched into Italy and declared Matilda's lands forfeit. For nearly two decades Matilda struggled against imperial forces and occasionally her own rebellious subjects to regain and hold her lands. Her court became a refuge for exiled Gregorian bishops, including Anselm of Lucca, who became Matilda's chief spiritual advisor. After many defeats, a victory in 1084 helped her gradually to win back her towns, although she never regained her full domain. Aside from a brief and mutually unsatisfactory second marriage to Welf, teenage son of the duke of Bavaria, the last decades of Matilda's rule were less turbulent. In 1111 she officially reconciled with the new emperor, Henry V. Matilda died in 1115 at the age of sixty-nine, leaving generations of emperors and popes to fight over the right to her vast fortunes.

Matilda's rule was not an unmitigated success. Her domain was considerably smaller at her death than at her accession. She alienated many of her barons, in part through her support for the Pataria, a populist religious reform movement. Although she was in part responsible for the successes of the Gregorian faction, she did not so much defeat her enemies as outlast them. Nevertheless, she retained in a strong if diminished position for nearly forty years. Her influence was widely felt, from the election of popes to the dissemination of Gregorian political propaganda to the movements of the emperor's armies.

Matilda is a particularly remarkable figure in women's history. At a time when most powerful women achieved their status through marriage, Matilda ruled over an inherited domain in her own right and managed to keep it out of the hands of both of her husbands. That she was able to extricate herself relatively painlessly from both marriages, though inviting the enmity of two powerful ducal houses in the process, points to the strength of her position. All evidence suggests that Matilda ruled with the same authority as her male counterparts, holding law courts, settling disputes, and levying armies. She took an active role in her military campaigns, and some contemporary sources claim that she led her own armies into battle.

In spite of her worldly accomplishments, Matilda nourished a life-long yearning for the religious life. The duties of marriage followed by the weighty responsibilities of rulership prevented her from realizing her desire. She accepted that she was needed in the secular world, fighting the "heretics and schismatics." This tension between the active and contemplative life, one longed for, the other undertaken out of duty, characterizes many contemporary portrayals of the countess. She strove to reconcile a life of pious spirituality with a life of leadership and warfare, making her a perfect heroine for a reform movement that was rooted in monastic ideals but condoned bloodshed on behalf of the Church.

Matilda may have embraced this role as champion of the Church and “daughter of St. Peter” (symbol of the papacy) in part for the special legitimacy it conferred upon her, for the extent of her power and influence was largely unprecedented for women of her era. Her sex does not seem to have impeded her exercise of authority, yet she must have felt some uncertainty about her official position, as expressed in her subscription on official documents: “Matilda, by the grace of God, whatever I am.”

ROSALIND JAEGER REYNOLDS

References and Further Reading

- Donizo of Canossa. Vita Mathildis celeberrimae principis Italiae carmine scripta a Donizone presbytero qui in arce canusina vixit, edited by Luigi Simeoni. Bologna: N. Zanichelli, 1940.
- Duff, Nora. Matilda of Tuscany, la gran donna d'Italia. London: Methuen & Company, 1909.
- Ghirardini, Lino Lionello. Storia critica di Matilde di Canossa: Problemi (e misteri) della piu' grande donna della storia d'Italia. Modena: Aedes Muratoriana, 1989.
- Goez, Elke and Werner Goez, eds. Die Urkunden und Briefe der Markgräfin Mathilde von Tuszien. Hannover: Hahnsche Buchhandlung, 1998.
- Goez, Werner. “Markgräfin Mathilde von Canossa.” In Lebensbilder aus dem Mittelalter: Die Zeit der Ottonen, Salier und Staufer. Darmstadt: Primus, 1998, pp. 233–254.
- Overmann, Alfred. Gräfin Mathilde von Tuszien: Ihre Besitzungen. Geschichte ihres Gutes von 1115–1230 und ihre Regesten. Innsbruck: Verlag der Wagner'schen Universitäts-Buchhandlung, 1895.
- Reynolds, Rosalind Jaeger. “Reading Matilda: The Self-Fashioning of a Duchess.” Essays in Medieval Studies 19 (2002): 1–13.
- Studi matildici: atti e memorie del III Convegno di studi matildici, Reggio-Emilia, 7-8-9 ottobre 1977*. Modena: Aedes Muratoriana, 1978.

See also Diplomacy and Reconciliation; Heiresses; Italy; Landholding and Property Rights; Noble Women; Patronage, Ecclesiastical; Virile Women; Warfare

MATILDA THE EMPRESS

One of two children of King Henry I of England and his queen Matilda of Scotland, Matilda (d. 1167) was born on or about February 7, 1102, and early betrothed to the German emperor Henry V. She was sent to Germany in 1110 to be educated and was married in 1114. Although she had no child, she ably carried out other duties associated with the role of empress. She returned to England when she was widowed in 1125. Since her brother had drowned in the wreck of the White Ship, Matilda was now her father's heir. After requiring the bishops and magnates to swear to support her claims to the throne, Henry betrothed Matilda to Geoffrey, heir to the county of Anjou. This marriage was not harmonious, but Matilda and Geoffrey learned to work together to secure their three sons' inheritance. When Henry I died in 1135, his nephew, Stephen of Blois, seized the throne. Matilda landed in England in 1139 determined to recapture the kingdom. Despite some early success, Matilda was never crowned queen. She was unable to secure the loyalty of the London barons, and Stephen's queen, also named Matilda, led an effective opposition. After 1142 she began to fight on behalf of her son Henry's right to succeed Stephen, a goal that was secured in 1152, when Henry was named Stephen's heir. He succeeded two years later. Matilda assisted her son during the early years of his reign, carrying out duties such as negotiating with the king of France on Henry's behalf. She made numerous gifts to ecclesiastical institutions, particularly favoring the Cluniacs and Cistercians. Her last years were spent at the Norman monastery of Le Bec. Matilda was unable to reign, but she established a precedent for inheritance of the English throne through royal women.

LOIS L. HUNEYCUTT

References and Further Reading

- Chibnall, Marjorie. The Empress Matilda. Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1991.
- . “The Charters of the Empress Matilda.” In Law and Government in Medieval England and Normandy, edited by George Garnett and John Hudson. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994, pp. 276–296.
- . “The Empress Matilda and Her Sons.” In Medieval Mothering, edited by John Carmi Parsons and Bonnie Wheeler. New York: Garland Publishing, 1996, pp. 279–294.
- Truax, Jean A. “Winning over the Londoners: King Stephen, the Empress Matilda, and the Politics of Personality.” Haskins Society Journal 8 (1996): 43–61.

See also England; Queens and Empresses: The West; Succession, Royal and Noble

MEAD-GIVER

Mead was the drink of prestige in Germanic and Celtic heroic societies and was often poetically linked to the concept of lordship, in that the leader who provided it to his followers was called a “mead-giver.” The rich drink was a symbol of community and quasi-contractual joining, since warriors who consumed it were bound to repay the gift with dedicated military service. Hence the cheering flow of mead in the hall may be compared to the bitter flow of blood on the battlefield. On ceremonial occasions, it was the lord's wife or consort who actually distributed the liquor in a single cup that was shared by all. She followed a strict order of precedence, with the lord served first and each man thereafter served according to rank. Medieval literature contains numerous examples of the pattern in whole or part; examples include Wealhtheow in Beowulf, Sif in Lokasenna, and Étaín in Tochmarc Étaíne. The woman bearing the cup was thus seen to possess a peculiar connection to the establishment of rank and to the public recognition of honor, an association otherwise furthered by the bridal presentation of a cup of liquor in rituals of marriage (which also creates a bond that joins families). Such cup offerings may also be reflected archaeologically in certain types of vessels and artistic depictions, such as those on Viking Age picture stones from Gotland showing a female figure bearing a cup or drinking horn.

MICHAEL J. ENRIGHT

References and Further Reading

- Enright, Michael J. Lady with a Mead Cup. Dublin: Four Courts Press, 1996.
- Haycock, Marged. Drink in Medieval Welsh Poetry. H. M. Chadwick Memorial Lectures 10. Cambridge: Department of Anglo-Saxon, Norse, and Celtic, 2000.
- Jarman, A. O. H. Aneirin: Y Gododdin. Llandysul: Gomer Press, 1990.
- Klaeber, L.C. Frederick, ed. Beowulf and the Fight at Finnsburg. Boston: D. C. Heath, 1950.

See also Alewives and Brewing; Beowulf; Literature, Old English; Literature, Old Norse

MECHTHILD OF HACKEBORN

Mechthild of Hackeborn (c. 1240–1298/1299) (not to be confounded with the Beguine Mechthild of Magdeburg) was the younger sister of the abbess of Helfta, Gertrude of Hackeborn. She was born at the castle of Helfta, near Eisleben, Saxony, into a Thuringian noble family, and died in the Cistercian monastery of Helfta.

Mechthild entered the monastery in 1247/1248 and was educated to function as the chantress of the house, a teacher for the young girls, and a spiritual guide for the younger nuns. In 1261 she received a five-year-old girl as her pupil who would become the author and theologian Gertrude the Great.

From about 1290 Mechthild dictated her work, Liber specialis gratiae (Book of Special Grace) to two unnamed nuns from the Helfta community, one of whom was probably Gertrude the Great. It consists of seven parts: the feasts of the liturgical year, revelations on the Christological mysteries, and revelations on Mary and the saints (I); special gifts of grace (II); instructions on praise of God (III); consolation and instructions for the community (IV); visions of diseased persons (V); life and death of abbess Gertrude of Hackeborn (VI); and Mechthild's final days, her death, and her merits (VII).

Trinitarian in emphasis, the nerve system of Mechthild's work is a love theology centred on the loving hearts of God and Jesus, reflecting an optimism about salvation due to Christ's passion. It is formulated as a conversation with God in gender-crossing language. The Liber was widely reproduced until the sixteenth century, in Flemish, English, Swedish, German, and Italian.

ELSE MARIE WIBERG PEDERSEN

References and Further Reading

- Bynum, Caroline Walker. "Women Mystics in the Thirteenth Century: The Case of the Nuns of Helfta." In Jesus as Mother: Studies in the Spirituality of the High Middle Ages. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1987, pp. 170–262.
- Finnegan, Mary Jeremy. The Women of Helfta: Scholars and Mystics. Athens, Ga. and London: University of Georgia Press, 1991.
- Haligan, Theresa A. The Booke of Gostlye Grace of Mechthild of Hackeborn. Toronto: PIMS, 1979.
- Liber Specialis gratiae*. In Revelationes Gertrudiana ac Mechthildiana. Vol. 2: S. Mechthildis virginis s. Benedicti Liber specialis gratiae, edited by the Benedictine Fathers of Solesmes. Paris: H. Oudin, 1877.
- Mechthild of Hackeborn. Livre de la Grace Spéciale. Revelations De Sainte Mechthilde, translated by the Benedictine Fathers of Solesmes and edited by the H. Oudin Brothers. Paris: H. Oudin, 1878.
- Spitzlei, Sabine. Erfahrungsraum Herz. Zur Mystik des Zisterzienserklosters Helfta im 13. Jahrhundert. In Mystik in Geschichte und Gegenwart. Texte und Untersuchungen 9. Stuttgart-Bad Cannstatt: Friedrich Frommann Verlag, 1991.

See also Devotional Literature; Gertrude of Hackeborn; Gertrude the Great; Mechthild of Magdeburg

MECHTHILD OF MAGDEBURG

Like many medieval women writers, Mechthild's life is known from references or allusions to herself or to historical events in her writings. Scholars have grown suspicious of these particulars over the years, but most of them still accept the following account. Mechthild's birth is set between 1207 and 1210 and her death in 1282. In her book, Das fließende Licht der Gottheit (The Flowing Light of the Godhead), she tells us that she experienced her first divine “greeting”—her term for her consciousness of the presence of God—when she was twelve years old. When she was in her twenties, she left home and went to a nearby city (Magdeburg), where she took up the life of a Beguine (a woman devoted to a religious life, but who did not take the vows of a religious order) and where she claims to have known only one person. In 1250, at the urging of her confessor (perhaps the sole friend), she began to write down her revelations of God, and she continued writing until her death. She spent her final years (c. 1270–1282) in the convent of Helfta, where she lived among younger gifted mystics (Gertrude the Great and Mechthild of Hackeborn). In Helfta, she wrote the last section of her book with the help of her sisters, because of her failing eyesight.

The Flowing Light is noteworthy for being the first set of mystical revelations to be composed in German, and it is now recognized by literary scholars as an extraordinary piece of literature. Divided into seven “books,” each of which contains between twenty-five and fifty chapters of varying length, The Flowing Light offers the reader a compendium of richly poetic dialogues between the soul and God and other allegorical figures, narratives of visions, poems of divine praise, instructions for good religious men and women, vivid visions of heaven and hell, and biting critiques of religious corruption. Readers will note the influence of the biblical Psalms (the first and sometimes only book of the Bible that medieval individuals read), the Song of Songs (translated and commented upon in German already in the twelfth century), and German courtly poetry of the day (Minnesang). Yet Mechthild’s writing is compelling and original precisely in its blend of these influences to form a new style of poetic German prose. That is, her prose is made rich with internal rhymes (the German term is Kolonreim) that give the text a strikingly lyrical and aesthetically enchanting quality. Describing divine love, Mechthild writes (rhymed words emphasized): Min licham ist an langer qwale, min sele ist an hoher wunne, wan si hat beschovet unde mit armen umbevangen iren lieben alzemale (I, 5: 1–2; My body is in eternal torment, my soul is in lofty rapture, for she has seen and embraced her lover in her arms all at once). We might expect poetry to appear in descriptions of the soul and God as lovers, but even when expressing doubt about her undertaking, Mechthild cannot help but rhyme: Nu muos ich doch dise rede betwungen schriben, die ich gerne woelte verswigen, wan ich voerhte vil sere den heimlich swank der italen ere (V, 32: 2–3; Now I feel compelled to write this speech, which I would otherwise gladly keep to myself, for I very much fear the stealthy blow of vain honor). Mechthild’s achievement in this style is unmatched in other devotional writing.

Also striking in the text is the strong voice of its author, which grows more confident and authoritative as the book progresses. Indeed, Mechthild’s authorship is considered to be one of the book’s central themes. Yet the relationship between the historical woman and her book as it has survived raises questions about her authorship. The Flowing Light survives in two translations: one into Middle High German and one into Latin. The presumed Middle Low German original has been lost (High and Low refer to southern and northern Germany, respectively). Of the translations, the Latin translates only the first six books and has been reordered and edited. In addition, the surviving manuscripts of both translations have been edited and recopied by numerous hands since Mechthild’s original composition. To what extent, some ask, can we attribute The Flowing Light to the Beguine of Magdeburg alone? Some scholars have also argued that much of what Mechthild writes about herself is attributable more to the genre of devotional and hagiographical literature to which her book belongs than to a historical reality. Regardless of one’s position on these issues, however, the book is worthy of careful reading, for its literary and theological achievements are beyond question.

SARA S. POOR

References and Further Reading

- Andersen, Elizabeth A. The Voices of Mechthild of Magdeburg. New York: Peter Lang, 2000.
- Mechthild von Magdeburg. Das fließende Licht der Gottheit: Nach der Einsiedler Handschrift in kritischem Vergleich mit der gesamten Überlieferung, edited by Hans Neumann, prepared for print by Gisela Vollmann-Profe. 2 Vols. München: Artemis, 1990 and 1993.
- . The Flowing Light of the Godhead, translated by Frank Tobin. New York: Paulist Press, 1998.
- Peters, Ursula. Religiöse Erfahrung als literarisches Faktum: Zur Vorgeschichte und Genese frauenmystischer Texte des 13. und 14. Jahrhunderts. Religious Experience as Literary Fact: On the Pre-History and Genesis of Women’s Mystical Texts in the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Centuries. Tübingen: Niemeyer, 1988.
- Poor, Sara S. Mechthild of Magdeburg and Her Book: Gender and the Making of Textual Authority. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2004.
- Tobin, Frank. Mechthild von Magdeburg: A Medieval Mystic in Modern Eyes. Columbia, S.C.: Camden House, 1995.

See also Beguines; Courtly Love; Devotional Literature; Dominican Order; Gertrude of Hackeborn; Gertrude the Great; Literature, German; Mechthild of Hackeborn; Minnesang; Mysticism and Mystics; Mystics’ Writings; Women Authors: German Texts

MEDICINE

Medieval medical thought and practice were as varied as medieval politics, religion, literature, or art. No single brief essay can summarize how people throughout the Christian, Muslim, and Jewish worlds wrestled with concerns about sickness, debility, and pain, nor how ideas about the female body were elaborated in various times and places. A few words may be helpful, however, to explain how medicine in medieval societies was gendered, permeated with ideas about the relative value of men and women and their proper roles within society.

At a certain level, the medical traditions of medieval Christians, Muslims, and Jews did not differ greatly because all derived, to a large extent, from the common background of Greco-Roman medicine. Thus, in terms of their theories of the qualities (hot, cold, wet, dry) and the humors (blood, phlegm, yellow bile, and black bile), and in their beliefs about therapeutic interventions (principally based on the need to restore the “balance” of the bodily complexion), there was a common core of belief. All three societies developed learned traditions of medicine that, to the extent that they were book-based, tended to be gendered masculine. Women were nearly universally excluded from these learned traditions, but we nevertheless find them populating other kinds of medical practice throughout all three cultures, from helping their friends and neighbors in childbirth to serving as nursing sisters in hospitals or working as surgeons alongside their husbands.

Medicine was no doubt gendered in other ways we can only guess at now. Were certain kinds of medical practices (say, reliance on healing shrines or use of charms) used more by women than by men? Were women more apt to resign themselves to physical pain than men, giving themselves up to Christ-like suffering rather than seeking out a physical cure? How did ideas of demonic possession in women relate to formal medical ideas of mental disease? Were women really the chief providers of medical care within the household or were these duties assumed by men? Did women develop their own traditions of empirical medical knowledge that they passed on to each other but rarely revealed to men? How do women’s historically documented medical practices relate to depictions in literature or art?

These are all large and important questions, and most have not yet been explored in any systematic way. The few comprehensive studies that have been done suggest that there are no easy generalizations. Research on the audiences of gynecological literature, for example, have shown that women had no monopoly over the field most intimately concerned with their own bodies. Studies of women’s medical reading show that, despite dramatically rising literacy rates among women in the later Middle Ages, medical reading among the laity continued generally to be gendered male. Studies of childbirth rituals show some contestation between women and men for the power to establish meaning over the event. All these studies show the importance of asking these questions and of continuing to explore this most vital aspect of medieval life.

MONICA H. GREEN

References and Further Reading

- Green, Monica H., ed. “Masses in Remembrance of ‘Seynt Susanne’: A Fifteenth-Century Spiritual Regimen.” Notes & Queries 50.4 (2003): 380–384.
- . “Bodies, Gender, Health, Disease: Recent Work on Medieval Women’s Medicine.” Studies in Medieval and Renaissance History 3rd series, 1 (2005): 1–46.
- . “History of Science.” Encyclopedia of Women and Islamic Cultures. Volume I: Methodologies, Paradigms and Sources, edited by Suad Joseph. Leiden: Brill, 2003, pp. 358–361.
- . Women’s Healthcare in the Medieval West: Texts and Contexts. Aldershot: Ashgate, 2000.
- Park, Katharine. “Medicine and Society in Medieval Europe, 500–1500.” In Medicine in Society: Historical Essays, edited by Andrew Wear. Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1992, pp. 59–90.

See also Abortion; Caesarean Section; Contraception; Cosmetics; Demography; Doctors and Healers; Gynecology; Hildegard of Bingen; Hospitals; Infertility; Lepers; Lovesickness; Madness; Magic and Charms; Menstruation; Midwives; Plague; Secrets of Women; Sexuality; Spirits; Discernment of and Possession by; Trota of Salerno

MEDITATION

The distinctive traditional practice of religious meditation in the West has its sources in Greco-Roman philosophy, ancient rhetorical education, and the sectarian communal customs of ancient Judaism, entailing procedures, postures, and practices that were adapted together from the start within Christianity. Few writers of the Middle Ages differentiated meditation from contemplation, viewing them as stages in a seamlessly joined activity of prayerful reading. It is proper to speak of Christian meditation as an orthopraxis, a set of experiences and techniques conceived together as offering a “way” to be followed by a devotee, leading each seeker to relive the path of enlightenment. Christian meditation began with texts, but their explication was not its main goal (as it was, for example, in university lectures). Rather, meditation seeks a whole experience, relying on patterns of oral formulae and ritualized behavior to prepare for an experience of God.

Meditation is the art of thinking, understood in this context as making thoughts about God. Instead of emptying one's mind, in meditation a Christian was to concentrate "mindfully" upon matters derived from Scripture, sermons and other meditations, the exemplary lives of saints, and (as appropriate) sacred art and chant. Christian meditation was the most creative and most focused of the various activities involved in reading. The essence of meditational reading is captured by the twelfth-century canon Hugh (d. 1141), of the Parisian convent of St. Victor, who wrote that meditation is free of reading's rules, and delights to range along open ground, where it fixes its free gaze upon the contemplation of truth, drawing together now these [matters], now those.... This especially it is which takes the soul away from the noise of earthly business.... in meditation is to be found the greatest delight. (Didascalicon III. 10)

In ancient rhetorical training, meditation (Latin meditatio) was the word used for the initial creative stage in the process of composing a work. Though speeches in the forum or law courts were to be delivered ex tempore rather than wholly written out and delivered verbatim by rote, no one should approach the task of speaking without careful prior preparation. One began by meditating upon what one was going to say, consulting the (ideally) well-stocked inventory of one's learning for quotes and examples, organizing the topics and materials of one's speech in a convincing and persuasive way, and rehearsing especially one's opening remarks. This task was, according to the first-century Roman educator Quintilian, best performed at night in silence, ruminating in a quiet murmur, and reclining upon a couch in one's private chamber.

Ancient philosophers cultivated a habit of meditation, as the Stoics, Epicureans, and others counseled a disciplined way of life wholly or in part away from the bustle of ordinary affairs as a means toward enlightenment and inner peace. This discipline included reading and meditation as well as learned conversation. The Meditations of the second-century emperor Marcus Aurelius is perhaps the work still most widely read that was produced by these ancient worldly philosophers. In ancient Judaism as well, sects such as the Essenes withdrew from the world into communities dedicated to a practice of physical and mental discipline, centered about meditation upon sacred texts. Many scholars believe that such sects and their practices deeply influenced the world of Jesus and the earliest Christians.

The ancient practice of meditation was modeled upon the chewing and digestion of food, as thoughtful reading was understood to nourish the mind and soul as food does the body. This traditional analogy, which has Biblical sanction, continued in common use throughout the Middle Ages. From the earliest times, both men and women practiced regular meditation. Thus, Melania the Younger (383–439), the scion of a distinguished Christian Roman family, took up a discipline of daily meditation as a young girl. Her grandmother, also called Melania (342–409), was a woman of considerable learning as well, confident enough to have irritated Jerome by siding against him in his quarrel with Rufinus over the validity of the hermeneutical methods of Origen. The younger Melania, according to her biographer, ate an ascetic diet comprised mainly of bread without oil, slept two hours a night, and nourished herself with the spiritual food of writing and reading. She had a settled program of reading the canonical books of Scripture and collections of homilies, and of writing out in little notebooks what she had read. Once she had finished the quantities she had set for herself, and was replete, she would then read the Lives of the Desert Fathers, "as though for dessert." Such chewing of texts was made physically literal by the murmur with which contemplatives recited the divine words. Though meditative reading was said to be done "in silence," accounts of the practice liken it to hearing a swarm of bees.

Meditation could rely also on both music and images, as these arts were closely allied to the sacred words. Certain chants, especially alleluias and others with complex melismas, could provide further occasions for community meditation during divine service. Meditative composition could also be helped by using images, including techniques of mental imaging. Meditation upon the Crucifixion, for example, focused in exacting sensory detail upon its image, either an actual artifact or a mentally reconstructed picture. In either case, the image served to organize the mental and emotional composition of the experience. Images also could serve as organizers of subjects to be covered in a sermon or colloquy. These mental structures can be simple—a tree, or a rose, or a ladder—or highly complex, including whole buildings constructed in imagination, such as the Biblical Ark or the ancient Temple compound.

MARY CARRUTHERS

References and Further Reading

Carruthers, Mary. The Craft of Thought: Meditation, Rhetoric, and the Making of Images, 400–1200. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998.

MEDITATION

- Clark, Elizabeth A., trans. The Life of St. Melania the Younger. Studies in Women and Religion 14. New York: Edwin Mellen Press, 1984.
- Dictionnaire de Spiritualité ascétique et mystique*, s. v. "Contemplation" and "Meditation." Paris: Beauchesne, 1937–1980.
- Hadot, Pierre. Philosophy as a Way of Life, edited by A. I. Davidson and translated by M. Chase. Oxford: Blackwell, 1995.
- Hausherr, Irenée. The Name of Jesus, translated by C. Cummings. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Cistercian Publications, 1978.
- Hugh of St. Victor. Didascalicon, translated by Jerome Taylor. New York: Columbia University Press, 1961.
- Jaye, Barbara, and M. Briscoe. Artes predicandi, artes orandi. Typologie des sources du moyen âge occidental, 61. Turnhout: Brepols, 1992.
- Leclercq, Jean. The Love of Learning and the Desire for God, translated by Catherine Misrahi. New York: Fordham University Press, 1961.
- Swartz, Michael D. Scholastic Magic: Ritual and Revelation in Early Jewish Mysticism. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1996.

See also Devotional Art; Devotional Practices; Lay Piety; Rosary; Spiritual Care

MÉLUSINE

At the very end of the fourteenth century, two versions of the legend of Mélusine were produced in France, the first, in prose, by Jean d'Arras (1392–1393), the second, in verse, and rather less interesting, by Coudrette (c. 1402). The story is intriguing: the beautiful Mélusine is the daughter of a king of Scotland and his fairy wife; because of a sin against her father (he himself has transgressed against their mother, and she and her sisters imprison him underground for life), she is condemned to turn into a serpent every Saturday. Count Raimondin, lord of Forez in Poitou, meets her sitting beside a fountain and falls passionately in love with her. She agrees to marry him, on condition that he will make no attempt to see her on Saturdays. Under her benign guidance, Forez prospers. Mélusine clears forests and sows fields, builds cities and castles, including notably the castle of Lusignan, and she gives birth to ten sons, many of whom are marked by strange signs, the result of their mixed heritage. Finally, however, one Saturday, Raimondin is overcome by curiosity and spies on his wife as she bathes; he is astounded to see that the lower part of her body takes the form of a snake. She realises his transgression when he calls her a serpent; she vanishes in the shape of a winged dragon, and will return periodically in that form—from that day to this—to keep watch over her sons, who meet various fates: some kings, of Cyprus and Luxemburg, some vicious tyrants. She also watches over her later descendants.

The burden of the story, as we now have it, has political ramifications: both writers were working under commission from the Lusignan family, whose name (Lusignan/Mélusine) they exalt. The Mélusine they celebrate is thus wonderfully fecund and a source of prosperity and family pride. She is the worthy ancestress of the noble Lusignans, one of whom, Guy, was to become king of Jerusalem (1186–1192)—and it is noticeable that both writers insist repeatedly on authenticity by using historical names and locations. Were both writers working from the same original? Was Coudrette adapting Jean? The question is unanswerable—but it is indisputable that the legend they both transmit did not originate in either of their imaginations. There are preexisting, far earlier, traces of the legend of a fairy bride whose body is not to be looked at, whose husband transgresses, and who immediately vanishes, and this tale-type has a rich folklore tradition in Brittany especially. The Lusignan family, in other words, in a manoeuvre not uncommon in the late Middle Ages, were mobilising an exotic tale to add glamour to their name and origins.

But the popularity the tale enjoyed, and enjoys, transcends local ambition: there is a very respectable tally of manuscripts and early editions, medieval and Renaissance translations into Spanish (Historia de la linda Melosina), English, German (by Thüring von Ringoltingen), and even Russian, and it has continued to fascinate musicians, artists, and novelists either directly or, as with A. S. Byatt's Possession, as a metaphor. That fascination centres on a number of aspects. First is Mélusine's hybridity, which allows her to engage medieval notions of demonology and genetics: her sons share their mother's ambiguities, epitomes of chivalry but also, except in two cases, disturbingly ambivalent (wall-eyed, big-nosed, birth-marked, three-eyed...). Mélusine, like them, is enigmatic, monstrous but also maternal, Christian but also dark and pagan. Secondly, however, we must recognise precisely the fascination of the astonishingly fecund and maternal Mélusine—a Mélusine who gives birth only to male children. Thirdly, we should note the way in which, in her human character, and until Raimondin's transgression, she makes Lusignan, and Poitou, outstandingly prosperous and fertile. In a famous article, in which they use her to explore late-medieval mentalities, Le Goff and Le Roy Ladurie call her défricheuse, the clearer of forests. Mélusine, met (as so often with fairies) beside a fountain, is the fairy godmother whose role is political—foundational, who bestows riches and honours on the human family to which she allies herself—but, like so many supernatural beings attempting to naturalise themselves into the human world, she cannot sustain the tensions her ambivalence causes. Finally, of course, there is the fascination precisely of Mélusine's hybridity: there is something stealthily erotic about the voyeuristic Raimondin peering through a little hole in the door at his wife's naked body, shading, grotesquely, into the snake's tail: the phallic overtones here have, predictably, inspired psychosexual analyses. Mélusine the hybrid is, appropriately, a being of multiple significances.

JANE TAYLOR

References and Further Reading

- d'Arras, Jean. Mélusine, edited by Louis Stouff. Dijon: Publications de l'Université de Dijon, 1932.
- . Le Roman de Mélusine, on L'histoire des Lusignan, translated by Michèle Perret. Paris: Editions Sotck, 1979. Modern French translation.
- Clier-Colombani F. La Fée Mélusine au Moyen Age: Images, Myths, Symbols. Paris: Le Léopard d'Or, 1991.
- Coudrette. Mélusine, edited by Eleanor Roach. Paris: Klincksieck, 1982.
- . Le Roman de Mélusine, translated by Laurence Harf-Lancner. Paris: Flammarion, 1993. Modern French translation.
- Harf-Lancner, Laurence. Les fées au Moyen Age; Morgane et Mélusine: La Naissance des fées. Paris: Champion, 1984.
- Le Goff, Jacques, and Emmanuel Le Roy Ladurie. "Mélusine maternelle et défricheuse." Annales: Economies, Sociétés, Civilisations 26 (1971): 587–622.
- Maddox, Donald, and Sara Sturm-Maddox, eds. Melusine of Lusignan: Founding Fiction in Late Medieval France. Athens, Ga. and London: The University of Georgia Press, 1996.

See also Genealogy; Literature, Old French; Supernatural Women

MENSTRUATION

Menstruation—what caused it, when it should begin, when it should end, whether it was beneficial or harmful—was a not-infrequent topic of debate in the Middle Ages. It was also not discussed in many contexts, leaving the historian to guess what significance this silence conveyed. Very little work has been done on attitudes or practices related to menstruation in medieval Muslim traditions, though recent work on Jewish, Byzantine, and Latin Christian traditions allows us to gain some understanding of both the positive and negative aspects of this physiological function.

In medieval Europe, attitudes toward menstruation largely depended on the social or intellectual context. The most explicit discussions of menstruation are found among medical writers. Here, menstruation is almost always treated neutrally, as a regular purgative process expected to happen more or less monthly between the ages of fourteen and about forty or fifty. The ages of both menarche and menopause (neither term was actually used in the Middle Ages) were usually repeated from one textual source to another; we cannot therefore put much reliance on them as accurate reflections of demographic realities. Nevertheless, a few authors offer unique observations. For example, John Mirfeld, a cleric writing in London in the late fourteenth century, observed that "in ancient times the menses did not begin to flow until the fifteenth or fourteenth year, or certainly not before age twelve. But now they begin in certain girls in the eleventh or in the tenth year. And at that point they are capable of conception."

Medical writers generally saw normal menstruation (regular in its frequency, duration, amount, and color) as the sine qua non of female health. Precisely because it was a purgation, not of the uterus alone but of the whole body, it needed to occur as regularly as any other bodily purgation. If it did not, the buildup of excess waste products could cause all manner of disease, from skin conditions to breast cancer, heart palpitations, uterine suffocation, and ultimately death. Excess menstruation was likewise a source of concern. It is little wonder, then, that menstrual difficulties are usually listed first among gynecological diseases in medical textbooks.

The association between the onset of menstruation and the beginning of fertility was expressed in the belief that no woman who was not menstruating regularly was capable of reproduction. The so-called Trotula, a popular compendium of works on women's medicine, articulated a widespread belief about menstruation: "The common people call the menses 'the flowers,' because just as trees do not bring forth fruit without flowers, so women without their flowers are cheated of the ability to conceive" (Trotula, p. 66). Emmenagogues (substances to provoke menstruation and thereby cleanse the womb) were frequently recommended as aids to fertility.

In nonmedical contexts, attitudes toward menstruation could be quite negative. The first-century Roman naturalist Pliny, reporting lore from his own society, created the standard litany of the menses' ill effects (they can kill crops, rust iron, drive dogs who eat them rabid, etc.), but he also itemized a variety of medical uses for them. The negative (more than the positive) views were later echoed by such late antique and early medieval writers as Solinus (third century) and the encyclopedist Isidore of Seville (d. 636). The most influential articulation of the Plinian tradition was The Secrets of Women, a later-thirteenth-century treatise falsely attributed to Albertus Magnus that elaborated on the vile nature of menstruation to a truly misogynous degree.

Religious attitudes were influenced by the verses in Leviticus 15, that litany of polluted states, regarding woman's "issue of blood" (verses 19–33). Among Jews, the tradition of avoidance of sexual intercourse during menstruation and the ritual cleansing in the mikvah afterwards were observed throughout the Middle Ages. In the Byzantine East, menstruating women were forbidden from coming in contact with any sacred spaces or objects. In the Latin West, however, Pope Gregory the Great challenged the practice of barring menstruating women (or women who had recently given birth) from church. By the twelfth century, this view was formally adopted with the argument that the Levitic prohibitions were part of the "old law" that Christ's coming had overthrown. Intercourse during menstruation was, nevertheless, still prohibited, and the view that menstruation was a sign of Eve's curse prompted debates as to whether the Virgin Mary herself (who was otherwise thought by many to be free of all taint of original sin) shared this female trait.

Beginning around 1300, there was debate as to whether Jewish men menstruated, in their case as punishment for their alleged role in the crucifixion of Christ. This belief (which persisted well into the early modern period) showed, as much as the earlier Plinian tradition, that whatever the neutral or even positive connotations women's "flowers" might have in medical contexts, the negative associations of menstruation were powerful enough to even disparage men.

MONICA H. GREEN

References and Further Reading

- Biller, Peter. "A 'Scientific' View of Jews from Paris Around 1300." Micrologus 9 (2001): 137–168.
- Green, Monica H., ed. and trans. The Trotula: An English Translation of the Medieval Compendium of Women's Medicine. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001.
- Green, Monica H. "Flowers, Poisons, and Men: Menstruation in Medieval Western Europe." In Menstruation: A Cultural History, edited by Andrew Shail and Gillian Howie. New York: Palgrave, 2005, pp. 51–64.
- Johnson, Willis. "The Myth of Jewish Male Menses." Journal of Medieval History 24 (1998): 273–295.
- Marienberg, Evyatar. "Le bain des Melunaises: les juifs médiévaux et l'eau froide des bains rituels." Médiévales: Langue, textes, histoire 43 (2002): 91–101.
- McCracken, Peggy. The Curse of Eve, the Wound of the Hero: Blood, Gender, and Medieval Literature. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2003.
- Miramón, Charles de. "Déconstruction et reconstruction du tabou de la femme menstruée (XII-XIIIe siècle)." In Kontinuitäten und Zäsuren in der Europäischen Rechtsgeschichte: Europäisches Forum Junger Rechtshistorikerinnen und Rechtshistoriker, München 22–24 Juli 1998. New York: Peter Lang, 1999, pp. 79–107.
- Mirfeld, John. Breviarium Bartholomei. London: British Library, Harley MS 3, s. xiv ex.
- Viscuso, Patrick. "Menstruation: A Problem in Late Byzantine Canon Law." Byzantine Studies/Études Byzantines 4 (1999): 116–125.
- Wood, Charles T. "The Doctors' Dilemma: Sin, Salvation, and the Menstrual Cycle in Medieval Thought." Speculum 56.4 (1981): 701–727.

See also Abortion; Contraception; Gynecology; Mikveh; Secrets of Women

MERCHANT FAMILIES, WOMEN OF

Women in Italian merchant families lived lives similar to other Italian women, lives emphasizing household management and motherhood rather than a profession. However, although less likely to trade in their own right than their counterparts in some areas of northern Europe, they nonetheless felt part of the merchant world and contributed to merchant activities. The surviving correspondence of Margherita Datini (1357–1423) and Alessandra Strozzi (1407–1473) provides insight into their family, business, and social and political concerns, and, by extension, into the concerns of women for whom less evidence exists.

Margherita Bandini Datini and her husband, the wealthy self-made "merchant of Prato," Francesco Datini, preferred to be apart rather than together, and often moved separately between Florence and Prato, corresponding regularly via his business network. In Francesco's absence, Margherita was his agent, managing a large household, including young apprentices and frequent guests, and overseeing related agricultural, business, building, and political activities, with the dividing line between the domestic and the nondomestic blurred. In business, Francesco had made his fortune incrementally, dealing for profit at every opportunity, both in international and local trade. His local trade had similarities to that of more humble merchants, and Margherita, always economical, was a willing participant in earning money by sewing saleable objects, preparing wine and food for sale, collecting small debts, and finding wet nurses for a fee. Of an elite, although needy, family, she was also able to fill well the role of hostess, furthering Francesco's social ambitions. Her inability to have children, and Francesco's two illegitimate ones, contributed to her defensive unhappiness, as well as to her desire to be useful. In her letters reporting to Francesco (mostly dictated to scribes), she was always ready to respond to criticism with a sharp tongue, and her successful efforts to learn to write autograph letters in her mid-thirties can be seen as part of her desire to be recognized as intelligent and competent.

The Florentine patrician Alessandra Macigni Strozzi was a self-confident widow whose identity and authority were based on her role as mother. Although Italian women were at a disadvantage in inheritance compared to men, their dowries were protected from seizure for debt, and as a widow, Alessandra was able to support five children from her dowry after her husband Matteo's exile by the Medici and early death. Her husband's relatives hired her sons in their merchant banking companies in Bruges, Spain, and Naples, but Alessandra acted as intermediary between these relatives and her sons, sent the sons money so that they could become partners, and invested as a passive investor herself in international companies that gave little room for direct female action. She wrote autograph letters in the merchant style, letters that show her to have been a woman of strong will but considerable tact, possessing exceptional judgment about family and finances, and a cynical but insightful view of the Florentine scene. She kept careful accounts, priding herself on thrift, and she never doubted that a merchant career was an admirable one for her sons to follow. Before her sons left home, she worked with them to improve their letter-writing skills, and once they had gone, she advised them to earn, not spend money, but to do it honestly, remembering eternal life. When her son Lorenzo misbehaved, she successfully used his love and obligation, as well as religious arguments, as levers to persuade him to improve his ways. Once the Strozzi brothers had become rich merchants in Naples, she used her many contacts in Florence to aid their business by finding them employees and to aid them politically by helping to negotiate the end of their exile and return to Florence. She also found them Florentine wives, providing herself with a happy old age.

Margherita Datini and Alessandra Strozzi had different relationships to the merchant world, in part because of differences in the merchant activity of the men in their families, because of Alessandra's motherhood and Margherita's lack of children, partly because one was a wife and the other a widow, and not least because of different personalities. Nonetheless, the letters of both Margherita Datini and Alessandra Strozzi show the way women identified with and participated in merchant business and in the social and political world of merchant families, and, between them, the two women provide a picture of the attitudes and activities of women in merchant families.

ANN CRABB

References and Further Reading

- Crabb, Ann. The Strozzi of Florence: Widowhood and Family Solidarity in the Renaissance. Ann Arbor, Mich.: University of Michigan Press, 2000.
 Origo, Iris. Merchant of Prato. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1957. Reprint, Boston: David R. Godine, 1986.

See also Datini, Margherita; Household Management; Investment and Credit; Italy; Mothers as Teachers; Strozzi, Alessandra

MERCHEM AND LEYRWITE

Merchet was the payment made by female serfs for permission to marry in England. It was due to the lord on the occasion of their marriages, and it could be given by the women themselves, their relatives, or their husbands. Merchet is usually considered to have been a particularly important servile obligation in a legal context as marking unequivocal proof of unfree status. Since the 1970s, it has drawn renewed attention from historians, whose work has added substantially to our understanding of this phenomenon.

One way in which this has occurred is in categorizing of merchet payers. It used to be thought that fathers did most of the paying. However, it is now clear that on certain estates at certain times husbands often paid, or, as on Spalding Priory estates after the 1450s, invariably paid. More interestingly, single females frequently paid their own merchets, more often at Spalding in some decades of the later thirteenth century and early fourteenth century than did even husbands or fathers, indicating (as is also the case on Ramsey Abbey estates) independence and individuality on their part. This view is compounded by the fact that some single women also used the marriage fine to, in effect, escape the jurisdiction of their lords through marrying free men or outside their fiefs, for which, surprisingly, they were often not charged a higher price by their lords. Merchet, however, was never a major item in the latter's budgets, though there are clear signs that some lords increased merchet charges for their rich serfs after the Black Death of 1348 and until the 1380s to offset the adverse economic situation they were facing.

On occasion, merchet could equate to a property tax, as in the case of female heiresses, and lords could expect to receive large marriage fines, equivalent in some instances to hundreds of thousands of our dollars or pounds from wealthy serfs, to whom lords paid particular attention. However, merchet practice and price, usually from a few pence to a few shillings, could vary widely, and on certain estates it was more usually charged not as a property tax but as a tax on serfs as serfs, i.e., as an obligation of their unfree position and as unequivocal proof of their status.

It is quite clear that indeterminate numbers of serfs, in places perhaps a majority, evaded their responsibility to pay merchet. In the case of poorer serfs, lords would not have been too worried by evasion, nor would they have bothered to pursue matters. Importantly, the fact that there was substantial evasion also means that numbers of merchets extant at different periods of time cannot be used to calculate population movements except in the most limited ways.

Merchet was not confined to single women. Widows also had to pay, or much more usually, prospective husbands paid for them. Obviously, widows generally commanded higher marriage fines than single females, though not invariably so, as on Spalding Priory estates in the 1310s.

By the fifteenth century, merchet, along with other servile obligations like leyrwite, was in decline. The massive fall in population in this era meant a greatly reduced number of merchets and a huge decline in merchet income. With the much improved conditions for peasants, aided by enforced concessions by landlords, merchet, like serfdom itself, withered away.

Leyrwite was the fine levied on unfree peasants for sexual activity banned by the Church. It appears to have been a peculiarly English institution, with little or no evidence of it elsewhere in Britain or on the continent, and it was not charged uniformly throughout England. Practice could also vary from lord to lord and estate to estate. Prior contract to marry would obviate the fine in certain places but not in others. It was very much a fine imposed on women, and not only confined to those women who had had bastards. Very few men were ever presented for leyrwite. The records that survive form only a tiny percentage of the illicit fornication that must have taken place and which was the major concern of church courts. Leyrwite was not levied primarily for financial motives, though comparatively low sums of six pence, a common level of fine, would have been burdensome on poorer women. It was against these, especially if they had bastards, that leyrwite was mainly directed as a form of social control, particularly in times of economic hardship. Having paid leyrwite, however, did not preclude women from later marrying.

E. D. JONES

References and Further Reading

Bennett, Judith M. "Medieval Peasant Marriage. An Examination of Marriage Licence Fees in the Liber Gersumarum." In Pathways to Medieval Peasants, edited by J. A. Raftis. Toronto: Pims, 1982, pp. 193–246.

———. "Writing Fornication: Medieval Leyrwite and Its Historians." Transactions of the Royal Historical Society, Sixth Series, 13 (2003): 131–162.

Jones, E. D. "Medieval Merchets as Demographic Data: Some Evidence from the Spalding Priory Estates, Lincolnshire." Continuity and Change 11(1996): 459–470.

———. "The Spalding Priory Merchet Evidence from the 1250s to the 1470s." Journal of Medieval History 24 (1998): 155–175.

Poos, L. R., and R. M. Smith. "Legal Windows onto Historical Populations? Recent Research on Demography and the Manor Court in Medieval England." In The World We Have Gained, edited by Lloyd Bonfield, Richard M. Smith, and Keith Wrightson. Oxford: Blackwell, 1986, pp. 52–56.

See also England; Marriage, Christian; Peasants; Sexuality; Extramarital Sex

MERMAIDS AND SIRENS

In Greek mythology sirens were sea nymphs whose sweet music lured seafarers to their deaths. In the Odyssey (12.39–54, 158–164, 181–200), Odysseus protected his men by stopping their ears with wax, while he lashed himself to the mast of his ship to prevent going to them himself. In the story of Jason and the Argonauts, Orpheus distracted his companions with a song.

In classical antiquity, a siren was conceived as being half woman and half bird. In the Middle Ages she was conflated with the mermaid: woman above the waist but fish below. She was interpreted allegorically as first enticing the soul to sleep and then killing it. Sometimes she exemplified heresy, vanity, or worldly pleasure, such as music. She was also connected with sex and prostitution, associations encouraged by the mention of sirens in the Vulgate Bible (Isaiah 13:22). Portrayed in a twin-tailed posture that exaggerated her labia, she resembled a sheela na gig (English and Irish figures of nude women, with their vulvas prominently displayed).

Closely related to the siren were other seductresses, especially supernatural lovers. The most famous was Mélusine, a mermaid wife, as she appeared in the late-fourteenth-century version of the tale. The best-known medieval siren is probably the one in Purgatorio 19.7–33: in a dream Dante first sees a horribly deformed woman and then transforms her in his own eyes into a lovely woman who sings in a beautiful voice. This alluring apparition identifies herself as the siren and tells of having led Ulysses (the Latin form of Odysseus) astray; thereupon another woman appears and directs Virgil to act, which he does by ripping the siren's dress to reveal a belly that reeks of anything but the odor of sanctity.

JAN M. ZIOLKOWSKI

References and Further Reading

- Berman, Ruth. "Mermaids" and "Sirens." In Mythical and Fabulous Creatures: A Source Book and Research Guide, edited by Malcolm South. New York: Greenwood Press, 1987, pp. 133–145 and 147–153.
- Leclercq-Marx, Jacqueline. La sirène dans la pensée et dans l'art de l'Antiquité et du Moyen Âge: du mythe païen au symbole chrétien. Publication de la Classe des beaux-arts. Collection in-4, 3rd series, vol. 2. Bruxelles: Académie Royale de Belgique, 1997.
- Rachewiltz, Siegfried de. De sirenibus: An Inquiry into Sirens from Homer to Shakespeare. New York and London: Garland Publishing, 1987.

See also Bible, Women in; Mélusine; Sheela Na Gigs; Supernatural Women

MIDWIVES

As with many occupational categories in the Middle Ages, the line between domestic work and the full-fledged occupation of midwifery is difficult to draw. Just as no society could survive without cooks even though professional cooks are few, so in medieval Europe we find nearly universal assistance in childbirth even if there were not always professional midwives.

In antiquity, midwives (called, in Greek, maiai, and, in Latin, obstetrices, or, more generically, medicae) were the normative caretakers of both the gynecological and obstetrical needs of Greek and Roman women. Medical writers from at least the third century BCE to the sixth century CE composed texts specifically for midwives' use, and there is ample evidence (such as inscriptions and artwork) that midwifery was professionalized in larger urban communities. Ancient writings on gynecology and obstetrics conceived of the ideal midwife as not simply literate and competent in medical theory but also responsible for all disorders of the reproductive organs as well as routine assistance in childbirth. In the scope of her practice, at least, she was fully the equivalent of modern obstetrician/gynecologists and not simply a birth attendant.

With the decline of ancient urban communities, the literate midwife of antiquity disappeared. Between the sixth and the thirteenth centuries, neighbors and kinswomen generally seem to have assisted each other in their births, none necessarily claiming any more expertise than the others. This explains why it is so difficult even to find mention of the word midwife. Anglo-Saxon seems never to have produced a stable term for "midwife," which is actually a Middle English term not documented prior to c. 1300. The same is true for all the other medieval vernacular languages save German, which can trace forms of the term Hebamme back to the eighth century. Ecclesiastical law had itself differentiated between midwives and "matrons" in late antiquity, preferring that determinations of virginity, rape, and pregnancy be made by groups of upstanding women of the community rather than midwives, whose individual eyes and hands were subject to error. This distinction between "matrons" (who had no particular medical expertise) and midwives seems to have continued into the later Middle Ages; for example, the women who examined Joan of Arc to assess her claims of virginity were laywomen rather than medical specialists. It was probably only with the gradual legal regulation of midwifery that midwives took over these tasks.

The transition of midwifery from a neighborly, shared task to a formal occupation was slow. Northern Europe was the earliest to establish formal licensing. In France, the church initiated licensing due to its concern that birth attendants know how to perform a valid emergency baptism if the newborn seemed likely to die. (This same concern would also lead to the practice of caesarean section, which in the Middle Ages was performed only on dead women in order to baptize the fetus.) In Germany and the Low Countries, concern for poor women led certain municipalities to appoint town midwives. By the early fifteenth century, midwives were being licensed, their oaths demanding that they treat rich and poor alike and uphold proper morals.

It remains unclear what the actual medical knowledge of midwives was or how they passed that knowledge on to others. Aside from a thirteenth-century Hebrew circumcisor's manual that describes some practices of Jewish midwives, there is very little extant testimony about the manual procedures or medicinal substances employed by midwives. Even Trota of Salerno, a twelfth-century medical writer, has little to say about attendance at normal births. An extraordinary eyewitness account of a birth made by a Spanish notary in the fifteenth century reflects a rather unusual situation because of the presence of several men. We have no evidence that medieval midwives undertook formal apprenticeships nor (unlike antiquity) that any instructional manuals were written for them. (The texts on women's medicine that are actually addressed to female audiences address women generically, not midwives.)

By the time midwives did reemerge as a specialized profession in the late Middle Ages, male practitioners had taken over the primary responsibility for diagnosing and treating gynecological conditions (including menstrual difficulties and, of particular concern, infertility). When visual inspection of or manual applications to the genitalia were needed, a female assistant was called in. By the end of the Middle Ages, male surgeons were commonly relied on for assistance in difficult births and for treating conditions of the external genitalia and vagina. Thus, when the first texts addressed specifically to midwives were composed in the mid-fifteenth century and early sixteenth century, they limited the scope of midwives' practice to supervision of pregnancy and childbirth; more difficult conditions were referred to the male physician or surgeon. Still, because of midwives' increased identity as professionals, midwifery remained an important and (usually) well-respected occupation for women throughout the early modern period. Despite the rather hysterical accusations against "witch-midwives" by the authors of the witch-hunters' manual, the Hammer of Witches (Malleus maleficarum, 1496), formally licensed midwives were hardly ever accused of witchcraft.

MONICA H. GREEN

References and Further Reading

- Cabré, Montserrat, trans. "Public Record of the Labour of Isabel de la Cavalleria. January 10, 1490, Zaragoza." The Online Reference Book for Medieval Studies. <http://www.the-orb.net/birthrecord.html> (accessed 3/7/06).
- Flemming, Rebecca. Medicine and the Making of Roman Women: Gender, Nature, and Authority from Celsus to Galen. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Flugge, Sibylla. Hebammen und heilkundige Frauen: Recht und Rechtswirklichkeit im 15. und 16. Jahrhundert, 2nd ed. Frankfurt am Main: Stroenfeld, 2000.
- Green, Monica H. "Bodies, Gender, Health, Disease: Recent Work on Medieval Women's Medicine." Studies in Medieval and Renaissance History Series 3, vol. 2 (2005): 1–46.
- Harley, David. "Historians as Demonologists: The Myth of the Midwife-witch." Social History of Medicine 3, 1 (1990): 1–26.
- Taglia, Kathryn. "Delivering a Christian Identity: Midwives in Northern French Synodal Legislation, c. 1200–1500." In Religion and Medicine in the Middle Ages, edited by Peter Biller and Joseph Ziegler. York Studies in Medieval Theology, 3. York: York Medieval Press, 2001, pp. 77–90.

See also Caesarean Section; Doctors and Healers; Gynecology; Pregnancy and Childbirth: Christian Women; Pregnancy and Childbirth: Jewish Women; Trota of Salerno

MIGRATION AND MOBILITY

Travellers, migrants, pilgrims, itinerants, and vagabonds: medieval women took to the road under these various titles with their husbands, fathers, brothers, or, more rarely, alone. They participated in all the great migratory movements—the Germanic migrations (fourth and fifth centuries), the crusades (eleventh to thirteenth centuries), colonisations near and far such as the Drang Nach Osten (twelfth century), and the urban renewal begun in the eleventh century—even if their presence was not always noted, or their migratory experience rarely taken into account. This absence of women from the migratory landscape reflects both a gendered vision of the migratory phenomenon and a system of norms and values that we associate with medieval societies. These values would have it that men moved freely and, therefore, broadened their horizons, while honest women remained at home; only women of questionable virtue ever cast aside the security of family and hearth to migrate alone. It follows that there is little interest in analyzing the path of female migrants. They would only have constituted a small minority of marginals and other rootless women often assimilated as prostitutes and delinquents.

This conceptualization is also embedded in the perspectives that have, for a long time, guided the analysis of migrations, whether medieval or modern. Historiography has, for many years, presented migrants as marginal, uprooted souls, or as solitary figures who were incapable of forming familial or social relationships within their new societies. For many historians this is the product of the often significant distance separating migrants from their places of origin. These conclusions, while not always incorrect, are the result of the sources studied, such as judicial records, which often portray foreigners more as criminals than as honest citizens. Likewise, the testaments widely used throughout the south of Europe, in particular Italy and Provence, do not, as a result of juridical constraints, always reflect migrants' ties of solidarity.

An approach that is more nuanced to the feminine migratory experience has revealed that social exclusion was not an inevitable consequence of geographic mobility. In late medieval England, for example, research has shown that young women were placed as domestics in neighbouring towns or villages. Their salaries, albeit humble, allowed them to accumulate funds necessary for marriage either in their working milieu or in their places of origin.

This type of research paves the way for a comprehensive analysis of migratory phenomena, one that reassesses women's places and roles. It implies a positive approach to migration wherein exclusion is replaced by the inclusion of migrants in their new societies thanks to their participation in professional and familial networks. This perspective was adopted for the study of migratory movements toward the town of Manosque in Provence between 1300 and 1480. A diverse documentation, including the notarized acts so common in the lands of Roman law, taxation records, and the minutes from municipal council meetings, yielded nearly 2000 male and female migrants. They came to establish themselves in the town in irregular waves influenced by local constraints—economic factors as well as depopulation linked to epidemic—but also by regional dynamics—a relative overpopulation of the mountains, increases in taxation, and the search for arable land. Women participated in this bustle of individuals; one in four immigrants was female. This relatively important feminine portion is explained by the clearly familial nature of migrations toward the town; migrations by isolated migrants, those bereft of any links of solidarity, remain rare.

Over time these families followed increasingly longer routes before taking root in Manosque. Prior to the late fourteenth century, they came mostly from locales within the immediate pull of the town. Outsiders, accustomed to frequenting the town's market, or even to marrying their daughters in Manosque, would later definitely establish themselves there. One notable exception is the Tuscan and Piedmontese merchants who arrived in Manosque when the papacy resided in Avignon. Later in the period, the sphere of recruitment spread out to include the mountains of the Savoy and Dauphiné regions, while at the same time intensifying the flow from Piedmont.

The destiny of many female migrants can be read in their marriage contracts. Women who married Manosquin men, or men long established there, made a place for themselves, even as they participated in strategies aimed at integrating their natal families into the community.

The conclusions drawn from the Manosquin case cannot be generalized at this time due to a lack of other research. They do show, however, the value of a more nuanced approach for the study of migratory phenomena in order to take into account the differentiated experiences of those who participated in them.

ANDRÉE COURTEMANCHE

References and Further Reading

- Courtemanche, Andrée. "Women, Family, and Immigration in Fifteenth-Century Manosque: The Case of the Dody Family of Barcelonnette." In Urban and Rural Communities in Medieval France, Provence & Languedoc. 1000–1500, edited by Kathryn Reyerson and John Drendel. Boston: Brill, 1998, pp. 101–127.
- . "Le peule des migrants. Analyse préliminaire des migrations vers Manosque à la fin du moyen âge". In Le petit peuple dans l'Occident médiéval, Terminologies, perceptions, réalités, edited by Pierre Bognioni, Robert Delort, and Claude Gauvard. Paris: Publications de la Sorbonne, 2002, pp. 281–292.
- Edgington, Susan B., and Sarah Lambert, eds. Gendering the Crusades. New York: Columbia University Press, 2002.
- Goldberg, P. J. P. "Marriage, Migration, and Servanthood: The York Cause Paper Evidence." In Woman Is a Worthy Wight: Women in English Society c. 1200–1500, edited by P. J. P. Goldberg. London: A. Sutton, 1982, pp. 1–15.
- Hoerder, Dirk. Cultures in Contact: World Migrations in the Second Millennium. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 2002, pp. 1–91.
- Seymour, Phillips, J. R. "The Medieval Background." In Europeans on the Move: Studies on European Migrations, 1500–1800, edited by Nicholas P. Canny. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1994, pp. 9–25.

See also Crime and Criminals; Crusades and Crusading Literature; Domesticity; Pilgrims and Pilgrimage; Prostitutes

MIKVEH

A mikveh (pl. mikva'ot) is an artificial water basin used by Jews for purification, by total immersion, of both objects and persons.

The Jewish laws regarding purity and impurity found in classic rabbinic literature are particularly complex. Nevertheless, in medieval Europe, the nearly exclusive type of bodily impurity dealt with by Jews was the one attributed to women, in relation to their menstrual cycle. The practical implication of this impurity being almost exclusively a prohibition of sexual relations, it generally affected only married women and those about to marry.

According to Jewish law, which followed and developed rules originally in the Pentateuch (especially Lev. 15, 18:19, and 20:18), a woman is considered impure from the monthly onset of her menstrual bleeding (or even some hours earlier), until she immerses herself in a ritual bath. The immersion cannot be done before the completion of seven days following the cessation of bleeding, considered, legally speaking, to last at least four or five days. In other words, for most women, the bath will generally take place around the twelfth day of their cycle. Until that moment, the woman is considered to be niddah, sometimes translated as "rejected" or "secluded," another biblical and rabbinic term of high practical (and, some would say, spiritual) significance. Therefore, she and her partner are forbidden from engaging in sexual relations. She must also refrain from various minor domestic activities considered by the rabbis to be possible sources of intimacy, such as serving him a cup of something to drink or making his bed. According to some European traditions, mostly from the twelfth through the seventeenth centuries, she should avoid entering synagogues as well.

For various reasons, the ritual immersion must be generally performed in total nudity and at night. Although it can take place within a natural setting, such as a pond or lake, a solution of this kind might be problematic, particularly in cold weather. The advantages of providing women with an artificial, closed, and sometimes heated bath are obvious. The community could also use such a bath to purify certain utensils produced by non-Jews; the bath could also serve as a place for the necessary ritual immersion of converts to Judaism.

Medieval Europe witnessed the construction of a significant number of mikva'ot, only a few of which have survived. Some of the most famous existing examples are those found in cities along the Rhine river, such as Cologne, Speyer, and Worms. Not surprisingly, they are generally built in the architectural style of their time. Although most modern mikva'ot are heated, it seems that there was no structural water heating system in many of the medieval ones.

Despite their various architectural styles, the basic structure of ritual baths is meticulously determined by Jewish law. The water volume should consist of several hundred liters (the exact amount is under debate). Moreover, for a mikveh to be valid, at least some of its water must be “nondrawn.” For this reason, the Mikva'ot are typically located underground, in a place in which water can be gathered naturally, without the need to pump it artificially using pipes or other devices. Oftentimes, the mikva'ot are built under or near synagogues.

EVYATAR MARIENBERG

References and Further Reading

- Baskin, Judith R. “Women and Ritual Immersion in Medieval Ashkenaz: The Sexual Politics of Peity.” In Judaism in Practice: From the Middle Ages through the Early Modern Periods, edited by Lawrence Fine. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 2001, pp. 131–142.
- Wasserfall, Rahel R., ed. Women and Water: Menstruation in Jewish Life and Law. Hanover: Brandeis University Press, 1999.

See also Jewish Women; Law, Jewish; Menstruation

MINNESANG

The German lands produced love poetry or Minnesang (Minne means love) that examines the joys and sorrows of a loving relationship between a man and a woman of elevated social standing, conventionally called a knight and a lady. The earlier known examples of Minnesang, dating to the 1160s and originating in the southeastern parts of German-speaking lands (corresponding roughly to present-day Austria and Bavaria), derived from indigenous models that have not survived. Many of these early poems are anonymous, but even when a name survives, typically nothing else is known about the life of the poet. Early German Minnesang is of particular interest because it presents a high percentage of strophes in a woman’s voice. These strophes sometimes occur in a form called the Wechsel (“alternation”), in which a knight and a lady express their views on love in alternating strophes (but in thematic isolation, not in debate or conversational form). There are also poems entirely in a woman’s voice known as Frauenlieder (woman’s song). The female speakers tend toward nostalgia for a love enjoyed in the past; their main emotions are grief at being left behind or abandoned by a lover who is now far away, and sorrow over the hostile interferences of spies or rivals. There is a trace of social reality in these poems, since women from the ruling ranks could not travel as men could, and their conduct was certainly subject to scrutiny in court settings, where privacy was hard to obtain. Der von Kurenberg, the first German minnesinger known by name (c. 1160s), left an oeuvre of fifteen song strophes, of which eight are in a woman’s voice. It is possible that men and women performed these songs together, but, in the absence of historical evidence about performance modes, it seems more likely that male artists performed both gender roles.

The next wave of Minnesang, beginning in the 1170s, introduces the notion of courtly love, partly under the influence of models from Provence and northern France. The channels of influence are complex and not fully understood. The great poets, or minnesingers, of what has come to be considered the classical period of Minnesang include Reinmar der Alte, Hartmann von Aue, Heinrich von Morungen, and, above all, Walther von der Vogelweide. The gender relations of this courtly love poetry (known in this context as hohe Minne, or lofty love) differ sharply from the earlier German poems. The adored lady is now usually beyond the poet’s reach and untouched by his desire for her. She is endlessly discussed but rarely present as an agent or character. The lady is assumed to embody the virtues and capabilities toward which the poet-lover strives, that is, she is already what he hopes to become. Feminist critics have noted an element of latent misogyny behind this construction, since no living woman could possibly measure up to the poetic ideal; in the German Minnesang tradition, however, misogyny is rarely, if ever, overtly expressed. Lofty love has a distinctive ethical and often even didactic dimension, since the poet-lover tries to improve himself through striving for the love of his lady. (This aspect strengthens in the late medieval genre of the Mimmerede, or discourse on love, in which noble ladies operate as mentor figures.) The lady’s marital status is generally unknown or unmarked, so adultery is not an issue as it is, for example, in Andreas Capellanus’ De amore. Male betterment in this context is not individual but social, since the capabilities of the lover—devotion, discretion, the ability to keep information confidential, diplomacy, moderation, perseverance, and, above all, skill with words—are also the skills of the successful courtier. As a social phenomenon, Minnesang hovers between a code of conduct for the court and a sophisticated game in which the artistic idealization of elite women advanced the goals of elite men. Critique is not lacking within the ranks of the minnesingers, however. Walther von der Vogelweide, for one, created a number of poems that critique the notion of lofty love, in part by placing it in debate with its opposing concept, niedere Minne or “low love,” in which sexual desire is fulfilled.

The end of the classical period of Minnesang in the 1220s and 1230s is heralded by the work of the poet Neidhart. His large oeuvre makes fun of the ideals of Minnesang by dramatizing the effect Minne has on a hapless poet-singer and on the peasant lads and lasses whom he entertains. In Neidhart’s so-called “Winter Poems,” the poet-singer attempts to woo village girls, only to start brawls and be chased off by village boys; in his “Summer Songs,” the poet-singer’s seductive charms are celebrated by the seduced maidens themselves (woman’s song). Neidhart’s oeuvre enjoyed enduring popularity well into the fifteenth century and was much imitated. New love poems using the conventions of Minnesang were composed throughout the thirteenth century. There is less scholarship on this later poetry, which has long been regarded as being largely a recycling of conventional motifs and themes, repetitious at best and hackneyed at worst. In it the distinction between “lofty” and “low” love largely disappears.

Lofty love (hohe Minne) was also the topic of narrative literature. One of the most innovative examples is Service of Ladies (Frauendienst), composed around 1255 by Ulrich von Lichtenstein (in the Styrian region of Austria). It is considered the first secular autobiography in German. Ulrich stylizes the story of his life as that of a knight in the love service of high-ranking ladies. Song texts inserted into the verse narrative show Ulrich was a composer as well as a champion jousting. His service takes unusual forms, for example, self-mutilation (he cuts off a finger), as well as surgery to improve a deformity of his lip or mouth. For a substantial part of the narrative, Ulrich jousts disguised as Lady Venus and wearing a braided wig and women’s garments. Although modern readers are puzzled, Ulrich’s obsessive service and his cross-dressing impress his lady and his male jousting partners, that is, they center him in the text’s system of values. The text presents a remarkable double standard with respect to marriage. Ulrich’s lady sounds conventional when she complains about spies and remains faithful to her husband. Ulrich’s wife, however, has nothing to say—and no speaking role in the text—when he takes breaks from his love service to enjoy the comforts of home.

Composing Minnesang appears to have been a common leisure pastime among the nobility, although, in contrast to the Occitan tradition, no female poets are known. Minnesang poems survive that were written by noblemen from the highest ranks of society. Other named minnesingers are known to have belonged to the ranks of the “serving” or “unfree” nobility, and still others appear to have been professional singers. Elite audiences continued to cultivate Minnesang into the fourteenth century and beyond, since the great, illuminated manuscripts, such as the Codex Manesse (compiled in Zurich), containing enormous amounts of material, were compiled in the first decades of the 1300s. Fifteenth-century compilation manuscripts of Minnesang survive as well.

ANN MARIE RASMUSSEN

References and Further Reading

- Chinca, Mark. “Women and Hunting-Birds are Easy to Tame: Aristocratic Masculinity and the Early German Love-Lyric.” In Masculinity in Medieval Europe, edited by D. M. Hadley. London: Addison Wesley Longman, 1999, pp. 199–213.
- Dobozy, Maria. Re-Membering the Present: The Medieval German Poet-Minstrel in Cultural Context. Turnhout: Brepols, 2005.
- Perfetti, Lisa. “‘With them she had her playful game’: The Performance of Gender and Genre in Ulrich von Lichtenstein’s Frauendienst.” In Women and Laughter in Medieval Comic Literature. Ann Arbor, Mich.: University of Michigan, 2003, pp. 126–167.
- Rasmussen, Ann Marie. “Woman as Audience and Audience as Woman in the Medieval German Courtly Lyric.” Exemplaria 6.2 (1994): 367–384.
- . “‘I Inherited It from You’: The Mother-Daughter Poems of the Neidhart Tradition.” In Mothers and Daughters in Medieval German Literature. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1997, pp. 163–188.
- . “Translations of Select Summer Songs.” In Mothers and Daughters in Medieval German Literature. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1997, pp. 227–234.
- . “Reason and the Female Voice in Walther von der Vogelweide’s Poetry.” In Medieval Woman’s Song: Cross-Cultural Approaches, edited by Anne L. Klinck and Ann Marie Rasmussen. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2002, pp. 168–186.
- . “Masculinity and the Minnerede in Berlin mgo 186.” In Verfügbare Minne. Konventionalität und Trivialisierung in spätmittelalterlichen Minnereden, edited by Ludger Lieb and Otto Neudeck. Berlin: de Gruyter Verlag, 2006.
- Sayce, Olive. The Medieval German Lyric, 1150–1300: The Development of Its Themes and Forms in Their European Context. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1982.
- Ulrich von Lichtenstein. Frauendienst, or, Service of Ladies, translated in condensed form with an introduction by J. W. Thomas. University of North Carolina Studies in the Germanic Languages and Literatures, 63. Chapel Hill, N.C.: University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill Press, 1969.

See also Courtly Love; Literature, German; Misogyny; Performance in Lyric; Trobairitz and Troubadours; Woman's Song

MIRACLES AND MIRACLE COLLECTIONS

John Locke has defined a miracle as an event that, "being above the comprehension of the spectator, and in his opinion contrary to the established course of nature, is taken by him to be divine." This definition is normative, accepted by Christian, Muslim, and Jew alike. These religious traditions are based on the premise of supernatural intervention in the world through acts contrary to the laws of nature, and thus recognize the frequent occurrence of miracles as a means of demonstrating God's power and concern for humanity. Building on Jewish tradition, early Christian theologians such as Origen and Justin Martyr, followed by Augustine and later by Thomas Aquinas and others, emphasized the performance of miracles through God's intermediaries (such as angels and saints) as a means of bringing nonbelievers to the faith and demonstrating its divinely ordained truth.

Scripture itself, beginning with the deeds of Moses and Elijah, has served as the major resource for the paradigmatic miracles of Christianity. Jesus performed at least forty miracles exclusive of the Incarnation and Resurrection, including the exorcism of demons; the cure of the lame, lepers, diseased, and blind; the transformation of water into wine; and the multiplication of the bread and fishes, among others. The Apostles were likewise able to perform miracles, followed by the early martyrs and saints, even posthumously, responding to Christians' pleas for help in times of distress. Other reported miracles include visions, telepathy, clairvoyance, and precognition. Thus, thousands of miracles have been attributed to the Christian faith and have been credited with converting nonbelievers, serving as continuing proof of its truth against the calumnies of the infidel. Nevertheless, skeptics such as David Hume have continued to argue that all so-called miracles have a rational, scientific explanation, even if modern science has not yet been able to provide one.

Miracle collections have appeared under the rubric of a particular saint, shrine, or relic, as instruments of the sacred, serving as proof of the continuing presence of the divine. In the face of skeptics and nonbelievers, since the twelfth century the Church has developed legally defensible grounds for the adjudication of miracles, which are a sine qua non for the canonization of saints. Witnesses appear before a commission of inquiry composed of canon lawyers, theologians, and church officials in order to prove that a cure from disease or rescue from danger could only have been the result of divine intervention and no alternative natural explanation is possible. Such a formal procedure is necessary, it has been argued, in order to ensure that "false prophets" do not befuddle the faithful into believing that acts of the Devil have occurred through God's agency, since Satan often masquerades as an "angel of light" (like Pharaoh's magicians). Some have also felt that the performance of fake miracles and the falsification of relics designed to enrich their perpetrators also demand that rigid standards be applied to the authentication of true miracles. The aim has therefore been to elucidate the "who, what, when, where, why, and how" of the miracle.

The circle of persons who either had witnessed a miracle or had themselves been its recipient often formed the kernel of a religious community or cult, having taken part in a common transcendent supernatural experience. The strong participation of women suggests that, despite their absence from the church hierarchy, women's deep belief and active involvement in the daily life of the church were absolutely necessary for the survival of the Christian faith. Particularly in rural society, a high percentage of miracles dealt with the vagaries of childbirth, childlessness, birth defects, and infant disease, and women played an active role at pilgrimage sites. The cult of an extremely popular saint such as Landgravina Elisabeth of Hungary (d. 1231), for example, reflects this phenomenon due to the prominence of women as both witnesses and the beneficiaries of miracles. The 1240 stained-glass windows at Marburg cathedral provide a vivid illustration of her life and miracles. While the catalog of miracles attributed to men and women saints is often strikingly similar, nevertheless, among the miracles that appear to have been more common among women are mystical visions of the next world and of the Infant Jesus, the "gift" of tears, and stigmata. The important cult of the Sacred Heart was the product of divine revelations accorded to pious women at Helfta beginning in the thirteenth century. Many of the miracle workers moved within pious circles, such as the Beguines, centered in the Low Countries, or the Poor Clares, centered around Clare of Assisi, in which their supernatural powers were acquired and encouraged.

A considerable percentage of Christian saints are women, beginning with the Virgin Mary and Mary Magdalene, whose intercession on behalf of believers in need has produced substantial collections of miracles. The cult of the Virgin, which flourished beginning in the central Middle Ages, transformed Mary into perhaps the premier miracle worker, whose appearance in a vision to a believer often preceded the performance of a miracle. Miracle workers have included martyrs such as Perpetua (d. 203), founders of religious orders such as Clare of Assisi (d. 1253), royalty such as Olga, Princess of Kiev (d. 969), and simple women such as Geneviève, patroness of Paris (d. 502). The miracles attributed to these figures were many and varied: Brigit allegedly increased the quality and quantity of all she touched; Geneviève rescued the city of Paris from both the pagan Huns and the plague; Olga converted the Russians to the Orthodox Christian faith. The very public nature of the miracle was the surest means of increasing the number of believers, who were astonished by the spectacle of God's intervention in human affairs, sometimes against great odds. Some saints became patrons of a particular family, profession, institution, community, or nation, while others specialized in the curing of certain ailments. The miracle tale often conformed to a fixed structure, following folklore and an oral tradition that spans cultures and religions. A problem is stated, and is resolved through supernatural intervention. The wider public learned about better-known miracles by means of the translation into the vernacular of saints' lives and miracles, sermons in which miracle stories were reported, and devotional art, including frescoes, stained-glass windows, and altarpieces. Due to their higher church attendance, it may well be that women were more exposed to legends of the supernatural, which reinforced their own participation in such events.

MICHAEL E. GOODICH

References and Further Reading

- Bynum, Caroline Walker. Holy Feast and Holy Fast: The Religious Significance of Food to Medieval Women. Berkeley, Calif.: University of California Press, 1987.
- Elliott, Dyan. Proving Women: Female Spirituality and Inquisitional Culture in the Later Middle Ages. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 2004.
- Farmer, Sharon. Surviving Poverty in Medieval Paris: Gender, Ideology and Daily Lives of the Poor. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2002.
- Finucane, Ronald. The Rescue of the Innocents: Endangered Children in Medieval Miracles. New York: St. Martin's, 1997.
- Goodich, Michael. Violence and Miracle in the Fourteenth Century: Private Grief and Public Salvation. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1995.
- Head, Thomas, ed. Medieval Hagiography. New York: Garland Publishing, 2000.
- Jacobus de Voragine. The Golden Legend, translated by William G. Ryan. 2 vols. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1993.
- Kleinberg, Aviad. Prophets in Their Own Country: Living Saints and the Making of Sainthood in the Later Middle Ages. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1992.
- Vauchez, André. Sainthood in the Later Middle Ages, translated by Jean Birrell. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997.
- Ward, Benedicta. Miracles and the Medieval Mind: Theory, Record, and Event, 1000–1215. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1982.

See also Brigit; Canonization of Saints; Church; Clare of Assisi; Elisabeth of Hungary; Hagiography; Mary, Virgin; in Literature; Mysticism and Mystics; Olga; Pilgrims and Pilgrimage; Relics and Reliquaries; Theology

MISERICORDS

For centuries very few people paid attention to the mine of information on medieval life that was incorporated into the carvings hidden under the seats of Gothic choir stalls, the misericords! Monks and canons stood during their daily prayer sessions until late in the twelfth century, when seats of mercy were permitted for the aged and handicapped and later for the entire religious community. The small ledges attached to the main seat enables the monks to perch while they appeared to be standing since the ledge is higher than the main seat. Only a simple stick was necessary to support the little ledge, but cathedrals, abbeys, collegiate churches, and private chapels commissioned sculptors to beautify their choir stalls and make them worthy of being in the most sacred part of the church, where the psalms were chanted and the liturgy was presented.

It may seem strange that women played an important role in these carvings under the seats—not the Virgin Mary and the martyred saints, but ordinary women performing their daily duties. However, if we look more closely at the choir stalls, we realize that these carvings were hidden when the seats were lowered and not visible to anyone. In addition, when the monks and canons sat on these seats they were in a position to crush the ideas portrayed there, as a virtue on a columnar statue crushed a vice under her feet.

Women were portrayed in many different roles by the misogynous church hierarchy. The paragraphs below will look at a few of these roles: women at work, conjugal relationships, women as vices, and women in league with the devil.

Women Working on Misericords

Most of the carvings of workers on misericords are men. The fifteenth-century misericords at the cathedral of Rouen show us several shoemakers, a physician, a sculptor, a mason, and several agricultural workers. In addition, merchants sell their products and deal with bags of money. Before the bombardments of World War II several misericords also showed artisans making fabric; a prime industry in the area. At Rouen women are presented as shoemakers, but not as frequently as the men, and women are confined to their workshops rather than selling shoes to customers. They also have their place in the market. No woman is shown with the level of skills of a mason, sculptor, or physician. Later, on a sixteenth-century set of choir stalls from Gaillon (now at St. Denis), two women are part of a musical group, and on another misericord a woman appears to run a workshop dealing with leather or wood.

On other choir stalls the working woman is shown as derelict in her duties: she falls asleep in Amsterdam, her distaff falling into the fireplace. At Ludlow (Great Britain) one woman is thrown into Hell: her sin was giving short measure to a customer in her tavern. In several instances a brewster is depicted as a drunk. Such a drunken couple are shown, for example at Fairford (Glos.), sitting by, and certainly emptying a huge keg. (This carving has recently been stolen.) A few women working in the fields are depicted, mainly in England. Generally speaking, women are shown at work, but not in the more skilled professions, and they are not always shown as responsible workers.

Conjugal Relationships

Courting traditions and marital contentions play a significant role in the misericord world, and these vary by region. At Rouen cathedral and several churches in England, one misericord shows a man kneeling before a seated woman. In France as well as in England, the man has placed his hand under the woman's shoe. This scene is usually interpreted as a marital spat. However, the couple looks peaceful. Actually, the man may be propositioning the woman, and the hand and shoe, as in the Cinderella tale, are symbols for the sex organs. In Rouen, if the woman accepts a proposal (it really is a proposition), she holds up a ladle with which they will share their marital feast. If the woman rejects the man's advances she hurls her distaff at him, as she does at Malvern Priory.

Another standard marital scene portrays the fight to see who will wear the pants in the family. Here the man and woman each clutch one side of a pair of breeches. We never see who wins, but in the original tale it is the husband. Each artist varies the scene. At Rouen cathedral the young husband clutches a knife, prepared to shred his pants rather than turn them over to his wife. At Hoogstraten (Belgium), two women fight over the pants, thus giving the man time to grab them and flee. At Rodez Cathedral (France), an elderly couple sits before a pair of underpants. Since there are no trousers, just holes for the legs, the artist conveys the impression that the couple is impotent and they are, in effect, fighting over nothing.

In Spain at Leon Cathedral and at two churches in the Cantal in France (from a single abbey long since dispersed) the marital story is told on two separate misericords. On one a man is spinning or carding, and on the other a woman is donning the pants. This looks suspiciously like the second act to the fight for the pants. The woman is the winner.

One more variation exists, mainly in Great Britain. Here the wife beats up the husband, pulls his hair and beard, readies a kitchen tool to throw at him, and drags him along the floor. Sometimes the husband's sword, a sexual symbol, lies uselessly at his side. He never wins.

Women Representing a Vice

Another function of depicting women on misericords is to represent a vice; virtues are rarely seen under the seats. Woman is Lust, and while we see a number of mermaids preparing to seduce a man, we also see nude women riding beasts in France, Great Britain, and Germany. Their mounts are pigs, rams, and monsters. Some may be imitating prints by Dürer or Hans Grien where the women ride off to a coven to seduce the devil.

Women are also seen as drunks and gluttons. In Spain one woman, holding a stein, loses her balance, and falls flat. Women are also vain on the misericords. Even if old and ugly, they dress their hair with nets and jewels topped by a coif called a sugar hennin, which could be a yard high. At Rodez a pair of women wearing fantastic hats introduces the north and south rows of stalls. At Stendal (Saxony), one woman wears a hat composed of dozens of ribbons. Several women wear a horned hennin, which leaves a space for the devil to nest. We do not see women as misers, probably because the men carry the purses.

Women in League with the Devil

Women were often presented in league with the devil, as at St. Martin-aux-Bois, where a woman saws a female devil in half. She also has such power over the devil that she can tie the demon to a cushion with a ribbon (Barcelona, Isle Adam, Aarschot, and Dordrecht).

Conclusions

Some images of women cross regional boundaries, while others vary by country. We never see the fight for the pants in England, nor the hand under the shoe in Spain, nor the violent fight in France. Each country, however, featured the domineering woman, who is crushed by the body of the monk seated above her.

These images of women melded with ideas held by the church rather than acting as reflections of contemporary women. For the men who lacked women in their lives, this type of woman was perhaps a comforting image. Sainly women abounded in the sculptures and paintings of the church, but did not appear on the misericords.

ELAINE C. BLOCK

References and Further Reading

- Armstead, Wendy. "Interpreting Images of Women with Books in Misericords." In Women and the Book: Assessing the Visual Evidence, edited by Jane H. M. Taylor and Lesley Smith. London: British Library, 1997, pp. 57–74.
- Block, Elaine C. "Half Angel–Half Beast: Images of Women on Misericords." Reinardus. 5(1992): 17–34.
- . Corpus of Medieval Misericords: France. Brepols, 2003.
- . Corpus of Medieval Misericords: Iberia. Brepols, 2004.

See also Architecture, Ecclesiastical; Eroticism in Art; Woman on Top; Work

MISOGYNY

Misogyny, literally "hatred of women," was pervasive in medieval culture, but it is important to remember that misogyny was only one facet of social and literary attitudes toward women. Many of the endlessly repeated antiwoman arguments were counterbalanced by prowoman arguments (Blamires, The Case for...), though outside of the purely discursive realm the negative views of women were more influential in justifying female subordination to males in all areas of medieval life. Misogyny in the Middle Ages was a remarkably uniform discourse that changed little over many centuries and can be found in the major European literatures in very similar forms. Misogynistic portrayals of women stressed their insatiable lust (leading to men's downfall); their garrulousness and unreliability; their abuse of long-suffering husbands; their love of makeup and ornaments; and their riotous nature. These supposedly female characteristics can be found in different variations in many satirical, particularly antimarriage, texts.

Another strand of misogyny exists in theological and philosophical writings, where woman was presented as the negative part of a whole series of dichotomies that pitted female against male: body/intellect; lust/self discipline; passive/active. In this context, male clerics saw woman as a threat to their ascetic ideals.

Medical and scientific texts also contributed to negative views of women. Aristotle's view of woman as a defective male and a purely passive partner in the process of conception dominated, although the Galenic theory of both women and men having an active seed also had some adherents. And for physiological reasons, women were believed largely incapable of rational thought (Bullough, "Medieval Medical...").

Taken together, these views justified the inferior roles assigned to women in many different contexts. Legally, most women were on the same level as a child or a mad person. They could not plead in court; be judges or arbitrators; hold public office; be witnesses to wills; adopt children; or act as guardians (except to their own children) (Brundage). They could not ordinarily practice most trades. Within the Church they were not allowed to teach, preach, hear confessions, or hold any office in the Church hierarchy, except in nunneries. In the Catholic Church, arguments against female ordination to this day draw on misogynistic commonplaces found in the medieval period.

The Creation of Eve and Women's Souls

Of the two creation stories found in the Book of Genesis, the misogynistic tradition preferred the second one, stating that Eve was formed from Adam's rib (Gen. 2:22) and was therefore subject to man. Yet, this version coexisted with Genesis 1:27, which stated that God had formed both man and woman in his image. The solution proposed by Saint Augustine (354–430) was that Eve was formed equivalent to Adam as far as the eternal order of salvation was concerned, but subordinated to him through the second act of creation that formed their actual bodies. Thus, in the realm of social reality, Eve is inferior. Consequently, women could be both "God's image" through their souls and subject to men through their bodies and because of Eve's sin. This idea was generally accepted in the Middle Ages by such thinkers as Thomas Aquinas (1225–1274) and Bonaventure (1221–1274) (Børresen and McLaughlin, “Equality of Souls”).

In spite of the dignity accorded to their souls, women were unfit for priestly ordination. Saint Paul’s statement in Galatians 3:28 that in Christ there is neither male nor female did not prevent theologians from finding many arguments against women priests: they lack “eminence” of status; Christ chose to adopt a male human form and not a female one; women are “naturally” subject to men; they cannot teach or preach; as women they cannot wed the female figure of the Church as do priests through their ordination; women are “unclean” during their menstruation; women cannot be tonsured; and many more (Minnis).

Ascetic and Philosophical Misogyny

In the ascetic tradition, virginity was of primary importance, and women were seen as the greatest threat to male ascetics (Ruether, “Misogynism...”). Countless Latin texts, beginning with the Church Fathers, depicted women as lecherous and licentious beings, subject to their insatiable desires and unstable emotions. Tertullian (c. 160–c. 225) was responsible for the famous image of woman as the devil’s gateway. Saint Jerome (331–420), in his treatise Against Jovinian of 393, cited Theophrastus (his name became synonymous with misogamy [hatred of marriage] in the Middle Ages) as saying that a wise man should never take a wife, since she would hinder his study of philosophy and ruin him with her constant demands for clothes, jewels, and gilded coaches. Jerome surrounded himself with pious women, although he did not marry.

In the twelfth century a number of writer’s Latin texts on women repeat again and again the same clichés while adding strong doses of venom. It seems that in France this misogynistic tradition was particularly widespread. Writers like Marbod of Rennes (1035–1123) and Hildebert of Tours (1057–1133) are prime examples of the current that depicted women as unstable and evil beings, putrid and sordid vipers that seduce men and whose only interests are make-up and jewelry. A catalog of female vices had been established by the twelfth century that was to continue throughout the Middle Ages. Yet, a writer like Marbod also defended “good women,” thus exemplifying the diptych structure so characteristic of much in the writing about women (Blamires, Woman Defamed...).

In the writings of Abélard and Héloïse the philosophical antimarriage tradition is especially paradoxical. Héloïse put forward age-old arguments against marriage, stating that, if she married Abélard, she—and any future children—would keep him from his all-important philosophical work. (Their eventual marriage had disastrous results, but not of the kind anticipated by Héloïse). Abélard, in his writings on nuns, made a strong case for the dignity of women, highlighting Christ’s special favors to women in the New Testament (McLaughlin, “Peter Abelard...”).

The basic tenet of the ascetic-philosophical misogynist tradition, though replete with disturbing invectives against women, is primarily the refusal of marriage rather than a denigration of women as a species.

Antiwoman, Antimarriage: The Debate

In vernacular literatures the same types of arguments against women and against marriage appear, frequently structured as a debate. Drawing on ancient satirical traditions (Ovid and Juvenal in particular), medieval misogamous texts presented women as seducers of men who, once they had caught their husbands, would not leave them a minute of peace. John of Salisbury’s 1159 book on statesmanship, the Policraticus, contained a whole catalog of warnings against marriage. Walter Map’s Letter of Valerius to Rufinus, Against Marriage of 1180 also lists examples of both good and bad women, with bad ones in the majority. The marriage debate existed in all the major European literatures and languages. For example, a Hebrew text, The Offering of Judah the Misogynist, written by Judah Ibn Shabbetai in Toledo around 1208, fits into the tradition of misogamous treatises by depicting a hapless male victim as he is being tricked into marriage with “an ugly shrew” (Rosen). Matheolus, the proverbial misogynist, authored a long and repetitive Livre des lamentacions (Book of Lamentations) in the late thirteenth century, in which he bemoans his status of being a bigame, the result of a change in law that had made marrying a widow unlawful for a cleric. Perette, his wife, is depicted as the incarnation of all possible vices.

In a similar vein, Boccaccio painted one of the most horrific portraits of the ugly and dangerous woman in his Corbaccio (c. 1355), where—under the pretext of complaining about one particular woman—he castigates women’s insatiable lust, bestiality, slovenliness, and desire to rob and ruin men. The prolific poet Eustache Deschamps also contributed to the marriage debate with his Miroir de mariage (Mirror of Marriage, 1381–1389), featuring a discussion between Franc-Vouloir (Free Will) and a number of his friends. His one true friend, Répertoire de Science (Fount of Knowledge), marshals a huge number of the classical antimarriage arguments in order to dissuade Franc-Vouloir from marrying. Interestingly, Deschamps added a universal history and various passages critical of his own society to his misogynous advice, thus giving an additional historical and didactic dimension to these outworn themes.

The late-fourteenth-century Quinze joies de mariage (Fifteen Joys of Marriage) shows in fifteen deftly painted scenes the ruin through marriage of a perfectly good man. Had he only resisted being caught in “the net of marriage” like a poor fish, this man could have led a life devoid of the constant demands of his nagging wife. Fernando de Rojas’s Celestina (1499) also depicts a despicable female character, a witch in league with the devil, who with her multifaceted skills supplemented by greed and treachery “is monastic antifeminism’s greatest fear personified” (Buedel, “Confronting Misogyny,” p. 31).

A special place in the misogynistic tradition belongs to the second part of the Romance of the Rose, authored by Jean de Meun around 1270. Although not necessarily speaking for the author, a number of allegorical characters spout misogynistic diatribes of the sort that led Christine de Pizan and the theologian Jean Gerson in 1402–1403 to condemn the Rose for its immorality and its negative depiction of women. La Vieille (the old woman) and Le Jaloux (the jealous husband) in particular repeat in excess many of the stereotypes of the covetous and adulterous woman found in preceding centuries. Because the Rose was enormously popular (still extant in over two hundred manuscripts) it became one of the major sources perpetuating attacks against women’s characters and reputations.

“Bad women” appeared in many contexts and often were juxtaposed with “good women.” Etienne de Fougères, who wrote his influential Livre des manières (c. 1175) on the three orders of medieval society, offered a catalog of “good women,” as opposed to “bad women,” though the latter dominate by far. Even Andreas Capellanus, whose treatise on courtly love, the De amore of c. 1185, codified a type of behavior that supposedly put women on a pedestal, added a palinode criticizing women in the last book.

Yet, once they had denigrated women, some authors felt “guilty,” and these feelings of guilt, perhaps nothing more than another literary fiction, account for such texts as Jean le Fèvre’s late fourteenth-century Livre de Leesce (Book of Joy), in which he refutes the misogynistic arguments he had translated in his version of that most famous of all medieval misogynous texts, Matheolus’s late-thirteenth-century Livre des lamentacions (a book that would unsettle and depress Christine de Pizan). In the late fourteenth century, Chaucer claimed that he wrote his Legend of Good Women as an atonement for having translated the Romance of the Rose. Pere Torroella in the second half of the fifteenth century wrote a prose rebuttal of his own misogynistic poem, the Maldecir de mujeres.

In some manuscripts the same diptych structure highlights the ambivalent attitude toward medieval women. The Bien des fames (Good Things about Women) coexisted with Le Blasme des fames (Blame of Women) in thirteenth-century manuscripts (Fiero et al., eds.). Each of these texts is filled with clichés, be they positive or negative. Indeed, texts in praise of women fall, according to Howard Bloch, into the same trap as those blaming women. For Bloch any statement that contains the phrase woman is is misogynistic.

The conflicted attitude of medieval men (especially of clerics striving for spiritual and physical purity) toward women is reflected in this constant pro- and contra-woman debate. Women were divinely created and necessary to men in so many ways, yet they threatened the ideals men had constructed for themselves. With a new emphasis on the interdiction of clerical marriage advocated by the Gregorian reforms in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, warnings against woman’s potential nefarious influence on men gained a new urgency.

Other Literary Contexts for Misogyny

“Bad women” and women in need of male discipline were plentiful in the fabliau tradition. In countless fabliaux women manage to cuckold their husbands through vicious trickery. But sometimes the men prevail, as in the particularly cruel and misogynistic La dame escouillée (The Castrated Lady), in which a woman’s perceived dominance is “cured” through a simulated castration involving a bull’s genitals. In an early-fifteenth-century Swiss fabliau, as in many other tales, including several from Boccaccio’s Decameron, a woman’s tricks enable her to have sex with another man while her husband believes her innocent. This pan-European tradition of the “wiles of woman” tales gave narrative expression to the negative stereotypes of the immoral and tricky woman promulgated in the many misogynistic texts authored by clerics.

But what about the troubadour lyric and romances, texts that seem to idolize women? A number of troubadours, among them Marcabru and Peire de Bussignac in the twelfth century, wrote overtly misogynistic poems. But even in those lyrics that seem to praise women, a new critical perspective has revealed plenty of misogynistic stereotypes. Thus the supposedly idealized lady of the troubadours has been shown to be primarily a mirror for an idealized male self, and the male love “service” is yet another means to subjugate women. Male ambivalence about female sexuality is apparent in these poems, as is the male desire to dominate the lady. What we find here is a “fantasy of power which excludes the female” (Burns).

In romance, as well, we find misogynistic tirades, such as the one uttered by the seneschal in Gottfried von Strassburg’s Middle High German Tristan and Isolde (c. 1210) or by Gawain in the Middle English fourteenth-century Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, which show the pervasiveness of this type of discourse in medieval literature. But there are also more subtle underminings of women’s status: Chrétien de Troyes’ Erec et Enide (c. 1170), for example, contains both negative stereotyping of women (the necessity to silence them, for example) and demonstrations of the unsuitability of woman’s rule at a time when, through women like Eleanor of Aquitaine and aristocratic wives left behind by their crusader husbands, female rights to inheritance and rule became important issues of debate (Ramey). Roberta Krueger sees much of the cultural discourse on gender issues and misogyny that is worked out in Old French romances as reflections of a crisis of masculinity.

At the end of the Middle Ages, misogyny was also prevalent in treatises on witchcraft, such as the Hammer of Witches by the Dominicans Kramer and Sprenger. Here, women are depicted as particularly prone to advances of demons, having sexual intercourse with them and engaging in other nefarious activities. Women constituted the majority of victims in the early modern witch hunts, and the deep-seated misogyny of medieval culture certainly contributed to this imbalance (Elliott).

Countering Misogyny: Christine de Pizan

During the course of the Middle Ages only one woman writer directly confronted the misogynistic tradition: Christine de Pizan (c. 1364–c. 1430). She detected the repetitiveness and pervasiveness of anti-women topoi in different areas of medieval literary production and revealed the real-life consequences for women resulting from this misogyny. Plunged into a deep depression after reading Matheolus at the opening of her Book of the City of Ladies (1405), she defines her task as a correction of the injustice done to women over centuries and the establishment of a tradition that honors women’s contributions to world history. But like other works in praise of women, Christine’s did not have much impact on the widespread misogyny of medieval culture.

RENATE BLUMENFELD-KOSINSKI

References and Further Reading

- Allen, Prudence. The Concept of Woman: The Aristotelian Revolution, 750 BC–AD 1250. Montreal: Eden Press, 1985.
- Archer, Robert. “‘Tus falsas opiniones e mis verdaderes razones’: Pere Torroella and the Woman Haters.” Bulletin of Hispanic Studies 78 (2001): 551–566.
- Blamires, Alcuin. The Case for Women in Medieval Culture. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1997.
- . Woman Defamed and Woman Defended: An Anthology of Medieval Texts. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1992.
- Bloch, R. Howard. Medieval Misogyny and the Invention of Western Romantic Love. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1991.
- Blumenfeld-Kosinski, Renate. “Christine de Pizan and the Misogynistic Tradition.” Romanic Review 81 (1990): 279–292.
- . “Jean le Fèvre’s Livre de leesce: Praise or Blame of Women?” Speculum 69 (1994): 707–727.
- Børresen, Kari Elisabeth. Subordination and Equivalence: The Nature and Role of Woman in Augustine and Thomas Aquinas. Oslo: Universitetsforlaget, 1968. New edition, Kampen: Kok Pharos, 1995.
- Brundage, James A. Law, Sex, and Christian Society in Medieval Europe. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1987.
- Buedel, Barbara Foley. “Confronting Misogyny in Three Texts of Medieval Spanish Literature.” In Estudios Alfonsinos y otros escritos, edited by Nicolás Toscano. New York: National Endowment for the Humanities, 1990, pp. 26–33.
- Bullough, Vern. “Medieval Medical and Scientific Views of Women.” Viator 4 (1973): 485–501.
- Bullough, Vern, and Bonnie Bullough. The Subordinate Sex: A History of Attitudes toward Women. New York: Penguin Books, 1974.
- Burns, E. Jane. “The Man Behind the Lady in Troubadour Lyric.” Romance Notes 25 (1985): 254–270.
- Elliott, Dyan. Fallen Bodies: Pollution, Sexuality, and Demonology in the Middle Ages. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999.
- Fiero, Gloria K., Wendy Pfeffer, and Mathé Allain, eds. and trans. Three Medieval Views of Women: La Contenance des Fames, Le Bien des Fames, Le Blasme des Fames. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1989.
- Huot, Sylvia. “Confronting Misogyny: Christine de Pizan and the Roman de la Rose.” In Translatio studii: Essays by His Students in Honor of Karl D. Uitti for His Sixty-Fifth Birthday, edited by Renate Blumenfeld-Kosinski, et al. Amsterdam and Atlanta: Rodopi, 2000, pp. 169–187.
- Krueger, Roberta. Women Readers and the Ideology of Gender in Old French Verse Romance. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- McLaughlin, Eleanor. “Equality of Souls, Inequality of Sexes: Women in Medieval Theology.” In Religion and Sexism, edited by Ruether, pp. 213–266.

- McLaughlin, Mary Martin. "Peter Abelard and the Dignity of Women: Twelfth-Century 'Feminism' in Theory and Practice." In Pierre Abélard – Pierre le Vénérable. Paris: CNRS, 1975, pp. 287–334.
- McLeod, Glenda. Virtue and Venom: Catalogs of Women from Antiquity to the Renaissance. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1991.
- Minnis, Alastair J. "De impedimento sexus: Women's Bodies and Medieval Impediments to Female Ordination." In Iller and A. J. Minnis. York Studies in Medieval Theology I. York: York Medieval Press, 1997, pp. 109–139.
- Ramey, Lynn Tarte. "Representations of Women in Chrétien's Erec et Enide: Courtly Literature or Misogyny?" Romanic Review 84 (1993): 377–386.
- Rogers, Katharine M. The Troublesome Helpmate: A History of Misogyny in Literature. Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1966.
- Rose, Tova. Unveiling Eve: Reading Gender in Medieval Hebrew Literature. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2003.
- Ruether, Rosemary Radford. "Misogynism and Virginal Feminism in the Fathers of the Church." In Religion and Sexism, pp. 150–183.
- , ed. Religion and Sexism: Images of Women in the Jewish and Christian Traditions. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1974.
- Wilson, Katharina M., and Elizabeth M. Makowski. Wykked Wyves and the Woes of Marriage: Misogamous Literature from Juvenal to Chaucer. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1990.

See also Aristotelian Concepts of Women and Gender; Boccaccio, Giovanni; Chaucer, Geoffrey; Chrétien de Troyes; Christine de Pizan; Courtly Love; Cuckold; Defenses of Women; Eve; Fabliau; Femininity and Masculinity; Gender Ideologies; Gender in History; Gerson, Jean; Gottfried von Strassburg; Heloise; Jerome, Influence of; Jewish Women; Literature, Hebrew; Literature, Italian; Literature, Old French; Marriage Ceremonies; Ordination of Women as Priests; Roman de la Rose and Its Reception; Romance, French; Troubadours; Virginité; Witches; Woman on Top

MOBILITY

See Migration and Mobility

MODERN DEVOTION

The religious reform movement known as the Modern Devotion, or Devotia Moderna, came into being during the fourteenth century in what is now the Netherlands. The founder of the movement was Geert Grote (d. 1384), a mayor's son from Deventer. Other pioneers of the movement include Florens Radewijns, Gerard Dou, and Johannes Brinckerink. The Modern Devotion called out to people to convert and embrace an ascetic lifestyle at a time when the Church and its institutions were corrupt. The founders of the Modern Devotion appear to have struck a chord: many converted. The movement was especially popular among women: it attracted approximately three times as many female participants as male. Today the Modern Devotion is considered to have been a second religious women's movement in the Low Countries (after the first, which had taken place in the southern Netherlands during the thirteenth century). The influence of this second movement extended throughout all of the German- and Dutch-speaking areas of Europe.

The institutionalization of the Modern Devotion began with the establishment of a community of religious women in the house of Geert Grote in Deventer (1374). The statutes of the so-called Meester-Geertshuis (Master Geert's house) reveal that their authors were especially intent upon avoiding any association with the Beguines, who had been persecuted by inquisitorial tribunals ever since the Council of Vienna of 1310. Following a period of years during which each sister arranged her life as she saw fit, Johannes Brinckerink (d. 1419) introduced the "common life." From that point on, the sisters put all of their possessions and income into a communal coffer, from which each received what she required. Thus the foundation was laid for the Sisters of the Common Life, one of the branches into which the Modern Devotion organized itself. In all, several dozen such houses were established, especially in the eastern portion of the Netherlands and the bordering German regions.

The most important aspect of the legacy of the Sisters of the Common Life is undoubtedly their "sisterbooks." Anthologies containing the life stories of exemplary sisters had been compiled in a number of convents over a considerable period of time. The cradle of this literary genre is to be found among the Sisters of the Common Life in the city of Deventer: the Meester-Geertshuis, the Lamme van Diezehuis, and quite possibly the Buiskenshuis each possessed a sisterbook, and moreover we know of the existence of a similar book from St. Agnes in Emmerich on the lower Rhine. Thanks to these collections of biographical material we are able to form a clear picture of the religious ideals held by these women. To the present-day reader these tales of asceticism, penance, fasting, and humility may be somewhat alienating, as, for instance, the anecdote concerning Johannes Brinckerink, who commanded a sister to throw an apple tree she had lovingly cultivated into the IJssel river: she put too much store in the things of this world.

Geert Grote also wanted the Modern Devotion's ideal of reform to be manifested within a Church-approved monastic structure. The Augustinian Rule was chosen because it offered the greatest degree of flexibility. An all-male monastery was established at Windesheim near Zwolle in 1387, and three years later the Chapter of Windesheim, the monastic union of the Modern Devotion, was created. In the course of the fifteenth century it grew to include some one hundred monasteries. Windesheim exerted a powerful attraction on women, but only thirteen female monasteries were accepted into the Chapter. The Chapter's administration was not prepared to accept the pastoral and legal responsibilities for more female establishments. They did, however, send considerable numbers of monks from affiliated monasteries to female houses to provide pastoral care. Moreover, many of these houses observed, in varying degrees of strictness, the Windesheim constitutions. Thus the sphere of influence of the Chapter of Windesheim extended to several hundred female monasteries, with several thousand inhabitants.

The Chapter of Windesheim may have numbered only a few female houses, but it was in this small circle that the intellectual level was the highest. There were many women in the Windesheim monasteries who felt the need to write about the spiritual life. The monastery of Diepenveen, near Deventer, possessed a sisterbook, of which not one, but two, manuscripts survive. This valuable source tells us that the Latin Divine Office held pride of place in their spiritual lives, but also that the sisters of Windesheim practiced the typical female virtues of the Modern Devotion, humility and obedience, with the greatest devotion. A characteristic activity was the "stealing of virtue": some sisters would rise early in the morning to perform the tasks assigned to others for the following day. Diepenveen's first prioress, Salome Sticken (d. 1449), wrote a rule for the Sisters of the Common Life, the Vivendi formula, in which obedience and submission again play a central role. Jacomijne Costers (d. 1503) lived in the monastery of Facons in Antwerp, and her writing career begins with her Visioen en exempel (Vision and Exemplum), in which, in the style of Tondal, she is led through purgatory and hell on account of her dishonest way of life. In addition to this eschatological vision, she left a number of other works containing practical advice for the monastic life as an admonition to her fellow nuns. The most remarkable author of this circle is Alijt Bake (d. 1455), prioress of the monastery of Galilea in Ghent. She attempted to introduce a mystically oriented reform of the inner spiritual life at Galilea, supported by a number of treatises, among which was a spiritual autobiography, in which are described numerous, intense dialogues with Christ. Bake's efforts were not well received by the Chapter's leadership. She was deposed and banished in 1455.

While the Sisters of the Common Life and Windesheim were rooted especially in the region of the IJssel valley and the lower Rhine, the Chapter of Utrecht was established in the western part of the diocese of Utrecht in 1399. Although this monastic union the Third Rule of St. Francis, it considered itself a part of the Modern Devotion. The few communities of male tertiaries that belonged to it had the task of providing spiritual care to the female tertiaries. The Chapter of Utrecht was by far the largest organization within the Modern Devotion: it comprised no fewer than 166 establishments of female tertiaries. Little is known about the spiritual life of the nuns of the Third Order. Short chronicles have survived from a number of establishments that are reminiscent, in style and intent, of the more comprehensive sisterbooks. It is likely that the tertiaries' way of living most resembled that of the Sisters of the Common Life. Over the course of the fifteenth century both categories exhibited a tendency toward further monasticization, with its accompanying enclosure and emphasis on celebration of the Divine Office, for which Windesheim undoubtedly provided an important role model.

WYBREN SCHEEPSMA

References and Further Reading

- Bollmann, Anne M. "'Een vrouwe te sijn op mijn selfs handt': Alijt Bake (1415–1455) als gestelijke Reformerin des innerlichen Lebens." Ons geestelijk erf 76 (2002): 64–98.
- . Frauenleben und Frauenliteratur in der Devotio moderna. Volkssprachige Schwesternbücher in literarhistorischer Perspektive. Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2004.
- Die niederländische Mystik des 14. bis 16. Jahrhunderts*. Munich: Beck, 1999.
- Hyma, Albert The Christian Renaissance: A History of the "Devotio Moderna". Hamden, Conn.: Archon Books, 1965.
- Post, R. R. The Modern Devotion: Confrontation with Reformation and Humanism. Leiden: Brill, 1968.
- Scheepsma, Wybren. "'For hereby I hope to rouse some to piety': Books of Sisters from Convents and Sister-Houses Associated with the Devotio Moderna in the Low Countries." In Women, the Book and the Godly, edited by Leslie Smith and Jane H. M. Taylor. Xane, 1995.
- . Medieval Religious Women in the Low Countries: The Modern Devotion, the Canonesses of Windesheim, and their Writings. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell Press, 2004.
- Van Engen, John Devotio Moderna: Basic Writings. New York: Paulist Press, 1988.

See also Bake, Alijt; Monasticism and Nuns; Sister-Books and Other Convent Chronicles

MONASTIC ENCLOSURE

Isolation from the demands and perceived snares of the secular world was a concept central to the monastic ideal from earliest times. An enclosed space, or cloister (from the Latin clausura), made sacred by continuous prayer and contemplation, delimited the boundaries beyond which members of a religious community were advised not to venture and into which the worldly were not to intrude.

The most popular monastic rule in early medieval Europe, that of St. Benedict of Nursia (d. 547), emphasized monastic stability as embodied in the popular saying that a monk outside his cloister was “like a fish out of water,” but Benedictine monks, and the nuns for whom the rule was adapted, were not strictly cloistered. With the permission of their abbot/abbess, they could leave the confines of their monasteries as the need arose, and the entrance of secular persons, especially children, for whom monasteries often functioned as schools, was commonplace.

Monastic rules composed specifically for women contained more precise provisions for enclosure, reflecting the insecurity of the times as well as a particular religious ideal. Writing for a small group of nuns in his diocese, Bishop Caesarius of Arles (504–542), for example, advised them to have a locked gate at the entrance of the monastery, and urgent need as their sole excuse to pass through it. The bishop also attempted to seriously curtail visits from secular persons.

Carolingian monastic reforms, spearheaded by St. Benedict of Aniane (d. 821), included an emphasis on segregation of monks as well as nuns from the outside world, even to the extent of barring children other than oblates (children offered to the monastery) from claustral schools. Nevertheless, gender-related distinctions surfaced here too. The Council of Mainz (813) required that monks have the consent of their abbots before venturing outside their monasteries, while demanding that nuns, even abbesses, obtain episcopal approval for such trips. With the promulgation of the Institutio sanctimonialium, the Council of Aachen (816) provided for strict cloistering of the canonesses whose lives it was designed to regulate.

Beginning in the eleventh century, new or reformed orders frequently mandated both active and passive enclosure for the religious women who wished to be officially associated with them. Initially reluctant to accept female affiliates, the Cistercians made strict enclosure (along with evidence of an endowment adequate to permit it) a precondition for incorporation. Cluniac, Premonstratensian, Franciscan, and Dominican nuns were also fully cloistered, and the rule of the Poor Clares actually contained a fourth vow, that of enclosure, tied to Clare’s insistence on apostolic poverty and dependence on alms.

Influenced by these developments and the actions of his predecessors—both Pope Gregory IX and Pope Clement IV had assisted the Cistercians in achieving their goals of strict enclosure for nuns—Pope Boniface VIII issued his 1298 decree Pericoloso. This was the first universal cloister regulation and it encompassed all nuns of every order throughout Christian Europe. By mandating strict active and passive enclosure for women—nuns—who had solemnly professed their vows in a recognized religious order, Boniface VIII seems to have wished to draw a clear distinction between women who were “religious” in the legal sense of the term and the ever-growing numbers of unofficial mulieres religiosae, such as Beguines.

Because it was the first instance of papal legislation on the matter, and because it set a standard for enclosure of nuns without parallel for male monastics, generations of church historians had regarded Pericoloso as a turning point in the history of religious women. With its firm restrictions on both exit from and entrance into monastic precincts, Pericoloso was viewed as having provided the proverbial mortar for cloister walls that, however much some churchmen might have desired otherwise, had remained up to that point unstable and easily breached. Although a few modern scholars, most notably Eileen Power, observed that nuns sometimes defied papal policy when bishops sought to enforce Pericoloso, these scholars did so without imperiling the traditional narrative, which posited a straight line of “progress” from flexible local prerogative to the acceptance of universal enclosure. As late as 1968, the most comprehensive English-language treatment of the subject still supported this view: “For the first time in the history of the Church, the cloister was imposed as a universal obligation by the Holy See itself and worded in vigorous terms so as to allow no exceptions to the rule” (Cain 1968, p. 267).

Only in the last decades have historians begun to question the largely untested assumption that prescriptive legislation easily translated into common practice. When examining the testimony of bishops who sought to enforce Pericoloso, or of canonists who interpreted it, they found evidence that the decree was neither immediately nor universally accepted. So, too, did numerous instances of objections to, or formal exemption from, its regulations emerge from studies of the archives of specific communities.

It now seems clear that, although Pericoloso, with its sweeping provisions and grand scope, continued to influence both the reformers who attempted to bring practice into line with its demands and nuns themselves (all new orders for women founded between 1300 and 1500 wrote cloister regulations into their rules) throughout the late Middle Ages, it did so in the teeth of substantial resistance. The traditional image of nuns passively acquiescing to this papal initiative is simply not supported by the evidence. To gauge the impact of Boniface’s decree in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, scholars must now consider the dynamics of the legislative process, including attempts to obstruct the law and, even more importantly, the reasons for those attempts. And because Pericoloso was restated with much more far-reaching effect in the twenty-fifth session of the reforming Council of Trent (1563), researchers must also attempt to ascertain the mechanisms by which the decree was kept before the eyes of ecclesiastical lawmakers despite the difficulties surrounding its enforcement.

ELIZABETH MAKOWSKI

References and Further Reading

- Cain, James R. "Cloister and the Apostolate of Religious Women." Review for Religious 27.2 (1968): 243–280.
- Gill, Katherine. "Scandala: Controversies Concerning Clausura and Women's Religious Communities in Late Medieval Italy." In Christianity and Its Discontents, edited by Scott Waugh and Peter Diehl. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996, pp. 177–203.
- Harline, Craig. "Actives and Contemplatives: The Female Religious of the Low Countries before and after Trent." The Catholic Historical Review 89, 4 (1995): 541–567.
- Makowski, Elizabeth. Canon Law and Cloistered Women: Pericoloso and Its Commentators 1298–1545. Washington, D.C.: The Catholic University of America Press, 1997.
- Schulenburg, Jane Tibbetts. "Strict Active Enclosure and Its Effects on the Female Monastic Experience ca. 500–1100." In Distant Echoes: Medieval Religious Women, edited by J. A. Nichols and L. T. Shank. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Cistercian Publications, 1984, pp. 51–86.

See also Architecture, Monastic; Beguines; Canonesses; Cistercian Order; Cluniac Order; Dominican Order; Law, Canon; Monastic Visitation; Monasticism and Nuns; Poor Clares Order; Premonstratensian Order

MONASTIC RULES

All medieval religious, male and female, took vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience upon entering monastic life. These vows, known as the three "substantial vows," are the heart of medieval monastic life, a way of life by definition governed by a rule. Furthermore, once professed, monks and nuns alike organized their lives around a routine of divine service, with masses and prescribed prayers, readings, and hymns set for the canonical hours. Despite this core of similarity, the particular rule followed by members of a religious order, and the different emphases in interpreting and enforcing rules for male and female members of an order, resulted in a variety of distinct monastic cultures.

In Latin Christianity, the standardization of a monastic rule for women began in some respects with the letters of Augustine of Hippo, who, around 423, addressed precepts and codes of conduct to the nunnery governed by his sister. This, and other writings often attributed to him (although in fact authored by others), formed the basis of the Augustinian rule that was so widely accepted in the Middle Ages. These texts also influenced other creators of monastic rules, including Benedict of Nursia.

The Benedictines

While Augustine's writing played a key role in the development of medieval monastic rules for both women and men, the first complete monastic rule in widespread use in the West was that of Benedict. The Benedictine rule was perhaps the most influential in medieval Europe; indeed, from the mid-sixth century through the early twelfth, monastic life was almost exclusively governed by the Benedictine rule. The Benedictine tradition stresses that the rule is not gender specific. In fact, however, beginning with reform movements in the eighth century, different versions of the Benedictine rule emerged for monks and nuns.

Vernacular translations of the Benedictine rule for women highlight the ways in which the rule was transformed ideologically, as well as linguistically, for women. For instance, the Benedictine rule describes the abbot as holding the place of Christ in the monastery. John E. Crean, who has analyzed Middle High German translations of the rule for women, argues that the way in which this passage is treated is crucial. He notes that the translator's choices illustrate the way in which he perceives the abbess's role in the community. While the German translations that Crean analyzes all identify the abbess with Christ to some extent, the fifteenth-century English verse translation found in London (BL MS Cotton Vespasian A 25) does not grant the abbess such an endorsement of her authority.

During the Carolingian period, strict claustration (monastic enclosure) was imposed on Benedictine nuns, and claustration also emerged as another key difference in the construction of life under the Benedictine rule for nuns and monks. In later centuries claustration would come to be, in effect, a fourth substantial vow for Benedictine nuns. Indeed, claustration was a defining aspect of monastic life not only for nuns following the Benedictine rule but also for those in other religious orders.

The Benedictines underwent several waves of reforms, and in the process monastic orders that distinguished themselves from the main body of the Benedictines emerged (Carthusians, Cistercians, Cluniacs, the double order of the Gilbertines). Possibly foremost among these was the Cistercian Order, established in 1098 by Robert, abbot of Molesme, with the intention of returning to a literal observance of the Benedictine rule. Nuns were reluctantly accepted into the Cistercian reform movement; however, their houses frequently did not possess the special Cistercian privileges (such as exemption from episcopal visitation) enjoyed by male houses. Furthermore, in England, Cistercian houses are not consistently described in records as such; the same house is sometimes called Cistercian and other times Benedictine.

Men did not simply construct monastic life differently for Benedictine women in order to ensure male privileges or to emphasize female submission to male authority. They sometimes privileged women's authority. Early in the twelfth century Robert of Arbrissel founded the Order of Fontevault, another reformed Benedictine order, specifically for women. In houses of this order, the abbess had supreme authority over nuns, priests, and lay brothers.

Women living under the supposedly gender-neutral Benedictine rule at times perceived their own experience of monastic life as differing by gender, for example, as Heloise's correspondence with Abelard reveals. Heloise requested, and received from Abelard, a modified version of the Benedictine rule for her community of the Paraclete. This version made changes targeted to women's bodily differences from men.

Women in the Mendicant Orders

The outward emphasis on gender neutrality that covered significant gender differences in the Benedictine tradition did not feature prominently in treatments of the rules in the Franciscan and Dominican orders. In these orders, the rules for women were strikingly different from those for men. Clare of Assisi and the nuns in her community of San Damiano were not permitted the mendicant life of the Franciscan friars. Although she managed to obtain a papal privilege of poverty, claustration was required from the beginning as the rule for Franciscan nuns. In fact, Cardinal Hugolino (later to become Pope Gregory IX) for a time imposed upon the nuns a rule based upon the Benedictine rule, an imposition that Clare strongly resisted and eventually overcame. As Regis Armstrong highlights, the differences in the discussions of claustration in Clare's Rule and the Rule of Hugolino are striking. While Hugolino only permits the nuns to leave enclosure to begin a new foundation, Clare allows nuns to leave the monastery for useful, approved purposes.

Clare was the first woman to write a rule for nuns; her rule gained papal approval two days prior to her death in 1253. In 1263, Pope Urban IV recognized the Poor Clares as a distinct monastic order. However, he did not grant all of them Clare's Rule or the privilege of poverty permitted to her foundation of San Damiano. He crafted a modified rule for Franciscan nuns, known as the Urbanist rule, which was enforced throughout Europe except in France and England. In these countries, Franciscan nuns, known as "Minoresses," followed a revised version of Clare's Rule made by Blessed Isabella, sister of Louis IX of France. This "Isabella Rule" emphasized the equality and distinctive identity of the Franciscan nuns and friars, although it did not include a commitment to the radical poverty so beloved by Clare.

Although Dominic de Guzman had himself established the first community of Dominican nuns at Prouille in the early thirteenth century, medieval Dominican nuns (often called canonesses) lived a life very different from that of the Friars Preachers. Naturally, given the prohibitions against female preaching in the medieval church, they did not participate in this practice so fundamental to the Order of Preachers. Living in strict claustration, they were subject to the Augustinian rule and, after 1259, to the Constitutions of the Sisters.

The Birgittines

In the last analysis, Birgitta of Sweden may be deemed more successful than Clare of Assisi in creating a monastic order for women that was true to her own ideals. The fourteenth-century Swedish noblewoman was directed by Christ in a revelation to found a new religious order, one designed first and primarily for women, in which the abbess would have authority over nuns and brothers. Birgitta thus faced the daunting task of gaining ecclesiastical sanction for a new double order, a form of monastic life that had long since been largely suppressed. The origins of the Birgittine rule, also called the Rule of St. Savior, in Birgitta's revelations, combined with the authority given to women by the rule, impeded the papal approval process. In 1370, Urban V issued a revised version of the rule that removed all indications that Christ dictated the rule to Birgitta and reduced the scope of the abbess's authority. Furthermore, to comply with the requirements of Lateran IV (1215) forbidding the founding of new orders, the Birgittine rule was given the official status of Constitutions to the Rule of St. Augustine.

The Birgittine rule prescribes a distinctive version of divine service for the nuns focusing on the Virgin Mary. The rule emphasizes poverty, strictly prohibiting the nuns from owning personal possessions (a prohibition specified by other monastic rules but one often modified in practice) but permitting nuns unlimited access to books. This specification reflects the high value placed on learning and study in the Birgittine order.

NANCY BRADLEY WARREN

References and Further Reading

- Armstrong, Regis J., ed. and trans. Clare of Assisi: Early Documents. New York: Paulist Press, 1988.
- Armstrong, Regis J., and Ignatius C. Brady, eds. and trans. Francis and Clare: The Complete Works. New York: Paulist Press, 1982.
- Bourdillon, A. F. C. The Order of Minoreesses in England. British Society of Franciscan Studies 12. Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1926.
- Burton, Janet. Monastic and Religious Orders in Britain, 1000–1300. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994.
- Crean, John E., Jr. “Voces Benedictinae: A Comparative Study of Three Manuscripts of the Rule of St. Benedict for Women.” Vox Benedictina 10.1 (1993): 157–178.
- Dreuille, Mayeul de. Seeking the Absolute Love: the Founders of Christian Monasticism. Herefordshire: Gracewing, and New York: Crossroads, 1999.
- Elkins, Sharon K. Holy Women of Twelfth-Century England. Chapel Hill, N.C.: University of North Carolina Press, 1988.
- Ellis, Roger. “Viderunt Eam Filie Syon.” The Spirituality of the English House of a Medieval Contemplative Order from Its Beginnings to the Present Day. Analecta Cartusiana 68. Salzburg: Institut für Anglistik und Amerikanistik Universität Salzburg, 1984.
- Fry, Timothy, et al., eds. RB 1980: The Rule of St. Benedict in Latin and English with Notes. Collegeville, Minn.: Liturgical Press, 1981.
- Internet Medieval Sourcebook: Selected Sources: High Medieval Church Life. <http://www.fordham.edu/halsall/sbook1s.html> (accessed June 2005).
- Johnson, Penelope D. Equal in Monastic Profession: Religious Women in Medieval France. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1991.
- Kerr, Berenice M. Religious Life for Women, c.1100–c.1350: Fontevraud in England. Oxford: Clarendon, 1999.
- Knowles, Dom David. The Monastic Orders in England: A History of Its Development from the Times of St. Dunstan to the Fourth Lateran Council 943–1216. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1950.
- Kock, Ernst A. Three Middle-English Versions of the Rule of St. Benet and Two Contemporary Rituals for the Ordination of Nuns. Early English Text Society o.s. 120. 1902. Reprint, Millwood, N.Y.: Kraus, 1987.
- Lawrence, C. H. Medieval Monasticism: Forms of Religious Life in Western Europe in the Middle Ages. London: Longman, 1984.
- Matrix. <http://monasticmatrix.usc.edu> (accessed June 2005).
- McNamara, Jo Ann. Sisters in Arms: Catholic Nuns through Two Millennia. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1996.

Power, Eileen. Medieval English Nunneries c. 1275 to 1535. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1922.

Sahlin, Claire L. Birgitta of Sweden and the Voice of Prophecy. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell Press, 2001.

Warren, Nancy Bradley. Spiritual Economies: Female Monasticism in Later Medieval England. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001.

See also Abbesses; Agnes of Prague; Augustine, Influence of; Birgitta of Sweden; Birgittine Order; Canonesses; Cistercian Order; Clare of Assisi; Cluniac Order; Dominican Order; Double Monasteries; Education, Monastic; Fontevraud, Abbey and Order of; Gilbertine Order; Heloise; Isabelle of France; Monastic Enclosure; Monastic Visitation; Monasticism and Nuns; Poor Clares Order; Poverty, Religious; Premonstratensian Order; Sister-Books and Other Convent Chronicles; Syon Abbey

MONASTIC VISITATION

Visits to monasteries for purposes of oversight, correction of specific abuses, and, if indicated, general reformation, typically took one of two forms. Episcopal visitation, sometimes referred to as canonical, was conducted by a bishop exercising his right and discharging his duty as ordinary of his diocese. In certain religious orders, monastic superiors visited affiliated houses by mandate of the order's constitutions. In addition to these two common forms, visits could be made by archdeacons, archbishops, papal legates, and others directly empowered by the pope.

Periodic episcopal visitation as stipulated by the Council of Chalcedon (451) was enjoined time and again by early medieval synods and councils (Second Braga, 572, and Toledo, 633, for example), but there is little evidence of diocesan intervention, absent a profound disturbance, in the affairs of the largely isolated and autonomous monasteries of the period.

Canonical policy was incorporated into Carolingian imperial decrees, and in 906, Abbot Regino of Prüm included guidelines for episcopal visitors, complete with a questionnaire to be used when interrogating individual members of a community, in Book I of his Libri duo de synodalibus causis et disciplinis ecclesiasticis (Two Books on Synodal causes and Ecclesiastical Disciplines).

Regino's procedural guide was incorporated into an influential canonical collection, the Decretum of Burchard, bishop of Worms (d. 1025), and with the further development of canon law a new spate of legislation highlighted the need for regular, usually annual, episcopal visits. By the thirteenth century, records of actual visits to monasteries began to be kept. One of the earliest surviving accounts was that of Archbishop Eudes Rigaud (1248–1269), whose register for the diocese of Rouen includes comperta (questions the bishop asked to discover abuses) and injunctions (rulings for reform based on the bishop's findings) for fourteen houses of religious women. By the close of the thirteenth century, sixteen of the seventeen dioceses of England formally registered episcopal visitation, and there are almost three hundred surviving registers from the period prior to the Reformation. One of the most complete accounts of English monastic visitation to houses of male as well as female religious is found in the register of the fifteenth-century bishop William Alnwick of Lincoln. Registers also reveal conflicts over a bishop's right to visit, a famous example being the contest between Nicholas of Cusa, bishop of Brixen, and Verena, abbess of Sonnenburg.

At the same time that episcopal visitation procedures became more formalized, however, the number of religious houses claiming exemption from such visits, indeed from diocesan supervision per se, increased dramatically. Before the twelfth century, the privilege of exemption, which placed a monastery directly under papal authority and made visitation the exclusive right of a papal agent, had been obtained only by Cluniac monasteries and a handful of important Benedictine abbeys. In the thirteenth century, many individual houses, and all Cistercian, Dominican, and Franciscan houses, claimed exempt status. The uneasy and changeable relationship between the new male orders and those religious women who sought affiliation with them, however, made episcopal rather than internal visitation the norm for nuns, despite the exempt status of their male counterparts.

Visits to an exempt monastery were usually conducted by religious superiors within the order and proceeded according to the constitutions of that order. Documentation of such visits usually became part of the archive of the mother house. On occasion, visitors sanctioned by the pope undertook major reform efforts of exempt as well as nonexempt houses. Book II of the liber de reformatione monasteriorum (Book on the Reformation of Monasteries), written by the Augustinian canon Johann Busch (1399–1419), recounts the efforts of one such visitor, who included some twenty-three women's houses among his reform efforts in Saxony.

As presented in episcopal registers, the diaries of extraordinary visitors, or exhaustive late medieval treatises on visitation, such as Joannes Franciscus de Pavinis' De visitatione episcoporum (On the Visitation of Bishops), the procedures followed in monastic visitation and the injunctions issued at their close were usually gender-neutral. Yet there were some issues that arose more often in connection with nuns than with monks, especially in the later Middle Ages. Nuns were commonly provided with injunctions, and even copies of their rule, in the vernacular rather than in an imperfectly understood Latin; women's houses were more often described as poorer or less well-managed than those of men; and nuns were more often reprimanded for having private property, including necklaces, gowns with fur collars, and other inappropriate attire. Perhaps most importantly, nuns were frequently charged with violation of the rules of strict enclosure—rules that did not exist for monks.

While much can be learned, and more inferred, from visitation records, they invariably reflect a single perspective, that of the visitor. Consequently, they must be used only in conjunction with charters, wills, cartularies, and other forms of documentation, both ecclesiastical and secular.

ELIZABETH MAKOWSKI

References and Further Reading

- Carroll-Clark, Susan M. "Bad Habits: Clothing and Textile References in the Register of Eudes Rigaud, Archbishop of Rouen." Medieval Clothing and Textiles 1 (2005): 81–103.
- Cheney, Christopher R. Episcopal Visitation of Monasteries in the Thirteenth Century. Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1931.
- Power, Eileen. Medieval English Nunneries. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1922.
- Tillotson, John H. "Visitation and Reform of the Yorkshire Nunneries in the Fourteenth Century." Northern History 30 (1994): 1–21.

See also Monastic Enclosure; Monasticism and Nuns; Records, Ecclesiastical

MONASTICISM AND NUNS

Monasticism is a regulated communal life embraced by women and men devoted to the contemplation, worship, and service of God and to the pursuit of their own spiritual perfection through asceticism, a program of mental and physical training, modeled on the training of an athlete. Renunciation of sexual activity (enclateia) as well as strict limitations on food, drink, rest, and other physical comforts and distractions works to enhance mental concentration and spiritual awareness. Monastic life centers around common meals, common property, and common prayer. This team structure supports the strivers and protects them from the temptations of idleness and indiscipline that often cause the downfall of solitary hermits.

Long before the early Christians began to form monastic communities, they appeared in other cultures, most notably Buddhism. The Buddha resisted the inclusion of women until his aunt persuaded him to admit them (sixth century BCE). He is said to have prophesied that, in the end, their presence would halve the order's perfection. Reluctance to recognize the claims of female lineages restricts the acceptance of their communities in many Buddhist areas even today. Jews traditionally resisted celibacy (the unmarried state) and employed polygamy to ensure every respectable woman a replacement for a husband who died before she had his children. Nevertheless, a number of Jesus's contemporaries set up encratic communities whose beliefs and regimes are recorded in the Dead Sea Scrolls. Most Essenes were men, but the Scrolls reveal the presence of women among them, generally thought to be the wives and daughters of the practitioners, presumably vowed to conform to the common ideals.

A few other ascetic communities of that period emerge from the sources. In Egypt, encratic men and women formed the Therapeutae, and in Rome a select handful of well-born virgins lived together and were entrusted with the care of the city hearth. These vestal virgins lived under the threat of execution if their chastity were polluted but were rewarded with extensive privileges and a very comfortable retirement when they reached the age of thirty or thereabouts. The Pauline letters, Christianity's earliest sources, reveal women resolved to live as virgins or to renounce sexual activity upon widowhood, a practice that the apostle viewed with considerable reserve, fearing that their failure to maintain their resolution would cause damage to the new religion's reputation.

Early Christian Communities

The developing church consistently resisted the enthusiasm of some of its members for the ascetic life and went so far as to condemn a group called Encratites as heretics because they maintained that all sexual activity was sinful. Nevertheless, groups of people throughout the Roman Empire embraced encrateia. Second- and third-century sources survive that contain regulations governing the activities of virgins and consecrated widows living in groups or in their own homes. They were repeatedly urged to be unpretentious, silent, and modest in demeanor; to keep out of the public gaze where possible; and to refrain from ostentatious religious displays during public worship. They undertook charitable activity, caring for the sick and training female catechumens. Most notably, they provided examples of Jesus' power as a divine presence in their steadfast resistance to torture and their stoicism in the face of death during periods of persecution. By the middle of the third century, Methodius systematically celebrated virginity as the Christian crown of a sexual hierarchy extending through chaste widows and married people (with celibates who lapsed into sexual activity unmentioned but implicitly at the bottom of the ladder).

By the fourth century, encrateia was largely considered to be a feminine virtue and men like Ambrose and Jerome in the Latin West and Gregory of Nyssa and Athanasius in the Greek East enthusiastically maintained the superiority of Christian virgins and widows over the traditionally dominant paterfamilias of imperial Rome. They described wealthy women who used their homes as centers for prayer and study in the cities of its far-flung domain, notably the Cappadocian community of women and men founded by Macrina, sister of Basil of Caesarea, who composed one of the most enduring of monastic rules. In the same period, other religious enthusiasts fled to the "deserts" in search of solitude and greater rigor, following the biblical examples of John the Baptist and Jesus himself. These were suburban areas, sparsely populated and lacking the amenities of urban life, but not by any means as isolated as monastic ideology generally implies. The sources tend to dwell on male hermits and communities, but there is occasional mention of female communities and a robust hagiographical tradition centered on women, like Marina, said to have lived successfully for many years in disguise in male communities. After studying their examples, Jerome's wealthy friend Paula and her daughter Eustochium supported a community of about two hundred women in Bethlehem, and such communities proliferated throughout the Roman world as the fourth century progressed.

None of these communities could have thrived without fairly rigorous regulation to control the abrasive effects of group life, individual self-indulgence, and the temptations always awaiting the idle mind. We have to assume that the serious desert-dwellers always abided by some accepted set of rules and were regulated by one or more supervisors. We should also assume that many of them fell short of their aspirations and that others were charlatans anxious to profit from the religious tourists who began to frequent these communities in the course of pilgrimages. Male monastics were prone to engage themselves in theological debates and occasionally erupted into the nearby cities to mount riotous demonstrations in favor of their opinions. Secular powers as well as monks themselves began to encourage restraint and regulation.

Autonomous Rules

The earliest surviving monastic rule is attributed to an Egyptian desert-dweller named Pachomius whose fame as a hermit had attracted a fairly large community of men and an ancillary community of women governed by his sister Mary, who lived across the river from the men. Setting an enduring example to his successors, Pachomius discouraged bizarre and excessive self-mortification in favor of regular common prayer and handiwork to give structure to the revolving days, warning particularly against accidia, the sin of spiritual sloth. Contact between the women and the men was strictly limited, and the women were sternly forbidden to speak to any man without the supervision of their mistress. A substantial literature grew up describing the virtues and practices of these ascetics, from which we learn that most of the women lived under lock and key, at least at night. Otherwise, the conditions of their lives and their spiritual achievements were equally praiseworthy. Among the most prized monastic virtues, humility and obedience were given pride of place—virtues more commonly gendered feminine than masculine. It was apparently viewed as more heroic for men than for women to attain these indicators of perfection, but this prejudice was offset by the idea that a woman required extraordinary strength to overcome the deficiencies of her sex.

By the end of the fourth century, monasticism had generated several other rules, notably one by Basil of Caesarea, which were in general use among growing numbers of independent communities. Popularized by Athanasius of Alexandria during his exile in Rome and by Martin of Tours, the exemplary monastic saint of Gaul, communities of monks and nuns began to appear throughout the Latin West, sharing a growing literature of advice, exemplary tales, and hagiography to embellish their house rules and standardize the powers of their superiors. Augustine of Hippo wrote a letter of advice to a community of nuns gathered around his sister that became the inspiration for the later rule that bore his name. In the early sixth century, Caesarius of Arles wrote the first women's rule for his sister Caesaria, whose community had been forced to take refuge in the city because of the incursions of marauding Visigoths. He introduced the requirement for strict claustration from the public that would come to be the central characteristic of women's monasticism for many centuries to come. Caesaria's is also the first known monastic community to support itself by the production of books.

By the end of the sixth century and the early seventh, the Greek East and the Latin West were drifting in different directions. Monasticism continued to be an intrinsic part of the Byzantine church and the Slavic churches that received Christianity under its aegis. However, the continued authority of the empire restricted its autonomy and public activity. In the West, where agricultural settlement, Christian missionizing, and the organization of secular and ecclesiastical hierarchies moved north, west, and east simultaneously, monasticism proved to be an invaluable instrument. Missionaries worked from monastic bases, and their new converts enthusiastically endowed foundations for women and men alike where new missionaries and a Christian ruling class were educated. Settlements surrounded the foundations, and they soon became wealthy economic centers. Abbots and abbesses drawn from royal and noble families performed the tasks of secular government, as well as spiritual services for the surrounding countryside. Wealthy communities of women, like Jouarre in northern France, acted as landlords and even supplied military service when needed.

Autonomous houses were free to make their own rules within a generally accepted framework. They were generally conceded to be answerable to episcopal authority, but friction often developed, and, in some places, there was no effective counter-authority. In some areas, abbots were traditionally appointed as bishops while abbesses performed many of the jurisdictional tasks of bishops without their sacramental authority. Gradually, shared experience produced a handful of dominant rules, and many houses simply combined their elements, as demonstrated by Donatus of Besançon's rule for his mother's foundation. The Rule of Columbanus, brought from Ireland to Gaul in the seventh century, emphasized a penitential spirituality aimed at perfecting monastic humility. It organized the liturgical exercises into a yearly round of psalm-chanting that constituted a chain of perpetual praise visualized as a rampart for embattled Christianity. Columbanus' was commonly combined with the Benedictine rule, outlining a simple but rigorous life of prayer and manual labor, regulating diet, rest, prayer, and other human activities. Benedict introduced the rule of stability, intended to put an end to the wanderings of footloose monks. This rule was energetically promoted by Gregory I, who saw no contradiction in sending monks on far-flung travels in the cause of converting new peoples to Christianity in its Roman form.

Most monastic communities were to some degree or another syneisactic (encompassing women and men together in encratic partnerships). The term double monastery, long popular among monastic historians, has recently been abandoned by some scholars in recognition of this fact. Benedict discouraged monks from being ordained to the priesthood. The sacraments took a distant second place to the daily offices in their spiritual lives, though both men and women monastics generally supported some clergymen to administer them. Other men were normally attached in varying numbers to women's communities, and male monasteries seem commonly to have taken groups of devout women who served them in various capacities under their spiritual protection. Neither rule was modified by sex. Encrateia was regarded as the highest level of spiritual perfection, setting monastic women and men above the sexually active clergy and laity, almost as a third gender. At that rarefied level, a general assumption of equality prevailed, though the sexes were never encouraged to interact without the most rigid precautions.

Imperial Regulation

With the rise of the Carolingian empire, secular authority again sought to assert itself over monastic wealth and persons. The missionary monk/bishop Boniface collaborated with Charlemagne on a series of reforms, and several bishops worked with Louis the Pious to impose a uniform framework on the monastic world. The reforming councils of Aachen (813) and Chalons (816) subjected all religious women and men to one or two rules. The Benedictine rule was preferred for most houses, but an alternative choice was offered in rules for canons and canonesses based on a rule attributed to Augustine that had been gaining popularity among communities responsible for the diocesan work of cathedrals. The rule for canonesses recognized the liturgical responsibilities of women attached to cathedral chapters. Like canons, these women continued to own their own property, though they were encouraged not to busy themselves in its administration. They may have been free to leave the community and marry; but, while active, they were obligated to live the common life and observe the strictest encrateia. The council attempted to impose claustration upon them, but the practice was never seriously implemented. Canonesses were particularly educated in music and ancillary arts to enhance their liturgical performances. Dramatic performances also entered the tradition at least by the tenth century, when the plays of Hrotsvit of Gandersheim were produced, probably for an audience drawn from the court of her relative, the Emperor Otto I.

Individual women's monasteries appear to have veered back and forth between the Benedictine and Augustinian rules, perhaps in a deliberate attempt to confuse male ecclesiastical authorities who presented themselves as enforcers. Meanwhile, from the late eighth century on, monasteries shared the sufferings of Europe in general under the onslaught of Nordic, Saracen, and Slavic marauders along coasts, rivers, and the eastern plains. Their wealth and vulnerability attracted these predators repeatedly, and many communities were destroyed or dispersed. This is generally held to be the cause of female monasticism's decline in this period. Many famous old female houses disappeared or emerged in later times as male houses. We should note, however, that many of these monasteries have no recorded history after their foundations, and their destruction or transfer into male hands may have an entirely different chronology and meaning.

“Reform”

By the tenth century, despite the violence of the age, intense monastic revivals and reforms were under way. Cluny in Burgundy pioneered a movement aimed at freedom from the “corrupting” influence of episcopal authority and secular patronage through subjection to Saint Peter (Rome) alone. They presented themselves as penitents particularly equipped to shoulder some of the burden of sin incurred by more worldly Christians (laity, secular clergy, and, ultimately, women). They promoted a complex round of spiritual exercises, particularly masses for the dead, to achieve these ends, and this began a process of clericizing the male monastic movement, which would separate monks and nuns and free the former to seize upon whatever claims to superiority accrued to the ordained clergy.

The reformers welcomed new foundations and reformed old foundations that had thrown off the patronage rights of their secular founders. They boasted an uncompromising rejection of women's communities, inescapably branding the most exemplary women's communities as spiritually inferior. Informally they often allied themselves with noble women who patronized their movement and did not discourage them from forming small dependent female communities in their penumbra. Their rhetoric, however, intensified the misogyny that always underlay the warmest relationships between women and men. Ultimately, Cluny would relent and allow a solitary female community, Marcigny, to be attached to its ranks, but its ninety-nine places were strictly reserved for the relatives and protégées of the clerical elite, and the women had to submit to such severe cloistering that their highest claim to praise was willingness to remain in the building when a fire was threatening to destroy them all. Marcigny had no abbess. The hundredth and highest place was reserved for the Virgin Mary.

As monks moved apart from women and embraced ordination, a form of religious reform spread among the secular clergy aiming to free the priesthood from secular authority by monasticizing them. Ecclesiastical property was to be freed from all claims by the original patrons and donors to name church officers and from all personal claims by imposing celibacy on all priests, ensuring that their widows and children had no legitimate rights of inheritance. The result was a thorough reorganization of the entire church hierarchy under the leadership of the pope in Rome. The Christian social order was divided rigorously between clergy and laity, and all women (including nuns) were locked into the laity. The “church” was redefined as a homosocial male monopoly that vaulted into the leadership of a newly mature civilization whose growing cities were soon to boast universities training a whole new cohort of professional men drawn from its celibate ranks. Even the military order was soon to be challenged by celibate monks who formed the front ranks of the new crusading armies.

Monastic Orders

Monasticism met these modern challenges by the formation of orders, coalitions of communities sharing a common rule, habit, and privileges with a governing superstructure. With only a few exceptions, these orders resisted the incorporation of women and tried to repudiate the spiritual direction (cura) of women on the grounds that monks were ill equipped to withstand the power of sexual temptation if forced into proximity with the female sex. The Fontevrault, Gilbertine, and Premonstratensian orders tried to solve the problem by cloistering the women so rigorously that, among the Gilbertines, a stone had to be passed through the partition to accept the kiss of peace from one side to the other. Women’s limited participation in chapter meetings was hedged with protections for the men, and the authority of the abbess of Fontevrault (whose constitution placed her in charge of the order) suffered ongoing revolts from the monks in the community. Nevertheless, women’s houses adopted the name and customs of every order. More commonly, episcopal visitors found throughout the Middle Ages that nunneries often mixed rules, habits, and claims of affiliation almost randomly—presumably to gain tactical advantages in their continuing struggles for recognition, donations, and spiritual achievement.

In the High Middle Ages, women’s houses commonly continued the earlier pattern of adhering to the Benedictine or the Augustinian rule under episcopal authority rather than trying to incorporate into an order with papal exemptions. Though the resistance of the orders received the most notice in the records, women religious may have preferred a local authority for a variety of reasons. Twelfth-century centers for female learning like Bingen and Hohenbourg, whose abbesses, Hildegard and Herrad, were distinguished authors, could compete successfully for donations and defend their position against clerical encroachment. Regional studies have begun to show that female communities tended to cultivate ties to local patrons—often their own families—and serve the needs of local communities. They lacked the global vision and global opportunities enjoyed by their male counterparts, but this may well have been offset by a sense of their importance in a more intimate environment.

Among the laity, women were often leaders in enthusiastic religious movements of penitents and reformers seeking to address the growing problems of poverty in the burgeoning capitalist economy. They formed encratic communities devoted to care of the sick and other social rejects and simple preaching among the largely unchurched urban masses. These were often syneisactic at their origins, embracing poverty through self-support, begging, and manual labor. By the thirteenth century, the mania for ordering all religious expression again separated the women from the men, and men, such as the Franciscan and Dominican friars, sought to exclude women from their ranks or at least to limit them to cloistered communities. Clare of Assisi fought a lifelong battle to maintain her original vocation to Franciscan poverty despite the prohibition on public activity and begging imposed on her and her sisters by both Francis and the pope.

All of the orders, however, had a tendency to channel the physical labors of charity to women, either ancillary nuns or lay conversae (women not fully consecrated to religious life). Some women persevered in the vocation by pursuing their social missions in quasi-religious communities like the beguinages. Many more lived consecrated lives under episcopal authority in their own homes or in small communities of two or three persons.

Through the course of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, much of the spiritual experience of women channeled into displays of mysticism, and a large number of books appeared recording their revelations. Female mysticism frequently offset male monopoly of the sacraments with eucharistic visions and devotions centered on reception rather than confectio of the body and blood of Christ. Male devotion frequently followed Bernard of Clairvaux’s bridal imagery drawn from the Song of Songs to describe the soul’s union with Christ. Women, on the other hand, commonly identified with Jesus himself, offering their own bodies to share in his atoning sufferings. In 1295,

Pope Boniface VIII imposed strict claustration on all religious women regardless of their original vocations, but the move was never very successfully enforced.

The Late Middle Ages

By the fourteenth century, the apogee of papal power had passed, and in a time of turmoil women like Catherine of Siena and Birgitta of Sweden found scope for their prophetic authority. Birgitta was able to found and spread the first order under a rule devised by a woman (by way of visions from Jesus). Her decision to cloister her daughters closely with an ancillary community of men in their service strongly indicates that this aspect of the female religious tradition has never been solely a product of male misogyny.

During the fifteenth century, Europe enjoyed an economic and political revival after the disasters of the fourteenth, and the monasteries were reviving and renewing themselves. Papal commissions and chapters of various orders enacted sweeping reform legislation backed up by traveling enforcers entering individual houses. Individual communities of women had mixed reactions. Presumably a lot of them quietly adhered to their rules or reformed themselves without making a mark in the records. Colette of Corbie was notable as a consecrated female mystic who personally directed a widespread reform of Franciscan communities that ultimately broke away as a separate order. In other cases, the male reformers were greeted as unwelcome intruders into the women's lives who showed little understanding of the delicate web of relationships and mutual services that governed their lives. Many communities showed a united front in resisting the demands of reformers that they change their costumes, diets, and liturgies, submitting to claustration and male authority. One convent ejected their reformer by throwing him into a nearby river.

On the whole, however, reform carried the day. By the end of the fifteenth century, individual houses and entire orders had been brought under new or revived disciplines. The typical monastic practices of common meals and common clothing, shared ownership, and individual poverty, and an unending routine of manual labor and prayer, silence, and psalm-singing prevailed. Most monastic women had submitted to claustration and learned to love it. When Henry VIII's royal commissioners went looking for wayward nuns in early-sixteenth-century England, they found embarrassingly little to report. Martin Luther denounced the principles of monastic spirituality at the start of the Protestant Reformation, complaining that its practices were not efficacious though they were scrupulously carried out. He spoke for a body of Christians who no longer believed that the heroic sacrifices of one group could contribute to the salvation of another, more sinful group. In fact, he continued to approve the encratic communal life of the great canoness institutes for respectable noble women, while encouraging all other Christians to submit to the humbler family virtues of the world of work and worry. In Germany, England, and Scandinavia, communities of women fought fiercely to defend the reformed way of life they had embraced in the fifteenth century. Whole communities fled to more hospitable countries rather than forsake it.

In the Catholic world, the reform impetus continued, among contemplative religious, most notably with the institution of the discalced Carmelites under the guidance of Teresa of Avila. The advent of the modern world for them was dramatically marked by the struggle and eventual success of religious women in enlarging their sphere of public activity, most notably in the areas of social service and teaching. For the modern age the term monasticism is technically applied to the contemplative orders of nuns who continue to live in stable and relatively cloistered communities centered upon the common life and continual prayer and meditation, while women engaged in public services are officially designated as "sisters" or congregations of sisters.

JO ANN McNAMARA

References and Further Reading

- Berman, Constance. The Cistercian Evolution: The Invention of a Religious Order in Twelfth-Century Europe. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2000.
- Elliott, Dyan. Proving Women: Female Spirituality and Inquisitional Culture in the Later Middle Ages. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 2004.
- Foot, Sarah. Veiled Women, 2 vols. Brookfield, Vt.: Ashgate, 2000.
- Gertrude of Helfta. The Spiritual Exercises, translated by Gertrud Jaron Lewis and Jack Lewis. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Cistercian Publications, 1992.
- Gilchrist, Roberta. Gender and Material Culture: The Archaeology of Religious Women. London: Routledge, 1994.
- Golding, Brian. Gilbert of Sempringham and the Gilbertine Order, c. 1130–1300. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1995.
- Gregory of Nyssa. Ascetical Works: On Virginitiy, Life of Saint Macrina; On the Soul and Resurrection, translated by Virginia W. Callahan. Fathers of the Church 58. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America Press, 1966.
- Hamburger, Jeffrey F. Nuns as Artists: The Visual Culture of a Medieval Convent. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1997.
- Harrison, Dick. The Age of Abbesses and Queens: Gender and Political Culture in Early Medieval Europe. Lund: Nordic Academic Press, 1998.

- Hildegard of Bingen. Explanation of the Rule of Benedict, translated by Hugh Feiss. Toronto: Peregrina, 2000.
- Hrotsvit of Gandersheim. Plays, translated by Christopher St. John. New York: Benjamin Blom, 1966.
- Jerome. Letter 108, To Eustochium: Memorial of Paula, translated by W. H. Fremantle. Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers 6. Grand Rapids, Mich.: Eerdmans, 1979, pp. 189–195.
- Lewis, Gertrud Jaron. By Women, for Women, about Women: The Sister-Books of Fourteenth Century Germany. Toronto: PIMS, 1996.
- McNamara, Jo Ann. Sisters in Arms: Catholic Nuns through Two Millennia. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1996.
- McNamara, Jo Ann, and John E Halborg, with Gordon Whatley. Sainted Women of the Dark Ages. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1992.
- Methodius. The Symposium: A Treatise on Chastity, translated by Herbert Musurilla. Ancient Christian Writers 27. Westminster, Md.: The Newman Press, 1958.
- Oliva, Marilyn. The Convent and the Community in Late Medieval England. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell and Brewer, 1998.
- Schulenberg, Jane Tibbets, Forgetful of Their Sex: Female Sanctity and Society, ca. 500–1100. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1998.
- Smith, Julie Ann. Ordering Women's Lives: Penitentials and Nunnery Rules in the Early Medieval West. Aldershot: Ashgate, 2001.
- Venarde, Bruce L., Women's Monasticism and Medieval Society: Nunneries in France and England, 890–1215. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1997.

See also Abbesses; Almsgiving and Charity; Augustine, Influence of; Birgitta of Sweden; Birgittine Order; Bride of Christ: Imagery; Canonesses; Catherine of Siena; Cistercian Order; Clare of Assisi; Cluniac Order; Colette of Corbie; Conversae and Conversi; Devotional Literature; Dominican Order; Education, Monastic; Fontevault, Abbey and Order of; Gilbertine Order; Hagiography; Herrad of Hohenbourg; Hildegard of Bingen; Hrotsvit of Gandersheim; Jerome, Influence of; Leoba; Monastic Enclosure; Monastic Rules; Monastic Visitation; Monasticism and Nuns, Byzantine; Monasticism and Nuns, Celtic; Monasticism, Women's: Papal Policy; Mystics' Writings; Patronage, Ecclesiastical; Poor Clares Order; Poverty, Religious; Premonstratensian Order; Sister-Books and Other Convent Chronicles; Spiritual Care; Tertiaries; Virgin Martyrs; Virginity; Virile Women

MONASTICISM AND NUNS, BYZANTINE

The development of female monasteries in the eastern Mediterranean world paralleled that of their male counterparts. Women were attracted to the monastic life as early as the fourth century. In Egypt, in the first half of the fourth century, Pachomios established a nunnery for women at Tabennisi that is said to have housed 400 women, while the nuns at Shenoute's fifth-century monastic complex at the White Monastery numbered 1,800. These monasteries were cenobitic, that is, the nuns lived in a community, went to services and meals as a group, and obeyed a superior. Female anchorites were rare, but not unknown. In Palestine, female monasteries seem to have been primarily an urban phenomenon, such as the nunnery founded on Jerusalem's Mount of Olives in the early fifth century by Melania the Younger, a Roman matron. The Judean desert monasteries were exclusively male, although the occasional female hermit (e.g., St. Mary of Egypt, Synkletike) is attested to. Makrina (c. 327–379/380), the older sister of Basil of Caesarea (an influential figure in the development of Byzantine monastic regulations), took vows of celibacy in her early teens and encouraged her family to establish in their house a monastery for men and women, the earliest known nunnery in Anatolia. During the fifth and sixth centuries, nunneries began to be founded in Constantinople and Greece; they tended to be most numerous in major cities such as the capital and Thessalonike. Nunneries were forbidden on Mt. Athos and severely restricted on other holy mountains.

Monastic rules (typika) survive for only six nunneries; their evidence can be supplemented by information from the vitae of female saints. The monastery was headed by an abbess, assisted by a steward (who might be male or female) and various officials, such as the cellarer and sacristan. The nuns were divided into two groups, the literate choir sisters responsible for chanting the monastic offices, and the housekeeping nuns who performed manual labor to meet the material needs of the institution. Nunneries varied greatly in size, averaging around twenty to thirty members, although one fourteenth-century female monastery housed one hundred nuns. Women took monastic vows at various ages, some as teenagers (the minimum age was sixteen), others in later life, often after being widowed or in old age. The novitiate varied between six months and three years, depending on the maturity of the novice. Women were inspired to take the monastic habit for many reasons, such as a genuine desire for a consecrated life of prayer and enhanced opportunity for salvation, or more mundane reasons, such as material support in one's declining years. Although gifts at the time of entrance into the monastery were encouraged by some houses and discouraged by others, many nuns made substantial donations of cash and real property, such as estates, books, and works of liturgical art, in order to provide for their maintenance and ensure proper burial and commemoration in perpetuity. Additional financial support was provided by lay patrons, who often requested burial within the monastery walls and annual memorial services in return. Some nuns lived in double monasteries, institutions that housed separate communities of men and women, directed by a single superior, sometimes an abbess. Such establishments were forbidden by the Second Council of Nicaea in 787, but they reappear in the Palaiologan period (thirteenth to fifteenth centuries).

Many nunneries were founded by aristocratic patrons to ensure the admission of female family members and the burial and commemoration of relatives. Although in theory nuns who took monastic vows were supposed to break all family ties, it is clear that many female monastics enjoyed the company of kinswomen in the cloister, brought maidser-vants from home, received visits from male and female relatives, and could attend the sickbeds or funerals of family members.

Like male monasteries, some nunneries performed important social services, especially the distribution of food, wine, and money to beggars at the gate. They had hostels to provide lodging for pilgrims and travelers, and, very rarely, small hospitals to treat lay patients. They might take in orphan girls as well as women who were refugees from enemy invasion, abused by their husbands, suffering from mental illness, or in abject poverty.

There were some notable differences between male and female monastic houses. Female monasteries had to bring in male priests to celebrate the liturgy, male doctors to care for the sick, and often male bailiffs to supervise the monastic estates. There also seems to have been little opportunity for nuns to engage in artistic or intellectual pursuits; only a handful are known to have worked as scribes or authors, and most occupied themselves primarily with spinning and weaving, in addition to their assigned house-keeping duties. Nuns also tended to live in cenobitic establishments, although a few female hermits and stylites (dwellers atop columns) are attested to from the fourth to eleventh centuries; thereafter the nuns for whom we have firm evidence all lived a communal life in monasteries.

The traditions of Byzantine female monasticism continued during the centuries of Ottoman Turkish occupation of the Balkans and Anatolia, although some nunneries fell into decline and were abandoned. There has been a remarkable upsurge in the numbers of Orthodox nuns in Greece in recent decades; several groups of nuns have successfully revived male monasteries that had been deserted or were in severe decline.

Alice-Mary Talbot

References and Further Reading

- Connor, Carolyn L. Women of Byzantium. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 2004.
- Petersen, Joan M. Handmaids of the Lord: Contemporary Descriptions of Feminine Asceticism in the First Six Christian Centuries. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Cistercian Publications, 1996.
- Talbot, Alice-Mary, ed. Holy Women of Byzantium: Ten Saints' Lives in English Translation. Washington, D.C.: Dumbarton Oaks, 1996.
- . Women and Religious Life in Byzantium. Aldershot: Ashgate, 2001.
- Thomas, John, and Angela C. Hero, eds. Byzantine Monastic Foundation Documents. 5 vols. Washington, D.C.: Dumbarton Oaks, 2000.

See also Byzantium; Monasticism and Nuns

MONASTICISM AND NUNS, CELTIC

While women in early medieval Celtic areas of Ireland, Scotland, Cornwall, Wales, and Brittany were enthusiastic converts to religious life, there were always fewer monastic houses for women than there were for men. Although there has been considerable debate over the existence and characteristics of a medieval Celtic church in the early medieval period (c. 500–1100), there were some commonalities in the monasticism practiced in the Celtic areas, including asceticism, local monastic rules, and a degree of isolation from policies and doctrines of Rome, as well as strong connections between monasteries and secular rulers.

Ireland has the best-known and best-documented medieval monasteries; however, there were also nunneries and holy women elsewhere in the Celtic areas. For the early medieval period, most of the evidence for the existence of nunneries comes from hagiography and place names. While this evidence is very important, some of the nunneries indicated in these sources may in fact have been very small, possibly only lasting for one woman's lifetime or to be evidence of veneration of women saints rather than location of houses for women. The use of continental monastic rules, such as those of the Benedictines, Cistercians, and Augustinians, became common in Celtic areas only after the twelfth century.

In Scotland, religious foundations for women are particularly poorly documented and did not survive to the twelfth century, when there was an upswing in monastic foundations by the native elite that saw the establishment of at least eleven nunneries, all following continental rules. Few of these houses survived the turbulent Anglo-Scottish conflicts of the fourteenth century. The Augustinian nunnery at Iona, established in the early thirteenth century, is the best-known exception, and there are substantial physical remains of this nunnery.

While Welsh hagiography mentions early medieval female saints, such as Gwenfrewy, living as a nun, communities of Welsh women religious did not survive into the later medieval period, when there were only three Welsh nunneries, all using continental rules—the Benedictine priory at Usk, and the Cistercian houses at Llanllugan and Llanllyr. The paucity of evidence of women's religious activities is particularly acute in Cornwall, where hagiography only suggests that there was a monastery associated with a holy woman called Sitofolla in the ninth century.

In Ireland the sources for women's religious activities are better, but this evidence cannot be used with confidence for the other Celtic areas. Both women and men were enthusiastic converts to Christianity when it arrived in Ireland with missionaries during the fifth century. Patrick, one of these early missionaries, records that large numbers of women and men flocked to renounce the world and join the church as monks and nuns. The religious communities they lived in were usually small rural settlements that housed either lay families or tenants of the monastery, as well as priests, nuns, and monks. The construction of stone buildings around a central cloister was not known in Ireland for either male or female religious houses until after the twelfth century and was associated with the introduction of the continental monastic rules. One of the most important women's religious houses established in the early phase of Irish monasticism was that of Bridget of Kildare, founded in the late fifth century. She established a prosperous community that enjoyed vital secular support from first the Fothairt family and then Leinster's Uí Dúnlainge dynasty, enabling it to survive and thrive throughout the early medieval period.

Irish monastic rules and ideas spread in the sixth century to Iona in Scotland with Columba and then to the continent with Columbanus. The only surviving Irish-based nunnery rule is that of Columbanus. This rule was more a guide for spiritual well-being than a day-to-day rule and importantly did not require enclosure away from lay society. It is unknown whether Columbanus' rule was based on nunnery rules from other Celtic regions; however, there are similarities between the life it outlines and what is known of life in Irish nunneries of the early medieval period.

After the twelfth century in Ireland, reforming Gaelic Irish bishops and kings, as well as incoming Anglo-Norman leaders, encouraged the spread of continental religious rules for both men and women. The Augustinian Rule was unusually popular in Irish nunneries, probably because it allowed connections between houses and surrounding lay communities as well as a greater degree of autonomy to individual monasteries. In Ireland, many nunneries continued until the Reformation and the general dissolution of monastic houses in the 1540s, when they were disbanded.

DIANNE HALL

References and Further Reading

- Bitel, Lisa. Land of Women: Tales of Sex and Gender from Early Ireland. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1996.
- Cartwright, Jane. "The Desire to Corrupt: Convents and Community in Medieval Wales." In Medieval Women in Their Communities, edited by Diane Watt. Cardiff: Cardiff University Press, 1997, pp. 20–48.
- Davies, Wendy. "The Myth of the Celtic Church." In The Early Church in Wales and the West, edited by N. Edwards and A. Lane. Oxbow Monographs 16. Oxford: Oxbow, 1992, pp. 12–21.
- Hall, Dianne. Women and the Church in Medieval Ireland, c. 1140–1540. Dublin: Four Courts Press, 2003.
- Harrington, Christina. Women in a Celtic Church: Ireland 450–1150. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2002.
- McDonald, R. Andrew. "The Foundation and Patronage of Nunneries by Native Elites in Twelfth- and Early Thirteenth Century Scotland." In Women in Scotland, c. 1100–c. 1750, edited by Elizabeth Ewan and Maureen M. Meikle. East Linton: Tuckwell Press, 1999, pp. 3–15.
- Olsen, Lynette. Early Monasteries in Cornwall. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell Press, 1989.

See also Abbesses; Architecture, Monastic; Asceticism; Brigit; Hagiography; Ireland; Monastic Enclosure; Monastic Rules; Monasticism and Nuns; Scotland; Wales

MONASTICISM, WOMEN'S: PAPAL POLICY

500–1100

From the time it was introduced to the West, women's monasticism was of concern to the papacy. Popes founded monasteries for women, extended their protection to them, and intervened in disputes concerning temporal holdings and jurisdiction. The letters of the first monk to become a pope, Gregory I, also known as "The Great," provide early and ample evidence of this sort of papal activity.

Written between 590 and 640, Pope Gregory's letters display his abiding interest in the endowment and stability of female institutions. He prompted the wealthy to bequeath money and even private homes to communities of religious women, ordered bishops to consecrate new foundations, made gifts of relics to houses threatened by poverty, and intervened when nuns faced illegal episcopal or secular interference. Tempering his enthusiasm for the religious life with pastoral pragmatism, the pope assisted a woman who had been cloistered against her will, and cautioned married aspirants against unilateral entrance into a monastery.

Many of Pope Gregory I's efforts on behalf of nuns were made at the request of wealthy aristocratic women, and his successors continued to accommodate the needs and desires of such petitioners and their families. Those desires, in turn, often centered on obtaining privileges of exemption from episcopal control. Limitation of royal prerogatives and usurpations by local potentates were also concerns, to judge from papal letters such as that of Pope John VIII to Charles the Bald (877) requesting the return of land unjustly seized from the ancient and important female monastery of St. Salvatore/St. Giulia in northern Italy.

In the tenth century, aristocratic laity, rather than popes, tended to found women's monasteries, but the papacy continued the tradition of gift-giving to established communities. Grants of papal immunity and protection took on new significance in the stormy era of the Investiture Controversy, since they often paralleled those made by Holy Roman emperors anxious to retain or reinforce control over politically significant Italian monasteries. And although the Gregorian reform was not directed at nuns, its demands that married clergy dismiss their wives can be linked to the increased number of new foundations for women in the eleventh century. So, too, papal support of reformed male monasticism helps to explain why older, less austere female communities were sometimes displaced or even dissolved in the interests of Cluniac monks, who occupied their monasteries.

Before the twelfth century, when a reinvigorated papacy buttressed by rationalized canon law and more clearly defined doctrine sought to assert greater control over religious practice, papal policy with respect to women's monasticism was largely reactive. Early medieval popes typically responded to requests from bishops, abbots, lay donors, or nuns themselves, but did not try to impress a particular stamp upon women's monasticism. Papal initiatives could have consequences for female religious, as in the case of the Gregorian reforms, but those consequences do not appear to be the result of conscious design. While the popes of the High and late Middle Ages would not always be systematic or even consistent in their long-range decision-making regarding female monastics, papal policy, properly speaking, had begun to coalesce.

1100–1298

In the religiously enthusiastic twelfth century, women and men attempting to put their particular visions of the apostolic life into regular practice challenged the ingenuity of popes who sought to standardize monastic life as they had so many other aspects of Christian belief and practice. One aim of the papacy was to ensure that the large numbers of women who had been drawn to the new orders would continue to have their spiritual and temporal needs met. Given that reform-minded male members in these orders often viewed women as occasions of sin, and that they consequently avoided service to them, that aim was not always satisfactorily achieved. The situation is well illustrated by the example of the Premonstratensian nuns and canonesses.

An order of regular canons founded in 1121, the Premonstratensians had initially tolerated, and even given pride of place to, their numerous female members: the mother-house of Prémontré was a double monastery. Yet as early as 1138, Pope Innocent II was forced to remind the canons to recognize and fulfill their obligations to female members, and similar admonitions were repeated by Celestine II, Eugenius III, and Adrian IV. Notwithstanding papal displeasure, the Premonstratensians ceased founding double monasteries and suppressed existing ones. The 1198 decree of the General Chapter altogether prohibiting the admission of women ushered in a period of insecurity and even vagrancy for the remaining sisters that was clearly at odds with the wishes of the Holy See.

This failure in the case of the Premonstratensians helps to explain the resolution with which thirteenth-century popes strove for success in their dealings with the Cistercians. After the death of their founder in 1134, the Cistercians had declared that they would neither provide pastoral care to, nor formally incorporate, the many nunneries modeling their observance on the customs of Cîteaux. But declarations such as these—for others were forthcoming—availed the order nothing in the face of papal demands. Successive thirteenth-century popes pressured the Cistercians on behalf of importunate women and their patrons, ultimately forcing the order to officially incorporate many female communities.

The papacy was particularly interested in finding a place for women within the Cistercian Order, since an enclosed contemplative life represented the ideal safeguard for orthodox practice in an age of increasing informality, and even heterodoxy. In 1213, as the General Chapter struggled to establish uniform discipline and control over far-flung affiliates, it gave full expression to this ideal by making strict active and passive enclosure—that is, a rigorous restriction on both exit from and entrance into cloister precincts—a precondition for incorporation of female Cistercian monasteries. It was in this General Chapter ruling, in turn, that thirteenth-century popes found a suitable model for female affiliation to other new orders, most notably the Franciscans and Dominicans. The model, of course, was scarcely original (enclosure of nuns had been mandated for a variety of reasons and with varying degrees of success since the beginning of monastic history), but the circumstances in which it was applied were.

A detachment from worldly affairs, which the cloister was designed to ensure, along with renunciation of personal property and communal life, had been hallmarks of the reformed monasticism of the previous century, and they were ideals to which both monks and nuns could aspire. These were not, however, the dominant features of thirteenth-century piety. The mendicant poverty of the Franciscans and the urban evangelization of the Dominicans were manifestations of a vision of the vita apostolica that had an active component. Although it was that vision that had attracted large numbers of female followers, the papacy either tacitly or actively disallowed it when integrating women into the new orders—the rule of the Poor Clares, confirmed by Pope Gregory IX in 1239, and the numerous papal interventions on behalf of Dominican sisters, beginning with Innocent III's recognition of the observance at Prouille, required strict active and passive claustration.

Periculoso and After

Although thirteenth-century popes clearly fought to find places for women in the new orders, they did so only by maintaining a gender-distinctive regular life in which the active apostolate was the exclusive preserve of male religious. At the very end of the century, Pope Boniface VIII reaffirmed and sought to further this policy. He recognized that despite papal efforts to force male orders to accept nuns, there were still many more women desirous of a religious life, and that informal foundations and unregulated quasi-religious women, like the Beguines, abounded. In his 1298 decree Periculoso he used strict enclosure regulation to differentiate these women, popularly perceived as religious women, from professed nuns, religious women in the canonical sense of the term. Where his predecessors had limited themselves to charting a course with reference to specific orders, Boniface VIII legislated for all professed nuns regardless of the rule under which they lived. Henceforth, nuns were to live strictly enclosed lives, leaving their monasteries only in the event of manifest necessity, and allowing no outsider to enter the cloister without license of the ordinary, usually the bishop.

Periculoso was a landmark in the history of papal policy; it was much less significant in the history of female monasticism. Not only did popes in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries undermine its directives through frequent grants of dispensations and privileges, but as the repeated exhortations of reforming councils and synods attest, it was almost impossible to enforce. Nevertheless, in the later Middle Ages enclosure of nuns remained a norm with which new orders seeking papal approval, such as the Birgittines, were expected to comply. Vigorously restated by the Council of Trent, it would continue to be a guiding principle of papal policy into the modern era.

ELIZABETH MAKOWSKI

References and Further Reading

- Makowski, Elizabeth. Canon Law and Cloistered Women: Periculoso and Its Commentators 1298–1545. Washington, D.C.: The Catholic University of America Press, 1997.
 Skinner, Patricia. Women in Medieval Italian Society 500–1200. Essex, U.K.: Pearson Education Limited, 2001.
 Southern, R.W. Western Society and the Church in the Middle Ages, Harmondsworth, U.K.: Penguin Books, 1970; London: Penguin Books, 1990.

See also Beguines; Birgittine Order; Canonesses; Cistercian Order; Cluniac Order; Dominican Order; Monastic Enclosure; Monasticism and Nuns; Poor Clares Order; Premonstratensian Order

MORTUARY ROLLS

See Necrologies and Mortuary Rolls

MOTHERS AS TEACHERS

Ever since, in 403 CE, St. Jerome gave detailed instructions to a woman friend on how to teach her children and particularly her daughters to read, women in the West have been regarded as primary teachers. Jerome not only gave practical advice on teaching methods, but also insisted on Christian piety as the basic ethical grounding of such instruction. Jerome's principles were repeated throughout the medieval period by Christian moralists.

Perhaps the most intriguing religious and practical instruction was produced by Dhuoda (c. 803–843), the wife of Charlemagne's second cousin Bernard of Septimania, who wrote her Liber manualis or Handbook for her son William in just over a year in 843. Her introduction exquisitely emphasizes her strong personal slant: "My son you will have learned doctors to teach you many more examples, more eminent and of greater usefulness, but they are not of equal status with me, nor do they have a heart more ardent than I, your mother, have for you, my firstborn son. . . ."

In c. 1249 Margaret of Provence, the queen of Louis IX (St. Louis) commissioned Vincent of Beauvais to write a treatise: De eruditione filiorum nobelium (On the Education of Noble Children). She ordered several chapters to be specifically addressed to girls. A century later, the Italian Francesco da Barberino again wrote a moral instruction manual for children: Regimento e Costumi di Donna (Rules and Customs for Ladies). He automatically assumed that the teacher would be a mother, and that daughters were likely to be the pupils. "She should learn to read and write, so that if it happens that she inherits lands, she will be better able to rule them."

Because most books during the medieval period were religious texts, for example, parts of the Hebrew or Christian Bible, Psalters (parts of the Book of Psalms) or Books of Hours (to be read during the various hours of prayer), these were used for religious instruction and also as teaching primers. Indeed, like many other mothers, the French queen, Isabeau of Bavaria, ordered a book of hours for teaching her daughter Jeanne in 1398 and a special alphabet Psalter and "A, b, c. de Psaumes" for her daughter Michelle in 1403. These daughters were of what we now consider primary-school age when they received these books. Throughout the centuries mothers commissioned such texts in order to teach their children to read. Blanche of Castile famously ordered a large Psalter in the early thirteenth century, as a teaching tool for her son, the future Louis IX of France (it is now in the Morgan Library in New York). In 1466, Empress Eleanor of Portugal commissioned an edition of the De liberorum educatione (On the Education of Children) by her contemporary, the humanist Pope Pius II, for her son Maximilian I of Austria, in a luxurious version exhibiting the latest artistic ideas.

In their capacity to commission these primers for their children, mothers had the ability to emphasize what they considered important ideas. Not only were they able to stress whether the child's first book should be a Psalter representing the Book of Psalms, or a book of hours, but they could choose which biblical stories should be included in such works.

Thus, for example, Anne of Brittany ordered a primer for her six-year-old daughter Claude (later the first wife of Francis I of France) in 1505. The book considered suitable for a six-year-old child begins with the alphabet, proceeds with the Lord's Prayer, the creed, grace to be said before meals, the creation story, and other details from the Christian Bible.

Although most books during the earlier Middle Ages were written in Latin, some mothers ordered vernacular translations, as did Margaret of Provence, who was also very clear in her suggestions of what should be included in the works she ordered, in the mid-thirteenth century. Christine de Pizan wrote her Enseignements moraux (Moral Teachings) for her son in 1395, and later presented a copy of this to the queen, Isabeau of Bavaria, who was certainly aware of a mother's responsibility for her children's education. Echoing Dhuoda, Christine wrote:

Son, I have no great treasure
To make you rich, but a measure
Of good advice which you may need;
I give it hoping you'll take heed.
Read willingly fine books of tales
As much as you can, for it never fails
That the examples such books comprise Can help you to become more wise.

SUSAN GROAG BELL

References and Further Reading

- Dhuoda. Liber manualis: Handbook for Her Warrior Son, edited and translated by Marcelle Thiebaut. Cambridge medieval classics 8. Cambridge, U.K.; New York: Cambridge University Press, 1998.
- Francesco di Barberino. Regimento e costumi di donna. Turin: Loescher-Chiantore, 1957.
- de Pizan, Christine. The Writings of Christine de Pizan, edited by Cannon Willard. New York: Persea Books, 1994. See "Proverbs Moveaux," pp. 30–31.

See also Blanche of Castile; Book Ownership; Books of Hours; Christine de Pizan; Dhuoda; Education, Lay; Jerome, Influence of; Literacy and Reading; Vernacular

MUSIC, WOMEN AND

Music was part of women's everyday lives, just as it was for men. Songs, dancing, instrumental music, liturgical experiences: music of many types was available to people of all social classes. Much of the repertory is lost to us. Improvised and orally transmitted repertories made up the majority of musics available to Western culture. Hints of that lost legacy can be recovered from contemporary works of art and literature that depict music's varied social roles. Such evidence must be handled carefully, of course; the image of an angel consort holding instruments, like the description of a medieval banquet which enumerates such instruments, are each clearly fictionalized. Yet taken in toto, the many depictions of music-making bespeak the importance of music in the lives of the medieval populace.

Modern scholarship in music history has often emphasized composition over other professional musical roles (such as performance) and has emphasized the stylistically innovative and predominately “male” genres of the polyphonic mass and the polytextual motet in preference to the stylistically less innovative plainchant and song repertoires. As composers, of course, women’s access to training was limited by virtue of gender. Yet just as the choir boy was trained in the liturgy, so too was the choir girl, as can be seen especially clearly in the extensive repertory of polyphonic mass movements, sequences, and motets in the Las Huelgas Codex, copied for a Spanish Cistercian convent, for instance. Other monastic institutions had less elaborate liturgical performances centered primarily, if not exclusively, on plainchant, but under normal circumstances, women monastics participated actively in the liturgy of their communities. Many secular women musicians also obtained access to some form of musical training. Trobairitz (women song composers of the langue d’oc) took their place beside the troubadours, and ministrelles were active alongside the minstrels of the era.

For a few medieval women, an extensive corpus of music survives. The ninth-century Byzantine nun Kassia composed at least twenty-three liturgical chants. Hildegard of Bingen (1098–1178), too, is famous as a composer as well as an abbess, author, and mystic; seventy-seven of her musical works are available in a volume called the Symphonia harmoniae caelestium revelationum (Symphony of Harmony of Heavenly Revelations), and the Ordo virtutum (The Play of Virtues), perhaps her most famous work from a modern standpoint, is appended to the collection in one of her manuscripts. Still, the contributions of a majority of women composers are likely lost to us altogether or are found only as anonymous entries in the many broad anthologies of sacred and secular song. Indeed, it is principally among the many “women’s songs,” which adopt a woman’s point of view, that gender-identified authors and composers have left identifiable musical legacies for our modern consideration. That “Anonymous” might well be female has been the working premise behind recovery of plainchant repertoires and the identification of the circle of poet-musicians among the ladies in waiting at the court of Margaret of Scotland, for instance.

Scholarly attention to medieval women in their roles as audience, as patrons, and as performers—whether professional or amateur—has followed in the wake of feminist queries to the discipline. We now recognize the significance of a cultural leader the like of Eleanor of Aquitaine in directing the stylistic innovations in secular song, for instance. We recognize too the importance of dance and of social displays of musical knowledge in creating social and personal identities at court and in urban communities. Nuns, Beguines, and aristocrats all availed themselves of musical references in their correspondence and other writings; they likely had the opportunity as well to participate in music making, though they would not necessarily have considered themselves “musicians.”

CYNTHIA J. CYRUS

References and Further Reading

- Coldwell, Maria V. “Jouglerses and Trobairitz: Secular Musicians in Medieval France.” In Women Making Music: The Western Art Tradition, 1150–1950, edited by Jane Bowers and Judith Tick. Urbana and Chicago: University of Illinois Press, 1986, pp. 39–61.
- Higgins, Paula. “Parisian Nobles, a Scottish Princess, and the Woman’s Voice in Late Medieval Song.” Early Music History 10 (1991): 145–200.
- Holsinger, Bruce W. Music, Body, and Desire in Medieval Culture: Hildegard of Bingen to Chaucer. Stanford: Stanford University Press, 2001.
- Klinck, Anne L., and Ann Marie Rasmussen. Medieval Women’s Song: Cross-Cultural Approaches. The Middle Ages Series. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2002.
- Prizer, William F. “Games of Venus: Secular Vocal Music in the Late Quattrocento and Early Cinquecento.” The Journal of Musicology 9 (1991): 3–56.
- Schleifer, Martha Furman, and Sylvia Glickman. Women Composers: Music throughout the Ages, Composers Born before 1599. New York: G. K. Hall & Co., 1996.
- Yardley, Anne Bagnall. “‘Ful weel she soong the service dyvyne’: The Cloistered Musician in the Middle Ages.” In Women Making Music: The Western Art Tradition, 1150–1950, edited by Jane Bowers and Judith Tick. Urbana, Ill.: University of Illinois Press, 1986, pp. 15–38.

See also Charivari; Dance; Death, Mourning and Commemoration; Eleanor of Aquitaine; Ermengard; Hildegard of Bingen; Mary, Virgin; in Music; Minnesang; Monasticism and Nuns; Pastourelle; Performance in Lyric; Trobairitz and Troubadours; Woman’s Song

MUSLIM WOMEN: IBERIA

After the arrival of Muslim armies in Spain in 711, al-Andalus (Muslim Spain) flourished under Islamic rule until 1492, when the last Muslim Spanish kingdom, Granada, was conquered by King Ferdinand of Aragon and Queen Isabella of Castile. During the eight centuries of Muslim presence in Spain, a frontier region divided al-Andalus, in the southern peninsula, from Christian kingdoms in the north. The border shifted southward over time with the expansion of Christian-controlled territory. In many ways, medieval Iberian society was shaped by the presence of the frontier, by interreligious contacts, and by warfare.

Although it is likely that some women arrived with the Arab and Berber troops who first entered Iberia, there is no mention of any female presence in sources. Most likely, the female Muslim population in Spain grew over time through conversion. Once established in the Iberian peninsula, some Muslim settlers summoned Eastern wives and families to join them, but many intermarried with the local Visigothic and Hispano-Roman population, creating an ethnically and religiously diverse society under the rule of the Umayyad dynasty (751–1031).

Interreligious Marriage

Andalusi society was never exclusively Muslim, since Christians and Jews also lived as protected populations under Islamic rule. This circumstance, called convivencia (coexistence), created a situation in which interreligious contact was normal, although not always peaceful. Intermarriage of a Muslim man with a non-Muslim woman (rarely the other way around) was not uncommon in the early centuries of Muslim rule, and we know of some Andalusi rulers who married Christian princesses. The earliest example of this trend was the marriage between Abd al-Azîz b. Mûsâ, the first governor of al-Andalus, and Egilona, the wife (or perhaps daughter) of the last Visigothic king. This marriage may have helped to establish the legitimacy of Muslim political rule in Spain. There is no indication that Egilona converted to Islam after this marriage. Although conversion of a non-Muslim woman was desirable upon marriage to a Muslim, this was not required by Islamic law. Presumably many indigenous women did convert to Islam (though not necessarily because of marriage to a Muslim), since there is evidence of rapid overall conversion of the Andalusi population during the ninth and tenth centuries. However, there are records at least until the middle of the ninth century of interreligious marriages in which Christian women retained their religion after marriage. In such a case, children would normally be Muslim, but sometimes sons would be raised as Muslims while daughters could follow the religion of their mother.

Slave Women

This complicated situation seems to have created a degree of social and religious tension, especially in the capital city of Cordoba during the 850s. Over time, intermarriage was increasingly frowned upon by Andalusi religious scholars, and it became less common as the Muslim population grew and the numbers of indigenous Andalusi Christians (mozarabs) declined. Northern women also came to al-Andalus as slaves, captured or traded across the frontier. These women, who usually converted to Islam, served in various domestic capacities, and were sexually accessible to the master of the house. A slave woman who gave birth to a boy (thereafter known as umm walad) enjoyed special status and was freed from slavery. Perhaps the most famous Andalusi example was Subh, from the Christian kingdom of Navarre, who was a concubine of the Umayyad caliph al-Hakam II (d. 976) and mother of his heir, Hishâm II (d. 1013). She later served as regent for Hishâm during his minority, with the help of the chamberlain, al-Mansûr.

Sources

The scarcity of sources is a constant problem for investigating the lives of Andalusi Muslim women, as is also true for women in other regions of the medieval Islamic world. However, poems survive by a number of important female poets, including the Umayyad princess Wallâda (d. late eleventh century) and Hafsa bint al-Hâjj (d. 1190), both famous for their love poetry. Andalusi chronicles and memoirs also mention women at the royal court and in elite households, especially the mothers and wives of rulers, who often held considerable power behind the scenes. Itimâd al-Rumaykîya, for example, was said to share power with her husband, al-Mutamid, ruler of Seville (late eleventh century). Female religious scholars are listed in biographical lists of Andalusi intellectuals. These include Maryam and Zaynab, the wife and daughter of Ibn al-Arabî (early thirteenth century); Rayhâna, a Quranic scholar in eleventh-century Almeria; and Maryam bint Ibrâhîm al-Murâdî (d. 1150), a celebrated calligrapher. Educated women often served as teachers to other women. Legal sources include court cases and queries (fatwas) that mention women; records of pious foundations (waqfs) endowed by wealthy women, including patrons like al-Rumaykîya; and manuals of market law (hisba) that provide data on urban space, female labor, and segregation of the sexes. A handful of fourteenth- and fifteenth-century documents survive from Granada that show women as active participants in sales of land and houses, marriages, and divorces.

Conditions in al-Andalus

Although al-Andalus stood at the western edge of the Islamic world, the lives of Muslim women in medieval Iberia do not appear to have been fundamentally different from those of contemporary women elsewhere around the Muslim Mediterranean. The school of Islamic law that prevailed in Spain and North Africa (Maliki law) was somewhat stricter than the schools of law more common in the eastern Islamic world, but provisions concerning women were not strikingly dissimilar. In general, Muslim social and religious mores that affected the daily lives of women—attitudes towards religious practice, marriage and divorce, property and inheritance, legal status, education, work, etc.—would not have significantly differentiated women in al-Andalus from women in the Islamic East. Nevertheless, there are areas in which the status of Muslim women in al-Andalus may have been influenced by the Iberian context. The constant presence of the frontier, and the gradual southward encroachment of Christian kingdoms, added insecurity to the lives of all people living in contested regions. Because of the uncertainties of frontier life, Muslim jurists in border areas, such as Toledo, may have been more lenient in regulating such things as remarriage for women whose husbands were missing in action. Likewise, it has been suggested that the ethnic diversity of Andalusian society, especially the presence of Berbers and Christians, may have influenced attitudes towards genealogy and the legal status of women.

Muslim Women in Christian Spain

As the border moved south, many ordinary Muslims (now called mudejars) found themselves living in newly Christian territories, either through conquest or capture. This was a new Christianized version of convivencia. In an unusual case, the Muslim princess Zaida of Seville was taken by King Alfonso VI of Castile as a concubine, then later wife, in the early 1090s. Zaida became the mother of Alfonso's only son, and converted to Christianity, taking the name Elizabeth. Conditions varied by region, but Muslim communities living under Christian rule were generally protected and tolerated, at least until the early sixteenth century, and they were allowed to live according to Muslim law. However, Muslims also had access to Christian courts, and Christian documents show Muslims of both sexes bringing criminal and civil cases before Christian judges, often successfully. Nevertheless, the situation was unstable, especially for women. For example, if a Muslim woman lost contact with her family and community, she was at risk of becoming a prostitute in a Christian city. Other Muslims, both men and women, served as slaves or (in the case of women) concubines in Christian households. Perhaps this is one reason why the romanticized figure of the beautiful mora (Muslim woman) is a trope of late medieval Spanish literature.

OLIVIA REMIE CONSTABLE

References and Further Reading

- López de la Plaza, Gloria. Al-Andalus: mujeres, sociedad y religión. Malaga: Universidad de Malaga, 1992.
- Marin, Manuela. Mujeres en al-Andalus. Madrid: Consejo Superior de Investigaciones Científicas, 2000.
- Meyerson, Mark. "Prostitution of Muslim Women in the Kingdom of Valencia: Religious and Sexual Discrimination in a Medieval Plural Society." In The Medieval Mediterranean: Cross-Cultural Contacts, edited by Marilyn J. Chiat and Kathryn Reyerson. St. Cloud, Minn.: North Star Press, 1988, pp. 87–95.
- Nichols, James M. "Arabic Women Poets in al-Andalus." The Maghreb Review 4 (1979): 114–117.
- O'Connor, Isabel Bonet. "Between Whipping and Slavery: Double Jeopardy against Mudejar Women in Medieval Spain." In Women and the Colonial Gaze, edited by Tamara L. Hunt and Michelle R. Lessard. New York: New York University Press, 2002, pp. 29–37.
- Shatzmiller, Maya. "Women and Wage Labor in the Medieval Islamic West: Legal Issues in an Economic Context." Journal of Economic and Social History of the Orient 40.2 (1997): 174–206.
- Viguera, Maria Jesus. "Aluu li'l-maâlî: On the Social Status of Andalusian Women." In The Legacy of Muslim Spain, edited by Salma Khadra Jayyusi. Leiden: Brill, 1992, pp. 709–724.
- Viguera, Maria Jesus, ed. La mujer en al-Andalus. Seville: Universidad Autónoma de Madrid, 1989.
- Walther, Wiebke. Women in Islam. Montclair, N.J.: Abner Schram, 1981.

See also Epic, Spanish; Iberia; Literature, Iberian; Isabel I; Law, Islamic; Iberia; Marriage, Islamic; Iberia; Muslim Women: Western Literature; Slaves; Waladah Bint al-Mustakfi

MUSLIM WOMEN: WESTERN LITERATURE

Little information has survived about the role that Muslim women have played in western European history. Of the few historical cases that survive, most involve Muslim Spain (al-Andalus) and the cultural participation of some women in the rule of the Party Kings (taifas), that is, the twenty-three locally ruled kingdoms that followed the collapse of the Andalusian Umayyad caliphate in 1031. Generally seen as a prototype of aristocratic refinement, women's emancipation, and unexpected sexual freedom, Princess Walladah, daughter of the Umayyad caliph Al-Mustakfi III (d. 1025), openly entertained two male lovers (Ibn Zaydun and Ibn 'Abdus) and one female lover (Muhya). She had the following two verses embroidered with gold thread on her coat: "By God, I was created for great achievements. I walk my own path and cultivate my pride;" and "Whoever loves me, I give him the cup of my cheeks; and whomever I love, I give him my kisses" (Arjona Castro 25; translation mine).

Other Muslim women played a pivotal role in East-West relations and especially in crusader history. Such is the case of Shajarrat Al-Durr (d. 1258), who ruled Egypt for four months (November 1249 to February 1250) at the time of the sixth crusade. As Egypt was besieged by Saint Louis's crusader army, Shajarrat Ad-Durr concealed the death of her husband (al-Malik As-Salih Aiyub), defeated the French king on February 19, 1250, at Mansura, and ransomed him for one million bezants. She put an end to the Crusaders' presence in Egypt, regained Damietta, and restored peace in Egypt. Despite the extraordinary role Shajarrat Ad-Durr (and probably others like her for whom no record has survived) played in Egyptian, Mediterranean, and western European history, this Egyptian queen has received limited attention from historians of the Crusades, who have focused primarily on the role Western men played in these wars.

Western European literary texts, on the other hand, regularly depict Muslim or "Saracen" women as politically active. (The word Saracen remains appropriately ambiguous, referring to pagans and even to the remains of Roman architecture just as easily as to enemies from Hungary or the Holy Land or to the Normans.) Where Islam is concerned, the word Saracen loosely describes foreign, exotic women from an imprecise geographical location: the Levant, North Africa, or the Iberian peninsula. Its use in epic, romance, and lyric poetry reveals the degree of imagination (and deformation) that is involved in the literary portrayal of women from the Islamic world.

Saracen women, especially princesses, have become a commonplace of medieval Western literary criticism since the early twentieth century (these princesses include Bramimonde in the Song of Roland, Princess Orable in the Prise d'Orange, or Charlemagne's wife, Galiene, in the Pseudo-Turpin). However, critical appreciation of the role that they played in French epic (chansons de geste) and romance has changed dramatically over the last hundred years. While, in the nineteenth and early twentieth century, classical philology, with its nationalist drive, was interested in the description of literary genres and thus gave limited attention to women generally and to Saracen women in particular, folklore studies and interest in character types gave the Saracen princess a legitimate space (albeit limited) in the critical analyses of the chansons de geste. Nevertheless, this critical approach regarded all non-Christian characters in a similar manner, and subordinated them to the male Christian white hero, his conquests, and the hegemony of Christendom. Saracen women especially were seen as nothing more than ornamental exotic details that were irrelevant to the overall literary story of conquest and success. Only in the late 1970s, with the development of post-colonial and feminist studies as well as with the increasing awareness of the sociopolitical dimensions of literature as a cultural artifact (pioneered by the late Edward Said), did the character of the Saracen princess become an integral part of critical discourse.

Since that time, the role of the Sarrasine has been reevaluated. The durable popularity of the Saracen princess in the Western literary imagination may well be due to the varied roles this character played in different texts (see Ramey). If she is physically indistinguishable from Christian romance heroines (white skin, dazzling beauty), she differs in the extraordinary agency and boldness that she displays. Even as she disrupts masculine narratives and becomes involved in adulterous liaisons (she has been coined a "rebellious heroine" by the critic Vallecalle), the Sarrasine is reformed in the end of most chansons de geste, baptized, and married to a Christian knight. Contrary to her Christian counterpart, the Sarrasine's independence and rebelliousness are praised since they are the means to enhance and firmly establish Christianity. Her love for the married Christian knight and resulting adultery, which are often at the heart of medieval epics and romances, are not perceived to be immoral, but rather seen as strategic ideological solutions to Frankish colonial conquest, expansion, and triumph (see Kinoshita). The Sarrasine is thus instrumental to proving Western religious, cultural, and moral hegemony.

The representation of Saracen women in Western literary production tells us much about the complex relations between western Europe and the Islamic East in the Middle Ages and reveals the extent to which the crucial role played by some historical Muslim women has been downplayed and reconstructed to benefit European expansion and hegemony and the ultimate triumph of Christianity.

SAHAR AMER

References and Further Reading

- Arjona Castro, Antonio. La Sexualidad en la España musulmana. Córdoba: Fuente de Las Piedras, 1985.
- De Weever, Jacqueline. Sheba's Daughters: Whitening and Demonizing the Saracen Woman in Medieval French Epic. New York: Garland, 1998.
- Kinoshita, Sharon. "The Politics of Courtly Love: La Prise d'Orange and the Conversion of the Saracen Queen." Romantic Review 86.2 (1995): 265–288.
- Metlitzki, Dorothee. The Matter of Araby in Medieval England. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1977.
- Ramey, Lynn. Christian, Saracen and Genre in Medieval French Literature. New York: Routledge, 2001.
- Vallecalle, Jean-Claude. "Rupture et intégration: L'héroïne révoltée dans les chansons de geste." In Charlemagne in the North, edited by Philip Bennett, Anne E. Colby, and Graham Runnalls. Edinburgh: Société Rencesvals, 1993, pp. 449–461.
- Wasserstein, David. The Rise and Fall of the Party-Kings: Politics and Society in Islamic Spain, 1002–1086. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1985.

See also Cross-Cultural Approaches; Crusades and Crusading Literature; Epic, Old French; Floire and Blancheflor; Iberia; Literature, Iberian; Marriage, Islamic; Iberia; Muslim Women: Iberia

MYSTICISM AND MYSTICS

The word mysticism is derived from the ancient Greek muv, "to close," more specifically "to close the eyes," and refers in its earliest uses to things that are hidden or secret. These early references pertain to the ancient mystery religions. So, for example, the fifth-century-BCE Greek historian Thucydides calls the rituals of the mystery religions ta mustika; and, in the first century BCE, another Greek historian, Strabo, names those initiated into these religions oi mustikoi. In both cases, the terms refer solely to ritual secrets and those who have access to them. That which is hidden is the details of the ritual, not esoteric, meanings to which they refer.

Early Christian writers take the terms over directly from the mystery religions, yet use them to surprisingly different ends. One might expect that early Christian ritual practice would be referred to as "mystical" and participants as "mystics," but instead the adjectival form is used to describe certain layers of meaning within the Bible and particular kinds of biblical interpretation. The Alexandrian theologian Clement (d. c. 215) refers to the "mystical interpretation" of scripture; and, in the following generation, Origen (c. 185–254), also from Alexandria, writes of the "mystical meaning" of scripture. In both instances, the hidden meaning of scripture, laid bare by allegorical interpretation, is Christ together with the mystery of his Incarnation and the further truths made available through that saving event. Only later is the term mystical used to describe Christian ritual and then predominantly to name the meaning of the Eucharist—the presence of the Incarnate Christ within the sacrament.

In its modern usages mysticism most often refers to some kind of extraordinary experience of the divine or of union with God, with mystics being those who undergo such experiences. As the historian Louis Bouyer demonstrates, the move to experience occurs in the early Christian literature itself precisely through exegetical and liturgical practices. Clement and Origen describe as "mystical" that spiritual knowledge attained through allegorical interpretation of the Bible, understood as the method for uncovering the hidden meanings or secrets of scripture. For Clement and Origen, both the secret or hidden things and the process by which one comes to know them are mystical.

Origen is the first to use the term mystical clearly to describe direct experiential knowledge of God, yet for him one always comes to this experiential knowledge through the allegorical or mystical interpretation of scripture. So in his Commentary on John he claims that Jesus Christ is "the high priest of the order of Melchisedek . . . our guide in mystical and ineffable contemplation." Through the correct interpretation of scripture, itself guided by Christ, "ineffable and mystical visions give joy and impart enthusiasm." By the time that Gregory of Nyssa (c. 335–394) writes of the "mystical contemplation of the Song of Songs," interpretation and experience have become inseparable, a merger most famously articulated in the late-fifth- or early-sixth-century textual corpus ascribed to Dionysius the Areopagite. There the heart of scripture and of the liturgy, present but veiled, is the mystical truth of God, rendered accessible to human beings through the saving Incarnation of Christ.

Yet in late antiquity and the Middle Ages, women were generally not allowed to interpret scripture. For most of the history of the Christian tradition, in fact, misogynist assumptions barred women from holding most church offices, from serving as preachers and teachers to mixed audiences of men and women except on very rare occasions, and from attending the elite educational institutions in which the methods of scriptural exegesis and theological reasoning were generally taught.

Despite these prohibitions, women and the men who supported them discovered various ways to justify women's religious leadership, most often through an appeal to mystical experience. Key was the presumption, supported by biblical texts, that women might be the recipients of special graces (especially—but by no means only—those women who dedicated themselves to God as virgins). In the twelfth and thirteenth centuries we find the argument that if God chose to give women visions, to bestow prophecies on them, or to render himself one with them, then women might also be permitted—indeed even be called on—to speak and write of these things. As a result, women’s lived experience of Christian truth became one of the primary means through which they were empowered to speak publicly, to teach, and to write. For women, then, the experiential aspect of the mystical is necessarily distinct from its exegetical base. Rather than arguing that mystical contemplation came to them through their interpretation of scripture, many medieval women mystics claimed that they came to understand scripture through their visionary and mystical experience.

This is the background against which the substantive “mysticism” emerged in the seventeenth century. Only then was mysticism articulated as a specific mode of theologizing, one grounded in individual experience rather than in scripture, the Holy Spirit’s revelations to the Catholic Church, or the rational exposition of revelation. Michel de Certeau, who demonstrates that the term mysticism emerged only in the early modern period, argues that the shift was the result of the breakdown of medieval theological hierarchies. According to de Certeau, late medieval theology rendered systematic a series of distinctions between symbolic theology, in which sensible things lead to knowledge of God; scholastic theology, which makes use of ideas (the intelligible realm) to the same end; and mystical theology, understood as the perfection of divine knowledge in contemplation. Just as Clement and Origen argue that one must move through the scripture to mystical contemplation, so Bonaventure and other late medieval mystical theologians argue that one must move through the sensible and the intelligible to a fuller apprehension of God.

In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries this hierarchically ordered conception of theology broke down and instead there emerged three competing methods of doing theology: positive or historical, scholastic, and mystical. The first relies on scripture and the revelations of the church, the second on philosophical and analytic articulations of these revealed truths, and the third on experience. Mysticism was no longer the fruition of all theological knowledge, but an alternative means of attaining that knowledge. Again, experience as an alternative source for knowledge of the divine was particularly prominent among late medieval and early modern women, whose visionary, auditory, and unitive experiences both legitimated and provided the subject matter for their teachings. Many scholars now hypothesize that the prominence of mystical experience within the writings of religious women played a crucial role in the development of early modern conceptions of mysticism.

Women, Gender, and Mysticism in the Middle Ages

With few exceptions, the first women writers in the West were Christian mystics, women who claimed just such extraordinary experiences of God’s presence or of union with God. Of course, not all Christian mystics were women. But women were central to Christian mystical traditions throughout the Middle Ages and into the modern era. Through their writings, oral teachings, and practices, mystics were often leaders and innovators within women’s monasteries and beguinages (Beguines were semireligious women who lived singly or in groups) and also within spiritual communities that included men. Sometimes known only in their own religious houses or local regions, a handful of female mystics were famous throughout western Europe. Hildegard of Bingen (1098–1179), for example, was in contact with the Pope and with Bernard of Clairvaux (1090–1153), arguably the most powerful religious leader of the twelfth century. With the support of these and other ecclesiastical leaders, Hildegard not only wrote extensive visionary works but also went on preaching tours throughout Germany and Swabia. The Italian Dominican tertiary Catherine of Siena (1347–1380) went further, writing to and advising not only male and female religious but lay leaders and even the pope himself.

We know about medieval women mystics from a variety of different kinds of sources. The vast majority of these are hagiographical texts, often written for specific communities and narrowly circulated. Simone Roisin argues for the efflorescence of what she calls “mystical hagiographies” in the Low Countries during the thirteenth century, and arguably the subgenre continues throughout the Middle Ages, often, although certainly not always, taking women as its subjects. As the ecclesiastical hierarchies centered in Rome took greater control over canonization proceedings, those local communities seeking wider recognition for their holy women applied to bishops or papal legates for consideration of their case. In some instances, this led to official papal inquiries concerning the claims of mystical saints, providing yet another layer of evidence about the lives of such women. Other secondhand reports can be found in chronicles, monastic books of the dead, the so-called sister books of the fourteenth century (group hagiographies depicting the sanctity of generations of women within specific religious communities), letters, polemical writings, sermons, and devotional texts produced for or used by women. Devotional images and objects also provide evidence about women's spiritual practices. Finally, women mystics themselves wrote texts in a wide variety of genres, among them letters, poems, visionary books, devotional treatises, and allegorical dramas. Although often mediated—sometimes in ways we cannot fully gauge—by male confessors or other confidants, these texts provide the best access we have to how women mystics understood themselves and their experiences.

Arguments for specifically feminine forms of mystical experience began in the medieval period and they continue to influence scholarship, if only indirectly. In 1415 the French prelate Jean Gerson, himself an author of mystical treatises and guidebooks, attacked women's putatively overly sensory and erotic experiences of the divine, as well as the teaching, preaching, and writing they authorized. Although Gerson claimed that he did not wish to silence women entirely, but merely to “bridle” their speech with tight clerical control, the basis for later distinctions between male and female styles of mysticism is clearly already in place in the early fifteenth century.

Modern scholars routinely repeat distinctions like those made by Gerson and tend to divide mysticism into two types: affective, emotional, visionary, and often erotic forms of mysticism, associated with femininity and with women; and speculative, intellectual, often explicitly antivisionary forms of mysticism, associated with masculinity and with men. The evidence, particularly that of male- and female-authored mystical texts, does not fit the model. So, for example, Bernard of Clairvaux, the greatest of the many male monastic commentators on the Song of Songs, both initiated and provided the vocabulary and images for the erotic mysticism of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. The thirteenth-century Beguine Marguerite Porete (d. 1310), on the other hand, eschewed visionary experience and erotic ecstasies in favor of an absolute union of the annihilated soul with God. The German Dominican Meister Eckhart (c. 1260–1328), often taken as the greatest of speculative mystics, was profoundly influenced by women of a visionary and ecstatic nature, as well as by Porete.

Perhaps most crucially, even visionary and ecstatic mystics usually included within their texts the call for a move through the visionary to another kind of more ineffable experience of divine union. The thirteenth-century Beguine visionary Hadewijch, for example, describes a vision in which the Eucharist comes to her in human form and then is “naughted” as the soul and Christ become indistinguishable from each other. Similarly, the Italian laywoman Angela of Foligno (d. 1310) records the movement of her soul from ecstatic, spiritually apprehended experiences of God's presence to their “unsaying” in the darkness of Christ's eyes.

Hadewich's and Angela's understanding of the relationship between the visionary and its “unsaying” emerges out of a distinction first found in Dionysius the Areopagite. Dionysius articulates two modes of naming God: cataphasis, in which names are positively attributed to the divine, and apophasis, in which all attributes are “unsaid” or denied in order to mark the illimitability of God's Being. For Dionysius, this works itself out in terms of an interplay between the biblical and philosophical names for God and their negation in the movement of mystical theology. Medieval mystics like Eckhart similarly work with attributes derived from the Bible and from philosophical speculation on the nature of God.

Yet women were prohibited by the Church from engaging in the interpretation of scripture and did not generally have access to philosophical education. In addition, medical, philosophical, and theological opinion throughout the Middle Ages held that women were more porous and imaginative than men and therefore open to possession, whether divine or demonic, and to spiritual visions, auditions, and other sensations. The confluence of theological and medical arguments about women's capacities and limitations led to a situation in which women's experiences of God's presence became the text that they interpreted, both cataphatically and apophatically. Dionysius and Eckhart grounded their apophatic practice in the reading of scripture; women like Hadewijch and Angela used their daily liturgical and meditative practices—both biblically based—to engender authorizing experiences that then became texts to be unsaid in the pursuit of a closer, less mediated, experience of God.

Action and Contemplation in Medieval Women's Mysticism

The denigration of affective, visionary, and ecstatic forms of mysticism generally associated with women is also tied to its putative escapism. Debates concerning the putative “quietism” of the mystical life often appear in discussions of the story of Mary and Martha (Luke 10:38–42), early interpreted as an allegory of the contemplative and active lives. Following Jesus' approbation of Mary (who sits at his feet to listen to his teaching) over Martha (who rushes to prepare a meal for her visitor), late antique and medieval commentators argue that the life of contemplation is higher than that of action. Yet they insist that as long as one lives on earth, one must take care of the body and of one's neighbor.

The thirteenth- and fourteenth-century women's movement in northern Europe, a hotbed of women's mystical activity, struggled with just this problem. The Beguines, in particular, like the new Franciscan and Dominican orders, desired to live actively in the world, serving others and bringing them to God. Yet medical opinions about women's bodily weakness and porousness—the same views that rendered women likely sites of divine possession—also rendered them susceptible to physical and spiritual danger. The kind of active ministry pursued by Francis and his male followers—preaching, hearing confessions, and caring for the sick and poor—was deemed unsuitable for women. In the hagiographies of the early Beguines (those mystical hagiographies studied by Roisin), women struggle to serve others and to live in absolute poverty, dependent on alms or the labor of their own hands for survival, despite the demands of local bishops and monastic authorities that they succumb to some form of enclosure. (Male hagiographers tend to associate the former with Martha and the latter with Mary.)

These same hagiographies, however, show the Beguines engaged in meditative practice, asceticism, and prayer while living in the world. Religious adepts, these women strive for and achieve experiences of divine presence and union. In response to the peculiar dilemmas posed by the church for religious women, the Beguines sought to bring together the active and the contemplative lives in new ways. The Beguines found ways to articulate the life of contemplation as itself a form of action, action through which they redeemed souls from purgatory and cared for their spiritual children on earth. They thereby enacted the union of Mary and Martha. (Similar patterns can be found in the lives and writings of women associated with the Dominican and Franciscan orders.)

Even more radically, the Beguine writer Marguerite Porete argues that those activities generally associated with action—care for the poor, the sick, and one's religious community—and those associated with contemplation—participation in the sacramental system, asceticism, meditation, and prayer—were all forms of action from which the soul seeking annihilation must become detached. This tradition culminates in Eckhart's Sermon 86, a radical rereading of the story of Mary and Martha in which he argues that Martha was favored by Christ, for she was so detached from all creaturely things and hence so entirely one with the divine that she was able to work in the world as Christ himself.

Ironically, Porete's and Eckhart's insistence on the union of action and contemplation leads to their denigration of visions and ecstasies. Both argue that enjoying the delights of the spiritual senses and experiences of God's special presence distract from the pursuit of annihilation or detachment. Thus, for Eckhart, Mary is less advanced than Martha, for she still becomes so caught up in spiritual delights as to be unable to do anything else. Only Martha truly combines action and contemplation. Porete is characteristically unyielding in her language. She describes seven stages of the soul, the fourth representing what many wrongly take to be the heights of the religious life:

The fourth state occurs when the Soul is drawn up by the height of love into the delight of thought through meditation and relinquishes all labors of the outside and of obedience to another through the height of contemplation . . . So the Soul holds that there is no higher life than to have this over which she has lordship. For Love has so greatly satisfied her with delights that she does not believe that God has a greater gift to give to this soul here below than such a love as Love has poured out within her through love." (Porete, Chapter 118)

This state, representative of the visions and ecstasies that follow meditative practice, is exceedingly dangerous for the soul. Freedom and nobility are attained only with the death of the spirit, which requires detachment from both external and internal works. The soul then becomes the place where God works in the world.

Porete was condemned as a relapsed heretic and burned at the stake in Paris' Place de Grève in 1310. Despite the edict commanding that all copies of her book be destroyed, it survived anonymously, to be rediscovered by the twentieth-century scholar Romana Guarnieri. It is unlikely that Porete directly influenced the gendering of mysticism that we find in theologians like Gerson. Yet the distinction between visionary and ecstatic experiences and a demand for annihilation, detachment, or union without distinction between God and the soul was anticipated in debates about the nature of religious experience emerging out of the thirteenth-century women's religious movement. Neither Porete nor Eckhart genders this distinction; both speak to women and assume that women are capable of attaining absolute freedom, simplicity, and detachment. Nor are the two kinds of experiences understood as being antithetical to each other. Even Porete, who is a vocal critic of "spiritual delights," recognizes that they represent a necessary stage on the path toward annihilation.

Yet the condemnation of Porete and of certain of Eckhart's teachings, particularly those dealing with an uncreated aspect of the soul that is always one with the ground of the divine, demonstrates the dangers their views pose, especially for women. During the later Middle Ages, women's religious authority depended on extraordinary visionary, auditory, or somatic experiences of God. Without such experiences and their approbation by male clerics increasingly trained to "read" the female body and soul, women had no legitimate authority within medieval religious culture. Hence the proliferation of visionary, ecstatic, and "autohagiographical" texts in the centuries following Porete's and Eckhart's condemnations, and the increasing association of these forms of visionary, ecstatic, and corporeal spirituality with women (although not, it should be noted, without signs of continued resistance). The association of women with certain types of mysticism is the result, then, not of a putatively universal femininity, but of the specific social and cultural constraints that women faced in the medieval and early modern periods.

AMY HOLLYWOOD

References and Further Reading

- Angela of Foligno. Complete Works, translated by Paul Lachance. New York: Paulist Press, 1993.
- Bouyer, Louis. "Mysticism: An Essay on the History of the Word." In Understanding Mysticism, edited by Richard Woods. Garden City, N.Y.: Image Books, 1980, pp. 42–55.
- Bynum, Caroline Walker. Jesus as Mother: Studies in the Spirituality of the High Middle Ages. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1982.
- . Holy Feast and Holy Fast: The Religious Significance of Food to Medieval Women. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1987.
- de Certeau, Michel. "Mysticism." Diacritics 22 (1992): 11–25.
- Elliott, Dyan. Proving Women: Female Spirituality and Inquisitorial Culture in the Later Middle Ages. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 2004.
- Gregory of Nyssa. Commentary on the Song of Songs, translated by Casimir McCambley. Brookline, Mass.: Hellenic College Press, 1987.
- Hadewijch. The Complete Works, translated by Mother Columba Hart. New York: Paulist Press, 1980.
- Hamburger, Jeffrey. The Rothschild Canticles: Art and Mysticism in Flanders and the Rhineland circa 1300. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1990.
- Hollywood, Amy. The Soul as Virgin Wife: Mechthild of Magdeburg, Marguerite Porete, and Meister Eckhart. Notre Dame, Ind.: Notre Dame University Press, 1995.
- . Sensible Ecstasy: Mysticism, Sexual Difference, and the Demands of History. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2002.
- McGinn, Bernard. The Flowering of Mysticism: Men and Women in the New Mysticism, 1200–1350. New York: Crossroads, 1998.
- Meister Eckhart. Meister Eckhart: Teacher and Preacher, translated by Bernard McGinn, with Frank Tobin and Elvira Borgstädt. New York: Paulist Press, 1986.
- Mooney, Catherine, ed. Gendered Voices: Medieval Saints and Their Interpreters. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999.
- Newman, Barbara. Sister of Wisdom: Hildegard of Bingen's Theology of the Feminine. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1987.
- . From Virile Woman to WomanChrist: Studies in Medieval Religion and Literature. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1995.
- Origen. Commentary on the Gospel According to John, translated by Ronald E. Heine. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America Press, 1989–1993.
- Petroff, Elizabeth Alvilda, ed. Medieval Women's Visionary Literature. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- Porete, Marguerite. The Mirror of Simple Souls, translated by Ellen Babinsky. New York: Paulist Press, 1993.
- Pseudo-Dionysius. The Complete Works, translated by Colm Luibheid. New York: Paulist Press, 1987.
- Roisin, Simone. L'Hagiographie cistercienne dans le diocèse de Liège au XIIIe siècle. Louvain: Bibliothèque de l'Université, 1947.

See also Angela of Foligno; Autohagiography; Beguines; Bride of Christ: Imagery; Catherine of Siena; Church; Devotional Practices; Gerson, Jean; Hadewijch; Hagiography; Hildegard of Bingen; Julian of Norwich; Marguerite Porete; Mary and Martha; Mystics' Writings; Ordination of Women as Priests; Sermons and Preaching; Sister-Books and Other Convent Chronicles; Song of Songs, Medieval Interpretations of Theology

MYSTICS' WRITINGS

The majority of women's mystical writings were composed after the 1200s, along with the development of an increasing number of texts produced by or about women in Latin and in vernacular languages. The subjects of mystics' texts varied greatly and include hagiographies, visions, prose chronicling the life and experiences of the mystic, poetry, songs, and letters. Although there was no single recognizable quality that would clearly delimit the style or genre that we associate with mystics' writings, certain patterns emerged that form recognizable traits. These included the emphasis on understanding Christ's suffering; a desire to unite with Christ (unio mystica); a longing to imitate Christ's passion (imitatio Christi) or to exemplify the apostolic life (vita apostolica) and become the living example of God's word, an importance ascribed to the materiality of the body (both the mystic's and Christ's) and to visual realms; and a remarkable inventiveness in Latin and vernacular languages. The writings of Beatrice of Nazareth and Hadewijch represented inaugural works in the Dutch language. Julian's was the first autobiographical text by a woman in the English language.

While many texts that bore witness to mystics' activity remain, we can assume that a significant number of texts and testimonies have not survived, due to what may have been the nonorthodox nature of some, the fact that many women may not have had access to writing or a scribe, the problematic nature of women's status as authors, especially with regard to theological doctrine, or to the lack of importance ascribed to women's texts in general. In addition, texts could survive that we do not yet recognize as having been composed by women, since the author's name may have been stripped when translated into Latin by clerics in order to be given a more theologically regulated and universal status, as was the case for the Latin version of Marguerite Porete's Mirror of Simple Souls. Mystics like Julian, who claimed the status of illiterati, were not necessarily illiterate, but used this humilitas formula to mean that they were not officially trained in scholastic theology or Latin, thereby subtly negotiating with church authority in order to find a less controversial position for voicing theological issues.

Because the writings of many medieval women mystics were mediated through male scribes and confessors, or even through nuns (as are sections of Gertrude of Helfta's The Herald of Divine Love), they were not always handed down in a form that gives us a clearly unmediated voice. Certain manuscript versions of the texts of Birgitta of Sweden, Mechthild of Magdeburg, and Gertrude of Helfta seem to have survived without an overly intervening hand; however, with a few exceptions, the majority of women mystics' texts were verified, authorized, or translated by a male scribe, confessor, or editor over which the mystic may or may not have had a degree of influence. Angela of Foligno constantly interjects when Brother A, her scribe and translator, seems to err; the interrelation between scribe and mystic may thus become part of the narrative itself, as is the case for Margery Kempe. While mystics' texts can be seen as a kind of dialogue between male and female voices, the fact that medieval notions of authorship differ considerably from modern ones and more closely resemble what we think of today as composing and dictating makes demarcating the line between mystic and scribe a problematic task. Autograph texts, fragments, and letters of male and female mystics' writings exist (as is the case for Birgitta of Sweden's Revelations, a letter of Francis of Assisi, and Teresa of Avila's The Interior Castle), but these are most likely due to their status as relics. Autograph texts of male and female mystics were habitually considered as drafts for secretaries or scribes to recopy, render more legible, or translate. Comparing the vernacular text with the Latin version may be particularly revealing, as is the case for Mechthild of Magdeburg's Flowing Light of the Godhead and Beatrice of Nazareth's Seven Ways of Loving God.

The question of scribal mediation is further complicated in that the mystic's text is, in essence, a message transmitted through her, which must be transmitted to her surrounding community. Thus, the denuding of voice of the text, of a first-person narrative, goes hand in hand with the status of the mystic as "transcriber" of a divine message that does not bear the mystic's signature, but rather God's. In addition, the tendency to write in the third person in visionary narratives may draw from a longstanding tradition that stems from Paul in 2 Cor. of communicating visions in the third person, but at the same time, it presents a means for women to negotiate with conflicts with regard to authority or immediacy of the divine through a veiled distance or humility that conformed to a narrative tradition.

Finally, the loss of the proper name is thematically significant for a mystic like Porete, who, in her Mirror of Simple Souls, desires to lose her name, since expropriation of the will and self falls in line with the becoming simple of the soul in order to more closely resemble God. Thus, the question of voice and authority in mystics' writings must also take into consideration questions of narrative strategy.

PATRICIA DAILEY

References and Further Reading

- Barratt, Alexandra, "Continental Women Mystics and English Readers." In The Cambridge Companion to Medieval Women's Writing, edited by Carolyn Dinshaw and David Wallace. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2003, pp. 91–108.
- Beckwith, Sarah. "Problems of Authority in Late Medieval English Mysticism: Agency and Authority in The Book of Margery Kempe." Exemplaria 4 (1992): 171–200.
- Benedict, Kimberly M. Empowering Collaborations: Writing Partnerships between Religious Women and Scribes in the Middle Ages. New York: Routledge, 2005.
- Colledge, Edmund, and Romana Guarnieri. "The Glosses by 'M.N.' and Richard Methley to The Mirror of Simple Souls." Archivio italiano per la storia della pieta 5 (1968): 357–382.
- de Hemptinne, Thérèse, and María Eugenia Góngora, eds. The Voice of Silence: Women's Literacy in a Men's Church. Turnhout: Brepols, 2004.
- Ferrante, Joan. To the Glory of Her Sex: Women's Roles in the Composition of Medieval Texts. Bloomington, Ind.: Indiana University Press, 1997.
- Gill, Katherine. "Women and the Production of Religious Literature in the Vernacular, 1300–1500." In Creative Women in Medieval and Early Modern Italy, edited

- by Ann Matter and Ann Coakley. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1994, pp. 64–104.
- Hirsch, John C. “Author and Scribe in The Book of Margery Kempe.” Medium Aevum 44 (1975): 145–150.
- Kline, Barbara. “Editing Women’s Visions: Some Thoughts on the Transmission of Female Mystics’ Texts.” Magistra 2.1 (1996): 3–23.
- Lochrie, Karma. “The Book of Margery Kempe: The Marginal Woman’s Quest for Literary Authority.” Journal of Medieval and Renaissance Studies 16 (1986): 33–55.
- McGinn, Bernard. The Flowering of Mysticism: Men and Women in the New Mysticism—1200–1350. New York: Crossroads, 1998.
- . “The Changing Shape of Late Medieval Mysticism.” Church History 65.2 (1996): 197–219.
- Mooney, Catherine M. “Brother A. in the Composition of Angela of Foligno’s Revelations.” In Creative Women in Medieval and Early Modern Italy, edited by E. Ann Matter and Ann Coakley. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1994, pp. 34–63.
- Poor, Sara S. Mechthild of Magdeburg and Her Book: Gender and the Making of Textual Authority. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania, 2004.
- Riddy, Felicity. “Julian of Norwich and Self-Textualization.” In Editing Women, edited by Anne M. Hutchison. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1998, pp. 101–124.
- . “‘Publication’ before Print: The Case of Julian of Norwich.” In The Uses of Script and Print, 1300–1700, edited by Alexandra Walsham. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2004, pp. 29–49.
- Staley Johnson, Lynn. “The Trope of the Scribe and the Question of Literary Authority in the Works of Julian of Norwich and Margery Kempe.” Speculum 66.4 (1991): 820–838.
- . Margery Kempe’s Dissenting Fictions. University Park, Pa.: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1994.
- Stargardt, Ute. “Male Clerical Authority in the Spiritual (Auto)biographies of Medieval Holy Women.” In Women as Protagonists and Poets in the German Middle Ages: An Anthology of Feminist Approaches to Middle High German Literature, edited by Albrecht Classen. Kümmerle: Göppingen, 1991, pp. 209–238.
- Summit, Jennifer. “Women and Authorship.” In The Cambridge Companion to Medieval Women’s Writing, edited by Carolyn Dinshaw and David Wallace. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2003, pp. 91–108.
- Wilson, Katharina M., ed. Medieval Women Writers. Athens, Ga.: University of Georgia Press, 1984.

See also Ancrene Wisse; Anchoresses; Angela of Foligno; Autohagiography; Beatrice of Nazareth; Beguines; Birgitta of Sweden; Catherine of Genoa; Catherine of Siena; Christina of Markyate; Ebner, Margaretha; Hadewijch; Hagiography; Heretics and Heresy; Julian of Norwich; Kempe, Margery; Laywomen, Religious: Marguerite Porete; Marie of Oignies; Mechthild of Magdeburg; Minnesang; Nuns as Scribes; Prophets; Women Authors: German Texts; Women Authors: Italian Texts; Women Authors: Latin Texts; Women Authors: Middle English Texts; Women Authors: Old French Texts; Women Authors: Spanish Texts

MYTHOLOGY, MEDIEVAL RECEPTION OF

Greco-Roman mythology—often denigrated as paganism by Christian authors such as St. Augustine, in De civitate Dei (On the City of God)—was transmitted in the Middle Ages through three vehicles. First was the transmission of the classical authors (primarily Virgil, Horace, Lucan, Statius, Boethius, Martianus Capella, and, in the later Middle Ages, Ovid) as texts for learning Latin grammar in monastic schools and then universities. Second were scholastic glosses on the classics, in addition to commentaries and mythological handbooks that explained to scholars and poets the literal and moral (or allegorical) significance of gods and heroes. Many of these handbooks were organized—as was the twelfth-century Third Vatican Mythography—by name of god and ordered within a narrative hierarchy that began with the outermost planet (Saturn) and moved downward, toward the earth; or that began, like Giovanni Boccaccio’s unfinished De genealogiae gentilium deorum (On the genealogy of the gentile gods), with the paterfamilias of the gods and traced the genealogy of his offspring. Third, in allegorical Latin and vernacular poetry the gods and heroes transform into personifications (for example, Amor, or Cupid, the son of Venus) who interact with a (male) persona, often the author (Amaunt the Lover, Dante, Geoffrey Chaucer, John Gower); the persona struggles with some psychological problem or crisis on his narrative journey. The late medieval reception of classical mythology depended upon poetic techniques that constructed another world in which subjective experiences, spiritual or courtly, played out for the poet and his readers’ edification.

Because medieval scholars and educated poets were generally male, and women, even Latin-literate women, were not educated in the universities, the reception, explanation, and use of mythology in the Middle Ages was conventionally gendered male. The misogyny characteristic of patriarchal institutions like the Church and the university encouraged the portrayal and interpretation of female mythological figures as objects of sexual desire, or as agents of self-destruction through desire for them—or else, when they were compared in patristic glosses to the Virgin Mary, as idealized agents of man’s virtue and salvation. Scholars Fulgentius, Remigius of Auxerre, Pierre Bersuire, and Robert Holkot, among others, maintained this dehumanizing attitude toward women in mythological glosses on Virgil, Martianus Capella, Ovid, and books of the Bible.

With the beginnings of early humanism in Italy, France, and England—which saw the rise of the vernacular and broadened literacy among royal queens, women patrons, and other noble women—a newly created audience of female readers demanded more books for and about women. Dante, in his fourteenth-century Divina Commedia, modeled his epic on that of Virgil's Aeneid, but substituted, for Aeneas's guide through Elysium, Virgil as his own guide through hell and most of purgatory and, then, Beatrice—an object of his own amor courtois—through heaven. Boccaccio wrote De claris mulieribus (On famous women), adapting classical stories of women to his own monomyth of Fortune as a blind and capricious female goddess. Chaucer, as a court poet, wrote in Troilus and Criseyde more sensitively than preceding poets and scholars about the Trojan widow and daughter of the traitor Calchas, Criseyde, who falls in love with the Trojan prince Troilus. Chaucer, however, then reveals false Criseyde succumbing to the wiles of the Greek hero Diomedes, and Chaucer's treatment of her apparently irritated the women of the court so much that as courtly penance he began writing his unfinished version of Ovid's Heroides, The Legend of Good Women.

Finally, one known woman scholar and poet emerged at the end of the Middle Ages who “remythicized” classical figures (Hans Robert Jauss's term). The fifteenth-century Franco-Italian poet Christine de Pizan—one of whose patrons was Queen Isabelle of France—celebrates the Amazons as female leaders who excelled in war, along with many other female mythological figures, queens, and saints, in her Cité des Dames (City of Ladies) (1405). Christine's most famous work was the Epistre Othea (The Letter of Othea) (1399), in which this invented goddess of wisdom draws upon the epistolary structure of Ovid's Heroides to write not a love letter to a man but an educational letter to the fifteen-year-old Trojan prince Hector in which she moralizes and allegorizes one hundred mythological fables drawn from Ovid's

Metamorphoses, but in which she empowers the female and reveals male weaknesses and errors. As a scholar she and Jean Gerson, chancellor of the University of Paris, argued in a famous epistolary debate about the Roman de la Rose against the dehumanization of the female in scholastic allegorization.

JANE CHANCE

References and Further Reading

- Blumenfeld-Kosinski, Renate. Reading Myth: Classical Mythology and Its Interpretations in Medieval French Literature. Stanford, Ca: Stanford University Press, 1997.
- Chance, Jane. “Illuminated Royal Manuscripts of the Early Fifteenth Century and Christine de Pizan's Remythification of Classical Women in Cité des Dames.” In Contexts and Continuities: Proceedings of the IVth International Colloquium on Christine de Pizan (Glasgow 21-27 July 2000), published in honour of Liliane Dulac, edited by Angus J. Kennedy with Rosalind Brown-Grant, James C. Laidlaw, and Catherine M. Müller. Glasgow University Medieval French Texts and Studies 1. Glasgow: University of Glasgow Press, 2002, pp. 203–242.
- . Medieval Mythography, vols. 1-2. Gainesville, Fla.: University Press of Florida, 1994 and 2000.
- . The Mythographic Chaucer: The Fabulation of Sexual Politics. Minneapolis and London: University of Minnesota Press, 1995.
- , trans. Christine de Pizan's Letter of Othea to Hector, with Introduction, Notes, and Interpretive Essay. Newburyport, Mass.: Focus Information Group, 1990. Reprint, Cambridge: D. S. Brewer, 1997.

See also Amazons; Beatrice; Boccaccio, Giovanni; Book Ownership; Chaucer, Geoffrey; Christine de Pizan; Criseyde; Dante Alighieri; Education, Monastic; Gender Ideologies; Gerson, Jean; Humanism; Literacy and Reading; Latin; Literacy and Reading; Vernacular; Mary, Virgin in Literature; Misogyny; Ovid, Medieval Reception of; Roman de la Rose and its Reception; Universities

N

---

NAMING

Focusing on naming goes much beyond simply studying women's names, which are the result of the crucial social process of naming. Understanding this process is all the more important for medievalists because the documents consulted are full of people's names that are usually considered as identifiers unveiling a pre-existing identity. They should be in fact considered as the signs of a qualifying process, and we will see that the naming of women although less thoroughly studied than that of men is an excellent vantage point for the observation of the social implications of the naming process itself.

The identification of women in the Middle Ages is composed of three processes that can be disassociated for the sole sake of analysis: on the one hand distinguishing the person (a better term than individualizing as it does not import into the medieval social system our own notion of "individual"); on the other hand the social qualification of the person (including their feminine gender); and eventually the social use of writing (as the names we study are only known from written sources). As writing was overwhelmingly produced by literate males, women, like peasants, were named by others instead of being self-named.

The question of distinguishing the person by his or her name (which includes matters as fundamental as Salvation as on the day of the Last Judgment when the dead will be called by their names) involves both theological and philosophical issues that go much beyond the specific case of women and cannot be dealt with in detail here. It is important, however, to keep in mind that the identification of medieval women is closely connected with how the human being was conceived at the time.

More significant is the fact that female anthroponymy is "an indication of the way the woman is placed in society and of the roles that she is given in it" (Bourin, 1992, p. 3). In order to identify persons medieval societies used a series of techniques (for instance onomastic, heraldic, sigilistic, and sometimes iconographic ones) in a precise way that evolved according to needs. A person could thus be named in a changing way, each denomination being connected with the specific social network in which the naming occurs. The name, as the result of the naming process, speaks less of a single person as of her or his place in a particular social network. This is clear from the numerous cases of name changing during "conversions" (when an adult was baptized or especially when a person took religious vows). But there is also the case of brothers sometimes bearing, but not always, the same surname according to needs, a phenomenon apparent as well among lay women whose names change according to the type of document (charters, tax rolls, seals, grave-stones), with a variability that seems greater than with men, precisely because this naming served to position women in relation to men.

This leads us back to the idea of denomination as social qualification: by their names, women are qualified, that is to say classified, inserted in multiple forms of social belonging. The qualification as a female person is one among other forms. Trying to find out if this particular form comes before others is a very difficult and probably unnecessary task. The historical evolution of the means of denomination of women is to a large extent in keeping with what we already know about men.

This historical evolution (which has been studied many times since the 1990s in continental Europe, which explains the lack of English-speaking bibliography) is characterized by the dropping of the three-name Roman system as early as late antiquity and replacing it by a single name composed of elements from a bilateral origin (e.g., a Deorovaldus and a Bertovara will call their daughter Deorovara). This inserts women as well as men into a kin-group whose limits are variable (from the clan to the conjugal family with a clear statistical bias for the paternal side, however, at all social levels until the practice of hypergamic marriages, that is marriages of men with women of upper social level, spread at the end of the Carolingian period, especially after the tenth century). But this is less a means of genealogical identification than a way of qualifying the person thus named as potential heir. The sex is indicated by the end of the name, by the -us ending for men and -a or -is ending for women, or by more specifically feminine elements (e.g., -hildis).

The principle of the transmission of whole names (which had not completely disappeared and had turned similarly bilateral) became dominant after about the seventh century because of a deeper Christianization. This undermined the taboo until then attached to the transmission of names (which were supposed to refer to a personal essence). And with the restructuring of the aristocracy at the same time, her practices spread downward by imitation. The insertion in the kin-group by name did not disappear—the married woman passed names from her own kin-group more often to her sons as well as daughters because the social level of the wife was often higher than that of the husband.

From the mid-eleventh century the main anthroponymic evolution in the medieval Western world was the progressive introduction of a surname, first changing from one generation to another (and merely signifying the filiation of the person) then becoming hereditary (often a place name indicating the location of residence or production). For women, however, the complement of the given name often marked the type of relationship with a man: “daughter of...” or “widow of...” and more and more “wife of...” In cities, where the two-name system seems to have appeared earlier than in the countryside, the focalization of the woman on her husband seems to have been clearly reinforced after about 1300. In Paris as in Blois or in Provence in the early fourteenth century, one finds that women are designated most of the time—and more and more—in relation to their husbands, either by the mention of the conjugal link or by the feminized form of their husband’s surname (e.g., in Paris Erembourg, fame Jehan Beroust in 1297 became in 1300 Erembourg la Berode).

The dropping of the father’s name is the most common situation in the anthroponymy of the married woman, but in town, it is the conjugal link that prevailed, whatever the social level. The women from the lowest social levels, however, more often bore individual nicknames (e.g., in Blois in 1334, seventeen percent of the women of lower social level bear a nickname – as la Fovette, la Pie-Parterne, etc.,—in comparison to only four percent of the women of middle social level, and none of the women of upper social level). The same observation can be made in Wurtzburg in the fourteenth century where the name of bourgeois ladies connects them more directly with their husbands than in the aristocracy where filiation prevails even when the marriage is mentioned. After about 1400, in Germany aristocratic women bear a double surname, associating the name of their husbands and the name of their fathers (e.g., “Anna von Reinstein, born von Adelsheim” in 1402) thus signaling the alliance they produced between two “lineages.”

The study of these phenomena and the differences between rhythms (women are involved later than men with the use of the double name) show a close correlation between the transmission of the name and of power (what was already to be observed with the correlation between hypergamy and the transmission of names by women). Indeed male clerics too switched later to the two-name system, and the spread of the phenomenon is all the slower as one goes down in the social scale.

Also, one notes wide regional differences: on the one hand there is a periphery (Italy, Spain, Brittany, England, Scotland, Scandinavia) where surnames on the model of “children of...” (nomen paternum) were preferred because they underlined the specificity of the siblings-group, transmitting a homogeneous image of the generation that coincides precisely with the regions where heritage is egalitarian among all children and sexes. In this case again the name is a means of claiming succession. Opposed to that model is, on the other hand, the continental “heartland” where surnames are instead toponymic and which, from the tenth and eleventh centuries, were characterized by the creation of communities of productive hearths, each run by a man who was a single heir. As women were not heads of family they were affected only marginally by these anthroponymic transformations.

Simultaneously with the introduction of the surname, one notes a strong concentration of the stock of proper names on a few choices, first those of princes and kings. Then names of a Christian origin became popular after the eleventh century, especially Peter for men, and later Mary. This name had remained present since the late Roman Empire in Italy where it was even dominant in some regions. Also Pierrette/Pétronille was popular for women (as well as, in some regions, typically feminine auspicious names such as Bonne or Belle). Then John triumphed for men in the thirteenth century (thirty percent in the first half of the fourteenth century before going down to twenty-five percent in the fifteenth century), followed by Jeanne among women (with very smaller percentages).

The case of Pierrette and Jeanne, as that of Guilhelmina or Raimunda in twelfth-century Languedoc, perfectly illustrate a specific phenomenon of women's naming that developed throughout the Middle Ages (i.e., the frequency of women's names that were feminized forms of men's names). The reverse never happens. Thus, just as the use of the surname signals a clear focalization of the woman on her father or husband, her proper name also makes her a derivative from man. The medieval naming of women thus carried on the biblical discourse (vir → virgo) and qualified the woman as a dominated being.

JOSEPH MORSEL

References and Further Reading

- Bedos-Rezak, Brigit Myriam, and Dominique Iogna-Prat, eds. L'individu au Moyen Âge. Individuation et individualisation avant la modernité. Paris: Flammarion, 2005.
- Beech, George T., Monique Bourin, and Pascal Chareille, eds. Personal Names Studies of Medieval Europe. Social Identity and Familial Structures. Kalamazoo: Medieval Institute Publications, 2002.
- Bourin, Monique, and Pascal Chareille, eds. Genèse médiévale de l'anthroponymie moderne, vol 2, part 2: Persistances du nom unique. Désignation et anthroponymes des femmes. Méthodes statistiques pour l'anthroponymie. Tours: Publications de l'Université, 1992.
- Bourin, Monique, Jean-Marie Martin, and François Menant, eds. L'anthroponymie, document d'histoire sociale des mondes méditerranéens médiévaux. Rome-Paris: École Française de Rome, 1996.
- Chareille, Pascal and Patrice Beck, eds. Genèse médiévale de l'anthroponymie moderne, 5 vols. Tours: Publications de l'Université, 1990–2002.
- Duby, Georges and Jacques Le Goff, eds. Famille et parenté dans l'Occident médiéval. Paris: École Française de Rome, 1977.
- Goetz, Hans-Werner. "Nomen feminine. Namen und Namegebung der Frauen im frühen Mittelalter." Francia 23.1 (1996): 99–134.
- Martin, Jean-Marie and François Menant, eds. Genèse médiévale de l'anthroponymie moderne: l'espace italien. 3 vols.: École Française de Rome, 1994–1998. Special issue, Mélanges de l'École Française de Rome, 106 (1994), 107 (1995), 110 (1998).
- Martínez Sopena, Pascual, ed. Antroponimia y sociedad. Sistemas de identificación hispano-cristianos en los siglos IX a XIII. Valladolid: Universidad de Valladolid, 1995.
- Mitterauer, Michael. Ahnen und Heilige. Namengebung in der europäischen Geschichte. München: Beck, 1993.
- Morsel, Joseph. "Personal Naming and Representations of Feminine Identity in Franconia in the Later Middle Ages." In Personal Names..., edited by Beech-Bourin-Chareille, pp. 157–180.
- Villani, Matteo. "L'onomastica femminile nel ducato di Napoli: l'esempio di Maria". Mélanges de l'École Française de Rome – Moyen Âge 106 (1994): 641–651.

See also Bible, Women in; Cities and Towns; Family (Earlier Middle Ages); Family (Later Middle Ages); Genealogy; Kinship; Noble Women; Patriarchy and Patrilineage; Seals and Sigillography; Widows

NATURAL WORLD

For the medieval woman the natural world of plants, stones, soils, waters, and weather was a place not mainly for speculation but for use. As domina (lady of the house) with responsibility for her own domain, the natural world was where she went for what she needed in cooking, brewing, and baking; for making life comfortable, cheerful, even pretty; and for treating discomfort and disease in family and friends. Not surprisingly, like the gypsy herbalist and farmwife still found in rural Europe today, the medieval woman knew a great deal about her own local ecology.

Images documenting her activities within it abound, especially in the illustrated herbals. They show her gathering wild plants in forest and field; picking fruit with friends; cultivating her herb garden; and planting, gathering, drying, and preparing her harvest. Others show her collecting eggs from her henhouse, milking cows, making cheese and churning butter, brewing beer, formulating potions, and selling her wares in the local market. But what mindset did a woman bring to these activities? What framework did she use to understand the connections between the resources she gathered and prepared, and the natural world from which they came? Unfortunately, of the many texts written by women only a few by those practiced in these arts survive: they include the Treatments for Women by Trota of Salerno, and Hildegard of Bingen's Physica and Causes and Cures.

Trota's Treatments for Women is notable for its terse and, above all, practical approach to the natural world—the source for almost all of her ingredients. She used farm and forest products almost exclusively: wild plants, kitchen herbs, nuts, fungi, berries, clay, rainwater, saltwater, vinegar, wine, oil, flour, eggs, and animal fat. Her attitude towards the source of all her ingredients was pragmatic; absent from her prescriptions is any romantic, magical, or ritual element. Use the natural world as she prescribes, her recipes imply, and the desired results will follow.

Trota's view of the natural world appears, then, quite modern and scientific, or, perhaps, simply practical and housewifely. At any rate, it was remarkably utilitarian—everything had its use for humans, and this use was natural, normal, and predictable.

Hildegard of Bingen's attitude toward the natural world was similar but more complex, perhaps because all of her work survived. In the nine books of her Physica, as in her medical text Causes and Cures, she shared her knowledge of plants, trees, minerals, metals, reptiles, fish, birds, and animals. For each item she provided a short description and then one or more recipes, along with an explanation for how and why each ingredient worked. When compared to traditional male sources such as the encyclopedic work of Pliny and Isidore, her material seems less abstract and theoretical and more personal and empiric. Indeed she covered more than two hundred wild plants and over thirty kitchen herbs, almost all of which were local; Hildegard knew her armamentarium personally and well.

Unlike Trota, however, Hildegard's knowledge was not only empiric; she used literate medical and scientific theory to explain how her empiric recipes worked. In essence the cosmos was an ordered set of moving spheres that exerted its forces upon the natural world through the four elements, qualities, and humors. That is, it was the traditional and ancient worldview that structured and ordered Hildegard's empiric observations.

Can it be said from the surviving evidence that there was a particular "woman's" natural world? Yes and no. On the one hand, both Trota and Hildegard had a broad and deep knowledge of the natural world and its practical uses. And this was, in the main, knowledge acquired personally, from experience, observation, and oral tradition, not from books. Although there is nothing particularly feminine about this kind of practical knowledge, for millennia it has made up a subterranean women's culture that continues, even today, in cooking recipes and gardening tricks, passed along orally and seldom written down.

On the other hand, Hildegard—and, probably, most other literate medieval women—did use scientific theory in order to structure her empiric knowledge. Doing so was not, of course, particularly female, although even here, it is difficult to be certain. Because, despite her reliance on traditional concepts, Hildegard's worldview was idiosyncratic—her world, natural and otherwise, quivered with interconnected life. In the natural world as she perceived it, everything was interdependent and continuous; everything influenced everything else. Whether in this she represented the medieval woman's view of the natural world, or whether it was an expression of her unique temperament is, given our lack of sources, impossible to say.

What we can say is that the natural world was well-known to the medieval woman and well-used; at the very least, it was her main source of goods, the place where she spent most of her life. It was where she looked for, and knew how to find, food and medicines, cosmetics and dyes, ornaments and decorations. There was no unnatural world.

VICTORIA SWEET

References and Further Reading

- Arano, Luisa Cogliati, Adele Westbrook, and Oscar Ratti. The Medieval Health Handbook. New York: Georges Braziller, 1992.
- Berger, Margret. Hildegard of Bingen: On Natural Philosophy and Medicine. Cambridge: D. S. Brewer, 1999.
- Collins, Minta. Medieval Herbals: The Illustrative Tradition. London: British Library, 2000.
- Green, Monica H. The Trotula: A Medieval Compendium of Women's Medicine. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001.
- Migne, Jacques-Paul, ed. S. Hildegardis abbatissae Opera omnia. Patrologiae cursus completus. Series Latina. Paris: Garnier, 1855.
- Moulinier, Laurence and Rainer Berndt, eds. Beate Hildegardis Cause et cure. Berlin: Akademie-Verlag, 2003.
- Sweet, Victoria. "Hildegard of Bingen and the Greening of Medieval Medicine." Bulletin of the History of Medicine 73 (1999): 381–403.
- . Rooted in the Earth, Rooted in the Sky: Hildegard of Bingen and Premodern Medicine. New York: Routledge Press, 2006.
- Throop, Priscilla. Hildegard von Bingen's Physica: The Complete English Translation of Her Classic Work on Health and Healing. Vt.: Healing Arts Press, 1998.

See also Agriculture; Alewives and Brewing; Clothwork, Domestic; Cosmetics; Doctors and Healers; Gynecology; Hildegard of Bingen; Trota of Salerno

NECROLOGIES AND MORTUARY ROLLS

One of the principal functions of nuns and monks in the Middle Ages was to pray for the dead. When people, who supported the monastery or church with gifts, offered sons and daughters, or were otherwise connected with a monastery, died, their names were recorded, so that prayers could be offered for them on the anniversaries of their deaths. Léopold Delisle called these records "paleographical monuments regarding the custom of praying for the dead." Because these documents listing the dead often specify their place in society or their relation to the monastery, they tell us much about the demographics of religious communities, the relations between those communities, the holders of office within the religious community and the surrounding worlds, and even the intellectual and material state of the communities. These documents took several forms.

In Carolingian times, Libri vitae contained the names of the living and the dead who were to be remembered at Mass. Only a few of these survive. Prayer confraternities existed between religious communities, so that the members of each participating monastery or community of canons prayed for the dead of all the associated communities, including those who entered only when they were at the point of death. Communities kept a list of the monasteries with which they had a prayer confraternity, so that they would know to which houses they should send news of a death in the community. Lay and clerical individuals also formed prayer confraternities with a monastery or among themselves. Confraternities kept registers of dead members for whom they prayed. When someone died, her community sent a messenger (rolliger) with a letter or mortuary roll announcing the death to the communities in its confraternity, requesting prayers. Each community the messenger visited inscribed its name and perhaps a message on the roll. Communities maintained necrologies, used in the commemoration of the dead at the chapter meeting, and obituaries of other kinds, in which the names of the dead to be prayed for were listed in calendar order according to the dates of their deaths. Necrologies were often inscribed in a martyrology and regularly formed part of a chapter book, a liturgical document that contained the documents needed at the daily chapter meeting.

An example of such a chapter book is that from the Monastery of San Nicola della Cicogna, a dependent priory near its motherhouse of Monte Cassino. This book has seven parts including a martyrology/necrology, some directives for conducting chapter business, ninety-eight chapter homilies, and the Rule of St. Benedict. The necrology lists 1,150 names of deceased monks, laypersons, and clergy who were part of the spiritual family of St. Nicola. Ninety women are mentioned by name, and some of them are identified as lady, monacha (monastic), soror (religious sister), wife, and daughter, sometimes with indications of parentage or place of origin. Probably the lay people in the necrology were buried at the priory.

Two examples will serve to show how necrologies from women's communities can be helpful for the history of medieval women. The abbey of Engelberg in Switzerland had both women's and men's communities from the first half of the twelfth century until 1615, when the women's community moved away. Such double communities were widespread in southern Germany and Switzerland during the Middle Ages, though few of them remained together as long as Engelberg did. The presence of the women's community at Engelberg was scarcely mentioned by historians of the abbey. The study of a necrology prepared in 1345 by the prior of the abbey for the magistra (woman in charge of the women's community) has helped remedy that neglect. For example, the necrology shows that by 1345 Engelberg had had nine abbots and ten magistrae. It lists 251 male and 515 female deceased members of the community.

The women's abbey of Notre Dame de Saintes was founded in 1047 and endured until the French Revolution. Their chapter book contains a feminized Rule of St. Benedict, a martyrology, and a necrology. The necrology contains over 1,000 names, of nuns, nobility, clergy, and laity from the area around Saintes. About fourteen percent of the nuns are said to have died as girls or young women; another ten percent are said to have been monachae conversae, women who entered as mature adults. Some nuns are identified as important officials of the monastery: abbesses, prioresses of dependent priories, deans, sacristans, and almoners. When the deceased sisters are regularly described as "a venerable and humble nun" or "a woman of this church community who was consecrated to Christ" we learn about the nuns' own understanding of their calling. The clergy and laymen described as "faithful friends" and "confrères" were part of the monastery's large, extended family.

Another window into the community of Saintes is provided by a mortuary roll for Mathilda, Abbess of Holy Trinity, Caen, which seems to have begun circulating in 1113 and reached Saintes, the 145th entry on the roll, toward the end of the decade. Saintes' entry consists of three twenty-line sections of Latin poetry and a list of deceased sisters from Saintes for whom prayers are asked. These include four abbesses, one dean, one prioress, twenty-seven nuns, and five men associated with the community. The last forty lines of poetry are inscribed as "verses of the abbess." If this is so, she was a very well-educated woman.

HUGH FEISS

References and Further Reading

- Feiss, Hugh. "The Chapter Book of the Nuns of Saintes," Yale University Library Gazette 67.1-2 (1992): 13-20.
- . "Consecrated to Christ, Nuns of This Church Community": The Benedictines of Notre-Dame de Saintes 1047-1792." American Benedictine Review 45.2 (1994): 269-302.
- . "A Poet Abbess from Notre-Dame de Saintes." Magistra. 1.1 (1995): 39-54.
- Gilomen-Schenkel, Elsanne. "Engelberg, Interlaken und andere autonome Doppelklöster im Südwesten des

- Reiches (11.–13. Jh.)” In Doppelklöster und andere Formen der Symbiose männlicher und weiblicher Religiösen im Mittelalter, edited by Kaspar Elm and Michel Parisse. Berlin: Duncker & Humblot, 1992, pp. 115–133.
- Hilken, Charles. The Necrology of San Nicola della Cicogna, Studies and Texts 135. Toronto: Pontifical Institute of Mediaeval Studies, 2000.
- Huyghebaert, N. Les documents nécrologiques, Typologie des Sources du Moyen Âge occidental, 4. Turnhout: Brepols, 1972.
- Riccoboni, Sister Bartolemea. Life and Death in a Venetian Convent: The Chronicle and Necrology of Corpus Domini, 1393–1436, edited and translated by Daniel Bornstein. The Other Voice in Early Modern Europe. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2000.
- Sheerin, Daniel. “Sisters in the Literary Agon: Texts from Communities of Women on the Mortuary Roll of the Abbess Matild of La Trinitè, Caen.” Women Writing Latin from Roman Antiquity to Early Modern Europe. Volume 2: Medieval Women Writing Latin, edited by Laurie J. Churchill, Phyllis R. Brown, and Jane E. Jeffrey. Routledge, 2002, pp. 93–131.

See also Abbesses; Confraternities; Death, Mourning, and Commemoration; Literacy and Reading; Latin; Monasticism and Nuns

NINE WORTHY WOMEN

The Nine Worthy Women, or Neuf Preuses in French, a collection of nine classical warriors venerated in art and literature in the late Middle Ages, has been considered a female pendant to the Nine Male Worthies, who first appeared in Jacques de Longuyon’s Vows of the Peacock (1312) symbolizing the epitome of chivalric prowess. But the first grouping of Preuses (Sinope, Hipolyte, Menalippe, Semiramis, Thamaris, Penthesilea, Teuca, Lampetho, and Deiphile) turns up only much later in Jean Le Fèvre’s Livre de leÿsce (Book of Joy, c. 1373), many decades after the Vows. Le Fèvre’s heroines, all from antiquity and predominantly Amazons, do not conform to Longuyon’s faith-based canon of three pagans, three Jews, and three Christians. It is open to speculation, however, whether Le Fèvre was the innovator of the Preuses. The almost incidental mention of the female grouping suggests that Le Fèvre’s audience was already acquainted with the theme.

Representations of the Nine Worthy Women spread quickly into every artistic sphere, testifying to the great approval in which the illustrious female warrior, or egregia bellatrix, was held in the late fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. Oversized statues of the heroines were commissioned in 1385–1386 for the chimney of Coucy castle in northern France, a link to the glorious Greek and Roman past. Eustache Deschamps, poet of the Hundred Years’ War, invoked the Preuses in several ballades (c. 1389–1396); Thomas of Saluzzo introduced the Preuses into his narrative the Chevalier errant (Knight Errant) in 1394; and Thomas’s bastard son decorated the baronial hall of Manta castle in Piedmont with a spectacular frieze of the Preuses (c. 1420). Worthies appeared in royal pageants and tapestries; male and female Worthies even graced face cards in the brand new pastime of playing cards.

Yet the names in the female canon fluctuated, based not on the whims of late medieval enthusiasts, it appears, but on the variety of ancient literary exemplars tendered to new audiences by the early Humanists. The third-century Roman author Justinus’s Epitome of Trogeus Pompeius, for instance, contained the names of nine Preuses, all Amazons, and was likely read by Humanist translators who spread the heroines’ fame. But the startling popularity of the “manly” valor of these female conquerors drew attention to profound differences based on conventions of gender. There was no direct female equivalent to the ancient biographical tradition known as the Lives of Illustrious Men (De viris illustribus) and ancient collections of women’s lives were often directly or indirectly misogynistic. The Amazons, in particular, were reviled, because the idea of the female conqueror shamefully reversed the ideal of male valor. Medieval adaptations of the Trojan War saga, however, helped to soften the martial image of the Amazon queen Penthesilea, and Boccaccio’s Concerning Famous Women, or De claris mulieribus, despite its satiric slant, broke ground in the 1360s as a collection devoted solely to biographies of women. In the popular motif of the Nine Worthy Women, a complicated literary past was transformed into a largely decorative motif where masculine valor could be counted as feminine virtue and women recovered their glorious (albeit sanitized) past.

DEBORAH FRAIOLI

References and Further Reading

- Boccaccio, Giovanni. [De claris mulieribus]. Famous Women. Edited and translated by Virginia Brown. I Tatti Renaissance Library, 1. Cambridge, Mass., and London: Harvard University Press, 2001.
- Fraioli, Deborah. “Why Joan of Arc Never Became an Amazon.” In Fresh Verdicts on Joan of Arc, edited by Bonnie Wheeler and Charles T. Wood. New York and London: Garland, 1996, pp. 189–204.
- Le Fèvre, Jean. Les Lamentations de Matheolus et le Livre de leÿsce de Jehan Le Fèvre de Resson. Edited by Anton-Gérard Van Hamel. Bibliothèque de l’Ecole des Hautes Etudes. 2 vols. Paris: Emile Bouillon, 1892–1905.

McMillan, Ann. "Men's Weapons, Women's War: The Nine Female Worthies, 1400–1640." Mediaevalia 5 (1979): 113–139.

Schroeder, Horst. Der Topos der Nine Worthies in Literatur und bildender Kunst. Göttingen, Germany: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1971.

Sedlacek, Ingrid. Die Neuf Preuses: Heldinnen des Spätmittelalters. Marburg: Jonas, 1997.

See also Amazons; Defenses of Women; Romances of Antiquity; Warfare

NOBLE WOMEN

Noble-born women of the aristocratic elite were landholders, active political players, notable cultural patrons, and leading convent administrators throughout the Middle Ages by virtue of their rank, status, and pivotal positions linking dynastic kin-groups, although the precise parameters framing their actions and determining their resources varied according to time, place, and familial circumstances. The reason for their participation in such "public" affairs, as Marc Loch disclosed, is a simple one: the fundamentally patrimonial character of society at a time when kings did not monopolize judicial and military powers and noble families wielded jurisdictional authority and political power from their castles and itinerating courts. Like that of noble men, noble women's access to the wealth, lands, and titles that underlay their powers and position depended largely on the personal and domestic institutions of family and household—marriage, inheritance, and loyal retainers of sworn followers and other dependents—rather than on their participation in impersonal "public" institutions of "official" government and a fully monetarized marketplace. Although noble women, unlike their male peers, were not trained for, and did not routinely participate in, armed conflict, they wielded the authority to command those who did, and many became noted adjudicators and diplomats, using their wealth and networks of kin, clients, and influential churchmen to pursue claims and mediate solutions to disputes. Never deemed fully equal to men and still expected to behave largely as any other women when they did exercise authority over others, noble women's social rank and access, as wives and mothers, to male lords and their heirs outweighed any ideological disabilities imposed by their female gender when circumstances dictated that they should act in traditionally "male" domains. In other words, noble birth sufficed to make any noble woman a potential player in high politics, affairs of fiefs and vassals, and the management of landed estates, and those activities, woven into the texture of a society in which "domestic" household management included what today would be considered affairs of official government and "public" politics, were natural extensions, not transgressions, of noble women's traditionally "feminine" social roles.

When they entered such "public" arenas, most often as regents for absent husbands or minor heirs, their powers ran the gamut of the feudal, judicial, economic, and political prerogatives of any medieval lord. Noble women received and swore homage, controlled fiefs, oversaw the maintenance and garrisoning of castles, and ordered knights to fight, while many supervised the management of seigneurial estates. The higher-ranking among them presided over courts that settled disputes, punished lawbreakers, defined provincial custom and authorized the undertakings of other people in their domains. They negotiated treaties with neighboring lay and ecclesiastical lords, granted liberties to burghers and villagers, and founded and regulated fairs, while some even controlled coinage. Although how women's powers and activities changed according to their own life-stages is often discussed, less frequently acknowledged is how, over the life-course of dynastic families, married women's pivotal positions as links between their natal and affinal families and, frequently, between generations within their own conjugal families, assured that married noble women were well placed to play key roles securing advantages for their various relatives and assuring the devolution of family honors from generation to generation.

The notion that a change in family structure caused noble women's political powers to be eclipsed from shortly after the year 1000 until the thirteenth century (when the great age of regents began, according to G. Duby, who first formulated that thesis), has not been borne out by subsequent research into the rich narrative sources, letter collections, and cartularies of the eleventh and twelfth centuries. That research has recuperated the life stories of numerous lordly women active in those years, from the high-ranking Adelaide of Turin and Savoy, Beatrice of Swabia, Ermengard of Narbonne, Marie of Champagne, and Mathilda of Boulogne and Brabant to place alongside the well-known Mathilda of Tuscany, Adela of Blois, and Eleanor of Aquitaine, to the more modest Eustachia of Brou, Beatrice of Roucy and Nogent, Mathilda of Chester, Stephania of Les Baux, and Benedicta of Ehrnegg-Königsberg. It also reveals that such a postulated shift is largely illusory, based on assumptions about changes in social practices that cannot be sustained. Senior sons increasingly may have been the preferred heirs to fiefs and castles, but many families controlled portfolios of possessions that included multiple fiefs alongside other, nonfeudal, property, and significant numbers of fathers left no surviving sons to succeed. Furthermore, land acquisition was not a zero-sum game, in which real property could be obtained only by inheritance or as a reward for military service; conquest, clearance, exchange, or purchase and maternal inheritances remained key ways to gain income-producing land throughout the Middle Ages. Noble women were never banned from inheriting fiefs or receiving them as marital assigns (dowries or dowers) and, once endowed with property at marriage, women were rarely legally barred from receiving further land from their natal kin; nor, in those centuries, were they prohibited from controlling real property and other assets legally theirs while their husbands were alive. Moreover, a change in inheritance customs entails no underlying change in family structure, which remained fundamentally bilateral throughout the Middle Ages. The very existence of heiresses—female direct heirs—and of daughters who indirectly transmitted their fathers' lands to their own sons—after their older brothers had inherited them—reveals that daughters were considered members of their patriline (or, natal families), as does church marriage law, which applied incest prohibitions equally to the maternal and paternal kin of potential spouses.

Noble women also played prominent roles in religious-cultural domains, primarily as patrons of art, literature, religious communities, and holy men. In pre-university days, even lay women could be highly learned in Latin literary culture, trained by household tutors or in monastic communities alongside young girls who ultimately took vows. And as vernacular literature flowered from the twelfth century, noble women came into their own as patrons and audience alike. Lordly courts were cultural as well as political centers and women promoted authors in all major genres, from romance and lyric to chronicles and devotional texts, both for their own edification and amusement, and to assist in the education of their children of both sexes. Moreover, in monastic and court settings alike, women often took the lead in the formation and transmission of dynastic and communal memories.

Noble women were not appreciably more devout than noble men, though they were often cultivated by churchmen seeking to influence their menfolk. Even those women who lived and died in the world routinely made pious bequests, endowed monasteries, and patronized charismatic holy men out of concern for the spiritual well-being of family and friends; pilgrimage and promoting the cult of favorite saints were popular forms of devotion. Many noble women chose to end their days by entering religious communities, sometimes where they could join other family members, and their previous experience often led them to accept leadership roles such as abbess or prioress, for which they were well-suited.

No one life course or pattern of experiences fits all noble women of the Middle Ages, whether those of the greater or lesser nobility. Their rank never made them, as a group, equal to noble men, and they remained vulnerable in the face of social forces and gender prejudices that could override their legal rights. Yet, as scholars continue to illuminate the rich and varied experiences of medieval noble women, they should keep in mind that female lords (dominae) were not rare in the Middle Ages; the exception was the man who had not dealt with at least one.

KIMBERLY LOPRETE

References and Further Reading

- Bloch, Marc. Feudal Society, translated by L. A. Manyon. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1961.
- Evergates, Theodore. "Nobles and Knights in Twelfth-Century France." In Cultures of Power: Lordship, Status, and Process in Twelfth-Century Europe, edited by Thomas N. Bisson. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1995, pp. 11–35.
- , ed. Aristocratic Women in Medieval France. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999.
- Ferrante, Joan M. To the Glory of her Sex: Women's Roles in the Composition of Medieval Texts. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1997.
- Freed, John B. "German Source Collections: The Archdiocese of Salzburg as a Case Study." In Medieval Women and the Sources of Medieval History, edited by Joel T. Rosenthal. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1990, pp. 80–121.
- Johns, Susan M. Noblewomen, Aristocracy and Power in the Twelfth-Century Anglo-Norman Realm. Manchester: Manchester University Press, 2003.
- Leyser, Karl J. Rule and Conflict in an Early Medieval Society: Ottonian Saxony. Oxford: Blackwell, 1979.
- LoPrete, Kimberly A. "Gendering Viragos: Medieval Perceptions of Powerful Women." In Studies on Medieval and Early Modern Women 4: Victims or Viragos?, edited by Christine Meek and Catherine Lawless. Dublin: Four Courts Press, 2005, pp. 17–38.
- McCash, June Hall, ed. The Cultural Patronage of Medieval Women. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1996.
- McLaughlin, Megan. "The Woman Warrior: Gender, Warfare, and Society in Medieval Europe." Women's Studies 17 (1990): 193–209.

See also Abbesses; Courtly Love; Dowry and Other Marriage Gifts; Empresses: Byzantium; Ermengard; Frankish Lands; Gender Ideologies; Hildegard of Bingen; Hrosvit of Gandersheim; Hunting and Falconry; Inheritance; Matilda of Tuscany; Matilda the

Empress; Monasticism and Nuns; Ottonian Royal Women; Queens and Empresses: The West; Regents and Queen-Lieutenants; Succession, Royal and Noble; Trobairitz and Troubadours

NOGAROLA, ISOTTA

The first major female humanist in Europe, Isotta Nogarola (1418–1466) first won fame when she circulated her book of Latin letters among Venice’s literati in the late 1430s. Modern scholars once believed that around 1441 the Veronese-born humanist abandoned her literary studies in Venice to concentrate solely on religious and philosophical texts, living in seclusion in her mother’s house in Verona. New research reveals that Nogarola remained a prominent Italian literary figure throughout her life, and that her renown as a syncretic scholar of the classical and Christian traditions grew exponentially during her later years in Verona (King and Robin, 2004, esp. pp. 9–19; 138–201; cf. King, 1978; 1980). Having studied under Guarino Veronese’s humanist protégé, Martino Rizzoni, Nogarola put the finishing touches on a series of important works clearly designated for public performance during the years 1450–1461. Each work exemplifies her expertise in the key humanist genres: in addition to her autobiographical letterbook, she wrote a dialogue on a subject of major public interest; a long consolatory oration; and a polemic against the Turks. In 1450, traveling to Rome with a delegation from Verona, she delivered an oration at the court of Pope Nicholas V. In 1451, Nogarola engaged the Venetian Governor of Verona, Lodovico Foscari, in a debate on the question of original sin, the nature of woman, and gender difference itself. Circulating as the Dialogue on the Equal or Unequal Sin of Adam and Eve, Nogarola’s work stands, after Christine de Pizan’s, as the inaugural work in the European “Querelle des femmes”—the controversy on gender and nature that would rage for the next four centuries (King and Robin, pp. 138–158). In 1453, Nogarola presented two new essays honoring the incoming bishop of Verona, the Venetian Ermolao Barbaro. The first of these epistolary orations welcomes Barbaro to Verona; the second, on the life of the ascetic St. Jerome, implicitly warns Barbaro against squandering the city’s scarce resources on ecclesiastical pomp (King and Robin, pp. 159–174). In 1459, Nogarola wrote a passionate oration slated for performance at Pope Pius II’s international Congress of Mantua (King and Robin, pp. 175–186), urging a crusade against the Turks. In her final major work, a funeral oration commissioned by the Venetian statesman Jacopo Antonio Marcello on the death of his son in 1461, she follows the humanist consolatory tradition well established by Petrarch, Salutati, and Marsuppini in her conflation of biblical, patristic, and classical references (King and Robin, pp. 187–201). On her death in 1466, her contemporary Giammaria Filelfo celebrated her performance as a Ciceronian public orator (oratrix), as well as her more Horatian role as the public conscience (vates) of her city (see Filelfo’s 1468 text in Abel, pp. 2.361–2.387).

DIANA ROBIN

References and Further Reading

- Nogarola, Isotta. Isotae Nogarolae veronensis opera quae supersunt omnia, accedunt Angelae et Zenevrae Nogarolae epistolae et carmina. Edited by Eugenius Abel. Vienna: apud Gerold et socios, and Budapest: apud Franciscum Kilian, 1886. This work contains Giammaria Filelfo’s eulogy of her [Cited above as Abel].
- . Complete Writings: Letterbook, Dialogue on Adam and Eve, Orations. Edited and translated by Margaret L. King and Diana Robin. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2004. [Cited above as King and Robin].
- King, Margaret L. “The Religious Retreat of Isotta Nogarola (1418–1466).” Signs 3 (1978): 807–22.
- . “Book-Lined Cells.” In Beyond Their Sex: Learned Women of the European Past. Edited by Patrician Labalme. New York: New York University Press, 1980, pp. 66–90.
- King, Margaret L., and Albert Rabil, Jr., eds. Her Immaculate Hand. Selected Works by and about the Women Humanists of Quattrocento Italy. 2nd rev. ed. Binghamton, NY: Medieval and Renaissance Texts and Studies, 1991.
- King, Margaret L., and Albert Rabil, Jr. The Death of the Child Valerio Marcello. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1994.
- Major manuscript collections of Nogarola’s letters are extant in Vienna (Vindobonensis 3481), Rome (Vaticanus 5127), Verona (Veronensis 256); see Paul Oskar Kristeller, Iter Italicum, 6 vols. (London, 1967–1997) for locations of smaller collections and individual letters of Nogarola in Florence, Venice, Milan, Mantua, Munich, Paris, London, and Basel.

See also Cereta, Laura; Defenses of Women; Fedele, Cassandra; Humanism; Italy; Letter Writing; Renaissance, Historiography of; Sanuti, Nicolosa Castellani; Women Authors: Latin Texts

NUNS AS ILLUMINATORS

Monastic rules dictated a life of work and prayer for women leading the religious life. The opus dei of church services was enhanced by manual labor, producing books and works of embroidery. The two crafts were practiced by nuns, sometimes in the same workshop, and their compositions and styles are comparable. The motivation for artwork was the same as that for prayer and chant in church services: to offer praise to God in words and works, to beautify the altar, and to make a tangible offering that would accrue to one's spiritual merit after death and that would earn one inclusion in the convent's memorial prayers.

Nuns' engagement as scribes across western Europe can be easily documented from numerous signed works beginning in the Merovingian era and continuing into the Renaissance. Their identification as artists has met with far less scholarly agreement. Prior to the Gothic era, scribe-artists were the norm, as illumination was largely done with the pen and colored inks. Hence Guda's famous self-portrait in a monochromatic pen initial identifies her as scribe and painter of a Homiliary (Frankfurt, Stadt—und Universitätsbibliothek MS. Barth. 42, fol. 110v). At the same time, in these early centuries many monasteries were double houses or had nuns in a neighboring establishment, raising questions about the extent to which monks and nuns may have worked together or divided labor, with monks doing the illumination, as was the case in the Guta-Sintram Codex (Strassbourg, Bibliothèque du Grande Séminaire MS. 78) written by the scribe Guta at Schwartzenthann and illustrated by Sintram, a monk from a neighboring monastery. On the other hand, the Girona Apocalypse of 975 (Girona Cathedral, MS. 7) is signed by two painters, the monk Emeterius and Ende (presumably a nun), from the double house of Tavara. The most contested attributions to nun-artists are the two great twelfth-century masterpieces, Herrad of Hohenbourg's encyclopedia, the Hortus Deliciarum, and Hildegard of Bingen's mystical visions, the Liber Scivias. Both manuscripts have been destroyed, and neither nun identified herself as the artist. However, the inextricable interweaving of text and image in Herrad's book, and the imaginative originality of Hildegard's visions give persuasive evidence that both nuns drew the initial images for these works, even if, as is usually hypothesized, male copyists may have been responsible for one or both manuscripts (although this is far from certain either).

In later centuries, a vast number of manuscripts illustrated by nuns have survived, particularly in German houses of the Cistercian and mendicant orders, despite the fact that from the thirteenth century on, professional book production in urban centers was increasingly the norm. However, music books remained a near monopoly of monastic scriptoria. For these later centuries, the signatures of artists raise another difficulty, as they may refer to patrons who hired craftsmen to make work, the patron claiming to have "made" the work because s/he commissioned it. Manuscripts of high quality in particular have elicited this interpretation, among them music books by the Cistercian nun Gisela von Kerssenbroeck of Osnabrück dating c. 1300, and by the Cologne Poor Clares, working in the first half of the fourteenth century, precisely because these are the most notable works attributable to highly skilled women artists. The training of women in needlework needs no discussion as it was part of every girl's education. That some women came to convents with further artistic training can also be documented. In the early fourteenth century, a widow entered the Dominican convent of Oetenbach in Zurich bringing three other women with her, one of whom could write and illuminate, one painted, and the third did embroidery.

On the other hand, the late Middle Ages is the era of nonnenarbeit, a "folk art" debasement of Gothic style practiced in convents that had become stringently enclosed and largely dependent on in-house art works for inspiration. As a result, models were copied for centuries in works from Wienhausen, Ebstorf, and Lüne, transferred from fourteenth-century miniatures to needlework into the sixteenth century. Stitching over drawings on cloth is a cognate skill to writing and illuminating manuscripts, and the two arts need to be studied together. Iconographic originality is also a marked element of Gothic convent art, seen in early fourteenth-century miniatures from Engelberg in Switzerland and in sixteenth-century drawings from St. Walburg in Eichstätt. It has also been argued that religious women, like the laity, were particularly dependent on visual images for their devotions, in contrast to the "imageless" devotional ideal of male monasticism, precisely because they were technically laity.

JUDITH OLIVER

References and Further Reading

- Carr, Annemarie Weyl. "Women as Artists in the Middle Ages: 'The Dark is Light Enough,'" In Dictionary of Women Artists, vol. 1, edited by Delia Gaze. London: Fitzroy, 1997, pp. 3–21.
- Hamburger, Jeffrey. Nuns as Artists. The Visual Culture of a Medieval Convent. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1997.
- Krone und Schleier: Kunst aus mittelalterlichen Frauenklöstern*, edited by Jutta Frings and Jan Gerehow. Munich: Hirmer, 2005.
- Marti, Susan. Malen, Schreiben, und Beten: Die Spätmittelalterliche Handschriftenproduktion im Doppelkloster Engelberg. Zurich: InterPublishers, 2002.
- Oliver, Judith. Singing with Angels: Liturgy, Music, and Art in the Gradual of Gisela von Kerssenbroeck. Turnhout: Brepols, 2006.

See also Art, Representations of Women in; Artists, Women; Book Ownership; Devotional Art; Herrad of Hohenbourg; Hildegard of Bingen; Monasticism and Nuns; Patronage, Artistic; Portrait Medals

NUNS AS MUSICIANS

In the first centuries of Christianity, men and women worshiped equally, singing psalms and other religious texts side by side as lay members of the congregation. In the fourth and fifth centuries, however, Christianity became increasingly patriarchal. As a result, the church came to rely on professional clergy, men and boys (in training) who directed and sang the liturgy and provided new music when desired. Women's voices, both literally and figuratively, were relegated to the monastery, one of the few places where women could develop both intellectually and artistically.

The monastic life, for both men and women, centered on the nearly continuous recitation of the Divine Office (eight daily services) and the Mass. In the monasteries, women had the same duties as their male counterparts. A cantrix, the female equivalent to a cantor, served as both soloist and as director of music. Her duties included teaching and rehearsing the service music, assembling chants for local saints' days, taking care of liturgical books and supervising the scriptorium, if there was one. While a priest was still needed to officiate at Mass, the women provided all of the service music, singing the proper and ordinary parts of the Mass as well as the psalms and canticles of the Divine Office. Female monasteries, however, emphasized the consecratio virginum, the service for the consecration of the virgins and by the fifteenth century these services had become complex affairs with eight separate sections acting out the blessings of and presentations to the virgin, most accompanied by chants, some of which were taken from the liturgies of Saints Agnes and Agatha. Performances of liturgical dramas at Easter also tended to be elaborate, probably due to the availability of both male and female characters.

The extent of musical activities in all cloistered communities depended on the size and wealth of the institution, as well as the Rule that governed it. For instance, The Rule of St. Clare (written in 1253 and one of the few Rules written by a woman) instructs the nuns to read the Divine Office, rather than sing it (legendo sine cantu) and that those who do not know how to read should say numerous "Our Fathers" substituting for the actual liturgy (twenty four for Matins, five for Lauds, seven each for Prime, Terce, Sext, and None; twelve for Vespers). Though Clare's directions might be interpreted in various ways, her Rule clearly placed less emphasis on singing the Divine Office than did most other Rules that governed female monasteries, some of which not only required the singing of the liturgy but also provided for the nuns' musical training.

While the most common genre of music generated by nuns was plainchant, manuscript evidence from the twelfth century on indicates that some continental nuns, in particular, sang polyphony. Examples include motets, mass ordinary settings, Benedicamus domino settings, sequences, and conductus. Most of the manuscripts from women's institutions contain only a few polyphonic works, but one, the fourteenth-century Las Huelgas Codex includes 136 polyphonic pieces and is one of the most important sources for early polyphony from either female or male institutions. The Monastery of Las Huelgas, near Burgos (in northern Spain) was wealthy and cosmopolitan. Its members were from noble families and it served as a site for royal ceremonies as well as a stopping point on the pilgrimage route to Santiago de Compostela. Its choir in the thirteenth century consisted of 100 nuns and forty girls. Although some scholars assume that the polyphony included in the manuscript was sung by the convent's male chaplains, texts addressed to the nuns that instruct them to sing polyphonically indicate otherwise.

Few cloistered medieval musicians of either sex have escaped the mantle of anonymity. Those whose names we know include several ninth century Byzantine nuns: Martha, Abbess at Argos; Thekla, Abbess near Constantinople; Kassia (b. 810); and Theodosia. Later Byzantines include the thirteenth-century singer and choir director, Kouvouklisena, and Palaeologina, from the late fourteenth century. Those from the West include Hrotsvit, a tenth-century canoness at the Convent of Gandersheim (Germany); Herrad of Landsberg, a twelfth-century Abbess at Hohenbourg (Alcace); Sister Lukardis of Utrecht, a fifteenth-century music scribe; and Duchna Jankowska, fifteenth century (Poland). Of course the most celebrated of all is Hildegard of Bingen (1098–1179), a German abbess who was not only a musician but also a writer, scientist, artist, and mystic. Her musical compositions date at least from the 1140s and were collected in a volume entitled Symphonia armonie celestium revelationum. These works, which include antiphons, sequences, hymns, a Kyrie, and Alleluia, form a liturgical cycle with emphasis on significant local saints such as St. Rupert, St. Disibod, and St. Ursula and her 11,000 Virgins. In addition, Hildegard wrote the first morality play, Ordo virtutum, in which the sixteen Virtues battle with the Devil over Anima (the soul). Hildegard's music is exclusively monophonic and her melodies cover a wide range, often with brilliant upward leaps and serpentine melodic formulae that give her music both energy and grace.

MARY NATVIG

References and Further Reading

Cyrus, Cynthia J. "Music: Medieval Women and Music," <http://www.vanderbilt.edu/~cyrus/ORB/orbwomen.htm> (December, 2005).

Edwards, J. Michele. "Women in Music to ca. 1450," In Women and Music: a History, edited by Karin Pendle. Bloomington, Ind.: Indiana University Press, second edition, 2001, pp. 26–53.

Hildegard of Bingen. Symphonia: A Critical Edition of the Symphonia armonie celestium revelationum. Edited by Barbara Newman. Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1988.

The Las Huelgas Manuscript: Burgos, Monasterio de Las Huelgas. 2 vols. Edited by Gordon A. Anderson. Corpus Mensurabilis Musicae 79. Neuhausen-Stuttgart: American Institute of Musicology, 1982.

Marshall, Kimberly. "Symbols, Performers, and Sponsors: Female Musical Creators in the Late Middle Ages." In Rediscovering the Muses: Women's Musical Traditions. Ed. Kimberly Marshall. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1993, pp. 140–168.

Natvig, Mary. "Rich Clares, Poor Clares: Celebrating the Divine Office." Women & Music 4 (2000): 59–70.

Neuls-Bates, Carol. Women in Music: An Anthology of Source Readings from the Middle Ages to the Present. Rev. ed. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1996.

Tick, Judith, Margaret Ericson, and Ellen Koskoff, "Women in Music," In Grove Music Online, edited by L. Macy, <http://www.grovemusic.com> (December, 2005).

Yardley, Anne Bagnall. "'Full Weel She Soong the Service Dyvyne': the Cloistered Musician in the Middle Ages." In Women Making Music: the Western Art Tradition, 1150–1950, edited by Jane Bowers and Judith Tick. Urbana, Ill.: University of Illinois Press, 1986, pp. 15–39.

See also Clare of Assisi; Herrad of Hohenbourg; Hildegard of Bingen; Hrotsvit of Gandersheim; Mary, Virgin; in Music; Monasticism and Nuns

NUNS AS SCRIBES

Religious women throughout the Middle Ages needed books. The Rule of St. Benedict, which governed life in many medieval monasteries, required daily reading, both private and communal, and a variety of books were critical for the proper celebration of the liturgy and the study of the Bible. Because only a small proportion of the surviving manuscripts from Europe's medieval monasteries prior to the fourteenth century contain the name of a scribe or scribes—male or female—a clear assessment of the role of women in the monastic scriptorium is difficult. Of the approximately 1,600 early and high medieval scribes catalogued by the Bénédictines du Bouveret in their Colophons de manuscrits occidentaux des origines au XVIe siècle, only sixteen are female. This statistic, however, based as it is primarily on surviving scribal self-identifications, tells only part of the story of female book production.

Substantial nonmanuscript evidence of female scribal activity emerges from the earliest Christian monasteries. Melania the Younger (d. c. 439), for example, was said by her biographer, Gerontius, to have copied both the Old and the New Testament at her monastery in Palestine, and Caesaria the Younger (d. c. 520), abbess of Arles in Gaul, both copied holy books herself and trained nuns at Arles to work as copyists. A similar picture of female involvement in book copying emerges from the letters of Boniface (d. 755), an eighth-century Christian missionary to Germanic lands. Boniface wrote to Eadburga (d. 751), abbess of Minster-in-Thanel in England, thanking her for sending books for the work of his mission and requesting that she copy for him the Epistle of Peter in gold letters.

The number of surviving books known to contain the work of female scribes increases in the eighth and ninth centuries. The most clearly attested early medieval nuns' scriptorium was operated at the monastery of Chelles in Francia. Chelles's connection with the provision of books dates back to the seventh century when the monastery's first abbess, Bertila (d. c. 700), sent manuscripts to missionaries and monasteries in England. The nuns' scriptorium at Chelles seems to have been quite well-known by the ninth century, as archbishop Hildebald of Cologne (d. 819) commissioned from it a three-volume copy of Augustine's commentary on the Psalms. The names of nine female scribes—Girbalda, Gislidis, Agleberta, Aduhich, Altildis, Gisledrudis, Eusebia, Uera, and Agnes—are recorded in these volumes.

The names Guntza and Abirhilt were written in the margin of two manuscripts copied in the vicinity of Würzburg in the late eighth century. Their Germanic names suggest that these women were local converts, perhaps brought to Christianity and the religious life by Anglo-Saxon missionaries to the region. The hand of the scribe Guntza is also preserved in three additional, though unsigned, contemporary manuscripts. By the tenth century, women copyists were also active at the monasteries of Essen, Gandersheim, Niedermünster in Regensburg, Nordhausen, and Quedlinburg. The famous tenth-century copy of the works of Hrotsvit of Gandersheim, for example, was made at Gandersheim itself.

The monastic reforms of the eleventh and twelfth centuries, attentive as they were to biblical study, encouraged the production of books, and women contributed significantly to this aspect of reform. For example, Idung of Prüfening sent his Dialogue between Two Monks to be "copied legibly and corrected carefully" by the sisters at Niedermünster in the twelfth century.

Female scribes are also attested at monasteries associated with the reform movement emanating from the monastery of Hirsau in the Black Forest. This reform favored both intellectual activity in the service of spirituality—devotional reading and biblical study—and the education of women. These twin emphases, combined with the prevalence of double monasteries (religious communities that included men and women under the direction of a single, usually male, superior), created a favorable environment for female involvement in book production, and we know the names of several female scribes from this context. According to the Monumenta Mallerstorfensia, Leukardis, a twelfth-century female scribe from Mallerisdorf, a daughter house of Niedermünster and a part of the Hirsau reform by 1122, copied a number of books, all of which are now lost. The necrology of the Hirsau community of Zwiefalten records the death of Mahtilt of Nifen, a lay sister (conversa) who copied many books at the monastery. The most prolific known female scribe from this period was Diemut, a nun-recluse at the Bavarian Monastery of Wessobrunn, a community that in her lifetime came first under the influence of the Gorzer reform and then of Hirsau. Surviving contemporary booklists from Wessobrunn state that Diemut copied as many as forty-seven manuscripts, fourteen of which survive today. The double monastery of Admont in what is now Austria, an important center of the Hirsau reform in the twelfth century, was home to a very active scriptorium of nuns who worked in close collaboration with their male counterparts to produce numerous biblical sermons and commentaries. The nuns Irmingart and Regilind took the lead in helping abbot Irimbert to record a number of his biblical studies, first taking dictation as he preached and later contributing to a wider effort among the women to edit and copy volumes containing these and other works composed at Admont.

Houses affiliated with the new religious movements of the period also employed female scribes. There is ample evidence that Premonstratensian women in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries copied books. As in the Hirsau Reform, double monasteries were prevalent among the Premonstratensians, but as the Order's regulations restricted female intellectual activity in favor of manual labor such as washing and making clothing for the men, these women may have copied books that were intended for male, rather than female, use. Twelfth-century female scribes from the monastery of Schäftlarn near Munich were particularly visible: of the community's thirteen named twelfth-century scribes, three were female, and there is evidence that male and female copyists collaborated closely, possibly even side-by-side in a single workshop. The practice of employing female scribes continued at Premonstratensian houses into the thirteenth century; Emo (d. 1237), first abbot of the double monastery of Wittewerun in the Low Countries, noted in his chronicle that there were women in his community who were educated and trained as copyists. Particularly interesting is his observation that female diligence made women particularly well-suited for the work of the scriptorium.

Although the bulk of the evidence of female scribal activity in the central Middle Ages survives from Germany—perhaps a function of the continued presence there of double monasteries or of the consolidation of Bavaria's monastic libraries under Napoleon—female scribes certainly also worked elsewhere. In 1154, for example, Guta, a nun-scribe of Schwarzenhann in upper Alsace, and Sintram, a monk-illuminator of Marbach worked together to produce a book that contains a calendar, necrology, and martyrology, and in twelfth-century England, a single volume from the monastery of Nunnaminster contains the work of a scriptrix—a female scribe.

In the late Middle Ages, monastic reform once again provided a context for female scribal activity. The Observant movement of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries produced numerous visible female scribes. The c. 1490 account of the reform of the monastery of Ebsdorf, written at the end of the fifteenth century, emphasized female education and its acquisition, and states that women there copied the books they needed, particularly for the celebration of the liturgy. A 1487 chronicle from this same community gives the names of six sisters who together copied some twenty-seven books. Sisters traveling to communities to be reformed commonly carried books with them to be copied and returned to the sending house. The wider copying of books was facilitated by a well-developed system of exchange among Observant communities. As book production expanded generally in the fifteenth century, books signed by female scribes became more common. One author from the convent of St. Katharina in St. Gall wrote with pride about the products of her community's scriptorium, asserting that a sister could properly record her name in a book that she had copied—provided that she was not motivated to do so by vanity—to the benefit of her soul.

ALISON BEACH

References and Further Reading

Beach, Alison I. Book Production and Monastic Reform in Twelfth-Century Bavaria. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2004.

NUNS AS SCRIBES

- Bischoff, Bernhard. "Die Kölner Nonnenhandschriften und das Skriptorium von Chelles," Mittelalterliche Studien vol. 1. Stuttgart: Hierseemann, 1966, pp. 16–34.
- Bodarwé, Katrinette. Sanctimoniales litteratae: Schriftlichkeit und Bildung in den ottonischen Frauenkommunitäten Gandersheim, Essen und Quedlinburg. Quellen und Studien, Veröffentlichungen des Instituts für kirchengeschichtliche Forschung des Bistums Essen. Münster: Aschendorff Verlag, 2004.
- Krone und Schleier: Kunst aus Mittelalterlichen Frauenklöstern*, edited by Jutta Frings and Jan Gerchow. Munich: Hirmer, 2005.
- Haines-Eitzen, Kim. "'Girls Trained in Beautiful Writing': Female Scribes in Roman Antiquity and Early Christianity," Journal of Early Christian Studies 6:4 (1998), 629–646.

- McKitterick, Rosamond. "Nuns' Scriptoria in England and Francia in the Eighth Century." Francia 19 (1992): 1–35.
- Winston-Allen, Anne. Convent Chronicles: Women Writing about Women and Reform in the Late Middle Ages. University Park, Pa.: The Pennsylvania State University Press, 2004.

See also Book Ownership; Conversae and Conversi; Double Monasteries; Hrotsvit of Gandersheim; Jouarre and Chelles; Literacy and Reading; Latin; Mathilda and the Monastery of Essen; Monasticism and Nuns; Observant Movement; Premonstratensian Order

O

---

OBLATES AND OBLATION

The term oblate has had a number of meanings. Here we are concerned with child oblates. The title of chapter 59 of the Rule of St. Benedict (c. 540) is “Concerning sons of nobles and of poor people who are offered (offeruntur).” The chapter legislates that parents who offer a child should prepare a document; then, with the Eucharistic offering (cum oblatione), they wrap that document and the hand of the child in the altar cloth and so offer the child. They promise never to give the child any property, but may make a formal donation to the monastery, keeping, if they wish, an annuity for themselves. Poor parents were simply to make the oblation of their child. Thus, according to the Rule of St. Benedict, an “oblate” is a child definitively “offered” to God by his or her parents.

There were some partial precedents for Benedict’s legislation, for example, in St. Basil, St. Caesarius’s Rule for Virgins, and in the Rule of the Master. The legislation of some local councils in the sixth to ninth centuries reinforced the provisions of the Rule of St. Benedict regarding the permanent and binding character of oblation. However, some Carolingian legislation of the early ninth century says that, to be binding, oblation must be ratified by the child when s/he attains the age of reason. In a celebrated dispute between Gottschalk and Rhaban Maur, a council of Mainz is reported to have released Gottschalk from his oblation, saying that one should not be made a monk against one’s will. For several centuries, Cluny (f. 909) accepted oblates and regarded them as strictly bound to the monastic life, but by the twelfth century the oblation of infants was increasingly criticized and orders such as the Cistercians rejected the practice. By the thirteenth century it was generally agreed that children who were offered by another without their consent could leave whenever they wished, and if they were offered with their consent before the legal age, they could leave on attainment of the age of mature reason. Children who entered monasteries of their own volition before the age of puberty could not stay in a monastery except with the consent of their parents. Nevertheless, the oblation of girls in Benedictine monasteries continued during the later Middle Ages.

The admission of child oblates could lead to simony (buying or selling ecclesiastical pardons or offices) as parents paid monasteries to take unwanted or handicapped children off their hands, or abbots extorted payment before accepting a child. Such abuses were finally ended by the Council of Trent (1545–1563), which forbade monastic vows before the age of sixteen.

Many medieval monasteries, especially before the twelfth century, were thus peopled by two kinds of monks or nuns: those who were raised in the monastery (nutriti/ae), and those who came as adults, often after being widowed. The latter were more experienced in worldly affairs and so were sometimes favored for positions involving business with the world beyond the cloister. In the earlier Middle Ages, at least, oblates had opportunities for secular and religious education not available to most medieval children. They may also have been likely to receive more personal nurturance than the average medieval child.

Perhaps the most well-known female oblate was Hildegard of Bingen (1098–1179). In a play on words, one account says she was the tenth child of her parents, who therefore dedicated her as a “tithe” to God. The first chapter of her vita speaks of her birth, oblation, and education. Her oblation to the anchorhold attached to the abbey of Disibodenberg seems to have occurred when she was about fourteen. Her early entry certainly did not limit either her intellectual horizons or her capacity for leadership. Gertrude the Great (1256–1302) and Mechthild of Hackeborn (c. 1241–1298) arrived at Helfta at the ages of five and seven, respectively, though they may not have been oblates.

The practice of child oblation, which committed a child to the monastic life, paralleled in some respects the practice of arranged marriages. However alien both practices seem today, they were less strange in a society in which parental authority was very great and most people’s places of residence and work were more a matter of necessity than choice. By the twelfth century, economic factors, the difficulties of child-rearing, tensions in monasteries between oblates and those who joined later in life, and a growing sense of individual responsibility made the practice questionable.

HUGH FEISS

References and Further Reading

- Boswell, John. The Kindness of Strangers: The Abandonment of Children in Western Europe from Late Antiquity to the Renaissance. New York: Pantheon, 1988.
- De Jong, Mayke. In Samuel’s Image: Child Oblation in the Early Medieval West. Leiden: Brill, 1996.
- Deroux, M.-P. Les Origines de l’oblature Bénédictine. Abbaye Saint-Martin de Ligugé: Éditions de la Revue Mabillon, 1927.
- Kardong, Terrence. Benedict’s Rule: A Translation and Commentary. Collegeville, Minn.: Liturgical Press, 1996.
- Klaes, Monika, ed. and trans. Vita Sanctae Hildegardis; Canonizatio Sanctae Hildegardis. Freiburg: Herder, 1998.
- Lentini, A. “Note sull’oblazione dei fanciulli nella Regola S. Benedetto,” Studia Anselmiana 18/19 (1947): 195–225.

See also Gertrude the Great; Girls and Boys; Hildegard of Bingen; Law, Canon; Mechthild of Hackeborn; Monastic Rules; Monasticism and Nuns

OBSCENITY

In antiquity, Latin was a fully living language. As in other cultures, Roman authors sometimes indicated that unmarried freeborn women should not know any obscenities, whereas after marriage they could know, and might even be expected to use, “bedroom words.” Whether married or not, freeborn women were not supposed to hear obscene words or to be told of obscene acts in public. Yet Romans had religious practices that entailed the uttering of obscenities, even by women. One was the festival of Floralia in April, which involved prostitutes performing (and maybe uttering) obscenities. Another was the festival of Anna Perenna, at which women chanted obscenities (Ovid, Fasti 3.675–676).

During the Middle Ages, Latin ceased to be a mother tongue. Instead, the tradition of Latin grammatical and rhetorical education that provided much of the foundation for literature was imparted by men to boys. Although exceptional women learned and used Latin, by and large the language was the preserve of men.

The tradition emphasized decorum. As the language became a father tongue that had to be acquired through formal schooling, seemliness often focused narrowly on the suppression of schoolboy humor connected with taboo words for feces, farting, and a female body part (cunnius). But in general Latin became virtually exempt of obscenity, as it remains today in English and many other modern European languages, in which Latinate words such as penis, vagina, pudendum, and labia can be uttered in formal contexts (such as medicine or law) whereas their vernacular equivalents are eschewed. In large part the difference can be traced to earlier times in which only (or mainly) men would have known Latin. To take one case in point, the Norman Latin poem Jezebel, from the early eleventh century, contains obscene words and obscene implications ascribed to the female title character, but it is highly unlikely that any woman of the time could have spoken or even understood the Latin vocabulary put in Jezebel’s mouth.

The long phase in which most literature was in Latin and therefore inaccessible to women ended as vernacular literatures developed. This situation posed difficulties for authors and for society in general, which came to a head in the twelfth-century Renaissance. An old Stoic argument, examined by Augustine, held that obscenity resides not in words but in actions or things, while others had maintained that there were indeed inherently obscene words (what we would call “fighting words” or “four-letter words”). Now, the debate resumed. For instance, Lady Nature in Alan of Lille’s Complaint of Nature picks her words carefully so as to avoid the risk of having any foul words come into a maiden’s mouth, despite the fact that few maidens (apart from allegorical personifications) would have been reading aloud Alan’s Latin. By far the most important expression of the debate was in Jean de Meun's Roman de la Rose, where the Lover and Lady Reason dispute over the appropriateness of using the word coilles (testicles). For the word to be pronounced by Lady Reason, a female character, increases the shock.

Young women, especially virgins, served as gauges of modesty or immodesty: words, gestures, or actions that brought a blush to their faces were obscene—or were they? The question of words versus actions reaches its highest comic pitch in the fabliau of “La Damoisele qui ne pooit oïr parler de foutre” (“The Maiden who could not stand to hear the word Fuck”), where a naive young woman is squeamish about any four-letter words but eagerly embraces four-letter activities, so long as they are described figuratively.

If young women were seen to be especially pure and restricted in their language and linguistic susceptibilities, poor old women, at the greatest distance socially from Latin-using men, were viewed as being particularly dirty-mouthed. Bawdy older women, known as vetula (e.g., in the Latin poem, De vetula) or la Vieille in Old French (e.g., in the Roman de la Rose), were characterized as go-betweens, gynecologists, and sex counselors who were able (and allowed) to break prohibitions about speech that other people, especially young women, could not ignore.

JAN M. ZIOLKOWSKI

References and Further Reading

- Adams, J. N. The Latin Sexual Vocabulary. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1982.
- Ziolkowski, Jan M., ed. Jezebel: A Norman Latin Poem of the Early Eleventh Century. Humana Civilitas 10. New York: Peter Lang, 1989.
- , ed. Obscenity: Social Control and Artistic Creation in the European Middle Ages. Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1998.

See also Body: Visual Representations of; Eroticism in Literature; Fabliau; Literacy and Reading; Latin; Old Age; Roman de la Rose and Its Reception; Sheela Na Gigs

OBSERVANT MOVEMENT

As part of what Kaspar Elm called the “new spiritual landscape” in the late Middle Ages, the Observance Movement shared much in common with the Modern Devotion and other religious initiatives that arose along with far-reaching social and political changes during the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. Prominent among these developments were demands for reform that emanated from every quarter. While public attention was focused on the high-profile efforts at top-down reform undertaken by the great reform councils of Constance (1414–1418) and Basel (1431–1439), grassroots movements had already begun springing up in many locales, the earliest of them among Franciscan “Spirituals” in France and Italy in the late thirteenth century. Advocating a return to the original rule of St. Francis, as they conceived it, these self-styled poor and devout brothers inhabited hermitages where they pursued a life of penitence and prayer. In Spain, radical Franciscan eremitical groups practiced strict silence and seclusion along with a life of poverty. Although more moderate forms of observance were promoted by popular Franciscan preachers Bernadino of Siena (1380–1444) and John of Capistrano (1385–1456), the issue of radical poverty split the Franciscan order into Observant and Conventual branches by the beginning of the sixteenth century. In France, female reformer Colette of Corbie (1381–1447), a former Beguine who had joined the Poor Clares, launched an initiative of her own, eventually founding twenty-two observant monasteries.

Strongly influenced by the example of the eremitical Franciscans, other orders spawned similar reform initiatives. In Italy an observant center was established by Augustinians at Lecceto around 1385. From there the movement developed strong followings in Spain and in Saxony, where Martin Luther became a leader of the Observant faction. In the Dominican order, reform was promoted by Catherine of Siena and her biographer Master General Raymond of Capua (1380–1399). In 1390 Raymond decreed that each Dominican province should designate one convent as an Observant house for friars who wished to keep strictly to the original rule of the order. Accordingly, reformer Giovanni Dominici established an Observant convent at San Domenico di Castello (Venice) in 1391 and three years later, at the instigation of a group of women, the first such house for Dominican nuns. In the German territories, the charismatic Conrad of Prussia, together with thirty like-minded brothers, took over the Dominican house at Colmar in Alsace and in 1397 founded an Observant community for women at nearby Schönensteinbach.

In the Benedictine order Observant centers sprang up in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries at Subiaco, Santa Giustina (Padua), Melk, Kastl, St. Matthias (Trier), and Bursfeld (on the Weser river). Decrees issued by the Council of Basel mandated a general reform of the Benedictine order. These measures required strict observance of the common life, reinstatement of manual labor, and simplification of the liturgy. The length of the monastic office was reduced in order to provide more time for individual meditation and spiritual exercises similar to those practiced by the Modern Devotion or Brothers and Sisters of the Common Life. Chanting was to be kept plain and performed mostly a capella. Other measures included divestiture of private property, enclosure for women (or restricted time away from the convent for men), and the elimination of special privileges and exemptions to the rule. Despite such regulations, Dominican Master General Raymond of Capua insisted that the Observant reform was not a matter of externals—eating and drinking—but of the inward mind, a renewal of fervor and a restoration not of the letter but of the spirit of the Rule.

In most cases reforms were instituted with the active cooperation of secular territorial rulers or town councils, both of whom wished to increase their control over monasteries. A very powerful force that resonated with the lay interests was reform merged with 1) the rise of the urban magistrate class and its struggle for greater oversight and access to religious institutions and 2) the maneuvers of territorial rulers to consolidate power at the expense of the lesser aristocracy. The Observant reformers—themselves members of the increasingly affluent and powerful urban non-noble class—questioned the privileges of the old religious elite and campaigned to open cloisters to a wider spectrum of the population. Thus, at the same time that the Observance imposed a stricter rule, it gave women of the burgher classes access to positions of leadership within monasteries. Supervisors issued mandates for women to write reform chronicles and encouraged them to transcribe sermons and copy devotional works. Through the exchanging and copying of books, women found new avenues for active participation in the late medieval conversation on spirituality and religious practice. Although only ten percent of women's houses belonged to the Observance, these monasteries produced ninety percent of vernacular manuscripts in the fifteenth century and built up the largest libraries of vernacular works in the Middle Ages.

ANNE WINSTON-ALLEN

References and Further Reading

- Burr, David. The Spiritual Franciscans: From Protest to Persecution in the Century after Saint Francis. University Park, Pa.: Pennsylvania State University Press, 2001.
- Elm, Kaspar, ed. Reformbemühungen und Observanzbestrebungen im spätmittelalterlichen Ordenswesen. Berliner Historische Studien 14. Ordensstudien 6. Berlin: Duncker und Humblot, 1989.
- . "Verfall und Erneuerung des Ordenswesens im Spätmittelalter: Forschungen und Forschungsaufgaben." In Untersuchungen zu Kloster und Stift. 188–238.

- Veröffentlichungen des Max-Planck-Instituts für Geschichte 68, Studien zur Germania Sacra 14. Göttingen: Vandenhoeck und Ruprecht, 1980, pp. 188–238.
- Helmrath, Johannes. Das Basler Konzil 1431–1449: Forschungsstand und Probleme. Cologne: Böhlau, 1987.
- Proksch, Constance. Klosterreform und Geschichtsschreibung im Spätmittelalter. Cologne: Böhlau, 1994.
- Richards, Joan Marie. "Franciscan Women: The Colettine Reform of the Order of Saint Clare in the Fifteenth Century." Ph.D. Dissertation, University of California, Berkeley, 1989.
- Walsch, Katherine. "The Observance: Sources for a History of the Observant Reform Movement in the Order of Augustinian Friars in the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Centuries." Rivista di Storia della Chiesa in Italia 31 (1977): 40–67.
- Winston-Allen, Anne. Convent Chronicles: Women Writing about Women and Reform in the Late Middle Ages. University Park, Pa.: Pennsylvania State University Press, 2004.

See also Catherine of Siena; Colette of Corbie; Dominican Order; Modern Devotion; Monastic Rules; Monasticism and Nuns; Poor Clares Order; Poverty, Religious

OCCITANIA

When making generalizations about women in Occitania (southern France, also known as the Midi), one must, as for other parts of Europe, take into consideration numerous variables, such as age and marital status (young and unmarried, married, widowed, consecrated), social status (noble, urban commoner, free peasant, serf), place of origin, and the time period in question; we are often better informed, for example, about noble and urban women than about their rural and poorer counterparts. As elsewhere too, many historians have posited a decline of women's juridical and material status in Occitania at the end of the Middle Ages, yet much can be said to argue the contrary.

Legal Status

Women political figures in Occitania were undeniably less important and colorful in the fifteenth century than in the twelfth, the period of Eleanor of Aquitaine, the viscountess Ermengarde of Narbonne, and the Trencavel "matriarchs"; yet women continued to participate in surviving feudal institutions, doing homage for fiefs and swearing oaths of loyalty. If family-oriented feudal institutions dwindled in importance as the star of the king of France rose, most ordinary women, however, did not necessarily lose out; institutional justice could provide means of action and support to women, including those lacking male kin, by giving them the opportunity to testify, sue, and prosecute.

Imposition of life-long monogamy by the Church was probably for the most part positive, both for noble women and for commoners, protecting them generally from the brutal repudiations that had been so common in the Midi in earlier times. Women generally were able to give or withhold consent for their own marriages, although explicit flouting of parental consent could result in disinheritance, according to some local statutes or “customs.”

The problem of women in inheritance law is in fact complex. The rediscovered Roman law corpus of Justinian, of increasing influence in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, prescribed partible inheritance (equal shares between all sons and daughters), an option often chosen by more modest testators. Liberal testamentary practice, on the other hand, also adapted from Roman law, enabled the testator to favor one particular heir. The heir in question was often the eldest son of the testator, yet could sometimes be a daughter; this was, in fact, systematically the case in the Pyrenees, where local custom favored “female primogeniture,” in which the eldest surviving daughter was designated heiress.

Dowry

Much historical literature on the “decline” of women has emphasized the vicissitudes of the dotal system. Dowries (marital assigns given to the bride by her family) tended increasingly to consist of money (either in one sum or in fixed annuities) rather than land in the late Middle Ages. Linked to this tendency was the growing importance of the exclusion of daughters who had been given dowries (filles dotées) from inheritance, especially inheritance of land, a “custom” dating from the twelfth century. Yet in practice, their exclusion was often, contrary to statutory norms, not absolute; notarial records show some married daughters “recalled” to inheritance, and others benefiting from various legacies or donations. Exclusion from inheritance was not limited to women, moreover; it often concerned younger sons as well as daughters. Certain younger sons, like some of their sisters, were sent with their dowries to monasteries; others brought their dowries to a marriage with an heiress, an arrangement that usually involved taking up residence in the woman’s house and often entailed adopting her family name.

In a dotal marital regime (antenuptial settlement with dowry), women remained owners of their dowry, even if the husband usually managed it. Women could, however, take over management of their property and indeed any common conjugal goods (notarial records show that many couples, especially in the later Middle Ages, in fact chose to share property in a communal estate); the wife could manage all the couple’s property, and that of her husband, in the temporary absence of her spouse, or even permanently, in case of insanity or of inept management on his part. Husbands often left generous settlements to wives in their wills, instituting the wife frequently as executor of the will, as “governor and administrator” of the family patrimony, and as guardian of their minor children.

Work

Urban women in the Midi, as was often the case elsewhere, were active in crafts, especially those dealing with food, clothing, and precious metals. Women of the merchant class were parties to contracts involving land trade, cloth and food sales, money-lending and real estate. Many women worked in hospitals, in domestic service or as wet nurses. Prostitution could be a last resort for some women, or even, especially in the late fourteenth century, a veritable investment opportunity for a few. A small number of domestic slaves could be found only in the largest Mediterranean port towns.

Jewish Women

Jewish communities flourished in Occitania in the High Middle Ages, and continued to survive in Provence into the fifteenth century, reinforced by exiles expelled from other areas. Jewish matrons and widows enjoyed a considerable juridical capacity, inheriting estates (often including extensive private libraries), engaging in business (particularly in money-lending), exercising guardianship of their minor children, and even participating occasionally, as heads of households, in public assemblies.

Courtly Love

A lively scholarly debate has flourished on the subject of the true meaning of “courtly love” (fin’amor), which originated in Occitania: should it be seen as proof of the important position of women in society, or is it a smoke-screen for their oppression, revealing more about male/male connections than about male/female relationships? While it is important to place the love poems in a wider context of a literature “of the court,” a literature that could be highly political (indeed propagandistic), satirical and even scabrous, the male/female relationship at the heart of the cansos is not incidental or merely symbolic, nor is it without relation to the actual social situation, that is, the important role of women in land-holding and in feudal relations, and the hypergamic tendency of Occitan society (men marrying women—often heiresses—of higher social standing than themselves, including even the counts of Toulouse, who sought royal spouses). Noteworthy too is a small but significant number of women authors of this literature (there is even one “political” poem by a woman, Gormonda of Montpellier), the so-called trobairitz, literary sisters of the troubadours. The phenomenon is clearly connected also to the role of female patronage of the arts. In the later Middle Ages, the relation of lover and beloved was often seen as a paradigm for husband and wife, as in the romances Paris et Vienne and Pierre de Provence et la belle Maguelonne.

Participation in Catharism and Mainstream Christianity

Another long-debated question about women in Occitania (the so-called Frauenfrage) concerns their role in the Cathar or Albigensian heresy: did women, frustrated by discrimination and lack of opportunity in contemporary society, flock to Catharism as a friendlier alternative? This seems unlikely, as the Cathar clerical hierarchy was as closed to women as the Catholic one was (the famous women “perfects” were in fact the equivalent of Catholic nuns, not of priests, as has often been misconstrued), and the dualism of Catharism (maintaining that only the spiritual is good, while all that is material is evil) was hardly a woman-friendly theology. The enthusiastic, if not numerically overwhelming, participation of women in Catharism can be seen less as an escape from the constraints of society and much more as a parallel to the increasing participation of women in mainstream Christian religious life at about the same time. The relative dearth of institutionalized monastic opportunities for women in the Midi was alleviated in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries by the founding of, among others, Cistercian nunneries, houses of the Poor Clares, and priories of the order of Fontevault, where women directed the double (male/female) communities. Beguinages too flourished, their aura enhanced by the reputation of Saint Douceline of Digne. Although Dominican convents were rarer, the first one founded, Prouille, lay in the very heart of Occitania.

Women also found opportunities for religious expression in confraternities, many of which included both male and female members. Some women enjoyed careers as anchoresses (recluses), considered virtually as municipal employees, engaged to pray for the community, which in return assured their material upkeep. Women frequently combined work and religion in their activity in hospitals, many of which were directed by couples, or by women alone (often widows).

Criminal Justice

Developments favorable to women are also noticeable in criminal law. Female adultery, which had been considered a capital offense in earlier times, was often resolved in the fifteenth century by a simple reconciliation, negotiated (and not always unfavorably to the woman!) before a notary. Marital violence was criticized and often punished, and most local customs protected even prostitutes from rapists. Women, even those of the lowest social (and “moral”) standing, were considered not simply as objects, but as active subjects of law.

LEAH OTIS-COUR

References and Further Reading

- Aurell, Martin. “La détérioration du statut de la femme aristocratique en Provence (Xe-XIIIIe s).” Moyen Age 91 (1985): 5–32.
- Bec, Pierre, ed. Chants d'amour des femmes-troubadours. Paris: Stock, 1995.
- Biller, Peter. “Cathars and Material Women.” In Medieval Theology and the Body, edited by P. Biller and A. Minnis. Woodbridge: Boydell, 1997, pp. 61–107.
- Brenon, Anne. Les Femmes cathares. Paris: Perrin, 1992.
- Cheyette, Frederic. “Women, Poets and Politics in Occitania.” In Aristocratic Women in Medieval France, edited by T. Evergates. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania, 1999, pp. 138–177.
- Courtemanche, Andrée. La richesse des femmes. Patrimoine et gestion à Manosque au XIVe siècle. Montréal; Bellarmin; Paris: Vrin, 1993.
- Duhamel-Amado, Claudie. Genèse des lignages méridionaux. Toulouse: Mirail, 2001.
- La femme dans l'histoire et la société méridionale (IXe-XIXe s.)*. Actes du 66<sup>e</sup> congrès de la Fédération historique du Languedoc méditerranéen et du Roussillon (Narbonne, 15–16 octobre 1994). Montpellier: La Federation, 1995.
- La femme dans la vie religieuse en Languedoc, XIIIe-XIVe siècles*. Cahiers de Fanjeaux 23. Toulouse: Privat, 1988.

- Iancu, Danièle. «Femmes juives en Provence médiévale.» In Histoire et société : mélanges offerts à Georges Duby. Aix: Université Provence, 1992, pp. 69–78.
- Mundy, John. Men and Women at Toulouse in the Age of the Cathars. Toronto: Pontifical Institute of Mediaeval Studies, 1990.
- Otis, Leah Lydia. Prostitution in Medieval Society: the History of an Urban Institution in Languedoc. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1985.
- Ourliac, Paul, and Jean-Louis Gazzaniga. Histoire du droit privé français de l'An mil au Code civil. Paris: Albin Michel, 1985.
- Reyerson, Kathryn. "Women in Business in Medieval Montpellier." In Women and Work in Preindustrial Europe, edited by Barbara Hanawalt. Bloomington, Ind.: Indiana University Press, 1986, pp. 117–144.
- Smail, Daniel. "Démanteler le patrimoine: Les femmes et les biens dans la Marseille médiévale." Annales: Économie, Société, Civilisation (1997): 343–368.
- Wheeler, Bonnie, and John C. Parsons, eds. Eleanor of Aquitaine: Lord and Lady. New York: Macmillan, 2002.

See also Anchoresses; Beguines; Cathars; Cistercian Order; Courtly Love; Dominican Order; Dowry and Other Marriage Gifts; Eleanor of Aquitaine; Ermen-gard; Fontevrault, Abbey and Order of; France, Northern; Inheritance; Law, Roman; Literature, Occitan; Marriage, Christian; Monasticism and Nuns; Poor Clares Order; Trobaritz and Troubadours; Work

OLD AGE

Old age was a topic and a social problem that engaged medieval society, though more attention was devoted to theories about the stages of the life cycle than about collecting demographic data, let alone working to ameliorate the problems attendant upon longevity and survival. Furthermore, most of what was written focused on men, rather than women: medical texts, theological colloquies, moral treatises, and behavioral manuals rarely saw women as worthy of discrete treatment. Old women, though present at all social levels and often in positions of importance and prominence, were rarely considered on their own; much of what was explicitly focused on them was satirical or hostile.

From the era of the Church fathers, drawing upon classical and Old Testament models, medieval thinkers elaborated the idea that life was best understood as composed of a series of stages through which we all moved. The number of stages might range from three—youth, middle age, and old age—to as many as twelve. Three ages or stages of life conformed to the model of the trinity, four to the humors or the seasons, seven to the days of creation (including the Sabbath), etc. At least in this regard, women—though deemed inferior in intellect, will, and body (being of an infelicitous humoral mix, as befitted their embryological development as imperfect men)—had to be accepted as likely to live as long as men, if not longer. Though statistics about medieval longevity are of limited value, given their unreliability and the extremely high but mostly unrecorded mortality rate for infants and young people, women of threescore and ten (as in the biblical injunction) were not uncommon. In many legal proceedings men had to state their age; if they were accepted as being in their 50s or 60s or more, we can assume that the wives who were usually going to outlive them would ultimately more than match such numbers. The most accessible data for women relate to those of high status, and here old age was a familiar phenomenon to women such as Eleanor of Aquitaine (1120–1204), Matilda of Tuscany (1046–1115), Blanche of Castile (1188–1252), Marguerite of France (1221–1295), Hilda of Whitby (614–680), Hildegard of Bingen (c. 1098–1179), and Birgitta of Sweden (1303–1373).

While men's ages were calibrated against their level of activity, as such factors were of interest, a woman's social age was closely related to the feminine life cycle and her marital and childbearing status. Except for women who entered religious life at an early age, women's lives were divided into three basic segments or stages: maidenhood, marriage, and (in most cases) widowhood (with remarriage as a complicating factor). Another way of covering this expanse was by casting her life in terms of life before menarche, the years of fertility and childbearing, and the years following menopause. For women who survived and maintained their strength and wits, this third stage really marked their entry into "social old age," regardless of its duration. An aging queen or empress might be turned out of the palace if she failed to produce the necessary heir, and early medieval law codes marked this final life stage—which might often run for three or more decades—by assigning her a lesser wergild, a mark of her now-diminished social value and a blatant indication that her days of greatest usefulness were in the past.

Old women did not receive much respect. While every social generalization has exceptions, there was not much sympathy slanted toward the plight of old women comparable to the male-oriented reflections of Cicero (in his De Senectute) or of Petrarch, in the fourteenth century, both reflecting on how they welcomed old age because it brought a release from (sexual) passion and now afforded them more time for spiritual matters and contemplation. The "loathly hag" who confronts the young hero in Chaucer's "Wife of Bath's Tale" was a more familiar figure, and fifteenth-century English society was shocked when Edward IV imposed his twenty-year-old brother-in-law in marriage upon the sixty-five-year-old dowager duchess of Norfolk (a maritagium diaboli-cum, as it was called).

But care for the elderly was an expected social obligation, and old women, as well as men, might find succor and support thanks to forms of charity that enjoined the establishment and support of hospitals, distributed cash (plus clothing and meals) to mourners at funerals, and remembered old servants and even nursemaids in wills. Furthermore, since most old women were apt to be widows, they often were able to partake of those privileges and avenues of independence concerning dower shares of property, control of their inheritance, and the freedom to direct the testamentary disposal of personal possessions that went with widowhood. This potential for agency and autonomy may have meant little to the lonely townswoman, dependent on the good will of neighbors if she were fortunate enough, or to the aged widow of the countryside who could find no man to work her fields, but for those with resources these social institutions and practices helped temper the ravages of old age. The concept of retirement for the aged and infirm was understood and accepted, though it was haphazardly institutionalized, at best, and Christian charity, rather than any serious forms of public or state polity, was the customary fallback. And if medieval medicine was no more effective than modern in warding off the inevitable march to the grave, there was at least an interest in making the most of what years one had, as shown by such writings as Gabriele Zerbi's fifteenth century Gerontocomia: On the Care of the Aged.

JOEL T. ROSENTHAL

References and Further Reading

- Clark, Elaine. "Some Aspects of Social Security in Medieval England." Journal of Family History 7 (1982): 307–320.
- Jones, J. W. "Observations on the Origin of the Division of Man's Life into Stages." Archaeologia 35 (1853): 167–189.
- Lind, L. R., trans. Gabriel Zerbi, Gerontocomia: On the Care of Old Age, and Maximianus, Elegies on Old Age and Love. Philadelphia: American Philosophical Society, 1988.
- Minois, Georges. History of Old Age, translated by Sarah H. Tenison. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1987.
- Rosenthal, Joel T. Old Age in Late Medieval England. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1996.
- Sears, Elizabeth. The Ages of Man: Medieval Interpretations of the Life Cycle. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1986.
- Sheehan, Michael M., ed. Aging and the Aged in Medieval Europe. Toronto: Pontifical Institute of Medieval Studies, 1990.

See also Almsgiving and Charity; Demography; Gender Ideologies; Hospitals; Wergild; Widows

OLGA

After the murder of her husband Igor in 945, Olga, Princess of Kiev (d. 969), acting as a regent for her son Sviatoslav, defeated Igor's killers, the Derevliane, and imposed a heavy tribute on them. The Russian Primary Chronicle credits her with establishing laws in the Derevliane's territory and integrating it into the trading network of the Kievan realm. Economic expansion and financial consolidation featured prominently during Olga's reign. In 947 she set up trading posts and a tribute collection system along several Russian rivers.

Paralleling the depiction of women in the Scandinavian sagas, Kievan sources attribute to the pagan Olga vengefulness and cleverness. When, after Igor's murder, the Derevliane suggested a marriage alliance between their prince Mal and Olga, she repeatedly tricked Mal's messengers into an ambush. Her methods—burying her enemies alive, burning them in a bathhouse, or killing them after getting them drunk at a funeral feast for her slain husband—suggest her ruthless but strong and determined nature.

Olga's conversion to Christianity foreshadowed Russia's adoption of Eastern Orthodoxy under her grandson Vladimir in 988. Juxtaposition of relevant Russian, German, and Byzantine sources suggests that Olga was baptized in Constantinople in 957 and was named Helena after the wife of her godfather, the Byzantine emperor Constantine Porphyrogenitus. As Russia's first Christian ruler, she became a saintly model for the Muscovite tsars' wives, who manipulated her image as intercessor for her people to legitimize their own roles as spiritual mothers of the realm and independent rulers.

ISOLDE THYRËT

References and Further Reading

- Cross, Samuel, and Olgerd P. Sherbowitz-Wetzor, eds. and trans. The Russian Primary Chronicle: Laurentian Text. Cambridge, Mass.: The Mediaeval Academy of America, 1953, pp. 78–87.
- Featherstone, Jeffrey. "Ol'ga's Visit to Constantinople." In Adelphotos: A Tribute to Omeljan Pritsak by His Students, edited by Frank Sysyn. Harvard Ukrainian Studies 14.3/4 (1990): 293–312.
- Pritsak, Omeljan. "When and Where was Ol'ga Baptized?" Harvard Ukrainian Studies 9.1/2 (1985): 5–24.

See also Conversion, Religions; Hagiography; Russia; Scandinavia

ORDINATION OF WOMEN AS PRIESTS

There are no recorded ordinations of women to the order of deacon, priest, or bishop in the Middle Ages, but there was a lively discussion among canonists and theologians about whether it was possible for a woman to receive orders. Two passages in St. Paul (I Cor.14:33–36 and I Tim.2: 11–12 ), the only passages in the New Testament that treat the issue, taught that women should be silent in the churches and be subordinate to men. It is not surprising, then, that the question of leadership dominated discussion. To avoid confusion it will be best to distinguish at the outset leadership that flowed from the sacramental powers inherent in orders from that which flowed from jurisdiction. Jurisdiction, i.e., the power to govern church members, was associated with holy orders but could be exercised by persons not in orders themselves. Jurisdiction could be delegated, as for example, by a bishop to his vicar general, or it could be recognized as flowing from the authority a religious superior held over a community, such as an abbess. An abbess could nominate a priest to preach or hear confessions of her nuns in her abbey church and she could receive the vows of women who were joining her community. Since the religious authority of an abbess closely resembled the jurisdiction of a bishop, an abbess has sometimes been called a bishop, but this did not imply that she had been ordained.

In the 1200s and 1300s canon lawyers and theologians turned their attention to the recipients of orders, and the discussion continued to the sixteenth-century Reformation. Several collections of ancient laws included canons that stated that women could not be ordained, along with a few which suggested the opposite. Gratian, in his Concordance for Discordant Canons (the Decretum, c. 1140–1150), had winnowed out six ancient canons about women and orders discarding a few of the more negative ancient texts. By the 1220s Gratian's Decretum, along with the Glossa Ordinaria of John Teutonicus, had become the authoritative legal text. Whatever their origins, these canons were accepted as authentic expressions of church tradition stating that women were not to handle the sacred vessels; enter the sanctuary to offer incense; teach (docere) in an assembly (even if well educated); keep their heads uncovered; or be placed in authority over a man. The two canons, Presbyter and Diaconissam, that seemed to suggest there were women elders and deacons in the ancient church were reinterpreted to say that elders must be referring to the wives of priests, or perhaps elderly widows or senior laywomen, and that deaconesses were women given some special powers or authority, but of a non-sacramental sort. There is some evidence that isolated groups like the Humiliati and the Waldensians accepted women into their ministry, at least as preachers, but it was something they felt any baptized Christian could do if well instructed. Most recent studies have found that women sometimes listened to confessions, but there was no solid evidence they celebrated a Eucharist and, in any event, no evidence exists for ordination ceremonies of men or women in a sacramental sense.

Theologians before the 1200s squeezed questions about orders into a few lines between Eucharist and matrimony. Surveys like the De Sacramentis of Hugh of St. Victor (d. 1142) and the famous Sentences of Peter Lombard (1155–1158) are silent on the issue, but the ideas of the canonists began to find their way into commentaries on the Sentences. At Oxford, Richard Fishacre (1240) stated that abbesses are not able to preach, bless, give penance, or exercise the office of any order. At Paris, Bonaventure (1253) asked cautiously whether the ordination of women was possible, although he was inclined against it. The Incarnate Christ was a mediator between God and humanity, essentially a symbolic role. (Skill, for example, in serving as a negotiator between individuals or within a community, important as that might be, was not the issue here.) Since Christ was a man, it was appropriate that a priest, as mediator, be a man as well. Genesis provided Bonaventure with his paradigm. In the sacred time of creation, Adam, the man, is given charge and made representative of the human community, while Eve, his wife, is presented as his helpmate. Hence, for Bonaventure, the more probable opinion and one confirmed by the teaching of many saints is that the role of leadership should be filled by a man and not a woman. Man and woman have complementary, not interchangeable, roles. The woman is to give a sense of worth and tranquility to a man while the man is to support and protect the woman. Thomas Aquinas died before he reached this topic in his Summa, but earlier in his Sentences (1256) he asked what qualities are necessary to fulfill the symbolism required for orders. He lists only one, eminence, being designated to preside. Although both men and women were made in the image of God, the man, Adam, was designated to decide and should preside in the church. There is a need for subordination and order if two sexes are to work in harmony in the community. As to the question of whether women should preach, if the topic is preaching in private there is no difficulty, yet if it is a question of preaching ex officio, that needs to be done by a prelate, i.e., someone assigned to preside.

Theological opinion was set by the 1300s. The religious symbolism required for orders could not be well expressed by a woman because orders dealt with a sacral leadership. Arguments about the supposed defects of women were offered to bolster the opinion that the ordination of women was inappropriate (such as, women were less wise than men, Adam was created first, Eve was deceived by the serpent, women were fickle [silly], a woman's voice raised a man's libido, etc.). These misogynous remarks took far too much space in theological texts, but as arguments they are secondary to the symbolism generated by the Genesis story. That women could not be ordained was continually repeated, but urgency seems to have receded over time as theological discussion became static, almost pro forma. The only new observation came from Duns Scotus (d. 1308). Since the Blessed Virgin received all possible graces, yet was not ordained, there must be an incompatibility, some inappropriateness, then, between women and orders. Although some uneasiness lingered as to just why this was so, the bottom line was not disputed—women were not to be ordained.

JOHN HILARY MARTIN

References and Further Reading

- Andrews, Frances. The Early Humiliati. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1999.
- Behr-Sigel, Elisabeth. The Ministry of Women in the Church. Redondo Beach, Calif.: Oakwood Publications, 1987.
- Borrensens, Kari E. Subordination and Equivalence. Washington, D.C.: University Press of America, 1981.
- Congar, Yves. Lay People in the Church: A Study of Theology for the Laity. Westminster, Md.: Newman Press, 1967.
- Duggan, C. "Decretals, Collection of." New Catholic Encyclopedia, 2nd ed., 2003. vol. 4, pp. 709–711.
- Ferrante, Joan M. Woman as Image in Medieval Literature from the Twelfth Century to Dante. New York: Columbia University Press, 1975.
- Friedberg, E., ed. Corpus Juris Canonici. Graz: Akademische Druck, 1959.
- Gryson, Roger. The Ministry of Women in the Early Church. Collegeville, Minn.: Liturgical Press, 1976.
- Hochstetler, Donald. A Conflict of Traditions: Women in Religion in the Early Middle Ages. Lanham: University Press of America, 1992.
- Le Bras, Gabriel, Ch. Lefevre, and J. Rambaud. L'Age classique, 1140–1378: Source et Theories du droit. Paris: Sirey, 1965.
- Martin, John Hilary. The Ordination of Women in the Medieval Context. A History of Women and Ordination. Lanham, Md. and London: Scarecrow Press, 2002.
- Minnis, A. J. De impedimento sexus: Women's Bodies and Medieval Impediments to Female Ordination. In Medieval Theology and the Natural Body, edited by Peter Biller and A. J. Minnis. Rochester, N.Y.: York Medieval Press, 1997, pp. 109–139.
- Raming, Ida. The Exclusion of Women from the Priesthood: Divine Law or Sex Discrimination? Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1992.
- Rand, Laurence. "Ordination of Women to the Diaconate." Communio 8 (1981): 370–383.
- Shahar, Shulamith. Women in a Medieval Heretical Sect. Woodbridge: The Boydell Press, 2001.
- Van der Meer, Haye. Women Priests in the Catholic Church: A Historical-Theological Investigation. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1973.

See also Abbesses; Church; Humiliati; Law, Canon; Misogyny; Sermons and Preaching; Theology; Waldensians

OTTONIAN ROYAL WOMEN

The Ottonian dynasty, also known as the Saxon dynasty after their homelands in Saxony, ruled part of western Europe from 919 to 1024. They were remote descendants of the Carolingians and extended their territory over other parts of Germany, France, and northern Italy. In 962 Otto I the Great (r. 936–973) and his wife Adelheid were crowned as emperor and empress by the pope, counterbalancing the rulers in Byzantium. Their son Otto II followed in 967. From this period the imperial consorts appear on the political scene. They are portrayed with their husbands, are featured in diplomas, and figure in contemporary and later sources.

Adelheid's name figures in diplomas and in letters written by Gerbert of Reims. After her death in 999 her life was described in a funeral oration by Odilo of Cluny, one of her intimates. Her life was also the subject of a Vita. In 972 her son Otto II married Theophano (c. 959–991), an educated Byzantine lady and niece of a Byzantine emperor. She was to have a great influence on the life and culture of the Ottonian empire. The marriage took place in Rome, where she was crowned empress by the pope. In the marriage contract, written in gold on purple, in the Byzantine tradition, Theophano was qualified as sanctissime (very holy), a qualification for Byzantine rulers and in analogy with the other protagonists of the contract.

After the death of Otto I in 973 Theophano became coimperatrix with her husband. She had arrived in the West with a rich dowry, and with Greek friends and advisers. Adelheid left the court, in conflict with the new empress, whom she disliked. She referred to Theophano with the deprecating terms illa imperatrix Greca, illa Greca (the Greek empress, the Greek woman).

Portraits of the imperial couple, sometimes represented as being crowned by Christ, now followed an even more Byzantine pattern by representing them symmetrically and frontally, stressing the rulers' authority. Theophano and her husband figure on lead medallions, wall-paintings, and ivories, such as the coronation by Christ on an ivory in the Musée de Cluny, Paris.

After the death of Otto II in 983, Theophano became regent for her infant son, born in 980, and became influential in the German Empire, using titles such as divina gratia imperatrix augusta. As sole ruler she is also portrayed in various ways. Her authority was not appreciated by all. Theophano's dowry, consisting of secular and religious artifacts of gold, silver, silk, ivory, enamel, and other costly materials, and manuscripts with Greek texts and miniatures, became a source of inspiration for artists and scholars. Byzantine artifacts were cherished and were donated to monasteries and churches.

In spite of critical remarks on the luxurious life style of the empress, Byzantine religious and artistic traditions, iconography, and the introduction of Eastern saints, influenced Western culture. The veneration of the Virgin Mary, sometimes called Theotokos (Mother of God) in the Byzantine tradition, became more popular.

Theophano's life and politics are described in various sources, positively and negatively, her foreignness being more than once accentuated. Theophano died in Nijmegen (Netherlands), in 991. The millenary of her death in 1991 renewed an interest in her life and background. Until Otto III's coronation as emperor in Rome, in 996, his grandmother Adelheid was regent. Coins were issued with the names of Adelheid and Otto. Otto's dream was a Renovatio imperii romani (restoration of the Roman Empire). He carried the icon of the Theotokos in procession through Rome. His dream could only be realized by marrying a Byzantine porphyrogenita (purple born), a princess born as daughter of a reigning emperor. A daughter of the emperor Constantine VIII, Zoe or Theodora, was sent to the West. When she arrived in Bari in 1002 the fiancé had just died, and she returned home. Zoe eventually became empress in her own right in Byzantium, reigning for a few months with her sister Theodora.

The life of the last Ottonian empress was less conspicuous. Otto III was succeeded by Henry II (1002–1024), another grandson of Otto I. He was married to Cunegunde of Luxemburg, who, according to her Vita, led a saintly life. She donated a precious icon to the monastery of Kaufungen (Germany), an icon that must have belonged to Theophano or her son. The reign of Henry II and his wife betrays influences of Byzantine court life, but Cunegunde seems a shadow of her predecessors, not being interested in politics or cultural life. The double portrait of the imperial couple was no longer a frontal portrait. When Cunegunde died childless, the Ottonian dynasty came to an end. By contacts with Byzantine institutions, Ottonian queens had become empresses, influencing in many ways the later history of the empire.

KRIJNIE CIGGAAR

References and Further Reading

- Ciggaar, Krijnie. "The Empress Theophano." In Byzantium and the Low Countries in the Tenth Century, edited by Victoria D. van Aalst and Krijnie N. Ciggaar. Hernen: A. A. Brediusstichting, 1985, pp. 33–77.
- . "Theophano: An Empress Reconsidered." In The Empress Theophano: Byzantium and the West at the Turn of the First Millennium, edited by Adelbert Davids. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995, pp. 49–63.
- Leyser, Karl. Medieval Germany and Its Neighbours 900–1250. London: The Hambledon Press, 1982.
- von Euw, Anton, and Peter Schreiner, eds. Kaiserin Theophanu. Begegnung des Ostens und Westens um die Wende des ersten Jahrtausends. 2 vols. Cologne: Schnütgen-Museum, 1991.
- Wolff, Gunther, ed. Kaiserin Theophanu. Prinzessin aus der Fremde: des Westreichs Grosse Kaiserin. Cologne: Böhlau Verlag, 1991.

See also Adelheid; Byzantium; Frankish Lands; Queens and Empresses: The West

OID, MEDIEVAL RECEPTION OF

The works of Publius Ovidius Naso (43 BCE–17 or 18 CE) adopted many conventions of the "neoterói" (literally "new," meaning avant garde) poets of Alexandria, the "Asiatic" style which was construed as "mannered and affected" (by Cicero) or "feminine" in opposition to the more "virile" modes of the Greco-Roman tradition. His style employed elaborate digressions, amplified ecphrasis (vivid literary description of works of art), heroines' laments, mythological allusions, interest in taboo sexual relations, and an "exquisiteness" of style and syntax, all techniques imitated in later medieval Latin and vernacular poetics. Ovid dramatized the inner conflicts of numerous mythological heroines, particularly in the Heroides, a series of poetic letters from abandoned women to the men who caused their distress, and in his epic Metamorphoses. Strong female characters in difficult situations and interior love monologues spoken by both sexes became key features of Ovidian-inspired courtly romance from the Roman d'Eneas (c. 1260)—which sets a romance precedent by amplifying Lavinia into an enamored courtly heroine—to the works of Chrétien de Troyes, Marie de France, Philippe de Rémi, Chaucer, and many others.

The callous narrators of Ovid's early works, the egocentric lover of a married woman named Corinna (and of her maid Cypassis!) in the Amores, and the seduction instructor of the Ars Amatoria (Art of Love) and Remedia Amoris (Remedy for Love), established his enduring reputation as master of the erotic, as well as the disapproval of Augustus, who banished him eastward to the remote Black Sea. There, he composed laments that would inspire later medieval exiles such as Dante: Tristia, in elegiac meter; letters Ex Ponto; and a curse poem, Ibis. His poem on women's cosmetics, Medicamina faciei, had a limited survival. It further suggests Ovid's characteristic link to the feminine. The loss of a play, Medea, speaks to the disappearance of theater in the early Christian era; however, the theme of Medea's inner conflict between loyalty to father and homeland and desire for Jason recurs in the Heroides and Metamorphoses, and would inspire medieval commentators and vernacular poets, such as Benoît de Sainte-Maure in the Roman de Troie (c. 1160–1165), or Chaucer in the Legend of Good Women (1386).

In late antiquity Ovid's major works were known through Spain, North Africa, and Europe, and some writers of the Carolingian Renaissance cited him. The twelfth and thirteenth centuries are called the "Ovidian Age"; during that time, he arguably became the single most influential classical author, and his works became textbooks in the growing schools of France, England, and Germany. Some suggest that this popularity is linked to the growth of towns, as his sophistication is uniquely urban.

Claims for direct borrowing or inspiration require caution. Ovidian techniques and themes were experienced both directly and indirectly. Scholastic-trained writers read Ovid's Metamorphoses glossed in commentaries such as the Mythologiae of Fulgentius (467–532), a number of guides from the school of classics at Orleans including the popular anonymous "Vulgate" commentary (c. 1250), Oxford-Paris schoolmaster John of Garland's condensed allegorization (c. 1234), the Christianizing French translation in the Ovide moralisé (1316–1328), Pierre Bersuire's Ovidius Moralizatus (1362) or the Allegorie of Giovanni del Virgilio (1322–1323), which influenced a new generation of Italian classicists, including Dante and Boccaccio. Preachers seeking exempla used such guides for sermons, which disseminated them less formally. The cosmography and Golden Age myths of Metamorphoses 1 and 15 were referenced in philosophical and early scientific texts by Alan of Lille, Bernardus Silvestris, Walter of Châtillon, and Albert the Great. Ovid's influence on literary theory is illustrated by his frequent mention in Matthew of Vendôme's rhetorical manual, Ars versificatoria (c. 1185).

The erotic texts, disseminated widely in pedagogical libri manuales, inspired numerous didactic works featuring the symptoms of lovesickness and obedience to the god of Love, such as Marie de France's Guigemar, Flamenca, Gower's Confessio Amantis, and Spenser's Faerie Queene. They also inspired both receptive and hostile reactions. De Amore by Andreas Capellanus (c. 1170) explicates the adulterous rules of fin'amor ("true love") found in the poetry of Bernard de Ventadorn and other troubadours and trouvères in its first two books, but in the third condemns the material as sinful. Chrétien de Troyes claims to have translated "Ovid's commandments and the Art of Love," but if so it is lost. His works espouse Ovidian scenes of love suffering, but many promote a less cynical view of marriage. Chaucer also claims to have translated the Art of Love, and the imprint is particularly visible in his Troilus and Creseyde (1381–1386) and the Wife of Bath's Tale. He translated the Roman de la Rose (c. 1225–1270), which called itself a "mirror for lovers," featured Ovidian digressions on Narcissus and Pygmalion, and, like the Amores or Metamorphoses (and later the Canterbury Tales, 1373–1400), employed embedded narration to tell stories within a frame story. For example, the narrator/lover relates Ami's (Friend's) narration of a jealous husband's diatribes; La Vieille (Old Woman) advises on how to fool men, strip lovers of their wealth, and move on, reprising much of Ars Amatoria book 3. Such "misogynist" passages have been condemned by Christine de Pizan and others, including modern readers. It is important to recognize, however, that the complex Ovidian narrative technique dramatizes multiple views of difficult human relationships, and does not necessarily reflect authorial intent.

SARAH-GRACE HELLER

References and Further Reading

- Allen, Peter L. The Art of Love: Amatory Fiction from Ovid to the Romance of the Rose. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1992.
- Desmond, Marilyn R., ed. Mediaevalia: Ovid in Medieval Culture, a special issue. Vol. 13, 1989 for 1987.
- Hagedorn, Suzanne C. Abandoned Women: Rewriting the Classics in Dante, Boccaccio, & Chaucer. Ann Arbor, Mich.: University of Michigan Press, 2004.
- Hexter, Ralph. Ovid and Medieval Schooling: Studies in Medieval School Commentaries on Ovid's Mich. "Ars Amatoria," Epistulae ex Ponto, and Epistulae heroidum. Munich: Arbo-Gesellschaft, 1986.
- McKinley, Kathryn L. Reading the Ovidian Heroine: "Metamorphoses" Commentaries 1100–1618. Leiden: Brill, 2001.
- Stapleton, Michael L. Harmful Eloquence: Ovid's Amores from Antiquity to Shakespeare. Ann Arbor, Mich.: University of Michigan Press, 1996.

See also Boccaccio, Giovanni; Chaucer, Geoffrey; Chrétien de Troyes; Dante Alighieri; Debate Literature; Eroticism in Literature; Gottfried von Strassburg; Misogyny; Mythology, Medieval Reception of; Roman de la Rose and Its Reception; Roman de Flamenca; Trobairitz and Troubadours

P

---

PAGANISM

As Christianity spread from city to city within the Roman Empire, the term paganus, originally a “country-dweller,” served to identify a believer in one of the old religions, or in short, a “heathen.” But as the Christians expanded beyond the empire’s frontiers paganism came to denote the polytheistic religions of the nonurbanized people, most notably the Germanic tribes, as well as other northern peoples, including Icelanders. Eventually it was also attached to the monotheistic Muslims. Until recently modern scholars have retained a Germanic focus on paganism because of the richness of the sources, but today Northern pre-Christian cults include the Celts and the Sámi as well, living in the northern parts of the Scandinavian peninsula and in Russia.

Largely the product of warrior societies the Celtic, Germanic, and Sámi religions were dominated by male gods, but they did not exclude female beings. Memories of a unique fertility goddess loomed in the background of these beliefs. Clearer and probably later were female supernatural beings associated with divination and warfare. Thus, the Celtic Lug and the Nordic Óðinn were assisted in battle by female figures, the former known by the collective name of Morigan and the latter by that of valkyries whose task was to choose those who were to fall in battle.

In the Germanic world other supernatural females were considered helpful to humans. In Old Norse society women participated in the worship of these figures, a role they continued when the Indo-European divinities came to the Germanic world. In Sweden and Norway, for example, women were responsible for sacrificial feasts celebrated within the house and behind closed doors.

Revealing the gender of their makers, Nordic creation myths highlight parthenogenesis and pseudo-procreation among groups of anthropomorphic males, thus suggesting the low status of females in this universe. The final pantheon consisted of a patriarchal family that included gods and goddesses. Among the latter the best known are Frigg, the wife of the chief god Óðinn, familiar to the entire Germanic world, and Freya, famous for her association with magic and unique to the North. Since their origin is not clear, their role in reproduction is barely mentioned; moreover the goddesses are not included in the rebirth of the world, and misogyny, thus, seems to be firmly established.

The Roman writer Tacitus had already remarked that the Germanic tribes conceded sacred and prophetic qualities to human women and accepted their advice and forecasts. In fact, the performance of prophecy and sorcery were for centuries the two most distinguished female contributions to Scandinavian society. These functions were attributed to a group known as völur, found in both the divine and human realms. Since the word is associated with völr, staff, they were thus known as the “staff-bearers.” Older than the chief god Óðinn the most renowned prophetess, or völva, articulated the prophecy, or spá, known as Völuspá, that formed the first in the collection of mythic and heroic verse known as The Poetic Edda. Adept also in prophecy, human völur were professional women who traveled around the countryside, predicting the future for groups and individuals in formalized rituals.

PAGANISM

Among Sámi deities was a female figure for childbirth named Sáráhká. Incorporated into Christianity under the name of St. Sara, she was invoked in the same breath as Mary into the early modern period. The fact that men hid outdoor altars for fear they might become desecrated by women suggests that misogyny was stronger among the Sámi than the Scandinavians and the Celts. The closest parallel between Sámi and Nordic religion, however, is found in the person of the female prophet. Old Norse texts at times identify the völva as a Finn or a Sámi.

For several centuries women played roles of prophets and sorcerers throughout Scandinavia and perhaps in the entire circumpolar region. Their role is closely associated with rituals of shamanism in which a religious professional, the shaman (male or female) attempted to contact spirits, divinities, or the dead. Leaving the body in a trance, thereby freeing the spirit to travel, the shaman brought information back to the worshippers. Best known from Siberia, shamanism played a larger role further east than in the North. It cannot be fully substantiated for the Celtic world or from Nordic texts dealing with the Viking age, but Paleolithic rock carvings suggest its earlier existence.

Given the chronological distance between the flourishing epochs of these religions, scholars continue to discuss whether their similarities resulted from contacts during the Viking age or should be credited to an independent development within each culture.

JENNY JOCHENS

References and Further Reading

- Boyer, Régis. La grande déesse du Nord. Paris: Berg International, 1995.
- Davidson, H. R. E. Myths and Symbols in Pagan Europe: Early Scandinavian and Celtic Religions. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1988.
- DuBois, Thomas A. Nordic Religions. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999.
- Jochens, Jenny. Images of Old Norse Women. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1996.
- Motz, L. The Beauty and the Hag: Female Figures of Germanic Faith and Myth. Vienna: Fassbinder, 1993.
- Price, Neil S. The Viking Way: Religion and War in Late Iron Age Scandinavia. Uppsala: Uppsala University Press, 2002.

See also Ireland; Magic and Charms; Prophets; Prophets, Nordic; Scandinavia; Scotland; Supernatural Women; Valkyries

PARISHES

The parish was the basic unit of public worship for medieval Christians. Within parish boundaries, a medieval Christian would worship, learn the creed, receive moral instruction and correction, and pay taxes, called tithes, to support the Church. The creation of parishes accompanied the expansion of Christianity. Parish boundaries and parish administrations were often incorporated into civic governance as towns grew in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. Many men first served in parish administrations before moving on to the more prestigious work of civic government.

In 1215, the Fourth Lateran Council mandated that each Christian go to confession to his or her own pastor and receive communion at least once a year, usually at Easter, which increased the importance of parishes to medieval Christianity. Typically a Christian attended three religious services on Sundays, holy days, and saints' days. Attendance was mandatory. Unless it was Easter or Christmas or a burial or baptism, parishioners in a large parish might attend a nearby chapel instead. Liturgical services were in Latin, and for much of the liturgy, the priest stood with his back to the congregation in the chancel. Until about the late fifteenth century, the laity stood for the service when they were not kneeling. Some brought stools, but the long service in a foreign tongue made many congregations restless, and the clergy continually complained about the laity's behavior at Mass. Husbands and wives did not sit together. In England, seating in rural parishes often reflected landholding, while in towns and cities, the laity purchased seats commensurate with their status and religious interests. Often seating locations within the women's section were further delineated by marital status, with unmarried women in one place and married women in another.

In many parts of Europe canon law stipulated that the laity maintain the nave of the church and the clergy the chancel. To this end, the laity had to organize themselves to raise and spend money because tithes did not maintain the parish church's fabric. Typically a lay leader, called a churchwarden, oversaw these responsibilities. Parishes used a variety of methods to raise money. Urban and town parishes often owned property, which they rented out. Urban and rural parishes hosted fairs, plays, and ales, and ran door-to-door collections. Although women rarely served as churchwardens, they were active in organizing fundraising, going door-to-door, brewing ale, and attending the festivities.

Within the parish, groups called confraternities, guilds, or stores raised money on behalf of the parish. Usually their focus was a specific part of the church, such as an altar or light dedicated to a saint. Membership in these groups could be based on occupation, wealth, or even marital status. In regions of Europe where parishes were large, such as Italy, confraternities, rather than the parish, held the religious interest and allegiance of the laity. By the end of the Middle Ages, membership in Italian confraternities or guilds became more restricted, and many began excluding women. In England, however, women, either married or single, formed their own single-sex guilds, which raised money to maintain a light or altar in their church. Although scholars debate their level of institutionalization, they are an early example of women's collective action.

The money raised went to maintaining, decorating, and furnishing the church. Some expenses were mundane, such as cleaning out the gutters. Others reflect religious interests, such as increasing amounts of wax for the Easter taper, a new tabernacle for a saint's altar, or a wall painting of a biblical scene. Taken together, lay expenses reflect a great deal of interest in the care of God's house and the performance of the mass. What is more, the range of activities allowed the laity to express a variety of interests. Women in particular left gifts and money to St. Margaret or St. Mary in hope of fertility, safe childbirth, and the health of their families. While scholars continue to debate the laity's level of Christian commitment, the variety of activities that the laity created to support their parishes suggests that they were invested in their parishes and at least many of the local manifestations of Christianity.

KATHERINE L. FRENCH

References and Further Reading

- Duffy, Eamon. Stripping of the Altars: Traditional Religion in England, 1400–1580. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1992.
- French, Katherine. "Maidens' Lights and Wives' Stores: Women's Parish Guilds in Late Medieval England." Sixteenth Century Journal, 29.2 (1998): 399–425.
- . "Women in the Late Medieval English Parish." In Gendering the Master Narrative: Medieval Women and Power, edited by Mary C. Erler and Maryanne Kowaleski. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2003, pp. 156–173.
- Vauchez, André. The Laity in the Middle Ages: Religious Beliefs and Devotional Practice, edited by Daniel E. Bornstein, translated by Margery J. Schneider. South Bend, Ind.: University of Notre Dame Press, 1993.

See also Confraternities; Hagiography; Lay Piety

PASTON LETTERS

This extensive and important collection of English letters was produced in the fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries by three generations of the prominent Paston family of Norfolk, East Anglia. Members of the gentry class, the Pastons increased their substantial landholdings in the region during the course of the fifteenth century while also pursuing a range of business interests in London. The family's high regard for the archiving and preservation of correspondence has bequeathed an invaluable resource to medieval historians, literary scholars and linguists, the corpus affording a remarkable amount of insight into fifteenth-century habits, customs, conventions, and uses of written English. The coherence and continuity of the collection distinguishes this body of correspondence from the other, more disparate, epistolary English collections of the period (Stonor, Cely, Plumpton, and Lisle) while increasingly the Paston Letters are of salient interest to students of the lives and writings of medieval English women.

A substantial number of the Paston letters are written by female members of the family, chiefly Agnes Paston (d. 1479) and her daughter-in-law, Margaret Mautby Paston (d. 1484), whose forceful and lively personalities loom large in a range of letters addressed to various family members. Two further letters are contributed by Elizabeth Poynings Paston (1429–1488), daughter of Agnes and William, and six by Margaret's daughter-in-law Margery Brews (d. 1495). The letters of Margaret in particular show the matriarch to have taken a proactive and purposive role in her family's fortunes. During the protracted visits of her husband John to London, and after his early death in 1466, it increasingly fell to Margaret Paston to administer the family's Norfolk estates, apprise her sons of developments, represent business interests, and ensure good family relations. Margaret showed a pronounced concern for the written record when she advised her son John "your father set more by his writings and evidence than he did by any of his movable goods" (PL ed. Davis, No. 198), and accordingly she herself contributed a substantial portion of the extant Paston correspondence, though little of it in autograph. While a good many of Margaret's letters were essentially business transactions, others revealed a strong personality of deep feeling. Early letters to her husband freely expressed affection, longing, and sorrow at separation; the later missives she wrote as a widow abound with strong maternal advice, moral injunctions, and plain rebukes for her sons John II (1442–1479) and John III (1444–1504).

The letters of Agnes and Margaret also provide invaluable insights into the extent and variety of female literacy in fifteenth-century England. Study of the corpus of letters has revealed that the Paston women enjoyed a considerable degree of literacy, though they generally relied upon secretaries and amanuenses for the penning of their letters and seem to have avoided the laborious task of writing first hand. Some of the letters show linguistic features associated with oral delivery (repetitions and recapitulations, shifts of tense, parentheses, and other nonfluency features) suggesting dictation to a scribe as a favoured mode of composition. That such dictation was on occasion conducted in a state of some emotion is suggested by the celebrated account by Margaret of a colourful fracas between a local landowner and herself, her mother, and their priest, James Gloys (PL, ed. Davis, No. 129).

Rich and detailed as the women's letters are, some commentators have expressed disappointment at the scant introspective or self-reflective element of these early epistles that offer modern readers only limited access to the thoughts and feelings of medieval women. Set against the introspective devotional prose of contemporary fifteenth-century East Anglian Margery Kempe, the women's letters are certainly much less expressive of the inner life and are generally cast in an un-self-conscious prose light on ornamentation and artifice—a fact berated by Virginia Woolf who found “no writing for writing's sake” among the epistles. Nevertheless, recent literary and historical studies have done much to illuminate the expressive scope of the letters. Scholarship has increasingly explored the rhetorical features of the women's letters, both in terms of traditional notions of rhetoric as set out in the ars dictaminis (the standard medieval treatises on epistolary composition) and in terms of more modern notions of the rhetorical range of the female writer in adopting discursive positions of clarity and cogency—matriarch, householder, counsellor, consoler, confidante. The results of such work continue to suggest that the search for a distinctive “female voice” in this important and extensive collection of medieval writing is a viable, illuminating, and richly rewarding endeavour.

ROGER DALRYMPLE

References and Further Reading

- Bennett, H. S. The Pastons and Their England. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1922.
- Castor, Helen. Blood and Roses: The Paston Family and the Wars of the Roses. London: Faber and Faber, 2004.
- Dalrymple, Roger. “Reaction, Consolation and Redress in the Letters of the Paston Women.” In Early Modern Women's Letter Writing in England, ed. James Daybell. New York: Palgrave, 2001, pp. 16–28.
- Davis, Norman. “The Language of the Pastons.” Proceedings of the British Academy 40 (1954): 119–139.
- Haskell, A. S. “The Paston Women on Marriage in Fifteenth-Century England.” Viator 4 (1973): 459–471.
- O'Mara, V. M. “Female Scribal Ability and Scribal Activity in Late Medieval England: the Evidence?” Leeds Studies in English 27 (1996): 87–130.
- The Paston Letters: A Selection in Modern Spelling*, edited by Norman Davis. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1963.
- Paston Letters and Papers of the Fifteenth Century*. 2 vols, by Norman Davis. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1971 and 1976.
- The Paston Women: Selected Letters*, edited by Diane Watt. Cambridge: D. S. Brewer, 2004.
- Richmond, Colin. The Paston Family in the Fifteenth Century: Endings. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000.
- Watt, Diane. “‘No Writing for Writing's Sake’: The Language of Service and Household Rhetoric in the Letters of the Paston Women.” In Dear Sister: Medieval Women and the Epistolary Genre, edited by Karen Cherewatuk and Ulrike Wiethaus. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1993, pp. 122–138.

See also England; Gentry, Women of: England; Kempe, Margery; Letter Writing; Literacy and Reading; Vernacular

PASTOURELLE

The term pastourelle is borrowed from medieval French, where it meant “shepherdess” or “poem about a shepherdess.” Many poems so described, however, do not literally involve a shepherdess. They are narratives in the voice of a man who typically says that the other day while riding in the country he met a girl (who may have been a shepherdess), spoke with her, and tried to seduce her, with every possible result. They share five traits: their mode is pastoral, commonly realized in a country setting or in the description of the heroine as a shepherdess or another kind of country lass; their cast includes a man and a young woman; their plot includes a discovery and an attempted seduction; their rhetoric involves both narrative and dialogue; and their point of view is that of the man.

We have some two hundred such poems in many languages. They were written from the early twelfth century in Occitan, by the troubadour Marcabru and others, through their heyday in the thirteenth century in French, by trouvères such as Jean Bodel, Thibaut de Champagne, and many anonymous poets, and on to the end of the Middle Ages and beyond. As early as the twelfth century the vernacular genre was imitated in Latin by Walter of Châtillon. The fashion spread in every direction around what we today call France, producing thirteenth-century pastourelles in German (Neidhart von Reuenthal, a variant by Walther von der Vogelweide), Italian, Galician-Portuguese, and English, as well as Latin in the Carmina Burana.

In the fourteenth century the French genre mutated into a new, more objective and less erotic form in poems by Froissart and Deschamps: the man says he met a group of peasants and observed their antics. But the traditional type continued to be written sporadically in Occitan, English, German, Spanish (the serranillas by Juan Ruiz in the Libro de Buen Amor), Welsh (Dafydd ap Gwilym), Italian (Petrarch), and Gascon. The fifteenth century produced nostalgic or folkloric texts in Franco-Provençal, German, Spanish (Santillana), and French. In one French pastourelle by Josquin des Prés, the Flemish composer, the girl sings a refrain in Basque.

The man says he took the girl by force in about twenty French poems and six others in various languages, about one eighth of the poems in the genre. Andreas Capellanus, in his De Amore, advised his aristocratic pupil to do so, perhaps satirizing the pastourelle. These songs represent medieval hierarchy, cruelty, and violence, qualities that may have contributed to the anonymity that cloaks the authors of many French pastourelles. When rape is mentioned, it is sometimes described as shameful. Rape does not, however, occur throughout the genre. Rape never occurs in the Occitan pastorelas. Altogether, the attempted seduction fails as often as it succeeds, by whatever means. Some of the pastourelles suggest prostitution rather than rape; many adopt the tone of witty sexual comedy, and others depict idealized eroticism.

The genre's realism is an artistic effect. The care of sheep was not normally entrusted to young women but to shepherds; Joan of Arc testified at her trial that she did not care for her father's livestock, but the image of the shepherdess was so powerful that she came to be known as la bergère. This image, which appears frequently in books of hours, has religious sources in the Old Testament (Rachel in Genesis 29:9) and in the lives of saints such as Margaret, a shepherdess who imitated Christ, the good shepherd. An aura of spirituality, or at least innocence, hovered near the medieval shepherdess. It enabled Christine de Pizan to rewrite the pastourelle, in her Dit de la pastoure (1403), as a narrative of her own life, love, and the loss of her husband. By substituting her own point of view for the man's and rewriting seduction as abandonment, Christine reclaimed the genre for women readers.

WILLIAM D. PADEN

References and Further Reading

- Bec, Pierre. La lyrique française au moyen âge (XIIe-XIIIe siècles): contribution à une typologie des genres poétiques médiévaux: études et textes. 2 vols. Paris: Picard, 1977–1978.
- Gravdal, Kathryn. Ravishing Maidens: Writing Rape in Medieval French Literature and Law. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1991.
- Jones, W. Powell. The Pastourelle: A Study of the Origins and Tradition of a Lyric Type. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1931.
- The Medieval Pastourelle*. Edited by William D. Paden. 2 vols. New York: Garland, 1987.
- Paden, William D. "Christine de Pizan as a Reader of the Medieval Pastourelle." In Conjunctures: Medieval Studies

- in Honor of Douglas Kelly*, edited by Keith Busby and Norris J. Lacy. Amsterdam: Rodopi, 1994, pp. 387–405.
- . "The Figure of the Shepherdess in the Medieval Pastourelle." Medievalia et Humanistica, new series, 25 (1998): 1–14.
- . "New Thoughts on an Old Genre: The Pastorela." RLA: Romance Languages Annual 10 (1998): 111–116.
- . "Rape in the Pastourelle." Romanic Review 80 (1989): 331–349.
- La pastourelle dans la poésie occitane du moyen âge*. Edited by Jean Audiau. Paris: De Boccard, 1923.
- Pastourelles*. Edited by Jean-Claude Rivière. 3 vols. Genève: Droz, 1974–1976.
- Romances et pastourelles françaises des XIIe et XIIIe siècles*. Edited by Karl Bartsch. Leipzig: Vogel, 1870. Reprint Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1967.
- Zink, Michel. La pastourelle: poésie et folklore au moyen âge. Paris: Bordas, 1972.

See also Christine de Pizan; Eroticism in Literature; Literature, Occitan; Literature, Old French; Rape and Raptus

Patriarchy and Patrilineage

In medieval Europe as in many societies before and since, most things worth having passed customarily from one male to another, whether the crown of a realm or the smallest parcel of a peasant's holding. The normal route of passage in this practice of patrilineage was from father to legitimate son, with women and girls included only in special circumstances.

Patriarchy literally means "rule by fathers." Modern feminist criticism, however, employs the term to denote a social and cultural system wherein positions of greater authority and legitimacy are reserved, preferentially or exclusively, for males. Patriarchy therefore extends beyond patrilineage, but is inescapably connected to it; preferential male succession to property, and access to positions of authority, cemented historical male dominance in medieval society. Moreover, a patriarchal society assumes that male authority and dominance are natural and correct. This does not mean that women in such a society exercise no authority, or have no agency. But it means that women's superior and legitimate authority—an authority exactly the same as a man's, with no special limits—is rare, and always a novelty or a temporary expedient. Such was the medieval case where a queen mother was regent for her minor son, or where a widow controlled the property of her deceased husband. When the son reached maturity or if the widow remarried, the woman's authority reverted to second-class standing. Women in religious communities exercised a considerable degree of self-governance, and the abbesses who oversaw convents might be highly respected by all. From the eleventh century on, however, the control of the institutional church over women's communities increased, and abbesses' relative degree of autonomous control was curtailed.

The literal meaning of patriarchy, its origin in fatherhood, helps remind us that it did not mean the authority of all men over all women, but rather the authority of some men over both male and female inferiors; medieval society was not only patriarchal but hierarchical, classified by social status, wealth, and age (among other ways), and those different forms of authority reinforced each other. Masculine authority in medieval society did not follow naturally or automatically from maleness and was a matter of constant negotiation. Only some males would qualify: fathers, mature men, the heads of households, the town burgesses, the village elders. On the most basic level, most people encountered patriarchal authority in the household, in the relationship of a father to his children, and of a master to his servants. For medieval thinkers it was easy to conceive the relationship of a king to his people, or of God to humankind, in the same way: a beneficent and responsible authority, but one ultimately not to be questioned. Medieval culture often adhered to a patriarchal ideology, then, which justified superior male authority.

Patriarchy seemed especially natural in a society that understood itself to be under the supreme authority of God the Father, whose earthly representative the pope (from the Italian papa = father) oversaw an institution permeating social, cultural, and political life. And in fact the medieval Church provides an excellent example of the uneven relationship between patriarchy and patrilineage. Though religious women contributed in important ways to its societal presence and creative life, the Church was indubitably a patriarchal institution. All significant authority within it was reserved by definition to men: the priests who celebrated the sacraments and were its first point of contact with ordinary people; the literate clerks and scribes who staffed its bureaucracies; the archdeacons, bishops, archbishops, and cardinals who maintained its secular legal, and political authority, managing and defending its considerable earthly wealth. In fact, arguably the Church was even more patriarchal than the secular powers with which it engaged. A daughter might inherit her father's property or title where there were no male heirs; a noble woman managed her husband's estate in his absence; a craftsman's wife kept the shop running and disciplined servants and inferiors. But nowhere in the Church could women even temporarily exercise responsibilities defined as men's. (No abbess, no matter how able her administration, was ever summoned to manage a vacant bishopric.) Thus the Church was patriarchal in this formal and institutional sense.

Moreover, that very engagement of the Church with secular society reinforced patriarchy in medieval Europe more generally. This is particularly true concerning education and literate culture. The male clerics whose training in the church gave them a high level of functional literacy might later be employed as clerks, administrators, and advisors in secular bureaucracies and royal courts; in effect, they passed from one patriarchal authority to another. The skills they brought with them led to a greater articulation of patriarchy in secular society as it applied to ordinary women and men through law and government. This succession of knowledge and authority between generations of men surely counts as patrilineage, even though the clergy during this period of expanding governmental administration, in the High and late Middle Ages, were celibate and did not as a rule pass wealth and property to the heirs of their bodies.

DEREK NEAL

References and Further Reading

- Bennett, Judith. Ale, Beer and Brewsters in England: Women's Work in a Changing World, 1300–1600. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.
- . "Confronting Continuity." Journal of Women's History 9 (1997): 73–94.
- Erler, Mary C., and Maryanne Kowaleski, eds. Gendering the Master Narrative: Women and Power in the Middle Ages. Ithaca and London: Cornell University Press, 2003.
- Kandiyoti, Deniz. "Bargaining with Patriarchy." Gender and Society 2 (1988): 274–290.

See also Church; Family (Earlier Middle Ages); Family (Later Middle Ages); Femininity and Masculinity; Feminist Theories and Methodologies; Gender in History; Husbands and Husbandry; Inheritance; Landholding and Property Rights; Marriage, Christian; Misogyny

PATRONAGE, ARTISTIC

Women's roles as patrons related to their social rank, their religious and spiritual status, and their legal powers depending on what regime they lived under. In general lay female patrons were expected to further the prestige of their father's and their husband's families and to act in ways honourable to the feminine, entailing chaste, devout, and modest behaviour. Although laywomen might be placed in charge of family patronage for a time, communities of nuns were able to sustain large-scale long-term programmes of building and decoration in their monasteries and churches. Nuns' patronage was usually devoted to sustaining their communities and devout reputations in circumstances that were more or less under the surveillance of some superior masculine institution whether this was the distant papacy, the local bishop, or the local male members of the order to which they belonged.

“Living Saints” (Zarri, pp. 219–326)

Women of quite modest social origins who could command respect for special spiritual distinction might commission, occasion commissions, or advise on the content of artworks. Thus Richelde built the replica of the wooden house of the Virgin Mary in 1061, on the model she had been shown in a vision, which became the focus of pilgrimage at Walsingham (Hall, 1965, pp. 104–110). For example the mid-twelfth-century Saint Alban’s Psalter was arguably tailored for the anchoress and later nun Christina of Markyate, daughter of merchants, since it commemorates the death dates of her parents and her spiritual advisor. Beata Colomba da Rieti, Dominican Tertiary in Perugia, was asked by the government to defend the city against plague and invasion in 1494 by designing a processional banner. This featured Saints Dominic and Catherine of Alexandria protecting her city and survives at San Domenico, Perugia (King, 1998, p. 220).

Rulers

The few women who were appointed as rulers in their own right, like Queen Joan I (1326–1382), commissioned a range of buildings and artworks including martial projects in fulfillment of their role as heads of state. Joanna, for example, built churches, hospitals, fortifications, and made palace improvements. In 1343, she commissioned the tomb of her father, which confirmed her right to rule via her genealogical tree (King, 1995, pp. 254–255; King, 1998, pp. 62–63, 247–248). Queen Caterina Cornaro (1472–1510) of Cyprus built a fortified villa with a chapel and lodging for a hundred soldiers, designed palatial apartments in her castle at Asolo, and asserted sovereignty over Asolo by donating a baptismal font to the cathedral in 1491.

Wives of Rulers

Wives of rulers exercised patronage by permission of their spouses to encourage piety, through church and, later, monastic foundations, and tended to represent the “caring feminine” by commissioning church furnishings, hospices, and hospitals. Empress Theodora (d. 548), wife of Justinian, sent a cross set with pearls to Jerusalem, built the churches of Hagia Irene and Saints Sergius and Bacchus, three hospices, and a monastery to shelter former prostitutes in Constantinople, as well as the church of Saint Michael and basilica of Anatolius in Antioch. Consorts sometimes withdrew to a religious life, as in the case of Queen Aethelthryth (c. 630–679) who fled her husband King Egfrith of Northumbria and built the double monastery of Saint Mary the Virgin at Ely.

As monasticism spread it became an arena for the commissioning powers of consorts such as Ansa, Queen of the Lombards, who in the mid-eighth century founded the female Benedictine convent of San Salvatore in Brescia, where the dynastic commemorations of her family were located (Wemple, 1985, pp. 85–102). Wives, like Queen Matilda, married to Henry I of England between 1100 and 1118, continued to oversee a range of enterprises on behalf of their dynasty. Matilda built bridges, a bathhouse with piped water, monastic foundations, a leper hospital, and ordered textiles and metalwork as religious gifts (Huneycutt, 1996, pp. 155–160). The pattern of doing good works and commemorating the family was still favoured. In the first half of the fifteenth century Isabel of Portugal, wife of Philip the Good Duke of Burgundy, contributed to the tombs of her natal and marital families, built three female monasteries, a hospice for pilgrims to Santiago, and a maternity hospital (Cannon-Willard, 1996, pp. 306–116). However the late fifteenth century patronage of the Marchioness Isabella d’Este of Mantua from 1490 onwards signals a possible break with philanthropic and dynastic concerns in terms of secular values and the self. Although Isabella could frame her purchases in terms of her maternal role as educator, her personal collection, housed in her apartments, represented a milestone in the development of museums by placing her choice of modern paintings alongside precious sculptures of ancient Greek and Roman artists. Isabella also employed portraits of herself and family as diplomatic gifts (Fletcher, 1981, pp. 50–63, and Brown, 1997, pp. 53–71).

Widows of Rulers

Widows of rulers acquired legal independence, although if they had heirs they seem to have been expected to spend relatively modestly. So, for example, Queen Balthild, widow of the Merovingian

King Clovis II, founded a monastery for women at Chelles, once her son inherited, and she retired there between about 665 and 680 (Nelson, 1978, pp. 68–69). Dowagers without heirs might spend the fortune. So Jeanne d'Evreux (c. 1300–1371) widow of Charles IV of France, invested in devotional books for herself and in good works, funding an infirmary and a nunnery in Paris. She commissioned one funerary chapel at Saint Denis near Paris including figures of her husband, herself, and their daughters from which the inscribed silver gilt statuette of the Virgin survives. She also commissioned a marble high altarpiece of the Last Supper for the Abbey of Maubuisson near Paris (still in situ) where she installed a second tomb to house her and her husband's entrails (now Musée du Louvre Paris) (Lord, 1997, pp. 22–34).

The survival of evidence is skewed towards commissioning for religious foundations, although we may surmise that wives and widows invested quite heavily in domestic buildings and objects too. The documentation of domestic, funerary, and philanthropic spending is attested in the case of Elizabeth de Burgh, Lady of Clare (d. 1360). As co-heiress with her sister and a childless widow, she built two friaries, one chantry, several chapels, founded Clare College Cambridge, added to three of her houses, built a new house in London, and commissioned metalwork, textiles, sculpture, paintings, liveries, as well as the family tomb (Underhill, 1996, pp. 266–287).

Relatives of Prominent Families

During the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries there is some evidence of wives and widows of more modest rank commissioning. In Italian cities wives of leading citizens, who were heiresses like Sibilia Cetto in Padua and Agnesina Badoer in Venice, erected buildings (respectively a hospital and a funerary chapel) in collaboration with husbands. In such cities widows from families of administrators, merchants, lawyers, and doctors occasionally designed sculpted effigial tombs for their male relatives, or had cheaper and less prestigious painted altarpieces made for themselves—sometimes including portraits. There is also evidence of women from artisan families contributing to joint devotional commissions (King, 1998, passim).

Women's Monasteries

Women's monasteries were led by abbesses or prioresses either appointed for life or elected for shorter terms, and commissioning took place at the will of nuns in chapter by vote and through their elected officers. These monasteries appointed a male syndic or procurator as a steward to do their business beyond the confines of the cloister walls. He promised to serve the community faithfully and commissions were also undertaken with the assistance of the monastery's priest. Communities that embraced strict enclosure were entirely dependant on their priest and syndic to manage commissions for them. Houses with more flexible enclosure rules were able to negotiate their own terms with architects and artists. While most communities were served by a priest appointed by their local bishop or on the advice of a brother order, some women's monasteries had the authority to choose their own priest (Wemple, 1985, p. 93). Consequently each community needs to be examined individually when assessing the degree to which it may have been able to decide upon its own course of action in commissioning. While women's monasteries were somewhat removed from the secular concerns of the lay world, commissions could hold dynastic significance relating to the family loyalties of the nuns and those who served them.

At an early period, as at Whitby in England in the seventh century, abbesses were sometimes placed in charge of the physical fabric of double monasteries while later, single-sex communities with no shared structures usually prevailed. Communities were responsible for the buildings of their outer church, the nuns' choir, their cloisters, the chapter house, refectory, infirmary, and dormitories, as well as their decoration with sculptures, textiles, paintings, and furnishings of all sorts. In most cases it is the public church which survives as at Romsey. Romsey Abbey was dedicated to Saint Mary and Saint Ethelflaeda, (founded 907) and was built and rebuilt for the Benedictine monastery between the tenth and the fifteenth century (Pevsner, 1967, pp. 477–486; Scott, 1996, passim). Occasionally, as at Lacock Abbey, the monastic fabric survives. This Augustinian monastery was built from 1229 onwards, initially with the funds of the first abbess, Ella, Countess of Salisbury, and dedicated to Saint Mary and Saint Bernard. The thirteenth century cloisters, chapter house, nuns' parlour, abbatial living rooms, infirmary, warming room, dormitory, and kitchen, are discernable in the fabric of the house that was built at the Dissolution (Pevsner, 1975, pp. 283–289). Female conventual buildings were distinctive in requiring architectural arrangements to protect the privacy of the nuns. Choirs, for example, were placed in a variety of ways: behind the apse of the public church (as at Monteluce, Perugia); or alongside the public nave (San Zaccaria Venice); or on a floor above the nave but with a view of the high altar (Donna Regina, Naples, and Vadstena).

Liturgical books were required, and also breviaries and other books for daily readings. It is sometimes possible to identify books commissioned by the nuns such as the mid-fourteenth-century missal ordered by Abbess Costanza de' Rossi from the monks of the Badia in Florence and adorned, among other scenes, with the life of their patron, the martyr and mother Santa Felicità (King, 1995, pp. 258–260). Nuns often commissioned distinctive seals made by goldsmiths to validate their documents, like the bronze gilt seal for the convent of Santa Chiara in Siena struck in the fourteenth century (Sigilli nel Museo Nazionale del Bargello, I, p. 284). While nuns were buried together, abbesses and prioresses might be distinguished by separate sculpted tombs. Some abbesses had plain tombs like the tomb of a thirteenth century abbess at Romsey decorated simply with a relief of her arm with a crozier (Pevsner, 1967, p. 486). Other abbesses were honoured with a full-length portrayal as, for instance, Chiara Gambacorta, Prioress of San Domenico, Pisa (d. 1419) (Roberts, 1994, pp. 121–154). Although property was supposed to be held in common, individual nuns were permitted to commission items, which encouraged devotion and benefited the community. For instance, Heluis d'Ecouffons of the monastery of Saint Benoîte d'Origny commissioned an illustrated life of Saint Benedict which depicted her kneeling at the altar in 1312 (Hamburger, 1992, p. 118). In 1363, Giusto de'Menabuoi inscribed an elaborate altarpiece with the information that "Giusto painted it. This work was commissioned by Sister Isotta daughter of the deceased Lord Simone de Terçago 1363" (King, 1995, p. 261).

Women seem to have calculated their strategies in buying art and architecture adroitly to accommodate dominant codes of female virtue and still sometimes represented their own variant versions of feminine decorum (Hall McCash, 1996, pp. 8–33; and Lawrence, 1997, pp. 4–7).

CATHERINE KING

References and Further Reading

Brown, Clifford. "The Art and Antiquities Collections of Isabella d'Este Gonzaga 1474-1539." In Women and Art in Early Modern Europe: Patrons, Collectors and Connoisseurs, edited by Cynthia Lawrence. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1997, pp. 53–71.

Cannon-Willard, Charity. "The Patronage of Isabel of Portugal." In The Cultural Patronage of Medieval Women, ed. June Hall McCash. Athens, Ga. and London: University of Georgia Press, 1996, pp. 306–320.

Fletcher, Jennifer. "Isabella d'Este Patron and Collector." In Splendours of the Gonzaga, edited by David Chambers and Jane Martineau. Milan: Amilcare Pizzi, 1981, pp. 51–63.

Gee, Loveday Lewes. Women, Art, and Patronage from Henry III to Edward III 1216–1377. Woodbridge: Boydell Press, 2002.

Gilchrist, Roberta. Gender and Material Culture: the Archaeology of Religious Women. London and New York: Routledge, 1994.

Hall McCash, June. "The Cultural Patronage of Medieval Women: An Overview." In The Cultural Patronage of Medieval Women, edited by June Hall McCash. Athens and London: University of Georgia Press, 1996, pp. 1–49.

Hamburger, Jeffrey F. "Art Enclosure and the Curia Monialium: Prolegomena in the Guise of a Postscript." Gesta, 31 (1992): 108–134.

Holdsworth, Christopher J. "Christina of Markyate." In Medieval Women, edited by Derek Baker. Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1978, pp. 185–204.

Huneycutt, Lois A. "Proclaiming her dignity abroad: the Literary and Artistic Network of Matilda of Scotland Queen of England 1100–1118." In The Cultural Patronage of Medieval Women, edited by June Hall McCash. Athens and London: University of Georgia Press, 1996, pp. 155–174.

King, Catherine. "Women as Patrons, Nuns, Widows, and Rulers." In Siena, Florence and Padua: Art Society and Religion 1280–1400, ed. Diana Norman. New Haven and London: Yale University Press in association with the Open University, 1995, pp. 243–266.

———. Renaissance Women Patrons: Wives and Widows in Italy c 1300–1550. Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1998.

Lord, Carla. "Jeanne d'Evreux as Founder of Chapels." In Women and Art in Early Modern Europe: Patrons, Collectors and Connoisseurs, edited by Cynthia Lawrence. Philadelphia: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1997, pp. 21–36.

McClanan Anne L. "The Empress Theodora and the Tradition of Women's Patronage in the early Byzantine Empire" In The Cultural patronage of Medieval Women, edited by June Hall McCash. Athens, Ga. and London: University of Georgia Press, 1996, pp. 50–72.

The Monastic Arts of Northumberland, introduction by Rosemary Cramp, Arts Council. London, 1967.

Nelson, Janet. "Queens as Jezebels: The Careers of Brunhild and Balthild in Merovingian History." In Medieval Women, edited by Derek Baker. Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1996, pp. 31–77.

Roberts, Ann M. "Chiara Gambacorta of Pisa as Patroness of the Arts." In Creative Women in Medieval and Early Modern Italy: a Religious and Artistic Renaissance, edited by E. Ann Matter and John Oakley. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1994, pp. 121–154.

Scott, Ian R. Romsey Abbey: Report on Excavations 1973–1991. Southampton: Hampshire Field Club and Archaeological Society, 1996.

Stranks, C. J. Saint Etheldreda Queen and Abbess. Ely: Ely Cathedral Shop, 1989.

Thomas, Anabel. Art and Piety in the Female Religious Communities of Renaissance Italy. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2003.

Underhill, Frances A. "Elizabeth de Burgh: Connoisseur and Patron." In The Cultural Patronage of Medieval Women, edited by June Hall McCash. Athens, Ga. and London: University of Georgia Press, 1996, pp. 266–287.

PATRONAGE, ARTISTIC

Warr, Cordelia. "Painting in Fourteenth-Century Padua." Renaissance Studies 10(1997): 139–155.

Wemple, Suzanne F. "S. Salvatore/S.Giulia: A Case Study in the Endowment and Patronage of a Major Female Monastery in North Italy." In Women and the Medieval World, edited by Julian Kirshner and Suzanne F. Wemple. New York: Blackwell, 1985, pp. 85–102.

See also Aethelthryth of Ely; Architecture, Monastic; Cornaro, Caterina; D'Este, Isabella and Beatrice; Joan I; Jouarre and Chelles; Monasticism and Nuns; Patronage, Ecclesiastical; Patronage, Literary; Queens and Empresses: the West; Widows

PATRONAGE, ECCLESIASTICAL

Women's options for engaging in ecclesiastical patronage, and the choices they made within the available options, depended on many factors, including wealth, social status, marital status, and location. Options and choices also varied from the early to the late Middle Ages as emphases in lay piety shifted. Ecclesiastical patronage in all of its forms gave women chances to practice, at times in highly public ways, their personal piety even as they simultaneously advanced familial strategies and achieved political aims.

Women participated in a wide range of types of ecclesiastical patronage. Some women presented jewelry or expensive articles of clothing to statues of saints in churches, as Margaret of York, Duchess of Burgundy, did when she donated her crown to the statue of the Virgin Mary at the cathedral in Aachen. Some endowed and supported colleges, as Mary de St. Pol, Elizabeth de Burgh, and Margaret Beaufort did—an important form of ecclesiastical patronage at a time when the universities were tied to the church. Others commissioned stained glass windows and works of art for churches, while many funded chantries, founded and served as benefactors for monasteries, and left bequests to parish churches. The two forms of ecclesiastical patronage that were most common for women from a range of class backgrounds throughout the Middle Ages were monastic patronage and patronage of parish churches.

Monastic Patronage

In the early Middle Ages, aristocratic women often were patrons of monastic institutions that had strong ties to their families. Families who founded monasteries tended to view the foundation as part of the estate's property, and women and men exercised rights of lordship, although feudal and canon law worked to limit proprietary claims. When aristocratic families founded nunneries, they generally had practical as well as spiritual aims, because such an institution could provide a place for daughters who did not wish, or were not permitted, to marry.

Additionally, a significant number of women founded monastic institutions in their own names; occasionally married women did so, but more frequently monastic founders were widows. When women founded nunneries independently, it was often with an eye toward entering the foundation themselves. Monastic foundation thus provided a form of security and, in the case of widows, an ecclesiastically sanctioned way to opt out of remarriage, as well as to exert independent control over an estate.

It is not surprising that widows founded monastic institutions in their own name more frequently than married women, because, although particulars varied, married women had very limited rights in regard to land holding, and only in widowhood could a woman enjoy a substantial degree of control over her dower property. Widows' ability to use their dower property in acts of monastic patronage (or indeed in other forms of ecclesiastical patronage) was not unlimited, however. Widows might face familial, as well as political, pressure to remarry, and the theoretical right to the financial autonomy that would enable acts of patronage was not in practice necessarily realized. Additionally, as Sally Thompson observes, the limited nature of women's property rights makes it difficult to discern the actual degree of women's roles in acts of monastic patronage undertaken jointly by husbands and wives. Husbands may have influenced wives' choices, but the reverse might also have been true.

Monastic records also do not always make clear the degree of women's involvement in corporate foundations, a form of monastic patronage that, as Thompson demonstrates, was widespread in post-Conquest England. In corporate foundation, families would join together to endow a monastery, a practice that opened the possibility of monastic foundation to those outside of the aristocracy. Furthermore, there are cases in which patronage is deliberately obscured because, as Thompson points out, from the later twelfth century onward, canonists attached the taint of simony to grants made by patrons in connection with the reception of novices from their families.

More typically, however, monastic patrons took pains to have their gifts recorded and remembered for posterity. Monastic foundation and other acts of patronage had benefits for the donors and the communities alike. Founders, as well as those who gave monasteries such gifts as fishing rights, grazing rights, financial bequests, or even household goods, did so to ensure perpetual prayers for themselves and their descendants.

As Jane Tibbetts Schulenburg observes, beginning in the ninth century and continuing through the eleventh century, especially in France, church reformers emphasized the spiritual superiority of monks, and female, as well as male, patrons increasingly supported male monasteries. Furthermore, in the tenth and eleventh centuries, the value of the mass in expiating sins came to be privileged over prayers, as C. H. Lawrence has shown. Concomitantly, professed monks were increasingly ordained as priests, an option not open to nuns; thus male monasteries became more attractive recipients of patronage from both men and women.

Founders' and patrons' rights, including custody of monastic estates during vacancies (for instance, the period between the death of a superior and the election of a successor), license and assent in elections of superiors, nomination of novices, and burial within the monastic cemetery or church went along with the spiritual benefits of giving to monasteries. These were not the end of the story, though. Being a patron of a rich, powerful monastic institution could enhance a family's prestige. Furthermore, in periods in which monastic reform movements were very active, women who wished to patronize monastic institutions might equally be drawn to the symbolic capital to be gained from affiliation with more austere, reformed communities.

Political benefits could also accrue from monastic patronage. The Birgittine house of Syon in England was founded by Henry V, and through the politically tumultuous fifteenth century women of the Lancastrian dynasty continued to be important patrons for this foundation so strongly associated with the Lancastrian cause. Similarly, Margaret of Bavaria, Duchess of Burgundy, made choices for monastic patronage with dynastic aims in mind. Margaret and Colette of Corbie were contemporaries, and Colette was widely revered as a saint in her lifetime. Margaret strategically supported Colette's foundations in areas in which Colette had great popular appeal and in which the Burgundian dynasty wished to consolidate its political power.

Patronage of Parish Churches

Patronage of parish churches allowed women from humble backgrounds, the mercantile class, the gentry, and the aristocracy alike to take active, visible roles in communal worship. Women's wills provide an excellent source of information about their patronage of parish churches, although, because a married woman typically required her husband's permission to make a will, widows once again had greater opportunities. Women frequently left money in their wills for church upkeep or for building projects; they also gave money for purchasing such items as chalices. There are many wills from women indicating that such luxury goods as elaborate gowns or bed hangings were given to the parish church to be converted for use as altar cloths or vestments. Even simple household goods, including sheets and towels, were bequeathed to parish churches for liturgical uses.

Aristocratic women, and, especially in the fifteenth century, women from the wealthy mercantile class sometimes engaged in more ambitious forms of parish patronage. They funded stained glass windows in which the names and images of the benefactors and members of their family were preserved. They paid for the construction of chapels and altars within parish churches, practices that increased as the fashion for chantries grew. As with certain kinds of monastic patronage, spiritual and more worldly aims overlapped such visible patronage of parish churches. Women clearly desired prayers on behalf of their souls and those of family members, as ubiquitous inscriptions indicate. Such donations also had the benefit of advertising a family's wealth alongside its piety and hence adding to familial cultural capital.

NANCY BRADLEY WARREN

References and Further Reading

- French, Katherine L. "Women in the Late Medieval English Parish." In Gendering the Master Narrative: Women and Power in the Middle Ages, edited by Mary C. Erler and Maryanne Kowaleski. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2003, pp. 156–173.
- Gold, Penny S. "The Charters of Le Ronceray d'Angers: Male/Female Interaction in Monastic Business." In Medieval Women and the Sources of Medieval History, edited by Joel T. Rosenthal. Athens, Ga.: University of Georgia Press, 1990, pp. 122–132.
- Johnson, Penelope D. Prayer, Patronage, and Power: The Abbey of la Trinité, Vendôme, 1032–1187. New York: New York University Press, 1981.
- King, Catherine. "Women as Patrons: Nuns, Widows, and Rulers." In Siena, Florence, and Padua: Arts, Society, and Religion 1280–1400. Vol. 2, edited by Diana Norman. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1995, pp. 243–266.
- Kümin, Beat. The Shaping of a Community: The Rise and Reformation of the English Parish c.1400–1560. Brookfield, Vt.: Scolar, 1996.
- Lawrence, C. H. Medieval Monasticism: Forms of Religious Life in Western Europe in the Middle Ages. London: Longman, 1984.
- McCash, June Hall, ed. The Cultural Patronage of Medieval Women. Athens Ga.: University of Georgia Press, 1996.
- McLaughlin, Mary Martin. "Creating and Recreating Communities of Women: The Case of Corpus Domini, Ferrara, 1406–1452." In Sisters and Workers in the Middle Ages, edited by Judith Bennett et al. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1989, pp. 261–288.

- Mirrer, Louise, ed. Upon My Husband's Death: Widows in the Literature and Histories of Medieval Europe. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1992.
- Raguin, Virginia Chieffo, and Sarah Stanbury, eds. Women's Space: Patronage, Place, and Gender in the Medieval Church. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2005.
- Schulenburg, Jane Tibbets. "Women's Monastic Communities, 500–1100: Patterns of Expansion and Decline." In Sisters and Workers in the Middle Ages, edited by Judith M. Bennett et al. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1989, pp. 208–239.
- Thompson, Sally. Women Religious: The Founding of English Nunneries after the Norman Conquest. Oxford: Clarendon, 1991.
- Warren, Nancy Bradley. Women of God and Arms: Female Spirituality and Political Conflict, 1380–1600. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2005.
- Weaver, F. W., ed. Somerset Medieval Wills: 1383–1500. 3 vols. Somerset Record Society 16, 19, 21 Gloucester: Alan Sutton, 1983.
- Wood, Susan. English Monasteries and Their Patrons in the Thirteenth Century. London: Oxford University Press, 1955.

See also Architecture, Ecclesiastical; Architecture, Monastic; Artisan Families, Women of; Beaufort, Margaret; Birgittine Order; Burials and Tombs; Colette of Corbie; Devotional Art; Dowry and Other Marriage Gifts; Heiresses; Landholding and Property Rights; Margaret of York; Merchant Families, Women of; Monasticism and Nuns; Noble Women; Records, Ecclesiastical; Widows; Wills

PATRONAGE, LITERARY

Throughout the Middle Ages, literary patronage was a special case of a larger social structure that organized political, economic, and cultural relationships at every level of society. Feudalism—the institution most associated with the Middle Ages—was itself an elaborate patronage system. The exchange of patronage, even after the return of a monetary economy in the twelfth century, was the primary means by which those both within and without government constituted their relationship to it. For this reason, it is important not to isolate literary patronage from other patronage relationships of which it was a part. Patronage was not a form of charity, philanthropy, or altruism, but a way of structuring social, political, and economic associations through gift-giving. The term covers a wide range of practices and customs in which the nature of the relationship between patron and client is left deliberately ambiguous.

Patronage organizes social life not contractually between corporate groups but through informal, face-to-face relationships between individuals. In literature, patronage provided a means of organizing the social relations of writing—of transmitting knowledge and authority—that was both more local and broader than the political divisions that have been used since the nineteenth century to organize literature.

In our own age of mechanical reproduction, a system of rewards pays authors royalties for their published work, creating distinct boundaries between the production of literary texts and their consumption. Writers at least appear free from the need to ingratiate themselves with any particular readers. Writing can be conceived of as a job and a social identity. In the Middle Ages, the system of reward for literary labor was different. Because the production of books was labor-intensive, requiring the orchestration of several artisans—writers, illuminators, rubricators, bookbinders, scribes—it is unlikely that authors could afford to produce books on their own in the hopes that someone might pay them for it. The task of coordinating book production and underwriting its expense was usually assumed by a patron who commissioned the work and who might supply the materials, oversee, coordinate, and reward the various artisans involved in its production. The process of writing or copying a book was either the product of a patronage relationship or the means of initiating one.

Patronage both shapes and is shaped by gender. Because of their informal and intimate nature, patronage networks offered an avenue for aristocratic women, who were otherwise excluded from political and economic life, to exercise power. There is evidence throughout the Middle Ages, in almost every region from Scotland to Jerusalem, that women engaged in both political and cultural patronage. Patronage is an important index of women's status since one could not be in a position to be a patron unless one wielded some kind of power or influence worth gaining access to. Eleanor of Aquitaine, who was successively queen of France and of England, was perhaps the greatest literary patron of the twelfth century but she is hardly an anomaly. Ermengard of Narbonne, as an heiress in control of her own lands, supported several troubadours including the trobairitz Azalaïs de Porcairages. Because they were more likely to be excluded from the Latin culture that defined literacy for much of the Middle Ages, female patrons were particularly significant in the revival of vernacular literatures. Many of the great medieval writers and compilers—Chaucer, Foissart, Caxton—experienced their first literary successes with the support of female patrons. The fifteenth century poet Christine de Pizan relied on extensive female patronage; the spectacularly illuminated manuscript of her collected works (Harley, 4431) was originally presented to the French queen Isabeau of Bavaria.

Abesses, religious women, and wealthy nuns were also frequently important patrons. Bede credits Hild, Abbess of Whitby, with discovering the first English vernacular poet, Caedmon, while Hildegard of Bingen was, in turn, patron to the visionary Elisabeth of Schönau.

Patronage networks disseminate, becoming more complex as clients forge relationships with multiple patrons and patrons compete for the clientele that will affirm their importance. Among women, patronage networks spread through intermarriage. The network Eleanor of Aquitaine and her daughters established might be credited with spreading the ideology of courtly love throughout Europe. Eleanor was the granddaughter of Guillaume IX, the first troubadour poet and the first to articulate fin' amor (courtly love). Marie, Eleanor's eldest daughter by her first marriage to Louis VII, married the Count of Champagne and became patron to Chrétien de Troyes, author of several Arthurian romances, and Andreas Capellanus, author of The Art of Courtly Love. Her half-sister, Matilda of Saxony introduced courtly love into her husband's German lands, while her other sister, Leonor of England, queen of Castile, was known for her support of troubadours. The geographical dispersal of Eleanor and her daughters through marriage suggests something of the internationalizing role women's cultural patronage played. Many aristocratic and royal women were married off in foreign lands. As the cultural traditions and languages these women brought with them mingled with those of their new homes, new literary styles and genres emerged. The spread of an indigenous legend like that of King Arthur, from a marginal northern outpost like England to nearly all of Europe can be explained in part by the patronage of peripatetic brides who contributed to the cosmopolitan flavor of medieval culture.

Patronage involves the exchange of different types of resources, both tangible and symbolic, resources that are perceived as interchangeable. The growth of a money economy after the twelfth century did not eliminate the structure of this gift economy; rather it meant that patronage could take new forms, like cash; older forms of reward—position, political influence, encouragement, and protection from competitors—continued to be important. What patrons received for their investment was less tangible. The term symbolic capital describes the means by which the wealthy converted some of their disproportionate wealth into forms of prestige, status, and social control through what are understood as voluntary acts of generosity. For recently widowed aristocratic women, for instance, acts of patronage were often part of a strategy to protect the interests of minor children against the incursions of other relatives; Queen Emma of England seemed to have this in mind when she commissioned the Encomium Emmae Reginae on the eve of the Norman Conquest.

Patronage relationships are defined within a system of highly elaborated rituals, codes, and rules, which are unspoken or articulated only in an elaborately codified language that disguises the economic or political nature of the relationship as personal and private (our custom of tipping is a useful analogy). Gender provided a convenient language for disguising the economic features of patronage. Fin' amor may have developed among the troubadour poets of the twelfth century as a means of masking the economic calculus involved in aristocratic patronage. The vida of the troubadour poet Bernart de Ventadorn suggests the euphemizing function of the courtly lyric; having received the favor of the Viscount of Ventadorn, who "grew very fond of him and of his inventing and his singing, and greatly honored him," he then falls in love with the viscount's wife: "and composed his songs and his poems for her, and about her merit." The erotics of the relationship between Bernart and his lord are here displaced onto the heterosexual love between the poet and his lord's wife. This perhaps explains why the great troubadour poets almost always addressed their loves as dompna, married ladies, rather than donzella. The great erotic triangles of medieval romance—Arthur-Guenevere-Lancelot and Tristan-Isolde-Mark—continue this tradition, using the adulterous relationship between two lovers to mask the more taboo erotics that exist between the two men bound by the "love" of patronage.

Laurie Finke

References and Further Reading

- Bourdieu, Pierre. Outline of a Theory of Practice, translated by Richard Nice. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1877.
- Eisenstadt, S. N., and Luis Roniger. Patrons, Clients, and Friends: Interpersonal Relations and the Structure of Trust in Society. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984.
- Finke, Laurie. Women's Writing in English: The Middle Ages. London: Longmans, 1999.
- Hambly, Gavin R. G., ed. Women in the Medieval Islamic World: Power, Patronage, and Piety. New York: St. Martin's, 1998.
- Kellogg, Judith. Medieval Artistry and Exchange: Economic Institutions, Society, and Literary Form in Old French Narrative. New York: Lang, 1989.
- Lewis, Hyde. The Gift: Imagination and the Erotic Life of Property. New York: Vintage, 1979.
- Mauss, Marcel. The Gift: Forms and Functions of Exchange in Archaic Societies, translated by I. Cunnison. New York: Norton, 1967.
- McCash, June Hall, ed. The Cultural Patronage of Medieval Women. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1996.

PATRONAGE, LITERARY

Sedgwick, Eve. Between Men: English Literature and Male Homosocial Desire. New York: Columbia University, 1985.

Trigg, Stephanie. Congenial Souls: Reading Chaucer from Medieval to Postmodern. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 2002.

See also Abbesses; Chaucer, Geoffrey; Christine de Pizan; Courtly Love; Eleanor of Aquitaine; Ermengard; Hild of Whitby; Hildegard of Bingen; Literacy and Reading; Vernacular; Patronage, Artistic; Patronage, Ecclesiastical; Trobairitz and Troubadours

PEASANTS

Arguably, peasant women had the worst of both worlds: as peasants, they occupied the lowest rank on the social scale, while as women, they formed the lower group within this bottom rank. The vast majority of medieval Europeans—more than ninety percent—were peasants. Among this group, further subdivisions existed: depending on parentage, one might be a slave (although this was rare from the tenth century on), a non-free peasant (known as a serf or a villein), or a free peasant. Some peasants could even be semi-free, obligated to lords/ladies in some ways while exercising more freedom than serfs in others. Regardless of their legal status, however, peasants typically lived in small villages or hamlets and earned their livelihood by working on land owned by the nobility. Conditions of legal status and living conditions varied throughout Europe; this entry focuses primarily on England because the better survival of primary sources means that considerably more is known about English peasant women than about peasant women elsewhere.

Peasant Women's Work

Men's work was based in the fields. Male serfs were required to work on their lord's or lady's land for a certain number of days each week. They spent the rest of their time working on land rented from the lord/lady. Women could sometimes inherit or purchase land and thus act as tenants, but this was rare, and female tenants were often forced to hire men to carry out their labor obligations. While women were usually exempt from working on the lands of the nobility except at times of the year when every hand was needed (e.g., harvest season), their lives were no less busy than those of their fathers, husbands, and brothers.

Peasant women typically worked at multiple occupations. While their husbands were in the fields, peasant wives cooked food, minded children, fetched water, tended animals, grew vegetables, made, washed, and mended clothing, and took produce to market. Although their work only sometimes took them beyond the immediate vicinity of the house, they nonetheless contributed to household income both directly (by earning wages and selling excess food and drink) and indirectly (by saving the family from having to purchase extra food and clothing). Poems such as the fifteenth-century English "Ballad of a Tyrannical Husband," in which a husband and wife recount their various tasks over the course of the day, show that a peasant woman's life was filled with multiple chores, often carried out simultaneously. Peasant women regularly brewed weak ale for their families and sold any excess within their villages. Girls and unmarried women worked at the same tasks, with single women often hired out for several years as servants to other local peasant families. If opportunities were scarce, single women often migrated to the towns.

In addition to work within the house, peasant women sometimes supplemented household income by working in the fields as paid labor. When they did so, they received lower wages than men. Studies of women's wages in England show that women typically received about two-thirds to three-quarters of the wages of men. This irregular income, however, probably provided a significant boost to the household economy.

Peasant Women's Status

The status of peasant women relative to that of peasant men has proven an issue of considerable debate among historians. Eileen Power's 1926 essay on medieval women suggested that medieval women of all ranks enjoyed "a certain rough-and-ready equality" with men, and her model has proven enduring. Some more recent historians have thus portrayed the lives of peasant women as that of a partnership with their husbands, with each contributing (albeit in different ways) to the household economy. Indeed, this rosier depiction of peasant women's status can be found even in medieval times: Christine de Pizan's fifteenth-century advice to "humble women living in the village, on the plains, or in the mountains," suggested that the lives of peasant women were "often more secure and better nourished than the lives of those seated in better places." For Christine, Power, and others, class thus "trumped" gender in determining women's status and the conditions of their lives.

More recent scholarship, however, has complicated this picture, and most would now agree that the opportunities of peasant women were considerably more limited than those of their fathers, husbands, and brothers. For instance, women appeared far less frequently than men in manorial courts and were very seldom, if ever, appointed to positions of local authority, such as ale-taster, bailiff, or churchwarden. In comparison to their male relatives, they only occasionally served as “pledges” for their friends and family members (a position similar to standing bail). In consequence, their ability to shape their lives beyond the household was limited. The patriarchal constraints faced by peasant women were thus different from those of noble women, but they existed nonetheless. We have far less evidence about what happened within the household: certainly women made direct contributions to the conjugal economy and performed important roles, but we know little about who made household decisions. Scholars have also focused on the role of peasant widows: while widows had more legal rights and responsibilities than wives, they were nonetheless among the most economically vulnerable. Widowed women did not remarry quite so quickly or frequently as widowed men, but they still remarried often, especially in places where land was scarce.

Representations of Peasant Women

Literary representations of peasants by medieval elites show a clear distinction between men and women. Poets typically depicted male peasants as grotesque and dull, whereas they described female peasants as beautiful and innocent objects of desire. Knights were expected to find peasant women attractive, and some sources even claimed that rape of “shepherdesses” was understandable and excusable. The French genre of the pastourelle (pastoral poetry) emerged in about the twelfth century and features many encounters between knights and peasant women, both consensual and forced. Indeed, some of the pastourelles even imply that peasant women themselves enjoyed rape, saw it as a game, or were won over by the amorous skills of the knights. In the eyes of medieval nobles, peasant women were not only more beautiful than their male counterparts but also more intelligent. Some examples of the pastourelle depict peasant women who defend themselves with their wit and make their knightly suitors look silly. Peasant women fool men of their own class, too: French fabliaux often depict adulterous peasant women who trick their husbands into overlooking or ignoring their sins.

Direct advice to peasant women, on the other hand, portrays them as considerably less intelligent. Christine de Pizan’s somewhat patronizing advice to peasant women lectures them about loving a single God, refraining from theft, and living in peace with their neighbors. For Christine, peasant women seem to be ignorant but well-intentioned. Anthony Fitzherbert’s early sixteenth-century Boke of Husbandry similarly doles out advice about matters that were probably second nature to a peasant woman: she should begin the day by sweeping her house, send corn and malt to the mill, and much else besides.

Artistic depictions of peasant women emphasize their roles as workers. Images in manuscripts such as the English Luttrell Psalter and the French Book of Hours of the Duc de Berry depict women harvesting, feeding chickens, carrying water or ale, and carding and spinning wool. Women appear less frequently than men but, like men, they are featured primarily at work (rather than at leisure or at worship, for instance).

Because we lack documents written from the perspective of peasant women, we know far less about how they themselves regarded their own status and roles. Stereotypes of peasant women (and townswomen) as gossips imply a vibrant oral culture, and case-studies like those of the French peasants of Montailou, demonstrate that women participated in meaningful networks of friendship and mutual support. Similarly, records of women’s participation in parish guilds show that these functioned as a way for women to work together on common projects and enjoy each other’s company.

SANDRA BARDSLEY

References and Further Reading

- Bennett, Judith M. Women in the Medieval English Countryside: Gender and Household in Brigstock before the Plague. New York: Oxford University Press, 1987.
- . A Medieval Life: Cecilia Penifader of Brigstock, c. 1295–1344. Boston: McGraw-Hill, 1996.
- de Pizan, Christine. A Medieval Woman’s Mirror of Honor: The Treasury of the City of Ladies, translated by Charity Cannon Willard & edited by Madeleine Pelter Cosman. Tenafly, N.J.: Bard Hall Press, 1989.
- Freedman, Paul. Images of the Medieval Peasant. Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1999.
- Hanawalt, Barbara A. The Ties That Bound: Peasant Families in Medieval England. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- . “Peasant Women’s Contribution to the Home Economy in Late Medieval England.” In Women and Work in Preindustrial Europe, edited by Barbara A. Hanawalt. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1986, pp. 3–19.

Ladurie, Emmanuel LeRoy. Montaillou: The Promised Land of Error, translated by Barbara Bray. New York: Vintage Books, 1979.

See also Agriculture; Alewives and Brewing; Christine de Pizan; Division of Labor; England; Fabliau; Feme Covert; Feme Sole; Gossip and Slander; Household Management; Husbands and Husbandry; Landholding and Property Rights; Parishes; Pastourelle; Records, Rural; Servants; Slaves; Social Status; Widows; Work

PENITENTIALS AND PASTORAL MANUALS

Pastoral manuals took various forms in both the early and late Middle Ages. Such a text could be a complex theoretical document elaborating scriptural precedents for the priesthood, or a short text focusing on a specific pastoral function. An example of the former is Gregory the Great's Liber Regulae Pastoralis or Pastoral Care (c. 590), a richly nuanced description of the priest's role as preacher and teacher widely popular throughout the Middle Ages, and translated into English by King Alfred and his assistants at the end of the ninth century. Among the earliest examples of the latter are handbooks of penance, or penitentials, catalogues listing sins and the penances assigned to each by the priest in confession.

From a practical perspective, the penitential, a form with its origins in Irish monasticism of the seventh century, can be considered the first pastoral manual. The penitential was primarily concerned with the administration of private confession and penance, but it also addressed the priest's duties in relation to other sacramental and disciplinary matters, including marriage and rites for the dying. Such texts were designed to educate the clergy as well as to guide them in the exercise of their offices. Although traditionally known as "handbooks," penitentials survive most often as parts of larger codices of ecclesiastical statutes, treatises, and homilies; these collections suggest that already in the early Middle Ages the penitential was regarded as an indispensable tool of pastoral education. Very few small, self-contained manuscripts that fit the designation handbook survive, no doubt because such utilitarian documents perished easily.

Penitentials are not simply lists, however; even the earliest surviving texts (from the eighth century) include prefatory material, including the ordo confessionis, a quasi-liturgical text explaining how the priest was to administer the sacrament, question the sinner, determine his or her sincerity, and weigh the seriousness of the sins confessed. Handbooks frequently differentiate penances according to the sinner's social status, including age, gender, and occupation. Penitentials appear to have originated in Ireland and reached England through the work of Irish missionaries. By the late seventh century, the handbook had spread to followers of Theodore of Canterbury (d. 690), the first non-Irish authority under whose name a penitential was issued. Ninth- and tenth-century manuscripts of penitentials are common on the Continent. Starting in England in the tenth century, penitentials were written in both Latin and the vernacular, although the Latin texts are far more numerous. The vernacular texts of the tenth and eleventh centuries list penances identical to those found in eighth-century texts. Some scholars assume that penitential tariffs would have been revised as the handbooks passed from region to region and century to century, and this uniformity is seen by them as contradicting assumptions about the widespread practice of private confession and penance. Regulatory literature is notoriously conservative, however, and although variations in penances themselves are rare, the handbooks show considerable innovation over time in both form and scope. It is safe to say that confession was widespread in both the early and late medieval periods, moving outward from its monastic origins to the lay population living around the monastery, and spreading to spiritual communities that formed around what eventually became the parish church. The early penitentials devote extensive consideration to sexual sins and to distinguishing the sins of men from those of women. According to the eighth-century Penitential of Theodore, for example (and its eleventh-century vernacular English translations), a woman who had sex with another woman was assigned a penance of fasting for three years (penances for male homosexual intercourse were higher, up to ten years). A husband could dismiss an adulterous wife, but a wife could not get rid of an adulterous husband unless she was willing to join a monastery.

Penitential literature underwent a great change after the Lateran Council of 1215, after which point pastoral manuals become more numerous. But the Council has served too conveniently as a date for differentiating old and new styles of penitentials and manuals. The Decretum of Burchard of Worms (finished by 1015) compiled moral theology and church law, drawing on handbooks of penance, patristic sources, and conciliar texts. Burchard's nineteenth book, "Corrector, seu medicus," often served as a penitential manual itself and drew some of its provisions from early penitentials, including the one attributed to Theodore of Canterbury. Burchard's text is an early example of the synthesis of instruction and practical regulation that served as a guide for the clergy. The Decretum of Gratian (c. 1140) combined a discourse on canon law and its principles with a discussion of church law, including penance and matrimony, and material on the liturgy and sacraments. Thereafter handbooks of penance and pastoral manuals were seemingly inseparable forms. [Ivo of Chartres incorporated many of Burchard's decisions into his Decretum in the late eleventh century, and later penitentials derive from Ivo's work, including those by Bartholomew of Exeter (c. 1150) and Robert of Flamborough (c. 1208). Robert's Liber Poenitentialis shows how the handbook of penance had developed as a form of catechism. Throughout the thirteenth century such texts became much longer and more complex and were designed to leave little to the discretion of individual confessors. They provided the confessor with topics divided and subdivided with near scholastic complexity. Manuals once limited to a few functions were now broadened to include prayers as well information on the commandments, the works of mercy, the deadly sins, and other matters of devotion and doctrine.

Later medieval manuals are explicit in describing how priests were to preach to and teach their congregations. The bishops' success in persuading the clergy to adhere to the regulations of these manuals is, of course, an open question. The sheer bulk of the surviving evidence strongly suggests that the program was pervasive. Works by John Pecham and William of Pagula, written in the late thirteenth and early fourteenth centuries, helped to conflate the objectives of pastoral manuals with those of theological treatises. Such texts informed a new generation of manuals written for the laity (e.g., The Lay Folks' Catechism). Prose works including Jacob's Well and Dives and Pauper further consolidated the aims of pastoral and lay education. By the late fourteenth century the pastoral manual had generated many textual strands in France, England, and elsewhere. The thirteenth-century Manuel des péchés, for example, was translated into English as Handlyng Synne by Robert Manning in the first quarter of the fourteenth century. This text includes several anecdotes in which women are assumed to be responsible for inciting the clergy to sexual sins, although Manning makes it clear that greater responsibility falls on the clergy in such cases. Special considerations for women appear elsewhere, as in the fifteenth-century Instructions for Parish Priests by John Myrc, which urges priests to give moderate penances that will be carried out rather than neglected as too demanding and requires that women be given penances that their husband will not know about (i.e., penance that can be performed in private).

Pastoral manuals offer a wealth of insight into medieval Christian expectations of human behavior. As penitentials, they advise the priest on methods of testing and determining the sincerity of the penitent's confession, his or her motives, degree of guilt, and other psychological factors that made confession an intriguing subject for literary exploration. Chaucer's Parson's Tale is one of the most elaborate attempts to integrate the genre of the manual into fiction. Following a verse prologue that questions the morality of fiction, the Parson's "tale" turns out to be a translation of the Summa de poenitentia of the Dominican Raymund of Pennaforte (c. 1222–1229). After defining the three parts of penance as contrition, confession, and satisfaction, the text distinguishes venial from mortal sins and vividly illustrates the seven deadly sins. Chaucer's decision to make this treatise the final "tale" of The Canterbury Tales has puzzled readers and points to the great gap between "literary" texts and pastoral discourse.

Penitentials and pastoral manuals have long been unedited and unstudied. Discussions dismissing them as having little or no literary interest were once routine. However, work on sexuality, sex, and gender in recent decades has begun to reverse this view. These texts are now seen as forms that refracted various aspects of medieval experience even as they sought to shape that experience along doctrinal lines. Sometimes, as in Handlyng Synne, narrative exempla are used to underscore the moral perspective of the text. Scholars have shown far more interest in such works than in those texts that approach pastoral instruction in a matter-of-fact way, as in, for example, the Lay Folk's Catechism, and it is clear that this catechism and similar works still have much to teach readers about the educational and pastoral traditions of the Middle Ages.

ALLEN J. FRANTZEN

References and Further Reading

- Frantzen, Allen J. The Literature of Penance in Anglo-Saxon England. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1983.
- Gillespie, Vincent. "Doctrina and Predicatio: The Design and Function of Some Pastoral Manuals." Leeds Studies in English n.s. 9 (1980): 36–50.
- Joliffe, P. S. A Check-List of Middle English Prose Writings of Spiritual Guidance. Toronto: Pontifical Institute of Mediaeval Studies, 1974.
- McNeill, John T., and Helena M. Gamer. Medieval Handbooks of Penance: A Translation of the Principal. Reprint, New York: Columbia University Press, Libri Poenitentiales and Selections from Related Documents. New York: Columbia University Press, 1938; 1990.
- Rayme, Robert T. Words of Religious and Philosophical Instruction. In A Manual of Writings in Middle English, 1050–1500, vol. 7. ed. Albert C. Hartung. New Haven: Connecticut Academy of Arts and Sciences, 1986.
- Utley, Francis Lee. Dialogues, Debates, and Catechisms. In A Manual of Writings in Middle English, 1050–1500, vol. 3. ed. Albert C. Hartung. New Haven: Connecticut Academy of Arts and Sciences, 1972.

 Woods, Marjorie Curry, and Rita Copeland. "Classroom and Confession." In The Cambridge History of Medieval English Literature. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1999, pp. 376–406.

See also Education, Lay; Education, Monastic; Law, Canon; Lay Piety; Sermons and Preaching; Sexuality, Regulation of; Spiritual Care

PERFORMANCE IN LYRIC

The information available on women's performance of lyric poetry encompasses a wide variety of textual sources, including historical references, literary, and didactic texts that present singing as a desirable accomplishment for women, and narrative works that depict women in the act of singing. Lyric poetry could be performed unaccompanied or accompanied by flute, harp, or fiddle; the specific songs are not usually identified, except in fictional accounts.

Ubiquitous in the medieval Arab world were trained female singers who performed extensive repertoires of songs from memory. They flourished particularly during the <sup>6</sup>Abbāsid period (749–1258 CE) and included both slaves (jāriyya or qaynah) and freedwomen. Qiyān sang, played instruments, and improvised poetry. Another group of female singers in Arab courts were known as the nadīm, highly educated companions to the ruler. On the Iberian peninsula, female singers performed Andalusian strophic genres such as the vernacular Arabic zajal and the classical Arabic muwashshah. The existence of kharjas (the final strophe of muwashshahat) in the poetic voice of a female subject (some of them in an inchoate Romance vernacular) has been associated with performance by Andalusian female singers. Several of the kharjas are introduced by phrases (such as "she sings") evoking such a performance context.

This interpretation of the Hispano-Arabic lyric raises the question of whether the depiction of female subjectivity in the lyric reflects female agency (whether composition or performance). The sex of the composer/author is frequently unknown, precluding any basis for determining the authenticity of the poetic voice. Nevertheless, the broad category of "woman's song" is often used to designate poetry in which the speaker (or one of the speakers) seems to be a woman. Even in songs clearly attributed to a man, such as the Galician-Portuguese cantigas de amigo of Martim Codax, the presence of a female speaker is sometimes thought to signal a connection with popular lyric genres that were customarily performed by women. Just how one might interpret the poetic representation of the female voice has long been central to scholarly discussions of musical performance by medieval women. In some cases an association with an archaic substrate of female performance traditions is an inherent dimension of the genre, as in the courtly northern French "spinning songs" or chansons de toile. Many "woman's songs" survive in the modern Sephardic, Arabic, and Galician oral traditions.

In what is now France, women worked as professional entertainers or minstrels (jougleresse in northern France, joglaressa or soldadeira in the south), performing lyric poetry among other genres. Courtly narrative and song depict women of various classes singing lyric poetry, suggesting that the authors were familiar with this kind of performance. A wide range of texts from northern France associates women with the performance of dances, known as caroles, that were performed while singing. In the later Middle Ages, and particularly in the fifteenth century, manuscript and biographical evidence suggests that elite women composed and performed lyric poetry set to music. The medieval Occitan lyric corpus of southern France includes several works attributed to female poets (trobairitz). Most of the melodies for these compositions do not survive, but the works were sung, quite possibly by their composers. References to performance by female poets in Occitania are rare, but it seems significant that a thirteenth-century manuscript contains instructions to the illuminator to depict the Comtessa de Dia (fl. c. 1200) as a lady singing.

Historical sources attest to the presence of women as professional singers at courts and in towns during the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries in the British Isles, France, Italy, Spain, and German-speaking lands. These women could also be minstrels. Information on amateur singing can be gleaned from prescriptive and literary texts. The early fourteenth-century treatise by Francesco da Barberino, Reggimento e costumi di donna, is an example of conduct literature that specifically addresses women's musical performance. Barberino recommended that elite women sing in public only at the request of a relative, but that they could sing in their rooms on a regular basis, while lower-class women had more freedom to engage in musical performance. In Boccaccio's Decameron, several of the female characters perform ballate, a fixed form of Italian lyric poetry that was linked to dance. In the fifteenth century, professional women singers of secular music, including lyric poetry, were employed by northern Italian courts. The extensive corpus of poetry in German authored by women during the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries suggests that women were involved in the musical performance of this lyric tradition as well.

SUSAN BOYNTON

References and Further Reading

- Beck, Eleonora M. Singing in the Garden: Music and Culture in the Tuscan Trecento. Innsbruck: Studien und Lucca: LIM, 1998.
- Brown, Howard Mayer. "Women Singers and Women's Songs in Fifteenth-Century Italy." In Women Making Music: The Western Art Tradition, 1150–1950, edited by Jane Bowers and Judith Tick. Urbana and Chicago: University of Illinois Press, 1986, pp. 62–89.
- Cheyette, Fredric L., and Margaret Switten. "Women in Troubadour Song: Of the Comtessa and the Vilana." Women and Music: A Journal of Gender and Culture 2 (1998): 26–46.
- Classen, Albrecht. Late-Medieval German Women's Poetry: Secular and Religious Songs. Cambridge: D. S. Brewer, 2004.
- Coldwell, Maria. "Jouglersesses and Trobairitz: Secular Musicians in Medieval France." In Women Making Music: The Western Art Tradition, 1150–1950, edited by Jane Bowers and Judith Tick. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1986, pp. 39–61.
- Marshall, Kimberly. "Symbols, Performers, and Sponsors: Female Musical Creators in the Late Middle Ages." In Rediscovering the Muses: Women's Musical Traditions, edited by Kimberly Marshall. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1993, pp. 140–168.
- Medieval Woman's Song: Cross-Cultural Perspectives*, edited by Ann Marie Rasmussen and Anne Klinck. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001.
- Page, Christopher. Voices and Instruments of the Middle Ages: Instrumental Practice and Songs in France 1100–1300. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1986.
- Rokseth, Yvonne. "Les femmes musiciennes du XIIe au XIV siècle." Romania 61 (1935): 464–480.
- Sawa, George Dimitri. Music Performance Practice in the early Abbasid Era, 132–320 AH / 750–932 AD. Toronto: Pontifical Institute of Mediaeval Studies, 1989.
- Songs of the Women Trouvères*, edited by Eglal Doss-Quinby, Joan Tasker Grimbert, Wendy Pfeffer, and Elizabeth Aubrey. New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 2001.

See also Trobairitz and Troubadours; Trouvères, Women; Woman's Song

PERFORMANCE THEORY

Performance theory focuses upon the classification, analysis, and functions of performances. Performance theorists regard performance as an innate human activity and therefore as a useful way to study human interaction. Performances (defined as mimetic, deliberate, and elaborated behaviors) include play, games, sports, theater, and ritual. Richard Schechner has identified four characteristics of such performances: 1) They take place in "event time" where the activity itself has a set sequence and all sequences must be completed regardless of how long it takes; 2) objects have different values from those attached to them in ordinary practice; 3) performance activities are nonproductive, that is, they create no wealth or goods; and 4) they are hedged about with special rules. Further, performance theorists have postulated that performance as a mimetic behavior is "cooked" in the Levi-Straussian sense of transforming raw experience into culturally palatable terms, and, as such, culturally co-created. Performances may be either conservative, reinforcing social order, or revolutionary, restructuring it.

Performance theories are useful to the study of medieval women because a performance perspective focuses upon what women did in their milieu. Scholars can analyze relationships among types of performances. An important aspect of performance theory for medievalists is the examination of relationships between texts and their performative uses. Because medieval texts were almost never written as private recollections of an individual author, a focus upon the performative dimensions of medieval textuality opens up new possibilities for understanding women's (and men's) agency in creating public performances that shaped and responded to their culture. A good introduction to the possibilities of performance theory for new understandings of the writings of a diverse array of women like Marguerite Porete, Margery Kempe, and Birgitta of Sweden is Mary Suydam and Joanna Ziegler's Performance and Transformation: New Approaches to Late Medieval Spirituality.

MARY SUYDAM

References and Further Reading

- Beeman, William O. "Performance Theory in an Anthropology Program." <http://www.brown.edu/Departments/A Anthropology/publications/PerformanceTheory.htm>.
- Schechner, Richard. Performance Theory. London and New York: Routledge, 1988.
- Suydam, Mary A. "Background: An Introduction to Performance Studies." In Performance and Transformation: New Approaches to Late Medieval Spirituality, edited by Mary A. Suydam and Joanna E. Ziegler. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1999, pp. 1–25.
- Turner, Victor. The Anthropology of Performance. New York: PAJ Productions, 1986.

See also Postmodernism and Historiography

PERSONIFICATIONS VISUALIZED AS WOMEN

Medieval allegory and its use of personified abstractions connect some of the central elements of Western thought—including questions of literary history, education, hermeneutics, and theology—to the representation of femininity and female characters in medieval literature and culture. Allegory, a metaphorical symbol, figure, discourse, or story, comes from the Greek words allos, “other,” and agoreuein, “to speak,” and situates itself in the belief that the value of a text depends upon its having “other” interpretations beyond the literal meaning. Allegoresis, or allegorical interpretation, enabled early exegetes to reconcile discrepancies between contemporary ideas and ancient texts. Primary in this regard was the impulse to read the Old Testament typologically, through the lens of the New Testament, and thus to understand female Old Testament figures, for example Eve, or the bride in the Song of Songs, as representative of larger moral or explicitly Christian themes, such as the danger of carnal desires (in the case of Eve) and the love of the Church for Christ (in the case of the bride). This use of allegory to extol the Christian perspective occurred in medieval art as well as literature. Late medieval antagonism toward Jews, for example, transformed a contest mentioned in the New Testament between the allegorical figures of Ecclesia, or Church, and the Jewish Synagogue, into a popular visual dyad, with Church depicted as a triumphant, newly crowned queen, and Synagogue depicted as a blinded or blindfolded woman who has lost her crown (perhaps following an image in the Lamentations of Jeremiah 5:16–17), or who holds a broken lance to represent her part in Christ’s Passion (for example, in the Musée de l’Oeuvre Notre-Dame, Strasbourg).

Yet, as Dante’s influential description of the four-fold allegorical interpretation in his “Letter to Can Grande della Scala” (c. 1317) suggests, allegory’s interpretive function could be applied to contemporary poetry as well as ancient texts. Dante’s preeminent allegorical work, the Divine Comedy, uses different types of allegory—including identifying his childhood love, Beatrice, with Christ—to represent physically what is ultimately a spiritual journey. As his poetry shows, allegory’s power as a form of medieval expression and interpretation lay in its way of linking the concrete and the abstract, but also in its way of linking the present to the past, and the secular to the spiritual. In its relation to the larger history of the representation of women, medieval personification allegory could be said to have helped restrict women characters to the realm of abstraction and essentialism; at the same time, however, the role allegory played in bringing female characters to the forefront of medieval literary creativity should be recognized.

Classical Influences

Perhaps most important in regard to female personifications is medieval allegory’s dependence on the conventions of classical philosophy and rhetoric. While early Christian custom tended to associate women with Eve, temptation, and idolatry, the classical tradition, with its Neo-Platonic emphasis on the marriage of male and female elements in creation, and its use of female personifications to balance both good and evil forces, introduced a more positive representation of women (Ferrante, 2). Images of women were central to the late-antique worldview and self-understanding; works such as Prudentius’ Psychomachia (or “Conflict of the Soul”) and Martianus Capella’s Marriage of Philology and Mercury envision the human condition, and especially man’s capacity for knowledge and inner turmoil, through female personified abstractions. Prudentius’ text imagines the human conflict between the flesh and the spirit as an epic battle between the vices and virtues, all of which are presented as female. In a similar way, Capella’s work explores the realm of human learning through the allegorical marriage of the God of Eloquence, Mercury, to the mortal woman and bibliophile Philology, who receives as a wedding gift the Seven Liberal Arts, personified as maidens.

These texts and the female figures they envision became part of the foundation of the medieval educational curriculum and greatly influenced not only medieval learned culture, but also medieval culture as a whole. Female representations of the vices and the virtues, for instance, populate such medieval “best-sellers” as William Langland’s Piers Plowman and Guillaume de Deguileville’s Pèlerinage de la Vie Humaine (as well as John Lydgate’s later translation of this text, the “Pilgrimage of the Life of Man”), and play a central role in morality plays from Hildegard of Bingen’s early Ordo Virtutum to the famed late medieval Everyman. They also maintain a consistent visual presence, from manuscript illuminations and ekphrastic descriptions, such as the garden wall in Guillaume de Lorris’ and Jean de Meun’s Romance of the Rose, to the sculptured bays of the Chartres Cathedral.

Lady Philosophy as Model

The single most influential use of the female personification, at least in regard to medieval European popular poetry, is the appearance of Lady Philosophy in the opening of Boethius’ Consolation of Philosophy (c. 525). This figure’s materialization at the poet’s side in his darkest moment of despair and self-pity, her brusque initial treatment of him, and her subsequent role as simultaneous nurse, teacher, and spiritual and intellectual guide, became the template for numerous medieval works. Boethius did not invent the role of the abstract or otherworldly female authority figure and guide; Virgil's Sybil and Capella's Virtue prefigure his Philosophy and inform many later medieval works themselves. But the overwhelming popularity of Boethius' Consolation in western Europe for roughly one thousand years, from its creation until the early modern period, meant that imitations of and allusions to the text, and especially to its central female character, Philosophy, became a mark of literary authenticity, and eventually an element of medieval poetic convention. Some of the best-known female figures of medieval literature, including Alan of Lille's Nature in his Plaint of Nature, Reason in the Romance of the Rose, Dante's Beatrice, the Pearl maiden in the anonymous Pearl, Holy Church in Langland's Piers Plowman, and various female figures in Chaucer's dream poetry, implicitly echo aspects of Boethius' Philosophy. Importantly, however, Philosophy's forceful presence in Boethius' text, characterized by her loyalty, stability, and reason, gains much of its power through its opposition to another, less venerable female figure: that is, fickle Fortune, whose seductive material gifts and ever-turning wheel were also made famous by Boethius (and whose likeness also appears throughout the medieval corpus of the literary and visual arts). How one is to understand this familiar dichotomy of opposing female forces of good and evil, transcendent and material, hinges on the complicated issue of how female personifications speak to medieval constructions of women and gender.

Gendered Personifications

Like the female abstractions in Prudentius and Capella, and like many subsequent medieval personifications, Boethius' Philosophy, though female, also represents humankind's—and in this case, one particular man's—inner qualities. This type of multifaceted gender identity epitomizes the complicated nature of gendered abstractions. On the one hand, the gendering of personifications to a large extent follows the gendering of language: in Latin, abstract concepts are usually feminine, and hence so are the personifications of those abstract concepts. On the other hand, medieval representations of female personifications can also appear to construct feminine gender, by aligning the figures with culturally inscribed "feminine" characteristics, such as ornamentation, sexual or economic exchange, or the eroticized process of allegorical reading itself. Like their late-antique counterparts, medieval commentators were fascinated with the idea of allegory as a veil or covering—the integumentum or involutrum that revealed or concealed textual truth—and they often explored this idea by troping the male acquisition of secret knowledge, truth, and revelation as the unveiling of the female body and its sexual "secrets." While the medieval poet's focus on the adorned female body ostensibly concerns the male susceptibility to shiny or dazzling surfaces (both rhetorical and material), it also reveals the extent to which these figures represent femininity as a projection of male desire. Jean de Meun imagines Fortune as a woman who alternates between a wealthy, luxuriously adorned and sweetly scented lady preening herself in a golden palace, and a prostitute stripped of all clothing, weeping on the floor of a brothel. In his Parliament of Fowls, Chaucer likewise describes the Goddess of Love, Venus, as naked from the waist up, while the rest of her is covered in a garment so fine as to be see-through. Perhaps Langland's connubial Lady Meed, who ravishes men simultaneously with her sumptuous attire and with her sumptuous words, most clearly epitomizes this connection between the erotics of rich female adornment and the erotics of rich allegorical language. As modern theorists have pointed out, this age-old link between women, adornment, and allegory suggests that figuration itself was understood to be an inherently feminine act.

This is not to say that all female personifications in the medieval period, or even those that depict the relation between the male mind and the adorned female figure, overtly essentialize the female gender. Some medieval authors use female personifications to explore the very issue of flawed male perception, and even flawed gender perceptions. Central to the Pearl poem, for example, is the protagonist's persistent inability to see the Pearl irrespective of his preconceived, worldly notions of her. Some works, like Langland's Piers Plowman and the anonymous Cursor Mundi ("Runner of the World") draw attention to questions of gender by actually shifting the gender of certain personifications mid-text, and often mid-sentence. And finally, in her Book of the City of Ladies, Christine de Pizan uses the tradition of the wise female counselor (of which she has three: Lady Reason, Lady Rectitude, and Lady Justice) to challenge misogynist stereotypes of women and to create a new concept of female authority, one built on positive examples of historical and mythical women, and on her own authority as a female writer.

ANDREA DENNY-BROWN

References and Further Reading

Bloch, Howard. Medieval Misogyny and the Invention of Western Romantic Love. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1991.

- Bloomfield, Morton, ed. Allegory, Myth, and Symbol. Cambridge, Mass: Harvard University Press, 1981.
- Cooper, Helen. "Gender and Personification in Piers Plowman." Yearbook of Langland Studies 5 (1991): 31–48.
- de Man, Paul. Allegories of Reading: Figural Language in Rousseau, Nietzsche, Rilke, and Proust. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1979.
- Ferrante, Joan M. Woman as Image in Medieval Literature. New York: Columbia University Press, 1975.
- Fletcher, Angus. Allegory: The Theory of a Symbolic Mode. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1964.
- Greenblatt, Stephen J., ed. Allegories of Representation: Selected Papers from the English Institute, 1979–80. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1981.
- Katzenellenbogen, Adolf. Allegories of the Virtues and Vices in Medieval Art. London: Warburg Institute, 1939.
- Lewis, C. S. The Allegory of Love: A Study in Medieval Tradition. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1951.
- Mâle, Emile. Religious Art in France, The Twelfth Century: A Study of the Origins of Medieval Iconography. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1978.
- Paxson, James J. "Gender Personified, Personification Gendered, and the Body Figuralized in Piers Plowman." Yearbook of Langland Studies 12 (1998): 65–96.
- . "Personifications" Gender." Rhetorica 16.2 (1998): 149–179.
- . The Poetics of Personification. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994.
- Quilligan, Maureen. The Language of Allegory: Defining the Genre. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1979.
- . The Allegory of Female Authority: Christine de Pizan's Cite des Dames. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1991.
- Tuve, Rosemond. Allegorical Imagery: Some Medieval Books and Their Posterity. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1966.

See also Art: Representations of Women in; Beatrice; Body, Visual Representations of; Chaucer, Geoffrey; Christine de Pizan; Dante Alighieri; Gender in Art; Hildegard of Bingen; Roman de la Rose and Its Reception

PETITIONS

Petitions addressed to powerful individuals or institutions are as old as civilization itself. Given the lower status and illiteracy that frequently characterized medieval women, their written applications survive in smaller numbers than those submitted by men. As European bureaucracies became increasingly sophisticated, so did the form of pleas presented. Wealthy and prominent females seeking redress from perceived injustices or financial burdens typically employed scribes to prepare their documents; women of slenderer means and more urgent needs sought public arenas where they could voice complaints and elicit responses at minimal cost. This option remained open in some European communities until the late Middle Ages.

Petitions from medieval women survive in various European record collections. A useful selection of English material from the thirteenth century onwards is held at the U. K. National Archives in the Public Record Office's SC8 class (Special Collections: Ancient Petitions). These documents include women's petitions to the king, the king and council, Parliament, and the chancellor or other officers of state. Similar sources held at the Vatican Archives originated mainly from noble secular women or enclosed religious. They include applications for absolution, removal of the stain of illegitimacy (by religious seeking higher office in the convent), or papal intervention in disputes. The published papal letters of the fifteenth century indicate a rising demand from both men and women for permission to employ private confessors, own portable altars and worship in private oratories. This pattern appears to have been consistent with a trend towards individualism in the expression of the Christian faith. To what extent these petitions were ultimately successful is open to question, since surviving evidence is patchy.

VALERIE SPEAR

References and Further Reading

- Kittell, Ellen E. "Women, Audience, and Public Acts in Medieval Flanders." Journal of Women's History 10.3 (1998): 74–96.
- Public Record Office. Calendar of Entries in the Papal Registers Relating to Great Britain and Ireland. Papal Letters, vols 1–16. London: A.M.S.O., 1893–1986.
- . Calendar of Entries in the Papal Registers Relating to Great Britain and Ireland. Petitions to the Pope, vol. i, A.D. 1342–1419, ed. William Henry Bliss. London: Eyre and Spottiswoode, 1896.
- Schmugge, Ludwig. "Female Petitioners in the Papal Penitentiary." Gender & History 12.3 (2000): 685–703.
- Spear, Valerie. "A Canterbury Lament." Parergon, New Series 18.3 (2001): 15–36.

See also Law; Legal Agency; Literacy and Reading; Vernacular

PETRARCH

Francesco Petrarca (1304–1374) was Italy's preeminent lyric poet and a prolific Latin humanist, crowned poet laureate in Rome in 1341. Petrarch has been characterized as the first modern intellectual. His modernity emerges through the intense subjectivity of his works, particularly in his collection of Italian lyric poems, the Canzoniere (Songbook; known also as Scattered Rhymes [Rime sparse] or Fragments in the Language of Ordinary Life [Rerum vulgarium fragmenta]), the poet's anguished exploration of his unrequited love for the beautiful Laura (also called Laureta). First collected in 1342 and continually expanded, revised, and reordered until the poet's death in 1374, the Canzoniere in its present form is divided into two parts, before (Canz. 1–263) and after (Canz. 264–366) Laura's death. The collection's total number of songs corresponds to the calendar year, culminating in the last sonnet (Canz. 366), the poet's final relinquishment of his obsessive desire for Laura and his dedication to the Virgin Mary.

In Laura, Petrarch emulates and yet interrogates the figure of Dante's Beatrice in the New Life (Vita Nuova) (1290–1295) and the Divine Comedy (Divina Commedia) (1306/7–1321). Like Beatrice, Laura is presented with a semblance of historical veracity. Although Laura's true identity remains conjectural, Petrarch states that he met her on Good Friday, April 6, 1327, in the Church of St. Clare in Avignon, and that she died on that same date, on Good Friday, 1348, presumably of the Black Death. The fictional correspondence of these dates to Good Friday indicates that Petrarch, like Dante, invests the beloved with a Christian conversational and redemptive significance.

Like Beatrice, in the Canzoniere Laura incarnates an ideal beauty (e.g., Canz. 126, 159). She inspires through her lucent presence the poet's desire for moral and spiritual perfection and poetic virtuosity (e.g., Canz. 71–73). She is not portrayed as an individual; she is rather an icon (Canz. 77), a projection of the poet's own desires, and a catalyst for his interior transformation, leading to poetic self-expression (e.g., Canz. 23).

Beatrice's name encapsulates her allegorical significance as Dante's "bearer of beatitude" (portatrice di beatitudine; New Life). Laura's name also encompasses her allegorical significance, but the Canzoniere's allusive, circular repetitions and word-plays (e.g., Canz. 5) create around her name a denser symbolic network. The poet assimilates his love of the elusive Laura to Ovid's myth of Apollo, god of poetry, and his amorous pursuit of the fleeing nymph Daphne, transformed into a laurel tree (il lauro; Metamorphoses 1). Laura is further associated with the breeze that surrounds her (l'aura); the gold of her hair and of the light emanating from her (l'oro); the dawn (l'aurora); and the laurel crown of victorious emperors and superior poets (la laurea) (e.g., Canz. 34, 194, 196–198).

Unlike Beatrice, Laura is an equivocal figure. She occasions both love and spiritual confusion (e.g., Canz. 1–3). Her erotic refusal has its origin at times in virtue, and at others in narcissism (Canz. 45–46). Compared to the Virgin Mary (Canz. 366), she is as Ovid's Medusa, the monstrous Gorgon (Metamorphoses 4–5). Laura symbolizes all earthly happiness (beauty, love, poetic virtuosity, fame) and yet also the effects of original sin and idolatry (moral paralysis, lust, egotism, mutability, mortality). Her ambivalent effect incites the poet's restless self-scrutiny (e.g., Canz. 127, 129), an intentional divergence from the edifying influence of Dante's Beatrice, an unequivocally beneficent vehicle of Christ's wisdom and redemption.

Begun during a period of spiritual crisis, two other works attempt to contend with, and ultimately resolve, Laura's ineluctable nature. In My Secret (Secretum, 1347–1353) an imaginary Latin dialogue between Petrarch's persona Franciscus and Augustine of Hippo, Franciscus defends the purity of his love for Laura against Augustine's accusation of his erotic attraction to her and his inordinate desire for fame. In the Triumphs (I Trionfi, 1353–1374), a Dantesque visionary poem in Italian, Laura appears, not as a carnal love to be rejected, but divinely transfigured as Petrarch's heavenly influence.

Despite this transfiguration, the Canzoniere's ambivalent portrayal of Laura and her conflicted poet-lover dominate subsequent literary history. As the premiere collection of love lyrics stretching from the late 1400s into the 1800s, the Canzoniere initiates Petrarchism, the Western textual tradition and vocabulary that explores the scenario of exalted female beauty and male erotic anguish. Petrarchism establishes a paradigm of female silence and the prerogative of male emotion and poetic expression. Yet the Canzoniere also paradoxically empowers later poets, both male and female, to imitate its literary example while also including within the depiction of erotic relationships female initiative, both poetic and amorous, as well as a more realistic mutual love.

PATRICIA ZUPAN

References and Further Reading

- Boyle, Marjorie O'Rourke. "Wounded Lovers." In Petrarch's Genius: Pentimento and Prophecy. Berkeley, Calif.: University of California Press, 1991, pp. 113–152.
- Braden, Gordon. "Applied Petrarchism: The Loves of Pietro Bembo." Modern Language Quarterly 57 (1996): 397–423.
- Canzoniere; The Canzoniere, or Rerum vulgarium fragmenta*. Trans. Mark Musa. Bloomington, Ind.: Indiana University Press, 1996.
- Freccero, John. "The Fig Tree and the Laurel: Petrarch's Poetics." Diacritics 5 (1975): 34–40.
- Hainsworth, Peter. Petrarch the Poet: An Introduction to the Rerum vulgarium fragmenta. New York: Routledge, 1988.
- Mazzotta, Giuseppe. "The Canzoniere and the Language of the Self." In The Worlds of Petrarch. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1993, pp. 58–79.
- Petrarca, Francesco. Opere Complete Works, Italian and Latin, with Italian translation of Latin. 2 Vols. Florence: Sansoni, 1975.

PETRARCH

- . Triumphs, translated by Ernest Hatch Wilkins. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1962.
- . Petrarch's Secretum. With an introduction, notes, and critical anthology, edited by Davy A. Carozza and H. James Shey. New York: Peter Lang, 1989.
- . Petrarch's Songbook (Rerum vulgarium fragmenta), translated by James Wyatt Cook. Binghamton, N.Y.: Medieval and Renaissance Texts and Studies, 1995.
- Sturm-Maddox, Sara. Petrarch's Laurels. University Park, Pa.: Penn State University Press, 1992.
- Waller, Marguerite. Petrarch and Literary History. Amherst, Mass.: University of Massachusetts Press, 1980.
- Vickers, Nancy J. "Re-membering Dante: Petrarch's "Chiare, fresche, e dolci acque"." Modern Language Notes (MLN) 96 (1981): 1–11.
- . "Diana Described: Scattered Woman and Scattered Rhyme." Critical Inquiry 8 (1981): 265–279.
- . "The Body Re-membered: Petrarchan Lyrics and the Strategies of Description." In Mimesis: From Mirror to Method. Augustine to Descartes, edited by John D. Lyons and Stephen G. Nichols. Hanover, N.H.: University Press of New England, 1982, pp. 100–109.

See also Beatrice; Beauty; Courtly Love; Dante Alighieri; Eroticism in Literature; Griselda; Humanism; Literature, Italian; Ovid: Medieval Reception of

PETRONILA OF ARAGÓN

Petronila (or Petronilla, or rarely Petronella) of Aragón (1136–1173) owed her existence to the complicated political situation created by her uncle Alfonso I "el Batallador" of Aragón. When he died in 1134 without an heir (and with a problematic will leaving his kingdom to the Orders of the Templars, the Holy Sepulchre, and the Hospitalers), the magnates chose his brother Ramiro as the next king. Ramiro II Sánchez "el Monje" was taken out of the Church and married to Inés of Poitou in 1135; their only child Petronila was conceived to resolve the problem of the succession to the throne of Aragón. Petronila's birth in 1136 allowed Ramiro to return to monastic life the following year when Petronila was declared queen of the Kingdom of Aragón and betrothed to Ramón Berenguer IV, Count of Barcelona (r. 1131–1162). They married in 1150.

Although she was nominally queen to his title of prince, Petronila appears to have wielded little real power during her husband's lifetime. Their son Alfonso II, born around 1157, inherited the territories of both his parents to rule as the first king of the joint Crown of Aragón. He was one of five children born to Petronila and Ramón Berenguer, according to Antonio Ubieta Arteta. Only three documents survive that were issued by Petronila and show her active participation in rulership, but she also appeared as signatory to some of her husband's charters. In 1164, two years after her husband's death, Petronila solidified her seven-year-old son's place on the throne by renouncing her privileges as queen. Unlike Urraca, her near contemporary in León-Castile, Petronila acted more as a queen consort than a reigning queen. Instead of asserting her own rights, Petronila safeguarded her son and guaranteed that her line would rule after her.

THERESE MARTIN

References and Further Reading

- Marquez de la Plata, Vicenta, and Luis Valero de Bernabé. Reinas medievales españolas. Madrid: Alderabón, 2000, pp. 135–147.
- Stalls, William Clay. "Queenship and the Royal Patrimony in Twelfth-Century Iberia: The Example of Petronilla of Aragón." In Queens, Regents and Potentates, edited by Theresa M. Vann. Dallas: Academia, 1993, pp. 49–60.
- Ubieta Arteta, Antonio. Los esponsales de la reina Petronila y la creación de la Corona de Aragón. Zaragoza: Diputación General de Aragón, 1987.

See also Iberia; Queens and Empresses: The West; Urraca

PILGRIMS AND PILGRIMAGE

Pilgrimage both affected and reflected medieval Western Christendom. Pilgrimage, the journey made to a shrine, church, or other religious place, carried sacred meaning for believers. The site may have contained relics, often body parts, of a dead saint, that were said to heal and were, therefore, seen as miraculous. Pilgrims within the Christian, Judaic, and Islamic traditions interacted with one another in the Holy Land, where Christians visited the physical places where Biblical figures had lived. Pilgrimage was a religious practice that had many repercussions for society in terms of history and politics (how do pilgrims cross borders during times of war, for instance), as well as cultural artifacts, like material culture (church buildings and arts) and written culture (everything from the mass said to pilgrims starting on their journey to fictive poems relating pilgrimage experiences).

Sources

Traveling, especially abroad, entailed careful preparation legally and financially. Sources—such as letters of protection, documents granting power of attorney while on pilgrimage, papal letters containing commutation of vows or dispensation, inquisitions, wills, guild records, household accounts, letters, narratives, and legal records—include the names of women who planned to or did travel on pilgrimage. Pilgrimage could vary enormously for women depending upon wealth and class; indeed, class could be a more important factor than gender in determining the pilgrim's daily experience.

As early as the fourth century women traveled as pilgrims to the Holy Land, including Helena, mother of Constantine, and Egeria who came from Spain or southern Gaul. Women of the Roman nobility, such as Melania the Elder, as well as Paula and her daughter Eustochium, also made such a pilgrimage. Saints' lives suggest that numerous female saints made the journey to Jerusalem and inspired women as religious models. Women also made the journey to Jerusalem while participating in the Crusades, though whether they can strictly be called pilgrims has been debated. The extensive household accounts of Elizabeth de Burgh, a very wealthy and important fourteenth-century dowager, record pilgrimage activity. The Liber celestis of St. Bridget of Sweden (1303–1373; canonized 1391) tells the story of the saint, who convinced her husband to go on pilgrimage to Saint James in Compostela. She continued to go on numerous pilgrimages thereafter. The Book of Margery Kempe, dating from the first half of the fifteenth century, tells the life of Margery, an apparently illiterate merchant-class woman from Lynn in Norfolk. Her pilgrimages show her devotion to the humanity of Christ by witnessing the places associated with his life. The Privy Purse Expenses of Elizabeth of York (1465–1503), daughter of Edward the IV and wife of Henry VII, record pilgrimage activity.

Gender Differences

Victor and Edith Turner's argument that pilgrimage is a rite of passage suggests that the ritual space of pilgrimage liberates pilgrims from societal limitations, including those imposed by social class or gender. But scholars have pointed out that pilgrimage does not eliminate traditional social boundaries. Although the legal status of pilgrims was gender neutral, women were not always treated as equal to male pilgrims. Women had to gain permission to go on pilgrimage, a demand often complicated by family and society. Criminal records show women pilgrims as victims of crime, including rape. Some shrines, especially those under monastic control, restricted women's access. Yet documents indicate how women pilgrims were accommodated in ways that men did not need to be, such as a special Franciscan hospice for women pilgrims in Bethlehem, and provisions in Jerusalem and Rome for cradles, suggesting that some women were pregnant and gave birth while on pilgrimage.

Ronald Finucane has convincingly shown in recorded English miracle stories that the majority of pilgrims who attended local shrines were women (and lower-class) while the majority of pilgrims attending a distant shrine were male (and upper-class). The proportion of male to female pilgrims varied from shrine to shrine, often due to the type of miracle promised by the legend of the saint worshipped there. The types of miracles recorded corresponded to the visitors. For women on pilgrimage, familial concerns were overwhelmingly important. Women went on pilgrimage to get pregnant, to have a safe delivery, to help an apparently damaged or sick fetus, to avoid childbirth pain, to expel a dead fetus, to help with postpartum pain, to help with failed milk supply, to help have a live birth after numerous stillbirths, and to help after overlaying an infant in bed.

Representations of Women Pilgrims

Gender could affect women pilgrims' experiences, not only historically but also in terms of how they were represented. In not fulfilling traditional roles for women, including that of caregiver, spouse or sexual partner, economic contributor, or cloistered nun, female pilgrims and their mobility became a gendered matter with a moral dimension. Negative criticism of female pilgrims occurred by the eighth century. In secular literature by the late Middle Ages, the topos of the sexual woman pilgrim had become the symbol of a disorderly body politic held victim to traditional misogynist satire and critique. Yet, despite the strong tradition in which women pilgrims are seen as literally and figuratively wayward, exemplified most famously in Chaucer's Wife of Bath, a competing view of women pilgrims lies in religious works. Saints' legends and other religious literature tend to endorse women pilgrims who validate the sanctity of the holy figure in question.

Legal documents are relatively unhelpful in expressing how women experienced their pilgrimages. Material culture, such as church art, reflected and shaped female piety. The architecture of and images in the churches along the route to the Marian shrine at Walsingham, for example, created iconographic experiences specifically designed to be received by women pilgrims by referring to milk and/or motherhood. Women's patronage practices supported a material culture that evolved around pilgrimage. Devotional texts and art helped facilitate both private and communal virtual pilgrimage for those who were not able to physically make the pilgrimage journey. Pilgrimage as it was practiced reveals an individual understanding of worship informed by gender consciousness.

SUSAN SIGNE MORRISON

References and Further Reading:

- Benson, Larry D., ed. The Riverside Chaucer. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1987.
- Casson, Lionel. Travel in the Ancient World. Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins University Press, 1994.
- Craig, Leigh Ann. "“Stronger Than Men and Braver Than Knights’: Women and the Pilgrimages to Jerusalem and Rome in the Later Middle Ages.” Journal of Medieval History 29 (2003): 153–175.
- Eade, John, and Michael J. Sallnow. Contesting the Sacred: the Anthropology of Christian Pilgrimage. London: Routledge, 1991.
- Ellis, Roger, ed. The Liber Celestis of St Bridget of Sweden. Vol. 1, Oxford, Early English Text Society/Oxford University Press, 291. 1987.
- Finucane, Ronald C. Miracles and Pilgrims: Popular Beliefs in Medieval England. London: Dent, 1977.
- . The Rescue of the Innocents: Endangered Children in Medieval Miracles. New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1997.
- Gilbertson, Leanne. “The Vanni Altarpiece and the Relic Cult of Saint Margaret: Considering a Female Audience.” International Medieval Research 8 (2002): 179–190.
- Halpin, Patricia. “Anglo-Saxon Women and Pilgrimage.” Anglo-Norman Studies: Proceedings of the Battle Conference 19 (1996): 97–122.
- Meech, Sanford Brown, and Hope Emily Allen, eds. The Book of Margery Kempe. London: Oxford University Press/Early English Text Society, 212. 1961.
- Morrison, Susan Signe. Women Pilgrims in Late Medieval England: Private Piety as Public Performance. London: Routledge, 2000.
- Nicholas, Nicholas Harris. Privy Purse Expenses of Elizabeth of York: Wardrobe Accounts of Edward the Fourth. London: William Pickering, 1830/Reprint, New York: Barnes & Noble, 1972.
- Schein, Sylvia. “Bridget of Sweden, Margery Kempe and Women’s Jerusalem Pilgrimages in the Middle Ages.” Mediterranean Historical Review 14.1 (1999): 44–58.
- Staley, Lynn, trans. and ed. The Book of Margery Kempe. New York: W. W. Norton, 2001.
- Storrs, Constance Mary. Jacobean Pilgrims from England to St. James of Compostella from the Early Twelfth to the Late Fifteenth Century. Santiago de Compostela: Xunta de Galicia, 1994.
- Sumption, Jonathan. Pilgrimage: An Image of Mediaeval Religion. Totowa, N.J.: Rowman and Littlefield, 1975.
- Turner, Victor, and Edith Turner. Image and Pilgrimage in Christian Culture. Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1978.
- Ward, Jennifer C. English Noblewomen in the Later Middle Ages. London: Longman, 1992.
- Webb, Diana. Medieval European Pilgrimage. Basingstoke, Hampshire: Palgrave, 2002.
- Wilkinson, John, trans. Egeria’s Travels: To the Holy Land. Oxford: Aris & Phillips, 1999.

See also Architecture, Ecclesiastical; Body in Literature and Religion; Birgitta of Sweden; Chaucer, Geoffrey; Crusades and Crusading Literature; Devotional Art; Gender in Art; Gender in History; Hagiography; Hagiography, Iconographic Aspects of; Kempe,

Margery; Mary, Virgin; Mary, Virgin: in Art; Migration and Mobility; Miracles and Miracle Collections; Misogyny; Mystics’ Writings; Private and Public Spheres; Rape and Raptus; Relics and Reliquaries; Space, Sacred: and Gender; Wife of Bath; Wills

PLAGUE

Medieval Europe endured two pandemics of plague: the first, known as the Justinian Plague, struck the Mediterranean region between 541 and 750 and the second, the Black Death, spread throughout Europe between 1348 and 1351. Plague returned in regional-based epidemics every six to twelve years for the first 130 years thereafter. It then returned every fifteen to twenty years until the final outbreak in Marseille in 1720–1722.

Historical discussion focuses on the most famous and widely devastating episode, the Black Death, which was known to contemporaries as “the great mortality.” Medieval doctors called it a pestilence or pestis brought on by miasma (bad air). Their almost universal descriptions of symptomatic buboes have convinced most historians that the disease was bubonic plague caused by the bacterium Yersinia pestis, spread by the rat flea, Xenopsylla cheopsis, and its host, the black rat. However, there is vigorous debate as to the exact nature of this disease because the rapid spread and incredibly high mortality rate of the medieval epidemic do not mimic modern epidemics of bubonic plague.

The plague was carried from eastern Asia to Europe on ships launched from the Crimea region of the Black Sea, arriving first at the ports of Sicily and Italy and then passing along the vast network of trading routes by land and sea throughout Europe. On average, Europe lost a third to a half of its population during the epidemic, although some towns suffered considerably higher mortality rates. A few chroniclers noted that women died in large numbers, but it was just as likely for other chroniclers to highlight the deaths of the rich, the poor, the old, or the young as excessive. However, it is reasonable to posit that women may have suffered more because their care-giving and house-bound duties kept them in close proximity to the infected fleas and the ill.

Although contemporary chronicles emphasize unspeakable horror and social collapse during the epidemic, other records demonstrate that in many areas government and Church officials acted quickly to combat the disease. Bishops consecrated new burial grounds, city councils passed ordinances banning traffic of goods and people and stipulated burial procedures, and doctors wrote tracts on how one could best avoid, prevent, and cure the pestilence. Despite the charges of chroniclers to the contrary, there is evidence that notaries, priests, and doctors continued their duties and served the ill during the epidemic. In Italian and French towns doctors were hired to carry out autopsies of plague victims in order to better determine how to fight the disease.

The king of France called upon the leading scientists of the day, the Medical Faculty of the University of Paris, to report on the cause of the epidemic. The professors concluded that the epidemic was the result of a miasma that had been produced and spread by a triple conjunction of the planets, Mars, Jupiter, and Saturn in 1345. They also stressed the usual types of preventive medicine based on a moderate regime of diet and exercise to keep the body's humors in balance and the use of aromatics to purify the air. The leaders of the Church declared the epidemic to be the result of divine wrath over human sinfulness. A few clerics highlighted as causes for the plague women's sin of pride and their adoption of immodest clothing, but these were common complaints of monastic writers that were not unique to the Black Death.

Church officials counseled men and women to take part in penitential processions, masses, and prayer in order to avert the plague. Recognizing that many were dying without the sacrament of penance due to the lack of priests, some officials, such as Bishop Ralph Shrewsbury of Bath and Wells in England, allowed emergency confession even to a woman. Some of the laity took upon themselves extreme acts of self-mutilation as penance for all of humanity's sins. These flagellants staged spectacles of blood that whipped up a popular frenzy of masses of people in German towns. Women did not participate in the whippings, which involved partial nudity, but were noted by chroniclers as clamoring for the flagellants and foolishly catching the blood to smear on their eyes for its miraculous properties. Again, this commentary on women's behavior during the plague is part of a general misogynistic attitude of male medieval writers. Other examples of violent hysteria were the pogroms against Jews, who were scapegoated with the charge of spreading the plague by poisoning wells. Despite a few attempts at protection from the pope and city officials, many Jewish communities in central Europe were attacked and decimated.

Siding with the landowning classes, chroniclers complained that after the epidemic laborers demanded high wages and no longer served their superiors respectfully. They saw the post-plague world, in which landlords were sometimes forced to remit rents and labor services, as an inversion of the natural order. Similarly, chroniclers complained about a decline in morals after the plague, often targeting women as particularly immoral. Giovanni Boccaccio remarked that women who survived the plague in Florence were less chaste because they had allowed themselves to be attended by male servants during the epidemic. In England, John of Reading lamented that widows threw themselves into the arms of foreigners or even kinsmen, too quickly forgetting their dead husbands. Working with different sources, historians have qualified the conclusions of these landowning men who felt threatened by the new economic and social situation of higher wages and new marriages for survivors. They have demonstrated that prices also rose, thereby limiting the "undue" gains of wage earners. Moreover, authorities in Italy, England, France, and Spain passed legislation to restrict wages and prices, but it is difficult to determine just how effectively these were enforced.

Women benefited from the drastic labor shortages with an increase in wages, but the kinds of work available to them did not change. In the centuries following the Black Death many professions, such as the medical profession, increasingly restricted female participation, while other areas traditionally open to women, such as brewing, became professionalized, thereby shutting out women. Fathers faced with the death of their preferred male heirs as they wrote their wills during the plague named females as heirs more often than before. However, female inheritance did not generally lead to independence, since in many parts of Europe the husband managed his wife's property. In Italy the plague only temporarily disrupted the rigid patriarchal system of inheritance that favored men. Thus, women's gains in the new economic climate produced by the Black Death were ultimately thwarted by medieval Europe's patriarchal social structure.

SHONA KELLY WRAY

References and Further Reading

- Aberth, John. From the Brink of the Apocalypse: Confronting Famine, War, Plague, and Death in the Later Middle Ages. New York: Routledge, 2000.
- Arrizabalaga, Jon. "Facing the Black Death: Perceptions and Reactions of University Medical Practitioners." In Practical Medicine from Salerno to the Black Death. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994, pp. 237–288.
- Benedictow, Ole. The Black Death 1346–1353: The Complete History. Rochester, N.Y.: Boydell & Brewer, 2004.
- Campbell, Anna Montgomery. The Black Death and Men of Learning. New York: Columbia University Press, 1931.
- Cohn, Samuel Kline, Jr. The Black Death Transformed: Disease and Culture in Early Renaissance Europe. New York: Oxford University Press, 2002.
- Goldberg, P. J. P. Women, Work, and Life Cycle in a Medieval Economy: Women in York and Yorkshire, c. 1300–1520. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1992.
- Henderson, John. "The Black Death in Florence: Medical and Communal Responses." In Death in Towns: Urban

PLAGUE

- Responses to the Dying and Dead, 100–1600*, edited by S. Bassett. Leicester: Leicester University Press, 1992, pp. 136–150.
- Herlihy, David. The Black Death and the Transformation of the West. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1997.
- Horrox, Rosemary. The Black Death. Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1994.
- Mate, Mavis E. Daughters, Wives, and Widows after the Black Death: Women in Sussex, 1350–1535. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell and Brewer, 1998.
- Naphy, William G., and Andrew Spicer. The Black Death and the History of Plagues 1345–1730. Stroud, Gloucestershire: Tempus, 2000.
- Park, Katharine. Doctors and Medicine in Early Renaissance Florence. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1985.
- Platt, Colin. King Death. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1997.
- Wray, Shona Kelly. “Speculum et Exemplar: The Notaries of Bologna during the Black Death.” Quellen und Forschungen aus italienischen Archiven und Bibliotheken 81 (2001): 200–227.
- . “Women, Family, and Inheritance in Bologna during the Black Death” In Love, Marriage, and Family Ties in the Middle Ages, edited by Miriam Muller and Isabel Davis. Belgium: Brepols, 2003, pp. 205–215.
- . “Boccaccio and the Doctors: Medicine and Compassion in the Face of Plague.” Journal of Medieval History 30 (2004): 301–322.
- Ziegler, Philip. The Black Death. New York: Harper & Row, 1969; reprint, London: Sutton, 1997.

See also Boccaccio, Giovanni; Doctors and Healers; Giovanni; Medicine; Work

POLITICS AND POWER

See Diplomacy and Reconciliation; Empresses: Byzantium; Noble Women; Women and Empresses: The West; Regents and Queen-Lieutenants

POOR CLARES ORDER

The Poor Clares constitute the enclosed female branch of the Franciscan Order. Their name honors Clare of Assisi (1193/94–1253), whom pious tradition credits as their founder in association with Saint Francis (1181/1182–1226). The actual formation of female Franciscanism was considerably more complex. Clare’s insistence that women could follow Francis’s spiritual ideals, including apostolic poverty, conflicted with the papal curia’s intention to standardize women’s religious life. Their efforts to impose stability initially produced a monastic order that consisted solely of women prior to its incorporation into the Franciscan Order. Thus, it is somewhat ironic that the Order of Saint Clare and the identification Poor Clares, terms created by papal legislation in 1263, honor a woman whose spiritual ideals challenged traditional female religious life.

The Origins of Female Franciscanism

It is necessary to distinguish the foundations connected with Clare and Francis from those outside Franciscan inspiration that were first brought together by the papal curia. Shortly after Clare’s conversion in 1212, Francis brought her and her sister Agnes to the church of San Damiano outside Assisi’s walls. Other women soon joined them to form the first community of Franciscan women. San Damiano also served as a base for the itinerant friars to whom Pope Innocent III had granted permission to preach penance and live supported by alms alone (1209). The stable communal life adopted by the women obviously contrasted with the friar’s wandering mendicancy, but a shared commitment to spiritual minoritas, humility in all things, sustained their close connection.

San Damiano had no formal monastic rule at first. Oral directions from Francis, including his promise of perpetual care and spiritual exhortations, were the foundation of their religious life. A 1219 document addressed to the Florentine community of Monticelli, which Agnes of Assisi had helped establish, allowed them to adopt San Damiano’s observantiae regulares (regular observance). Contemporary documents confirm that houses in nearby Arezzo, Foligno, Perugia, and Spello were founded on the model of San Damiano and with the assistance of its sisters. Some evidence suggests that individual friars helped establish other female communities, but their connection to San Damiano is not explicit. While Jacques de Vitry’s famous letter of 1216 praising the sorores minores (lesser sisters) who lived in hospices and supported themselves by their own labors is often taken as evidence of Clare’s influence, it only confirms an association between some friars (fratres minores, lesser brothers) and sisters rather than broader institutional formation derived from Assisi. Most claims of direct foundation by Clare or Francis, especially for communities outside central Italy, derive from later desires to connect with the charismatic authority of the “founders.”

At the time of Francis’s death in 1226, only San Damiano and a handful of other houses had been incorporated into the Franciscan Order. They now faced pressure from ecclesiastical efforts to normalize the women’s religious movements. Beginning in 1218, Cardinal Hugolino dei Segni had begun to regularize communities of female penitents in central Italy. Although many of these groups had been motivated by apostolic poverty (albeit not directly inspired by Francis), Hugolino imposed a constitution modeled after the Benedictine rule that required material support. He also sought to link these houses more closely to the Franciscan Order. He named a friar to serve as their visitor in 1220. This appointment was short lived and the friars' antipathy toward new female communities led the cardinal to assign Cistercians. This situation changed after Francis's death and Hugolino's elevation to the papacy as Gregory IX (1227–1241). He now directed the Franciscan minister general to appoint a minister for these houses, which the papal curia began to identify as the Order of San Damiano.

The confusion between Clare's community at San Damiano and the Order of San Damiano was deliberate. While suggesting fidelity to Francis's and Clare's model of religious life, the papal program differed in several key components including strict enclosure, monastic silence, and financial endowment. Over the next two decades, Clare would resist pressure to conform to these standards. In 1228, Gregory IX granted a "Privilege of Poverty" to San Damiano that allowed the women to live without guaranteed income. Other houses that sought similar privileges were generally refused. An exception was Agnes of Prague, who only obtained permission to give up property held in common toward the end of her life. From the 1230s onward, most Damianite houses, including those foundations originally established by San Damiano's sisters, accepted property. Pope Innocent IV's constitution for the order (1247), issued to resolve ambiguities in earlier legislation, also mandated ownership. Clare rejected this rule and instead composed her own formula vitae (form of life), which modified Francis's rule for the friars to meet the needs of a stable female community. Pope Innocent IV approved the text on her deathbed (1253). Certain provisions suggest that she intended it to govern all Damianite houses, but it did not circulate beyond a few affiliated communities. Some houses adopted the 1247 Rule, others kept the Hugolinian constitution, and most had individual provisions concerning their observance. Pastoral care from Franciscan friars linked these diverse houses, an institutional relationship that contributed to the papally constituted order increasingly coming to identify itself with the movement initiated by Francis of Assisi. During the same period, the newly canonized Saint Clare (1255) was memorialized as an enclosed contemplative, a model for all religious women rather than a female example of Francis's spiritual ideals.

The Order of Saint Clare

Following an intense legal battle over the friars' obligations to provide pastoral care (1261–1263), Pope

Urban IV ratified a new constitution for the Order of Saint Clare in 1263 that effectively confirmed their place within the Franciscan Order. Like earlier papal legislation, it incorporated traditional monastic requirements, including adequate material support. By the end of the thirteenth century, this rule was widely adopted, especially by Italian Poor Clares. In parts of France and throughout England, however, Franciscan nuns professed a rule composed by the royal princess Isabelle of France (1259; revised 1263). There is also evidence of women who refused to conform to these organized forms of female Franciscanism. Both Innocent IV and his successor, Pope Alexander IV (1254–1261), railed against certain "Minoresses" who lived outside of a cloister and made demands on the friars. It seems likely these were women who chose not to become Poor Clares as the order moved away from the ideals of Francis's early movement into traditional female monasticism.

Later sources commonly identify the fourteenth century as a period of relaxed observance before the Franciscan Order entered a period of renewal. In Italy, fifteenth-century reformers encouraged the Poor Clares to profess their "first rule," that is, Clare's formula vitae. While some convents continued to observe the Urbanist rule, chronicles and devotional writings produced by the sisters make clear the important role these women played in spreading Clare's rule and reform generally. Contemporary sisters who were praised as spiritual models included the French reformer, Colette of Corbie (1381–1447) and the Italian devotional author and artist, Caterina Vigri (1413–1463). These reforms also increased interest in the historical Clare and contributed to the growth of her reputation as founder of the eponymous order. While Clare of Assisi was not historically the founder of the Poor Clares, she ultimately became a source of charismatic authority for female Franciscan life.

Franciscan Penitent Women

Institutional forms of female Franciscan life were not limited to the Poor Clares. Friar Hugh of Digne prepared a rule for his sister Douceline (c. 1215–1274), who lived in a Beguine community in Marseilles. Hagiographical legends describe how some women who were refused admittance to Damianite convents became penitents (sorores de penitentia or sometimes bizzoche or reclusae) and lived in small, semireligious communities close to Franciscan friaries. Other penitent women were able to remain independent while developing a pastoral relationship with individual friars, such as Margaret of Cortona (1247–1297) and Angela of Foligno (1248–1309). Along with their pastoral bond with Franciscan friars, the desire to follow a life of evangelical prayer, penance, and charity while remaining in the world united these women.

The Roman Curia sought to regularize these lay penitents in a manner similar to what occurred with other women's religious movements. They encouraged the idea of Francis as founder of a Third Order of Penance, although this legislation derived from outside the order. A member of Cardinal Hugolino's circle wrote the earliest constitution, the Memoriale Propositi (1221), to govern mixed penitential communities. A new rule was confirmed by Pope Nicholas IV (a Franciscan friar) in the bull Supra Montem (1289) during the same period as a rule was authored for Dominican tertiaries. Communities of female penitents were increasingly obligated to live according to a monastic rule after the bull Periculoso (1298) imposed enclosure and some houses were even transferred into the Order of Saint Clare. Others maintained their status as members of the Franciscan Third Order. One of the most influential was the community of Santa Anna in Foligno whose sisters helped spread reform ideas throughout Italy under the leadership of Angelina of Montegiove (c. 1357–1435).

The female Franciscan movement during the Middle Ages is thus characterized by its diversity. While the Poor Clares mostly followed traditional monastic forms of life, other women established different forms of communal life while maintaining an association with the Franciscan friars or an affiliation with the spiritual ideals of Francis of Assisi.

LEZLIE KNOX

References and Further Reading

- Alberzoni, Maria Pia. Clare and the Poor Sisters in the Thirteenth Century, edited by Jean-François Godet-Calogeras. St. Bonaventure, N.Y.: Franciscan Institute Publications, 2004.
- Armstrong, Regis J., ed. Clare of Assisi: Early Documents. Revised and expanded. St. Bonaventure, N.Y.: Franciscan Institute Publications, 1993.
- . The Lady. Clare of Assisi: Early Documents. New York: New City Press, forthcoming.
- Carney, Margaret. The First Franciscan Woman: Clare of Assisi and Her Form of Life. Quincy, Ill.: Franciscan Press, 1993.
- Franciscan Women: History and Culture. A Geographical and Bio-Bibliographical Internet Guide*. <http://franwomen.sbu.edu/franwomen/default.aspx>.
- Grundmann, Herbert. Religious Movements in the Middle Ages: the Historical Links between Heresy, the Mendicant Orders, and the Women's Religious Movement in the Twelfth and Thirteenth Centuries. 2nd rev. ed. Stephen Rowan. South Bend, Ind.: University of Notre Dame Press, 1995.
- Knox, Lezlie. "Audacious Nuns: Institutionalizing the Franciscan Order of Saint Clare." Church History 69:1 (2000): 41–62.
- Pellegrini, Luigi. "Female Religious Experience and Society in Thirteenth-Century Italy." In Monks and Nuns, Saints and Outcasts: Religion in Medieval Society. Essays in Honor of Lester K. Little, edited by Sharon Farmer and Barbara H. Rosenwein. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2000, pp. 97–122.
- Wood, Geryldene. Women, Art and Spirituality: The Poor Clares of Early Modern Italy. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996.

See also Agnes of Prague; Angela of Foligno; Beguines; Caterina Vigri; Clare of Assisi; Colette of Corbie; Dominican Order; Douceline of Digne; Isabelle of France; Laywomen, Religious; Margaret of Cortona; Monastic Enclosure; Monastic Rules; Monasticism and Nuns; Monasticism, Women's; Papal Policy; Poverty, Religious; Sister-Books and Other Convent Chronicles; Tertiaries

POPE JOAN

The story of a woman pope first appeared in northern Europe in the mid-thirteenth century and spread widely. It attained its most familiar form in an interpolation into the chronicle of Martin of Troppau, a Polish Dominican (d. 1278). The chronicle placed Joan in the ninth century between Leo IV and Benedict III. She is described as an English woman who disguised herself as a man, "John the Englishman," to study in Athens. Coming to Rome, she supposedly was made a curial notary and then a cardinal because of her conspicuous learning. On the death of Leo IV (d. 855), she was elected pope and enthroned. In this version, she died two years later while giving birth to a child, having gone into labor during a procession. Stephen of Bourbon, another thirteenth-century Dominican, alone says the female pope and her child were stoned to death by the populace after she gave birth during the coronation procession. The story, distributed particularly through Dominican channels, was used by both the friends and foes of the papacy in the Middle Ages and thereafter. Only in the sixteenth century was its veracity called into question. Among those who told the story of Pope Joan is Giovanni Boccaccio, in his On Famous Women. Among the explanations offered for this story is that it reflects the domination of the papacy by Theodora and her daughter Marozia. The female pope in the tarot deck may represent not Joan but Guglielma, a Milanese holy woman who was the focal point of a thirteenth-century heretical group.

THOMAS IZBICKI

References and Further Reading

Boureau, Alain. The Myth of Pope Joan. Translated by Lydia Cochrane. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2001.

See also Boccaccio, Giovanni; Cross-Dressing; Marozia of Rome

PORTRAIT MEDALS

Portrait medals were an especially potent means of self-presentation in the late medieval and early modern periods. They came into vogue in the humanist circles of early fifteenth-century Italy and quickly became an integral part of diplomacy and gift exchange in noble society throughout Europe. Like more monumental portraits, medals were commissioned to assert a strong public image or to commemorate an important event or change in status. For women, a medal could record betrothal, marriage, widowhood, or death, or, in more elite cases, celebrate political events such as ascent to regency or rule, or military or diplomatic victories. Modeled after ancient Roman coins, they usually displayed a portrait on one side and a carefully devised emblem on the other, each accompanied by Latin or, less often, Greek or vernacular inscriptions detailing the sitter's name, status, and motto. Family insignias were regularly integrated into the design. A second portrait sometimes replaced the emblem so that husband and wife or regent and minor-age ruler appeared on opposite faces, illustrating their relationship. The portrait was most commonly presented in profile, following ancient prototypes. In the sixteenth century and in response to developments in painted portraiture, some portraits on medals shifted to a three-quarter pose or, more rarely, a full-frontal view. The classically inspired emblems and inscriptions could be very straightforward or rather obtuse, with a secret or highly intellectual meaning expected to be understood by only a privileged few. In the sixteenth-century, single-sided medals began to appear and emblems were either combined with the portrait or eliminated.

Because of their small size (typically 30–105 mm in diameter) and durability, portrait medals were easily portable and were distributed as elite symbols of affection and alliance. Produced in multiples in lead or copper alloys, bronze, silver, or gold, they were cast from molds or, beginning in the sixteenth century, struck with dies. Medals started to be serially produced in the late fifteenth century when large workshops, sometimes associated with mints, offered their clients the opportunity to choose designs, emblems and mottos from available models, which they could customize with a specific portrait and name. The most elite medals were invariably cast and custom-made, the emblems and mottos devised by intellectual advisors with an eye toward singularity. Collectors displayed their portrait medals on shelves, on ribbons or chains worn around the neck, or in cabinets specially devised for their storage with multiple small drawers and hooks on which to hang them. The small format of portrait medals invited intimate viewing, which led to debate over their aesthetic, intellectual, and commemorative merits. Though they were prized by their owners, only a relative few of the many portrait medals produced in the late medieval and early modern eras, survive since they were often melted down and the metal reused.

A portrait, regardless of media, was not usually conceived as a literal record of the subject's likeness; rather, it was more like a multifaceted allegory that illustrated the sitter's character. The portrait, inscriptions, and emblems on medals all worked together to present the sitter's ideological aspirations, which were clearly affected by notions of gender. For women, a conventionalized beauty served as an outward sign of virtue, the most prized female attribute that encompassed the concepts of chastity, modesty, and loyalty. This beauty was signaled by elaborate dresses, jewels, hairstyles, and idealized features. The emblems were similarly gendered and often referred to classical or literary characters and stories, their motifs and styles borrowed from ancient sculpture or coins or created anew. Common subjects were pagan deities, personifications of virtues, signs of the zodiac, mythological and real animals, family crests, and other symbols. Through Humanist interpretation, ancient and secular motifs evoked religious piety and other important virtues including the intellectual. Since a married woman's status stemmed equally from her agnatic and marital families, both surnames appeared with her title in inscriptions. Thus, the portrait medal conveyed the culturally and personally significant components of a woman's character.

While a male relative commonly commissioned a woman's portrait medal to commemorate her betrothal, marriage, widowhood or death, quite a number of women, especially those in positions of power, ordered their own and updated them periodically. Women rulers and regents often adapted the masculine symbols associated with power and political authority, such as armor, weapons, and architecture, for their emblems and sometimes tempered them with signs of more feminine virtues. Elizabeth I, Caterina Sforza, Isabella d'Este, and other female rulers and regents commissioned medals with inscriptions and emblems that boosted their political and cultural authority and served as propaganda. Scholarly interest in women's portrait medals, especially those from Italy, continues to rise, but much research remains to be completed on examples from other European areas.

JOYCE DE VRIES

References and Further Reading

de Vries, Joyce. "Caterina Sforza's Portrait Medals: Power, Gender, and Representation in the Renaissance Court." Woman's Art Journal 24.1 (2003): 23–28.

The Medal, a quarterly journal published by the British Art Medal Trust.

Och, Marjorie. "Portrait Medals of Vittoria Colonna: Representing the Learned Woman." In Women as Sites of Culture: Women's Roles in Cultural Formation from the Renaissance to the Twentieth Century. Ed. Susan Shifrin. Aldershot: Ashgate, 2002, pp. 153–163.

Pollard, J. Graham, and Eleonora Luciano. Renaissance Medals. Washington, D.C.: National Gallery of Art, 2005.

Scher, Stephen K., ed. The Currency of Fame: Portrait Medals of the Renaissance. New York: Harry N. Abrams, Inc., 1994.

———, ed. Perspectives on the Renaissance Medal. New York: Garland Publishing and the American Numismatic Society, 2000.

Syson, Luke. "Consorts, Mistresses and Exemplary Women: the Female Medallion Portrait in Fifteenth-Century Italy." In The Sculpted Object 1400–1700, edited by Stuart Currie and Peta Motture. Aldershot: Scolar Press, 1997, pp. 43–64.

See also Art, Representations of Women in; Caterina Sforza; Coinage; D'Este, Isabella and Beatrice; Death, Mourning, and Commemoration; Diplomacy and Reconciliation; Femininity and Masculinity; Gender in Art; Honor and Reputation; Humanism; Noble Women; Patronage, Artistic; Personifications Visualized as Women

POSTCOLONIAL THEORY

Postcolonial theory typically analyzes the conflict and accommodation that unfold in the wake of conquest and other kinds of cultural admixture. It stresses the enduring economic and social disparity that is likely to result when a powerful nation annexes land belonging to others, transforming that territory into a colony or frontier and rendering its inhabitants a subaltern (or dominated) people. Often inspired by a strong sense of social justice, postcolonial critics explore the violence inherent in the colonial encounter but do not argue that some "pure" state of aboriginality might be recovered in the wake of profound cultural clash. Postcolonial criticism has therefore developed a sophisticated vocabulary for describing hybridity, the conflictual interpenetration of cultures that results from colonial contact and that transforms both colonizer and indigene. Though it never uncritically celebrates this turbulent fusion of differences, it does find in hybridity the potential for subversion of the systems that are likely to be imposed in the wake of conquest. Postcolonial criticism stresses the impurity of both present and past. It critiques the mechanisms (social, legal, literary) through which dominated groups are disparaged and dispossessed, especially of their history. Postcolonial theory has always been sensitive to the ways in which power is distributed unevenly across gender lines. Some of the most important work undertaken within the field studies the effects of the postcolonial upon subaltern women.

Postcolonial cultural studies are useful to the study of the western Middle Ages. Europe did not appear from some void, as the historian Robert Bartlett has argued, but emerged slowly, via conquest that extended borders and assimilations that attempted to render emergent territorial states internally homogeneous. Europe, in a word, had to Europeanize itself in custom, language, law, and religion—an inherently colonial project with profound repercussions on gender. In the course of the Middle Ages some peoples were absorbed and vanished as part of this process, while others found themselves represented as less than human. Thus the English could insist on a natural superiority over the bestial Welsh, allowing them (in their minds) an evident right to the dominion of the whole of Britain. Medievalists working in a postcolonial vein have dedicated themselves to studying how such enduringly uneven access to power and privilege came about; how myths of origin and manifest destiny buttressed communities; and what price was paid by people who (like the Irish, Welsh, and Jews in Britain) found themselves resident in some denigrated category or who were, because of their mixed descent, suspended between mutually exclusive groups.

Medievalists have made extensive use of the work of Edward Said, whose Orientalism developed a sophisticated model for exploring how the West fantasizes its own version of the East (an exotic geography that is typically gendered feminine); Homi Bhabha, who offers a postmodern approach to hybridity; Gayatri Spivak and Dipesh Chakrabarty, who have persuasively argued against assuming Eurocentric models of history. More recently, postcolonial theories derived from the analysis of the Caribbean and U.S.–Mexico border have also appeared. Some medievalists like Geraldine Heng are also well-known postcolonial critics.

JEFFREY JEROME COHEN

References and Further Reading

Bartlett, Robert. The Making of Europe. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1993.

Biddick, Kathleen. The Shock of Medievalism. Durham: Duke University Press, 1998.

- Cohen, Jeffrey Jerome, ed. The Postcolonial Middle Ages. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2000.
- Ganim, John M. Medievalism and Orientalism. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2005.
- Heng, Geraldine. Empire of Magic: Medieval Romance and the Politics of Cultural Fantasy. New York: Columbia University Press, 2003.
- Holsinger, Bruce W. "Medieval Studies, Postcolonial Studies, and the Genealogies of Critique," Speculum 77 (2002): 1195–1227.
- Ingham, Patricia Clare, and Michelle R. Warren, eds. Postcolonial Moves: Medieval through Modern. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2003.
- Kabir, Ananya, and Deanne Williams, ed. Postcolonial Approaches to the European Middle Ages. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2005.

See also Cross-Cultural Approaches; Postmodernism and Historiography

POSTMODERNISM AND HISTORIOGRAPHY

Although postmodernism has been a common term in nearly every area of intellectual and cultural life since the 1980s, its exact definition remains elusive, and its applications and consequences continue to arouse contention. In every field of artistic or scholarly production it has touched, postmodernism challenged the accuracy of commonly accepted meanings, undermined confidence in our ability to depict reality with certainty in any medium, and generally destabilized tradition and consensus by questioning the foundations of intellectual life. All of the traditional humanistic disciplines dependent on complex language for research and expression (literature, history, philosophy, social criticism) have had to confront postmodernism in fundamental ways because the focus of postmodernist insight is on language itself. Postmodernism's analogous and widely used term, the linguistic turn, is especially useful in understanding the specific relation of this sweeping cultural movement to the practice and understanding of history.

At the most fundamental level, the postmodernist critique is based on a severe scrutiny of the ability of our common language to depict reality without distortion or bias. Whatever the object under investigation, ranging from literature to social institutions, the production of knowledge depends on agreed upon definitions and stable representations of the world. Structuralist linguistics, created by the Swiss linguist Ferdinand Saussure in the early twentieth century, effectively undermined the traditional simplistic view that language merely gives names to things and relationships that exist objectively apart from observers, and whose meanings are self-evident and consistent. Saussure's work stressed the highly artificial and conventional nature of language, and the deep dependence of language systems on binary oppositions to produce meanings. Apparently "natural" contrasts such as masculine/feminine, black/white, Western/Oriental, rational/irrational, civilized/primitive were shown to be culturally produced linguistic structures whose implications were highly changeable over historical time. Notable theorists such as Jacques Derrida pushed the implications of structuralist linguistics into the poststructuralist mode of analysis called deconstruction: under the deconstructionist critique language became an unstable system where meaning recedes further and further into uncertainty. With no simple linkage to an objective world, words depend on contextual words for meanings that constantly shift. The greater the pressure of writers and readers for essential truth and a stable language in which to register it, the more elusive and elastic the meaning of linguistic concepts becomes. In the most general way, the postmodern condition of intellectual life is one in which our defining instrument—language—cannot be regarded as neutral, passive, or accurate.

Relation to Historical Research and Writing

Under postmodernist scrutiny, descriptive language could not be a reliable recorder of present reality, and its deployment for the reconstruction of the vanished past has made the discipline of history appear fragile and open to serious challenge. By placing the unstable word/world relation in the foreground of critical problems, the linguistic turn introduced its complications to the reading and interpretation of primary source evidence. Older notions of the "document" as a straightforward, simple message from the past, or a transparent "window" onto past life appeared naive and simplistic in the light of more sophisticated appreciations of linguistic meaning. The language of historical evidence, especially the language of cultures as distant from us as medieval Europe, multiplied the problems facing the historian under the insights of postmodernism. Sensitive to the ways that language itself has the power to constitute reality, or at least to color reality with strongly moral and ideological meanings, historians have had to extend their reading techniques beyond traditional methodologies of text criticism. All forms of written source material, even apparently nonliterary legal evidence, letters, administrative treatises, as well as chronicles and biography, exhibit the problems and complexities of descriptive language, and thus require subtler reading strategies than historians were accustomed to use. The linguistic turn has made literary critical techniques of discourse analysis, specifically addressed to intertextual echoes and embedded premises of language, an invaluable resource for historical work.

Just as the historical document no longer could be regarded as a neutral window onto the past, so the historian's own language also has come under critical scrutiny. The idea that historians can see and identify generalized historical objects like class, race, social structures, and power with a neutral accurate language now seems illusory. Postmodernism refocused a sharp attention on the historian's role in constructing supposedly essential objects such as social classes and sexual roles with language infused with unacknowledged cultural assumptions. All such generalizations used by historians emphatically categorize that purport to describe areas of race, class, and gender, now require careful analysis with their component elements candidly laid out.

At a larger scale of construction, historical writing has been subjected to the insights of narrative theory, with historians responding to and against the influential work of historian-theorist, Hayden White. Structuralist linguistic theory and deconstruction undermined simple notions of the naming function of language in relation to the real world. Narrative theory has demonstrated that chronological story form, the followable and intelligible sequence of events leading from some beginning point toward a resolution, is a structure made from language, and not found in real events. The real past, full beyond intelligible control of seriatim and simultaneous unrelated events, does not come in story form. Narratives of progress, tragedy, amelioration, and the like are created through the selection and rejection of events; the historians' feeling of "discovering" the "true story" in the evidence is an illusion resulting from the deeply un-self-conscious knowledge of certain story types that inform every culture. Historians recognize in their evidence the useable elements of the stories they have always known, and construct the past around those forms. Narrative theory has seemed to some historians to bring historical writing too close to the techniques of fiction and opened the way to morally irresponsible history. But the past is not available to inspection, and universal consensus on a single correct narrative is neither possible nor even desirable in an open society. In the view of most historians who accept the premises of narrative theory, responsible and rigorous evidence-based history results in a range of variant stories, none of which claim to exhaust or dominate the evidence.

Applications to Medieval Women's History

As a specialized topic in historical study, medieval women have benefited from the linguistic turn because its array of critical questions have undermined conventional assumptions about society and culture, naming and meaning. The radical critique mounted by structuralist linguistics and deconstruction addressed the foundational concepts anchoring traditional views of social organization. Long-held uninspected notions about the supposed essential natures of men and women, the inevitability of their social roles, the naturalness of men's domination over women in early societies, turned out to be vulnerable targets for the new modes of language-based analysis. If meanings are culturally constructed in linguistic form, then claims to "nature" and inevitability are reduced to cultural constructs, not mirrors of reality. Even patriarchy, a social organization of many variants over time, characterized by its male monopoly of real economic, political, legal, cultural, and sexual power, yields to this analysis as a construct created, imposed, and continually reinforced by assertions of naturalness—not an inevitable emanation of nature and the human condition.

In both medieval and modern systems of meaning, the concept of femininity was elaborated over against masculinity. In no other area has the binary conception of meaning had such far-reaching results in changing fundamental conceptions used by historians. Language-based analysis has worked to unpack the thick and often self-contradictory layer of alleged characteristics attached to female and male persons, characteristics not found but created to justify disparate arrangements of power and privilege. Women were sometimes seen as essentially sexual and aggressive, and sometimes as asexual and passive: both were offered as justifying male guardianship. Medieval texts offer a virtual universe of feminine qualities, mainly derogatory. The specific technique for cultural analysis of sex-linked ideas, gender theory, is a direct outgrowth of postmodernist theories of language. Narrative theory and the detailed analysis of how intention and agency work in narrative have also had positive implications for the history of women, especially the women of strongly patriarchal societies. Narrative theory made the question of who is admitted "into history" as a narrative protagonist, and who (or which groups) are regarded as merely present in some subhistorical manner without narrative impact, a matter for analysis and inquiry. Acknowledging the constructed nature of narrative, both in the medieval period and the modern, opened the way for recognizing the artificial exclusion of women from public life, and also the artificiality of regarding only public life as worthy of historical record. Language, of course, is not a total substitute for persons and institutions, but language creates and conveys meaning in human life; it is fair to assert that women would have a very sparse history without the resources of the linguistic turn.

NANCY PARTNER

References and Further Reading

- Berkhofer, Robert F., Jr. Beyond the Great Story: History as Text and Discourse. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1995.
- Hutcheon, Linda. A Poetics of Postmodernism: History, Theory, Fiction. New York: Routledge, 1988.
- LaCapra, Dominick. History and Criticism. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1985.
- Novick, Peter. That Noble Dream: The "Objectivity Question" and the American Historical Profession. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988.
- Partner, Nancy. "Making Up Lost Time: Writing on the Writing of History." Speculum 61(1986): 90–117.
- White, Hayden. The Content of the Form. Baltimore, Md.: Hopkins University Press, 1987.

See also Queer Theory; Medieval Women's History; Postcolonial Theory; Psychoanalytic Theory

POVERTY

Medieval society included several categories of poor people. The "deserving poor" (those worthy of receiving alms) included widows, orphans, poor girls in need of a dowry, individuals who could not work because of age or disability, persons of means who were no longer able to live according to their accustomed standard of living (these were called the "shame-faced poor"), and the "voluntary poor" who had given up their wealth for religious reasons. The "undeserving poor," often assumed to be male, were those who begged even though they did not need the assistance. Individuals who had nothing with which to support themselves except their own labor were often classified as poor; we would call these the working poor. Finally, there were those who were grouped at the bottom of tax assessments, paying the smallest tax or no tax at all. Modern historians call these the "fiscal poor."

As "deserving" recipients of charitable alms, women had an advantage over men, both because of the Biblical injunction to help widows and because of the gendered expectation that men should work. Thus, many towns had shelters for poor widows or elderly women, but there were few institutions for elderly men; and some medieval authors, such as the fourteenth-century Italian Paolo da Certaldo, were explicit in their recommendations that it was better to give alms to women than to men. After the onset of the Black Death in 1347–1348, moreover, girls in need of dowries became favored recipients of charity because governments and charitable organizations wished to assist in the repopulation of communities.

Despite their privileged role as recipients of charity, women in cities were especially vulnerable to fiscal poverty. In northwestern Europe, where large numbers of single women immigrated to towns to seek work, this was because women were concentrated in the lowest paying forms of employment and they often earned less than men in comparable positions. Within the wool cloth industry, for instance, which was the most industrialized sector of the medieval economy, women predominated among the lowest paying and least skilled workers—the spinners, combers, carders, and warpers. In the late thirteenth-century tax assessments of Paris, fifty-nine percent of female heads of household who paid a tax were listed among the "little people," those who paid the lowest taxes, and many working single women earned too little to even show up on the tax assessments.

Because single women who worked often did not earn enough to support themselves, many women subsidized their incomes as part-time prostitutes. Indeed, as Karras has pointed out, the term "laundress" came to be thought of as virtually synonymous with "prostitute." Another strategy for survival among poor working women was "spinster clustering," or living together in pairs or groups. Some working single women also accepted alms to augment their incomes.

Most poor working women in towns worked as domestic servants. In some cases they worked as young girls until they had earned enough for a dowry. In other cases, they returned to domestic service as widows, or they worked as servants throughout their adult lives, until age or disability rendered them incapable of working any longer. Some employers of domestic servants allowed their servants to stay on even after age or disability prevented them from working; however, many aged domestic servants were turned out on their own. Since the number of beds in shelters for elderly women and widows was not sufficient to accommodate the population of elderly women in cities, many of these former servants had to join the ranks of the begging poor.

In Mediterranean towns, where young women did not tend to leave home to find work, female poverty was exacerbated in the later Middle Ages by changes in inheritance practices. In Catalonia, for instance, a law passed in 1351 penalized widows who remarried, forcing them to give up the usufruct of their husbands' property, taking only their dowry into their second marriage. Brodman has suggested that this law reduced women's chances of remarrying and may have compelled a number of widows to abandon their children. In northern Italian towns, such as Florence, women's inheritance was restricted, in the later Middle Ages, to their dowry, and charitable institutions worried, especially in periods of high mortality brought about by the Black Death, that orphaned girls—who could not represent themselves in court—might be cheated by male relatives out of recovering their dowries and thus being able to marry.

POVERTY

SHARON FARMER

References and Further Reading

- Archer, Janice. Working Women in Thirteenth-Century Paris. PhD Diss., University of Arizona, 1995.
- Bennett, Judith, and Amy Froide, eds. Singlewomen in the European Past, 1250–1800. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999.
- Brodman, James. Charity and Welfare: Hospitals and the Poor in Medieval Catalonia. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1998.
- Farmer, Sharon. Surviving Poverty in Medieval Paris: Gender, Ideology and the Daily Lives of the Poor. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2002.
- Henderson, John. Piety and Charity in Late Medieval Florence. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1997.
- Karras, Ruth. Common Women: Prostitution and Sexuality in Medieval England. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.

See also Almsgiving and Charity; Disabilities; Division of Labor; Hospitals; Inheritance; Migration and Mobility; Poverty, Religious; Prostitutes; Servants; Singlewomen; Social Status; Textile Production for the Market; Widows; Work

POVERTY, RELIGIOUS

Religious or voluntary poverty was a central and compelling Christian belief throughout the Middle Ages. Its basic motivation was the desire to emulate Christ's life and teachings: "If you wish to be perfect, go, sell your possessions, and give the money to the poor, and you will have treasure in heaven; then come, follow me" (Matthew 19:21). This and similar passages gave the renunciation of material possessions the force of a gospel precept, but religious poverty also could be understood to encompass personal austerity, charity toward the poor, and disinterest in temporal matters. Thus, this spiritual ideal was not limited to professed religious (for whom adopted individual poverty was one of the three vows of religious life, with chastity and obedience) for it also could be embraced in some form by devout lay people as a way to increase their spiritual virtue. Indeed, medieval concepts of religious poverty varied over time in that they both responded to, and in turn transformed, their social and cultural context. During the early Middle Ages, for example, it was primarily a monastic virtue which helped develop spiritual perfection through renunciation of material concerns.

New Religious Movements

The most significant example of religious poverty's influence in medieval society derives from the complicated reactions to the growth of liquid wealth and a commercial economy during the High Middle Ages. Ambivalence toward a profit-oriented mentality and an awareness of the growing divide between rich and poor resulted in new forms of piety. This enthusiasm could reflect criticism of the perceived wealth and growing worldliness of the ecclesiastical hierarchy. Despite the diversity of the religious groups that emerged over the course of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries—encompassing religious and lay, heterodoxy and orthodoxy—each was linked to the other by a shared understanding of voluntary poverty as a way to participate in the vita apostolica, that is, the desire to return to the ideals of the primitive Church. Monastic reformers such as the Cistercians renewed emphasis on charity as part of their spiritual vocation. They also adopted austerity in their dress, liturgical celebrations, and even the art and architecture of their communities. However, the primacy of this movement was shifting away from traditional forms of monasticism toward the concerns of an urbanized laity. For example, around 1170, a merchant named Peter Waldo renounced his wealth after hearing a jongleur tell of the life of Saint Alexis, a wealthy Roman who became a beggar. His followers, the Waldensians, practiced collective poverty and moral preaching to live in imitation of the life of Christ and the Apostles. The Beguine Marie of Oignies (d. 1213) wanted to beg from her neighbors to better follow Christ. Other Beguines, groups of pious lay women, strove for material simplicity, forbade the misuse of property, and supported their houses by the labor of their own hands. Local secular and ecclesiastical authorities often supported these groups as exemplars of Christian virtue, except when they intruded on clerical privilege (as happened with Waldensian preaching).

Mendicant Orders

The commitment to religious poverty as an expression of apostolic piety reached its height in the thirteenth century with the mendicant orders. The Dominicans began as an order of penitential preachers in Southern France. They lived a simple life supported by alms in order to provide a counterexample of moral living to Cathar heretics. An especially famous medieval example of religious poverty is Francis of Assisi (c. 1181–1226), also known as the Poverello (the Little Poor One). The renunciation of worldly possessions was at the core of his evangelical vocation. His followers would have no possessions, either individually or in common, so that they would have to rely on alms or their own labor. Religious poverty therefore allowed his followers to adopt complete humility and obedience so to better serve the poor of society. As his order grew and became institutionalized, however, the friars moved away from Francis's strict standards. By the end of the thirteenth century, most friars understood their order's observance of poverty as little more than a matter of simplicity and a source of spiritual inspiration. Debates over the standard of poor observance would split the Franciscan Order into bitter factions during the fourteenth century (for example, did use equal ownership? was "poor use" an essential part of their vow?). This ultimately led to the suppression of the Franciscan Spirituals, those brothers who insisted on a strict observance of apostolic poverty.

Clare of Assisi

Given Francis's prominence, it is not surprising that the medieval woman most associated with religious poverty is his first female convert, Clare of Assisi (1193/1194–1253). Clare embraced Francis's ideal of religious poverty. Although she accepted the necessity of a fixed community at San Damiano for her sisters, she intended them to live by alms and the produce of their own small garden. After Francis's death, Clare faced significant pressure from the Roman Curia, who wanted both to assure adequate resources for the women and to regularize the community according to papal standards for female religious life. Clare resisted and managed to convince the pope to grant her community a Privilege of Poverty in 1228. (Scholars no longer accept the authenticity of the 1216 Privilege of Poverty attributed to Pope Innocent III.) Her form of life, approved by Pope Innocent IV while she was on her deathbed, also inscribed religious poverty as the heart of her vocation, but this rule did not circulate much beyond San Damiano. A few other closely connected communities did gain similar privileges, but most female houses attached to the Franciscan Order were supported by endowments. Nonetheless pious traditions emphasize Clare as an exemplar of strict religious poverty. The Franciscan Spiritual Angelo Clareno claimed (incorrectly) that Pope Gregory excommunicated Clare over her opposition to material support for San Damiano. Fifteenth-century Poor Clares, who based their standards of poverty on her, were praised as models of individual holiness.

The example of the Franciscans points to questions about religious poverty of concern to medieval scholars. How did ideals of religious poverty promote religious reform? What was the relationship between the voluntary and involuntary poor? And finally, how did gender impact the social meaning of religious poverty? If the choice to become poor was by its nature limited to those who had possessions to renounce, how did women, whose economic power was generally less than that of men of equal status, understand the social meaning of this central Christian virtue?

LEZLIE KNOX

References and Further Reading

- Alberzoni, Maria Pia. Clare and the Poor Sisters in the Thirteenth Century, edited by Jean-François Godet-Calogeras. St. Bonaventure, N.Y.: Franciscan Institute Publications, 2004.
- Burr, David. The Spiritual Franciscans: From Protest to Persecution in the Century after Saint Francis. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 2001.
- Lambert, Malcolm. Franciscan Poverty: The Doctrine of the Absolute Poverty of Christ and the Apostles in the Franciscan Order, 1210–1323. 2nd ed. St. Bonaventure, N.Y.: Franciscan Institute, 1998.
- LeGoff, Jacques. Your Money or Your Life: Economy and Religion in the Middle Ages, translated by Patricia Ranum. Boston: MIT Press, 1988.
- Little, Lester. Religious Poverty and the Profit Economy in Medieval Europe. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1978.
- Mollat, Michel. The Poor in the Middle Ages: An Essay in Social History, by Arthur Goldhammer. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1986.
- Wolf, Kenneth. The Poverty of Riches: Saint Francis of Assisi Reconsidered. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2003.

See also Administration of Estates; Agnes of Prague; Almsgiving and Charity; Beguines; Cistercian Order; Clare of Assisi; Devotional Practices; Dominican Order; Monasticism and Nuns; Poor Clares Order; Poverty; Waldensians

POWER, EILEEN

Born in Bournemouth in 1889, Eileen Edna Le Poer Power constructed a brilliant career in medieval social and economic history. She founded the Economic History Society in 1926, was elected to the chair of Economic History at the London School of Economics (LSE) in 1933, and delivered the Ford Lectures at Oxford in 1939 (the first woman to do so) on the wool trade.

After attending Girton College of Cambridge University, where she studied history, Power studied in Paris at the École des Chartes and then at the London School of Economics. She traveled to India and China in 1920 on a Kahn Fellowship—the first earned by a woman—and then took up a lectureship in history at the LSE in 1921, where she remained for the rest of her life.

Her first book, Medieval English Nunneries c. 1275 to 1535 (1922), derived its information about the difficulties of smaller convents from bishops' visitation records. Medieval People (1924) details the lives of specific individuals—a peasant, a housewife, Chaucer's prioress, a wool merchant. With R. H. Tawney she edited the three-volume sourcebook, Tudor Economic Documents (1924). Translator of Le Ménagier de Paris (The Goodman of Paris), about woman's role in household management (1928), she edited with M. M. Postan Studies in English Trade in the Fifteenth Century (1933).

After her death in 1940, her Ford lectures were published (1941); in 1975, her volume on Medieval Women established her, inaccurately, as a historian of women (she fought for women's suffrage, but did not regard herself as a feminist).

JANE CHANCE

References and Further Reading

- Berg, Maxine. A Woman in History. Eileen Power 1889–1940. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996.
- Chibnall, Marjorie. "Eileen Edna Le Poer Power (1889–1940)." In Women Medievalists and the Academy. Ed. Jane Chance. Madison and London: University of Wisconsin Press, 2005.

See also Cities and Towns; Gentry, Women of England; History, Medieval Women's; Household Management; Monasticism and Nuns; Women Medievalists in the Academy

PREACHING

See Sermons and Preaching

PREGNANCY AND CHILDBIRTH: CHRISTIAN WOMEN

Most medieval women were mothers. They learned about pregnancy and childbirth from one another and from personal experience. Our reliance on textual sources limits our knowledge of common practices among the majority of women living in rural populations. The texts, however, reveal a combination of medical, religious, and magical treatments for pregnant and parturient women.

Mother receiving her newly born baby in bed. Liber introductorius ad iudicia stellarum, Arun 66, f. 148. Written by Guido Bonatti de Forlivio, for Henry VII. Location: British Library, London, Great Britain. Credit: Art Resource, N.Y.

Signs of pregnancy included the lack of a menstrual period, continual desire for intercourse or, in other sources, lack of all desire, and changes in a woman's color. In the later Middle Ages, physicians observed urine to confirm pregnancy. Texts also offered the means to determine the sex of an unborn child. For example, if the mother carried the child on the right side and if her right breast was larger than the left, the child was male. The opposite indicated a female. Pregnant women were also thought to desire strange foods, such as charcoal or earth. If this was the case, the pregnant woman should be given beans cooked with sugar. It was also suggested that mentioning foods the woman could not have been avoided in her presence, since her unsatisfied desire would cause miscarriage.

During pregnancy women were encouraged to eat lightly, and to eat easily digestible foods, such as poultry or fish. Arab and Muslim women received similar advice and were also told to avoid strong or heavily spiced foods. Too much or too strenuous activity was to be avoided for fear of causing premature labor. Following such advice, however, was clearly possible only for the elite. Lower-class women were not likely to have a diet that included much poultry and fish or to have the freedom to avoid routine, and perhaps heavy, labor. Scholars have suggested that a major cause of maternal mortality, especially in the early Middle Ages, was anemia caused by insufficient protein and iron in the diet, leading to excessive bleeding in a miscarriage or even in a normal delivery.

Normal childbirth was seen as a natural process and so was discussed very little in medical texts. Childbirth was, nevertheless, surrounded with traditional customs. Descriptions of birth practices and iconography of birthing scenes almost universally depict them as exclusively female arenas, but there is debate about the degree of men's interest and participation in gynecology and obstetrics. Medical texts written by and for male practitioners indicate interest and, perhaps, experience in the process of childbirth. Royal births are often described as an exception to the all-female rule, with court physicians and astrologers in attendance, although arrangements for the deliveries of fifteenth-century English queens excluded all male participation. Most scholars, however, agree that normal births usually were attended only by women.

When labor began and if circumstances allowed, the mother retreated to a private chamber with her midwife and other female attendants, presumably family and friends. In isolated areas of northern Europe, husbands could assist the midwife or female assistant by supporting the women in the last stages of delivery. Most births took place in the mother's home although, beginning in the twelfth century, some hospitals provided facilities to care for poor women during birth and postpartum convalescence. Some texts suggest the birthing chamber be darkened and warm since light and cold were thought to be harmful to the mother and stressful for the newborn. The birth chamber was to be furnished with warm water, sponges, bandages, and other necessities to care for and comfort the mother and her infant. This, of course, also depended upon the mother's class and economic situation. Royal birthing chambers provided the expectant queen with featherbeds and fine linen sheets and upper-class women strove to imitate these standards. Rural women often gave birth on a bed of straw strewn on the earthen floor of their cottages. Women gave birth in whatever position was comfortable, squatting, kneeling, or supported on the knees of a birth attendant or husband. Illustrations of childbirth also portray women using a birthing stool which allowed the mother to be supported by an attendant on each side while the midwife positioned herself in front where she could aid the mother and guide the birth. The role of the midwife in a normal delivery was to comfort the mother, protect the infant, and to intervene as little as possible in the natural process. Soothing and encouraging the mother could involve massaging her abdomen or vagina with oils to keep her supple, help with dilation, and ease delivery. The midwife also caught the baby, cut the umbilical cord, cleaned and anointed the child, and wrapped it in swaddling.

Medical texts pay much more attention to the problems involved in difficult deliveries. If labor was protracted and unproductive, women could turn to herbal remedies meant to cause sneezing or open the womb. Herbal baths were encouraged. Women were given herbs in beverages, pessaries (worn in the vagina to support the position of the uterus), or by fumigation. They were made to walk around to ease pains and encourage delivery. If presentation of the fetus exiting the womb was abnormal, the midwife was responsible for correcting the position. Some medieval texts depict as many as sixteen different presentations with instructions to the midwife for correcting each one. The texts advised that the midwife's hand be small and oiled and that she work with great care. Still, turning the child was a dangerous situation involving both pain and the risk of infection. Skeletal remains have been uncovered of medieval women buried with their child still in the womb, sometimes in breech position. In other cases, the problem seems to have been pelvic distortions from rickets or other diseases or simply a narrow pelvis and an unusually large child.

During difficult deliveries, women turned to religion and magic as well as medicine. Placing coriander seed near the womb was thought to attract the fetus. Birth charms, such as the girdle of the Blessed Virgin, were placed on the mother's abdomen. Prayers and rhythmic chants that could be recited by the mother or her attendants and that were perhaps used to regulate breathing were also used. These often included magical and nonsense syllables as well as references to saints, such as the Virgin Mary or St. Margaret. Charms of this type have been preserved in priests' manuals, which suggests that, when a delivery became especially dangerous, clerics could be present to pray for and offer the Church's consolations to a woman in danger of death.

In a prolonged labor, the infant was also at risk. Midwives in fourteenth-century France and fifteenth-century Germany were instructed and licensed by the Church to perform emergency baptisms. If the child died in the womb, medical texts provided both herbal and physical treatments midwives could use to encourage expulsion of the fetus. More drastic advice included placing the mother on a sheet held at the four corners that was then pulled at opposite corners so as to shake the mother back and forth, causing her to deliver. If these did not succeed, a surgeon could be called to extract the fetus using hooks and knives.

After the delivery, it was necessary to ensure the expulsion of the placenta and to control postpartal bleeding. Retention of the placenta could be fatal and, if it was not delivered naturally or with herbal remedies, midwives were instructed to remove it manually, sometimes using their fingernails. Women who suffered from tears, ruptures, or a prolapsed uterus required additional care. Such conditions easily led to infection for which there was little effective treatment. If all went well, however, the midwife left the mother in the care of her friends and relatives and handed the newborn over to the wet nurse.

PAULA M. RIEDER

References and Further Reading

- Biller, Peter. "Childbirth in the Middle Ages." History Today 36 (August 1986): 42–49.
- Bullough, Vern, and Cameron Campbell. "Female Longevity and Diet in the Middle Ages." Speculum 55.2 (1980): 317–325.
- Deegan, Marilyn. "Pregnancy and Childbirth in the Anglo-Saxon Medical Texts: A Preliminary Survey." In Medicine in Early Medieval England, edited by Marilyn Deegan and D. G. Scragg. Manchester: University of Manchester, Center for Anglo-Saxon Studies, 1989, pp. 17–26.
- Elsackers, Marianne. "In Pain You Shall Bear Children (Gen 3:16): Medieval Prayers for a Safe Delivery." In Women and Miracle Stories: A Multidisciplinary Exploration, edited by Anne-Marie Korte. Leiden: Brill, 2001, pp. 179–209.
- Green, Monica H. "Women's Medical Practice and Health Care in Medieval Europe." Signs: Journal of Women in Culture and Society 14.2 (1989): 434–473.
- , ed. and trans. The Trotula: A Medieval Compendium of Women's Medicine. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001.
- Jacobsen, Grethe. "Pregnancy and Childbirth in the Medieval North: A Topology of Sources and a Preliminary Study." Scandinavian Journal of History 9.2 (1984): 91–111.
- Musacchio, Jacqueline Marie. The Art and Ritual of Childbirth in Renaissance Italy. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1999.
- Staniland, Kay. "Royal Entry into the World." In England in the Fifteenth Century: Proceedings of the 1986 Harlaxton Symposium, edited by Daniel Williams. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell Press, 1987, pp. 297–313.

See also Abortion; Breastfeeding and Wet-Nursing; Caesarean Section; Churching; Contraception; Gynecology; Infants and Infanticide; Infertility; Lying-in; Magic and Charms; Margaret of Antioch; Midwives; Pregnancy and Childbirth: Jewish Women; Procreation and Ideas of Conception; Trota of Salerno

PREGNANCY AND CHILDBIRTH: JEWISH WOMEN

Jewish men and women often married at the onset of puberty. Medical tractates indicate that first pregnancies were around age fifteen. The pregnancy was formally recognized by a midwife after approximately three months. During pregnancy, women's nutrition was a concern. Women were expected to eat healthy food and any desire women had for specific foods was supposed to be fulfilled.

Birth was attended by a midwife and other women. A birthing chamber was prepared and filled with amulets and metal objects, warding off Lillith, the demonic and rebellious apocryphal first wife of Adam, who was believed to harm newborns. Men did not enter the birthing chamber. Labor was considered a time of danger. Members of the family and community prayed for the parturient. After birth, the baby was rubbed with salt and swaddled. Males were circumcised eight days after birth. No official ceremony for girls existed. The new mother lay in bed for up to a few weeks, during which time she was cared for by other women. Fourteenth and fifteenth century sources mention a ritual that took place a month after birth in which the mother went to the synagogue for the first time.

In Jewish society, procreation was considered a positive commandment, an obligation for all men. As a result, when a couple did not have children for a period of over ten years, men could initiate divorce proceedings. Women were not considered obligated by this commandment, therefore when they wished to divorce for this reason, they had to claim other grounds. In medieval Europe, where Jews lived among Christians, who believed that celibacy was of the highest order, the contrast between procreation and celibacy was often emphasized.

ELISHEVA BAUMGARTEN

References and Further Reading

- Barkai, Ron. A History of Jewish Gynaecological Texts in the Middle Ages. Leiden: Brill, 1998.
- Baumgarten, Elisheva. "Thus Sayeth the Wise Midwives: Midwives and Midwifery in Thirteenth Century Germany." Zion 65 (2000): 45–74 [in Hebrew].
- . Mothers and Children: Jewish Family Life in Medieval Europe. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 2004.
- Cohen, Jeremy. "Be Fertile and Increase. Fill the Earth and Master It." The Ancient and Medieval Career of a Biblical Text. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1989.
- Klein, Michelle. A Time to Be Born. Customs and Folklore of Jewish Birth. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1998.

Menaḥem Ibn Zerah, Zeida la-Derekh. Warsaw: H. Kelter, 1880.

Sabar, Shalom. "Childbirth and Magic: Jewish Folklore and Material Culture." In Cultures of the Jews, edited by David Biale. New York: Schocken Books, 2002, pp. 671–722.

Sefer Hasidim, ed. Judah Wistinetzki. Jerusalem: Sifre Vahrman, 1924.

See also Infertility; Jewish Women; Marriage, Jewish

PREMONSTRATENSIAN ORDER

The Premonstratensian order had its origins in the monastic foundation of Prémontré in northern France around 1120. Like other monastic movements of the twelfth century, a single foundation quickly multiplied within a century of its existence. Scholars estimate that the number of Premonstratensian foundations across Europe grew as high as 600 religious communities. Spreading from the Holy Lands to England, but located predominately in France, Germany, and the Low Countries, the Premonstratensian order played a significant role in providing religious opportunities for women.

The founder of the Premonstratensian order, Norbert of Xanten (c. 1080–1134), came from a noble family in the lower Rhineland. Around the age of thirty-five, he underwent a dramatic religious conversion and pledged to follow a penitent's life. At his priestly consecration, Norbert removed his worldly clothes in favor of a sheepskin tied with a cord. This dramatic spectacle added to his renown as a holy man. Thereafter, he traveled throughout Europe as an itinerant preacher and spiritual educator, attracting great crowds. After Norbert's unsuccessful attempt to reform the canons (priests who lived communally) of Laon Cathedral, the local bishop asked Norbert to seek a location for a monastic foundation within that diocese. On Christmas Day 1121, forty canons were formally invested at Prémontré, located about ten miles from Laon. Other foundations quickly followed at Floreffe, Cuissy, Laon, and Cappenberg, the first foundation in Germany. Norbert chose the Augustinian rule to order his monasteries, rather than the Benedictine rule, and therefore clearly marked the men of the order as canons. Unlike monks, they frequently served as priests and provided spiritual care at local churches and women's monasteries.

Described as the first Norbertine nun, Ricwera (d. 1136), the widow of Count Raymond of Clastres, joined Prémontré in its earliest days and served in the hospital. Contemporaries of Norbert praised his decision to accept women and recognized the throngs of women who were attracted to his mission. Herman of Laon stated that ten thousand women joined the order in the twelfth century with over a thousand in his diocese alone. He wrote that had Norbert done nothing else, he would have been worthy of the highest praise for this alone. Most religious women of the Premonstratensian order referred to themselves as "sisters" and did not envision themselves as canonesses. In the lower Rhineland alone, twenty-two monasteries were established for Premonstratensian women; that is, three-fourths of the total number of monasteries.

In contrast to other monastic orders, the earliest statutes of the Premonstratensian order (c. 1130–1134) addressed women's communities. Statutes include important information on the sister's clothing, fasting, prayer, care of the sick, receiving guests, financial issues, and the administrative duties of the prioress. Expected to observe continual silence, the earliest Premonstratensian sisters engaged in meal service, washing clothes, pressing cheese, and weaving wool, in addition to the spiritual tasks of praying and listening to the psalms. Sisters were allowed to possess psalters and prayer books, as well as a small sheathed knife that was to hang from their belted wool tunic. Thirteenth-century statutes of the order and annual General Chapter meetings continued to make mention of women's communities.

However, like other medieval religious orders, there was uneasiness about the place of women within the order. Looking at the number of women's foundations emerging in the earliest decades, some scholars have suggested that there was a general call for the separation of men and women within a monastery. Prémontré, for instance, established a women's community in the late 1130s. Extant property confirmations reprimand Prémontré for receiving goods meant for nearby women's monasteries. And, in an 1198 papal bull, the papacy confirmed the order's decision to no longer require the reception of sisters, especially in those monasteries already suffering from troubles. However, this regulation was generally ignored and early thirteenth-century statutes clarified that sisters could continue to be accepted in those locations that had always received them. In the lower Rhineland, applications for entry into women's monasteries exceeded their capacity, indicating a stable and supportive environment.

Although Premonstratensian monasteries continued to exist throughout the Middle Ages, the thirteenth century brought competition from new religious orders. After one hundred years of popularity, the Premonstratensian order witnessed a sharp decline in its foundations for men and women. The Premonstratensian order may be situated within the twelfth-century religious blossoming of the Middle Ages, which provided leadership, educational, and cultural opportunities for numerous women. While past scholarship on this question concentrated on restrictive legislation, new scholarship seeks answers in local studies, where scholars find women in abundance within the order, especially in northern Germany.

SHELLEY AMISTE WOLBRINK

References and Further Reading

- Neel, Carol. "The Origins of the Beguines." Signs 14 (1989): 321–341.
- Wolbrink, Shelley Amiste. "Women in the Premonstratensian Order of Northwestern Germany, 1120–1250." Catholic Historical Review vol. 89, no. 3 (July 2003): 387–408.

See also Canonesses; Monastic Rules; Monasticism and Nuns; Spiritual Care

PRIVATE AND PUBLIC SPHERES

The designation of public and private spheres traditionally distinguishes between work and the state—gendered male—and the individual and the family—gendered female. Feminists such as Michelle Rosaldo and Daphne Spain posited the roots of women's subordination in this distinction, arguing that the relegation of women to the domestic sphere is a form of control determining the degree of women's subordination in society: the greater the gulf between the public and private spheres, the greater the degree of subordination. More recently, scholars such as Carol Pateman and Diana Coole have argued that the public/private dichotomy is overdrawn, difficult to maintain for all contexts, and oversimplifies the nature of social space.

Although scholars such as Georges Duby have applied the public/private model to the Middle Ages, medieval Europe more convincingly supports the recent critique. Not an era generally associated with significant freedoms for women, medieval Europe also made little distinction between the public and private. As Shannon McSheffrey has pointed out, the demarcation is a legacy of enlightenment thought and anachronistic when applied to earlier societies. Politically, medieval society vested the seat of government in the body of the monarch; wherever the monarch was, governing occurred. Thus the king's household was not only a domestic, familial space, but also the seat of political administration. The king's household officers began as personal servants and gradually assumed administrative roles through their proximity to the king. For instance, England's chancellor began as the king's chaplain, but over the course of the Middle Ages he became a judicial figure who heard petitions and presided over his own court.

Similarly, medieval economies did not distinguish between public and private. The aristocracy's position relied upon their possession and exploitation of land, on which they and their families lived and from which they derived their income. The aristocratic hall was both a residence and a space from which to administer agricultural estates. The noble family lived—ate, worked, and slept—among their personal servants and estate officers. Merchants' and artisans' homes and workshops were one and the same space. Apprentices lived and worked alongside their masters' families, and the master received partners and clients in his personal chamber. The seat of the peasant economy was also in the home. While peasant men traveled to the family's fields and peasant women worked in and around the home, the necessity of both partners' labor to the family's success blurred any economic segregation between public and private.

Even the architecture of medieval homes observed little distinction between public and private. Peasant homes were frequently divided into only two spaces, one in which the family lived, ate, and slept, and one in which their animals were housed. More affluent peasants kept their animals outside their homes, but otherwise their household space remained the same. Medieval elites more extensively partitioned their homes, but hallways were extremely rare. Anyone who wished to pass from one part of a medieval home to another traversed all the rooms—and thus passed through all the activities and communities housed within.

This lack of clear division between public and private meant that women's traditional association with ostensibly "private" domestic spaces did not segregate them from the "public" workings of the government or the economy. For instance, royal women might enjoy significant governmental influence through their access to the person of the monarch. While a queen did not officially enjoy the same administrative or judicial powers as her husband, nonetheless she could shape the administration of those powers through her position in the royal household and her personal relationship to the king. Similarly, a merchant's wife might not go through a professional apprenticeship, but was likely to learn equivalent skills by living in and overseeing the household in which a craft was practiced. A wife might command her husband's apprentices, and in some contexts, after her husband's death, merchant widows might take up their husbands' former position in his professional guild. Because work occurred in the home, a merchant woman's participation in the market was possible.

This blurring between the public and private in medieval Europe leads to two conclusions: first, the undeniable political, legal, social, and economic restrictions placed on women in the Middle Ages confirm that separation between public and private spheres is not the only source of women's subordination. Second, scholars of medieval women need to recognize that, despite such restrictions, precisely this lack of clear demarcation between public and private afforded women opportunities to participate in medieval society that were not always available to women in later eras.

ANNA DRONZEK

References and Further Reading

- Coole, Diana. "Cartographic Convulsions: Public and Private Reconsidered." Political Theory. 28. 3 (June 2000): 337–354.
- Duby, Georges, ed. Revelations of the Medieval World. translated by Arthur Goldhammer. Vol. 2 of A History of Private Life. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1988.
- Landes, Joan B., ed. Feminism, the Public, and the Private. Oxford Readings in Feminism. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- McSheffrey, Shannon. "Place, Space, and Situation: Public and Private in the Making of Marriage in Late-Medieval London." Speculum 79. 4 (October 2004): 960–990.
- Pateman, Carole. "Feminist Critiques of the Public/Private Dichotomy." In Disorder of Women: Democracy, Feminism, and Political Theory. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1989, pp. 118–140.
- Rosaldo, Michelle Zimbalist. "Women, Culture, and Society: A Theoretical Overview." In Women, Culture, and Society, edited by Michelle Zimbalist Rosaldo and Louise Lamphere. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1974, pp. 17–43.
- Spain, Daphne. Gendered Spaces. Chapel Hill, N.C.: University of North Carolina Press, 1992.

See also Architecture, Domestic; Division of Labor; Feminist Theories and Methodologies; Gender Ideologies; Gender in History; Intercession; Space, Sacred; and Gender; Space, Secular; and Gender

PROCREATION AND IDEAS OF CONCEPTION

Saint Paul's famous dictum, "It is better to marry than to burn," epitomizes the early Christian theological ambivalence toward sexuality: while virginity or at least celibacy is best, marriage provides the only legitimate outlet for sexual intercourse, which could lead to unrestrained and sinful passion. Medieval theology continued to view sexuality with suspicion, as an act fraught with spiritual dangers, despite its necessity in reproduction. In clear contrast to the moral concerns of theologians, medieval writings on medicine and physiology extensively discussed the acts of procreation and conception, generally without any explicit moralizing.

In fact, writers from the eleventh century onward noted that procreation was a gift of God for the survival of the human race and, as a natural function, was not shameful but necessary and worthy of study. In the Greek medical traditions associated with Hippocrates and Galen, which the medieval world followed, sexual intercourse served another important purpose for the individuals involved: it brought the body back to a sense of balance and moderation. Galenic thought in particular emphasized that the body contained four qualities, heat, coldness, dryness and moisture, and that the healthy human body was able to maintain a balance (relative to each person's particular needs) between these qualities or humors. According to this humoral theory, men were by nature hot and dry, while women were cold and moist. Sexual activity provided one way to remove excess heat and moisture, and if performed in moderation would return the humors and thus the body to health (Jacquart and Thomasset, pp. 48–52; Lemay, pp. 41–43).

While they agreed on the importance of sexual intercourse in reproduction and in promoting health, medieval medical writers actively debated the roles of male and female parents in the process of conception. All agreed that the seed or semen was blood that had been transformed through heat, but agreement ended there. The central and later Middle Ages inherited two primary notions from antiquity: one medical and the other associated with natural philosophy. While they have many variants and permutations, the two central views can, with some simplification, be identified as the two-seed theory, connected with the medical writings attributed to Hippocrates and Galen, and the one-seed theory, associated with the natural philosophy of Aristotle.

The two-seed theory argues that the human fetus is created from the union of both male and female seed or sperm. Both men and women have testicles (the female genitalia being simply the inverse and internal mirror to the external male genitalia) and emit seed that combines to form the embryo. The seed derives from all parts of each parent's body, and so explains the physical resemblances of the child to mother and father. While this theory might suggest an equality of the sexes, it in fact presumes the predominance of the male seed, as hotter and stronger than the female, but allows for the possibility of the female seed's active involvement in forming the fetus (Cadden, pp. 15–21; Jacquart and Thomasset, pp. 52–64; Baldwin, pp. 93–94; Lloyd, pp. 319, 321, 324). This model, built around the complementarity of male and female bodies, predominated in western European thought until the thirteenth century, when an alternative model was rediscovered and disseminated.

That alternative model, known as the one-seed theory advocated by Aristotle in the fourth century BCE, claims that it is only the male who produces seed and plays an active role in the process of conception and formation of the embryo. The female simply provides matter, which is then shaped into a human form by the power of the male seed, much as a sculptor takes clay or wood and transforms it into a work of art. That unformed female matter is identified with menstrual blood, not semen, which Aristotle argues women cannot produce. The female, according to Aristotle, is a deformed or imperfect male, and particularly incapable of producing the heat necessary to transform blood into semen, which the male body could do through an internal boiling, thickening, and whitening of the blood (Aristotle, 729b, 737a; Cadden, pp. 21–26). Such a theory reflects the philosopher's larger division between the roles of men and women: the male is active, hot, strong, and formative, while the female is passive, cold, weak, and material.

Medieval writings through the twelfth century only acknowledged the two-seed theory. But the process of translation of Greek and Arabic sources during the same period led to the rediscovery of Aristotle's natural philosophical writings in general. As early as the 1210s, the one-seed theory was articulated by Parisian masters, at the same moment that other views of Aristotle (such as his belief in the eternity of the world) were condemned by the Church. Despite ecclesiastical opposition, Aristotelian natural philosophy came to dominate the intellectual world by the end of the thirteenth century. While some writers continued to advocate the two-seed theory, their defensive statements indicate that the one-seed argument relegating women to a passive role was becoming the accepted view. Albertus Magnus and such later writers as Giles of Rome and Peter of Abano may have used terms such as female sperm but associated it increasingly with the passive matter that Aristotle had described (Lemay, pp. 20–26; Jacquart and Thomasset, pp. 64–69). The triumph of Aristotelian thought in general over the course of the thirteenth century finds a clear parallel in the replacement of the Hippocratic-Galenic idea of two seeds with Aristotle's one-seed argument.

The role of male and female in reproduction was not limited to such theories. Discussions during the same period focused also on the creation of sexual difference. Generally, the sex of the child was thought to be determined by the placement of the fetus in the uterus. If the seed(s) should settle near the liver—thought to be the hottest part of the body, the child would be male; if it settled farther from the liver, the child would be female. The theory once again associates the male with heat and by implication strength, and the female with cold and weakness. Others argued that the placement of the fetus on the right side indicated a boy, and the left side a girl. Another, particularly revealing argument for the determination of the fetus's sex lies in a belief by some medical writers that the uterus consisted of seven cells. The theory created a spectrum of sexual and gender possibilities. If the seed should fall in the leftmost cell, the child would be an extremely feminine girl; if in the next cell, the child would be a feminine girl; if in the third cell, a masculine female; if in the middle cell, a hermaphrodite; and so on, to the extremely masculine boy in the rightmost cell (Kudlein, passim; Cadden, pp. 93, 198–201). The theory places in the realm of biology not just the sex of the child, but also its future gender characteristics as well.

Procreation and conception provided ample opportunity for debate and discussion, opportunities that medieval thinkers, especially from the twelfth century onward, used to their fullest in order to consider the relations of men and women in the realm of biology.

WILLIAM F. MACLEHOSE

References and Further Reading

- Aristotle. Generation of Animals, translated by A. L. Peck. Loeb Classical Library. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1942.
- Baldwin, John. The Language of Sex: Five Voices from Northern France around 1200. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1994.
- Cadden, Joan. Meanings of Sex Difference in the Middle Ages: Medicine, Science and Culture. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- Jacquart, Danielle, and Claude Thomasset. Sexuality and Medicine in the Middle Ages, translated by Matthew Adamson. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1988.
- Kudlein, Fridolf. "The Seven Cells of the Uterus: The Doctrine and Its Roots." Bulletin of the History of Medicine 39 (1963): 416–423.
- Lemay, Helen Rodnite. Women's Secrets: A Translation of Pseudo-Albertus Magnus' De Secretis Mulierum with Commentaries. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1992.
- Lloyd, G. E. R., ed. Hippocratic Writings. New York: Penguin Books, 1978.
- MacLean, Ian. The Renaissance Notion of Woman: A Study in the Fortunes of Scholasticism and Medical Science in European Intellectual Life. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1980.

See also Aristotelian Concepts of Women and Gender; Gender Ideologies; Gynecology; Pregnancy and Child-birth; Christian Women; Secrets of Women; Sexuality: Extramarital Sex; Sexuality: Female Same-Sex Relations; Sexuality: Male Same-Sex Relations; Sexuality, Regulation of; Sexuality: Sex in Marriage

PROPHETS

The connection between women and prophecy has ancient and venerable roots. In the Graeco-Roman world women often served as priestesses of the great temples where oracles were handed down by the gods through the women attendants who interpreted them. More pertinently for medieval women, the Hebrew Bible, appropriated by the Christian community as the “Old Testament,” recorded the work of five women who were acknowledged as prophets: Miriam, the sister of Moses (Ex 15: 20–21), Deborah (Judges 4 and 5), Huldah (2 Kings 2:14–20), Noadiah (Neh 6:14), and the wife of Isaiah (Is 8:3). The Christian scriptures themselves not only identified women prophets in their own tradition—Anna (Lk 2:36–38), the four daughters of Philip (Acts 21:9), and a certain “Jezebel” (Acts 2:20)—but also recognized the role of the prophet as among the charismatic ministries by which the Holy Spirit guided and led the Christian communities (1 Cor 12: 4–11; Rom 12:28). Theoretically, then, Christian women prophets in the Middle Ages could find significant role models and approbation in the scriptural text. Despite the sanction of the scriptures, however, the role of the prophet in itself was also considered problematic and the functioning of women as prophets attracted a special, gender-specific suspicion.

Infused with the Spirit, prophets always functioned somewhat outside the hierarchical control of the Church. Though Paul in his letters consistently approved the prophetic ministry, he also required that the authentic prophet give an intelligible message that builds up the church community. By late antiquity, the Pauline understanding developed into a twofold notion of the prophet. On the one hand, the prophet speaks for God on the basis of divinely inspired visions, criticizing the contemporary morals and predicting future divine actions. On the other hand, the prophet also speaks for God by interpreting the biblical word as it applies to the moral, social, and spiritual growth of the local church community. In this function, the prophet has been subsumed to some degree into the official ministerial structure as a teacher of the Christian community. We have the witness of the influential bishop of Mainz, Rabanus Maurus (c. 776–856), that this double understanding of prophet endured into Carolingian times, and he also affirmed that women were worthy and able to receive the gift of prophecy, in spite of inherent tensions between the demands of the prophetic role and the prevailing theory about the nature of women.

Women who were the subjects of religious visions could easily be indicted as under the influence of irrational forces, at best, and subject to demonic influences at worst. While this criticism might apply to a prophet of either gender, it was a particularly telling accusation for women who were believed to be deficient in reason when compared to men. To function as an interpreter of scripture, on the other hand, required both an appropriate education in the liberal arts and authority to teach; the latter authority was explicitly denied women in 1 Tim 2. Further, the teaching prophet could also be seen as usurping the function of the hierarchical priesthood. In spite of ambiguity, criticism, and outright prohibition, nonetheless, women functioned as prophets, in both senses, throughout the Middle Ages.

Visionary prophets were often women of great importance and influence; their visions gave them religious authority and public recognition. Hildegard of Bingen (1098–1179), sanctioned by visions and possessed of a solid monastic education, became a correspondent and advisor of major political figures in her day. Elisabeth of Schönau (1129–1164) spoke out courageously against the corruption in both Church and secular society. Catherine of Siena (1347–1380) not only spoke but also acted; in the tradition of the Old Testament prophets who spoke truth to the powerful in their own courts, she confronted the errant Avignon Pope and admonished him to return to his true place in Rome.

Prophets who taught and interpreted the scriptures were fewer in number, and their influence is less well documented. Although the prohibition against women teachers remained in force, women were not denied the kind of liberal arts education necessary for scriptural interpretation, at least not up to the twelfth century. Boniface’s companion, Leoba (d. 779), was the official teacher for the Diocese of Mainz during her lifetime. During the Carolingian period, the bishop Jonas of Orleans, in De institutione laicali, had promoted the idea that noble women were responsible for the religious education and pastoral care of all within their households and Dhuoda of Septimania (fl. 842) left a written text for her absent son. Hildegard of Bingen’s influence was grounded not only on her visions but also on her reputation as an educated woman and scriptural scholar, and Heloise (1101–1164), known for her remarkable learning, served as a prophetic teacher for the nuns of Le Paraclete.

MARIE ANNE MAYESKI

PROPHETS

References and Further Reading

- Madigan, Shawn, ed. Mystics, Visionaries, and Prophets: An Historical Anthology of Women's Spiritual Writings. Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1998.
- Mayeski, Marie Anne. "'Let Women Not Despair': Rabanus Maurus on Women as Prophets." Theological Studies 58, 2 (June, 1997): 237–253.
- Petroff, Elizabeth, ed. Medieval Women's Visionary Literature. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- . Body and Soul: Essays on Medieval Women and Mysticism. New York: Oxford University Press, 1994.
- Watt, Diane. Secretaries of God: Women Prophets in Late Medieval and Early Modern England. Woodbridge, Suffolk: D. S. Brewer, 1997.

See also Catherine of Siena; Dhuoda; Education, Lay; Education, Monastic; Elisabeth of Schönau; Heloise; Hildegard of Bingen; Leoba; Literacy and Reading; Latin; Mothers as Teachers; Mysticism and Mystics; Sermons and Preaching

PROPHETS, NORDIC

Since female prophets, or sibyls, were important in Jewish, Greek, and Roman societies as well as among the early Christians, it is not surprising to find them in the Germanic and the Nordic worlds. Tacitus reported that the Germanic tribes worshipped female divinities and honored female prophets. As revealed in Old Norse sources, the female element in the Nordic pantheon is not impressive, but these texts also included women known as völur (sibyls) who existed both at the supernatural and human levels. The most impressive is the supernatural sibyl who articulated the spá, or prophesy, that is known as Völuspá and that constitutes the first poem in the collection of mythic and heroic poems called the Elder or Poetic Edda. Addressing a large audience, including the chief god Óðinn, she, swiftly and authoritatively, describes the creation of the world, its past history and current condition, predicts the destruction of the world, but promises a rebirth. The poem was composed around 1000 and recited orally for generations before its inscription.

Human sibyls performed similar functions. The best known is the Þorbjörg lítil-völva (the little sibyl) who predicted the end of a famine for a Norse community in Greenland, as recounted in The Saga of Erik the Red. She was equipped with a staff and her performance was accompanied by singing women. The latter feature is confirmed by other texts, the former from archaeology. Throughout Scandinavia female tombs contained a long iron rod that is no longer interpreted as a cooking implement but as a part of the sibyl's equipment, although its exact use is not known. The term völur may be associated with the word völr, staff, and, in fact, these “staff-bearing” women who performed prophecy and sorcery may have been a circumpolar phenomenon.

JENNY JOCHENS

References and Further Reading

- The Complete Sagas of Icelanders Including 49 Tales*. Ed. Viðar Hreinsson. 5 vols. Reykjavik: Leifur Eiríksson Publishing, 1997.
- Dillmann, F.-X. Les magiciens dans l'Islande ancienne. Uppsala: Kungl. Gustavs Akademien, 2005.
- Enright, Michael J. Lady with a Mead Cup: Ritual, Prophecy and Lordship in the European Warband from La Tène to the Viking Age. Dublin: Four Courts Press, 1996.
- Jochens, Jenny. “Völuspá: Matrix of Norse Womanhood.” Journal of English and Germanic Philology 88(1989): 344–362.
- . “At the Dawn of Nordic Literature: A Chorus of Female Voice.” In Female Voices of the North I: An Anthology, edited by Inger M. Olsen, Sven Hakon Rossel, and Robert Nedoma. Vienna: Edition Praesens, 2002, pp. 13–53.
- McGinn, Bernard. Visions of the End: Apocalyptic Traditions in the Middle Ages. New York: Columbia University Press, 1979.
- Price, Neil. S. The Viking Way: Religion and War in Late Iron Age Scandinavia. Uppsala: Uppsala University, 2002.

See also Literature, Old Norse; Prophets; Scandinavia; Supernatural Women; Voice, Female: in Literature

PROSOPOGRAPHY

Prosopography is a biography of a specific group of people, generally people of low social or legal status who are therefore underrepresented in primary sources, or people whose functions in society render them relatively invisible: for example, women, peasants, and the urban poor. Accumulating and analyzing available biographical data for the people involved in a particular institution, social rank, or historical event—their geographic origins, the identities of parents, siblings, and other relatives—allows scholars to achieve a richer understanding of the institution to which the group belonged or the event in which they participated, and also realize significant details about the group itself, thus raising an otherwise hidden entity and its members to a more visible and knowable position. This methodology has proved particularly fruitful for the study of medieval nuns and moneyers, and early modern guild members. An excellent example of a prosopographical study is Judith Maltby's work on the identities and social ranks of parishioners in early modern England who approved of the liturgy and services of the newly established Church of England. Advantages of prosopography include discerning specific patterns (such as the identification of social status and geographic origins) of a group of people whose association in a particular institution often disguises important differences among them. A prosopographical analysis can also provide insights into the nuanced distinctions within and among social groups. Limitations to this methodology concern the biased nature of sources, which are most plentiful for society's elites: men and upper social classes. Lesser social status groups tend to be left out of historical studies, giving a lopsided view of a particular event or institution, because the more visible elite tend to be seen by historians as the norm. Examples of prosopographical studies can be found in the biannual journal Medieval Prosopography: History and Collective Biography.

MARILYN OLIVA

References and Further Reading

- Maltby, Judith. Prayer Book and People in Elizabethan and Early Stuart England. Cambridge Studies in Early Modern British History. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998.
- Narbona-Carceles, Maria. "Women at Court: A Prosopographic Study of the Court of Carlos III of Navarre (1387–1425)." Medieval Prosopography: History and Collective Biography 22 (2001): 31–64.
- Oliva, Marilyn. The Convent and the Community in Late Medieval England. Female Monasteries in the Diocese of Norwich, 1350–1540. Woodbridge, Suffolk: The Boydell Press, 1998.

See also Charters; History, Medieval Women's; Records, Ecclesiastical; Records, Rural; Records, Urban

PROSTITUTES

Generally prostitutes are defined as persons who take money for sex, but in medieval times, the term encompassed any woman with many sex partners. It should also be noted that historians have always treated prostitution as an urban phenomenon linked to the evolution of commercial society. If it existed in medieval rural society, we know very little of it. To a large extent, prostitution existed to assuage the needs of a large urban masculine population that married late or constantly flowed into cities and remained single, if not celibate, transitional visitors.

The Double Standard

It is traditionally accepted that medieval society held a double standard regarding sexual behavior: it allowed men sexual permissiveness and demanded sexual austerity from women. The irony remains that medieval men loaded women with negative characteristics: they were considered fickle, libidinous, inconsistent, prone to temptation, and weak in terms of sexuality (hence needing male dominance). Yet men conceded that male concupiscence was problematic and a danger to social order. By this circular rationale they acknowledged prostitution as a minor evil. To paraphrase a famous statement from St. Augustine, "Prostitution is like the sewer; it stinks but is necessary."

The dominant patriarchal discourse expected males to have what was commonly labeled a "long youth" and allowed them to be surrounded by easily accessible women of their choosing, within and outside their household. Men had wives for the orderly continuation and reproduction of society, and for their personal gratification they had concubines, visited prostitutes, and held sexual rights over the females of their households (handmaids, servants, and slaves). Once abandoned, these women had few alternatives but prostitution. Repeated adultery marginalized them.

Hence for medieval society, prostitution was riddled with ambiguity. The practice was systematically rejected morally, but simultaneously accepted and regulated. Even if prostitutes were marginalized, medieval society recognized them for their function, which provided them a place in the community. Medieval theologians condemned prostitutes because they were promiscuous, but accepted their social function, their ministerium. Theologians discussed the number of men a woman had to have sex with to be called a prostitute, and the validity of the financial gain earned by the woman in the process. Authorities were so complacent with this functional system that they rarely attempted to define what a prostitute was. In a rare instance, Marseille, in its thirteenth-century statutes, included a chapter entitled de meretricibus (regarding prostitutes). The Marseillais designated prostitutes as "public girls" who day and night received two or more men in their houses. A prostitute was also a woman who "did business" trading her body within the confines of a brothel.

Promiscuity and trade, the exchange of money for the pleasure of a body, made a prostitute. The validity of the wage a woman received during the exchange of services with her client was not denied. Theologians like Thomas of Aquinas legitimized these earnings and Thomas of Chobham granted to prostitutes, in addition to the control of their earnings, the possibility to distribute alms, attend church, and receive communion. Theologians nevertheless pondered the level of contamination involved in alms provided by sinners like prostitutes.

Institutionalization

Historians have often explained the ambiguous character of medieval reactions to prostitution empirically. On the one hand the institutionalization of prostitution was rationalized and analyzed parallel to demographics and marital structures; when numerical data is lacking, prostitution is understood in terms of cultural values and issues of sexual normality and deviance on the other.

Institutionalized in red light districts or brothels, prostitutes shielded daughters, wives, and widows from dissoluteness and prepared men for marriage; they protected society from adultery, fornication, rape, incest, and sodomy. For example, using the ample records of the Florentine Office of Decency, Richard C. Trexler suggested that prostitution was institutionalized as a remedy for young male homosexuality. Faced with a demographic crisis that endangered the survival of their society, Florentine fathers reacted where they saw fit. They felt that prostitutes would help young Florentine men focus on the pleasure of women's bodies. In the end their attempt backfired. According to Trexler, the foreign prostitutes that populated Florentine brothels served essentially a population of immigrants rather than Florentines.

In other ways, the institutionalization of prostitution could display the power and authority of the state. Regarding Venice, Elisabeth Pavan has argued that controlling prostitution eradicated male violence in the city. Mary Elizabeth Perry suggested in a similar way that in Seville, Spain, organized prostitution reinforced lines of authority and polarized symbols of evil.

Authors like Jacques Rossiaud help identify some of the weaknesses of the previous theories that explained the institutionalization of prostitution. The study of prostitution cannot be disengaged from the study of gender. Because medieval society remained ambiguous toward women and sex, it perceived women in sexual terms and it determined their status and place in society according to sex. Jacques Rossiaud argued that sexual violence and especially rape replenished the ranks of prostitutes. Rossiaud noted that in southern French medieval towns older men married younger women (this was also the case in many other European cities). He correlated the high incidence of collective rapes committed by groups of youths to the late age of men marrying and to the age and status of the raped women. Respectable women of marriageable ages (between fifteen and thirty) were most often the victims of these collective rapes. The social utility of a raped woman in marriage disappeared with her lost virginity and defilement. Rape dishonored and marginalized these women so they were forced into prostitution. In the end, according to Rossiaud, rapes did not single out women specifically but rather targeted the group of older males that would have married such women. "Gendering" allowed such degradation.

Identification of Prostitutes

The identification of prostitutes faces many obstacles: in general, medieval society was andocentric and misogynistic, and with few exceptions it silenced women's voice. Lower-class and uneducated laywomen are absent from the records for the most part and we can only get a glimpse of their lives by accident. We know names of prostitutes because of transgressions, on the part of others as well as by the prostitutes themselves. But we know very little besides their names, and even these may be misleading. Often, records left no patronymics but a trade name: first name and a label like "of somewhere" or "the something," like Marguerite the Huntress or Jeanette de Valence.

Prostitutes' names then contrasted with medieval naming tradition. Women were generally designated by affiliation (as daughters, wives, or widows); prostitutes were not. This lack of information defined their lives. From their silenced affiliations historians inferred that most often prostitutes were immigrants, who resorted to selling their bodies because they lacked the traditional support networks of kin, neighbors, and friends.

Prostitutes rarely practiced in their place of origins and their numbers peaked with demographics, possibly because of a high male to female ratio, and the migratory character of the male population. Medieval ideology also favored the development of prostitution by recommending that a large segment of the male population remain single. The exigencies of celibacy burdened the single life while prostitutes were available to "sinners." For theologians, simple fornication with public women carried little weight and the spiritual consequences were negligible.

Prostitutes' narratives, when they are available, often tell stories of victimization. In one case, the leader of a gang of miscreants convinced Beatrice, a married woman from 1350s Avignon, to join them. She abandoned her husband to follow the gang leader, who put her to work in Avignon's red light district, the Bourg Neuf. Also in Avignon, in 1370, a butcher kidnapped the wife of Jean de Vitry and set her up to work across the Rhône in the town of Alès. Sixty years later, Catherine Douspe (of Hope) was a young, poor orphan. She was kidnapped and put to work at the Bath of the Stone (baths and stews, like inns and taverns, were often associated with prostitution). A few heartening stories also appeared. The same Catherine asked the municipal authorities for the alms that would allow her to leave her life of “sin.”

Poverty was considered a major contributor to prostitution, although society blamed women’s nature for their behavior. It was thought that women prostituted themselves by choice and for their pleasure, but some individuals and institutions developed a system of financial support to alleviate young women’s poverty and their “fall” into prostitution. Most late medieval testaments included a clause that granted funds for the marriage of poor girls. Civil authorities and confraternities also distributed dowries to prostitutes who wished to leave their trade and marry. At least some perceived the link between growing dowry prices, poverty, and prostitution.

The labor market that shut women out of lucrative professions also favored prostitutes’ entry into this trade. Some historians, like Leah Otis and Ruth Mazzo-Karras, have argued that some women entered the profession willingly, as a preferable way to earn a living. Not all were professional prostitutes and occasionally women could resort to the sex trade as a last alternative. Labor practices also facilitated the recruitment of prostitutes. Court records give examples of female apprentices diverted by their masters from learning their craft and being instead forced into prostitution. The same happened to servants and maids.

Medieval prostitution oscillated between phases of toleration and integration, and movements of rejection and marginalization. Rossiaud sees a correspondence between periods of tolerance and economic expansion and prosperity, with periods of legislation and constraints marking economic crisis. One of the best-known examples of the latter is the French King Louis IX’s expulsion of prostitutes and pimps, brothel and stews keepers, and the confiscation of their goods. He relented and allowed them back to Paris two years later. The city of Toulon acted similarly in 1318. Authorities specified a day (the eleventh of October) for “shameless women” to leave the premises under the threat of flogging and confiscation of their garments. The latter ordinance did not eradicate prostitution; during the fourteenth century, citizens complained that certain ladies crossed the brook leading into town, strutted in the streets, and washed themselves in public.

Public Control

The long-term trend saw an evolution toward the institutionalization of brothels controlled by public authorities. By the fourteenth century most European towns had a red light district where prostitutes were confined, controlled, and regulated. Such districts allowed a clear spatial and social separation. The owners and managers of brothels, stews, and other houses of prostitution ran their establishments in full light of and support of the law. In fourteenth-century Avignon, for example, a prostitute leased her tenement, and paid a cens (yearly tax) to the diocese. Several prostitutes rented tenements from the convent of Saint Catherine. Wealthy merchants invested in the trade. Marguerite Busaffi, daughter of Thomas Busaffi, a prominent Florentine banker established in Avignon, owned a profitable brothel in the city. In papal Avignon, the income and taxes raised by the profession eventually attracted the authorities, who in 1337 decided to tax prostitutes and procurers two sols per week. A scandalized Pope Innocent VI annulled the tax in 1358.

Sumptuary laws prohibited prostitutes from dressing like “honest” women and required a recognizable mark on their clothing. Prostitutes, like Jews, were tolerated to a certain extent as social utility, but this attitude was mixed with bigotry and the stigma of pollution. Many towns decreed that prostitutes and Jews purchase the bread and fruits they had examined or touched in the market.

Sumptuary laws were widespread. Since the dominant discourse conceived of women as mentally weak, these laws aimed at deterring honest women from their natural inclination to sin. A 1372 public decree from Avignon’s Temporal Court prohibited prostitutes from wearing coats, silk veils, amber rosaries, and gold rings under penalty of fines and confiscation. Marseille and Toulon ordered prostitutes to wear single-color garments and Aix-en-Provence ordered them veiled. In 1382 London, “common harlots” were required to wear a striped hood and they were not allowed to line their coats with fur. The reasons behind such legislation were multiple. It forced prostitutes to be recognizable and prevented them from blending in with other women. It also forced prostitutes to hide and not display the rewards of their trade. After all, they could be perceived as successful women who by-passed women’s traditional means of success, by birth or marriage. Prostitutes could not serve as models, and parade and tempt other women to take up their way of life.

Redemption

The reform and rehabilitation of prostitutes was a medieval concern from the twelfth century onward. The prostitute symbolized human frailty and catalyzed the benevolence of God's grace. She symbolized penance and repentance. Christianity offered many models of repenting prostitutes and the best known was Mary Magdalen.

In 1198, Pope Innocent III declared that marrying a prostitute counted as a pious work and he offered the remission of the groom's sins. Marriage presented the double advantage of alleviating poverty and controlling women's sexuality and "natural inclination to sin." Testamentary donations often dowered those prostitutes willing to marry and leave the trade. In addition to marriage, convents could also provide means of social reintegration and salvation for prostitutes.

It is important to recognize that convents for reformed prostitutes were known well before the thirteenth century. At the urging of Theodora, Justinian built the Convent of Repentance, where, according to James A. Brundage, some unhappy residents leaped to their death from the convent walls. Nonetheless, the largest phase of Repentant institutionalization (Repenties) occurred between the thirteenth and fifteenth centuries, the same period that saw the institutionalization of prostitutes in municipal brothels. Founded by clergymen, these convents or houses reflected a male Christian ethos and the clergy's definition of required female penance. Prostitutes were to renounce their previous lives as did the "penitent whores" in the edifying stories of Pelagia, Mary the Harlot, Afra, Thaïs and, above all, Mary Magdalen.

JOËLLE KOSTER

References and Further Reading

- Amt, Emilie, ed. Women's Lives in Medieval Europe: A Sourcebook. London: Routledge, 1993.
- Aries, Philippe, and André Béjin, eds. Western Sexuality: Practice and Precept in Past and Present Times. Oxford: Blackwell, 1985.
- and Georges Duby, eds. A History of Private Life: Revelations of the Medieval World. Cambridge, Mass.: The Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1988.
- Brundage, James A. Law, Sex and Christian Society in Medieval Europe. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press, 1987.
- Bullough, Vern L., and James A. Brundage, eds., Sexual Practices and the Medieval Church. Buffalo: Prometheus, 1982.
- , eds. Handbook of Medieval Sexuality. New York: Garland, 1996.
- Bullough, Vern L. and Bonnie Bullough. Sin, Sickness and Sanity: A History of Sexual Attitudes. New York: Garland, 1977.
- . Prostitution: An Illustrated Social History. New York: Crown Publishers, 1978.
- . Women and Prostitution: A Social History. Buffalo: Prometheus Books, 1987.
- . Cross Dressing, Sex, and Gender. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1993.
- . Human Sexuality: An Encyclopedia. New York: Garland, 1994.
- Mazzo-Karras, Ruth. Common Women: Prostitution and Sexuality in Medieval England. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1996.
- Mengel, David. "From Venice to Jerusalem and Beyond: Milic of Kromeriz and the Topography of Prostitution in Fourteenth-Century Prague." Speculum 79 (2004): 407–442.
- Otis, Leah. Prostitution in Medieval Society: The History of an Urban Institution in Languedoc. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press, 1985.
- Pavan, Elisabeth. "Police des moeurs, société, et politique à Venise à la fin du Moyen Age." Revue historique 264 (1980): 241–288.
- Perry, Mary Elizabeth. Crime and Society in Early Modern Seville. Hanover, N.H.: University Press of New England, 1980.
- Richards, Jeffrey. Sex, Dissidents, and Damnation: Medieval Minorities. New York: Routledge, 1991.
- Rollo-Koster, Joëlle. "The Women of Papal Avignon. A New Source: The Liber Divisionis of 1371." Journal of Women's History 8 (Spring 1996): 36–59.
- . "From Prostitutes to Virgin Brides of Christ: The Avignonesse Repenties in the Late Middle Ages." Journal of Medieval and Early Modern Studies 32 (2002): 109–144.
- Rossiaud, Jacques. "Prostitution, Youth, and Society in the Towns of Southeastern France in the Fifteenth Century." In Deviants and the Abandoned in French Society: Selections from the Annales, edited by Robert Foster and Orest Ranum. Baltimore: John Hopkins University Press, 1978, pp. 1–46.
- . La prostitution médiévale. Paris: Flammarion, 1988.
- Trexler, Richard C. The Women of Renaissance Florence. Binghamton: Medieval and Renaissance Texts and Studies, 1993.

See also Mary Magdalen; Rape and Raptus; Sexuality; Extramarital Sex; Sexuality, Regulation of; Sumptuary Law; Work

PROVERBS, RIDDLES, AND GNOMIC LITERATURE

Proverbs, riddles, and gnomes (short statements conveying traditional truisms) abound in old English wisdom literature, most found in the Exeter Book, a collection of poetry transcribed in the tenth century and kept at the Exeter Cathedral library. The most widely anthologized Exeter Book wisdom poems include The Gifts of Men (GfM), The Fortunes of Men (FtM), Maxims, several elegies, and selections from a collection of riddles.

GfM and FtM list male attributes and experience in sequences of proverbial and gnomic statements. Both poems reflect the Anglo-Saxon heroic code, which valued loyalty, courage, and skill in warfare. The poems also depict aspects of the comitatus, the lord/retainer relationship based on a man's loyalty to his lord, as well as to his fellow retainers—in return, the lord sheltered his men in his hall and rewarded them with gifts. GfM catalogues characteristics and accomplishments “the ordaining Lord apports and assigns” to men, including wisdom, valor, good looks, wealth, and skills such as harp-playing, wine-tasting, blacksmithing, and battling sin. FtM opens with a vignette of a mother and father tenderly nurturing and teaching their young son. The poem’s moral is expressed in gnomic sayings, for example, “Only God knows what the years will bring as he grows up”; “Such things are not man’s to control.” The poet lists many misfortunes and accidents—usually fatal—that can befall a boy or young man. Women are depicted twice lamenting their sons’ deaths, a familiar scene in old English literature.

Maxims offers a catalogue of correct behavior. Again the focus is on males, but women are mentioned, for example, “Woman belongs at her embroidery; a roving woman gives rise to talk,” expressing the Anglo-Saxon ideal of the docile, hall- or home-bound woman, repeated in the poem’s description of the Frisian wife who welcomes her sailor-husband home—she cleans his clothes and satisfies him sexually. Maxims presents aristocratic marriage as a kind of comitatus, with the woman as retainer to her lord. Although she offers him advice and shares in gift-giving, she is subservient—when she passes the mead cup she must serve her husband first. An aristocratic wife also “must excel as one cherished among her people,” for, in cherishing her they cherish her kin. She is a “peace-weaver,” a woman given in marriage by an opposing tribe in order to reduce tribal enmities.

The Exeter Book elegies are poems of lament marked by gnomic and proverbial sayings. For example, the exiled male narrators of The Wanderer and The Seafarer state, “A wise man must be patient,” and “Blessed is he who lives in humility.” In one of the few displays of same-sex physical affection in old English literature, Wan’s narrator, mourning his deceased lord, imagines himself “embracing and kissing him and laying hands and head on his knee.”

Several elegies depict comitatus-like relationships between women and men, such as The Wife’s Lament (Wfl), Wulf and Eadwacer (WIE), and The Husband’s Message. Wfl and WIE are narrated by women, a rarity in old English literature. Both utter gnomic statements, such as the Wfl’s “A young man must always be sad-minded . . . yet must have a happy demeanor,” WIE’s repeated “A difference exists between us,” and WIE’s proverbial “One easily tears apart what was never united.” Both Wfl and WIE are enigmatic and difficult to translate into modern English, but the scholarly consensus is that they depict Anglo-Saxon women lamenting their exiles, exiles caused by men adhering to a heroic code that required them to separate from the women.

The Exeter Book contains ninety-five riddles, whose solutions refer to familiar objects of Anglo-Saxon daily life, such as Sword, Bible, and various animals and birds. Others describe warfare, weather, or the ocean; several deal with wisdom and religion. Fourteen of the riddles are risqué, yielding two solutions: an “innocent” one, and another that is “wrong” and “obscene.” For example, Riddle 61’s “innocent” solution is Helmet or Shirt, while the “incorrect” solution is Vagina; Riddle 54 yields both Onion and Penis. Unlike much Old English poetry, the risqué riddles do not focus exclusively on nobility. Several involve working people and depict objects they used daily, such as churn, plough, key, fire, dough, oxen. In most of these riddles both women and men who perform sexual acts are viewed positively—the exception is Riddle 12, where the narrator contemptuously depicts a masturbating female slave. Riddles 37 and 62, Bellows and Poker, depict masturbating men; in Riddle 62 the men also appear to engage in anal intercourse.

kennings—newly-created compound words that often result in mini-riddles—appear throughout the Old English corpus, such as bone-house for the human body and whale-road for the sea. Coined compounds in old English that are associated with gender or sexuality include, for example, bed-companion for sexual partner, mead-giver, for a queen or noble woman, and woman-knowing for male heterosexual intercourse.

NINA RULON-MILLER

References and Further Reading

- Bradley, S. A. J., ed. and trans. Anglo-Saxon Poetry. London: Everyman, 1995.
- Chance, Jane. Woman as Hero in Old English Literature. Syracuse: Syracuse University Press, 1986.
- Crossley-Holland, Kevin, ed. and trans. The Anglo-Saxon World: An Anthology. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1984.
- Donoghue, Daniel. Old English Literature: A Short Introduction. Oxford: Blackwell, 2004.
- Frantzen, Allen J. Before the Closet: Same-Sex Love from Beowulf to Angels in America. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1998.
- Hollis, Stephanie. Anglo-Saxon Women and the Church: Sharing a Common Fate. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell, 1992.
- Marsden, Richard. The Cambridge Old English Reader. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2004.
- Tanke, John W. “Wonfeax wale: Ideology and Figuration in the Sexual Riddles of the Exeter Book.” In Class and Gender in Early English Literature: Intersections, edited by Britton J. Harwood and Gillian R. Overing. Bloomington, Ind.: Indiana University Press, 1994, pp. 21–42.
- Wilcox, Jonathan, ed. Humour in Anglo-Saxon Literature. Cambridge: D. S. Brewer, 2000.

See also Eroticism in Literature; Literature, Old English; Mead-Giver; Obscenity; Sexuality: Male Same-Sex Relations

PSYCHOANALYTIC THEORY

Psychoanalysis permeates contemporary life; its premises and concepts are used casually and inevitably to describe behavior, dreams, and culture even though most people have not read Freud and are not aware of the source of their ideas about denial, repression, projection, fantasy, inner conflict, paranoia, and much more. Historians, traditionally wary of a theory that foregrounds sex as a key motive throughout human impulses, have mistakenly thought that all psychoanalytic scrutiny is addressed to childhood conflicts, and generally have conflated the clinical practice of psychoanalysis with its potential for textual interpretation throughout the humanities. Begun with the work of Sigmund Freud (with the core theory found in The Interpretation of Dreams; Psychopathology of Everyday Life; Three Essays on the Theory of Sexuality; and Jokes and their Relation to the Unconscious), with over a century of development that has refined and extended the theory, psychoanalysis offers historians a powerful instrument to bring to textual evidence. Its coherent system of explanatory concepts was developed to understand the role of unconscious ideas in mental life, and thus in behavior, and the products of culture. Properly understood, psychoanalysis for historians is not analogous to a clinical activity, but an interpretive method that proceeds from a deep understanding of the origins of polysemous meaning.

Psychoanalysis begins with the premise that much of mental activity is unconscious—that is, not immediately available to awareness, introspection, or observation from outside. This basic perception was also present to ancient and medieval culture; Freud's signal achievement was to map the traffic between unconscious and conscious life in functional terms of mental systems: the unconscious or "id"—repository of unruly wishes and demands, the disciplinary superego imposing morality and control, and the ego or conscious self that negotiates between them, using its resources of language to represent the world. The impress of unconscious wishes makes itself evident in all forms of behavior, but most legibly in dreams, and complex forms of speech and writing. The processes by which all minds produce symbolized representations to mediate between deeply felt wishes and an unaccommodating real world result in the entire range of expression, from dreams and improvised behaviors to cultural achievement in literature and art. In a generalized sense, the human capacity for symbolization, the visual and verbal forms that compromise between unconscious and conscious ideas, makes the special domain of psychoanalytic theory. Psychoanalysis offers historians the concepts and interpretive techniques that enable us to move from the manifest to the latent levels of meaning in the artifacts of human culture, and restore human depth and complexity to the traces of past lives. In this sense, psychoanalysis is not a total historical method; it uniquely occupies a boundary region touching all the separate disciplines of the humanities and social sciences.

Just as psychoanalysis is not limited to its foundational writings, its interpretive attention is also not limited to mental pathology. The processes of the "normal," or well-functioning mind are its central focus. Irrationality, a major interest for psychoanalysis, can be understood as motivated and intelligible in psychoanalytic terms, taking into account the interests of unconscious pressures. The contribution of this depth of psychology to medieval culture is that it strongly assists in restoring full human complexity and interiority to persons who lived in a conformity-demanding culture.

NANCY PARTNER

References and Further Reading

- Edelson, Marshall. Psychoanalysis: A Theory in Crisis. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1988.
- Freud, Sigmund. The core theory in The Interpretation of Dreams; The Psychopathology of Everyday Life; The Three Essays on the Theory of Sexuality; Jokes and their Relation to the Unconscious. Also useful: Introductory Lectures on Psychoanalysis. All available from many publishers.
- Lear, Jonathan. Love and Its Place in Nature: A Philosophic Interpretation of Freudian Psychoanalysis. New York: Farrar Straus and Giroux, 1990.
- Partner, Nancy. "No Sex, No Gender." In Studying Medieval Women: Sex, Gender, Feminism. Edited by N. Partner. Cambridge, Mass.: Medieval Academy of America, 1993.
- Schafer, Roy. A New Language for Psychoanalysis. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1978.

See also History, Medieval Women's; Postmodernism and Historiography

PUBLIC SPHERES

See Private and Public Spheres

Q

---

QASMŪNA BINT ISMĀ'ĪL

In the centuries following the Arab invasion of the Iberian Peninsula, Jewish culture flourished, reaching its peak in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, known as the Jewish Golden Age. Did Jewish women have a Golden Age? In general, Jewish women were not taught Hebrew, the language of literature. In addition, marriage was particularly important in Jewish culture, and, for women, not conducive to writing. Thus, whereas quite a few Moslem and Christian women managed to express themselves in writing, there is an almost total silence from Jewish women. The most notable exception is Qasmūna Bint Ismā'īl, a late-eleventh- or early-twelfth-century poet who appears to have been the daughter of Samuel ha-Nagid, the Jewish vizier of the Moslem king of Granada and a renowned poet. Unlike her father, who wrote his poems in Hebrew, Qasmūna, who probably was not given an education in this language due to her gender, wrote hers in Arabic. Thus, she is usually placed among the Arab women writers of al-Andalus. Her three extant poems show a considerable degree of sophistication. The first one is a reply to a short poem by Samuel ha-Nagid about a benefactor hurt by a beneficiary, which Qasmūna compares to the sun giving light to the moon and sometimes being eclipsed by it. It is said that, upon hearing this, her father declared her a better poet than he. Her two other poems are laments about her loneliness. In the first, she compares herself to a garden going to waste for lack of a gardener, while in the second, she establishes a parallel between herself and a deer in a garden. Critics believe that she was complaining about the lack of a husband. But Qasmūna sounds confined (like a deer in a garden in poem number two), in addition to being isolated (comparing herself to a garden without a gardener in poem number one). Perhaps she felt that, unlike the moon in her poem, she would never have an opportunity to truly eclipse the sun.

CRISTINA GONZÁLEZ

References and Further Reading

- Bellamy, James A. "Qasmūna the Poetess: Who Was She?" Journal of the American Oriental Society 103 (1983): 423–424.
- González, Cristina. "Qasmūna Bint Ismā'īl." In Medieval Iberia: An Encyclopedia, edited by E. Michel Gerli. New York: Routledge, 2003.
- Nichols, James Mansfield. "The Arabic Verses of Qasmūna Bint Ismā'īl ibn Bagdālah." International Journal of Middle East Studies 13 (1981): 155–158.

See also Iberia; Jewish Women; Muslim Women; Western Literature

QUEENS AND EMPRESSES, CONSORTS OF

Acting as a consort was a role typically played by the wives of kings in medieval Europe. Yet the existence of male consorts—husbands whose wives held territory by inheritance—offers an interesting study in medieval gender relations. What roles did these men play when their wives were their political equals or even superiors? Drawing evidence from a chronological and geographical range of examples reveals the negotiations that shaped these relationships.

One consideration was the extent to which husbands participated in the political authority wielded by their wives. Most commonly, king consorts wielded their military might in the defense of their wives' territories, since even queens who ruled in their own right did not customarily lead troops into battle. The marriage of Matilda of England and Geoffrey, count of Anjou (1113–1151), illustrates this well. A disputed succession allowed Matilda, the daughter of Henry I, to lay claim to the English throne in 1135. Although Henry had named Matilda his heir, her cousin Stephen was a rival claimant. At the time of her attempted accession she was married to Geoffrey of Anjou. When civil war between Matilda and Stephen erupted in 1135, Geoffrey's principal role became the defense of Matilda's Anglo-Norman territories. The demands of military campaigns on the continent limited Geoffrey's participation in English affairs and, by 1148, Matilda had effectively abandoned her claims to the English throne. Geoffrey, however, had successfully concentrated his military efforts on the region of Normandy, subduing much of it by 1144, when he claimed the title duke of Normandy for himself. Similarly, Ferdinand of Aragon (1452–1516) led the military campaigns against the Muslim kingdom of Granada that his wife, Isabel of Castile, was anxious to reclaim.

Ferdinand, however, also pushed the question of his authority in his wife's kingdom of Castile, demonstrating that, in some instances, king consorts shared their wives' sovereignty. Ferdinand and Isabel wed in 1469, and in 1474 Isabel inherited the throne of Castile from her half-brother, Enrique IV. Ferdinand (who would inherit the kingdom of Aragon from his father in 1479) immediately questioned his role in the royal marriage. Although at the time of their wedding the two had negotiated a set of marriage capitulations, they renegotiated this agreement into a novel power-sharing arrangement. Although Isabel retained some prerogatives as sovereign ruler of Castile, the two nonetheless jointly issued documents with Ferdinand's name coming first, but her coat of arms preceding his. Thus, although he held no legal claim to the territories of Castile, Isabel ruled jointly with Ferdinand.

The demands created by a marriage of two crowns, like Isabel and Ferdinand's, often created a de facto distribution of power. Margrethe I (1353–1412), daughter of King Waldemar IV of Denmark, married Hakon VI (1343–1380), king of Norway (and eventually Sweden), in 1363. She ruled as regent in Denmark for their son Olaf upon the death of her father in 1375. The unpopularity of Hakon's father, Magnus VII, had led him to cede his throne to Hakon. Thus, Hakon remained preoccupied by this kingdom, while Margrethe directed affairs in Denmark—circumstances that may have resulted from Denmark's unwillingness to allow the ruler of another kingdom to interfere in its administration. Yet after Hakon's death Margrethe would successfully unite the three Scandinavian crowns that Olaf inherited. Similarly, the marriage of Urraca (1082–1125/1126), queen of Castile-León, upon the death of her father Alfonso VI in 1109, to Alfonso of Aragon, was one in which Alfonso exerted very little influence on affairs in his wife's kingdom, confining himself to the protection of his realm.

Attempts to unite dynastic lines did not always end peacefully. When Joan I (1327–1381) inherited the throne from her grandfather, Robert the Wise, she was already married to Andreas of Hungary (son of Louis the Great of Hungary). The two had been married when she was seven and he was six. In 1344 Pope Clement VI crowned her queen of Naples. Thereafter, Andreas acted as her consort. Intrigue surrounded the marriage, however, and in 1345 Andreas was murdered. Joanna was linked to the plot to assassinate him but was never formally held accountable.

The existence of a king consort often raised the question of who would inherit the territory upon a wife's death. Typically, these negotiations favored the couple's children and disadvantaged the king consort. Matilda and Geoffrey, for example, secured from Stephen the agreement that the English throne would also pass to their son, Henry, upon Stephen's death. Isabel and Ferdinand agreed that if she died first Ferdinand could not inherit Castile; it would pass instead to their children.

As these examples demonstrate, various factors complicated the roles played by king consorts. Questions of military support, the division of labor in shared realms, and inheritance created unique gendered balances of power.

ELIZABETH A. LEHFELDT

References and Further Reading

- Chibnall, Marjorie. The Empress Matilda: Queen Consort, Queen Mother, and Lady of the English. Oxford: Blackwell, 1993.
- Duggan, Anne, ed. Queens and Queenship in Medieval Europe. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell Press, 1997.
- Liss, Peggy. Isabel the Queen: Life and Times. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.
- Parsons, John Carmi, ed. Medieval Queenship. Stroud, Gloucestershire: Alan Sutton, 1994.

Reilly, Bernard F. The Kingdom of León-Castilla under Queen Urraca, 1109–1126. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1982.

See also Isabel I; Joan I; Matilda the Empress; Queens and Empresses: The West; Urraca

QUEENS AND EMPRESSES: THE WEST

The study of medieval queens-consort involves features of political life that contemporaries saw no need to define. The idea of “queenship” itself is an anachronism to medieval understandings, and modern definitions risk anachronism. More medieval writers dealt with the reputations and actions of queens than with the idea of a queenly office. Queenly perquisites were treated not in general contexts of rank, but in specific contexts of the aspects of government or administration with which a queen came into periodic contact. Officials involved in such incidental encounters nailed down exact points at issue; they did not examine the full range of a queen’s prerogatives nor the activities they upheld. Churchmen wrote in particular situations to urge queens to behave properly, or to scold them for failing to do so. If anything like a general idea of “queenship” was raised, it was to catalogue behaviors befitting a king’s wife and the mother of his children. So defined, medieval queens did not require rationalization. They were necessary aspects of a political landscape characterized by hereditary male rulers.

Medieval writing about queens is, for the most part, then, episodic. It is nonetheless possible to identify themes common to the majority of such writings. One example is a manual of instruction Sancho IV of Castile (r. 1284–1294) wrote for his son: a king should choose his wife for her inner and outer virtues (the latter including height as well as beauty); as queen, she must pattern herself on heroines of Scripture and antiquity, remaining industrious, pious, and chaste, and working always to have the respect and affection of husband, children, and other people. However conceived and expressed, these themes are constant in medieval writings to, for, or about queens. Chroniclers who praised or criticized queens routinely resorted to comparisons with the good and bad queens of history. Secular history could offer Clothilda and Balthild (both canonized) and Messalina and Agrippina (both vilified); Scripture provided Esther and the Virgin Mary in contrast to Jezebel and Athaliah. On one hand, perceptions created by such comparisons afforded monarchy a dramatic element it otherwise lacked. On the other, for postmedieval readers, the resort to such typologies obscured understandings of medieval queens’ real agendas, motives, and strategies.

Empresses

The Roman empress’s place was a known quantity, but not an automatic consequence of marriage. The title Augusta was specifically conferred; not all emperors’ wives received it, and even if so honored, they remained subject to the laws. Informal avenues of influence were available, but between the Julio-Claudian period and the Christianization of the empire, few imperial consorts emerged as prominent or powerful women. Christianity, the arrival of new peoples in the empire, and crises in imperial power opened new paths for the wives of Roman rulers. The lives of Galla Placidia and the empresses of the Theodosian house witness to the prominence of late Western and early Byzantine imperial women and the means by which they attained power. But the resources and powers of kings’ wives in the new Western kingdoms were undefined. These peoples arrived in the empire without political ideas as developed as those of Rome; most of them had traditions of powerful women, but their customs did not encompass well-defined ideals of kingship, let alone of queenship. What reasoned discussion was given to early medieval queenship in Europe rested on Christian traditions and practices, but the Church could prescribe only standards of conduct appropriate to any Christian wife. Then and for centuries, queenship was a uncertain quantity, dependent upon what individual women could make of the circumstances in which they found themselves and of the resources, human and material, that they could effectively claim.

The Early Middle Ages

Medieval queens’ positions in society and government evolved not in a matrix of established legal or administrative procedures, as in the Roman Empire, but within the traditions of a society based upon marriage and family and dominated by lineage politics, within which considerations of family were bound to dominate. Unlike Roman empresses, queens acquired their rank upon marriage, but marriage did not guarantee a successful life as queen. Early medieval society knew stable customs of neither royal succession nor marriage. A childless queen, or one whose marriage had proven a political disadvantage, labored under the threat of repudiation.

Even if a king was not deposed or murdered by competitors, rival claimants were a threat when he died, especially if his son was a child, if succession customs favored kinsmen over direct descendants, or if the succession was not limited to a single lineage. Meddling by a widowed queen and her cohort on behalf of her son could lead to civil war. Practices adopted to impede royal women's participation in such struggles reveal the extent to which they were rooted in family contexts, the power they might secure therein, and a perceived need to limit their interventions.

Medieval queens obtained their position at marriage, but like Roman empresses, they did not acquire sovereign status. They were personages of honor who shared their husbands' rank, but they wielded royal authority only occasionally and temporarily, as their husbands' deputies or, after their husbands' deaths, as regents for young sons. No royal wife or widow who assumed that authority in her own right, and was recognized as sovereign, was known in the medieval West. In the early Middle Ages, when Western kings were not invariably succeeded by sons or near kinsmen, some royal widows married their husbands' successors. Godeswinth, widow of King Athanagild of the Visigoths (r. 551–567) in the Iberian peninsula, wed his successor Leovigild; Aelfifu-Emma (d. 1052), the Norman widow of Aethelred II of England (r. 979–1013 and 1014–1016), married his successor, the invader Canute of Denmark (r. 1016–1035). Such marriages helped stabilize the new king's position and made the queen a peacemaker between her husbands' families and supporters. In that sense such a second marriage could enhance her influence while continuing her wonted eminence and wealth, but it did not raise her to full sovereignty.

The eminence of late Roman empresses perhaps influenced the position of early medieval queens in the West. Many Visigothic consorts in the Iberian peninsula are unknown by name, but those who are known shared their husband's titles; in 589, Reccared I's wife Baddo subscribed canons of the Third Council of Toledo as gloriosa, echoing his gloriosus, from the late imperial epithet gloriosissimus, witnessing her eminence as well as the seemliness of her approval. But the Visigoths often killed their kings, who were rarely succeeded by family members. If nonhereditary royal succession left any king's wife vulnerable, however, her place as wife and mother could suggest that her presence might stabilize an insecure situation. King Athanagild hoped to make the throne hereditary for his issue and so gave his wife Godeswinth a queenly title and enhanced her role in royal ceremony.

But the effort came to nothing, and when coronation became established usage for Visigothic kings in the seventh century, their consorts were not included. Visigothic queens became subjects of consistent legislation, but laws concerning them neither protected them nor guaranteed honor and respect. Rather, the laws limited queens' potential in politics: Visigothic royal widows had to take the veil to prevent them from interfering in succession politics.

In Merovingian Frankish lands, kings and queens were uncrowned. What prestige Frankish queens held came primarily from religious roles, most familiarly in the case of Clotilda (d. 544), Clovis I's Christian wife, who won him to the faith in 497. Merovingian widows were not forced to take the veil, but the monastic life appealed to a number of them. Balthild, a slave, attracted King Clovis II (d. 657), who married her c. 648. When he died, Balthild became regent for their son, Clothar III; she was deposed c. 665, founded a convent at Chelles, and died as its revered abbess c. 680.

Other Merovingian queens' political roles were shaped by the interests of sons or grandsons. The widowed Clotilda was asked by her surviving sons to choose which sons of their deceased brother should die and which should become monks, so the survivors could share their brother's domains.

The best-known Merovingian queens were Brunhild (d. 613), daughter of Athanagild and Godeswinth, wife and widow of Sigibert I (d. 575), and her bitter rival, Fredegund (d. 597). Brunhild's sister, Galswinth, married Sigibert's brother Chilperic I (d. 584), who soon killed her to marry Fredegund, his concubine. Enmity between the two queens and their families lasted three decades, until Fredegund's son Clothar II (d. 528) put Brunhild to death.

Queens in Anglo-Saxon England had a notable role in the age of conversions. The Merovingian Bertha, wife of King Aethelberht of Kent (d. 616), followed the example of her ancestor Clothilda, welcoming the Roman mission to England in 597 and bringing her husband to the faith. Their daughter Aethelburh married King Edwin of Northumbria (d. 633) and repeated Bertha's success there. Two daughters of King Anna of East Anglia (d. 653/654) married kings elsewhere in England. Aethelthryth was divorced by both husbands after persuading them that she preferred to remain a virgin and eventually became abbess of Ely, while her sister Seaxberga took the veil after her Kentish husband died and followed Aethelthryth as abbess at Ely. In eighth-century Mercia, King Offa (d. 796) exalted his wife Cynethryth as he sought to found a dynasty, and hoped to marry his son Ecgrith to one of Charlemagne's daughters. But Ecgrith died unmarried; Offa's line ended with him. In contrast, ninth- and early-tenth-century kings of Anglo-Saxon England from the house of Wessex kept their wives out of public life by denying them a royal title or a throne. King Aethelwulf (d. 858) was deposed partly because he let his second wife, the Carolingian Judith, be crowned at their marriage on the Continent in 856. Only in 973 was an Anglo-Saxon consort crowned. Aelfthryth's elevation reflected King Edgar's preeminence in England, though their marriage was suspect because of incest prohibitions, as she and her first husband were Edgar's cousins.

Perhaps to deal with that situation, Aelfthryth aligned herself with the church reform under St. Dunstan and won his support for her coronation. Most of the later Anglo-Saxon queens were crowned; in the mid-eleventh century the rite was elaborated to state that the kingdom should be governed by the king's power and the queen's virtue alike.

The Queen in the Royal Household

Several factors allowed queens in some early medieval kingdoms to overcome the limits placed on them. A king's wife naturally managed his palace, its personnel, and its resources. As royal governments evolved, the great men of the king's household were also the chief officials of the kingdom. As she worked regularly with these men, a queen forged valuable relationships.

Kings often chose ministers from their relatives, and queens worked to place relatives or servants in royal service. As mistress of the king's household, his wife also managed his treasure. Judicious use of that wealth could win supporters to a queen's side. Her position as a warlord's wife also made her a kind of adoptive mother to the fighting men in his household. She dispensed rewards to these men, honoring an often fiercely guarded hierarchy among them as she associated herself with the king's gratitude to them. Finally, as the king's advisors included bishops and abbots, a queen could develop relationships with them, strengthened by gifts of land or gold to religious houses, or, as in Aelfthryth's case, by support of religious reform. All these activities were proper to a queen; by wisely deploying such expedients, she could strengthen a perhaps otherwise uncertain position.

But the same activities could elicit verdicts pro or con. Too much interest in royal treasure could be depicted as greed, and familiarity with royal ministers was dangerous; Fredegund was twice accused of illicit liaisons with officials. As regent, Balthild involved herself in a disputed election to the see of Lyon; when a friend of Bishop Wilfrid was killed during the dispute, one English chronicler dubbed Balthild a Jezebel. Aelfthryth, in contrast, managed to have herself crowned as well as made protectress of all English female monasteries. Royal wives trod fine lines, and their conduct demanded an acute sense of time and place. Not all were successful.

Transitions

In 751, Bertha, wife of Pepin the Short and mother of Charlemagne, became the first Frankish queen to be crowned. This was most probably done to underline definitively the change of dynasty in that year, to emphasize that Pepin's descendants had replaced the Merovingians. Bertha's formal investiture thus suggested avoidance of succession disputes by limiting throneworthiness to the children of an anointed queen. After Pepin's death in 768 Bertha played a major role in maintaining peaceful relations between her sons, Carloman (d. 771) and Charles, who, following Merovingian practice, divided the Frankish realm. Bertha's coronation did not, however, establish an immediate precedent. None of Charlemagne's wives was crowned, nor were Carolingian queens regularly crowned until well into the ninth century.

As time progressed, the Church's marriage doctrine came to reinforce the positions of threatened consorts. The faith offered queens many advantages, but they had to be weighed against the disadvantages of unstable succession. Since the Church wrote and prepared the coronation orders, it was perhaps the churchmen's liking for orderly hereditary succession, possibly based on Old Testament lineages, that helped consolidate queens' positions as dynastic mothers and as models of indissoluble Christian marriage. Certainly queens' association with Church reform and the monastic orders afforded them renewed influence and security.

Neither marriage nor coronation immediately altered casual marriage practices in these centuries that allowed powerful men to divorce or repudiate wives with relative ease. A queen who failed to bear a viable son lived with the possibility, if not the likelihood, of repudiation, as did those whose marriages brought their husbands no political advantage. A year after Charlemagne took his first wife, daughter of the Lombard king in Italy, he repudiated her as unable to bear children. An equally likely reason was that he was about to invade her father's kingdom and needed allies along the route to Italy, so he quickly married a well-connected Swabian girl. Such maneuvers were not always so easy. Charlemagne's grandson Lothar II, trying to rid himself of a noble but childless consort to marry a fertile concubine, resorted to lurid accusations of sorcery and incest against his wife Theutberga; after nine years, the case remained unresolved when Lothar died in 869. Theutberga managed to sustain her cause with the help of her birth family, as well as that of Lothar's relatives.

In the eleventh century, Emperor Henry II's childless wife, Cunegunde of Luxemburg (d. 1033), could rely on her powerful family to keep her at Henry's side. In England, Edward the Confessor briefly repudiated the childless Edith (d. 1075) in 1051, when he momentarily escaped the political yoke of her father and brothers; but they soon reinstated themselves and forced Edward to restore Edith.

Cunegunde and Edith benefited from a trope of growing importance to childless queens: the chaste marriage. Neither marriage was, in fact, chaste; few queens would willingly give up the privilege of bearing a royal heir. In fourteenth-century Sicily, popular rumor blamed the extreme Franciscan piety of Queen Sancia (d. 1345) for her childlessness. Sancia's case probably exemplifies the reactions, pro or con, that could be read into aspects of a queen's behavior, in this case her pious observances. Cunegunde and Henry II proclaimed their hopes for children in at least one charter, and Edith advertised herself as Edward's bedfellow in one of hers.

Edith excused her childlessness by inventing a chaste marriage for herself and Edward after his death, in a Life of King Edward she authorized and directed. The legend arose for Cunegunde and Henry II during the growth of cults that led to their canonizations: the couple had linked themselves so closely with Church reform that the reforming canons of a 1005 synod were issued in both their names, and founded the see of Bamberg where Cunegunde's cult was centered. Both women were also the targets of adultery accusations, Edith in her own day and Cunegunde posthumously. In the latter case, the legendary allegation provided the basis for miraculous proof of Cunegunde's innocence. But the chaste marriage was a tool that could cut both ways: in the ninth century, Emperor Charles the Fat divorced his second empress, Richardis, claiming that their marriage was unconsummated and that she had committed adultery with a bishop.

The High Middle Ages

Unlike Roman empresses, medieval queens-consort acquired their rank upon marriage or their husbands' accessions. Formal conferral of the queenly title was unknown in the medieval West. Coronation remained for centuries a requisite constitutive act for kings, but for queens the rite was performed only after marriage and affirmed its consequences, with the implied function of designating her the king's lawful consort, who alone could bear his lawful heirs. In fact, many queens in medieval Europe were uncrowned but enjoyed the prerogatives of their rank from the time of marriage. Queens in Spain were rarely crowned; in France, they were invested less and less regularly as the Middle Ages drew on. Yet Castilian and Aragonese queens exercised considerable political influence; and, in France, the king's widow, crowned or not, had a strong claim to act as regent for her son.

Arguments produced in France to justify a widowed queen's right to the regency are the most valuable single body of medieval commentary on the queen's position. These discussions make it clear that the queen's maternity assured her a place in the interests of both family and kingship, which were not readily disentangled when power was seen as patrimony.

The Queen's Coronation Rite

The queen's coronation rite offers a blueprint for queenly practices. In its final form, the rite derived from common sources and was similar, though not identical, in all realms that practiced it. It unfolded in successive stages. A first blessing asked God to make the queen fruitful like the patriarchal wives of the Old Testament, stressing her role in perpetuating an elect lineage. Before the altar, she prostrated herself and then knelt for anointing on head and breast, with holy oil if crowned with the king or with chrism if crowned alone. In imagery redolent of the marriage rite, she then received a ring in token of faith; whether the ring was blessed then or previously, the blessing used was that for the rings of nuns. A prayer naming Esther impressed upon her the duty to entreat and counsel the king.

The celebrant then placed a crown on her head for earthly glory, admonishing her that as she now shone with gold and jewels, she must look within for the gold of chastity and the pearls of virtue and wisdom. Finally she was given a scepter, or two, again depending on whether she was crowned alone or with the king. In England, the conferral of the scepter was at first followed, later accompanied, by a prayer that God would strengthen her to order her office aright; in France, formulae added in the fourteenth century more specifically addressed the scepters' significance. The rite thus successively named the queen's fertility, faith, eminence, and counsel. Her worldly rank was addressed at the moment of crowning, but the next exhortation emphasized her womanly need to strive for chastity, virtue, and wisdom. Her lesser status was underlined by her anointing on head and breast, not on the hands. The final prayer used in England further accented her particular reliance as a woman on divine favor to fortify her.

The themes of the coronation, family, piety, eminence, and counsel marked the parameters within which a queen's agendas and strategies took shape.

But as with endeavors noted earlier, these points could summon reactions pro or con. Coronation introduced new wrinkles as it legitimized delicate areas such as counsel. No one could dispute that the Biblical model of Esther sanctioned a queen's mediation and counsel. But at what point did her attempts to guide the king become domination? A queen must still conduct herself with prudence in her relations with the male ruler. A show of humility in persuading him to modify a harsh decision could deflect suspicions that she was seeking to dominate him. Careful displays of piety might divert criticism of her behavior in other areas. Possibilities for effective action were many, but pitfalls were just as numerous.

The Queen's Role in the Royal Family

Family was a strong base of power for medieval women that rarely faltered; the real guarantor of a woman's security was her place in an established family. It is often said to have been a drawback that women in the medieval West never belonged fully to a birth lineage or to that into which they married, but in fact this allowed them considerable space to maneuver. For a woman wed for political or diplomatic reasons, the capacity to act as peaceweaver or liaison between two powerful lineages could be an important base of influence. Women likewise were not constrained to focus exclusively on their sons, however valuable they might be; queens also emerged as the natural educators and protectors of their daughters, whose careers as diplomatic brides could be shaped by their mothers before and after marriage, much to their fathers' profit. But as the Middle Ages drew on, and kings frequently took wives from increasingly distant kingdoms, distance often impeded queens as liaisons with their homelands. Alphonso X of Castile (r. 1252–1284) was in political difficulties for the last decade of his reign, and his sister Eleanor (d. 1290), wife of Edward I of England (r. 1272–1307), could not rely on his support had she needed it. She instead cultivated networks in England, though again she did so through her family, arranging many marriages for female cousins with English barons.

Diplomatic marriages were a treacherous process that could easily come to grief. Negotiations were often protracted if the marriage was to end a war or resolve competing claims. Among the most famous depictions of the process is Shakespeare's portrayal of Henry V of England (r. 1416–1422) wooing Katherine of Valois (d. 1437) even as his army devastates France. The ramifications go beyond Katharine charmingly learning English through obscene bilingual puns. Her older sister Isabelle had wed Richard II of England, who was deposed by Henry V's father and later killed. The chronicler Froissart described the child Isabelle reciting at her mother's knee that she would marry Richard because "I shall be a great lady."

Perhaps that same thought consoled Katherine. Perhaps she hoped to act as peaceweaver, but Henry V's early death ended any possibility of that. Some women fought to become queens, like Edith-Matilda of Scotland (d. 1118), who had to prove she had never been a nun in order to marry Henry I of England (r. 1100–1135). Others refused outright. William the Conqueror's daughter Adelizia of Normandy was betrothed at least three times, but after the last project she either decided she had had enough or acted on a longstanding wish and took religious vows. Adelizia's many times grandniece, Isabella, the eldest daughter of Edward III of England, was also involved in many marriage projects, ending one of them by refusing to board the ship that was to carry her to her prospective husband.

Even the journey to a new husband's domains could be treacherous, as the bride passed emotionally and geographically from one male ruler's control to another's. Sermon exempla often used this liminal bridal journey as a setting for temptation or tribulation; the bride in one such story is raped by her own steward, whom she murders to conceal her shame. She is later driven by guilt to admit her crime to a bishop and must confess everything to her husband's courtiers. In many cases, the arrival of a foreign-born queen raised suspicions in her new kingdom; she might import crowds of foreigners and divert the king's wealth to their enrichment. In this sense she figured the kingdom's vulnerability to invasion. Small wonder that queens were made to shed their native dress and adopt clothing from their husband's domains.

Security and Insecurity

The strengthening of the Church's marriage teachings afforded queens a measure of security. In 1193 Ingeborg of Denmark (d. 1236) became the second wife of Philip II of France (r. 1170–1223), only to be repudiated the day after the wedding. For twenty years she tenaciously sustained her case against him and, in the end, he had to recognize her as his queen. On the other hand, the tightening of marriage doctrine and the evolution of stable hereditary succession sharply increased societal focus on adultery—the background to the rumors about Cunegunde and Edith and to tales of fictional queens like Guinevere and Isolde. Adultery, of course, could involve either partner, and once wed, queens often had to accept royal mistresses.

This was not unusual in arranged marriages; husband and wife often met only days before they wed, and not all kings honored marriage vows. Respect, not love, was the norm. The queen's strength lay in the chastity that assured her legitimate maternity, in her role as counselor, and in the eminence that allowed her to construct impressions of her power. Perhaps she took comfort in the knowledge that a mistress might be only a passing fancy. It is untrue that Eleanor of Aquitaine resented Henry II's mistresses—his liaisons flourished after the birth of her last child in 1166, years she spent in Poitou and he in England. Since by then she had a quiverful of sons, it probably did not matter to her what Henry did behind her back.

Childbearing

The production of children was a paramount concern to the kingdom as well as to the royal couple. Healthy sons did not merely improve the queen's power base. They marked a step in an often torturous process by which she could be more closely identified with the interests of her husband's realm than with her homeland. Thereafter her chief care was understood to be the interests of her son, naturally regarded as those of his future subjects as well. Daughters promised future alliances and the births of grandchildren for the king. Childlessness led to rumors, not only of adultery. One countess of Flanders was said to have used contraceptive knowledge to limit her family, and the early deaths of all her children were ascribed to divine punishment. Marriage doctrine made it increasingly difficult for a king to dispose of an unwanted wife, but the last medieval queen of England, Katharine of Aragon (d. 1536), found that having the most powerful ruler in Europe as a nephew was not enough once her husband made up his mind to annul their marriage because her only surviving child was a daughter, Mary Tudor.

The childless queen might substitute other aspects of her position. Richard II of England's first wife, Anne of Bohemia (d. 1394), was celebrated for gracious intercession with her difficult spouse and became something of a mother to the kingdom; her early death was deeply lamented.

Queens showed much personal bravery in regularly facing the dangers of childbirth, sometimes in very difficult circumstances. The travel that was an essential component of medieval rulership made danger a commonplace; in 1271 Philip III of France (r. 1270–1285) lost his pregnant wife Isabella of Aragon when she fell from a horse near Cosenza; and in 1324 Marie of Luxemburg, second wife of Charles IV of France (r. 1322–1328), died in childbirth after a coach accident. Eleanor of Castile undertook long journeys while pregnant, famously bearing her last son in 1284 in a temporary shelter on the site of Caernarfon castle. Even more remarkable is the case of Margaret of Provence (d. 1297), wife of Louis IX of France (r. 1226–1270), who bore several children while on Crusade, one of them in circumstances of extreme personal danger to herself after Louis was taken prisoner at Damietta.

Raising Royal Children

Children posed problems because of potential rivalries within the family, as became obvious among the sons of Henry II of England and Eleanor of Aquitaine. But in the children's early years, the queen's role in their lives was paramount. She could develop political capital from all her children, not just her sons. But even here, in the last analysis, she was dependent on the king's will. Louis IX forbade Margaret of Provence to name officials to their children's households and usurped one of her functions by writing a manual of instruction for their daughter Isabelle. In contrast, Louis's brother-in-law, Henry III of England (r. 1216–1272), allowed his wife, Eleanor of Provence (d. 1291), full rein in educating their son Edward I.

But here too the phenomena of reactions pro and con often surfaced: Eleanor was accused of teaching Edward to favor her relatives rather than his own countrymen and future subjects.

Problems common to any family surfaced on a royal scale in a queen's need to deal equably with stepmothers and mothers-in-law, frequent sources of discord. A knowing queen could turn them to advantage by acting as a peacemaker. Edward I's second wife, Margaret of France (d. 1318), smoothed relations between her husband and stepson, later Edward II. In-law relations were more treacherous. Margaret of Provence suffered at the hands of Louis

IX's mother, Blanche of Castile (d. 1252), but created a favorable impression by weeping at Blanche's death, though she admitted she wept less for herself than for Louis's grief. Eleanor of Castile and Edward I's mother, Eleanor of Provence, cooperated over the younger woman's children. But in a notoriously less successful case, Margaret of Anjou (d. 1482) fatally exacerbated tensions between her husband, Henry VI (r. 1422–1461), and his kinsman Richard of York.

Royal Widows

Reference to mothers-in-law raises the matter of royal widows. Relatively uncommon by reason of the repeated dangers of childbirth, the rare dowager queen was a significant political figure. Many saw a king's mother as a more desirable mediator with him than his wife. In any event, a widowed queen must live in comfort suited to her rank; otherwise her birth family might demand that her son improve matters. Thus the question of royal dower was all-important, witnessed by the frequent damage this question did to marriage negotiations. There was, as well, the troubling matter of a royal widow's personal behavior. Clemence of Hungary (d. 1328), the young widow of Louis X of France (r. 1314–1316), was scolded by Pope John XXII for dressing immodestly before the men of her household. Henry V of England's widow Katherine of Valois romped scandalously with Edmund Beaufort; when it became clear she could not marry so powerful a nobleman, she quietly settled down—married or not—with an obscure squire named Owen Tudor.

The Queen's Image

A queen could do much to smooth over difficulties by displaying herself as a pious woman, a submissive wife, and a protector of the Church and its institutions. Personally distributing alms demonstrated humility and concern for her husband's poorest subjects. An interest in education was also a formidable weapon; founding colleges as well as new religious houses was a most laudable endeavor. But giving support to new orders, at the expense of established religious communities, could cost a queen the approval of the older communities; Eleanor of Castile aggressively promoted the Dominicans in England, an endeavor of which the Benedictine and Augustinian chroniclers of the day said nothing. On the other hand, her mother-in-law Eleanor of Provence supported the Franciscans just as devotedly, but won Benedictine praise when she chose to take the veil in a house of that order.

Over time, changes in the conduct of government brought about significant shifts in queens' position and the methods open to them. Earlier medieval queens very frequently witnessed royal charters that advertised them as influential members of royal councils. From the late eleventh century, a gradual secularization of society, particularly in the growth of professional male bureaucracies, limited or ended the queen's voice in the council chamber. The growing separation of royal administration from the king's household meant that control of royal treasure passed to male officials, while the great officers of the kingdom were no longer as integral a part of royal households as they had formerly been. The queen's management was now exercised in a more domestic venue. These developments clearly lessened queens' visibility in governance. Eleanor of Aquitaine was the last queen of England to witness royal charters; in France, her mother-in-law Adelaide of Maurienne (d. 1154) was the last queen to do so, during the reign of Louis VI (1108–1137). Queens now saw their influence shift from the council chamber to the bedchamber, an informal venue vulnerable to mistrust because of queens' potential ability as bedfellows to sway their husbands to their own ends. The queen's voice remained consequential but, beyond the legitimate control of male officialdom, it became worrisome and open to criticism. Learned writers and common people alike no longer authorized the queen's voice by appealing to the image of Esther, resplendent in royal raiment as she approached the king on his throne; the legitimizing image became that of the Virgin Mary's humility and loving maternal care. Much of the elaborate ritual surrounding queens within royal households in the later Middle Ages adopted and assimilated Marian imagery, further developing associations enunciated in the coronation rite that tacitly made her a link between the Davidic lineage and her husband's royal line.

Thus the queen's eminence remained an important tool for her, especially as the uses of royal ceremonial grew during the Middle Ages. Queens had an integral part in such splendid occasions, appearing with their husbands at tournaments or regal banquets, translations of saints' relics or the consecrations of cathedrals, on occasion taking their absent husbands' places at such events. A queen's traditional supervision of the splendor of the royal household still gave her a central role in planning such events, contributing personally to their significance and success in impressing royal power and magnificence upon observers. For the vast majority of medieval queens, eminence was supported by substantial incomes that allowed them to engage in patronage on a considerable scale, whether personal, religious, or artistic. Their activities embraced not only the creation of new art works or architectural splendor, but also the distribution of gifts of money, jewels, or clothing to their own servants and households as well as to visiting foreign dignitaries.

The personal ties established by such exchanges require consideration of the degree to which any queen could command the loyalty of supporters she might desperately need. Queens rarely could rely on tenurial links to summon help, but ties of personal loyalty were an adequate substitute.

Largesse required wealth, and queens had to keep a careful eye on income and expense. Clearly there were links here to queens' role as managers of royal households and treasure, but those links were subtly altered. Some queens helped determine successions by sending regalia to their husbands' successors. Empress Cunegonde did so after her husband's death, and a wily Hungarian dowager queen in the fourteenth century assured the succession of her infant son by having her loyal lady-in-waiting, Helene Kotaner, steal St. Stephen's crown from the royal treasury, with which the queen's servants were familiar. Loyalty to queens often involved women or was woven through them. Cunegonde raised a young female cousin at court; Eleanor of Castile kept many of her cousins in her household before they went to live with their English husbands. Those husbands, and the husbands of Eleanor's ladies-in-waiting, received grants of land at marriage and in many cases, places at court. No queen could afford to ignore such resources or the need to attend carefully to them.

At the end of a queen's life, burial and commemoration allowed her to continue to manifest royal presence, power, permanence, and stability. The choice of burial site, perhaps near the shrine of a revered saint, manifested the close ties between royal and divine power. The funeral, in the presence of massed nobility or courtiers, reinforced hierarchy and solidarity. Queens often ordered their tombs in their lifetimes, allowing their artistic patronage or influence to persist after death. The implied perpetuation of their renown provided models for later queens. Queens' posthumous commemorations were observed with great ceremony, demonstrating the exalted nature of royal power and its links to divine favor.

Conclusions

Chroniclers were often extremely harsh in their opinions of the women whose proximity to the centers of government left them open to suspicions of undue political or diplomatic influence. The lives of canonized queens are marked by the opposite tendency, to exaggerate virtue and devotion to the interests of the kingdom. The extent to which any queen could really exercise such leverage cannot, however, be accurately judged from narrative sources alone.

Such writings were susceptible to exaggeration, and their harsh words were often directed as much at the king as at their ostensible target, the queen.

Most chroniclers realized that it was safer to focus on the woman's perceived ambition or harshness than on the king's inability to resist a woman's prodding. By the same token, writers could present queens as vainglorious or impious so as to display kings' resistance to their wives' weaknesses. Studying individual careers helps to clarify the processes by which chroniclers shaped their writings, and builds up a helpful fund of case studies. But since each queen faced different circumstances it is inadvisable to generalize too freely from a single woman's experience. But certainly any queen who found herself coupled to a weak or stubborn husband was likely to face political trouble; the same could happen if the king was considered too strong or harsh.

If queens in the medieval West were accepted as necessary to existing political structures, their individual conduct was often less acceptable. Rank, wealth, motherhood, all depended on marriage to the king, and the resulting proximity to the male ruler caused much concern in many medieval kingdoms. The stabilization of marriage teachings came about just as bureaucratization began to constrict queens' visible role in the conduct of government, but insistence on husbands respecting wives and on wives as preachers to their husbands—especially important to royal couples thanks to the images of Queen Esther and the Virgin Mary—authorized the queen's counsel. However respected in theory, any of these factors could be turned against a queen. Excessive religious devotion could be blamed for a childless marriage. If she failed to manifest charitable sentiments by having others hand out her alms, she was seen as proud and haughty.

Distributing too much wealth was condemned as extravagance. Any of this could be true of any woman, but as the most highly visible of women, queens became lightning rods for criticism. And if a king were deemed unable to control his wife, people might wonder whether he could manage his kingdom.

The queen thus figured the kingdom itself as well as its vulnerability to outside influence. Perhaps more than anything, this conundrum embodies the extreme delicacy of the queen's position.

JOHN CARMİ PARSONS

References and Further Reading

Duggan, Anne, ed. Queens and Queenship in Medieval Europe. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell Press, 1997.

Earenfight, Theresa, ed. Queenship and Political Power in Medieval and Early Modern Spain. Aldershot: Ashgate, 2005.

Facinger, Marion F. "A Study of Medieval Queenship: Capetian France, 987–1237." Nebraska Studies in Medieval and Renaissance History 5 (1968): 1–48.

Howell, Margaret. Eleanor of Provence: Queenship in Thirteenth-Century England. Oxford: Blackwell, 1998.

Huneycutt, Lois M. Matilda of Scotland: A Study in Medieval Queenship. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell Press, 2003.

———. "Alianora Regina Anglorum: Eleanor of Aquitaine and Her Anglo-Norman Predecessors as Queens of England." In Eleanor of Aquitaine: Lord and Lady, edited by Bonnie Wheeler and John Carmi Parsons. The New Middle Ages; New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2002, pp. 115–132.

Jackson, Richard A., ed. Ordines Coronationis Franciae: Texts and Ordines for the Coronation of Frankish and French Kings and Queens in the Middle Ages. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1995–2000.

Laynesmith, J. "Constructing Queenship at Coventry: Pageantry and Politics at Margaret of Anjou's 'Secret Harbour.'" Fifteenth Century 3 (2003): 137–147.

Ormrod, W. M. "Monarchy, Martyrdom, and Masculinity: England in the Later Middle Ages." In Holiness and Masculinity in the Middle Ages, edited by P. H. Cullum and Katherine J. Lewis. University of Wales Press, 2004, pp. 174–191.

Parsons, John Carmi, ed. Medieval Queenship. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1993.

———. Eleanor of Castile: Queen and Society in Thirteenth-Century England. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1995.

Stafford, Pauline. Queens, Concubines, and Dowagers: The King's Wife in the Early Middle Ages. Athens, Ga.: University of Georgia Press, 1983.

———. Queen Emma and Queen Edith: Queenship and Women's Power in Eleventh-Century England. Oxford: Blackwell, 1997.

———. "Queens and Treasure in the Early Middle Ages." In Treasure in the Medieval West, edited by Elizabeth M. Tyler. York: York Medieval Press, 2000, pp. 61–82.

See also Adelheid; Aethelthryth of Ely; Almsgiving and Charity; Anne of Bohemia; Berenguela; Blanche of Castile; Brunhild and Fredegund; Burials and Tombs; Chastity and Chaste Marriage; Clotilda; Concubines; Constance of Sicily; Conversion, Religious; Diplomacy and Reconciliation; Divorce and Separation; Edith; Eleanor of Aquitaine; Empresses: Byzantium; Gender Ideologies; Household Management; Isabel I; Isabel of Aragon; Joan I; Jouarre and Chelles; Kottaner, Helene; Margaret of Anjou; Margaret of Scotland; Margrethe; Marriage, Christian; Mary of Hungary I; Mary of Hungary II; Matilda the Empress; Ottonian Royal Women; Patronage, Ecclesiastical; Queens and Empresses, Consorts of; Regents and Queen-Lieutenants; Sexuality: Extramarital Sex; Succession, Royal and Noble; Urraca; Widows; Woodville, Elizabeth

QUEER THEORY

Queer theory is a collection of methods and perspectives rather than a unified theory for approaching texts and cultures. To queer a text or a cultural representation is to expose the epistemological foundations that structure its interpretation of sexual relations, sometimes also revealing concealed homosexual and homoerotic content. Queer theory borrows its interpretive strategies from deconstruction, seeking to show that the heterosexual order depends on an assumed but suppressed homosexual order; the world can appear to be ordered along heterosexual lines only because other forms of sexuality can be excluded. But their very marginality imparts to those excluded forms a paradoxically foundational role in the creation and maintenance of sexual norms.

Queer theory militates against simple binarisms, such as "homosexual" and "heterosexual," and seeks to interrupt conventional patterns for organizing thought, texts, images, and cultures. Equally important is its movement away from fixed identities within the category of "homosexual" to concepts of gender performance and historically contingent identity that contradict biological or genetic explanations for sexual orientation. The claim that sexual identity is at most a discursive effect might be the most distinctive assumption of queer theory and the point at which queer theory diverges most sharply from other views of the history of sexuality and their essentialist assumptions. The goal of queer theory seems to be the endless deconstruction and destabilization of sexual identities, although it remains to be seen how this work, over the inevitable course of its institutionalization, will avoid accumulating its own history of stable and codified readings, guiding principles, and canonical texts (the work of Eve Kosofsky Sedgwick and Judith Butler, for example) and resisting the establishment and subversion of its own principles.

ALLEN J. FRANTZEN

References and Further Reading

Blasius, Mark, ed. Sexual Identities, Queer Politics. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 2001.

Butler, Judith. Gender Trouble: Feminism and the Subversion of Identity. New York: Routledge, 1990.

Doty, Alexander. Making Things Perfectly Queer. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1993.

Foucault, Michel. The History of Sexuality. Vol. 1, translated by Robert Hurley. New York: Vintage, 1980.

Sedgwick, Eve Kosofsky. Epistemology of the Closet. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1990.

See also Feminist Theories and Methodologies; Performance Theory; Psychoanalytic Theory; Sexuality: Female Same-Sex Relations; Sexuality: Male Same-Sex Relations; Sexuality, Regulation of

R

---

RADEGUND

Radegund (c. 520–587) was born a Germanic princess. Abducted by King Clothar of the Franks to be his queen, she eventually became a nun through a profession of faith, and founded the monastery of the Holy Cross at Poitiers. Radegund was well educated in Latin, rhetoric, the writings of the church Fathers, and the lives of female martyrs and saints. Royal status combined with literacy provided Radegund an advantage few early medieval women had. She could make her voice heard in domestic, political, and church affairs. A prolific writer, she authored an epic lament on the destruction of her Germanic homeland, The Thuringian War, an elegy on a cousin's murder, Letter to Artachis, and numerous letters to kings, emperors, and bishops advocating peace.

Her most influential letter is the Letter of Foundation, which Gregory of Tours includes in his History of the Franks. Written at the end of her life, the Letter explains her reasons for establishing a community for women and obtaining the Rule of Caesarius, the first rule written for religious women, for its governance. One of the Rule's requirements is that every member learn how to read and write. The Letter insists that the women's house maintain its standards for literacy as well as its reputation for doing good works. Even as early as the sixth century, the Church provided no accommodations for women to participate in its hierarchy of power and influence. Thus, in order to distance the monastery from unwanted Church interference, Radegund, authorized by her education, royal status, and religious role, claimed that the Rule of Caesarius exempted her house from ecclesiastical authority. The Letter appealed to powerful male friends, including kings, emperors, and bishops, to protect the monastery from outside threats, specifically the Church's attempts to seize its land and extensive possessions. In conclusion, Radegund implored her community of almost two hundred women to preserve the monastery of the Holy Cross as the caring and supportive community it was, and not to engage in quarrels that could destroy the house.

In 600, almost ten years after Radegund's death, her friend Venantius Fortunatus, bishop of Poitiers, wrote the Life of St. Radegund. Fortunatus focused on Radegund's ascetic practices, which became noticeable during her marriage to King Clothar. Though forced to wed him, Radegund refused to be his wife in either domestic or sexual terms. Instead, she devoted her life at court to performing acts of Christian charity, caring for the poor, bathing the sick, and releasing many of Clothar's prisoners. According to Fortunatus, Radegund fasted while presiding over royal feasts, wore a hair shirt under her regal robes, burned her body with a brass plate made in the image of the Cross, and tightly coiled iron chains around her neck and arms to engrave wounds into her body like those that Christ had suffered on the Cross. Fortunatus explains these self-infliction sufferings as Radegund's public intention to leave Clothar and marry Christ. Alarmed, Clothar agreed to donate the money and land with which Radegund founded the monastery of the Holy Cross.

A decade later, the nun Baudonivia, who grew up in Radegund's convent, wrote a different life of Radegund. Baudonivia's Life of St. Radegund commemorates a woman interested in national and church politics and in the active life of the monastery. Fortunatus and Baudonivia both emphasize Radegund's spousal relationship to Christ, yet Baudonivia also describes a woman who made decisions, developed friendships with other nuns, and encouraged interactions with pilgrims, especially through the practice of intercessory prayer, which Radegund considered a social responsibility of the monastery. Within the monastery, Radegund still held the title queen of the Franks, and Baudonivia explains Radegund's acquisitions of holy relics from Jerusalem and Constantinople as political achievements. Radegund's most significant relic was given by Emperor Justinian II of Byzantium, who sent a jeweled reliquary containing a piece of the cross on which Christ died. Baudonivia's Life ends with an account of Radegund's death and a celebration of her tomb, which quickly became known as a site for miraculous healings.

One further source for Radegund's life is an eleventh-century illustrated Life of Radegund based on the biographies by Fortunatus and Baudonivia. The scenes depict Radegund's enclosure, asceticism, and miracles. None of the illustrations record the self-infliction sufferings described by Fortunatus. Instead, the illustrations portray Radegund's healing of the sick, feeding and clothing of the poor, and performance of miracles through intercessory prayer. Five centuries after her death, these illustrations provide iconic reminders of Radegund's erudition, teaching, and endeavors for women.

JANE E. JEFFREY

References and Further Reading

- Carrasco, Magdalena Elizabeth. "Spirituality in Context: The Romanesque Illustrated Life of St. Radegund of Poitiers." Art Bulletin. 72.3 (1990): 414–436.
- Cherewatuk, Karen. "Radegund and Epistolary Tradition." In Dear Sister: Medieval Women and the Epistolary Genre, edited by Karen Cherewatuk and Ulrike Wiethaus. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1993, pp. 20–45.
- Fortunatus, Venantius, and Baudonivia. "De vita sanctae Radegundis libri duo," edited by Bruno Krusch. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores Rerum Merovingicarum, Vol. 2. Hanover: Impenesis Bibliopol: Hahniani, 1888, pp. 364–395.
- Gregory of Tours. The History of the Franks, translated by Lewis Thorpe. London: Penguin, 1974.
- Jeffrey, Jane E. "Radegund and the Letter of Foundation." In Women Writing Latin: From Roman Antiquity to Early Modern Europe, Vol. 2, edited by Laurie J. Churchill, Phyllis R. Brown, and Jane E. Jeffrey. New York: Routledge, 2002, pp. 11–13.
- McCarthy, Maria Caritas. The Rule of Nuns of St. Caesarius of Arles: A Translation with a Critical Introduction. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America Press, 1960.
- McNamara, Jo Ann, E. John Halborg, and E. Gordon Whatley, eds. and trans. Sainted Women of the Dark Ages. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1992.
- Radegund. "De excidio Thuringiae," "Ad Iustinum et Sophiam Augustos," and "Ad Artachin." In Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Auctores Antiquissimi, Berlin: Apud Weidmannos, 1881, Vol. 4, part 1, pp. 271–275.
- . "Exemplar Epistulae." In Gregory of Tours Historia Francorum, Book IX Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores Rerum Merovingiocartum.
- Thiébaux, Marcelle, trans. The Writings of Medieval Women: An Anthology. New York: Garland, 1994.
- Wehlau, Ruth. "Literal and Symbolic: The Language of Asceticism in Two Lives of Radegund." Florilegium 19 (2002): 75–89.
- Wemple, Suzanne F. Women in Frankish Society: Marriage and the Cloister, 500 to 900. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1981.
- Weston, Lisa. "Elegiac Desire and Female Community in Baudonivia's Life of Saint Radegund." In Same-Sex Love and Desire among Women in the Middle Ages, edited by Francesca Canadé Sautman and Pamela Sheingorn. New York: Palgrave, 2001, pp. 85–99.
- Wormald, Francis. "Some Illustrated Manuscripts of the Lives of the Saints." Bulletin of the John Rylands Library 35 (1952): 248–266.

See also Art, Representations of Women in; Asceticism; Bride of Christ: Imagery; Frankish Lands; Letter Writing; Literacy and Reading; Latin; Monastic Enclosure; Monastic Rules; Relics and Reliquaries; Virginity; Women Authors: Latin Texts

RAPE AND RAPTUS

Literary, hagiographic, and iconographic representations of threatened and actual rape and raptus (abduction) populated the cultural landscape of medieval Europe. Literary motifs, such as the rape of Lucretia, conveyed the idea that sexual violation of women could undermine the very foundations of the social and political order. Other classical accounts circulating in the Middle Ages, such as the raptus of Helen of Troy, stressed the devastating consequences of the theft of women for an entire civilization. Mirroring values of kinship, the underlying gender ideology extolled the possession of women's bodies and saw sexual violation and subtraction of women as unsettling acts that primarily damaged women's kin. Rape and raptus threatened a woman's sexual purity, which was maintained through her virginity and chastity, to guard the purity of blood within the lineage. Significantly, hagiographic accounts of female saints threatened by rape tended to present virginity as the source of female holiness and to stress the physical, rather than exclusively spiritual, nature of their sanctity. In so doing, they reminded the lay audience that the absence of consent did not save the woman (not even a saint) from the shame cast by sexual violation. In addition to blemishing the woman, rape tainted her family honor and decreased her marriage opportunities. Sometimes, instances of rape were followed by marriage between the rapist and the raped woman, one of the possible ways to restore lost honor, however perverse to modern sensibilities.

Throughout the Middle Ages, the notion of rape was intertwined with that of raptus, a category derived from Roman law and primarily meaning abduction, although with a sexual connotation as well, so it could be translated as “ravishment.” Abduction could also have a marital purpose. In fact, it was a marital strategy in use among the early medieval Germanic populations and still appears to have been in use among the feudal nobility in the fifteenth century.

The rise of centralized institutions in the eleventh and twelfth centuries marked a turning point in the criminalization of rape and abduction, when monarchs and city-states issued legislation aimed at these behaviors. Against the backdrop of the variety of customary norms, two distinct patterns can be identified, one within the legal system of civil law (ius commune) and the other within common law.

In civil law, the legal system in use in a large part of continental Europe, laws on rape and abduction developed separately. For the definition of rape, civil law revived the Roman notion of stuprum, which meant shame, dishonor, and defilement. The doctrine of civil law defined stuprum as the sexual violation of virgins, widows, or other honest women. Stuprum, however, contains a fundamental ambiguity from a modern perspective, being at the same time a crime of violence and one of shame. Such ambiguity is particularly evident in the case of the stuprum of virgins, which referred both to forced sex and to illicit defloration of a consenting virgin. Evidently, the essence of the crime rested in the offense against the woman’s honor, of which she was merely a guardian and not the owner. Under civil law, virgin women of honest reputation were protected. For example, in doubtful situations, when the alleged deflowerer/rapist asserted that the woman had not been a virgin, hence he did not deflower her, the court presumed the woman was telling the truth. The penalties for stuprum ranged from the death penalty for the most serious instances to the imposition of marriage or the payment of the dowry. Of course, the seriousness of the penalty varied according to the social standing of those involved in the crime.

The notion of raptus was also revived from Roman law, in which it meant primarily abduction. In civil law, raptus came to refer to the violent abduction of an honest woman and had a sexual connotation. Like stuprum, raptus also contained a fundamental ambiguity, since it referred to the abduction of a woman either without or with her consent. In the latter instance, since the woman was considered her family’s property, the violence was understood to be against her family. Underlying the criminalization of abduction was the concern for marital unions that might jeopardize a family’s status and wealth.

In England, the criminalization of rape and abduction developed differently from continental Europe. After the Norman Conquest, the notion of raptus became intertwined with the notion of rape. In the early stages of the development of common law, the term raptus designated forcible intercourse. Rape was a felony and was theoretically punishable by death or “loss of member.” The victim had to raise the hue, show her torn clothes and her bleeding before the sheriff and the county court, and lastly repeat the accusation against the rapist before the court of the “justices in eyre” (literally “justices on journey,” that is, itinerant justices who were invested with the authority of the king) and the jury. In a case from the Berkshire Eyre of 1248, studied by John Marshall Carter, the victim, Margery daughter of Emma de la Hulle, reported that Nicholas son of Geoffrey of Whatcomb “raped her virginity against the King’s peace and she offers to prove this against him as the court sees fit.” The rape of virgins was a particularly serious offense, but the definition of the crime was not limited to this instance.

The law of raptus evolved in the direction of including incidents of abduction and elopement, so that the terms raptus and ravishment (from the Anglo-Norman ravyssment) could refer to rape, abduction, or elopement unless specified by circumstantial information. The extension of the legal category raptus to include abduction reflected the concern, on the part of public authorities, for the abduction of heirs and heiresses (ravishment of ward). Not uncommon was the abduction of wealthy widows, as was the case of Lady Maud de Clifford, studied by Andy King. While traveling through Yorkshire in November 1395, Lady Maud de Clifford was abducted by Jack le Irish and his gang. Her abductor’s probable intent was to ascend the social ladder through a socially and financially advantageous marriage.

Over time, the law of raptus developed to the detriment of the raped woman. The Crown focused on issues of social order and property more than the plight of the raped woman. Common law was explicitly oriented toward the regulation of issues of property, which explains why the category raptus, with its emphasis on the “theft” of women and property, instead of stuprum, with its emphasis on the woman’s and her kin’s honor, was assimilated by English medieval law.

The criminalization of rape and abduction were strategies in the hands of central institutions, aimed at maintaining social stability and control over abduction-based marital practices that might jeopardize the best family plans. The reason for the distinct developments in common and civil law may be associated with the different degrees of strength asserted by state power. In England, where the monarchy was strong, the notion of abduction was incorporated into the much more ignominious crime of rape, probably because of the threat that abduction posed to social stability and transmission of property. By way of contrast, rape and abduction remained distinct crimes in continental Europe, where lineages maintained strong power to the detriment of central institutions and, especially in southern Europe, values of family honor persisted more tenaciously.

VALENTINA CESCO

References and Further Reading

- Benveniste, Henriette. “Les enlèvements: stratégies matrimoniales, discours juridique et discours politique en France à la fin du Moyen Âge.” Revue Historique 283:1 (1990): 13–35.
- Brundage, James A. Law, Sex, and Christian Society in Medieval Europe. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1987.
- Carter, John Marshall. Rape in Medieval England: An Historical and Sociological Study. Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 1985.
- Casey, James. The History of the Family. Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1989.
- Gravdal, Kathryn. Ravishing Maidens: Writing Rape in Medieval French Literature and Law. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1991.
- Higgins, Lynn A., and Brenda R. Silver, eds. Rape and Representation. New York: Columbia University Press, 1991.
- Kalifa, Simon. “Singularités matrimoniales chez les anciens Germains: le rapt et le droit de la femme à disposer d’elle-même.” Revue historique de droit français et étranger 48 (1970): 199–225.
- King, Andy. “Jack le Irish and the Abduction of Lady Clifford, November 1315: the Heiress and the Irishman.” Northern History 38 (2001): 187–195.
- Laiou, Angeliki E., ed. Consent and Coercion to Sex and Marriage in Ancient and Medieval Societies. Washington, D.C.: Dumbarton Oaks, 1993.
- Massetto, Gian Paolo. “Ratto (diritto intermedio).” In Enciclopedia del diritto, Vol. 38. Varese: Giuffrè, 1987, pp. 725–743.
- Menuge, Noël James, ed. Medieval Women and the Law. Woodbridge: The Boydell Press, 2000.
- Post, J. B. “Sir Thomas West and the Statutes of Rapes, 1382.” Bulletin of the Institute of Historical Research 53 (1980): 24–30.
- Ribordy, Geneviève. “Mariage aristocratique et doctrine ecclésiastique: le témoignage du rapt au Parlement de Paris pendant la guerre de Cent ans.” Crime, Histoire & Sociétés/Crime, History & Societies 1:2 (1998): 29–48.
- Roberts, Anna, ed. Violence against Women in Medieval Texts. Gainesville, Fla.: University Press of Florida, 1998.
- Robertson, Elizabeth, and Christine M. Rose. Representing Rape in Medieval and Early Modern Literature. New York: Palgrave, 2001.
- Rosoni, Isabella. “Violenza (diritto intermedio).” In Enciclopedia del diritto, Vol. 46. Varese: Giuffrè, 1987, pp. 843–856.
- Ruggiero, Guido. The Boundaries of Eros: Sex, Crime, and Sexuality in Renaissance Venice. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1985.
- Saunders, Corinne. Rape and Ravishment in the Literature of Medieval England. Cambridge: D. S. Brewer, 2001.
- Wolfthal, Diane. Images of Rape: The “Heroic” Tradition and Its Alternatives. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1999.

See also Honor and Reputation; Law; Marriage, Christian; Virginity

READER-RESPONSE CRITICISM

Reader-response criticism is a general term that has been used to describe a variety of contemporary approaches to literary works that focus on the relationship between texts and their readers; an alternate term is reception theory. In an attempt to expand the limits of “new criticism,” which analyzed only the literary object itself, critics such as Jaus and Iser in Germany, Poulet in France, and Prince in the United States began to study the strategies by which texts address their readers and to theorize about the reception of literary works by the public. Suleiman and Crosman have divided these different approaches into six categories: rhetorical; semiotic and structuralist; phenomenological; psychoanalytic and subjective; sociological and historical; and hermeneutic.

The majority of studies have focused on modern and contemporary literature, but critics such as Jaus demonstrated, from the 1970s, the usefulness of reader-response and reception theory for medieval literature. Medieval scholars have always paid attention to problems of audience, patronage, and modes of transmission. The notions of implied readers and audiences, among other concepts, became readily incorporated into medieval literary criticism.

The first studies of “reception” or “reader-response” theory did not specifically raise questions of gender, either in contemporary or in premodern literature. However, key studies, such as those by Fetterly and Radway, demonstrated that historical women readers may react differently to literary texts or that certain genres, written by men or women, may respond explicitly to the desires and ideals of women audiences. Fetterly's "resisting reader"—who attempts to resist her appropriation within male discourse—is one of the critical concepts that feminist medieval scholars have adapted and modified within medieval historical and literary contexts.

In the past twenty years, a number of studies have explored, first, the roles of readers and audiences in the creation, transmission, and reception of medieval literary and textual performances, and second, the ways that the different genres of medieval literature represent, engender, or problematize masculine and feminine roles in their readers. In a textual tradition where male authors, narrators, and scribes far outnumber explicitly signed female writers, consideration of female literacy, female patronage, and women readers has allowed critics and historians to reevaluate the critical role played by women as participants in and creators of medieval literary culture.

ROBERTA L. KRUEGER

References and Further Reading

- Bartlett, Anne Clark. Male Authors, Female Readers: Representation and Subjectivity in Middle English Devotional Literature. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1995.
- Iser, Wolfgang. The Act of Reading: A Theory of Aesthetic Response. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1978.
- Jauss, Hans-Robert. "The Alterity and Modernity of Medieval Literature." New Literary History 10 (1979): 181–229.
- Krueger, Roberta L. Women Readers and the Ideology of Gender in Old French Verse Romance. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- Poulet, George. "The Phenomenology of Reading." New Literary History 1 (1969): 53–68.
- Prince, Gerald. "Introduction à l'étude du narrataire." Poétique: revue de théorie et d'analyse littéraires 14 (1973): 178–196.
- . "Introduction to the Study of the Narratee." In Reader-Response Criticism: From Formalism to Post-Structuralism, edited by Jane P. Tompkins. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1980, pp. 7–25.
- Rabinowitz, Peter J. Before Reading: Narrative Conventions and the Politics of Interpretation. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1987.
- Radway, Janice. Reading the Romance: Women, Patriarchy, and Popular Literature. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1984.
- Robertson, Elizabeth Ann. Early English Devotional Prose and the Female Audience. Knoxville, Tenn.: University of Tennessee Press, 1990.
- Schibanoff, Susan. "Taking the Gold Out of Egypt: The Art of Reading as a Woman." In Gender and Reading: Essays on Readers, Texts, and Contexts, edited by Elizabeth A. Flynn and Patrocínio P. Schweickart. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1986, pp. 83–106.
- Smith, Lesley, and Jane H. M. Taylor, eds. Women, the Book, and the Worldly. Cambridge: Brewer, 1995.
- Sturges, Robert. Medieval Interpretation: Models of Reading in Literary Narrative 1100–1500. Carbondale, Ill.: Southern Illinois University Press, 1990.
- Suleiman, Susan, and Inge Crosman, eds. The Reader in the Text: Essays on Audience and Interpretation. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1980.

See also Audience, Women in the; Femininity and Masculinity; Gender Ideologies; Literacy and Reading; Vernacular; Patronage, Literary

RECORDS, ECCLESIASTICAL

Medieval secular society before the fourteenth century, especially outside Italy, is known primarily from ecclesiastical records. That is, most of the sources from which scholars now determine family structure, the relations between men and women or between different social groups, the nature of authority, even economic organization, were produced by and preserved by churches. These records most commonly recount a transaction between a monastery and a well-to-do layman or laywoman, typically a gift to monks, but also sometimes a sale or exchange of property or the settlement of a quarrel. Because such a document might later be produced as proof that a transaction really had taken place, and because the monks themselves used these documents to inventory their holdings, it was important to preserve them.

Early Records

In late antiquity (the fifth through seventh centuries), in contrast to most of the Middle Ages, written documents were very common. In that period notaries scrawled notes on slips of papyrus to record all sorts of transactions between ordinary people, from wills to sales to the formal declaration that a child had become an adult. Monasteries seem to have let the notaries keep the documents spelling out pious gifts to the monks. But in the late seventh and eighth centuries, as much of late Roman urban civilization collapsed and parchment increasingly replaced papyrus as the preferred writing medium, the use of documents to record transactions between laypeople became increasingly rare, and monasteries began keeping their charters in their own archives.

Polyptyques

During the ninth century the first efforts were made to organize these charters and the property holdings spelled out in them. Some monasteries drew up polyptyques, that is, censuses of their property and the various dues owed by their tenants. Although only a few polyptyques survive essentially intact, most notably those of St.-Germain-des-Prés, St.-Remi of Reims, St.-Bertin, and Montier-en-Der, there are enough fragments of others, as well as Charlemagne's famous admonition that his royal estates draw up such accountings, to suggest that they were fairly common.

These polyptyques were generally organized geographically, with the holdings and required dues of each village or area spelled out separately. Sometimes, as at Montier-en-Der, there is a fair amount of overlap between the individual entries and royal charters of confirmation. Although the polyptyques list large numbers of people, often by name, one cannot treat these as population censuses of a region or even of a monastery's tenants. Rather, polyptyques listed only those individuals who owed dues, usually the heads of households. This explains why they generally included more men than women. In these polyptyques tenants were typically described by their status, using various words such as servus, collibertus, mancipius, or hospes, all of which were used for some version of servile station.

Cartularies

Even if a monastery produced no polyptyque, those with the largest number of documents in their archives began in the ninth century to try to organize these documents and often made registers summarizing them. These monasteries, outside the boundaries of the old Roman Empire, had never relied on public notaries and thus had themselves always kept the records of their transactions with the laity. By the end of the ninth century some were producing what were later called cartularies.

A cartulary is a book into which are copied more or less complete versions of the charters in a church's archives. A major purpose of the creation of such a cartulary was the organization and preservation of records, many of which might be several centuries old—and some of which might be on relatively fragile papyrus. An untidy pile of charters was much less convenient than a single book, which typically began with a monastery's foundation documents or great privileges of kings or popes. Most charters copied within a cartulary were grouped roughly by location, so that the account of the earliest gift of property in a certain village might appear next to the most recent. When it is possible to compare the original charter to the cartulary copy, it is clear that conscientious scribes tried their best to reproduce what was before them, although they might abbreviate the list of long-dead witnesses.

The first ninth-century cartularies, those of Lorsch and Fulda, being roughly contemporary to the creation of polyptyques, seem to have arisen from the same impetus to create order and establish an overview of monastic holdings. Cartularies remained very rare, however, until the eleventh century, and even then the format was rather ad hoc. That of St.-Pierre-le-Vif of Sens, for example, took the form of a liturgical book into which the house's most important documents and privileges were copied at intervals. The monasteries of St.-Bénigne of Dijon and of Bèze both produced chronicle-cartularies, histories of their monasteries and regions into which the chronicler copied documents from the archives. The first cartularies in the format that would soon become standard were composed at Cluny in the second half of the eleventh century. In the early decades of the twelfth century, however, a great many monasteries started producing cartularies—and the monks at Lorsch and Fulda recopied theirs. After another century or so, when a monastery might again have a large pile of unconsolidated documents, it was common to create a second cartulary.

Cartularies typically included, along with copies of donation charters or dispute settlements, a polyptyque if a monastery had produced one. There had been enough changes in social and economic structures—and the words used to describe them—between the ninth century and the twelfth that scribes were often unsure of what they were reading, but made their best guesses. Many twelfth-century cartularies also included copies of pancartes. A pancarte was not an ordinary donation charter but rather a somewhat sketchy listing of a number of small acquisitions; typically the monks would have the local bishop draw up and seal such a list.

There are very few original documents surviving from before the year 1000 and a fairly small number from the eleventh century, which means that without the copies in cartularies we would know substantially less about the history of the early Middle Ages. Crucial documents such as royal charters and polyptyques are generally now found only in cartulary copies. From the twelfth century onward, however, the number of records increases rapidly and steadily. Many original documents still survive, written on unevenly shaped pieces of parchment (left over from book production) and hung with one more or seals. It is thus far easier to study the history of the twelfth through fifteenth centuries than that of earlier periods.

Transactions

Ecclesiastical records were never dry, as scribes did more than fill in the blanks with pertinent information. Rather, each charter was an individual narrative, giving the background of the transaction and the family relationships and social position of the principals. There were never any explicit rules as to who might or might not make a transaction, or who would be expected to give their consent or to witness, but general patterns may be observed. Men were far more likely than women to be the principal lay actor. Women, however, could and did take the lead in gifts to a monastery if the property was their own. Husbands in these cases generally gave consent. Most commonly, however, the women who made gifts or engaged in other economic transactions with a church were widows. Children beyond infancy generally consented to all transactions, as did a feudal lord if someone held property in fief. Neighbors, other secular friends of the church, and more distant relatives were typically listed as witnesses. From this information scholars can now determine contemporary assumptions about family, property ownership, and legal obligations.

CONSTANCE B. BOUCHARD

References and Further Reading

- Barthélemy, Dominique. "Une crise de l'écrite? Observations sur des actes de Saint-Aubin d'Angers (XIe siècle)." Bibliothèque de l'Ecole des chartes 155 (1997): 95–117.
- Bouchard, Constance Brittain. Holy Entrepreneurs: Cistercians, Knights, and Economic Exchange in Twelfth-Century Burgundy. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1991.
- . Sword, Miter, and Cloister: Nobility and the Church in Burgundy, 980–1198. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1987.
- , ed. The Cartulary of Montier-en-Der, 666–1129. Medieval Academy Books 108. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2004.
- Geary, Patrick J. Phantoms of Remembrance: Memory and Oblivion at the End of the First Millennium. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1994.
- Guyotjeannin, Olivier, Laurent Morelle, and Michel Parisse, eds. Les cartulaires. Mémoires et documents de l'Ecole des chartes 39. Paris: Ecole des chartes, 1993.
- Heidecker, Karl, ed. Charters and the Use of the Written Word in Medieval Society. Turnhout: Brepols, 2000.
- Kosto, Adam J., and Anders Winroth, eds. Charters, Cartularies, and Archives: The Preservation and Transmission of Documents in the Medieval West. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2002.
- Parisse, Michel. "Ecriture et réécriture des chartes: Les pancartes aux XIe et XIIe siècles." Bibliothèque de l'Ecole des chartes 155 (1997): 247–265.
- Parisse, Michel, P. Pégeot, and B.-M. Tock, eds. Pancartes monastiques des XIe et XIIe siècles. Turnhout: Brepols, 1998.
- Renard, Etienne. "Lectures et relectures d'un polyptyque carolingien (Saint-Bertin, 849–859)." Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique 94 (1999): 373–435.
- Rosenwein, Barbara H. To Be the Neighbor of Saint Peter: The Social Meaning of Cluny's Property, 909–1049. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1989.
- White, Stephen D. Custom, Kinship, and Gifts to Saints: The Laudatio Parentum in Western France, 1050–1150. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1988.

See also Charters; Patronage, Ecclesiastical; Records, Rural; Records, Urban; Widows

RECORDS, RURAL

Most medieval Europeans (95%+) were small-scale agriculturalists who inhabited farming villages, practiced mixed-grain farming and animal husbandry, and lived within the reach of supraregional entities of royal and ecclesiastical power, as well as regional lordships (monastic, episcopal, secular). Peasants formed the base of the economy; indeed, "the village communicated to society at large in all its activities the rhythm and standards of workmanship of a peasant community" (R. W. Southern). In comparison with elites and town populations, however, peasants have not received scholarly attention in proportion to their numbers and influence, although this historiographical situation has been improving significantly since the mid-twentieth century. Medievalists have begun to bring farmers to center stage in the reconstruction and interpretation of medieval society, not only in terms of economic activity but also in their investigations of religious and political institutions.

Documents of Theory and Documents of Practice

When considering medieval peasants, the main population revealed in rural local records, it may be useful to begin with a rough working distinction between "documents of practice" and "documents of theory," a distinction that rests on the degree of fictional treatment and the recording of "ideas" rather than "fact" or actual occurrence: the evidentiary difference between the record of an actual court case and statute law illustrates this difficult point. Documents of practice relevant for rural populations might include the minutes and cases from secular or ecclesiastical courts, account records, tax records (which can include detailed subsidy lists that itemize taxable wealth, as well as revealing numbers of individuals, i.e., size of household), wills, and, to some extent, inquisition records. Documents of theory could include preachers' handbooks, sermon literature, penitentials, and tales embedded in medieval chronicles and other literary or quasi-literary texts. These distinctions are important for research on any historical topic or population, but are especially so for the medieval peasantry, since documents of theory have played a greater role in shaping historical approaches than have documents of practice: the imagery of the suffering peasant in Piers Plowman has been cited more often than court roll data, and the "contempt for labor" literary topos is conventionally read as indicative of peasants' attitudes toward themselves.

What is striking is how frequently medieval records, whether of royal, supraregional, regional, or local provenance, by lordship or village, identify countryside people by full name and in connection with a specific place. In the category of royal and supraregional documents we may place tax records, coroner's rolls, peasants' petitions or formal complaints, and the legal materials generated by ecclesiastical courts and tribunals; the category of regional and local documents includes the records of estate administration (most notably for monastic houses), including account rolls, cartularies (inventories of properties and deeds of land transfer), tenant lists, customals, and court rolls. All of these sources, in varying ways, reveal women and men, their actions and interactions, and the world that they lived in, thus opening up the world of gender studies for people who were not of high status, rich, urban, educated, or connected politically to major figures. Indeed, the records of medieval Europe teem with rural people, men, women, and occasionally children, named as individuals (with first name and surname), living in villages, holding land, and engaged in labor and local exchanges with other named individuals. We do not, in short, have to wait until the sixteenth century's explosion of records and the improved reach of the early modern state into the countryside for material on rural women, rural men, and issues of gender.

Court Records and Inventories

The records here par excellence are court records that belong to the category of estate administrative records and that are especially detailed for England. These court rolls, which first appear in the later thirteenth century and survive for hundreds of English villages, are the minutes of local rural courts (in effect, an assembly of farmers) that usually met several times a year, had broad jurisdiction over seigneurial, tenant, and personal matters, and possessed varying degrees of collective authority to render and enforce decisions. (Interestingly, English villages produced such records within lordships that had holdings in England and France, while their French counterparts did not—or at least theirs have not survived). In general, local court records for the Continent tend to be less abundant, less consecutive, less detailed, and later than English court rolls. Perhaps the closest inside view we have of the peasant family and landholding, before the period of these English court rolls of the High and later Middle Ages, is provided by the polyptychs, or estate inventories, drawn up for the lands of a number of monasteries in northern France and Germany over the ninth and tenth centuries. The polyptychs list the landed endowments of the monastery, by manors or villae, and the various renderings of the tenantry, household by household, including the names of family members, men, women, and children. The wealth of name evidence provided by these rich sources has been used to study personal relations within marriage and the family in the Carolingian peasant household (Herlihy 1985). While the later English estate administrative records have been much studied, the focus has tended to be on the landholding institution, not the peasantry. However, the growing interest among scholars in the lives of the everyman and everywoman has led students of the village to return to these sources to investigate peasants and the realities of their everyday life in ever greater detail.

Women's Roles

Agnes le Reves, Cecilia Penifader, Emma Revelove, and Geoffrey Buk were real people whose lives have been partially reconstructed from court roll data for the English villages of Upwood, Brigstock, Cuxham, and Ellington, respectively. Prominent villagers, including women, might amass enough entries and references to enable us to construct a kind of biography; equally valuable is looking at women's profiles in the aggregate, where it is clear that they, like men, were ubiquitous in the daily life of the village, and neither privatized within the household nor narrowly specialized in terms of their activities. All accounts of peasant women's lives, across time and place, emphasize the multitude of tasks they had, the roles they played, and the varieties of specialized knowledge they regularly drew upon: as moneylenders, farmers, gleaners, laborers, cooks, dairymaids and poultry-keepers, landholders, heiresses, deviants, raisers of the hue and cry (and hence involvement in local policing activity), brewers, textile producers, and more. It is well known that women performed every type of farm work, including the most physically demanding, plowing. Whether one argues for the subjugation of women under the identities and powers of their menfolk, or for the probability that they experienced the “satisfaction of doing productive work” (G. E. and K. R. Fussell) and lived their lives within a social role made up of many component parts besides gender, the court rolls and other local records show that women were everywhere present in the village, held land and were responsible for its rent and renderings, took oaths, had personal pledges, and in general answered for themselves in the public forum of the court. At the very least the court rolls and other related documents of practice provide ample evidence for complicating the story of gender relations, the formation of men’s as well as women’s identities in the countryside, and the gender history of work. In short, it is not merely because real, individual women and their activities are preserved in these materials, but also because these records are of such detailed nature, for men as well as women, that gender studies are possible: since the peasant economy and social structure were founded equally upon the labors of men and women, the world of work and all that fell within its influence are equally the product of such an economic partnership. The most famous countrywoman of the Middle Ages, Joan of Arc, might be cited as an example of a late medieval peasant woman whose life and beliefs are richly evidenced in the minutes of her trial and rehabilitation, whose peasant worldview and background produced an individual woman clearly “empowered” to act, and whose exceptionality, to modern eyes, might be tempered somewhat as gender studies continue to add to our knowledge.

SHERRI OLSON

References and Further Reading

- Ault, W. O. “Open-Field Husbandry and the Village Community: A Study of Agrarian By-Laws in Medieval England.” Transactions of the American Philosophical Society 55:7 (1965).
- Balestracci, Duccio. The Renaissance in the Fields: Family Memoirs of a Fifteenth-Century Tuscan Peasant. University Park, Pa.: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1984.
- Bennett, Judith. A Medieval Life: Cecilia Penifader of Brigstock, c. 1295–1344. Boston: McGraw-Hill, 1999.
- . Women in the Medieval English Countryside: Gender and Household in Brigstock before the Plague. New York: Oxford University Press, 1987.
- Bloch, Marc. “From the Royal Court to the Court of Rome: The Suit of the Serfs of Rosny-sous-Bois.” In - Change in Medieval Society: Europe North of the Alps, 1050–1500*, edited by Sylvia Thrupp. New York: Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1964, pp. 3–14.

- Fussell, G. E., and K. R. Fussell. The English Countrywoman: A Farmhouse Social History: The Internal Aspect of Rural Life, A.D. 1500–1900. London: Melrose, 1953.
- Gies, Frances, and Joseph Gies. Life in a Medieval Village. New York: Harper & Row, 1990.
- Harvey P. D. A. “English Estate Records.” In Pragmatic Literacy East and West, 1200–1330, edited by Richard Britnell. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell Press, 1997, pp. 107–118.
- . Manorial Records. London: British Records Association, 1984.
- Herlihy, David. Medieval Households. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1985.
- . Opera Muliebria: Women and Work in Medieval Europe. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1990.
- Homans, George. English Villagers of the Thirteenth Century. New York: Russell & Russell, 1960.
- Olson, Sherri. A Chronicle of All That Happens: Voices from the Village Court in Medieval England. Toronto: PIMS, 1996.

See also Administration of Estates; Agriculture; Alewives and Brewing; Gender Ideologies; Joan of Arc; Landholding and Property Rights; Law, Canon; Law, English Secular Courts of; Lay Piety; Merchet and Leyrwite; Migration and Mobility; Naming; Parishes; Peasants; Records, Ecclesiastical; Records, Urban; Servants; Sexuality, Regulation of; Spiritual Care; Work

RECORDS, URBAN

The records generated within and by medieval towns provide scholars with fertile material, although, as with all medieval sources, men’s activities are their central concern. This limitation is offset to some degree by the unusual variety and depth of urban records, generated in part because of the advantages of knowing how to read, write, and calculate in order to conduct business, the lifeblood of medieval towns. In southern European cities, notaries—the men whose job it was to write up and authenticate written contracts—were an important occupational group, as were the large concentrations of literate clerics associated with cathedrals and mendicant friaries, both of which tended to be in towns. The proliferation of different authorities in towns also helped to create a diversity of records from the bureaucratic machinery of lords, town governments, guilds, fraternities, parishes, and corporate landowners such as hospitals, bridge trusts, and religious institutions.

Literate culture was most advanced in southern Europe, especially in the highly urbanized region of northern Italy, where there were many self-governing towns from as early as the late twelfth century. Yet these republican forms of government, along with a marked Mediterranean preference for confining the activities of “reputable” women to family contacts, meant that the urban records of medieval Italy tend to offer limited glimpses into the life of townswomen. Notable exceptions include the detailed taxes administered by Tuscan towns, especially the catasto of 1427–1430 for Florence, which assessed some sixty thousand households in Florence and its hinterland according to the value of their real estate, investments, and cash. Since each declaration listed the name (and thus gender), age, and family relationship of members of the household, historical demographers have been able to calculate sex ratios (the number of men to every one hundred women) for specific age groups, wealth categories, and occupations. By comparing later catasto declarations and other records, scholars have also been able to derive the average age at marriage for women and men according to their social status and place of residence. The taxation records that survive for other towns are not as full, but taxes that list taxpayers and households (such as for the French town of Reims in 1422) also yield data on urban sex ratios, household size, and the percentage of single and married women. The nominative returns of national taxes, such as the English poll taxes of 1377, 1379, and 1381, provide similar data.

This information on the demographic profile of medieval towns can be supplemented by the Italian ricordi, a combination of family diary and business ledger kept by many rich merchants, particularly in Florence. Called livres de raison in southern France, these diaries record details about marriage negotiations, the births and deaths of children, the selection of godparents, and many other personal matters. It is the urban source that comes closest to revealing the emotions of family life, at least from the man’s perspective. A less personal but equally valuable source for medieval towns is notarial registers, which contain documents drawn up by a licensed public notary. More typical of southern Europe because of the Mediterranean reliance on Roman law precedents, the notarial act could document wills, loans, dowries, apprenticeship agreements, and many other types of contracts. In northern Europe, such contracts appeared in different venues: enrolled on a town’s court rolls, in a register of deeds, or even a cartulary of charters kept by civic, monastic, or individual landowners.

Town court rolls are more likely to survive for northern towns, especially in England, although they are also extant for some southern cities such as Marseille, while criminal court proceedings can be found for most towns. In England, the leet courts have furnished especially full information on women’s work because they name those charged with market and quality-of-life infractions, such as brewing or selling ale improperly, retailing food or drink outside the approved time and market place, maintaining a brothel, and even spreading malicious gossip, a “crime” with which men were only rarely assessed. Guild records, including ordinances, courts, and contracts, have also been mined successfully for insights into the waged work of women, particularly in the more organized ends of the textile and food trades, which attracted many female workers.

Town ordinances or customals (written compilations of “how things are done” in a particular town) do not name individuals, but they do lay out laws with gendered implications, including such matters as inheritance customs, the legal status of women in trade, and juridical privileges. Medieval Spain has a particularly rich body of this material, called fueros, which also often specified the different rights of Muslims, Jews, and Christian settlers in the frontier towns. Finally, there are various literary sources that speak to the urban experience of medieval women, including Chaucer’s tale of the Wife of Bath, the Middle English poem “How the Good Wife Taught Her Daughter,” and the Old French handbook The Menagier of Paris, in which an aged but fastidious rich merchant gives advice to his much younger wife on how to manage a large urban household.

MARYANNE KOWALESKI

References and Further Reading

- Branca, Vittore, ed. Merchant Writers of the Italian Renaissance, translated by Murtha Baca. New York: Marsilio Publishers, 1986.
- Goldberg, P. J. P., ed. and trans. Women in England c. 1275–1525: Documentary Sources. Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1995.
- Herlihy, David. “Women and the Sources of Medieval History: The Towns of Northern Italy.” In Medieval Women and the Sources of Medieval History, edited by Joel T. Rosenthal. Athens, Ga.: University of Georgia Press, 1990, pp. 133–154.
- Kowaleski, Maryanne, ed. Medieval Towns: A Reader. Peterborough, Ont.: Broadview Press, 2005.
- Power, Eileen, ed. and trans. The Goodman of Paris (Le Ménagier de Paris): A Treatise on Moral and Domestic Economy by a Citizen of Paris (c. 1393). London: George Routledge and Sons, 1928.

See also Alewives and Brewing; Artisan Families, Women of; Cities and Towns; Crime and Criminals; Conduct Literature; Demography; Family (Later Middle Ages); Feme Covert; Feme Sole; Guild Members and Guilds; Market and Tradeswomen; Merchant Families, Women of; Records, Ecclesiastical; Sumptuary Law; Wife of Bath; Wills; Work

REGENTS AND QUEEN-LIEUTENANTS

The offices of queen-regent and queen-lieutenant are similar in that, in both cases, the queen is a consort who rules in an official capacity, not in her own name but rather in place of a king. In both offices, the queen is the legal embodiment of the king's authority and serves as custodian of the realm; they are not heritable. The positions differ significantly, however. The regency was ad hoc, created because a king's youth, illness, or captivity impaired his ability to rule, and it was widely used throughout medieval Europe and into the modern era. The office of the queen-lieutenant, on the other hand, was a distinctive form of permanent delegated authority used by the kings in the medieval Crown of Aragon. The queen-lieutenant governed both in place of and with an adult king who was fully capable of ruling but was unable to govern a particular territory (or territories). As a permanent office, it was held at the king's discretion and constituted a unique form of monarchical co-rulership.

Regencies differed greatly from place to place in terms of the age of royal majority, the scope of authority, and the need for and composition of a regency council. Because it had a predetermined beginning and end, the regency was palatable to ambitious and opportunistic brothers, uncles, and nobles who would otherwise feel threatened by a ruling queen. A queen-regent's authority was considered the legal extension of her maternal rights as the guardian of her son and thus the protector of both king and kingdom. But regents could be any member of the family; for instance, Anne of Beaujeu was regent and guardian for her brother, Charles VIII, from 1483–1488.

Many queen-regents wielded considerable power, notably Adela of Blois, for Louis VII of France (1137–1180); Blanche of Castile (1188–1252) governed forcefully for Louis IX (1226–1279) during his minority (1226–1244) and while he was on Crusade (1248–1252). In Castile, María de Molina was regent for both her son, Fernando IV (1295–1312), and her grandson, Alfonso XI (1312–1350). Byzantine Empress Irene, the Athenian, was regent for her son Constantine VI (753–803) during the contentious Iconoclastic period. A regency was a potent but dangerous time, especially for foreign-born queens who ruled on behalf of weak kings, notably Isabelle of France, regent for Edward III (1327–1377) in England after the deposition of Edward II in 1322; Margaret of Anjou, regent for Henry VI (1422–1461) during his illnesses; and Isabeau of Bavaria during the illnesses of Charles VI (1380–1422) in France. Regencies were often contentious, as when ambitious family members, unwilling to cede authority to a queen-regent, bypassed Catherine of Valois when Henry V of England died in 1422.

Whereas the regency's origins extend to the earliest known kings, the governmental lieutenantcy was devised by the kings of the Crown of Aragon in the thirteenth century to rule their varied and dispersed Mediterranean territories. Originally the prerogative of princes, by 1300 the lieutenantcy became associated with Aragonese queens, who were prohibited from ruling in their own right. A queen-lieutenant governed with fully sanctioned de jure and de facto authority. Her official status was roughly equivalent to the king's, and she was empowered to assume the routine business of government, including convocation of parliamentary assemblies and, more rarely, direction of military matters. In practice the king retained the power to withhold assent or revoke a queen-lieutenant's authority.

In all, seven Aragonese queens served as lieutenants, but three in particular are noteworthy: María de Luna, María of Castile, and Juana Enríquez. María de Luna, wife of Martin (1395–1410), was one of her husband's ablest advisers. She pacified the kingdom and governed for a year until Martin's return from Sicily, where he was king, and served a second term as lieutenant in 1401 while Martin was away. María of Castile governed as lieutenant of Catalonia for her husband, Alfonso V (1416–1458), for a longer span of time (1420–1423 and 1432–1453) and with greater authority than any of her predecessors. She maintained a court separate from the king's at Naples, took council from her own royal council, regularly presided over parliamentary assemblies, and advocated the manumission of the remences, semi-servile Catalan peasants. The last Aragonese queen-lieutenant, Juana Enríquez, ruled closely with her husband, Juan II (1458–1479). She proved her worth as his right hand during the tumult of civil war (1462–1472), governed Girona during the siege, and became lieutenant in her own right in 1465. The office of the queen-lieutenant was discontinued when Isabel la Católica (1474–1504) succeeded to Castile as queen in her own right.

THERESA EARENIGHT

References and Further Reading

- Coll Juliá, Nuria. Doña Juana Enríquez, lugarteniente real en Cataluña, 1461–68. 2 volumes. Madrid: Consejo Superior de Investigaciones Científicas, 1953.
- Collins, Roger. "Queens-Dowager and Queens-Regent in Tenth-Century León and Navarre." In Medieval Queenship, edited by John Carmi Parsons. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1993, pp. 79–92.
- Cosandey, Fanny. La Reine de France: symbole et pouvoir, XVe–XVIIIe siècle. Paris: Gallimard, 2000.

- Earenfight, Theresa. "Queenship, Politics, and Government in the Medieval Crown of Aragon: The Lieutenancy of Maria of Castile, 1420–23 and 1432–53." Doctoral dissertation, Fordham University, New York, 1997.
- Facingier, Marion. "A Study of Medieval Queenship: Capetian France, 987–1327." Studies in Medieval and Renaissance History 5 (1968): 1–48.
- Gaibrois de Ballasteros, Mercedes. María de Molina, tres veces reina. Madrid: Espasa-Calpe, 1936.
- James, Liz. "Goddess, Whore, Wife or Slave?: Will the Real Byzantine Empress Please Stand Up?" In Queens and Queenship in Medieval Europe, edited by Anne J. Duggan. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell Press, 1997, pp. 123–139.
- Lightman, Harriet. "Political Power and the Queen of France: Pierre DuPuy's Treatise on Regency Government." Canadian Journal of History 21 (1986): 299–312.
- Maurer, Helen. Margaret of Anjou: Queenship and Power in Late Medieval England. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell Press, 2003.
- Poulet, André. "Capetian Women and the Regency: The Genesis of a Vocation." In Medieval Queenship, edited by John Carmi Parsons. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1993, pp. 93–116.
- Shadis, Miriam T. "Motherhood, Lineage, and Royal Power in Medieval Castile and France: Berenguela de León and Blanche de Castille." Ph.D. dissertation, Duke University, 1994.
- Silleras-Fernández, Núria. "María de Luna, una reina entre la piedad y el poder (1396–1406)." Doctoral dissertation, Universitat Autònoma de Barcelona, 2002.

See also Adela of Blois; Anne of Beaujeu; Blanche of Castile; Empresses: Byzantium; Iberia; Irene; Margaret of Anjou; Queens and Empresses: The West

RELICS AND RELIQUARIES

Relics—the physical remains of saints and holy people or objects associated with them—were, in many ways, the most potent source of power in the Middle Ages. Saints were held to be alive and present in their bodily remains, as even the smallest bit possessed the complete presence of the saint (pars pro toto, the part implies the whole). Relics manifested the terrestrial presence of the saints, thereby providing a palpable connection between heaven and earth. As such, they were the most valued possessions of a church, monastery, or community. Among the most potent functions of relics was the performance of miracles, particularly thaumaturgies, which imbued them with numinous authority. Relics assured the praesentia (presence) of the saints. Miracles demonstrated their potentia (power). This miraculous presence is illustrated by a fourteenth-century account that records how thirteen heads of the eleven thousand virgins, placed on the main altar of the Cistercian abbey at Esrom, Denmark, miraculously began singing a response to the Te Deum at Matins during the Christmas Eve vigil. The eleventh-century Book of Sainte Foy's Miracles (Liber miraculorum sancta-ae Fidis) from Conques is replete with examples of miracles effected by the saint's relics, such the resuscitation of Goteline, the wife of Roger, a Norman nobleman (Book 3.1).

There are three classes of relics: primary relics (the saint's body or portions thereof), secondary relics (objects that came into contact with the saint, such as clothing), and tertiary relics (items that touched primary or secondary relics—generally oils and strips of cloth, known as brandea). Though doubtless as old as Christianity itself, the veneration of relics is attested to in the passio of St. Polycarp (martyred c. 155), in which his disciples gather his bones as "more precious than gold." Due to their peerless value, relics became the focus of a sacral economy in which they were both legitimately traded and relocated through pious theft. By the ninth century the cult of relics was widespread, constantly serving as the impetus to the development of new artistic and literary forms, from church architecture and reliquaries to hagiographic tropes and legendae.

Because of their tremendous value, relics were secured in containers (reliquaries), fashioned out of precious materials. Generally a complete body would be kept in a tomb, while smaller fragments would be placed into reliquaries, which allowed them greater portability. Reliquaries could be carried in procession, allowing the saint to attend ecclesiastic councils, reclaim usurped land, and generally assert an active presence in the community. By the associative property of tertiary relics, reliquaries themselves accrued the numinous aura of their contents, often being linked, even conflated, with the relics they contained and presented. While somewhat due to natural tendencies toward conceptual conflation of related objects, much of this was due to the practice of only showing relics within their reliquaries—a practice formalized in 1215 with the Fourth Lateran Council's forbidding of the display of relics outside their reliquaries. This conflation between container and contents was particularly vivid with anthropomorphic reliquaries, which appeared as radiant epidermal layers, literally reconstituting the saint's body.

Early reliquaries were frequently made in casket or purse form, fashioned from gold and ivory and decorated with precious gems and enamels. While this reliquary type endured throughout the Middle Ages, other forms developed. Figural reliquaries—frequently full figures, heads, or arms—visually fleshed out the belief in the reconstituted presence of the saint in her/his relics. The performative potential of body-part reliquaries ensured their popularity. First documented in the ninth century, anthropomorphic reliquaries increased in number by the twelfth century, eventually becoming virtually ubiquitous by the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. Other reliquary forms existed, such as the ostensory or monstrance, which from the thirteenth century displayed relics in a manner similar to the Host, fostering the link between saint and Christ (imitatio Christi). The use of crystal in ostensories permitted visual communion with the relics—a facet of the phenomenon of increasing personal devotional interaction.

The value of reliquaries often exceeded the cost of the buildings in which they were housed (the most famous example being the Sainte-Chapelle in Paris, built to hold Louis IX's collection of Passion relics). The possession of relics was frequently the impetus to embark upon elaborate building campaigns (as was the case with the Virgin's tunic at Chartres). The importance of relics in medieval culture cannot be overstated, as they literally formed the core of church and community. A city was defined by its patron saints—generally present in relics, which lent authority through the implied saintly sanction and often brought great economic benefit via donations and pilgrimage. Throughout the Middle Ages, relics were the goal of pilgrims who traveled to be in the presence of the saints, embodied in their relics. Furthermore, canon law required that all consecrated altars contain relics—a practice that ensured both the ubiquity and the propinquity of relics.

Naturally, primary relics were the most sought after, as they most potently asserted the saint's real, physical presence. However, resultant from the Ascension of Christ and Assumption of the Virgin, primary relics of these two most important figures in Christianity were relatively scarce, aside from Christ's milk-teeth, blood, and foreskin(s), as well as hair and milk of the Virgin (at Saint-Denis and Saint-Omer, among other locations). Their secondary relics were thus highly valued, particularly the abundant Passion relics.

Among the most highly regarded relics were important secondary relics of the Virgin Mary, particularly the Sancta camisia, the tunic worn by the Virgin at Christ's birth, held at Chartres Cathedral from the ninth century. The Santa cintola in Prato Cathedral was believed to be the belt of the Virgin, handed to the apostle Thomas as proof of her bodily assumption. Both relics were the object of significant pilgrimages and fostered important artistic and building programs. Bodies and body parts of virgin martyrs were abundant, most notably those of the eleven thousand virgins of Cologne (companions of Ursula), whose relics could be found in every corner of Europe by the fourteenth century, and Roman martyrs, such as Agnes, whose body is venerated in her titular church in Rome. Relics of great monastic role models were prized, including Mary Magdalen at Vezelay and Clare at Assisi. Reliquaries could even be commissioned as part of propaganda campaigns for canonization, as was the case with the c. 1360 reliquary bust of Beata Umiliana dei Cerchi, a lay penitent, in Santa Croce, Florence.

Women were vital and prolific in the patronage and use of relics and reliquaries. The most famous of relic gatherers was Emperor Constantine's mother, Helena, whose early-fourth-century excursion to the Holy Land uncovered the True Cross, the Holy Sepulchre, and other sites associated with the life and Passion of Christ. Helena set the template for intense relic devotion among many royal women throughout the Middle Ages who sought to follow her example. The fourteenth-century Shrine of Elizabeth of Hungary in the Cloisters Collection of the Metropolitan Museum of Art and the Klaren-Altar in Cologne Cathedral (c. 1347, originally from the monastery of Clares in Cologne) are examples of lavish reliquary altarpieces commissioned by royal or noble women.

Though not exclusive to female monastics, intense and dramatic veneration and display of relics was common among nuns. In the twelfth century, Elisabeth of Schönau communed with the head of Verena (one of the companions of Ursula) to learn the identity of many of the eleven thousand virgins of Cologne. It is significant that the revelations were delivered by a female saint to a female mystic. This underscores the way in which the cult of the female martyrs spoke directly to women—particularly through their presence in their relics. This close, affective piety was often associated with female spirituality by clerics, possibly due to long held associations between women and matter, hence bodily/physical forms of piety. A particularly intimate and visceral form of relic veneration—osculation (kissing)—is often linked to women, such as the head of St. Just being kissed by his mother after his decapitation.

As an inextricable aspect of the cult of saints, relic veneration was virtually ubiquitous, as was the practice of preserving and presenting these holy remains inside lavish reliquaries. As such, this is an aspect of medieval religion that transcends gender—in form, patronage, and use. Nonetheless, the cult of relics was closely associated with female piety.

SCOTT B. MONTGOMERY

References and Further Reading

- Angenendt, Arnold. Heilige und Reliquien: Die Geschichte ihres Kultes vom frühen Christentum bis zur Gegenwart. Munich: C. H. Beck, 1994.
- Braun, Joseph. Die Reliquiare des christlichen Kultes und ihre Entwicklung. Freiburg im Breisgau: Herder, 1924.

- Gauthier, Marie-Madeleine. Highways of the Faith: Relics and Reliquaries from Jerusalem to Compostela, translated by J. A. Underwood. Secaucus, N.J.: Wellfleet, 1986.
- Geary, Patrick J. Furta Sacra: Thefts of Relics in the Central Middle Ages. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1978.
- . Living with the Dead in the Middle Ages. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1994.
- Herrmann-Mascard, Nicole. Les reliques des saints. Formation coutumière d'un droit. Paris: Klincksieck, 1975.
- Legner, Anton, ed. Ornamenta ecclesiae: Katalog zur Ausstellung des Schnütgen-Museums in der Josef-Haubrich-Kunsthalle, 3 vols. Cologne: Stadt Köln, 1985.
- . Reliquien: Verehrung und Verklärung, Skizzen und Noten zur Thematik und Katalog zur Ausstellung der Kölner Sammlung Louis Peters im Schütgen-Museum. Cologne: Schütgen-Museum, 1989.
- Montgomery, Scott B. "The Use and Perception of Reliquary Busts in the Late Middle Ages." Ph.D. Dissertation, Rutgers University, 1996.

See also Clare of Assisi; Devotional Practices; Elisabeth of Schönau; Hagiography; Hagiography, Iconographic Aspects of; Helena; Jacobus de Voragine's Golden Legend; Mary Magdalen; Mary, Virgin; Miracles and Miracle Collections; Patronage, Ecclesiastical; Pilgrims and Pilgrimage; Spirituality, Christian; Ursula and Her Companions; Virgin Martyrs

REMARRIAGE

Throughout the Middle Ages there was a sharp distinction between the Church and secular society on the issue of remarriage. For the most part, but not always, social and economic factors encouraged remarriage while the Church discouraged it.

There is no doubt that the Church prevailed, beginning as early as legislation passed by Constantine I (306–337) and Theodosius II (408–450), in greatly restricting access to divorce, which had been common among the Romans and certainly was one occasion for remarriage. Leo I (440–461) equated remarriage after divorce with adultery. Canon law came to allow separations from bed and table (a mensa et thoro) without the right to remarry. Only a full annulment would allow a remarriage, which then technically was not a remarriage.

Remarriage occurred in the context of death. Church approval came, if reluctantly, as a remedy for fornication by widows and widowers. Generally, however, the surviving spouse was discouraged from remarrying. Widows, along with orphans and the abject poor, figured among the miserable (miserabiles personae) who were the special objects of ecclesiastical and royal charity and protection. Sermons by Bernardino of Siena (1380–1444) and other late medieval preachers urged women to embrace a chaste widowhood that was projected as a second virginity. The relative prevalence, where demographic data is available, of widows in comparison to widowers would indicate some success in this regard. Still, decisions to remarry, like those to marry in the first place, responded to social needs and concerns.

The reality for most households, with some exceptions among elites, was that the surviving spouse sought a new partner very quickly. Marriage and remarriage absorbed more poor girls in comparison to elites, whose girls in greater proportion headed to monasteries. Men remarried faster and more frequently, as they needed a wife's labor and a means of having children or caring for those already at hand; but women too needed male labor, managerial acumen, and legal stature. Landholdings and shops in which women generally could not succeed to ownership had to replace lost male owners. By the late Middle Ages craft guilds often stepped in to govern widows' remarriages and their rights to continue the shop. Men who married such heiresses were seeking social advancement, thus possibly marrying a woman older than themselves; but many widowers took younger brides.

Remarriage was most difficult for women in elite classes, especially in southern Europe, where the Roman law of dowry prevailed and lineage continuity weighed heavily. In much of northern Europe, where wives had inheritance rights to household assets, they had incentive to remain in the home, remarried or unmarried. In places like central and northern Italy and southern France, a social dilemma revolved around where widows were to live. They could remain in their husbands' homes, raising children, if any. They could return to their natal homes, and rights to do so were spelled out in law in some places. Or, especially if they were still fairly young and capable of having children, they might be married again, creating another useful family alliance for their kin.

While a widow's remarriage might help her family, it could be disastrous for her deceased husband's kin, which included his children. A remarrying widow would generally leave her children behind, to be raised by others, and she would demand the return of her dowry, which could pose a financial problem. Stereotypes of remarrying widows as capricious and greedy, dangerous, sexual, and even cruel abounded. A remarrying widow who had guardianship over her children (tutela) lost it by virtue of allying herself in marriage to another. Any children she might have with her second husband would have only weak inheritance rights to their uterine brothers and sisters. For example, the Florentine Luca da Panzano split his mother's property with his half-brother, Luca Carnesecchi, but these men could only leave small bequests to each other in their wills as long as they had close, agnate kin.

The converse was that, for widowers who remarried, their second set of progeny had equal rights of succession to him along with their consanguine siblings. Widowers' remarriages brought adult females' labor, procreativity, sexual companionship, and dowry into the house. Second wives might well be as young as typical first wives.

Practices were reflected in literary texts. On the one hand, there were caricatures of widows (including Chaucer's Wife of Bath), while there were few of widowers (except that of the pathetic old man remarrying and not satisfying a young wife). On the other hand, there were images and concerns about stepmothers, but few about stepfathers. Remarriage, especially of an older man with a new bride, was not met with total approval. In forms of "rough music," charivari (in France), young men openly harassed such couples, expressing a ritualized disapproval of a union that, among other things, removed a potential bride from their grasp. Clerical synods in Italian dioceses frequently passed decrees forbidding clerical blessing of second marriage, or at least curtailed nuptial rites, so as not to call attention to them.

THOMAS KUEHN

References and Further Reading

- Cavallo, Sandra, and Lyndan Warner, eds. Widowhood in Medieval and Early Modern Europe. London: Longman, 1999.
- Herlihy, David. Medieval Households. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1985.
- Howell, Martha C. The Marriage Exchange: Property, Social Place, and Gender in Cities of the Low Countries, 1300–1550. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1998.
- Klapisch-Zuber, Christiane. Women, Family, and Ritual in Renaissance Italy, translated by Lydia G. Cochrane. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1985.
- Mirrer, Louise, ed. Upon My Husband's Death: Widows in the Literature and Histories of Medieval Europe. Ann Arbor, Mich.: University of Michigan Press, 1992.
- Sheehan, Michael M. Marriage, Family, and Law in Medieval Europe: Collected Studies, edited by James K. Farge. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1996.

See also Charivari; Chastity and Chaste Marriage; Divorce and Separation; Widows

RENAISSANCE, HISTORIOGRAPHY OF

In his exaltation of the individual and the secular, Jacob Burckhardt's The Civilization of the Renaissance on Italy (1860; English translation 1890) presented a glowing portrait of women as the equals of men in education, poetry, and authority: "There was no question of 'women's rights' or female emancipation, simply because the thing itself was a matter of course." For him, the term virago was a compliment, meaning a woman had the heart and soul of a man. Courtesans, too, were accomplished and respected. A Swiss Protestant, Burckhardt rescued the Italians, beginning with Dante, Petrarch, and Boccaccio, from the intellectual darkness, superstition, and Catholicism of the "Middle Ages," and swept them up into the "Renaissance," which found its fulfilment in the Enlightenment of northern Europe.

Although he used primary sources, Burckhardt's choice was not only highly selective, and colored by his desire to define the "spirit of the age," but it led to his commission of the original sin of historians, that is, confusing fictional accounts about women (Castiglione and Bandello are favourites) with archival documentary ones. A further confusion lay in assuming that classical antiquity, Greek or Latin, advanced women's equality. While noting the presence of misogyny in Renaissance writings, Burckhardt simply dismissed it as misleading; even more, he subsumed women into the same paradigm he developed for men.

Resulting histories gave little attention to women, limiting discussion to a section on a few outstanding rulers, writers, saints, and patrons of the court. When Paul Oskar Kristeller, the pioneer of Renaissance history of philosophy, focused on women and education in the Renaissance ("Learned Women of Early Modern Europe: Humanists and University Scholars," first appearing in Patricia Labalme's Beyond Their Sex: Learned Women of the European Past, 1980; and then in Kristeller's collected articles, Studies in Renaissance Thought and Letters, 1985), he directed his assessment along more sober paths. The role of women was not prominent, and could not be so, because of the vast gender gap in education. At the secondary level, education was for boys alone; women were not allowed to attend schools where Latin and Greek were taught. Whatever instruction they might receive from tutors and kind relatives, they never went to university, where the curriculum trained young men for the professions, mainly in law and medicine, and from there to a public life that excluded women. The in-depth studies of Paul E. Grendler prove this conclusively.

With the initiative of women scholars researching their own past, historiography has made a decisive turn. Since the boom in women's studies beginning in the 1960s and 1970s, enormous advances have been made in our knowledge of the number of women writing and participating in public life. In addition, there has been marked progress in understanding social and cultural conditions that both fostered and impeded women's progress. Joan Gadol Kelly threw down the gauntlet in "Did Women

Have a Renaissance?" (Becoming Visible: Women in European History, 1977). Addressing historians in the Burckhardt and Kristeller vein, who understood the Renaissance from a male perspective, her answer was a provocative "no." Kelly argued that, during the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries, in all areas of society, whether within the family, marriage, or the Church, women were subject to the male authority of fathers, brothers, husbands, and priests. Power that they might achieve, say, as widows or rulers, was often by accident, not by right. Lisa Jardine followed with another pointed question: "Women Humanists: Education for What?" The humanist education program was flawed, argued Jardine; it offered to teach women the humanities and at the same time forbade them from using it in a public life. It proclaimed that classical education made men virtuous and ethically superior; but at the same time made women unnatural and unchaste. Fifteenth-century women suffered because of intellectual brilliance. Their works were ignored by men, or not published, or vilified. Ian Maclean's The Renaissance Notion of Women (1980) studies the position of women in scholastic Aristotelian philosophy, natural science, theology, and law to arrive at the depressing conclusion that in all areas women were deemed inferior because they were lacking in rationality, and, therefore, had to be under the control of (rational!) males at all times. Nevertheless, a study of dialogues and treatises by and about women in the sixteenth century and first half of the seventeenth century reveals a deeper awareness that women are servile not by nature but by social and cultural factors, and, given a chance, are just as capable of men.

Rather than writing histories with a chapter or two on women, women (and men) have dedicated themselves to writing histories about women and Renaissance culture and society on the one hand, and to resurrecting and translating an ever-increasing number of genres, some originally in Latin but mostly written in Italian, French, German, and Spanish, on the other. A vast five-volume History of Women in the West, with Georges Duby and Michelle Perrot as general editors, first appeared in 1990 and in English translation in 1992 with contributions from seventy-five historians. It indicates the swing in historical perspectives. Great strides have been made in studying factors determining women's position in family structures (see the numerous studies of Christiane Klapisch-Zuber and David Herlihy), defining the significance of the dowry (see Stanley Chojnacki), revealing the exceptions to conventional marriages revealed by archives of marriage tribunals (see Silvana Seidel Menchi), and publishing on women as the "devout "sex" (see Gabriella Zarri). Life in the monastery has come out from the shadows; some convents encouraged women to write and perform plays (see Elissa Weaver) or to write chronicles (see Kate Lowe); light has been shed on the life of nuns in Venetian convents, which existed as boarding houses for girls without vocation but whose families would not let them marry (see Mary Laven and Francesca Medioli for differing evaluations of Venetian nunneries). Collections of essays explore a variety of cultural and social issues affecting women (see Letizia Panizza; also, in the 1990s Cambridge University Press inaugurated a series on Women Writers in France, Italy, Germany, Spain, and Russia).

Her Immaculate Hand (1983), edited by Margaret L. King and Albert Rabil, Jr., brought together selected works by Italian women humanists, and put them in their historical and cultural context. The book shows them proficient in public orations, debates, and formal letters to other humanists. King went on to Women of the Renaissance (1991), a wide-ranging synthesis of European women's condition, bringing together a wealth of detailed studies; and both authors initiated a magnificent project aptly named "The Other Voice in Early Modern Europe" (University of Chicago Press: <http://www.press.uchicago.edu/Complete/Series/OVIEME.html>). The first volume came out in 1996. For the very first time in scholarly English translation, with notes and introductions, we "hear" women who are courtesans, nuns, polemicists, proto-Protestants, dramatists, epic writers, poets, and letter writers. Oxford University Press has published a volume edited and translated by Jane Stevenson of one thousand women Latin poets. What emerges is that periodization that works for history from a male perspective does not work for women, who come into their own at the tail end of the "Renaissance." Historiography still has to digest the explosion of primary and secondary material in women's studies in order to detect directions leading to future developments.

One area that has not been fully explored is the negative impact on the Renaissance perception of women brought about by the rediscovery of ancient Greek and Latin texts and early Christian ones. The Greeks, with the exception of some essays of Plutarch, looked down on women, exalting homoerotic love. Romans valued marriage as a civic duty, yet Cicero and Seneca termed sexual pleasures base and considered friendship higher, since it demanded equality, a virtue that could exist only between males. For Greek Christian writers like Chrysostom, virginity alone gave women value; and in the Latin tradition Jerome above all denounced marriage and women's sexuality, especially in Adversus Jovinianum, already well known in the Middle Ages. Only a brave man, or later woman, could ignore or deny the towering authorities of Jerome and Augustine, who shared similar views.

LETIZIA PANIZZA

References and Further Reading

- Burckhardt, Jacob. The Civilization of the Renaissance in Italy, translated by Samuel George Chetwynd Middlemore. London: Sonnenschein & Co., 1890.
- Cox, Virginia. "The Single Self: Feminist Thought and the Marriage Market in Early Modern Venice." Renaissance Quarterly 48 (1995): 513–581.
- Duby, Georges, and Michelle Perrot. History of Women in the West, 5 vols. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1992–1994.
- Grendler, Paul E. Schooling in Renaissance Italy: Literacy and Learning 1300-1600. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1989.
- . The Universities of the Italian Renaissance. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2002.
- Jardine, Lisa. "Women Humanists: Education for What?" In From Humanism to the Humanities: Education and the Liberal Arts in Fifteenth- and Sixteenth-Century Europe, edited by Anthony Grafton and Lisa Jardine. London: Duckworth, 1986, pp. 29–57.
- Kelly, Joan Gadol. "Did Women Have a Renaissance?" In Becoming Visible: Women in European History, edited by Renate Bridenthal and Claudia Koonz. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1977, pp. 137–164.
- King, Margaret L., and Albert Rabil, Jr., eds. Her Immaculate Hand: Selected Works by and about the Women Humanists of Quattrocento Italy. Binghamton, N.Y.: Center for Medieval and Early Renaissance Studies, 1983.
- Kristeller, Paul Oskar. "Learned Women of Early Modern Europe: Humanists and University Scholars." In Beyond Their Sex: Learned Women of the European Past, edited by Patricia Labalme. New York: New York University Press, 1980, pp. 91–116.
- Maclean, Ian. The Renaissance Notion of Women: A Study in the Fortunes of Scholasticism and Medical Science in European Intellectual Life. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1980.
- Stevenson, Jane, ed. Women Latin Poets: Language, Gender, and Authority, from Antiquity to the Eighteenth Century. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2005.

See also Aristotelian Concepts of Women and Gender; Augustine, Influence of; Education, Lay; Feminist Theories and Methodologies; Gender Ideologies; Gender in History; History, Medieval Women's; Humanism; Jerome, Influence of; Literacy and Reading: Latin; Literacy and Reading: Vernacular; Nogarola, Isotta; Women Authors: Italian Texts; Women Authors: Latin Texts

RÉPONSE DU BESTIAIRE D'AMOUR

Appended to four manuscripts of Richard de Fournival's Bestiaire d'amour is an intriguing, protofeminist work that was unique in the Middle Ages and remains unique today. Very little information about its author can be deduced from the codicological evidence. The rubrics of two of the manuscripts say that it was written by la dame as a response/refusal to Richard's love-bestiary. The other two manuscripts provide no information at all.

The author begins with a prologue that is clearly intended to challenge Richard's priorities and, most particularly, his attitudes toward love. Richard, who at the time of writing Le Bestiaire d'amour was the chancellor of Notre Dame d'Amiens, had begun his somewhat misogynistic work by extolling the ancients and the glories of savoir (knowledge). The author of the Réponse, however, begins by reproaching Richard for his values, asserting that a man of sense and discretion should not waste his time perpetrating damage, but should instead pay attention to the non-sachans, i.e., the nonlearned, many of whom were, of course, women.

She then begins what is essentially a defense of women by asserting that God in His courtesy made woman to be the nobler creation. She demonstrates this by a heterodox rendering of the Creation story (Genesis 2:23), narrating that in a dual creation God first made a man and a woman out of dust. But Adam killed that first woman, explaining to God that he did not love her, she was nothing to him. God then created Eve, whom Adam loved at first sight because she was made from his own flesh. Thus Adam is, in this account, a petulant malcontent, a bigamist (by medieval standards), and a murderer. He was even, "according to certain authorities," responsible for original sin—it was the man, not the woman, who, by following the dictates of his senses, "brought us the evil/suffering for which we are now all in pain."

Having substituted her female frame of reference for Richard's clerical misogyny, the author now modifies Richard's male-oriented love symbolism by moving systematically, animal by animal, through Richard's love bestiary. For example, the crowing of the introductory animal, the cock, no longer represents Richard's desperate cries for love; those piercing, penetrating cries now represent threat. And whereas Richard, playing the unicorn, had made the maiden responsible for his love-death, she finds that the unicorn with its fierce horn is the creature she most fears—there is nothing so wounding (trenchans) as (Richard's) fair speech.

Thus, thematic to Le Bestiaire d'amour is the threat posed by the love of woman. Thematic to the Réponse, however, is the threat posed to women's honor by men and, more specifically, clerics. Clerics, she puns, are preying/praying bids (oiseaux de proie) who, with charming words, draw women into love relationships, to the detriment of both sexes. If circumstances had been different, the woman could have married an honest chevalier who would have supported her honorably, and the cleric would have received a prebend and have risen to a position of prestige in the Church. In one of her few literary references, la dame angrily berates Richard as “Renart,” exclaiming “how far out your tongue is hanging!” The attack is typical of her down-to-earth realism. The woman author has, by the immediacy of her responses and the cogency of her logic, created a work that is as universal as it was medieval.

JEANETTE BEER

References and Further Reading

- Beer, Jeanette. Beasts of Love: Richard de Fournival's Bestiaire d'amour and a Woman's Response. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2003.
- . “Le Bestiaire d'amour en vers.” In Medieval Translators and Their Craft, edited by Jeanette Beer. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Medieval Institute Publications, 1989.
- . “Duel of Bestiaries.” In Beasts and Birds of the Middle Ages: The Bestiary and Its Legacy, edited by Willene B. Clark and Meredith T. McMunn. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1989, pp. 96–105.
- . “Gendered Discourse in Two Thirteenth-Century Texts.” Journal of the Institute of Romance Studies 3 (1994–1995): 27–32.
- . “Woman, Authority and the Book in the Middle Ages.” In Women, the Book and the Worldly, edited by Lesley Smith and Jane H. M. Taylor. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993, pp. 61–69.
- de Fournival, Richard. Le Bestiaire d'amour suivi de la Réponse de la dame, edited by C. Hippeau. Paris: Aubry, 1860. Reprint, Geneva: Slatkin, 1969, 1978.
- . Li Bestiaires d'amours di Maistre Richart de Fournival e li response du Bestiaire, edited by Cesare Segre. Milan and Naples: Riccardo Riccardi, 1957.
- . Master Richard's Bestiary of Love and Response, translated by Jeanette Beer and illustrated by Barry Moser. West Hatfield, Mass.: PennyRoyal Press, 1985.
- . Master Richard's Bestiary of Love and Response, translated, with preface, by Jeanette Beer and illustrated by Barry Moser. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1986. Reprint, West Lafayette, Ind.: Purdue University Press, 2000.
- Krueger, Roberta L. Women Readers and the Ideology of Gender in Old French Verse Romances. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- Solterer, Helen. The Master and Minerva. Berkeley, Calif.: University of California Press, 1995.

See also Beast Epic; Celibacy: Clerical and Priests' Concubines; Debate Literature; Defenses of Women; Eve; Literature, Old French; Misogyny

ROMAN DE FLAMENCA

The mid-thirteenth-century Occitan romance Flamenca or Las Novas de Guillem de Nivers consists of 8,096 lines of octosyllabic rhymed couplets and survives in one manuscript (Carcassone, Bibl. Mun. 35) that lacks its initial and concluding folios and contains several significant lacunae. Its erudite author (who is possibly called Bernardet) was likely a cleric and associated with the court of Alga, a castle in Rouergue that belongs to the Roquefeuille family. Flamenca's narrator is extremely well developed and intervenes frequently in the narrative. Although normally classified as a romance and heavily inscribed in the discourse of fin' amor, the text also shares many features with the form of fabliau known as the castia-gilos, and this discourse is frequently subverted through its representation as an elaborate game. Flamenca also shares motifs with the seventh story from The Seven Sages of Rome and the Old French romance Jouffroi de Poitiers. Although the very playful, sometimes ironic movement between various rhetorical and literary discourses makes it difficult to pin down the text's meaning, Flamenca is almost unanimously considered an artistic triumph, due in part to the text's combination of courtly, comic, erotic, religious, realistic, and possibly historical elements.

Count Gui of Namur, Flamenca's father, marries his only daughter to the worthy knight Sir Archambaut of Bourbon. Following a lavish wedding celebration, the couple returns to Bourbon, where Sir Archambaut hosts a second celebration attended by many nobles as well as the king of France. After the French queen falsely suggests Flamenca is behaving improperly with her husband, Sir Archambaut becomes insanely jealous and encloses his wife and her two handmaidens in a tower, only allowing them out to attend church and occasionally the nearby baths. Guillem de Nevers, the hyperbolically brave knight and clever cleric, realizes from his studies that ideal knights should fall in love and develops, sight unseen, an overwhelming passion for the beautiful Flamenca. Upon the advice of Amors (Love) and a dream version of Flamenca, Guillem travels to Bourbon and takes rooms at an inn near Flamenca's tower. He then bribes the local priest into accepting him as his cleric, so he can converse, two words at a time, with Flamenca when offering her the peace during mass on Sundays and on feast days. Over a period of months, the lovers exchange one- or two-word messages in church while Guillem builds a tunnel between the baths and his room at the inn. Once the tunnel is complete and Flamenca finally agrees to meet him at the baths, Guillem takes her to his room and becomes her lover. The two meet for four months until Flamenca obtains her freedom after swearing a specious oath to Sir Archambaut promising to guard herself as well as he has guarded her and sends Guillem away. When the two men subsequently become friends at a tournament, Sir Archambaut invites Guillem to attend his own tournament that Easter and also unsuspectingly delivers a salutz d'amor (love greeting) from Guillem to Flamenca. Guillem excels in the tournament, and the lovers resume their relationship with Sir Archambaut's continuing unwitting assistance, as the romance abruptly breaks off. Although the manuscript offers no definitive proof, it is likely that only a few folios are missing and that the narrative concludes in Bourbon with Flamenca happily manipulating her husband and lover.

Somewhat paradoxically, Flamenca both foregrounds its status as a highly intertextual, literary artifact and incorporates numerous concrete, realistic details. Notably, the short messages Guillem and Flamenca exchange in church construct a poem based on troubadour Peire Rogier's "Ges non puese en bon vers faillir," while the feast days on which the meetings take place correspond to historical days in the liturgical calendar.

Much of the central portion of the romance functions as an "Art of Love," as Guillem, Flamenca, and her two handmaidens engage in extended speeches on appropriate behavior for lovers and ladies. Although Flamenca's historical author was likely male, the female characters' speeches, like the poems of the trobairitz (female troubadours), offer the feminine perspective on fin' amor and give a voice to the normally silent lady who struggles to situate herself in a system that, as governed by the feudal hierarchy, professes to venerate her but more frequently succeeds in marginalizing her. By the romance's conclusion, Flamenca has changed from silenced maiden and wife to the virtual embodiment of the troubadour's all-powerful domna who tames her vassal into submission. The text's somewhat ambivalent representation of the eponymous heroine's overwhelming success in playing the game of love provides insight into the antifeminism often underlying fin' amor.

KAREN A. GROSSWEINER

References and Further Reading

- Blodgett, E. D., ed. and trans. The Romance of Flamenca. New York: Garland, 1995.
- Damon, Phillip. "Courtesy and Comedy in Le Romance of Flamenca." Romance Philology 17 (1964): 608–615.
- Dickey, Constance L. "Deceit, Desire, Distance, and Polysmy in Flamenca." Tenzo 11 (1995): 10–37.
- Fleischman, Suzanne. "Dialectic Structures in Flamenca." Romanische Forschungen 92 (1980): 223–245.
- Grossweiner, Karen A. "Implications of the Female Poetic Voice in Le Roman de Flamenca." In The Court Reconvenes: Courtly Literature across the Disciplines, edited by Barbara Altmann, Carleton Carroll, and Chantal Phan. Cambridge: D. S. Brewer, 2003, pp. 133–140.

Solterer, Helen. "Sermo and Juglar: Language Games in Flamenca." In The Spirit of the Court: Selected Proceedings of the Fourth International Conference of the Courtly Literature Society (Toronto, 1983), edited by Glyn S. Burgess and Robert A. Taylor. Woodbridge, Suffolk: D. S. Brewer, 1985, pp. 330–338.

Vitz, Evelyn Birge. "A Showcase for Talent: Performance in and Robert Flamenca." In De Sens Rassis: Essays in Honor of Rupert T. Pickens, edited by Keith Busby, Bernard Guidot, and Logan E. Whalen. Amsterdam: Rodopi, 2005, pp. 683–698.

See also Courtly Love; Fabliau; Literature, Occitan; Romance, French; Trobairitz and Troubadours

ROMAN DE LA ROSE AND ITS RECEPTION

The Roman de la Rose was one of the most influential and widely circulated works in western Europe in the closing centuries of the Middle Ages, judging by nearly any criterion—numbers of surviving manuscript copies and poems that imitated or responded to it, as well as the influence of its themes among later authors. The work, written in the most common form used for narrative fiction in this period, rhyming octosyllabic couples, was undertaken by a first author, named Guillaume de Lorris, some time in the 1230s; however, Guillaume never brought the poem to a conclusion. Jean de Meun, a second author, working some forty years later, added a massive continuation and conclusion, over four times the length of Guillaume's fragment, that radically altered the contours and the scope of the first part. Guillaume had devised an innovative narrative frame: a first-person tale of a dream experience modeled upon stereotypes from the tradition of lyric poetry, designated by the expression "courtly love," in which the singer/lover proclaims his longing for the lady he loves in the hope of ultimately receiving her favors.

Guillaume de Lorris

In the Rose, the dream tale is a thinly veiled allegorical version of this poetic "quest": the narrator/lover happens upon the garden of Pleasure (populated by such figures as the God of Love himself, Beauty, Youth, and so forth) and falls in love with the Rose Bud, which will remain to the end the target of his desire. The last lines written by Guillaume depict his protagonist's monologue of longing outside the tower, which has been erected to protect the rose by enemies to the quest, Jealousy and her minions, among whom figure Shame and Fear. Guillaume had more than a personal story to tell. His narration purports to provide instruction to future lovers: “This,” says the narrator in his prologue, “is the Roman de la Rose, in which the entire art of love is enclosed.” While the narrator’s own quest might accordingly serve as an instructive model (or warning) for future lovers, the Rose also includes explicit instruction on the part of the God of Love, who issues his commandments to the narrator, henceforth his vassal.

Courtly garden scene. From the Roman de la Rose. c. 1440. Harl. 4425, fol. 12v. Location: British Museum, London, Great Britain. Credit: Snark / Art Resource, N.Y.

Jean de Meun

Jean de Meun pursued a quite different ideological agenda, though he maintains the focus on love, retitling the work at a later point the Mirror for

Lovers. Using his allegorical characters (Reason, Nature, and others) as spokespeople/voices for and against a wide variety of amorous doctrines and comportments (friendship, adultery, prostitution, sodomy, and so forth), many of them dependent upon such Latin authorities as Ovid, Boethius, and Juvenal, Jean makes his encyclopedic intent clear: “it is good to know everything.” Whereas Guillaume’s text maintained a sanitized lexical and thematic perspective proper to the delicate nature of courtly love, Jean broadened the scope to include outrageously obscene language, suggestive considerations of sexual behavior, and some of the most notorious misogynistic statements to be found in medieval literature.

Generations of scholars considered Guillaume’s section to be a relatively straightforward compilation of the courtly clichés, depicting the weak and suffering lover subject to the power of his desire and the beloved's failure to respond to his entreaties. Jean's manifestly ironic overturning of these rarefied literary conventions by drowning them in a morass of discourses drawn from the domains of philosophy, theology, and science has, in turn, led many to ask what the direction of his irony was: was his rejection of courtly love underwritten by a promotion of charity, that is, love of God, over the vanities of earthly passion, a defense of sex in marriage with the goal of procreation, a belief in sexual licentiousness and even rape in the service of one's pleasure, a simple hatred of women and the feminine? Debate on these issues has and will remain open, due to Jean de Meun's strategy of indeterminacy, which juxtaposes disparate voices, none of which is reducible to his own, in order to place the difficult burden, and essential responsibility, of interpretation on the reader.

Interpretive Ambiguities

In spite of the Rose's inherent ambiguities, these were the terms around which the interpretive questions hovered until more recent interventions stemming from interest in feminism and gender studies. Not only has the critical focus moved away from such dichotomies used to depict the two authors as courtly and anticourtly, aristocratic and bourgeois, but it has also attempted to nuance the largely heteronormative slant characteristic of traditional criticism. Recent critical work has shown, for instance, that the very nature of personification allegory, which provides a gender to personified abstractions such as "beauty" or "reason" based upon their grammatical gender, leaves the way open for criticism of the gendered hierarchies of "straight" sexuality. Nowhere is this more apparent, as Simon Gaunt has recently shown, than in Guillaume de Lorris's choice of a male personification, Fair Welcoming, as the keeper of, and surrogate for, the female Rose, thus raising numerous questions with regard to the text's homoerotic overtones. This, combined with the centrality of the mythical figure of Narcissus as a figure of the lover, plunges us into a realm quite removed from the straight sexuality most believe to be inherent in the courtly model.

Jean de Meun, for his part, uses what might be called an "ethics of speech" to make such problems as misogynistic speech and obscene or blasphemous discourse an issue of reception and not articulation. Jean knowingly provides his readers with varying, even contradictory, points of view that the reader is expected to evaluate and alternately accept or reject. In a notorious defense of his misogynistic and anti-religious statements, Jean states that his words are like arrows shot with no individual in his aim; if someone claims to have been wounded by stepping in front of them, that is their own fault.

By translating into the vernacular portions of texts only hitherto accessible to those who could read or understand Latin, Jean de Meun performed an important service to a burgeoning community of readers looking for texts in French. As Sylvia Huot has shown, evidence from the manuscripts copied in the two centuries following the work's composition, in the form of adjustments or rewritings of the text, marginal doodles and notes, and manuscript illuminations, suggests strongly that readers were deeply engaged in many of the above issues. To mention only one example, it is clear from illuminators' (and rubricators') attempts to portray the figure of Fair Welcoming, shuttling back and forth between the gender of the personification and the gender of the woman he allegorically stands for, that they were alternately appalled and intrigued by the gender issues thus raised.

Querelle of the Rose

But it was not until Christine de Pizan sharply attacked the Rose in 1401—thus spurring on an epistolary debate, known as the querelle of the Rose, that lasted until late the following year—that we get a clear picture of what readers actually thought about the work. Christine was in particular incensed by Jean de Meun's defamation of women in general; his profanity, which she found unacceptable, especially in the company of women; and the closing scene of the romance, which depicts the taking of the castle protecting the rose in terms that transparently suggest the mechanics of sexual intercourse. Although she was seconded by the highly distinguished theologian and preacher Jean Gerson, her opponents in the debate were representative of a clerkly class largely associated with the royal chancery. These men rallied around their "master," Jean de Meun, whom they undoubtedly admired as much for his absurdly comical misogyny as for the way he skirts the very limits of propriety. But the debate probably tells us as much about the unusual situation of a female within a male-dominated intelligentsia in the early fifteenth century as it does about interpretation. The interest that Christine's role in the querelle holds for us stems more from her willingness to attack male authority in order to establish her own reputation than from the uniqueness of her moral stance regarding marriage and sexual activity, essentially conservative and traditional in nature—one that made her an ally of the most illustrious preacher of her time. Thus, the profound interest that the Rose, a text that Sarah Kay has called “the most powerful investigation of textuality and sexuality in the French Middle Ages,” holds for a modern audience, while possibly shared by some medieval readers, was precisely what made it unreadable for Christine.

DAVID F. HULT

References and Further Reading

- de Lorris, Guillaume, and Jean de Meun. Le Roman de la Rose. 3 vols. Paris: Honoré Champion, 1965–1970.
- de Pizan, Christine, Jean Gerson, Jean de Montreuil, Gontier and Pierre Col. Le Débat sur le Roman de la Rose, edited by Eric Hicks. Paris: Honoré Champion, 1977.
- Gaunt, Simon. “Bel Accueil and the Improper Allegory of the Romance of the Rose.” New Medieval Literatures 2 (1998): 65–93.
- Hult, David F. “The Roman de la Rose, Christine de Pizan, and the querelle des femmes.” In The Cambridge Companion to Medieval Women’s Writing, edited by Carolyn Dinshaw and David Wallace. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2003, pp. 184–194.
- . “Words and Deeds: Jean de Meun’s Romance of the Rose and the Hermeneutics of Censorship.” New Literary History 28.2 (1997): 345–366.
- Huot, Sylvia. The Romance of the Rose and Its Medieval Readers: Interpretation, Reception, Manuscript Transmission. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- Kay, Sarah. “Sexual Knowledge: The Once and Future Texts of the Romance of the Rose.” In Textuality and Sexuality: Reading Theories and Practices, edited by Judith Still and Michael Worton. Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1993, pp. 69–86.

See also Christine de Pizan; Courtly Love; Defenses of Women; Eroticism in Literature; Feminist Theories and Methodologies; Gender Ideologies; Gerson, Jean; Literature, Old French; Misogyny; Obscenity; Ovid, Medieval Reception of; Personifications Visualized as Women; Rape and Raptus; Reader-Response Criticism; Romance, French; Woman Authors: Old French Texts

ROMAN DE SILENCE

Composed in the second half of the thirteenth century by Heldris de Cornuälle (Cornwall), this 6,706-line Old French romance recounts the adventures of a heroine named Silence. To elude King Ebain of England’s ban on female inheritance, Silence’s father, Count Cadour of Cornwall, raises her as a boy—a decision he describes in linguistic terms as the substitution of the Latin masculine declensional ending -us for the feminine -a (a bilingual pun, since us is Old French for custom or practice). As an adolescent, Silence becomes the object of a spirited debate between Nature and Nurture (Noretture). Convinced by Reason that “a man’s life was much better than that of a woman” (lines 2,637–2,638), Silence learns to excel as a knight and a minstrel. Finally, however, Silence is outed as a woman and (after the execution of the adulterous Queen Eufeme) married to the king, who reverses his previous prohibition on female inheritance.

Silence survives in only one manuscript, University of Nottingham Ms. LM. 6, published in 1972. Early strands of criticism highlighted issues of language and textuality, developing the allegorical promise inherent in the names of the major female characters (Silence, her mother, Eufemie, and Ebain’s wife, Eufeme). Other work examines the implications of Silence’s cross-dressing: should we read her success at chivalry and minstrelsy as a triumphant challenge to biological determinism, or should we see her eventual unmasking and marriage to Ebain as a strategy of containment, reemphasizing the subordinate role allotted to women in medieval patrilineal systems?

SHARON KINOSHITA

References and Further Reading

- Allen, Peter L. “The Ambiguity of Silence: Gender, Writing, and Le Roman de Silence.” In Sign, Sentence, Discourse: Language in Medieval Thought and Literature, edited by Julian N. Wasserman and Lois Roney. Syracuse: Syracuse University Press, 1989, pp. 98–112.
- Bloch, R. Howard. “Silence and Holes: The Roman de Silence and the Art of the Trouvère.” Yale French Studies 70 (1986): 81–89.
- Brahney, Kathleen J. “When Silence Was Golden: Female Personae in the Roman de Silence.” In The Spirit of the Court: Selected Proceedings of the Fourth Congress of the International Courtly Literature Society (Toronto 1983), edited by Glyn S. Burgess, et al. Dover, N.H.: Brewer, 1985, pp. 52–61.
- Heldris de Cornuälle. Le Roman de Silence, edited and translated by F. Regina Psaki. Garland Library of Medieval Literature 63B. New York: Garland, 1991.
- . Le Roman de Silence: A Thirteenth-Century Arthurian Verse-Romance by Heldris De Cornuälle, edited by Lewis Thorpe. Cambridge: W. Heffer and Sons, 1972.
- . Silence: A Thirteenth-Century French Romance, edited and translated by Sarah Roche-Mahdi. East Lansing, Mich.: Colleagues Press, 1992.
- Kinoshita, Sharon. “Heldris de Cornuälle’s Roman de Silence and the Feudal Politics of Lineage.” PMLA 110.3 (1995): 397–409.
- Psaki, F. Regina, ed. “Special Issues on Le Roman de Silence.” Arthuriana 7:2 (1997) and 12:1 (2002).

See also Cross-Dressing; Gender Ideologies; Inheritance; Literature, Old French; Patriarchy and Patrilineage; Romance, French

ROMAN LAW

Roman law has often been cited as an abiding source of legal restrictions on women in Western history. Indeed, women could not possess the sweeping parental powers entrusted to fathers (patria potestas), and they could not hold public offices or act as witnesses. Still, by the time of Justinian (527–565), few other legal restrictions remained on women in Roman law. Romans did not base guardianship of women originally on ideologically inscribed gender weakness (infirmitas sexus). Women simply were not able to act for others; they could not transcend a narrow range of interest—hence their inability to stand surety for others. Ideological gender conceits entered juristic discourse only under the influence of Hellenistic ideas and Christianity.

Male guardianship over women in Roman law was loosened over the centuries. This was largely the work of emperors and of the praetors, who were the chief judges of the most important Roman courts. This change was also the consequence of problems that arose in practice for families, especially those of wealth and prominence, as they dealt with legal restrictions on women whose agency and ownership of property were of potential use. One notable example is the edict of Augustus (30 BCE–14 CE) that freed from guardianship (tutela) those married women who had undergone three pregnancies and freedwomen who had had four.

Roman law rested on a variety of sources, but in the centuries of the Christian era two stood out—imperial legislation by rescript (replies to inquiries) and jurisprudential elaborations by learned experts. These latter were largely responsible for injecting the language of female inferiority into legal discourse, even as legislation opened wider areas of female autonomy. By the fifth century the sheer volume of imperial legislation on all subjects begged for some form of organization and clarifying reform. Theodosius II (408–450) took a significant step in that direction with promulgation of the Theodosian Code in 438. It arranged the imperial edicts since the first Christian emperor, Constantine (306–337), into sixteen books. No attempt was made to harmonize old laws with new; they simply sat in chronological order with the new presumed to supersede the old. Subsequently Burgundian and Visigothic kings gathered rules meant to apply to the Romans in their dominions, the Lex Romana Burgundionum and the Lex Romana Visigothorum (better known as the Breviary of Alaric).

Justinian first brought the Theodosian Code up to date, while also issuing constitutions that resolved conflicts in the laws. Laws issued after Justinian's

Codex were later gathered in another collection known as the Novellae. The important innovation he worked was the collection of jurisprudential wisdom in extracts grouped under various titles in fifty books—the Digest. A textbook known as the Institutes completed Justinian's legal reforms and publications. The entire product, later dubbed the Body of Civil Law (Corpus iuris civilis), became the basis for the revival of jurisprudence, starting in Italy, and for the elaboration of Roman rules in practice from the twelfth century onwards. It was especially the Digest, as a depository of sophisticated interpretive techniques, that influenced the later law and the methods of those who studied and applied it. The language of female weakness came with it, reinforcing similar statements and presumptions that had come to grace portions of the growing body of canon law.

The effects of Roman law on women were mixed. Their exclusion from holding patria potestas (paternal authority), while they were left under the potestas (authority) of their own fathers, meant that they were not fully under the control of their husbands. Justinian also notably reduced the husband's control over dowry during marriage and guaranteed the wife priority in claims against her husband's estate for return of her dowry. For this and other reasons, one scholar has concluded that "women living in the last centuries of the empire had a greater legal capacity than their sisters in any historical period before the twentieth century" (Arjava, p. 265). Germanic laws, canon law, and local customs in the course of the Middle Ages reduced women's realm of action and legal capacities in many regards, although there would be areas in which their legal prerogatives would remain strong or even stronger (such as their guardianship of their own children). Yet Roman law also never treated women as equal to men. Its exclusion of them from public office and its limitations on their citizenship, along with its emphasis on agnation (tracing descent through the paternal line) in defining kinship and laying out lines of inheritance meant that women were always subordinate in relation to men. Equality of the sexes was just inconceivable to the Romans and the medieval people who drew on their law.

THOMAS KUEHN

References and Further Reading

- Arjava, Antti. Women and Law in Late Antiquity. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1996.
- Bellomo, Manlio. The Common Legal Past of Europe, 1000–1800, translated by Lydia G. Cochrane. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America Press, 1995.

ROMAN LAW

- Nicholas, Barry. An Introduction to Roman Law. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1962.
- Stein, Peter. Roman Law in European History. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1999.
- Thomas, Yan. "The Division of the Sexes in Roman Law." In A History of Women in the West, edited by Georges Duby and Michelle Perrot. Vol. 1: From Ancient Goddesses to Christian Saints, edited by Pauline Schmitt Pantel. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1992, pp. 83–137.

See also Law, Canon; Law Codes, Barbarian; Legal Agency

ROMANCE, ENGLISH

Vernacular readers (and listeners) in late medieval England—including, of course, women—would have known romance as the default category for all nonreligious narrative. In Chaucer's Troilus and Criseyde (about 1385), when Pandarus visits his niece, he finds her and her all-female household enmeshed in the Romance of Thebes, which one of the group reads aloud from a deluxe, "coffee-table" manuscript. The scene models a form of reading that is at once ordinary and desirable, a source for these women not simply of pleasure but also of cultural capital, in a way that foreshadows novel reading four centuries later. In the poem, Criseyde takes her place among the highest ranks of society; though a bit later she suggests that her uncle, as a proper guardian, ought to be pressing didactic reading upon her, it seems clear that her devotion to romances of this sort is an acceptable, even attractive, use of her leisure time. In the Prologue to the Legend of Good Women (1388?), a "sequel" to the Troilus, Chaucer invents a fictional yet persuasive scenario concerning women's engagement with modern romances, suggesting that reading these stories produces a direct impact on the thought and behavior of female audiences. Dante, in his episode of Paolo and Francesca in the Inferno, portrayed an Arthurian romance as a galeoto, a pimp sponsoring an illicit affair. Chaucer, on the other hand, through this scene in Criseyde's "paved parlour," suggests that romances might function as artifacts and opportunities for the formation of same-sex reading communities. In this, the poem reflects evidence that networks of female readers—within circles of acquaintances, households and extended families, and religious orders—shared written texts and "communing" or discussion about them during the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries.

Though surviving documents specify mainly religious works as reading matter, individual women did own and share copies of romances: Chaucer's granddaughter Alice owned Lydgate's Siege of Thebes (1466); Anne Paston owned a Romance of Thebes (1472); another fifteenth-century book owner seems to have made her own copy of Sir Degrevant; and a variety of Arthurian romances contain inscriptions by female owners and readers. Nearly 150 English romances have come down from the Middle Ages, and references suggest that nearly that number again may have been lost to us. The more popular of these did not "target" women audiences, as Chaucer seems to have done. Though they prize spectacle and masculine adventure over psychological realism or refined sentiments, reading and listening to these romances appealed to women alongside men.

THOMAS HAHN

References and Further Reading

- Meale, Carol M., ed. Women and Literature in Britain, 1150–1500. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- TEAMS Middle English Texts. (Reliable versions of scores of romances.) <http://www.lib.rochester.edu/camelot/teams/tmsmenu.htm>.

See also Book Ownership; Chaucer, Geoffrey; Criseyde; Dante Alighieri; Literacy and Reading; Vernacular; Literature, Middle English; Romances of Antiquity

ROMANCE, FRENCH

Romance arose in the mid-twelfth century not as a fixed genre but as the result of a process of translation: the mise en romans—the reworking into the Romance vernacular—of texts previously known only in Latin. Composed in octosyllabic rhyming couplets, the Romans de Thèbes, de Troie, and d'Enéas, collectively known as the Romances of Antiquity (c. 1155–1165), adapted classical legends to the tastes of a lay, noble audience. As translations from Latin—Western Christendom's official language of truth—these inaugural texts carried their own justification, exemplifying the motif of translatio studii: the historical transmission of letters from Greece to Rome to the West.

Within a generation, written French had gained sufficient cachet to support the translation of tales from the Celtic tradition. An important transitional text was Wace's Roman de Brut (1155), a translation/adaptation of Geoffrey of Monmouth's Historia regum Britanniae, which first introduced King Arthur to French-speaking audiences. Wace's account of a twelve-year peace during which Arthur founded the Round Table provided the backdrop for the five romances of Chrétien de Troyes: Erec et Enide, Cligès, Yvain, Lancelot, and Perceval (c. 1170–1190). These texts established the pattern of the lone protagonist striking out from court in search of adventure and introduced two themes—Lancelot’s illicit love for Guenevere and the enigma of the Grail—destined to dominate thirteenth-century Arthurian literature. Stories of the adulterous love of Tristan and Iseult (Isolde) constitute this period’s second major corpus—its exploration of the power of illicit passion forming a counterpoint to Chrétien’s emphasis on conjugal love in Erec, Cligés, and Yvain. Versions of Tristan by the Anglo-Normans Bérout and Thomas d’Angleterre survive only as fragments, while the Folies of Oxford and of Berne focus on the brief episode of Tristan’s feigned madness. (The subsequent diffusion of this Arthurian material into German and Spanish literatures in the late twelfth and early thirteenth century—yet a further stage of translatio—is sometimes ascribed to the influence of Henry II of England and Eleanor of Aquitaine’s daughters Mathilda and Eleanor, who married the king of Castile and the duke of Saxony, respectively.) Other works of this period include Floire et Blancheflor (contemporary with the Romances of Antiquity but set in the Muslim Mediterranean); Partonopeus de Blois; and Gautier d’Arras’s Eracle and Ille et Galeron (in which Breton or French protagonists triumph over Roman or Greek antagonists, winning royal brides in the process). Finally, the Lais of Marie de France—French literature’s first named female author—present many romance themes in a briefer narrative form.

The thirteenth century brought a reorganization of the Old French literary system, perhaps in response to the rapid political and social transformations of the day: the triumph of the French monarchy over the great princes in whose courts romance had flourished; King John’s loss of his continental lands (1204), hastening the development of a distinctive “insular” Anglo-Norman romance tradition; and a disillusionment with chivalric ideals following the perversions of the Fourth and the Albigensian Crusades. Amidst these and other changes, Jean de Meun’s Romance of the Rose or Guillaume de Dole introduced two significant innovations: the incorporation of lyric pieces (some well known and independently attested) into its verse narrative, producing a kind of medieval musical; and its use of a “realistic” setting, featuring numerous proper names identifiable with local sites and recognizable contemporary figures.

The two most important transformations were the development of prose and the turn to allegory. Old French prose appeared suddenly in the early thirteenth century in reaction to suspicions concerning the “truth value” of vernacular verse. First used in translations of Latin historiographies, it soon spilled over into romance: La Fille du comte de Pontieu (called the first French nouvelle or short story) combined a cross-cultural Christian–Saracen plot with a local realism resembling that of Guillaume de Dole. Of greater significance was the Lancelot-Grail (c. 1220–1240). Also called the Vulgate or Pseudo-Map cycle, this monumental compilation of five texts—L’Estoire del Saint Graal, L’Estoire de Merlin, Lancelot, La Queste del Saint Graal, and La Mort Artu—expanded, embellished, and Christianized the adventures of Lancelot and Perceval, synthesizing previous Arthurian plots and characters into one comprehensive cycle held together by the narrative technique of interlace. In the 1230s Guillaume de Lorris’s Romance of the Rose introduced another significant shift, transforming the romance plot of the love quest into the allegorical dream-vision of a first-person narrator, penetrating the Garden of Delight to reach the beautiful Rose at its center. In the 1270s, Guillaume’s 4,000-line romance was “completed” by Jean de Meun’s 18,000-line “continuation,” which adapted the poem’s allegorical scaffolding to the presentation of philosophical and scientific debates. Both elements—the allegorical dream-vision and the propensity to philosophical debate—substantially influenced the development of fourteenth-century French literature.

Representations of Women and Gender

Traditional histories represent romance as replacing the masculine world and collective feudal values associated with Old French epic with a more refined and feminine world of courtly ideals. (More recent criticism rejects this simple binarism, noting epic’s inclusion of numerous important female characters as well as its continued popularity throughout the late Middle Ages.) Correspondingly, twelfth-century romances are often read as the chivalric Bildungsroman of a hero seeking to balance the demands of love and arms: Enéas, who must reject Dido’s all-consuming passion to get on with the founding of empire; Erec, who must expiate his uxoriousness by putting Enide in her place; and Yvain, who must win back Laudine’s love through a series of challenging adventures.

What of the romance’s female protagonists? Does the fascination exerted by an impassive belle dame sans merci over her would-be lover constitute power, or does it simply idealize the objectification of women within medieval society? The agency wielded by female characters varies widely in nature and degree.

In the Roman d'Enéas, the Carthaginian queen Dido and the warrior-queen Camille excel in the masculine arenas of political and military power, yet each meets a violent end. Conversely, Lavine is a sheltered princess with no tangible power except over Enéas's heart. Yet through her lengthy monologues (introducing Ovidian love casuistry into the nascent romance tradition) she becomes a subject of desire, invested with a psychological depth reflecting twelfth-century humanist concerns. Ultimately, this focus on Lavine's inner thoughts ensures that her eventual marriage to Enéas conforms to reformist ecclesiastical definitions of marriage, requiring the consent of both partners.

Similar complexity attends the representation of women as speaking subjects. As Arthur's queen, Guenevere speaks authoritatively and as a wise counselor. Iseut speaks duplicitously, her ambiguous oaths capitalizing on the ambiguities inherent in language to conceal her adultery from Mark. Conversely, Enide breaks into speech only to lament her very existence: here the emergence of an interior consciousness marks not the privilege of the humanist subject but the disempowerment of a poor vassal's daughter with no claim to public speech.

The motif of the adulterous queen, whose infidelity threatens to contaminate the king's lineage and disrupt his relationship with his vassals, reflects the apprehension surrounding the high social and political stakes of women's sexuality. Farther down the social scale, the so-called "wager romances" depict a malicious outsider falsely impugning a young woman's reputation through his secret knowledge of a distinctive mark on her body (Guillaume de Dole, the Roman de la Violette; cf. Decameron II.9). Finally, the anxiety surrounding women is confirmed in the motif of the substitutability and reduplication of female objects of desire. In Tristan, Iseut's servant Brangien takes her place in the queen's marriage bed lest Mark notice his bride is no longer a virgin; an exiled Tristan later marries a second Iseut in compensation for his loss of the queen. In Gautier d'Arras's Ille et Galeron, the Breton noble Ille exchanges the count of Brittany's sister, Galeron, for the Roman emperor's daughter, Ganor; his children by these two successive wives include two daughters, each named Idoine. In Galeran de Bretagne (derived from Marie de France's Fresne), the titular protagonist is torn between his love for the foundling Fresne and her twin sister, Fleurie.

In these varied literary representations, romance reveals the centrality of women to feudal society, inseparable from the perplexity their influence triggered in the medieval imaginary.

SHARON KINOSHITA

References and Further Reading

- Bloch, R. Howard. Medieval Misogyny and the Invention of Western Romantic Love. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1991.
- Crane, Susan. Insular Romance: Politics, Faith and Culture in Anglo-Norman and Middle English Literature. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1991.
- Duggan, Joseph J. The Romances of Chrétien de Troyes. New Haven: Yale University Press, 2001.
- Haidu, Peter. "Romance: Idealistic Genre or Historical Text?" In The Craft of Fiction: Essays in Medieval Poetics, edited by Leigh A. Arrathoon. Rochester, Mich.: Solaris, 1984.
- Jean de Meun. The Romance of the Rose or Guillaume de Dole, translated by Patricia Terry and Nancy Vine Durling. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1993.
- Kay, Sarah. The Chansons de Geste in the Age of Romance: Political Fictions. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1995.
- Kibler, William W., ed. The Lancelot-Grail Cycle: Text and Transformations. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1994.
- Kinoshita, Sharon. Medieval Boundaries: Rethinking Difference in Old French Literature. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2006.
- Krueger, Roberta L., ed. The Cambridge Companion to Medieval Romance. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000.
- McCracken, Peggy. The Romance of Adultery: Queenship and Sexual Transgression in Old French Literature. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1998.
- Ollier, Marie-Louise. "Utopie et roman arthurien." Cahiers de Civilisation Médiévale 27:3 (1984): 223–232. Reprinted in Marie-Louise Ollier, La forme du sens: textes narratifs des XIIe et XIIIe siècles, études littéraires et linguistiques. Orléans: Paradigme, 2000, pp. 217–231.

See also Arthurian Literature; Chrétien de Troyes; Courtly Love; Floire and Blancheflor; Guinevere; Isolde; Literature, Old French; Marie de France; Patronage, Literary; Roman de Flamenca; Roman de la Rose and Its Reception; Roman de Silence; Romance, English; Romance, German; Romances of Antiquity; Translation

ROMANCE, GERMAN

Medieval romances are book-length, verse narratives distinguished by plots involving chivalry, love affairs between high-born women and men, and complex female characters. They first appear in the German language in the 1170s, flourish during the thirteenth century, and are still read in the early sixteenth century. The earliest German romances are adaptations of Old French texts. The cross-cultural exchange of these texts testifies to the emergence of a new, trans-European, aristocratic, secular identity in the High Middle Ages. Romance narratives were frequently adapted and altered to suit the tastes and interests of new audiences. This malleability may have contributed to their long life.

There is a great deal of evidence for this enduring popularity. A large number of different romance texts circulated in German-speaking lands. The practice of making new manuscript copies of twelfth- and thirteenth-century romance texts continued into the first decades of the sixteenth century. Romance stories were used to adorn the dwelling places of the wealthy. Medieval wall paintings and textiles, such as bed hangings, that feature figural representations of well-known romance narratives have survived in German-speaking lands. All the major strands of romance literature are represented in German-language versions. These include the widely popular adventure romances, such as the Floire and Blancheflor stories (Konrad Fleck); the Arthurian romance tradition (Hartmann von Aue; Wolfram von Eschenbach); the Tristan tradition (Gottfried von Strassburg; Eilhart von Oberg); the Gawain tradition (Wirnt von Grafenberg; Heinrich von dem Türlin); and the Lancelot tradition (Ulrich von Zatzikhoven; the anonymous text translated from Old French known as the Prose Lancelot). Later in the thirteenth century, German authors such as the Minnesang poet Ulrich von Liechtenstein, Rudolf von Ems, Konrad von Würzburg, Johann von Würzburg, der Stricker, and der Pleier renewed and expanded romance literature.

ANN MARIE RASMUSSEN

References and Further Reading

- Jackson, W. H., and S. A. Ranawake, eds. The Arthur of the Germans: The Arthurian Legend in Medieval German and Dutch Literature vol 3. Arthurian Literature in the Middle Ages. Cardiff: University of Wales, 2000.
- Pincikowski, Scott E. "Female Pain—Female Eroticism: The Eroticization of the Female Body in Pain in Hartmann von Aue's Courtly Epics." In Nu lôn' ich iu der gâbe: Festschrift for Francis G. Gentry, edited by Ernst Ralf Hintz. Göttingen: Kümmerle, 2003, pp. 211–225.
- Rasmussen, Ann Marie. "Medieval German Romance." In Cambridge Companion to Medieval Romance, edited by Roberta L. Krueger. Cambridge, U.K.: Cambridge University Press, 2000, pp. 183–202.
- Rushing, James A., Jr. Images of Adventure: Yvain in the Visual Arts. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1995.
- Sterling-Hellenbrand, Alexandra. Topographies of Gender in Middle High German Arthurian Romance. New York: Routledge, 2001.
- Sullivan, Joseph M. Counsel in Middle High German Arthurian Romance. Göttingen: Kümmerle, 2001.

See also Arthurian Literature; Floire and Blancheflor; Gottfried von Strassburg; Guinivere; Isolde; Literature, German; Minnesang; Romance, French; Wolfram von Eschenbach

ROMANCERO

The medieval Spanish ballad-singing tradition, or Romancero, is made up of individual texts known in Spanish as romances. The texts, composed anonymously beginning in the fourteenth century or earlier, typically describe events of the distant past, whether real or imaginary. Their themes offer a popular and dramatic vision of Spanish history, from the Muslim invasion of the eighth century through the reconquest of the Muslim kingdom of Granada in the fifteenth century. The first printed romances date from the sixteenth century, although romances continue to be discovered today throughout the Iberian peninsula, Latin America, and the Judeo-Spanish diaspora. In modern times, romances have sometimes served the purpose of lullabies, sung by mothers to young children at bedtime. As such, they are sometimes seen in the context of women's song. There is no fixed text to a romance, so singers and poets have often reinterpreted a particular romance, giving rise to a new version or variant. The romance of the rape of Lucretia by Tarquino, described in the fifteenth-century Spanish Romancero, is one salient example. The story of the rape of Lucretia by a Roman tyrant was transformed by twentieth-century Judeo-Spanish singers into a story about the steadfast refusal of a Jewish woman to marry a Christian man. Structurally, romances are arranged in couplets, with assonance at the close of each couplet. Lines nearly always include eight syllables.

Both structure and content have played an important role for scholars in analyzing the Romancero tradition. A number of theories have been offered to explain the extraordinary persistence of romances, beginning with seminal work in Spain in the nineteenth century that argued that the texts were fragments of medieval epic poems, and continuing with work by Spanish scholars in the early decades of the twentieth century. Theories of "formulistic diction" in Romancero composition, put forth by Ruth House Webber in the mid-1900s, and underlying "deep structures" in the Romancero corpus, advanced by Diego Catalán later on, focus on how linguistic elements of the texts enable singers of the romances to keep the tradition alive. But work on the themes of the texts—love, sex (including rape), marriage, honor, and so on—suggest plausibly that romances may have survived because they promoted and perpetuated ideologies that were useful to successive generations of Spaniards and others who continued to sing them. Buetler, Catarella, Goldberg, Lanz, Mirrer, and others have argued that romances often advance gender stereotypes; for example, they show women—particularly queens and noblewomen—as lascivious, unfaithful, and dangerous to men. So-called fronterizo (frontier) and “morisco” (Moorish) romances, traditionally viewed as the last treasures of heroic poetry in Spanish, often depict Muslim women improbably, as eager for sex with Christian men, or as pure, but sexually ripe, tempting Christian men to rape them. Such stereotypes, these scholars argue, stoked antifeminist behavior and motivated antifeminist legislation. Gender stereotypes promoted in the romances may also have helped stimulate completion of the reconquest and presaged exclusion of Muslims and Jews from Spain by feminizing “other” men, describing them as wearing richly colored garments, engaged in passive activities, and unable to keep and satisfy their women.

LOUISE MIRROR

References and Further Reading

- Buetler, Gisela. “Some Remarks on the Moorish Ballads in Spain and Elsewhere.” In Ballad Research: The Stranger in Ballad Narrative and Other Topics, edited by Hugh Shields. Dublin: Folk Music Society of Ireland, pp. 171–182.
- Burshatin, Israel. “The Docile Image: The Moor as a Figure of Force, Subservience, and Nobility in the Poema de mio Cid.” Romance Quarterly 31.3 (1984): 269–280.
- Catarella, Teresa. “Feminine Historicizing in the romancero novelesco.” Bulletin of Hispanic Studies 67.4 (1990): 331–343.
- Cruz, Anne J. “The Politics of Illicit Love in the ‘Pedro el Cruel’ Ballad Cycle.” Scandinavian Yearbook of Folklore 48 (1992): 1–16.
- Goldberg, Harriet. Motif-Index of Folk Narratives in the Pan-Hispanic Romancero. Tempe, Ariz.: Arizona Center for Medieval and Renaissance Studies, 2000.
- . “Two Parallel Medieval Commonplaces: Antifeminism and Antisemitism in the Hispanic Literary Tradition.” In Aspects of Jewish Culture in the Middle Ages: Papers of the Eighth Annual Conference of the Center for Medieval and Early Renaissance Studies, SUNY Binghamton, edited by Paul Szarmach. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1979, pp. 85–119.
- Lanz, Eukene Lacarra. “Political Discourse and the Construction and Representation of Gender in Mocedades de Rodrigo.” Hispania Review 67.4, Lloyd Homage Issue (1999): 467–491.
- MacKay, Angus. “The Ballad and the Frontier in Late Medieval Spain.” Bulletin of Hispanic Studies 53 (1976): 15–33.
- Mirror, Louise. Women, Jews & Muslims in the Texts of Reconquest Castile. Ann Arbor, Mich.: University of Michigan Press, 1996.
- Ratcliffe, Marjorie. “Adulteresses, Mistresses, and Prostitutes: Extramarital Relationships.” Hispania 67 (1984): 346–350.

See also Ballads; Courtly Love; Epic, Spanish; Femininity and Masculinity; Gender Ideologies; Iberia; Jewish Women; Muslim Women: Iberia; Muslim Women: Western Literature; Rape and Raptus; Sexuality, Regulation of; Woman’s Song

ROMANCES OF ANTIQUITY

The Romans d’Antiquité, three of which were written within five years at the English court of Henry II and Eleanor of Aquitaine, represent a major shift in twelfth-century historiographical and literary practice. These vernacular romances combine a medieval fascination with genealogy, heroism, and legitimacy with extravagant accounts of a distant, heroic past. The tone is didactic and inspirational, corresponding almost certainly to Henry II’s desire to strengthen his claim to Trojan ancestry. This claim, already exploited by the Capetian royal family in France, carried with it great prestige but also legendary liabilities: the Trojans actually failed to secure their kingdom, and they had an inconvenient penchant for sodomy. The romances are, therefore, explicitly ideological: they construct and bolster a royal and imperial identity while advocating a new form of popular humanism. Present in different forms in earlier French epics, this celebration of victory over adversity, of founding narratives and adherence to divinely ordained missions, would go on to inspire the major courtly romances of the following century.

The Roman de Thèbes, the Roman d’Enéas, and the Roman de Troie (manuscript Bibliothèque Nationale fonds français 60 contains all three) thus provide impressive proof of the erudition of twelfth-century scholars. Most of the stories were gleaned either from extant manuscripts of original sources (in the case of the Eneas) or from later medieval translations/adaptations of the material (in the case of the Troie). To a much greater degree than in the feudal epics, these classically inspired texts introduced into historical romance a form of psychological analysis. Their interest in the development of the young male hero, his introduction to erotic fantasy, and its culmination in love and/or marriage still left ample room for discussion of women. These earliest of medieval romances are also distinguished by their structure; they are chronological and comprehensive narratives that stretch across continents and generations. They may pretend to be constructing illustrious classical civilizations, but their building blocks are the stuff of the present: fashionable rhetoric, octosyllabic verse, feudal justice and combat, and a frank examination of contemporary sexual mores.

The role of fate is still central, but adherence to feudal norms and Christian values has replaced the rule of the Classical gods. The ethical dilemmas now point to new intellectual influences and a struggle between the secular and the religious, the feudal and the monarchic. In the Thèbes, for example, women may be described largely as erotic icons but, following the model of Statius’ Thebaid, they are also figures of wisdom and righteousness. Jocasta, mother and wife of Oedipus, is a respected leader and negotiator, and it is an army of women (albeit led by men) who succeed in tearing down the wall of Thebes, thereby enacting their own revenge. Antigone is deprived of her heroic role in burying the dead and defying patriarchal law, but she is given a role as love interest of Parthonopex, a military leader of the Arcadian enemies, and this couple serves as a tool by which to critique war.

In the Troie also, love stories share the spotlight with feudal battles, but it is in the Enéas that this juxtaposition attains its most innovative and subversive force, most strikingly when the medieval text diverges from the Virgilian model. The heroines, Dido, Camilla, and Lavinia, embody three medieval models of femininity. Dido is driven by her passions to self-destruction; the virginal Camilla is completely committed to a higher goal; and Lavinia is the young innocent, the victim of love redeemed through suffering. Woven into the narratives surrounding these heroines is an inordinate amount of attention given to homoeroticism, far exceeding that found in Virgil's account. Nisus and Euryalus' story is given much greater prominence, and in death the two martyrs are elevated to the status of perfect lovers (ll. 4,941–4,954). Eneas delivers a long and emotional oration over the dead body of the boy warrior, Pallas (sixty-two lines [6,185–6,213] as opposed to Virgil's three), that resembles in many ways the Nisus/Euryalus same-sex plaint. Finally, Camilla, the woman warrior, is highlighted first through a vicious attack on her inappropriate gender identification (ll. 7,073–7,106), then through the funeral oration of her ally, Turnus, who mourns her as a genderless beloved, in the very terms of the earlier two eulogies for same-sex alter egos.

The principal conflict between same-sex and other-sex love surfaces in the pairing of Eneas and Lavinia, and it is framed through a mother–daughter conflict. When Lavinia first sees Eneas, love strikes, but her mother denounces him, claiming in graphic terms that all Trojans are sodomites. Her daughter's erotic obsession and emotional swings lead to one of the most surprising discussions of sexuality in the Middle Ages. Sodomy is seen as completely natural but foreign, a despised but always available alternative whose presence can be felt even in the marriage bond and bed. The text's candor and humor alert us to the fact that such topics were under discussion in 1160. However, the face-off it features between the two species of men (to use the queen's term), from a woman's point of view, are belied by the text's own evident investment in gender ambiguity and same-sex attraction. Such a daring portrayal of erotic relations and misunderstandings would have huge implications for the development of romance over the following century.

WILLIAM E. BURGWINKLE

References and Further Reading

- Blumenfeld-Kosinski, Renate. "Old French Narrative Genres: Toward the Definition of the Roman Antique." Romance Philology 34 (1980): 143–159.
- Burgwinkle, William E. "Knighthood and the Classical Hero: Homo/Hetero Affectivity in Eneas." Exemplaria 5.1 (1993): 1–43.
- . Sodomy, Masculinity, and Law in Medieval Literature: France and England, 1050–1230. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2004.
- Cormier, Raymond J. One Heart One Mind: the Rebirth of Virgil's Hero in Medieval French Romance. University, Miss.: Romance Monographs, 1973.
- Eneas, Roman du XIIe siècle*, edited by J.-J. Salverda de Grave. Paris: Honoré Champion, 1985.
- Eneas: a Twelfth-Century Romance*, translated with introduction and notes by John A. Yunck. New York and London: Columbia University Press, 1974.
- Gaunt, Simon. "From Epic to Romance: Gender and Sexuality in the Roman d'Eneas." Romantic Review 83.1 (1992): 1–27.
- Huchet, Jean-Charles. Le Roman Médiévale. Paris: PUF, 1988.
- The Medieval French Roman d'Alexandre*, edited by E. C. Armstrong, et al. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1937–1976.
- Poirion, Daniel. Ecriture Poétique et composition Romanesque. Orléans: Paradigme, 1994.
- Le Roman d'Alexandre*, translated with introduction and notes by Laurence Harf-Lancner. Paris: Livre de poche, 1994.
- Le Roman d'Enéas*, edited and translated with notes and introduction by Aimé Petit. Paris: Livre de poche, 1997.
- Le Roman de Thèbes*, edited and translated with notes and introduction by Francine Mora-Lebrun. Paris: Librairie Générale Française, 1995.
- Le Roman de Troie*, edited and translated with notes and introduction by Emmanuèle Baumgartner and Françoise Viellard. Paris: Livre de poche, 1998.
- Ross, David J. A. Studies in the Alexander Romance. London: Pindar, 1985.
- Statius, P. Papinius. The Thebaid, translated by A. D. Melville. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1995.
- Virgil. The Aeneid, translated by Robert Fitzgerald. New York: Random House, 1983.

See also Amazons; Eleanor of Aquitaine; Epic, Old French; Eroticism in Literature; Femininity and Masculinity; Literature, Latin; Literature, Old French; Marriage, Christian; Queer Theory; Romance, French; Sexuality: Male Same-Sex Relations; Sexuality, Regulation of; Virile Women

ROSARY

The rosary is a devotional method that combines meditation on fifteen scenes from the Life of Christ and the Virgin with the recitation of fifteen decades of Hail Marys demarcated by Our Fathers. The scenes are divided into three groups: the Joyful, the Sorrowful, and the Glorious mysteries, centered on Christ's Infancy, Passion, and Resurrection. The rosary finds its antecedents among several Marian devotions circulating in northern Europe in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries; it existed in numerous variations until its codification in the late fifteenth century. In this period the devotion witnessed tremendous growth due to the efforts of the observant Dominicans of the Congregation of Holland, who founded a universal brotherhood dedicated to the rosary in 1475. This confraternity, headquartered in Cologne with branches throughout Europe, was open to all members of Christian society regardless of age, class, or gender. The emphasis on private prayer made the confraternity especially attractive to women. Extant roll books indicate that women, both lay and religious, comprised at least half of the confraternity's membership.

The term rosary also designates the strands of beads upon which the repeated prayers are counted. In addition to their devotional function, rosaries were believed to possess apotropaic (able to ward off or combat evil) properties. Since members of the confraternity were encouraged to wear them in public, rosaries became important fashion accessories, as can be seen in numerous fifteenth-century northern European portraits. Rosaries were often made of precious materials such as coral, pearls, and amber and adorned with pomanders of delicate gold or silver filigree.

ESPERANÇA CAMARA

References and Further Reading

Winston-Allen, Anne. Stories of the Rose: The Making of the Rosary in the Middle Ages. University Park: The Pennsylvania State University Press, 1997.

See also Confraternities; Devotional Practices; Dominican Order; Jewelry; Lay Piety

ROSE OF VITERBO

Rose (1233–1252) was born in Viterbo, a city divided between proimperial and propapal factions. The proimperial Ghibellines, who dominated Viterbo, were tolerant of the presence of heretics in the city. Rose, according to her earlier vita, was converted at a young age by a vision of the crucified Christ. She began roaming the streets of Viterbo carrying a cross and exhorting the residents to embrace the orthodox faith and moral conversion. Rose's attacks on heresy caused the authorities to exile her. She carried on her preaching ministry in nearby towns. After the Emperor Frederick II died as Rose had prophesied, she was able to return to Viterbo. Rose sought to enter the local convent of the Poor Clares, but they turned her away. The nuns may have feared disruption of their lives by an outspoken young woman. The same monastery accepted her body for reburial six years after her death. It is uncertain whether Rose belonged to an informal group of penitent women linked to the Franciscans, but she was not a tertiary, as was recorded by later hagiographers.

Rose was accepted as a prophet by ecclesiastical authorities, possibly because she attacked heretics. Moreover, her public pronouncements were exhortations to belief and good conduct, not formal sermons. The papacy also accepted Rose as worthy of admiration, but she was not canonized until 1457. Her example was held up for veneration but not for imitation by women. A cycle of paintings illustrating Rose's life was painted in Viterbo by Benozzo Gozzoli just before her canonization, but it is lost. Rose is regarded as a patron saint of Viterbo.

THOMAS IZBICKI

References and Further Reading

Pryds, Darleen. "Proclaiming Sanctity through Proscribed Acts: The Case of Rose of Viterbo." In Women Preachers and Prophets through Two Millennia of Christianity, edited by Beverly Mayne Kienzle and Pamela J. Walker. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998, pp. 159–172.

Rusconi, Roberto. "Women's Sermons at the End of the Middle Ages: Texts from the Blessed and Images of the Saints." In Women Preachers and Prophets through Two Millennia of Christianity, edited by Beverly Mayne Kienzle and Pamela J. Walker. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998, pp. 173–195.

Weisenbeck, Joan, and Marlene Weisenbeck. "Rose of Viterbo: Preacher and Reconciler." In Clare of Assisi: A Medieval and Modern Woman, edited by Ingrid Peterson. Clarefest selected papers. St. Bonaventure, N.Y.: The Franciscan Institute, 1996, pp. 145–155.

See also Heretics and Heresy; Italy; Lay Women, Religious; Poor Clares Order; Prophets; Sermons and Preaching

RUSSIA

The position of medieval Russian women from the inception of the Kievan realm in the ninth and tenth centuries to the late fifteenth century remains a challenging subject since the sources are slanted toward privileged and exceptional women and mostly express legal or religious norms rather than women's historical activities or attitudes. Still, recent studies of birch-bark documents recovered from the swamps of the city of Novgorod strongly suggest that aristocratic and wealthy women of this period acquired a level of functional literacy and were able to use their reading and writing skills to carve out a meaningful role for themselves.

A clear understanding of the role of women in the Kievan period (from the ninth through the end of the twelfth century) is difficult because of the complex layering of pagan and Christian norms and practices during this period. While some scholars argue that the practices of bride capturing, polygamy, and pagan festivals encouraging sexual activities amongst early East Slavic tribes gave both Kievan men and women an opportunity to enjoy sexual freedom, it is not clear how easy it was in reality for women to pick their own mates. The unsuccessful struggle of Rogneda, a pagan wife of Grand Prince Vladimir (who in 988 converted Russia to Eastern Orthodoxy), to escape marriage to him, suggests that scholars may have romanticized pagan Kievan women, to whom chronicles often attributed magic healing powers, the gift of prophecy, physical strength, and cleverness. The latter quality is particularly ascribed to the most outstanding female of the Kievan period, Grand Princess Olga (d. 969), Vladimir's grandmother, who used her wit to take revenge on her husband Igor's murderers and to consolidate the Kievan realm during her regency for her son Sviatoslav. The fact that early Russian chronicles ascribe to Olga, who was the first Russian ruler to convert to Christianity, the gift of divine wisdom underscores the difficulty in distinguishing pagan and Christian values in this period.

While no other woman attained the same position as Olga in the Kievan realm, the sisters and daughters of the Kievan Grand Princes played important roles in the marital diplomacy of these rulers. In the eleventh century Iaroslav the Wise, who sought to establish ties with the West, married a younger sister to Kasimir of Poland and his daughters Anastasia and Anna to King Andrew I of Hungary and King Henry I of France. Iaroslav's son Vsevolod advanced the interests of his realm by marrying his daughter Eupraxia to the Holy Roman Emperor Henry IV and sending his daughter Anna (Ianka) on a mission to Constantinople for the selection of a new metropolitan to preside over the Russian church. None of these women seems to have been a mere pawn in a political game: French state documents of the 1050s contain Queen Anna's name in Cyrillic, suggesting her personal involvement in the politics of her new homeland. Eupraxia took the papacy's side against her husband in the struggle over investiture. Ianka, upon her return from Constantinople, founded a female monastery and Russia's first school for women.

Comparison of the twelfth-century expanded version of the Russkaia Pravda, Russia's first law code, and fifteenth-century legal charters and wills shows a strengthening of medieval Russian women's property and inheritance rights throughout this period. The Kievan code treated noble women's property as distinct from that of their husbands, favored sons over daughters in the inheritance of ancestral lands (otchina), and allotted to a widow only the portion her husband had assigned to her. From the fourteenth century on, an aristocratic couple's holdings were considered community property so that the wife could conclude contracts with her husband and become equally responsible for debts. After her husband's death she could come into full ownership of gifts and legacies and receive part of the estate in usufruct until she remarried. To keep the family property intact, daughters were allowed to inherit in the absence of sons.

The change in Russian women's economic rights and opportunities is documented in the written sources of the city-republic of Novgorod, which enjoyed a semiautonomous status in the post-Kievan period as a significant Russian trading center. Birch-bark documents, mentioned above, show that women of Novgorodian merchant families lent money but held only moveable property in the twelfth century. In the fourteenth century they received the legal right to the ownership and disposition of land, inherited the use of otchina land in addition to their portions, and often appeared as co-recipients of a patrimony along with their sons or even received the use of the entire property. Novgorodian women administered properties even during the lifetimes of their husbands or in the presence of grown sons. They carried out administrative duties associated with their family businesses and became involved in Novgorod's international fur trade. Novgorodian noble women could take oaths and give testimony, although only in their homes, and could personally fight in duels. In the fifteenth century a few widows of Novgorodian oligarchs resisted the centralization efforts of the Muscovite rulers, though in vain. Marfa Boretskaia, nicknamed "The Mayoress," who became one of the largest land holders in Novgorod, sought an alliance for her city-republic with Poland-Lithuania to fend off Ivan III's takeover of the city.

The rise of small principalities in Russia after the political and economic decline of Kiev gave the women of Russian princely families greater visibility. While most scholars have discounted any direct influence by Russia's new Mongol rulers on the social position of Russian women, the conflicts between individual Russian princes and their Mongol overlords gave these women a new role as peacemakers or defenders of their principality when the Mongol khan detained their husbands. During the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, the Grand Princes of Moscow in their wills elevated the position of their wives within their families to counter the pressure on the Grand Principality by their collateral kinsmen. The Grand Princesses actively promoted Moscow's centralization efforts by redistributing the patrimonial territories amongst their sons and maintaining peace between the heir to the throne and his junior brothers.

RUSSIA

ISOLDE THYRËT

References and Further Reading

- Goehrke, Carsten. "Die Witwe im alten Russland." Forschungen zur osteuropäischen Geschichte 38 (1986): 64–96.
- Lenhoff, Gail, and Janet Martin. "Marfa Boretskaia, Posadnitsa of Novgorod: A Reconsideration of Her Legend and Her Life." Slavic Review 59.2 (2000): 343–368.
- Levin, Eve. "Women and Property in Medieval Novgorod: Dependence and Independence." Russian History 10.2 (1983): 154–169.
- Pushkareva, Natalia. Women in Russian History: From the Tenth to the Twentieth Century, translated and edited by Eve Levin. Armonk, N.Y.: M. E. Sharpe, 1997.
- Thyrêt, Isolde. Between God and Tsar: Religious Symbolism and the Royal Women of Muscovite Russia. DeKalb, Ill.: Northern Illinois University Press, 2001.

See also Olga; Sophia Palaiologina

S

---

SAINTS

See Canonization of Saints; Hagiography; Hagiography, Iconographic Aspects of

SANUTI, NICOLOSA CASTELLANI

Known for one treatise, Ut mulieribus ornamenta restituantur (That Ornaments Be Restored to Women) (a copy survives at Vicenza and another in the Vatican, although it is attributed, probably erroneously, to Francesco Filelfo), Nicolosa Castellani Sanuti (d. 1505) composed a spirited defense of the virtue and dignity of women in 1453. In forbidding ornaments and fine clothes to women, the learned Greek Cardinal Legate to Bologna, Bessarion, had proposed a revised sumptuary law in 1453 that prompted Nicolosa's response. Her treatise was composed in expectation of Sante Bentivoglio's marriage to Ginevra Sforza, and apparently carried public opinion in Nicolosa's favor. She was widely known to have been Sante's lover, and her plea for women's right to wear their finery, their only means of conveying their rank, social status, and virtue or personal merit, met with a sympathetic audience.

Nicolosa was born into a prosperous Bolognese family and her substantial dowry as second wife to Nicolo di Giacomo Sanuti in 1446 may have helped her husband obtain a title as first count of Poretta, an area famous for thermal springs. Nicolosa participated in humanist circles that gathered at Poretta, and she earned frequent mention from scholars in Sante's court circle, almost always accompanied by mention of her beauty. But Nicolosa was not numbered among the learned women of fifteenth century Italy because she had no Latin. Her treatise was translated into Latin by an unknown scholar, possibly Filelfo, but more likely, according to Catherine Kovesi Killerby, Guarino da Verona. (Killerby, pp. 262–263).

Distinguishing mere vanity from proper pride Nicolosa argued that by wearing finery women could acquire public and political virtue. She ended her treatise with these words: "State offices are not allowed to women, nor do they strive for priesthoods, triumphs, and the spoils of war, for these are the customary prizes of men. But ornaments and decoration, the tokens of our virtues—these, while the power is left to us, we shall not allow to be stolen from us." (Killerby, p. 282).

SUSAN MOSHER STUARD

References and Further Reading

- Beyond Their Sex: Learned Women of the European Past*, edited by Patricia H. Labalme. New York and London: New York University Press, 1980.
- Frati, Ludovico. La Vita Privata di Bologna. Bologna: Zanichelli, 1928.
- Her Immaculate Hand*, edited by Margaret L. King and Albert Rabil. Medieval and Renaissance Texts and Studies 20, Binghamton, N.Y.: Center for Medieval and Early Renaissance Studies, 1983.
- A History of Women's Writing in Italy*, edited by Letizia Panizza and Sharon Wood. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000.
- Killerby, Catherine Kovesi. "'Heralds of a Well-Instructed Mind': Nicolosa Sanuti's Defence of Women and Their Clothes." Renaissance Studies 13.3 (1999): 255–282.

See also Cereta, Laura; Clothing; Fedele, Cassandra; Humanism; Italy; Literacy and Reading; Vernacular; Nogarola, Isotta; Sumptuary Law

SATAN

Satan is one name for the Devil in medieval tradition. This being, understood as the ultimate embodiment of evil in the universe, was also sometimes known as Lucifer and as the Ancient Enemy of the Human Race. Conventionally referred to by the male pronoun, Satan was conceived as a multiform being capable of shape-shifting and of deceiving human senses in many different ways. Although Satan had been part of Christian theology from the time of the primitive Church, the Fourth Lateran Council of 1215 was the first church body to make an official pronouncement of dogma concerning the existence and nature of the Devil and demons.

According to medieval cosmology, the Devil was created by God as an angel. Rather than worshiping his creator, however, he initiated an insurrection against the Lord. Medieval theologians sometimes envisioned this rebellion in materialist terms, suggesting that Satan sat upon the throne of God and received adoration from some of the other angels. Whatever the precise form of Satan's transgression against God, he and his followers were punished for the sin of pride by being cast forth from Heaven. Ever since, Satan engaged in war against God, presiding over his army of fallen angels (now transmuted into demons) and fomenting mayhem whenever possible. Satan's kingdom was located in Hell, usually understood as existing underneath the surface of the earth. Thus in addition to commanding his legions of demons, Satan also presided over a vast region of the human afterlife. Indeed, Satan actually fulfilled the mandates of divine retribution by tormenting the deceased sinners who were consigned to his keeping by God.

Satan appears in the Gospel accounts, tempting Jesus just after his baptism as he fasted for forty days and forty nights in the desert. The most important depictions of the Devil in scripture, however, occur in the first and the last books of the Christian Bible: Genesis and Revelation. Diabolic activity thus framed the entire history of humankind in the imagination of medieval Christians. The first three chapters of Genesis recount Adam and Eve's creation, first sin, and expulsion from the Garden of Eden. According to the text, a snake within the garden tempted Eve to eat the fruit of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, a fruit expressly forbidden by divine command. Medieval exegesis identified this snake with Satan, the fallen angel, who thus was held to bear some responsibility for the lapse into sin of the first human couple and their consequent banishment from the delights of paradise. The Book of Revelation foretells the events of the End Times, which center upon a vast world war of righteous believers against the armies of the unrighteous led by Satan and his lieutenants. The text is complicated and fraught with difficult symbolic language, but ultimately predicts the final triumph of God's faithful and the binding of Satan and his followers for all eternity.

The struggle against Satan and his demonic forces was viewed as an ongoing condition of human life throughout the generations from Adam and Eve until the End Times. Within this context of unceasing warfare, women occupied a particularly significant role. Since the book of Genesis relates that it was Eve who spoke with the snake, first ate the forbidden fruit, and then offered it to Adam, medieval (as well as many postmedieval) theologians felt justified in assigning the majority of the blame for the Fall to Eve (although some theologians, such as Aquinas, argued that Adam had to fall too for the human race to be condemned). The consequences of this position were momentous. Since Adam and Eve were regarded as prototypes for all subsequent generations of male and female human beings, Eve's preeminent role in the Fall translated into the perception that all women were more susceptible to demonic seduction than were men. Hence women often were termed the "weaker sex," a designation that referred not only to physical but also (indeed especially) to women's intellectual and moral abilities.

The period from the thirteenth through the fifteenth centuries marked a movement toward an ever-stronger sense of connection between the feminine and the demonic. Satan was sometimes represented as female during this period. For example William of Auvergne, the thirteenth-century bishop of Paris, argued that angels only appeared to humans in male guise, and demons only as females. Likewise, in an increasingly common iconography, the sculpted portals of Notre Dame cathedral in Paris show Eve succumbing to the temptation of a female-headed serpent, and several Italian frescoes of the Last Judgment portray the Devil with feminine bodily characteristics. By the end of the Middle Ages the link between the feminine and the demonic had become extremely intimate, thus setting the stage for the witchcraft persecutions that gained momentum in the 1430s and continued throughout the early modern period. In many (though not all) areas of Europe, the core of the witchcraft stereotype focused upon the willing connivance of a female witch with Satan, in the so-called diabolic pact.

NANCY CACIOLA

References and Further Reading

- Baschet, Jerome. Les justices de l'au-dela: Les Représentations de l'enfer en France et en Italie (XIIe – XVe siècle). Rome: École Française de Rome, 1993.
- Bernstein, Alan. The Formation of Hell: Death and Retribution in the Ancient and Early Christian Worlds. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1993.
- Caciola, Nancy. Discerning Spirits: Divine and Demonic Possession in the Middle Ages. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2003.
- Clark, Elizabeth. Women in the Early Church. Collegeville, Minn.: Liturgical Press, 1983, pp. 27–47.
- Kors, Alan, and Edward Peters. Witchcraft in Europe, 1100–1700: A Documentary History. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1972.
- McGinn, Bernard. Antichrist: Two Thousand Years of the Human Fascination with Evil. New York: Harper Collins, 1994.
- Quay, Paul. “Angels and Demons: The Teaching of IV Lateran.” Theological Studies 42.1 (1981): 20–45.
- Russell, Jeffrey Burton. The Devil: Perceptions of Evil from Antiquity to Primitive Christianity. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1977.
- . Lucifer: The Devil in the Middle Ages. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1984.

See also Eve; Spirits: Discernment of and Possession by; Theology; Witches

SCANDINAVIA

The Northern climate and geography imposed hardships on Scandinavians that left only a small margin between survival and starvation. Gender division in labor was necessary to make the individual farm function and enable society as a whole to continue. In principle, men performed the out-of-doors work, while women's domain was inside.

Economic Roles

Throughout their lives as daughters, sisters, wives, mothers, servants, and housekeepers, women bore and raised children, provided food for their families for both immediate and delayed consumption, and produced cloth for innumerable purposes, including clothing, bedding, and the indispensable sails for the Viking ships. Icelandic women's work at the loom was especially impressive; their cloth became so abundant that it replaced silver as a medium of exchange in domestic and foreign trade and became the denominator by which all values were expressed for purposes of fines, legal compensations, taxes, and tithes. The unit was the ell, the length of a grown man's arm from elbow to fingertip, and the “legal ell” became a length of six ells (about 3 m), the amount that previously could be bought with an ounce of silver. The primary export from Iceland consisted of cloth and coats until about 1300, by which time it was replaced by dried fish. Nonetheless, the monetary unit of lengths of cloth remained as testimony to the importance of women's work.

Plucking (and later shearing) the fleece from the sheep and washing clothes were not the only chores that brought women outdoors, although their work here depended on the terrain. Where animal husbandry dominated, as in Iceland, most of Norway, and the Swedish interior, women may have worked harder than elsewhere because they were also largely in charge of the animals. During the summer months they organized the transhumance, leading the animals to the pastures in the mountains where they remained, as well as preparing and conserving dairy products. Where agriculture was important, as in Denmark and the Swedish lowlands, women were needed in particular during the harvest. In addition they performed everywhere their ancient role of gathering berries, nuts, eggs, and seaweed that were free for the taking. In both types of agricultural societies opportunities for female employment outside the family was limited to domestic service. The economic upswing that began in Europe around 1100 and introduced urbanism was felt also in the North (with the exception of Iceland), but the employment opportunities for women in towns were minimal. Nonetheless, Bergen could boast both prostitutes and a guild of domestic female workers (the latter was outlawed, however, in 1295).

Marriage and Family

The Scandinavian population lived in nuclear families that were in turn organized in villages in Denmark and lowland Sweden and in hamlets or isolated farms in Norway and Iceland. The prevalent incest that came to light at the Reformation was undoubtedly also an endemic problem during the Middle Ages.

Fathers arranged the marriages of daughters, taking into consideration the economic and strategic interests of the family. Like the other Germanic tribes, the Scandinavians followed the computations of a binary kinship system whereby ancestors from both parents were counted. This is undoubtedly the reason that daughters inherited from their parents, if not equally, at least together with sons and often before more distant male relatives. A daughter normally received her inheritance when she married, but it was to be administered by her husband.

If he died before her, she retained her property as a widow. Spouses did not inherit from each other but passed their wealth on to their offspring. If they lacked children or these predeceased them, reverse or back inheritance allowed the last surviving spouse to inherit. Since women undoubtedly found themselves as the last heir more often than men, they were able to funnel property from their deceased husband and even from sons-in-law into their own family. These conditions can be ascertained both from Runic inscriptions and later laws. In fact, women are treated copiously in all Scandinavian laws; to be sure they are without equality with men, but occasionally they receive preferential treatment. Thus, the ecclesiastical burden of fasting is lightened for pregnant women and nursing mothers in the Icelandic Grágás; the same law enjoins men and women alike to support indigent mothers, going into debt if necessary. Court cases from the late Middle Ages in Norway and Denmark demonstrate that women at times were treated fairly and according to justice.

Religion

The religious interests of Scandinavian women were prominent. The polytheism of the pagan religion was more woman-friendly than Christianity; the pantheon included female divinities, and women played roles in worship and performed divination and sorcery. Except for Mary, patriarchal Christianity envisioned the godhead devoid of female elements and permitted no liturgical roles for women. Women were nonetheless among the first to join and heeded the churchmen's admonitions in offering donations. In Sweden, for example, runic inscriptions suggest that women provided for bridges and causeways to be built in order to facilitate communication; undoubtedly encouraged by churchmen, such acts were particularly useful during the missionary period. In Iceland female saints were especially popular, and the Virgin had special appeal for women as demonstrated by the numerous miracles she performed in their favor, according to the voluminous Maríu saga. It appears that many aspects of the church legislation benefited women, including the prohibition against infanticide and divorce, the emphasis on monogamy and fidelity, as well as the introduction of consent in marriage. Women undoubtedly considered the promise of a bright afterlife in the Christian Paradise more appealing than the dark Hell of paganism to which all women were condemned.

Because Christianity arrived in Scandinavia later than in the rest of Europe monasticism also was delayed. The female appetite for a religious life was particularly strong in Denmark where there were almost as many nunneries (albeit smaller and poorer) as male monasteries: twenty-two and thirty-one, respectively, by the middle of the thirteenth century. Sweden had six of each, Norway five nunneries, and Iceland one, to which a few anchoritic women who lived alone in the wilderness or attached to a small church, must be added. The monastic movement was Benedictine or Cistercian in inspiration, but in the late Middle Ages, Birgitta, a remarkable Swedish woman, contributed an order of her own that included both women and men. This Birgittine order spread not only in Scandinavia but also to England and throughout the Germanic lands where it contributed to reforming the Dominican order.

As elsewhere in Europe, in Scandinavia a few women became rulers in name or at times in fact. From the tenth century it is worth mentioning Gunnhildr who ruled Norway together with her husband Eirik, and after his death, with their sons. She gained her political goals through goading and inciting the men. In the eleventh century the Swedish princess Margareta was given in marriage to the Norwegian King Magnús and at his death in 1103 she married the Danish King Niels, thus prompting foreign observers to remark that "in Denmark the government was in the hands of a woman." Margrethe, queen of the so-called Kalmar Union of Denmark, Norway, and Sweden (1387–1412) is the preeminent example of a Scandinavian female monarch.

JENNY JOCHENS

References and Further Reading

- Blom, Grethe Authén. "Women and Justice in Norway c. 1300–1600." In People and Places in Northern Europe 500–1600, edited by Ian Wood and Niels Lund. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell Press, 1991, pp. 225–235.
- Jacobsen, Grethe. Kvindeskikkelser og kvindeliv i Danmarks middelalder. Copenhagen: Gad., 1986.
- Jochens, Jenny. "Gender Symmetry in Law? The Case of Medieval Iceland." Arkiv för nordisk filologi 108 (1993): 46–67.
- . Women in Old Norse Society. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1995.
- . Old Norse Images of Women. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1996.
- Nyberg, Tore. "On Female Monasticism and Scandinavia." Mediaeval Scandinavia 13 (2000): 181–197.
- Sawyer, Birgit. "Women as Bridge-Builders: the Role of Women in Viking-Age Scandinavia." In People and Places in Northern Europe 500–1600, edited by Ian Wood and Niels Lund. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell Press, 1991, pp. 211–224.

See also Birgitta of Sweden; Birgittine Order; Clothwork, Domestic; Family (Later Middle Ages); Household Management; Incest; Infants and Infanticide; Inheritance; Literature, Old Norse; Margrethe; Marriage and Concubinage in Scandinavia; Monasticism and Nuns; Paganism; Prophets, Nordic; Supernatural Women; Work

SCHOLASTICISM

Scholasticism is a term that designates both a significant intellectual movement of the twelfth through fourteenth centuries and a significant change in the social location of medieval education. It coincides, furthermore, with a period of social, economic, and political change that began in the mid-eleventh century and flourished in the twelfth and of which Scholasticism was itself an integral part.

As an intellectual movement, Scholasticism was primarily theological, although it gave rise to intellectual consequences outside of the field of theology. It was both continuous with the intellectual life that preceded it and yet marked by new themes and new methods. The Carolingian reforms in theological education mark its beginning. Under the influence of Alcuin (735–804), theologians addressed themselves to the careful grammatical study of the biblical text and the use of Aristotelian categories in discerning its meaning, and they did so in newly created “schools” founded by the major cathedrals within the Carolingian orbit. By the late eleventh century, scholars had developed an acuity in the use of logic that allowed them to ask new philosophic questions of the biblical text. The work of Anselm of Canterbury (1033–1109) and Abelard (1079–1142), among others, illustrates the competence of these prescholastic theologians in discourse about such themes as the rational argument for the existence of God and the methodological strategy for resolving intellectual contradictions within the work of previous theologians.

Aristotle

By the late twelfth century, other works of Aristotle were available to the scholars. Muslim scholars had preserved the Aristotelian texts themselves and had studied them for centuries. Gradually both the work of Aristotle and that of his Muslim commentators, in Latin translations, made their way into the chief Christian centers of study, principally the University of Paris, where they began to influence the thinking of those who studied the artes (the disciplines that grew out of the old trivium and quadrivium) and the theologians. Nourished by this fertile mix of classical philosophy, Islamic thought and theological concerns, Scholasticism achieved its full flowering. It would foster wide-ranging debates over the relationship between faith and reason, especially in Paris. In Oxford, Robert Grosseteste (c. 1175–1253) and Roger Bacon (c. 1214–1294) would lay the intellectual foundations of experimental science, while Thomas Aquinas (c. 1225–1274) in Paris would eventually recast the whole body of Christian theological thought into the ten categories of Aristotelian logic, creating a new marriage between Christian theology and classical philosophy.

None of this escaped the notice of Church authorities. They first moved to forbid the Parisian theologians from studying Aristotle, although the arts masters were free to continue with their pursuit of the ancient philosopher. In 1277, the bishop of Paris, Etienne Tempier, set up a commission to review the work of the Parisian scholars; a list of various suspect theories of the theology faculty, including many of Thomas Aquinas’s were drawn up, ready for condemnation. Apparently the master of the Dominicans succeeded in having the case referred to Rome, but before the pope (John XXI) could confirm the condemnation, he was accidentally killed by falling masonry in his study. The condemnation never took place, and Aristotelianism remained a potent force in the universities.

Impact of Scholasticism on Women

As an intellectual movement, Scholasticism had a deepening negative effect on the status and understanding of women within the Christian tradition. Prescholastic theologians had indeed absorbed and perpetuated the negative attitudes of Neoplatonic philosophy of the classical Christian period, especially those of Augustine, to whom early medieval theology was particularly indebted. Nonetheless, early medieval theology was largely a matter of biblical interpretation, and its practitioners, schooled by the monastic method of lectio-divina (divine reading), read the biblical text in the light of their own lives and their lives in the light of the sacred text. This meant that the actual experiences of known women and their accomplishments often balanced, even if they did not always outweigh, the philosophical presuppositions that discredited them. But once Aristotelian dicta about the nature of women were thoroughly integrated into Christian theology, philosophical convictions prevailed against practical experience and even, in some cases, the implications of the biblical text and Christian doctrine. Hence, when a theologian like Aquinas considered the questions of whether women could be ordained or could function as authentic prophets, his answers relied explicitly and authoritatively on Aristotelian natural philosophy in which women were considered “misbegotten males.”

Education

As a significant change in the social location of education, Scholasticism also served further to restrict the already limited activities of women in the public sphere. In the early Middle Ages, education took place usually in the home or in monasteries. Social attitudes generally favored the education of males rather than females, but religious authorities encouraged biblical literacy as the foundation of Christian life, and women of the upper classes, at least, had access to the study of Latin grammar, rhetoric, and logic as the necessary skills for reading the Bible and the other Christian texts. Like their male counterparts, nuns required literacy skills as a condition of their vocation, and aristocratic women who were in charge of large households were required to see to the Christian education of those dependent upon them. Even when cathedral schools became part of the educational structure, they did not replace monastic or tutorial education, nor, more significantly, did they change the standard curriculum. The goal of monastery, cathedral, and domestic education was the same—competent reading and interpretation of the Bible and its theological commentators. Further, the structure of the curriculum was the same for all educational venues: a modified version of the classical trivium—grammar, rhetoric, and logic—and quadrivium—arithmetic, geometry, music, and astronomy. When a woman did become educated, she was learned in precisely the same way as her educated male counterpart and, potentially, a conversation partner with him. Granted that many fewer women than men received such an education, but recent and continuing research indicates that more women of the eighth to the twelfth centuries were significantly educated than was once supposed.

With the rise of Scholasticism there arose also a new educational institution, the university. The universities developed out of the independent lectures offered in Paris by men like Abelard and in Oxford by such as John of Salisbury (1120–1180) in locations that were essentially storefront lecture halls, not connected to already existing cathedral schools. The origins of the earliest universities are obscure; by the early thirteenth century, however, they were well organized as associations of students and teachers, modeled after the trade guilds, to withstand outside pressure and civic surveillance but also to monitor the admission of students and of scholars into the teaching positions or “chairs.” The universities were thoroughly new places of learning, essentially independent, governed by the independent scholars who worked there and confirmed by charters granted by the city. Ordination to minor orders soon became a condition of matriculation at the universities, and women were thus institutionally excluded, a situation that endured in European universities until the early twentieth century. The universities soon became the seed-bed for ecclesiastical and secular leadership and the new learning based on Aristotle, the requisite training for exercising influence in Church and society. From these, women were explicitly and carefully excluded. Whereas in the twelfth century, Hildegard of Bingen (1098–1179) could counsel kings and popes because of her learning as well as her mystical visions and Abelard’s own lover, Heloise (1101–1164), could be commended by the abbot of Cluny for her learning and religious leadership, women of the thirteenth century and beyond would be denied the kind of education that would allow them influence in the world.

MARIE ANNE MAYESKI

References and Further Reading

- Bouchard, Constance B. Every Valley Shall be Exalted: The Discourse of Opposites in Twelfth Century Thought. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2003.
- Chenu, Marie-Dominique. “The Masters of the Theological Science.” In Nature, Man, and Society in the Twelfth Century. Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1968, pp. 270–309.
- Evans, G. R. Old Arts and New Theology. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1980.
- Mayeski, Marie Anne. “Excluded by the Logic of Control: Women in Medieval Society and Scholastic Theology.” In Equal at the Creation: Sexism, Society, and Christian Thought, edited by Joseph Martos and Pierre Hegy. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1998, pp. 70–95.
- Pieper, Josef. Scholasticism: Personalities and Problems of Medieval Philosophy, translated by Richard and Clara Winston. New York: Pantheon Books, 1960.
- Rubenstein, Richard E. Aristotle’s Children: How Christians, Muslims and Jews Rediscovered Ancient Wisdom and Illuminated the Dark Ages. Orlando, Fla.: Harcourt, 2003.

See also Aristotelian Concepts of Women and Gender; Education, Lay; Education, Monastic; Heloise; Hildegard of Bingen; Literacy and Reading; Latin; Literacy and Reading; Vernacular; Theology; Universities

SCOTLAND

The study of medieval women developed in Scotland much later than in most of Europe, partly because of the later development of social history and partly because of the relative lack of sources. Most published work has only appeared since the late 1990s. Most research has focused on lowland Scotland; the lives of highland women have been as yet little explored.

Few records exist before c. 1050, although the Roman historian Tacitus reported a conversation involving the wife of Argentocoxos, a Celtic chief, c. 210. Scotland's name is derived in an origin legend from Scota, reputed daughter of Pharaoh, who married a Greek prince and escaped with him to Spain. Their descendants settled in Ireland and later Scotland. The Picts, the early inhabitants of Scotland, may have followed a matrilineal succession system, although this has been much-debated.

Women become more visible from the eleventh century, with Gruoch, wife of MacBeth (1140–1156). More influential was Queen Margaret (d. 1093, canonized 1250), a princess of the English dynasty displaced by William the Conqueror in 1066. She married King Malcolm Canmore and helped introduce European religious and cultural influences to Scotland. She has been both praised and criticised for attempting to bring the practices of the Scottish church more into line with those of the Roman church. Her daughter Matilda (also known as Edith) married Henry I of England. Other royal consorts during the Middle Ages also played significant roles during and, in some cases, after their husband's reign.

War with England marked much of the fourteenth century. "Black Agnes," countess of Dunbar, defended her castle against English siege forces for five months in 1338, while Isabel, countess of Buchan, deserted her husband in 1306 and helped crown his enemy, Robert Bruce, as king of Scots in defiance of Edward I of England. Edward showed little mercy to those who defied him, imprisoning Isabel in a cage in a tower for several years. Many other Scotswomen also suffered from the ravages of war, although some also cooperated and acted as spies or suppliers to the occupying forces.

Women's legal position in lowland Scotland was similar to that elsewhere in Europe, although highland marriage practices may have been more flexible, with concubinage more acceptable and divorce easier to obtain. Scotswomen kept their own surnames upon marriage. A woman brought a tocher (dowry) to the marriage; her husband endowed her with a dower for her widowhood. Wives and their property came under their husbands' authority; a wife kept control only of her paraphernalia, her personal dress and jewelry. However, marriage contracts often mitigated the strict letter of the law. Despite official restrictions on wives' ability to sue or handle large sums of money without their husband's consent, court records show many wives carrying out the transactions needed to care for their families. They even occasionally acted as procurators (legal representatives) for others in court. Unmarried women and widows had legal independence.

Opportunities for monastic life were relatively rare, although there was, possibly, an earlier Celtic tradition of women's religious communities. Fifteen religious houses were founded after 1100, although four were later suppressed. Few were centres of learning. Some girls' schools existed by 1500. The earliest surviving woman's signature comes from 1493. Literacy was not widespread, although some noble women wrote poetry. Two daughters of James I, Margaret, dauphine of France (1424–1445), and Eleanor, archduchess of Austria-Tyrol (1427–1480), became celebrated for their literary accomplishments. A countess of Argyll wrote Scottish Gaelic poems in the late fifteenth century.

Women played an important role in the economy. Some girls were apprenticed, but more probably spent time as domestic servants before marrying. Women are most visible in the towns, where they headed between ten and twenty percent of households. Women could become burgesses, although few did. Several widows became prominent merchants; Isobel Williamson had customers throughout Scotland and supplied the royal household in the 1470s. Others were their husbands' factors in their absence. Women dominated the brewing trade until 1500 and beyond. Women were also employed as bakers, candle-makers, bonnet-makers, spinners, midwives, and wet nurses. Many earned their living as hucksters or petty retailers, supplying goods in small quantities to the urban poor. Some women earned a living through prostitution, although, as it was not heavily regulated, this trade only rarely appears in the records. A few women held town offices—Marjorie Schireham acted as Dundee customs collector in the 1320s and, when several customs collectors were killed in battle against England in 1513, their widows replaced them. Future research will reveal more of these and other Scotswomen's lives.

ELIZABETH EWAN

References and Further Reading

- Brotherstone, Terry, Deborah Simonton, and Oonagh Walsh. Gendering Scottish History: An International Approach. Glasgow: Cruithne Press, 1999.
- Dunnigan, Sarah M., C. Marie Harker, and Evelyn S. Newlyn. Woman and the Feminine in Medieval and Early Modern Scottish Writing. Houndmills: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004.
- Ewan, Elizabeth and Maureen M. Meikle, Eds. Women in Scotland c.1100–c.1750. East Linton: Tuckwell Press, 1999.
- Ewan, Elizabeth, Sue Innes, Sian Reynolds, and Rose Pipes. A Biographical Dictionary of Scottish Women. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 2006.

Marshall, Rosalind K. Virgins and Viragos: A History of Women in Scotland from c.1080 to 1980. London: Collins, 1983.

———. Scottish Queens 1034–1714. East Linton: Tuckwell Press, 2003.

See also Alewives and Brewing; Dowry and Other Marriage Gifts; Eleanor of Scotland; Margaret of Scotland; Marriage, Christian; Monasticism and Nuns, Celtic; Queens and Empresses: The West; Work

SEALS AND SIGILLOGRAPHY

A western medieval seal is a mark of authority impressed from an engraved matrix upon a malleable material (wax, lead, gold) and attached to a written document so as to signify the seal user's commitment to the document's content. This documentary function of the seal, which operated at the levels of representation, identification, authorization, and validation, developed within the papal and royal chanceries of the early Middle Ages, remaining an exclusive male prerogative until the eleventh century. At that point, secular and ecclesiastical potentates undertook the issuance of sealed charters as part of their engagement with new formats of leadership. By the early thirteenth century, sealing's connotation of high status had evolved into a legal mode for committing oneself, extending rapidly, if hierarchically, to every stratum of medieval society. Patterns of seal diffusion register sensitivity to both status and gender, although the axis of gender only partially overlaps that of class.

The first female sealers, in the eleventh century, were at the royal rank: Matilda, queen of Henry I of England and Bertrada of Montfort, widow of King Philip I of France. Succeeding queens, abbesses, and aristocratic women followed suit, remaining the only female sealers until 1200. By the thirteenth century, however, a huge proportion of new female sealers belonged to the lesser nobility (gentry), to town dwellers, and to non-noble landowning families. While the diffusion of women's seal usage was largely concomitant with the male pattern, particularly after 1200, significant distinctions emerged both within female sealing practices and with respect to male usage.

Prior to 1200, high-ranking women had independently sealed transactions of various types, but by the mid-thirteenth century a regression in their seal usage had occurred, so that they sealed thereafter only in concert with their fathers, husbands, and sons, and only those acta involving their own property (personal estates, dowries, and dowers). Quite often, documents issued in the name of both spouses were authorized by the seal of the husband alone. Unmarried aristocratic women did not seal at all. By contrast, gentry and non-noble women seem to have had a more independent use of their seals: if unmarried, they sealed deeds in their own names; if married, they sealed a wide variety of deeds conjointly with their husbands, and not merely those involving disposition of their rights and property.

Seal legends, that is, the inscription bearing the names and titles of the sealers, also show a sharp cleavage between high-ranking and other women. Though all women were identified by reference to their position vis-à-vis male kindred (men typically were identified only with reference to men), aristocratic women tended to resort to patronymics, thus emphasizing filiation and ancestry. For gentry and non-nobles, who tended to display their names together with the names and titles of their husbands, conjugality as partnership was stressed. Heraldic bearings on seals further display a primarily male-centered lexicon for the formulation of female identity.

Women's seals carried as much power of authentication as male ones. No record ever seems to have been contested because it was sealed by a woman. However, such effectiveness extended only to documents issued in women's own names, while men might endow the transaction of a lesser person with publicity and with greater security by affixing their seals to the deed, even when they were not themselves principals to the transaction. That laywomen's seals operated at a private level is further highlighted by the sealing practices of queens, which were limited to documents concerning matters domestic and personal, their seals never being endowed with the symbolic value of the king's seal as representative of the authority of the state. In the monastic world, however, role and function trumped gender for seals of abbesses appear in contexts similar to those of abbots.

The leveling of gender asymmetry by office finds further exemplification in women's seal iconography. Images on seals were informed by a taxonomy centered less on individuality than on interpersonal relationships based upon membership within a kin or sociopolitical grouping. Prevalent iconography on male seals is role oriented, and costume is functionally specific. Kings are enthroned, robed in regalia; bishops and abbots appear in liturgical vestments; armed lords are mounted; craftsmen display their professional equipment. When women had a recognized function with an equivalent in the male world, their seals registered this function. Abbesses displayed a cross and monastic robes signaling their equal status by an image identical to that on abbots' seals. Not so for queens, however, who were shown crowned and holding a scepter but not in the enthroned posture of majesty that characterized the king's seal. As for noble women, the elegant and fashionable rendering of the garments clothing the slender effigies that appear on their seals, typically holding a fleur-de-lis or a hawk, places the female body in an attitude of sexual attractiveness. There is no display of function unless it is physicality. Their two principal attributes ambivalently symbolize women: from its strong association with the Virgin Mary, the fleur-de-lis evokes the importance of motherhood, and thus of women in the biogenetics of lineage, however paradoxically given the ideal of virginity. The hawk signals courtly life but in medieval literature it often stands for female beauty and cruelty.

Thus, the seals of religious women, creatures virgin and continent, were unrestricted in their use and in their explicit demonstration of function. The seals of wives, sexually active creatures ruled by men, operated privately and connoted motherhood and kinship only indirectly through the emblematic system of heraldry and the metaphorical fleur-de-lis. Significantly, holy women, chief among them the Virgin Mary, received on seals natural depictions of biological and affective lives. Religious institutions did not discriminate between male and female saints in their choice of seal iconography; male ecclesiastics indeed showed a marked preference for displaying the Virgin Mary on their seals. There thus occurred on seals a displacement whereby natural roles were shifted from living persons toward holy females. As a result, the representation of living women on their own seals was of woman qua woman. Gender was the function that constituted and defined the natural woman's identity. Such an identity set women outside the order of society that was principally defined by gradations of male status. In terms of this overall iconographic pattern, the stereotyped image of the natural woman reveals a cultural template whereby men in groups were seamlessly bounded by the feminine.

BRIGITTE MIRIAM BEDOS-REZAK

References and Further Reading

- Bedos-Rezak, Brigitte. "Women, Seals and Power in Medieval France, 1150–1350." In Women and Power in the Middle Ages, edited by Mary Erler and Maryanne Kowaleski. Athens Ga.: University of Georgia Press, 1988, pp. 61–82. Reprinted in Bedos-Rezak. Form and Order in the Middle Ages. Studies in Social and Quantitative Sigillography. Aldershot: Ashgate, 1993. No IX.
- . "Medieval Women in French Sigillographic Sources." In Women and Sources of Medieval History, edited by Joel T. Rosenthal. Athens Ga.: University of Georgia Press, 1990, pp. 1–36. Reprinted in Bedos-Rezak. Form and Order in the Middle Ages, No X.
- Harvey, Paul D. A., and Andrew McGuiness. A Guide to British Medieval Seals. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1996.

Stieldorf, Andrea. Rheinische Frauensiegel: Zur rechtlichen und sozialen Stellung weltlicher Frauen im 13. und 14. Jahrhundert. Cologne: Böhlau, 1999.

See also Abbesses; Art, Representations of Women in; Body: Visual Representations of; Clothing; Coinage; Gender in Art; Hagiography, Iconographic Aspects of; Heraldry; Legal Agency; Mary, Virgin: in Art; Noble Women; Queens and Empresses: The West

SECRETS OF WOMEN

"Secrets of Women" (in Latin, Secreta mulierum) is the common title of a quasi-genre of texts, the most famous of which was written near the end of the thirteenth century and often bears a false attribution to the great Dominican theologian Albertus Magnus (d. 1280). Other texts with the same or similar titles were either selections from gynecological works (most commonly the Trotula) or material on generation and sex differences gathered from various natural philosophical (what we would call "scientific") traditions. Although these texts reflect no formal area of intellectual inquiry, collectively they show a pattern of thought increasingly common in the late Middle Ages.

Probably the earliest text to bear the title "secrets of women" was a French adaptation of the sections of the Trotula (a Latin compendium on women's medicine) in which the sections on fertility were crafted into a sermonlike work addressed to laywomen and men. The Trotula and other gynecological texts would be similarly adapted in later years, though usually for male audiences only. For example, compilers in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries often took the Trotula and trimmed it of most of the sections on general pathology; what remained were the chapters on menstruation, infertility, and childbirth, the topics most immediately concerned with how the female body becomes and can remain reproductively active.

The pseudo-Albertan text follows this pattern of compiling lore on women's reproduction but also moves beyond it, using small selections from the Trotula and fusing them into a longer text that addressed various aspects of the generation of the child, from the physiology of menstruation to planetary influences on the developing fetus. Pseudo-Albert (who may have been a student of the great Dominican theologian) adapted elements of Albertus's Aristotelian views. He also culled together other lore about the female body, including Pliny's misogynistic litany of the effects of menstrual blood. The text is presented as a private tutorial from master to student and is prefaced by a warning that it ought not be shown to those who were still boys, either in age or in moral development.

Pseudo-Albert's Secrets of Women circulated widely in central and northern Europe, and to a lesser extent in France and Italy. It was translated into Czech, Dutch, French, German, and Italian, and received at least five different commentaries, two of which enjoyed particularly wide circulation. With the advent of print technology in the latter half of the fifteenth century, the Latin text was printed at least fifty different times prior to 1500 by German and Dutch presses. It would go on to have an extraordinary medieval afterlife well into the nineteenth century, especially in its reincarnation in the work known as Aristotle's Masterpiece.

Texts bearing the label "secrets of women" found three distinct audiences. First, surprisingly given the derivative nature of their content, they were often employed by medical practitioners as a source of information on female fertility, one of the areas in which male practitioners were claiming expertise from the thirteenth century on. In Dutch, French, and Italian translation, these "secrets" texts were often used by surgeons. The second group was clerics, very often preachers who copied the text into volumes containing sermons, grammar textbooks, or rules on consanguinity. Several copies even include it alongside tracts on witchcraft. The third group, who are represented most commonly among the owners of the German translations, were laymen who apparently wanted more knowledge of the processes of generation that were "hidden" from them in the recesses of the female body. Oddly, a Dutch translation claims to be addressed to the author's lady love. Christine de Pizan recognized the fundamental misogyny of the text, famously condemning it in her City of Ladies as "a treatise full of lies."

Neither the Trotula nor the pseudo-Albertan text were particularly useful sources of information on female anatomy or physiology; that they should nevertheless have been exploited so incessantly for over two centuries suggests how intense the desire for knowledge of the female body was. By the end of the Middle Ages, physicians moved away from the pseudo-Albertan text, basing their knowledge instead on the anatomical dissections then commonplace in Italy and on their own experience treating female patients. The Secrets of Women retained its popularity among clergy who continued to perpetuate the text's misogyny as popular lore. Indeed, it has been suggested that this text played a contributing role in the creation of negative stereotypes of women at the beginning of the most intense phase of the witchcraft trials.

MONICA H. GREEN

References and Further Reading

- Bosselmann-Cyran, Kristian, ed. Secreta mulierum mit Glosse in der deutschen Bearbeitung von Johann Hartlieb. Würzburger medizinhistorische Forschungen, 36. Pattensen and Hannover: Horst Wellm, 1985.
- Green, Monica H. "'Traittié tout de mençonges': The Secrès des dames, 'Trotula,' and Attitudes Towards Women's Medicine in Fourteenth- and Early Fifteenth-Century France." In Christine de Pizan and the Categories of Difference, edited by Marilyn Desmond. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1998, pp. 146–178. Reprint in Green, Women's Healthcare in the Medieval West: Texts and Contexts. Aldershot: Ashgate, 2000, No. VI.
- . "From 'Diseases of Women' to 'Secrets of Women': The Transformation of Gynecological Literature in the Later Middle Ages." Journal of Medieval and Early Modern Studies 30 (2000): 5–39.
- Lemay, Helen, trans. Women's Secrets: A Translation of Pseudo-Albertus Magnus's De secretis mulierum with Commentaries. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1992.
- Salmon, Fernando and Montserrat Cabré i Pairet. "Fascinating Women: The Evil Eye in Medical Scholasticism." In Medicine from the Black Death to the Great Pox, edited by Jon Arrizabalaga, et al. Aldershot: Ashgate, 1998, pp. 53–84.
- Schleissner, Margaret R. "A Fifteenth-Century Physician's Attitude Toward Sexuality: Dr. Johann Hartlieb's Secreta mulierum Translation." In Sex in the Middle Ages: A Book of Essays, edited by Joyce A. Salisbury. Garland Medieval Casebooks, 3. New York: Garland, 1991, pp. 110–125.
- Schleissner, Margaret R. "Pseudo-Albertus Magnus: Secreta mulierum cum commento, Deutsch: Critical text and commentary." Ph.D. dissertation. Princeton University, 1987.

See also Aristotelian Concepts of Women and Gender; Christine de Pizan; Gynecology; Menstruation; Misogyny; Trota of Salerno; Witches

SENTIMENTAL ROMANCE

The Spanish "Sentimental" Romances are a diverse group of relatively short and highly innovative romances that flourished in Iberian literature from the 1440s to the middle of the sixteenth century. The twenty-odd works commonly designated as "sentimental" rather than "chivalric" romances are deeply preoccupied with gender and sexual relations. They chart the emotional and physical trials of ill-fated lovers and examine the forceful power—generally destructive—of desire. They also share a marked interest in questioning courtly constructs, including chivalry, courtly love, and monarchical power. In addition to these thematic concerns, the Sentimental Romances abound in intertextual allusions and employ hybrid formal structures, which include the insertion of lyrics, dialogue, debates, interpolated stories, allegories, and epistolary exchanges into prose narrative frames. This formal hybridity and inventiveness highlights the Sentimental Romances' decidedly self-conscious literariness; the interpolated letters, stories, and debates are accompanied by fictionalized acts of writing, reading, and interpretation.

Juan Rodríguez de Padrón's Siervo libre de amor (The Free(d) Servant of Love) (c. 1440) is generally listed as the first Spanish Sentimental Romance in literary histories. A visionary narrative based on conventional allegorical pilgrimages, Siervo relates the author-figure's own experience of the delights and devastation of romantic love and his ensuing journey to wisdom, envisioned as a difficult ascension toward the temple of Minerva. The narrator and author-figure also recites courtly lyrics and tells the tragic story of two star-crossed lovers who come to a violent end.

Diego de San Pedro and Juan de Flores are the two major and most studied authors of the Sentimental Romances. Their late-fifteenth-century works were enormously popular and went through multiple editions in Spanish as well as in English, French, and Italian translations. Both authors were associated with the court of the Catholic Monarchs, Isabel of Castile and Ferdinand of Aragon, where Juan de Flores served as a royal chronicler. In Diego de San Pedro's Arnalte y Lucenda (Arnalte and Lucenda) (1491), dedicated to Queen Isabella, and Cárcel de amor (The Prison of Love) (1492), the author-figure and narrator becomes an interlocutor and intermediary for his central characters, who are frustrated lovers. Both works incorporate dialogue, letters, and lyrics, and Cárcel de amor also inserts a lengthy debate on the nature of women into its narrative frame. The debate occurs when Cárcel de amor's hero Leriano, is languishing near death due to his unrequited and unconsummated love for Laureola, with whom he has exchanged a series of letters. A loyal friend tries to cure Leriano of his love sickness by detailing the evils of women, following the conventions of fifteenth-century misogynist writers. Leriano responds with an equally conventional defense of women.

Juan de Flores' Sentimental Romances date from the 1480s and 1490s. His Grisel y Mirabella (Grisel and Mirabella) revolves around the debate on women: the prohibited love between Grisel and Mirabella leads to royal and legal investigation into the collective guilt of either men or women in seduction. Flores resurrects two well-known literary characters to act as lawyers in the proceedings: to defend men's innocence, the arch-misogynist Pere Torrellas from the Iberian cancionero tradition; and to defend women, Braçayda, the character Criseyde from the legends of Troy. Although Torrellas is victorious in the proceedings, Braçayda and the other ladies of the court wreak violent vengeance upon him. Flores' resurrection of characters from other literary works and contexts is even more pronounced in Grimalte y Gradissa (Grimalte and Gradissa), where Gradissa demands that, in order to win her love, Grimalte must serve as a mediator between Fiammetta and Pamfilo, the protagonists of Giovanni Boccaccio's fourteenth-century Fiammetta. Grimalte is unsuccessful in his attempts to reunite Boccaccio's jilted heroine and unwilling hero, and thus his own desire will be forever frustrated. Two additional works by Flores, Triunfo de amor (The Triumph of Love) and La coronación de la señora Gracisla (The Coronation of Lady Gracisla) are also studied in conjunction with the Sentimental Romances.

Other works grouped within the Sentimental Romances include: the Sátira de felice e infelice vida (Satire of the Fortunate and Unfortunate Life) (c. 1453) by Dom Pedro, constable of Portugal; Luis de Lucena's Repetición de amores (Recitation on Love) (c. 1497); the anonymous Triste deleytación (Sorrowful Delectation) (c. 1458); and Pedro Manuel Ximenez de Urrea's Penitencia de amor (Penance of Love) (1514). The latest work read within the context of the Sentimental Romances is Juan de Segura's wholly epistolary Proceso de cartas de amores (Process of Love Letters) (1548). The ambiguous generic status, metafictional modes, formal inventiveness, and engagement with the broader debate on women and gender in late medieval Iberian letters and culture have generated prolonged critical debates on the meanings, intentions, and reception of the Sentimental Romances.

EMILY C. FRANCOMANO

References and Further Reading

- Brownlee, Marina Scordilis. The Severed Word: Ovid's Heroines and the Novela Sentimental. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1990.
- Cortijo Ocaña, Antonio, ed. Critical Cluster on the Sentimental Romance. La corónica 29.1 (Fall 2000): 5–229.
- . La evolución genérica de la ficción sentimental de los siglos XV y XVI: género literario y contexto social. London: Tàmesis, 2001.
- Deyermond, Alan D. The Middle Ages. Vol. 1 of A Literary History of Spain. London: Ernest Benn, 1971.
- Flores, Juan de. Grimalte y Gradissa. Edited by Pamela Waley. London: Tàmesis, 1971.
- . La coronación de la señora Gracisla. In Dos opúsculos isabelinos: La coronación de la señora Gracisla (BN MS. 22020) y Nicolás Núñez, Cárcel de Amor. Edited by Keith Whinnom. Exeter, U.K.: University of Exeter, 1979, pp. 3–47.
- . Triunfo de amor. Edited by Antonio Gargano. Pisa: Giardini editori e stampatori, 1981.
- . La historia de Grisel y Mirabella: Edición facsimile sobre la de Juan de Cromberger de 1529. Introduction by

- Pablo Alcázar López and José A. González Núñez. Granada: Editorial Don Quijote, 1983.
- Gerli, E. Michael. "Toward a Poetics of the Spanish Sentimental Romance." Hispania 72.3 (1989): 474–482.
- Grieve, Patricia E. Desire and Death in the Spanish Sentimental Romance, 1440–1550. Newark, Del.: Juan de la Cuesta, 1987.
- Gwara Joseph J. and E. Michael Gerli, eds. Studies on the Spanish Sentimental Romance (1440–1550): Redefining a Genre. London: Támesis, 1997.
- Matulka, Barbara. The Novels of Juan de Flores and Their European Diffusion: A Study in Comparative Literature. Geneva: Slatkine, 1974.
- Menéndez y Pelayo, Marcelino. Orígenes de la novela. 4 vols. Madrid: Bailly-Baillière, 1905–1915.
- Rodríguez del Padrón, Juan. Siervo libre de amor. Edited by Antonio Prieto. Madrid: Castalia, 1986.
- San Pedro, Diego de. Obras completas. 2 vols. Edited by Keith Whinnom. Madrid: Castalia, 1985.
- Whinnom, Keith. The Spanish Sentimental Romance 1440–1440: A Critical Biography. London: Grant and Cutler, 1983.

See also Boccaccio, Giovanni; Courtly Love; Debate Literature; Defenses of Women; Gender Ideologies; Isabel I; Literacy and Reading; Vernacular; Literature, Iberian; Lovesickness; Misogyny; Ovid, Medieval Reception of; Sexuality, Regulation of

SERMONS AND PREACHING

Medieval women claimed the Holy Spirit's inspiration as authority to proclaim the Word, whether inside religious communities or even in public settings. They preached, attended sermons, influenced the content of preaching, and disseminated its teaching. Reconstructing the activity of women as preachers proves more difficult than ascertaining their role as listeners. Very few sermon collections by women have been identified, notably those of Hildegard of Bingen (1098–1179), and Humility of Faenza (1226–1310). Moreover, ecclesiastical authors such as James of Vitry showcased women like Marie of Oignies for their devotion to sermons and preachers. Overall, male authors described female speech with caution, employing a variety of synonyms for discourse that would be classified as preaching if performed by an authorized man. Medieval debates swirled around the proper term for Mary Magdalen's resurrection testimony: some wary churchmen declared that she "announced" but did not preach the good news, while others hailed her as apostolorum apostola and retold the legend of her preaching in Provence. Modern historians, bound by fixed terminology, definitions, and narratives, have often passed over the voices of preaching women. Nonetheless, careful reading of varied sources reveals women engaged with the Word as producers and not only as consumers of sermons.

The Early Middle Ages

Saints' lives provide testimonies about the preaching of early medieval women when the texts include plausible accounts of daily events amidst legendary material. Holy women delivered discourses, called instruction or occasionally preaching, to audiences inside and outside the monastery. These utterances generally remain in the story's background among everyday pious activities, while ascetic feats or dazzling miracles occupy the narrative's foreground.

In the early seventh century, Baudonivia, a nun at the monastery of the Holy Cross in Poitiers, composed a vita of the founder, Radegund (c. 529–587), which resolutely recounts what the earlier biography by Venantius Fortunatus omitted. Writing under obedience to Abbess Dedimia and relying on testimony from sisters who included Radegund's contemporaries, Baudonivia praises the founder for her preaching, which she relates utilizing the verb praedicare. Baudonivia includes a brief sermon reported in direct speech, as Radegund "would often say when she preached to us" (p. 91). Baudonivia remarks that Radegund "never ceased to preach on what the reading offered for the salvation of the soul" (p. 92); furthermore, undoubtedly inspired by the vita of Caesarius of Arles, Baudonivia signals that Radegund preached while asleep.

In contrast, the male biographers of two learned Carolingian women, Leoba (d. 779) and Liutberga (d. 870), described their subjects as giving spiritual instruction to audiences, but avoided the verb praedicare. Leoba dreams that a purple cord comes forth from her innermost body—a sign that she would "speak" "wise counsels" from her heart. Called to assist Boniface in his missionary activity, she customarily gives "spiritual instruction" to her nuns; respected for her knowledge of Scripture and her wise counsel, she "discussed spiritual matters" with princes and prelates, and sometimes "held a conversation" with the brothers at Fulda. Liutberga, on the other hand, became a recluse at Windenhausen after years of giving spiritual counsel to the imperial family. Her vita, written by a monk of Halberstadt, recounts briefly that she gave any spare time she had to instructing the women who came to her cell.

When writing about thirteenth-century nuns at Helfta, Caroline Walker Bynum concludes that women who "grew up in monasteries were less likely to be influenced by the contemporary stereotype of woman as morally and intellectually inferior" (p. 185). Perhaps the same observation extends to the general perception of nuns and behavior within convents as compared to laywomen acting in public. Certainly when one contrasts the activities of Radegund, Leoba, and Liutberga with the fate of Theuda (c. 847), it is clear that within religious communities, preaching, teaching, and learning took place in greater freedom than outside convent walls. Rabanus Maurus, who commissioned Rudolf of Fulda to write Leoba's vita around 836, presided as the new archbishop of Mainz over the 847 synod that punished a laywoman for usurping the office of preaching. Theuda, called a pseudo-prophetess, claimed the authority of divine revelation for publicly preaching that the end of the world was imminent. Many believed her, brought her gifts, and commended themselves to her prayers. Interrogated at St. Alban's monastery and sentenced to public flogging, she reportedly put an end to her prophecies.

The Gregorian Reforms and After

The medieval hierarchy solidified as a result of the eleventh-century Gregorian Reforms and moved to deny the magisterium vocis, public preaching, and even interpretation of Scripture to all women. More or less contemporaneously, they attempted to restrain religious women with stricter rules of enclosure. The Fourth Lateran Council (1215) prohibited establishing new religious rules, and thereby new orders, at a time when women in increasing numbers sought to lead a religious life; at the same time Canon Ten specified that suitable men be recruited for preaching and marked a new emphasis on preaching as an instrument of education and propaganda. Literature designed for the office of preaching multiplied, including model sermons and preaching manuals. The latter also designated who held authority to preach and even to comment on Scripture. Thomas of Chobham's Summa de arte praedicandi allowed that female superiors might give moral instruction to their communities, but not "expound on Scripture by preaching" (sacram Scripturam predicando exponere) (p. 58).

Before the thirteenth century clamped down more tightly on women's religious expression, the extraordinary Hildegard of Bingen not only preached on the Scriptures to her nuns, who recorded the fifty-eight Expositiones evangeliorum, homiletic commentaries on the Gospels, but also addressed monastic communities and even mixed audiences during the four preaching tours she undertook from her monastery at Rupertsberg. Hildegard's public sermons delivered in Trier, Cologne, and Kirchheim were preserved in her letter collection. In contrast, emulation of Hildegard led to charges of demonic possession for Sigewize, who witnessed Hildegard's preaching tours and then imitated her but espoused Cathar beliefs.

Sigewize and her exorcism demonstrate the extent to which women's public discourse on religion could transgress accepted norms.

Contemporaneous with Hildegard, nuns at the Benedictine double monastery of Admont in Austria preached in their chapter meeting on feast days when the abbot or his deputy was unable to be present. Two manuscripts of sermons for feast days feature portraits of nuns, one holding a book and the other preaching. Abbot Irimbert (1172–1176) praised the nuns' skill in exegesis and probably benefited from their input in composing his scriptural commentaries.

At the turn of the next century, however, evidence that abbesses preached derives from the effort to silence them. Abbesses in the dioceses of Palencia and Burgos, notably at the Cistercian monastery of Las Huelgas, aroused Innocent III's astonishment and provoked a 1210 bull prohibiting them from blessing their own nuns, hearing their confessions, and preaching their interpretation of the Gospels.

Women as Audience

For medieval ecclesiastics, the appropriate relationship of women to sermons was that of listener. Vitae highlighted the thirst of holy women for sermons. James of Vitry describes Marie of Oignies as an avid listener and astute critic of his preaching. While Marie advised James on how to avoid homiletic failure, her public voice on theology sounded forth only in the songs she intoned on her deathbed. James was one of many preachers who addressed and composed sermons for lay and religious female audiences. Before the mendicant orders expanded the ministry of preaching to women and others, Robert of Arbrissel and Gilbert of Sempringham founded female-centered orders; Abelard wrote sermons for Heloise's community at the Paraclete, and the Cistercian Gilbert of Hoyland addressed some of his sermons on the Song of Songs to nuns.

Prominent churchmen and famous preachers such as Humbert of Romans (c. 1200–1277), minister general of the Dominican order, Gilbert of Tournai, Stephen of Bourbon, and Berthold of Regensburg composed sermons for female audiences. Friars and other clergy assumed the cura monialium, celebrating the mass, preaching, hearing confessions, and giving spiritual direction. Among the best known, Meister Eckhart (c. 1260–1328) preached to Cistercian, Benedictine, and Dominican women, Johannes Tauler (c. 1300–1361) addressed female audiences, and Heinrich Seuse (c. 1295–1366) served the sisters at Toss and elsewhere. Italian mendicants who preached to women include Giovanni Dominici (1356–1419), Bernardino of Siena (1380–1444), and Savonarola (1452–1498).

Numerous extant sermons provide model texts for preachers to address female audiences on moral behavior, including saintly exemplars such as the repentant Magdalen; praises of virginity and chastity; the proper relationships in marriage and family; the sacramentality of marriage against Cathar views and the idealized adultery of courtly literature; the instruction mothers should give their children on good faith and upright conduct; warnings on vices associated with women, such as loquaciousness, and in particular vanity—the target of sumptuary laws in prosperous communes. Sermon collections have been identified for many female audiences, including nuns, Beguines, tertiaries, young girls, married women, widows, and prostitutes. Moreover, compilations of exempla (brief anecdotes, historical or contemporary, for inclusion in sermons) feature stories with lessons for and about women.

Attentive listening led to criticism and praise of sermons and preachers. Mechthild of Magdeburg (c. 1208–1284 or 1297) reproached preachers as poor listeners, while Marguerite of Oingt (c. 1240–1310) defended a Franciscan preacher's account of the Passion against the objections of a Carthusian. A regular diet of sermons proved so crucial to religious women that when illness prevented Gertrude the Great (1256–1301/1302) from hearing a sermon, Christ appeared to console and to preach to her. In the rich spiritual and intellectual milieu at Helfta, Gertrude wrote her Herald of Divine Love with the collaboration of her sisters, who praise her quick mind and eloquent speech when her adept understanding of Scripture facilitated the edification of her listeners and the refutation of errors. The impact of the spiritual instruction Gertrude provided mirrors accounts of effective preaching when, "Some, through her words, were brought to repent and were saved" (Herald, p. 54).

German sister-books or convent chronicles, many from the fourteenth century, provide rich evidence for the impact of sermons. Upon hearing the word of God, Elsbeth von Beggenhofen, according to the Ötenbach chronicler, desired to cry out loudly from divine love, while Metze, sister of chronicler Anna von Munzingen, experienced rigid limbs. Sermons or the desire for them also led to visionary experience. Preaching on the passion moved the child Adelheid Langmann to meditation. According to the Toss Sisterbook, Mezzi Sidwibrin envisioned the Christ child seated on a preacher's lap during a Christmas sermon, and an Advent sermon on Ecce ("Behold") stirred her to repeat the word a thousand times. Like Gertrude the Great, Adelheid von Hiltegarthausen could not attend a sermon because of illness, whereupon Christ himself came to preach to her.

Italy

Italian sources, textual and visual, attest to the power of preaching. Paintings portray attentive crowds listening to outdoor sermons, with female separated from male listeners. Bernardino of Siena's preaching against the vanity of women prompted the lighting of bonfires of vanities (fashionable clothing, false hair, and the like) in Florence and elsewhere. His preaching with the IHS symbol produced exorcisms of women and men, as did the sermons of the Dominican Vincent Ferrer (d. 1419). Paintings in the churches of Macello and of St. Dominic in Modena depict Ferrer's cure of a woman possessed by the devil. The transformative power of preaching emerges clearly in the vita of Camilla Battista da Varano (1458–1524), a Poor Clare: hearing a sermon around the age of eight transformed her life completely, moving her to shed at least one tear every Friday for love of Christ's passion.

Italian saints illustrate a variety of ways in which women answered the Spirit's call. Rose of Viterbo distinguished herself as a street preacher in her native Viterbo; her exhortations were tolerated by a local church that saw her denouncing heresy and its political opponents. Humility of Faenza (1226–1310) preached from her cell at St. Apollinaris in Faenza and later led the monastery of St. John the Evangelist in Florence. An altar piece by Pietro Lorenzetti shows Humility reading to her sisters in the refectory and dictating sermons, nine of which are extant, as are some laude, or poems of praise to the Virgin Mary. Angela of Foligno (1248–1309) dictated the sermon-like accounts of her spiritual experiences to Brother A., her Franciscan confessor. Angela did not refrain from criticizing contemporary preachers; a vision following meditation on Scripture led her to conclude that preachers did not understand either the love of God or what they preached about it.

Catherine of Siena (1347–1380) exercised an apostolate that extended from her native city to Rome and southern France between 1374 and 1380. While she recounts in a letter a vision where Christ called her to preach, Raymond of Capua, Catherine's confessor, accentuates her gift of prophecy, defending her against detractors, describing her discourses as prophetic and employing the verb praedicere (to foretell) rather than praedicare (to preach). The confessor records Catherine's 1376 discourse before Pope Gregory XI in Avignon, clarifying his own role as interpreter from Catherine's Tuscan to Latin. To Gregory XI and others Catherine advocated crusade, peacemaking in Italy, and the return of the papacy to Rome. When the Carthusians of Gorgona requested Catherine's verbal edification (ædificationis verbum), Raymond agreed to the journey, as he did to other travels under his supervision, and accompanied her with around twenty other people. Raymond reports Catherine's strong hesitation to articulate her thoughts, but affirms that when she opened her mouth, the Spirit spoke through her. Catherine disseminated her message broadly through her letters, which served as epistolary sermons.

Suspicious

Visionaries from northern Europe also thirsted for preaching while they claimed their revelations as direct authorization to make themselves heard. Birgitta of Sweden (1302/1303–1373) conveyed Christ's mandate to be his "bride and channel." While a vision from Christ called her to preach and convert as the apostles did, Birgitta generally relied on her male clerical supporters to serve as her mouthpiece; they proclaimed her revelations from pulpits and mediated between Birgitta and the crowds at public assemblies. She herself addressed crowds in Cyprus, where her confessor Alfonso of Jaén served as interpreter. Birgitta's boldness and controversial prophecies aroused suspicions, and her detractors accused her of heresy and witchcraft. After Birgitta's death, her daughter Catherine continued her mother's work of spiritual reform and proclaimed Birgitta's revelations during the journey back to Sweden from Rome with her mother's remains. Pope Urban VI (d. 1378) praised her eloquence.

Outside the convent, the religious discourse of laywomen came under increasing suspicion because of the reputed ministry of dissident women in the Waldensian, Cathar, and Lollard movements. Polemical accusations against dissident preachers range from charges of public usurpation of the office to allegations of subversive gatherings in secret conventicles. While scholars disagree on the extent of female leadership in dissident communities, evidence confirms that to some degree they permitted women to undertake pastoral duties, including preaching. Polemical treatises expounded lengthy arguments against women and lay persons preaching; preaching manuals (artes prædicandi) confirmed the prohibitions; and ecclesiastical authors proposed alternative models, such as the vita of Marie of Oignies—a countermodel to the active ministry of Cathar women in southern France. At the time that fourteenth-century Lollards were advocating lay preaching, Margery Kempe, whose fits of weeping and bodily movement became a sort of discourse for her, was interrogated by the archbishop of York. She spoke forcefully to defend herself against accusations of heresy, protesting that she had not preached because she had never mounted a pulpit.

The Beguines attracted clerical ire for their public service of the Word. At the Second Council of Lyons (1274), Gilbert of Tournai attacked the Beguines' vernacular translations of the Scriptures and their bold reading both in conventicles and in city squares. A suspected association of the Beguines and the Free Spirit heresy led the Council of Vienne (1311) to issue two decrees against the Beguines: Cum de quibusdam mulieribus and Ad nostrum. The latter led to a century of persecution against the Beguines in Germany, while in northern France the bishops of Tournai and Arras-Cambrai were ordered to investigate Beguinages in Lille and Douai to ascertain whether the women there were involved "in debates or errors."

Marguerite Porete, a Beguine and author of the influential Mirror of Souls, was burned at the stake in Paris on June 1, 1310, after disobeying an order to stop disseminating and talking about her book, an indication that she may have been suspected of preaching. Na Prous Boneta, a follower of Peter John Olivi, began receiving visions on Good Friday in 1321. Believing that the Holy Spirit had been given to her as God's Son was given to the Virgin Mary, Na Prous revealed her visions to others in her household, and then extended her message by preaching in other towns. She was interrogated by the inquisitors, incarcerated in Carcassonne in 1325–1326, and probably burned at the stake in that city on the order of Pope John XXII in 1327 or 1328.

Early Modern Era

On the eve of the Council of Trent (1545–1563), cloistered women continued to find creative paths around the restrictions placed on them. The Ansprachen (Lectures) of Abbess Ursula Haider (1413–1498) represent instructions on meditation that skirt the prohibition on female religious scriptural exegesis, as do the teachings of Caritas, abbess of Nuremberg in the early sixteenth century, who addressed her sister Poor Clares in reply to the sermons of Lutheran clergy which they were compelled to hear.

Thirty-five of Abbess Caterina Vigri's (d. 1463) sermons, delivered to the Poor Clares of Corpus Domini in Bologna, were preserved within her vita by Paolo Casanova who wrote around 1605, over a century after her death in 1463. A volume of sermons by Isabella of Villena (1430–1490), abbess of the Valencian convent of Trinità, once in the possession of a Carmelite friar, has been lost, although traces of Isabella's preaching may be found in another of her works, the Vita Christi.

The sermons of Caterina Vigri and Isabella of Villena illustrate, much as the epistolary sermons of Hildegard of Bingen, that women's sermons were preserved as letters or included in vitae of female saints. Vitae and chronicles also report the intense involvement of women as listeners. Continued exploration of a range of texts will further reconstruct the rich and intense involvement of medieval and early modern women with the ministry of the Word. Expanding the boundaries of definition opens the path for seeing the myriad ways in which women performed the Word of God without a conventional locus of authority such as the pulpit. Moreover, the intense involvement of women as consumers of sermons influenced female literary discourse. The impact of the sermon on the various genres adopted by women writers needs further research.

BEVERLY MAYNE KIENZLE

References and Further Reading

- Angela of Foligno's Memorial*. Translated from Latin with introduction, notes, and interpretative essay by Cristina Mazzoni and John Cirignano. Woodbridge, Suffolk and Rochester, N.Y.: D. S. Brewer, 1999.
- Annales Fuldenses*. In Die Konzilien der karolingischen Teilreiche 843–859, edited by Wilfried Hartmann. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Concilia 3. Hannover: Impensis Bibliopoli Hahniani, 1984, p. 151.
- Beach, Alison L. Women as Scribes: Book Production and Monastic Reform in Twelfth-Century Bavaria. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2004.
- Blamires, Alcuin. "Women and Preaching in Medieval Orthodoxy, Heresy, and Saints' Lives." Viator 26 (1995): 135–152.
- Bynum, Caroline Walker. Jesus as Mother: Studies in the Spirituality of the High Middle Ages. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1982.
- de Vitry, Jacques. The Life of Marie d'Oignies, translated by Margot H. King. Toronto: Peregrina, 1993.
- Gertrude of Helfta. The Herald of Divine Love. Trans. Margaret Winkworth. New York: Paulist Press, 1993.
- Griffiths, Fiona. "'Men's Duty to Provide for Women's Needs': Abelard, Heloise, and Their Negotiation of the cura monialium." Journal of Medieval History 30 (2004): 1–24.
- Izbicki, Thomas M. "Pyres of Vanities: Mendicant Preaching on the Vanity of Women and Its Lay Audience." In De Ore Domini: Preacher and Word in the Middle Ages, edited by Thomas L. Amos, Eugene A. Green, and Beverly Mayne Kienzle. SMC 25. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Medieval Institute Publications, 1989, pp. 211–234.
- Kienzle, Beverly Mayne, and Pamela J. Walker. Women Preachers and Prophets through Two Millennia of Christianity. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998.
- . "Penitents and Preachers: The Figure of Saint Peter and His Relationship to Saint Mary Magdalene." In La figura di san Pietro nelle fonti del medioevo: Atti del convegno tenutosi in occasione dello Studiorum universitatum docentium congressus (Viterbo e Roma 5–8 settembre 2000), edited by Loredana Lazzari and Anna Maria Valente Bacci. Textes et études du moyen âge, 17. Louvain-la-Neuve: F.I.D.E.M., 2001, pp. 248–272.
- Matter, E. Ann and John Coakley, eds. Creative Women in Medieval and Early Modern Italy: A Religious and Artistic Renaissance. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1990.
- McNamara, Jo Ann, and John E. Halborg, with E. Gordon Whatley, ed. and trans. Sainted Women of the Dark Ages. Durham, N.C., and London: Duke University Press, 1992.
- Mooney, Catherine M., ed. Gendered Voices: Medieval Saints and Their Interpreters. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999.
- Muessig, Carolyn A., ed.. Medieval Monastic Preaching. Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1998.
- . Preacher, Sermon and Audience in the Middle Ages. Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2001.
- Raymond of Capua. Vita S. Catharina Senensis. Acta Sanctorum, April 30, Vol. 3, pp. 753–95.
- Roest, Bert. "Female Preaching in the Late Medieval Franciscan Tradition." Franciscan Studies 62 (2004): 119–154.
- Rudolf of Fulda. The Life of Saint Leoba. In The Anglo-Saxon Missionaries in Germany, translated and edited by C. H. Talbot. New York: Sheed and Ward, 1954.
- Sahlin, Claire L. Birgitta of Sweden and the Voice of Prophecy. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell and Brewer, 2001 (Studies in Medieval Mysticism).
- Simons, Walter. Cities of Ladies: Beguine Communities in the Medieval Low Countries, 1200–1565. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001.
- Stoudt, Debra. "The Influence of Preaching on Dominican Women in Fourteenth-Century Teutonica." Medieval Sermon Studies 44 (2000): 53–67.
- Suydam, Mary A., and Joanna E. Zeigler, eds. Performance and Transformation: New Approaches to Late Medieval Spirituality. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1999.
- Thomas of Chobham. Summa de arte praedicandi, edited by Franco Morenzoni. Corpus Christianorum Continuation Medivalis 82. Turnhout: Brepols, 1988.
- Ulf of Vadstena. Vita Catharinae Suedicae. Acta Sanctorum, March 24, vol. 3, pp. 503–515.
- Vita S. Liutberga*. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores Vol. 4, Hanover: Impensis Bibliopoli: Hahniani, 1841, pp. 158–164.

See also Abbesses; Angela of Foligno; Beguines; Birgitta of Sweden; Caterina Vigri; Cathars; Catherine of Siena; Dominican Order; Exemplum; Gertrude the Great; Hagiography; Heretics and Heresy; Hildegard of Bingen; Humility of Faenza; Italy; Kempe, Margery; Langmann, Adelheid; Lay Piety; Laywomen, Religious; Leoba; Lollards; Marguerite Porete; Marie of Oignies; Mary Magdalen; Mechthild of Magdeburg; Monastic Rules; Monasticism and Nuns; Monasticism, Women's; Papal Policy; Mothers as Teachers; Mysticism and Mystics; Poor Clares Order; Prophets; Radegund; Rose of Viterbo; Sister-Books and Other Convent Chronicles; Spiritual Care; Woman Authors: Latin Texts

SERVANT SAINTS

See Zita and Other Servant Saints

SERVANTS

Several words were used to describe a female domestic servant in the Middle Ages—ancilla, famula, domestica, serviens—but they all denoted an unmarried woman who lived under the same roof as her employer and provided labor in return for bed, board, and wages. Recent research has suggested that for a significant number of young women, in later medieval England at least, domestic service was not a permanent occupation but rather a stage in growing up, a threshold period in which to learn useful skills and accumulate some capital. There were both advantages and disadvantages for young women in leaving their homes and families to live and work in another household. Surviving evidence by its nature tends to give prominence to the dangers of abuse and exploitation, while, because so little is known about conditions of service and the later lives of the women concerned, the benefits have to remain largely a matter for speculation.

At the highest level of society the daughters of noble, gentry, and mercantile families were often sent at an early age to serve in the households of their social superiors. An Italian visitor found this English practice inhumane, but domestic service of this sort involved no disparagement and was a way for girls to acquire social skills and make contacts that might lead to marriage. Apart from this specialized form of service, noble households were hostile to female domestics and, with the exception of the ubiquitous laundresses, any female servants were confined to the private quarters as nursery nurses or maidservants to the lady of the household. Male servants mainly staffed religious houses, although some female domestics can be found in nunneries and hospital priories.

Recent research, based mainly on wills, taxation records, and witness statements in church courts, has drawn attention to the significance of domestic service for girls at the lower levels of English society in the later Middle Ages. There were few opportunities in the countryside for young women to live independent of their families, and it was unusual for girls to be bound by their parents in apprenticeships. Domestic service, however, offered adolescent girls the chance to migrate into towns and spend their late teens and early twenties in urban households. These young women seem to have found their employers in a variety of ways: at hiring fairs, through kinship ties, or trading networks. They were obliged by law to serve their master or mistress for at least a year and, although some servants stayed with one master for longer than that, there is evidence of considerable mobility.

As a source of cheap labour, requiring little more than their bed and board, the services of these young immigrants were much in demand in artisan and trading households after the Black Death. They were able to acquire the basic domestic skills of baking, brewing, needlework, and looking after children, but, depending on their employer, their duties could include other activities. They might be required to serve in shops, inns, and taverns or to help out in workshops with their master's craft and sell goods in the marketplace. As recession deepened in the second half of the fifteenth century, most artisans could no longer afford to employ domestic servants. Opportunities for female migrants contracted, the social status of servants declined, and maidservants are usually found in a purely domestic setting in merchant households and were an indication of their employer's wealth and status.

For a short period domestic service seems to have offered young migrant women considerable advantages. Independent of their families they could build up friendship networks, conduct their own courtships, assemble dowries from their wages and from gifts and bequests by their employers and choose when and whom to marry. The skills they had acquired must have made them attractive marriage partners, and they could afford to delay marriage until they found a suitable husband. This pattern of late companionate marriage was rather different from that found in Mediterranean societies where, rather than a prelude to marriage, domestic service was a last resort for women who could not find a husband.

Employers, as surrogate fathers or mothers, had the responsibility to care for their young female servants, who were often either related to them or of a similar social status. Bequests to servants in wills can suggest strong emotional ties and long-lasting, affectionate relationships. Servants were not, however, blood relatives and their association with their employers was temporary and could be fraught with difficulties. Young women living apart from their families were regarded as particularly prone to temptation, and so their behaviour needed to be controlled.

Both male and female employers could be harsh disciplinarians. Books of instruction, such as the Book of the Goodman of Paris and Christine de Pizan's Book of the Three Virtues, and didactic poems such as How the Goodwife Taught Her Daughter, advised the mistress of the house to choose her servants carefully, oversee their work and ensure that they did not slack or misbehave. Christine de Pizan pointed out that the necessity of earning their living from an early age meant that the moral education of domestic servants might well have been neglected. This meant that their mistresses must watch out for their dishonest tricks and try to ensure that they did not sneak out at night.

In the popular literature of the later Middle Ages servants were portrayed as prone to the female vices of dishonesty, avarice, disloyalty, hypocrisy, and lasciviousness. As weak women, they were a temptation to, and easy prey for, their male employers. The church's attitude was predictably ambivalent toward female servants. Ancilla, the term most frequently used for a servant girl, was also applied to saintly, cloistered women. In hagiography the picture of the fickle, scheming servant girl of popular literature was balanced by that of the servant saint, who was humble, hardworking, loyal, charitable, and strong enough to resist sexual temptation; an embodiment of the virtues of the church itself.

Most of the servant girls found listed in taxation records went from the anonymity of domestic service to the anonymity of marriage but the reports of sexual misbehaviour made to juries during ecclesiastical visitations in the later medieval England reveal the dark side of domestic service. The close relationship between servant and employer could undoubtedly lead to abuse and sexual exploitation. Masters and mistresses were bound to protect their vulnerable young servants, but they had complete power over them, and this could lead to sexual license. Even if the prostitution of servants by their employers was rare, there is much evidence of the seduction of servant girls by their employers or their sons. The detection of casual fornication could lead to dismissal and marginalisation. Women whose shameful condition revealed the nature of their misbehaviour were harshly treated, and prostitution must often have been the only alternative occupation available to disgraced servants.

ANN KETTLE

References and Further Reading

- Goldberg, P. J. P. Women, Work, and Life Cycle in a Medieval Economy: Women in York and Yorkshire c. 1300–1520. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1992.
- Goodich, Michael. "Ancilla Dei: The Servant as Saint in the Late Middle Ages." In Women of the Medieval World, edited by Julius Kirshner and Suzanne F. Wemple. Oxford: Blackwell, 1985, pp. 119–136.
- Hanawalt, Barbara A. Growing Up in Medieval London: The Experience of Childhood in History. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1993.
- Kettle, Ann J. "Ruined Maids: Prostitutes and Servant Girls in Later Medieval England." In Matrons and Marginal Women in Medieval Society, edited by Robert R. Edwards and Vickie Ziegler. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell Press, 1995, pp. 19–31.

Women in England c. 1275–1525: Documentary Sources. Translated and edited by P. J. P. Goldberg. Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1995.

See also Celibacy; Clerical and Priests' Concubines; Christine de Pizan; Conduct Literature; Ladies-in-Waiting; Prostitutes; Singlewomen; Social Status; Work; Zita and Other Servant Saints

SEXUALITY: EXTRAMARITAL SEX

Throughout the medieval period, there existed a tension between the sexual morality prescribed by religion, the sexual norms deemed appropriate by secular society, and the average person's sexual behavior. While theoretical values and beliefs pertained to all people, irrespective of age, sex, or social rank, in fact, which behaviors were permitted, or tolerated, very much depended on whether one were male or female, rich or poor, or whether the behavior was being judged according to secular or religious criteria. While both value systems sought to regulate and control sexual activity outside of marriage, they did so for very different reasons.

In the early Middle Ages, before the Church had succeeded in disseminating and enforcing its doctrines of marriage, it is more difficult to identify exactly which behaviors might have constituted sins, given that polygyny, serial monogamy, concubinage, and divorce were widely practised by the upper ranks of society, and formal marriage was not accessible to slaves, serfs, or the poorest members of society. Fundamentally, by the central Middle Ages, both secular and ecclesiastical values promoted the view that the only appropriate venue for female sexual activity was within marriage. Secular society was preoccupied with the need to ensure the legitimacy of children, in order to perpetuate lineages, secure advantageous marriage alliances, and maintain familial honor. In general, moralists urged people to control their lust, noting that sexual sins were harmful and some transgressions were mortal sins.

Fornication

Fornication was the term used by ecclesiastical writers to describe sexual activity between an unmarried man and an unmarried woman. It was considered to be the least serious of the sexual sins. Among the modest ranks of society, particularly in rural areas, couples might engage in informal sexual liaisons, perhaps as a consequence of the general late age at marriage customary in northern Europe, for both men and women. Moreover, given the important contribution of children to the rural household economy, it may have been prudent to delay marriage until a woman's fecundity had been demonstrated and she became pregnant. Records from the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries reveal secular authorities, including local lords and manor courts, attempting to control the sexual behavior of villagers. In England, a special fine, called the leyrwite, was levied on women who fornicated or gave birth to children outside marriage. Both men and women, however, could be summoned to the manor court to account for their sexual behavior. Both sexes could be required to give sureties to guarantee that their future sexual behavior would be within appropriate societal norms.

While village society may have tolerated informal sexual relationships, the church considered them to be scandalous. Fornicating couples could be summoned to appear before ecclesiastical courts and account for their behavior. Couples might reveal that they, and their neighbors, considered them to be married, but they had dispensed with the formalities of priest and ceremony. Those guilty of fornication could be required to perform penance, for example, by being whipped three times around the local church. Habitual fornicators, especially if they cohabited or had children, might be required to swear to abjure further sexual relations sub pena nubendi (on penalty of marriage). In such a situation, the man and woman were compelled to exchange conditional consent to marriage. If they engaged in intercourse subsequently, the condition would be met and that sexual act automatically would render them legally and indissolubly married. As much as the authorities might have tried to control the sexual behavior of people, such informal relationships served a purpose, especially among the poor, for whom the solemnities of marriage were too expensive or irrelevant. Consequently, such relationships, although open to allegations of fornication or informal divorce, endured throughout the period.

Among the upper ranks of society, fornication was evaluated according to a double standard. Women were expected to remain chaste virgins until they married, whereas sex before marriage was tolerated for men. Given that familial honor, especially that of fathers, brothers, and husbands, was heavily dependent upon the chastity and good reputation of their female relatives, women were subject to heavy surveillance. Daughters were married as young as decently possible, and wives were largely confined to the household. Thus, among the landed aristocracy and the urban merchants, girls were married at a young age, at least in part to ensure they did not have the opportunity to fall into fornication. The economic and social structures, however, often resulted in men marrying later in life, and sometimes, not at all. Thus, at the height of their sexual potency, many men did not have regular access to a legitimate sexual partner. This resulted in the prevalence of brothels, frequently owned and managed by civic governments across Europe. These were rationalized as a means to protect respectable women from unwanted advances, seduction, and rape, but their main function was as an outlet for male sexuality.

Rape

Rape, including abduction and gang rape, occurred in towns across Europe. The streets were dangerous, and women were even abducted from their houses. Coroners' records also show that women working in the fields in rural areas were vulnerable to opportunistic rape by outlaws or passing travelers. While rape was a crime that could be prosecuted in both the secular and ecclesiastical courts, it was also a more serious manifestation of the sin of lust. Not really a type of fornication, it nevertheless had similar results for the female victim. Women who fornicated willingly, or who were raped, were judged according to a double standard that privileged virginity for a woman to make a respectable marriage. Consequently, many rape survivors were unable to find a marriage partner and swelled the ranks of prostitutes. Men, however, unless they were convicted of rape (a rare occurrence in medieval court records), faced few social impediments. They may, indeed, have gained some standing in the eyes of their fellows, as men of sexual prowess. A young man who fornicated would not face many disabilities in arranging a decent marriage, assuming he was a financially desirable partner and his sexual exploits were not excessive or notorious.

Adultery

Adultery was the term applied to illicit sexual activity when one or both parties were married to another person. The church considered adultery to be a mortal sin, whereas secular society considered it a criminal offense. According to canon law, adultery was equally culpable for men and women. Secular values, however, applied a double standard that reckoned adultery a serious crime for women but almost tolerated it for men, unless it was egregious or threatened the social order. In the early Middle Ages, secular law codes had permitted a father or husband to kill both the adulterers with impunity, if they were caught in the act. The church worked to curb this kind of vengeance, preferring penance and, ultimately, the reconciliation of the married couple. Nevertheless, until the central Middle Ages, the church also permitted a husband to repudiate his adulterous wife, although a wife was not accorded the reciprocal right if her husband committed adultery.

Among the higher ranks of society, in particular, the feudal aristocracy and royalty, adultery by a wife was considered to be treasonous and could result in the severest of punishments, up to and including death. While courtly literature and romances idealized the young knight's adoration of his lord's wife, this kind of adulterous fascination would have been very dangerous, even deadly, for a married woman. For men of these ranks, however, adultery was not only tolerated but even admired. It was not uncommon for aristocratic men to keep concubines, and to raise legitimate and illegitimate children together in the same household. Wives might rail against their husband's adultery, but they had little recourse. Indeed, a man was able to display his potency through sex with many women in the same way he would prove his virility on the battlefield. Although the clergy had the temerity to criticize such licentious behavior, it was nevertheless tolerated by aristocratic society, as long as the adultery did not involve the wives or daughters of one's peers, superiors, or allies. Lower status women, servants or serfs, married or virgin, were fair game, however, for the married man with a roving eye.

Other Sexual Transgressions

Another area in which a double standard prevailed was sexual activity across religious boundaries. Christian authorities, both secular and religious, condemned sexual fraternization between Christians and Muslims or Jews. Jewish communities were found across Europe, side-by-side with their Christian neighbors. On the Iberian peninsula, in particular, all three religious communities coexisted. Given that marriage across religious lines was impossible, all sexual activities between Christians and Jews or Muslims were necessarily extramarital in nature. Numerous regulations were enacted by secular rulers to prohibit such sexual relations, recommending harsh punishments for infractions. Of particular concern were relations between Christian women and men of another faith. Such acts of fornication and adultery were frequently considered capital crimes for the transgressive man, and possibly for the woman as well. A more tolerant view was taken of Christian men who engaged in sexual relations with Jewish or Muslim women. This double standard was again related to society's investment of male honor in female chastity. A Christian man who had sex with a Muslim or Jewish woman dishonored those religions, and their men in particular, in the process. Similarly, if a Christian woman had sex with a non-Christian man, she dishonored not only herself and her male relatives, but also Christianity as a whole.

Technically, any form of sexual activity with someone other than one's legitimate spouse was considered extramarital sex. This, in particular, included same-sex activities, by both men and women, as well as masturbation or bestiality. The most common, and commonly reported, extramarital sexual activities, however, were conventional fornication or adultery. The meaning, evaluation, and punishment of these activities varied according to gender and social rank and, to some extent, according to location. Rural villagers in northern European areas generally had more opportunity to engage in extramarital sex than did aristocratic women and women living in Mediterranean areas. Although the Church taught that adultery and fornication were equally sinful for all Christians, in practice, the double standard rendered adultery, in particular, a far more serious transgression for women. Ultimately, then, every sex act that did not occur within marriage, with one's legitimate spouse, for the purpose of procreation constituted extramarital sex.

JACQUELINE MURRAY

References and Further Reading

- Baldwin, John W. The Language of Sex: Five Voices from Northern France around 1200. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1994.
- Brundage, James A. Law, Sex, and Christian Society in Medieval Europe. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1987.
- . "Playing by the Rules: Sexual Behaviour and Legal Norms in Medieval Europe." In Desire and Discipline: Sex and Sexuality in the Pre-Modern West, edited by Jacqueline Murray and Konrad Eisenbichler. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1996, pp. 23–41.
- Flandrin, Jean-Louis. "Repression and Change in the Sexual Life of Young People in Medieval and Early Modern Times." Journal of Family History 2 (1977): 196–210.
- Helmholz, Richard. "Abjuration sub pena nubendi in the Church Courts of Medieval England." The Jurist 32 (1972): 80–90.
- Karras, Ruth Mazo. Sexuality in Medieval Europe: Doing unto Others. New York: Routledge, 2005.
- Payer, Pierre J. Sex and the Penitentials: The Development of a Sexual Code, 550–1150. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1984.

See also Concubines; Courtly Love; Cuckold; Divorce and Separation; Honor and Reputation; Illegitimacy; Jewish Women; Law, Canon; Marriage, Christian; Merchet and Leyrwite; Muslim Women: Iberia; Penitentials and Pastoral Manuals; Prostitutes; Rape and Raptus; Sexuality: Female Same-Sex Relations; Sexuality: Male Same-Sex Relations; Sexuality, Regulation of; Sexuality: Sex in Marriage; Slaves; Virginity

SEXUALITY: FEMALE SAME-SEX RELATIONS

Retrieving the traces of same-sex relations between medieval women is predicated on scholars being authorized to posit the very possibility of such relations, theoretically and intellectually. This simple point of departure, nevertheless, became the locus, in the late 1980s and early 1990s, of contentious debates between constructionists and essentialists on the nature and scope of sexual marginality in times past. Originally, the debate opposed those (essentialists) who believed in the innate, irrepressible, often biologically determined, and perhaps even immutable, fundamental characteristics of identity—gendered, sexual, or ethnoracial, to those (constructionists) who viewed identity as the product of difference, shifting historical paradigms, specific contexts, and the workings of discourse. The seemingly radical opposition was questioned in 1989 by Diana Fuss in an important work that suggested the two positions were more interdependent and interlocked than previously perceived. Yet, an extreme form of constructionism, beholden to the view that homosexuality was born in the late nineteenth century, and lesbianism decades later, also expanded its opposition to essentialism well beyond rejecting the notions of natural or universal. The very existence of same-sex identification, not limited to discrete “practices,” but encompassing sensibilities, consciousness of self, cultural behavior, political impact, and burgeoning communities, has thus been questioned.

Historiography

In 1981, Louis Crompton tackled the “myth of lesbian impunity” through a summary examination of a number of trials that ranged well beyond the medieval period, in which women were accused of same-sex malfeasance. Nearly a decade later, E. Ann Matter argued for the presence of woman-identification among medieval women mystics by carefully examining their writings. These were the very first attempts to bring to light the existence of “medieval” women who loved other women in the face of interdiction and danger, and these scholars unabashedly made the term lesbian explicit, taking a bold and pathbreaking stance, and positing the very existence of such women. In the early 1990s, however, the specter of terminological incorrectness and accusations of dreaded essentialism loomed large over discussions, not only of same-sex love among medieval women, but of women in all times past. By the late 1990s, the discussion had already moved to another plane: Michel Foucault’s theories of the construction of sexuality were no longer the sole purview of the most entrenched constructionists. Scholars active in the emerging field of medieval queer theory, such as Carolyn Dinshaw, saw in Foucault’s treatment of the Middle Ages a powerful insight into the inception of modern sexualities. In her 1999 book, Getting Medieval, Dinshaw made queer-identification a touchable, pulsating, connection between the distant past and the present work of scholars, centered on notions of community-building across time, and thus, continuing the movement to reclaim a queer past. These questions constituted a rigorously tilled terrain for the study of lesbian/female same-sex lives in the Middle Ages. Concurrently, Karma Lochrie firmly contested the validity of Foucault’s medieval paradigms for a queer Middle Ages. In their introduction to their 2001 collection of essays, Francesca Canadé Sautman and Pamela Sheingorn proposed a middle ground, recognizing at once Foucault’s potential contributions to the retrieval of a female same-sex past and his limitations.

Queer Theory

“Queerness” and queer theory had come to stay in the conversations about that past. Karma Lochrie pursued a distinctive and original contribution to such a queer reading, culminating in her 1999 book, Covert Operations. She analyzed the uses of secrecy in medieval society as the central shaping force in the construction of sexuality, and shifted traditionally male categories such as sodomy to a multigendered plane of experience and transgression, which she identified as a “female perversion.” In an important 1997 essay on the imagery of the wound of Christ, Lochrie had reclaimed an historical lesbian presence by daringly queering a normative icon, the painted, and later printed, representations of the wound of Christ, shifting its identification to the vulva. Lochrie thus appropriated a seemingly pellucid religious representation and made it into a signpost of early lesbian visual sensibility.

Queering proceeded to unearth female same-sex desire in works of fiction, producing a body of interpretative work informed at the onset by gender studies. Categories such as gender instability and disruption have been examined through the themes of cross-dressing (donning of clothing ascribed to the opposite sex, in order to pass as the other), transvestism (a regular or permanent adoption, usually by biological men, of the dress, body language, and mannerisms of women in a manner that is also transformative and often performance-oriented), sexual disguise and sex change, as well as ostensibly hostile woman to woman interactions. Gendered readings of seemingly normative and opaque texts written by monastic women, such as saints' lives, uncovered desire and community (Weston). Queer theory's subsequent revisiting of itself with a greater focus on empire, early postcolonialism, and masculinities, may as much enhance as hinder the still fragile process of recovering the histories—textual, archival, and imagined—of female same-sex relations.

Scholarly interventions on medieval female same-sex relations have thus never eschewed burning theoretical debates. By the mid-1990s, led to a great extent by the work of Renaissance scholars, medievalists reclaimed a place for women in the developing field of studies on medieval same-sex relations, and provided new applications of gender and queer studies to the history of sexualities. Yet a pull, if not a tension, has remained between those who favor a process of strict historical documentation, and those who envisage the “imagined spaces” of the past through lenses such as queer theory.

‘Lesbian-Like’

Women who might have expressed same-sex object choice and affection, and lesbians as historical subjects, had once again been “hidden from history” and made “twice marginal”: such was the challenge issued in a 1996 foundational article by historian Jacqueline Murray. Examining a variety of textual sources across the medieval period, Murray called into question the theoretical premises that had virtually silenced the study of female same-sex love in the distant past, conceptualizing a series of questions that would give legitimacy to further investigation. Bernadette Brooten's book on early Christianity examined the forms, language, articulation, perception, and containment of same-sex love among women. This important contribution sought to read ancient history in order to retrieve the voice of same-sex female love and excavate the contours of the discourse that shaped it.

There remains the vexed matter of whether lesbian, both as a term and a category, is a valid tool for historically removed times. During the 1998 conference Queer Middle Ages (CUNY Graduate Center, November 1998), Judith Bennett presented a new term, lesbian-like, later developed in a 2000 essay. This was a methodological and theoretical solution to the problem of a presentism that affixed the contemporary label lesbian to traces of the past, without stifling research on gender-transgressive social practices among women who focused affectively on women, or exhibited that potential. Bennett thus argued for a reclaiming of the term lesbian that would also mitigate and correct its anachronism. Lesbian-like denoted an entire range of social contexts and behaviors in which medieval women could at least in part remove themselves from the direct control of men and function in independent, potentially woman-centered environments. Bennett thus formulated a blueprint for further research in areas such as monastic communities, singleness or widowhood, or historical instances of cross-dressing. Coming from a respected archival historian, the construct conferred legitimacy on a new type of historical examination, no longer constrained by the drive to merely seek “instances,” but also open to imagining the plausible and the possible, to envisioning a female same-sex past grounded in spaces and social contexts.

Same-sex monastic communities, Beguinages, and other pious congregations were indeed a pole of attraction in the search for the same-sex female past. In this light, scholars have worked out hypotheses for the existence of possible spaces of lesbian/same-sex female encounters in the shadow of religious dictates concerning chastity and reclusion. Developing a concept coined by Theodara Jankowski, the lesbian void, Michelle Sauer argues for a “reconstructionist” type of work in reading the anchoress's living quarters and household structure in relation to devotional prescriptions such as the Ancrene Wisse. She posits the possibility of woman-to-woman erotic encounters and romantic attachments, founded on the historical public/private divide and a coincidence between the rise of the anchoress movement and the tendency toward greater privacy in the thirteenth century. In this argument, patriarchal society's fears of sully contacts between women and men supersede its distaste and conceptualization of such contacts between women, so that secluded spaces are created that allow for female same-sex relations.

The hypothesis of potential woman-restricted spaces is bolstered by scholarship on penitentials, monastic rules, and confessor's manuals that specify penalties for same-sex acts committed by men or women. (Frantzen, Benkov, Puff). Yet, such texts address what the authorities wanted to avoid and curtail but is not necessarily fleshed out into historical occurrence. Patriarchal prescriptions against something condemned but conceivable, sex between two women, nevertheless delineates what is scriptable in the consciousness of the time. Such is the importance of Etienne de Fougères' Livre des Manières: referred to by most scholars in the field, it was studied in depth, with varying conclusions, originally, by Jeri Guthrie, then by Robert Clark and Sahar Amer. The importance of this book of conduct in rhymed and satirical form, excoriating the major foibles of women across society, lies in its denunciation and description, at once metaphorical and transparent, of actual sex acts between women, one of the earliest in the medieval West.

Trial Records

Trial records stand out as a privileged site for the documentation of "actual" lesbians in the distant past. Helmut Puff and Edith Benkov have given this approach an enormously significant inflection. Studying the late medieval trials of women accused of unnatural sex with another woman, in fifteenth century Germany and France, they have carefully scrutinized primary sources and contextualized them, both in the past and in the present. But both Puff and Benkov provided much more than an exacting reading of sources. Both theorized in important ways on the absence of lesbians in the historical record by questioning the very rhetoric regulating the representation of sexuality around the ultimate transgression of women performing sexual penetration and the absence of nonphallic sexual scripts.

Larger Context

The history of female same-sex relations has been enlightened by the readings of actual lives of historical figures, such as Susan Schibanoff's study of Hildegard of Bingen, or Gregory Hutcheson's work on Leonor López de Córdoba. These studies provide rich, complex, and unhesitatingly discontinuous engagement with persons, situations, and texts, articulated around heuristic tools such as the concepts of the homosocial and the homoaffective. Similar work on Renaissance figures—work published nonetheless in collections that conjoin medieval and Renaissance studies, further questioning received periodization—such as Laudomia Forteguerra, (1515—c. 1555) a Sieneese noble woman and poet who loved Margaret of Austria, or the multifaceted Eleno/Elena, a Moorish transgendered former slave who lived in sixteenth century Spain, have extended the field, showing how the concept of "same-sex" allows the inclusion of various configurations, not limited to the category "lesbian."

The collective work edited by Sautman and Sheingorn further questioned the entrenched relation of same-sex female history within the medieval West. Crucial contributions to revising this view and contesting the default value of Western paradigms in same-sex history were provided by Fedwa Maltidouglas's investigation of medieval Arabic courtly and love manuals, by Sahar Amer's attribution of Arabic sources to the famed Livre des Manières, and by Ruth Vanita's skilled navigation of the erotic language of Indian devotional texts.

Further studies of biographies, life narratives, and trial records are needed and under way, hemmed in not merely by uncharted sources, but also by these sources' very rhetoric in framing sexuality, as scholars in the field have pointed out (Bennett, Benkov, Puff, and others). The structures of family life and the status of women in the West, still the dominant focus of this field, continue to create obstacles to making significant quantifiable jumps. These may indeed be felicitously derailed or corrected by an increased interest in and attention to studies of women outside the West, and outside Christianity within the West.

FRANCESCA CANADÉ SAUTMAN

References and Further Reading

- Amer, Sahar. "Lesbian Sex and the Military: From the Medieval Arabic Tradition to French Literature." In Same-Sex Love and Desire among Women in the Middle Ages, edited by Francesca Canadé Sautman and Pamela Sheingorn. New York: Palgrave, 2001, pp. 179–198.
- Benkov, Edith. "The Erased Lesbian: Sodomy and the Legal Tradition in Medieval Europe." In Same-Sex Love and Desire among Women in the Middle Ages, edited by Francesca Canadé Sautman and Pamela Sheingorn. New York: Palgrave, 2001, pp. 101–122.
- Bennett, Judith M. "'Lesbian-Like' and the Social History of Lesbianism." Journal of the History of Sexuality 9.1/2 (January/April 2000): 1–24.
- Brooten, Bernadette J. Love between Women: Early Christian Responses to Female Homoeroticism. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1996.
- Brown, Judith. Immodest Acts: The Life of a Lesbian Nun in Renaissance Italy. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- Burshatin, Israel. "Elena Alias Eleno: Genders, Sexualities, and Race in the Mirror of Natural History in Sixteenth-Century Spain." In Gender Reversals and Gender

- Cultures: Anthropological and Historical Perspectives*, edited by Sabrina Petra Ramet. London and New York: Routledge, 1996, pp. 105–122.
- Clark, Robert L. A. “Jousting Without a Lance: The Condemnation of Female Homoeroticism in the Livre des Manières.” In Same-Sex Love and Desire among Women in the Middle Ages, edited by Francesca Canadé Sautman and Pamela Sheingorn. New York: Palgrave, 2001, pp. 143–177.
- Crompton, Louis. “The Myth of Lesbian Impunity: Capital Laws from 1270-1791.” Journal of Homosexuality 6 (Fall/Winter 1980/1981): 13–25.
- Dinshaw, Carolyn. Getting Medieval: Sexualities and Communities, Pre- and Postmodern. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1999.
- Eisenbichler, Konrad. “Laudomia Forteguerra Loves Margaret of Austria.” In Same-Sex Love and Desire among Women in the Middle Ages, edited by Francesca Canadé Sautman and Pamela Sheingorn. New York: Palgrave, 2001, pp. 251–275.
- Fuss, Diana. Essentially Speaking: Feminism, Nature and Difference. New York: Routledge, 1989.
- Guthrie, Jeri S. “La Femme dans le Livre des Manières: Surplus économique, surplus érotique.” Romanic Review 79 (1987): 251–261.
- Hutcheson, Gregory S. “Leonor López de Córdoba and the Configuration of Female-Female Desire.” In Same-Sex Love and Desire among Women in the Middle Ages, edited by Francesca Canadé Sautman and Pamela Sheingorn. New York: Palgrave, 2001, pp. 251–275.
- Kelly, Kathleen Coyne. “The Writable Lesbian and Lesbian Desire in Malory’s Morte d’Arthur.” Exemplaria. 14:2 (Fall 2002): 239–270.
- Lochrie, Karma. “Mystical Acts, Queer Tendencies.” In Constructing Medieval Sexuality, edited by Karma Lochrie, Peggy McCracken, and James S. Schultz. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1997, pp. 180–200.
- . Covert Operations: The Medieval Uses of Secrecy. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999.
- . “Between Women.” In The Cambridge Companion to Medieval Women’s Writing, edited by Carolyn Dinshaw and David Wallace. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2003, pp. 70–88.
- . Heterosyncracies: Female Sexuality When Normal Wasn’t. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 2005.
- Malti-Douglas, Fedwa. “Tribadism/Lesbianism and the Sexualized Body in Medieval Arabo-Islamic Narratives.” In Same-Sex Love and Desire among Women in the Middle Ages, edited by Francesca Canadé Sautman and Pamela Sheingorn. New York: Palgrave, 2001, pp. 123–141.
- Matter, E. Ann. “My Sister, My Spouse: Woman-Identified Women in Medieval Christianity.” In Weaving the Visions, edited by Judith Plaskow and Carol P. Christ. San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1989, pp. 51–62.
- Murray, Jacqueline. “Twice Marginal and Twice Invisible: Lesbians in the Middle Ages.” In Handbook of Medieval Sexuality, edited by Vern L. Bullough and James A. Brundage. New York: Garland, 1996, pp. 191–222.
- Puff, Helmut. “Female Sodomy: The Trial of Katherina Hetzeldorfer (1477).” Journal of Medieval and Early Modern Studies 30.1 (Winter 2000): 41–61.

- Sauer, Michelle M. “Representing the Negative: Positioning the Lesbian Void in Medieval English Anchoritism.” Thirdspace 3.2 (March 2004). http://www.thirdspace.ca/articles/3\_2\_sauer.htm. (accessed 28 May 2006).
- Schibanoff, Susan. “Hildegard of Bingen and Richardis of Stade: The Discourse of Desire.” In Same-Sex Love and Desire among Women in the Middle Ages, edited by Francesca Canadé Sautman and Pamela Sheingorn. New York: Palgrave, 2001, pp. 49–83.
- Watt, Diane. “Behaving Like a Man?: Incest, Lesbian Desire, and Gender Play in Yde et Olive and Its Adaptations.” Comparative Literature 50.4 (1998): 265–285.
- Weston, Lisa. “Elegiac Desire and Female Community in Baudovinia’s Life of Saint Radegund.” In Same-Sex Love and Desire among Women in the Middle Ages, edited by Francesca Canadé Sautman and Pamela Sheingorn. New York: Palgrave, 2001, pp. 85–99.

See also Aristotelian Concepts of Women and Gender; Cross-Dressing; Eroticism in Art; Eroticism in Literature; Hildegard of Bingen; López de Córdoba, Leonor; Queer Theory; Sexuality, Regulation of

SEXUALITY: MALE SAME-SEX RELATIONS

Male same-sex relations describe a wide variety of experiences, ranging from casual friendship to sexual intimacy. Such relations were once rigidly categorized to ensure that the paradigm of friendship between men was not contaminated by romantic or sexual implications. Rare indeed were the claims of homophiles like Havelock Ellis, whose Sexual Inversion (1897) narrated a history of male same-sex attraction ranging from friendship to sexual intercourse. Ellis did justice to the medieval evidence of same-sex relations between men, material that is still scant in histories of the topic; he positioned the English Renaissance as the point at which intellectual and social freedoms combined to allow homosexuality to be recognized as a cultural phenomenon.

Although male friendship and male homosexual intimacy were at one time understood as polar opposites, it is now common to present friendship and physical intimacy as stages along a continuum of male-male relations similar to the continuum along which homosexual and heterosexual desires are often arranged. The traditional (usually implied) homophobia of strict separation in degrees of male same-sex relations has lost at least some of its force as research into the history of homosexuality broadens and deepens. Scholars have become more willing than their predecessors to allow for romantic and sexual valences in relations between men in earlier cultures, especially Antiquity.

In western Europe during the Middle Ages, both military and monastic institutions could foster passionate relations between men. The early Germanic comitatus and its later medieval successor, chivalry, formed strong bonds between men who were attached to each other more by the circumstance of war and military exploit rather than sexual inclination. In medieval romance and other narratives, it is common to find such men involved in a homosocial triangle (“homosocial” designating relationships between men mediated by a woman with whom both men are involved). Close friendships between warriors are common in chivalric romances. A famous example is the tale of Amis and Amile, two knights whose devotion to each other took priority over their loves of wives and children. Their passionate devotion has no sexual manifestations, and there is every reason to suppose that medieval audiences would have been shocked if such manifestations were suggested. Where sexual relations between knights are discussed, as in some old French narratives, those relations are ridiculed as sodomitical, invariably a slur against prowess and masculinity. The learned monastic tradition is another rich store of evidence for same-sex relations between men, ranging from pious letters to erotic poetry. Narratives of transvestite monastic saints raise complex questions about gender relations in a performative context. The evidentiary status of such texts is, to say the least, problematic: what part recounts lived experience, and what part derives from literary imitation?

Same-sex relations between men are, however, contested territory, as one can see in the contrast between Derrick Sherwin Bailey’s Homosexuality and the Western Christian Tradition (1955) and John Boswell’s Christianity, Social Tolerance, and Homosexuality (1980), two studies that defined and redefined the topic in the twentieth century. Both works are avowedly antihomophobic, but they take sharply different views of the relationship between Christianity and same-sex relations between men. Bailey focused on the scripture in his explanation of Christianity’s antihomosexual attitudes and sought to show that ecclesiastical sources separated criticism of homosexual conduct from criticism of other forms of sexual misbehavior. He pointed out that the Bible’s denunciations of same-sex acts do not mention Sodom and Gomorrah, and that the cities were instead associated with other forms of sexual immorality. What Bailey represented as negative evidence, Boswell portrayed in a positive light. Like Bailey, Boswell denied that religion was a cause of sexual intolerance; instead, he attempted to show that same-sex relations between men were valorized rather than denounced in a variety of sources, many of them literary (letters and poems especially).

Boswell’s optimistic assessment of the evidence (although not his understanding of homosexuality itself, which is now considered essentialist), have had enormous appeal and influence in the study of same-sex relations. But many of his claims have not held up to close scrutiny. Important qualifications have been made by James A. Brundage in his studies of the Church, law, and sexuality. Brundage argued that the Church’s negative view of all sexual relations necessitated a negative view of sex between men. Another scholar who has demonstrated the Church’s negative view of such relations, contra Boswell, is Pierre J. Payer, who has studied early medieval penitentials and their treatment of sexual practices.

It is generally agreed that same-sex relations between men are not exclusively sexual and that the narrowing of such relations to genital contact excludes important evidence, psychological and emotional perspectives in particular. Standards of physical intimacy in the modern world make it difficult to approach even nineteenth-century evidence outside a genital-based sexual determinism (it was common in the Middle Ages, and in the early twentieth century, for example, for friends of the same sex to kiss on the mouth and sleep in the same bed). Sex is never far in the background in discussions of same-sex relations and friendship. The influence of Michel Foucault’s History of Sexuality and its master narrative of hide-and-seek, of detection and evasion, has inspired a steady stream of “queer” readings of texts aimed at uncovering sexual and genital as well as emotional connections that the texts themselves might be seen as trying to conceal. Among researchers concerned with assessing evidence other than literary texts, however, the results are less playful than they are in the work of Foucault’s followers. Mark Jordan has demonstrated the emergence of sodomy in a range of important works, beginning with Peter Damian’s The Book of Gomorrah and texts by Alan of Lille, Albertus Magnus, Thomas Aquinas, and others. As Jordan shows, these sources unambiguously condemn sodomy and contravene Boswell’s narrative of growing sexual tolerance from the early to the late Middle Ages. For Boswell, the thirteenth century is a peak of tolerance for passionate same-sex relations between men. But Jordan shows that the Church strongly opposed same-sex relations long before Peter Damian, as Jordan would have it, “invented” the term sodomy.

The range of male same-sex relations is not synonymous with sodomy, which in the Middle Ages had become a term used to designate acts ranging from anal intercourse between men to heresy. There is, however, a reluctance to read same-sex relations between men outside the framework of sexual attraction, as if to imply that same-sex relations between men must always be viewed in a teleological perspective in which the most advanced or sophisticated form of such relations will be sexual intimacy. If a homophobic interpretive tradition is responsible for suppressing discussions of sexual relations, a homophobic tradition in which sex is implied as the core or objective of such relations is no less defective and no less exclusive of a wide range of male-male relations.

ALLEN J. FRANTZEN

References and Further Reading

- Bailey, Derrick Sherwin. Homosexuality and the Western Christian Tradition. London: Longmans, 1955; reprint, Hamden, Conn.: Archon, 1975.
- Boswell, John. Christianity, Social Tolerance, and Homosexuality: Gay People in Western Europe from the Beginning of the Christian Era to the Fourteenth Century. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1980.
- Bray, Alan. Homosexuality in Renaissance England. London: Gay Men's Press, 1982; New York: Columbia University Press, 1995.
- Bullough, Vern L. Sexual Variance in Society and History. New York: John Wiley, 1976.
- Clover, Carol J. "Regardless of Sex: Men, Women, and Power in Early Northern Europe." In Studying Medieval Women: Sex, Gender, Feminism, edited by Nancy F. Partner. Cambridge, Mass.: Medieval Academy of America, 1993, pp. 61–85.
- Ellis, Havelock. Sexual Inversion. 3rd ed. Studies in the Psychology of Sex 2. Philadelphia: F.A. Davis Company, 1929.
- Frantzen, Allen J. Before the Closet: Same-Sex Love from Beowulf to Angels in America. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1998.
- Gaunt, Simon. "Straight Minds/"Queer" Wishes in Old French Hagiography." In Premodern Sexualities, edited by Louise Fradenburg and Carla Freccero. New York: Routledge, 1996, pp. 155–173.
- Gerard, Kent, and Gert Hekma, eds. The Pursuit of Sodomy: Male Homosexuality in Renaissance and Enlightenment Europe. New York: Harrington Park, 1989; reprint from Journal of Homosexuality 16.1–2 (1988).
- Jordan, Mark D. The Invention of Sodomy in Christian Theology. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1997.
- Payer, Pierre J. Sex and the Penitentials: The Development of a Sexual Code 550–1150. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1984.

See also Cross-Dressing; Eroticism in Art; Eroticism in Literature; Penitentials and Pastoral Manuals; Queer Theory; Sexuality: Female Same-Sex Relations; Sexuality, Regulation of

SEXUALITY, REGULATION OF

Sex is a potentially explosive force in human society, and the earliest surviving records show that, from time immemorial, communities have tried to impose strict limits upon sexual relations among their members. Medieval Christendom was no exception to this rule. Church authorities sought to confine sexual activity among medieval Christians to marital intercourse and to regulate and restrict sexual conduct even within marriage. Predictably, the prescribed norms met with stubborn and continuing resistance among both the clergy and the laity.

Biblical Teaching

Theologians and church leaders found sacred authority to support some of their restraints on sexual behavior among Christians in the Hebrew scriptures. They occasionally drew as well upon rabbinical doctrines from the post-Biblical period. Ancient Hebrew communities, however, permitted polygyny and concubinage as their neighbors in the ancient Near East commonly did, while monogamous marriage was a fundamental ideal among Christians, although one that was not invariably observed in real life. Jewish law also permitted men to divorce their wives (but not vice versa), a practice that Christian tradition strenuously discouraged save on grounds of adultery—and most medieval Christian authorities believed that even this concession should be disallowed.

Although Christian lawgivers found it essential to modify Jewish law concerning marriage and sexuality, and rejected some of it altogether, it nonetheless provided Christians with a scriptural starting-point for the development of their own system of sexual regulations. They found Jewish law's harsh ban on adultery (especially by women), its fierce punishment for rape, its prohibition of prostitution (at least by Jewish women), and the death penalty that it prescribed for sexual relations between men particularly admirable.

The gospels, Christianity's basic foundation documents, had relatively little to say specifically about sexual behavior. Jesus for the most part accepted the traditional prescriptions found in the Hebrew scriptures and his reported comments about sex and marriage dealt only with matters where his views differed from mainstream rabbinical teachings. Perhaps the most fundamental of these was his belief that love between spouses ought to be the paramount element in a marital relationship. He urged his followers to pattern their personal relationships on the mutual self-giving that lay at the heart of the notion of agape, or spiritual love, in early Christian communities. Sexual relations, to be sure, formed an important element in the ways that married couples shared their bodies as well as their souls with each other. Their sexual coupling should express intimate regard for one another, rather than self-centered lust and passion.

A few passages, especially in the Gospel of Luke, imply that Jesus may have considered sex a potential hindrance to salvation. In one passage Luke represented Jesus as saying that a man who wished to follow him must reject the love of wife and family (Luke 14:25–27, 18:28–30), while in another Luke reported that Jesus advised his hearers that they should refrain from marriage (and presumably from sex) altogether if they hoped to participate in the resurrection (Luke 20:34–35; cf. Matthew 19:10–12).

Jesus also departed from mainstream Jewish tradition in his attitude toward divorce. While he did not ban it altogether, he imposed far more stringent limitations on divorce than did prevailing opinion among contemporary rabbis. Several gospel passages depict Jesus as condemning extramarital sex and prostitution, although he showed compassion on occasion for individual prostitutes. All of these departures from conventional religious teachings certainly aggravated the hostility of established religious authorities toward Jesus.

Christian writers in the generation that immediately followed the death of Jesus elaborated on these teachings. Sex and marriage occupied far more prominent places in St. Paul's writings than they did in the gospels, and Paul became far and away the most influential authority in shaping early Christian treatments of these issues. Paul treated sexual behavior as one of the major sources of sin. Indeed, he thought that illicit sex was as serious a moral offense as murder. In his writings about sex, Paul developed an implicit theory of sexual sin that distinguished four types of offenders: prostitutes, adulterers, what he called "the softies" (1 Corinthians 6:10), that is people who used sex primarily as a source of pleasure, and men (but perhaps not women, since he did not mention them) who had sex with one another.

Marriage in Paul's view, was good, but considerably less good than virginity, for a Christian. He taught that marital sex joined husband and wife together both physically and spiritually. It made them two in one flesh, just as a Christian's spiritual union with Jesus joined two persons in a single spirit. Precisely because marital sex was tinged with the sacred, any type of extramarital sex in Paul's view was worthy of damnation.

Patristic Teachings

Major Christian thinkers and writers between the second and fifth centuries CE, conventionally known as the Church Fathers, not only elaborated on these views, but also introduced new rules and doctrines concerning acceptable sexual conduct for Christians. Many of these innovations stemmed from their reaction against what they regarded as sectarian deviations from the true faith. One early Christian group known as the Encratites, for example, taught that Jesus had intended to abolish marriage altogether and demanded that his followers observe total chastity throughout their lives. Hence they denounced sexual relations of any kind, even within marriage, as morally corrupt and gravely sinful. At the opposite extreme, members of another sect, the Nicolaitans, maintained that faithful Christians were supposed to share everything freely with one another, including sexual favors, whether they were married or not.

To combat these and numerous other deviations from orthodox doctrine the Church Fathers found it essential to prescribe regulations for proper Christian sexual behavior in far more minute detail than the authors of the New Testament scriptures had done. With few exceptions the Fathers regarded human sexuality with deep suspicion. They acknowledged, to be sure, that God had commanded people to "be fertile and increase" (Genesis 1:28) and that sex was essential for reproduction. At the same time many of the Fathers clearly looked upon this as a regrettable necessity. They commonly advised Christians who had the moral strength to do so to abstain from marriage and sex altogether. Heroic Christians should instead lead lives of virginal purity, untouched by the lust and passion, pleasures and pains that accompanied sexual activity. Praise of chastity, of course, was not unique to Christian teachers. Stoics and other non-Christian thinkers in the ancient world regularly commended sexual abstinence as virtuous, but Christian writers extolled chastity and virginity with far greater fervor than their pagan contemporaries. Most of the Church Fathers at one point or another in their careers lived as monks or hermits, and the ascetic values of the monastic life loomed large in their efforts to reduce the role of sexuality in the Christian life to the minimum necessary for reproduction. This was especially true for members of the clergy. Early in the fourth century the Council of Elvira took the first steps toward demanding that Christian clerics refrain from marriage altogether and pledge to live a life of celibacy. Any who failed to comply, the council ruled, should be deposed from clerical office.

The Church Father whose teachings most widely influenced subsequent regulation of sexuality in the Western church was Augustine of Hippo (354–430). Augustine regarded sex as foul and unclean, a uniquely dangerous manifestation of human rebellion against God's designs. Sex was especially pernicious, Augustine felt, because unlike other bodily desires and pleasures it could overwhelm reason and disarm the will to do what was right, while at the same time it could also transmit original sin. Christians therefore had a moral duty to avoid sex so far as possible. Even married Christians, he believed, should strive so far as they possibly could to lead a chaste life, despite any difficulties that this might cause in the marriage.

Once the Roman emperor Constantine (313–337) and his successors embraced Christianity, the views of the Church Fathers began to be incorporated into imperial law. Constantine himself altered earlier Roman law concerning divorce in 331, for example, with the aim of making it much more difficult for couples, whatever their religion, to dissolve their marriages. Even before that, in 326, he made adultery a public crime, punishable in particularly scandalous cases by death.

Constantine's successors promulgated increasingly detailed and harsher regulations that aimed to discourage all types of sexual conduct of which the church disapproved. Justinian I (527–565) was particularly vigorous in this process. Among numerous other measures, he prescribed the death penalty for men "who dare to practice abominable lust with men," conduct that he blamed for causing famine, earthquakes, and pestilence. He also introduced stricter laws on marriage and divorce, concubinage, adultery, fornication, prostitution, rape, and other sex crimes.

Beginning with Constantine's reign, church councils in which large numbers of bishops and other church leaders came together to work out common policies and rules to implement them emerged as an important source of law concerning sexual conduct as well as many other matters. The decisions of these bodies, along with the rulings of bishops and other church authorities on individual cases, became the major sources of church law on disputed matters concerning faith and morals. Decisions handed down by the bishops of Rome enjoyed special authority, particularly in the Western church, in virtue of their claims to be successors of Peter.

Sexual offenses by Christians were also punishable by special church courts that Constantine had first authorized bishops to conduct. Decisions of these tribunals had the force of public law. Their decisions were enforceable not only by ecclesiastical sanctions such as excommunication, but also by fines, whippings, and other punishments that civil authorities were instructed to impose upon recalcitrant offenders.

Germanic Peoples

Church laws and church courts still continued to operate, and sometimes even expanded the scope of their functions, following the invasions of the West Roman Empire by the so-called Germanic barbarians. Mass invasions commenced in earnest from the late fourth century onwards. Many of the invaders were pagans, although a significant number had converted to Christianity (although not always of the orthodox persuasion) before they began their migrations into the Empire. Once they had settled among the overwhelmingly Christian population of the empire, the remaining pagans among them gradually began to accept baptism and in consequence became subject to the rules that the church imposed on its members.

By the sixth century the invaders had effectively taken political control of nearly all of the Western empire. Barbarian kingdoms ruled by Germanic kings had replaced the earlier Roman authorities throughout virtually all of western Europe, although the indigenous Roman (or Romanized) population largely survived the conflicts that accompanied the invasions. The new rulers brought with them their own customary laws and practices that conflicted in many ways with those familiar among the Romans and those prescribed by the Christian church.

Marriage in Germanic society seems in practice to have operated with relatively few hard-and-fast rules and restrictions. Barbarian laws, for one thing, did not recognize the legal distinction that Roman law drew between marriage and concubinage. The invaders instead generally treated the first year of marriage as a trial period, at the end of which the union could be terminated unless a child had been conceived during that time, while church authorities insisted that marriage once entered into was indissoluble so long as both parties lived. Couples who found their marriages unsatisfactory did not always seek ecclesiastical approval for ending them, and divorce by mutual consent remained common in the barbarian kingdoms. Germanic laws seldom treated extramarital sex by a married man as an offense, although they commonly prescribed capital punishment for adultery by a married woman.

Fornication was apparently commonplace in early medieval Europe despite repeated efforts by the clergy to deter extramarital sex. Prostitutes carried on a brisk trade and numerous efforts by kings and bishops to ban commercial sex apparently had little effect. Churchmen and civil authorities also made strenuous efforts to repress a whole galaxy of sexual practices that they classified as deviant, especially sexual intercourse between persons of the same gender, or even worse, with animals. They labeled these practices “sodomy” and treated them as a horrendous crime that deserved savage punishment, frequently castration followed by burning alive.

Church authorities also attempted to restrict the frequency and varieties of marital sex. Penitential manuals, guides that priests used to determine the penance they should assign to those who confessed sexual and other sins, regularly prescribed pilgrimages, prolonged fasts, and lengthy or even permanent abstinence from marital sex for offenders against the church’s sexual rules. They banned married persons from having intercourse during Lent and Advent, on all days when fasting was required, as well as on Sundays, Wednesdays, Fridays, and Saturdays, or while the wife was pregnant or nursing a child.

Despite these harsh prescriptions, it is far from certain that the general run of early medieval Christians regularly observed many of the church’s stern rules about sexual behavior. Complaints from religious authorities about the sexual activities of both laity and clergy were frequent.

The Reform Movement

During the eleventh century a church reform movement that sought, among other things, to enforce the church’s sexual regulations more effectively, began to take shape. The reformers made particularly strenuous efforts to restrict sexual activity among the clergy, although their efforts enjoyed only mixed success. Prior to the reformers’ campaign to enforce clerical celibacy, priests had commonly either married or lived with concubines. This was also true of many bishops as well. It was not unusual for church offices to pass from father to son over a period of several generations. The reformers slowly managed to put a halt to the transmission of church offices by inheritance, so that by the end of the twelfth century it was becoming rare to encounter married bishops. The rank and file of the parish clergy, however, stubbornly resisted efforts to deprive them of their wives, concubines, and children. Church councils in 1123 and 1139 finally ruled that ordination to major orders (subdeacon, deacon, and priest) created a legal bar to marriage and forbade the faithful to attend Mass or other church services conducted by priests who were married or lived with concubines. Furious clerics sometimes tried to shut down reforming bishops who were enforcing such rules and occasionally attacked them physically as well. The clergy of Rouen hurled stones at a bishop who demanded that they abandon their concubines and children and drove him from the church, while at Cambrai outraged clerics burned a preacher alive for the same offense.

Canon Law

In order to succeed in their enterprise the reformers realized early on that they needed to revamp the church’s whole legal system. Church law, usually called canon law, had become a wilderness of rules and regulations, promulgated at different times and places by different authorities. Many of its prescriptions were inconsistent with one another, and finding one’s way through the maze of canons could at best be difficult, and sometimes impossible. Numerous churchmen over the centuries had tried to bring order out of chaos by compiling collections of the canons they deemed most useful and appropriate for the church’s needs, but no single collection commanded universal assent. This made it difficult for priests or bishops to give satisfactory or consistent answers to the kinds of questions that people asked them to resolve. Was a marriage between fourth cousins valid? It depended on which authorities one consulted. Could a woman divorce her husband because he turned out to be sexually impotent? And if she did so, could she then remarry? Again, the answers depended on which rules one chose to follow.

This unsatisfactory state of affairs finally ended around the middle of the twelfth century, when a massive new textbook of canon law appeared. The circumstances surrounding its appearance are obscure, as is the identity of its author, Gratian. The book, usually known as the Decretum, was being taught in law schools by around 1150. Gratian’s Decretum differed from its predecessors not only in its comprehensiveness—it comprised nearly 4,000 canons—but even more importantly, in Gratian’s efforts to analyze his material in order to reconcile conflicting rules and thus to produce a coherent body of canon law.

It would be difficult to overstate the importance of Gratian’s Decretum. It became one of the most widely read books in Western history and remained a basic textbook in schools of canon law from the middle of the twelfth up to the beginning of the twentieth century. The Decretum touched off an intellectual revolution that helped to shape the future development of Western legal systems. Its influence continues to be felt to this day.

Gratian's discussion of marital sex centered upon his concept of marital debt, by which he meant that wives and husbands had a legal duty to make themselves available for intercourse whenever the partner desired it. The debt commenced at the moment when the marriage was consummated and thereafter each spouse was bound to render sexual services upon demand. In principle at least, no matter where or when the demand was made, the spouse had an absolute obligation to comply then and there.

Gratian, like many of the authorities on whom he relied, treated sexual urges, inside or outside marriage, as a moral weakness that Christians must combat with utmost vigor. He deemed fornication as grave a sin as perjury and only slightly less serious than homicide. Adultery in his view was an aggravated, and hence even more sinful, form of fornication. He treated prostitution, however, as a necessary evil. Echoing Augustine, he maintained that if prostitutes were to vanish from society, men would turn to even worse sex crimes, such as rape and same-sex relations.

Gratian's work assembled and tried to rationalize sexual regulations that the Christian church had developed during the millennium and more following the death of Jesus. The making of new law did not cease with the appearance of Gratian's book. Later church lawmakers sought primarily to refine and amplify earlier regulations about sexual activity that they found in Gratian's Decretum.

An underlying problem that the church's leaders faced was the lack of systematic mechanisms for the detection and punishment of sexual offenses. Since people tended to conduct their sexual activities away from public view, it was usually difficult to discover who was engaging in prohibited conduct. The Fourth Lateran Council in 1215 produced a partial answer to this problem by requiring all Christians to confess their sins to their parish priests at least once a year during the Lenten season that preceded Easter. Since most people in western Europe lived in small rural communities, it was not difficult for priests to know who had failed to perform their Easter duty. Annual confession thus enabled priests to discover which members of their flock were engaging in prohibited sexual conduct and to demand that they do penance as punishment for their sins. They could publicly excommunicate those who failed to comply, an action that imposed severe hardship, shame, and loss of reputation upon recalcitrant sinners. The Lateran Council also clarified the laws governing impediments to marriage based on kinship (consanguinity) or other kinds of relationship, including premarital intercourse (affinity).

Other methods of dealing with the problem were introduced during the thirteenth century. Bishops were required, for one thing, to conduct regular visitations of each parish within their diocese. On these occasions the visiting bishop invited members of the parish to reveal the names of their fellow parishioners who they suspected of sexual misconduct. New criminal procedures were also instituted during this period that made it far easier to crack down on priests who violated their obligation to celibacy. Manuals for confessors guided priests' inquiries into the sex lives of penitents. While these measures did not fully solve the problem, they did make noncompliance with the medieval church's sexual regulations more hazardous.

JAMES A. BRUNDAGE

References and Further Reading

- Baldwin, John W. The Language of Sex: Five Voices from Northern France around 1200. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1994.
- Biller, Peter, and A. J. Minnis, eds. Handling Sin: Confession in the Middle Ages. York: York Medieval Press, 1998.
- Boswell, John. Christianity, Social Tolerance, and Homosexuality: Gay People in Western Europe from the Beginning of the Christian Era to the Fourteenth Century. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1980.
- Brown, Peter. The Body and Society: Men, Women and Sexual Renunciation in Early Christianity. New York: Columbia University Press, 1988.
- Brundage, James A. Law, Sex, and Christian Society in Medieval Europe. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1987.
- . Sex, Law and Marriage in the Middle Ages. Aldershot: Variorum, 1993.
- Bullough, Vern L., and James A. Brundage, eds. Sexual Practices and the Medieval Church. Buffalo N.Y.: Prometheus Books, 1982.
- Helmholz, Richard H. Marriage Litigation in Medieval England. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1974.
- Karras, Ruth Mazo. Common Women: Prostitution and Sexuality in Medieval England. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1996.
- Levin, Eve. Sex and Society in the World of the Orthodox Slavs. Ithaca N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1989.
- Linehan, Peter. The Ladies of Zamora. University Park, Pa.: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1997.
- Makowski, Elizabeth M. "The Conjugal Debt and Medieval Canon Law." Journal of Medieval History 3 (1977): 99–114.
- Noonan, John T. Jr. Contraception: A History of its Treatment by the Catholic Theologians and Canonists. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press, 1965.
- Otis-cour, Leah Lydia. Prostitution in Medieval Society: The History of an Urban Institution in Languedoc. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1985.
- Payer, Pierre J. Sex and the Penitentials: The Development of a Sexual Code, 550–1150. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1984.

———. The Bridling of Desire: Views of Sex in the Later Middle Ages. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1993.

Pedersen, Frederik. Marriage Disputes in Medieval England. London: Hambledon Press, 2000.

Wemple, Suzanne F. Women in Frankish Society: Marriage and the Cloister 500 to 900. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1981.

See also Celibacy; Clerical and Priests' Concubines; Chastity and Chaste Marriage; Divorce and Separation; Law, Canon; Marriage, Christian; Marriage, Impediments to; Penitentials and Pastoral Manuals; Sexuality: Extramarital Sex; Sexuality: Female Same-Sex Relations; Sexuality: Male Same-Sex Relations; Sexuality: Sex in Marriage; Virginity

SEXUALITY: SEX IN MARRIAGE

According to the medieval Church, marriage was the only legitimate venue for sexual activity. Throughout the period, there was an ongoing debate about whether, and to what degree, sex in marriage might be sinful. This was due, in part, to the fact that marital sex always had a connotation of being a concession to human weakness. If people did not have a legitimate outlet for their desire, a myriad of social ills would result, as people, particularly men, sought other sexual outlets. This view can be traced back to the Apostle Paul's assertion that "It is better to marry than to burn" (1 Cor. 7:9). Moreover, the asceticism of ancient Roman stoicism also influenced the Church Fathers, who established the foundation of Christian teachings about marriage and sexuality. Consequently, there was considerable debate about the nature and appropriate exercise of marital sexuality. The doctrine of the conjugal debt further complicated the understanding of sex within marriage, requiring spouses to be available to each other for sex whenever asked. Furthermore, sexual consummation was an important component of the marriage bond, as well as being essential to achieve one of the three goods of marriage: the procreation of children. But sexual intercourse, even within marriage, was inextricably linked to the sin of lust, and was a sign of humanity's disordered nature and fallen state.

The conflicted manner in which marital sex was viewed by theologians, canonists, and moralists is exemplified in discussions of the ideal marriage of Mary and Joseph. This marriage was believed to have never encompassed a sexual relationship because the clergy could not contemplate the mother of God engaging in any act so fallen, polluted, and as brutish and animalistic as sexual intercourse. Thus, the clergy concluded that married couples must have the capacity to engage in sexual relations, but they could agree to abstain completely from sex. This was, however, a mode of life suitable only for rare couples and was not encouraged among the laity in general.

The fundamental understanding of the Church can be summarized as permitting sex within marriage, in the only legitimate position (the so-called missionary position), with the sole intention to procreate. Sex for pleasure, especially if it was accompanied by innovative positions or excessive foreplay, was always to some degree sinful, even with one's own spouse. Indeed, in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, canonists and theologians debated if it was ever possible for a married couple to engage in sex without committing a sin. Some, such as Huguccio (d. 1210), insisted that sin always inhered to intercourse, while others, notably Hugh of St. Victor (1096–1141), were more moderate and incorporated marital sexuality as part of the loving relationship that should pertain between husband and wife, owing to the sacramental nature of marriage. The mere intention to procreate was sufficient for sex to occur without sin. Occasionally, too, clerical authors and writers of romances both presented an appreciation of the intimacy of the marriage bed, describing a couple's pillow-talk and expressions of endearment. Authors could portray the soft words of love between a couple in bed, whereas conventional morality proscribed the encouragement, or even description, of the physical manifestations of that love.

Religious Viewpoints

The prevailing belief that women were passive sexually led to the oft-repeated dictum, traced to Jerome, that a man should not treat his wife as he would a prostitute. It is unclear if this referred to lusty mutual pleasure, or to the indifferent use of one's wife to satisfy one's lust, or to the absence of procreative intent. Moreover, moralists rarely discussed how people might engage in sexual activity, beyond proscribing positions and denouncing passionate kissing, nudity, foreplay, and sexual touching as obscene, even in marriage. The ambiguous evaluation of marital sexuality led the church to implement constraints not only on how, but also on when, sex could occur. In addition to the sexual taboos surrounding a woman's body—that is, during menstruation, pregnancy, after birth, and during lactation—marital sex was also forbidden on Sundays, Fridays, Wednesdays, feast days, during Lent, Advent, and Pentecost, and before receiving communion. What these restrictions meant in the lives of the married laity, however, is unclear. Certainly, the injunctions were disseminated through the mechanisms of pastoral care, in particular, through sermons and counseling in the course of confession, but how they played out in people's lives cannot be determined.

Medicine

Medicine is another theoretical discourse that may have exercised some influence on marital sexuality. Medical theory basically held the ancient view that, for conception to occur, both the man and the woman needed to achieve orgasm and ejaculate seed, which would mingle together in the uterus. Consequently, according to prevailing medical opinion, female as much as male sexual pleasure was required for procreation. This may have had some influence, since there are occasional references to the two-seed theory in the works of pastoral writers, such as Robert Grosseteste (1175–1253), and authors of manuals for confessors seem to have encouraged men to ensure their wife's sexual pleasure.

Literature

Secular sources and works of literature offer little assistance to better understand sexual relations, marital or otherwise. This is partly because such sources either idealized chaste love, as in courtly romances, or were deliberately bawdy and titillating, as in the fabliaux. Chaucer portrayed his Wife of Bath as a woman who enjoyed sex with her numerous husbands, but it is difficult to assess the extent to which this reflects medieval experience. Few married people wrote down their reflections or discussed their personal sexual experiences. One notable exception to this silence is found in the twelfth century, in the letters exchanged between Peter Abelard and Heloise. Written after the couple had separated and entered monastic life, their letters reveal fond memories of their sexual encounters, describing their passion, their sexual experimentation, and their ultimate mutual pleasure in sex. Significantly, Abelard and Heloise both knew well the various prohibitions and regulations of sex, marital and extramarital, but this knowledge did not seem to detract from their personal sexual experiences or, at least, how they remembered those experiences.

Sexual activity, or at least the potential for it, lay at the heart of marriage. Both the secular and religious goals of marriage gave prominence to procreation. The Church taught that if everyone had the ability to engage in sex with a legitimate spouse, society would be protected from social evils such as prostitution and sodomy. Although it was commonly believed that women were more lustful than men, it was also acknowledged that, in the absence of a wife, men would seek other sexual outlets. The role of sexual pleasure is a more complex area and perhaps more fraught. There were different theoretical views but it is not possible to grasp fully what these meant, if anything, in the daily lives of the sexually active laity.

JACQUELINE MURRAY

References and Further Reading

- Abelard, Peter. The Letters of Abelard and Heloise. Translated by Betty Radice. Harmondsworth: Penguin Books, 1974.
- Baldwin, John W. The Language of Sex: Five Voices from Northern France around 1200. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1994.
- Brundage, James A. Law, Sex, and Christian Society in Medieval Europe. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1987.
- . Sex, Law and Marriage in the Middle Ages. London: Variorum, 1993.
- Clifford, John T. "The Ethics of Conjugal Intimacy according to St. Albert the Great." Theological Studies 3.1 (1942): 1–26.
- Elliott, Dyan. Spiritual Marriage: Sexual Abstinence in Medieval Wedlock. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1993.
- Flandrin, Jean Louis. "Sex in Married Life in the Early Middle Ages: The Church's Teaching and Behavioural Reality." In Western Sexuality: Practice and Precept in Past and Present Times, edited by Philippe Ariès and André Bejin, translated by Anthony Forster. Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1985, pp. 114–129.
- Payer, Pierre J. The Bridling of Desire: Views of Sex in the Later Middle Ages. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1993.
- Salisbury, Joyce E. "The Latin Doctors of the Church on Sexuality." Journal of Medieval History 12 (1986): 279–289.

See also Chastity and Chaste Marriage; Conjugal Debt; Courtly Love; Fabliau; Gender Ideologies; Heloise; Impotence; Marriage; Christian; Menstruation; Prostitutes; Spiritual Care

SHEELA NA GIGS

Since the 1840s, sculpted figures of nude women exhibiting their vulvas have been known as sheela na gigs. These crudely sculpted figures are so unlovely that they are abject, repulsive, yet fascinating and popular; they even have a dedicated Web site. Although Weir and Jerman demonstrated that exhibiting women appeared earlier in the monumental sculpture of France, alongside other ribald figures, it is clear that their popularity was greatest in Ireland and Britain between the twelfth century and the fifteenth. Most of the insular examples differ in their comparative isolation, the exaggerated size of the vulva that is often stretched open by the hands, and their appearance on castle walls as well as churches. Most sheelas squat or stand above eye level on the edges of buildings, such as door and window frames, corners, and roof-lines. Unprofessional carving, weathering, and defacement that often includes enlargement of the vaginal passage, impede dating.

Sheela na Gig, from the church of St. Mary and St. David, Kilpeck, Herefordshire. Location: English Heritage, National Monuments Record, Great Britain. Credit: HIP / Art Resource, N.Y.

The name is perplexing. Freitag's recent thorough review of Irish and English renderings reveals an obsolete meaning for English gig as the vulva or female pudenda. Yet an Irish folk tradition that Patrick had a troublesome wife called Sheila also appears relevant. Reception history indicates that witch and hag are among many names used, a multivalence that is in keeping with multiple functions. Freitag's theory that sheelas aided women in childbirth is sound, yet surely they also filled armies with fear (men were forbidden to see birthing); and neither function would prevent the clergy enlisting them against the sin of lust.

MADLINE H. CAVINESS

References and Further Reading

Freitag, Barbara. Sheela-Na-Gigs: Unravelling an Enigma. London and New York: Routledge, 2004.
Weir, Anthony, and James Jerman. Images of Lust: Sexual Carvings on Medieval Churches. London: B. T. Batsford, 1986.

See also Art, Representations of Women in; Body: Visual Representations of; Ireland; Magic and Charms; Obscenity; Pregnancy and Childbirth: Christian Women

SHEKHINAH

The term Shekhinah was coined by the rabbis to denote the presence of God in the world. There is little evidence in classical rabbinic literature that Shekhinah denotes a hypostatic entity ontically distinct from God, a secondary being akin to the Logos in Philo or in the prologue to the Gospel of John. In most instances, Shekhinah is used interchangeably with the supreme divine being as He appears in history and nature.

The rabbinic conception of Shekhinah is phenomenologically on a par with the priestly notion of the kavod, the divine glory that resides in the midst of the people of Israel. The rabbis formulated their idea after the destruction of the Second Temple in 70 CE, and thus, in contrast to the priests, the abiding of Shekhinah is not confined to the physical space where sacrifices were offered. The Temple is replaced by the schoolroom, synagogue, and domestic space of the family, as these were the main sites wherein one could access the indwelling of the presence through the cultivation of a life of ritual purity.

The symbol of Shekhinah continued to play a decisive role in various genres of the Jewish religious imagination. But it is in the minds of kabbalists, in particular, that Shekhinah is accorded a significance unparalleled in earlier sources. In the theosophic system of the Kabbalah, Shekhinah routinely is associated with the last of the ten sefirot, the luminous attributes that reveal the hidden aspect of God. Needless to say, kabbalists absorb many of the older rabbinic portrayals of Shekhinah, but what is most distinctive about their approach is the explicit representation of the presence in a litany of female images, including Matrona, bride, daughter, sister, mother, community of Israel, heavenly Jerusalem, throne, temple, tabernacle, moon, sea, and the sphere of the earth.

Undeniably, one of the great contributions of kabbalists to the history of Judaism is the explicit utilization of gender images to depict the nature of God and the consequent application of erotic symbolism to characterize the divine-human relationship. In line with earlier rabbinic tradition regarding the two main attributes of God, but explicating the sexual implications far more openly, kabbalists envisage the unity of God in androgynous terms as the coupling of male and female, which are respectively aligned with the attributes of loving kindness on the right and judgment on the left. Gender symbolism in traditional kabbalistic literature is dynamic, presupposing the crossing of boundaries and intermingling of identity, male in female and female in male. The flexibility of gender transformation is determined, however, by an inflexible structure, and hence one may legitimately speak of variability in kabbalistic symbolism but not ambiguity. Male and female are correlated consistently with the activity of projection and the passivity of restriction: the potency to overflow is masculine, the capacity to withhold, feminine. The religious obligation imposed on the Jewish man to unify God is interpreted as the harnessing of male and female, a pairing of right and left, the will to bestow and the desire to contain. But just as the entirety of the Godhead is androgynous, so each of the sefirot exemplifies the dual capacity to overflow and to receive, and Shekhinah is no exception. In relation to the sefirot above her, Shekhinah receives the divine efflux and is thus engendered as feminine; in relation to the worlds below her, Shekhinah overflows and is thus engendered as masculine. The sovereignty over this world—in virtue of which the name malkhut, “kingship,” is attributed to Shekhinah—is not indicative of a positive valorization of the feminine, but rather marks the capacity of Shekhinah to be transformed into a demiurgic being, which is masculine in relation to the worlds beneath the divine emanations.

The gender orientation of medieval kabbalists was androcentric in nature since both masculine and feminine elements were interpreted as features of the male. The simplest way to express the matter is to note that kabbalists read the account of God having created Adam male (zakhar) and female (neqevah) in the first chapter in Genesis in light of the second account wherein the derivative ontic status of woman (ishshah) from man (ish) is made explicit. Accordingly, the proto-human, adam, is conceived as a male androgyne, the single gender that contains its other as part of itself, a typical patriarchal construction. For kabbalists, therefore, we can speak properly of an Edenic state of the androgynous prelapsarian man, a condition to be retrieved in the end of time. In the conjunctio oppositorum, two sexes are unified and woman is restored to man, the ideal unification that tolerates no difference. Representations of Shekhinah as feminine, and especially as the erotic object of male desire, bespeak the sexual dimorphism characteristic of a state of exile wherein the unity of the male androgyne has been severed, and as a consequence the male seeks his other, to restore the part of his self that has been taken and rendered independent. Redemption entails the overcoming of this dimorphic condition, the reconstitution of the androgynous male, expressed by the image of the ascent of Shekhinah as the diadem (atarah) that rises to the head of Keter, the first of the sefirot. By virtue of this ascent Shekhinah is transformed into the crown of the male and the unity that was rendered asunder in the beginning of creation is repaired.

ELLIOT R. WOLFSON

References and Further Reading

- Abrams, Daniel. The Female Body of God in Jewish Mystical Literature: Embodied Forms of Love and Sexuality in the Divine Feminine. Jerusalem: Magnes Press, 2004.
- Green, Arthur. “Shekhinah, the Virgin Mary, and the Song of Songs: Reflections on a Kabbalistic Symbol in Historical Context.” AJS Review 26 (2002): 1–52.
- Liébes, Yehuda. Studies in the Zohar. Translated by Arnold Schwartz, Stephanie Nakache, and Penina Peli. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1993.
- Mopsik, Charles. Sex of the Soul: the Vicissitudes of Sexual Difference in Kabbalah. Edited with a foreword by Daniel Abrams. Los Angeles: Cherub Press, 2005.
- Schäfer, Peter. Mirror of His Beauty: Feminine Images of God from the Bible to the Early Kabbalah. Princeton, N.Y.: Princeton University Press, 2002.
- Scholem, Gershom. On the Mystical Shape of the Godhead: Basic Concepts in the Kabbalah. Translated by Joachim Neugroschel, edited and revised by Jonathan Chipman. New York: Schocken Books, 1991.
- Wolfson, Elliot R. Circle in the Square: Studies in the Use of Gender in Kabbalistic Symbolism. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1995.
- . “Coronation of the Sabbath Bride: Kabbalistic Myth and the Ritual of Androgyneisation.” Journal of Jewish Thought and Philosophy 6 (1997): 301–344.
- . “Occultation of the Feminine and the Body of Secrecy in Medieval Kabbalah.” In Rending the Veil: Concealment and Secrecy in the History of Religions, edited by Elliot R. Wolfson. New York and London: Seven Bridges Press, 1999, pp. 113–154.

See also Gender Ideologies; Jewish Mystical Thought, Body and Soul in; Jewish Women; Theology

SILENCE

See Roman de Silence

SINGLEWOMEN

The study of singlewomen in the Middle Ages is a relatively new development, with most knowledge becoming available only since the 1990s. The first useful information on never-married women came from work produced by demographic and economic historians, who were interested in the ages at marriage of commoners, and the work they did in the Middle Ages. Studies analyzing singlewomen and singleness have focused primarily on the later Middle Ages and, in contrast to the norm, on commoners more than elite females. The historical literature written in English is skewed toward the study of singlewomen in western Europe, especially medieval England. There is an entire separate literature (not covered here) on Catholic nuns, who were celibate women, but whom contemporaries characterized as “Brides of Christ.”

With the exception of Joan of Arc, few singlewomen from the Middle Ages are recognized outside the religious life. But such women, especially life-cycle (or young, not yet married) singlewomen were not as rare in medieval Europe as might be assumed. Their numbers did vary, with never-married women more numerous in northwestern than southern Europe and in towns more than rural areas. The first was due to what historians call the northwestern European marriage pattern, wherein young, single people worked as laborers or servants for a numbers of years, saving up money to establish a separate household, and thereby delaying marriage into their early or even mid-twenties. In southern Europe, multiple-generation households enabled people to marry earlier, and it was customary for women to marry in their teens or to enter a nunnery if they did not marry. This geographic contrast is evidenced by tax and census material that shows that in England in 1377 almost one-third of adult women were single, whereas in Florence, Italy, in 1427 about one-fifth of adult women were single.

Town Life

Never-married women were also more common in towns than in rural areas, because there were more opportunities for female employment in urban areas. Domestic service was the primary occupation for medieval singlewomen. Opportunities for service increased in the later Middle Ages, which perhaps led some women in northern English towns like York to choose to work instead of marriage. Servants were able to save enough money so that in southern England they became active local moneylenders.

Domestic servants were so in demand in the thriving merchant towns of Renaissance Italy that traders resorted to importing female slaves from the Balkans. Female slaves were virtually all singlewomen; their slave status was passed on to their children frequently fathered by their masters. These births made them undesirable marriage partners.

Some never-married women were able to find work in areas other than domestic service. Brewing was originally an occupation by which singlewomen and widows were able to make a living, but by the fifteenth century, unmarried women were pushed out of the brewing trade, foreshadowing the complete masculinization of the occupation by the early modern era. Other urban women were able to learn a skilled trade and work within the guild system. Some cities, like Paris, even had all-female guilds that focused on textile trades such as embroidery and purse-making. But successful brewers and guildswomen may have been more the exception than the rule.

Singlewomen frequently numbered among the poor and criminal elements of medieval towns. Legalized prostitution and civic-run brothels provided never-married women without money and skills one form of employment. Such women were marginalized in their communities, confined to specific districts and forced to wear certain types of clothing marking them as “common women.” In the London suburb of Southwark, prostitutes were known as “singlewomen,” which illustrates much about the assumed marital status of such workers. Never-married women in countries like France and Italy were able to seek assistance from institutions set up for women at risk of turning to prostitution, or turning from it. Such Magdalen houses (named after the biblical Mary Magdalen) provided one sort of refuge for singlewomen who were poor and homeless.

The issue of where a never-married woman was supposed to live and work was a fraught one in the Middle Ages. Contemporaries assumed that a young singlewoman would live with her family or master until she married. In England these assumptions were sometimes enshrined in law, such as when in 1492 Coventry forbade never-married women under fifty years of age from keeping houses or rooms by themselves. The reality was that singlewomen in cities like York and Paris commonly lodged and shared expenses with other unmarried women. Beguinages provided a communal living arrangement for lay singlewomen in the Low Countries, France, and other parts of continental Europe. Beguines lived and worked together in female communities, but unlike nuns, they took no formal vows, and could leave their communities.

Countryside

We know much more about urban singlewomen than rural ones, but such women also appeared in the records of medieval Europe's manors or estates. Never-married women were the specific targets of one of the fines that landlords levied on their unfree peasants. Singlewomen who produced children out of wedlock were required to pay leyrwite, a fine that illustrates how never-married women were held responsible for their extramarital sexuality. Other rural singlewomen contributed to their manors in more positive ways. For instance, the fourteen-century peasant Cecilia Penifader was a never-married woman on the manor of Brigstock in England. She made a prosperous life for herself, buying up plots of land, heading her own household, and farming with the help of her brothers and other servants. At a time when a well-off peasant was someone who held thirty acres, Penifader died possessing over seventy acres that she passed on to her kin.

Social Status

Laywomen who never married tended to be marginalized in the Middle Ages. Medieval people conceived of singleness as a life stage, and used terms such as puella, pucelle, virgin, and maiden to describe young women who had not yet married. The term singlewoman may have been a bit more elastic. As noted, it was used to describe prostitutes in London, and in towns like York it seems to have encompassed both never-married and widowed women. It is possible that singlewoman described a woman's unmarried status more than her youth or virginity.

Attitudes toward young never-married women varied. On the one hand, young singlewomen were believed to need supervision and guidance to prepare them for marriage and to protect their chastity. And they were expected to be dependents, both economically and residentially. On the other hand, European culture extolled the maiden as the ideal woman (perfect, pure, uncorrupted, and innocent) and maidenhood as the perfect female age. Royal and noble households displayed their high status through a bevy of young female attendants. In addition, the Middle Ages witnessed the veneration of young, virgin-martyr female saints and the popular depiction of the Virgin Mary as a young maiden rather than a matronly mother.

French courtly romance was also replete with maiden characters who asserted their autonomy and resourcefulness. Late medieval English songs also focused on the independence and sexuality of young singlewomen. While it is difficult to discern if stories and songs echoed the experiences of actual women, it is clear that young singlewomen in England enjoyed a distinct subculture and special religious and communal roles. Never-married women raised funds for and tended to particular altars, candles, and statues in parish churches. They participated in Hocktide and May Day rituals that involved playful and physical contact with the opposite sex. Whatever their eventual marital status, all females in the Middle Ages experienced life as a singlewoman for some period in their lives.

AMY M. FROIDE

References and Further Reading

- Amtower, Laurel, and Dorothea Kehler, eds. The Single Woman in Medieval and Early Modern England: Her Life and Representation. Tempe, Ariz.: Arizona Center for Medieval and Renaissance Studies, 2003.
- Beattie, Cordelia. "'A Room of One's Own?' The Legal Evidence for the Residential Arrangements of Women Without Husbands in Late Fourteenth- and Early Fifteenth-Century York." In Medieval Women and the Law, edited by Noël James Menuge. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell Press, 2000, pp. 41–56.
- . "The Problem of Women's Work Identities in Post Black Death England." In The Problem of Labour in Fourteenth-Century England, edited by James Bothwell, et al. York: York Medieval Press, 2000, pp. 1–19.
- Bennett, Judith M. Ale, Beer and Brewsters in England, Women's Work in a Changing World 1300–1600. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.
- . A Medieval Life: Cecilia Penifader of Brigstock, c. 1295–1344. Boston: McGraw Hill, 1999.
- . "Ventriloquisms: When Maidens Speak in English Songs, c. 1300–1550." In Medieval Women's Song: Cross-Cultural Approaches, edited by Anne L. Klinck and Ann Marie Rasmussen. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2002, pp. 187–204.
- Bennett, Judith M., and Amy M. Froide, eds. Singlewomen in the European Past, 1250–1800. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999.
- French, Katherine L. "Maidens' Lights and Wives' Stores: Women's Parish Guilds in Late Medieval England." Sixteenth Century Journal 29 (1998): 399–425.
- Goldberg, P. J. P. Women, Work, and Life Cycle in a Medieval Economy: Women in York and Yorkshire c.1300–1520. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1992.
- Karras, Ruth Mazo. Common Women, Prostitution and Sexuality in Medieval England. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1996.
- Lewis, Katherine J., Noël James Menuge, and Kim M. Phillips, eds. Young Medieval Women. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1999.
- McIntosh, Marjorie K. "Moneylending on the Periphery of London, 1300–1600." Albion 20.4 (1988): 557–571.
- Phillips, Kim M. Medieval Maidens: Young Women and Gender in England 1270–1540. New York: Palgrave/Manchester University Press, 2003.

See also Adolescence; Alewives and Brewing; Beguines; Merchet and Leyrwite; Monasticism and Nuns; Prostitutes; Servants; Virgin Martyrs; Work

SISTER-BOOKS AND OTHER CONVENT CHRONICLES

Sister-Books (also Schwesternbücher, Nonnenbücher, vitae sororum, Lives of the Sisters, or Convent Chronicles) are a genre of female-authored texts composed in women's monasteries of the Dominican Order's German province between 1310 and 1350. They are loosely modeled on Gerard of Frachet's Lives of the Brothers (1260), a collection describing the activities and miracles of the early Dominican friars across Europe. More interior in focus, the Sister-Books are confined to the lives and events of monastic women in specific communities.

These texts, which survive today in Latin and dialects of Middle High German, combine monastic historiography, hagiography, and mysticism, to create collections of pious lives [vitae]. Each Sister-Book may have originally contained a chronicle of the monastery's foundation and history, in addition to the collection of individual vitae, but most of these have been lost. The Sister-Books record, among other things, the prayers, visions, devotional practices, obedience to the monastic rule, theological discussions, received signs of grace, mystical experiences, fasting, bodily mortifications, and deaths of individual women. Each Dominican monastery composed the lives of its own inhabitants, often going back to the founding generation of the community and proceeding, not necessarily in a chronological fashion, to the current generation of monastic members, both nuns and lay sisters.

The hagiographic nature of these vitae means that they must be approached with care. The lives were intended to be didactic, instructing the monastic audience about proper female Dominican behavior and belief, as well as celebrating the feats of the early sisters. The literary aspect of their composition means that they are not always true records of actual events. Rather, they are reworkings of women's lives that reveal much about the ideals, aspirations, and religious milieu of cloistered Dominican women.

Since none of the original fourteenth-century manuscripts survive, it is difficult to exactly date their composition, as well as know the exact contents of the originals. The transmission history of the Sister-Books is complicated. Manuscripts circulated among Dominican houses, and other religious communities, where they were copied by interested readers. Lives were excerpted from one manuscript and combined with lives from other Sister-Books, creating new collections for pious audiences. The original creation of each monastery's Sister-Book also differed. Some texts have an identifiable single author, while others are the result of more communal efforts. Some authors wrote their own material, while others recycled previously composed lives, functioning as compilers and editors.

There are nine surviving Sister-Books. The Adelhausen Sister-Book (c. 1310–1320), called the Chronik, was written in Latin by prioress Anna of Munzingen but survives only in Middle High German translations. It contains a short chronicle and the vitae of thirty women. The Unterlinden Sister-Book (c. 1320) was composed in Latin by Catherine, a nun whose identity remains unclear. The Unterlinden text survives in a complete Latin copy from the fifteenth century (made in the monastery), a later summary in Latin, and in a late fifteenth-century Middle High German translation by the prioress, Elisabeth Kempfin. The text describes the lives of forty-one women in thirty-nine chapters. Several more lives were added in the fifteenth century. The Gotteszell Sister-Book (after 1320) has no identifiable author and, until the 1970s, was thought to be a continuation of the Kirchberg Sister-Book, since they were preserved in the same manuscript with no break. The Gotteszell text survives in copies of the original Middle High German, containing about twelve vitae and one additional long life, which was separately authored.

The Kirchberg Sister-Book (1320–1340) was produced by Elisabeth of Kirchberg in Middle High German. The Engelthal Sister-Book (1328–1340) was written by Christine Ebner in Middle High German. The text is commonly referred to as Der Nonne von Engelthal Büchlein von der Gnaden Überlast [The Nun of Engelthal's Little Book of the Overwhelming Burden of Graces]. It consists of a chronicle and the brief lives of some forty women, in addition to two long vitae, both of which may have different authors. The Töss Sister-Book (before 1340) has been attributed primarily to Elsbeth Stägel, correspondent and spiritual follower of Henry Suso, but she is not the sole author. The full Sister-Book contains a chronicle and about forty vitae, six of which are extensive and may have existed previous to the composition of the main body of the text.

The anonymous Oetenbach Sister-Book (after 1340), which is the shortest, was written in a Zurich dialect of Middle High German. It contains a lengthy and detailed monastic chronicle with six lives. The St. Katharinenthal Sister-Book (1318–1343) also has no identifiable author. The text consists of a chronicle and about sixty lives, all in Middle High German, with additional vitae added after its fourteenth-century composition. The Weiler Sister-Book (c. 1350) has at least two authors, both unknown. It contains twenty-seven Middle High German vitae.

In addition to the fourteenth-century female Dominican Sister-Books, there are other groups of texts that are sometimes referred to as either Sister-Books or convent chronicles. These include collective biographies associated with the Modern Devotion. The oldest of these is the Middle Dutch Lives of the Older Sisters, which covers the period from 1398–1456. Another group encompasses texts generated by the Observant Movement beginning in the late fourteenth century. These include works like the combination chronicle and necrology of the Venetian convent of Corpus Domini written by a fifteenth-century nun. Despite variations in content, geographic location, and composition dates, all of these writings were composed by women who wished to pass on their histories and pious observations to subsequent generations of monastic inhabitants.

ERIKA LAUREN LINDGREN

References and Further Reading

- Anna of Munzingen. "Die Chronik der Anna von Munzingen." edited by W. König. Freiburger Diözesan-Arcáiv 13 (1880): 129–236.
- "Aufzeichnungen über das mystische Leben der Nonnen von Kirchberg bei Sulz Predigerordens während des XIV. und XV. Jahrhunderts." edited by F. W. E. Roth. Alemannia 21 (1893): 103–148.
- Catherine of Unterlinden. "Les vitae Sororum d'Unterlinden. Édition critique du manuscrit 508 de la bibliothèque de Colmar." edited by Jeanne Ancelet-Hustache. Archives d'Histoire Doctrinale et Littéraire du Moyen Age 5 (1930): 317–519.
- Devotio Moderna: Basic Writings, translated by John Van Engen. New York: Paulist Press, 1988.
- Early Dominicans: Selected Writings*. Edited and translated by Simon Tugwell. New York: Paulist Press, 1982.
- Ebner, Christina. "Der Nonne von Engeltal Büchlein von der Gnaden Überlast." Edited by Karl Schröder. Bibliothek des Litterarischer Verein in Stuttgart, 108 (1871): 1–44.
- Gerard of Frachet. Lives of the Brethren of the Order of Preachers, 1206–1259. Translated by Placid Conway. New York: Benziger Brothers, 1924.
- Das Leben der Schwestern zu Töß beschrieben von Elsbet Stigel*. Edited by Ferdinand Vetter. Deutsche Texte des Mittelalters 6. Berlin: Weidmannsche Buchhandlung, 1906.
- Lewis, Gertrud Jaron. By Women, for Women, about Women: The Sister-Books of Fourteenth-Century Germany. Toronto: Pontifical Institute of Mediaeval Studies, 1996.
- Life and Death in a Venetian Convent: The Chronicle and Necrology of Corpus Domini, 1395–1436*. Edited and translated by Daniel Bornstein. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2000.
- "Mystisches Leben in dem Dominikanerinnenkloster Weiler bei Eßlingen im 13. und 14. Jahrhundert." Edited by Karl Bihlmeyer. Württembergische Vierteljahreshefte für Landesgeschichte, n.s. 25 (1916): 61–93.
- Das "St. Katharinentaler Schwesternbuch": Untersuchung, Edition, Kommentar. Edited by Ruth Meyer. Tübingen: Max Niemeyer, 1995.
- "Die Stiftung des Klosters Oetenbach und das Leben der seligen Schwestern daselbst, aus der Nürnberger Handschrift." Edited by H. Zeller-Werdmüller and Jakob Bächtold. Zürcher Taschenbuch, n.s. 12 (1889): 213–276.
- Winston-Allen, Anne. Convent Chronicles: Women Writing about Women and Reform in the Late Middle Ages. University Park, Pa.: Pennsylvania State University Press, 2004.

See also Asceticism; Audience, Women in the; Dominican Order; Education, Monastic; Germanic Lands; Hagiography; Literacy and Reading; Vernacular; Literature, German; Modern Devotion; Monasticism and Nuns; Mystics' Writings; Necrologies and Mortuary Rolls; Observant Movement; Stigel, Elsbeth; Women Authors: German Texts; Women Authors: Latin Texts

SKÁLDKONUR

Old Norse poetry is conventionally subdivided into eddic and skaldic poetry: the former anonymous and the latter, by and large, attributed to named poets and deploying more complex meters. Eddic poetry, cast in rhythmic, alliterative meters, depicts the ancient Scandinavian world of heroines and heroes, gods and goddesses, giants and giantesses, valkyries, dwarves, troll-women and dragons. Much of it is in dialogue form and a considerable proportion of the reported speech is the speech of females: a völva (prophetess) narrates the history of the world in Völuspá, and the conversations of the heroines Brynhildr and Guðrún fill many of the heroic poems of the thirteenth-century Codex Regius anthology of eddic poems (known as the Poetic Edda). In sagas too, female characters declaim poetry, some of it in eddic style, such as Darrañarljóð, chanted by valkyries in Njáls saga or The Waking of Angantýr, spoken by the valiant shield-maiden Hervör in the saga of legendary times, Hervarar saga ok Heiðreks. Considering it her duty to avenge her father, she visits him in his grave and demands the ancestral sword she needs to carry out her mission of vengeance. In a saga set in a much later period, eight stanzas are attributed to a young girl called Jóreiñr Hermundardóttir who lived in Iceland in the thirteenth century. In them, she recounts detailed predictions of death told to her in a dream by a large woman riding from the north on a grey horse. The dream verses presage political killings that the saga then narrates, and although both the setting and the content of Jóreiñr's verses are undoubtedly stylized, her versifying is depicted as a contemporary historical event.

Other historical poets who were women are named in a range of medieval documents: Skáldatal (List of Poets) mentions Áslaug, wife of King Ragnarr, Vilborg skáldkona (“poet-woman”), one of the poets of the eleventh-century Norwegian king, Óláfr kyrri, and the Icelander Steinvör Sighvatsdóttir, a poet to the thirteenth-century Norwegian chieftain Gautr of Mel. The Edda of Snorri Sturluson, a thirteenth-century handbook of poetics, quotes a verse by one woman poet, Jórunn skáldmær (“poetmaiden”) addressed to the Norwegian prince Hálfdan the Black. Sagas record a wider range of poetic compositions by women: court poetry by Hildir Hrólfsdóttir and Queen Gunnhildr of Norway has been preserved, and a number of Icelandic women from the settlement period are identified as poets: Áórhildr skáldkona, Steingerñr Áorkelsdóttir, Bróka-Auñr, Áuríñr Óláfsdóttir, and Steinunn Refsdóttir. The target of Steinunn’s verse was political: she took on the missionary Áangbrandr, arguing in her verses that the god Áórr was more powerful than Christ. Áórhildr’s composition was more domestic, but no less serious, in both intent and consequence. She recited an angry couplet at a wedding feast when she noticed her husband staring at a young woman, at which he declared himself divorced from her on the grounds of her malicious language. Fonder verses by women are rare, although Kormaks saga records a half-stanza by Steingerñr (with whom the poet Kormakr was in love), in which she declared she would want to marry him even if he were blind, knowing that even then, fate would have been kind to her. The recitation by men and women of erotic verses was banned by a zealous bishop in Iceland in the twelfth century, as a result of which we have no trace of what seems to have been another mode of poetic expression by women in medieval Scandinavia.

JUDY QUINN

References and Further Reading

- Clunies Ross, Margaret. “Women Skalds and Norse Poetics: Jórunn Skáldmær’s Sendibitr.” In Gudar på Jorden. Festskrift til Lars Lönnroth, edited by Stina Hansson and Mats Malm, Stockholm: Brutus Östling, 2000, pp. 85–96.
- The Poetic Edda*, translated by Carolyne Larrington. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1996.
- Skáldkonur fyrri alda*, edited by Guñrún P. Helgadóttir. 2 vols. Akureyri: Kvöldvökuútgáfan, 1961–1963.
- Straubhaar, Sandra Ballif. “Ambiguously Gendered: The Skalds Jórunn, Auñr and Steinunn.” In Cold Counsel: Women in Old Norse Literature and Mythology, edited by Sarah M. Anderson with Karen Swenson. New York and London: Routledge, 2002, pp. 261–271.

See also Literature, Norse; Prophets, Nordic; Scandinavia; Valkyries

SLANDER

See Gossip and Slander

SLAVES

The Middle Ages have long been credited with the demise of slavery that had been inherited from the classical age and with terminating all that a slave society implied. With the spread of manorialism, “free” dependants came to be regulated by the custom of the group rather than owned as chattel, in Marc Bloch’s memorable words. While the pace of that change has been debated in regional studies—the demise of slavery in Scandinavia (thralls) occurred much later than in France where it largely disappeared by the eleventh century—most authorities concur that medieval agriculture moved away from chattel slavery as its labor delivery system.

The demise argument does not rest on Christianity’s repudiation of slavery to any noticeable extent, since the Christian church lived with the institution of slavery from its inception. The church accepted slavery as a fact of life, however odious, and the matters debated within canon law had to do with whether a slave could become a priest and similar questions rather than the morality of the institution itself. Some early Christians entered religious houses accompanied by their slaves. Christians considered it a pious act to free one’s slaves, and Christianity promised slaves a heaven where they would be equal to free persons. From the thirteenth century forward certain holy women, among them Zita of Lucca, Margaret of Louvain, Margaret of Città di Castello, Sibilina Biscossi of Pavia, Veridiana Attavanti of Castellfiorentino, Jane of Orvieto, and Margaret of Hungary, for example took on the soubriquet ancilla dei (Luke 1:38), literally “slave of God,” to place themselves on the lowest rung of human society. Yet, with the exception of the first-mentioned most were well-born women.

Canon law dealt not with servi and ancillae as such but with “unfree persons,” which included serfs and bondsmen (Gilchrist). Canon law recognized some paternal rights for unfree men over their offspring in its attempt to strengthen the bond of marriage, but this law had little relevance to female slaves, who did not marry.

As a result the demise of slavery argument rests on the structural foundations of society and economy in medieval Europe rather than moral repudiation. And Europe experienced a revival of the slave trade in the thirteenth century that continued unabated into the modern era. In the 1850s, the economic historian

Wilhelm Heyd was surprised to find that the Mediterranean trade in slaves moved from the East to the Christian West. Researching in numerous archives Charles Verlinden found that the enslaved were destined for wealthy Christian households and were about ninety percent female. These slaves, ancillae in contrast to servi or male slaves, were sold at high prices and used as domestic workers, becoming symbols of the high status of the households that owned them. Because the offspring of female slaves were also unfree, this revived slave trade possessed the capacity to perpetuate the institution of slavery.

Early Medieval Slavery

Yet slavery had never died out entirely in Europe. The treatment of slaves differed according to local law and custom, although medieval communities generally recognized slavery as legitimate and regulated slaves' condition. On Carolingian estates gynaecea staffed by female slaves produced fine cloth, one of the few manufactured products worthy of export from Europe in this period (Herlihy, p. 83). If not slave societies, early Germanic, Scandinavian, Irish, and Anglo-Saxon societies were slaveholding ones. The early English penitentials fined slaveholders for sexual exploitation of their female slaves, but at a reduced rate from sexual crimes against free women. By law and tradition female slaves were assumed to be the property of masters with their sexual access assured. Any resulting offspring were the property of the master regardless of paternity. In early medieval Bavaria marriages among the free and unfree induced free members of the community to ameliorate the condition of their unfree partners, particularly in regard to the rights of offspring. By the tenth century the unfree entered into a more privileged dependency on the Church allowing them to exchange annual fixed payments for other servile obligations (Hammer). In Salzburg a ministeriales class of officials and knights remained noble bondsmen and women, that is, unfree in the eyes of the law, well into the fourteenth century (Freed).

Thirteenth Century Revival of the Slave Trade

The revival of Roman law in Christian lands in the Mediterranean West meant that an elaborate legal system pertaining to slavery was on hand to regulate the lives of the newly enslaved women brought from Tartar lands, from some Greek locales, and from the Balkan highlands in the thirteenth century, hence the toponymic slave for Slavic. Towns like Florence and Pisa favored baptizing slaves once purchased, although in many instances slaves were already baptized Christians (Origo). Other communities were more lax on the issue of baptism, but all households that owned slaves contended with the difficulties of "outlandish" languages and unfamiliar customs. Learning local dialects and some household skills raised the price of slaves, who were then passed from household to household in towns. There was a clear market preference for very young children, who were captured or sold to slave traders, then imported into towns. Contracts were frequently required to assure owners of their property rights over slaves.

For townspeople slaves were expensive and, therefore, luxuries. Being accompanied by one's slaves on the streets and canals of Venice was a display of conspicuous consumption. In medieval Ragusa/Dubrovnik wealthy households took in slaves who served as wet nurses for their children. A slave-nurse might accompany her former nursling to her new household upon marriage, serving as a life-long companion. In Florence Alessandra Strozzi expressed some fears about her garrulous, angry old slave Cateruccia, because she was a gossip and could "ruin" the family name with her loose talk (Origo, p. 343). Cooking, spinning, weaving, and sewing were particularly valuable learned skills among women slaves. In Italy a ten-year-old might cost as little as twenty florins in the fourteenth century, while a skilled woman slave might cost eighty florins or more (Stuard, "Ancillary," p. 22). Italian market towns placed taxes on slave sales as well.

Manumission

One recently debated issue in the literature on the revival of slavery is manumission, which was permitted under Roman law. It was considered a charitable act to free one's slaves in a last will and testament, although this also excused urban households from caring for slaves in their old age. This propensity to manumit domestic slaves has convinced some scholars that medieval slavery was not an onerous or exploitive institution since manumitted slaves might assimilate into the community. Since slaves served domestic households along with contract servants, who left after their period of service, and with wage-earning servants, scholars have recognized that some slaves entered great households as unfree persons but had a chance to gain some rights over a lifetime.

This has proved to be true in some documented cases, but, while the market for trained domestic slaves remained lively, there was a tidy profit for a household willing to sell vigorous and skilled slaves rather than manumitting them. The issue becomes more complicated when the offspring of women slaves are considered. Sally McKee has argued that in Crete slaves with Latin fathers were regarded as free after a generation or two, while Venice, Florence, and Genoa moved toward free status for the children of slaves by assuming that the offspring of slaves could inherit their fathers' status rather than their mothers' servile condition, at least by the fifteenth century (McKee). Where legitimate heirs were lacking the offspring of slave women were sometimes freed and acknowledged.

In Valencia manumitted offspring of a head of household and his slave (who might be manumitted as a result) could inherit the family name and in some cases even sue for a share in the family estate. Members of the family were known to plead the master's impotence to avoid sharing the family estate with a former slave's offspring (Blumenthal).

The Late Medieval North-South Trade in Slaves

Yet slavery persisted into the later Middle Ages when "Moorish" or African slaves became attractive new additions to wealthy households in Christian Europe. Also young when enslaved, these children might be either female or male. The small lavishly dressed Blackamoor of Renaissance family portraits might be a petted favorite of the household, but this does not mean that slaves led carefree lives. Slaves were imported into Venice and other towns, then rented out to produce an income. They were assigned the more tedious and back-breaking tasks of hauling goods or firewood. For a slave both the present and future were determined by the whim of the owner.

Piracy in the Mediterranean encouraged a two-way north-south trade in slaves. Christian ships raided and enslaved Muslims, who were taken back to home ports and sold. Christian sailors and ship passengers were taken to North African ports and enslaved until their families or Christian charities redeemed them. Since redemption was notoriously difficult to accomplish, many spent a lifetime in slavery. For centuries the border between Christian and Muslim Spain had seen a two-way traffic in slaves, with occasional redemptions. In the later Middle Ages capture and enslavement had become a more widespread Mediterranean phenomenon, and the numbers enslaved on both sides were considerable (Davis).

Conclusion

The institution of slavery never died out in medieval Europe. It remained as a viable, and rarely condemned, solution for household help—workers, nurses, concubines, rented-out laborers, or whatever other functions owners demanded—and for any other back-breaking work that "free" laborers eschewed. As with slaves imported into Crete in the thirteenth century to process sugar cane, slave labor presented to Europeans an economically feasible solution for the plantation economies of the Mediterranean islands, later the Atlantic islands off Europe and North Africa, and finally New World plantations. While some ameliorating influences had softened the face of slavery for a few, the legal condition of slaves, most notably ancillae and their offspring, remained unfree. Giovanni Bertachini's Repertorium Iuris Utriusque, an important reference tool for doctors of both civil and canon law printed in 1494 stated unequivocally, "Servuus meum est qui natus est de ancilla mea"—"A slave born to my (female) slave is my slave." The means for the perpetuation of the institution of slavery had survived.

SUSAN MOSHER STUARD

References and Further Reading

- Angiolini, Franco. "Schiave." In Il Lavoro delle donne, edited by Angela Groppi. Storia delle donne in Italia. Roma and Bari: Editori Laterza, 1996.
- Bertachini, Giovanni. Repertorium Iuris Utriusque III. 3 vols., ed. Venice: Arrivabene, 1494.
- Bloch, Marc. Slavery and Serfdom in the Middle Ages: Selected Essays. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1975.
- Blumenthal, Debra. "Slaves molt fortes, senyors invalts: Sex, Lies, and Paternity Suits in Fifteenth-Century Spain." In Women, Texts, and Authority in the Early Modern Spanish World, edited by Marta V. Vicente and Luis R. Corteguera. Aldershot: Ashgate, 2003, pp. 17–35.
- Davis, Robert. "Counting European Slaves on the Barbary Coast." Past and Present 172 (August 2001): 87–124.
- Devroey, Jean-Pierre. "Men and Women in Early Medieval Serfdom: The Ninth-Century North Frankish Evidence." Past and Present 166 (February 2000): 3–30.
- Elbl, Ivana. "'Men without Wives': Sexual Arrangements in the Early Portuguese Expansion in West Africa." In Desire and Discipline: Sex and Sexuality in the Premodern West, edited by Jacqueline Murray and Konrad Eisenbichler. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1996, pp. 61–86.
- Epstein, Steven. Speaking of Slavery: Color, Ethnicity and Human Bondage in Italy. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2001.
- Freed, John. Noble Bondsmen: Ministerial Marriage in the Archdiocese of Salzburg, 1100–1343. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1995.
- Gilchrist, John. "The Medieval Canon Law on Unfree Persons." In Mélanges G. Fransen, edited by Stephan

- Kuttner and Alfons M. Stickler. Studia Gratiana, 19 (1976): 278–295.
- Girsch, Elizabeth Stevens. “Metaphorical Usage, Sexual Exploitation, and Divergence in the Old English Terminology for Male and Female Slaves.” In The Work of Work: Servitude, Slavery, and Labor in Medieval England, edited by Allen J. Frantzen and Douglas Moffat. Glasgow: Cruithne Press, 1994, pp. 30–54.
- Hammer, Carl I. “The Handmaid’s Tale: Morganatic Relationships in Early-Mediaeval Bavaria.” Continuity and Change 10.3 (1995): 345–368.
- Herlihy, David. Opera Muliebria. New York: McGraw Hill, 1990.
- Karras, Ruth Mazo. “Concubinage and Slavery in the Viking Age.” Scandinavian Studies 62.2 (1990): 141–162.
- . “Desire, Descendants, and Dominance: Slavery, the Exchange of Women, and Masculine Power.” In The Work of Work: Servitude, Slavery, and Labor in Medieval England, edited by Allen J. Frantzen and Douglas Moffat. Glasgow: Cruithne Press, 1994, pp. 16–29.
- Luzzati, Michele. “Schiavi e figli di schiavi attraverso le registrazioni di battesimo medievali: Pisa, Gemona del Friuli, Lucca.” Quaderni Storici 107(36)2 (2001): 349–362.
- McKee, Sally. “Inherited Status and Slavery in Late Medieval Italy and Venetian Crete.” Past and Present 182 (2004): 31–53.
- Origo, Iris. “The Domestic Enemy: The Eastern Slaves in Tuscany in the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Centuries.” Speculum 30 (1955): 321–399.
- Stuard, Susan Mosher. “Ancillary Evidence for the Decline of Medieval Slavery.” Past and Present 149 (1995): 3–28.
- . “Single by Law and Custom.” In Singlewomen in the European Past, 1250–1800, edited by Judith M. Bennett and Amy M. Froide. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999, pp. 106–126.
- . “Qui natus est de ancilla mea in Medieval Church Law.” In Proceedings of the Tenth International Congress of Medieval Canon Law, edited by Kenneth Pennington, Stanley Chodorow and Keith H. Kendall. Vatican City: Biblioteca Apostolica Vaticana, 2001, pp. 653–673.
- Verlinden, Charles. L’Esclavage dans l’Europe médiévale. Bruges: De Tempel, 1955, and Ghent: Rijksonijersiteit te Gent, 1977.

See also Captivity and Ransom; Household Management; Iberia; Italy; Strozzi, Alessandra

SOCIAL STATUS

Social historians of the modern era generally agree that self-conscious social classes emerged only in the nineteenth century, as a result of the Industrial Revolution. Thus, it is more appropriate to use the expressions social status or social-economic groups when discussing medieval women. Social status shaped medieval women’s experiences and opportunities, and it complicated the ways in which women and men were gendered in the Middle Ages.

Social-Economic Groups

The predominant social-economic groups of the medieval countryside were peasants, nobles, monks, and nuns. Peasants worked the land. Nobles, whose male members often engaged in armed warfare, and men and women in monastic institutions, whose primary social function was to pray, derived their wealth from the lands that they held and from the rights that they had over the peasants who worked those lands. In the early Middle Ages, until the twelfth century, most nobles and monastics resided in the countryside; after 1100, however, increasing numbers of nobles, monks, and nuns began to live in towns, although, in most cases, they continued to derive their wealth from the rural labor of peasants.

Urban social-economic groups—those whose income was derived from urban production, commerce, or bureaucratic functions—grew significantly after the year 1000. These included merchant elites, whose men often controlled town governments; government bureaucrats and notaries; artisans, who owned their own workshops; laborers who earned their wages by the day or week; servants; and the nonlaboring (i.e., disabled or aged) poor. Mediterranean towns also had domestic slaves. In Iberia, these were predominantly Muslims and former Muslims who had been captured during the Christian reconquest of Muslim territories, which began in the eleventh century. In northern Italy, domestic slaves did not appear in significant numbers until after the onset of the Black Death in 1347–1348; most were girls and women from the Black Sea region. Town populations also included members of urban religious orders, such as the Franciscans, Dominicans, Poor Clares, and Beguines, whose movements took shape around the year 1200.

Marriage

In addition to their differing standards of living, medieval women from these various social groups—and from differing parts of Europe—had differing degrees of choice about whether or not to marry and who to marry, differing roles within marriage, and differing economic rights and standards of living as widows. Elite women—both those of the nobility and those of the merchant elite—tended to marry at a very young age and their first marriages were frequently arranged by their parents. Nonelite women tended to marry at an older age, one that was closer to that of their husbands, than did elite women. In northern Europe, where many single women migrated to towns, urban working women, and probably a good number of peasant women as well, had a great deal of freedom in their choice of marriage partner. In Italy, as Lansing has argued, women whose natal families were too poor to endow them with a dowry were often prevented from marrying, but this lack could result in the freedom to form sexual liaisons that were motivated by affection, a luxury that was not available to Italian girls and women of means. In most cases, slave women did not marry. Although some legal systems in Spain implied that slave women could marry, it is unclear if such marriages took place before manumission. Slave women were often the victims of sexual advances from the men in the households that they served. In Italy, many of the children that were born to slave women were placed in institutions for abandoned girls and boys.

Responsibilities

Conduct literature and works on household management, such as those by the Knight of La Tour Landry, the Ménagier of Paris, and Leon Battista Alberti, create the impression that the principal roles of elite wives were to guard their virtue, obey their husbands, produce children, and manage the household. This impression is somewhat misleading in the case of wives of the northern European merchant elite, since a number of those women engaged in commercial enterprises both alongside their husbands and independently. Even for those elite wives who did conform to the ideals of childbearing and household management, the responsibilities could be enormous, since large aristocratic households could include dozens of members. Moreover, when royal, noble, and merchant husbands were away from their homes for reasons of warfare, crusade, business, or exile, elite women's responsibilities often grew enormously. In the High and late Middle Ages (1050–1500) a number of queens and countesses took over the governance and defense of their realms in the absence of their husbands, even to the point of bearing arms. In northern Italian towns the activities and economic independence of women of the merchant elite were limited by customs and laws that favored extended male lineages over the conjugal unit, thus they tended to be excluded from commercial activities. Nevertheless, elite merchant wives and mothers in Italy, such as Alessandra Strozzi and Marguerita Datini, played pivotal roles in managing their families' affairs during the extended absences, for reasons of business and exile, of their husbands and adult sons. Both peasant and artisan wives were valued within marriage for their essential economic roles, which may have contributed to an informal sense of marital equality.

Widows

In northern Europe, noble, merchant, peasant, and artisan widows tended to have a great deal of economic independence, gaining control of one third to all of the conjugal property upon the deaths of their husbands. Legally, they were now free from the control of both their parents and their husbands' families, but in reality, as the story of Guibert of Nogent's noble mother indicates, some had to struggle to protect that independence. As the work of Howell and Archer makes clear, many merchant and artisan widows in northern Europe were able to exercise a great deal of independence in the commercial and productive spheres. However, laboring husbands who earned their wages by the day or week frequently had nothing to leave their widows. For these women, the cost of economic independence was economic marginality or destitution. In northern Italy, elite urban widows were frequently limited to their dowry, and, as Klapisch-Zuber has argued for the elite bourgeois women of fifteenth-century Florence, many such widows were subject to male control—either that of their paternal families, or that of their husbands' families. By contrast, Dennis Romano has argued from evidence in Venice, that artisan widows were freer from the control of extended patrilineal families than were elite Italian widows.

Stereotypes

According to Farmer, women and men from differing social groups were subjected to differing dominant gender stereotypes. Thus, while all men were associated, in clerical writings, with productive labor, and all women with reproductive labor, elite men were more likely to be associated with intellectual or spiritual productive labor, and elite women with intellectual and spiritual functions associated with reproductive labor, while nonelite men and women were more likely to be associated with the body and its appetites. In their model sermons for people of various social groups, thirteenth-century preachers such as James of Vitry, Humbert of Romans, and Guibert of Tournai charged elite women with the responsibility of spiritually educating all the members of their households and controlling not only their own sexuality but also that of their male and female servants.

Conversely, these preachers associated both male and female servants with uncontrolled lust, and they blamed female servants for the sexual liaisons that some of them had with the male members of the households that they served. Along similar lines, vernacular literature drew sharp distinctions between nobles and peasants. In courtly literature, only nobles were represented as worthy and capable of the refined emotion known as courtly love; in pastourelle literature, peasant men were represented as too blundering and inept for love and peasant women were portrayed as sexually promiscuous.

For women of the lower echelons of society, these dominant gender stereotypes could have devastating effects. As Gravdal has suggested, literary portraits of peasant women who were open to sexual encounters functioned as barely veiled invitations for elite men to rape lower-status women. Support for this argument comes from Rossiaud, who found in his examinations of court records from fifteenth-century Dijon that lower-status women living alone or working as servants were especially vulnerable to rape, often by men of means.

While predominant stereotypes of lower-status women could have very real consequences, those women did not necessarily internalize the ways in which they were represented by elites. Farmer has argued that while clerical authors tended to be blind to women's roles in the economic realm, working women were outspoken about their essential economic contributions to their households. Lansing has argued, moreover, that poorer residents of thirteenth-century Bologna resisted elite attempts to classify as "infamous" and "prostitutes" all women who entered into extramarital relations.

Spirituality and Sanctity

In addition to affecting women's choices, roles and rights with respect to marriage and widowhood, as well as the ways in which women were stereotyped by those who controlled dominant cultural representations, social status shaped women's access to spiritual prestige and sanctity. As Kenneth Wolf has argued, western medieval Christian society placed much more spiritual value on self-abnegation than on service for others: in the High and later Middle Ages especially, voluntary poverty and extreme asceticism were essential aspects of sainthood. Only individuals who had something to give up could practice self-abnegation and voluntary poverty; thus, it was difficult for those who were born poor to aspire to sanctity. Wolf's analysis applies well to most of the prominent female saints of the High and later Middle Ages who were known for their extreme asceticism: Elisabeth of Hungary was the daughter of a king and the wife of a member of the highest nobility. Marie of Oignies, Beatrice of Nazareth, Clare of Assisi, Humility of Faenza, and Angela of Foligno were all from well-to-do backgrounds, and Margaret of Cortona was the concubine of a nobleman before her religious conversion. Catherine of Siena stands out as a possible exception, since she was the daughter of a lower-middle-class dyer. Nevertheless, dyers were well placed within the hierarchy of artisans, and they were included in a group of modest artisans and notaries who ruled Siena during a significant portion of Catherine's lifetime. Saints who were born truly poor, such as the servant saint Zita of Lucca, were exceptions to the rule.

SHARON FARMER

References and Further Reading

- Archer, Janice. "Working Women in Thirteenth-Century Paris." PhD Diss., University of Arizona, 1995.
- Bennett, Judith, and Amy Froide, eds. Singlewomen in the European Past, 1250–1800. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999.
- Blumenthal, Debra. Enemies and Familiars: Muslim, Eastern and Black African Slaves in Late Medieval Valencia. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, forthcoming.
- Farmer, Sharon. Surviving Poverty in Medieval Paris: Gender, Ideology and the Daily Lives of the Poor. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2002.
- . "Introduction." In Gender and Difference in the Middle Ages, edited by Sharon Farmer and Carol Pasternack. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 2003, pp. ix–xxvii.
- Freedman, Paul. Images of the Medieval Peasant. Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1999.
- Gravdal, Kathryn. Ravishing Maidens: Writing Rape in Medieval French Literature and Law. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1991.
- Howell, Martha C. Women, Production and Patriarchy in Late Medieval Cities. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1986.
- Karras, Ruth Mazo. Common Women: Prostitution and Sexuality in Medieval England. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.
- Klapisch-Zuber, Christiane. Women, Family and Ritual in Renaissance Italy. Translated by Lydia G. Cochrane. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1985.
- Lansing, Carol. "Concubines, Lovers, Prostitutes: Infamy and Female Identity in Medieval Bologna." In Beyond Florence: The Contours of Medieval and Early Modern Italy, edited by Paula Findlen, Michelle M. Fontaine, and Duane J. Osheim. Stanford: Stanford University Press, 2003.
- Origo, Iris. "The Domestic Enemy: The Eastern Slaves in Tuscany in the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Centuries." Speculum: A Journal of Medieval Studies 30 (1955): 321–366.

- . The Merchant of Prato: Francesco di Marco Datini, 1335–1410. New York: Knopf, 1957.
- Romano, Dennis. Patricians and Popolani: The Social Foundations of the Venetian Renaissance State. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1987.
- Rossiaud, Jacques. Medieval Prostitution. Translated by Lydia G. Cochrane. New York: Blackwell, 1988.
- Strozzi, Alessandra. The Selected Letters of Alessandra Strozzi, translated with an Introduction by Heather Gregory. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1997.
- Stuard, Susan Mosher. “Ancillary Evidence on the Decline of Medieval Slavery.” Past and Present 149 (1995): 3–32.
- Wolf, Kenneth Baxter. The Poverty of Riches: Saint Francis of Assisi Reconsidered. New York: Oxford University Press, 2003.

See also Angela of Foligno; Artisan Families, Women of; Beatrice of Nazareth; Beguines; Business; Catherine of Siena; Clare of Assisi; Concubines; Conduct Literature; Courtly Love; Datini, Margherita; Dowry and Other Marriage Gifts; Femininity and Masculinity; Gender Ideologies; Gentry, Women of: England; Guibert of Nogent’s Mother; Household Management; Humility of Faenza; Inheritance; Landholding and Property Rights; Margaret of Cortona; Market and Tradeswomen; Marriage, Christian; Merchant Families, Women of; Migration and Mobility; Monasticism and Nuns; Noble Women; Pastourelle; Peasants; Poor Clares Order; Poverty; Queens and Empresses: The West; Rape and Raptus; Regents and Queen-Lieutenants; Servants; Singlewomen; Slaves; Strozzi, Alessandra; Warfare; Widows

SONG OF SONGS, MEDIEVAL INTERPRETATIONS OF

The Song of Songs, a collection of poems attributed to King Solomon, is perhaps the most enigmatic book of the Bible, eight chapters of passionate love poems between a man and a woman that mention neither salvation history nor the name of God. Jews and Christians alike have debated whether this text has a place in Scripture. Ancient Jewish midrashic traditions saw it as the marriage song of God and Israel. Early Christians were well aware of this and used it to their advantage. In the third century, Origen of Alexandria wrote a commentary and a series of homilies on the Song in which the two lovers become either Christ and the Church or Christ and the human soul. Origen wrote in Greek, but the surviving fragments in Latin translations were well-known throughout the Middle Ages, and inspired a huge tradition of Latin allegory.

For medieval Christians, then, the Song of Songs was an elaborate allegory of God’s love for the Church or the soul, in which the sometimes steamy eroticism of the text was spiritualized. Such readings flourished in the monastic world of the seventh to the twelfth centuries, when almost a hundred interpretations were written. Most favor the interpretation of Christ and the Church, although the monastic world of the twelfth century saw a boom of writings on the Song as God’s love for the soul, such as the famous homilies by Bernard of Clairvaux. It is interesting to think about medieval monks and nuns, vowed to a chaste life, meditating on the passionate eroticism of God’s love for the soul. Yet there is nothing prudish about these texts; rather, the monastic authors revel in their role as the feminized spouse of the Song. This is all the more remarkable when the author and the imagined protagonist of the love story are men. The medieval tradition of the Song of Songs is an excellent place to see some stunning medieval gender reversals as men, even abbots and bishops, imagined themselves in the passive role of the Bride.

It is hard to tell if the spiritual interpretation of the Song of Songs has the same paradoxically elevating effect for medieval women. For one thing, women were not allowed to write biblical commentaries, a task reserved for men, so they had to comment on the Bible in more oblique ways. The Song was not always a part of women’s vocabulary; the famous twelfth-century author Hildegard of Bingen quotes extensively from parts of the Bible but largely stays away from the Song of Songs. In the following century, though, both Clare of Assisi’s letters to Agnes of Prague and Gertrude the Great’s mystical meditation on the liturgy, the Spiritual Exercises, urge their readers to use the love language of the Song as a guide to the proper love of God. Ironically, Clare and Gertrude use a male spiritual tradition to urge female monastics to cast themselves in the role of the Bride.

Medieval women also had access to the tradition of interpretation that sees the Bride as the Virgin Mary. This is a minor strand of the commentary tradition, mostly twelfth-century, but it obviously had an impact on a German translation of the Song of Songs probably done by a woman and certainly for use in a women’s community in South Germany. The St. Trudperters Song of Songs holds up the Virgin as a model for the contemplative soul; the nuns are told that they can become, like Mary, a spiritual mother, daughter, and wife all at once. This language foreshadows the way women in religious life will be characterized in the early modern period, when women’s spiritual power (and danger) becomes a dangerous double-edged trope.

And it is in the early modern period that the first commentary on the Song of Songs by a woman, Teresa of Avila’s Meditations on the Song of Songs, a treatment of the verses from the Song used in her Carmelite Breviary, was written. Teresa's language is as passionate, and as self-deprecating, as that of the famous male authors of earlier centuries; and no wonder, since she was under the scrutiny of the Inquisition when she wrote it. This suggests, once again, that this tradition reached women when it had run its course among male authors, and that although it may have been affirming for men because of its paradoxical gender inversion, its impact on women was more likely to affirm stereotypes of submission.

E. ANN MATTER

References and Further Reading

- Bernard of Clairvaux. On the Song of Songs. Vols. 1–2 translated by Killian Walsh. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Cistercian Publications, 1976. Vols. 3–4 translated by Irene Edmonds. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Cistercian Publications, 1979, 1980.
- Clare of Assisi Letters to Agnes of Prague In Francis and Clare: The Complete Works, translated by Regis J. Armstrong and Ignatius C. Brady. New York: Paulist Press, 1982.
- Gertrude the Great. Spiritual Exercises. Translated by Gertrud Jaron Lewis and Jack Lewis. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Cistercian Publications, 1989.
- Matter, E. Ann, "The Song of Songs in the Exercitia Spiritualia of Gertrude the Great of Helfta" Laurentianum 31 (1990): 39–49.
- . The Voice of My Beloved: The Song of Songs in Western Medieval Christianity. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1990.
- Origen of Alexandria. The Song of Songs. Commentary and Homilies. Translated by R. P. Lawson. New York: Newman Press, 1957.
- Teresa of Avila. Meditations on the Song of Songs. In The Collected Works of St. Teresa of Avila, vol. 2. Translated by Kiernan Kavanaugh and Otilio Rodriguez. Washington, D.C.: ICS, 1976.
- Turner, Denys. Eros and Allegory: Medieval Exegesis of the Song of Songs. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Cistercian Publications, 1995.

See also Bride of Christ; Imagery; Clare of Assisi; Eroticism in Literature; Gender Ideologies; Gertrude the Great; Hildegard of Bingen; Mary, Virgin; Monasticism and Nuns; Theology

SOPHIA PALAIOLOGINA

Sophia Palaiologina (1450/1451–1503), originally christened Zoe, was the daughter of Thomas Palaiologos, despot of the Morea (southern Greece), and Caterina Zaccaria, a Genoese heiress from Achaia. She was therefore the niece of Constantine XI, the Byzantine emperor who died on the walls of Constantinople in 1453. Zoe was about ten years old when the Ottoman Turks captured Mistra, capital of the despotate, and forced her family in 1460 to flee first to Corfù (Kerkyra) and later to Rome. After her father's death, Cardinal Bessarion acted as Zoe's guardian, supervised her education, and arranged her marriage to Ivan III, Grand Duke of Moscow. This was negotiated by Ivan's master of the mint, Gian Battista della Volpe, who accompanied Zoe to Moscow. Through this alliance Pope Sixtus IV hoped to promote the Catholic faith but Zoe adopted Orthodoxy and was renamed Sophia at her marriage to Ivan in November 1472.

Although previously credited with introducing much Byzantine influence in the Muscovite court, Sophia brought Western styles with her, as well as two of her brothers and other Greek advisors. Italian engineers and architects assisted in the construction of the Moscow Kremlin and Dormition Cathedral (1475–1479). Sophia's presence may have increased awareness of Byzantine imperial traditions, but the double-headed eagle and title tsar were already in use. Between 1497 and 1500, as Ivan III wavered over the succession, Sophia championed her eldest son Vasiliï against Dmitriï, Ivan's grandson by his first wife. Eventually Vasiliï was designated and succeeded his father (1505–1533).

JUDITH HERRIN

References and Further Reading

- Crummey, Robert. The Formation of Muscovy 1304–1613. London: Longman, 1987.
- Fennell, J. L. Ivan the Great of Moscow. London: Macmillan, 1963.
- Thomson, Francis J. The Reception of Byzantine Culture in Medieval Russia. Aldershot: Ashgate, 1999.

See also Byzantium; Russia

SOUL

In its broadest sense, soul refers to the principle of life in plants, animals, and humans known in Latin as anima. However, soul is also used to translate the Latin words animus and mens, meaning the rational soul or the mind, and it is this uniquely human capacity of reason that most medieval thinkers emphasize. Questions about the soul have been discussed since the time of the earliest Greek philosophers. However, by the Middle Ages, the topic was approached from three different points of view: the scientific, the philosophical, and the theological. The most widely known of these conceptions of the soul was the theological, so only a brief review of the scientific and philosophical definitions will be provided here.

The scientific perspective derived from the medical theories of Hippocrates and Galen was transmitted to the West by Arabic doctors. Although the medical tradition focused on the body formed of the four elements (earth, air, fire, and water), by the Middle Ages doctors believed that the soul or principle of life was immaterial, and they developed the classical theory of pneuma, or spirit, proposed by the Stoics as the link between the immaterial soul and the material body.

Arabic scholars also transmitted Aristotle's texts to the West by the mid-twelfth century. The recovery of De anima (On the Soul) led to discussions among the scholastics, those male thinkers associated with the universities, about the nature of the soul and its cognitive powers. Philosophers debated issues such as the relationship between the material, mortal body and the immaterial, immortal soul, as well as the means by which the rational part of the soul acquires knowledge. Aristotle's explanation of the soul as the form of the body promoted an integrated view of the human person. Thomas Aquinas (c. 1224–1274) incorporated Aristotle's ideas about the soul into Christianity by the 1270s, although his doing so was controversial at the time.

Even though the late-medieval medical and philosophical discourses acknowledge the Christian belief that the soul is immortal, both fields emphasized the soul's dependence on a body to maintain life and to attain knowledge in this world. Theological discussions of the soul, however, focused on the soul's relationship to God and its eternal destiny.

Augustine, Bishop of Hippo (354–430 CE), developed the theological perspective on the soul that was most familiar and influential throughout the Middle Ages. Although he wrote treatises on several different questions regarding the soul's nature, Augustine's most important work on this subject is De Trinitate (On the Trinity). This text demonstrates his introspective method of inquiry. Referring to Genesis 1:26–27, "And he said: 'Let us make man to our image and likeness,'" Augustine regards the soul as the site of the imago Dei or image of God in humankind. He therefore tries to ascertain the nature of the divine Trinity by examining various psychic trinities such as memory, intelligence, and will, within himself.

In Book 12, chapter 3 of De Trinitate, Augustine divides the mens or rational part of the soul into the higher and the lower reason. The higher reason, dedicated to the contemplation of God, can achieve wisdom (sapientia); the lower reason, oriented to temporal affairs of the world, can only achieve knowledge (scientia). Although Augustine claims that these two parts of the soul are not separate, but merely different in function, he genders the higher reason masculine and the lower reason feminine; he also concludes that the image of God resides exclusively in the masculine higher reason. Although he admits that men and women are literally equal in spirit, Augustine claims that, insofar as the female is different from the male in body, she is a metaphor for the lower reason's incapacity for contemplation of transcendent reality. By chapter 12 of Book 14 Augustine conflates the literal and metaphoric senses of woman by arguing that Eve, both as a female person and as the lower reason, was the intermediary who exposed Adam or the higher reason to the temptation of the serpent and thus caused original sin.

Frequently reiterated during the Middle Ages, Augustine's division of the soul in De Trinitate into the higher and lower reason had far-reaching consequence for women in the medieval church. Although his insistence on the spiritual equality of literal men and women before God enabled some women to empower themselves, his metaphoric identification of the female body with the lower reason placed them in an inferior position to the opposite sex and called into question their mental capability.

DENISE NOWAKOWSKI BAKER

References and Further Reading

- Børresen, Kari Elisabeth. Subordination and Equivalence: The Nature and Role of Woman in Augustine and Thomas Aquinas. Translated by Charles H. Talbot. Washington, D.C.: University Press of America, 1981.
- Harvey, E. Ruth. The Inward Wits: Psychological Theory in the Middle Ages and the Renaissance. Warburg Institute Surveys 6. London: Warburg Institute, University of London, 1975.
- McGinn, Bernard. "The Human Person as Image of God II: Western Christianity." In World Spirituality: An Encyclopedic History of the Religious Quest, vol. 16, Christian Spirituality: Origins to the Twelfth Century, edited by Bernard McGinn and John Meyendorff. New York: Crossroad, 1985, pp. 312–330.
- Pasnua, Robert. "Human Nature." In The Cambridge Companion to Medieval Philosophy, edited by A. S. McGrade. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2003, pp. 208–230.

See also Aristotelian Concepts of Women and Gender; Augustine, Influence of; Gender Ideologies; Scholasticism; Theology

SPACE, SACRED: AND GENDER

The gendering of sacred space and its implications for women's lives have only recently begun to receive the attention of scholars. Although often taken for granted and viewed as "natural" or accidental, spatial arrangements as metaphors and symbolic systems embodied some of the most basic values and meanings of medieval society. The medieval church had a keen interest in the ordering, regulation, and protection of sacred space. As statements of power and authority, spatial constructs served the special interests of the church and its hierarchy. These arrangements were used to reinforce the prevailing male advantage and regulate social behavior; they also worked to contain and marginalize women. They both reflected and constructed gendered identities of the period.

Influenced by ancient Greek, Jewish, and early Christian practices, and reflecting in part the physical tension between the sacred and profane, the church attempted to deal with its fear of female sexuality and pollution and need to segregate the laity from the clergy by establishing certain symbolic and physical boundaries. Church councils warned that lay dwellings, especially those containing women, were to be kept at a certain distance from church buildings. Monasteries of nuns were not to be built in the neighborhood of those of monks, as much to resist "the ruses of Satan" as the rumors that would result from this. Regulations regarding whether women could take communion during menstruation; or how long after childbirth women might be allowed to enter the church; purification rituals; or whether women who died in childbirth might be brought into the church for funeral rites or buried in consecrated ground, underscore the church's fear of female pollution and need to protect the sacrality of its space.

Although arrangements varied, a policy of strict segregation was adopted in many churches. Separate doors were established for men and women. Men were placed a dextris, on the privileged right or south side, reserved for the elect in the Last Judgment; while females were relegated a sinistris, to the left or north side of the nave, corresponding to the side of the damned, the location of the devil's door, etc. The gendered iconography of mosaics or paintings on nave walls, or that of church screens with female saints on the left and male saints on the right, or later carvings on bench ends further reinforced this placement. Marriage ceremonies stipulated that the woman was to stand to the left of the man. In certain regions cemeteries for women were found to the north of the church while those for men were located to the south. Other sources note that men were to sit in the forepart or eastward section of the church while women were to sit behind them, since the "husband was the head of the wife." Prostitutes were required to stay "behind and segregated from good women." Durham Cathedral still has a line in the floor of the second bay of its nave beyond which women were forbidden to pass. Many arrangements were however of a local nature and there is evidence that in a few churches these customary stations that privileged men were reversed to reward women's heroic behavior in their communities.

Double churches or chapels emphasized hierarchical ordering: royalty or nobility occupied the upper floor while those of lesser standing remained below, as at the Sainte Chapelle in Paris. Frequently separate chapels were designated for the king and for the queen.

The sanctuary which housed the altar was viewed as the church's most sacred space. Women were specifically warned that, because of their natural infirmity, they were not to approach the main altar, stand or sit within the chancel, touch the sacred vessels or corporal, or distribute communion to the faithful. Nevertheless some women were able to vicariously occupy this privileged space through donations of altar crosses, chalices, books, major altar pieces, etc., which contained their names and portraits.

Many male monasteries strictly forbade women access to their churches and chapels. These exclusionary practices proved to be especially difficult for women who wished to visit these sites and pray at their saints' tombs. Unwilling to accept these gender-based proscriptive policies, women consistently challenged or contested these spaces: for example, some women were involved in negotiations to allow them limited access; others became audacious trespassers within these "male only spaces." In a number of cases, wealth and status overrode gender (i.e., queens and noble women were accorded special permission to enter male monastic churches and pray at their saints' tombs). As an expression of their gratitude they invariably provided generous donations to these foundations.

In contrast, the spatial policies of women's monastic churches appear to have been more inclusive. With the need for priests and other males to help in the running of their communities, they did not have the luxury to exclude men. They made provision for the laity (male and female) to be allowed to worship within their main churches which in some cases also served as parish churches. Cogitosus, in his Life of St. Brigit (seventh century), provides a description of the church of the double or mixed community of Kildare with its internal divisions of space. The nave had a median wall that divided the congregation: the women's half was located on the left or north side, and the men's half on the right or south side. Each side had its own special door. At the east end or the chancel area, was a transverse wall with two doors that separated the lay congregation from the monks and nuns. Here the nuns were relegated to the left or north side of the altar and the monks were to the south or right of the altar. The nuns were thus separated in their churches from the lay men and women:

in some places they occupied one side of the nave; or the choir, or an upper gallery placed over the aisles or in the west end or Westwerk of the church. In the central and late Middle Ages, with the increased emphasis on strict segregation and enclosure, the nuns were frequently hidden behind wooden or masonry walls, or heavy metal grills. With this arrangement, they often had to endure obstructed views of the altar and communion. In some cases nuns were provided with only small apertures that served as “listening holes” for them to hear the liturgy. Thus for many monasteries, these spatial arrangements seem to have been made at the expense of the members of the female community and their religious experiences: they effectively limited or restricted their access to the most privileged sacred space within their own churches.

While there exists some variety in the arrangements of medieval sacred space, these spaces were never neutral, disinterested, or inert. The gendered policies provide another important perspective on shifting views of women and their proper “place” in society and the church.

JANE TIBBETTS SCHULENBURG

References and Further Reading

- Aston, Margaret. “Segregation in Church.” In Women in the Church. Studies in Church History 27, edited by W. J. Sheils and Diana Wood. Oxford: Blackwell, 1990, pp. 237–294.
- Crook, John. The Architectural Setting of the Cult of Saints in the Early Christian West c. 300–1200. Oxford: Clarendon Press; New York: Oxford Univ. Press, 2000.
- Douglas, Mary. Purity and Danger: An Analysis of the Concepts of Pollution and Taboo. 1966. New York: Praeger, 1984.
- Gilchrist, Roberta. Gender and Material Culture: The Archaeology of Religious Women. London and New York: Routledge, 1994.
- Hanawalt, Barbara A., and Michal Kobińska, eds. Medieval Practices of Space. Medieval Culture, 23. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 2000.
- Hayes, Dawn Marie. Body and Sacred Place in Medieval Europe, 1100–1389. London and New York: Routledge, 2003.
- Morrison, Susan Signe. Women Pilgrims in Late Medieval England: Private Piety as Public Performance. London and New York: Routledge, 2000.
- Nilson, Ben. Cathedral Shrines of Medieval England. Woodbridge, Suffolk, Rochester, N.Y.: Boydell Press, 1998.
- Raguin, Virginia Chieffo and Sarah Stanbury, eds. Women’s Space: Patronage, Place and Gender in the Medieval Church. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2005.
- Randolph, Adrian. “Regarding Women in Sacred Space.” In Picturing Women in Renaissance and Baroque Italy, edited by Geraldine A. Johnson and Sara F. Matthews Grieco. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997, pp. 17–41, 250–256.
- Schulenburg, Jane Tibbetts. “Strict Active Enclosure and Its Effects on the Female Monastic Experience ca. 500–1100.” In Distant Echoes: Medieval Religious Women, vol. I, edited by John A. Nichols and Lillian Thomas Shank. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Cistercian Publications, 1984, pp. 51–86.
- . “Gender, Celibacy, and Proscriptions of Sacred Space: Symbol and Practice.” In Medieval Purity and Piety: Essays on Medieval Clerical Celibacy and Religious Reform, edited by Michael Frassetto. New York and London: Garland, 1998, pp. 353–376. Reprinted with revisions in Raguin and Stanbury. Women’s Space: Patronage, Place and Gender in the Medieval Church, pp. 185–205.
- . Forgetful of their Sex: Female Sanctity and Society. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1998.
- Smith, Julia M. H. “Women at the Tomb: Access to Relic Shrines in the Early Middle Ages.” In The World of Gregory of Tours, edited by Kathleen Mitchell and Ian Wood (Cultures, Beliefs and Traditions: Medieval and Early Modern People, 8). Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2002, pp. 163–180.
- Spain, Daphne. Gendered Spaces. Chapel Hill, N.C.: University of North Carolina Press, 1992.
- Spicer, Andrew and Sarah Hamilton, eds. Defining the Holy: Sacred Space in Medieval and Early Modern Europe. Aldershot, England, Burlington, Vt.: Ashgate, 2005.
- Von Simson, Otto. The Gothic Cathedral: Origins of Gothic Architecture and the Medieval Concept of Order. 2nd ed. New York: Pantheon, 1962.

See also Architecture, Ecclesiastical; Architecture, Monastic; Church; Gender Ideologies; Pilgrims and Pilgrimage; Space, Secular: and Gender

SPACE, SECULAR: AND GENDER

In late medieval and early modern Europe, secular space was so highly and rigidly gendered that variations from established patterns and accepted norms were often the subject of comment. This was particularly the case in Florence, a town of local customs, but also one of international connections that make it an important case study of patterns of activity, cultural proclivities, and gender differentiations that are variously applicable, albeit with caution, to places and customs elsewhere. In his fifteenth-century treatise On the Family, the humanist Leon Battista Alberti wrote: “It would hardly win us respect if our wife busied herself among the men in the marketplace, out in the public eye. It also seems somewhat demeaning to me to remain shut up in the home among women when I have manly things to do among men.” Alberti clearly reflects a contemporary codification of a Florentine world that was gender specific, with the external world, primarily the arena of politics and mercantile activity, gendered male, while the home and domestic activity were gendered female.

So ingrained was this structure of gendered spaces in the secular realm that it does not surprise that another period writer would take special note of a striking disruption of this system in which women ventured boldly, and indeed threatening, beyond the confines of the domestic sphere. In 1497, during the period of Savonarolan unrest in the city and in response to the deprivations of famine, three thousand poor women gathered in the Piazza della Signoria, the main civic and thus male space in Florence, in mass protest demanding the provision of bread. This was an extraordinary appearance in the public realm of the city, a space dominated by the public Palazzo della Signoria from which women were assiduously forbidden entry throughout much of Florentine history. After several days' protest and nearly riotous circumstances, the demands of the women were finally met and, as the chronicler notes, they "took themselves home." This episode not only describes a tense moment in the public arena; it also communicates something significant about the gendering of secular space, for the aversion of crisis was not simply in the satisfaction of the women's demands; it was also in their return to their place at home. So clearly was the Piazza della Signoria considered a secular space for Florentine men alone that when Giralomo Savonarola was executed there the following year, a capital punishment observed by many males, the preacher's female followers viewed the event only at a distance while praying at the church of San Marco.

This is not to suggest that women had no role in the public and secular spaces of the city. However, from important rituals like marriage ceremonies, during which women paraded through the city from the house of the father to the house of the husband, to funerals, when women had prescribed roles, often as unrestrained wailing mourners, and even the daily tasks of marketing and socializing, women moved about the spaces of the city in ways that were specific to their gender and clearly differentiated from male roles in those same spaces. Unmarried women were carefully attended by male and female relatives, and as for married women, only their reputation as chaste spouses permitted them to move about the city without similar retinues of chaperones.

The domestic sphere, then, was the space most extensively gendered female, but even there women's activities of organizing and monitoring household affairs seem to have been circumscribed by male interests in the preservation of honor, the education of children, the maintenance of accounts, and the safe stewardship of family wealth as Alberti additionally indicates in his treatise. Furthermore, even spaces that might at times be exclusively gendered female—such as bedrooms during times of childbirth—could shift in their gendering to male spaces in moments when business or political activity were conducted by men in those same spaces in a domestic context still largely undifferentiated for various functions room by room. Finally, even though women had an element of autonomy in the management of the domestic sphere despite its overall prescription by males, the domestic environment continued to present a problematic secular space of liminal danger in the late medieval and early modern period from which women could be problematically seen by the male gaze of the outside world. Archbishop Antonino, another fifteenth-century Florentine, writes in one context "I am not happy that you should stand at windows, in order to see who passes by," and in another, "The wife ought but rarely to wander around outside the home, and she should not go leaping about the piazza, nor stand telling stories and murmuring in the doorway, nor talking at the window but going outside the house only to church, and then she should not go by herself." What Antonino's text and others like it make clear is that in his world women in secular spaces were valuable signifiers of virtue but also, problematically, of vice should their actions ever shift from licit and controlled to illicit and free from male supervision and control.

ROGER J. CRUM

References and Further Reading

- Crum, Roger J. "Controlling Women or Women Controlled? Suggestions for Gender Roles and Visual Culture in the Italian Renaissance Palace." In Beyond Isabella: Secular Women Patrons of Art in Renaissance Italy, edited by Sheryl E. Reiss and David G. Wilkins. Kirksville, Mo.: Truman State University Press, 2001, pp. 37–50.
- Haas, Louis. The Renaissance Man and His Children: Childhood and Early Childhood in Florence 1300–1600. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1998.
- Hufton, Olwen. The Prospect Before Her: A History of Women in Western Europe. vol. I: 1500–1800. London: Harper Collins, 1995.
- Klapisch-Zuber, Christiane. Women, Family, and Ritual in Renaissance Italy, translated by Lydia G. Cochrane. Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1985.
- Musacchio, Jacqueline Marie. The Art and Ritual of Childbirth in Renaissance Italy. New Haven, Conn. and London: Yale University Press, 1999.
- Schiesari, Juliana. "In Praise of Virtuous Women? For a Genealogy of Gender Morals in Renaissance Italy." In Women's Voices in Italian Literature, edited by Rebecca West and Dino S. Cervigni. Chapel Hill, N.C.: University of North Carolina Press, 1989, pp. 66–87.
- Tomas, Natalie. "Did Women Have a Space?" In Renaissance Florence: A Social History of Space, edited by Roger J. Crum and John T. Paoletti. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2006, pp. 311–328.
- Wiesner, Merry E. Women and Gender in Early Modern Europe. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993; 2nd ed., 2000, pp. 13–47.
- Wigley, Mark. "Untitled: The Housing of Gender." In Sexuality and Space, edited by Beatriz Colomina. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton Architectural Press, 1992, pp. 327–389.

See also Architecture, Domestic; Gaze; Honor and Reputation; Italy; Private and Public Spheres; Space, Sacred: and Gender; Sumptuary Law

SPIRITS: DISCERNMENT OF AND POSSESSION BY

Medieval Christian culture acknowledged many different spirits. Angels, demons, ghosts, and fairies all fell under the category of spiritual beings. Humanity itself contained a spiritual essence, the human spirit, which dwelt in the heart and acted as an intermediary between the physical self and the immortal soul. Derived from the Hellenistic environment of the early Church, especially Stoic influences, the notion of the material human spirit was augmented in medieval thought by Arab medical treatises that filtered into western Europe through Spain in the twelfth century. Ultimately, medieval thinkers elaborated an entire spiritual system in their writings on human physiology.

Many medieval people lived their lives without ever having an experience that they believed involved supernatural spirits. Others claimed to have seen ghosts or other spiritual beings on occasion. A small number of individuals, however, were diagnosed as having entered into a long-term state of intimacy with a spirit, a condition known as spirit possession. We may identify two major forms of this phenomenon. The first was demonic possession, in which a demon physically invaded the body of a person and seized control over it. The phenomenon of demonic possession is mentioned frequently in the gospels of Mark, Matthew, and Luke, where the exorcism of such persons features prominently among Jesus's miracles. (There are no exorcisms in the Gospel of John.) As a biblically attested category of affliction, demonic possession remained an important idea throughout the Middle Ages. In the early medieval centuries, demoniacs of both sexes often congregated around the tombs of saints. By the 1200s, however, demonic possession was becoming increasingly common, and also highly feminized. Reports of demoniacs proliferate in thirteenth-century sources, accompanied by an increasing gender imbalance, toward women, in the victims. Thomas of Cantimpré, for example, recounts a detailed story of a girl who became possessed after a long day of dancing, and who was healed by a young boy. Likewise, the vitae of saints frequently recount miraculous healings of the possessed, such as that of a violent female demoniac in Ferrara, healed by Anthony of Padua.

A second kind of spirit possession was divine possession. The hagiographies of certain female visionaries present their subjects as possessed by the spirit of God, emphasizing that the Holy Spirit lives and speaks through the saint. Although the phrase divine possession was not used in medieval writings, the notion of direct physical inhabitation by the spirit of the divine was enunciated by medieval authors in other terms. Thus the hagiographer of Jutta of Huy wrote that she had the gift of mind-reading "through the Holy Spirit, which lived inside her." Many women visionaries reported that Jesus literally entered into their heart and dwelt therein, fused with their own human spirit. The miracle of the stigmata, so often reported of women visionaries, may be viewed as the ultimate physical expression of divine possession, a union of two into one spirit and two into one flesh. This trend began in the late twelfth century with the proliferation of new, lay religious movements (such as the Beguines and other independent religious women) that hosted many visionary women, and continued unabated until the end of the era.

Divine and demonic spirit possession affected women more than men; and both saw rising numbers in the thirteenth century and beyond. Furthermore, both possessions were manifested in similar ways. The demonically and the divinely possessed were credited with prophetic abilities, xenoglossia (the ability to speak previously unknown foreign tongues), physical transformations (bloating, or the ability to subsist without eating), and other individual charisms. In consequence, medieval churchmen became concerned about the possibility of confusion between these two types of extraordinary women, fearing lest the overly credulous might treat as saintly someone who actually was demonically possessed. The Devil, after all, was thought to be ever-ready to deceive the faithful.

Thus arose the concern with the discernment of spirits, also called the testing of spirits. These synonymous phrases refer to the imperative to distinguish between the truly divinely inspired (who deserve veneration as saints), and the demonically possessed (whose influence should be eliminated). In time, the theory and practice of discerning spirits also came to embrace other categories of potential confusion, such as feigned sanctity and various natural pathologies. Concern over the issue reached its peak in the late fourteenth and early fifteenth centuries, with the appearance of treatises devoted exclusively to the topic of testing spirits.

Although in theory the discernment of spirits was a gender-neutral exercise, in fact discernment concerns clustered closely around the careers of laywomen who claimed supernatural gifts. In part, this stemmed from the fact that women visionaries and women demoniacs were reported to behave in similar ways. Scholars agree, however, that the feminine emphasis in the discernment of spirits literature also expresses a deep-seated cultural ambivalence toward women arrogating to themselves a leadership role. Notably, many discernment treatises were penned in response to the attempted canonizations of visionary women. The best-known writer on the subject, Jean Gerson (d. 1429), composed three separate treatments, all directly inspired by visionary women. His 1415 tract On the Testing of Spirits, for example, was commissioned by the Council of Constance as part of the review of Birgitta of Sweden's (d. 1373) canonization. As may be seen in the well-known case of Joan of Arc (d. 1431), debates over women's leadership and supernatural inspiration were contentious struggles at the end of the Middle Ages.

Ultimately, one long-term effect of the discernment of spirits debates was to undermine female claims to holiness, leaving only the alternative category—demonic influence—as an explanation for cases of female spiritual inspiration. This increasing demonization of women helped set the stage for the witchcraft persecutions that began in the generation after Gerson, in the 1430s, and continued through the early modern period.

NANCY CACIOLA

References and Further Reading

- Caciola, Nancy. "Mystics, Demoniacs, and the Physiology of Spirit Possession in Medieval Europe." Comparative Studies in Society and History 42.2 (2000): 268–306.
- . Discerning Spirits: Divine and Demonic Possession in the Middle Ages. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2003.
- Fraioli, Deborah. Joan of Arc: The Early Debate. Suffolk: Boydell Press, 2000.
- Kieckhefer, Richard. "The Holy and the Unholy: Sainthood, Witchcraft, and Magic in Late Medieval Europe." Journal of Medieval and Renaissance Studies 24 (1994): 355–385.
- Klaniczay, Gábor. "Miraculum and Maleficium: Reflections Concerning Late Medieval Female Sainthood." In Problems in the Historical Anthropology of Early Modern Europe, edited by Ronnie Po-Chia Hsia and Robert Scribner. Harrassowitz: 1997, pp. 49–73.
- Newman, Barbara. "Possessed by the Spirit: Devout Women, Demoniacs, and the Apostolic Life in the Thirteenth Century." Speculum 73/3 (1998): 733–770.
- Voaden, Rosalyn. God's Words, Women's Voices: The Discernment of Spirits in the Writings of Late Medieval Women Visionaries. York: York Medieval Press, 1999.
- Zarri, Gabriella, ed. Finzione e santità tra medioevo ed età moderna. Turin: Einaudi, 1991.

See also Birgitta of Sweden; Gerson, Jean; Joan of Arc; Madness; Mysticism and Mystics; Prophets; Satan; Spiritual Care; Witches

SPIRITUAL CARE

In the Middle Ages care of souls (cura animarum) was a clerical privilege, but it was also an amorphous practice exercised even by women. In its narrow meaning, the term is associated with pastoral care (cura pastoralis), which principally referred to priestly care of the laity's spiritual affairs through homilies, exhortations, and the administration of sacraments. Such cura came with financial support (beneficium) that came with jurisdiction over a parish. Spiritual direction was not limited to the activities of the parish priests, however, since it also encompassed religious formation in monasteries and spiritual relationships between the members of religious orders and the laity or within religious communities. While spiritual care was essentially associated with positive religious formation, it had a correctional element to it as well, for a spiritual director was also responsible for uprooting practices seen as heterodox or counterproductive. Especially toward the end of the Middle Ages, the distinctio spirituum or the art of discerning between the workings of good and bad spirits, came to be an essential aspect of spiritual direction, often with negative consequences for women whose piety could be labeled unorthodox or even demonic.

Women were not merely recipients of spiritual care provided by men, but as abbesses and prioresses they were involved in spiritual formation of other monastic women. Mothers held spiritual authority unofficially as religious educators of their children, and women could be role models of piety, especially as mystics whose perceived closeness with God empowered them to counsel others.

Parish Priests

Even though care of the souls was principally the duty of the parish clergy and bishops, strikingly little is known of the spiritual relationships between these authorities and women. The low educational level of ordinary priests helps to explain the lack of written evidence. But even bishops, who typically came from the nobility and enjoyed greater educational opportunities, seem not to have involved themselves with spiritual formation. They focused on the administrative affairs of the church. Though Pope Gregory VII (1073–1085) successfully bolstered parish priests' authority over secular magnates, and later the Fourth Lateran Council (1215) stressed their sacramental authority by demanding that lay people annually receive communion at their local churches, the parish priests still seem to have had only marginal impact on the practice of spiritual care.

Guidance from Monks and Friars

The most effective practitioners of spiritual care came from the ranks of the religious orders. Monks and friars wrote the most influential classics of spiritual direction, among them The Conferences of John Cassian (d. c. 435) and The Soul's Journey into God by Bonaventure (d. 1274). Even Pope Gregory the Great's (590–604) momentous Liber regulae pastoralis, a pastoral manual for bishops, was shaped by his experiences as a monk. The monastic life also created a fertile seedbed for literature specifically concerning women's spiritual direction. One significant means for exercising such care was through religious rules (regulae). The Rule of Augustine, which became popular only toward the end of the eleventh century, derived from Augustine's (d. 430) Letter 211 to a group of religious women. Caesarius of Arles (d. 542) wrote guidelines to the flourishing community of his sister, Caesaria. Benedict (d. c. 550) did not write a rule for women, but his Rule for monks was later introduced to women's houses.

The regula was read aloud when the community gathered together for its chapter meetings and meals, but women commonly adjusted the contents of the rule by requesting changes or by refusing to follow regulations that did not suit their purposes. Heloise (d. 1164), the powerful abbess at the Paraclete, wrote to Abelard (d. 1142) to ask for clarification concerning women's use of the Rule of Benedict, revealing her own learnedness on the practices of spiritual direction. Some women even wrote the rules for their religious communities, including Clare of Assisi, whose modus vivendi was approved just a few days before her death in August 1253, and Birgitta of Sweden (d. 1373), who claimed that she received the rule for her Order of the Holy Savior in a vision.

Inspirational Literature

Inspirational literature was an essential aspect of medieval spiritual care, be that care directed at nuns or women. Such guidance came in the shape of devotional manuals, among them the Speculum virginum, which in the twelfth century advised nuns in the art of piety through a fictional dialogue between a nun and her spiritual mentor. The vitae of past and contemporary saints presented material for spiritual formation through emulation (imitatio). Not unlike men, medieval women were nurtured by The Lives of the Fathers, the Golden Legend, and other collections of the lives of saints. Some women became models of piety themselves, thus teaching through their saintly model (docere exemplo). Many authors responded to women's concerns in an epistolary format. The powerful Countess Matilda of Canossa received guidance from both Gregory VII and Anselm of Canterbury (d. 1109). Peter the Venerable (d. 1156) sent advice to his nieces Margaret and Pontia at Marcigny, a Cluniac monastery. The Dominican preacher Giovanni Dominici (d. 1419) directed spiritual letters to the nuns at Corpus Domini (Venice) and guided Bartolomea degli Alberti in the religious duties of a mother.

Arranging Spiritual Services for Nuns

The medieval church had no preemptive solutions concerning the spiritual care directed toward nuns or other religious women (cura monialium or cura mulierum). Hence the arrangements concerning religious instruction, administration of sacraments and other religious services varied from one community to another. Some monasteries were served by an adjoining community of chaplains, others teamed up with men in double monasteries, as was the case with the Gilbertines. More typically, however, women's houses, though often technically under the care of a bishop, received spiritual services from visiting members of the major religious orders, especially the Augustinian Canons, the Cistercians, the Dominicans, and the Franciscans. As such arrangements were rarely fixed, care could turn easily into neglect, resulting in thorny debates during which the leaders of the religious orders sought to terminate their ties with religious women. Such was the case with the Cistercians in the 1140s and with the Dominicans and the Franciscans throughout the thirteenth century. It was not untypical for the women in these circumstances to fight back by appealing to the popes for a privilege that granted them, at least temporarily, the spiritual services of the reluctant religious orders.

Women Providing Spiritual Care

Women themselves were not officially to teach Christian doctrine or comment on the Bible, but the practice of morally and spiritually uplifting exhortation (exhortatio) was open to them, whether as leaders of a religious community, mystics, or simply as mothers. It was the duty of abbesses and prioresses to ensure that the members of their community participated in monastic observances. When this privilege to educate and discipline their fellow religious was coupled with the abbesses' and prioress' aristocratic pedigrees, many emerged with spiritual authority that extended well beyond their communities. The visionary Hildegard of Bingen (d. 1179) counseled Pope Eugenius III, and Gertrude of Hackeborn (d. c. 1292) developed the Cistercian monastery of Helfta into a flourishing center of literal and spiritual activity.

A ninth-century Carolingian mother, Dhuoda, all but turned herself into a theologian when she dictated her Liber manualis to advise her warrior son on the wisdom of the Bible and the Christian ethics. Religious and laywomen with reputations as mystics practiced guidance that was associated with the tradition of the seven works of spiritual mercy, which included counseling the doubtful and instructing the ignorant. Most of these women operated privately, receiving visitors at their homes or at their communities, but some reached the public by draping their teaching in a literary format. Catherine of Siena (d. 1380), a Dominican laywoman, directed close to four hundred spiritual letters to a mixed group of recipients that included popes as well as ordinary people. Caterina Vigri of Bologna (d. 1463), a Franciscan nun, wrote her Seven Spiritual Weapons as a step-by-step guide to religious perfection. She herself was modeled into an example of piety only a few years after her death when Illuminata Bembo, a nun at her community, eulogized her exemplary life in Specchio di Illuminazione (Mirror of Illumination).

Women even stepped into the field officially reserved for men by explaining theological tenets or by teaching in public. For some, this brought marginalization or outright condemnation, as was the case with Beguine Marguerite Porete, who was burned as a heretic in 1310. Yet, the hagiographers of Rose of Viterbo (d. 1252) and Humility of Faenza (d. 1310) not only tolerated, but even applauded, their public teaching. When such prophetic preaching meshed with the reform agenda of leading churchmen, women could rise to considerable fame, as did Birgitta of Sweden and Catherine of Siena. While such public leadership was exceptional for women, it was conceivable for it matched with the widely recognized mythic roles of Mary Magdalen, who was known as the Apostle of the Apostles, and Catherine of Alexandria, who was presented as a converter of pagan philosophers.

MAIJU LEHMIJOKI-GARDNER

References and Further Reading

- Boyle, Leonard E. Pastoral Care, Clerical Education, and Canon Law, 1200–1400. London: Variorum Reprints, 1981.
- Bynum, Caroline Walker. Holy Feast and Holy Fast. The Religious Significance of Food to Medieval Women. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1987.
- Catherine of Bologna. The Seven Spiritual Weapons. Translated, with notes by Hugh Feiss and Daniela Re. Toronto: Peregrina Publishing, 1998.
- Catherine of Siena. The Letters of Catherine of Siena. Translated with introduction and notes by Suzanne Noffke, 2 vols. Tempe, Ariz.: Arizona Center for Medieval and Renaissance Studies, 2000, 2001.
- Clare of Assisi. Early Documents, edited and translated by Regis J. Armstrong. New York: Franciscan Institute Publications, 1993.
- Freed, John B. "Urban Development and the Cura Monialium in Thirteenth-Century Germany." Viator 3 (1972): 312–327.
- Griffiths, Fiona. "Men's Duty to Provide for Women's Needs: Abelard, Heloise, and the Negotiation of the Cura Monialium." Journal of Medieval History 30 (2004): 1–24.
- Guidance to Women in Twelfth-Century Convents*. Translated by Vera Morton with an interpretative essay by Jocelyn Wogan-Browne. Woodbridge, Suffolk: D. S. Brewer, 2003.
- The Letters of Abelard and Heloise*. Translated with an introduction and notes by Betty Radice. Revised by M. T. Clanchy. London: Penguin Books, 2003.
- Listen Daughter. The Speculum Virginum and the Formation of Religious Women in the Middle Ages. Edited by Constant J. Mews. New York: Palgrave MacMillan, 2001.
- Mayeski, Marie Anne. Dhuoda. Ninth Century Mother and Theologian. Scranton, Pa.: University of Scranton Press, 1995.
- McNamara, Jo Ann. Sisters in Arms. Catholic Nuns through Two Millennia. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1996.
- Pastors and the Care of Souls in Medieval England*. Edited by John Shinnors and William J. Dohar. South Bend, Ind.: University of Notre Dame, 1998.
- Sahlin, Claire L. "Prophetess as Preacher: Birgitta of Sweden and the Voice of Prophecy." Medieval Sermon Studies 40 (1997): 29–44.
- Women Preachers and Prophets through Two Millennia of Christianity*. Edited by Beverly Mayne Kienzle and Pamela J. Walker. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998.

See also Abbesses; Birgitta of Sweden; Caterina Vigri; Catherine of Alexandria; Catherine of Siena; Church; Cistercian Order; Clare of Assisi; Devotional Literature; Dhuoda; Dominican Order; Double Monasteries; Gertrude of Hackeborn; Humility of Faenza; Laywomen, Religious; Marguerite Porete; Mary Magdalen; Matilda of Tuscany; Monastic Rules; Monasticism and Nuns; Mothers as Teachers; Mysticism and Mystics; Poor Clares Order; Rose of Viterbo; Sermons and Preaching; Spirits: Discernment of and Possession by; Tertiaries; Theology

SPIRITUALITY, CHRISTIAN

The Oxford English Dictionary reminds us that spiritual was originally synonymous with ecclesiastical. In the Merriam-Webster dictionary, the definitions that many people associate with spirituality, “attachment to religious values,” “the state of being spiritual,” are secondary to the primary definition: “something that in ecclesiastical law belongs to the church or to a cleric as such” (Merriam-Webster Online, <http://www.m-w.com/home.htm>). It is significant that in the Middle Ages spirituality had as much to do with ecclesiastical power and property as it did with the inner state of one’s soul. Spirituality thus is about power: the power of one’s office as well as the power of inner conviction. In this entry spirituality also denotes an engagement with, devotion to, or mediation of God or other spiritual beings.

As European societies became more settled in the period after 1000, more people were able to devote time and energy to their religious aspirations. At the same time, the papacy, under the legacy of the eleventh-century Gregorian Reform movement (named after Pope Gregory VII [1073–1085]), attempted to centralize and systematize both Christian theology and practice. These two parallel trends explain much of the excitement about, and also the conflicts over, Christian spirituality from 1100 to 1300. This entry describes a few of the most significant manifestations of spirituality in this period among clerical, monastic, and lay groups, with a special emphasis upon women.

Monastic Spirituality

In the western half of the Roman Empire Christian spirituality was developed and practiced within the framework of Benedictine monasticism. Benedictine monks and nuns dedicated themselves to lives of chastity, poverty, and, above all, obedience to a superior. These principles helped shape the distinctive monastic practices of prayer, work, and study. Prominent among their spiritual practices was lectio divina, a unique method of studying Scripture that involved “hearing with one’s heart,” as Benedict explained in the prologue to his famous Rule. Lectio divina integrates hearing, reading, prayer, meditation, and study in a quiet, laborious, and reflective manner. In Lectio divina there is no separation between “spiritual” meditation and “devotional” practice: lectio is at once a method of spiritual practice and a philosophy of spirituality that is not “goal-directed” but receptive to many modes of spiritual refreshment. Developed by monks who had a lifetime as their disposal, lectio divina had as many spiritual paths as there were practitioners.

Lectio divina also had one stringent requirement beyond monastic vows: Latin literacy. It was assumed that one would hear and meditate upon the Bible, and perhaps read the many medieval commentaries on it, in Latin. Only the wealthy and educated few in the lay population could participate in this form of spirituality. From the twelfth century onward, however, more people had the resources to acquire at least the rudiments of such an education. And a new class of popular preachers began to explain the Scriptures to lay populations in their own languages. Finally, new monastic orders—first the Cistercians, and then the Franciscans and Dominicans—appealed to the laity as never before: the Cistercians through their evocative spiritual writings, the Franciscans through their locations in urban centers, and the Dominicans through their popular preaching.

Secular Culture and Christian Spirituality

A good example of the medieval interaction between lay and spiritual devotional impulses is the use of secular love poetry to cultivate a particular form of Christian spirituality called Minnemystik or “love mysticism.” Mysticism is a nebulous term but in the Christian tradition generally denotes a type of direct experience of or participation in God, rather than experiencing God as mediated through Christian sacraments. Troubadour poetry extolled the virtues of devotion to one’s lady or lord, imagined as a noble man or woman who bestowed his/her favors upon the beloved. In poetry both erotic and long-suffering, the knight pined for the loving reward of his devotion. There was also a monastic parallel to this love poetry: the sensuous language of the Biblical Song of Songs. From Origen in the second century to Bernard of Clairvaux in the twelfth, monks used the language of the Bride and Bridegroom in the Song of Songs to explain the mystery of God’s union with the soul. Both men and women were attracted to this symbolism, but Minnemystik and its kin, bridal mysticism, are especially associated with spiritual women in central Europe and the Low Countries. For example, in the thirteenth century Hadewijch of Antwerp wrote passionate poetry in her native tongue, describing God personified as Minne, a female aspect of God to whom the soul, like a knight, devotes himself. Gender ambiguity is a central feature of this form of mysticism, for Minne, an aspect of God, is female, while the soul is imagined as either masculine or feminine. In contrast, bridal mysticism, most clearly depicted in the writings of Mechthild of Magdeburg (1207–1294), is more closely aligned with heteronormative paradigms, in which the soul is imagined as a Bride entering God's chamber to become united with Him.

Spiritual Devotion to the Humanity of Christ

Minnemystik imagines the union of God and the soul in terms of human love. Part of the impulse for this form of spiritual devotion was a heightened awareness of Christ's humanity, as well as his divinity. Iconographically represented by an idealized man instead of a stern judge, Christ's image as God incarnate in human flesh provided a way to experience God more concretely than as a purely formless spirit. As Bernard of Clairvaux wrote: "Our Lord shows us both the difficulty of the way and the reward of the labor. . . . If you imitate him you will not walk in darkness; you will have the light of life" (Evans, 103).

One result of this renewed appreciation of Christ's humanity was the conviction that he provided the ideal life to follow: the imitatio Christi. This imitatio could take many forms; especially popular were those of idealizing poverty, selling one's possessions and begging for food, and ministering to the sick and the poor. These forms were highly gendered, because women generally did not have the option of casting off all social bonds and living hand to mouth, as did Franciscan monks. One has only to examine the careers of Francis (1182–1226) and St. Clare (1194–1253) to appreciate the difficulties such an ideal posed for women. Although St. Clare also extolled voluntary poverty and clung to it for her Rule, the move to enclose her nuns within a nunnery proved very hard to resist. Ministering to the sick and the poor, however, was an option that many religious women championed. In the Low Countries a group of religious women called Beguines, taking no permanent vows, ran schools and hospitals and pooled their money for the welfare of all in their communities. They organized as self-supporting communities, however, not bands of wandering friars. They are one of the best examples of how imitatio Christi could be imagined as a lifestyle for women.

Christ's Suffering as a Spiritual Model

Related to the importance of Christ's life is the attention paid to his suffering and death. Part of imitatio Christi is the notion that to truly imitate Christ, one must suffer, and perhaps even die, as he did. This was not a new form of Christian spirituality. In the early days of Christianity martyrs were praised as those who most perfectly imitated Christ. Since the days of martyrdom were long over, what form of suffering might be appropriate? Monasticism remained the "white [bloodless] martyrdom," but newer forms of imitating Christ's suffering focused on the aspects of his narrative that depicted him as reviled, persecuted, and misunderstood. As Meister Eckhart (1260–1327/1328), a Dominican mystic, wrote to the Queen of Hungary: "If you want to be a son of God and do not want to suffer, you are all wrong" (Colledge, 232). Devotional meditations on Christ's Passion were also very popular. Many were written in the vernacular especially for women, such as those by the fourteenth century English monk, Richard Rolle (1300–1349).

Eucharistic Spirituality

An emphasis upon Christ's real presence in the Eucharist became more pronounced from the tenth century on. Eucharistic piety is a wonderful example of the synchrony between popular devotion and clerical desires. The festival of Corpus Christi, for example, was officially promulgated by the papacy in 1264, but the impetus for the festival came from the Beguine Juliana of Cornillon (1222–1258). Stories of Eucharistic hosts that miraculously manifested Christ's body (in whole or in part) had been part of popular culture since the eighth century, and clerics and preachers began to use these stories as exempla to teach the proper Christian respect for the Eucharist. From the twelfth century on, bleeding host stories cannot be extricated from the anti-Semitism that surrounded them, fueled by both popular and governmental resentment at Jewish success. It is undeniable that as views of the real presence became more entrenched in Christian society, persecution and expulsion of Jewish communities also increased.

The religious implications of this doctrine for Christian lay people, especially women, were also profound. Women could not be priests, and so could not participate in the most powerful ritual of the Christian Church: the consecration of the Eucharist. As Miri Rubin has detailed, after 1100 the emphasis on Christ's real presence in the Eucharist increased the powers of the priesthood and tended to separate them even more from the laity. As clerics across Europe consolidated the doctrine of the real presence and engaged in an extensive preaching and teaching campaign, the right of lay people to teach or interpret Christian doctrine was increasingly curtailed.

Yet many lay people, both men and women, were caught up in the religious sentiments of their day, especially Eucharistic devotion. Lay men and women could not consecrate the host, but they could adore it. After all, devotional meditations on Christ's Passion were thought appropriate for lay people. These meditations, taking place in churches, could also cause extravagant ecstatic or other visionary phenomena. Many biographies of "holy women" stress that their ecstatic visions occurred during reception of the Eucharist. Thus, eucharistic spirituality had public, as well as personal, aspects. Ecstatic visions were public and sometimes resulted in religious transformations of witnesses. Women who were graced with these visions were often regarded as spiritually gifted. A few of these holy women also claimed to live solely on Eucharistic "food."

Eucharistic spirituality thus had the effect of providing a spiritual niche for religious women in addition to heightening the institutional office of priest. Clerics were often great admirers of holy women and wrote enthusiastic vitae for them. Holy women were also rivals for spiritual power, however, and some clerics were suspicious of their claims.

Spiritual Power

The phenomenon of ecstatic visions returns us to ecclesiastical power. That is, who has the ability to mediate the sacred for others? One kind of spiritual power was the distribution of the Eucharist, over which clerics established a spiritual monopoly. Another form of spiritual power was the cult of saints, which provided intermediaries between heavenly and earthly power. A third kind of spiritual power was developed by holy women. The period from 1100–1300 saw a marked rise in the documentation of holy women in every European country. Anchoresses in England, religious laywomen affiliated with the Franciscans and Dominicans in Italy, and Beguines in the Low Countries, were just a few of the variety of practitioners of female religious spirituality. Some of these holy women presided over a new form of spiritual power: the ability to traverse purgatory and heaven via visual and ecstatic phenomena. As Barbara Newman has argued, the domain of purgatory was relatively new in the twelfth century and represented a new spiritual "apostolate to the dead" to which women had access. Some holy women claimed to be able to discover the fates of particular deceased individuals. Other holy women became channels of divine inspiration. They could, in that role, reveal divine wisdom. Still others became famous for their voluntary poverty and asceticism. The spiritual power exercised by these holy women was as much a feature of the medieval landscape as clerical power.

Conclusion

All of these forms of medieval spirituality were both intoxicatingly creative and dangerous to the societies that inspired them. Spiritual variety could thrive in confident, well-integrated societies, but any social and economic fissures threatened to upset the delicate balance between creative spirituality and society-unraveling chaos. Rulers and clerics perceived many potential problems. First, the spiritual devotion of the laity was by definition less educated in the intricacies of scholastic theology, so lay preachers and writers could make theological mistakes. Second, admiration of alternate models of spiritual power could become dangerous if it led to clerical critiques. Third, extravagant imitations of Christ could spawn hordes of beggars and rogues roaming the countryside. Finally, claims for divine sanction could result in prophetic statements unacceptable to Christian orthodoxy. The heady days of social and religious experimentation became increasingly less attractive after the thirteenth century. Many spiritual movements that churchmen had formerly praised were condemned, such as the Beguine movement, along with the "Free Spirit" heresy, in 1311–1312 at the Council of Vienne. Yet, although women's writings and sometimes their bodies were burned, the deep impulses of spiritual desire proved impossible to suppress. For example, Marguerite Porete was executed for heresy at Paris in 1310, but her book, The Mirror of Simple Annihilated Souls, circulated in French, Latin, Italian, and English versions long after her death, albeit with her name sometimes removed. It is ironic that the spirituality inspired and nurtured by the Church in the medieval period would erupt in different forms during the Protestant Reformation of the fifteenth century. Indeed, many of the spiritual expressions of the medieval period: Bible study, devotional meditations, focus on the Passion, love mysticism, dedication to poverty and aid of the sick and disadvantaged, survive in both Catholic and Protestant manifestations to this day.

MARY SUYDAM

References and Further Reading

Babinsky, Ellen, trans. Marguerite Porete: The Mirror of Simple Souls. New York: Paulist Press, 1993.

- Bartlett, Anne, Thomas Bestul, Janet Goebel, and William Pollard, eds. Vox Mystica: Essays on Medieval Mysticism. Cambridge: D. S. Brewer, 1995.
- Brown, Peter. The Cult of Saints: Its Rise and Function in Latin Christianity. New York: Oxford University Press, 1981.
- Colledge, Edmund, and Bernard McGinn, trans. Meister Eckhart: The Essential Sermons, Commentaries, Treatises, and Defense. New York: Paulist Press, 1981.
- Dor, Juliette, Lesley Johnson, and Jocelyn Wogan-Brown, eds. New Trends in Feminine Spirituality: the Holy Women of Liège and Their Impact. Brepols: Turnhout, 1999.
- Evans, G. R., trans. Bernard of Clairvaux: Selected Works. New York: Paulist Press, 1987.
- Galvani, Christiane, trans. Mechthild von Magdeburg: Flowing Light of the Divinity. New York: Garland Publishing, 1991.
- Greer, Rowan, trans. Origen: An Exhortation to Martyrdom, Prayer, and Selected Works. New York: Paulist Press, 1979.
- Hart, Columba, trans. Hadewijch: Complete Works. New York: Paulist Press, 1988.
- Johnson, James Howard, and Paul Antony Hayward, eds. The Cult of Saints in Late Antiquity and the Middle Ages: Essays on the Contribution of Peter Brown. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- Matter, E. Ann. The Voice of My Beloved: the Song of Songs in Medieval Christianity. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1992.
- Newman, Barbara. From Virile Woman to WomanChrist: Studies in Medieval Religion and Literature. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1995.
- Petroff, Elizabeth A. Medieval Women's Visionary Literature. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- Rubin, Miri. Corpus Christi: the Eucharist in Late Medieval Culture. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.
- Suydam, Mary, and Joanna Ziegler, eds. Performance and Transformation: New Approaches to Late Medieval Spirituality. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1999.
- Zum Brunn, Émilie, and Georgette Épiney-Burgard. Women Mystics in Medieval Europe. New York: Paragon Press, 1989.

See also Anchoresses; Beguines; Bride of Christ; Imagery; Church; Clare of Assisi; Courtly Love; Devotional Practices; Hadewijch; Hagiography; Lay Piety; Laywomen, Religious; Marguerite Porete; Mechthild of Magdeburg; Meditation; Monasticism and Nuns; Mysticism and Mystics; Song of Songs, Medieval Interpretations of; Theology

STAGEL, ELSBETH

Elsbeth Stigel (c. 1300–1360) is known primarily because of her (disputed) role in the composition of two works: 1) the vita of the German Dominican preacher Henry Suso (1295–1366), which he compiled, along with his other major German works, in a collection called The Exemplar; and 2) the Sisterbook (or convent chronicle) of the Dominican convent of Töss near Zürich. Little is known of Elsbeth Stigel's background beyond notes, made in a Suso manuscript owned by Stigel, referring to her order, the Dominican community in Töss, and her immediate family. Other documents confirm that her father, Rudolf Stigel, was a town councilman in Zürich. Stigel probably entered the convent at a young age and remained there until her death.

The debate over Stigel's authorship centers around Suso's contradictory accounts of her in his vita. In the prologue, Suso describes Stigel as having secretly written down his personal experiences. Once he discovered the existence of these writings, he threw them into the fire. Yet before he could burn all of them, a divine message stayed his hand, and he proceeded to use her writings to complete a vita of his own. Although it is clear from the text that Stigel's written and verbal exchanges with Suso contributed to his work, scholars continue to debate whether what we learn of her in the vita is more fiction than fact. Suso also praises Stigel's authorship of her own book—a compilation of thirty-three lives of sisters from the Töss community, but this authorship has also been disputed and it is now thought that Stigel was one of a number of contributors to that compilation.

SARA S. POOR

References and Further Reading

- Henry, Suso. The Exemplar, with Two German Sermons. Translated by Frank Tobin. New York: Paulist Press, 1989.
- Lewis, Gertrud Jaron. By Women, for Women, about Women: The Sister-Books of Fourteenth Century Germany. Toronto: Pontifical Institute of Mediaeval Studies, 1996.
- Tobin, Frank. "Henry Suso and Elsbeth Stigel: Was the Vita a Cooperative Effort?" In Gendered Voices: Medieval Saints and Their Interpreters, edited by Catherine M. Mooney. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999, pp. 118–135.
- Vetter, Ferdinand, ed. Das Leben der Schwestern zu Töß beschrieben von Elsbet Stigel samt der Vorrede von Johannes Meier und dem Leben der Prinzessin Elisabeth von Ungarn [The Life of the Sisters of Töss described by Elsbeth Stigel including the Forward by Johannes Meyer and the Life of the Princess Elisabeth of Hungary]. Berlin: Weidmannsche Buchhandlung, 1906.

See also Devotional Literature; Dominican Order; Hagiography; Literature, German; Monasticism and Nuns; Mysticism and Mystics; Mystics' Writings; Sister-Books and Other Convent Chronicles; Women Authors; German Texts

STROZZI, ALESSANDRA

The Florentine patrician Alessandra Strozzi (1407–1471) is known for seventy-three surviving letters written in her own hand, all but one addressed to her exiled sons, who worked as merchant bankers in Naples, Spain, and Bruges. Alessandra had been widowed by age thirty and left to raise five small children after her husband Matteo's exile by the Medici and subsequent death. Her earliest letters, starting in 1447 after ten years of widowhood, show her establishing her sons in merchant careers and finding husbands for her daughters. The later letters document her efforts to obtain the repeal of her sons' exile and to find them wives.

Like most Florentine women of her time, Alessandra had little formal education, but she wrote fluently in a colloquial style reflecting everyday speech. Her words show her to have been a devoted mother, serious about the religious advice she gave her sons. They also suggest she was a woman of strong will but considerable tact, possessing exceptional judgment about family and finances, and a cynical but insightful view of the Florentine social and political scene. Letters by Alessandra's relatives reinforce the self-portrait presented in her letters and reveal her as a guiding force in family decisions until the end of her life.

ANN CRABB

References and Further Reading

Crabb, Ann. Widowhood and Family Solidarity: The Strozzi of Florence. Ann Arbor, Mich.: University of Michigan Press, 2000.

Strozzi, Alessandra. Selected Letters: Bilingual Edition. Translated by Heather Gregory. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1997.

See also Italy; Letter Writing; Merchant Families, Women of; Widows

SUCCESSION, ROYAL AND NOBLE

During the Middle Ages, a number of rulers were elected, including most famously the pope, the Holy Roman Emperor, the Rí of Gaelic Order Ireland and, following the rules of tanistry, the chiefs of some Celtic tribes and early kings of Scotland. Yet most medieval lordships and monarchies were inherited according to rules of succession that evolved throughout the Middle Ages, often paralleling developments in the complex and diverse laws of inheritance of private property. In the early medieval period, proximity of blood or closeness in degree of kinship was often the overriding factor, so that brothers or other males within the same generation succeeded before any children. This had the advantage of ensuring that the heir was an adult but encouraged conflict between rival claimants and ran contrary to a growing tendency to place the immediate family ahead of the extended kin or stirps. This practice continued in Plantagenet England, placing King John ahead of his nephew Arthur, the son of an older brother. By the High Middle Ages, most systems of inheritance tended to prioritize direct children, though there was still considerable variation in practice, ranging from the equal division of an inheritance among those children, for example, by William the Conqueror, to the more common system of primogeniture whereby the eldest son took priority, thereby preserving the integrity of the lordship or kingdom.

Males were almost always given priority in the succession to lordships and monarchies, not only because of the assumption that these were inherently masculine functions, involving military leadership and sometimes even quasi-sacerdotal qualities, but more fundamentally because females were never accorded equal status with males by medieval laws of inheritance. Nevertheless most legal systems did allow daughters and sisters to inherit in the absence of direct male heirs and as a result, females were frequently allowed to succeed to lordships and monarchies, brothers failing, even if their husbands usually became the real lord and most often also received the title. As a result numerous women succeeded to both noble lordships and kingdoms across Europe.

In some specific cases, political elites did take action to exclude women from noble and royal succession. The most famous example was in France, where the daughters of the last three Capetian kings were deliberately excluded from the royal succession following the deaths of their fathers in 1316, 1322, and 1328. On the last of these occasions, the assembled notables of France chose Philip of Valois as the heir to King Charles IV, rejecting the claim of Edward III of England, son of Charles's sister Isabella. This decision extended the exclusion of females from the French royal succession to males claiming through women, that is to say cognates. Yet in none of these cases was there a clear legal authority opposing either female or cognate succession, particularly given the fact that women had inherited both private property and lordships in the recent past. Rather than admit that the decisions were made by public assemblies, and thereby introduce an element of election into the French royal succession, official writers argued that the crown was a public office inappropriate for females and pretended that their exclusion accorded with an ancient constitutional law, the Salic Law. This Lex Salica was a long-forgotten legal code written around the time of Clovis (476–496), rediscovered by the monks of Saint-Denis in the middle of the fourteenth century. With some modification, Jean de Montreuil, Jean Juvénal des Ursins, and other French writers were able to argue that it was the first law of the French kingdom and that it excluded both women and cognates from the French royal succession and from apanages, that is to say lordships given to the younger sons of French kings. Today the term Salic Law has become synonymous with agnatic succession (i.e., a system that entirely excludes females and males claiming through females).

The situation was more complex in England where the common law allowed both women and cognates to inherit property but the legal device of the entail had been developed to answer the concerns of the English nobility at lands passing out of their family through the marriage of an only daughter. This created a potential model for the exclusion of women from the royal succession, though neither King Edward III (1327–1377) nor King Henry IV (1399–1413) were successful in applying it. In 1460, Richard of York laid claim to the English throne as a descendant of Edward III's second son, Lionel, duke of Clarence. Yet this claim passed through two women, Lionel's daughter Philippa and Richard's mother Anne, and so it was far from clear that this Yorkist title was superior to that of the Lancastrians who were descended in direct male line from Edward III's fourth son, John of Gaunt. The absence of a Salic Law in England, or any clear principle regarding agnatic and cognatic succession to the throne, left no legal solution to the problem that underpinned the Wars of the Roses.

CRAIG TAYLOR

References and Further Reading

- Bennett, Michael J. "Edward III's Entail and the Succession to the Crown, 1376–1471." English Historical Review 113 (1998): 580–609.
- Lewis, Andrew W. Royal Succession in Capetian France: Studies on the Familial Order and the State. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1981.
- Taylor, Craig. "Sir John Fortescue and the French Polemical Treatises of the Hundred Years War." English Historical Review 114 (1999): 112–129.
- . "The Salic Law and the Valois Succession to the French Crown." French History 15 (2001): 358–377.

See also England; Family (Later Middle Ages); France, Northern; Inheritance; Kinship; Queens and Empresses; The West

SUMPTUARY LAW

Renaissance Europe witnessed an extraordinary economic growth that built upon and expanded the trade in luxury commodities that had begun in the early thirteenth century. So marked were the levels of consumption in comparison to what had gone before, that many now argue for this period as the origin of modern consumer society. The impact of the new habits of expenditure and the practices that they were seen to foster created social, economic, political, and religious tensions. Perhaps the clearest expression of societal preoccupation with the new expenditure and associated way of life is sumptuary law, enacted by governments throughout Europe from London to Dubrovnik, of which hundreds are extant. The most frequent legislators, however, were the Italians, whose laws are also the lengthiest and most detailed.

These laws take their name from ancient Roman leges sumptuarie (sumptus meaning "expense"). The Renaissance sumptuary laws regulated a range of activities including expenditure on luxury goods, specific fashions, purchase of foreign goods, and funeral and wedding rituals and festivities. Above all, it was the public display of wealth that the laws targeted. Very few laws, for instance, regulated interior furnishings and many laws did not prohibit the possession of certain types of fabric and clothing, but merely their wearing outside the home.

Of all the many subjects dealt with in sumptuary laws, clothing appears most frequently and women's clothing in particular. Though several "celebrity" preachers such as Bernardino of Siena, Bernardino da Feltre, and Savonarola regularly castigated men and, more frequently, women for excess and immodesty in apparel, the impetus to legislate in this area came from secular governments rather than the Church. These clothing laws are usually minutely detailed and had to be revised relatively frequently to keep pace with changing fashions. Indeed often the laws helped to precipitate a change in fashion as a means to evade specific prohibitions. The preoccupation with clothing in general can partly be explained by the sheer volume of household expenditure on clothes (up to forty percent of household income in some cases). But it was clothing's ability to signify at a glance a person's rank, occupation, wealth, nationality, gender, and marital status that made it so susceptible to regulation. And it was precisely these indicators that permitted such difference in the laws regulating women's and men's clothing.

Many of these clothing laws are rank and occupation specific. For instance, certain types of clothes, shoes, and jewelry are permitted to nobles, knights, and their families, but prohibited to those lower down the social scale, especially servants and prostitutes. Men with public roles to fulfill within their community were usually exempted from sumptuary laws and required to wear clothes befitting the honour of their station. In Venice in 1433, for instance, the city's councillors were specifically instructed in a sumptuary law to wear costly scarlet robes suited to their prominent position. Similar notions of honour explain why in some cases women were exempted from sumptuary laws when foreign ambassadors visited the city so that the wealth of the city could be publicly displayed. In all these cases women were allowed expensive clothing only by reference to their association with prominent men or, in the latter case, with the city itself.

Women's lack of a public voice meant not only that their lavish clothing could not be justified by reference to the honour of their own position, but, paradoxically, that they relied more than men on the vestimentary codes that their clothes expressed. On the occasions that women appeared in public, they were still predominantly silent, and their clothes gave them a voice, limited though that voice might be. The public milestones of a woman's life—marriage, childbirth, widowhood—were all marked by clothing that served to demarcate publicly her changing status. Such clothing was always linked to the male lineage to which a woman belonged, whether by birth or marriage, and so her clothes “spoke” on men's behalf rather than on her own account. Once again, it is honour that is prized in a woman's relationship with her family, and modesty in outward apparel is a constant theme of sumptuary law. While both men and women were instructed to dress modestly, the laws addressing women's modesty are sometimes couched in language suffused with misogynistic venom. The clearest expression of this is in a Florentine law of 1433 that referred to the “barbarous and irrepressible bestiality of women who, not mindful of the weakness of their nature, forgetting that they are subject to their husbands, and transforming their perverse sense into a reprobate and diabolical nature, force their husbands with their honeyed poison to submit to them.”

Women's response to sumptuary law is hard to gauge. However one remarkable protest was made by a Bolognese noble woman, Nicolosa Sanuti, in the form of a lengthy treatise that she had translated into Latin in 1453. Sanuti argued passionately for clothing as an indicator of women's honour that was thereby disgraced through legislation. Sanuti questioned the assumptions behind sumptuary law and used her protest as a springboard to discuss the merits of women, and noble women, such as herself, in particular. As such, her treatise is the earliest extant defence of women in Italy conceived by a woman. Employing the same justifications used for men's expensive clothing, Sanuti argued that precisely because women could not hold public positions and receive the associated “triumphs and spoils of war,” the only signifier of their virtue and honour was their clothing. These, she argued, were “the tokens of our virtues” that “while the power is left us, we shall not allow to be stolen from us. Amen.” Sanuti's protest was unsuccessful, however, and sumptuary law continued in Europe for at least another two centuries.

CATHERINE KOVESI

References and Further Reading

- Baldwin, F. E. Sumptuary Legislation and Personal Regulation in England. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1926.
- Bridgeman, J. “Pagare le pompe: Why Quattrocento Sumptuary Law Did Not Work.” In Women in Italian Renaissance Culture and Society, edited by Letizia Panizza. Oxford: European Humanities Research Centre, Oxford University, 2000, pp. 209–221.
- Chisholm, J. “The Sumptuary Laws of Scotland.” Journal of Jurisprudence 414/35 (1891): 290–297.
- Evans, J. Dress in Medieval France. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1952.
- Frick, Carole. Dressing Renaissance Florence: Families, Fortunes, and Fine Clothing. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2002.
- Greenfield Kent, R. “Sumptuary Law in Nürnberg: A Study in Paternal Government.” Johns Hopkins University Studies in Historical and Political Science, 36th ser., 2 (1918).
- Harte, N. B., “State Control of Dress and Social Change in Pre-Industrial England.” In Trade, Government and Economy in Pre-Industrial England: Essays Presented to F. J. Fisher, edited by D. C. Coleman and A. H. John. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1976, pp. 132–165.
- Hooper, Wilfred. “The Tudor Sumptuary Laws.” English Historical Review 30 (1915): 433–439.
- Hughes, Diane Owen. “Sumptuary Law and Social Relations in Renaissance Italy,” In Disputes and Settlements: Law and Human Relations in the West, edited by John Bossy, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1983, pp. 69–99.
- Kovesi Killerby, Catherine. “‘Heralds of a well-instructed mind’: Nicolosa Sanuti's defence of women and their clothes.” Renaissance Studies 13, 3 (1999): 255–282.
- . Sumptuary Law in Italy 1200–1500. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 2002.
- Langlois, C. V. “Project for Taxation Presented to Edward I.” English Historical Review 4 (1894): 517–529.
- Newett, M. M. “The Sumptuary Laws of Venice in the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Centuries.” In Historical Essays by Members of the Owens College, Manchester, edited by T. F. Tout and James Tate, London: Longmans, Green, and Co. 1907, pp. 245–277.
- Rainey, E. R. “Dressing Down the Dressed-Up: Repeating Feminine Attire in Renaissance Florence.” In Renaissance Society and Culture: Essays in Honor of Eugene F. Rice, edited by John Monfasani and Ronald G. Musto, New York: Ithaca Press, 1991, pp. 217–237.
- Shaw, F. J. “Sumptuary Legislation in Scotland.” Juridical Review ns (1979): 81–115.
- Strocchia, Sharon T. Death and Ritual in Renaissance Florence. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1992.
- Vincent, J. M. Costume and Conduct in the Laws of Basel, Bern, and Zurich, 1370–1800. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1935.

See also Clothing; Consumption; Honor and Reputation; Italy; Sanuti, Nicolosa Castellani; Social Status

SUPERNATURAL WOMEN

Female characters who have magical abilities are found in the writings of such major medieval writers as Geoffrey Chaucer, the Pearl-Poet, Marie de France, and Sir Thomas Malory, and are predominantly associated with the tradition of Arthurian literature. Although long regarded by many critics as figures secondary to the main, masculine-dominated movement of the text, most scholars now contend that such characters are in fact critical and intrinsic to the progression of the narrative. Through spells, gifts, and shrewd manipulation of conventional gender roles, such female characters often function to produce—rather than merely participate in—the narrative action.

Perhaps the best-known and most important of these supernatural women is Morgan le Fay, the half-sister of King Arthur. Believed by many scholars to derive from a Celtic pre-Christian goddess, her first recorded literary appearance is in Geoffrey of Monmouth's Vita Merlini (c. 1150) where she is represented as a beautiful shape-shifting healer residing on the Isle of Avalon. Chrétien de Troyes (mid- to late twelfth century) is the first to identify her as Arthur's sister. In her early appearances Morgan is usually positively represented as a benevolent figure. Her character begins to decline somewhat in the French Vulgate Cycle prose romances (c. 1215–1235), and in the Post-Vulgate (c. 1235–1240) she becomes Arthur's enemy, seeking to destroy his rule through a variety of schemes. She replaces Arthur's sword, Excalibur, and its magic scabbard with fakes; then by means of witchcraft she arranges for single combat between Arthur and her lover, Accolon, to whom she has given the real Excalibur. She also sends a magic drinking horn to court out of which only faithful women can drink without spilling, an attempt to expose the affair of Lancelot and Guinivere.

Standing in opposition to Morgan's malevolence are The Lady of the Lake and other Lake "damsels" who are often conflated. Occasionally identified as Niniane, Vivienne, or Nimuë, the Lady appears in the Vulgate Cycle, Sir Thomas Malory's Morte D'Arthur (c. 1469–1470), and other versions of the legend. She is the figure who gives Arthur Excalibur, and, in the Vulgate, she is responsible for the rearing and training of the young Lancelot.

While Morgan is often represented as an attractive woman in many texts, in Sir Gawain and the Green Knight she is represented as a stunningly ugly hag who arranges a magical beheading contest—in which the Green Knight challenges Arthur's knights to exchange axe-blows with him—in an attempt to frighten Guinivere. Her ugly appearance in this text may owe something to the tradition of the Loathly Lady. This supernatural woman makes her best known appearance in the "Wife of Bath's Tale" in Geoffrey Chaucer's Canterbury Tales (c. late 1380s), which has as an analogue The Wedding of Sir Gawain and Dame Ragnell (c. 1400s). In Chaucer's story, the queen offers a knight who has committed rape the opportunity to save his life if he can discover what it is that women most desire. The knight encounters a hag who offers to help him, but only if he grants her a gift that she will demand on the occasion when he gives the queen the answer to her question. The knight agrees to the terms, only to discover to his horror that the prize the hag demands is that he marry her. On their wedding night, the hag offers him a choice—she can become beautiful but unfaithful, or remain old but loyal. The knight makes the correct choice in leaving the decision up to the loathly lady, proving that he has learned his lesson: what women most desire is sovereignty. As a reward, the hag transforms herself, promising to be both beautiful and faithful.

Another kind of magical woman appears in Lanval, one of Marie de France's lais (c. 1150–1190). In this story, a knight of King Arthur's court finds love with a fairy woman who swears him to secrecy about their relationship. Upon Lanval's return to court, Queen Guinevere makes advances toward him; when he rejects her, she impugns his masculine identity, suggesting that he must take his pleasure with young boys, as he has no lady. Thus provoked, Lanval reveals the secret of his fairy lover. Although he has broken his oath, the fairy lady rides to Lanval's rescue in the end.

Other medieval literary female characters who might be described as "supernatural" include, from the earlier period, Grendel's mother (in Beowulf), from later periods, Dame Brangwain (who prepared the potions in the Tristan stories), Rhiannon (in the Mabinogi), and the serpent-woman Mélusine (in the eponymous romance by Jean d'Arras).

DORSEY ARMSTRONG

References and Further Reading

- Armstrong, Dorsey. Gender and the Chivalric Community in Malory's Morte Darthur. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 2003.
- Chaucer, Geoffrey. The Riverside Chaucer. Edited by Larry D. Benson. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1987.
- Crane, Susan. Gender and Romance in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1994.
- Fenster, Thelma S., ed. Arthurian Women: A Casebook. New York: Garland, 1996.
- Ferrante, Joan M. The Conflict of Love and Honor: The Medieval Tristan Legend in France, Germany, and Italy. The Hague: Mouton, 1973.

- Ford, Patrick K., trans. The Mabinogi and Other Medieval Welsh Tales. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1977.
- Geoffrey of Monmouth. The Historia Regum Britanniae of Geoffrey of Monmouth. Edited by Neil Wright. Cambridge: D. S. Brewer, 1985.
- Hodges, Kenneth. Forging Chivalric Communities in Malory's Le Morte Darthur. New York: Palgrave/Macmillan, 2005.
- Lacy, Norris J., ed. Lancelot-Grail: The Old French Arthurian Vulgate and Post-Vulgate in Translation. 5 vol. New York: Garland, 1993–1996.
- Malory, Sir Thomas. Works. Edited by Eugène Vinaver. 3 vol. 3rd edition, revised by P. J. C. Field. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1990.
- Marie de France. Lais. Edited and translated by Glyn S. Burgess and Keith Busby. Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1986.
- Patterson, Lee. "For the Wyves of Bathe: Feminine Rhetoric in the Roman de la Rose and the Canterbury Tales." Speculum 58 (1983): 656–695.
- Summer, Laura, ed. The Weddyng of Sir Gawen and Dame Ragnell. Northampton, Mass.: Smith College, 1924.
- Tolkien, J. R. R. and E. V. Gordon, eds. Sir Gawain and the Green Knight. Second Edition. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1967.
- Wheeler, Bonnie, and Fiona Tolhurst, eds. On Arthurian Women: Essays in Honor of Maureen Fries. Dallas, Tx.: Scriptorium Press, 2001.

See also Arthurian Literature; Beowulf; Chaucer, Geoffrey; Chivalry; Chrétien de Troyes; Guinevere; Isolde; Literature, Middle English; Literature, Old French; Marie de France; Mélusine; Mermaids and Sirens; Prophets, Nordic; Valkyries

SYON ABBEY

The only English house of the Birgittine Order, Syon Abbey, or more formally, the Order of St. Saviour, St. Mary and St. Bridget of Syon, was established by Henry V in 1415 near his royal palace at Sheen (Richmond). An Order envisaged as a "new vineyard" at a time when all over Europe the need for reform was urgent, the Birgittines, along with the austere Carthusians, were especially chosen by Henry to occupy sites close to his palace as a signal that he intended to take strong leadership in both the political and ecclesiastical spheres. After the first vows were made in April 1420 in the presence of the archbishop of Canterbury, this late medieval royal foundation almost immediately became one of the most important monastic houses in England, exercising, in particular, a profound influence on the religious life of the capital.

An order dedicated to the Virgin Mary and intended primarily for women, whose main duty, according to the Rule, was the constant praise of God through the Lord's "most beloved mother," was timely in an era when Marian devotion was flourishing, especially in England, or "Mary's dower," as it was known. This was a double order, modeled after the post-Ascension community with Mary as its head. The priests assisted the nuns in their devotions and were their spiritual advisors. The abbess, elected from among the choir sisters, was the earthly representative of the Virgin and administered the monastery; the confessor-general, elected by the nuns and brethren, was the spiritual head. Both the women's and men's communities were enclosed and strictly separated, even in the church itself, both literally and figuratively the heart of Birgittine life. Excavations at Isleworth have indicated that the Church at Syon was larger even than Westminster Abbey.

During its pre-Reformation existence, Syon Abbey was held in high esteem for the rigour of its religious observance and the learning of its members. The nuns' main task was the daily performance of their special office, or the Cantus sororum, and at Matins attending to lessons concerning Mary's role in salvation that had been dictated to Birgitta by an angel and hence called the Sermo angelicus. In the mid-fifteenth century one of the brothers wrote The Myroure of oure Ladye, a translation and explication of the entire service, not so the nuns could abandon the Latin but to ensure that they fully understood and could meditate on the words they recited daily. In an order that valued poverty, it was remarkable that the choir sisters could have as many books of devotional readings as they required; many possessed books in Latin and French as well as English.

At the Dissolution, the community refused to take the oath of allegiance; even a visit from Queen Anne Boleyn failed to sway the determined nuns. Henry VIII himself was reluctant to take action, and when on November 25, 1539, the Birgittines were "putt out" of their house on legal grounds, they did not "surrender to the king." They retired to safe houses and went abroad, and Syon is alone among religious houses in England in claims of an unbroken existence from its medieval foundation. Today the nuns carry on their devotional life at South Brent, Devon.

ANN M. HUTCHISON

References and Further Reading

- Blunt, J. H., ed. The Myroure of Oure Ladye. Early English Text Society. Extra Series 19. London: N. Trübner, 1873; reprint 1981, 1998.
- Ellis, Roger. Syon Abbey: The Spirituality of the English Bridgettines. Analecta Cartusiana 68.2. Salzburg: Institut für Anglistik und Amerikanistik, Universität Salzburg, 1984.

SYON ABBEY

- Hutchinson, Ann M. "The Nuns of Syon in Choir: Spirituality and Influences." In Medieval Spirituality in Scandinavia and Europe: A Collection of Essays in Honour of Tore Nyberg, edited by Lars Bisgaard. Odense: Odense University Press, 2001, pp. 265–274.
- Johnston, F. R. "Syon Abbey." In Victoria County History. Middlesex, vol.1 London: Oxford University Press, 1969, pp. 182–191.
- Knowles, David The Religious Orders in England. 3 vols. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1948–1959.

See also Abbesses; Architecture, Monastic; Birgitta of Sweden; Birgittine Order; Book Ownership; Devotional Literature; Devotional Practices; Double Monasteries; Literacy and Reading; Latin; Literacy and Reading; Vernacular; Mary, Virgin; Monastic Enclosure; Monastic Rules; Monasticism and Nuns; Monasticism, Women's; Papal Policy; Patronage, Ecclesiastical; Poverty, Religious; Spiritual Care

T

---

TEACHERS

See Education, Beguine; Education, Lay; Education, Monastic; Literacy and Reading: Latin; Literacy and Reading: Vernacular; Monasticism and Nuns; Monasticism and Nuns, Byzantine; Monasticism and Nuns: Celtic; Mothers as Teachers

TERESA DE CARTAGENA

Teresa de Cartagena (c. 1425–d. after 1465) belonged to the most powerful family of judeoconversos (Jewish converts to Christianity) in late medieval Spain. Her grandfather, father, and uncles converted to Christianity in 1390–1391 and became pivotal figures in the religious, political, diplomatic, and literary culture of the fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries. Around 1440, Teresa entered the Franciscan monastery of Santa Clara in Burgos and studied, in some capacity, at the University of Salamanca. In 1449, she transferred to the Cistercian Order, probably entering the prestigious Monastery of Las Huelgas in Burgos. Shortly afterward, in the mid-1450s, Teresa became deaf, an affliction that cut her off from family, friends, and members of her convent. She recorded her twenty-year struggle with her deafness in Grove of the Infirm (Arboleda de los enfermos) around 1475–1476, and subsequently defended her writing in Wonder at the Works of God (Admiración operum Dei).

Grove of the Infirm is a hybrid work (consolatory treatise, medieval sermon, epistolary narrative, spiritual autobiography, moral treatise on the virtue of patience); its theme is the spiritual benefits of affliction, and Teresa's deafness serves throughout as an autobiographical exemplum. Apparently the circulation of her manuscript occasioned considerable local controversy, and Teresa wrote her second work to counter the incredulity (admiración) of her detractors, who contended that a woman—especially a handicapped woman—had nothing of value to teach, and to refute their allegations that she had not authored Grove of the Infirm but had plagiarized male sources and presented their work as her own.

DAYLE SEIDENSPINNER-NÚÑEZ

References and Further Reading

- Seidenspinner-Núñez, Dayle. The Writings of Teresa de Cartagena. Cambridge: D. S. Brewer, 1998.
- Seidenspinner-Núñez, Dayle, and Yonsoo Kim. "Historicizing Teresa: Reflections on New Documents regarding Sor Teresa de Cartagena." La corónica 32.2 (Spring 2004): 121–150.
- Surtz, Ronald E. Writing Women in Late Medieval and Early Modern Spain: The Mothers of Teresa de Avila. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1995.

See also Disabilities; Iberia; Literature, Iberian; Monasticism and Nuns; Theology; Women Authors: Spanish Texts

TERTIARIES

The term tertiary, which in the modern era has come to denote the lay members of Franciscan, Dominican, and other mendicant orders, was rarely used during the Middle Ages. The term presumes that the laity formed a distinct third branch (tertius ordo) or a third rule (tertia regula) within religious orders, complementing the first and second branches of friars and nuns respectively. But the lay groups associated with the medieval mendicant orders evade such simple classification, for during their lives many women who today are labeled as tertiaries, were virtually indistinguishable from other religious laywomen. Thus such generic names as penitents (soror de poenitentia) or bearer of penitent habit (vestita), pinzochera or, simply, religious woman (mulier religiosa) better respond to the institutionally ambiguous and relatively independent lives of medieval laywomen who associated themselves with the mendicant friars. Moreover, the mendicant friars' influence on religious lay life was not limited to associations that may be grouped as tertiaries, but was felt widely, among such independent lay groups as the Beguines of central and northern Europe or the beatae of Spain.

TERTIARIES

Franciscan and Dominican Groups

Both the Franciscan and the Dominican friars engaged in the spiritual direction of religious laywomen, but the Franciscans, themselves profoundly inspired by lay devotional ideas, were more ready to formalize the bonds with laywomen than were the markedly clerical Dominicans. Thus, the Franciscan tertiary groups not only outnumbered the Dominican lay associations but also spread throughout Europe, in stark contrast to Dominicans whose lay affiliations principally grew in Italy. Moreover, the Franciscans enrolled both laymen and women, whereas the Dominican groups were almost exclusively populated by women.

Guidelines

It is probable that both the Franciscan and Dominican penitents used the first surviving guideline of the penitent life, the so-called Memoriale of 1221–1228, but it is impossible to determine to what extent the document's ideals concerning humble clothing, frequent fasting, observing the seven canonical hours, Eucharistic observances, or obligations of prayers for the dead shaped the actual practices of the penitents. Pope Nicholas IV's bull Supra montem provided the Franciscan tertiaries with a formal rule on September 18, 1289, but the Dominican women did not receive their rule until Pope Innocent VII published it within his bull Sedis apostolicae on June 26, 1405. (Master General Munio of Zamora's Ordinationes of 1286 is not, contrary to what historians long believed, the first known version of the formal Dominican tertiary rule of 1405, but merely a preliminary set of guidelines intended for local use by the penitents of Orvieto.) The other two principal mendicant orders, the Augustinian Hermits and the Carmelites, exercised limited spiritual direction among the laity. Even after they forged their first formal ties with laywomen at the beginning of the fifteenth century, they never rivaled in popularity the Franciscans or the Dominicans.

Ways of Life

The more stable institutional position of the Franciscan tertiaries was reflected by the emergence of the first semi-monastic tertiary communities during the fourteenth century, among them the house of Angelina of Montegiove (d. 1435). In contrast, Dominican tertiaries lived exclusively at private homes or in informal domestic communities until the turn of the sixteenth century when Colomba of Rieti (d. 1501) and Lucia Brocadelli of Narni (d. 1544) were among the first Dominican penitents to found semi-monastic houses for laywomen.

The tertiaries were typically widows to whom religious life in the world brought social stability and access to religious instruction. But structured religious observances in the world and pious collegiality also made the tertiary life attractive to the unmarried and to married couples. The Franciscans even generated an ideal of virginal marriage within which the union was never consummated, as was the case with the saintly pair of aristocratic tertiaries from France, Elzéar of Sabran (d. 1323), and Delphine of Puimichel (d. 1358). A typical tertiary woman came from the well-to-do urban middle class or lesser nobility, but notable exceptions both from the higher aristocracy and servant class show that penitential life offered a viable religious alternative for all levels of society. Princess Elisabeth of Hungary (d. 1231) sought a life of Franciscan penitential poverty and service to the poor after she was left a widow, whereas Dominicans Giovanna of Orvieto (d. 1306) and Stefana Quinzani (d. 1530) transformed their existence as domestic servants into famed lives as penitential mystics.

Charity and Mysticism

The religious culture of both the Dominican and the Franciscan tertiaries resonated with the broader lay piety within which ascetic self-denial and imitation of Christ's suffering on the cross paved the way to visionary experiences and mystical celebration of the sacrament of the Eucharist. But the Franciscan and Dominican understanding of lay spirituality differed from each other in a few notable ways. Just as the Franciscan penitent rule encouraged service to the urban poor, the Franciscans supported the benevolent engagements of such saintly laywomen as Umiliana dei Cerchi (d. 1246), who as a young widow immersed herself in the care of her neighbors, and Margaret of Cortona (d. 1297), who founded the hospital of Santa Maria della Misericordia in her hometown. In contrast, the Dominicans were cautious about such institutional commitment and did not enshrine charity toward the poor in the penitent rule of 1405. The Dominican penitents were instead uniquely focused on the Passion of Christ, with several of them embodying Christ's crucifixion through their public enactment from the scenes of the Passion, as was the case with Giovanna of Orvieto and Stefana Quinzani. Catherine of Siena (d. 1380) and Lucia Brocadelli of Narni (d. 1544) even received the stigmata, the five wounds of Christ.

The Dominican and Franciscan laywomen's propensity toward mysticism did not preclude their active contributions as reformers and spiritual guides. The Book of Franciscan tertiary Angela of Foligno (d. 1309), consisting of two parts, The Memorial and The Instructions, was an impassioned account concerning her journey toward mystical union with God and at the same time a level-headed guidebook for those seeking spiritual perfection. Colette of Corbie (d. 1447), who herself oscillated among tertiary life, eremitical existence, and semi-monastic commitments, helped to rejuvenate the Order of the Poor Clares of France. Catherine of Siena was instrumental in reshaping not only Dominican lay life, but Dominican women's monasticism as well. Her book The Dialogue and almost four hundred surviving letters show a contemplative woman in action: her elaborate Christ-centered mystical teaching was matched by practical wisdom and a phenomenal aptitude for attracting supporters among men and women of power.

MAIJU LEHMJOKI-GARDNER

References and Further Reading

- Angela of Foligno. Complete Works. Translated with an introduction by Paul Lachance. New York: Paulist Press, 1993.
- Catherine of Siena. The Dialogue. Translation and introduction by Suzanne Noffke. New York: Paulist Press, 1980.
- Coakley, John. "Gender and Authority of the Friars: Significance of Holy Women for Thirteenth-Century Franciscans and Dominicans." Church History 60 (1991): 445–460.

- Dominican Penitent Women*. Edited, translated, and introduced by Maiju Lehmijoki-Gardner with contributions by Daniel E. Bornstein and E. Ann Matter. New York: Paulist Press, 2005.
- Elliott, Dyan. Spiritual Marriage: Sexual Abstinence in Medieval Wedlock. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1993.
- Herzig, Tamar. "The Rise and Fall of a Savonarolan Visionary: Lucia Brocadelli's Forgotten Contribution to the Piagnone Campaign." Archiv für Reformationsgeschichte/Archive for Reformation History 95 (2004): 34–60.
- Lehmijoki-Gardner, Maiju. "Writing Religious Rules as an Interactive Process: Dominican Penitent Women and the Making of Their Regula." Speculum 79 (2004): 660–687.
- Makowski, Elizabeth. A Pernicious Sort of Woman: Quasi-Religious Women and Canon Lawyers in the Later Middle Ages. Washington, D.C.: The Catholic University of America Press, 2005.
- Scott, Karen. "Urban Spaces, Women's Networks, and the Lay Apostolate in the Siena of Catherine Benincasa." In Creative Women in Medieval and Early Modern Italy: Religious and Artistic Renaissance, edited by E. Ann Matter and John Coakley. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1994, pp. 105–119.
- Testi e documenti sul terzo ordine francescano*, edited by Lino Temperini. Rome: Editrice Franciscanum, 1991.
- Vauchez, Andre. "Lay People's Sanctity in Western Europe: Evolution of a Pattern (Twelfth and Thirteenth Centuries)." In Images of Sainthood in Medieval Europe, edited by Renate Blumenfeld-Kosinski and Timea Szell. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1991, pp. 21–32.
- . The Laity in the Middle Ages: Religious Beliefs and Devotional Practices. Edited and introduced by Daniel Bornstein and translated by Margery Schneider. South Bend, Ind.: University of Notre Dame Press, 1993.
- Women and Religion in Medieval and Renaissance Italy*, edited by Daniel Bornstein and Roberto Rusconi and translated by Margery J. Schneider. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press, 1996.

See also Angela of Foligno; Beguines; Catherine of Siena; Chastity and Chaste Marriage; Colette of Corbie; Dominican Order; Lay Piety; Laywomen, Religious; Margaret of Cortona; Mysticism and Mystics; Poor Clares Order; Spiritual Care; Spirituality, Christian

TEXTILE PRODUCTION FOR THE MARKET

Of all the forms of medieval textile production, by far the most commercially important were those focused on wool-based cloths: woolens, worsteds, and serges (mixed woolen-worsted fabrics). When first properly documented, in Carolingian times, the basic processes of cloth manufacturing were almost entirely undertaken by women, as indicated by the name for a textile workshop in manorial estates: gynaecia. Those basic processes became all the better defined, by "division of labor," when cloth production became market-oriented crafts. In order they were: wool-beating and fiber-separation, scouring, washing, greasing, combing, spinning, warping, and weaving. Most of the subsequent cloth-finishing processes were, however, undertaken by men: fulling, shearing, and dyeing.

Tanaquil (Etruscan Queen of Rome) with loom and women spinning. From “De Claris Mulierbus,” by Giovanni Boccaccio (1313–1375), after Pliny (HN 8.194). French, Fourteenth century Roy 16.G.V, f.56. Location: British Library, London, Great Britain. Credit: Art Resource, N.Y.

Woolens: Processes of Textile Production

The differences between woolens and worsteds were fourfold: the type, nature, and quality of the wools used; the consequent processes of cloth-production;

the weight and appearances of the cloths; and, their prices. Woolens were woven from very costly, fine, weak, short-fibered, curly wools, which had to be thoroughly scoured, to remove the natural lanolin, and then heavily greased with butter or olive oil in order to protect these delicate fibers from damage in the ensuing processes of combing, spinning, and weaving. To prevent these woolens from falling apart after weaving, they then had to be subjected to fulling, which was traditionally undertaken, especially in towns specializing in luxury cloth production, by two or three naked men who, for three days trod upon the cloth (about 30 meters long) in a stone trough, filled with an emulsion of hot water, fuller’s earth (floridin), and urine. That process, with the combination of pressure, heat, and chemicals, had three objectives: to remove all the grease and dirt; to force the short, curly fibers to “felt” together (i.e., to interlace and interlock), and to shrink the cloth by at least fifty percent in area. The result was a very strong, durable, heavy, densely felted fabric whose weave was no longer visible. Indeed, any traces of the weave were obliterated in the subsequent processes of napping (raising nap fibers with teasels) and shearing, which also made the cloth finish as fine and smooth as silk. Dyeing commonly took place both “in the wools,” chiefly in blue (woad, indigo), and subsequently “in the piece.”

Worsteds: Processes of Textile Production

Worsteds, in contrast, were woven from very strong, straight, coarse, long-fibered wools, which were neither scoured nor greased; nor, therefore, were worsteds fulling and thus were also not napped and shorn. They were very light (about one-quarter the weight of woolens); not particularly durable; and were either bleached or inexpensively dyed. They were, therefore, also far cheaper than were most woolens. Because the cloth-finishing processes in true woolen manufacturing were male dominated, exclusively male in fulling, we may deduce that a much higher proportion of the labor engaged in manufacturing worsteds was female.

The Pre-Finishing Processes that Women Performed: Combing, Carding, and Spinning

Some of the basic processes, in both branches of the industry, remained exclusively female until the eighteenth-century Industrial Revolution, in particular spinning, though some males can be found in the wool-preparation processes from the fifteenth century. In disentangling and preparing wools for spinning, the universal process, from ancient times, for both short- and long-fibered wools, had been combing: employing a metal device, often fixed to a post, about a foot-long, with three rows of spiked teeth, seven per rank, through which the wools were drawn. From the thirteenth century onward, however, an alternative process for preparing short fibered wools, known as carding, was introduced from the cotton industry of Muslim Spain. The twin cards were leather-encased blocks of wood through which were pierced backward bending iron hooks; and the female carder, placing a mass of wool between them, worked the cards in opposite directions to disentangle and straighten the fibers. This technique greatly increased productivity, but did not permit the production of strong, unbreakable yarns.

Spinning had a similar history. Again, from ancient times, one process was used to spin all yarns, woolen and worsted, short and long: the drop-spindle or spindle-whorl, a conically shaped rod, narrowed at both ends, made of stone, wood, or bone. By this process, the spinster placed a mass of prepared wool on a forked stick, known as the distaff, fixed into her belt. With thumb and forefinger, she teased some loose strands from the roving and attached them to the top of the spindle-whorl, and then let the spindle drop to the ground, a task that she could perform while doing other household duties. In doing so, the spindle rotated at a very high speed, thereby drafting (drawing) fibers from the roving and twisting them into yarn. The yarn, which the spinster then wound onto the bottom part of the spindle, was both very strong and yet extremely fine.

The subsequent and famed spinning wheel accompanied the wool-cards from the Muslim cotton industries, similarly spreading into western Europe from the thirteenth century. The spindle, to which the wool fibers were attached to one end, was placed as an axle between two upright supports. The spinster used the hand-spun wheel to drive a figure-eight shaped leather band that was looped around both the wheel (grooved) and the spindle-axle. That band rotated the spindle-axle at enormously high speeds, to perform the same tasks of drafting and twisting the fibers, thereby increasing productivity over two-hundred fold. The defect of this process, however, was in having to stop and reverse the wheel in order to wind the yarn onto a separate bobbin. The result was yarn that was much less fine than that produced by the drop spindle, and worse, far weaker, indeed, it was subject to frequent breakages. Consequently, in the luxury woolen industries, both carding and wheel-spinning were restricted, until about the late fifteenth century, to the production of woolen wefts, while combing and the drop-spindle continued to be required for producing warp yarns for woolens, and all yarns for worsteds.

The Revolution in Weaving: The Gender Change

The significance of the difference between these woolen warps and wefts can be best understood in analyzing the final process, the most important of all: weaving. From ancient times until the twelfth century, weaving had also been an exclusively female occupation employing the so-called warp-weighted loom, with two uprights, a top cross-bar beam from which the foundation warps were hung, and a lower beam that separated the warps, whose ends were weighted with clay, stone, or bone. It was placed against a wall (60-degree angle), allowing two female weavers, one on each side, to insert the weft yarns, attached to a stick, through alternate pairs of separated warps. Such cloths were short and narrow, and evidently used to produce only weakly woven worsteds, with very visible lozenge-shaped weaves.

From the twelfth century this loom was superseded by a far superior implement: the foot-powered horizontal loom, with two fixed but rotating beams, operated by ratcheted levers. The warp yarns were fed from the warp-beam at the rear through alternate sets of suspended heddle-hooks to the cloth-beam at the front; and the weaver used a foot-powered treadle to operate the heddles, in order to open alternating "sheds" of bundled warp yarns. The weaver passed a wooden shuttle containing the weft yarns through alternate "sheds" of warps; and finally the weaver used a wooden "sword" (spatha) to beat the weft up into the edge of the cloth, while using the lever to wind the woven fabric onto the cloth beam. This device permitted the manufacture of very strong, densely packed woolens that were not only far better woven, but also far longer, up to 30 meters. But in so tautly stretching the warps and subjecting them to so much stress, this loom required very strong, unbreakable warp yarns (i.e., those spun by drop-spindles from combed wools). Since the wefts were not subjected to the same stress, they could be produced from carded, wheel-spun wools.

Medieval iconography indicates that the earliest versions of the horizontal loom were operated by women; but when this loom evolved into the far more complicated broadloom, during the thirteenth century, weaving had become an exclusively male occupation, requiring two male weavers. Many historians have suggested that male dominance arose from the much greater physical strength required to operate this newer, heavier broadloom.

Exclusively Male Guilds in the Later-Medieval “Putting-Out” System

The true explanation, and one cogently argued by Martha Howell, lay in the changes in industrial organization that evolved when woolen cloth production became a major urban export-oriented industry. Master-weavers were now full-time industrial entrepreneurs who organized cloth production, hiring wool-beaters, combers, carders, and spinners, in a complicated, often regionally far-flung “putting-out” system, with both rural (carding, combing, spinning) and urban components (weaving and finishing). Furthermore, the master weavers also had to deal with other urban artisan-entrepreneurs in the finishing processes, and with various urban merchants: those who supplied wools and other raw materials, and those who marketed the finished woolens. Indeed, the urban weavers, fullers, dyers, and shearers, all became organized in exclusively male guilds that required the exercise of both political and military power in protecting their crafts, duties and tasks denied to almost all women in a basically patriarchal society that confined women to the home. In the putting-out system, all of the wool-preparation functions, fitting in well with a rural economy, took place within the female artisans’ own homes, thus giving rise to the alternative term the domestic system of production. Needless to say these female artisans did not enjoy any guild protection.

The Modern Industrial Revolution

The next major gender change in textile production occurred when the eighteenth-century Industrial Revolution in cotton manufacturing converted both carding and spinning from female “domestic” occupations into an exclusively male occupation using steam-powered mules within an urban factory system of production, radically reducing the costs of yarn production. The economic and social significance of that industrial transformation is revealed by the costs for those prefinishing production processes, all performed by female employees, in the Medici’s woolen-cloth firm in 1556–1558: 47.1 percent for spinning alone, another 19.8 percent for wool preparation, for a total of 66.9 percent.

JOHN H. MUNRO

References and Further Reading

- Baines, Patricia. Spinning Wheels, Spinners and Spinning. London: Batsford, 1977.
- Boone, Marc, and Walter Prevenier, eds. La draperie ancienne des Pays Bas: débouchés et stratégies de survie (14e–16e siècles)/ Drapery Production in the Late Medieval Low Countries: Markets and Strategies for Survival (14th–16th Centuries). Studies in Urban Social, Economic and Political History of the Medieval and Modern Low Countries. Leuven and Appeldorn: Garant, 1993.
- Carus-Wilson, Eleanora. “The Woollen Industry.” In The Cambridge Economic History of Europe, vol. 2. Trade and Industry in the Middle Ages, 2nd rev. ed., edited by Michael Postan and Edward Miller. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1987, pp. 630–646, 657–674.
- Chorley, Patrick. “The Evolution of the Woollen, 1300–1700.” In The New Draperies in the Low Countries and England, 1300–1800. Ed. Negley B. Harte. Pasold Studies in Textile History, Vol. 10. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1997, pp. 7–34.
- De Roover, Raymond. “A Florentine Firm of Cloth Manufacturers: Management of a Sixteenth-Century Business.” Speculum 16 (1941): 3–33. Reprinted in Business Banking, and Economic Thought in Late Medieval and Early Modern Europe: Selected Studies of Raymond De Roover, edited by Julius Kirshner. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1974, pp. 85–118.
- Harte, Negley, and Kenneth Ponting, eds. Cloth and Clothing in Medieval Europe: Essays in Memory of Professor E. M. Carus-Wilson, Pasold Studies in Textile History no. 8. London: Heinemann, 1983.
- Hoffmann, Marta. The Warp-Weighted Loom: Studies in the History and Technology of an Ancient Implement. Oslo: Universitetsforlaget, 1964.
- Howell, Martha. Women, Production, and Patriarchy in Late Medieval Cities. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1986.
- Munro, John. “Wool Price Schedules and the Qualities of English Wools in the Later Middle Ages.” Textile History 9 (1978): 118–169. Reprinted in John Munro, Textiles, Towns, and Trade: Essays in the Economic History of Late-Medieval England and the Low Countries. Variorum Collected Studies series, CS 442. London: Ashgate Publishing, 1994.
- . “Textile Technology” and “Textile Workers.” In The Dictionary of the Middle Ages, edited by Joseph Stayer, vol. XI. New York: Charles Scribner’s Sons, 1988, pp. 693–715. Reprinted in John Munro, Textiles, Towns, and Trade: Essays in the Economic History of Late-Medieval England and the Low Countries, London: Ashgate Publishing, 1994.
- . “The Symbiosis of Towns and Textiles: Urban Institutions and the Changing Fortunes of Cloth Manufacturing in the Low Countries and England, 1270–1570.” The Journal of Early Modern History: Contacts, Comparisons, Contrasts 3:1 (1999): 1–74.

- . “Medieval Woollens: Textiles, Textile Technology, and Industrial Organisation, c. 800–1500.” In The Cambridge History of Western Textiles, edited by David Jenkins. Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 2003, vol. 1: pp. 181–227.
- . “Medieval Woollens: The Western European Woollen Industries and their Struggles for International Markets, c. 1000–1500.” In The Cambridge History of Western Textiles, edited by David Jenkins. Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 2003, vol. 1: pp. 228–324, 378–386 (bibliography).
- Patterson, R. “Spinning and Weaving.” In A History of Technology, edited by Charles Singer and E. J. Holmyard, II. Oxford: Clarendon, 1956, pp. 191–200.
- Ryder, Michael. “The Origin of Spinning.” Textile History 1 (1968–1970): 73–82.
- . “Medieval Sheep and Wool Types.” Agricultural History Review 32 (1984): 14–28.
- Walton, Penelope. “Textiles.” In English Medieval Industries: Craftsmen, Techniques, Products, edited by John Blair and Nigel Ramsay. London: The Hambledon Press, 1991, pp. 319–354.
- Wild, John. Textile Manufacture in the Northern Roman Provinces. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1970.

See also Artisan Families, Women of; Clothing; Clothing for Religious Women; Clothwork, Domestic; Guild Members and Guilds; Home Manufacturing; Work

THEODORA

The empress Theodora (c. 500–548), wife of the Byzantine emperor Justinian I, was born to a modest family and married Justinian in 523 before his ascent to sole rule. She is the best known of the Byzantine empresses, largely because of the scurrilous account of her origins written by the sixth-century historian Procopius of Caesarea. Procopius’s Secret History claims Theodora was an actress and a prostitute (the two professions were virtually synonymous) in her youth, though it should be noted that this account closely conforms to similar attacks on prior Roman imperial women. Other Byzantine authors such as John of Ephesus are more positive about Theodora.

Theodora was an active supporter of heretical Monophysite Christians, sheltering from persecution a large contingent within the imperial palace. She probably built the church of Sts. Sergios and Bacchos for these Monophysite holy men, and her participation in Justinian’s patronage is inscribed on many of the key monuments of their reign, such as the Church of Hagia Sophia in Constantinople (Istanbul). She is also prominently depicted with her court entourage in a large mosaic in the apse of the Church of San Vitale, Ravenna.

The Court of Theodora, detail of Theodora and several attendants. Location: S. Vitale, Ravenna, Italy. Credit: Scala / Art Resource, N.Y.

Her role in politics is debated. Procopius suggests Theodora exerted enormous influence on Justinian, but that may again be part of the historian’s tactics to insult the emperor. Nevertheless her prominence as a patron may indicate her impact on other aspects of imperial rule. During the Nika Revolt (532), Theodora may have dissuaded Justinian from fleeing the city. She died in 548, perhaps of cancer, and Justinian’s remaining seventeen years in power were eclipsed by the accomplishments of the earlier part of his reign shared with his remarkable wife.

ANNE McCLANAN

References and Further Reading

- Brubaker, Leslie. “The Age of Justinian: Gender and Society.” In The Cambridge Companion to the Age of Justinian, edited by Michael Maas. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2005, pp. 427–447.
- McClanan, Anne. Representations of Early Byzantine Empresses: Image and Empire. New York: Palgrave, 2002.

See also Byzantium; Empresses; Byzantium

THEOLOGY

Early medieval theology in the West was dominated by the writings of the Latin Fathers, especially Augustine of Hippo and Jerome. Many theologians, including Gregory the Great, had monastic backgrounds. The strongest interest of these monks, and some nuns too, was in a theology fitting monasticism, including an emphasis on virginity. Particular attention was paid by these writers to exegesis of the Bible, especially spiritual readings of texts. Among the issues addressed were the Fall, including the role of Eve, the nature of sin, with an emphasis on asceticism and denial of bodily desires, and, in the time of Charlemagne, the legitimacy of creating religious images (the iconoclast controversy).

In the High Middle Ages, with the rise of Scholasticism in the newly established universities, patristic texts frequently were read excerpted in the glossed Bible, as topical excerpts in the Sentences of Peter Lombard or as materials related to religious discipline in the Decretum of Gratian. University-trained experts in theology and canon law, striving to reconcile conflicting texts, dominated the teaching and preaching of doctrine and morals, as well as pastoral care. In the thirteenth century they absorbed an expanded corpus of the works of Aristotle into the curriculum. These teachings affected the theologians' understanding of human nature as they dealt with problems ranging from the moral capacities of women to the Immaculate Conception of Mary. Theological ideas about women remained largely suspicious of women's perceived carnality and irrationality, while the Virgin Mary was exalted above the rest of her sex. All female archetypes (including Wisdom and Church) were conflated in her. Men were expected to be more rational than women, but still they were regarded as sinful creatures. Only Jesus was regarded by all as sinless, both fully divine and human.

Women, although frequently discussed, rarely were involved in these debates. A few, among them Hildegard of Bingen and Elisabeth of Schönau, were consulted on points of belief, devotion, or practice. (Hildegard's preaching against the Cathars upheld orthodox ideas of the goodness of the Creator.) These and other women were the sources of visions and revelations, some diffused in the vernacular. Many were guided by confessors or other male advisors into acceptable paths; and a few, like Catherine of Siena, became widely respected. Others, however, were regarded as too daring. Birgitta of Sweden was held in suspicion by Jean Gerson, and Marguerite Porete was executed for her ideas.

THOMAS IZBICKI

References and Further Reading

- Bynum, Caroline Walker. The Resurrection of the Body in Western Christianity, 200–1336. New York: Columbia University Press, 1995.
- Matter, E. Ann. The Voice of My Beloved: The Song of Songs in Western Medieval Christianity. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1990.
- Miles, Margaret Ruth. The Word Made Flesh: A History of Christian Thought. Malden, Mass.: Blackwell, 2005.
- Rubin, Miri. Corpus Christi. The Eucharist in Late Medieval Culture. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991.
- Smalley, Beryl. The Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages. Oxford: Blackwell, 1983.

See also Aristotelian Concepts of Women and Gender; Asceticism; Augustine, Influence of; Birgitta of Sweden; Catherine of Siena; Church; Elisabeth of Schönau; Eve; Gender Ideologies; Gerson, Jean; Hildegard of Bingen; Icons, Byzantine; Immaculate Conception, Doctrine of; Jerome, Influence of; Julian of Norwich; Marguerite Porete; Mary, Virgin; Monasticism and Nuns; Mysticism and Mystics; Mystics' Writings; Ordination of Women as Priests; Scholasticism; Universities

TORNABUONI DE' MEDICI, LUCREZIA

Born into an aristocratic family in Florence, Lucrezia (1427–1482) married Piero, Cosimo de' Medici's elder son, in June 1444. When, between 1464 and 1469, Piero took charge of the faction dominating republican Florence, the pious Lucrezia, "a font of charity" according to one contemporary, emerged as a focus of popular reverence (to the advantage of the Medici regime) and revealed an increasing grasp of the workings of grassroots patronal politics. This understanding she put to further use after her son, Lorenzo, assumed leadership of the family party in late 1469. Her abundant surviving correspondence reveals Lucrezia to have been a patron who, alongside her son, exercised indirect political authority and herself pursued the interests of scores of Medici clients, especially women, humble people, and the religious. Upon her death on March 25, 1482, Lorenzo wrote that his mother had been "an irreplaceable refuge," "an instrument that relieved me of many chores."

Lucrezia exercised cultural patronage by commissioning art works and cultivating poets, including Luigi Pulci. Devoted to Mary, she was herself a religious poet in the vernacular. While her sacred stories and poems cannot rival the sophisticated verse produced by her friend Angelo Poliziano and by her own son (whose muse she helped to shape), Lucrezia's able poetic explorations of the lives of “public” Biblical heroines such as Judith constituted a rare female voice, with an autobiographical register, in a city as unkind to eloquent and active women as it was generous to able men.

FRANCIS W. KENT

References and Further Reading

- Kent, Francis W. “Sainted Mother, Magnificent Son: Lucrezia Tornabuoni and Lorenzo de’ Medici.” Italian History and Culture 3 (1997): 3–34.
- Tomas, Natalie R. The Medici Women: Gender and Power in Renaissance Florence. Aldershot: Ashgate, 2003.
- Tornabuoni de’ Medici, Lucrezia. Lettere. Edited by Patrizia Salvadori. Florence: Olschki, 1993.
- . Sacred Narratives. Edited and translated by Jane Tylus. Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 2001.

See also Devotional Literature; Italy; Judith; Lay Piety; Mary, Virgin; Merchant Families, Women of; Patronage, Artistic; Patronage, Ecclesiastical; Patronage, Literary; Women Authors: Italian Texts

TOURNAMENTS

The warrior training that aristocratic men received in the twelfth century prepared them to fight and kill, but church leaders—and sometimes even the nobility themselves—argued that Christians should not kill other Christians. One solution was mock battles, or tournaments. In these exercises, in which the purpose was to disarm the opponent rather than to kill him, a skilled knight could show off his prowess and even make a profit by forcing the less successful to ransom their equipment from him. William Marshall, later regent of England, had his start on the tournament circuit. Men could still be killed in tournaments, of course, even if not intentionally. The English kings tried to limit tournaments and their violence, and for two centuries the church threatened participants with excommunication. But their popularity continued undiminished.

Women’s prescribed role in tournaments was to watch admiringly as the knights showed off their manly skills. The “Frauenturnier,” a German late thirteenth-century story of women fighting “honorably” while the men were away, was a comic fabliau, critiquing the arrangement of marriages but not realistically proposing women’s tournaments.

Late medieval tournaments became more formal and stylized. The original wide-open fighting was increasingly replaced by a series of individual combats, jousts, in which knights sought to unhorse each other with their spears. Even after the invention of cannons greatly decreased the role of cavalry in warfare, knights practiced their tournament skills and used them at great festivals and pageants.

CONSTANCE B. BOUCHARD

References and Further Reading

- Bouchard, Constance Brittain. “Strong of Body, Brave and Noble”: Chivalry and Society in Medieval France. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1998.
- Keen, Maurice. Chivalry. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1984.
- Westphal-Wihl, Sarah. “The Ladies’ Tournament: Marriage, Sex, and Honor in Thirteenth-Century Germany.” Signs 14 (1989), 371–398.

See also Arms and Armor; Chivalry; Warfare

TRANSLATION

The art of translation (or translatio) was an important phenomenon for medieval women, particularly from the twelfth century on, in terms of their patronage, their education and ability to access works of Latinate (and other) cultures, and the influence of their own written works.

Patronage

Women were among the earliest patrons of vernacular literature. Not only did they sponsor the composition of some of the first courtly romances in the vernacular, they also sought to make other texts more accessible, both to themselves and their courts, by requesting translations. Marie de Champagne, best known as patron of Chrétien de Troyes, the first writer of Arthurian romance, also sponsored two biblical translations, one of Psalm 44 from the Vulgate Bible, Eructavit cor meum (“My heart is stirred”), and the other an (incomplete) translation of the book of Genesis. In both cases, the “translation” went well beyond the bounds of what we would consider translations today, for the texts were paraphrased, heavily glossed, and contained considerable commentary by the two clerical translators. Translations of the Bible were still considered rather bold undertakings in the twelfth century, and many clerics, notably Adam de Perseigne, to whom Eructavit is sometimes attributed, believed that the laity should not confront Scripture without interpretation. Thus, both of these “translation” projects provided the gloss that the authors thought necessary for a fuller understanding of the text.

However, not all translation projects done for women were scriptural. One example of a nonscriptural work is the Voyage of Saint Brendan (sometimes characterized as a hagiographical romance), originally written in Latin by the poet Benedeit and dedicated to Queen Matilda, wife of Henry I of England. Whether she had personally commissioned the Latin text we do not know (though she did commission two other Latin works: a life of her mother, Saint Margaret of Scotland, by a monk from Durham and the history of the kings of England by William of Malmesbury). However, we do know that she later asked Benedeit to translate his work into French, which not only made it more accessible to courtiers, but also clearly added to the work's popularity. It would be so popular that in later years he would rededicate it to Henry's second wife, Adeliza, after Matilda's death.

Translations into Latin

The opposite side of the coin, and one that has thus far been less studied by scholars, is that some women writers (particularly female mystics, who, like some women patrons, may have felt less comfortable in Latin) often wrote in the vernacular. Frequently their works were then translated into Latin by others, usually clerics, in order to make them more generally accessible to clerical readers throughout Europe or to lay persons of other regions who might not know the particular vernacular in which the work was written, but who could read or understand Latin. The thirteenth-century Beguine Marguerite Porete, for example, wrote in French, but her work, the Mirror of Simple Souls, was quickly translated. Unfortunately no thirteenth-century manuscripts of the work in any language survive today; but the popularity of her work is attested by a large number of manuscripts from the fifteenth century or later, not only in her native French, but also in Latin, Italian, and English. This is rather remarkable since Church courts had ordered that all copies of her book be destroyed when she was burned at the stake for heresy in 1310. The work of another female mystic, Mechthild of Magdeberg, who wrote her Flowing Light of the Godhead in Low German about 1250, was translated into Latin soon after her death, which allowed her an audience that extended well beyond her native Germany into Switzerland and Italy and probably beyond. Similarly, the vernacular Revelations of the fourteenth-century mystic Birgitta of Sweden were translated into Latin by her various confessors, only to be retranslated some time later into Swedish. Inevitably, such translations pass through the creative filter of the translator and perhaps blunt the direct experience of the women's writing. But, had they not been preserved in Latin, some of them might have been lost to posterity. Such translations inevitably extended the fame of the author and the influence of the works beyond their original linguistic boundaries.

Women Translators

It would be wrong to leave the impression that medieval women never read or wrote in Latin. Many did, and some, like the German abbess Hildegard of Bingen, wrote prolifically in the Latin language. Others, who clearly knew the language well, played some of the most important roles in the phenomenon of translation by becoming translators themselves. As such, they took creative control over a work's interpretation as they recast it for a new audience. Throughout the Middle Ages, women, some as renowned as Christine de Pizan, served as translators. Although many no doubt remain anonymous, among the earliest female translators were the Anglo-Norman Clemence of Barking and the anonymous Nun of Barking (who may have been Clemence herself). Best known among female translators of that period, however, was Marie de France. Her language skills were clearly the equal of those of the best clerks of her day, and her work shows evidence of her knowledge of French, Latin, English, and Breton. At first she rejected the idea of doing translations from Latin to French because so many others had already done so. Instead, she chose to translate oral Breton lays that she had heard into octosyllabic verse. Her Lais remain today among the pearls of medieval literature. In her second translation project, Isopet or Fables, she marks out for herself a clear role in the process of translatio studii, the transmission of knowledge from one culture to another, noting that the works written by Aesop had been translated from Greek into Latin, then into English (in a now-lost text) by King Alfred, from which she translated them into French. In fact, most scholars believe that she worked from a Latin text, the Romulus Nilantii, at least for the first forty fables, though since we do not have Alfred's text, it is impossible to know for sure. We can perhaps best judge her skill as a translator by the octosyllabic works, based on known texts, that she most likely wrote in the 1190s, near the end of her life: the Espurgatoire seint Patriz, based on Henry of Saltrey's Tractatus on Saint Patrick's Purgatory, and the Vie seinte Audree, rendered from an anonymous life of Saint Etheldreda preserved in the Vitae Sanctorum and in the Liber Eliensis. In both cases, she created works intended to appeal to a lay audience—the simple gent or the laie gent, as she called them. Although Marie closely followed her original sources in the case of the Espurgatoire and the Audree, like all competent translators, she inevitably brought new dimensions to the works and certainly her own creativity to the process.

Whether as patrons, writers, or translators, women played an important role in the translations of textual compositions in the Middle Ages. The end result of such efforts was the gradual decline of Latin as the most vital literary language and the rise of the vernacular as a legitimate creative vehicle.

JUNE HALL McCASH

References and Further Reading

- Bassnett, Susan and André Lefevere, eds. Translation, History, and Culture. London and New York: Pinter Publishers, 1990.
- Beer, Jeanette, ed. Translation Theory and Practice in the Middle Ages. Studies in Medieval Culture 38. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Medieval Institute Publications, 1997.
- Blumenfeld-Kosinski, Renate, Duncan Robertson, and Nancy Bradley Warren, eds. The Vernacular Spirit: Essays on Medieval Religious Literature. New York: Palgrave, 2002.
- Blumenfeld-Kosinski, Renate, Luise Flotow, and Daniel Russel, eds. The Politics of Translation in the Middle Ages and the Renaissance. Ottawa: University of Ottawa Press, 2001.
- Ferrante, Joan M. To the Glory of Her Sex: Women's Roles in the Composition of Medieval Texts. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1997.
- Freeman, Michelle. "Marie de France's Poetics of Silence: The Implications for a Feminine Translatio." PMLA 99 (1984): 860–883.
- Leonard, Bonnie H. "The Inscription of a New Audience: Marie de France's Espurgatoire Saint Patriz." Romance Languages Annual 5 (1993): 57–62.
- McCASH, June Hall. "La Vie seinte Audree: A Fourth Text by Marie de France?" Speculum 77 (2002): 744–777.
- . ed. The Cultural Patronage of Medieval Women. Athens, Ga.: University of Georgia Press, 1996.
- Meale, Carol, ed. Women and Literature in Britain 1150–1500. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- Pickens, Rupert. "Transmission et translatio: mouvement textual et variance." French Forum, 23 (1998): 133–145.
- . "Marie de France, Translatrix." Le Cygne: Journal of the International Marie de France Society (2002): 7–24.
- Vauchez, André. "Lay People's Sanctity in Western Europe: Evolution of a Pattern (Twelfth and Thirteenth Centuries)." In Images of Sainthood in Medieval Europe, edited by Renate Blumenfeld-Kosinski and Timea Szell. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1991, pp. 21–32.
- Walters, Lori J. "Christine de Pizan as Translator and Voice of the Body Politic." In Christine de Pizan: A Casebook, edited by Barbara Altmann and Deborah L. McGrady. New York: Routledge, 2003, pp. 25–41.
- Weiss, Judith, Jennifer Fellows, and Morgan Dickson, eds. Medieval Insular Romance: Translation and Innovation. Cambridge, U.K.: Brewer, 2000.
- Wogan-Browne, Jocelyn. "Wreaths of Thyme: The Female Translator in Anglo-Norman Hagiography." In The Medieval Translator 4, edited by Roger Ellis and Ruth Evans. Binghamton, N.Y.: Medieval & Renaissance Texts & Studies, 1994.

See also Audience, Women in the; Beguines; Birgitta of Sweden; Christine de Pizan; Clemence of Barking; Education, Lay; Hagiography; Literacy and Reading: Latin; Literacy and Reading: Vernacular; Marguerite Porete; Marie de France; Mechthild of Magdeberg; Mysticism and Mystics; Mystics' Writings; Patronage, Literary; Women Authors: German Texts; Women Authors: Italian Texts; Women Authors: Latin Texts; Women Authors: Middle English Texts; Women Authors: Old French Texts; Women Authors: Spanish Texts

TRAVEL

See Migration and Mobility: Pilgrims and Pilgrimage

TROBAIRITZ AND TROUBADOURS

Old Occitan is unusual among medieval vernacular literatures in having a substantial body of lyric poetry written by women. These women poets were known in their own language as trobairitz, the feminine of troubadour ("one who finds, invents, or composes"). The feminine form was uncommon but not limited to a single occurrence, as has been believed; it occurs once in the thirteenth-century romance of Flamenca, where a serving lady playfully suggests that her mistress is a trobairitz, and again in a grammar.

The assessment of the reality of the trobairitz depends on manuscript attributions and the poems themselves. The manuscripts attribute poems to nineteen women by name. Each one is credited with a single song except for two more major figures: the Comtessa de Dia, with four songs, and Castelloza, with three and a possible fourth that is anonymous in the manuscript. One song is a dialogue between two women (Almuc de Castelnou and Iseut de Capiro), and another involves three women in conversation (Alais, Iselda, and Carezza, assuming that "Alaisina Iselda" is not one person). The number of songs attributed to named trobairitz by the manuscripts is twenty-one. Two more trobairitz, Alamanda and Felipa, figure by name in the texts of dialogues that are attributed by the manuscripts only to their male interlocutors. In addition, a number of songs, mostly dialogues, involve a female voice identified only as a domna ("lady"). If these domnas were real poets they may have preferred to remain anonymous out of discretion. This hypothesis is strengthened by the example of Domna H., so named in the manuscript that attributes a dialogue to her and a little-known troubadour. Since an anonymous domna may have composed more than one song with the same anonymity, we cannot know how many such trobairitz are concealed behind the term. Other poems use donzela (“young domna”) or midons (“my lady”) in the same way, and there are also anonymous songs that use no such term but speak in the voice of a lady who remains anonymous. If all these trobairitz were real, they may have left as many as fifty songs.

In recent years scholars have become more willing to acknowledge the reality of the trobairitz. The radical view once expressed by Jean-Charles Huchet and echoed by the historian Georges Duby, who claimed that there were no real trobairitz at all because medieval gender roles would not have allowed it, is now dismissed by most scholars as willful disregard of the manuscript evidence. Among the named trobairitz, Bietris de Romans has attracted attention because the poem attributed to her reads exactly like a love song by a troubadour. If the author was a man, the poem is conventional; but if the author was a woman, as the manuscript says, the poem appears to be an expression of lesbian desire unique in Old Occitan and unusual in medieval poetry. Alamanda is named within a dialogue with the troubadour Giraut de Bornelh, but the manuscripts attribute the poem to him alone. It is possible that Alamanda is a fictional character with a name, and not a real poet, but scholars lean increasingly toward the latter view. The case of Felipa is similar.

The importance of the trobairitz to our understanding of desire in this poetry far outweighs the number of their preserved songs. That number is modest compared to the total corpus, about 2,500 compositions written in the twelfth, the thirteenth, and the early fourteenth centuries. They are distributed chronologically as a bell curve peaking in the years around 1200, and higher in the years following than in those preceding. The corpus of fifty poems that may have been written by trobairitz is distributed similarly. Most of them were probably written in the forty years around 1200; only three were surely written earlier, and none in the early twelfth century; more were written later.

The system of Old Occitan lyric genres developed from degree zero in the earliest troubadours into an elaborate structure of more than twenty poetic types in fourteenth-century poetic treatises. The earliest poem by a named trobairitz, Azalais de Porcairagues, has been misread as a blend of two genres, the love song and funeral lament; however, since the genres had not yet taken shape, it should be read as a less conventional and more personal expression of the poet’s grief at the death of the troubadour Raimbaut d’Aurenga, in 1173, and her love for another man. The most famous trobairitz poems are love songs (cansos), fourteen in all, foremost among them those by the Comtessa de Dia and Castelloza. We have as many dialogues (tensos), some of which have often been regarded as the work of troubadours who invented anonymous female interlocutors. There are also partimens, in which one poet proposes alternative positions on some question in amorous casuistry, another poet picks one of them, and they debate; coblas, or incidental stanzas; and sirventes, or satires. One satire, by Gormonda of Montpellier, is a scathing rebuttal of an attack on Rome by Guilhem Figueira, whom Gormonda curses as a heretic. We have two versified love letters, one dawn song (alba), and one funeral lament (planh), perhaps for the poet’s husband.

In a poetry dedicated above all to the theme of love and overwhelmingly represented by male poets, the trobairitz add the essential component of the women’s point of view. If it were not for the trobairitz we might believe that the troubadours really loved cold, distant ladies; but the trobairitz sang as passionately as the men, and they found their lovers cold and distant too, so the coldness appears to be an element in art, not reality. This poetry is a precursor of the blues. More generally, the trobairitz show that despite social constraints, women were not absent from the literary scene, not passive, and not silent, but contributed vigorously to poetry in many forms.

WILLIAM D. PADEN

References and Further Reading

- Chants d’amour des femmes-troubadours*, edited by Pierre Bec. Paris: Stock, 1995.
- Medieval Lyric: Genres in Historical Context*, edited by William D. Paden. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2000.
- Poe, Elizabeth W. “Cantairitz e trobairitz: A Forgotten Attestation of Old Provençal Trobairitz.” Romanische Forschungen 114 (2002): 206–215.
- Songs of the Women Troubadours*, edited by Matilda Tomaryn Bruckner, Laurie Shepard, and Sarah White. New York: Garland, 1995.
- Trobairitz: Der Beitrag der Frau in der altokzitanischen höfischen Lyrik. Edition des Gesamtkorpus*, edited by Angelica Rieger. Tübingen: Niemeyer, 1991.
- The Voice of the Trobairitz: Perspectives on the Women Troubadours*, edited by William D. Paden. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1989.

See also Literature, Occitan; Trouvères, Women; Woman’s Song; Voice, Female: in Literature

TROTA OF SALERNO

Trota (or, as her name would have been spelled in southern Italy, Trocta) was a medical practitioner in twelfth-century Salerno, a coastal town south of Naples. Although southern Italy was controlled at that time by Normans, Trota herself was probably a Lombard woman. She wrote (or dictated) a general collection of her cures. Called the Practica (“handbook of medical practice”), this work shows that Trota's expertise was expansive, covering a variety of medical fields from gynecology to eye diseases and stomach conditions. The Practica survives as an independent text in only two manuscripts, though excerpts were also incorporated into a massive compendium of Salernitan writings composed around 1200. It is clear that other women were practicing medicine at Salerno: writers refer to them generically as mulieres Salernitane, the "women of Salerno." Yet Trota stands out as the only Salernitan woman who is known to have composed a written text.

Comparison of Trota's work with that of contemporary Salernitan male practitioners shows certain notable differences. Trota did not engage in any theoretical speculation about the causes of disease, whereas engagement with theory was the most defining characteristic of her male contemporaries. Although imported substances like cinnamon and nutmeg appear occasionally in her remedies, she tended primarily to use locally available ingredients; contemporary male practitioners, in contrast, more regularly employed newer ingredients (like sugar) that had recently become available with the reconquest of Muslim Sicily. Most importantly, Trota practiced a "hands-on" gynecology: she can touch and manipulate her female patients' bodies in a way that no male practitioner ever did.

It was apparently Trota's particular expertise in women's medicine (which, in her definition, included gynecology, obstetrics, and cosmetics) that induced someone (apparently from England, to judge from their use of some English synonyms) to write down her practices in a text called Treatments for Women (De curis mulierum). Here we find a slight overlay of theory and allusions to some of the practices of her male contemporaries. By the end of the twelfth century, Treatments for Women would serve as the core onto which two other Salernitan texts were fused: the anonymous Conditions of Women and Women's Cosmetics, both of which were probably male-authored. Originally called the Trotula (meaning "little Trota" or perhaps "the abbreviated Trota"), the ensemble circulated widely throughout all of western Europe, proving to be the most popular work on women's medicine for the following three centuries. "Trotula" was soon misunderstood as the author's name and so "she" was credited with the whole ensemble of texts. "Trotula" developed a reputation as an authority on "women's secrets," a reputation that turned negative when Chaucer placed her next to the equally suspect Heloise in Jankyn's Book of Wicked Wives (Canterbury Tales, Wife of Bath's Tale).

Although the Trotula was published multiple times in the sixteenth century, humanist scholars came to believe that the work was actually of ancient origin, written by a man. The theory of ancient origin was ultimately abandoned, yet doubt about "Trotula's" existence as a female author persisted. In the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, "she" was bandied back and forth by various factions who either wanted to celebrate her as the "first woman professor of medicine" or dismiss her as a pornographic joke on the thought that her name must mean that she "trotted around." Recognition of the three-text origin of the Trotula and discovery of Trota's original Practica occurred in the 1980s, but her authorship of Treatments for Women was confirmed only in the 1990s. Additional research on female medical practitioners has allowed us to gain a better appreciation both for Trota's accomplishments and for the constraints that kept other medieval women from venturing into medical writing.

MONICA H. GREEN

References and Further Reading

- Green, Monica H. "'Traittié tout de mençonges': The Secrès des dames, 'Trotula,' and Attitudes towards Women's Medicine in Fourteenth- and Early Fifteenth-Century France." In Christine de Pizan and the Categories of Difference, edited by Marilyn Desmond. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1998, pp. 146–178. Repr. in Green, Women's Healthcare in the Medieval West: Texts and Contexts. Aldershot: Ashgate, 2000, essay VI.
- . "In Search of an 'Authentic' Women's Medicine: The Strange Fates of Trota of Salerno and Hildegard of Bingen." Dynamis: Acta Hispanica ad Medicinae Scientiarumque Historiam Illustrandam 19 (1999): 25–54.
- , ed. and trans. The 'Trotula': A Medieval Compendium of Women's Medicine. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001.

See also Cosmetics; Doctors and Healers; Gynecology; Secrets of Women

Trousseau

Trousseau refers to a "bundle" of portable and displayable items, including personal clothing and accessories, bedclothes, utensils, and furniture that a bride brings to the marital household. A trousseau was an essential accompaniment of marriage in the Middle Ages. A bridal trousseau assembled by an elite family included valuables, such as expensive jewelry and brocades, and served as an index of a family's position in the social hierarchy. Among peasants and commoners, a trousseau regularly amounted to a substantial share of what the bride stood to inherit from her family. Even when the trousseau was prepared by the bride and her mother, the responsibility for providing the raw materials as well as ready-made items fell primarily on the bride's father and secondarily on her brothers and other relatives.

Parapherna

Following Roman law, medieval jurists differentiated a dowry from a trousseau. The dowry was conveyed by the bride's family to the son-in-law as a fund to support the new household. During marriage, ownership and control of the dowry with its fruits were exercised by the husband. Parapherna, a Greek term meaning "items beyond the dowry," was the juridical designation for the trousseau. In a fourteenth-century Italian legal opinion, parapherna was defined as "those movable goods which a wife brings to the husband's household especially for her own use and the common use of herself and her husband" (Kirshner, 185). The vernacular designations for parapherna in dowry instruments and family records varied. Corredo was the most common designation. It was employed in Florence in the fourteenth century, and was gradually supplanted by the designation donora. Parapherna was used in Milan, and in southern Italy, where marital property regimes continued to be influenced by Greek and Roman customs and law.

Trousseau and Dowry

In principle, ownership and control of parapherna were reserved to the wife during marriage; the husband was prohibited from managing parapherna against his wife's wishes. It was common, however, for the wife to allow the husband to manage parapherna. Categorical distinctions etched in legal writings between trousseau and dowry did not square with actual practice, because the trousseau counted as part of the dowry throughout Europe and the Mediterranean. In addition, this practice was sanctioned by local statutes and customs, which, diverging from Roman law, granted husbands control over parapherna.

The conflation of trousseau and dowry, for example, was customary in the Jewish communities of eleventh-century Jerusalem and twelfth-century Cairo. The thirty-one items listed in a Kariate marriage contract from Jerusalem, dating from 1028, were divided into three categories: (1) gold jewelry, (2) wearing apparel, and (3) copper utensils and containers, and bedding. Wearing apparel amounted to approximately half the total value of sixty-one dinars.

Goitein's description (314–317) of these items as a trousseau fits conventional meanings. Yet the husband formally acknowledged that all the items "were now in his possession and under his hand; and that he had undertaken to keep them as if they were his own" (316).

In fifteenth-century Avignon, a weaver received from his wife a dowry consisting of twenty-four livres, plus "a culcitra (a mattress), a feather pillow, bed blanket, sixteen bed sheets, sixteen table cloths, and three new garments" (Girard, 488). Girard calls these items a trousseau, which they were, but in the document he cites there is no mention of a trousseau: all the items were consigned to the husband as a dowry. In northern and central Italy, the corredo and donora were almost invariably treated as part of the dowry. In England, the bride's trousseau "became the property of her husband, since under common law all the bride's movable goods, or chattels, became the groom's property after marriage" (Fleming, 37).

Between the mid-fourteenth and early sixteenth centuries, Florentine donora typically consisted on average of about eleven percent of the total amount of the dowry (Klapisch-Zuber, 216). In Venice, the corredo was treated as distinct from the dowry, and from the late fourteenth century onward often equaled from a third to half the dowry. Venetian husbands demanded full control of the corredo, without the legal restrictions encumbering dowries. Increasingly, the Venetian corredo was transformed from a traditional trousseau into a substantial cash payment to the groom (Chojnacki, 83ff).

Trousseau and Consumption

Within the upper reaches of society in late medieval Europe, the traditional trousseaux of everyday personal belongings and household goods gave way to self-aggrandizing displays of conspicuous consumption. City governments and church officials acted to suppress lavish trousseaux and dowries, but in vain. Sumptuary laws limiting the value of trousseaux were sporadically enforced, and flouted by families whose social reputation was advanced by large dowries and sumptuous trousseaux.

One means of circumventing the legislated limits on the value of the corredo or donora was to leave part of the trousseau unappraised (non stimate). It was in the interest of wives to have the trousseau formally inventoried and appraised in cash (stimate), usually by clothes dealers, before it was brought to the marital household. The cash valuation protected wives by shifting the risk of damage and loss to the husband and by preventing him and his heirs from later claiming that the trousseau was worth less than the agreed-upon value. The husband had the right to elect, upon his predecease, the return to his wife of the specific items in the corredo he had actually received or a cash payment of the appraised value. On the other hand, the husband was obligated to restore to his wife the very goods comprising the unappraised corredo. Families who wished to evade sumptuary laws could, and did, resort to giving unappraised goods. By deflating the legal valuation of the total dowry, this tactic also served to decrease the contract tax on dowries payable by new husbands (Frick, 135–136).

Cassoni

The painted wedding chests (cassoni) in which the trousseaux of Florentine brides were conveyed to their new husbands, customarily on the day of the wedding or immediately after, have attracted considerable scholarly attention. Given as donora, a richly decorated cassone represented a valuable component of the dowry. Cassone painters, like Apollonio di Giovanni (d. 1465), illustrated scenes from the Old Testament, Homer's Odyssey, Virgil's Aeneid, Boccaccio's Amorous Vision and Concerning Famous Women, and Petrarch's Triumph of Chastity, Triumph of Fame, and Triumph of Love. Exemplars of female subservience and humility, including Solomon's bride, the Queen of Sheba, holding "her left hand over her heart in a gesture of submission" (Callmann, 43) and Boccaccio's Griselda, "rewarded" by her monstrous husband for passively enabling and enduring his degrading abuse, defined the hierarchical relationship between older husbands and teenage brides. Cassone favorites—Dido, the queen of Carthage, and the Roman matron Lucrezia—were admired for their valor and courage and ultimate sacrifice of suicide on behalf of their people. On the cassone panels, the mythic Amazons, fierce warriors and male killers, beautiful and celibate, were forced to succumb to marriage and domesticity, deprived of any memory of having lived transgressively.

JULIUS KIRSHNER

References and Further Reading

- Baskins, Cristelle L. Cassone Painting, Humanism, and Gender in Early Modern Italy. Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1998.
- Callmann, Ellen. Apollonio di Giovanni. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1974.
- Chojnacki, Stanley. "From Trousseau to Groomgift." In Women and Men in Renaissance Venice: Twelve Essays on Patrician Society. Baltimore and London: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2000, pp. 76–94.
- Fine, Agnès. "A Consideration of the Trousseau: A Feminine Culture?" In Writing Women's History, edited by Michelle Perrot and translated by Felicia Pheasant. Oxford: Blackwell, 1992, pp. 118–145.
- Fleming, Peter. Family and Household in Medieval England. Basingstoke, Hampshire and New York: Palgrave, 2001.
- Frick, Carole Collier. Dressing Renaissance Florence. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2002.
- Girard, René. "Marriage in Avignon in the Second Half of the Fifteenth Century." Speculum 28 (1953): 485–498.
- Goitein, S. D. A Mediterranean Society: The Jewish Communities of the Arab World as Portrayed in the Documents of Cairo Geniza, Vol. 4: Daily Life. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1983.
- Kirshner, Julius. "Materials for a Gilded Cage: Non Dotal Assets in Florence, 1300–1500." In The Family in Italy from Antiquity to the Present, edited by David Kertzer and Richard Saller. New Haven and London: 1991, pp. 184–207.
- Klapisch-Zuber, Christiane. "Les corbeilles de la mariée." In La maison et le nom Stratégies et rituels dans l'Italie del la Renaissance. Paris: École des Hautes Études en Sciences Sociales, 1990, pp. 215–227.
- See also Betrothals; Boccaccio, Giovanni; Clothing; Dowry and Other Marriage Gifts; Griselda; Jewelry; Jewish Women; Law, Roman; Marriage, Christian; Petrarch; Roman Law*

TROUVÈRES, WOMEN

The women trouvères, or troveresses, were poet-musicians whose lyrics were performed for courtly audiences and at popular festivities throughout northern France in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. There is ample evidence in literature, iconography, and historical documents that women at all levels of society were active as singers, composers, and poets. They participated in the creation and performance of songs in a variety of genres and forms—including monophonic chansons, refrain songs associated with dancing (such as ballettes, virelais, and rondets de carole), lyric debates, and motets in two, three, or four voices—and in a variety of circumstances, both for public and private enjoyment. Interestingly, women sang songs in which the lyric subject could be either masculine or feminine, that is, the gender of the singer did not always correspond to that of the song's lyric subject. Once neglected in favor of the trobairitz, their southern counterparts, writing in Occitan, the troveresses are gaining recognition as contributors of a distinctive, specifically feminine perspective within old French lyric.

We know of eight named troveresses. Blanche of Castile (1188–1252), wife of Louis VIII of France and mother of Louis IX (Saint Louis), authored a chanson à la Vierge (or Marian song), "Amours, u trop tart me sui pris” (Love, to which I have been drawn so late). Two songs—“Par maintes fois avrai esteit requise” (Many a time I have been asked), a lament occasioned by the loss of her beloved, and “Un petit davant lou jor” (Just before daybreak), which stages the dialogue between a knight and his lady, who is confined in a high tower by her jealous husband, are ascribed to one “Duchesse de Lorraine,” most likely Marguerite de Champagne (married in 1255 to Ferri III, Duke of Lorraine), the daughter of Thibaut IV de Champagne, one of the most illustrious trouvères. The names of Maroie de Diergnau de Lille, the Dame de Gosnai, the Dame de la Chaucie, Lorete, Dame Margot, and Sainte des Prez are recorded in the rubrics or tables of contents of various manuscripts or inscribed within lyric debates. There were undoubtedly many more women composers, and, whereas their names are lost to us, some of their songs are arguably still extant, though bereft of proper attribution.

Many of the genres and forms typical of twelfth- and thirteenth-century trouvère poetry were practiced by the troveresses, in particular the grans chans (courtly love songs that exploit the vocabulary, metaphors, and motifs associated with fin’amors, the true, perfect, refined love elaborated by the troubadours), the jeu-parti and tenson (lyric debates regarding a point of courtly casuistry, favored by thirteenth-century urban poets), the plainte (death-lament), the aube (erotic dawn song), the chanson de croisade (crusade lyric), and the chanson pieuse (nonliturgical devotional song).

Although the songs that can be attributed with relative certainty to historical women are not numerous, there is a large body of lyrics, mostly anonymous, that gives voice to women and may well have been composed by them; this lyric type, known as chansons de femme (or women’s songs), includes several more or less clearly defined genres. In the chanson d’ami, an apparently unmarried woman avows her love and yearns for her lover. She either feels the urge to love—in keeping with the season, her youth, and her charm—or expresses her sorrow and despair over her sweetheart’s absence, sometimes blaming herself for having rebuffed him. She cannot be dissuaded from loving, despite the opposition of her parents and the threat posed by detractors: slanderers, flatterers, and gossip-mongers. The unhappy, frustrated wife heard in the chanson de malmariée bewails her fate at the hands of a husband (whom she calls a vilain, or boorish lout) who often holds her captive and who is old, ugly, jealous, occasionally impotent, and even brutal. She either longs for compensation or has already exacted satisfaction by taking a lover who possesses all the attributes lacking in the husband she despises: her ami is young, handsome, refined, cheerful, and ardent in love. A variant of the chanson de malmariée, the chanson de nonne, portrays a young nun cloistered against her will, who laments her confinement—pointing an accusatory finger at those who have sentenced her to the convent—and longs for a lover who will liberate her.

Many of the songs of the troveresses survive with music, including six of the thirteen lyric debates featuring women interlocutors. Two songbooks of Lorraine provenance preserve most of the jeux-partis and chansons with a feminine voice, which may be indicative of a regional predilection for poetry attributable to women.

EGLAL DOSS-QUINBY

References and Further Reading

- Doss-Quinby, Eglal. “Rolan, de ceu ke m’avez / Parti dirai mon semblant: The Feminine Voice in the Old French jeu-parti.” Neophilologus 83 (1999): 497–516.
- Doss-Quinby, Eglal, Joan Tasker Grimbert, Wendy Pfeffer, and Elizabeth Aubrey, eds. and trans. Songs of the Women Trouvères. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 2001.
- Grimbert, Joan Tasker. “Diminishing the Trobairitz, Excluding the Women Trouvères.” Tenso 14 (1999): 23–38.
- . “Songs by Women and Women’s Songs: How Useful Is the Concept of Register?” In The Court Reconvenes: Courtly Literature across the Disciplines, edited by Barbara Altmann and Carleton Carroll. Cambridge: D. S. Brewer, 2003, pp. 117–124.
- Pfeffer, Wendy. “Complaints of Women, Complaints by Women: Can One Tell Them Apart?” In The Court Reconvenes: Courtly Literature across the Disciplines, edited by Barbara Altmann and Carleton Carroll. Cambridge: D. S. Brewer, 2003, pp. 125–131.
- . “Constant Sorrow: Emotions and the Women Trouvères.” In The Representation of Women’s Emotions in Medieval and Early Modern Culture, edited by Lisa Perfetti. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 2005, pp. 119–132.
- Tyssens, Madeleine. “Voix de femmes dans la lyrique d’oïl.” In Femmes, mariages-lignages, XII<sup>e</sup>–XIV<sup>e</sup> siècles: Mélanges offerts à Georges Duby. Brussels: De Boeck Université, 1992, pp. 373–387.

See also Blanche of Castile; Courtly Love; Dawn Song (Alba); Literature, Old French; Trobairitz and Troubadours; Voice, Female: in Literature; Woman’s Song

TYOLOGY AND WOMEN

Typology is an interpretive method initiated by Jews in the Old Testament and continued by Jesus and his followers in the New Testament. The actions of certain Old Testament persons are thus interpreted as prefiguring the actions of the Messiah. Typology was a staple of medieval biblical interpretation. Generally types are sexually consonant, so that a man prefigures a man and a woman prefigures either a woman or an abstract idea represented by a noun of feminine gender. Within the Old Testament only Jewish men, such as Moses, had prefigured the Messiah. For Christians, biblical women were frequently types prefiguring Mary, the Mother of God, and the Church, Ecclesia.

Strikingly, Christians in the first century AD also invented a new strand of typology: women as types of Christ. Jesus's emphasis on the spiritual equality of the sexes and his innovation of presenting himself as a type for his followers to imitate added a new dimension to prophetic types: In addition to prefiguring Christ, the types were also reminders that each human person was to be Christ-like. It was possible, even necessary, to recognize Gentiles (such as Melchisedek) and women as types of Christ, as an expression of the belief that the Christian vocation to holiness was universal. Such typologies were found in both the East and the West across centuries.

Historically the first woman to be interpreted as a type of Christ was Susanna, whose history (Daniel 13) served as the narrative template for the synoptic Passion narratives. From the Gospels onward she was a well-known type of Christ. Between 450 and 1500 she was depicted as a type of Christ in Gethsemane and as a type of Christ at his trial in medieval illustrated manuscripts (Biblia Pauperum) and in stained glass, bas reliefs, and frescoes in churches. Commentaries and sermons treated and further developed her typology.

Jephthah's daughter, like Isaac, was an only-begotten, beloved child whose father was willing to sacrifice her to fulfill a vow to God. Both Jewish and Christian tradition condemn Jephthah's rash vow and praise his daughter's courage and faith. By the third century she and Isaac became a pair of Christian types of Christ, the only-begotten, beloved Son who was sacrificed. As such, this young woman and Isaac are depicted next to the altar in churches at Mount Sinai (fifth century) and at the Red Sea (twelfth century). Dionysius bar Salibi (twelfth century) provides the fullest commentary of her as a type of Christ. Her frequent appearance in western manuscripts is at least sometimes typological.

The Jewish interpretation of Ruth, an ancestress of Jesus, as a type of the Messiah (Ruth Rabbah, fifth century) may show influence from Christianity.

Esther, like Susanna, was included in the Lectionary because she is a type of Christ, as Rupert of Deutz explains (Liber de divinis officiis 4:15). Judith beheading Holofernes and David beheading Goliath were types of Christ defeating the Devil through the Crucifixion. In the illustrated manuscripts of the Leven van Jezus Judith entering Bethulia triumphantly with Holofernes' head is a type of Christ entering Jerusalem. The Widow of Zarephath carrying crossed sticks (3 Kings 17) was depicted as a type of Christ carrying the Cross on numerous liturgical vessels, crosses, and altars in northern Europe, especially in the twelfth through fourteenth centuries; she also had been included from the start in the Lectionary.

From the New Testament, Jairus's daughter was a type of Christ in his Resurrection, and, especially in the East, the woman in the parable who finds the lost coin was presented in sermons and hymns as a type of Christ finding and rescuing lost humanity. Annemarie Weyl Carr suggests that Mary Magdalen wiping Christ's feet with her hair was a type of Christ washing the disciples' feet in the illustrations of a twelfth-century Gospel Book in Kiev; if this is correct, it is likely that this pair of depictions is typological elsewhere, as in the sanctuary paintings at Aght'amar in Armenia.

The demographic range of these women is significant: virgins, married women, and widows were recognized as types of Christ. As with male types of Christ, their characters and actions made them suitable prefigurations of Christ. Significantly, although women were interpreted as types of Christ in every aspect of his Passion, no one, including such writers as Herrad of Hohenbourg and Catherine of Siena, ever chose to compose a text or iconographic program presenting the Passion entirely through female types. Their typology was known—in the case of Susanna at least, quite well known—until the Reformation suppressed images and restricted typology.

CATHERINE TKACZ

References and Further Reading

- Abecassis, Deborah. "Jephthah's Daughter in the Jewish Exegetical Tradition." Master's thesis, McGill University, 1993.
- Carr, Annemarie Weyl. Byzantine Illumination, 1150–1250: The Provincial Tradition. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1987.
- Tkacz, Catherine Brown. "Susanna as a Type of Christ." Studies in Iconography 21 (1999): 101–153.
- . "Women as Types of Christ: Susanna and Jephthah's Daughter." Gregorianum 85 (2004): 281–314.
- . "The Doctrinal Context for Interpreting Women as Types of Christ." Studia Patristica Forthcoming, pp. 37–41.

See also Bible, Women in; Judith; Mary Magdalen; Personifications Visualized as Women

U

---

UNICORN

The unicorn is a mythical one-horned beast widely believed to be real during the Middle Ages. Unicorn horn (actually the tusk of the narwhal, a large Arctic sea mammal), was highly prized for its reputed power to detect and neutralize poison. It was made into drinking cups or ground into a powder that could be added to food or drink suspected to contain poison.

During the Middle Ages, this horse-like creature symbolized a number of different and often contradictory subjects and characteristics, both religious and secular. Fierce, bold, and courageous, the invincible unicorn was also associated with chastity and humility, and was thus both a symbol of Christ and of ideal knighthood. Accordingly, the unicorn became a favourite heraldic emblem of royalty.

The most popular story described the only way to tame and capture the unicorn. A virgin was left alone in the forest. Drawn by the scent of her purity, the unicorn would put his head in her lap and fall asleep, allowing hunters to capture or kill him. Often depicted in medieval art and literature, this story came to represent both secular themes of courtly love and the seductive powers of female sexuality, as well as the Christian stories of the Annunciation and Incarnation.

The most famous known artistic representations of the unicorn are the two late fifteenth-/early sixteenth-century sets of tapestries housed in the Musée de Cluny, Paris, and the Cloisters, Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York City. The meanings of both sets of tapestries have been the subjects of various interpretations for the past two centuries.

KRISTI GOURLAY

References and Further Reading

Freeman, Margaret B. The Unicorn Tapestries. New York, 1976.

Gourlay, K. "La Dame à la Licorne: A Reinterpretation." Gazette des Beaux-Arts (1997): 47–72.

———. "The Malterer Embroidery: Representations of the Power of Young Female Sexuality." In Young Medieval Women, edited by Katherine Lewis, Noël James Menuge, and Kim Phillips. Phoenix Mill: Sutton Publishing Limited, 1999, pp. 69–102.

See also Courtly Love; Virginity

UNIVERSITIES

From their origins in the twelfth century, medieval universities were masculine, clerical institutions. Most students were in minor orders, and many were monks or priests, though the Italian universities admitted more lay students and the many new universities founded in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries educated aristocrats who did not intend a career in the church, as well as those who did. Teachers, too, were mainly clergy, although in faculties other than theology there were occasionally married masters (as well as students). Many students had few licit occasions to come into contact with women. Many college statutes prohibited women servants, or at least young ones. Students who lived not in colleges but in boarding-houses dealt with landladies, and students would have also met female shopkeepers and barmaids or prostitutes. Masters and university officials would have had occasion to meet wealthy women donors.

The classroom experience, however, remained masculine. Authors like John of Salisbury and Peter Abelard, who wrote in the twelfth century, likened the battles of words that occurred in academic disputations to clashes of arms, a very masculine image. The content of university teaching, too, excluded women. From the thirteenth century on much of the curriculum was based on Aristotle, who held that women were inferior and intellectually incapable.

The dominance of the universities in the intellectual life of thirteenth-century Europe marked a change in women's participation in that life. When the monastery was the locus of intellectual creativity, both male and female monastics had participated, and a woman like Hildegard of Bingen could be a leading scholar. But already in Hildegard's twelfth century the signs of female exclusion were appearing. Heloise was reputed to be one of the wisest women in Europe, but she had to be tutored privately rather than attend lectures, and her only known works are the letters she wrote to her husband Peter Abelard. The women authors of the thirteenth to fifteenth centuries tended to be mystics, relying on personal experience rather than scholarship, and many (though not all) writing in the vernacular rather than the Latin of the universities.

Not only scholarship but also the daily life of students was affected by the masculine nature of the university experience. Students might enter the universities as young as fourteen, and often had to undergo hazing analogous to that found in modern fraternities. The Manuale Scholarium, a handbook of Latin for fifteenth-century German students, includes a dialogue about an initiation ritual called the depositio cornuum or removal of the horns, in which taming the initiate as a wild beast is connected with cleansing him of femininity. This ritual involved a great deal of drinking, as did student life generally. Perhaps not unrelated to their alcohol consumption, student gangs were frequently accused of rape and other crimes against the townspeople. Some evidence survives for homosexual relations among members of the universities.

There are stories of women who attended the universities in disguise, for example one in the fifteenth century who attended the University of Kraków dressed as a man. Christine de Pizan tells of Novella d'Andrea, the daughter of an eminent jurist, who supposedly substituted for her father when he was unavailable to give his lectures in law at the University of Bologna, but did so from behind a curtain so that the sight of her face would not distract the students. Even if true, however, these are exceptions. University statutes did not explicitly prohibit women from participation; they did not have to, because it was simply assumed that women would not.

Universities attempted to maintain a monopoly on the learned professions, which meant that women could not enter. In Paris in 1322, the medical faculty attempted to have the midwife Jacoba Felicie condemned for practicing medicine without a license. Her patients testified as to the efficacy of her treatment, but the doctors argued that she did not have the proper academic knowledge to treat patients, although she used the same methods as they did.

Although a very small proportion of the population attended universities—the largest admitted four to five hundred students a year, the smallest more like fifty, and most were from the social elite—university graduates (and even students who never attained a degree) were disproportionately influential in later medieval Europe, where they dominated the legal and medical professions, as well as the church. Exclusionary practices as well as teachings on the inferiority of women thus had an impact throughout society.

RUTH MAZO KARRAS

References and Further Reading

- Allen, Prudence. The Concept of Woman: The Aristotelian Revolution, 750 BC–AD 1250. Montreal: Eden Press, 1985.
- De Ridder-Symoens, Hilde, ed. Universities in the Middle Ages. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1992.
- Karras, Ruth Mazo. From Boys to Men: Formations of Masculinity in Late Medieval Europe. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2003.
- The Manuale Scholarium: An Original Account of Life in the Mediaeval University*, translated by Francis Seybolt. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1921.
- Shank, Michael. "A Female University Student in Late Medieval Kraków." Signs: Journal of Women in Culture and Society 12 (1987), 373–380.
- Thorndike, Lynn, ed. University Records and Life in the Middle Ages. Records of Civilization, 38. New York: Columbia University Press, 1944.

See also Aristotelian Concepts of Women and Gender; Christine de Pizan; Education, Lay; Education, Monastic; Heloise; Hildegard of Bingen; Literacy and Reading; Latin; Scholasticism

URRACA

Born to Alfonso VI and his second wife Constance of Burgundy (d. 1093), Urraca (c. 1080–1126) ascended the throne upon her father's death in 1109. Previously she and her first husband, Count Raymond of Burgundy (d. 1107), had ruled over the region of Galicia. They had two children, Sancha (c. 1095–1159), and Alfonso (1105–1157), who would reign after Urraca as Alfonso VII.

As reigning queen of León-Castile, Urraca married Alfonso I, king of Aragón, in 1109, but it was not a successful union. The couple separated within three years, although neither married again. Each battled the other for full control over the Christian kingdoms of Iberia, but neither was strong enough to prevail. In 1117, they agreed to a truce that was renewed every three years until Urraca's death in childbirth in 1126.

Urraca ruled successfully over the core lands inherited from her father, but she was not able to extend the territory. By repeatedly reminding her court and subjects that she was her father's named heir, Urraca was able to maintain her precarious place on the throne. She took a favorite from among the Castilian nobility, Count Pedro González de Lara, with whom she had two children who survived infancy, Elvira (born c. 1112) and Fernando (born c. 1118). In the early modern period, her liaison with Count Pedro would be turned into a reputation for wantonness, so that Urraca is today more often remembered for moral laxity rather than for her political astuteness.

One of Urraca's strategies appears to have been patronage of the Romanesque basilica of San Isidoro in León, turning what had been her family's private palace chapel into a pilgrimage church open to the public. Through artistic patronage, the queen created a permanent and highly visible reminder of her place in the dynasty of León-Castilla. However, it was only her capable handling of political strategies that allowed a woman to rule in the Middle Ages. Some 220 documents surviving from her reign were ably studied by Bernard F. Reilly.

THERESE MARTIN

References and Further Reading

- Marquez de la Plata, Vicenta, and Luis Valero de Bernabé. Reinas medievales españolas. Madrid: Alderaban, 2000, pp. 117–133.
- Martin, Therese. "The Art of a Reigning Queen as Dynastic Propaganda in Twelfth-Century Spain." Speculum 80 (2005): 1134–1171.
- . "De 'gran prudencia, graciosa habla y elocuencia' a 'mujer de poco juicio y ruin opinion': Recuperando la historia perdida de la reina Urraca (1109–1126)." Compostellanum 50 (2005): 551–578.
- . Queen as King: Politics and Architectural Propaganda in Twelfth-Century Spain. Leiden: Brill, forthcoming.
- Monterde Albiac, Cristina. Diplomatario de la reina Urraca de Castilla y León (1109–1126). Zaragoza: Anubar, 1996.
- Reilly, Bernard F. The Kingdom of León-Castilla under Queen Urraca 1109–1126. Princeton: 1982. Also published by LIBRO (The Library of Iberian Resources Online) at <http://libro.uca.edu/urraca/urraca.htm>

Ruiz Albi, Irene. La reina doña Urraca (1109–1126), cancellería y colección diplomática. León: Centro de Estudios e Investigación San Isadora, 2003.

See also Iberia; Queens and Empresses, Consorts of; Queens and Empresses: The West

URSULA AND HER COMPANIONS

The cult of St. Ursula and the eleven thousand virgins of Cologne (Feast Day, October 21) were among the most ubiquitous of the later Middle Ages. Largely due to the widespread diffusion of their relics and their appropriateness as role models for both religious and secular women, the holy virgins of Cologne were venerated across Europe.

The earliest document of a cult of unnamed and unnumbered holy virgins in early medieval Cologne can be found on the Clematius Inscription, an early fifth-century stone plaque in their titular church in Cologne. Over the course of the ninth through thirteenth centuries, the legend of the holy virgins of Cologne was gradually developed, expanded, and codified in a series of passiones. Ursula was a Christian princess of Britannia who was promised in marriage to a pagan prince, Aetherius. She requested a delay of several years, during which she and eleven thousand companions would make a pilgrimage to Rome. During their return trip, they were martyred by the Huns besieging Cologne.

In 1106, excavations outside the walls of Cologne uncovered thousands of bodies, which were proclaimed to be the relics of the eleven thousand virgins. This discovery appeared to prove the veracity of the legend, including the astounding number of eleven thousand holy virgins. The most probable explanation can be attributed to an interpretive error through which an inscription "XI M," signifying "undecim martyrum" (eleven martyrs), was misread as indicating "undecim milium" or eleven thousand, by interpreting the "M" as the roman numeral for 1,000. With the help of mystics, particularly Elisabeth of Schönau, the relics were authenticated and the story was fleshed out, ultimately taking on its elaborate form popularized through the Golden Legend.

As early as 1113, Cologne began exporting large quantities of the relics uncovered in the excavations. By the fourteenth century, relics of the holy virgins could be found in cities and monasteries across the map of Europe, often in immense collections, such as the thousand bodies acquired in 1182 by the monastery of Altenberg, near Cologne. Despite the far-flung distribution of relics, their greatest concentration remained in the Rhineland, particularly Cologne, where the relics could be found in every church.

Eventually the holy virgins joined the Three Magi as patrons of the city.

Though the identity of St. Ursula as the leader was established by the tenth century, the group was commemorated and referenced as a collective mass—Undecim millium virginum (eleven thousand virgins). This group identity informed the presentation of their relics, as well as the form of much of the imagery associated with this cult, in which the holy virgins of Cologne were represented en masse, as though individuality was subsumed into corporate identity. Frequently portrayed as a group of eleven idealized women, as eleven followers beneath the mantle of St. Ursula, or as eleven flames on the coat of arms of late medieval Cologne, the holy virgins of Cologne were consistently identified by their collective cohesion. Described and depicted as an undifferentiated mass of holy virgins, the eleven thousand virgins of Cologne cogently visualized the monastic requirement that one surrender her individual identity to that of the unified ecclesiastical body.

Images—particularly reliquary figures—were used to foster the standing of the eleven thousand virgins as role models for religious women. Several important artistic programs in Cologne utilized relics and reliquary figures to create a dynamic sacral environment in which the (principally female) audience is both situated and actively involved, as religious women are invited to follow the model of the holy virgins and literally join their sacred company. The motherhouse and titular church of the cult, the ecclesia sanctorum undecim milium virginum (Church of the Holy Eleven Thousand Virgins) in Cologne, literally surrounds the viewers (both secular parishioners and cloistered Benedictine nuns) with relics and reliquary figures to fashion a palpable connection between saints and devotees. The altarpiece made for the high altar of the church of the Poor Clares in Cologne circa 1347 presents a group of twelve reliquary busts of Holy Virgins who appear as female apostles. Analogous examples can be found throughout Europe.

In many ways, Ursula and her companions provided ideal role models for the realization of women's religious calling in the later Middle Ages and Renaissance. As Europe's largest group of holy women, the holy virgins of Cologne exemplified the glories of spiritual betrothal to Christ, virginity and chastity, martyrdom, and erudition, offering religious women a collective model for imitatio Christi. The fifteenth-century Dominican Giovanni Dominici singled out the eleven thousand virgins as fitting role models for young women. In the sixteenth century, Sister Angela Merici dedicated her Ursuline order to St. Ursula, whose name had become synonymous with the corporate body of the eleven thousand virgins and female spirituality.

SCOTT B. MONTGOMERY

References and Further Reading

- Günter Zehnder, Frank. Sankt Ursula. Legende-Verehrung-Bilderwelt. Cologne: Wienand Verlag, 1985.
- Holladay, Joan A. "Relics, Reliquaries, and Religious Women: Visualizing the Holy Virgins of Cologne." Studies in Iconography 18 (1997): 67–118.
- Montgomery, Scott B. "Corporate Corporeality: The Cult of St. Ursula and the Eleven Thousand Virgins." In Old Masters in Context: Romanino's "Mystic Marriage of Saint Catherine", edited by Victor Coonin. Brooks Museum of Art Bulletin, No. 4. Memphis: Brooks Museum of Art, 2003, pp. 37–49.
- Sheingorn, Pamela, and Marcelle Thiébaux, trans. The Passion of Saint Ursula and The Sermon on the Birthday of Saint Ursula. Toronto: Peregrina, 1996.
- Solzbacher, Joseph and Veronika Hopmann. Die Legende der Heiligen Ursula. Cologne: Wienand Verlag, 1964.

See also Elisabeth of Schönau; Hagiography; Hagiography, Iconographic Aspects of; Jacobus de Voragine's Golden Legend; Relics and Reliquaries

V

---

VALKYRIES

Valkyries, from Old Norse valkyrja (choosers of the slain), were originally semidivine warrior women, attendants of the war-god Odin, who chose warriors to die in battle and escorted them to Valhalla (hall of the slain) to await the final battle of Ragnarok (doom of the gods). Terms like skjaldmaer (“shield-maidens”) and hjálmvitr (“helmeted beings”) reflect the valkyries’ warlike nature. They sometimes appear as malevolent and sometimes as benevolent figures. Saxo Grammaticus (c. 1200) says that valkyries can alter their appearance from fearsome to beautiful. The valkyries appear in the Poetic Edda (assembled in the thirteenth century from earlier mythological poems). In the Poetic Edda, the most important valkyrie is Brynhild, and several poems recount her love for the mortal hero Sigurd. In later skaldic poetry, valkyries are merely the beautiful and benign messengers of Odin, but nameless and undifferentiated.

Brynhild was famous throughout the Germanic world and appears in the Middle High German Nibelungenlied (early thirteenth century). Richard Wagner (1876) used material from the Nibelung saga and the character of Brynhild in his epic opera Der Ring des Nibelungen. The Old English cognate of Old Norse valkyrja is wælcyrge, a term that always refers to an evil being associated with slaughter. Nora K. Chadwick argues that Grendel’s mother of Beowulf, who is a wælgæst wæfre (“roaming slaughter spirit”), is influenced by the malevolent figure of the valkyrie. Literary figures like Wealtheow, the Danish queen in Beowulf, are beautiful and adorned with gold and reflect the benevolent figure of the valkyrie.

ALEXANDRA H. OLSEN

References and Further Reading

- Chadwick, Nora K. “The Monsters and Beowulf.” In The Anglo-Saxons: Studies in Some Aspects of Their History and Culture Presented to Bruce Dickins, edited by Peter Clemons. London: Bowes and Bowes, 1959, pp. 171–203.
- Heaney, Seamus, trans. Beowulf. New York: W. W. Norton, 2000.
- Hollander, Lee M., trans. Poetic Edda. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1977.
- Mowatt, D. G., trans. Nibelungenlied. London and New York: Dent and Dutton, 1965.
- Saxo Grammaticus. The History of the Danes, translated by Peter Fisher and edited by Hilda Roderick Ellis Davidson. 2 vols. Totowa, N.J.: Rowan & Littlefield, 1979.

See also Amazons; Beowulf; Magic and Charms; Supernatural Women; Warfare

VERONICA’S VEIL

Though not mentioned in any Gospel account, Veronica (feast day July 12) became associated with the tale of a woman of Jerusalem who offered her veil to wipe Christ’s face on the Way to Calvary. Both the woman and the cloth, onto which Christ’s features were miraculously transferred, are referred to as Veronica—a conflation popularized by the etymological connection with vera icona (true image). This cloth, believed to bear the likeness of Christ, was the most popular of the acheiropoietai (images not made by human hands) in the later Middle Ages. Apocryphal accounts, such as the fourth-century Acts of Pilate, link Veronica with the woman cured of a hemorrhage by touching Jesus's robe (Matthew 9:20–22, Mark 5:25–34, Luke 8:43–48), fostering the connection between the woman, the miraculous cloth, and female spirituality.

The story recounted in Jacobus de Voragine's Golden Legend has Veronica bringing the veil to Rome. The miraculous image was venerated in Rome by the eighth century. In 1297 Boniface VIII had it placed in St. Peter's basilica.

The cult of the Veronica reached its apogee in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, during which time the saint was often included in narratives depicting the Way to Calvary. Images of Veronica displaying the veil to the viewer, or Christ's face on the veil (as seen in pilgrims' badges from Rome), reinforced the effectiveness of contemplation of the Holy Face, and indeed images in general. Images of Veronica's Veil (particularly prints) were popular tools for private devotion, particularly among monastic women, due in part to Veronica's standing as a model of female piety and compassion.

SCOTT B. MONTGOMERY

References and Further Reading

Kuryluk, Ewa. Veronica & Her Cloth: History, Symbolism, and Structure of a "True" Image. Cambridge, Mass.: Basil Blackwell, 1991.

See also Hagiography; Hagiography, Iconographic Aspects of; Jacobus de Voragine's Golden Legend

VILLON, FRANÇOIS

François Villon (b. c. 1430) came to Paris in his youth and acquired a university education and a criminal record for burglary and manslaughter. He wrote a handful of shorter lyrics and two longer poems, both mock wills: Le Lais ("Legacies," c. 1456) and Le Testament (c. 1461). He vanishes from view in 1463, when he was banished from Paris. His voice is pseudo-autobiographical, and both of his longer poems are full of distancing irony, scathing satire on civil and ecclesiastical authorities, and bitter attacks on enemies and former lovers—all of which would seem to bind his poems to a cult of masculinity and to make him an uneasy entry here.

But this voice, redolent with a surface machismo, makes his self sexually ambivalent in ways that confront gender stereotypes and destabilise sexual identities. In his Ballade de la Grosse Margot, for instance, he figures himself as a pimp in a violently exploitative relationship with his lover Margot—but the poem overall centralises the uneasy attitudes to sexuality (and money) that underlie what it is conventional to call "courtly love," by iconising the realities of the power relationship. Another lyric, the Ballade pour Robert d'Estouteville, is by contrast a celebration of mutuality, of male potency and mature sexuality: a paean of praise to "Ambroise" that is a vision of an idyllic contentment. But it is when Villon plays with voices—his own and those of women—that his work has its most interesting implications for the cultural constructions of gender: his mother's sense of complicity with the mother-ness of the Virgin Mary (Ballade pour prier Nostre Dame), and above all his masterly invention of a female voice, that of the Belle Heaulmiere, "the beautiful helmet-maker," now, in old age, a prostitute, and who, in a lingering catalogue of body parts, compares her past loveliness with her present decrepitude, her once-sexualised with her now-sexless body.

Too often in the Middle Ages, such types are used to serve male fantasy, or for stereotypical and exemplary purposes—the ills of old age as retribution for a misspent youth. Here, by contrast, because the voice is that of the woman herself rather than that of the voyeuristic, moralising male, the Belle Heaulmiere inspires a real sympathy: her female subjectivity disrupts what may be the readers' comfortable homosocial complicities. More remarkable again is the ballade that follows, a little homily to occasional prostitutes (filles de joie): they are, she says, to be hard-headedly mercenary, capitalise on youth, ensure a comfortable old age. Women's self-seeking is a stereotype, of course (as in the Roman de la Rose), but, by using a woman's voice unmediated, Villon has his Belle Heaulmiere usurp a cherished male prerogative by speaking knowledgeably about sexuality, money and power—she and the filles de joie claim the right to enjoy control over their erotic encounters, and thus to refuse the place of silent submission commonly allotted to women. Villon, it may be said, invests female subjectivity with uncommon lucidity and an unusual degree of self-affirmation.

JANE TAYLOR

References and Further Reading

Kuhn, David. La poétique de François Villon. Paris: A. Colin, 1967.

Taylor, Jane H. M. The Poetry of François Villon. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.

Villon, François. The Complete Poems, edited and translated by Barbara N. Sargent-Baur. Toronto: University Toronto Press, 1994.

See also Femininity and Masculinity; France, Northern; Gender Ideologies; Literature, Old French; Prostitutes

VIOLENCE

The Middle Ages has always been considered a period of impulsive and irrational violence and cruelty. However, during the last decade, medievalists have endeavored to demonstrate that this image is inaccurate. Obsolete paradigms and terminology that hindered a better understanding of medieval violent behavior and its mechanisms are undergoing a systematic deconstruction. Even the traditional concept of the feud has now been abandoned in favor of the term customary vengeance, which describes “any individual wrongs avenged by violence or resolved by the threat of violence” (Halsall). Despite regional diversity and chronological variation throughout the Middle Ages, violence, basically defined as any agonistic exchange, whether provocative or competitive, dual or collective, verbal or physical, impulsive or ritual, is undoubtedly a central trait of medieval culture and literature. But far from being uncontrolled or chaotic, as some clerical sources would like us to believe, it obeys certain rules or conventions. Often associated with a notion of honor, characterized as a general system of exchanges (gift/counter-gift and challenge/counter-challenge), violence is an important component of social interaction and, more specifically, an aristocratic strategy of distinction.

Alongside matrimonial strategies, funerals, and ostentatious wealth, the purpose of violence, or at times simply the threat of violence, was to display the excellence and the omnipotence of the family or lineage and at the same time to demarcate its position in the hierarchy of power. Understood in this perspective, the active or potential use of violence was not a mere disordered way of settling scores but a structuring strategy, especially in the early Middle Ages, when authority was sometimes no more than influence. Among the various forms of medieval violence, vengeance represents a common feature. Related to a more or less systematized set of values that vouches for and legitimizes the specific status of an individual in a social class or the collective worth of a group within a specific society, vengeance is a proof that a sense of justice was deeply rooted in medieval culture and mentalities. Vengeance, often described as an unleashed outburst of anger caused by an offense, was far from spontaneous. Vindication followed a ritual pattern in which different components, such as the delay of retaliation, the public moaning, the choice of the right timing in a public space, the necessity of eyewitnesses, and the support of collective solidarity, were required in order for it to be considered as a legitimate and ethical social act. The main target of medieval exchanges of violence, at least till the end of the feudal period, was to maintain the status quo among different magnate factions, to ensure social order, and to establish a hierarchical balance of power and social precedence.

Female Violence

Although widely studied, the approach to medieval violence still suffers from gender bias. Whereas mechanisms of male violence are fully analyzed and explained in the context of political and social conflicts and strategies, female violence has not yet received enough attention, even in the early Middle Ages, when women’s aggression was particularly well recorded by the sources. The reason stems from a combination of several factors. First of all, female violence was certainly less recurrent or, in certain cases, less discernible than its male counterpart. The early medieval archeological evidence corroborates this state of affairs. Weapons, the classic male signifier, were absent in female Germanic graves. Moreover, some barbarian codes of laws, such as the Frankish Pactus legis salicae, do not even mention its possible existence. But this silence is not proof of its nonexistence. The fact that Burgundian and Lombard codes and later on the Lex Salica Karolina severely castigate women’s aggression corroborates its existence well before the ninth century. Secondly, as a consequence of the hegemonic feminist ethic, which legitimately considers women as the victims rather than as the performers of violence, historians have not yet found it necessary to conceptualize female aggressive violence as a historical object. Furthermore, since the majority of anecdotes recounting women’s aggression are interpreted by historians as literary artifacts, female violence is frequently relegated to the domain of fiction. This is the case with the Hetzerin, one of the most remarkable heroines of Old Norse literature. According to Jochens, the goading woman who urges an unwilling and frightened man to avenge family honor is a male fantasy, a mere figment of some cleric’s misogynous imagination. It could be assumed, on the contrary, that the long-term existence of this character, from Tacitus to Gregory of Tours as well as from Anglo-Saxon and Icelandic sources such as in Sturlunga saga, proves the tangible permanence of this type of female conduct.

Theoretical Issues

The methodological resort to gender categories whenever female behavior is at stake remains complicated. The history of female violence is certainly affected by gender ideologies of both medieval authors and contemporary historians. But, while casting new light on gendered social representations, particularly relevant in the context of the later Middle Ages, this historical conceptual approach tends to fix the interpretation of women's behavior in a strict, unchanging way.

However, beyond the historical consistency characterizing the relation between genders, it is necessary to note the variability of past gender systems and to recognize the exception. This point of view is particularly relevant for Merovingian noble and royal women. Long relegated to the category of curiosities or monstrosities, their violent activity has never been studied in the perspective of a class strategy. Thanks to a fluid gender ideology, Merovingian queens (Brunhild and Fredegund), princesses (Clothild, Caribert's daughter), and noble women could actively participate in the cycle of violence and even initiate their own vengeance. Following the example of their male counterparts, they obeyed a familial and personal code of honor aiming at the growth of wealth, power, and social precedence.

Cross-Dressing and Female Violence

During the central Middle Ages, female violence remains noticeable in narratives and legal records. The chansons de gestes feature women involved in military activities, warfare, and revenge but in a somewhat different manner. Within the delimited frame of chivalrous ideology, which conceived of aggression and warfare as exclusively male attributes and activities, female violence became increasingly marginalized. It could still function, but only by borrowing a male identity. The topos of female transvestites confirms a change of attitude, which is certainly related, from the Carolingian period onwards, to the growing penetration of Christian influence and its constraints, demanding a strict representation of the division of labor between the sexes. In romances of the eleventh to the thirteenth century, cross-dressing expressed the author's ambivalence. While allowing women to fight in certain cases, it still preserved the gender hierarchy.

Yet, in the late Middle Ages, the mindset changed significantly. Considered subversive because it undermined the dividing line between sexual roles and the principle of male domination, this topos became the expression of women's deceit and powerlessness. Even disguised as men, women could not hide their true weak and inferior nature. The paradigm of this new strict attitude towards women's use of violence is exemplified by Joan of Arc, a young peasant woman who led the French armies during the Hundred Years' War. She was condemned to death by the Church precisely for her cross-dressing. With the development of nascent states and capitalist economy emerging from feudal society, violence ceased to be a social marker. The ongoing formation of differentiated public and private spheres definitively destroyed the opportunity for women to defend their family honor. When female violence is recorded in judicial registers during the fifteenth century and onwards, it has lost its social signification and become simple criminality.

NIRA PANCER

References and Further Reading

- Balzaretti, R. "These Are Things That Men Do, Not Women': The Social Regulation of Female Violence in Langobard Italy." In Violence and Society in the Early Medieval West, edited by Guy Halsall. Rochester, N.Y.: Boydell, 1998, pp. 175–193.
- Gradowicz-Pancer, N. "De-Gendering Female Violence: Merovingian Female Honour as an 'Exchange of Violence'." Early Medieval Europe 11.1 (2002): 1–18.
- Halsall, Guy, ed. Violence and Society in the Early Medieval West. Rochester, N.Y.: Boydell, 1998.
- . "Female Status and Power in Early Merovingian Central Austrasia: The Burial Evidence." Early Middle Ages 5 (1996): 1–24.
- Jochens, J. "The Medieval Icelandic Heroine: Fact or Fiction?" Viator 17 (1987): 35–50.

See also Brunhild and Fredegund; Crime and Criminals; Cross-Dressing; Domestic Abuse; Gender Ideologies; Honor and Reputation; Incest; Joan of Arc; Literature, Old Norse; Private and Public Spheres; Rape and Raptus; Romance, French; Warfare

VIRGIN MARTYRS

Narratives concerning virgin martyrs such as Catherine de Alexandria, Margaret of Antioch, Agnes, and Cecilia form one of the largest categories of hagiographical literature and were told across Europe and the Christian Near East from late antiquity to the late Middle Ages and beyond. Often intended for female audiences, they are highly conventional in terms of plot, recounting the story of a young and beautiful woman whose virginity is threatened either by rape (Lucy, Agnes) or by a proposed marriage (Cecilia, Ursula); she chooses to submit to death rather than renounce her virginity. Graphically violent, the narrative of virgin martyrdom usually includes a series of exchanges between the virgin and a pagan persecutor, alternating with an escalating sequence of tortures; sometimes the devil himself makes an appearance (Margaret, Juliana). In spite of its apparently sadistic content, the story of the virgin martyr was evidently appealing to medieval women both as readers and as writers.

Historical Development

In late antiquity, martyrdom was revered as the most perfect imitatio Christi (imitation of Christ). During the Roman persecutions, the execution of women was considered particularly shocking and affecting; contemporary accounts of the martyrdoms of Christians such as Perpetua and Felicity emphasize the courage of women confronted by dreadful and public death. Historical accounts suggest that rape was sometimes used by the Romans as a method of political repression, since the desire of Christian women to preserve their virginity was seen as a form of resistance to the power of the Roman state; this may account for the importance of the threat of rape in hagiographic plots.

The historical reality of persecution found reflection in fictional narratives emphasizing the inviolable virginity of the protagonist. In the apocryphal Acts of Thecla, the heroine is an independent female apostle who baptizes herself and evangelizes Asia Minor after having survived several attempted martyrdoms. In the West, less radical models proved more influential and programmatic. Ambrose's version of the passion of Agnes in On Virgins (late fourth century) and Prudentius's poems in honor of Agnes and Eulalia (early fifth century) emphasize not the virgin's independence but her vulnerable body and willing submission to torture and death.

Virgin martyr narratives multiplied in the Middle Ages, in both Latin and the vernacular. The seventh-century Anglo-Saxon author Aldhelm, writing in Latin, composed two catalogues of virgins, mostly martyrs, for the edification of the nuns of Barking Abbey. Hrotsvit of Gandersheim's virgin martyr stories, composed in the tenth century, are strikingly original and bear witness to the broad geographical distribution of the tradition. Her verse dramas include two plays dealing with the martyrdom of virgins. The better known of these, Agapes, Chione and Hirena (sometimes called Dulcinius), is of Greek origin and probably came to Germany with Theophano, the Byzantine wife of Otto II; it tells the story of three girls supposed to have been martyred under Diocletian and is remarkable for its humor and merciless exposition of male stupidity. Hrotsvit's collection of hexameter Legends includes a version of the story of Agnes in which the martyr is represented not as a suffering body but as a rational proponent of virginity. Even more unusual is the story of Pelagius, a male virgin martyred in Mozarabic Spain. Hildegard of Bingen, for whom virginity was a driving theological concept, composed an elaborate song series dedicated to St. Ursula and her eleven thousand virgin companions in about 1150.

After the twelfth century, virgin martyr legends flourished in French and Middle English (there are two notable ninth-century examples, Cynewulf's Juliana, in Old English, and the anonymous Old French Sequence of St Eulalia). Many of these texts were intended for female audiences; some were written by women. Clemence of Barking's Life of St. Catherine (c. 1175) is an Anglo-Norman verse romance that expands on its Latin source by giving the heroine a sophisticated theological perspective likely to be appreciated by Clemence's fellow nuns. Anonymous thirteenth-century French romances about Agnes, Barbara, Christina, and Margaret survive in multiple manuscripts, an indication of popularity. The so-called Katherine Group, composed in Middle English in the thirteenth century for an audience of anchoresses, includes stories about Margaret, Catherine, and Juliana. Osborn Bokenham's Legends of Holy Women (1447), although not exclusively concerned with virgin martyrs, contains dedications to several female patrons.

Influence and Afterlife

The most influential hagiographical collection, Jacobus de Voragine's Golden Legend (c. 1260), was composed in Latin but was quickly translated into vernaculars from Spanish to German. Virgin martyrs form the largest category of female saints in the Legend, and several scholars have pointed out the conservative implications of Jacobus's decision to privilege these narratives over those of historical women saints like Clare of Assisi. In a period marked by religious innovations, from Franciscanism to the rise of lay movements like the Beguines and heretical sects like the Cathars, all offering new devotional possibilities to women, Jacobus's emphasis on virgin martyrs appears nostalgic and reactionary. The Golden Legend reduces or eliminates those elements in particular narratives that might be read as profeminist; feminine sanctity is reduced to a single, realistically inimitable model. The Legend inspired Chaucer's Second Nun's Tale of St. Cecilia, and its translation and publication by Caxton in 1483 ensured the survival of a particularly conventional version of the virgin martyr story into the early modern period.

The late Middle Ages also saw a multiplicity of visual representations of virgin martyrs in every medium: stained glass, paintings, miniatures, sculpture. Many are extremely graphic, focusing on the mutilation of the female body, including detached body parts (eyes, breasts). These images were available to an illiterate public with no access to more nuanced versions. Visual representations, however, combined with oral tradition, were sufficient to inspire the career of Joan of Arc. Calling herself "La Pucelle" (the virgin or the maid) and claiming inspiration from Catherine and Margaret, Joan led French resistance against the English in the last phases of the Hundred Years' War. She was executed by the English for heresy—an execution indistinguishable from martyrdom, as several contemporaries noted. Her canonization, in 1920, and her worldwide popularity demonstrate a continuing fascination with the image of the virgin martyr. Another late example, that of Maria Goretti, is more disturbing. In 1909, the twelve-year-old Maria, who had been frequently threatened by a neighbor, died after being stabbed by him for resisting his sexual advances. Aware of his intent, Maria did little to avoid the encounter that led to her death. These two examples demonstrate powerfully the different ways in which the example of the virgin martyr could be internalized by real women.

Much feminist scholarship on virgin martyrs has represented these narratives as misogynistic, part of a patriarchal mechanism for the control of women's bodies, voices, and lives; certainly, the emphasis on torture and rape in the narratives often seems like a projection of the most violent sort of antifeminist fantasy. Other scholars have noted the importance of the virgin martyr as an inspirational and empowering role model for medieval women. Given the longevity of the genre, the differing investments of male and female authors, and the varied contexts in which the tales have been told and retold over centuries, it is probably a mistake to suggest that the message of the virgin martyr narrative can be definitively reduced to one of either feminine empowerment or feminine disenfranchisement. Narratives of virgin martyrdom provide fertile ground upon which differing religious, sexual, and cultural ideologies play themselves out in a bewildering variety of ways.

MAUD BURNETT MCINERNEY

References and Further Reading

- Bokenham, Osbern. Legendys of Hooly Wummen, edited by Mary S. Serjeantson, Early English Text Society, Old Stories, 206. London: Oxford University Press, 1938.
- Cameron, Averil. "Virginity as Metaphor: Women and the Rhetoric of Early Christianity." In History as Text: The Writing of Ancient History, edited by A. Cameron. London: Duckworth, 1989, pp. 185–205.
- Cazelles, Brigitte. The Lady as Saint: A Collection of French Hagiographic Romances of the Thirteenth Century. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1991.
- Heffernan, Thomas J. "Virgin Mothers." In Sacred Biography: Saints and Their Biographers in the Middle Ages. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1988, pp. 231–299.
- Innes-Parker, Catherine. "Sexual Violence and the Female Reader: Symbolic 'Rape' in the Saints' Lives of the Katherine Group." Women's Studies 24 (1995): 205–217.
- Jacob of Voragine. The Golden Legend, translated by W. G. Ryan. 2 vols. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1993.
- Kelly, Kathleen Coyne. Performing Virginity and Testing Chastity in the Middle Ages. London: Routledge, 2000.
- Lapidge, Michael, and James L. Rosier, trans. Aldhelm: The Poetic Works. Cambridge: D. S. Brewer, 1985.
- McInerney, Maud Burnett. Eloquent Virgins from Thecla to Joan of Arc. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2003.
- Sherman, Gail Berkeley. "Saints, Nuns and Speech in the Canterbury Tales." In Images of Sainthood in Medieval Europe, edited by Renate Blumenfeld-Kosinski and Timea Szell. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.
- Winstead, Karen A. Virgin Martyrs: Legends of Sainthood in Late Medieval England. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1997.
- Wogan-Browne, Jocelyn, and Glynn Burgess. Virgin Lives and Holy Deaths: Two Exemplary Biographies for Anglo-Norman Women. London: Everyman, 1996.

See also Bokenham, Osbern; Catherine of Alexandria; Clemence of Barking; Foy; Hagiography; Hagiography, Iconographic Aspects of; Hildegard of Bingen; Hrotsvit of Gandersheim; Jacobus de Voragine's Golden Legend; Joan of Arc; Katherine Group; Margaret of Antioch; Rape and Raptus; Ursula and Her Companions; Virginity

VIRGINITY

Virginity—a concept that richly elaborated on the bare fact of sexual inexperience—had a very high profile in medieval Europe. Virginity was at once the highest of ideals, a condition that enabled humans to aspire to transcend their limitations and become angel-like, and a day-to-day lifestyle to which many thousands of fallible individuals were committed, with varying degrees of success. Sexual renunciation was a founding principle of the religious orders, meaning that most monks, nuns, friars, hermits, and recluses were virgins and that all were sworn to observe chastity. Once clerical celibacy had been enforced, following the Gregorian Reform of the eleventh century, the secular clergy joined the ranks of presumptive virgins. Jesus and Mary were the prime exemplars of male and female perpetual virginity, with the latter in particular often depicted as the leader of a crowd of virgins. Virginity had many variants. It could be imagined in religious, medical, and legal terms: it could be male or female, temporary or permanent, a bodily state or a spiritual exercise. Technically, virginity was the condition of total sexual inexperience and as such distinct from chastity, the virtue of sexual continence, which could be practised by virgins and nonvirgins alike. However, the distinction was not always firm, for being a virgin encompassed chaste practice as well as a personal history and bodily condition of sexual inexperience.

Although virginity sometimes disrupted normal expectations of gendered behaviour, in medieval practice it had distinct male and female forms. As all secular clergy and most monastics were men, male virgins heavily outnumbered female; virginity, however, was a condition more strongly associated with women and more significant to them. There are good reasons for most medieval and modern writing on virginity to take women's virginity as the paradigm of the state. Virgin was a sociolegal status and category of sanctity for women only. Male virgins were almost always so by virtue of their clerical or religious status, and it was that status, not virginity itself, that constituted their social identity. Women's virginity, but not men's, was a marketable commodity and a bodily condition that could be identified by medical procedures.

A Christian Concept

Virginity is one of the great inventions of Christian theology, marking a significant departure from both its Hebrew and its classical sources. For early Christian communities, to reject marriage was to reject citizenship, householding, public office: virginity indicated a radical refusal of the world. When St. Augustine defined sexual desire as the consequence and perpetual reminder of the Fall, the corollary was that to refuse to act upon such desires was to reassert control over the body and to aspire to imitate prelapsarian perfection. The practice of virginity enabled the clerical and religious elite to separate itself from the married laity. Though virginity was necessarily a minority option, it was normally regarded as the superior spiritual state, a superiority often enumerated in the claim that in heaven, married Christians would be rewarded thirtyfold, the widowed sixtyfold, and the virgins one hundredfold. This relative evaluation can be traced back to the earliest Christian texts, such as St. Paul's assessment, "It is good for them if they abide even as I. But if they cannot contain, let them marry: for it is better to marry than to burn" (1 Cor. 7:8–9). Marriage was a sacrament and a state over which the Church increased its control during the Middle Ages. Pastoral guides are full of detailed discussions of the obligations of married people to one another, to their parents, and to their children; yet the sense that marriage was a grudging concession to the weakness of the flesh persisted, and was most freely voiced in commendations of virginity.

In theological and moralistic terms, virginity was located more fundamentally in the will than in the body. Hence it was not necessarily identical with lack of sexual experience. Bodily virginity was worthless in the absence of humility, meaning that virginity was nullified if the virgin took pride in the condition. Indulgence in sexual fantasy would mar virginity; even to be the unwitting object of another's desire could mar virginity. A virgin who was not committed to maintaining the state was thereby, according to the stricter spiritual guides, not a true virgin: it follows that virginity must be freely chosen. Conversely, it was possible to argue, following St. Augustine, that a virgin could retain virginity if she had been raped, so long as she had never faltered in her intention to remain a virgin. The emphasis on the will makes it possible to imagine that a redoubled commitment to chaste practice might enable the recovery of lost virginity.

Religious imagery, however, celebrated virginity as bodily wholeness, a precious treasure held in a fragile vessel, which once broken could not be mended. The virgin body was imagined to be perfectly sealed with that elusive and culturally variable body part, the hymen, and thus as paradigmatically female. Virginity was held to counter the body's usual vulnerability to the processes of change, flux, and decay: the virginal body, contained within its own borders, aspired to immutability. The Virgin Mary was sometimes depicted as youthfully fresh-faced in middle and old age, preserved from aging by the perfection of her virginity. The bodies of virgin saints were often reported to have been discovered miraculously incorrupt in their tombs, in anticipation of the bodily glorification to come at the general resurrection.

Medical Concepts

Medical perspectives, however, recognised the inhuman perfection of virginity to be an unnatural condition for an adult body. Its maintenance was frequently acknowledged to be difficult for most men and women: not for nothing was it described as the new martyrdom. Medical theory held that sexual activity was necessary to keep the body's humours in healthy balance, hence that virginity could be debilitating. In a refinement of this theory, the abbess Hildegard of Bingen concluded that virginity was least difficult and dangerous for those men and women who were dominated by melancholic humours, a category in which she presumably included herself. The bodies of virgin women might suffer from the retention of menstrual fluids and the dissatisfaction of wombs that longed for children: hastily arranged marriages might be recommended to ailing young women. The holiness of those who nevertheless risked their health by persisting with virginity was all the more to be admired. Several lives of holy men include sick-bed narratives in which virtue is proved by a readiness to risk death rather than compromise virginity.

Medical thought considered female virginity to be an objectively identifiable bodily condition. Examination of the hymen (which modern medicine does not consider a reliable indicator) was known, but not routinely practised: it was argued that the procedure risked destroying virginity in the process of confirming it. In this argument, virginity is a purely physical phenomenon with no necessary bearing on an individual's life history or desires. Other tests for discerning female virginity seem to be primarily symbolic statements about purity (a virgin's urine is clear, her gait demure, her eyes downcast) or about the hymeneal seal (a virgin cannot smell a smoking coal or wine-cask placed beneath her skirts). There are no physical tests recorded for men's virginity, which was not sufficiently commodified to require its own bodily sign.

Virginity as a Life Stage

For women, the purpose of virginity—whether it was intended to be lost or to be kept—made a great deal of difference to its enactment. In literature, the existence of two virgin-centred plots demonstrates this duality. In romance, the virgin is an object of desire, whose plot culminates with the loss of her virginity in marriage; in hagiography, the virgin refuses marriage, and her plot culminates with the confirmation of her virginity in death. The first plot is the ancestor of a still hugely popular genre, wide enough to encompass Jane Austen's novels and Bridget Jones's Diary. The second plot, that of the virgin martyr, now has a more specialised appeal, but in its day was as popular, many-faceted, and culturally ubiquitous as the heterosexual romance is today. Virgin martyrs were amongst the most powerful and widely venerated saints, often functioning as role models and protectors to women. In their inviolable purity they stood for the mystical body of Christ, but their example also influenced the lives of individual medieval women. The life of Christina of Markyate, a twelfth-century English recluse and nun, was written in partial imitation of virgin martyr legends, which offered the best narrative model for a young woman's desire to resist the marriage arranged by her parents and to choose her own future. Two of the three saints Joan of Arc named as the source of her voices were virgin martyrs, Catherine of Alexandria and Margaret of Antioch, details of whose legends can be argued to have influenced Joan's androgynous persona.

When virginity was conceptualised as a stage in a woman's lifecycle, it was as the precedent and entry-qualification for marriage and motherhood. Conduct literature for elite women lays great stress on the need for marriageable girls to maintain their virginity, with cautionary tales of the humiliation and punishment of those who failed to do so. Such women were presumably the market for the gynaecological texts that include recipes for constructing false hymens using everyday ingredients such as egg-white and leeches. It was normal for elite girls to be virgins at marriage, when their virginity would be not so much lost as traded in exchange for the property and position of a wife. Outside of the ruling classes, practice was more varied, though here too young women's sexual behaviour was monitored and controlled. In the towns, employers were held responsible for the morals of their women servants and workers; in rural manors, the fine of leyrwite was exacted for women's premarital loss of virginity. Compensation was sometimes payable to women from their lovers to neutralise the damage to their prospects of marriage, thus putting a concrete—and often rather high—value on the virginity even of non-elite women.

Lifelong Virginity

Lifelong virginity marked a decisive break with the usual female life cycle of maidenhood, marriage, and, for some, widowhood. In theory, virginity could enable women to overcome their inherent female weaknesses: several of the Church Fathers admiringly refer to pious virgins as manlike. A commitment to virginity removed a woman from the economy of exchange and sexual difference. Recognition of this logic was often accompanied by an argument for the propriety of controlling virgins' behaviour and interactions with the world. Although their rhetoric was gender-neutral or gender-transcending, the Fathers did not expect committed virgins to aspire to the social privileges of men: as Tertullian argued, such a virgin would be neither male nor female but “a third generic class, some monstrosity with a head of its own.”

In medieval Europe, career virginity was an option for only a small proportion of women. Nunneries were fewer and smaller than monasteries for men, and were usually open only to women whose families could afford a substantial entry fee, though at certain times and places it was possible for poorer women to commit to virginity as recluses, lay sisters, hospital sisters, and Beguines. The lives of such career virgins diverged in some key features from those of secular women. They avoided subjection to the authority of husbands, and the dangers of repeated pregnancy and childbirth. Abbesses and prioresses not only had authority over their communities, but could also wield considerable economic and legal power over their tenants and neighbourhoods. Though these powers were also exercised by noble and gentlewomen who administered their family estates, it was only the convent that offered anything like a career structure. However, commitment to virginity did not free women from male control altogether. All religious women relied on clerics for spiritual direction and access to the sacraments, and nunneries often had male administrators as well as being subject to episcopal visitation.

Career virginity improved a woman's chances of attaining literacy and of participating in cultural production. Some women's communities were particularly hospitable to creative activities. Hildegard of Bingen's visions were preserved, interpreted, and illustrated within her community; her contemporary Herrad, abbess of Hohenberg, compiled an illustrated history of the world, The Garden of Delights. Sister-books of communal history and biography were written in German convents, and in the thirteenth century a culture of affective mystical writing developed in the nunnery of Helfta. Hildegard's nuns are known to have taken part in dramatic and musical performances; the English nunnery of Barking developed innovative liturgical drama, and it may be that the canoness Hrotsvit of Gandersheim intended her dramas, based on the classical Latin comedies of Terence, for performance in her community. Other women, such as the solitary recluse Julian of Norwich, found forms of religious life that gave them the space and time to think and compose. Much of what is now considered to be the canon of medieval women's writing emerged from a context of institutionalised virginity.

Women committed to virginity were often described as brides of Christ. The legends of women saints martyred in the defence of their virginity represent the saint's death as the supreme pleasure of the consummation of their love for Christ. The imagery of the Song of Songs was used to describe this relationship in highly erotic terms. Narratives and treatises instructed consecrated virgins to think on Christ's superiority to merely human lovers and husbands and to meditate on his beauty, his power, and his tender love for them. In such contexts virginity appears to be itself a sexuality: the virgin is she whose desires are directed to Christ. Male virgins were not excluded from this discourse: St. Bernard of Clairvaux's eighty-six sermons on the Song of Songs are only the best-known example of masculine occupation of the position of the Bride.

Male Virginity

Although sexual restraint was admired in secular men, expectations of their premarital virginity and marital fidelity were not high. The main exception in literature is the grail legends, which attempt to introduce monastic values to chivalric romance, producing a category of virginal heroes. In the grail-quest narratives, the successful grail knights are symbolised as three white bulls amongst a black herd, set aside from their fellows by their virginity. Virginity here is a source of power that enables the knights to perform miraculous feats culminating in the finding of the holy grail. Some male lay saints, such as Edward the Confessor and Elzear of Sabran, were married but believed to have retained their virginity with their wives' agreement. It is evident in their legends that married virginity was an extremely uncommon condition for a layman.

For religious and holy men, virginity was valued, but not the foundation of their identity. Whereas women saints had to protect their virginity from external sexual assault, for male saints the danger was usually perceived to come from within. Virginity did not come easily to male bodies: some argued, indeed, that involuntary nocturnal emissions compromised virginity. The lives of many male saints recount the vigorous ascetic practices—fasting, wearing hair-shirts, self-flagellation, jumping into nettle-beds or freezing water—with which they attempted to dispel sexual temptation and maintain chastity. However, lack of virginity was not insuperable; chaste practice was more important than notional intactness. Aelred of Rievaulx contrasted himself with his sister, a virgin recluse, to lament the loss of his virginity prior to his entry into religion. This loss, however, did not prevent

VIRGINITY

Aelred from becoming a monk, an abbot, and, in due course, a saint.

SARAH SALIH

References and Further Reading

- Bernau, Anke, Ruth Evans, and Sarah Salih, eds. Medieval Virginites. Cardiff: University of Wales Press, 2003.
- Brown, Peter. The Body and Society: Men, Women and Sexual Renunciation in Early Christianity. London: Faber and Faber, 1989.
- Bugge, John. Virginitas: An Essay in the History of a Medieval Ideal. The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff, 1975.
- Carlson, Cindy L., and Angela Jane Weisl, eds. Constructions of Widowhood and Virginites in the Middle Ages. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1999.
- Elliott, Dyan. Spiritual Marriage: Sexual Abstinence in Medieval Wedlock. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1993.
- Evans, Ruth. "Virginites." In The Cambridge Companion to Medieval Women's Writing, edited by Carolyn Dinshaw and David Wallace. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2003.
- Frasetto, Michael, ed. Medieval Purity and Piety: Essays on Medieval Clerical Celibacy and Religious Reform. New York: Garland, 1998.
- Kelly, Kathleen Coyne. Performing Virginites and Testing Chastity in the Middle Ages. London: Routledge, 2000.
- Kelly, Kathleen Coyne, and Marina Leslie, eds. Menacing Virgins: Representing Virginites in the Middle Ages and Renaissance. Cranbury, N.J.: Associated University Presses, 1999.
- McInerney, Maud Burnett. Eloquent Virgins from Thecla to Joan of Arc. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2003.
- Salih, Sarah. Versions of Virginites in Late Medieval England. Cambridge: Brewer, 2001.
- Wogan-Browne, Jocelyn. Saints' Lives and Women's Literary Culture c. 1150–1300: Virginites and Its Authorizations. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001.

See also Abbesses; Ancren Wisse; Anchoresses; Asceticism; Augustine, Influence of; Bride of Christ: Imagery; Celibacy: Clerical and Priests' Concubines; Christina of Markyate; Demography; Education, Monastic; Hagiography; Herrad of Hohenbourg; Hildegard of Bingen; Hrotsvit of Gandersheim; Katherine Group; Mary, Virgin; Monastic Enclosure; Monasticism and Nuns; Sexuality, Regulation of; Sister-Books and Other Convent Chronicles; Virgin Martyrs; Virile Women

VIRILE WOMEN

Virility, with its companion quality, virtue, comes from the Latin vir (man—as opposed to homo, a more generic word embracing both male and female). It is the manliness that all classical authors deemed indispensable to an individual aspiring to authority over other persons. Its essence was self-control and self-determination. The Roman nobility took care to train their male children to be rulers, training and shaping their bodies, their deportment, and their oration to produce manly tones and gestures.

Women were generally ineligible for full virility by virtue of their subordinate condition. A high-status woman was expected to be under the control of her male relatives, her husband, or her son, or, if all else failed, a tutor. Such a woman could and did preside over the government of humbler people, but her principal virtue was obedience to a male superior. This hierarchical system assumed a gender system that diverged dramatically from the system of binary opposites used in less political contexts. Thus, male and female were opposed to one another in abstract contexts such as heat versus cold, light versus dark, and strength versus weakness—generally to the disadvantage of the female principle. Classical biologists, however, recognized that every individual draws from a dual biological inheritance and placed all individuals along a single-gender scale that ranked their degree of manliness. The lower end of the scale was "effeminacy." Women were defined as misbegotten men whose share of sperm had not been sufficiently cooked in the oven of the womb. Virility was not matched by a set of feminine virtues.

First-century Roman writers memorialized the long history of the Roman Republic as a male monopoly, keeping public affairs free of any effeminate taint. Historians of the early empire (first century) perceived that with the transfer of the highest authority to Augustus and his successors, called Fathers of the Country, the gender barrier had been fatally breached. Directors of the imperial household, even some slaves, but most especially the empress, had taken precedence over all other noble Romans. They resisted entitling the Empress Mother of the Country but eventually even accorded the title Mother of the Camps (the army) to her third-century successors. The empress Livia and her successors in power were, of necessity, given the accolade "virile women." Empresses like Messalina, who failed to meet Roman standards of virtue (principally self-control), were criticized in much the same terms as self-indulgent men like Nero.

Among the subordinate women, lower-class men, and slaves, other standards prevailed—for the most part lost to our records. Christianity arose from these groups and demonstrated a different view of virtue. Self-control as practiced by Jesus and his followers led to spiritual, not physical, leadership. The principal element of Christian virility was integrity, a wholeness that resisted penetration and dominance, regardless of pain or pressure, most forcefully represented by a virgin. The Christian virgin or widow who embraced encreteia (sexual abstinence) freed herself from the subordination of marriage and sexual submission and was thus fully entitled to compete for the highest levels of manliness. Among the earliest Christian texts, The Acts of Paul and Thecla outlines the epic of a Christian virgin whose integrity entitled her to preach and perform baptism, a virgin whose power tamed the beasts sent to devour her in the arena. By the beginning of the third century, the prison diary of the martyr Perpetua testifies to a woman who envisioned that she “became a man” upon entering the arena to contend for her salvation in martyrdom. At the same period, Tertullian violently criticized women who refused to wear a veil on the grounds that they were men and not subject to the restrictions placed on subordinate females.

By the fourth century, the virginity movement had been joined to the expanding monastic movement and religious leaders universally proclaimed the authority of the encratic women who “led the high emprise” and defeated death itself with their incorruptibility. The legendary transvestite saints, women who lived among the desert dwellers in the most ferocious hardship disguised as men, entered into Christian lore.

During the remainder of the first millennium, virile women were among the leaders in the settlement and conversion of Europe. Queens like the Frankish Balthild ruled in their widowed years as kings and then ascended to monastic leadership. In the tenth century, the emperor’s daughter, Mathilda, Abbess of Quedlinberg, enjoyed archepiscopal powers, presiding over a reforming synod of German bishops. In the secular world, marriage and inheritance laws enhanced the power of noble women. Remaining subordinate in daughterhood and marriage, women emerged into full virility if the chances offered in a violent world left them in command of the status and wealth of fathers and/or husbands. Contemporaries agreed that it was better to let power flow temporarily into the hands of virile women than to let it escape the family or become the object of too much contention. This situation, despite the complaints of misogynistic chroniclers like Liutprand of Cremona, prevailed through the tenth century, when Adelheid of Burgundy transferred her father’s estates and her late husband’s Italian crown to her second husband, Otto of Saxony, to establish the Holy Roman Empire. In the eleventh century, Countess Mathilda of Tuscany, who was rumored to have refused consummation of either of her marriages, led her armies in support of Gregory VII’s “reforming” papacy. This “reform” resulted in the imposition of celibacy on a clergy eager to restore the woman-free power structure of the Roman Republic. Theologians of both sexes (notably Hildegard of Bingen) produced a gender model based on complementary opposition, and female virility gave way to feminine virtue.

JO ANN MCNAMARA

References and Further Reading

- Allen, Prudence. The Concept of Women: The Aristotelian Revolution, 750 BC–AD 1250. Montreal and London: Eden Press, 1985.
- Bugge, John. Virginitas: An Essay in the History of a Medieval Ideal. The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff, 1975.
- Clover, Carol J. “Regardless of Sex: Men, Women and Power in Early Northern Europe.” Speculum 68.2 (1993): 364–388.
- McNamara, Jo Ann. “An Unresolved Syllogism: The Search for a Christian Gender System.” In Conflicted Identities and Multiple Masculinities: Men in the Medieval West, edited by Jacqueline Murray. New York: Garland, 1999, pp. 1–24.
- . “Sexual Equality and the Cult of Virginity in Early Christian Thought.” Feminist Studies 3.3/4 (1976): 145–158.
- Newman, Barbara. From Virile Woman to WomanChrist: Studies in Medieval Religion and Literature. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1995.
- Salisbury, Joyce E. Perpetua’s Passion: The Death and Memory of a Young Roman Woman. New York: Routledge, 1997.
- Tertullian. On Veiling Virgins, edited by Alexander Roberts and James Donaldson. The Ante-Nicene Fathers 4. Grand Rapids, Mich.: W. B. Eerdmans, 1976.

See also Adelheid; Chastity and Chaste Marriage; Cross-Dressing; Dowry and Other Marriage Gifts; Femininity and Masculinity; Gender Ideologies; Heiresses; Hildegard of Bingen; Landholding and Property Rights; Mathilda of Tuscany; Monasticism and Nuns; Ottonian Royal Women; Queens and Empresses: The West; Virginity; Widows

VOICE, FEMALE: IN LITERATURE

The female voice is variously constructed according to the conventions of different genres. Thus, heroic literature projects female speech against a background of male violence and feud. Women can be the repository of civility and courtesy, like Queen Wealhtheow in the Anglo-Saxon epic Beowulf; inciters and avengers, like Brynhild and Guthrun in the Norse Poetic Edda, Kriemhild in the German Nibelungenlied, and an apparently historical Guthrun in Laxdaela Saga; or lamenters over men’s hostilities, like Guthrun after the killing of Sigurd in the Edda, and Guinevere at Arthur’s departure for war in the Alliterative Morte Arthure.

The lady of courtly lyric and romance inspires noble love or fin’amor. She requires her lover to act in accordance with the exacting code of “love service.” Famously, in Chrétien de Troyes’ Lancelot, Guinevere rebukes her lover for hesitating even for a moment to undergo humiliation for her by riding in a cart. Wise and witty women speak in the courtly dialogue poems—tensos in Occitan, jeux partis in northern French. In Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, the charming lady of the castle is both courtly lady and sexual temptress. Lunete and Lyonet, in Chrétien's Yvain and Malory's Tale of Gareth, respectively, use manipulative language to influence or resolve conflict. Wisdom is purveyed by allegorical female figures like Lady Philosophy in Boethius' Consolation, translated by Chaucer and others, Lady Reason in the Romance of the Rose, and the idealised Beatrice in Dante's Divine Comedy.

In the pastourelle, a smooth-talking knight or clerk meets a lower-class girl and attempts to seduce her. Here, the clash of gender and status is underlined by a difference in idiom: female directness versus male guile. The outcome varies, and the woman's tone shifts between cynicism and pathos. In the chanson de malmariée, a pretty young woman defies her boorish, brutal, and very likely impotent old husband, and flaunts her handsome, polished, and virile lover. The domineering wife of a henpecked husband is another stereotype, behind which lies a tradition of male, especially clerical, misogyny. Chaucer's Wife of Bath, who narrates with gusto how she wielded the mastery over her five husbands, is a well-known example.

In the Arabic–Spanish kharjas, female-voice codas to male-voice poems in classical Arabic or Hebrew, attractive young women confess their sexual feelings or encounters. Somewhat similarly, in the later Galician–Portuguese cantigas de amigo (“songs about a lover”), most of which are by known male authors, young girls confide their feelings to their mother or a girl friend. An outspoken girl in an anonymous Italian poem, “Mother, the time has come” (to get married), declares that she desires a young man physically. Girls who have been seduced and abandoned lament alone in chansons de délaissée—in French, English, and other languages.

The death lament and the love complaint have religious analogues in Mary lamenting for her Son, and the Bride yearning for her beloved in the Old Testament Song of Songs. The two figures are intertwined in the Middle English In a tabernacle of a tour, with its Latin refrain “quia amore langueo” (“because I am pining with love”); the voice is Mary's as intercessor for the soul, but these words are the Bride's. Medieval mysticism is often associated with the female voice: Hildegard von Bingen and later Mechthild of Magdeburg in Germany, Birgitta in Sweden, Julian of Norwich and Margery Kempe in England, Catherine of Siena in Italy. The learned voice of medieval Latin is used by Hildegard, Birgitta, and Catherine, as well as abbess Heloise, writing to her former lover Peter Abelard.

Female-authored texts tend to present more independent women's voices; for example, the Muslim princess Wallada in early medieval Spain, the fourteenth-century “Queen of Mallorca,” and the troubairitz, the women troubadours of Occitania, all of whom assertively express their desires and opinions. Is it possible to assign female-voice works to female authors on the basis of style? An interesting case is “Toute-Belle,” who contributes poems to Guillaume de Machaut's Livre du Voir-Dit. The sections in her voice are different, whether because they actually are by another author or because this is the way Machaut thought a young woman would write. Anonymous texts in the female voice used to be regarded as male-authored, but this assumption has been challenged lately, notably with regard to the women trouvères of northern France. At any rate, it seems to be the case that anonymous poetry in which women speak merely as saucy wantons or vulnerable innocents has more in common with identifiably male-authored than with female-authored texts.

ANNE L. KLINCK

References and Further Reading

- Dinshaw, Carolyn, and David Wallace, eds. The Cambridge Companion to Medieval Women's Writing. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2003.
- Doss-Quinby, Eglal, Joan Tasker Grimbert, Wendy Pfeffer, and Elizabeth Aubrey, eds. Songs of the Women Trouvères. New Haven: Yale University Press, 2001.
- Klinck, Anne L. “Poetic Markers of Gender in Medieval ‘Woman's Song’: Was Anonymous a Woman?” Neophilologus 87 (2003): 339–359.
- Krueger, Roberta L., ed. The Cambridge Companion to Medieval Romance. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000.
- Solterer, Helen. The Master and Minerva: Disputing Women in French Medieval Culture. Berkeley, Calif.: University of California Press, 1995.
- Wheeler, Bonnie, and Fiona Tolhurst, eds. On Arthurian Women: Essays in Memory of Maureen Fries. Dallas: Scriptorium, 2001.

See also Beowulf; Courtly Love; Debate Literature; Femininity and Masculinity; Gender Ideologies; Guinevere; Mary, Virgin; Misogyny; Mysticism and Mystics; Pastourelle; Roman de la Rose and Its Reception; Wife of Bath; Women Authors: German Texts; Women Authors: Italian Texts; Women Authors: Latin Texts; Women Authors: Middle English Texts; Women Authors: Old French Texts; Women Authors: Spanish Texts; Woman's Song

VOWESSES

Vowesses, usually but not always widows, undertook a solemn vow of chastity forbidding voluntary sexual pleasure and prohibiting marriage or remarriage.

The tradition arose among patristic authorities and received continued mention in medieval sources. Often referred to as velata, or veiled, women because of rituals accompanying the vow, vowesses may have occupied a quasi-clerical status in the early Church.

Early medieval references identified vowesses as living independently in secular residences. Unlike nuns, vowesses initiated a new spiritual life while retaining control over their resources and maintaining existing secular ties. As monasteries became the preferred locus for female spirituality under Carolingian monastic reforms, secular-dwelling vowesses were discouraged, and distinctions between vowesses and nuns became blurred. However, references to vowesses persisted in canon law, and benedictions for consecrated chastity (separate from monastic vows) appeared in manuscripts from the tenth to the sixteenth centuries. The vowess demonstrated a permanent state of spiritual “widowhood” through her celibacy and prayer.

Canon law required the bishop to complete the vowing ritual, particularly for virgins, although sources sometimes acknowledged that priests or others could substitute. Benedictions for widows and virgins appeared sporadically in episcopal manuscripts, and often in connection with houses of canons, suggesting canons’ pastoral responsibilities for vowesses. Continental ceremonies consisted of the woman’s veiling and a blessing of her clothing and her person. Specific examples of European vowed women occur mainly in hagiography, particularly in the vitae of widowed saints. Later medieval English liturgies described the vowess as donning a mantel, veil, and ring, all blessed by the bishop. The vowess provided confirmation of the vow in writing through the sign of the cross; hence, English episcopal registers listed specific vowesses by name.

KATHERINE CLARK

References and Further Reading

- Clark, Katherine. “Pious Widowhood in the Middle Ages.” Ph.D. Dissertation, Indiana University, 2002.
- Cullum, P. H. “Vowesses and Lay Female Piety in the Province of York.” Northern History 32 (1996): 21–41.
- Erler, Mary. “English Vowed Women at the End of the Middle Ages.” Medieval Studies 57 (1995): 155–203.
- . “Three Fifteenth-Century Vowesses.” In Medieval London Widows, edited by Caroline M. Barron and Anne F. Sutton. London: Hambledon Press, 1994, pp. 165–183.
- Parisse, M., ed. Veuves et Veuvage dans le haut Moyen Âge. Paris: Picard, 1993.
- Wemple, Suzanne F. Women in Frankish Society. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1981.

See also Chastity and Chaste Marriage; Laywomen, Religious; Virginity; Widows

W

---

WALDENSIANS

The name Waldensians was given to the members of the sect by churchmen referring to its founder, Waldes. Waldes began his activity in Lyons in the late 1170s. He was a wealthy burgher who had made his fortune in commerce and finance and then experienced a religious conversion. He distributed his property to the poor and began to preach the adoption of voluntary poverty, a life in the spirit of the Gospels, and penitence. Neither Waldes nor his early followers intended to secede from the Catholic church. All they wanted was to live in poverty, wander, and preach the Gospel. Pope Alexander the Third (1179) prohibited them from preaching without the permission of the diocesan bishop. Though permission was not granted, they continued to preach. They were denounced as disobedient and, finally, condemned as heretics and excommunicated. However, they neither developed a new theology nor a new concept of women's rights in religion. Unlike some other sects, they did not regard the Godhead as a combination of both male and female elements and saw no feminine elements in the vision of redemption at the Second Coming. They did not deny the role of the Virgin Mary as mother of the Redeemer but did not believe in her power to mediate between the faithful and her son and to help those who prayed to her.

From the second decade of the thirteenth century the Waldensians rejected universal priesthood and put an end to the idea of universal equality. Only the Brothers vowed to observe celibacy, renounce private property, and subsist on the alms of Believers. They dedicated themselves to giving spiritual guidance, hearing confessions, and administering those sacraments the Waldensians did not renounce, like Baptism, the Eucharist, and Penance. The division between Brothers and male Believers was paralleled by a similar division between female Believers and Sisters. The accepted view, until the publication of the revisionist article by Grado Merlo (1991), was that, in the early days of the sect, women had enjoyed equal rights with men, and that only after the discarding of the egalitarian principle among the men, and their division into Brothers and Believers, did women lose their rights. However, this definitely was not the case. Some women did indeed preach (a function from which they were banned in the Catholic church). Yet even in this early period there was no equality either in theory or in practice. The idea of spiritual equality between men and women (Galatians 3:28) was never interpreted as meaning equality in the earthly church.

The lack of equality between the Brothers and Sisters was even more pronounced than between men and women in the early years of the Waldensian movement. The Sisters were confined to the hospices, which also served as schools and meeting places for the Believers with the Brothers. They prepared the food for the Brothers and if they taught it was only in the hospices with almost exclusively female Believers as their students. As a rule they did not preach in public; they did not attend the general councils of the Brothers; they did not hear confessions or administer the sacraments; and they could not rise in the spiritual leadership to become deacons, presbyters, or a majoral

(the highest rank among the Brothers). Though the Sisters did teach and sometimes preach—at least some of the time and in some of the regions—essentially the same hierarchy and gender roles prevailed between Brothers and Sisters as between the nuns and monks or canons in the Church.

It was the female Believers who both had a fuller religious life and played a more important role in the religious community than their counterparts. In the attitudes of Brothers to female Believers, contrary to their attitudes to the Sisters, there was a neutralization of the customary division of gender roles. Waldensian teaching did not refer to gender, or relate to gender concepts or gender boundaries. There were no special instructions for women—not even the usual commandment for the wife to obey her husband. The Brothers taught and preached to mixed groups of male and female Believers and attributed great importance to the instruction of the former. Unlike the Sisters, the female Believers were free to come and go and thus played a greater part in spreading the beliefs and moral precepts of the sect. These were women who brought into the sect not only their children but also their husbands, and even men and women not closely related to them. They played a central role in accommodating in their homes the Brothers when they came to hold common prayers, teach, preach, and hear confessions. Both married women and widows put the Brothers up in their homes and provided them with food and donations of money when they left. They sometimes also accompanied the Brothers to help disguise their identity or hid their whereabouts. This neutralization of the traditional gender categorization in some sense compensated them for the loss of the cult of the Virgin Mary, the other female saints, and the religious festivals in which women played a role. It did not derive from a principal of faith, nor did it entail a formal status or official appointment. It derived from the fact that the Waldensians constituted a marginal persecuted group, adherence to which was voluntary and depended on the active consent of its members. In such groups class and gender divisions were partly eliminated. It was a vital necessity.

SHULAMITH SHAHAR

References and Further Reading

- Audisio, Gabriel. Les "Vaudois": Naissance, vie et mort d'une dissidence (XII–XVI<sup>me</sup> siècles). Turin: Albert Meynier, 1989.
- Billier, Peter. "Les Vaudois dans les territoires de langue allemande vers la fin du XIV<sup>e</sup> siècle: le regard d'un inquisiteur." Heresies 13-14 (1989): 203–228.
- . "Heresy and Literacy: Earlier History of a Theme." In Heresy and Literacy 1000–1350, edited by Peter Billier and Anne Hudson. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994, pp. 1–18.
- Gonnet, Giovanni. "La femme dans les mouvements paupéro-évangéliques du bas moyen âge (notamment chez les Vaudois)." Heresis 22 (1994): 25–41.
- Kienzle, Beverly M. "The Prostitute Preacher: Patterns of Polemic against Medieval Waldensian Women Preachers." In Women Preachers and Prophets through Two Millennia of Christianity, edited by Beverly M. Kienzle and Pamela J. Walker. Berkeley, Calif.: University of California Press, 1998, pp. 99–113.
- Merlo, Grado G. "Sulle 'Misere donnicciuole' che predicavano." In Identità Valdàesi nella storia e nella storiografia. Valdismi medievali 2. Turin: Claudiana, 1991, pp. 93–112.
- Paravi, Pierrette. "Waldensians in Dauphiné (1400–1530): From Dissidence in Texts to Dissidence in Practice." In Heresy and Literacy 1000–1350, edited by Peter Billier and Anne Hudson. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994, pp. 160–175.
- Shahar, Shulamith. Women in a Medieval Heretical Sect: Agnes and Huguette the Waldensians, translated by Yael Lotan. 2001.
- Wakefield, Walter L., and Austin P. Evans, eds. and trans. Heresies of the High Middle Age. New York: Columbia University Press, 1969.

See also Heretics and Heresy; Ordination of Women as Priests; Sermons and Preaching

WALES

As is the case with so many subjects in medieval Welsh history, our knowledge of women's lives is conditioned by the relative paucity of sources. Women figure prominently in the major literary works of the period, poetic and prose. Arguably more revealing of the texture of real-life women's experiences, however, is the lawbook tractate on the "Law of Women," which dates to the late twelfth or early thirteenth century and is extant in various versions both in Welsh and in Latin. Court records of the period after the conquest by England (1284 on) are also available, although the evidence suggests that disputes pertaining to marriage were pursued mainly in extracurial venues even in the late Middle Ages.

For those approaching the subject of Welsh women from a knowledge of English or continental norms, perhaps the greatest surprise is that these women were virtually excluded from the inheritance of land. Only one legal text even acknowledges the possibility of female heirs to land, and then only in cases in which no other male heirs existed; this particular text was almost certainly influenced by contemporary English custom. Even fathers who wished to leave land to their daughters were enjoined from doing so, and English customs with respect to dower were introduced only after the Conquest in 1284. At least for native Welsh women (English women holding land in Wales had greater latitude with respect to landed property), land passed entirely through the male line except in very specific circumstances. Restrictions on women regarding land tenure were paralleled in other legal venues. Women were not allowed to be witnesses against men in legal proceedings, and, possibly as late as the thirteenth century, did not have the right to make contracts on their own except through a procedure called briduw. Their right to sell or give away property appears to have been linked to the amount of property they brought into marriage.

Surprisingly given these limitations, Welsh women enjoyed a certain degree of equality within the marital relationship itself. The law tracts are clear that the man is considered the woman's "lord" (dominus eius est); on the other hand, husbands could not act badly towards their wives without penalty. Wife-beating entailed in most cases the payment of compensation to the wife, and women could actually leave their husbands in certain circumstances, including leprosy, impotence, or bad breath. Indeed, women were required to leave their husbands if the latter had been demonstrably unfaithful to them more than three times (for the first three offenses, wives were paid their honor-price in compensation). Divorce remained possible in Wales long after ecclesiastical customs with respect to marriage had prevailed elsewhere in medieval Europe, and both parties were free to remarry. Property arrangements within marriage were designed in such a way as to ensure the wife's ability to support herself should the marriage fail. If spouses separated during the first seven years of the marriage for reasons other than a fault on the part of the wife, the woman was entitled to a certain portion of the marital property, known as the agweddi; after seven years, the spouses split all (moveable) property between them. Widows inherited all moveable goods except corn if no specific bequest had been made; if it had been, wives were still entitled to half of the marital property. The nature and parameters of marriage were in flux at the time the lawbooks were penned. Earlier Welsh custom recognized a variety of legal unions, including elopement, rape, and abduction; indeed, as late as 1517, there is a record of a wife being "sold" to another man by her husband. However, the thirteenth century saw many attempts both from within and without native Wales to define marriage according to the laws of the Church.

Religious options for women in Wales were few. Only three nunneries were in existence in Wales for any significant length of time before the Dissolution—as compared to an estimated 150 in England—and all were poor and sparsely inhabited. Estimates suggest that there were no more than thirty-five nuns in the country as a whole: private devotion at home seems to have been the primary form of religious expression for women. Literacy among native women either in Welsh or in Latin seems to have been quite rare, although women clearly participated actively in the oral culture of the period. Two female poets are known by name, one of whom, Gwerful Mechain (a late-fifteenth/early-sixteenth-century figure), penned an important work in the querelle des femmes tradition.

ROBIN CHAPMAN STACEY

References and Further Reading

- Cartwright, Jane. "The Desire to Corrupt: Convent and Community in Medieval Wales." In Medieval Women in Their Communities, edited by Diane Watt. Cardiff: University of Wales Press, 1997, pp. 20–48.
- Fulton, Helen. "Medieval Welsh Poems to Nuns." Cambridge Medieval Celtic Studies 21 (1991): 87–112.
- Jenkins, Dafydd, ed. and trans. The Law of Hywel Dda: Law Texts from Medieval Wales. Llandysul: Gomer Press, 1986.
- Jenkins, Dafydd, and Morfydd Owen, eds. The Welsh Law of Women: Studies Presented to Professor Daniel A. Binchy on His Eightieth Birthday. Cardiff: University of Wales Press, 1980.
- Lloyd-Morgan, Ceridwen. "Women and Their Poetry in Medieval Wales." In Women and Literature in Britain, 1150–1500, edited by Carol M. Meale. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993, pp. 183–201.
- . "More Written About Than Writing?: Welsh Women and the Written Word." In Literacy in Medieval Celtic Societies, edited by Huw Pryce. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998, pp. 149–165.
- . "The Querelle des femmes: A Continuing Tradition in Welsh Women's Literature." In Medieval Women: Texts and Contexts in Late Medieval Britain: Essays for Felicity Riddy, edited by Jocelyn Wogan-Browne, Rosalynn Voaden, Arlyn Diamond, Ann Hutchison, Carol Meale, and Lesley Johnson. Turnhout: Brepols, 2000, pp. 101–114.
- Owen, Aneurin, ed. Ancient Laws and Institutes of Wales. London: Public Records Commission, 1841.
- Stacey, Robin Chapman. "Divorce, Medieval Welsh Style." Speculum 77 (2002): 1107–1127.
- Wade-Evans, Arthur W., ed. Welsh Medieval Law. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1909; Reprint, Aalen: Scientia, 1979.
- Wiliam, Aled Rhys, ed. Llyfr Iorwerth op Madog: A Critical Text of the "Venedotian Code" of Medieval Welsh Law. Cardiff: University of Wales Press, 1960.
- Williams, Stephen J., and J. Enoch Powell, eds. Cyfreithiau Hywel Dda yn ôl Llyfr Blegywryd. 2nd ed. Cardiff: University of Wales Press, 1961.

See also Divorce and Separation; Inheritance; Landholding and Property Rights; Law; Marriage, Christian; Monasticism and Nuns

WALLĀDA BINT AL-MUSTAKFĪ

Al-Andalus produced no fewer than forty women poets, some of them slaves working as entertainers but most of them educated free women with access to literary circles, usually through a relationship with an important man. Many of these female poets were single and of noble birth, including one of the best known, Wallāda, who was the daughter of Caliph Muhammed al-Mustakfī and whose house in eleventh-century Córdoba became an important meeting place for writers. Wallāda had a stormy relationship with the poet Ibn Zaydūn before she went on to have an apparently happy life-long liaison with the vizier Ibn Abdūs. In addition, she seems to have had an erotic relationship with another woman poet, Muh̄ya Bint at-Tayyānī, who was her protégée.

Most of Wallāda's extant poems consist of dialogues with Ibn Zaydūn. Some are delicate love compositions, while others are obscene satirical pieces, in which, among other things, she accuses him, in rather graphic terms, of having homosexual affairs. Although Wallāda's life as a free woman moving in men's circles was unusual, the graphic sexuality of her satirical poems was completely conventional, since that style of satire was one of the most popular literary genres in al-Andalus. She excelled at it and held her own against the best poets of her time. Wallāda had a poem embroidered on her tunic, in the fashion of the slaves. Ironically, it proclaimed her freedom and independence: "By God, I was made for glory and I proudly follow my own path" and "I offer my cheek to whomever loves me and kiss whomever desires me." The fact that she succeeded at establishing herself as a legendary libertine whose adventures have excited the imagination of readers for centuries is a tribute to her extraordinary literary talent.

CRISTINA GONZÁLEZ

References and Further Reading

- González, Cristina. "Wallāda Bint al-Mustakfī." In Medieval Iberia: An Encyclopedia, edited by Michael Gerli. New York: Routledge, 2003, p. 845.
- Hoenerbach, Wilhelm. "Notas para una caracterización de Wallāda." Al-Andalus 36 (1971): 467-473.
- Nichols, James M. "Wallada, the Andalusian Lyric, and the Question of Influence." Literature East and West 21 (1977): 286-291.

See also Literature, Iberian; Muslim Women: Iberia

WARDSHIP

It is possible to trace English wardship to at least 1100, and it seems likely that the feudal practice in England started with the Conquest. Feudal wardship (also known as military wardship or wardship in chivalry) was an incident of tenure between a lord and his vassal by virtue of the vassal holding land from the lord in exchange for military service. Such wardship went beyond the usual services performed in return for land. (Wardship in socage was when the tenant held land in return for services other than military.)

Feudal wardship became necessary when a military tenant (most often a knight) died leaving a minor heir or heiress who could not perform the necessary feudal obligations because of minority or gender. Until the heir reached majority and could swear fealty to the lord (the husband of the heiress would normally swear fealty in her stead), the lord would hold custody of the body, property, and lands of the heir or heiress, thus holding them in wardship. This was seen to be an extension of the lord's relationship with the deceased father of the ward and ensured that upon majority the ward would be able to move into the tenancy of the father's lands.

The lord had the right to pass or sell the wardship to someone of his choosing; usually this would be to another lord or someone else of high status; sometimes the lord would sell these rights to members of the ward's immediate family, and sometimes even to the mother. Guardianship of family members was not an automatic right in noble society.

An heir in military wardship came of age when he was deemed mature enough to bear arms; this was accepted to be the age of twenty-one. Until this time the lord could profit freely from the ward's lands and with no accountability to his ward for profits lost or made during this term. (Guardians in socage were accountable to their wards.) As such, the office of guardianship was easily open to abuse, and contemporary legal literature attests to this occurrence as frequent.

The person, property, and marriage of the ward could generate the most financial gain for the lord and was so most often open to financial abuse. Where the marriage of the ward was concerned, the guardian had the right, within reason, to choose a marriage partner for his ward or even to sell the marriage on to another interested party. The sale of the ward's marriage was often used to form political alliances or dynastic arrangements. The Magna Carta (1215, c. 6) is the first instance we have of an attempt to regulate this practice, in the clause that wards must not be married "disparagingly." Contemporary legal treatises (in particular the mid-thirteenth-century "Bracton") stated that male and female wards must not be married against their will, and that male marriages should be free, although the lord would still have the right to the marriage.

There is some evidence in legal cases of the period that wards sought restitution from the courts for such abuses, while further legislative sources sought to delimit such abuse through statute (in particular see the Magna Carta [1215, cc. 6,7], the Statute of Gloucester [1278], and the Statute of Westminster II [1285]).

As well as military wardship and wardship in sackage there were other forms—namely urban (wardship in burgage) and manorial (nonaristocratic). In legal terms the office of all types of medieval guardianship existed to protect the property and person of the ward during their minority and was thus an office of personal care. That it was a position easily open to abuse did not mean that all guardians abused their wards, wasted their property, or sold their marriages unsuitably. Legal material (legislative, treatises, and case law) is prescriptive in its demonstration that such abuses against the ward should not happen, but suggests that in all likelihood it did.

The main textual sources that deal with wardship legislation include the late-twelfth-century Glanvill; Très ancien coutumier (late twelfth to early thirteenth century); and the mid-thirteenth-century “Bracton.” In addition to the statutes mentioned above, there is extant a large body of common law and ecclesiastical court material that shows wards taking their guardians to court for restitution of their legal rights. A corpus of at least six popular contemporary romances take the subject as their theme, thus demonstrating a concern and understanding of wardship practices that further illuminates the legal material and highlights in particular its inextricable links with the issue of inheritance.

NOËL JAMES MENUGE

References and Further Reading

- Baker, John H. An Introduction to Legal History. 2nd ed. London: Butterworth, 1979.
- Bracton, Henry de. On the Laws and Customs of England, edited by George E. Woodbine and Samuel E. Thorne. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press, 1968.
- Clark, Elaine. “The Custody of Children in Manor Courts.” Law and History Review 3 (1985): 333–348.
- . “Social Welfare in the Medieval Countryside.” Journal of British Studies 33 (1994): 381–406.
- . “City Orphans and Custody Laws in Medieval England.” American Journal of Legal History 34 (1995): 168–187.
- Hall, G. D. G., ed. The Treatise on the Laws and Customs of England Commonly Called Glanvill. London: Nelson, 1968.
- Hemholz, Richard H. Canon Law and the Law of England. London: Hambleton Press, 1987.
- . Marriage Litigation in Medieval England. London: Cambridge Press, 1974.
- Menuge, Noël James. Medieval English Wardship in Romance and Law. Cambridge: D. S. Brewer, 2001.
- Tardiff Ernest, J., ed. Coutumiers de Normandie. 2 vols. Rouen: E. Cagniard, 1881, 1903.
- Waugh, Scott. L. The Lordship of England: Royal Wardships and Marriages in English Society and Politics, 1217–1327. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1988.

See also Children, Betrothal and Marriage of; Fosterage; Girls and Boys; Heiresses; Inheritance; Landholding and Property Rights; Law; Legal Agency; Marriage, Christian

WARFARE

As with any aspect of society, medieval women participated in warfare in a variety of ways: they were victims, intercessors, supporters, and warriors. Famous examples—such as Philippa of Hainault, queen of England in the fourteenth century, a celebrated peacemaker, and Joan of Arc, a commander—may have been unusual in either the scope or the publicity of their military contributions, but they were hardly alone in shaping and being shaped by war.

Roles

Due to their official status as noncombatants, it is not surprising to find women portrayed as victims of the ravages of war. Military strategy throughout the Middle Ages advocated the destruction of property and crops by those wishing to overcome their enemies. The protection of a walled city or fortress did not guarantee safety, as prolonged sieges could produce starvation and illness within the walls, and successful ones could result in besiegers venting their rage over the tedium and expense of a protracted operation on the people who were sheltered inside. Some women avoided death, rape, or physical injury only to survive in captivity. European accounts of the crusades mention instances when Muslims sold into slavery the women and children in overrun fortresses. In Europe, too, a high-ranking woman could make an attractive captive, useful as leverage against her kin or as ransom.

It would be misleading to categorize these women as passive participants. Even those traditionally perceived as victims could have contributed actively to combat. There are numerous accounts of townswomen aiding in defense by throwing rocks at besiegers. In the thirteenth century, Simon of Montfort, the leader of the Albigensian Crusade, was said to have died from blows inflicted by stones hurled from a catapult operated by the women of Toulouse, the town he was attempting to subdue. A century later, the chronicler Jean Froissart enthusiastically praised Countess Jeanne of Montfort for rallying her townswomen to assault their attackers with hot tar and paving stones pulled up from the streets. Women also joined their male relations on crusade—if not as officially sanctioned crusaders, then as camp followers and companions. In the heat of battle, their duties as cooks, laundresses, prostitutes, or wives of high-ranking commanders could blend into more active support roles, bearing water and ammunition to the fighters and filling in the moats of besieged castles.

Wealthy and socially prominent wives could influence the direction of warfare by interceding with their husbands. Medieval aristocrats often contracted marriages between two warring sides in an effort to foster peace. With this reputation as peacemakers and with the clerically approved duty to advise their husbands, wives often interceded directly in military decisions. When John of Montfort's uncle died childless in 1341, John's wife Jeanne counseled him to take immediate steps to secure the duchy's treasury and proclaim himself the duke of Brittany. Philippa of Hainault famously, and successfully, pleaded for the lives of prisoners her husband had intended to execute. A wife's publicly performed intercession allowed a husband to preserve his own warlike reputation, for his subsequent leniency could then be attributed to his wife.

Some medieval women influenced warfare more directly, by encouraging their men to go to war or sending money and troops to aid in the fighting. The chronicler Orderic Vitalis reported that Countess Adela of Blois badgered her husband to return to the First Crusade when he came home before it ended. In 1420, Marguerite de Clisson convinced her sons to capture the duke of Brittany because she felt the duchy rightfully belonged to her family. In addition to encouraging their male relations to go to war, noblewomen directed nonrelatives to march to battle. The Empress Matilda sent troops to secure various strongholds in Normandy when she was attempting to secure her claim to the English throne in the mid-twelfth century. In the next century, Jeanne of Constantinople, countess of Flanders and Hainault, sent her soldiers to punish the towns that had supported an imposter claiming to be her long-absent father Count Baldwin. Noblewomen also controlled financial resources necessary for waging wars. Adela of Blois financed her husband and his military contingent on the First Crusade. In the fifteenth century, Isabelle of Portugal sold her jewelry to raise money for the costly wars of her husband, Philip the Good, duke of Burgundy.

Women Warriors

It has proven very difficult to determine whether medieval women ever realized the role of warrior. Part of the difficulty lies in scholars' definitions of "warrior," which has been variously defined as anyone who "participates actively in warfare," whether or not the person ever wielded a sword, to a more narrow reading in which physical combat is key. Medieval sources can often obscure more than they reveal, leaving much of the degree of participation up to the readers' imaginations. Chronicle accounts, for example, often relate that a particular woman "won with manliness her land" or "torched the town," without indicating whether the woman's manliness extended to bearing arms or lighting the fire. Nevertheless, some chronicles do contain stirring accounts, such as Jean Froissart's depiction of the Countess Jeanne of Montfort armed astride a courser, leading a band of men out a back gate to attack the enemy camp, or Orderic Vitalis's portrayal of the twelfth-century Isabel of Conches, armed and riding alongside her men like the Amazon queens of old. It should be noted that chronicles could be equally confusing about the level of male commanders' participation. Orderic's account of Harold of England's defense against William the Conqueror in 1066 has Harold abandoning his seaports, "which he had been closely guarding all year," though it would not have been possible for Harold himself to "closely" guard each of those seaports simultaneously.

It has been widely accepted that medieval women disappeared from "active" participation in warfare (meaning as warriors or commanders) by the thirteenth century, but chronicle accounts and diplomatic documents indicate that women participated in wars throughout the medieval period.

Representations

In addition to identifying the roles women played in warfare, scholars have examined medieval representations of women's military participation for clues about how medieval society viewed the notion of women warriors, but no consensus has yet been reached. While some studies argue for an increase in disparagement of women warriors, others argue for a more nuanced approach that situates characterizations of women warriors within the wider agenda of the individual medieval author. Often, medieval representations reveal less about women's roles than about other societal concerns. Chronicles of warfare in Iberia praised female warriors to shame the men whose cowardice had created an opportunity for these women to fight, while Baltic crusade chronicles described the success of female warriors as a manifestation of God's approval of the Christian cause and the shame of Christianity's enemies. Muslim accounts of the crusades over the Holy Land recount anecdotes of European women warriors as a way to explain the moral depravity of the Europeans, while European accounts remain reticent about female warriors, choosing to promulgate the holy nature of the endeavor by glossing over what these authors felt was the inconvenient presence of women. English and northern French chronicles impute positive or negative motives to women warriors based on whether the woman aligned with the chronicler's political views or visions of proper societal structure. Literary sources, too, use women warriors for other means. Romances such as the Roman de Silence and the Tournament of Ladies employ their armed women as tools to explore "proper" gender behavior, while fabliaux insert the occasional armed woman as comic relief.

KATRIN E. SJURSEN

References and Further Reading

- Blythe, James M. "Women in the Military: Scholastic Arguments and Medieval Images of Female Warriors." History of Political Thought 22.2 (2001): 242–270.
- Edgington, Susan B., and Sarah Lambert, eds. Gendering the Crusades. New York: Columbia University Press, 2002.
- Gershenson, Shoshanna, and Jane Litman. "The Bloody Hands of Compassionate Women": Portrayals of Heroic Women in the Hebrew Crusade Chronicle." In Crisis & Reaction: The Hero in Jewish History, edited by Menahem Mor. Omaha, Neb.: Creighton University Press, 1995, pp. 73–91.
- Mazeika, Rasa J. "'Nowhere Was the Fragility of Her Sex Apparent': Women Warriors in the Baltic Crusade Chronicles." In From Clermont to Jerusalem: The Crusades and Crusader Societies, 1095–1500, edited by Alan V. Murray. Turnhout: Brepols, 1998, pp. 229–248.
- McLaughlin, Megan. "The Woman Warrior: Gender, Warfare, and Society in Medieval Europe." Women's Studies 17 (1990): 193–209.
- McMillin, Linda A. "Women on the Walls: Women and Warfare in the Catalan Grand Chronicles." Catalan Review: International Journal of Catalan Culture 3 (1989): 123–136.
- Nicholson, Helen. "Women on the Third Crusade." Journal of Medieval History 23 (1997): 335–349.
- Saunders, Corinne. "Women and Warfare in Medieval English Writing." In Writing War: Medieval Literary Responses to Warfare, edited by Corinne Saunders, Françoise Le Saux, and Neil Thomas. Cambridge: D. S. Brewer, 2004, pp. 187–212.
- Sjursen, Katrin E. "'The Heart of a Man and a Lion': Northern French Noblewomen as Medieval Commanders, 1000–1500." Ph.D. Dissertation, University of California Santa Barbara, 2006.
- Solterer, Helen. "Figures of Female Militancy in Medieval France." Signs: Journal of Women in Culture and Society 16 (1991): 522–549.
- Truax, Jean. "Anglo-Norman Women at War: Valiant Soldiers, Prudent Strategists or Charismatic Leaders?"

In The Circle of War in the Middle Ages: Essays on Medieval Military and Naval History, edited by Donald J. Kagay and L. J. Andrew Villalon. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell Press, 1999, pp. 111–125.

See also Adela of Blois; Amazons; Captivity and Ransom; Castles and Palaces; Chivalry; Crusades and Crusading Literature; Diplomacy and Reconciliation; Intercession; Joan of Arc; Matilda the Empress; Roman de Silence; Tournaments; Valkyries; Violence

WERGILD

The wergild was the payment made to the relatives of a murder victim in order to avert a blood feud. Each person above the rank of slave was valued at the wergild appropriate to his or her class or standing. Information on the system as it affected women has to be pieced together from the Barbarian law codes, and it is not always clear which aspects were universal and which provincial. A common factor is an enhanced wergild associated with childbearing. Under Salic and Riparian law, the wergild of a woman of childbearing age was three times that of a girl or older woman (Lex Salica 41, 15–17; Lex Ribuarua 12–13), while in Anglo-Saxon and Lombardic society, a pregnant woman was protected by an additional wergild for her unborn child (Alfred 9; Rothari 75).

As members of the kin group, women were involved in the obligation to contribute towards wergild payments (Lex Salica 58). Under certain circumstances, they also received a share of the wergild for a murdered relative or dependent (Capitula Legi Salicae Addita 68; Ine 23). This did not always apply, however, as women could be excluded from receipt of wergild on the grounds that they were unable to raise the feud (Liutprand 13, 8).

The wergild might also comprise a woman's brideprice (Lex Saxonum 40), and it was used as a measure of compensation for crimes besides murder. These included adultery (Lex Baiwariorum 8, 1; Lex Burgundionum 36, 68; Æthelberht 31; Alfred 10), sexual assault (Alfred 11; II Cnut 52), and a range of other offenses committed by or against women (e.g., Lex Alamannorum 53, 2; Grimwald 7; Liutprand 122, 130, 135; Wihtred 12; Alfred 18; II Cnut 73).

CAROLE HOUGH

References and Further Reading

- MacCormack, Geoffrey. "Inheritance and Wergild in Early Germanic Law: I." Irish Jurist. n.s.8 (1973): 143–163.
- . "Inheritance and Wergild in Early Germanic Law: II." Irish Jurist. n.s.9 (1974): 166–183.

WERGILD

Rivers, Theodore John. "Adultery in Early Anglo-Saxon Society: Æthelberht 31 in Comparison with Continental Germanic Law." Anglo-Saxon England 20 (1991): 19–25.

See also Abortion; Crime and Criminals; Kinship; Social Status; Violence

WET NURSING

See Breastfeeding and Wet-Nursing

WIDOWS

Widows are common in most societies and cultures. Social scientists and policy workers, as well as historians, study how they fare and how they are regarded in their world. Because women tend to outlive men, widows are frequently found in large numbers; in the United States today about three of every four women who marry will be widows for some period in their lives. In some segments of medieval society, as in the towns and cities of late medieval Italy, the practice of men marrying much younger women compounded this biological aspect of human survival, and of the fourteen married kings of England between 1066 and 1485 eleven left a widow upon death. While medieval life was harsh for almost everyone by modern standards, a life of manual labor probably was harsher on men than on women, and the chronic warfare of that world—in pitched battles and even more so in the guise of the disease and malnutrition that went hand in hand with sieges and campaigns in the field—took a heavy toll. Though romance and drama may color our accounts of great battles—Charles Martel at Tours (732), or the Christian crusaders and the Muslims at Hattin (1187), or Henry V at Agincourt (1415)—these head-on encounters were widow-makers on a grand scale. While the dangers of childbirth and an iron-deficient diet evened the scale to some extent, the widower was more easily reintegrated into society and family life than was the woman whose partner had died. The widow was a more isolated figure.

Widows' Problems

The medieval widow faced a number of problems. Some were pragmatic and their weight depended on her social and economic status as well as on her own personality and style. But other problems were ideological. The strain of misogyny that underlay so much social and religious thinking—traceable in a direct line to both the Old and the New Testament—singled out the widow as especially problematic. She was sexually experienced, and therefore apt to have a strong appetite for more such activity. Thus she was a potential threat to social and family stability (and to male innocence). Either separation from the world or quick remarriage would seem the best alternatives, though Paul's own inclination (as transmitted in the Pauline Epistles of the New Testament) had been to advocate permanent celibacy, for both men and women, after the death of the first partner. If there is no consensus regarding Chaucer's actual viewpoint or sympathies, his "Wife of Bath" sums up the male fantasy of the widow on the loose: loud, oft-married, frank about sex, on the prowl for another husband, and boastful of her wiles and her record of marital domination.

But society is not governed by any single ideology. Many social and personal realities existed to temper the harshest edges of theological reflections and generalizations about women without men (first her father, then her husband) to stand cover over their legal and social identity. From early on, medieval society accepted that widows, as vulnerable women, would need legal protection and some share of the family's assets if they were to survive, let alone to contribute. Sometimes a widow might be able to fall back upon emotional and economic support from her natal family, as well as upon her own resources. In literature, as in record sources and charters, there are numerous depictions of a tension or duality in her identity, between her birth family—to which she might return upon widowhood—and that new one into which she had married; her role as a potential intercessor was promising but, as Beowulf declared, rarely successful. As "feudal" law developed, women (often already widows, because of marital demography that worked in favor of women's survival) frequently became the heiresses of aristocratic families, a not-uncommon situation due to the absence of brothers. As such they could control great estates and exercise real power in the political as well as the economic sphere, holding both a family inheritance and the widow's dower share (which she usually was able to get her hands on, though perhaps not without some difficulty). And royal widows, at the very top of society, might be regents of the realm as well as guardians of underage kings: Blanche of Castile and the young Louis IX of France in the thirteenth century offer a prime example, and Byzantine court life has similar tales to tell. At the other end of the socioeconomic spectrum, the poor widow—elderly, apt to be in failing health, unable to care for herself or to work her holding in the fields—was a social problem addressed only in part by the establishment of hospitals and alms houses and by the countless testamentary bequests of small sums for the poor. Her future was not very promising, though she too had to be folded into the embrace of “traditional society.”

Widows' Alternatives

There were three basic options regarding a widow's future: the Church, in some fashion or other; remarriage; and remaining in the world, unmarried. Entering a nunnery was a popular choice for many widows. Some became vowed and full-fledged nuns, while others were content to remain in the monastery as a novice or a lay sister, or perhaps simply as a boarder or paying guest, bringing an endowment (a corrody) and living out life within the cloister on prearranged terms. Many women, from sixth-century Merovingian queens to preteens in fifteenth-century Italy, had been pushed into premature marriage, sex, childbirth, and a life of domestic obligation from which widowhood and the nunnery might offer a welcome relief. By the later Middle Ages, when there was less enthusiasm for monastic life, many nunneries drew a considerable proportion of their recruits from those who had once been married and in the world. In the early Middle Ages, widows of royal families, as in Anglo-Saxon England and the Empire, often chose this route, finding protection against worldly pressures (including pressure to remarry) that would otherwise have enmeshed them. As women of experience and considerable presence, they not infrequently rose to positions of authority within their new domain, especially when the house was a family foundation. Elisabeth of Hungary (d. 1231) had been both duchess and mother before she turned to the lifestyle that culminated in her canonization.

There were other options for a life under the Church's protection beyond entry into the cloister. The Church came to encourage women who did not wish to leave the world to take vows of “chaste widowhood” with a formal ceremony performed by the bishop that made them vowesses. The inclination of women of some status to choose this alternative may have been enhanced by the common provision in their husbands' wills that they would inherit more (for a life interest) if they remained unmarried than if they took another spouse. Some women—both widows and virgins—from the twelfth century on, and mostly in northern Europe, formed communities (beguinages) that offered shelter and combined a commitment to celibate and communal life with the freedom to move about each day to contribute to the common purse and larder. So within the wide and comforting penumbra of ecclesiastical support there were a number of choices and opportunities for widows, they being as welcome as those young virgins who had chosen this lifestyle from the start.

Remarriage

For many women widowhood turned out to be a temporary status or condition. Despite what Paul and various Church Fathers had counseled, remarriage was widely accepted—fostered by economic and political considerations, in a world where women often had property of their own and children to raise, as well as by their personal inclinations. Life with a spouse, except perhaps for those of considerable affluence, was probably easier than life without, and it conformed to the most accepted norm or model of secular life. Where we have statistics for late medieval populations and social groups, as we do for aristocratic and even bourgeois women of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, we find that remarriage was the case for a good fifty percent of the widows we can identify. Furthermore, remarriage often came after a relatively short span as a widow; a year or two was a common and seemly interval. Since the new husband might come into some effective control of her share of her late husband's property (perhaps as high as one-half or one-third of the dead husband's estate), as well as of her own inheritance, and perhaps of her children's wardship and marriage, a widow could be an attractive “commodity” in both town and countryside. Queens and empresses remarried, as did women of the towns and cities, and perhaps most peasant and village women who were able to do so (and peasant women with land often found younger husbands to work the fields and support them). Since many widows were quite young, their child-bearing potential (perhaps already proven) could be of value, alongside their domestic skills. A late medieval treatise in the form of advice from an aged husband to his young bride works on the idea that her next husband will think well of her first because the latter has trained her so well in the ways of household management. The church monitored remarriage, but objections on biblical grounds were not a serious matter by early medieval times, especially in a world faced with a declining population, and efforts to eliminate pre-Christian Germanic leanings toward polygamy probably helped establish a more flexible view that was willing to accept serial monogamy as a decent modus vivendi under the new spiritual culture being established.

Many widows remained unmarried, though how many did so by choice and how many by necessity is hard to gauge. In the Magna Carta (1215), one of the feudal perquisites imposed upon King John was the provision that widows not be forced into remarriage; this was primarily with an eye to heiresses and women of considerable property (and perhaps of some independence of mind). As the church came to accept that the essence of marriage was mutual consent, rather than consummation, it became easier (at least in theory) for widows to choose to remain single. One aspect of remarriage, especially when there were children by more than one marriage, was the creation of complex networks of kinship and inheritance; a widow might have more than one remarriage by the end, so her web of children and stepchildren could be a tangled one. Widows often had the freedom to write a will, and these documents are of particular value in revealing women's concern for ecclesiastical benefaction, for the range of remembered family members, and for the distribution of personal goods at what was often the breakup of the household. The will often stipulated beside which husband she was to lie, though the money she left for prayers usually covered both (or all) of her partners, and she might refer to sons of more than one surname as an indication of her multiple families. Whatever the motives of the many who remarried, life with a partner often looked an easier path than life on one's own, though any given widow's potential for independence could be a significant counterweight to this generalization.

Independence

Some widows, both old and young, chose to remarry; others, with fewer points of attraction, had little choice but to face life without a partner. Instances of widowhoods running as long as three and four decades are not hard to find, as death might come early for him and late for her. For women of property widowhood could be a time of affluent independence: control of her dower share and inheritance, control of the business or shop, time and opportunity for a say in the management of family lands and children's futures, leisure for participation in women's cultural and spiritual networks. Now, for those so inclined, it might be time for a pilgrimage, perhaps down the road but occasionally all the way to Jerusalem, or to visit married children, or to run the great household over which she had perhaps always been the de facto chief (as Alice de Brienne did with considerable élan in early-fifteenth-century Suffolk). But these rosy views about widowhood as a window of opportunity are governed or shaped by economic as well as social and personal realities, and for many an aged and enfeebled woman the future was bleak. Children might be expected to care for aged (single) parents, but in many instances there might be no children and in others they had scattered. Sons had gone to seek their fortunes in war or the city, never to return, and daughters might have moved to another village without much inclination to "keep in touch." For many widows, remaining unmarried meant starting over, only now they might be carrying the baggage of age, debts, and disability. Bereavement and depression are hard to gauge but they are hardly modern phenomena, and even when there were sufficient resources for her bed and board there were human factors about death and personal crises that we cannot quantify and that mostly go unmentioned in the records.

As there is no single Middle Ages, so there can be no single picture of widowhood, and in many ways the story of widowhood is a chapter in the larger story of the role and treatment of women. Ways in which society protected the widow, both in her person and her possessions, are readily found, from the law codes of early Christian and Germanic Europe through the bustling urban and commercial world of the last medieval centuries. It is important not to romanticize the widow's condition, nor to overestimate her autonomy. While many women, at all social levels, showed inspiring signs of agency and spirit, women who lost husbands were apt to be confronted by some hard choices. They buried their dead, they mourned, and—as women have done through the recorded course of history—they took their chances with the future. They might cast their lot with the Church, or they might listen to a suitor, be he young or old, or they might go it alone, whether by choice or from force of circumstances. Did they find it a source of consolation that there were always so many women in these ranks? Queens and saints and learned women (like Christine de Pizan, d. c. 1431, who turned to writing to support her family) were among those to be counted, along with legions of bourgeois widows and anonymous peasant relicts and the countless aged and poor survivors who were given some passing attention in the charitable provisions of wills and, sometimes, with less kindness, in lines of verse that could substitute ribald humor and mockery for Christian charity.

JOEL T. ROSENTHAL

References and Further Reading

Archer, Rowena A. "Rich Old Ladies: The Problem of Late Medieval Dowagers." In Property and Politics: Essays in Later Medieval English History, edited by Tony Pollard. Gloucester: Alan Sutton, 1984, pp. 15–35.

- Barron, Caroline M., and Anne F. Sutton, eds. Medieval London Widows, 1300–1500. London: Hambledon Press, 1994.
- Brundage, James A. Law, Sex, and Christian Society in Medieval Europe. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1987.
- Chojnacki, Stanley. Women and Men in Renaissance Venice: Twelve Essays on Patrician Society. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2000.
- Franklin, Peter. "Peasant Widows 'Liberation' and Remarriage before the Black Death." Economic History Review 39 (1988): 186–204.
- Herlihy, David, and Christiane Klapisch-Zuber. Tuscans and Their Families: A Study of the Florentine Catasto of 1427. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1985.
- Holderness, B. A. "Widows in Pre-Industrial Society: An Essay upon Their Economic Functions." In Land, Kinship and Life-Cycle, edited by Richard M. Smith. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984, pp. 423–442.
- Klapisch-Zuber, Christiane. "'The Cruel Mother': Maternity, Widowhood, and Dower in Florence in the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Centuries." In Women, Family, and Ritual in Renaissance Italy, translated by Lydia Cochrane. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1985, pp. 182–202.
- Mirrer, Louise, ed. Upon My Husband's Death: Widows in the Literature and Histories of Medieval Europe. Ann Arbor, Mich.: University of Michigan Press, 1992.
- Nelson, J. L. "The Wary Widow." In Property and Power in the Early Middle Ages, edited by Wendy Davis and Paul Fouracre. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995, pp. 82–113.
- Swabey, Fiona. Medieval Gentlewoman: Life in a Widow's Household in the Later Middle Ages. Stroud: Sutton Publishing, 1999.
- Walker, Sue Sheridan. "Widow and Ward: The Feudal Law of Child Custody in Medieval England." In Women in Medieval Society, edited by Susan Mosher Stuard. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1976, pp. 159–172.
- , ed. Wife and Widow in Medieval England. Ann Arbor, Mich.: University of Michigan Press, 1993.
- Wemple, Suzanne F. Women in Frankish Society: Marriage and the Cloister, 500 to 900. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1981.

See also Beguines; Demography; Dowry and Other Marriage Gifts; Heiresses; Misogyny; Monasticism and Nuns; Poverty; Regents and Queen-Lieutenants; Remarriage; Sexuality: Extramarital Sex; Single-women; Vowesses; Widows as Guardians

WIDOWS AS GUARDIANS

In Roman law, so influential in the western Mediterranean, a tutrix or tutor served as guardian for a boy under fourteen or a girl under twelve, while a curatrix or curator was entrusted with adolescents under twenty-five, the technical age of majority. (In practice many older children renounced the legal and financial protection of their guardians before their twenty-fifth birthdays.) Men appointed the guardians, who would be responsible for their children after they died, in their last wills and testaments. Thus, when a woman lost her husband in the western Mediterranean world, she did not automatically gain custody of their children, although societal and legal norms usually made her the first choice as guardian. In some areas widowed mothers served alone as guardians, and many became effective financial and legal agents in working on behalf of their children. In other places panels of guardians were preferred to individuals. When a father appointed a group of guardians, he was often looking for a way to include his widow in the upbringing of their children, while their male relatives managed the children's estates. Since among the urban elite, women were usually viewed as financially incompetent, urban patricians were most likely to favor group arrangements. Distrust of guardians was widespread, as was fear that they would mismanage the children's assets, putting their financial futures in jeopardy. Thus fathers strove to balance the commercial inexperience of mothers against the greed of male relatives, male business associates, or neighbors. In these group-guardianship arrangements mothers usually resided with their children but their control of finances was limited.

Mothers lost all rights to custody or financial control of their children upon remarriage. Since, during the Middle Ages, most southern European towns had no official oversight of guardianship by any municipal or royal administrative body, fatherless children whose mothers remarried often suffered financial (and emotional) hardship. Widowed mothers who did not take up responsibilities as guardians and instead remarried were thus the objects of some censure. Guardianship was the locus for tensions surrounding women's position in medieval society; especially for a young widow, the interests of her children, who needed her in the absence of her husband, conflicted with those of her birth family, which had much to gain from her remarriage.

Medieval Jewish fathers in southern Europe designated who would serve as guardians for their children in their deathbed declarations or in Latin last wills and testaments. Like Christians, Jews privileged widowed mothers as guardians but also commonly employed group arrangements with the mothers gaining custody. Jewish community leaders and the children's family members usually worked together as guardians administering the children's assets. Jewish widowed mothers also lost custody of their children upon remarriage (or divorce), although infants and toddlers might stay with their mothers for several years, girls sometimes for even longer.

In practice the terminology of guardianship in the western Mediterranean is, as we might expect, various. After tutrix and curatrix, other legal terms used to describe a widowed mother's position as guardian include administratrix and gubernatrix of her children and their inheritances. In some southern French and Iberian areas, mothers who acted as guardians, although they were under the age of twenty-five themselves, were often given the title domina et potens, although dominae maintained more enduring rights over the family's assets than a tutrix or curatrix would. In contrast, in Italy for much of the later Middle Ages the domina et potens was simply a widowed mother who lived with her children and had the lifelong right to maintenance from their estates. (The Hebrew term for guardians is apitropsim.)

REBECCA WINER

References and Further Reading

- Calvi, Giulia. "Widows, the State and the Guardianship of Children in Early Modern Tuscany." In Widowhood in Medieval and Early Modern Europe, edited by Sandra Cavallo and Lynden Warner. New York: Longman, 1999, pp. 209–219.
- Chabot, Isabelle. "Lineage Strategies and the Control of Widows in Renaissance Florence." In Widowhood in Medieval and Early Modern Europe, edited by Sandra Cavallo and Lynden Warner. New York: Longman, 1999, pp. 127–144.
- Klapisch-Zuber, Christiane. "The 'Cruel Mother': Maternity, Widowhood, and Dowry in Florence in the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Centuries." In Women, Family, and Ritual in Renaissance Italy, translated by Lydia G. Cochrane. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1985, pp. 264–276.
- Winer, Rebecca. In Women, Wealth and Community in Perpignan circa 1250–1300: Christians, Jews and Enslaved Muslims in a Medieval Mediterranean Town. Aldershot: Ashgate, 2005.

See also Family; Girls and Boys; Iberia; Inheritance; Italy; Jewish Women; Legal Agency; Occitania; Remarriage; Roman Law; Widows

WIFE OF BATH

We learn about Chaucer's character, the Wife of Bath, in three places: the portrait of her in the General Prologue to the Canterbury Tales; the prologue she tells before she tells her own tale; and the tale itself. Each casts a different light. The portrait presents a woman who is an experienced weaver, gap-toothed (a sign of sexual attractiveness), somewhat deaf, married five times, flamboyantly dressed in a large hat and red hose, and accustomed to going on pilgrimage. In the prologue to her tale, Alisoun (we learn her name as the prologue progresses) skillfully and humorously challenges prevailing misogynistic discourse of the day formulated especially in Jerome's attack on marriage, Against Jovinian. Alisoun manipulates clerical discourse, apparently to suit her own desires to pursue sex and pleasure. The prologue has been analyzed as a brilliant example of Irigarayan mimicry, that is, as a discourse that seizes control of antifeminist discourse and turns it on its head. While earlier male critics adored the Wife for her bawdy sexual appeal, later critics have been disturbed by her inability to escape the terms of antifeminism and by the poignancy of her commodification on the marriage market. Her tale, on the other hand, has recently received attention for its challenging critique of rape. Its ending, which posits an ideal relationship of men and women based on mutual acknowledgment, has generated conflicting critical interpretations, with some viewing it as a tale gratifying male fantasies, and others seeing it as a visionary alternative to relationships based on cultural assumptions that produce rape.

ELIZABETH ROBERTSON

References and Further Reading

- Beidler, Peter G., ed. The Wife of Bath: Geoffrey Chaucer. Boston: Bedford Books of St. Martin's Books, 1996.

See also Chaucer, Geoffrey; Jerome, Influence of; Literature, Middle English; Misogyny; Rape and Rapture

WILD WOMEN

In medieval literary sources from the thirteenth century, wild women have a hideous appearance. In Wolfdietrich B, Shaggy Else, who walks on all fours, is described as covered with hair like a bear. An unnamed wild woman in The Crown, an Arthurian romance by Heinrich von dem Türlin, is more fully described according to a standard representational scheme that involves both animal and racialized imagery. She is covered with shaggy hair; her ostrich eyes burn like fire; she has a broad, flat, ugly nose and a wide, thick-lipped mouth; her head hair is kinky like a Moor's; the tusks of a wild boar protrude from her mouth; her enormous ears droop like a hound's; she has long, sharp lion's claws on her hands and feet; and her grotesque skin is wrinkled and folded like an empty sack. Wolfram von Eschenbach's Cundrie has the wild woman's characteristic bristles, tusks, and bear's ears. A similar wild woman appears in the Arthurian romance Wigalois by Wirnt von Grafenberg. This descriptive scheme is intended to be the grotesque opposite of the top-to-toe delineation of ideal courtly female beauty, and the Moorish motifs of blackness express the fear and denigration of African and Eastern peoples. The dominant animal imagery has many sources in folklore and mythology, but one important antecedent for medieval Christian culture is the wicked woman of Ecclesiasticus 25:22–25 in the Latin Vulgate, whose dark face resembles that of a bear.

Despite their appearances, wild women have exceptional powers. Wolfram's Cundrie knows Latin, Arabic, and French; is educated in dialectic, geometry, and astronomy; and is the messenger from the grail world. Shaggy Else throws magic substances on Wolfdietrich to make him sleep, then trims his nails and hair to magically turn him into a madman. Heinrich's wild woman has enormous strength. She packs the super-knight Gawein under her arm and carries him away. A wild woman teaches medical skills to the hero Wate from the heroic epic Kudrun.

As seen by knights and heroes, wild women are more frightful than the devil, with whom they are often compared. As bearers of bad news or bad adventures their appearance broadcasts trouble. Yet as female beings they are also sexualized. To underscore her ugliness Wolfram comments that Cundrie's face could never rouse a lover's desire. The breasts of wild women are too large, long, and flabby, reaching to the knees, or bellows-like according to Heinrich von dem Türlin. Heinrich also observes the wild woman's ape-like pelvis and compares her genital area to a horse collar. Amazingly, some wild women convert themselves into courtly ladies with tight, controlled bodies once they have secured a sexual partnership with a hero. Shaggy Else takes Wolfdietrich to her country, Old Troy, where she bathes in the fountain of youth and emerges as the lovely Lady Sigminne. In her transformation she resembles the loathly lady in the Middle English Marriage of Gawain and Dame Ragnell as well as Chaucer's Wife of Bath's Tale. In these stories the wild woman's lack of sex appeal is a hurdle to be overcome by a knight or hero who restores her to the world of the court.

Wild women do not form a very distinctive grouping among the mythical beings discussed by Jacob Grimm in his classic work Teutonic Mythology. They blend with mermaids, wood wives, swan maidens, giantesses, valkyries, elves, norns, and supernatural women who mediate between the deities and humans. All are found in medieval literary texts and all have roots in folklore. Germanic and Slavic traditions also know of wild men, but they are portrayed as solitary beings, not as the companions of wild women. Nor are they imagined as the sexual partners of human women.

SARAH WESTPHAL-WIHL

References and Further Reading

- Grimm, Jacob. Wise Women. Teutonic Mythology, translated by James Steven Stallybrass. Vol. 1. New York: Dover Publications, 1966.
- Thomas, J. W., trans. Ortnit and Wolfdietrich: Two Medieval Romances. Columbia, S.C.: Camden House, 1986.
- “The Wedding of Sir Gawain and Dame Ragnell.” In The Romance of Arthur: An Anthology of Medieval Texts in Translation, edited by James J. Wilhelm. New York and London: Garland, 1994, pp. 467–487.
- Wirnt von Grafenberg. Wigalois: The Knight of Fortune's Wheel, translated by J. W. Thomas. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1977.
- von dem Türlin, Heinrich. The Crown: A Tale of Sir Gawein and King Arthur's Court, translated with an introduction by J. W. Thomas. Lincoln, Neb.: University of Nebraska Press, 1989, pp. 396–437.
- von Eschenbach, Wolfram. Parzival, translated by A. T. Hatto. Harmondsworth: Penguin Books, 1980.

See also Chaucer, Geoffrey; Literature, German; Literature, Middle English; Mélusine; Mermaids and Sirens; Misogyny; Romance, German; Supernatural Women; Wolfram von Eschenbach

WILLS

Through wills it was possible to dispose of one's estate for the time after death. This included providing for one's family members, making bequests to other beneficiaries, making decisions on one's funeral and grave, paying debts, and having credits collected. Yet, in the Middle Ages wills had an important spiritual aim: contributing to the salvation of the soul through pious bequests. There were several after-death provisions: wills, testaments, donations of single goods, and lists of donations. We will use the term will and deal with its diffusion and function, neglecting its legal aspects.

Differing Legal Practices

In western Europe, in the early Middle Ages, there were different practices concerning wills. Germanic customary laws did not permit disposition of one's property, whereas in southern France, Italy, and other areas of the former Roman Empire the Roman legal practice of making testaments obtained. For centuries, however, only members of the high clergy and the aristocracy made testaments. In England, Scandinavia, the Low Countries, Germany, and northern France, donations—both during one's lifetime and after death—were the usual provisions for the soul.

The revival of Roman law and the diffusion of the belief in Purgatory in the twelfth century stimulated the use of wills. Furthermore, the Church encouraged making wills. Then, in western Europe, wills began to spread into all social groups—except among those who did not own any property. Around a century later, eastern Europe followed suit. By the later Middle Ages, even people with little fortune, for instance male and female servants, wrote wills to provide for their souls without renouncing their goods while alive. Although wills belonged to the religious preparation for death, only a small portion of the population drew them up. When scholars are able to determine percentages, it is usually found to be lower than ten percent.

The goods of those who made no will passed to their legal heirs following the local inheritance rules, as did the portion of the goods testators did not dispose of. Usually making a will was a way to correct or complete the inheritance rules, seldom to reverse them. Moreover, wills did not represent the only possibility for remembering the deceased through masses, funerals, or other forms of commemoration, as the family of those who died without a will could arrange these. Depending on local laws, testamentary freedom could be limited. In most of northern Europe, testators disposed of only a portion of their estate, often one-third. Testamentary freedom was usually wider for movables than for land and for acquired rather than for inherited goods; wills sometimes required approval by one's legal heirs.

In principle, to be sui iuris, i.e., capable of legal acts, was a condition required to make a will. In most of southern Europe women were under guardianship—first by their fathers and later either by their husbands or by appointed legal representatives; there, women were not generally permitted to make wills. Similar cases involved men and women of servile condition and young men legally dependent on their fathers. But, as these limitations contradicted the moral obligation of providing for one's soul, in the course of the Middle Ages it became more and more acceptable for everyone to make a will. Nonetheless, women were subject to more limitations than were men: married women might need their husbands' permission and might dispose of only a portion of their estate. Usually, widows and unmarried adult women had more testamentary freedom than married ones.

Wills as Historical Sources

Wills have been used for centuries as a source for genealogy and political history, and since the 1970s have been exploited as a quantitative source. Some historians from the Annales school then began using computer databases to analyze either complete archives or random samples of thousands of wills, in order to study religious mentalities and attitudes towards death. Since the 1970s, scholars have examined large collections of late medieval and early modern wills from western Europe; beginning in the 1990s, these studies were augmented by studies of wills from eastern Europe and colonial America. The number, money value, and recipients of pious bequests provide insight into the popularity of religious institutions (parish churches, hospitals, monasteries, brotherhoods) and of religious acts (masses, almsgiving, paying back of illicit gains). Secular provisions permit reconstruction of the networks of people around testators: spouses, children, other family members, servants, neighbours, work or business associates, friends. For instance, wills allow groups to be identified, for example, lay women, who appear to be friends and connected through a religious experience, Beguines, or members of the third mendicant orders.

Scholars have produced tables and graphs showing how many testatrices there were in their samples, grouping them according to marital status, social group, profession, and place of origin. Depending on location, as few as five percent to as many as sixty percent of total testators were women. These differences depend on the property rights and the testamentary freedom women enjoyed.

Wills are now used in legal history, genealogical studies, economic and social history, and history of material culture. Through the diffusion of gender as a category of analysis, the question has arisen whether patterns of bequests depended on testators' sex, in addition to their social position and age. Even if there is not one pattern of bequests for women and one for men, many testaments made by women show common characteristics. Despite having fewer means, women tended to bequeath more than men for the benefit of their souls. Women often left objects, for example, clothes and other items, to single recipients; typically, they bequeathed their tablecloths to churches to be transformed into altar cloths, and they listed their gowns and mantels, identifying each one through quality and colour. Testatrices were less willing than their male counterparts to influence the afterworld, by imposing certain moral or social behaviours on their heirs and beneficiaries.

Women in Others' Wills

Furthermore, the place women occupied in other people's wills has been the object of inquiry. Husbands used wills to offer their future widows better conditions than laws and customs permitted. To secure each other advantages, some spouses made mutual wills, and these could be part of marriage agreements, as was the practice in Flanders. Wills were often used to provide marriageable women with dowries and other gifts. In this way wealthy women could receive their portion of inheritance, while poor women could collect their dowries through bequests from several testators. Women were seldom testamentary executors because many laws and customs considered them unsuitable to act as proxies.

Wills have been defined as the only direct signs left by people—among them many women—about whom scholars would otherwise know nothing. But the significance of these signs depends in part on whether medieval women's wills provided a space for independent decisions. Some scholars emphasize that testatrices consciously used their right of choosing to whom they would leave their goods. Others doubt that wills are suitable to give information on the choices of individuals, because they were written with specific aims and formal characteristics; furthermore, wills were often dictated to scribes and could be written down in Latin, a language unknown to most testatrices. At the same time wills are a source for information on people—often women—too poor to make their own wills: they were beneficiaries in others' wills.

After the death of the testator, his or her will proved to be no self-executing act: the intent of the deceased could be equivocal or contested in court, and the will had no effects until the executors implemented it.

LINDA GUZZETTI

References and Further Reading

- Amt, Emilie, ed. Women's Lives in Medieval Europe: A Source Book. New York: Routledge, 1993, pp. 130–136.
- Burgess, Clive. "Late Medieval Wills and Pious Convention: Testamentary Evidence Reconsidered." In Profit, Piety and the Professions in Later Medieval England, edited by Michael Hicks. Gloucester: Alan Sutton, 1990, pp. 14–33.
- Chauau, Pierre. La mort à Paris, XVI<sup>e</sup>, XVII<sup>e</sup>, XVIII<sup>e</sup> siècles. Paris: Fayard, 1984.
- Chiffolleau, Jacques. La comptabilité de l'au delà. Les hommes, la mort et la religion dans la région d'Avignon à la fin du Moyen Âge. Roma: École française de Rome, 1980.
- Chojnacki, Stanley. "Patrician Women in Early Renaissance Venice." In Women and Men in Renaissance Venice: Twelve Essays on Patrician Society, edited by Stanley Chojnacki. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2000, pp. 115–131.
- . "The Power of the Love: Wives and Husbands." In Women and Men in Renaissance Venice: Twelve Essays on Patrician Society, edited by Stanley Chojnacki. Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins University Press, 2000, pp. 153–168.
- Cohn, Samuel Kline. The Cult of Remembrance and the Black Death: Six Renaissance Cities in Central Italy. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1992.
- . "The Place of the Dead in Flanders and Tuscany: Towards a Comparative History of the Black Death." In Place of the Dead: Death and Remembrance in Late Medieval and Early Modern Europe, edited by Bruce Gordon and Peter Marshall. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000, pp. 17–43.
- Epstein, Steven. Wills and Wealth in Medieval Genoa 1150–1250. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1984.
- Goldberg, P. J. P., ed. "Passages from Wills Made by or concerning Women." In Women in England, c. 1275–1525: Documentary Sources. Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1995.
- Howell, Martha C. "Fixing Movable: Gifts by Testament in Late Medieval Douai." Past and Present 150 (1996): 3–45.
- Kittell, Ellen E. "Testaments of Two Cities: A Comparative Analysis of the Wills of Medieval Genoa and Douai." European Review of History 5 (1998): 47–82.
- Kuehn, Thomas. "Law, Death, and Heirs in the Renaissance." Renaissance Quarterly 45 (1992): 484–516.
- Lewis, Katherine J. "Women, Testamentary Discourse and Life-Writing in Later Medieval England." In Medieval Women and the Law, edited by Noël James Menuge. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell & Brewer, 2000.
- MacMillin, Linda. "Anonymous Lives: Documents from the Benedictine Convent of Sant Pere de les Puelles." In Women Writing Latin, 2: Medieval Women Writing Latin, edited by Laurie J. Churchill, Phyllis R. Brown, and Jane J. Jeffrey. New York and London: Routledge, 2002, pp. 265–280.
- Sheehan, Michael M. The Will in Medieval England: From the Conversion of the Anglo-Saxons to the End of the Thirteenth Century. Toronto: Pontifical Institute of Medieval Studies, 1963.
- . "English Wills and the Records of the Ecclesiastic and Civil Jurisdictions." In Marriage, Family, and Law in Medieval Europe: Collected Studies, edited by James K. Farge. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1996.
- Szende, Katalin G. "Families in Testaments: Some Aspects of Demography and Inheritance Customs in a Late Medieval Hungarian Town." Otium 3 (1995): 107–124.
- Thompson, Victoria. "Women, Power and Protection in Tenth- and Eleventh-Century England." In Medieval Women and the Law, edited by Noël James Menuge. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell & Brewer, 2000, pp. 1–17.
- Vovelle, Michel. Pitié baroque et déchristianisation en Provence au XVIII<sup>e</sup> siècle. Paris: Plon, 1973. Second edition, Paris: Seuil, 1978.

See also Almsgiving and Charity; Annales School of History; Beguines; Clothing; Confraternities; Death, Mourning, and Commemoration; Dowry and Other Marriage Gifts; Family (Earlier Middle Ages); Family (Later Middle Ages); Hospitals; Inheritance; Landholding and Property Rights; Law; Literacy and Reading; Latin; Widows; Widows as Guardians

WISDOM

Feminine embodiments of wisdom—e.g., Lady Wisdom, Sapientia, Sophia, Philosophy—are commonplace in medieval depictions of the transmission and acquisition of knowledge. In allegories written in Latin and in the medieval European vernaculars, Wisdom personified mediates divine and higher knowledge, frequently entering into an intimate relationship with a male narrator or character who desires wisdom. Boethius's sixth-century The Consolation of Philosophy, for example, in which Lady Philosophy guides the author-figure to wisdom, was widely read and highly influential throughout the Middle Ages.

In addition to neo-Platonist writings such as The Consolation of Philosophy, biblical wisdom literature, particularly the book of Proverbs, was an authoritative source for theological and literary personifications of wisdom. In Proverbs, Wisdom appears as a prophet, counselor, and bride. Readers are admonished to love Wisdom, who, like the ideal wife, is described as "more precious than jewels." Medieval Christian exegesis identified the biblical feminine wisdom figure with Christ, as did the Christian evangelical writers (John, Luke, Matthew, and Paul). In the Middle Ages, Lady Wisdom was also commonly associated with the Virgin Mary, often represented as the Seat of Wisdom.

By putting a feminine face on the divine and implicitly demonstrating the intellectual ability of women, the feminine personification of Wisdom contrasts with medieval wisdom literature's generalized misogyny in its presentation of "Woman," the "secrets of women," and the "wiles of women" as standard topics for male mastery. In this light, it is not surprising that the feminine personification of wisdom was of particular interest to and used by women writers, such as Hildegard of Bingen and Christine de Pizan.

EMILY C. FRANCOMANO

References and Further Reading

- Boethius. The Consolation of Philosophy, translated by V. E. Watts. New York: Penguin, 1969.
- Camp, Claudia. Wisdom and the Feminine in the Book of Proverbs. Decatur, Ga.: Almond, 1985.
- Deutsch, Celia. Lady Wisdom, Jesus, and the Sages: Metaphor and Social Context in Matthew's Gospel. Valley Forge, Pa.: Trinity Press International, 1996.
- Newman, Barbara. God and the Goddesses: Vision Poetry and Belief in the Middle Ages. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2003.
- Paxson, James J. The Poetics of Personification. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994.
- . Sister of Wisdom: St. Hildegard's Theology of the Feminine. Berkeley, Calif.: University of California Press, 1987.

Solterer, Helen. The Master and Minerva: Disputing Women in French Medieval Culture. Berkeley, Calif.: University of California Press, 1995.

Smalley, Beryl. Medieval Exegesis of Wisdom Literature, edited by Roland E. Murphy. Scholars Press Reprints and Translations Series. Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1986.

See also Christine de Pizan; Defenses of Women; Hildegard of Bingen; Mary, Virgin; Personifications Visualized as Women; Song of Songs, Medieval Interpretations of

WITCHES

Witches supposedly wield occult power, beyond the capacity of ordinary humans. In rationalistic terms, witchcraft powers represent special forms of knowledge, e.g., herbs and healing, meteorological patterns, the ability to find lost objects, animal behavior, and human psychology. Witches may use their powers for either good or evil, but for the witch's community, such powers are a source of awe and fear. Harmful witchcraft is considered an expression of the witch's malevolence toward other people.

In preindustrial, preliterate societies, a distinction between witchcraft and sorcery appears to be normative. Witchcraft power originates within the witch; it can be consciously employed, but can also operate against the witch's intentions. Unlike witchcraft, sorcery depends on rituals, the conscious manipulation of objects and symbols in external reality to attain a maleficent effect. Related powers are necromancy, which invokes and consults dead or nonhuman spirits, and shamanism, wherein the shaman's spirit travels into a noncorporeal dimension or "spirit world" to seek advice or supplementary powers. Such ideas, documented in modern "primitive" societies (Evans-Pritchard; Douglas), had clear analogues in medieval and later western European folklore (Kieckhefer 1989; Ginzburg).

The European Stereotype

Around 1400, social and religious upheavals contributed to the evolution of a new concept of witchcraft, combining elements of all these aforementioned occult roles. The hybrid stereotype had disastrous consequences for women. In preliterate societies, witches could be male or female, but the new European stereotype, elaborated by intellectual theorists, disproportionately victimized women. Across Europe and the Americas between the early 1400s and the late 1700s, around fifty thousand people were put to death for witchcraft. About eighty percent of known trials and executions involved female defendants.

Although protests were usually ineffectual, opponents of witch persecution denounced its cruelty and irrationality throughout the period. Yet although the European “witch craze” declined rapidly by 1650, witch-trials did not end until the late 1700s. Nineteenth-century historians pioneered the systematic study of witchcraft trials and witchcraft treatises; social and intellectual historians since 1970 provide a more complete understanding of the witch-hunting pathology and its effects on society and culture (Levack; Clark).

The European witch stereotype embodies two apparent paradoxes: first, it was not produced by the “barbaric Dark Ages,” but during the “progressive” Renaissance and early modern period; secondly, Western Christianity did not recognize the reality of witches for centuries, or criminalize them until around 1400.

Canon law and penitential manuals suggest that, even in the late Middle Ages, laypeople confessed to venerating beings that Christian theology condemned as pagan gods (i.e., as demons). Early secular law codes punished sorcery, sometimes with death. But throughout the early and High Middle Ages, the Church condemned occult practices as pagan superstition, and prescribed penances for believing in their reality. In Canon Law, the influential decree Episcopi typified the early medieval Church’s attitude to superstition and occult practices. Formulated during Carolingian times, the canon Episcopi informed bishops about women who supposedly believed the goddess Diana led them en masse on mysterious nocturnal cavalcades (Kors and Peters, 60–67). Episcopi directed bishops to discover such women, explain their experiences as demonic illusions produced during sleep, prescribe penance, and excommunicate anyone who obstinately defended the reality of the cavalcade.

Although clerics possibly misunderstood such beliefs, references to them influenced intellectuals’ thinking about women and witchcraft for centuries. Paradoxically, canon Episcopi, transmitted through Gratian’s Decretum, inspired the earliest learned theories of female demonic witchcraft. Beginning abruptly c. 1430, learned treatises expressly refuted Episcopi’s contention that women’s nocturnal travels were an illusion. The “goddess Diana” was redefined as an incarnate demon, her idolatrous, apostate followers declared awake, the experience pronounced entirely real. Clerical theorists imagined that many heretical sects met embodied demons at night, pledged homage to Satan, and formally joined his “synagogue.” He commanded them to perpetrate all forms of evil, and punished them for failure. At Satanic meetings, heretics performed human sacrifices, copulated with demons, and mocked and desecrated the Christian sacraments. The women of canon Episcopi figured prominently as proof of such heretics’ interaction with demons (Stephens, 125–144). Clerics referred to the new super-heretics as maleficus/malefica (male/female evildoer). These terms and maleficium (evildoing), today considered synonyms of witch and witchcraft, represent the early, formative phase of witch stereotyping.

Important social and religious developments after the year 1000 influenced this radical demonization of heretics. Formerly largely restricted to clerics, heresy spread among the laity due to urbanization, commerce, and growing vernacular literacy. Waldensians demanded ecclesiastical reform to reduce clerical luxury, accommodate laypeople, and assist the suffering poor; Cathars (Albigensians) espoused a partially non-Christian religion resembling ancient Manichaeism; by 1400, Wyclifites and Bohemian Hussites demanded reforms of doctrine, ritual, and ecclesiology, foreshadowing Luther’s revolt. Increasingly worried, fifteenth- and sixteenth-century clerics and magistrates interpreted spreading heresy as a massive demonic conspiracy (Cohn).

Logically, as the enemy of orthodoxy, Satan would personally oversee heretics’ activities. Twelfth-century clerics had already described his presence “in person” at heretical gatherings. By 1300, intellectuals were also preoccupied with necromancers, real and imagined. Necessarily literate, inhabiting a “clerical underworld” of reckless exorcists (Kieckhefer 1989), necromancers supposedly consulted demons, rather than the dead, and exchanged their salvation for demonic power through pacts with Satan. From c. 1400 to 1480, lay and clerical magistrates in Switzerland, Italy, and elsewhere also tried laypeople for harmful sorcery; face-to-face interaction with the devil was a standard accusation. Confessions of heretical belief or practice corroborated confessions of maleficium obtained under torture, usually dooming the accused.

Uneducated people did not originally associate witchcraft power with demons, but after 1400 learned men interpreted laypeople’s traditional witchcraft accusations as evidence that demons produced maleficium in exchange for witches’ souls (Kieckhefer 1976). Prosecutors and treatise writers elaborately described the maleficia that Satan performed for witches: impotence, infertility, crop failure, and disease and death of livestock and persons, including infants, both baptized and not. Added to the inhuman horrors imagined for the “sabbat,” or witches’ mass meeting, this everyday human–demon collaboration explained the world’s distressing state (Stephens).

Witches as Female

These developments coalesced into the stereotype of woman-as-witch. Although uneducated people also referred to male witches, their traditional witchcraft accusations mainly affected domestic activities, where women had principal responsibility: food preparation; childbirth; care of children, invalids, and livestock; healing; and male sexual self-esteem.

Intellectuals’ stereotype of witches as female was desultory until 1487, when it was deliberately and exhaustively codified. Bearing a corroborative bull of Pope Innocent VIII, the Malleus maleficarum (Hammer of Witch-Women) declared that most witches were female. Its virulent descriptions of women’s innate perversity and its program for entrapping and convicting them make the Malleus maleficarum a “classic” work of misogyny. Its direct influence over subsequent witch persecutions is debatable, but its many reprintings reinforced clerical, judicial, and folkloric stereotypes about ungovernable, maleficent women with unparalleled thoroughness. Subsequent trials continued to equate women and witches; meanwhile, the Malleus inspired increasingly elaborate theoretical treatises for over a century. Trials, preaching, and growing vernacular literacy spread the misogynistic stereotype from theologians and magistrates to laypeople.

A Medieval Precursor

Although widespread persecution of women as witches began in the fifteenth century, the 1324–1325 trial of Alice Kyteler, an Irish noblewoman, uncannily foreshadowed Renaissance trials. Repeatedly widowed, Alice stood to inherit from her fourth husband, but her estranged stepchildren accused her of poisoning him and her previous spouses. Richard Ledrede, the bishop of Ossory, preoccupied with theological demonology, transformed this unexceptional property dispute into the earliest complete witch trial, accusing Alice of leading a sect of devil-worshipping homicidal heretics. Ledrede had Alice’s servant Petronilla of Meath whipped until she “confessed” to arranging sexual trysts between Alice and an incarnate devil named Robert Artisson; Petronilla “testified” that Alice had poisoned her victims with demonic aid. Alice prudently escaped to England; Ledrede burned Petronilla on 3 November 1324. The trial is fictionalized in The Name of the Rose (Eco 1994, 30, 327).

WALTER STEPHENS

References and Further Reading

- Bailey, Michael David. Battling Demons: Witchcraft, Heresy, and Reform in the Late Middle Ages. University Park, Pa.: Pennsylvania State University Press, 2003.
- Briggs, Robin. Witches and Neighbors: The Social and Cultural Context of Witchcraft. Second edition. Oxford: Blackwell, 2002.
- Clark, Stuart. Thinking with Demons: The Idea of Witchcraft in Early Modern Europe. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1997.
- Cohn, Norman. Europe’s Inner Demons: An Enquiry Inspired by the Great Witch-Hunt. New York: Basic Books, 1975.
- Davidson, L. S., and J. O. Ward, eds. The Sorcery Trial of Alice Kyteler: A Contemporary Account (1324) Together with Related Documents. Binghamton, N.Y.: Medieval and Renaissance Texts and Studies, 1993.
- Douglas, Mary. Witchcraft Confessions and Accusations. London: Tavistock, 1970.
- Eco, Umberto. The Name of the Rose, translated by William Weaver. Reprint, New York: Harcourt Brace, 1994.
- Evans-Pritchard, E. E. Witchcraft, Oracles and Magic Among the Azande, edited by Eva Gillies. Oxford: Clarendon, 1976.
- Ginzburg, Carlo. The Night-Battles: Witchcraft and Agrarian Cults in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries, translated by John and Anne Tedeschi. New York: Penguin, 1985.
- Kieckhefer, Richard. European Witch Trials: Their Foundations in Popular and Learned Culture, 1300–1500. Berkeley, Calif. and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1976.
- . Magic in the Middle Ages. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989.
- Kors, Alan Charles, and Edward Peters. Witchcraft in Europe 400–1700: A Documentary History. Second edition, revised by Edward Peters. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001.
- Kramer, Heinrich. The Malleus Maleficarum of Heinrich Kramer and James [sic] Sprenger, translated by Montague Summers. London: J. Rodker, 1928. Reprint, New York: Dover, 1971.
- Purkiss, Diane. The Witch in History: Early Modern and Twentieth-Century Representations. London: Routledge, 1996.
- Stephens, Walter. Demon Lovers: Witchcraft, Sex, and the Crisis of Belief. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2002.
- Thomas, Keith. Religion and the Decline of Magic. New York: Scribner, 1971.
- Williams, Bernadette. “‘She Was Usually Placed with the Great Men and Leaders of the Land in Public Assemblies’: Alice Kyteler, A Woman of Considerable Power.” In Women in Renaissance and Early Modern Europe, edited by Christine Meek. Dublin: Four Courts, 2000, pp. 67–83.

See also Cathars; Femininity and Masculinity; Gender Ideologies; Gender in History; Heretics and Heresy; Impotence; Infants and Infanticide; Magic and Charms; Misogyny; Paganism; Waldensians

WOLFRAM VON ESCHENBACH

Although Wolfram once calls himself a Bavarian (Pz 121, 7), he is usually associated with Franconia, the region to which several of his works refer. He mentions Herrmann of Thuringia (r. 1190–1217) as one of his patrons (Wh 3, 8–9; Tit. 82a, 2–4), but also an unnamed woman, for whose sake the narrator claims to have composed Parzival (Pz. 827, 29). Parts of Parzival must have been completed before 1203, since book VII mentions the destruction of the vineyards in Erfurt as an event of the recent past; his Willehalm is commonly dated to 1210–1220.

Little is known of his social standing, but his work suggests that he must have had knowledge of French, as well as an interest in medicine, astronomy, geography, and aspects of theology. Wolfram was clearly familiar with the work of contemporary writers, and, although he paints a picture of himself as an illiterate layperson, he must have had sufficient knowledge of the Latin learned tradition to establish himself in opposition to it. Like most medieval literature, his narratives were probably read out loud to a court audience, possibly in sections even before completion of the work as a whole, yet there are references to the audience reading the tales, and it is clear that he envisaged an audience of men and women.

Wolfram is an unusually prolific author whose oeuvre combines lyric and narrative modes. No more than nine courtly love songs are transmitted under his name, but they are striking in their use of unusual metaphor and a complex interchange of voices. The best known, Sine clawen, opens with the image of dawn as a bird of prey streaking the sky and thus evokes the erotically charged moment in which the lovers have to part at daybreak.

Parzival, based on Chrétien de Troyes's Perceval but extending beyond its fragmentary source, develops the story of its protagonist across three generations. Parzival, whose father had died in battle, is brought up by his mother Herzeloyde, a daughter of the Grail king Frimutel, in total seclusion so that he might escape the fate of his father. He, nevertheless, sets out into the world in pursuit of knighthood, becomes a knight of King Arthur's round table, finds a bride, succeeds in the quest for the Grail, and yet fails to ask the crucial question. Exiled from human society and despairing to the point of renouncing God, Parzival, aided by divine grace, is finally recalled to the Grail, crowned Grail king, and reunited with his wife Condwiramurs. Wolfram's narrative moves beyond Chrétien in developing the Arthurian knight Gawan into a second protagonist who is at the centre of whole sections of the narrative. Yet Parzival is also defined through a series of encounters with female figures. His mother Herzeloyde embodies triuwe (loyalty), which in the eyes of the narrator is the key virtue defining not only successful human relations but also the relationship between man and God. His cousin Sigune, whom he encounters at key stages of his journey, out of loyalty to her dead lover renounces the world, dying as a hermit on the same day as Parzival is crowned Grail king. His wife, Condwiramurs, sustains him throughout with her love. In the world Wolfram creates, love and sexual desire are forces that lead to violence, war, and human suffering, yet marriage can be the way to heal past injustice (Gawan and Orgeluse), reconcile feuding families (Gramoflanz and Itonje), and even unite east and west (Gahmuret and Belakane, Feirefiz and Repanse). Women's roles in this are rarely active, despite the fact that Belakane, Herzeloyde, Condwiramurs, and Orgeluse all rule in their own right. They are shown to be dependent on men, yet the same is true in reverse, as demonstrated by the prominent role that Wolfram accords marriage.

Willehalm combines elements of the chanson de geste, the political narrative of great deeds, with a saint's life: Willehalm, the disinherited younger son, falls in love with the heathen queen Arabel, who becomes his wife, converts, and takes the name Gyburc. Led by Arabel/Gyburc's former husband Tybalt and her father Terramer, the heathens set out to regain her and her territory. Defending the city of Orange, Willehalm leads the Christians to victory, although the narrative remains incomplete, breaking off with Willehalm searching the battlefield for his supporter Rennewart. In contrast to his French source, Wolfram foregrounds the role of Gyburc—she is not only the cause of the war between heathens and Christians, but also takes a decisive stance. Like the female figures in Parzival, she acts as ruler and even military commander inside the besieged city during Willehalm's absence, and before the final battle, she makes a long speech in council pleading for mercy towards the heathens. They are her kin, but she reminds the Christian nobles that they are also linked in spiritual kinship as fellow creatures of God.

With Titurel, Wolfram engages in a narrative experiment that has no parallel in medieval literature: he returns to the figure of Sigune, Parzival's cousin, and makes her the central figure of a new narrative. The work consists of two fragments, between which a considerable section of narrative is missing: the first fragment opens with a genealogy of the Grail family down to the birth and childhood of Sigune, who as a young girl falls in love with the equally youthful Schionatulander. Aware of the conventions of courtly love but not its emotional impact, she demands love service of him. The second fragment opens with Schionatulander bringing her a dog with a precious lead. Sigune starts reading the story embroidered on that leash when the dog escapes; she orders Schionatulander to retrieve the dog so she can finish the story. From premonitions of the narrator and references to Parzival it is clear that this demand will cause Schionatulander's death. Titirel clearly presupposes knowledge of Parzival, and there are pointers to the tragic end of the incipient love story all through the narrative. In turning to a female protagonist, Wolfram is able to explore the relationship between reading and life, or narrative and experience.

ALMUT SUERBAUM

References and Further Reading

- Bumke, Joachim. Wolfram von Eschenbach. Seventh edition. Stuttgart: Metzler, 1997.
- Hasty, Will, ed. A Companion to Wolfram's Parzival. Columbia, S.C.: Camden House, 1999.
- Jones, Martin, and Timothy MacFarland, eds. Wolfram's Willehalm: Fifteen Essays. Rochester, N.Y.: Camden House, 2001.
- von Eschenbach, Wolfram. Werke, edited by Karl Lachmann. Berlin: De Gruyter, 1926. Reprint, Berlin: De Gruyter, 1965.

See also Arthurian Literature; Audience, Women in the; Courtly Love; Dawn Song (Alba); Literature, German; Romance: German

WOMAN ON TOP

"Woman on Top" refers to a frequently encountered family of representations in literature, art, and popular festivities of women who seize the upper hand in their relations with men, reversing the normative hierarchy in which women are inferior and submissive to men. A familiar example is the medieval tale in which the beautiful Phyllis tricks the philosopher Aristotle into allowing her to ride him like a horse by promising him sexual favors. In visual art—notably prints, misericords, manuscript margins, and objects of daily use—women who use sexual attraction to make slaves of men are also figured as leading them by ropes and chains around their necks, while disorderly wives beat their husbands with distaffs, drive them like cart horses, and steal their pants. Natalie Z. Davis, who popularized the term Woman on Top in her 1975 article of the same name, applied it also to cases in which women dress as men and play male roles. These gender role reversals are one aspect of the broader topos of the World Upside Down, which also encompasses, inter alia, topsy-turvy relations between humans and animals. In the symbolic realm, sexual inversion, especially with respect to the relations between husbands and wives, sometimes served as a figure for disorder in political, social, and other hierarchies. Underpinning the Woman on Top is the theory, widely held in the Middle Ages, that women are by nature disorderly and rebellious. Commentators on Genesis regarded Eve's disobedience to God as proof that women as a sex are prone to resist the legitimate authority of men. Women's weakness in reason, evidence for which exegetes claimed to find in Eve's secondary creation from Adam's rib, was blamed. Corroborating theological opinion was the physiological theory of Aristotle and his medieval followers, such as Albertus Magnus, according to which women's temperament was dominated by cold and wet humors that made them less rational and more subject to the desires of the body than men. Inclined to allow these inferior, characteristically female qualities to dominate the higher faculty of reason in their own natures, women were held to be likewise desirous of asserting their rule over men.

In the literature of misogyny and misogamy, the Woman on Top was invoked to denigrate women and urge the necessity of keeping them in their place. The celebrated thirteenth-century preacher Jacques de Vitry accordingly told the tale of Aristotle and Phyllis as an exemplum to condemn the cunning and malice of women and to warn his listeners against succumbing to their wiles. Moralists and satirists likewise derided rebellious wives who use trickery to cuckold their humiliated husbands and stop at nothing to take household authority into their own hands.

Reactions to the Woman on Top were not necessarily all negative, however. As Davis notes, in carnival, festival practices, and popular theater, gender role reversals enabled the venting of conflicts between the sexes within clearly defined limits of time and place. Though the ultimate result may have been to reaffirm male authority when the period of misrule ended, she argues that the expression of alternatives could also work to subject normative expectations to critique and offer women models for disruption and disobedience. Similarly ambiguous are comic literary characters such as Chaucer's Wife of Bath, who boasts of using sexuality and deception to dominate one husband after another.

Susan Smith similarly finds considerable ambiguity in the Power of Women topos, a prominent manifestation of the Woman on Top. Also known as the Wiles of Women, Slaves of Love, and Slaves of Women, this topos brings together two or more famous examples from the Bible, ancient history, and romance to prove that women can master even the worthiest of men. “Who was stronger than Samson, wiser than Solomon, or holier than David?” a fourteenth-century preacher asks his audience. “Yet they were all overcome by the deceits and wiles of women.” The weight of patristic authorities such as St. Jerome made the topos ubiquitous in the later Middle Ages, initially in antifeminist Latin literature but, by the twelfth century, in vernacular genres as well. In visual art, beginning in the fourteenth century, the topos is commonplace in embroideries, tapestries, ivory caskets, tableware, misericords, prints, and other media. The Malterer Embroidery (early fourteenth century) and two series of woodcuts by Lucas van Leyden (1512, 1516–1519) are widely cited examples. At least some artists and vernacular poets, Smith shows, deployed the topos to celebrate the power of women and of love, not to condemn them, just as the thirteenth-century Norman poet Henri d’Andeli concluded his version of the Aristotle and Phyllis tale by vindicating the lady and declaring that love conquers all. The carousing pants-wearing woman of Nuremberg’s Fastnacht revels, Chaucer’s lusty Wife of Bath, and other embodiments of the Power of Women topos suggest that the Woman on Top is best understood not as a straightforward manifestation of medieval antifeminism but as a site of contest through which conflicting ideas about gender roles could be expressed.

SUSAN L. SMITH

References and Further Reading

- Davis, Natalie Z. “Women on Top.” In Society and Culture in Early Modern France: Eight Essays by Natalie Zemon Davis. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1975, pp. 124–151.
- Perfetti, Lisa. Women and Laughter in Medieval Comic Literature. Ann Arbor, Mich.: University of Michigan Press, 2003.
- Susan L. Smith. The Power of Women: A Topos in Medieval Literature and Art. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1995.

See also Aristotelian Concepts of Women and Gender; Cross-Dressing; Eve; Festivals of Misrule; Gender Ideologies; Misericords; Misogyny; Wife of Bath

WOMAN'S SONG

The term woman's song (German, Frauenlied; French, chanson de femme; Galician–Portuguese, cantigas de amigo [songs about a lover]) has long been used by scholars to denote love poems spoken entirely in a woman's voice that are either anonymous or male-authored. The origins of this kind of poetry are ancient. Examples of woman's song are among the first surviving lyric poems in the vernacular languages of Europe, and they have come down to us in virtually all of the languages spoken in medieval Europe, including Latin and Arabic. Examples of woman's song can consist of a single or multiple stanzas, and they can appear in monologues or in poems in which the woman's voice is in dialogue with the voice of another woman, typically her mother or a girlfriend, or with the voice of a man, typically her lover or suitor. Religious lyrics are traditionally excluded from this category, though female personifications, sanctified and legendary women, and the Blessed Virgin Mary often raise their voices in song in medieval hymns, liturgies, and plays. The term woman's song has conventionally been used to mean “songs narrated by women” and not “songs composed by women.” However, recent feminist scholarship has called this distinction into question. It views woman's song as a literary construct, a set of poetic and generic conventions that can be employed by both male and female authors. Woman's song thus becomes a matter of voice, not authorship. For this reason, Anne L. Klinck's Anthology of Ancient and Medieval Woman's Song (2004) includes anonymous, male-authored, and female-authored works.

Woman's song is about love. It plumbs variations in the experience of love and desire from many different perspectives: sorrow at being parted from one's beloved; grief at being abandoned; nostalgia for a love enjoyed in the past; regretful or joyful proclamations of love and fidelity; expressions of longing; sorrow and anger over the hostile influences of spies or rivals; joyful celebrations of fulfilled love and reciprocated desire. The variety of form, content, style, symbolism, and tone in this body of female-voiced poetry about love is astonishing. In the Provençal poetry of the trobairitz the Comtessa de Dia, the language of power relations and the language of love fuses and evokes both political and erotic lordship. The Galician–Portuguese cantigas de amigo (of which there are over five hundred examples) often create a sense of youthful, artless femininity. In them a girl is often shown in dialogue with a confidante, either her mother or a girlfriend. Most of the surviving examples of woman's song in Middle English are carols, that is to say, songs originally created to accompany dancing. Much of the surviving Old French corpus of woman's song also takes the metrical form of dance songs (ballette, rondeau). The surviving examples of Middle Latin woman's song, which were probably composed by male clerics, are sometimes charming, witty, or bawdy, and sometimes ironic and even misogynist. The woman's song of early medieval Spain reflects the linguistic, ethnic, and religious diversity of its three communities of Christians, Muslims, and Jews.

In German courtly love poetry (Minnesang), some male poets use woman's song for particularly dramatic effects. The lady in the verses of the poet Reinmar der Alte ("Reinmar the old") voices the paradox of being ravished by Reinmar's poetry but unable to act on her love due to social constraints (MF 178, 1). A woman entirely rejects courtly love (hohe Minne) as male hypocrisy and dangerous to her honor in Hartmann von Aue's Frauenlied (MF 213, 13). The poet Walther von der Vogelweide, widely regarded as one of the greatest of all German poets from medieval times to the present, composed fourteen poems with female speakers. His ladies engage in witty debate with the poet-lover on the meaning of female honor, which they see in the exercise of reason, not sexual discipline, a distant echo of Christine de Pizan. One of Walther's Mädchenlieder (songs articulated by a young woman not belonging to the court) is the most famous poem from medieval Germany. It is commonly called "Under der linden" ("under the linden tree") after its opening words (L 39, 11). In it a woman joyfully recalls an episode of lovemaking in a bed of roses under a linden tree, letting the audience in on her pleasures while enjoining the nightingale (a symbol of the poet) to complete secrecy.

Woman's sexual desire and frank sexual pleasure is also openly expressed in the European genre known as the dawn song (German Tagelied). Conversely, the female-voiced lyrics in the Old French chanson de malmariée (song of an unhappily married woman) suggest situations of domestic and sexual violence, and to a modern mind, the "seduction" scenarios of some carols and pastourelles (songs narrating an encounter between a shepherdess and a poet or lover) seem like rape. As Klinck states in the forward to her anthology, in woman's song "we find a woman's voice protesting against a male-imposed state of affairs and elevating the private over the public, the individual over the group, personal ties over social responsibilities" (1). Woman's song evokes the range, depth, and breadth of ways in which love is experienced, and at the same time it has been a vehicle for protest, resistance, and the discovery of an independently feeling self.

ANN MARIE RASMUSSEN

References and Further Reading

Bruckner, Matilda Tomaryn, Laurie Shepard, and Sarah White, eds. and trans. Songs of the Women Troubadours. New York: Garland, 1995.

- Cheyette, Frederic L., and Margaret Switten. "Women in Troubadour Song: Of the Comtessa and the Vilana." Women & Music 2 (1998): 26–45.
- Cramer, Thomas, John Greenfield, Ingrid Kasten, and Erwin Koller, eds. Frauenlieder Cantigas de Amigo. Stuttgart: Hirzel, 2000.
- Doss-Quinby, Eglal, Joan Trasker Grimbert, Wendy Pfeffer, and Elizabeth Aubrey, eds. and trans. Songs of the Women Trouvères. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 2001.
- Grimbert, Joan Tasker. "Songs by Women and Women's Song: How Useful is the Concept of Register?" In The Court Reconvenes: Courtly Literature across the Disciplines. Selected Papers from the Ninth Triennial Congress of the International Courtly Literature Society, University of British Columbia, 25–31 July 1998, edited by Barbara Altmann and Carleton W. Carroll. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell & Brewer, 2003, pp. 117–124.
- Kasten, Ingrid, ed and trans. Frauenlieder des Mittelalters. Zweisprachig. Stuttgart: Reclam, 1990.
- Klinck, Anne L., ed and trans. Anthology of Ancient and Medieval Woman's Song. New York: Palgrave, 2004.
- . "Poetic Markers of Gender in Medieval 'Woman's Song': Was Anonymous a Woman?" Neophilologus 87.3 (2003): 339–359.
- Klinck, Anne L., and Ann Marie Rasmussen, eds. Medieval Woman's Song: Cross-Cultural Approaches. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2002.
- "The Medieval Lyric." Projects for Teaching supported by the National Endowment for the Humanities and Mount Holyoke College. http://www.mtholyoke.edu/acad/medst/medieval\_lyric/index.html.
- Pfeffer, Wendy. "Complaints of Women, Complaints by Women: Can One Tell Them Apart?" In The Court Reconvenes: Courtly Literature across the Disciplines. Selected Papers from the Ninth Triennial Congress of the International Courtly Literature Society, University of British Columbia, 25–31 July 1998, edited by Barbara Altmann and Carleton W. Carroll. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell & Brewer, 2003, pp. 125–131.
- Rasmussen, Ann Marie. "Reason and the Female Voice in Walther von der Vogelweide's Poetry." In Medieval Woman's Song: Cross-Cultural Approaches, edited by Anne L. Klinck and Ann Marie Rasmussen. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2002, pp. 168–186.
- . "Representing Woman's Desire: Walther's Woman's Stanzas in 'Ich hoere iu sô vil tugende jehen' (L43,9), 'Under der linden' (L39,11) and 'Frô Welt' (L100,24)." In Women as Protagonists and Poets in the German Middle Ages: An Anthology of Feminist Approaches to Middle High German Literature, edited by Albrecht Classen. Göttingen: Kümmerle, 1991, pp. 69–85.

See also Courtly Love; Dance; Dawn Song (Alba); Literature, German; Literature, Iberian; Literature, Latin; Literature, Middle English; Literature, Occitan; Literature, Old French; Minnesang; Pastourelle; Trobairitz and Troubadours

WOMEN AUTHORS: GERMAN TEXTS

While it is certain that ordinary women created literature through oral media such as song during the Middle Ages, there is only indirect evidence of their works. The first learned woman writer whose name is known is also the first German dramatist: the tenth-century canoness Hrotsvit of Gandersheim (Saxony). Composing in Latin and often using humor to make a point, Hrotsvit adapted the comedies of Terence to Christian teaching, especially the praise of chastity, for use in her Benedictine monastery. The next women authors of whom we have certain knowledge lived in the twelfth century. Like Hrotsvit they flourished in monastic communities and used Latin. Three are from the Rhineland. Hildegard of Bingen, abbess of Rupertsberg (1098–1179), produced a theological, musical, visionary, and scientific oeuvre including correspondence that shows her authority spread far beyond the Benedictine convent she founded. Elisabeth, a nun from the Benedictine monastery of Schönau (1129–1164), recorded her ecstatic visions partly under the influence of Hildegard, whom she visited at Rupertsberg and contacted by letter. Herrad of Landsberg (died 1195) was the abbess of the Augustinian house of canonesses in Hohenbourg near Strasbourg. She directed the production of a singular manuscript (now destroyed), the Hortus deliciarum (Garden of Delights), a compendium of Christian knowledge with almost 350 individual images including portraits of the nuns in her monastery.

The first woman writer using the German language had a spiritual calling as an anchoress, probably connected to the Benedictine monastery in Melk (Austria). Frau Ava (deceased about 1127) retold the lives of John the Baptist and Jesus in a fast-moving narrative style that has been praised as the first German epic. An anonymous nun is traditionally credited with writing down the earliest extant German love poem, a single but striking strophe known by its first line, “I am all yours.” It was included at the end of an anonymous Latin love letter written in a woman’s voice. Ten additional Latin letters, the majority woman-voiced, including two in which women express their love for other women, are copied in a late-twelfth-century Bavarian manuscript from Tegernsee monastery. It is not known what women composed these letters or whether they might have served as rhetorical models for male students.

Religious Writings

Vernacular literature flourished in the German courts in the decades around 1200. Ironically, no woman writers arose from this literary movement despite the fascination with gender evident in court texts. Yet a short time later one woman was in the vanguard as a writer of religious works in the vernacular. Mechthild of Magdeburg (1207–1282), most of her life a Beguine, was inspired by Dominican evangelism to reach a wide audience by composing in her native Low (northern) German. Although her originals are lost, they were translated into High (southern) German and Latin. Mechthild was a mystic who expressed her experience of God’s love in highly original fusions of vernacular verse and prose, as well as in hymns, prayers, anecdotes, and dialogues. The influence of secular minnesang (love poetry of the courts) is present in her work. Late in her life Mechthild joined the Cistercian monastery of Helfta in Saxony, where two of her sisters in religion, Gertrude the Great and Mechthild of Hackeborn, produced their own mystical texts and correspondence under Mechthild’s influence. The visions of Mechthild of Hackeborn were recorded in Latin for her first audiences, but German versions circulated in later manuscripts. Her vita (spiritual biography) of her abbess and biological older sister, Gertrude of Hackeborn, was also available in both languages. Gertrude of Hackeborn in turn was a distinguished educator at Helfta.

Dominican nuns in the fourteenth century continued the tradition of German women’s mysticism but created a new genre for its expression. Known as the sister book, it combined a history of the monastery with biographies of nuns who had received special graces from the Lord. Nine sister books are extant, seven written in German and two in Latin with closely related German translations. Sister books were communal and cooperative efforts that required archival research, oral testimony, writing, compilation, and editing. Still, some sister books are associated with a single nun who took a leading role in their production, including Anna von Munzingen (Adelhausen), Katharina von Gebersweiler (Unterlinden), Christine Ebner (Engeltal), Elisabeth von Kirchberg (Kirchberg) and Elsbet Stigel (Töss). These nuns are known for additional writings: Christine Ebner recorded her revelations in German in her spiritual biography, while Stigel collaborated with Heinrich Seuse, the most popular mystic of the era, in the composition of his vita. Additional figures associated with the outpouring of German writing by Dominican nuns in the fourteenth century are Adelheid Langmann (Engeltal), Elsbeth von Oye (Ötenbach), and Margaretha Ebner (Maria Medingen). Ebner was a partner, with the itinerant priest Heinrich von Nördlingen, in the first German-language correspondence. Convent and religious writing in German continued in the fifteenth century; for example, the works of the nun Elisabeth Kempf (1415–1485), but it has not been as fully researched as the earlier records.

Increasing Literacy

The spread of literacy and the burgeoning use of German for all forms of written communication created new opportunities for women in the fifteenth century. The first female professional scribe, Klara Hätzlerin (1430–1476), worked in Augsburg. Several of her manuscripts have been identified, including one devoted to themes of love. Mechthild von der Pfalz (1419–1482) was a literary patron, book collector, and cofounder of the University of Tübingen. The first personal memoir in the German language was composed by an Austrian noblewoman named Helene Kottaner (about 1400–1470). It is a gripping tale of how she stole the crown of St. Stephen, which was used in the coronation of the kings of Hungary, in order to safeguard the sovereignty rights of the unborn child of the queen she served. More glimpses of noblewomen's lived experience are available in fifteenth-century correspondence: a companionate marriage is reflected in the letters of Margareta von Schwangau (died about 1459) to her poet husband, Oswald von Wolkenstein; and their daughter, Maria von Wolkenstein, abbess of the Poor Clares in Brixen (Tyrol), used secret correspondence in 1455–1456 to appeal to her brothers for help in staving off unwanted monastic reforms imposed by her bishop. The letters of Perchta and Aněžka Rožmberk, daughters of a powerful Bohemian family, are dictated partly in German and partly in Czech. They recount Perchta's self-defense in a marriage gone sour through delay of dowry payments (letters 1448–1488). Aněžka is an important example of a literate single woman, one who neither married nor became a nun.

Two noblewomen greatly advanced German prose as the medium for literary fiction through their success as translators. They were Elisabeth of Nassau Saarbrücken (1397–1456) and Eleonore Stuart (Eleonore of Scotland or of Austria) (1433–1480). Both Elisabeth and Eleonore were raised in multicultural court settings, Eleonore in Scotland and France and Elisabeth in France. Both left their natal lands to come to German-speaking states through marriage, and both were in a position to function as cultural ambassadors in their husbands' courts. Elisabeth and Eleonore both translated French chansons de geste (epics based on the life and times of Charlemagne) into German prose. Elisabeth, who was a generation older than Eleonore, translated four chansons-de-geste. One, Huge Scheppel, presents the path-breaking ideas of cross-class marriage; another, Herzog Herpin, gives female characters exceptional agency as diplomats and peacemakers. Eleonore's Pontus and Sidonia is a tale in which faithful love is tested and rewarded with both personal happiness and political success. Elizabeth and Eleonore probably regarded their translations as educational texts that would reinforce the actions and attitudes needed to govern. The immense success of their works—they were reprinted until the eighteenth century—underscores their innovative formal and thematic aspects.

SARAH WESTPHAL-WIHL

References and Further Reading

- Beach, Alison I. Women as Scribes: Book Production and Monastic Reform in Twelfth-Century Bavaria. Cambridge, U.K. and New York: Cambridge University Press, 2004.
- Classen, Albrecht. "Footnotes to the German Canon: Maria von Wolkenstein and Argula von Grumbach." In The Politics of Gender in Early Modern Europe, edited by Jean R. Brink et al. Kirksville, Mo.: Sixteenth-Century Journal Publishers, 1989, pp. 131–147.
- Edmunds, Sheila. "The Life and Works of Clara Hätzlerin." Journal of the Early Book Society 2 (1999): 1–25.
- Garber, Rebecca L. Feminine Figurae: Representations of Gender in Religious Texts by Medieval German Women Writers. New York and London: Routledge, 2002.
- Hindsley, Leonard Patrick. The Mystics of Engelthal: Writings from a Medieval Monastery. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1998.
- Karnein, Alfred. "Mechthild von der Pfalz as Patroness: Aspects of Female Patronage in the Early Renaissance." Medievalia et Humanistica n.s. 22 (1995): 141–170.
- Klassen, John M., ed. and trans. The Letters of the Rožmberk Sisters: Noblewomen in Fifteenth-Century Bohemia. Library of Medieval Women. Woodbridge, Suffolk: D. S. Brewer, 2001.
- Klink, Anne L., ed. and trans. "I am all yours, you are all mine." In An Anthology of Ancient and Medieval Woman's Song. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004.
- Lewis, Gertrud Jaron. By Women, for Women, about Women: The Sister-Books of Fourteenth-Century Germany. Toronto: Pontifical Institute of Medieval Studies, 1996.
- Morrison, Susan Signe. "Women Writers and Women Rulers: Rhetorical and Political Empowerment in the Fifteenth Century." Women in German Yearbook: Feminist Studies in German Literature and Culture 9 (1993): 25–48.
- Poor, Sarah S. Mechthild of Magdeburg and Her Book: Gender and the Making of Textual Authority. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2004.
- Skow-Obenaus, Katya. "Wives and Mothers: A Study of Roles in Herzog Herpin and Kaiser Octavian." Germanic Notes and Reviews 30.2 (1999): 124–132.

See also Abbesses; Canonesses; Ebner, Margaretha; Eleanor of Scotland; Elisabeth of Schönau; Germanic Lands; Gertrude the Great; Hadewijch; Herrad of

Hohenbourg; Hildegard of Bingen; Hrotsvit of Gandersheim; Kottaner, Helene; Langmann, Adelheid; Letter Writing; Mechthild of Hackeborn; Mechthild of Magdeburg; Mystics' Writings; Patronage, Literary; Singlewomen; Sister-Books and Other Convent Chronicles; Stigel, Elsbeth; Translation

WOMEN AUTHORS: ITALIAN TEXTS

The near-total absence of women authors writing in Italian in the Middle Ages is somewhat surprising, given their presence in other language traditions. In the cluster of dialects animating the Italian peninsula there are no figures writing who parallel Marie de France, Hildegard of Bingen, or Julian of Norwich, for example. The single woman poet writing in Tuscan Italian in the thirteenth century, the Compiuta Donzella, may be an historical figure (one about whom we have no biographical information); then again, she may be a total chimera, an invented persona, or a series of elusive figures lurking behind oblique references in lyric poems by male authors.

The impression of utter absence may, however, be artificially heightened by the relatively late start that vernacular writing received on the peninsula compared to the rest of the continent, as well as by the vestiges of periodization. The learned figure identified as Trota or Trotula, for example, reportedly wrote treatises on women's health in the context of the Salerno medical studium; these are in Latin, virtually the only language choice for erudite writing in the eleventh century. Angela da Foligno (d. 1309), who comes down to us mediated by a male amanuensis and by the conventions of spiritual writing, may have dictated her book in vernacular or Latin, but it survives only in the latter.

Finally, the fact that early modernity has traditionally been considered to emerge first in Italy assigns to the Renaissance the constellation of women writing from the fourteenth century on, in religious and/or in humanist circles. In a paradigm in which the Renaissance is frequently aligned with the writing of Dante Alighieri (1265–1321), the production (direct or indirect) of figures such as Catherine of Siena (c. 1347–1380) and Isotta Nogarola (1418–1466) falls by default to the Renaissance, not to the Middle Ages.

F. REGINA PSAKI

References and Further Reading

Green, Monica H., ed. and trans. The Trotula. A Medieval Compendium of Women's Medicine. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001.

King, Margaret L., and Albert Rabil, Jr., eds. Her Immaculate Hand: Selected Works by and about the Women Humanists of Quattrocento Italy. Binghamton, N.Y.: Pegasus Paperbooks, 1992.

Mazzoni, Cristina, ed. Angela of Foligno's Memorial. Translated from Latin with Introduction, Notes, and Interpretive Essay, translated by John Cirignano. Woodbridge, Suffolk, and Rochester, N.Y.: D. S. Brewer, 1999.

Noffke, Suzanne, trans. The Letters of Catherine of Siena. Tempe, Ariz.: Arizona Center for Medieval and Renaissance Studies, 2000.

See also Angela of Foligno; Compiuta Donzella; Tornabuoni de' Medici, Lucrezia

WOMEN AUTHORS: LATIN TEXTS

Early Christianity offered women unprecedented access to literacy, especially Latin literacy, because of its emphasis on the Word of God transmitted through the Bible. Perpetua's account of her imprisonment leading to martyrdom in 203, Latin correspondence between Fathers of the Church and a number of women, and Egeria's account of her travels in the Holy Land, probably between 381 and 384, are surviving examples of early Christian women writing Latin literature that are likely to have influenced medieval women's writing.

Between 450 and 1500, women used Latin as a medium for literature in a wide variety of genres. Some, such as letters, lyric, and mystical visions, have long been associated with women. Others are more surprising. Most notably, in the tenth century Hrotsvit of Gandersheim wrote Latin legends, dramas, and epic histories, as well as prefaces and dedicatory epistles to introduce her collected works; and in the twelfth century Hildegard of Bingen wrote letters, lyrics, hymns, religious drama, visionary and theological treatises, homilies, biography, commentaries on the Gospels, the Athanasian Creed, the Benedictine Rule, and technical books on natural history, health, and healing, all in Latin.

The earliest surviving medieval Latin texts by women are saints' lives, poems, and letters written by Merovingian noblewomen. Baudonivia, a nun in Queen and Abbess Radegund's monastery, wrote The Life of St. Radegund around 605–610. Radegund (d. 587) corresponded in Latin with Abbess Caesaria of Arles (c. 550) and various bishops in connection with her administration of the monastery for nuns she founded in Poitiers. More literary are her letters in Latin verse to a cousin and a nephew, in which conventions of classical epic and elegy merge with themes well known from Anglo-Saxon vernacular elegy.

Also poignant are some surviving Latin letters written by Brunhild, queen of the Franks (d. 613).

Especially notable is her letter to Empress Anastasia of Constantinople, asking Anastasia to return Brunhild's kidnapped grandson to Gaul rather than use him as a political pawn. Strikingly different in subject and style is Eucheria of Marseille's Latin poem of sixteen couplets listing incongruities in art and the natural world as evidence for the absurdity of her being wooed by a man of lower social standing than herself.

In the eighth century, the Saxon Abbess Hugeberg's Hodoeporicon of St. Willibald, an account of St. Willibald's pilgrimage to the Holy Land and his participation in the Christianization of Germany, is evidence that women continued to write in multiple genres, while Rudolf of Fulda's Life of St. Leoba provides considerable evidence of extensive Latin learning among the female religious leaders. Letters written by a group of Anglo-Saxon nuns associated with Boniface, the missionary to the Frisians and Saxons martyred in 754, illustrate stylistic variety. Scholars have noted the influence of Anglo-Saxon winileodas, songs for a lover, and Old Testament poetry on some of these letters, such as the nun Berthgyth's letters to her brother Balthard, with its range of stylistic devices and motifs, as she begs him to visit her and ease her sorrow. Dhuoda of Uzès's lengthy letter to her sixteen-year-old son, begun in November 841 and completed in February 843, a manual of advice in eleven sections, provides a particularly good example of how literary Medieval Latin letters could be. Peter Dronke identifies the ethic of Dhuoda's letter as different from any other surviving document from the period in its insistence that her son can serve both the world and God and in the twofold service find great joy (41).

Women writing Latin from the tenth century to the fifteenth century tend to be more familiar. Latin texts by Hrotsvit, Hildegard, Heloise, Elisabeth of Schönau, Gertrude of Helfta, Herrad of Hohenbourg, Catherine of Siena, Clare of Assisi, and Birgitta of Sweden, increasingly available in translation, exemplify the range and variety of ways in which women used Latin to make their voices heard. Social class continued to be a usual prerequisite for Latin literacy. Queen Edith of England (d. 1075), wrote a Latin biography of her husband, Edward the Confessor. Latin letters written by Queen Matilda of England (1080–1118) illustrate her involvement in the disputes between Henry I and Archbishop Anselm of Canterbury. She even wrote to Pope Pascal II on Anselm's behalf. Also in the eleventh century, a nun named Constance exchanged with Baudri of Bourgueil Latin verse poems imitating Ovid's Heroides.

Scholars of the Italian Renaissance often refer to the appearance of the learned woman as a phenomenon of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries.

Humanism did bring with it remarkable opportunities for some women to participate in Latin literacy. Battista da Montefeltro Malatesta (1383–1450), Costanza Varano, Ippolita Sforza, and Cassandra Fedele wrote and delivered Latin orations in public; Maddalena Scrovegni (1356–1429), Isotta (1418–1466), Ginevra Nogarola (1417–1461/1468), and Cecilia Gonzaga (1425–1451), all well known in their own time as learned women, were encouraged—to some extent—to write Latin literature. Yet these women encountered significant obstacles. Humanist education and learning aimed to prepare citizens for service to the state; women were explicitly excluded from serving the state in any direct way. Some early humanistic Latin literature written by women differs from contemporary vernacular literature by women and Latin literature by men in its preciousness—seemingly written mainly to prove that the authors are capable of doing so. Laura Cereta (1469–1499), whose Epistolae familiares (Letters to Family and Friends) was published for the first time in the seventeenth century, is a notable exception prefiguring a number of exceptionally learned women who wrote in Latin throughout Europe in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.

PHYLLIS R. BROWN

References and Further Reading

- Churchill, Laurie J., Phyllis R. Brown, and Jane E. Jeffrey, eds. Women Writing Latin from Roman Antiquity to Early Modern Europe. 3 vols. New York: Routledge, 2002.
- Dronke, Peter. Women Writers of the Middle Ages. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984.
- King, Margaret L., and Albert Rabil, Jr. Her Immaculate Hand: Selected Works by and about the Women Humanists of Quattrocento Italy. Binghamton, N.Y.: Medieval & Renaissance Texts & Studies, 1992.
- McNamara, Jo Ann, and John E. Halborg, with E. Gordon Whatley, ed and trans. Sainted Women of the Dark Ages. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1992.
- Petroff, Elizabeth Alvilda, ed. Medieval Women's Visionary Literature. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- Thiébaux, Marcelle, trans. The Writings of Medieval Women: An Anthology. Second edition. New York: Garland, 1994.
- Wilson, Katharina M., ed. Medieval Women Writers. Athens, Ga.: University of Georgia Press, 1984.

See also Birgitta of Sweden; Brunhild and Fredegund; Catherine of Siena; Cereta, Laura; Clare of Assisi; Dhuoda; Edith; Education, Lay; Education, Monastic; Elisabeth of Schönau; Fedele, Cassandra; Gertrude the Great; Hagiography; Heloise; Herrad of Hohenbourg; Hildegard of Bingen; Hrotsvit of Gandersheim; Humanism; Leoba; Letter Writing; Literacy and Reading; Latin; Literature, Latin; Mystics' Writings; Nogarola, Isotta; Ovid, Medieval Reception of; Radegund

WOMEN AUTHORS: MIDDLE ENGLISH TEXTS

Few women writers writing in Middle English are known by name, and the ones who are known date from the fourteenth century or later. Women who wrote in England most often wrote in French (including Marie de France and Clemence of Barking); usually the texts they chose to write were religious works. Almost all the known women writers writing in English were either religious writers or translators of religious works. Most prominent are the two religious contemplatives Julian of Norwich and Margery Kempe. Julian wrote an account of her visions of Christ in two major versions, a short version some time after she had her visions in the 1370s and a longer version written some twenty years later, after she had become an anchoress in Norwich. The longer version seems to qualify potentially heretical implications of the earlier version. Julian is known for her subtle, rational theology, which includes a celebration of Christ's feminine aspects.

Margery Kempe, who visited Julian in her anchorhold seeking affirmation of her choice to pursue a chaste contemplative life, apparently dictated her autobiography to a priest around 1438. One of the startling characteristics of Margery is her refusal to retreat from the public sphere in her pursuit of a religious life. Formerly a business woman of many talents, including brewing, she continued to seek union with Christ in the secular sphere outside any religious institution. The text tells of her decision to enter into a chaste marriage after giving birth to thirteen children, her visions of Christ, her self-defenses in the face of those who accused her of heresy, and her various pilgrimages, including one to Jerusalem. She is presented in the narrative either by herself or by her scribe as willful, adroitly self-protective, and, at times, exasperating. Her presence in the secular sphere, rather than under the guiding hand of the Church, may be one reason why Margery generated such hostility both then and now, for, as Beckwith has shown, Church and community vied for control of the Christian cultural capital such a devout woman represented. Spearing has recently argued that there is little evidence proving that this is a text written by a woman and that Margery's autobiographical voice may be a male fiction.

Other known fifteenth-century writers include Eleanor Hull (d. 1460), who translated a commentary on the penitential psalms and some devout meditations, Margaret Beaufort (d. 1504), who, with William Atkinson, translated Thomas a Kempis's Imitation of Christ, and Dame Juliana Berners, who may have written parts of the Book of St. Albans, a treatise on hunting and related sports printed in 1486. The fifteenth century also produced notable letters by women, including the Paston letters, many written by several generations of women of the socially aspiring gentry family. The Paston letters are an especially rich source about women's roles in the governance of large households, and about middle-class marriage practices. The letters tell, for example, of Margery Paston's choice to marry the family bailiff, Richard Calle, despite her family's strenuous disapproval and her subsequent disinheritance.

Other female writers undoubtedly existed in this period and earlier; it is likely, for example, that numerous anonymous lyrics were written by women. A female scribe has been identified as the copyist of a Nunnaminster manuscript, but not as a producer of literary works. It is possible that female recluses composed short anonymous lyric meditations on Christ, such as those known as The Wooing of Our Lord. The late-fifteenth-century Findern manuscript—a compilation of poetry, lyrics added at a later date, recipes, and bills—contains works probably written down and possibly composed by women. The Findern manuscript suggests the different ways women may have engaged manuscript culture, for the manuscript contains scraps of information such as butcher's bills, pen trials of female names, and short lyrics on topics of particular concern to women living in the provinces whose husbands traveled frequently—for example, lyrics of lament at abandonment. Other manuscripts may well include anonymous lyrics by women written in spare blank spaces of manuscripts. Middle English translations of works written by or attributed to women also exist, including some lais of Marie de France in English, spiritual works by continental women, some of Christine de Pizan's works, and treatises on women's health. Additional names of women writers and their work will undoubtedly be uncovered in future research, especially as assumptions about the nature of authorship come under scrutiny.

ELIZABETH ROBERTSON

References and Further Reading

- Aers, David, and Lynn Staley. The Powers of the Holy. University Park Pa.: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1996.
- Beckwith, Sarah. "The Uses of Corpus Christi and The Book of Margery Kempe." In Christ's Body: Identity, Culture and Society in Late Medieval Writings. London and New York: Routledge, 1993, pp. 78–111.
- Davis, Norman, ed. The Paston Letters. Early English Text Society SS 20. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2004.
- Dinshaw, Carolyn, and David Wallace. The Cambridge Companion to Medieval Women's Writing. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2003.

WOMEN AUTHORS: MIDDLE ENGLISH TEXTS

- Glasscoe, Marion. A Revelation of Love: Julian of Norwich. Exeter: University of Exeter Press, 1993.
- Lochrie, Karma. Margery Kempe and Translations of the Flesh. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1991.
- McNamer, Sarah. "Female Authors: Provincial Setting: The Re-Versing of Courtly Love in the Findern Manuscript." Viator 22 (1991): 303–310.
- Robertson, Elizabeth. "Medieval Medical Views of Women and the Female Spirituality of the Ancrene Wisse and Julian of Norwich." In Feminist Approaches to the Body in Medieval Literature, edited by Linda Lomperis and Sarah Stanbury. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1993, pp. 142–167.
- Robinson, P. R. "A Twelfth-Century Scriptorix from Nunaminster." In Of the Making of Books: Medieval Manuscripts, Their Scribes and Readers. Essays Presented to M.B. Parkes, edited by P. R. Robinson and Rivkah Zim. Aldershot, U.K.: Scolar Press, 1997.
- Spearing, A. C. "Margery Kempe." In A Companion to Middle English Prose, edited by A. S. G. Edwards. Cambridge: D. S. Brewer, 2004, pp. 83–97.
- Staley, Lynn. The Book of Margery Kempe. TEAMS. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Medieval Institute Publications, 1996.
- Thompson, W. Meredith. Pe Wooing of Ure Lauerd. Early English Text Society 241. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1958.

See also Ancrene Wisse; Beaufort, Margaret; Christine de Pizan; Julian of Norwich; Kempe, Margery; Paston Letters

WOMEN AUTHORS: OLD FRENCH TEXTS

So much medieval literature is anonymous that we cling to the few proper names we can attach to individual works or manuscripts. Women authors are scarcer even than men because of women's limited access during the Middle Ages to formal education and the channels through which literature was commissioned, circulated, and collected. Certain lyric genres feature women's voices as the speaking subjects, although we cannot know who actually composed and recorded them in writing. As for identifiable historical figures, we have no more than a handful of names to list with confidence as women authors of medieval French literature. Three of them are introduced here.

Women's voices are heard in the genre known as chansons de toile (spinning songs), a corpus of narrative poems from the early thirteenth century. These poems may preserve the vestiges of a much earlier oral tradition of songs sung by women while weaving, spinning, and doing needlework, traditional domestic activities for women of all classes. The poetic form of these stories, which most often concern the unhappy love of a young woman, is marked by assonance or rhyme, a simple refrain, and highly conventional characters and settings. They are remarkable, nonetheless, for adopting a consistent female perspective.

Marie de France is the earliest identifiable woman author in Old French, although we have almost no biographical information. Her name derives from a mention at the end of her Fables: "Marie ai num, si sui de France" (my name is Marie, and I am from France). That small detail, combined with textual and philological evidence from the manuscripts that preserve her works, has led to the general consensus that Marie was a learned, native speaker of French, writing most likely at the court of Henry II of England. She is best known for her Lais (1160–1175), twelve tales of variable length composed in octosyllabic rhyming couplets, inspired by Breton lais known from oral tradition. Their subject matter is diverse, although most develop a love story of some kind and many incorporate elements of the marvelous. Her lai "Lanval" is the earliest text in Old French to treat Arthurian material, and "Chèvrefeuille" recounts a brief episode of the Tristan and Iseult story developed much more fully by other writers. Marie's Lais make her one of the key authors in the development of the medieval romance. The other works attributed to her are the Fables (1167–1189), mentioned above, the first known French adaptation of Aesop's fables, and the Espurgatoire saint Patrice (Saint Patrick's Purgatory) (1189).

A century later, Marguerite Porete (d. 1310) composed a mystical text entitled the Mirouer des simples ames (Mirror of Simple Souls), in which several characters discuss in dialogue the progress of the Soul towards union with God. Marguerite is associated with the Beguines. Her work is often read in the context of other medieval women mystics writing either in Latin or other vernacular languages, such as Julian of Norwich. Writing inspired by spiritual experience is one of the few types of literature in which medieval women are well represented, given the relative autonomy they enjoyed in religious houses or informal communities like beguinages, the prestige of the contemplative life, and the education available to women in such settings. Their writings, however, are often controversial. Marguerite's book was condemned and burned by the bishop of Cambrai, and she herself was tried by inquisitors, found guilty of heresy, excommunicated, and burned at the stake in 1310.

In contrast to the paucity of information we have on Marie and Marguerite, the life of Christine de Pizan is much better known, due largely to her own writings. Christine (1364–1430) counts among the major authors of late medieval France for both the quantity and the quality of her work. Christine became well educated in the learned milieu of King Charles V's court in Paris. She describes her transformation into a writer as a necessity imposed by Fortune after the deaths of her father and her beloved husband. Given her access to the aristocracy, she succeeded in writing and finding patronage for volumes of lyric poetry, debate poems, political treatises, epistles, and long allegorical works on a broad range of topics. She saw her work as solidly in the tradition of her literary forefathers, but she also wrote bold new works that challenged misogynist thinking and promoted the basic goodness and worth of women. Her best known text is the Livre de la cité des dames (Book of the City of Ladies), for which she drew on the works of Augustine and Boccaccio in her design for a model community to house all women of virtue.

BARBARA K. ALTMANN

References and Further Reading

- Bloch, R. Howard. The Anonymous Marie de France. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2003.
- Blumfeld-Kosinski, Renate, and Kevin Brownlee, eds. and trans. The Selected Writings of Christine de Pizan. New York: Norton, 1997.
- Burgess, Glyn S. The Lais of Marie de France: Text and Context. Athens, Ga.: University of Georgia Press, 1987.
- Christine de Pizan. Le Livre de la cité des dames (The Book of the City of Ladies), translated by Rosalind Brown-Grant. New York: Penguin, 1999.
- Dronke, Peter. Women Writers of the Middle Ages: A Critical Study of Texts from Perpetua (d. 203) to Marguerite Porete (d. 1310). Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984.
- Georgiadou, Aristoula. "Porete, Marguerite." In Women in the Middle Ages, edited by Katharina M. Wilson and Nadia Margolis. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 2004, pp. 761–765.
- Golden, Frederick, ed. and trans. Lyrics of the Troubadours and Trouvères: An Anthology and a History. New York: Doubleday, 1973.
- Klinck, Anne L., and Ann Marie Rasmussen, eds. Medieval Woman's Song: Cross-Cultural Approaches. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2002.
- Marie de France. Espurgatoire saint Patrice (Saint Patrick's Purgatory), translated by Michael J. Curley. Binghamton, N.Y.: Medieval and Renaissance Texts and Studies, 1993.
- Marie de France. Fables, edited and translated by Harriet Spiegel. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1987.
- Marie de France. Lais, translated by Joan Ferrante and Robert Hanning. New York: Dutton, 1978.
- Plummer, John F., ed. Vox Feminae: Studies in Medieval Woman's Songs. Studies in Medieval Culture 15. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Medieval Institute, 1981.
- Porete, Marguerite. Le Mirouer des simples ames/Margere-tae Porete Speculum simplicium animarum, edited by Romana Guarnieri and Paul Verdeyen. Corpus Christianorum Continuatio Medievalis, 69. Turnhout: Brepols, 1986.
- . Margaret Porette. The Mirror of Simple Souls, translated by Edmund Colledge, J. C. Marler, and Judith Grant. Notre Dame Texts in Medieval Culture 6. Notre Dame, Ind.: University of Notre Dame Press, 1999.
- Willard, Charity Canon. Christine de Pizan: Her Life and Works. New York: Persea, 1984.
- See also Beguines; Christine de Pizan; Literature, Old French; Marguerite Porete; Marie de France; Mysticism and Mystics; Mystics' Writings; Woman's Song

WOMEN AUTHORS: SPANISH TEXTS

The earliest known woman author writing in Castilian is the noblewoman Leonor López de Córdoba (c. 1362/1363–c. 1412). She wrote her autobiographical Memorias sometime after 1412. The brief work covers only part of her life, ending abruptly in about 1401. It is intended to defend her family, which suffered greatly for being on the losing side of a bitter dynastic struggle. Leonor's father was advisor to King Pedro I of Castile (1350–1369). When Pedro was murdered by his half-brother Enrique II of Trastámara, her father was executed and Leonor, then nine years old, and most of her extended family were imprisoned. The Memorias recounts the death of most of them in prison and the later loss of a son to the plague. Throughout the work Leonor emphasizes her religious piety and humility in the face of enormous personal tragedy. It is noteworthy that Leonor survived and at times thrived due to the relationships she cultivated with strong women. She tells how, after prison, she was taken in by a wealthy maternal aunt, who made it possible for her to acquire property. Some years after writing Memorias she became the favorite of Queen Catalina of Lancaster, wife of Enrique III, who for several years enjoyed considerable power.

Teresa de Cartagena (c. 1425–after 1465) is the author of two important works, Arboleda de los enfermos and Admiración operum Dey (both written before 1480). Teresa was a member of an illustrious family of conversos (converts from Judaism). She took monastic vows as an adolescent, initially entering a Franciscan house and transferring to a Cistercian community in 1449. This decision and the tone of her written works may have owed something to the anti-converso riots of 1449. Some years after entering the monastery she became deaf, an affliction that motivated her to write Arboleda. The work is part autobiography and part consolation. It treats illness, and deafness in particular, as an opportunity for spiritual growth, a way of turning inward, away from earthly distractions. Its self-confident use of biblical and patristic sources indicates Teresa's high level of education. Two years after finishing Arboleda, apparently in reaction to male critics who refused to believe that a woman could have produced such a learned treatise, Teresa wrote Admiración. In it she not only insists that Arboleda was her own, divinely inspired work, but she also more generally defends women's strength of character and intelligence. A subtle use of imagery, irony, and control of the rhetoric of humility make this earliest defense of female authorship written in Spanish a powerful work.

Nothing is known about the life of the poet Florencia Pinar, who wrote in the second half of the fifteenth century. Her extant corpus consists of only three finely wrought lyric poems. The importance of Pinar lies partly in that she is one of the very few named female poets included in the massive corpus of the Castilian cancioneros, poetry miscellanies that feature the work of hundreds of male poets. At times ambiguous in vocabulary and tone, her poems have been read as protofeminist rejections of the constraints placed on women's roles and desire by the "rules" of courtly love.

BARBARA F. WEISSBERGER

References and Further Reading

- Kaminsky, Amy Katz and Elaine Dorrough Johnson. "To Restore Córdoba." In The Female Autograph, edited by Domna C. Stanton. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1987, pp. 71–87.
- Seidenspinner-Núñez, Dayle. The Writings of Teresa de Cartagena. Cambridge: D. S. Brewer, 1998.
- Snow, Joseph. "The Spanish Love Poet: Florencia Pinar." In Medieval Women Writers, edited by Katharina M. Wilson. Athens, Ga.: University of Georgia Press, and Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1984, pp. 320–332.

See also Iberia; Literature, Iberian; López de Córdoba, Leonor; Teresa de Cartagena

WOMEN MEDIEVALISTS IN THE ACADEMY

Women scholars have chosen to make the study of the Middle Ages their life's work since the eighteenth century, when Elizabeth Elstob (1684–1756), attracted to the study of Old English, published the first vernacular grammar of the language. But until the twentieth century, women were hampered by their inability to obtain an advanced degree and teach at a university, and, therefore, earn an adequate living from their scholarship. Independent scholar Anne Jameson (1794–1860), the first art historian, published authoritative works about medieval Italian art, but ended her life in poverty.

If women were not allowed to earn higher degrees at universities, then they researched and published outside academe. Evelyn Underhill (1875–1941) independently published a definitive work on mysticism; freelance writer Dorothy Sayers (1893–1957) translated Dante. But women also encountered misogynistic resistance from male reviewers, inside or out of the academy. Elstob's work was snubbed by fellow Anglo-Saxonists; Jessie L. Weston (1850–1928), writing on the origins of Grail romance, was criticized as unscholarly and ignored.

And when women were hired, finally, to teach at a university or college, their originality was misperceived as eccentric, as was the case with young Beryl Smalley (1905–1984), a pioneer in the history of the study of Bible and commentaries in the Middle Ages, when she was selected as a research fellow at Girton College of Cambridge University.

That women have advanced the development of various medieval fields in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries testifies to their dedication to their professions, the quality of their achievements, and the encouragement of other individuals. Women medievalists distinguished themselves for three different reasons. First, they found other ways to enable academic degrees or careers. They may have relocated to obtain a degree or tenure, as did Caroline Spurgeon (1869–1942), for example, who left England for the Sorbonne in order to obtain a Ph.D. (but returned to serve as the first woman professor in England); or Elisabeth Gössmann (1928–), who left her university in Germany for one in Japan when she did not receive her Habilitacion upon publication of her first book. Three distinguished paleographers who worked in manuscript departments at national libraries without being named director—Anneliese Maier (1905–1971), Suzanne Solente (1895–1978), and Marie-Thérèse d'Alverny (1903–1991)—also published groundbreaking works on medieval philosophy and French and Latin literature.

Second, some medievalists—Eileen Power (1889–1940) and Marjorie Chibnall (1914–), in history, and the Loomis wives, Gertrude Schoepperle Loomis (1882–1921), Laura Hibbard Loomis (1882–1960), and Dorothy Bethurum Loomis (1897–1987), in literature—found male mentors (dissertation directors, colleagues, husbands) who supported their work. Others who married at a time when society demanded that they put their husbands' needs before their own accompanied their husbands to universities or nearby colleges and still distinguished themselves as scholars within their institutions and their fields, such as Dorothy Stenton (1894–1971), in history, and Charity Cannon Willard (1914–), in French.

Third, some women medievalists simply persevered in their pursuit of research, despite silence toward their work, unfair reviews, or being passed over for awards, larger salaries, promotions, chairs, and other distinctions. Elise Richter (1865–1943) was the first woman in Austria to earn the title of professor, in 1907, although she only received it formally in 1921. Edith Rickert (1871–1938), trained at the University of Chicago, had collaborated with John Matthews Manly on their monumental Chaucer edition, but received lesser credit and attention (Manly, without Rickert, received the Haskins Medal from the Medieval Academy of America). Nellie Neilson (1873–1947), chair of her department and, later, president of the American Historical Association, was forced by her university—despite many honors and publications—to retire early. Joan Evans (1893–1977), in art history, was designated a “Dame” long after less-qualified men had received the equivalent honor. Cora Lutz (1906–1985) and her Latin editions of Carolingian commentators received scathing reviews, but after she retired at Wilson College she catalogued and described pre-1600 manuscripts at the Yale Beinecke Library.

Those fields that most blocked women’s progress included medieval Latin, Germanic philology, theology, philosophy, archaeology, and intellectual history. Those fields that allowed women some success included art history, as is evident from the careers of Jane Hayward (1919–1994), working on stained glass, and Elaine Bloch (1929–), on misericords; women’s history and literature, in the case of Mary Bateson (1865–1931), whose work on nunneries and catalog of books at Syon Monastery are cited today; Hope Emily Allen, whose edition of Margery Kempe endures; Régine Pernoud (1909–1998), with her book on Joan of Arc; and many recent scholars who have worked on medieval religious women, particularly the mystics.

The first women medievalists to attain the highest office in a professional society include, among others, Neilson, social and constitutional history, president of the American Historical Association, in 1942; Sirarpie Der Nersessian (1896–1989), Armenian art history, full professor at Dumbarton Oaks; and Ruth J. Dean (1902–2003), Anglo-Norman literature, president of the Medieval Academy, in 1973.

In the recent past, women flourished at women’s colleges and, in the present, at large metropolitan universities where women can network with one another. Because of changing demographics, women now claim the majority in selected medieval fields. And although they may not have received fellowships to finish their research during their academic careers, in retirement women medievalists such as Anglo-Norman scholar Dean, ecclesiastical historian Majorie Chibnall (1914–), and Middle English scholar Marie Borroff (1923–) have published their life’s work into their sunset years, with continuing distinction.

JANE CHANCE

References and Further Reading

- Chance, Jane, ed. Women Medievalists and the Academy. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 2005.
- Damico, Helen, and Joseph B. Zavadil (vol. 1 only), with Donald Fennema and Karmen Lenz (vols. 2 and 3 only). Medieval Scholarship: Biographical Studies on the Formation of a Discipline. 3 vols: History, vol. 1; Literature and Philology, vol. 2; Philosophy and the Arts, vol. 3. New York: Garland, 1995–2000.
- Scanlon, Jennifer, and Sharon Cosner, eds. American Women Historians, 1700s–1900s: A Biographical Dictionary. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1996.
- Sherman, Claire Richter, with Adele M. Holcomb, eds. Women as Interpreters of the Visual Arts, 1820–1979. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1981.
- Stanbury, Sarah, guest ed. Feminist Legacies: Female Medieval Scholars and the Academy. Medieval Feminist Forum 30–31 (2001).
- Wheeler, Bonnie, and Fiona Tolhurst. On Arthurian Women: Essays in Memory of Maureen Fries. Dallas, Tex.: Scriptorium Press, 2001.

See also Gender in History; History, Medieval Women’s; Misericords; Misogyny; Mystics’ Writings; Power, Eileen

WOODVILLE, ELIZABETH

In 1464, Elizabeth (1437–1492) secretly married the Yorkist King Edward IV of England. Elizabeth’s first husband, Sir John Grey, had been killed in 1460 fighting on behalf of the Lancastrians during the Wars of the Roses. Her marriage to the king may have rankled some, especially Edward’s advisors, who were already negotiating with the French, and those who resented the royal favors and marriages subsequently bestowed upon Elizabeth’s relatives. However, Edward’s kinship to the large and ambitious Woodville family also provided him alliances among the Lancastrian faction.

As Edward’s queen, Elizabeth took on public roles typical of English queens. She succeeded Margaret of Anjou as patron of Queens’ College, Cambridge in 1465, giving the college its first statutes in 1475. She also seems to have provided some patronage to William Caxton, the distribution of several of his books being associated with her. When Edward IV died in 1483, Elizabeth’s brother-in-law, Richard Duke of Gloucester, and his supporters seized the throne from her son, the thirteen-year-old Edward V. The new regime further secured its coup by executing Elizabeth's brother, the second Earl Rivers, and one of her sons, Richard Grey, and by seizing Elizabeth's two younger sons by Edward, both of whom were probably murdered in order to secure Richard's hold on the throne.

During Richard's reign, Elizabeth took sanctuary in Westminster, where she resisted efforts to declare her marriage and her remaining children illegitimate. After defeating Richard III at the battle of Bosworth Field, Henry VII united the Lancastrian and York bloodlines in 1486 by marrying Elizabeth Woodville's eldest daughter, Elizabeth of York, thus establishing the Tudor dynasty. Elizabeth Woodville retired to the abbey of Bermondsey, Surrey, in 1487, where she died on 8 June 1492.

TERESA D. KEMP

References and Further Reading

- Hicks, Michael A. "The Changing Role of the Wydevilles in Yorkist Politics to 1483." In Patronage, Pedigree and Power in Later Medieval England, edited by Charles Ross. Gloucester: Alan Sutton, 1979, pp. 60–86.
- Kemp, Theresa D. "The Knight of the Tower and the Queen in Sanctuary: Elizabeth Woodville's Use of Meaningful Silence and Absence." New Medieval Literatures 4 (2001): 171–188.
- Lander, J. R. "Marriage and Politics in the Fifteenth Century: The Nevilles and the Wydevilles." In Crown and Nobility, 1450–1509. London: Edward Arnold Ltd., 1976, pp. 94–126.
- Sutton, Anne F., and Livia Visser-Fuchs. "The Cult of Angels in Late Fifteenth-Century England: An Hours of the Guardian Angel Presented to Queen Elizabeth Woodville." In Women and the Book: Assessing the Visual Evidence, edited by Jane H. Taylor and Lesley Smith. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1997, pp. 230–265.
- . "'A Most Benevolent Queen': Queen Elizabeth Woodville's Reputation, Her Piety, and Her Books." The Ricardian 10 (1995): 214–245.

See also England; Patronage, Ecclesiastical; Patronage, Literary; Margaret of Anjou; Queens and Empresses: the West

WORK

"When Adam delved and Eve span, who was then the gentleman?" asked the preacher. The question was taken up with more radical egalitarian intent by the (predominantly male) rebels of the English Peasants' Revolt of 1381, but neither the moralising nor the political uses to which this question was put detract from the assumption implicit within it, namely that in a postlapsarian world, the lot of humankind is to labour. Equally unquestioned was that women's work was—or at least was supposed to be—essentially different from men's. Another late medieval English text, the so-called Ballad of the Tyrannical Husband, adopts this normative position, but within the course of the narrative gives voice to a fictive wife. She relates how her sleep is interrupted by the crying of children and that feeding them and attending to their needs punctuates her day. She also cooks for her hot-tempered husband, whilst performing a range of tasks essential to the familial economy: she brews and bakes; she prepares flax; she weaves; she takes responsibility for the geese and poultry; she milks cows and makes butter and cheese; she takes goods to the market. She could have added that she participated in the hay and grain harvests, weeded crops, and fetched water from the well. Two important points arise. First, we should not limit our definition of work to those activities with an immediate economic return; childrearing, cooking, cleaning, fetching water, and the like are also work activities and carry economic implications. Second, waged work, though better documented than other kinds of work, in fact accounts for only a proportion, and probably in fact a minority, of all work activities.

A significant number of work activities undertaken by women for wages were extensions of unpaid work undertaken within a domestic or familial context. It seems to have been a given of medieval societies that primary childcare, responsibility for cooking and feeding family members, the primary stages of textile production (carding, spinning, preparing flax, etc.), cleaning, and nursing the sick were women's work. The aristocracy, and in Italian cities well-to-do citizens, invariably employed women to suckle and take care of their infants. Though doctors and surgeons were usually male, nursing care fell to women, whether paid or unpaid. Women alone assisted at childbirth, though it is probable that comparatively few were professional midwives, but simply experienced neighbours. Within pastoral economies, dairying—milking cows and sheep, making butter and cheese—was women's work. So too was weaving if primarily for domestic consumption, but we can find numbers of women who produced cloth for sale. The demands of harvest were always such as to draw in all available labour, including that of women. It is likely that married couples often worked as a team, taking turns to cut and bind the grain. The same consideration dictated that numbers of hired harvest workers were also female. Sometimes these would have been wives and daughters normally employed on the familial holding, but temporarily redeployed to take advantage of the inflated wages available at harvest. Women were also active in the hay harvest, raking and stacking the cut grass.

Peasant Society

Obviously the nature of women's work within peasant society was influenced by the prevailing agrarian economy. Pastoral and mixed economies probably presented the most opportunities, but even in arable economies tasks such as weeding and winnowing—the one backbreaking and repetitive, the other dusty and uncomfortable—tended to be relegated to women. Ploughing, in contrast, was jealously guarded as a male preserve. Here we may uncover something of the cultural underpinnings of gendered construction of work identities. Men's work is associated with skill and strength and is integral to their standing within the community: a man may be identified as a ploughman, a shepherd, a husbandman; a woman is more likely to be known only as a wife. Women's work is always understood as secondary and, because so often an extension of domestic responsibilities, “natural,” hence unskilled. Spinning, for example, was not recognised as a skill, but rather as somehow innate or natural to womankind, a notion presented in the proverb that portrayed weeping, chattering, and spinning as female attributes. Another telling example, because the opposite of modern ideological assumptions, is the case of washing and shearing sheep. Such employment fell within women's sphere as an extension of women's association with caring for small livestock, with the processing of wool, and because washing was quintessentially women's domestic work.

There are numbers of normative writings from across later medieval Europe that insist that women's proper sphere of activity was the home. The proliferation of texts such as the Libro di Buoni Costumi or How the Goodwife Taught Her Daughter warn us that this is how the authors of such text would have the world, but not necessarily how the world was. It warns us that this was a normative model appropriate to the intended audiences of the texts and thus implicitly only to certain, usually more prosperous levels of society. Barbara Hanawalt has attempted to show that for English peasant society of the later thirteenth and fourteenth centuries at least, women's work was indeed located around the home, in contrast to men's employment outdoors. She used the spatial location of deaths associated with supposed accidents recorded in coroners' rolls, but her methodology really only tells of intrinsically hazardous work activities. A more convincing model would be that described by Martine Segalen for nineteenth-century French peasant society. Here women's work profile is characterised by periodic movement throughout the day in and out of the house—throughout the day (to fetch water, to milk cows or tend to livestock), the week (to attend market or to take washing to the river), and the seasons (to weed crops, assist at lambing, participate in harvest).

Waged Work

Waged work is comparatively well documented simply because the payment of wages, particularly by institutional employers, tended to be accounted for, recorded, and archived. Unfortunately such accounts tend to be more concerned with justifying payments made than with detailing the employees, whether male or female, whose individual wages lie behind these payments. Given the propensity of husbands and wives to work together in some contexts, moreover, it is likely that payments apparently made to men hide wages intended to remunerate husband and wife together. This, for example, is what may lie behind Christopher Dyer's finding of the startlingly high quantities of food provided to English harvest workers after the Black Death as an inducement over and above money wages, then subject to wage controls. Only where employees are specifically named or where these are exclusively female can women be identified with confidence.

The possibility of wage differentials operating according to gender has been the subject of a long-running debate. The evidence is both slight and ambivalent. On the one hand, as just suggested, wages paid to male workers may disguise payments to couples. On the other hand, payments made specifically to women tend to represent women's work. Sandy Bardsley has argued that though women can be found engaged at the same rates of remuneration as males, the men so employed represent second-rate workers—youths, older males, or even handicapped workers. This is an interesting suggestion deserving further study. That women were paid less than males for the same tasks has yet to be convincingly demonstrated. What is relatively easy to establish—and is perhaps the more important observation—is that women were always disadvantaged within a hierarchy of paid employment. By reserving tasks such as ploughing or mowing using a scythe to males, men ensured that the pool of available labour was reduced and so could command the highest wages. Of course, this unequal distribution of labour was justified by reference to women's lack of strength and height, a crude biological determinism that was blind to the claims of those women who were stronger or taller than average, or to skill, a self-perpetuating claim that depended on denying women the opportunity to learn. At the moment in the Ballad of the Tyrannical Husband, the text noted at the beginning of this entry, that the wife goes off to plough, we realise, if we had not done before, that this poem is satirical and that the idea of the wife ploughing is to be greeted with guffaws of laughter, so reinforcing the normative order, the ultimate intent of the text.

Towns

Rural society seems to have been rather more conservative than urban, and it is in towns that we can find the greatest variety of female employment. Women are especially conspicuous in food trades, textiles, and service trades. Using the Parisian tax records for 1292 and 1313, for example, David Herlihy found numbers of tavern and hostel keepers, fishmongers, dress-makers, and silk workers, but also various women taxed as petty traders, laundresses, barbers, and chandlers. This is at best a crude barometer, since only independent women of some means would have been taxed in their own right. Women were ubiquitous as petty retailers of foodstuffs and other basic commodities, a role that required very little capital outlay but a good knowledge of a local clientele. The same considerations of lack of access to investment capital or formally recognised training also explain women's participation in carding and spinning, sewing, or such service trades as laundry work or even prostitution. Numbers of other women, however, gained access to a variety of craft activities through marriage. Wives were expected to assist their husbands in their craft and, significantly, numbers of widows managed to continue to run workshops after the deaths of their husbands.

A significantly smaller proportion of women served formal apprenticeships, primarily within a very limited range of crafts, of which the silk trades were the most conspicuous. Such apprentices were formally bound to a master and his wife, but to learn the wife's trade. In fifteenth-century London, female apprentices were drawn from all over the kingdom and included at least one knight's daughter. The prominence of women in the silk industry in Paris is reflected in the feminised nature of the silk guilds of the city reported by Etienne Boileau around 1268, but is part of a much wider pattern. At much the same date Mabel of Bury St. Edmunds was undertaking major commissions for vestments embroidered in silk thread, though production was also associated with nunneries. By the post-Plague era there is plentiful evidence for the employment of women in various stages of the industry, but production began to look less aristocratic and more bourgeois and commercial. In Florence women silk workers constituted a proletariat subject to the merchants who dominated the Arte della Seta guild. In both Cologne and London the wives of merchants, drapers, and other, often well-connected men headed workshops weaving silk ribbon, producing embroidery and the like, but the silk spinners, needlewomen, and other females they employed seem not to have been well remunerated and, in Cologne at least, appear sometimes to have been paid in kind.

Erosion of Women's Position

Broadly speaking, the last decades of the medieval era seem to have witnessed an erosion of women's position within the labour market. Whereas the labour-starved conditions prevailing after the Black Death seem to have opened up opportunities for women, especially in the towns of northwestern Europe, the twin effects of continued population contraction and recession caused by the bullion famines of the earlier and mid-fifteenth century appear to have reversed this situation. This is most strikingly illustrated in respect to cloth weaving. In the early Middle Ages weaving was very much an extension of the domestic and hence fell within the sphere of women's work. The High Middle Ages saw the growth of numbers of significant centres of textile manufacture and, at least within an urban context, male weavers came to predominate, but not to exclude. By the later fifteenth century, however, numbers of weavers' guilds were beginning to regulate against the employment of women, even wives, in the craft. A parallel trend has been described by Judith Bennett in relation to brewing. Here a feminised part-time domestic industry was displaced in an urban context by a more masculine commercial industry. Finally, as ale gave way to beer brewed with hops, so enjoying a longer shelf life and allowing for larger-scale production, women lost out altogether. More generally, women seem to have found it harder to retain control of workshops once widowed. In numbers of German towns male employees agitated against working alongside women. More conservative gender hierarchies were once more asserted.

P. J. P. GOLDBERG

References and Further Reading

Bennett, Judith M., et al., eds. Sisters and Workers in the Middle Ages. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1989.

Brown, Judith. C. "A Woman's Place Was in the Home: Women's Work in Renaissance Tuscany." In Rewriting the Renaissance The Discourses of Sexual Difference in Early Modern Europe, edited by Margaret W. Ferguson et al. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1986, pp. 206–224.

Dillard, Heath. Daughters of the Reconquest: Women in Castilian Town Society, 1100–1300. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989.

Goldberg, P. J. P. Women, Work and Life Cycle: Women in York and Yorkshire c. 1300–1520. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1992.

Hanawalt, Barbara A., ed. Women and Work in Preindustrial Europe. Bloomington, Ind.: Indiana University Press, 1986.

Herlihy, David. Opera Muliebria: Women and Work in Medieval Europe. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1990.

See also Alewives and Brewing; Apprentices; Artisan Families, Women of; Clothwork, Domestic; Division of Labor; Guild Members and Guilds; Household Management; Market and Tradeswomen; Peasants; Prostitutes; Social Status; Textile Production for the Market

Y

---

YVETTE OF HUY

Hugh of Floreffe, biographer of Yvette of Huy (1158–1228) (or Ivetta), portrays an anchoress, an enclosed recluse, less ascetic than her more celebrated contemporaries. Instead, he emphasizes her humility and her role as spiritual mother.

Yvette came from a wealthy family of Huy on the Meuse River in modern-day Belgium. Although she objected strongly to marital obligations, she was forced to wed at the age of thirteen. Of her three children, two boys survived. She was widowed at eighteen and chose to remain unmarried despite the wishes of her father.

Yvette dedicated herself to a spiritual life, with a particular devotion to the Virgin Mary. Her extreme charity provoked a clash with her father over her sons' inheritance. However, she saw to their corporal and spiritual support, eventually convincing her father and both sons to join the Cistercian order.

At twenty-three Yvette gave up her worldly life to minister to lepers in a crumbling community outside the city walls. There she had a vision of a great church and new buildings. After securing the future of a new Beguine religious community and hospital, Yvette retired to pursue a life of prayer in an anchorhold.

In her house attached to a church, her contemplations led to visions such as one in which Christ commended Yvette to his mother as her handmaid. She experienced a prescience that compelled her to intervene in the lives of the townspeople, particularly sexually errant priests. Finally, she was especially solicitous of the lives of her spiritual daughters who had formed a community around her, appearing even after her death to guide them.

HEATHER E. WARD

References and Further Reading

- Carpenter, Jennifer. "Juetta of Huy, Recluse and Mother (1158–1228): Children and Mothering in the Saintry Life." In Power of the Weak: Studies on Medieval Women, edited by Jennifer Carpenter and Sally-Beth MacLean. Urbana, Ill.: University of Illinois Press, 1995, pp. 57–93.
- Hugh of Floreffe. The Life of Yvette of Huy, translated by Jo Ann McNamara. Toronto: Peregrina, 1999.
- Mulder-Bakker, Anneke B. "Ivetta of Huy: Mater et Magistra." In Sanctity and Motherhood: Essays on Holy Mothers in the Middle Ages, edited by Anneke B. Mulder-Bakker. New York: Garland, 1995, pp. 224–258.
- . "Yvette of Huy: The Metamorphoses of a Woman." In Lives of the Anchoresses: The Rise of the Urban Recluse in Medieval Europe, translated by Myra Heerspink Scholz. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2005, pp. 51–77.

See also Anchoresses; Asceticism; Beguines; Flanders; Hagiography; Lepers; Mothers as Teachers; Widows

Z

---

ZITA AND OTHER SERVANT SAINTS

Among the many persons regarded as saints within the Western tradition, some officially canonized, others venerated as a result of popular enthusiasm, who followed the example of Jesus and the Apostles, there are those who were from the lowest social orders. The servant-saint Zita of Lucca (1218–1278) belongs to a class of saints who suffered the humiliation of performing the most menial chores and were even subject to the sexual pressures of their employers or fellow servants, but nevertheless persisted in their humble pursuit of the faith and numerous acts of charity. Such women were usually born of humble backgrounds, but, despite their own impoverished circumstances, showed a concern for the poor and served as a pious alternative to the allegedly debased, even promiscuous behavior of the servant class. Other such saints include Gunthild of Suffersheim, Sibillina Biscossi of Pavia, Notburga of Rottenburg, Radegunda of Wellenburg, and Magaret of Louvain.

Born of rural parentage in Monsagrati, Zita moved to Lucca at twelve in order to serve in the household of the mercantile Fatinelli family. The stereotypical elements of her legend include suffering from a variety of medical problems (probably including malnutrition), giving food scraps away to the poor, tending to condemned prisoners, sharing her warm garments and bed with beggars, pilgrims, and others, assiduously saying her prayers, attending mass, and visiting local churches, and suffering the mockery and ill-treatment of her fellow servants, even mutilating herself in order to avoid their advances. Due to the posthumous miracles attributed to Zita and her reputation for piety, Dante (Inferno, 21.37) designated Lucca the city of St. Zita. A chapel was erected in the church of San Frediano in Zita's honor in 1321, and after her official canonization in 1696, she was named the patron saint of domestics and housewives.

MICHAEL E. GOODICH

References and Further Reading

Acta Sanctorum, 3 April: 499–510.
Goodich, Michael. "Ancilla Dei: The Servant as Saint in the Late Middle Ages." In Lives and Miracles of the Saints: Studies in Medieval Latin Hagiography. Aldershot: Ashgate, 2004, pp. 119–136.

See also Dante Alighieri; Hagiography; Miracles and Miracle Collections; Servants; Social Status

Appendix I: Calendar of Female Saints

---

Private prayer books, psalters, and books of hours usually included calendars listing major feasts of Jesus and Mary, as well as saints' days. Names listed on the calendar often varied from region to region, reflecting devotion to local saints like Geneviève, patron of Paris. The calendar below is intended to suggest the variety and number of holy women celebrated during the liturgical year. It is not a transcription from a single source but relies in part on several books owned by women: the De Lisle Hours belonging to Margaret de Beauchamp, the Hours of Margaret of Cleves, the Hours of Mary of Burgundy, the Neville of Hornby Hours belonging to Isabel de Byron, and the Saint Albans Psalter belonging to Christina of Markyate. The list below also incorporates all those women profiled in this volume who had active cults during the Middle Ages but did not appear in the prayer books surveyed. Sainthood in the Middle Ages had a wide definition ranging from a small local cult to an elaborate (and expensive) process for canonization. These different levels of acceptance are indicated by canonization dates, approvals of cults, and limitations to local cults.

Saints whose names appear in bold have articles in the volume.

January

- 1 Solemnity of Mary, Mother of God—first Marian feast of the calendar year
- 4 Angela of Foligno—thirteenth century, Italy, religious laywoman, local cult
- 6 Gertrude of Ortenberg, virgin—fourteenth century, Netherlands, Beguine, local cult
Epiphany—the feast celebrating the visit of the Magi
- 13 Yvette of Huy (Jutta, Ivetta)—thirteenth century, Flanders, anchoress, local cult
- 15 Ita, virgin—sixth century, Ireland, abbess
- 18 Prisca, virgin martyr
- 21 Agnes, virgin martyr
- 23 Emerentiana (Emerancia), virgin martyr
- 29 Sabina, virgin
- 30 Aldegundis, virgin—seventh century, Flanders, abbess

February

- 1 Brigit of Kildare, virgin—sixth century, Ireland, abbess
- 2 Feast of the Purification of the Virgin Mary (Candlemas)—commemorates Mary's purification at the temple following the birth of Christ
- 5 Agatha, virgin martyr
- 6 Dorothy, virgin martyr
- 9 Apollonia, virgin martyr
- 10 Scholastica, virgin—sixth century, Italy, Benedictine nun, reputed sister of Saint Benedict
- 12 Eulalia, virgin martyr
- 15 Veronica, whose veil was said to have been imprinted by Christ's face when she wiped it
- 16 Juliana, virgin martyr
Mary the Younger—ninth century, Byzantium, married woman who died from her husband's abuse
- 22 Margaret of Cortona—thirteenth century, Italy, religious laywoman, canonized May 16, 1728
- 25 Walburga, virgin—eighth century, England and Germany, abbess
- 26 Isabelle of France, virgin—thirteenth century, France, daughter of King Louis VIII and founder of the monastery of Poor Clares at Longchamps, cult approved in 1521

March

- 2 Agnes of Prague, virgin—thirteenth century, Bohemia, Poor Clare, daughter of King Ottokar I of Bohemia and founder of a monastery of Poor Clares, canonized November 12, 1989
- 6 Colette of Corbie, virgin—fifteenth century, France, Poor Clare, canonized May 24, 1807
- 7 Felicity and Perpetua, martyrs
- 9 Frances of Rome—fifteenth century, Italy, religious laywoman, canonized May 9, 1608
Caterina Vigri (Catherine of Bologna), virgin—fifteenth century, Italy, Poor Clare, canonized 1712

APPENDIX I: CALENDAR OF FEMALE SAINTS

- 12 Fina of San Gimignano, virgin—thirteenth century, Italy, local cult
- 17 Gertrude of Nivelles, virgin—seventh century, Belgium, abbess
- 25 Annunciation of the Lord—commemorates the angel Gabriel's announcement to Mary that she has been chosen to be the mother of Christ
- 31 Balbina, virgin
Cornelia, martyr
- 20 Margaretha Ebner—fourteenth century, Germany, Dominican nun, beatified February 24, 1979
- 23 Aethelthryth of Ely—seventh century, England, nun and founder of a double monastery at Ely
Marie of Oignies, virgin—twelfth through the thirteenth centuries, Belgium, Beguine and mystic

April

- 2 Mary the Egyptian, penitent prostitute
- 5 Juliana of Mount Cornillon, virgin—thirteenth century, Belgium, Augustinian nun and prioress and promoter of the feast of the Eucharist, later known as Corpus Christi; cult confirmed locally in 1869
- 13 Ida of Boulogne—twelfth century, Flanders, countess of Boulogne
- 14 Lidwina—fifteenth century, Netherlands, a mystic who was bedridden all her adult life
- 27 Zita, virgin—thirteenth century, Italy, servant, public veneration authorized 1278, cult confirmed September 5, 1696
- 30 Catherine of Siena, virgin—fourteenth century, Italy, religious laywoman associated with the Dominicans, canonized 1461

May

- 19 Pudentiana, virgin martyr
- 22 Humility of Faenza—thirteenth century, Italy, anchoress and abbess
- 30 Joan of Arc, virgin—fifteenth century, France, canonized May 9, 1920
- 31 Petronilla, virgin martyr

June

- 3 Clotilda—sixth century, France, wife of Clovis, king of the Franks
- 10 Margaret of Scotland—eleventh century, Scotland, queen-consort, canonized 1249
- 16 Lutgard of Aywieres, virgin—thirteenth century, Belgium, Cistercian nun
- 18 Elisabeth of Schönau, virgin—twelfth century, Germany, Benedictine nun, abbess, mystic, canonized 1584

July

- 2 Visitation of the Virgin Mary—commemorates Mary's visit to her cousin, Elizabeth, the mother of John the Baptist
- 6 Godelieve of Gistel (Godeleva, Godliva)—eleventh century, Flanders, noblewoman who was killed on her husband's orders
- 8 Isabel of Aragon—fourteenth century, Portugal, queen associated with the Franciscan order, canonized 1625
- 10 Amelberga—eighth century, Flanders, abbess
- 11 Olga—tenth century, Russia, princess of Kiev
- 13 Mildred, virgin—seventh century, England, abbess
- 17 Jadwiga (Hedwig)—fourteenth century, Poland, queen, canonized June 8, 1997
Marina, lived as the monk Marinus
- 19 Daria, martyr
- 20 Margaret of Antioch, virgin martyr
- 21 Praxedes, virgin martyr
- 22 Mary Magdalen, apostle
- 24 Christina the Astonishing, virgin—thirteenth century, Flanders, local cult
- 26 Anne—mother of the Virgin Mary, cult introduced in eighth century Rome, her feast is first known in the thirteenth century
- 29 Mary and Martha of Bethany, virgins—these sisters of Lazarus sometimes represent the contemplative (Mary) and active (Martha) lives
Beatrice of Nazareth—thirteenth century, Flanders, Cistercian nun and prioress, local cult

August

- 1 Sapientia with her daughters Fides, Spes, and Caritas, martyrs
- 12 Clare of Assisi, virgin—thirteenth century, Italy, Franciscan nun and founder of the Order of Poor Clares, canonized August 12, 1255

- 13 Radegund—sixth century, France, queen and nun, acclaimed a saint following her death in 587
- 15 Assumption of the Virgin Mary, commemorates her death and her body's elevation to heaven
- Irene—eighth century, Byzantium, empress and supporter of the veneration of icons
- 17 Clare of Montefalco, virgin—fourteenth century, Italy, Augustinian nun, abbess, and mystic, canonized 1881
- 18 Helena, Empress—fourth century, Italy, mother of Constantine and Roman empress

September

- 1 Douceline of Digne—thirteenth century, France, mystic, founder of a house of Beguines, local cult
- 4 Rose of Viterbo, virgin—thirteenth century, Italy, canonized 1457
- 8 Birthday of the Virgin Mary
- 15 Catherine of Genoa, widow—fifteenth century, Italy, noblewoman, religious laywoman, and mystic, canonized May 18, 1737
- 16 Euphemia, virgin martyr
- 17 Hildegard of Bingen, virgin—twelfth century, Germany, nun, mystic, and composer
- 23 Thecla, virgin martyr
- 26 Justina of Antioch, virgin martyr
- 28 Leoba, virgin—eighth century, England and Germany, abbess

October

- 6 Foy, virgin martyr
- 8 Birgitta of Sweden, widow—fourteenth century, Sweden, founder of the Birgittine Order, canonized Oct. 7, 1391, confirmed in 1415
- Pelagia—actress and penitent
- 19 Translation of Austraberta, virgin—seventh century, France, abbess
- Frideswide, virgin—seventh century, England, abbess
- 21 Ursula and her companions, virgin martyrs

- 22 Cordula, virgin martyr and companion to Ursula
- 28 Anastasia, virgin martyr
- 30 Dorothea of Montau, widow—fourteenth century, Poland, anchoress, never officially canonized but in 1976 the pope confirmed her cult as a saint based on long-standing veneration

November

- 1 All Saints
- 2 All Souls
- 17 Gertrude the Great, virgin—thirteenth century, Germany, nun and mystic
- Hild of Whitby, virgin—seventh century, England, abbess
- Elisabeth of Hungary—thirteenth century, Germany, religious laywoman, canonized May 27, 1235
- 19 Mechthild of Hackeborn—thirteenth century, Germany, Benedictine nun and mystic
- 21 Presentation of the Virgin Mary, commemorates Mary's presentation at the Temple as a small child
- 22 Cecilia, virgin martyr
- 25 Catherine of Alexandria, virgin martyr—cult became popular in Europe in the eleventh century

December

- 2 Bibiana (Vivian), virgin martyr
- 4 Barbara, virgin martyr
- 8 Conception of the Virgin Mary
- 13 Lucy, virgin martyr—cult spread to Rome, Milan, and Ravenna in sixth and seventh centuries
- 16 Adelheid (Adelaide), widow of Otto I—tenth century, Germany, empress
- 23 Victoria, virgin martyr
- 24 Christmas Eve
- 25 Christmas
- 28 Holy Innocents—feast commemorating the massacre of children by King Herod

Appendix II: Some Milestones in Medieval Women's History

---

The editors gradually assembled this list and offer it as one historical view of the field. "Milestones" has multiple meanings in order to better represent the issues, activities, and audiences for medieval women's history. First and foremost milestones are path-breaking studies that open a new area for research or present a compelling new interpretation of a major question. There are also some works that serve students in the classroom: textbooks, anthologies and especially translations of texts, many of which, like Christine de Pizan's Book of the City of Ladies, had no modern English version before the 1980s. Other milestones generated controversies that profitably bring the present in touch with the Middle Ages. Medieval women's studies even has some milestones in the wider realm of popular culture, with recordings of Hildegard of Bingen's music and Judy Chicago's museum installations celebrating women's achievements. Finally, milestones take account of the history of medieval women's studies, recording and analyzing the developments and scholars who have helped shape the terms of discourse.

As is evident below, the pace of publication picked up dramatically in the late 1970s, spurred both by the second wave of the feminist movement, with its emphasis on activism, and the growth of social and economic history as exemplified by the Annales School. The number of essay collections and journal articles in the 1970s is not surprising, given that many new areas and topics were being explored for the first time during that era. These types of publications, however, continue to be important suggesting the vitality and growth of the field.

| Date | Work  |
|------|---|
| 1    | 1501 Hrotsvit of Gandersheim. Opera Hrosvitae . Printed by Conrad Celtes. Nurnberg, 1501.  |
| 2    | 1566 Hildegard of Bingen. Epistolarum liber , edited by Justus Blanckwald. Cologne: Johann Quentel and Gerwin Calenius, 1566.  |
| 3    | 1838 Thomassy, Marie-Joseph-Raymond. Essai sur les écrits politiques de Christine de Pisan, suivi d'une notice littéraire et de pièces inédites . Paris: Debécourt, 1838.                    |
| 4    | 1882 Bücher, Karl. Die Frauenfrage im Mittelalter . Tübingen: H. Laupp'sche Buchhandlung, 1882. [Second edition, 1910].  |
| 5    | 1888 Hudson, William Henry. "Hrotsvitha of Gandersheim." English Historical Review 3 (1888): 431–457.  |
| 6    | 1893–94 Buckstaff, Florence Griswold. "Married Women's Property in Anglo-Saxon and Anglo-Norman Law." Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science 4 (1893–1894): 233–264. |
| 6    | 1895 Dixon, E. "Craftswomen in the 'Livre des Métiers.'" Economic Journal 5 (1895): 209–228.   |
| 7    | The Evangile aux femmes - An Old-French Satire on Women . Ed. George C. Keidel. Baltimore, Md.: Friedenwald, 1895.   |
| 8    | 1896 Eckenstein, Lina. Woman under Monasticism: Chapters on Saint-Lore and Convent Life between A. D. 500 and A. D. 1500 . Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1896.                      |
| 9    | 1898 Marie de France. Die Fabeln der Marie de France . Ed. Karl Warnke. Halle: M. Niemeyer, 1898.  |
| 10   | 1899 Bateson, Mary. "Origin and Early History of Double Monasteries." Transactions of the Royal Historical Society , New Series 13 (1899): 137–198.  |
| 11   | 1902–1903 Strickland, Agnes. Lives of the Queens of England: From the Norman Conquest . Philadelphia: G. Barrie, 1902–1903. 16 vols.   |
| 12   | 1912 Laigle, Mathilde. Le "Livre des Trois Vertus" de Christine de Pisan et son milieu historique et littéraire . Paris: H. Champion, 1912.  |
| 13   | 1914 Clay, Rotha Mary. The Hermits and Anchorites of England . London: Methuen and Company, 1914.  |
| 14   | 1916 Abram, Annie. "Women Traders in Medieval London." Economic Journal 26 (1916): 276–285.  |
| 15   | 1922 Power, Eileen Edna. Medieval English Nunneries, 1275–1535 . Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1922.  |

APPENDIX II: SOME MILESTONES IN MEDIEVAL WOMEN'S HISTORY

| Date | Work  |
|------|---|
| 16   | 1924 Heinrich, Mary Pia, Sister. The Canonesses and Education in the Early Middle Ages . Washington, D. C.: Catholic University Dissertation, 1924.  |
| 17   | 1925 Underhill, Evelyn. The Mystics of the Church . London: J. Clark, 1925.  |
| 18   | 1929 Buckler, Georgina. Anna Commena: A Study . London: Oxford University Press, 1929.   |
| 19   | 1933 Dale, Marian K. "The London Silkwomen of the Fifteenth Century." Economic History Review 4 (October 1933): 324–335.   |
| 20   | 1934 Epstein, Isidore. "The Jewish Woman in the 'Responsa' (900 C. E.–1500 C. E.)." In The Jewish Library , edited by Leo Jung. New York: Jewish Library Publications, 1934. vol. 3:123–152.   |
| 21   | 1935 Rokseth, Yvonne. "Les femmes musiciennes du XIIe au XIVE siècle." Romania 61 (1935): 464–480.   |
| 22   | 1940 Allen, Hope Emily, and Sanford Brown Meech, eds. The Book of Margery Kempe . Early English Text Society. London: H. Milford, 1940.  |
| 23   | 1951 Odegaard, Charles E. "The Empress Engelberge." Speculum 26 (1951): 77–103.  |
| 24   | 1955 Bandel, Betty. "The English Chroniclers' Attitude toward Women." Journal of the History of Ideas 16 (1955): 113–118.  |
| 25   | 1957 Origo, Iris. The Merchant of Prato, Francesco di Marco Datini . London: Jonathan Cape, 1957.  |
| 26   | 1960 Stenton, Doris Mary Parsons, Lady. The English Woman in History . London: Allen and Unwin; New York: Macmillan, 1957.   |
| 27   | 1964 Pernoud, Régine. Jeanne d'Arc par elle-même et par ses témoins . Paris: Éditions du Seuil, 1962 [translation in English, 1982].   |
| 28   | 1968 Facinger, Marion F. "A Study of Medieval Queenship: Capetian France, 987–1237." Studies in Medieval and Renaissance History 5 (1968): 3–48.   |
| 29   | 1970 Bellomo, Manlio. La condizione giuridica della donna in Italia . Turin: Eri, 1970.  |
| 30   | 1971 Herlihy, David. Women in Medieval Society . Houston, Tx.: University of St. Thomas, 1971.   |
| 31   | 1973 McNamara, Jo Ann, and Suzanne Fonay Wemple. "The Power of Women through the Family." Feminist Studies 1 (1973): 126–141.  |
| 32   | 1976 Women in Medieval Society , edited by Susan Mosher Stuard. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1976.  |
| 33   | 1977 Kelly-Gadol, Joan. "Did Women Have a Renaissance?" In Becoming Visible , edited by Renate Bridenthal and Claudia Koonz. Boston: Houghton-Mifflin, 1977, pp. 137–164 [third edition, 1998].  |
| 34   | 1978 Herlihy, David, and Christiane Klapisch-Zuber. Les Toscans et leurs familles: une étude du "catasto" florentin de 1427 . Paris: Centre national de la recherche scientifique, 1978 [abridged translation in English, 1985].   |
| 35   | Hughes, Diane Owen. "From Brideprice to Dowry in Mediterranean Europe." Journal of Family History 3 (1978): 262–296.   |
| 36   | Julian of Norwich. Showings . Trans. Edmund Colledge and James Walsh. New York: Paulist Press, 1978.   |
| 37   | Medieval Women , edited by Derek Baker. Studies in Church History. Subsidia, 1. Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1978.   |
| 38   | 1979 Chicago, Judy. The Dinner Party: An Exhibition Conceived by Judy Chicago and Executed by Her in Cooperation with a Working Community of Women and Men, San Francisco Museum of Modern Art, March 16–June 17, 1979 . San Francisco: San Francisco Museum of Modern Art, 1979. [Includes place settings for Brigit, Theodora, Hrotsvit, Trotula, Eleanor of Aquitaine, Hildegard of Bingen, Petronilla de Meath (executed for witchcraft in fourteenth century Ireland), Christine de Pizan, and Isabella d' Este.] |
| 39   | 1980 Boswell, John. Christianity, Social Tolerance and Homosexuality: Gay People in Western Europe from the Beginning of the Christian Era to the Fourteenth Century . Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1980.   |
| 40   | Maclean, Ian. The Renaissance Notion of Woman: A Study in the Fortunes of Scholasticism and Medical Science in European Intellectual Life . Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1980.  |
| 41   | 1981 Wemple, Suzanne Fonay. Women in Frankish Society: Marriage and the Cloister, 500 to 900 . Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1981.   |
| 42   | 1982 Bell, Susan Groag. "Medieval Women Book Owners: Arbiters of Lay Piety and Ambassadors of Culture." Signs 7 (1982): 742–768.   |
| 43   | Bynum, Caroline Walker. Jesus as Mother: Studies in the Spirituality of the High Middle Ages . Berkeley: University of California Press, 1982.   |
| 44   | Hildegard of Bingen. Feather on the Breath of God: Sequences and Hymns . Conductor Christopher Page. London: Hyperion, 1982. [Sound recording.]  |
| 45   | 1983 Stafford, Pauline. Queens, Concubines, and Dowagers: The King's Wife in the Early Middle Ages . Athens, Ga.: University of Georgia, 1983.   |

APPENDIX II: SOME MILESTONES IN MEDIEVAL WOMEN'S HISTORY

| Date | Work |  |
|------|------|--|
| 46   | 1984 | Dillard, Heath. Daughters of the Reconquest: Women in Castilian Town Society, 1100–1300 . Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1984.   |
| 47   |      | Medieval Women Writers , edited by Katharina M. Wilson. Athens, Ga.: University of Georgia Press, 1984.   |
| 48   |      | Willard, Charity Cannon. Christine de Pizan: Her Life and Works . New York: Persea Books, 1984.   |
| 49   | 1985 | Allen, Prudence. The Concept of Woman . Montreal: Eden Press, 1985 (vol. 1) and 2002 (vol. 2).  |
| 50   |      | Bell, Rudolph M. Holy Anorexia . Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1985.  |
| 51   |      | Gold, Penelope Schine. The Lady and the Virgin: Image, Attitude, and Experience in Twelfth-century France . Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1985.   |
| 52   |      | Klapisch-Zuber, Christiane. Women, Family and Ritual in Renaissance Italy . Trans. Lydia C. Cochrane. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1985.   |
| 53   |      | Otis, Leah Lydia. Prostitution in Medieval Society: The History of an Urban Institution in Languedoc . Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1985.  |
| 54   | 1986 | Hanawalt, Barbara. The Ties That Bound: Peasant Families in Medieval England . New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.   |
| 55   |      | Howell, Martha C. Women, Production and Patriarchy in Late Medieval Cities . Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1986.  |
| 56   |      | Medieval Feminist Newsletter . 1986–. [Changed to Medieval Feminist Forum in 1999].  |
| 57   | 1987 | Bennett, Judith. Women in the Medieval English Countryside: Gender and Household in Brigstock before the Plague . New York: Oxford University Press, 1987.  |
| 58   |      | Brundage, James A. Law, Sex, and Christian Society in Medieval Europe . Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1987.   |
| 59   |      | Bynum, Caroline Walker. Holy Feast and Holy Fast: The Religious Significance of Food to Medieval Women . Berkeley: University of California Press, 1987.  |
| 60   |      | Newman, Barbara. Sister of Wisdom: St. Hildegard's Theology of the Feminine . Berkeley: University of California Press, 1987.   |
| 61   |      | Women in Medieval History &amp; Historiography , edited by Susan Mosher Stuard. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1987.   |
| 62   | 1988 | Jacquart, Danielle, and Claude Alexandre Thomasset. Sexuality and Medicine in the Middle Ages . Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1988.  |
| 63   | 1990 | Hildegard of Bingen. Scivias . Trans. Columba Hart and Jane Bishop. New York: Paulist Press, 1990.  |
| 64   |      | Medieval Women and the Sources of Medieval History , edited by Joel T. Rosenthal. Athens, Ga.: University of Georgia Press, 1990.   |
| 65   |      | Storia delle Donne in Occidente , edited by Georges Duby and Michelle Perrot. V. 2: Il Medioevo , edited by Christiane Klapisch-Zuber. Bari: Editori Laterza, 1990. [Published in English in 1993.]  |
| 66   | 1991 | Gravdal, Kathryn. Ravishing Maidens: Writing Rape in Medieval French Literature and Law . Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1991.   |
| 67   |      | Bloch, R. Howard. Medieval Misogyny and the Invention of Western Romantic Love . Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1991.  |
| 68   | 1992 | Goldberg, P. J. P. Women, Work and Life Cycle in a Medieval Economy: Women in York and Yorkshire . Oxford: Clarendon Press; New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.  |
| 69   |      | Hansen, Elaine Tuttle. Chaucer and the Fictions of Gender . Berkeley: University of California Press, 1992.   |
| 70   |      | Sainted Women of the Dark Ages , edited and translated by Jo Ann McNamara and John E. Halborg with E. Gordon Whatley. Durham, N. C.: Duke University Press, 1992.   |
| 71   | 1993 | Burns, E. Jane. Bodytalk: When Women Speak in Old French Literature . Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1993.   |
| 72   |      | Cadden, Joan. Meanings of Sex Difference in the Middle Ages: Medicine, Science, and Culture . New York: Cambridge University Press, 1993.   |
| 73   |      | Studying Medieval Women: Sex, Gender, Feminism , edited by Nancy F. Partner. Speculum 68.2 (April 1993). [Much anticipated issue that sought to rectify the journal's lack of attention to women's studies. Also published separately as a book by The Medieval Academy of America.] |
| 74   |      | Krueger, Roberta L. Women Readers and the Ideology of Gender in Old French Verse Romance . Cambridge; New York: Cambridge University Press, 1993.   |
| 75   |      | Women's Lives in Medieval Europe: A Sourcebook , edited by Emilie Amt. New York: Routledge, 1993.   |
| 76   | 1994 | Christine de Pizan. The Writings of Christine de Pizan , edited by Charity Cannon Willard. New York: Persea Books, 1994.  |

APPENDIX II: SOME MILESTONES IN MEDIEVAL WOMEN'S HISTORY

| Date | Work  |
|------|---|
| 77   | Gilchrist, Roberta. Gender and Material Culture: The Archaeology of Religious Women . New York: Routledge, 1994.   |
| 78   | McNamara, Jo Ann. "The 'Herrenfrage': The Restructuring of the Gender System, 1050–1150." In Medieval Masculinities: Regarding Men in the Middle Ages , edited by Clare A. Lees with the assistance of Thelma Fenster. Medieval Cultures, 7. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1994, pp. 3–29. |
| 79   | 1995 Newman, Barbara. From Virile Woman to WomanChrist: Studies in Medieval Religion and Literature . Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1995.  |
| 80   | Solterer, Helen. The Master and Minerva: Disputing Women in French Medieval Culture . Berkeley: University of California Press, 1995.  |
| 81   | 1996 Bennett, Judith M. Ale, Beer, and Brewsters in England: Women's Work in a Changing World, 1300–1600 . New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.  |
| 82   | Karras, Ruth Mazo. Common Women: Prostitution and Sexuality in Medieval England . New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.   |
| 83   | McNamara, Jo Ann. Sisters in Arms: Catholic Nuns through Two Millennia . Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1996.   |
| 84   | 1997 Ferrante, Joan M. To the Glory of Her Sex: Women's Roles in the Composition of Medieval Texts . Bloomington, Ind.: Indiana University Press, 1997.  |
| 85   | Hamburger, Jeffrey F. Nuns as Artists: The Visual Culture of a Medieval Convent . Berkeley: University of California Press, 1997.  |
| 86   | 1998 Schulenburg, Jane Tibbetts. Forgetful of Their Sex: Female Sanctity and Society, ca. 500–1100 . Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1998.   |
| 87   | 1999 Elliott, Dyan. Fallen Bodies: Pollution, Sexuality, and Demonology in the Middle Ages . Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999.   |
| 88   | Wolfthal, Diane. Images of Rape: The "Heroic" Tradition and Its Alternatives . Cambridge; New York: Cambridge University Press, 1999.  |
| 89   | 2000 Bennett, Judith M. "Lesbian-Like and the Social History of Lesbianisms." Journal of the History of Sexuality 9 (2000): 1–24.  |
| 90   | 2001 Boccaccio, Giovanni. De Mulieribus Claris , Revised 1371. Famous Women , translated by Virginia Brown. I Tatti Renaissance Library, 1. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 2001.   |
| 91   | Green, Monica H., ed. and trans. The Trotula, A Medieval Compenium of Women's Medicine . Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania, 2001.   |
| 92   | Virtue and Beauty: Leonardo's Ginevra de' Benci and Renaissance Portraits of Women , edited by David Alan Brown. Washington, D. C.: National Gallery of Art, 2001. [Catalog of an exhibition held September 30, 2001–January 6, 2002 at the National Gallery of Art.]                                    |
| 93   | Caviness, Madeline Harrison. Visualizing Women in the Middle Ages: Sight, Spectacle, and Scopic Economy . Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001.  |
| 94   | 2002 Farmer, Sharon A. Surviving Poverty in Medieval Paris: Gender, Ideology and the Daily Life of the Poor . Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2002.  |
| 95   | 2003 Cambridge Companion to Medieval Women's Writing , edited by Carolyn Dinshaw and David Wallace. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2003.   |
| 96   | Karras, Ruth Mazo. From Boys to Men: Formulations of Masculinity in Late Medieval Europe . Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2003.   |
| 96   | Gendering the Master Narrative: Women and Power in the Middle Ages , edited by Maryanne Kowaleski and Mary C. Erler. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2003 [in many ways an update to the 1988 collection, Women and Power in the Middle Ages ].   |
| 97   | 2005 Women Medievalists and the Academy , edited by Jane Chance. Madison, Wisc.: University of Wisconsin Press, 2005.  |

Appendix III: Encyclopedia Cited References

---

This list of fifty-nine cited references was constructed to identify titles that are worthy of particular attention. They have been recommended by multiple authors in this encyclopedia. The contributors to this volume have cited more than four thousand titles in the article bibliographies. In this context, the agreement of five or more authors is noteworthy. The method employed in compiling this list was pioneered in the study of scientific literature, and it is applied here with the caveat that other deserving works are left out only because fewer references were made to them.

- Bynum, Caroline Walker. Holy Feast and Holy Fast: The Religious Significance of Food to Medieval Women. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1987. (19)
- Brundage, James A. Law, Sex, and Christian Society in Medieval Europe. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1987. (15)
- Klapisch-Zuber, Christiane. Women, Family, and Ritual in Renaissance Italy, translated by Lydia Cochrane. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1985. (11)
- Bynum, Caroline Walker. Jesus as Mother: Studies in the Spirituality of the High Middle Ages. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1982. (10)
- Goldberg, P. J. P. Women, Work, and Life Cycle in a Medieval Economy: Women in York and Yorkshire c. 1300–1520. Oxford: Clarendon Press; New York, Oxford University Press, 1992. (10)
- Cadden, Joan. The Meanings of Sex Difference in the Middle Ages: Medicine, Science, and Culture. Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1993. (9)
- Green, Monica H., Ed. and trans. The Trotula: A Medieval Compendium of Women's Medicine. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001. (9)
- Howell, Martha C. Women, Production, and Patriarchy in Late Medieval Cities. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1986. (9)
- Petroff, Elizabeth Alvilda, Ed. Medieval Women's Visionary Literature. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986. (9)
- Brown, Peter. The Body and Society: Men, Women, and Sexual Renunciation in Early Christianity. New York: Columbia University Press, 1988. (8)
- Hanawalt, Barbara. The Ties That Bind: Peasant Families in Medieval England. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986. (8)
- Herlihy, David. Medieval Households. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1985. (8)
- McNamara, Jo Ann. Sisters in Arms: Catholic Nuns through Two Millennia. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1996. (8)
- Mulder-Bakker, Anneke B. Lives of the Anchoresses: The Rise of the Urban Recluse in Medieval Europe, translated by Myra Heerspink Scholz. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2005. (8)
- Wemple, Suzanne Fonay. Women in Frankish Society: Marriage and the Cloister (500 to 900). Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1981. (8)
- Allen, Prudence. The Concept of Woman, [v. 1]: The Aristotelian Revolution, 750 B.C.–A.D. 1250. Montreal: Eden Press, 1985. (7)
- Bloch, R. Howard. Medieval Misogyny and the Invention of Western Romantic Love. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1991. (7)
- Christine de Pizan. The Treasure of the City of Ladies, or The Book of the Three Virtues, translated by Sarah Lawson. Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1985. (7)
- Ferrante, Joan M. Woman as Image in Medieval Literature: from the Twelfth Century to Dante. New York: Columbia University Press, 1975. (7)
- Krueger, Roberta L. Women Readers and the Ideology of Gender in Old French Verse Romance. Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1993. (7)
- Newman, Barbara. From Virile Woman to WomanChrist: Studies in Medieval Religion and Literature. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1995. (7)
- Newman, Barbara. Sister of Wisdom. St. Hildegard's Theology of the Feminine. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1987. (7)
- Simons, Walter. Cities of Ladies: Beguine Communities in the Medieval Low Countries, 1200–1565. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001. (7)
- Beach, Alison I. Women as Scribes: Book Production and Monastic Reform in Twelfth-Century Bavaria. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2004. (6)
- Chaucer, Geoffrey. The Riverside Chaucer, edited by Larry D. Benson. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1987. (6)
- Elliott, Dyan. Proving Woman: Female Spirituality and Inquisitional Culture in the Later Middle Ages. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 2004. (6)
- Farmer, Sharon. Surviving Poverty in Medieval Paris: Gender, Ideology, and the Daily Lives of the Poor. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2002. (6)
- Ferrante, Joan M. To the Glory of Her Sex: Women's Roles in the Composition of Medieval Texts. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1997. (6)
- Finucane, Ronald C. The Rescue of the Innocents: Endangered Children in Medieval Miracles. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1997. (6)
- Gilchrist, Roberta. Gender and Material Culture: The Archaeology of Religious Women. London and New York: Routledge, 1994. (6)
- Gold, Penny Schine. The Lady and the Virgin: Image, Attitude and Experience in Twelfth-Century France. Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1985. (6)
- Goody, Jack. The Development of the Family and Marriage in Europe. Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1983. (6)

APPENDIX III: ENCYCLOPEDIA CITED REFERENCES

- Herlihy, David, and Christiane Klapisch-Zuber. Tuscans and Their Families: A Study of the Florentine Catasto of 1427. New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 1985. (6)
- Karras, Ruth Mazo. From Boys to Men: Formations of Masculinity in Late Medieval Europe. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2003. (6)
- King, Margaret L., and Albert Rabil, Jr., Eds. and trans. Her Immaculate Hand: Selected Works by and about the Women Humanists of Quattrocento Italy. 2nd ed. Asheville, N. C.: Pegasus, 1992. (6)
- Schulenburg, Jane Tibbetts. Forgetful of their Sex: Female Sanctity and Society, ca. 500–1100. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1998. (6)
- Solterer, Helen. The Master and Minerva: Disputing Women in French Medieval Culture. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1995. (6)
- Armstrong, Regis J. Clare of Assisi: Early Documents. St. Bonaventure, N.Y.: The Franciscan Institute Publications, 1993. (5)
- Baldwin, John W. The Language of Sex: Five Voices from Northern France around 1200. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1994. (5)
- Bennett, Judith M. Ale, Beer and Brewsters in England: Women's Work in a Changing World, 1300–1600. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996. (5)
- Blamires, Alcuin. The Case for Women in Medieval Culture. Oxford: Clarendon Press and New York: Oxford University Press, 1997. (5)
- Burns, E. Jane. Bodytalk: When Women Speak in Old French Literature. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1993. (5)
- Burns, E. Jane. Courtly Love Undressed: Reading through Clothes in Medieval French Culture. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2002. (5)
- Dronke, Peter. Women Writers of the Middle Ages: A Critical Study of Texts from Perpetua (+203) to Marguerite Porete (+1310). Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984. (5)
- Gravdal, Kathryn. Ravishing Maidens: Writing Rape in Medieval French Literature and Law. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1991. (5)
- Hamburger, Jeffrey F. Nuns as Artists: The Visual Culture of a Medieval Convent. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1997. (5)
- Hanawalt, Barbara, Ed. Women and Work in Preindustrial Europe. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1986. (5)
- Helmholz, Richard H. Marriage Litigation in Medieval England. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1974. (5)
- Herlihy, David. Opera Muliebria: Women and Work in Medieval Europe. McGraw-Hill, 1990. (5)
- Jacobus de Voragine. The Golden Legend: Readings on the Saints, translated by William Granger Ryan. 2 vols. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1993. (5)
- Jacquart, Danielle, and Claude Thomasset. Sexuality and Medicine in the Middle Ages, translated by Matthew Adamson. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1988. (5)
- Karras, Ruth Mazo. Common Women: Prostitution and Sexuality in Medieval England. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996. (5)
- Lewis, Gertrud Jaron. By Women, for Women, about Women: The Sister-Books of Fourteenth-Century Germany. Toronto: Pontifical Institute of Mediaeval Studies, 1996. (5)
- McCash, June Hall, Ed. The Cultural Patronage of Medieval Women. Athens, Ga.: University of Georgia Press, 1996. (5)
- McGinn, Bernard. The Flowering of Mysticism: Men and Women in the New Mysticism (1200–1350). Presence of God: Vol. 3 of New York: Crossroad, 1998. (6)
- Parsons, John Carmi, Ed. Medieval Queenship. New York: St. Martins Press, 1993. (5)
- Stafford, Pauline. Queen Emma and Queen Edith: Queenship and Women's Power in Eleventh-Century England. Oxford and Malden, Mass.: Blackwell, 1997. (5)
- Stafford, Pauline. Queens, Concubines, and Dowagers: The King's Wife in the Early Middle Ages. Athens, Ga.: University of Georgia Press, 1983. (5)

Appendix IV: Web Resources for Medieval Women and Gender Studies

---

The Internet has provided a hospitable environment for databases, metasites, bibliographies, editions and translations of texts, and images related to medieval women and gender. Some of these projects are so large and open-ended that a print format would not be feasible. The Web also promotes scholarly exchanges through discussion groups and academic organizations in this field.

The sites below have been selected as those most likely to offer reliable and useful information in a direct and up-to-date form. They are edited by scholars who actively research and publish in women's and gender studies. Indeed the usefulness of these web sites can be confirmed by their presence in the selective bibliographies in this volume.

Bibliography on Women in Byzantium

<http://www.doaks.org/WomeninByzantium.html>

Edited by Alice-Mary Talbot, Dumbarton Oaks.

Christine de Pizan: The Making of the Queen's Manuscript

<http://www.pizan.lib.ed.ac.uk./index.html>

Project to make digital transcriptions of works by Christine from a presentation manuscript that she supervised in the copying process. Supervised by the University of Edinburgh.

Corpus Reuelacionum sancte Birgitte (The Revelations of St. Birgitta)

<http://www.ra.se/ra/diplomatariet/crb/>

Latin edition of Birgitta of Sweden's works. Edited by Sara Risberg.

Epistolae

<http://db.ccnmtl.columbia.edu/ferrante/about2.html>

Letters from and to medieval women, 4th to the 13th century. Both the original Latin texts and English translations are presented. Edited by Joan Ferrante, Columbia University.

Feminae: Medieval Women and Gender Index

<http://www.haverford.edu/library/reference/mschaus/mfi/mfi.html>

Index of journal articles, essays, and book reviews published from 1990 to the present. Edited by Margaret Schaus, Haverford College.

Franciscan Women: History and Culture. A Geographical and Bio-Bibliographical Internet Guide

<http://franwomen.sbu.edu/franwomen/default.aspx>

Includes information on individual women. Directed by JeanFrançois Godet-Calogeras and Bert Roest, Franciscan Institute, St. Bonaventure University.

Hildegard of Bingen

<http://www.hildegard.org/>

Edited by the Working Group for the Promotion of the Tradition of Hildegard based in Bingen.

International Joan of Arc Society

<http://www.smu.edu/ijas/>

Director Bonnie Wheeler, Southern Methodist University, and Assistant Director Jane Marie Pinzino, University of Puget Sound.

International Marie de France Society

<http://www.people.vcu.edu/~cmarecha/>

Edited by Logan E. Whalen, University of Oklahoma.

Mapping Margery Kempe: A Guide to Late Medieval Material and Spiritual Life

<http://www.holycross.edu/departments/visarts/projects/kempe/>

The site brings together visual as well as textual resources for fifteenth century lay religious devotion. Sarah Stanbury and Virginia Raguin, both of the College of the Holy Cross, direct the project.

Marriage and Sexuality in Medieval Europe

<http://falcon.arts.cornell.edu/prh3/368/index.html>

Syllabus with Web links from Paul Hyams, Cornell University.

Medfem-1

<http://mailman1.u.washington.edu/mailman/listinfo/medfem-1>

Discussion list about feminist approaches to medieval studies.

Medieval Feminist Forum

<http://www.minotstateu.edu/mff/index.shtml>

This journal published by the Society for Medieval Feminist Scholarship promotes gender and women's studies.

Medieval Feminist Forum Bibliography

<http://myweb.uiowa.edu/cafrica/smfs/>

Bibliographies of recent publications in medieval women's and gender studies that appeared in the Medieval Feminist Forum are also available on this web site. Compiled by Chris Africa, University of Iowa.

Medieval Jewish Women in History, Literature, Law, and Art: A Bibliography

http://www.brandeis.edu/hbi/pubs/MEDWOM\_2006\_bib.doc

Compiled by Cheryl Tallan, 2000 and updated in 2006.

The Medieval Lyric

http://www.mtholyoke.edu/acad/medst/medieval\_lyric/index.html

Website for a project directed by Margaret Switten, Mount Holyoke College. The songs and anthology are available for purchase, but this site includes excerpts and bibliography.

Mittelalterliche Frauenklöster

<http://www.frauenkloester.de/>

Information, researchers, and links on medieval and early modern women's monasteries. Edited by Katrinette Bodarwé, Seminar für Mittlere und Neuere Geschichte, University of Göttingen.

Monastic Matrix

<http://monasticmatrix.usc.edu>

Resources for the study of medieval women's religious communities. Edited by Lisa Bitel, University of Southern California, and Katherine Gill, University of North Florida.

ORB: On-line Reference Book for Medieval Studies – Women's Studies Section

<http://www.the-orb.net/encyclop/culture/women/femindex.html>

Includes primary sources in translation, bibliographies, and links to other sites. Note in particular:

Montserrat Cabré, Trans. Public Record of the Labour of Isabel de la Cavalleria. January 10, 1490, Zaragoza. <http://www.the-orb.net/birthrecord.html>

Sharon Michalove, O Chyldren! Geue Eare Your Duties to Learne: The Education of Upper-Class Englishwomen in Late Medieval and Early Modern England http://www.the-orb.net/bibliographies/o\_chyl.html

Other Women's Voices

<http://home.infionline.net/~ddisse/>

Translations on the Web of women's writings prior to 1700. Edited by Dorothy Disse.

Roman de la Rose: Digital Surrogates of Medieval Manuscripts

<http://rose.mse.jhu.edu/>

Scanned images of manuscript pages from libraries in England and the United States. First-time users need to register for a password. Directed by Stephen Nichols, Johns Hopkins University.

Sex and Gender (section from the Internet Medieval Sourcebook)

<http://www.fordham.edu/halsall/sbook1v.html>

Primary sources in translation, edited by Paul Halsall.

St. Albans Psalter Website

<http://www.abdn.ac.uk/stalbanspsalter/english/index.shtml>

This psalter was made for Christina of Markyate. The site includes page images with transcriptions and translations in addition to explanatory essays. It is a project of the University of Aberdeen.

Women Writers of the Middle Ages

<http://www.library.rochester.edu/index.cfm?PAGE=227>

A bibliography compiled by Juliet Sloger, Robbins Library, University of Rochester.

Index

---

A

- “A la stagion che ‘1 mondo foglia e flora” (Compiuta Donzella), 156
- Abbesses, 1–4, 349
- Aebbe of Coldingham as, 10
  - Benedictine Rule and, 1
  - Brigit of Kildare as, 95
  - Caterina Vagri as, 113
  - Clare of Assisi as, 145
  - consecration of, 2
  - in diocese of Münster, 3
  - ecclesiastical jurisdiction of, 3–4
  - election of, 1–2
  - external duties of, 3–4
  - in Fontevrault Abbey, 296
  - in Frankish lands, 306
  - Gerberga II as, 107
  - in Germanic lands, 318–319
  - Gertrude of Hackeborn as, 322
  - Herrad of Hohenbourg, 363
  - Hild of Whitby, 3, 249, 364
  - Humility of Faenza, 385
  - internal authority of, 2–3
  - in Ireland, 410
  - in Jouarre/Chelles, 435
  - Mathilda as, 549
  - monasticism of, 581
  - necrologies/mortuary rolls of, 607
  - Petronilla of Cheminé as, 170
  - seals/sigillography of, 732
  - Seaxburh, 11
  - secular jurisdiction of, 3
  - sermons/preaching of, 737
  - Theodechilde, 98
  - virginity of, 819
  - on women’s ordination as priests, 625
- Abelard, Peter, 138, 157, 194, 243, 286, 289, 301, 358, 368, 468, 570, 577, 729, 730, 737, 756, 777, 808, 822
- Abortion, 4–5
- contraception and, 5, 167
  - as homicide, 4
  - midwives and, 5
  - as mortal sin, 4
  - public justice for, 4
  - scholasticism and, 5
  - theory of criminal, 4–5
  - wergild for, 831
  - witches in, 5
- Abram, Annie, 369
- Acts of Paul and Thecla, The*, 821
- Accounts. See Household Accounts
- Adela of Blois, 6–7
- Cecilia as sister of, 6
  - diplomacy of, 210
  - ecclesiastical influence of, 6
  - Ivo of Chartres and, 6
  - letter writing of, 468
  - literacy of, 6
  - Mathilda of Flanders as mother of, 6
  - Paschal II (Pope) and, 6
  - patronage of, 472
  - reforms of, 6
  - as regent, 6, 703
  - Stephen-Henry as husband of, 6
  - on warfare, 830
  - William the Conqueror as father of, 6
- Adelaide of Maurienne, burial of, 99
- Adelhausen Sister-Book, 761
- Adelheid (Adelaide), 7, 242, 318, 350
- Cluniac Order and, 7
  - coinage of, 627
  - diplomacy of, 210
  - ecclesiastical interests of, 7
  - letter writing of, 467–468
  - Lothar (King), of Italy as first husband of, 7
  - Otto I (King) as husband of, 7
  - as Ottonian royal woman, 626
  - political influence of, 7
  - Rudolf II (King) as father of, 7
- Adeodatus, 52
- Adgar, 536
- Administration of Estates, 7–8
- agriculture in, 12
  - Barberino, Francesco da on, 7
  - Beaufort and, 8
  - by Berkeley, 8
  - by Burgh, 8
  - charters for, 121–122
  - Christine de Pizan on, 7, 8
  - by gentry women of England, 316–317
  - Grosseteste on, 7
  - by Mahaut, 8
  - by Mohun, 8
  - in rural records, 700
  - by Talbot, 8
  - by widows, 8
- Admiración operum Dey (Wonder at the Works of God)* (Teresa de Cartagena), 480, 789, 853
- Adolescence, 8–10
- apprenticeship and, 9
  - Ariès on, 8
  - career options/education during, 9
  - of females, 9
  - James on, 9
  - Schultz on, 9
- Adorno, Giuliano, 116
- Adrian IV (Pope), 588
- Adson of Montier-en-Der, 152
- Adultery, 750. See also Sexuality: Extramarital Sex
- in extramarital sex, 743–744
  - Gratian on, 754
- Adversus Jovinianum*, 708
- Aebbe of Coldingham, 10
- Aelfflaed, 194
- Aelred of Rievaulx, 146, 324, 402, 470, 485, 488, 819
- Ancrene Wisse and, 19–20
- Aelthryth, 685

INDEX

- Aeneid* (Virgil), 16, 602, 803
 Aeschylus, 219
 Aethelberht (King), 684 law codes of, 60
 Aethelburh, 684
 Aethelflaed, 10, 443
   Aetheldred as husband of, 10
   Alfred the Great as father of, 10, 443
   Anglo-Saxon Chronicle and, 10
   Hild of Whitby and, 10
   House of Wessex and, 10 of Mercia, 10
   Vikings and, 10
 Aethelred, 10, 250, 549
 Aethelred II (King), 211, 507, 684
 Aethelstan, 10
 Aethelthryth of Ely (Queen), 10–11, 684
   Aebbe of Coldingham, 10
   Aethelwold and, 11
   artistic patronage of, 635
   asceticism of, 10–11
   chastity of, 123
   Ecgfrith as husband of, 10
   as female saint, 11
   Hild of Whitby and, 10
   Seaxburh as sister of, 11
   Tonberht as first husband of, 10
   virginity of, 10–11
   Wilfrid and, 10
 Aethelweard, 549
 Aethelwold of Winchester (Bishop), 11
 Aethelwulf (King), 685
Against Jovinian (Jerome), 486, 570, 836
 Agatha, 354
 Agnes of Assisi, 656
   as virgin martyr, 814
 Agnes of Harcourt, 413
 Agnes of Montepulciano, 224
 Agnes of Prague, 11
   Clare of Assisi and, 11, 145
   Crosiers of the Red Star by, 11
   Franciscan rule for women and, 11
 Agriculture, 11–13
   administration of estates in, 12
   Barbarian Law Codes on, 60
   division of labor in, 214 economic system of, 12 Germanic laws on, 60
   peasants and, 11–12, 642
   rural records of, 701
   in Scandinavia, 727
   women in, 605–606
 Ainsworth, Maryan, 543
 Alamans, law codes of, 60
 Alan of Lille, 262, 363, 628, 749
 Alba. See Dawn Song (Alba)
 Alberic II of Rome, 516
 Alberic of Spoleto, 516
 Albert the Great, 434, 628
 Albert V (King), 445
 Albertano of Brescia, 196
 Alberti, Leon Battista, 396, 767, 773
 Albigensian Crusade, 36, 114
 Albrecht (King), 510
 Alceste, as Queen of the God of Love, 24
 Aleida of Cleve, 135
 Alewives and Brewing, 13–14, 238, 605 apprentices for, 25
   in artisan families, 45
   in England, 251
   hopped beer introduction in, 13
   peasants and, 642
   prostitutes and, 13
   regulations for, 13
   in Scotland, 731
   singlewomen and, 759
 Alexander III (Pope), 250, 452, 525, 825
   on children, betrothal/marriage, 127
   on illegitimacy, 395
 Alexander IV (Pope), 145, 413, 657
 Alexander the Great, Thalestris seduction of, 16
 Alexander VI (Pope), 413
Alexiad (Komnene), 104, 368, 444, 445
 Alexios I Komnenos, 104, 248
 Alexios II, 248
 Alexios III, 103
 Alfonso, 412, 478
 Alfonso I (King), 652, 809
 Alfonso II (King), 652
 Alfonso IV (King), 112
 Alfonso IX (King), 70, 391
 Alfonso V (King), 211, 703
 Alfonso VI (King), 256, 593, 682, 808
 Alfonso VII (King), 211, 809
 Alfonso VIII (King), 70, 76
 Alfonso X (King), 391, 478, 479, 547
 Alfonso XI (King), 703
 Alfred the Great, 443
   Aethelflaed as daughter of, 10
   Ealhswith as wife of, 10
 Ælfric, on Judith, 436
 Alice de Bryene, 210
   household accounts of, 379
 Alice of Blois, 184
 Alienor de Poitiers, 447
 Allegory, 647–648, 717
   in Sentimental Romance, 735
 Allen, Emily Hope, 369, 855
 Almsgiving and Charity, 14–15
   Annunciation Guild of Rome and, 15
   Aquinas and, 14
   Bernardino of Siena and, 14
   Book of Tobit and, 14 for bridge of Puente la Reina, 15 captive redemption as, 15 of Catherine of Genoa, 116 Christ and, 14
   to confraternities, 163
   dowry in, 15
   by Elisabeth of Hungary, 14, 245 Frances of Rome and, 14
   guilds and, 15
   hagiography and, 14 hospitals and, 15, 377
   men's distribution of, 15 for old age, 624
   for poverty, 663
   practice of, 14–15

- of Queens/Empresses of West, 689
 for religious poverty, 665
 Seven Works of Mercy and, 14 wills and, 14–15, 838 women/children in, 14 of Zita of Lucca, 14
- Al-Mustakfi III, 594
- Alphonso X, 687
- Altfred, 549
- Altra fiata* (Guittone), 483
- Amadis of Gaul*, 17
- Amalasantha (Queen), 16, 416
- Amand (Bishop), 322
- Amatus of Montecassino, 416
- Amazons, 16–17, 252
- Achilles and, 16
- Ares and, 16
- arms/armor of, 16, 36
- Artemis and, 16
- Boccaccio and, 16
- Chaucer and, 16
- Christine de Pizan and, 16, 602
- Eschenbach and, 16
- Joan of Arc as, 17
- of Nine Worthy Women, 608
- Penthesilea and, 16
- Suetonius description of, 16
- Thalestris as queen, 16
- Trojan War and, 16
- Ambrose, 580, 815
- letter writing to, 485
- on Mary/Martha, 531
- on Virgin Mary, 538
- on virginity, 123
- Amer, Sahar, 747
- Amores* (Ovid), 193, 627
- Amorous Vision* (Boccaccio), 803
- Amoryus and Cleopes* (Metham), 488
- Amulets. See Magic and Charms
- Anchoresses, 17–19
- Ancrene Wisse and, 18, 19
- anonymity of, 18, 19
- Dorothea of Montau as, 225
- enclosure of, 18
- Eve of St. Martin as, 19
- Eve of Wilton as, 18
- Fourth Lateran Council and, 17, 19
- Guibert of Nogent's mother as, 18
- in Iberia, 391
- Julian of Norwich as, 18, 437
- Juliana of Cornillon as, 18
- Katherine Group for, 439–440
- Katherine of Ledbury as, 18
- Kempe and, 18
- Loretta, Countess of Leicester as, 18
- Margaret “the Cripple” of Magdeburg as, 19, 508
- Mulder-Bakker on, 19
- social status of, 18–19
- widows as, 18
- Yvette of Huy as, 18, 861
- Anchoritism
- in architecture, monastic, 33
- popularity of anchoresses in, 17–18
- Ancrene Wisse, 18, 19–20, 439, 487, 489, 746
- “AB” dialect of, 19
- Aelred and, 19–20
- on anchoritism, 17–18
- Bodley 34 and, 19
- “Confession” in, 20
- Corpus Christi manuscript of, 19
- “Custody of the Senses, The” in, 20
- “Devotions” in, 20
- Dominican Order and, 19
- Fourth Lateran Council and, 19
- of Katherine Group, 19
- “Love” in, 20
- Millet on, 19
- “Penance” in, 20
- “Regulation of the Inward Feelings, The” in, 20
- Salu and, 20
- Savage on, 19
- “Temptations” in, 20
- Andreas of Hungary, 682
- Andrew I of Hungary, 723
- Andrew II of Hungary, 236, 245, 430
- Andronikos III, 248
- Angela of Foligno, 21–22, 55, 280, 351, 418, 441, 463, 600, 658, 768, 849
- as bride of Christ, 95
- on Christ, 21
- Franciscan Rule and, 21
- lay woman, 462
- Liber* on, 21
- mysticism of, 597
- spiritual experiences of, 21
- as tertiary, 791
- theological themes of, 21
- Third Order of St. Francis and, 21
- Ubertino and, 21
- Angelina of Montegiove, 658, 790
- Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, 10
- translation of, 549
- Anglo-Saxon Literature. See Literature, Old English
- Anna of Nassau, 318
- Anna of Savoy, 248, 249
- Annales de Terre Sainte*, 184
- Annales Mettenses Priores*, on Carolingian dynasty, 435
- Annales Quedlinburgenses*, 549
- Annales School of History, 22–23
- Annales d'Histoire Économique et Sociale* journal of, 22
- Annales: Economies, Sociétés, Civilisations* journal of, 22
- Bloch, Marc and, 22
- Bloch, R. Howard and, 288
- Braudel and, 22
- Clio: Histoire, Femmes et Société* and, 22
- Duby/Perrot and, 22
- Febvre and, 22
- Herlihy and, 22
- Klapisch-Zuber and, 22
- Ladurie and, 22
- Schmitt Pantel and, 22
- at University of Strasbourg, 22
- wills in, 838
- “Annals of Aethelflaed,” 10
- Annals of Metz*, on Carolingian dynasty, 442
- Anne (Saint), 24–25, 313, 374
- Anne of Brittany and, 24
- Anne of Burgundy and, 24

INDEX

- Anne (Saint) (cont.)
 as apocryphal mother of Virgin Mary, 14
 in art, 24, 25, 40
 Council of Trent and, 25
 Holy Family group and, 25 as Holy Kinship group founder, 24
 on Immaculate Conception, 24
 Jacobus and, 24
 Jesus as grandson of, 24 prayers to, 24
 Trithemius and, 25
- Anne of Beaujeu, 23, 161, 404, 703
 Charles (King) and, 23
 Charles VIII (King) as brother of, 23
 Charlotte of Savoy as mother of, 23
 Jeanne as sister of, 23
 Louis XI (King) as father of, 23
 Mad War of 1485 and, 23
 Pierre de Beaujeu as husband of, 23
- Anne of Bohemia, 24, 87–88, 688
 Alceste and, 24
 as ambassador of culture, 87
 Charles IV (King) as father of, 24
 Chaucer and, 24
 Hus and, 24
 Richard II (King) as husband of, 24, 87 tomb of, 111
 Wycliffe and, 24
- Anne of Brittany, 24, 590
- Anne of Burgundy, 24
- Anne of France. See Anne of Beaujeu
- Annunciation. See Mary, Virgin (all entries)
- Annunciation Guild of Rome, 15
- Anselm of Canterbury, 396
- Anselm of Bec, 394, 468
- Anselm of Canterbury, 6, 729, 777, 850
 devotional practices of, 207
- Anselm of Lucca, 550
- Ansfride, concubine of Henry I (King), 158
- Ansprachen (Lectures)* (Haider), 739
- Anthanasius, 108
 on Virgin Mary, 538
- Anthology of Ancient and Medieval Woman's Song*
 (Klinck), 845
- “Antichrist” (Ava), 56
- Antiope, 16
- Aoife, 411
- Apollinaris of Laodicaea, 422
- Apostles' Creed*, 327
- Apostolic Constitutions*, 137
- Apostolic Tradition* (Hippolytus), 136
- Apprentices, 25–26 adolescence and, 9
 contracts for, 25, 26 girls/boys as, 327
 guilds and, 25, 337
 in home manufacturing, 375
 servants as, 741
 textile production and, 26
- Aquinas, Thomas, 14, 314, 396, 566, 625, 729, 749
 on Biblical Creation, 209
 on Immaculate Conception, 538
 on prostitutes, 675
 on soul, 771
- Arboleda de los enfermos (Grove of the Infirm)* (Teresa de Cartagena), 480, 789
- Arbor Vitae* (Ubertino), Angela of Foligno and, 21
- Archaeology, 26–28 of architectural remains, 28 cemeteries in, 27 challenge of traditional, 26–27
 gender ideologies in, 308–309
 gender inequity in, 26 of grave goods, 333
- Archer, Janice, 767
- Architecture, Domestic, 28–30, 670 castles/palaces in, 29
 gendering space in, 28–30
 metaphors of, 29–30
 Mondeville and, 29
 segregation in, 28
 upper-class women's accommodations in, 29
- Architecture, Ecclesiastical, 30–31
 Bernard (Saint) and, 31
 Boniface VIII (Pope) and, 30
 in Byzantine tradition, 30
 Catherine of Alexandria (Saint) and, 31
 Chartres Cathedral in, 31
 choirs in, 30
 Durham Cathedral, 30
 Ely cathedral and, 31
 female saint dedication in, 31
 Gregorian Reform and, 30
 misericords in, 568
 separation for sacraments in, 30–31
 Tridentine reform and, 30
 Vadstena church and, 30
 Virgin Mary in, 31, 542–546 women as patrons of, 31
 women's separation in, 30
- Architecture, Monastic, 31–35
 art/austerity in, 34
 Benedictine Order and, 31, 32, 34
 Birgitta of Sweden (Saint) and, 33
 Boniface VIII (Pope) and, 33
 Caesarius (Bishop) and, 32 choir location in, 34
 Council of Trent and, 32
 destruction of women's, 32
 Elisabeth of Hungary model for, 33 enclosure in, 33
 in England, 32
 Fontevault Abbey and, 2, 3, 33
 Franciscan Order and, 33 generalization difficulties of, 32–33 in Germany, 34
 Gernrode monastery in, 34
 Giotto and, 34
 historical documentation of, 32
 Isabelle and, 33
 in Italy, 32, 33, 34
 Mendicant Order and, 34
 monasteries in, 32, 34 monastic enclosures in, 574–575
 patronage of, 635–636
 Poor Clares Order and, 32, 33 in Portugal, 32
 in Spain, 32, 34

- sparse evidence of, 32
 Sta. Chiara nunnery and, 31, 32, 33, 34 in Sweden, 34
 Virgin Mary in, 542–546
 women's role in, 33–34
 Zarri and, 34
- Ares
 Amazons and, 16
 “Girdle of Ares,” 16
- Ariès, Philippe, 8, 325 arguments against, 325–327
- Arisian Books of the Taille, The, on tax records of business, 101
- Aristotelian Concepts, of Women and Gender, 35–36, 284, 314
 Christine de Pizan and, 36
 on conception, 671, 672
 on Eve, 267
 Giles of Rome and, 35
 hermaphrodites in, 362
 Maclean on, 708
 Magnus and, 35
 on medicine, 216
 on misogyny, 569
 of scholasticism, 729
 in Secrets of Women, 733–734
 of soul, 771
 in universities, 808
 on Virgin Mary, 540
 of Woman on Top, 844
 women's political role and, 35
 women's subordination/inferiority to men in, 35
- Aristotle's Masterpiece*, 734
- Arms and Armor, 36–37 of Amazons, 16
 Born, Bertran de and, 36
 Christine de Pizan and, 37
 Giles and, 36
 Hundred Years War and, 37
 Joan of Arc and, 36
 Montfort, Jeannes de and, 37
 Montfort, Simon de and, 36
 Penthievre and, 37
 Ptolemy and, 36
 in tournaments, 797
 Valkyries and, 37
- Armstrong, Regis, 577
- Arnalte y Lucenda (Arnalte and Lucenda)* (Diego de San Pedro), 735
- Ars Amandi* (Ovid), 498
- Ars Amatoria (Art of Love)* (Ovid), 175, 627
- Art of Courtly Love, The* (Capellanus), 175, 641
- Art, Representations of Women in, 37–41
 in Abbey Church of Königsfelden, 39
 Anne (Saint) and, 40
 Boccaccio and, 40
 Campbell and, 40
 Chartres Cathedral and, 39
 Christine de Pizan and, 40
 in devotional, 200–204
 Duke of Berry and, 40
 Eyck and, 39
 feminine activities in, 39–40
 gender in, 312–313
 Genesis story and, 39
 Giles of Rome and, 39
 Mellinkoff and, 39
 Nicholas and, 39
 nudity/female body in, 39
 by nuns as illuminators, 611–612 portrait medals in, 659
 powerful women in, 40
 Queen of Sheba and, 39
Saxon Manor and, 40 seals/sigillography of, 732–733 sheela na gigs in, 38, 756–757
 of Virgin Mary, 544–545
 witches and, 40
 woman as deformity/ideal beauty in, 39
- Artemis, 16
- Arthur, incest by, 400
- Arthurian Literature, 41–43, 717
 Burns and, 43
 Camelot and, 41
 Chrétien de Troyes and, 41, 42, 797
 Cornuälle and, 42 critical approaches to, 43
 cross-dressing in, 182
 diversity of male roles in, 42–43
 Fay in, 42
 Fries and, 43
 Guinevere in, 41–42, 338–339
 Iseut as character in, 42, 43
 Krueger and, 43
 Lancelot in, 41–42
 Malory and, 43
 McCracken and, 43
 Paris, Gaston and, 41
 Perceval's sister as character in, 43
 Round Table, The and, 41
 Silence as female character in, 42–43, 175 supernatural women in, 42–43, 786
Tristan as, 332
 Tristan/Isolde, 414–415 vernacular literacy/reading of, 473 of Wolfram von Eschenbach, 843
 women/courtly love in, 41–42
- Artisan Families, Women of, 44–45
 apprentices in, 25
 artisan wives in, 44
 artistic patronage of, 636
 Benoyne and, 44
 guilds and, 44, 337
 social status of, 766, 767
 in textile production, 794
 work in, 858
 workshop production role by, 45
- Artistic Patronage. See Patronage, Artistic
- Artists, Women, 45–47
 Bayeux Tapestry and, 46
 Caterina Vigri, 46, 113
 Claricia and, 46
 Codex Sintram and, 46 crafts v. art for, 45
 feminist art historians and, 46
 Guda and, 46
 Guidisalvi as, 45
 guilds and, 45, 46
 Herrad of Hohenbourg and, 45
 Hildegard of Bingen and, 45 identification impediment in, 45 in nunneries, 46
 nuns as illuminators, 611–612

INDEX

- Artists, Women (cont.) self-portraits, 46
Syon Cope and, 46
- Asceticism, 47–49
of Aethelthryth, 10–11
Ambrose and, 47
Bible/Eastern Church and, 47
Bynum and, 48
Catherine of Siena and, 48
Christ and, 47, 48
Christina the Astonishing and, 48
Council of Nicaea and, 47
Dorothea of Montau and, 48
Elliott and, 48
by fasting, 48
in hagiography, 348
Hollywood and, 48
of Jerome, 47, 422
Julian of Norwich and, 48
lay penitential movement in, 48 of Lutgard of Ayvières, 500 Marie of Oignies and of martyrs, 108
in Modern Devotion, 573
monasticism and, 47–48
Paul (Saint) writings and, 47 practices in, 48
of Radegund, 48, 693, 694
on sex in marriage, 755
sexual abstinence and, 47
syneisaktism and, 47
Vauchez and, 48
Western development in, 47–48
of Yvette of Huy, 861
- Aston, Margaret, 497
- Ástriðr, in Old Norse literature, 495
- Athalaric, 16
- Athanagild (King), 684
- Athanasius of Alexandria, 422, 537, 580, 581
- Audience, Women in the, 49–51 for ballads, 58–59 belief of inferiority of, 50
Boccaccio and, 50
Chaucer and, 50
Chrétien de Troyes and, 50
Christine de Pizan and, 51
for drama, 233
Fournival and, 50
France, Marie de and, 51
Jean de Meun and, 50, 51
LeFèvre and, 50
male authors and, 50
Matheolus and, 50, 51
reader-response criticism of, 696–697 resistant figures in, 50–51
- Augustine (Saint), 52, 348, 354, 469, 566, 601, 708, 854
on Biblical Creation, 309 on chastity/chaste marriage, 123 community of, 1
on conjugal debt, 164
on devotional literature, 205
on Eve, 569
on incest, 399
on Mary/Martha, 531
on obscenity, 618
on prostitution, 675
Rule of, 324
on virginity, 817
on vision, 307
- Augustine (Saint), Influence of, 51–53
on asceticism, 52, 53
Clark, Elizabeth and, 52, 53
Ecdicia and, 52
inferiority/subordination of women by, 52
Jerome and, 52, 422
letters or nuns in Hippo by, 52 relationships with women by, 51–52
Richardson and, 52
theoretical perspectives of, 52–53
Visigoths and, 52
- Augustine of Hippo (Saint), 137, 423, 434, 576, 581, 651
on contraception, 168
on Eve, 267
on Immaculate Conception, 395
on soul, 771
on Virgin Mary, 538
- Augustinian Order, 586
- Augustinian Rule, 107, 573–574, 577, 583, 777
Clare of Montefalco and, 146
clothing for, 149
in Dominican Order, 223
in Irish nunneries, 587
in monastic rules, 576
of Premonstratensian Order, 669
- Augustodunensis, Honorius, 268, 539
- Aurelian of Arles, 241
- Austen, Jane, 287
- Austrasia, Brunhild as regent of, 96
- Autohagiography, 53–56
of Angela of Foligno, 53, 55
Caterina of Bologna and, 54 characteristics of, 54
by Ebner, Margaretha, 237
Elisabeth of Schönau and, 53
hagiography v., 54
Hildegard of Bingen, 54
of Julian of Norwich, 53, 54, 600
Kempe and, 54
Magdalena and, 53
of mystics, 599
Paul (Saint) and, 54
revelations of, 53, 55
- Ava, 56, 474
as German woman author, 847
Vorau manuscript and, 56
- Ave Maria* prayer, 206, 327, 539, 540, 548
- Ave regina caelorum* (Hail, Queen of the Heavens) (Dufay), 548
- Aviñón, Juan de, 479
- ## B
- Bacci, Michele, 545
- Baiane, Eudokia, 102
- Bailey, Derrick Sherwin, 749
- Bake, Alijt, 57–58
Modern Devotion and, 574
vision of, 57
- Baker, Derek, 371
- Baldwin IX (Emperor), 154

- Baldwin of Boulogne, 394
Ballad of the Tyrannical Husband, 856
Ballade de la Grosse Margot (Villon), 812
Ballade pour prier Notre Dame (Villon), 812
Ballade pour Robert d'Estouteville (Villon), 812 Ballads, 58–59
   on heroic figures, 58–59
   on romance, 58
   Romancero as, 719–720
 Balthild (Queen), 349, 685
   artistic patronage of, 635–636
   grave goods of, 333
Banshenchas (Lore of Women), 481
 Barbarian Law Codes, 59–61, 451, 752 Aethelberht and, 60 for agricultural disputes, 60 of Bavarians, 60 compensation in, 60 crime/criminals in, 60
   for female violence, 813
   of Germany, 59
   for inheritance, 60
   in Latin, 60
   Roman law in, 59
   Salian Franks and, 59–60 of Theodoric II (King), 59 of Theodosius II, 59 of Visigoths, 59
   for wergild, 831
 Barbaro, Francesco, humanism of, 383
 Barberino, Andrea da, 253
 Barberino, Francesco da, 88, 463, 646
   on administration of estates, 7
 Barking Abbey, 146
 Bartlett, Robert, 660
 Basil I, 248
 Basil of Caesarea, 580, 581, 585
 Bateson, Mary, 369, 855
 Bathild (Queen), 435
 Battagli, Marco, 191
 Baudonivia, 242, 349, 694, 736, 849
 Baudri of Dol, 170
 Bayeux Tapestry, 46, 152
   memorial purpose of, 194
 Beast Epic, 61–62
   Réponse Du Bestiare d'amour as, 709 as satire vehicle, 61
 Beata Colomba da Rieti, 635
 Beatrice, 61, 602, 649, 651
   as Dante character, 62, 190–191
   in Dante's Commedia, 190
   in Dante's Paradiso, 191
   in Italian literature, 483 masculine authority of, 190–191
 Beatrice d'Aragona, 281
 Beatrice de Planissoles, 168
 Beatrice d'Este, 281
 Beatrice of Nazareth, 62–64, 239, 600, 768 of Cistercian Order, 63 dancing of, 189
   mystic writings of, 599–600
   theology of love of God by, 63
 Beatrice of Upper Lorraine, 468 Beaufort, Margaret, 8, 64–65, 851 chastity vow of, 64
   devotional literature translation by, 64, 205
   ecclesiastical patronage of, 638
   as mother of Henry VII (King), 64
   Richard III (King) conspiracy by, 64 Beauty, 64–66
   elements of female, 64–65 elements of male, 65 of Laura, 651
   Matthew of Vendôme's description of, 64–65
 Beauvais, Vincent de, 84
 Beauvoir, Simone de, as feminist theorist, 289
 Bede, 10, 364, 429, 434, 641
   on chastity, 123
   on Mary Magdalene, 532
   on Virgin Mary, 543
 Bédier, Joseph, 271
 Beguines, 66–69, 350, 575, 589, 766, 780, 790 almsgiving/charity by, 15
   asceticism of, 48
   in bridal body in religion, 81
   community of, 67
   Douceline of Digne for movement of, 228 education in, 239–240
   on female same sex relations, 746
   in Flanders, 294
   Hadewijch and, 345
   Humiliati comparison to, 385
   Jutta of Borgloon as, 66
   lay women of, 462
   Marie of Oignies as, 66, 68, 514
   Mechthild of Magdeburg, 554 mysticism/mystics of, 596, 598
   in northern France, 299
   in Occitania, 622
   Otilia of Liège as, 66
   persecution of, 68
   religious poverty of, 664
   sermons/preaching of, 739
   singlewomen of, 759
   spirituality of, 67–68
   vernacular theology of, 68
   for widows, 833
   Yvette of Huy as, 66
 Bela IV (King), 223
 Bell, Rudolph, 280, 281, 347
 Bell, Susan Groag, 371
 Belle Dame Sans Merci, 69
   as independent woman, 69
Belle Heulmiere (Villon), 812
Belles Heures (Beautiful Hours) (Duke of Berry), 86 Bellini, Giovannina, 173, 187
 Bellomo, Manlio, 230
Belt, The (Dietrich von Glezze), 182
 Belting, Hans, 202, 544
 Bembo, Pietro, 173
 Benedict III (Pope), 658
 Benedict of Aniane
   on canonesses, 107
   on monastic enclosure, 575
 Benedict of Nursia, 575, 576
 Benedict XIII (Pope), 155
 Benedictine abbey, 6, 299
 Benedictine Order, 355, 575, 586 architecture, monastic and, 31, 32, 34
   clothing for, 149

INDEX

- Benedictine Order (cont.)
 in Observant Movement, 619–620
- Benedictine Rule, 1, 107, 153, 324, 364, 581, 583, 656, 777, 849
 Clare of Assisi and, 144
 clothing for, 149
 on monastic rule, 576–577 nuns as scribes for, 614
 on oblates/oblation, 617
- Benkov, Edith, 747
- Bennett, Judith, 372, 746, 858
- Benoît de Sainte-Maure, 628
- Benonyne, Giles de, 44
- Beowulf, 69–70, 491, 492, 786, 821
 on Judith, 436
 mead-giver in, 552
 powerful women in, 69
 valkyries in, 811
 violence in, 70
- Berceo, Gonzalo de, 479, 547
- Berenger Long-Ass*, as fabliau, 271
- Berenguela, 70–71
 Alfonso VIII (King) as father of, 70
 Fernando III (King) as son of, 70 as queen of León, 70
- Berkeley, Elizabeth, 8
 household accounts of, 379
- Bernard of Clairvaux (Saint), 31, 81, 139, 247, 324, 345, 365, 423, 434, 532, 543, 583, 596, 597, 769, 779, 780
 on Bride of Christ, 95
 on Immaculate Conception, 396
 on Mary/Martha, 531
- Bernard of Gordon, 479
 on Caesarean section, 105
- Bernard of Septimania, 209, 590
- Bernardino of Siena, 14, 434, 619, 706, 738, 784 behavior guidelines by, 220–221 on cosmetics, 173
 preaching of, 533
- Berners, Juliana, 851
- Bérout, 717
- Berta, countess of Tuscany, diplomacy of, 210
- Bertachini, Giovanni, 765
- Bertha (Queen), 349, 684, 685
- Berthold
 preaching of, 533
 sermons/preaching of, 737
- Bertilla
 abbess of Jouarre, 435
 grave goods of, 333
- Bertrade of Montfort, 157, 732
- Bertram of Le Mans, 304
- Bertran de Born, 490
- Bertrand du Guesclin, 433
- Bescela, Berne abbey founded by, 135
- Bestiaire D'Amour. See Réponse du Bestiaire d'Amour
- Bestor, Jane Fair, 230
- “Betrothal of the Prepubescent, The” (Isidore), 127
- Betrothals, 71–72
 in bride of Christ imagery, 94
 in Christian marriage, 517
 in courtship, 179
 gender ideologies of, 309
 German version of, 71
 in Jewish marriage, 528, 529
 Lombard on, 71
 in marriage impediments, 525, 526
 rites in, 72
 in Scandinavia, 523
 trousseau for, 802
- Beyond Their Sex: Learned Women of the European Past* (Labalme), 707
- Bible, Women in, 47, 72–74 equality of, 73
 as evangelists, 73–74
 Eve, 266–267
 Mary Magdalene in, 531–534
 Mary/Martha in, 530–531 mother in, 73 naming from, 605
 in Old English literature, 491
 personifications of, 72
 Reinhartz on, 73
 typology of, 804–805
- Biddick, Kathleen, 545
- Biernoff, Susannah, 202
- Billr, Peter, 114, 169
- Birgitta of Sweden (Saint), 33, 74–75, 205, 251, 302, 351, 441, 463, 577, 584, 600, 647, 728, 776, 777, 796, 822, 850
 Bride of Christ and, 739
 on clothing, 149
 on double monasteries, 228
 heresy and, 739
 as prophet, 739
 sermons/preaching of, 739, 778
- Birgittine Order, 1, 75–76, 228, 577 by Birgitta of Sweden, 75
 clothing for, 149
 in Scandinavia, 728
 Syon Abbey of, 787
- Birgittine Rule, 577
- Birth Control. See Contraception
- Bishop, Jane, 372
- Black Death, 13, 14, 300, 301, 559, 654, 663, 741, 766, 857. See also Plague
- Blanca (Queen) of Navarra, sarcophagus of, 99
- Blanche of Castile (Queen), 31, 76–77, 299, 319, 468, 590, 689
 Alfonso VIII (King) as father of, 76
 diplomacy of, 211
 Eleanor of Aquitaine as grandmother of, 244
 Isabelle of France as daughter of, 413
 Louis IX (King) as son of, 76
 Louis VIII as husband of, 76 mother as teacher, 87
 patronage of, 31, 77
 as regent of France, 77, 703
 as widow, 832
- Blanche of France. See Floire and Blancheflor
- Bloch, Elaine, 855
- Bloch, Marc, 22, 298, 609
- Bloch, R. Howard, 288, 289, 373, 571
- Boccaccio, Giovanni, 40, 50, 77–79, 125, 126, 151, 185, 197, 252, 261, 269, 368, 384, 451, 482, 498, 570, 601, 602, 628, 646, 707, 735, 803, 854
 Amazons and, 16
 Dante v., 77, 78
 Flammetta as figure in work of, 78
 humanism of, 383
 in Italian literature, 483
 literary work of, 77–78
 on lovesickness, 499

- Petrarch v., 77, 78
 on plagues, 655
 on Pope Joan, 658
 portrayal of women by, 77–78
- Bodley 34, Ancrene Wisse and, 19
- Body, in Literature and Religion, 79–82 asceticism in, 47–48
 body in religion, 80–81
 bridal body in religion, 81–82
 celibate body in religion, 81
 Christine de Pizan and, 80
 desiring body in literature, 79–80 inspirational body in literature, 79 literary challenges to convention in, 80 maternal body in religion, 81 repugnant body in literature, 80 suffering body in religion, 82
- Body, Visual Representations of, 82–85 art representations in, 39 clothing of, 83
 earthly empresses in, 84
 Eve depictions in, 83 formal court attire in, 84 gender bending in, 84–85 on Jesus, 312
 medical body in, 83
 narrow line of dress propriety in, 84 nudity of, 82–83
 Queen of Heaven in, 84 romantic/spiritual lovers in, 84
 sheela na gigs in, 756–757
 taboo body in, 83–84
- Boeck der tribulation (Book of Tribulation)* (Bake), 57
- Boethius, 148, 469, 490, 601, 712, 822, 840
- Boiardo, Maria Matteo, 253
- Bois, Hawisia de, 91
- Boke of Husbandry* (Fitzherbert), 643
- Boke of the Duchesse* (Chaucer), 488
- Bokenham, Osbern, 85–86, 487, 815 female saints writing of, 85
- Bonaventure, 777
- Boniface (Saint), 465, 466, 582, 614
- Boniface IX (Pope), 303
 Birgitta of Sweden's canonization by, 75
- Boniface of Canossa, 550
- Boniface VIII (Pope), 30, 33, 463, 575, 584, 589, 812
- Bonnassie, Pierre, 229
- Book of Ceremonies* (Constantine VII), 248
- Book of Consolation and Advice* (Albertano), 196
- Book of Deeds of Arms and of Chivalry* (Christine de Pizan), 134
- Book of Gomorrah, The* (Damian), 749
- Book of Holy Feasts* (Dorothea of Montau), 351
- Book of Hours (Noir), 45
- Book of Margery Kempe, The* (Allen/Brown), 369
- Book of Margery Kempe, The* (Kempe), 220, 251, 308, 440, 541, 653
- Book of Peace, The* (Christine de Pizan), 134
- Book of St. Albans* (Berners), 851
- Book of the Body Politic* (Christine de Pizan), 134
- Book of the City of Ladies, The* (Christine de Pizan), 17, 36, 40, 51, 88, 134, 161, 195, 197, 372, 494, 572, 602, 649, 734
- Book of The Duchess* (Chaucer), 125
- Book of the Goodman of Paris*, 741
- Book of the Knight of the Tower, The* (Caxton), 160–161, 220
- Book of the Three Virtues, The* (Christine de Pizan), 51, 88, 134, 161, 741
- Book of the Treasury of Ladies* (Christine de Pizan), 220
- Book of Tobit*, 14
- Book Ownership, 86–89, 716 of devotional literature, 205
 in lay education, 241 mothers as teachers for, 87
 on piety, 86
 private, 86
 secular books in, 87–88
 translated into vernacular in, 87–88 women as ambassadors of culture in, 87 written for women, 88
- Book Production. See Nuns as Scribes
- Books of Hours, 89–92, 505, 590, 633 content/decoration of, 90–91
 Deschamps on, 91
 in devotional practices, 206
 Grote translation of, 90
 for lay piety, 462
 Leroquais catalogue of, 207
 marginalia in, 509
 origins/development of, 90–91 ownership/patronage/use of, 91–92 peasants in, 643
 prayers in, 207
 Psalter in, 90
 recitation of, 90
 on Virgin Mary, 89
- Books of Visions* (Elisabeth of Schönau), 246
- Born, Bertran de, 36
- Borroff, Marie, 855
- Boswell, John, 749
- Bouly de Lesdaiin, A.M., 206
- Bouyer, Louis, 595
- Boys. See Girls and Boys
- Braudel, Fernand, 22
- Brayer, E., 206
- Breastfeeding and Wet-nursing, 93–94, 326 attitudes toward, 93
 fosterage for, 297
 Galen on, 93
 infanticide and, 93–94
 of infants, 402
 Soranus on, 93
- Brenon, Anne, 114
- Breugel the Elder, 326
- Brewing. See Alewives and brewing
- Brews, Margery, 631
- Bride of Christ: Imagery, 94–95, 313, 541
 of Birgitta of Sweden, 739
 Catherine of Alexandria on, 115
 Catherine of Siena and, 116, 139
 Christina of Markyate and, 131
 devotional use of, 94
 Hildegard of Bingen and, 139
 Jerome on, 422
 Katherine Group on, 440
 nuns and, 94
 of Radegund, 694
 sexual roles in, 94
 in Song of Songs, 769
 of Virgin Mary, 542, 543
- Bridget of Sweden, 653

INDEX

- Brief uit de ballingschap (Letter from Exile)* (Bake), 57
- Brigid, 349
- Brigit, 95–96, 481
  - on double monasteries, 227
  - of Ireland, 410
  - of Kildare as Saint, 95, 587
- Brinckerinck, Johannes, 573
- British Library Arundel 327 (Bokenham), 85
- Brocadelli, Lucia, 224
- Brodman, James, 664
- Brooten, Bernadette, 746
- Brother A., 21
- Brown, Michelle, 491
- Brown, Sanford, 369
- Brucker, Gene, 156
- Brundage, James, 749
- Brunhild and Fedegund, 96, 304, 684, 814, 849
  - letter writing of, 467
  - as Merovingian queens, 96
- Brythnoth, 194
- Bücher, Karl, 370
- Buetler, Gisela, 719
- Burckhardt, Jacob, 707, 708
- Burgundian Law Code, 59
- Burgundian Netherlands, 96–97
  - Colette of Corbie and, 155
  - dukes of, 96
  - Evangelies des Quenouilles* in, 266
  - Margaret of York in, 508
  - marriage practices in, 97
  - Mary of Burgundy in, 534–535
  - singlewomen in, 97
  - women's employment in, 96–97
- Burgundofara, 304
- Burials and Tombs, 98–100
  - archeology in, 27
  - Biblical imagery of, 99
  - of Christian Rome, 98
  - in death/mourning/commemoration, 194
  - of family, 99
  - of Frankish lands, 98
  - grave goods in, 333–334
  - of Iberia, 98–99
  - imagery of, 98–99
  - of Queens/Empresses, 99
  - territory of, 99
  - of upper class, 98
- Burns, E. Jane, 43
- Busch, Johann, 579
- Business, 100–101
  - alewives/brewing as, 13–14
  - family enterprises in, 100–101
  - investment/credit in, 407–408
  - of Kempe, 100
  - legal agency of women in, 101
  - market/tradeswomen in, 515
  - for women in Byzantium, 102
  - women's participation in, 100
- Butler, Judith, 314
  - on Queer theory, 691
- Byatt, A.S., 556
- Bynum, Caroline Walker, 48, 132, 259, 280, 371, 541, 544, 545
  - on Eve, 267
  - on sermons/preaching, 736–737
  - on women's spirituality, 290
- Byzantine tradition, of architecture, ecclesiastical, 30
- Byzantium, 101–104
  - attitudes toward women in, 101
  - authors/patrons of, 104
  - brides in, 103
  - devotional art in, 201
  - empresses in, 102–103, 247–249
  - eunuchs in, 264–265
  - Gynaikonitis in, 102
  - icons in, 392, 393
  - Komnene of, 444
  - Mary the Younger of, 536
  - monasticism/nuns in, 585–586
  - Ottonian royal women in, 627
  - prostitution in, 103–104
  - segregation of women at court, 102
  - Sophia Palaiologina of, 770
  - Theodora of, 795
  - Theophano of, 626
  - women as business owners in, 102
- Byzantine Monasticism and Nuns. See Monasticism and Nuns, Byzantine
- Byzantine Icons. See Icons, Byzantine
- Byzantium: Faith and Power*, 544
- ## C
- Caesar, Julius, Caesarean birth of, 105–106
- Caesarean Section, 105–106
  - Antichrist's birth by, 106
  - Argellata on, 105
  - Bernard of Gordon on, 105
  - Caesar, Julius' birth by, 105–106
  - Chauliac on, 105
  - midwives on, 105, 561
  - Odo of Sully on, 105
  - Rousset on, 105
  - Tristan's birth by, 106
- Caesaria of Arles, 849
  - as nun/scribe, 614
- Caesarius (Saint), 617
- Caesarius of Arles (Bishop), 1, 32, 33, 138, 241, 581, 736, 777
  - on monastic enclosure, 575
  - Rule of, 149
  - rules for nuns by, 468
- Caesarius of Heisterbach, 237
- Calvalcanti, Guido, 482
- Camelot, 41
- Camille, Michael, 202, 307, 543
  - on marginalia, 509
- Campbell, C. Jean, 41
- Cannon, Charity, 372
- Cannon, Christopher, 125
- Canonesses, 106–107
  - Bake, Alijt as, 57
  - Benedict of Aniane on, 107
  - communities of, 107
  - in monasticism/nuns, 582
  - nuns v., 106–107
  - of Premonstratensian Order, 669
  - rules for, 107
  - Stifte* houses of, 1
  - vows of, 106
- Canonization of Saints, 107–109
  - centralization of, 109

- Elisabeth of Hungary as, 245
 of Frances of Rome, 302 Godelieve of Gistel as, 328 issues of control for, 108–109
 of Margaret of Cortona, 507
 matryrs/confessors of, 108
 by papacy, 109
Cantar de mio Cid, 256, 257, 258
Canterbury Tales (Chaucer), 125, 126, 271, 330, 335, 451, 628, 645, 786, 836
   Constance in, 165
Canzoniere (Songbook) (Petrarch), 650
 Capella, Martianus, 648
 Capellanus, Andreas, 175, 260, 262, 564, 571, 628, 633, 641
 Capgrave, John, 324 Captivity and Ransom, 109–110 beauty/high rank dependency in, 109–110
   marriage in, 110
   rape in, 109
   of slaves, 764, 765
Cárcel de amor (The Prison of Love) (Diego de San Pedro), 735 Cardenal, Peire, 490
 Carlos I, 413
 Carnival. See Festivals of Misrule
 Caro, Joseph, 460
 Carolingian Dynasty, 582, 684, 685
   Annales Mettenses Priores on, 435
   Annals of Metz on, 442
   in Frankish lands, 304
   Gertrude of Nivelles and, 98
   kinship in, 442
   Pippinids as, 322
   reform of, 3
   reorganization of church by, 107
 Carolingian Period, 349, 383 monastic enclosure of, 576
   scholasticism in, 729
 Carolingians. See Frankish Lands
 Carruthers, Mary, 203
 Carter, John Marshall, 695
 Cartulary, 698, 700
 Casa de las Arrepentidas, as house for reformed prostitutes, 15
 Casagrande, Giovanna, 163
 Cassian, John, 777
Cassoni (painted wedding chest), 803
 Castiglione, 187
 Castles and Palaces, 110–112 in architecture, domestic, 29 defense facet of, 110
   gender ideologies of, 111
   great hall in, 111
   gynaikonitis in, 102
   royal women involvement in, 110–111 sexual segregation in, 111
   stacked lodgings in, 111
Castrated Lady, The, as fabliau, 271 Castro, Inés de, 112, 391 assassination of, 112
   Castro, Pedro Fernández de as father of, 112
 Catalina (Queen) of Lancaster, 498, 853
 Catarella, Teresa, 719
 Caterina Cornaro, 635
 Caterina of Bologna. See Caterina Vigri Caterina Sforza, 112–113, 659 cultural patronage by, 113
   Riario as husband of, 112
 Caterina Vigri, 46, 54, 113, 351, 657, 778
   art of, 113
   sermons/preaching of, 739–740
 Cathars, 114–115, 240, 362, 417, 737, 738, 739, 796
   Biller on, 114
   Brenon on, 114
   on marriage, 530
   marriage of, 114
   in Occitania, 622
   persecution of, 114
 Catherine de La Rochelle, 433
 Catherine of Alexandria (Saint), 31, 115–116, 137–138, 278, 355, 420, 635, 778 Clemence poet on, 146
   cult of, 115
   as intercessor, 115
   Katherine Group on, 439
   painting of, 354
   as patron, 115
   as virgin martyr, 814
 Catherine of Aragon, 412
 Catherine of Bologna. See Caterina Vigri
 Catherine of Genoa, 116
   Adorno as husband of, 116 spiritual teaching of, 116
 Catherine of Siena, 48, 116–117, 139, 224, 251, 289, 351, 355, 368, 418, 430, 463, 541, 584, 596, 619, 768, 778, 791, 822, 849, 850
   as bride of Christ, 95
   diplomacy of, 211
   on Eve, 267
   on Mary Magdalene, 533 on papacy, 117
   as prophet, 673
   Raymond of Capua as biographer of, 116, 117 role model for Maria of Venice, 511
   sermons/preaching of, 738, 778
   servant's life of, 116–117
   Vecchietta's altarpiece of, 355
 Catherine of Valois, 211
   as regent, 703
 Catholic Church, crusade promotion by, 183
 Catholic Reform, confraternities of, 162
 Cauchon, Pierre, 433
 Cauliac, Guy de, 105
Causae et Curae (Causes and Cures) (Hildegard of Bingen), 216, 366, 605, 606 Caviness, Madeline, 545
 Caxton, 161
 Cecilia, 6, 354, 355
   as virgin martyr, 814
 Cecily of York, 205
Celestina (Rojas), 571
 Celestine II, 588
 Celibacy: Clerical and Priests' Concubines, 117–119, 753
   on concubines, 118–119
   concubines' legal rights, 118
   Council of Trent on, 118
   Gregory VII (Pope) on, 118
   illegitimacy of, 395
   Marozia of Rome as, 516
   ostracism of, 118 reform efforts for, 118
   in Scandinavia, 523–524
 Celibacy, Lay. See Chastity and Chaste Marriage; Singlewomen

INDEX

- Celtic Monasticism and Nuns. See Monasticism and Nuns, Celtic
- Centuries of Childhood* (Ariès), 325
- Cereta, Laura, 119–120, 281, 850
     humanism of, 384
     letters of, 120
- Certeau, Michel d, 496
- Cesarini, Cecilia, 224
- Chanson de Guillaume*, 255
- Chanson de Roland*, 252, 254
     in Old French literature, 493
- Chanson de sainte Foy* (Boethius), 490
- Chansons de geste*, 499, 594
     in Old French literature, 493
- Charms. See Magic and Charms
- Chapter of Utrecht, in Modern Devotion, 574
- Chapter of Windesheim, 574
     Bake, Alijt and, 57
     Sister-Books in, 574
- Charity. See Almsgiving and Charity
- Charivari, 120–121
     in courtship, 178 dramatic elements of, 121 honor/reputation in, 376
     for impotence, 398 for marriage deviance, 121 ritual of, 120–121
     “rough music” in, 121
- Charlemagne, 107, 151, 209, 215, 306, 308, 411, 442, 469, 493, 539, 590, 684, 685 beauty of, 65
     family of, 273
     incest by, 400
- Charles II (King), 535
- Charles III, 430
- Charles IV (King), 24, 111, 115, 535, 636, 688, 783
- Charles of Burgundy (Duke), 357
- Charles of Calabria, 430
- Charles of Naples, 535
- Charles of Orléans, 321
- Charles of Salerno, 532
- Charles Robert, 535
- Charles the Bald, 209, 274, 588
- Charles the Bold, 310, 508, 534
- Charles V (King), 91, 111, 133, 853
- Charles VI (King), 133, 161, 404, 432, 703
- Charles VII (King), 133, 211, 431, 506
- Charles VIII (King), 23, 703
- Charms. See Magic and Charms
- Charters, 121–122 of cartulary, 698
     gender in, 122
     Herlihy on, 122
     for legal acts, 121
     polyptyques as, 697–698 for royal/papal instructions, 121 of Russia, 723
     Wemple on, 122
- Chartier, Alain, 69, 489
- Chartres Cathedral, 31, 39, 138
- Chastity and Chaste Marriage, 122–124, 349, 751
     of Aethelthryth, 11
     in asceticism, 48
     Augustine of Hippo on, 752
     Augustine on, 52, 123, 124
     extramarital sex and, 743
     in femininity/masculinity, 286 gender ideology aspect of, 311
     of Joseph, stepfather of Jesus, 433–434
     of Kempe, 440
     Leo I (Pope) on, 124
     of Marie of Oignies, 514
     Paul (Saint) on, 122–123
     remarriage for, 706 spiritual marriage for, 123 spouse separation in, 123–124
     virginity in, 123
     of vowesses, 823
- Chastoiement des dames* (Robert de Blois), 160
- Chaucer, Geoffrey, 24, 50, 88, 124–126, 165, 185, 261, 269, 287, 330, 451, 488, 498, 571, 601, 602, 623, 627, 628, 645, 653, 707, 741, 786, 801, 816, 836, 844
     on Amazons, 16
     Cannon, Christopher on, 125
     Decameron translation by, 335 Dinshaw on, 126
     in English Romance, 716
     English writing of, 125
     Hansen on, 126
     on Jewish women, 429
     literary patronage for, 640
     on lovesickness, 499
     Roet, Phillipa as wife of, 125 on wild women, 837
     women and, 125
     women’s portraits by, 125–126
- Chelles. See Jouarre and Chelles
- Chevalier errant (Knight Errant)* (Thomas of Saluzzo), 608
- Chibnall, Marjorie, 854
- Chievrefoil* (Marie de France), 414
- Childbirth. See Jewish Women; Pregnancy and Childbirth:
     Christian Women; Pregnancy and Childbirth: Jewish Women
- Children. See Children, Betrothal and Marriage of; Family (Earlier Middle Ages); Family (Later Middle Ages); Girls and Boys
- Children, Betrothal and Marriage of, 126–128
     Alexander III (Pope) on, 127
     Decretals of Gregory IX on, 127
     in Italy, 127
     marriage impediment of, 526
     papal decretals of, 127–128
     Roman law on, 127
     Urban III (Pope) on, 127–128 of wardship, 828
- “Children’s Games” (Breugel the Elder), 326
- Chirurgia (Surgery)* (Argellata), 105
- Chirurgie* (Mondeville), 29
- Chivalry, 128–129
     contradictions in, 129
     courtly love v., 174–175 knight and, 127
     in tournaments, 797
     in warfare, 128
- Choir location
     in architecture, ecclesiastical, 30
     in architecture, monastic, 34
- Chojnacki, Stanley, 178, 708
- Chrétien de Troyes, 41, 128, 129–131, 195, 261, 289, 301, 454, 499, 627, 628, 641, 717, 786, 797
     Arthurian literature of, 42, 129
     on courtly love, 175
     female characters of, 130

- on infants, 402
 misogyny of, 572
 in Old French literature, 493–494
 romances of, 130
 Wolfram von Eschenbach and, 843 women in audience of, 50
- Christ. See also Jesus and God as Mother
 almsgiving/charity and, 14
 Angela of Foligno on, 21
 Anne (Saint) as grandmother of, 24
 asceticism and, 47, 48
 Ava on life of, 56
 books of piety on, 86
 bride of, 94–95
 as first martyr, 108
 genealogy of, 315
 humanity of, 21
 imagery for, 202
 Mary unity with, 540–541
 maternal imagery and, 81
 Passion of, 205
Theotokos and, 101 on women in Bible, 73 Wound of as devotional art, 203
- Christian of Mainz, 367
Christianity, Social Tolerance, and Homosexuality (Boswell), 749
 Christina Mirabilis, 362
 Christina of Markyate, 131–132, 350, 402, 486, 635
   Geoffrey and, 131
   as St. Albans monastery leader, 131 virginity vow of, 131, 818
 Christina the Astonishing, 48, 66, 132–133, 300, 351, 500
   Bynum on, 132
   cult of, 132
   incarceration of, 131
   madness of, 503
 Christine de Pizan, 45, 87, 88, 133–134, 147, 195, 205, 301, 368, 380, 472, 489, 494, 571, 590, 602, 611, 628, 649, 734, 741, 742, 834, 851, 853–854
   on administration of estates, 7, 8
   on Amazons, 16
   on Aristotelian concepts of women/gender, 36 on arms/armor, 37
   Cannon, Charity on, 372
   in defense of women, 572
   Etinne de Castel as husband of, 133 on female virtue/vice, 80
   Gerson and, 321 on Griselda, 335
   on ladies-in-waiting, 447
   on laughter, 450
   literary career of, 134
   literary patronage for, 640 on pastourelle, 633
   on peasants, 642, 643
   poetry of, 133
   Querelle of the Rose of, 713–714 on representation of women in art, 40 Thomassy on, 369
   on universities, 808
   on wisdom, 840
   on women in audience, 51 works of, 133–134
Christine's Vision (Christine de Pizan), 134
 Christopher Columbus, 412
 Chrodechild (Queen), 435
Chronicle, 549
 Chronicles of the Northern Low Countries, 134–136 on Aleida of Cleve, 135 of Melis Stoke, 135 monastic, 135
   of Willem the Procurator, 135
   women in, 134–135
 Chrysostom, John, 149
 Church, 136–140
   Apostolic Constitution for, 137 Brides of Christ in, 138–139 early church, 136–137
   on extramarital sex, 743, 744
   male hierarchy in, 136–137
   on male same sex relations, 749 on marriage ceremonies, 517 martyrs in, 137–138
   monasticism in, 138
   patriarchy/patrilineage in, 634 restricted autonomy in, 139 role in family (earlier middle ages), 274 salvation in, 137 sanctity in, 139
   subordinate/equal, 137–138 widow in, 136–137
   women in, 136
   on women's ordination as priests, 625
   women's subordination/equality to men in, 137–138
 Church of Our Lady in Jehosaphat, burial in, 99
 Church of the Holy Apostles, burial in, 99
 Church of the Holy Sepulcher, burial in, 99 Churching, 140–141
   lying-in and, 500
   purification ritual of, 140
 Cicero, 623
 Cieco da Ferrara, 253
 Cistercian Monastery, 3, 31, 153
   Birgitta of Sweden at, 74
 Cistercian Order, 1, 3, 31, 141–143, 324, 577, 586, 587, 588, 612, 777, 779
   Beatrice of Nazareth of, 63
   Berenguela as patron of, 70
   Blanche of Castile as patron of, 77 Charter of Charity of, 142
   clothing of, 149
   conversae/conversi in, 170 in France, northern, 299
   General Chapter of, 141
   in Germanic lands, 319
   houses of, 142
   on monastic enclosure, 575
   in Occitania, 622
   by Robert of Molesme, 141 Strict Observance reform of, 142
   on Virgin Mary, 543
 Cîteaux
   Cistercian Order of, 141, 153
   Harding as abbot of, 142
 Cities and Towns, 143–144
   monasteries in, 144
   political role of women in, 144 urban elite women in, 143
   widows in, 143
   women in economy in, 143–144

INDEX

- Cities and Towns (cont.)
work in, 858
City of Ladies. See Book of the City of Ladies, The (Christine de Pizan)
City of Women (Christine de Pizan), 368
Civilization of the Renaissance on Italy (Burckhardt), 707
Clare of Assisi, 11, 139, 144–145, 351, 355, 413, 417, 566, 577, 657, 768, 777, 850
Agnes of Prague and, 145
canonization of, 145
in Dante's Commedia, 191
fasting/food of, 280
Francis of Assisi and, 144 monastic life organization by, 144–145 Offreduccio di Favarone as father of, 144
religious poverty of, 665
Rule of, 145
on Song of Songs, 769
vow of poverty by, 145
Clare of Montefalco, 146, 418
canonization of, 146
Claricia, 46
Clark, Alice, 369
Clark, Elizabeth, 52, 53
Clark, Robert, 747
Clemence of Barking, 115, 146–147, 536, 815
Wogan-Browne on, 146
Clemence of Hungary, 689
Clement, 595
Clement III (Pope), 165
Clement IV (Pope), 223, 575
Clement of Alexandria, on chastity/chaste marriage, 123
Clement VI (Pope), 682
Clement VII (Pope), 430
“Clerk's Tale” (Chaucer), 126
Cligès (Chrétien), 129, 716
Clio: Histoire, Femmes et Sociétés, journal on women's history, 22
Cloister, 138
Clothar I (King), 304, 693
Clothar II (King), 684
Clothar III (King), 684
Clothing, 147–149 foreign imports of, 148 gender definition in, 147–148 legal/moral restraints of, 147 luxury items of, 147
regulatory/ritual, 147 rule breaking in, 148
Sanuti on, 725
sumptuary law for, 784, 785
textile production of, 791–794
as trousseau, 802
Clothing, for Religious Women, 149–150 head coverings of, 149 simplicity of, 149
Clothwork, Domestic, 150–152, 856
art representations of women in, 39–40
of artisan families, 45
clothmaking in, 150–151 embroidery in, 151–152
in home manufacturing, 375
metaphors from, 152
on misericords, 568
in natural world, 605
rag use in, 151
in Scandinavia, 727
silk embroidery in, 151
spinning in, 150
textile production of, 791–794
weaving in, 150
women artists of, 45
Clotilda, 152, 303, 305, 349, 684
Chilperic (King) as father of, 152
Clover, Carol, 496
Clovis (King), 152, 303–304, 684
christianization of Frankish Kingdom by, 171
Clovis II (King), 322, 636, 684
Cluniac Order, 153–154
Adelheid and, 7
on monastic enclosure, 575
Cluniac reforms, 349
Cluny, 582
on oblates/oblation, 617
Cluny Monastery, 209
Adela of Blois and, 6
Adelheid and, 7
Berno as abbot of, 153
Cnut (King), 211
Codex Manesse, 160, 565
Codex Sintram, 46
Codex Theodosianus, 59
Cogitis me (You Compel Me) (Radbertus), 539 Coinage, 154–155 of Eschwege, 154 of Gandersheim, 154 of Herford, 154 portrait medals as, 659 of Quedlinburg, 154 rights of, 154–155
Coinci, Gautier de, 547
Coitus interruptus, as form of contraception, 167, 168, 169
Colette of Corbie, 155, 584, 619, 639, 657 Franciscan nunneries by, 155
Coletti, Theresa, 541
Commedia (Dante), 190, 191, 252, 482
Clare of Assisi in, 191
Constance of Sicily in, 191
Commemoration. See Burial and Tombs. Death, Mourning, and Commemoration Commentary of the Song of Songs (Reupert of Deutz), 539–540
Comnena, Theodora, 88
Compendio de la humana salud (Compendium of human health) (Ketham), 479 Compiuta Donzella, 155–156 historical identity of, 156 Italian female poet, 155
as Italian woman author, 849
Complaint of Nature (Alan of Lille), 618
Complaint of the Black Knight, The (Lydgate), 488
“A Complaint to His Purse” (Chaucer), 125
Conception. See Procreations and Ideas of Conception
Concordia Discordantium Canonum (Concordant for Discordant Canons) (Decretum) (Gratian), 452, 625
Concubinage, in Scandinavia. See Marriage and Concubinage, in Scandinavia Concubines, 156–159, 744, 750. See also Celibacy: Clerical and Priests' Concubines Brucker on, 156 of clergy, 156–157

- of Henry I (King), 157–158
 in Iberia, 389
 interpretations of, 157
 Lansing on, 156
 Marozia of Rome as, 516
 offspring of, 157–158 reasons for, 156
 in Scandinavia, 523–524
Conde Lucanor (Manuel), 479
Conditions of Women, The (Trota of Salerno), 342, 801 Conduct Literature, 159–162 books for women in, 160
   didactic works in Latin in, 159 early didactic, 159–160
   Elias on, 161
   femininity/masculinity in, 285
   on laughter, 450
   for lay education, 241
   lyric performance of, 646
   Montandon on, 161
   on servants, 741–742
   social status and, 767 terminology/genre, 159
   on virginity, 818
   for women after c. 1350, 160–161
Conferences, The (Cassian), 777
 “Confession,” in Ancrene Wisse, 20
Confessions (Augustine), 52, 220, 469
 Confessor, as martyr, 108
 Confessors/Spiritual Advisors. See Spiritual Care Confraternities, 162–164
   almsgiving/charity to, 163
   Casagrande on, 163
   lay people in, 162
   by Margaret of Cortona, 507
   necrologies/mortuary rolls for, 607
   in parishes, 630–631 religious services in, 162
   on rosary, 722
   social/political goals of, 162–163
   statutes of, 163
 Congregation of the Virgin, 163
 Conjugal Debt, 164–165, 755
   Augustine (Saint) on, 164
   canonistic writers on, 164
   in Christian marriage, 520, 522
   Gratian on, 754
   illness in, 164
   infertility in, 493
   law for, 451
   lying-in and, 500, 501
Consolamentum, Cathar ritual of, 114
Consolation of Philosophy (Boethius), 148, 469, 490, 648, 649, 822, 840 Consorts of Queens and Empresses. See Queens and Empresses, Consorts of Constance (Empress), 416
 Constance, as Chaucer character, 165
 Constance of Hungary (Queen), 11
   coinage of, 154
 Constance of Sicily, 165–166
   Dante on, 166
   in Dante’s Commedia, 191
   Frederick II (Emperor) as son of, 165
   Henry VI (King) as husband of, 165
   Roger II (King) as father of, 165 Constantine (Emperor), 348, 492, 653, 714 on adultery, 752
   on divorce, 706, 752
 Constantine IX Monomachos, 104, 248
 Constantine Porphyrogenitus, 624
 Constantine the African, on contraceptives, 168
 Constantine V (Emperor), 248, 411
 Constantine VI, 103, 310, 703
 Constantine VII Porphyrogenetos, 102, 248
 Constantine VIII, 248, 627
 Constantine XI (Emperor), 770
 Constantini, 354
 Constantinople, 16, 247, 248
   icons and, 202 Consumption, 166–167
   on clothing, 167
   economic definition of, 166 legislation on extravagant, 166 sumptuary law and, 784–785
   Tertullian on, 166
Contigas de Santa Maria (Canticles of Holy Mary), 547 Contraception, 167–169, 340
   abortion and, 167
   Augustine of Hippo (Saint) on, 168
   Biller on, 169
   Christian attitudes toward, 168
   Islamic/Jewish attitudes toward, 167
   menstruation and, 557
 Convent Chronicles. See Sister-Books and Other Convent Chronicles Conversae and Conversi, 169–171, 615 in Cistercian Order, 170 as converted to religious life, 169 as laborers within monasteries, 170 in laywomen, 463 within monastic context, 170
   of monasticism/nuns, 583
   Petronilla of Cheminé as example of, 170
   Pons de Lérans as example of, 170
 Conversion, Religious, 171–172
   Helena’s influence on, 357
   of Olga, 624
   orthodox Christianization of, 171 ruler’s conversion importance, 171 women as missionaries in, 172
 Coole, Diana, 670
Coplas de las calidades de las donas (Torrellas), 196
Corbaccio (Boccaccio), 570
 Corbet, Sybil, concubine of Henry I (King), 157–158
 Cormack, Robin, 393
 Cornaro, Caterina, 172–173, 357
   Bellini on, 173
   cultural activities of, 173
   Jacques II Lusignan (King) as husband of, 172
 Corner, Christine, 167
 Cornet, Raimon, 490
 Cornuälle (Cornwall), Heldris de, 715
 Coronation of the Virgin, 31
 Corpus Christi manuscript, 19
 Corpus Domini monastery, 223
 Cosmetics, 173–174
   for appearance, 173
   Bernardino of Siena on, 173
   Hildegard of Bingen on, 173

INDEX

- Cosmetics (cont.)
 medical texts for, 174 for men, 174
 perfumes for, 173–174
 Tertullian on, 173
 of Trota of Salerno, 801
- Council of Aachen, 575, 582
 on canonesses, 107
- Council of Basel, 619–620
- Council of Canterbury, on Caesarean section, 105
- Council of Chalcedon, 538, 578
- Council of Chalons, 582
- Council of Constance, 166
- Council of Elvira, on celibacy, 117, 751
- Council of Ephesus, 538, 543
- Council of Lyon, 463
- Council of Mainz, 575
 on oblates/oblation, 617
- Council of Nicaea, 47, 166, 537, 586
 Second, 201
- Council of Trent, 32, 589, 739
 Anne (Saint) and, 25
 anticoncubinage legislation of, 118
 on Christian marriage, 521
- Council of Trèves, on Caesarean section, 105
- Council of Vienne, 463, 739, 781 against Beguines, 68
- Counter-Reformation, 33
- Courtenay, Thomas, 8
- Courtesy Books. See Conduct Literature
- Courtly Love, 174–175, 371
 affair between men in, 176
 Arthurian literature of, 41–42
 canon broadening of, 175–176
 Capellanus on, 175, 176
 chivalry v., 174–175
 Chrétien de Troyes on, 175, 176
 in Christian marriage, 521–522 courtly corpus of, 175
 dawn songs for, 192–193
 in erotic literature, 262
 feminist interpretations of, 176
 in Hadewijch, 345
 in Italian literature, 482–483
 literary patronage for, 641
 lovesickness in, 498–499
 of Marguerite Porete, 511
 of Mechthild of Magdeburg, 552
 in Middle English literature, 488
 minnesang for, 564–565
 in Old French literature, 493–494
 origination in Occitania, 621–622
 Paris, Gaston on, 174
 of Petrarch, 651
 resistant readings in, 176–177
 Roman de Flamenca on, 710–711
Roman de la Rose on, 711–714
 in Romancero, 719
 Sentimental Romance on, 734
 social status and, 768
 unicorn for, 807
 woman's song for, 845
- Courtship, 177–180
 abduction in, 179
 in ballads, 58
 betrothal in, 179
 Chojnacki on, 178
 Chrétien de Troyes on, 178
 generational conflicts in, 179
 lovesickness in, 498–499
 parental consent in, 179
 prostitution v., 178 social status issues in, 178
- Covert Operations* (Lochrie), 745
- Crawford, Sally, 325
- Crean, John E., 576
- Credit. See Investment and Credit
- Credo* prayer, 206
- Crime and Criminals, 180–181 abortion as, 4–5
 adultery, 180
 in ballads, 58–59
 in Barbarian Law Codes, 60
 for extramarital sex, 744 females as victims of, 180
 German law on, 457
 homicide, 180
 infanticide by women as, 180 migration/mobility of, 562
 petty crime of women in, 180 prostitution, 180
 of rape, 180
 social status of, 181
 violence and, 814
 wergild for, 831
- Criseyde, 181, 489, 716
 as Chaucer character, 126, 181
 Donaldson on, 181
- Crompton, Louis, 745
- Crosiers of the Red Star, by Agnes of Prague, 11
- Crosman, Inge, 696
- Cross, Claire, 497
- Cross-Cultural Approaches, 181–182 postcolonial theory in, 660 of study of women, 181
 women use of vernacular in, 181
- Cross-Dressing, 148, 160, 177, 182–183, 286
 in ballads, 59
 for celibacy, 81
 in female same sex relations, 746
 for female violence, 814
 in festivals of misrule, 291–292
 in hagiography, 182
 Hetzeldorfer for, 183
 Joan of Arc, 183
 of Joan of Arc, 147, 431
 in literature, 80 in male same sex relations, 749 masks in, 182
 in Roman de Silence, 182, 715
 significance of, 182
 textiles in, 182
 of Woman on Top, 844, 845
- Crusades and Crusading Literature, 183–184
 arms/armor in, 36
 Catholic church promotion of, 183
 for lay piety, 462
 migration/mobility in, 562
 military force in, 184 pilgrims/pilgrimage in, 653

Cuckold, 184–185, 286 conjugal debt and, 185
 legal evidence of, 185
 as source of humor, 185
 Cunegunda (Queen), 354, 627, 686, 688
 “Custody of the Senses, The,” in Ancrene Wisse, 20
Custody of the Soul, 439
 Cyrcica (Saint), 348

D

Da Vinci, Leonardo, 187
 Dalassena, Anna, 248, 249, 444
 Dale, Marion, 369
 D’Alverny, Marie-Thérèse, 854
 Damasus I (Pope), 422
 Damian, Peter, 434, 749
 Dance, 187–189
 cleric attitudes toward, 189 form of social, 188–189
 French carole, 188
 in Romance of Flamenca, The, 188 in Romance of the Rose, The, 188
 woman’s song in, 845
 Dance of Death. See Danse macabre des femmes
Danse macabre des femmes (Dance of Death of Women), 40, 189–190 d’Auvergne and, 190
 Marchant as publisher of, 190 mirror of, 190
 roles in, 190
 Dante Alighieri, 62, 125, 190–192, 252, 261, 482, 490, 560, 601, 628, 651, 707, 822, 849, 863
 Beatrice of, 190–191
 Boccaccio v., 77, 78
 in English Romance, 716
 Francesca da Rimini of, 191–102
 in Italian literature, 483
 d’Arras, Jean, 556
Das fließende Licht der Gottheit (The Flowing Light of the Godhead) (Mechthild of Magdeburg), 553
 Datani, Margherita, 767
 Datini, Margherita, 192, 369, 558, 559 correspondence with husband, Francesco, of, 192
 infertility of, 192
Daughters of the Reconquest: Women in Castilian Town Society, 1100–1300 (Dillard), 371 d’Auvergne, Martial, 190
 Davis, Natalie Zemon, 292, 293, 844
 on home manufacturing, 375
 Davis, Paulina Wright, 368
 Dawn Song (Alba), 192–194
 erotic love in, 193
 Hatto on, 193
 as lyric monologue/dialogue, 192
 in Occitan literature, 490
 in woman’s song, 846
De Amore (Capellanus), 498, 564, 571, 628, 633
De anima (On the Soul), 771
De civitate Dei (On the city of God) (Augustine), 601
De claris mulieribus (On Famous Women) (Boccaccio), 40, 78, 88, 197, 368, 383, 384, 602, 608, 658, 803
De cultu feminarum (Appearance of Women, The) (Tertullian), 173
De curis mulierum (Treatments for Women) (Trota of Salerno), 801

De eruditione filiorum nobelium (On the Education and Instruction of Noble Children) (Vincent of Beauvais), 88, 590
De genealogiae gentilium deorum (On the genealogy of the gentile gods) (Boccaccio), 601
De institutione inclusarum (Aelred of Rievaulx), 470, 485, 488
De liberorum educatione (On the Education of Children), 590
De matrona (Marabod of Rennes), 196
De meretrice (Marbod of Rennes), 196
De Muliere Costante (Ser Giovanni Sercambi), 335
De ornatu mulierum (On Women’s Cosmetics), 174
De planctu naturae (Alan of Lille), 363
De Sacramentis (Hugh of St. Victor), 625
De scriptis a Cleopatra in decorativis (Cleopatra’s Writings on Cosmetics), 174
De Senectute (Cicero), 623
De Trinitate (On the Trinity) (Augustine of Hippo), 52, 771
De vier kruiswegen (Four Ways of the Cross, The) (Bake), 57
De visitatione episcoporum (On the Visitation of Bishops) (Pavinis), 579
De vitio sodomitico (Peter the Chanter), 362
 Dean, Ruth J855.
 Death, Mourning, and Commemoration, 194–195
 archeology in, 26–28 commemoration forms, 194
 grave goods in, 333
 necrologies/mortuary rolls for, 606–608
 portrait medals for, 659 prayers for, 194 of Queens/Empress of West, 690 tapestries for mourning, 194
Death of Arthur, The, 42, 338
 Debate Literature, 195
Réponse du Bestiaire d’amour as, 709–710
Decameron (Boccaccio), 50, 78, 165, 383, 450, 483, 499, 571, 646
 Petrarch’s Latin translation of, 334
 Ser Giovanni Sercambi Italian translation of, 335
Decretales Gregorii, of Alexander III (Pope), 452
Decretals of Gregory IX, 138
 on children betrothal/marriage, 127
Decretum. See Concordia Discordantium Canonum (Concordant for Discordant Canons) (Gratian)
Decretum (Burchard of Worms), 644, 645
Decretum (Gratian), 525, 578, 644–645, 753, 796, 841
Deeds of Otto (Hrotsvit of Gandersheim), 470
 Defenses of Women, 50, 195–197
 Christine de Pizan for, 197, 572, 713–714
 Eve’s exoneration for, 196
 in Latin literature, 486
 misogynous text replies for, 196–197 misogyny for, 196
 Nine Worthy Women in, 608
 Nogarola for, 611
 in Old French literature, 494
 Petrarch on, 483–484
 profeminine writing roots for, 195–196
 by Sanuti, 725
 social benefits for, 196
 theological privileges for, 196
 Delooz, Pierre, 347
 Demography, 197–200
 female infanticide for, 198 female mortality for, 198
 in Germanic lands, 319
 marital status in, 199–200
 marriage age in, 198–199

INDEX

- Demography (cont.)
 sex ratio in, 198
 in urban records, 702
 urban v. country for, 198
- Der Ritter vom Turm* (Marquard vom Stein), 161
- Derbes, Anne, 545
- Deschamps, Eustache, 91, 608, 632
 on misogyny, 570
- D'Este, Ercole I, 187
- D'Este, Isabella/Beatrice, 187
 Eleanora of Aragon as mother of, 187
 Ercole I d'Este as father of, 187 portrait medals of, 659
- Devil. See Satan
- Devotio Moderna. See Modern Devotion
- Devotional Art, 200–204
 Belting on, 202
 Biernoff on, 203
 in Byzantine icons, 393
 Camille on, 202
 in early middle ages, 201 function/gender in later medieval period, 202–203
 Gregory I (Pope), 201
 Hamburger, Jeffrey on, 203
 icons in, 202
 Marks, Richard on, 201 for meditation, 203 of mysticism/mystics, 597
 of nuns, 611–612
 Parshall on, 203
 Ringbom on, 202
 Virgin Mary in, 542–546
 visions for, 202–203
 of women artists, 45–46
- Devotional Literature, 204–206
 Augustine on, 205
 of Bake, Alijt, 57
 as evidence for women's lives, 205
 Fourth Lateran Council on, 204 of Goscelin of St. Bertin, 330 in Iberian literature, 478–480
 Katherine Group as, 439–440
 Latin texts in, 204–205
 of Mary Magdalene, 533
 of Mechthild of Hackeborn, 552
 of Mechthild of Magdeburg, 553–554 Rolle on, 205 for spiritual care, 777 of Stagel, 782 of Tornabuoni de'Medici, Lucrezia, 796 vernacular texts in, 205
- Devotional Practices, 206–208 of asceticism, 47–48
 Bouly de Lesdain on, 206
 Brayer on, 206
 of Ebner, Margaretha, 237
 Gerson on, 207
 Hasenohr on, 207–208
 of meditation, 554–555
 of mystics, 597
 prayer as, 206
 Psalters/Books of Hours in, 206 relics/reliquaries of, 704–706 of religious poverty, 664–665 of rosary, 722
 of spiritual directors, 208
 in Syon Abbey
 Tertullian on, 206
 “Devotions,” in Ancrene Wisse, 20
- Dhuoda, 209–210, 306, 469, 778, 850
 Bernard of Septimania as husband of, 209 on Christian theology, 209 conduct book of, 160 on family, 273, 274
Handbook of, 209 mother as teacher of, 590
 as prophet, 673
- Dialogue*, 791
 Catherine of Siena's mystical teachings in, 117, 224, 351, 355
Dialogue between Two Monks (Idung of Prüfening), 614
Dialogue on the Equal or Unequal Sin of Adam and Eve
 (Nogarola), 611
Dialogue with Trypho (Justin Martyr), 537 Dialogus miraculorum (Dialogue of Miracles) (Caesarius of Heisterbach), 237
- Diana d'Andalo, 223, 224
 “Did Women Have a Renaissance?” (Kelly-Gadol), 370
- Didactic Literature. See Conduct Literature
- Didascalia Apostolorum*, 136–137
- Die Frauenfrage im Mittelalter* (Bücher), 370
- Diego de San Pedro, 735
- Diego of Osma, 223
- Digby, 233
- Dillard, Heath, 371
- Dinis of Portugal, 413
- Dinshaw, Carolyn, 126, 181, 745
- Dionysius, 597
- Dionysius the Areopagite, on mysticism/mystics, 597
- Diplomacy and Reconciliation, 210–212 countess/queen as diplomat in, 210 diplomatic marriages in, 211
 in intercession, 406 lawyers/bureaucrats for, 211
 of Matilda of Tuscany, 550
 portrait medals of, 659
 of regents, 211
 in religious disputes, 211 of Russian noble women, 723 women as intercessors for, 210
- Disabilities, 212–213 familial acceptance of, 213 of Fina of San Gimignano, 293
 Fourth Lateran Council on, 212 individual blame for, 212 of Margaret “The Cripple” of Magdeburg, 508 sin association of, 212 social status/gender treatment of, 213
 of Teresa de Cartagena, 789
- Dit de la pastoure* (Pizan), 633
- Divine Comedy* (Dante), 62, 195, 602, 648, 651, 822
- Division of Labor, 213–214 gendered, 213
 German law on, 457
 Goldberg on, 214
 Hanawalt on, 214
 Hatcher on, 214
 within household, 214
 market/tradeswomen in, 515
 peasant labor in, 214
 in private/public spheres, 670

- in textile production, 791
- Divorce and Separation, 214–216
- Biblical teachings on, 751
  - in Christian marriage, 520
  - Christianity on, 214–215
  - church's view of, 215–216
  - Constantine on, 706, 752
  - consummation of marriage and, 216
  - among Germanic tribes, 215
  - for impotence, 398–399
  - in Ireland, 409–410
  - Islamic law on, 458
  - in Islamic marriage, 527
  - in Jewish marriage, 528–529
  - remarriage after, 706
  - in Wales, 827
- Doctors and Healers, 216–217
- Felice as, 217
  - Hildegard of Bingen as, 216
  - midwives and, 216, 561–562
  - on plagues, 654–655
  - for pregnancy/childbirth, 667
  - Trota of Salerno as, 801
  - Valencia as, 217
  - women as unlicensed, 216
- Dodesham, Stephen, 488
- Dogaressa, 217–219
- oath of office of, 218
  - as wife of doge of Venice, 217
- Doge Agostino Barbarigo, 172
- Doglia mi reca nello core ardire* (Dante), 483
- d'Oilly, Edith, concubine of Henry I (King), 158
- Dolce of Worms, 218–219, 427
- spiritual activities of, 219
- Domenico Selvo (Doge), 218
- Domestic Abuse, 219–221
- in ballads, 58
  - behavior guidelines in, 220–221
  - biblical examples of, 219–220
  - corporal punishment in, 221
  - domestic rebellion in, 220
  - incest as, 400
  - of Mary the Younger, 536
  - paternal power in, 220
  - scriptural texts of, 219–220
- Domestic Architecture. See Architecture, Domestic
- Domesticity, 221–222
- of burgess household, 222
  - organization of, 222
  - privacy in, 222
  - urban set of values in, 221
  - of well-off, 222
- Domina Prous Boneta, 351
- Dominic of Silos, 389
- Dominican Legen*, 533
- Dominican Order, 1, 48, 162, 223–225, 268, 350, 362, 463, 577, 589, 658, 737, 766, 777, 779, 781
- Ancrene Wisse and, 19
  - Catherine of Siena and, 117, 224
  - clothing for, 149
  - Ebner, Margaretha in, 237
  - Honorius III, 223
  - on immaculate conception, 396–397, 538
  - Maria of Venice in, 511
  - marriage preaching in, 530
  - on Mary Magdalene, 533
  - on monastic enclosure, 575
  - mysticism of, 598
  - Na Soriana and, 15
  - nuns as German women authors, 847–848
  - nuns/lay women in, 223–224
  - in Observant Movement, 619
  - in Occitania, 622
  - religious poverty of, 665
  - on rosary, 722
  - Rule of St. Augustine in, 223
  - Sister-Books of, 761
  - spirituality of, 224
  - tertiaries (lay members) of, 789, 790
  - on Virgin Mary, 540
- Dominici, Giovanni, 619, 777
- Doña Sancha, sarcophagus of, 99
- Donaldson, E.T., 181
- Donatello, Mary Magdalene painting by, 355
- Donatus of Besasñon, 241, 468, 581
- Dorothea of Montau, 48, 225–226, 351
- Adalbert as husband of, 225
- Double Monasteries, 226–228, 349, 581, 589, 737
- Admount as, 242
  - artistic patronage of, 636
  - Birgita of Sweden on, 228
  - election of abbesses in, 1
  - in England, 249
  - evidence for/significance of dual-sex houses as, 226–227
  - Fontrevault as, 296
  - Gertrude of Nivelles as abbess of, 322
  - of Gilbertine Order, 324
  - of Hild of Whitby, 364
  - Hild of Whitby for, 228
  - Jouarre/Chelles as, 435
  - monastic revivals in, 227–228
  - nuns as illuminators in, 612
  - nuns as scribes in, 615
  - research frameworks in, 226
  - sacred space in, 772
  - sexual equality in, 226
  - of Wimbourne, 465
- Douceline of Digne, 228–229, 657
- founder of lay religious order, 228
- Dove's Neck Ring, The* (Ibn Hazm), 498
- Dowry and Marriage Gifts, 6, 15, 143, 200, 229–232, 327
- Bellomo on, 230
  - Bestor on, 230
  - cash awards in, 231
  - Chojnacki on, 708
  - in Christian marriage, 518
  - in Eastern Europe, 235
  - French customary laws for, 454
  - of gentry women of England, 316
  - German law on, 457
  - of heiresses, 356
  - in history of medieval women, 371
  - Hughes on, 371
  - in Iberia, 391
  - in inheritance, 405
  - investment of, 230–231
  - Islamic law on, 458
  - in Islamic marriage, 527
  - Justinian on, 715
  - land as, 448

INDEX

- Dowry and Marriage Gifts (cont.) laws for, 452
  male-to-female, 229
  Monte delle Doti funds for, 231
  in Occitania, 620
  Roman in Italian City-States, 229
  in Scotland, 731
  social status of, 767
  trousseau and, 802
  in wills, 839
- Dragaš, Helena, 248
- Drama, 232–234 authors/sponsors of, 232 within convents, 233
  by Hildegard of Bingen, 232
  by Hrotsvit of Gendersheim, 232, 382 by Katherine of Sutton, 232
  Kempe and, 233
  performance of, 232–233
  spectators of, 233
  women as subjects of, 233
  women's sponsorship of, 232
- Duby, Georges, 22, 708, 800
  on Christian marriage, 518
  on private/public spheres, 670
- Ducas, Michael (Emperor), 218
- Ducas, Teodora, 218
- Duccio, 354, 542, 543
- Duckett, Eleanor Shipley, 369
  on feminist theory, 288
- Dufay, Guillaume, 548
- Duke of Aquitaine, 153
- Duke of Berry, 40, 86
- Duke of Burgundy, 153, 161
- Duke of Milan, 112
- Dunash ben Labrat, 476
- Dunbar, William, 451
- Duns Scotus, 396
- Durham Cathedral, in architecture, ecclesiastical, 30
- Dyer, Christopher, 857
- E
- Ealhswith, 10
- Eastern Europe, 235–237
  marriage in, 235–236
  pious women in, 236 political scapegoats in, 236 property rights in, 235
- Ebba of Coldingham, 349
- Ebernand von Erfurt, 457
- Ebner, Christina, 224, 237, 761, 847
- Ebner, Margaretha, 224, 237–238, 847
  autohagiography of, 237–238
  in Dominican Order, 237
  fasting/food of, 280
  as mystic, 237
- Ecclesia*, 543
  as bride of Christ, 95
- Ecclesiastical Architecture. See Architecture, Ecclesiastical
- Ecclesiastical History of the English People, The* (Bede), 10
- Ecclesiastical influence of Adela of Blois, 6
  of Adelheid, 7
- Ecclesiastical Patronage. See Patronage, Ecclesiastical
- Ecdicia, 52, 164
  chastity of, 123
- Ecgfrith (King), 10, 684
- Eckenstein, Lina, 369
- Eckhart, Meister, 79–, 597, 737
  mysticism of, 597
  on mysticism/mystics, 598
- Economic History Society, by Power, Eileen, 665
- Economy, 238–239
  of agriculture, 12
  guilds in, 238
  landholding in, 238, 448–449
  women's legal status in, 238 women's wages in, 238
- Edda* (Sturluson), 763
- Edgar (King), 549, 685
- Edict of Milan, 108, 348
- Edictum Theoderici*, 59
- Edith, 239, 549, 686, 688
  Edward I (King) as husband of, 239
  Stafford on, 239
- Edmund Beaufort, 689
- Education, Beguine, 239–240
- Education, Lay, 240–241, 327 in adolescence, 9 book ownership in, 241 conduct literature in, 241
  in England, 251
  Latin in, 240
  literacy/reading for, 240 literacy/reading of Latin for, 469–470
  of Margaret “The Cripple” of Magdeburg, 508 mothers as teachers in, 240
  penitentials for, 644–645
  scholasticism in, 730
- Education, Monastic, 241–243, 327 female authorship in, 242
  Gertrude of Hackeborn and, 322
  Herrad for, 363
  in Jouarre/Chelles, 435
  in later middle ages, 243
  by Leoba, 465
  monastic rules in, 241–242
  penitentials/pastoral manuals for, 644–645
  saints' lives in, 242 scholarship within women's community for, 242–243
  scholasticism in, 730
  Scribal activity in, 242
  women as teachers in, 242
- Edward, Duke of Buckingham, 8
- Edward I (King), 87, 112, 233, 239, 277, 472, 687, 688, 689, 731
- Edward II (King), 157, 211, 233, 386, 688, 703
- Edward III (King), 99, 124, 157, 277, 310, 356, 687, 703, 783, 784
- Edward IV (King), 64, 506, 508, 623, 653, 855
  beauty of, 65
- Edward of Norwich, 387
- Edward the Black Prince, 111
- Edward the Confessor (Saint), 146, 151, 311, 394, 686, 850
  virginity of, 819
- Edward the Elder, 10
- Edward the Great, 10
- Edward V (King), 856
- Edwin (King), 684
- Egfrith (King), 635

- Egils Saga*
 on concubinage, 524
 on fosterage, 297
- Eike von Repgow, 457
- Ekbert, Elisabeth of Schönau translations by, 246–247
- Elderly. See Old Age
- Eleanor de Montford, 379, 380
- Eleanor of Aquitaine, 157, 211, 235, 243–244, 250, 339, 356, 366, 403, 532, 572, 591, 688, 689, 717, 720
 burial of, 99, 296
 coinage of, 154–155
 Henry of Anjou as second husband of, 244 literary patronage of, 640, 641
 Louis VII (King) as husband of, 243 of Occitania, 620
 as political figure in France/England, 244
 in Second Crusade, 184
- Eleanor of Austria. See Eleanor of Scotland
- Eleanor of Castile, 211, 688, 689, 690
 Edward I as husband to, 87
 patronage of, 472
- Eleanor of Portugal, 590
- Eleanor of Provence, 111, 112, 689
 Henry III (King) as husband of, 87
- Eleanor of Scotland, 244–245, 731
 James I (King) as father of, 244
- Eleanora of Aragon, 187
- Eleazar ben Judah (Rabbi) of Worms, 218, 427
- Elegy of Lady Flammetta, The* (Boccaccio), 78
- Elene*, 491–492
- Elfreda of Whitby, 349
- Elias, Norbert, 161
- Elisabeth of Hungary, 236, 245, 302, 350, 354, 413, 463, 566, 705, 768, 790
 almsgiving/charity of, 14, 245
 canonization as saint of, 245
 Hildegard of Bingen and, 246
 Marburg hospital founding by, 14 model for architecture, monastic, 33
- Elisabeth of Kirchberg, 761, 847
- Elisabeth of Nassau, 848
- Elisabeth of Schönau, 53, 242, 246–247, 280, 350, 641, 705, 796, 850
 Ekbert as brother of, 246
 as German woman author, 847
 Latin proficiency of, 247
 letter writing of, 468
 as prophet, 673
 on Ursula and her companions, 809
 on Virgin Mary, 246
 visions of, 246
 writings of, 246–247
- Elisabeth von Nassau-Saarbrücken, 245
- Elizabeth de Burgh, 8, 357
 artistic patronage of, 636
 ecclesiastical patronage of, 638
 household accounts of, 379
 pilgrimage of, 653
- Elizabeth I, 659
- Elizabeth of Hapsburg, 445
- Elizabeth of Luxemburg (Queen), 445
- Elizabeth of Poland, 236
- Elizabeth of Portugal. See Isabel of Aragon (Queen)
- Elizabeth of York, 653
- Elizabeth Woodville. See Woodville, Elizabeth
- Ellington, Donna Spivey, 541
- Elliott, Dyan, 48
- Ellis, Havelock, 748
- Elm, Kaspar, 619
- Elstob, Elizabeth, 854
- Elvira “the Nun” of León, 391
- Ely cathedral, 10, 31
- Embroidery. See Clothwork, Domestic
- Emma (Queen), of England, 641
- Emma (Queen), of West Francia, 7
- Emma (Ælgifu) of Normandy, 211
- Empresses: Byzantium, 102–103, 247–249
 art representations of, 248–249 dynastic responsibilities of, 248 imperial marriages of, 248
 Irene as, 411
 Komnene, Anna, 444–445
 letter writing of, 467
 role at court of, 247–248
 Theodora as, 795
- Enclosure, Monastic. See Monastic Enclosure
- Engagements. See Betrothals. Children, Betrothal and Marriage of
- Engelberge (Empress), 369
- Engelthal Sister-Book (Ebner), 761
- England
 adolescence in, 9
 Aethelthryth and, 11
 ale brewing in, 13, 251
 Anne of Bohemia in, 24 architecture, monastic and, 32
 children betrothal in, 127
 churching in, 141
 dowry/marriage gifts in, 229
 dual-sex monasteries in, 227
 education in, 251
 Eleanor of Aquitaine and, 243
 genealogy in, 315
 gentry women of, 316–317
 Gilbertine Order in, 324
 godparents in, 329
 heiresses in, 356
 hopped beer production in, 13
 humanism in, 601
 Ida of Boulogne in, 394
 landholding/property rights in, 448–449
 leywite in, 560
 literacy/reading, vernacular in, 471
 Margaret of Anjou of, 506
 marital status in, 199
 marriage in, 250
 merchet in, 559–560
 misericords in, 568
 nuns in, 249
 Old English Literature in, 491–493 parishes in, 630
 Paston letters of, 631–632
 prostitutes in, 251
 Queens/Noble women in, 250
 on rape/raptus, 695, 696
 saints in, 349
 widows in, 251
 women as aletasters in, 13
 work life in, 250–251
- English Literature. See Literature, Middle English. Literature, Old English
- English Romance. See Romance, English

INDEX

- English Woman in History, The* (Stenton), 369
- Enrique III, 498, 853
- Enrique IV, 412, 682
- Enseignement de Princes* (Blois), 160
- Enseignements moraux* (Moral Teachings) (Christine de Pizan), 87, 161, 590
- Ensenhamen* (Garin lo Brun), conduct book of, 160
- Epic, Italian, 252–254
  - Barberino, Andrea da and, 253
  - Boccaccio and, 253
  - cantari* (anonymous poems) in, 253
  - Dante and, 252
  - Pucci and, 253
- Epic, Old French, 252, 254–255
  - female roles in, 255
  - in Old French literature, 493
  - Saracen women in, 255
- Epic, Spanish, 255–258
  - Cantar de mio Cid* as, 256, 257, 258
  - Castilian, 255–256
  - el Cid in, 256
  - Jimena in, 256, 257
  - Mocedades del Cid* as, 257
  - of Romancero, 719–720
  - women representation in, 257–258
- Episcopi*, 841
- Epistolae familiares* (Letters to Family and Friends) (Cereta), 120, 850
- Epistre Othea* (The Letter of Othea) (Pizan), 602
- Epitome* (Justinus), 608
- Epstein, Isidore, 370
- Eracle* (Gautier d'Arras), 717
- Erasmus, Desiderius, 384
- Erec et Enide* (Eric and Enide) (Chrétien), 42, 129, 176, 493–494, 572, 716
  - on courtly love, 175
- Erklärung des Vaterunsers* (Magdalena), 53
- Erler, Mary, 314
- Ermengard of Narbonne, 258–259
  - business of, 100–101
  - diplomacy of, 210
  - literary patronage of, 640
  - of Occitania, 620
  - of Occtania, 258
  - patron of troubadour poets, 259
- Ermentrud, 304
- Eroticism, in Art, 39, 259–261
  - age of Ovid in, 261–262
  - Bynum on, 259
  - Capellanus on, 260
  - explicitness in, 260
  - Lochrie on, 259
  - meanings of images in, 259–260
  - Mills on, 259
  - in misericords, 568
  - nudity in, 260
  - Steinberg on, 259
- Eroticism, in Literature, 261–264, 745–747
  - courtly love in, 262
  - fabliau in, 263, 271
  - Karras on, 263
  - Latin texts for, 262
  - in On Love, 262
  - obscenity in, 618–619
  - of Ovid, 627–628
  - in pastourelle, 632–633
  - of Petrarch, 651
  - Plaint of Nature* as, 262
  - in proverbs/riddles/gnomic literature, 678–679
  - Roman de Flamenca of, 710–711
  - in Romances of Antiquity, 720, 721
  - Song of Songs, 769
  - vernacular texts in, 263
- Eschwege, coinage right of, 154
- Esclarmonde of Foix, 361
- Esdras, on women's power, 195
- Esplandian*, 17
- Espurgatoire Seint Patriz* (Saint Patrick's Purgatory) (Marie de France), 513–514, 852
- Essen. See Matilda and the Monastery at Essen
- Estates, Administration of. See Administration of Estates
- Estates General of 1484, Anne of Beaujeu and, 23
- Estoria de Espanna* (Alfonso), 478
- Ethelburga of Barking, 349
- Etheldreda of Ely, 349
- Ethics* (Abelard), 35
- Etienne de Castel, 133
- Etienne de Fougères, 160
- Etymologies* (Isadore of Seville), 478
- Eucharist, 20, 21. See Beguines. Fasting and Food, Religious
  - Aspects of. Spirituality
  - of Beguines, 67
  - spirituality in, 780–781
  - symbol of Christ's physicality/humanity, 82
  - Virgin Mary in art of, 544
  - women at, 73
- Eucherius of Orléans (Bishop), 171
- Eudokia Ingerina, 248
- Eugene III (Pope), 365
- Eugene IV (Pope), 303
- Eugenius III (Pope), 141, 244, 588, 778
- Eugenius IV (Pope), 397
- Eunuchs, 264–266, 286, 308, 341
  - in Byzantine court, 265
  - in Byzantine Empire, 264
  - castration of, 265
  - as guardians, 265
  - in Orthodox Church, 265
- Euripides, 219
- Eustace I of Boulogne, 328
- Eustace II, 394
- Eustace III, 394
- Eustochium, 422, 423, 580
  - letter writing to, 468
- Evangelienbuch* (Otfried), 474
- Evangelies des Quenouilles*, 266, 450
  - folk wisdom of women, 266
- Evans, Joan, 855
- Eve, 266–268
  - Aristotle on, 267
  - art representations of, 40
  - Augustine of Hippo on, 267, 569
  - books of piety on, 86
  - Bynum on, 267
  - Catherine of Siena on, 267
  - depictions of body of, 83
  - in gender ideologies, 308, 309
  - Gerson on, 267
  - Hildegard of Bingen on, 267
  - Miles on, 267

- misogyny of, 569
 in Old English literature, 491
 Satan and, 726
 Tertullian on, 267
 Virgin Mary and, 537
 as woman in Bible, 72, 73
 Woman on Top and, 844
 Eve of St. Martin, 19
 Eve of Wilton, 18
Exemplar, The (Suso), 782
 Exemplum, 268–269, 738 of gossip/slander, 330
   Gregory I (Pope) on, 268
   in Jewish liturgy, 429
   in Latin literature, 487
   on madness, 503 meaning of (example), 268
   in sermons/preaching, 268 value of, 268
   on Virgin Mary, 546
Exeter Book, 678
Expositiones evangeliorum (Commentaries on the Gospels)
   (Hildegard of Bingen), 366
 Extramarital Sex. See Sexuality: Extramarital Sex
 Eyck, Jan van, 39, 543
- F
- Fables* (Marie de France), 513
 Fabliau, 271–272
   Bédier on, 271
   in erotic literature, 263
   eroticism in, 271
   German comic tales in, 475
   on impotence, 399
   Johnson on, 272
   Ladd on, 272
   laughter in, 451
   Levy on, 271
   Lorcin on, 271
   Ménard on, 271
   in Middle English literature, 489
   for misogyny
   misogyny in, 272
   obscenity in, 619
   on peasants, 643
   on sex in marriage, 756
 Facinger, Marion, 370
 Fairies. See Mélusine; Supernatural Women
 Falconry. See Hunting and Falconry Fall of Humankind. See Eve Family (Earlier Middle Ages), 272–275
   Bouchard on, 273
   Carolingians as model of, 273 church role in, 274
   consciousness in, 274
   Dhuoda in, 273, 274
   fosterage in, 274
   Fourth Lateran Council on, 273
   kinship degrees in, 273, 442
   marriage ties in, 273–274
   patriarchy/patrilineage in, 633–634
   technical vocabulary in, 272–273
 Family (Later Middle Ages), 275–280 aristocratic families in, 277
   church role in, 278
   kinship degrees in, 276, 442–443
   nuclear family in, 275
   patriarchy/patrilineage in, 633–634 patterns of inheritance in, 276 peasant families in, 277
   as political unit, 277 public sphere in, 278–279 threats to, 279
   urban families in, 277
 Faremoutiers monastery, 6
 Farmer, Sharon, 767, 768
 Fashion. See Clothing
 Fasting and Food, Religious Aspects of, 280–281
   asceticism of, 48
   Bell, Rudolph on, 280
   Bynum on, 280, 290
   of Catherine of Siena, 280
   of Clare of Assisi, 280
   of Ebner, Margaretha, 280
   Hildegard of Bingen on, 280
   Kempe on, 281
   kitchen metaphors for, 280–281
   of Lutgard of Aywières, 500
   of Mary the Younger, 536
Fastnachtspiele (Carnival plays), 292
Fates of Illustrious Men (Boccaccio), 78 Fay, Morgan le, in Arthurian literature, 42
 Feast of Corpus Christi, Juliana of Cornillon and, 18
 Febvre, Lucien, 22
 Fedegund. See Brunhild and Fedegund Fedele, Cassandra, 281–282
   humanism of, 384
   as humanist, 281
   public oration of, 281
 Federico II, 187
 Felice, Jacoba, 217
 Females, adolescence of, 9
 Feme covert, 282, 310
   landholding/property rights for, 282 widows and, 282
 Feme sole, 282–283, 310 criminal law for, 282–283
   in England, 250
   market/tradeswomen and, 283
Feminae, 373
Feminine Mystique (Friedan), 289
 Femininity and Masculinity, 284–287
   Aristotle on, 284
   Christianity influence on, 284–285
   in gender ideologies, 308–309
   gender physiology of, 284 gender slippage in, 286–287
   hermaphrodites in, 363
   morality of, 285
   in patriarchy/patrilineage, 633–634
   secular, 285–286
Feminist Studies (journal), 371 Feminist Theories and Methodologies, 287–291 academy for, 287–288 of Annales School of History, 22–23
   Annales School of History on, 288–289
   in Arthurian literature, 43
   Beauvoir on, 289
   Friedan on, 289

INDEX

- Feminist Theories and Methodologies (cont.) of gender, 290–291
 historians of, 288
 on human body, 290
 male/female differences in, 289 Mill, John Stuart on, 287 of patriarchy/patrilineage, 633–634
 Power, Eileen on, 288
 Putnam on, 288
 Queer theory of, 691
 religious scholars of, 290 of Rosaldo, 670
 social science application of, 288–289 source finding for, 288 of Spain, Daphne, 670 Wollestonecraft on, 287
 women's writings in, 289
- Ferdinand IV (King), 413
 Ferdinand of Antequera, 356
 Ferdinand of Aragon, 154, 592, 682, 735
 Fernán González, 98
 Fernando I (King), 412
 burial of, 99
 Fernando III (King), 70
 Fernando IV, 703
 Festivals of Misrule, 291–293
 Davis on, 292, 293
 laughter in, 451
 male cross-dressing in, 291–292
 misogyny in, 292
 nuns in, 292–293
 Russo on, 293
 women on top in, 292
- Fiametta* (Boccaccio), 499, 735
 Fifteen Joys of the Virgin prayer, 207
Fifteen Ones, The, 205
Filostrato (Boccaccio), 252, 499
 Fina of San Gimignano, 293
 Finucane, Ronald C., 325, 653
 First Crusade, 183–184
 First Lateran Council, on celibacy, 118
 Fitzherbert, Anthony, 643
 Flambard, Ranulf, 131
Flamenca. See Roman de Flamenca Flanders, 294–295
 Beguine community in, 67, 294
 landholding/property rights in, 294
 Lutgard of Aywières of, 499–500
 Marie of Oignies of, 514
 market/tradeswomen in, 294
 marriage in, 294
 monasticism/nuns in, 294
 textile production in, 294
- Flight from the Incestuous Fathers stories, 401 Floire and Blancheflor, 295–296, 717, 719 literary historians on, 295
 Florentine Catasto, Herlihy/Klapisch-Zuber on, 22
 Florentine Office of Decency, on prostitutes, 676 Flores, Juan de, 735
 Floris IV (Count), 135
Flowing Light of the Godhead (Mechthild of Magdeburg), 319, 600, 798
Folie, 414, 717
 Fontevrault, Abbey and Order of, 2, 3, 33, 228, 296, 299, 324, 577, 583
 Chelles and, 435 monastery in, 244
 in Occitania, 622
 Robert of Arbrissel of, 227, 296
 Fontevrault monastery, 75
 burial in, 99
 Fontevrist Order, 1
 Fornication, 752–753
 in extramarital sex, 742–743
 Gratian on, 754
 Forsyth, Ilene, 545
 Forteguerra, Laudomia, 747
 Fortunatus, Venantius, 469, 693, 736
Fortunes of Men, The (FtM), 678 Foscari, Francesco (Doge), 218
 Foscari, Marina Nani, 218
 Fosterage, 274, 296–297
 in Iceland, 296–297
 in literature, Old Norse, 297
 in Scandinavia, 297
 Foucault, Michel, 745, 749
 Fougères, Etienne de, 571, 747
Founding of Gandersheim Monastery (Hrotsvit of Gandersheim), 470
 Fournival, Richard de, 50, 175, 709–710
 Fourth Lateran Council, 17, 19, 144, 273, 461, 577, 630
 on concubines, 156
 on consanguinity, 525 on courtship, 178
 on devotional literature, 204
 on disabilities, 212
 on incest, 400
 on lay piety, 776
 on marriage, 520
 on relics, 704
 on religious rules, 737 on Satan/demons, 726
 on sexual offenses, 754
 Foy (Saint), 297–298
 miracles of, 297
 in Occitan literature, 490
Fragments in the Language of Ordinary Life (Petrarch), 650
 Franc, Martin Le, 69
 France, Marie de, 51, 80
 France, Northern, 298–302
 Adela of Blois and, 6
 Adelheid's political influence of, 7
 adolescence in, 9
 betrothals in, 72
 chivalry in, 128
 Christian marriage in, 519
 Christina the Astonishing in, 300
 churching in, 140
 consumption laws in, 166
 creative women in, 301
 Dominican Order in, 223
 dowry in, 143, 299, 300
 dual-sex monasteries in, 227 elite women in, 298–300
 genealogy in, 315
 godparents in, 329
 heiresses in, 356
 humanism in, 601
 Joan of Arc of, 431, 432
 law codes for, 454–455

- literacy/reading vernacular in, 471
 lyric performance in, 646
 Marie of Oignies in, 300
 marital status in, 199
 marriage in, 299
 monasteries in, 299
 Revolution in, 32
 royal women in, 299 rural women in, 300–301 slaves in, 763 succession in, 784
 urban women in, 300
 Villon in, 812
 women's journals in, 372
 Frances of Rome, 14, 302–303
   canonization as saint of, 302
 Francesca da Rimini
   Battagli on, 191
   as Dante character, 191–192
   in Dante's Inferno 5, 191
 Francesco da Barberino, 160, 590
 Francesco II Gonzaga, duke of Mantua, 187
 Francis I (King), 23, 590
 Francis of Assisi, 48, 299, 600
   Clare of Assisi and, 144
   religious poverty of, 665
 Franciscan Order, 33, 48, 162, 268, 299, 355, 463, 577, 589, 658, 766, 777, 779, 781
   Colette of Corbie and, 155
   on Immaculate Conception, 396, 397, 538
   marriage preaching in, 530
   mysticism of, 598
   Poor Clares Order in, 656
   religious poverty of, 665
   tertiaries (lay members) of, 789, 790
   on Virgin Mary, 540
 Franciscan Rule, 144
   Agnes of Prague and, 11
   Angela of Foligno and, 21
   Clare of Assisi and, 11
   clothing for, 149
   in Observant Movement, 619
 Frankish Lands, 303–306
   Carolingian period in, 305
   charters in, 305–306
   Clovis (King) ruling of, 303–304
   Dhuoda on, 209
   godparents in, 329
   law in, 304
   laywomen in, 306
   letters writing in, 304
   marriage in, 303
   marriage to Romans in, 304
   Ottonian royal women in, 626–627
   Radegund of, 693
   royal women in, 304–305
 Franzen, Allen, 290
 Frau Ava. See Ava
Frauenepen (Women's Epics), 475
 Fredegund, 305, 685. See Brunhild and Fredegund
 Frederick Barbarossa, 154, 366
 Frederick I (Emperor), 62
 Frederick II (Emperor), 11, 165, 413, 482, 550
 Frederick III (Emperor), 534
 Freedberg, David, 545
 Freitag, Barbara, 757
 French Epic. See Epic, Old French
 French Literature. See Literature, Old French
 French Romance. See Romance, French
 French Texts, Women Authors. See Women Authors: French Texts
 Friedan, Betty, as feminist theorist, 289
 Fries, Maureen, 43
FiM. See Fortunes of Men, The Fulk IV (Count), 157
 Fuss, Diana, 745
- ## G
- Gage, Matilda, 368
 Galen, 284, 540, 770
   on anatomy, 340
   on conception, 671–672
   on cosmetics, 174
   on gender, 308
   in gender, in history, 314 medical literature of, 93
   on medicine, 216
   on sexuality, 671
 Galleria degli Uffizi, 354
 Gandersheim, coinage right of, 154. See Hvotsvit of Gandersheim Garin lo Brun, 160
 Gaston IV, 404
 Gautier d'Arras, 717, 718
 Gaze, 307–308, 774
   Augustine on, 307
   in Byzantine icons, 394
   Camille on, 307
   Lacanian, 307
   Stanbury on, 307
 Gender Ideologies, 308–311
   in archaeology, 27
   Arthurian concepts of, 35–36
   authority aspect of, 310 Biblical source of, 309
   in Christian marriage, 521–522
   gender/body/theory in, 308–309
   in grave goods, 333–334
   of Joan of Arc, 433
   Laqueur on, 308
   legal sources of, 309–310 literary patronage and, 640, 641 medical sources of, 309
   in patriarchy/patrilineage, 633–634 of public/private spheres, 670–671
   of rape, 694
   reader-response criticism in, 696–697
   of regents, 310
   in Romancero, 719
   sexuality aspect of, 311
   of Shekhinah, 758
   of social status, 767
   in Song of Songs, 769
   for virile women, 820
 Gender in Art, 312–313
   on Christ, 312
   Father-God in, 313
   Joseph in, 313
   personifications visualized as women in, 649 seals/sigillography in, 732
   Virgin Mary in, 313

INDEX

- Gender in History, 313–314
Annales School of History on, 22–23
Burckhardt on, 708
Butler on, 314
Erler on, 314
Galen on, 314
Karras on, 314
Kowaleski on, 314
Kristeller on, 708
McNamara on, 314
Zarri on, 708
- Gender Reversals. See Cross-Dressing. Femininity and Masculinity. Festivals of Misrule.
- Gender Ideologies. Roman de Silence
- Gendering the Master Narrative* (McNamara), 372
- Genealogy, 315–316 of Christ, 315
in family, earlier middle ages, 274
Holy Kinship on, 374
kinship in, 315
literature in, 315
of Lusignan family, 556 naming in, 603–605
wills as source of, 838
- Generation of Animals* (Aristotle), 35
- Gentry, women of: England, 316–317 education of, 316
Power, Eileen on, 666
- Geoffrey of Anjou, 682
- Geoffrey of Monmouth, 339, 358
- Geoffrey of Vinsauf, description of beauty, 64–65
- Geoffroy, Chevalier de la Tour Landry, 160
- Gerald of Wales, on concubines, 156
- Gerard of Frachet, 761
- Gerberga II, 107, 381, 549
- Gerberga of Gandersheim, 469
- German Literature. See Literature, German
- German Romance. See Romance, German
- German Texts, Women Authors. See Women Authors: German texts
- Germanic Lands, 317–320
abbesses in, 318–319
adolescence in, 9
ale brewing in, 13
architecture, monastic in, 34
Barbarian Law Codes of, 59–60
betrothal version in, 71
canonesses of, 107
capitalist enterprises in, 319–320
churching in, 140
Cistercian Order in, 319
coinage in, 154
demography in, 319
Dominican Order in, 223
dowry/marriage gifts in, 229
economic situation in, 317–318
Herrad of Hohenbourg in, 363
Jewish women in, 317
lyric performance in, 646
marital status in, 199
monastery reforms in, 319 political situation in, 317–318 royal/noble women in, 318
textile production in, 319–320
urban women in, 319–320
women as tavernkeepers in, 13
women's journals in, 372
- Gerontocomia: On the Care of the Aged* (Zerbi), 624
- Gershom b. Judah, on Jewish marriage, 528
- Gerson, Jean, 195, 267, 320–321, 434, 571, 602, 713, 775
Christine de Pizan and, 321
on church reform, 321
on devotional practices, 207 as doctor of theology, 320, 329
on mysticism/mystics, 597, 598
on Virgin Mary, 539
- Gertrude of Hackeborn, 321–322, 323, 552, 778 abbess, 322
as German woman author, 847
- Gertrude of Helfta, 600, 850
- Gertrude of Meran, 236, 245
- Gertrude of Nivelles, 242, 304, 322–323, 349
Carolingian dynasty founded by, 98
- Gertrude of Ortenberg, 323
- Gertrude the Great of Helfta, 139, 322, 323, 351, 355, 423, 552, 553, 738
as bride of Christ, 95
as German woman author, 847
as oblate, 618
on Song of Songs, 769
- Gesta Abbatum*, on Christina of Markyate, 131
- Gesta Ottonis* (Hrotsvit of Gandersheim), 381
- Geste Francor*, 252
- Getting Medieval* (Dinshaw), 745
- GfM*. See Gifts of Men, The
- Ghent Altarpiece (Eyck), 39
- Gibson, Gail McMurray, 541
- Gifts of Men, The* (GfM), 678
- Gilbert of Sempringham founder of Gilbertine Order, 324 Gilbertine Order founded by, 227
- Gilbert of Tournai, 739
- Gilbertine Order, 228, 324, 583
clothing for, 149
double monasteries of, 324
Gilbert of Sempringham as founder of, 227, 324 prayer focus of, 324
- Giles de Wenlock, household accounts of, 379
- Giles of Rome, 35, 36, 39, 672
- Gilligan, Carol, 132
- Giotto, 34
- Giovanni di Paolo, Maria della Scala's altarpiece by, 355
- Girls and Boys, 325–328
adolescentia segment of, 327
as apprentices, 25–26
Ariès on, 325
baptism of, 326
Crawford on, 325
Finucane on, 325
fosterage of, 297
Hanawalt on, 325
infantia segment of, 326
marriage of, 327
oblates/oblation of, 617–618
Orme on, 325
pueritia segment of, 326–327
refutation of Ariès on, 325
Shahar on, 325
widows as guardians for, 835–836
- Gisela, 236, 242
abbess of Chelles, 435

- Gisela von Kersenbroeck, 612
 Glezze, Dietrich von, 182
Gli Asolani (Bembo), 173
Gloria prayer, 206
Glossa Ordinaria (Ordinary Gloss) (Teutonicus), 221, 625 Gnomonic Literature. See Proverbs, Riddles, Gnomonic Literature
 God as Mother. See Jesus/God as Mother
 Godefroy de Brabant, 206
 Godegisil (King), 152
 Godelieve of Gistel, 328–329 canonization of saint of, 328
   cult of, 328
 Godeswinth, 684
 Godfrey of Bouillon, 361, 394
 Godfrey the Bearded, 394, 550
 Godfrey the Hunchback, 550
 Godparents, 329
   at baptism, 329
   canon law for, 329
   fosterage and, 297
   of girls/boys, 326
   incest by, 400
 Goeffrey, abbot of St. Alban's, 131
 Goes, Hugo van der, Mary Magdalene painting by, 355
 Goigs de Pallafols, 428
 Gold, Penny Schine, 372
Golden Legend. See Jacobus de Voragine's Golden Legend
 Goldberg, Harriet, 719
 Goldberg, P.J.P., 214, 372
Golden Legend (Jacobus), 86, 109, 354, 374, 396. See also Jacobus of Voragine's Golden Legend
   on Catherine of Alexandria's life, 115
 Goodich, Michael, 347
 Goodman of Paris, 88
 Goody, Jack
   on incest, 400
   on kinship, 441
Gorleston Psalter, marginalia in, 509 Goscelin of St. Bertin, 330
   hagiography by, 330
   Latin education of, 485
 Gösmann, Elisabeth, 854
 Gospel of Luke, 137
 Gossip and Slander, 330–331
   exemplum and, 330
   honor/reputation in, 376 literary/artistic representations of, 330 of peasants, 643
   scolding in, 330–331
   of Wife of Bath, 330
 Gotteszell Sister-Book, 761
 Gottfried of Disibodenberg, 365
 Gottfried von Strassburg, 331–332, 457, 572, 719
   Tristan by, 331
   on Tristan/Isolde, 414
Gracial (Adgar), 536
 Grail. See Arthurian Literature
 Grafenberg, Wirnt von, 836–837
Grande Chirurgie (Great Surgery) (Chauliac), 105 Gratian, 525, 625, 753
   on adultery, 754
   on Canon Law, 452
   on conjugal debt, 164, 754
   on fornication, 754
   on impotence, 397
   on prostitutes, 754
 Gravidal, Kathryn, 768 Grave Goods, 332–334
   in archeology, 27
   gender aspects of, 333–334
   jewelry of, 424
   in monastic communities, 333
 Green, Monica, 372
 Gregorian Reform, 30, 268, 349, 737, 779
   for celibacy, 387
   on clerical marriages, 124 over marriage disputes, 215
   on virginity, 816–817
 Gregory I (Pope), 581, 587
   on devotional art, 201
   on exemplum, 268
 Gregory IX (Pope), 11, 109, 138, 144–145, 575, 577, 589, 657 decretals on children's betrothal/marriage, 127
   Hugolino dei Signi as, 656
 Gregory of Nazianzus, 422
 Gregory of Nyssa, 580, 595
 Gregory of Tours, 152, 303, 304, 358, 469–470, 693, 813
   on Mary Magdalene, 532
   on relics of Virgin Mary, 538
   on women, 305
 Gregory the Great (Saint), 2, 293, 313, 358, 429, 469, 529. See also Gregory I (Pope)
   on Mary Magdalene, 531, 533
   pastoral manual of, 644
 Gregory VII (Pope), 109, 211, 318, 417, 468, 550, 776, 777, 779, 821 on celibacy, 118
 Gregory XI (Pope), 117, 738
 Grendler, Paul E., 707
 Grey, John, 855
Grimalte y Gradissa (Grimalte and Gradissa) (Flores), 735
Grisel y Mirabella (Grisel and Mirabella) (Flores), 735 Griselda, 334–336, 488, 803
   by Boccaccio, 77, 78, 334–335
   Chaucer translation of, 335
   Christine de Pizan on, 335
   French versions of, 335 Iberian versions of, 335
   in Italian literature, 483
   lay piety and, 462
   by Petrarch, 125, 261, 269
   Petrarch on, 335
   Philippe de Mézières on, 335
 Grosseteste, Robert, 756
   on administration of estates, 7
 Grote, Geert, 90
   Modern Devotion founded by, 573
 Guarnieri, Romana, 598
 "Guda et Claricia: Deux 'autoportraits' déminins du XIIe siècle" (Klapisch-Zuber), 23
 Guda, self-portrait of, 46
 Guglielma of Milan, 418, 658
 Guibert of Gembloux, 364, 365, 366
 Guibert of Nogent, 402 father's impotence, 398 Guibert of Nogent's Mother, 18, 336, 767
   as widow, 336
 Guibert of Tournai, 767
Guide of the Perplexed (Maimonides), 425
 "Guides of Ares," 16
Guigemar (Marie de France), 499, 628

INDEX

- Guild Members and Guilds, 337–338 for almsgiving/charity, 15
apprentices in, 25, 337
of crafts, 337 economy of, 238
market/tradeswomen in, 515
masters' widows in, 337 of merchants, 337
in northern France, 300
of professionals of silk industry, 101, 337
for textile production, 794
women artists in, 45
women as doctors in, 217
of women in artisan families, 44, 45
- Guilhelm IX, 490
- Guillaume d'Angleterre* (Chrétien de Troyes), 129
- Guillaume de Lorris, 88, 261, 572, 648, 711–712, 822
- Guillaume IX, 641
- Guinevere, 41–42, 338–339, 489, 688, 718, 786, 821
as adulteress, 339
in Arthurian literature, 338
Lancelot and, 338
Sir Arthur as husband of, 338
- Guiscard, Robert, 416
- Guittone d' Arrezzo, 482, 483
- Gundobad (King), 152
- Gunnhildr (Queen), 495, 728
- Guthrie, Jeri, 747
- Guy de Chauliac, 341
- Guy of Tuscany, 516
- Guzman, Dominic de, 577
- Gynaikonitis* (women's quarters) in Byzantium, 102
site of conspiracy of, 102
- Gynecology, 339–343 anatomy in, 340
cross-sex practice in, 243 disease incidence in, 339–340
Hildegard of Bingen on, 341, 342
life expectancy in, 339–340 medical knowledge/care in, 341–342, 554 menstruation in, 557–558
midwives in, 561
physiology/pathology/therapy in, 340–341
for pregnancy/childbirth, 667
procreation/conception in, 671–672
Secrets of Women in, 733
Trota of Salerno on, 341, 342, 801
- H
- Habits, Monastic. See Clothing for Religious Women
- Hadewijch, 81, 139, 239, 280, 345–346, 597, 779
Beguines and, 345
on Bride of Christ, 95
courtly love in, 345
Minnesang in, 345–346
mystic writings of, 599–600
mysticism of, 597
Van Mierlo as editor of, 345
- Hagiography, 346–354
almsgiving/charity and, 14
audience for, 347–348
autohagiography v., 54 of Baudonivia, 242
Bell, Rudolph on, 347
canonization of saints in, 347 in central Middle Ages, 349–350 of Christina the Astonishing, 132 chronicles of northern low countries in, 134 clerical suspicions in, 351–352 composition of Lives in, 347–348
cross-dressing in, 182
Delooz on, 347
in early church, 348
in early Middle Ages, 348–349
of Foy (Saint), 297 of Gertrude of Nivelles, 304 Goodich on, 347
as historical source, 346–347
in late Middle Ages, 350–351
in Latin literature, 486
of Lutgard of Aywières, 500 male predominance in, 347
of Margaret of Cortona, 507
of Maria of Venice, 511
of Marie of Oignies, 514
martyrs in, 348
of Mary the Egyptian, 536 mystical visions in, 351 mystical writings of, 599
of mystics, 596–597, 598
of Olga, 624
queens as saints in, 349
of Radegund, 304
of saints' lives, 242
Schulenburg on, 347
Sister-Books of, 761
Sorokin on, 347
virgin martyrs in, 814
for virginity, 818
Weinstein on, 347
of Yvette of Huy, 861
- Hagiography, Iconographic Aspects of, 354–356
Mary of Magdelene in, 355 matrons/widows in, 354 nuns/abbesses in, 354–355
penitents/ascetics/mystics in, 355
seals/sigillography in, 732–733 of Ursula and her companions, 809
virgin martyrs in, 354, 816
Virgin Mary in, 355
- Haider, Ursula, 739
- Haimo of Auxerre, 139
- Håkon (King), 510
- Håkon VI (King), 310, 682
- Halakhah*, 460
- Hamburger, Jeffrey, 203
- Hamda Banat Ziyad, 478
- Hammer of Witches, The. See Malleus Maleficarum (Hammer of Witches, The)* (Tertullian)
- Hanawalt, Barbara, 214, 325, 372, 857
- Handbook* (Dhuoda), 306
- Handicaps. See Disabilities
- Handlyng Synne* (Manning), 645
- Hansen, Elaine Tuttle, 126
- Haraldsson, Óláfr (King), 495
- Harding, Stephen, 142
- Hart, Columba, 372

- Hasenohr, G., 207–208
 Hatcher, John, 214
 Hatto, Arthur, 193
 Hätzlerin, Klara, 848
 Hawking. See Hunting and Falconry
 Haymo of Auxerre, 529
 Hayward, Jane, 855
 Healers. See Doctors and Healers Hebrew Literature. See Literature, Hebrew
 Hedwig Codex, 203
 Heinrich von Nördlingen, 237
 Heiresses, 356–357
   dowry of, 356
   inheritance of, 357, 406
   landholding/property rights of, 356
   Mary of Burgundy, 534
   in wardship, 828
   widows as, 834
 Heldris de Cornuälle, 42
 Helen. See Olga
 Helen of Troy, rape of, 694
 Helena (Saint), 354, 357–358, 492, 705
   coinage of, 357
   Constantine (Emperor) as son of, 348, 357 festivals for, 357
   pilgrimage of, 653
   True Cross recovery by, 357
 Helfta mystics, 368
 Heloise, 157, 194, 240, 243, 289, 301, 358–360, 368, 570, 577, 730, 737, 756, 777, 801, 808, 822, 850
   Abelard and, 358, 359
   debate of, 195
   on Latin, 468
   letter writing of, 359–360, 368, 485
   life of, 358–359
 Helvidius, 422
 Helvig of Schleswig, 510
 Heng, Geraldine, 660
 Henri de la Baume, 155
 Henry I (King), 6, 154, 157, 211, 244, 310, 318, 339, 356, 468, 472, 551, 635, 682, 687, 723, 731, 732, 798, 850 burial at Fontevrault Abbey, 296
   concubines of, 157–158
 Henry II (King), 99, 146, 250, 310, 324, 339, 366, 403, 507, 627, 686, 688, 717, 720
 Henry III (King), 87, 111, 112, 468, 688
 Henry IV (Emperor), 236, 318, 361, 550, 723, 784
 Henry IV (King), 125, 211
 Henry of Anjou, 157
 Henry of Brabant, 394
 Henry of Winchester (Bishop), 6
 Henry V (King), 211, 420, 550, 551, 687, 689, 703, 787
 Henry VI (King), 62, 154, 165, 211, 233, 324, 472, 506, 689, 703
 Henry VII (King), 11, 23, 64, 127, 473, 653, 856
 Henry VIII (King), 158, 211, 324, 584, 787
   Beaufort as grandmother of, 64
Her Immaculate Hand (King/Rabil), 708
 Herald of Bavaria, 135
Herald of Divine Love (Gertrude of Helfta), 600, 738
 Heraldry, 360–361
   designs of, 360
   matrilineal descent in, 361 military origins of, 360 seals in, 360
 Hercehnfreda, 304
 Heretics and Heresy, 361–362
   Birgitta of Sweden as, 739
   of Lollards, 496
   of Marguerite Porete, 361, 510, 511, 598, 778, 781, 798
   Na Prous Boneta as, 361
   Rose of Viterbo attacks on, 722 of witches, 841
   witches as, 362
 Herford, coinage right of, 154
 Herlihy, David, 22, 122, 272, 289, 370, 371, 708, 858
   on incest, 400
 Herman I (King), 245
 Hermaphrodites, 340, 362–363 conception of, 362
   femininity/masculinity of, 363
   Muslim on, 362
 Hermas, on chastity/chaste marriage, 123
Heroides, The Legend of Good Women (Ovid), 126, 487, 602, 627, 628
 Herrad of Hohenbourg, 45, 242, 363–364, 583, 850
   as German woman author, 847 manuscript of, 363
   as nun as illuminator, 612
   virginity of, 819
 Herrin, Judith, 393
 Hetzeldorfer, Katharina, as cross-dresser, 183
 Heyd, Wilhelm, 764
 Hild of Whitby, 3, 138, 249, 349, 364, 491, 641
   as abbess, 3
   Aethelthryth of Ely and, 10
   Bede on, 364
   for double monasteries, 227
 Hildebald of Cologne, 614
 Hildebert, 364, 570
 Hildegard of Bingen, 45, 95, 139, 216, 228, 242, 246, 267, 280, 314, 319, 342, 350, 355, 364–368, 368, 403, 470, 541, 583, 591, 596, 641, 730, 747, 778, 796, 808, 822, 849, 850
   autohagiography of, 53, 54
   on cosmetics, 173
   debate of, 195
   on Eve, 267
   as female oblate, 618
   as German woman author, 847
   on gynecology, 341
   Hildebert as father of, 364 last years of, 367
   on Latin, 469
   Latin and, 485
   letter writing of, 365, 468, 486
   Liber vitae meritum (Book of Life's Merits) by, 366
   life of, 364–365
   on liturgical music, 367
   Mechthild as mother of, 364
   on natural world, 605–606
   Newman on, 372
   as nun as illuminator, 612
   as nun as musician, 613
   preaching of, 365, 366–367
   as prophet, 673
   propriety of dress by, 84
   Rupersberg founding by, 366–367
   Scivias by, 365–366, 372 sermon collections of, 736
   sermons/preaching of, 737, 740
   on Song of Songs, 769

INDEX

- Hildegard of Bingen (cont.)
 on Ursula and her companions, 815 on Virgin Mary in music, 548
 on virginity, 818, 819
 on virile women, 821
 on wisdom, 840
- Hildegund of Schönau, 148
 cross-dressing of, 182
- Hilton, Walter, 473
- Hippocrates, 671, 770
- Hippolyta, 16
- Hippolytus of Rome, 136
- Histoire des Femmes* (Duby/Perrot), 22
- Historia regum Britanniae* (Geoffrey of Monmouth), 716
- History, Medieval Women's, 368–374 academic acceptance of, 371
 Aethelflaed in, 10
 Anneles School of History on, 22–23
 Bateson on, 369
 Bücher on, 370
 diversity in, 372–373
 Dixon on, 369
 Duby on, 708
 Duckett on, 369
 Eckenstein on, 369
 feminist historians on, 370–371
 Gage on, 368
 gender history in, 371–372
 Herlihy on, 370
 historians outside of academy on, 369–370 historians within academy on, 370 historical research on, 370–371
 misogyny in, 373
 Perrot on, 708
 positioning impact on, 368–369
 positivism in, 369
 Power, Eileen on, 370
 scholarly editions/journals for, 372
- History of My Calamities* (Abelard), 358, 359
- History of Sexuality* (Foucault), 749
- History of the Kings of Britian* (Monmouth), 338
- History of Women in the West* (Duby/Perrot), 708
- Hoccleve, Thomas, 489
- Hodegetria*, Virgin Mary art of, 543
- Hodoeporicon of St. Willibald* (Hugeberc), 840
- Holland, Thomas, 357
- Hollywood, Amy, 48
- Holy Family group, 25
- Holy Feast and Holy Fast* (Bynum), 290, 371–372
- Holy Kinship, 24, 374, 544
 genealogy of Jesus' maternal relations, 374
Golden Legend on, 374
- Holy Maidenhood*, 439
- Holy Roman Empire, in Germanic lands, 318
- Holy Trinity nunnery, 6
- Home Manufacturing, 374–375
 apprentices in, 375
 clothwork in, 375
 Davis on, 375
 Howell on, 375
 Power, Eileen on, 374
 for textile production, 791–793
- Homer, 803
- Homicide, abortion as, 4
- Homoeotericism. See Eroticism (all entries)
- Homosexuality. See Sexuality: Female Same Sex Relations;
 Sexuality: Male Same Sex Relations
- Homosexuality and the Western Christian Tradition* (Bailey), 749
- Honest Courtesan, The* (Rosenthal), 156
- Honor and Reputation, 375–376 in epic, Spanish, 257
 gender in, 376
 gossip in, 376
 legal dimension of, 376
 portrait medals for, 659
 rape/raptus and, 694–695 “shame/guilt cultures” in, 376 violence for, 813
- Honorius Augustodunensis, 139, 363
- Honorius III (Pope), 144, 223, 324
 Beguine protection by, 68
- Hortus Deliciarum (Garden of Delights)* (Herrad of Hohenbourg), 45, 363, 612, 847
- Horváti, János, 535
- Hôpital des Quinze-Vingts, for disabled, 212, 213
- Hospitals, 377–378 disability treatment at, 212 leper care in, 377–378
 for lepers, 466, 467
 prostitute care by, 378
- Hours of the Virgin, recitation of, 90
- House of Boulogne, 394
- House of Fame, The* (Chaucer), 125
- House of Wessex, 10
- Household Accounts, 378–380 of Alice de Bryene, 379 of Berkeley, Elizabeth, 379 of Elizabeth de Burgh, 379
 of noble women, 379
- Household Management, 380–381
 Christine de Pizan on, 380
 legal agency in, 464–465
 lying-in and, 501 marginalia for, 509 of noble households, 380 in peasant households, 381
 Power, Eileen on, 666
 in Scandinavia, 727
 social status and, 767
 in urban households, 380–381 of women of merchant families, 558
- How the Good Man Taught His Son* (Chaucer), 220
- How the Goodwife Taught Her Daughter* (Chaucer), 44, 160, 220, 702, 741, 857
- Howell, Martha, 372, 794
 on home manufacturing, 375
- Hrotsvit of Gandersheim, 107, 232, 242, 243, 319, 368, 381–382, 470, 486, 549, 582, 819, 849 drama by, 382
 German author of, 473
 as German woman author, 847 historical writings of, 382
 as nun as musician, 613
 nuns as scribe for, 614
 on virgin martyrs, 815
- Hudson, William Henry, 368
- Hugeburc of Heidenheim, 242, 850
- Hugh of Arles (King), 516
- Hugh of Cluny, 394
- Hugh of Digne, 657

- Hugh of St. Victor, 434, 625
 Hughes, Diane Owen, 371
 Hugolino dei Segni. See Gregory IX (Pope)
 Huguccio, on impotence, 397–398
 Hull, Eleanor, 851
 Humanism, 382–384, 601–602
   authors of, 383
   diffusion of, 384
   of Fedele, 281
   in fifteenth century, 383
   in historiography of Renaissance, 707
   Jardine on, 708
   King, Margaret on, 708
   Nogarola and, 611
   origins of, 383
   of Petrarch, 650
   portrait medals in, 659
   Rabil on, 708
   of woman authors of Latin texts, 850
   women and, 383–384
 Humbert of Romans, 223, 767
   sermons/preaching of, 737
 Hume, David, 566
 Humiliati, 384–385, 417
   Beguines comparison to, 385
   of Italy, 384
   Orders of, 385
   textile production of, 385
   on women's ordination as priests, 625
 Humility of Faenza, 351, 385–386, 768
   Latin proficiency of, 386
   sermons/preaching of, 385–386, 736, 738, 778
   Vallombrosan nunnery founding of, 385
 Humphrey of Gloucester, 420
 Hundred Years' War, 37, 133, 142, 210–211, 608, 814, 816 Hunting/Falconry, 386–387
   of noble women, 386–387
   in Queen Mary's Psalter, 386, 387
 Huot, Sylvia, 713
 Hus, Jan, 24
 Husbands and Husbandry, 387–388
   in Islamic marriage, 527
   of Joseph, stepfather of Jesus, 433–434 masculine identity in, 388 patriarchy/patrilineage of, 634
   of peasants, 643
   practical option of, 387
Husband's Message, The, 679
 Hutcheson, Gregory, 747
 Hysteria. See Madness
- I
- “I monasteri femminili a Bologna tra il XIII e il XVII secolo”
 (Zarri), 34
 Iaroslav the Wise, 723
 Iberia, 389–392, 789. See also Muslim Women: Iberia anchoresses in, 391
   architecture, monastic in, 32, 34
   Christian women in, 390–392
   concubines in, 389
   consumption laws in, 166
   double monasteries in, 227
   dowry in, 391
   five kingdoms of, 389
   inheritance in, 390–391
   Islamic law of, 458–459
   Islamic marriage in, 527–528
   Jewish women in, 390
   landholding/property rights in, 390
   literature of, 478–480
   lyric performance in, 646
   misericords in, 568
   Muslim women in, 389–390
   noble women in, 391
   Petronila of Aragón, 652
   prostitutes in, 391
   Qasmuna Bint Isma'il of, 681
   in Romancero, 719–720
   Urraca of, 809
   versions of Griselda, 335
   widows as guardians in, 836
   women in al-Andalus, 389–392
 Iberian Literature. See Literature, Iberian Ibn Hazm, on Islamic marriage, 528
 Ibn Shabbetai, Judah, 477
 Ibn Zaydun, 478, 828
 Iceland
   concubinage in, 524
   fosterage in, 296–297
   genealogy of, 315
   honor/reputation in, 376
   Old Norse literature and, 495
 Icons, Byzantine, 392–394
   Cormack on, 393
   in devotional art, 393
   gaze in, 394
   Herrin on, 393
   Mary the Younger in, 536 of Theophano, 627
   of Virgin Mary, 393, 542–543, 544
 Iconography. See Hagiography, Iconographic Aspects of Ida of Boulogne, 394–395
   crusade of, 394
   as noble woman, 394
 Ida of Gorsleeuw, 239
 Ida of Nevilles, 239
Il Contrasto delle donne (Pucci), 196
Il Filostrato (Boccaccio), 126, 181
Iliad, 491
Ille et Galeron (Gautier d'Arras), 717, 718
 Illegitimacy, 395–396
   of clergy children, 395
   in extramarital sex, 395
   infanticide and, 395
   inheritance for, 395
   penalties for, 395
   in Scandinavia, 524
 Illuminators. See Nuns as Illuminators
Image on the Edge: The Margins of Medieval Art (Camille), 509
Images in the Margins of Gothic Manuscripts (Randall), 509
Imitation of Christ, Beaufort translation of, 64
 Immaculate Conception, Doctrine of, 396–397
   Aquinas on, 538
   art images on, 544
   Dominican Order on, 396–397
   Franciscan Order on, 396, 397
   Gerson on, 397
   Holy Kinship on, 374
   iconography of, 397

INDEX

- Immaculate Conception, Doctrine of (cont.)
Pius IX (Pope) on, 538
scholasticism of, 396
Virgin Mary and, 538
- Impotence, 336, 397–399
causes/consequences of, 397–398
charivari for, 398
Gratian on, 397
Huguccio on, 397–398
infertility v., 397
legal recourse for, 398–399
Lombard on, 397
magic/charms for, 505
marriage impediment of, 526
types of, 397–398
from witches, 398
- “In Defence of Women” (ibn Shabbetai), 477
- In Defense of Icons* (John of Damascus), 201
- Incest, 399–401
church views on, 399–400 of Constance, 165
documentary evidence of, 400
Flight from the Incestuous Father stories of, 401
Fourth Lateran Council on, 400
by godparents, 400
Goody on, 400
Herlihy on, 400
Isolde in, 414
literary sources for, 400–401
in marriage impediments, 524
misogyny in, 400
- Industrial Revolution, 27
- Infants and Infanticide, 326, 401–403
Ariés on, 401 for disabilities, 213 for illegitimacy, 395
infant symbolism of, 402
Isidore of Seville on, 401
Medieval definitions of, 401–402 pregnancy/childbirth of, 402
in Scandinavia, 728
wet nurses for infants, 402
- Inferno 5* (Dante), 191, 716
- Infertility, 341, 403–404, 668
for Christians, 403
conjugal debt in, 403
of Datini, 192
impotence v., 397
for Jews, 403
medical views of cause of, 403–404
Richard the Englishman on, 403
sheela na gigs use for, 403
- Ingeborg of Denmark, 687
- Inheritance, 404–406
administration of estates for, 7, 8
adolescence and, 9
Barbarian Law Codes for, 60
in Christian marriage, 518, 521
dowry in, 405
in Eastern Europe, 235
French law for, 405, 454
German law for, 405
of heiresses, 357
in Iberia, 390–391
for illegitimacy, 395
investment/credit in, 408
kinship in, 406, 442
landholding in, 448
of noble women, 609–610
partible/impartible, 405–406
patriarchy/patrilineage in, 634
Roman law for, 405, 406, 443
in Scandinavia, 727–728
succession in, 783
testate/intestate in, 405
in Wales, 826
in wills, 838
- Innocent II (Pope), 588
- Innocent III (Pope), 3, 70, 109, 138, 385, 418, 589, 656, 665, 678 on coinage rights, 154
on concubines, 156
on sermons/preaching of abbesses, 737
- Innocent IV (Pope), 2, 145, 223, 367, 413, 657, 665
- Innocent VI (Pope), 677
- Innocent VII (Pope), 224, 511, 790
- Innocent VIII (Pope), on witches, 842
- Insanity. See Madness
- Instructions for Parish Priests* (Myrc), 645
- Instructions, The* (Angela of Foligno), 791
- Intercession, 406–407
in diplomacy/reconciliation, 21 political, 406
Thomas of Chobham on, 407
by Virgin Mary, 406
of Virgin Mary, 539, 542, 547
- Interior Castle, The* (Teresa of Avila), 600
- Investiture Controversy, 550, 588
- Investment and Credit, 407–408
in business, 407–408
in inheritance, 408
Jordan, William Chester on, 407
by women of merchant families, 559
- Ireaneus of Lyons, 537
- Ireland, 408–411
abbesses in, 410
Anglo-Norman invasion of, 410–411
Brigit of Kildare (Saint), 410
Celtic stereotype evidence in, 409 dual-sex monasteries in, 227
kinship in, 409
legal status in, 409
literature in, 480–482
marriage/divorce in, 409–410
misogyny in, 410
monasticism/nuns in, 411, 586
saints in, 349, 410
- Irene, 248, 249, 310, 393, 411–412, 539
eunuchs for, 411
as regent, 411, 703
- Irish Literature. See Literature, Irish
- Isabeau of Bavaria, 87, 91, 432, 590
diplomacy of, 211
literary patronage of, 640
as regent, 703
- Isabel de Byron, 91
- Isabel I, 154, 412–413
Christopher Columbus and, 412 patron of learning/arts, 412
- Isabel la Católica, 703

- Isabel of Aragon (Queen), 391, 413 canonization of saint, 413
- Isabel of Bourbon, 534
- Isabel of Castile, 682, 735
- Isabel of Portugal, 635
- Isabella (Queen), 157, 281, 592
 huntiinig/falconry of, 386
- Isabella d'Este, 635
- Isabella of Aragon, 688
- Isabella of Beaumont, concubine of Henry I (King), 158
- Isabella of Villena, 740
- Isabella the Catholic. See Isabel I
- Isabelle, 33
- Isabelle of England, 687
- Isabelle of France, 299, 413–414, 602, 657
 Blanche of Castile as mother of, 413 childhood betrothal of, 127
 diplomacy of, 211
 Louis VIII as father of, 413
 in monastic architecture, 41
 monastic rule of, 413
 as regent, 703
- Isadore of Seville, 243, 435, 478
- Iser, Wolfgang, 696
- Iseut. See Isolde
- Isidore of Seville, 557, 568
 on children, betrothal/marriage, 127
 on infants, 401
- Islamic Women. See Muslim Women: Iberia
- Isolde (Iseut), 42, 43, 148, 289, 331, 414–415, 688, 717, 718 myth of, 414
 in Old French literature, 494
- Isserles, Moses, 460
- Italian Epic. See Epic, Italian
- Italian Literature. See Literature, Italian
- Italian Renaissance, 382, 383
- Italian Texts, Women Authors. See Women Authors: Italian Texts
- Italy, 415–418
 Adelheid as queen of, 7
 adolescence in, 9
 Amalasantha and, 16
 architecture, monastic in, 32, 33, 34
 betrothals in, 72
 charters in, 122
 children betrothal in, 127
 civic chronicles in, 416
 Compiuta Donzella as poet in, 155 consumption laws in, 166
 dogaresse in, 217–218
 Dominican Order in, 223
 dowries in, 143
 humanism in, 382, 601
 Humiliati Order of, 384–385
 Joan I of, 430
 land owners in, 417
 legal sources in, 415
 literature in, 482–484
 lyric performance in, 646
 Maria of Venice of, 511–512
 Marozia of Rome in, 516 narrative sources in, 416 peasant women in, 416–417
 religion in, 417–418
 Roman dowry in, 229–230 sermons/preaching in, 738–739
 slaves in, 764
 sources on women in, 415–416
 sumptuary law of, 784
 tax record sources in, 416
 Tornabuoni de' Medici, Lucrezia of, 796
 widows as guardians in, 836
 women's journals in, 372
- Ivan III, 723, 770
- Ivo of Chartres, 6
- ## J
- Jacobus of Voragine's Golden Legend, 24, 86, 109, 419–420, 487, 532, 536, 777, 809
 Holy Kinship awareness from, 374
 Immaculate Conception in, 396 on Margaret of Antioch, 506
 on Mary Magdalene, 532
 on saints/festivals, 419–420
 Veronica's Veil in, 812
 virgin martyrs in, 815–816
 Winstead on, 420
 Wogan-Browne on, 420
- Jacqueline of Bavaria, 420–421
 in chronicles of northern low countries, 134
 Margaret of Burgundy as mother of, 420
 William VI (Count) as father of, 420
- Jadwiga, 236, 421
 Louis of Hungary as father of, 421
 Mary of Hungary II and, 421, 535
- James I (King), 244, 428, 731
- James IV (King), 111, 112
- James of Majorca, 430
- James of Vitry, 268, 737, 767
- Jameson, Anne, 854
- Jankowski, Theodara, 746
- Jardine, Lisa, 708
- Jauss, Hans-Robert, 696
- Jean de Meun, 50, 51, 84, 261, 358, 572, 648, 649, 712–713, 717, 822
- Jean, duc de Berry, 207, 407
- Jean Gobi the Elder, miracle collection of, 532
- Jeanne de Toucy, 361
- Jeanne d'Evreux, 636
- Jeanne of Montfort, 830
- Jeanne of Valois, diplomacy of, 210
- Jerman, James, 756
- Jerome, 52, 149, 196, 243, 285, 348, 359, 469, 486, 570, 580, 611, 708, 836
 asceticism of, 47
 letter writing to, 468, 485
 on virginity, 123
- Jerome, influence of, 421–423
 on asceticism, 422
 Augustine and, 422
 on mothers as teachers, 589
 Song of Songs commentary by, 422
 theology of, 422
 on Virgin Mary, 422, 423
 Vulgate Bible translation by, 422
- Jesus and God as Mother, 309, 423–424. See also Christ
 Augustine of Hippo on, 423
 Julian of Norwich on, 423, 424
 theology of, 423
 Wisdom as comparison to, 423
- Jesus as Mother* (Bynum), 371

INDEX

- Jewelry, 424–425
 gems in, 424
 for grave goods, 424
 in grave goods, 333
 of rosary, 722
 in trousseau, 802
 of women, 424
- Jewish Mystical Thought, Body and Soul in, 425–426 alienation of soul in, 426 body as tool/text in, 425 female terms for, 425
 Maimonides on, 425
 Rosen on, 425
 Shekhinah in, 757–758
- Jewish Women, 426–428
 Christian v. Muslim, 426
 churching of, 140
 Dolce of Worms, 218
 dowry of, 427
 economic/religious roles of, 427–428
 in Germanic lands, 317
 in Iberia, 390
 investment/credit for, 427
 Jewish law on, 460–461
 Judith, 436
 in marriage, 528–529
 mikveh for, 563–564
 in Occitania, 621
 Qasmuna Bint Isma'il
 regional differences of, 427 sexual transgressions of, 428
 trousseau for, 802
 widows as guardians for, 835
 widows in, 427
- Jewish Women in the "Responsa" 900 CE to 1500 CE* (Epstein), 370
- Jewish Women: Latin and European Vernacular Literature, 429–430 of Chaucer, 429
 in exemplum, 429 representation of, 429
 Virgin Mary in, 429
- Joan I, 430
 Charles of Calabria as father of, 430
 Mary of Valoi as mother of, 430 political missteps of, 430
- Joan of Arc, 361, 368, 430–433, 461, 633, 701, 776, 814, 816, 855
 Amazons and, 17
 arms/armor of, 36
 in campaign after Orleans, 432–433
 Christine de Pizan on, 133
 cross-dressing of, 183, 431
 diplomacy of, 211
 gender issues of, 433
 heresy trial of, 433
 in Orleans siege, 432 political importance of, 432
 virginity of, 431
 in warfare, 829
- Joan of Arc, by Herself and Her Witnesses* (Pernoud), 369
- Joan of Kent, 111, 357
- Joan of Navarre, 147
- Joan of Stuteville, 361
- Joanna I (Queen), 403, 416, 635, 682
- Johanna of Rozmital, diplomacy of, 211
- Johannes de Caulibus, 207
- Johannes de Vepria, 359
- John (King), 18, 324
- John I Tzimiskes, 394
- John II, 248, 249, 631
- John II Komnenos, 394
- John III, 631
- John IV, 420
- John of Brabant, 420
- John of Capistrano, 155, 619
- John of Demascus, 201
- John of Gaunt, 157, 211, 784
- John of Reading, on plagues, 655
- John of Salisbury, 363, 730
- John the Baptist, 56
- John VIII (Pope), 588
- John XI (Pope), 516
- John XV (Pope), 109
- John XXI (Pope), 729
- John XXII (Pope), 367, 430, 689, 739
- John XXIII (Pope), 75
- Johnson, Lesley, 272
- Jordan, Alphonse, 258
- Jordan, Mark, 749
- Jordan of Saxony, in Dominican Order, 224
- Jordan, William Chester, 407
- Joseph, Stepfather of Jesus, 313, 433–435, 538
 cuckold representation of, 434
 Gerson on, 434
 sexual purity of, 433–434
 Virgin Mary and, 434
 writers on, 434
- Josephite Marriage. See Chastity and Chaste Marriage
- Jouarre and Chelles, 435–436
 abbesses in, 435
 artistic patronage of, 636
 double monasteries of, 435
 education in, 435
 Latin literacy/reading in, 435
 nuns as scribes in, 615
- Jouffroi de Poitiers*, 710
- Journal of Family History*, Hughes dowry article in, 371
- Journals, of Women's Studies
Feminist Studies as, 371
SIGNS: A Journal of Women in Culture and Society as, 371
Speculum: the Journal of the Medieval Academy of America, 372
- Juan II of Castile, 211, 412, 498
- Juana Enriquez, as Queen-lieutenant, 703
- Juana of Castile, 412
- Judah al-Harizi, 476
- "Judah the Women-Hater" (Ibn Shabbetai), 477
- Judith, 436, 474, 797
Beowulf on, 436
 in Old English literature, 492
 in typology, 805
- Judith* (Matthus), 436
- Judith of Flanders, as ambassador of culture, 87
- Julian of Norwich, 251, 351, 436–437, 600, 819, 822, 849, 851, 852 anchoress, 463
 autohagiography of, 600
 on Jesus/God as Mother, 437
 on Jesus/God as mother, 423, 424
 Kempe and, 440
 revelation of, 48, 53
 seclusion of, 18

on suffering body in religion, 82
 on women's authority to write, 54–55
 Juliana of Cornillon, 18, 239, 351, 492, 780
 Juliana of Nicomedia, Katherine Group on, 439
 Justin Martyr (Saint), 537, 566
 Justinian, 103, 104, 621, 635, 678, 714 on Byzantium prostitutes, 103
 on dowry, 715
 on Theodosian Code, 714–715
 Justinian I, 248
 on same sex relations, 752
 Justinian II, 248, 694
 Justinian Plague, 654
 Justinus, 608
 Jutta of Borgloon, 250, 364
 as Beguine, 66
 Jutta of Huy, 775
 Juvenal, 196, 712

K

Karras, Ruth Mazo, 261, 263, 314, 664
 Kassia, as Byzantine female writer, 104
 Katharine of Aragon, 688
 Katherine Group, 19, 439–440, 487 for anchoresses, 439
 on Bride of Christ, 440 vernacular literature of, 439
 on virgin martyrs, 439–440
 on virginity, 439–440
 Katherine of Aragon, 211
 Katherine of Ledbury, 18
 Katherine of Sutton, 232
 Katherine of Valois, 687, 689
 Kelly-Gadol, Joan, 370, 707
 Kempe, Margery, 18, 54, 202, 233, 251, 281, 440–441, 463, 541, 600, 632, 647, 822, 851, 855
 business of, 100
 chastity of, 124, 440
 heresy and, 739
 Julian of Norwich and, 440, 441
 lay woman, 462
 madness of, 503
 memoir of, 440
 pilgrimages of, 440
 on suffering body in religion, 82
 Kempfin, Elisabeth, 761
 Ketham, Johannes de, 479
 King, Andy, 695
 King, Margaret L., 708
 King, Margot, 372
Kingis Quair, The (James I of Scotland), 244
 Kinship, 441–444
 Bloch, Marc on, 441
 in family, earlier middle ages, 273 in family, later middle ages, 276
 genealogy in, 315
 godparents and, 329
 Goody on, 441
 Holy Kinship, 374
 inheritance in, 406, 442
 in Ireland, 409
 Levi-Strauss on, 441 marriage impediment of, 526 naming of, 442, 443, 603–605

Schmid on, 442
 succession and, 783
 Kirchberg Sister-Book (Elisabeth of Kirchberg), 761
Kitab al-Muyarrabat (Book of Medical Experiences) (Abu l-Ala' Zuhr), 479
 Klapisch-Zuber, Christine, 22, 23, 289, 371, 708, 767
 Klinck, Anne L., 845
 Knight of La Tour Landry, 767
Knight of the Cart, The. See Le Chevalier de la Charrette (Chrétien)
Knight's Tale (Chaucer), 17
 Komnene, Anna, 104, 249, 369, 444–445 politics of, 444
 women stereotypes by, 444
 Konrad von Fußesbrunnen, 402
 Kottaner, Helene, 445, 848
 as lady-in-waiting, 445
 narrative of, 445
 Kowaleski, Maryanne, 314, 372
 Kristeller, Paul Oskar, 707, 708
 Krueger, Roberta L., 43
 on misogyny, 572
Kudrun, 475
 Kuno of Disibodenberg, 365

L

La Belle Dame Sans Merci (Chartier), 69, 489
La Contenance des Femes (The Ways of Women), 494
La coronación de la senora Gracisla (The Coronation of Lady Gracisla) (Flores), 735
La dame escouillée (The Castrated Lady), 571
La Fresne (Marie de France), 402
La vita nuova (Dante), 499
 Labalme, Patricia, 707
 Ladd, Anne, 272
Ladder of Perfection, The, 204
Ladies' Tournament, The, 37
 Ladies-in-Waiting, 447–448
 Alienor de Poitiers on, 448
 Christine de Pizan on, 447
 as governess, 448
 in Iberia, 391
 Kottaner as, 445
 for noble women, 447–448
 of Queens/Empresses of West, 690
 servants as, 741
 for West queens/empresses, 447–448
 Ladislav (King), 445
 Ladurie, LeRoy, 22
Lady and the Virgin, The (Gold), 372
 “Lady of the Mercians,” Aethelflaed as, 10
Lai de Fresne (Marie de France), 494
Lais (Marie de France), 512–513, 717
 “Lamb of God,” for Siena Cathedral, 354
Lament of the Old Woman of Beare (Ni Dhonnchadha), 480
Lamentations (Matheolus), 50
Lamentations de Matheolus (LeFrèvre), 494
Lamentations Matheoluli (LeFrèvre), 196
 Lancelot, 41–42, 175, 717
Lancelot (Chrétien de Troyes), 175, 338, 472, 717, 821. See also Le Chevalier de la Charette (Knight of the Cart, The)
 courtly love in, 175
 Landholding and Property Rights, 448–449
 administration of estates in, 8
 in Christian marriage, 518, 522

INDEX

- Landholding and Property Rights (cont.)
  deathbed transfers in, 449
  dowry as, 448
  English secular court law on, 455, 456
  for feme covert, 282
  in Flanders, 294
  German law of, 457
  of heiresses, 356
  in Iberia, 390
  inheritance of, 448
  in Italy, 416
  jointure/widowhood for, 448–449
  of Matilda of Tuscany, 550
  patriarchy/patrilineage in, 634
  in polyptyques, 697–698
  of urban property, 449 of virile women, 821
  Walker on, 448 of wards, 828 of Welsh women, 826–827
  of women, 238
Lane, Barbara, 544, 545
Langland, William, 222, 648
Langmann, Adelheid, 224, 237, 450, 847
Lansing, Carol, 156, 767, 768
Lanz, Eukene Lacarra, 719
Laqueur, Thomas, 308
Las Cantigas de Santa Maria (Alfonso el Sabio), 548
Las Huelgas Codex, 613
Las Novas de Guillem de Nivers. See Roman de Flamenca “Lascia vorria lo mondo, e Dio servire” (Compiuta Donzella), 156
“Last Judgement” (Ava), 56
Latin Literature. See Literature, Latin Latin Texts, Women Authors. See Women Authors: Latin Texts Learning. See Education (all entries). Humanism. Literacy and Reading (all entries). Mothers as Teachers
Laughter, 450–451
  Christine de Pizan on, 450
  in fabliaux, 451
  Marie de France on, 450
  monastic rules on, 450
Laura, Petrarch character of, 650–651
Laven, Mary, 708
Law, 451–452
  Barbarian, 451
  canon, 451
  customary, 451 for feme sole, 283
  petitions in, 650
  on rape/raptus, 694, 695
  Roman, 451
Law, Canon, 451, 452–454
  on adultery, 743–744
  Alexander III (Pope) on, 452
  on betrothal, 71, 72 church courts and, 453
  on godparents, 329
  Gratian on, 452
  on impotence, 398
  on marriage, 452, 520, 525
  on monasteries, 588
  on oblates/oblation, 617
  on parishes, 630
  in penitentials, 645 records of, 453
  on relics, 705
  on remarriage, 706
  Roman law in, 715
  for sexuality regulation, 753–754 for slaves, 763 on witches, 841
  on women’s ordination as priests, 625
Law Codes of Alamans, 60
  Barbarian, 59–61
  Burgundian, 59
  of Salian Franks, 59–60
Law Codes, Barbarian. See Barbarian Law Codes
Law, Customary: French, 454–455
  of dowry, 454
  for inheritance, 405, 454 on sexuality regulation, 454
  for widows, 454
Law, English Secular Courts of Chancery court on, 456
  common law, 455
  court rolls for, 701 on landholding/property rights, 455, 456 on married women, 455–456 on singlewomen, 455 on widows, 456
Law, German, 311, 457–458
  on crime, 457
  on division of labor, 457
  on divorce, 752
  on dowry, 457
  on extramarital sex, 752
  for inheritance, 405
  landholding/property rights in, 457
  legal agency in, 465
  on marriage, 752
  on rape, 457
  on same sex relations, 753
  Saxon Mirror of, 457
  wergild in, 457
Law, Islamic: Iberia, 458–459
  on divorce/separation, 458 on dowry/marriage gifts, 458 on interreligious marriage, 592
  on marriage, 458
  marriage in, 527
  on Muslim women, 459 polygamy in, 458
Law, Jewish, 459–461
  on adultery, 750
  Gershom ben Judah (Rabbi) on, 460
  in Jewish marriage, 528–529
  on marriage, 459, 460
  on mikveh, 563–564
  rabbinic texts of, 459–460
  on rape, 750
  Responsa/Halakah and, 460
  on same sex relations, 750
  women’s status in, 460–461
Law, Roman. See Roman Law
Lawrence, C.H., on ecclesiastical patronage, 639
Laxdala Saga, 821
  on concubinage, 524
Lay Folks’ Catechism, The, 645

- Lay Piety, 461–462, 776
 in anchoresses, 462
 of Angela of Foligno, 21
 in Beguines, 462
 clerical feminization of, 461
 gender/patriarchy in, 461–462
 Gerson on, 462
 Kempe and, 440
 laywomen of, 462
 of Lollards, 497
 of Margaret of Scotland, 507
 Marguerite Porete on, 511
 of Mary the Younger, 536
 meditation of, 555
 parishes for, 630–631
 penitentials for, 645
 reform movements for, 462
 of rosary, 722
 sermons/preaching in, 739
 of tertiaries, 790–791
 Virgin Mary as symbol of, 462
- Laywomen, Religious, 462–464
 Angela of Foligno, 21–22, 462
 Beguines as, 66
 conversae in, 463
 in Dominican Order, 223–224
 Fina of San Gimignano as, 293
 Frances of Rome as, 302–303
 Gertrude of Ortenberg as, 323
 Kempe, Margery, 462, 463
 Maria of Venice, 511–512
 Marie of Oignies, 462, 514
 Rose of Viterbo as, 722
 tertiaries of, 790
 vowesses as, 823
- Le Bestiaire d'amour* (Fournival), 709
Le Bien des fames (The Virtues of Women), 494, 571
Le Blame des fames (The Blame of Women), 494, 571
Le Champion des dames (Franc), 69
Le Chastiemusart (The Fool's Comeuppance), 494
Le Chevalier au lion (Knight of the Lion, The) (Chrétien), 129
Le Chevalier de la Charrette (Knight of the Cart, The) (Lancelot) (Chrétien de Troyes), 41, 43, 129, 338
Le Conte du graal (Story of the Grail, The) (Chrétien), 129
 Le Goff, Jacques, 556
Le Lais (Legacies) (Villon), 812
Le Livre de Griseldis (Chaucer), 335
Le Menagier de Paris, 44, 335, 666
 Le Roy Ladurie, Emmanuel, 556
Le Sette Armi Spirituali (Seven Spiritual Weapons, The) (Caterina Vigri), 54, 113
Le Testament (Villon), 812
Lectio divina, 779
 LeFèvre, Jean, 50, 196, 197, 494, 571, 608
 Legal Agency, 464–465
 in Christian marriage, 518–519
 in German law, 465
 patriarchy/patrilineage in, 464
 petitions in, 650
 in Roman law, 464, 465, 714–715
 women as guardians in, 464
- Legatus* (Gertrude of Helfta), 322
Legatus Divinae Pietatis (Herald of Divine Love) (Gertude the Great), 323
- Legend of Good Women* (Chaucer), 24, 85, 88, 125, 126, 197, 488, 489, 571, 628, 716
Legenda aurea (Jacobus), 24, 237
Legends of Hooly Wummen (Legends of Holy Women) (Bokenham), 487, 815. See Bokenham, Osbern Lentini, Giacomo da, 482
L'Entré d'Espagne, 252
 Leo I (Pope), 124, 538
 on remarriage, 706
 Leo III (Pope), 411
 Leo IV (Pope), 411, 658
 Leo VI (King), 102, 248
 Leoba (Saint), 242, 349, 465–466, 491, 850 of double monastery of Wimbourne, 465 as missionary, 172, 227 monastic education of, 465
 as prophet, 673
 sermons/preaching of, 736
 Leonor de Albuquerque, 391
 Leopold VI (King), 11
 Lepers, 466–467
 hospitals for, 377, 466, 467 isolation of, 466
 spiritual penance for, 467
 Leroquais, Victor, 207
Les Etablissements de Saint Louis (Establishments of St. Louis, The), on women in business, 101
Les honneurs de la cour (Alienor de Poitiers), 447
Les Miracles de Nostre Dame (Miracles of Our Lady) (Coinci), 547, 548
Les Toscans et leurs familles (Klapisch-Zuber/Herlihy), 371 “Lesbian-like,” in female same sex relations, 746–747 Lesbians. See Sexuality: Female Same Sex Relations
L'Estoire de Griseldis, 335
Letter of Cupid (Hoccleve), 489
Letter of Foundation (Radegund), 693
Letter of Othea to Hector (Christine de Pizan), 134
Letter of the God of Love, The (Christine de Pizan), 134, 195, 197
Letter of Valerius to Rufinus, Against Marriage (Map), 570
Letter to Arcachis (Radegund), 693
Letter to the English (Joan of Arc), 432 Letter Writing, 467–469
 of Adela of Blois, 468
 of Adelheid, 467–468
 of Brunhild, 467 of Byzantine empresses, 467
 of Catherine of Siena, 117
 of Cereta, 120
 of Datini, 192
 of Elisabeth of Schönau to Eustochium, 468
 of Fedele, 281
 of Heloise, 359–360
 of Hildegard of Bingen, 365, 468, 740
 to Jerome, 468
 in Latin literature, 485–486
 of Matilda of Boulogne, 468 of Matilda of England, 468
 of Matilda of Tuscany, 468
 of Nogarola, 611
 of Ottonian royal women, 467–468
 Paston letters in, 631–632 to Paula, 468
 of Radegund, 468, 693
 of Strozzi, 783

INDEX

- Leukardis, as nun as scribe, 615
 Levi-Strauss, Claude, on kinship, 441
 Levy, Brian, 271
 Lewis III (Emperor) of Bavaria, 135
Lex Burgundionum, 59
Lex Romana Burgundionum, 59
Lex Romana Visigothorum, 59
Lex Salica, 60, 783
 Leyrwite. See Merchet and Leyrwite
L'Honneur des dames (Robert de Blois), 196–197
Liadain and Cuirithir, 480
Liber (Mechthild of Magdeburg), 322
Liber Confortatorius (Goscelin of St. Bertin), 330, 485
Liber de reformatione monasteriorum (Book on the Reformation of Monasteries) (Busch), 579
Liber de Verum Fidelium Experientia (Angela), 21, 55
Liber divinorum operum (Book of Divine Works) (Hildegard of Bingen), 364, 366
Liber Extra. See Decretales Gregorii, of Alexander III (Pope)
Liber manualis (Handbook) (Dhuoda), 209, 590
Liber miraculorum, on Foy, 297
Liber Poenitentialis (Robert of Flamborough), 645
Liber Regulae Pastoralis (Pastoral Care) (Gregory the Great), 644, 777
Liber Scivias (Hildegard of Bingen), 612
Liber specialis gratiae (Book of Special Grace) (Mechthild of Hackeborn), 552
Liber viarum Dei (Book of the Ways of God) (Elisabeth of Schönau), 246
Liber vitae meritum (Hildegard of Bingen), 364
Libro di Buoni Costumi, 857
 Lichtenstein, Ulrich von, 565
 Licoricia of Winchester, 427 Life
   of Christina of Markyate, 131 of Gertrude of Ortenberg, 323 of Godelieve of Gistel, 328
Life (Rudolf of Fulda), 465, 466
 Life of Anthony (Anthonasius), 108
 Life of Catherine (Clemence), 115
Life of Christina of Markyate, 486
Life of Christina the Astonishing (Thomas of Cantimpré), 132
Life of Francis of Assisi (Thomas), 109 “Life of Jesus” (Ava), 56
Life of King Edward, 686
Life of Marie d'Oignies (James of Vitry), 132 Life of Martin of Tours (Severus), 108
 “Life of Robert” (Baudri of Dol), 170
Life of St. Brigit (Cogitosus), 772
Life of St. Catherine (Clemence of Barking), 815
Life of St. Disibod (Hildegard of Bingen), 367
Life of St. Edith (Goscelin of St. Bertin), 330
Life of St. Gilbert (Capgrave), 324
Life of St. Leoba (Rudolf of Fulda), 850
Life of St. Radegund (Baudonivia), 694, 849
Life of St. Radegund (Fortunatus), 693
Life of St. Rupert (Hildegard of Bingen), 367
Life of Wilfrid (Stephen of Ripon), 10
 Lifecycle. See Adolescence. Demography. Girls and Boys. Infants and Infanticide. Old Age
Ligamen (marriage bond), 525
Lilio de medicina (Iris of medicine) (Bernard of Gordon), 479 Literacy and Reading
   Adela of Blois and, 6
   Jerome's influence on, 422
   for lay education, 240
   of Radegund, 694
   reader-response criticism of, 697
 Literacy and Reading: Latin, 469–471
   in Christian spirituality, 779
   in Jouarre/Chelles, 435
   in late Middle Ages, 470
   literate expectations in, 469–470
   obscenity in, 616
   scholasticism in, 730
   textual engagement in, 470
   translation to, 798
 Literacy and Reading: Vernacular, 471–473 acquisition of, 471 dame schools in, 471–472
   in England, 471
   English Romance in, 716
   in France, 471
   French use in, 472–473
   Katherine Group for, 439
   Lowe on, 708
   patronage/ownership/reading in, 472
   petitions in, 650
   scholasticism in, 730
   skills of, 472
   translation of, 797–798
   Weaver on, 708
 Literary Patronage. See Patronage, Literary Literature, French, Decameron versions of, 335. See also Literature, Old French Literature, German, 473–476
   Ava in, 56
   comic tales in, 475
   Eleanor of Scotland and, 245
   Elisabeth von Nassau-Saarbrücken and, 245
   by Gottfried von Strassburg, 330–331
   Hrotsvit of Gandersheim of, 473 middle high, 474–475
   minnesang as, 564–565
   minstrel epics in, 474
   Sister-Books and, 761
   wild women in, 836–387
   of Wolfram von Eschenbach, 843–844
   woman's song in, 846
 Literature, Hebrew, 428, 476–478
   misogyny in, 477
   women-martyrs in, 477
 Literature, Iberian, 478–480
   devotional literature in, 479 late medieval debate on women in, 480 law/history/legends in, 478
   Leisure/advice/insults in, 479 love relations/sex/family in, 478–479 medical literature in, 479–480
   misogyny in, 480
   Sentimental Romance in, 734–735
   Spanish women authors of, 853–854
   of Teresa de Cartagena, 789 of Wallada Biint al-Mustakfi, 827–828
   woman's song in, 845
 Literature, Irish, 408, 480–482 anonymity in, 480 heroic women in, 481
   misogyny in, 481

- Literature, Italian, 482–484
 Boccaccio in, 483
 courtly v. anti-courtly in, 482–483
 Dante in, 483
 epic in, 252–254
 of Petrarch, 483–484, 650–651
 sonnet in, 482
- Literature, Latin, 484–487
 defense of women in, 486
 definition of, 484–485
 Guinevere in, 338
 hagiography in, 486
 letters in, 485–486 literacy/reading in, 469–471
 misogyny in, 486
 women participation in, 485
- Literature, Middle English, 487–490
 antifeminism in, 489
 courtly lyric in, 488
 English Romance in, 716
 exemplary literature in, 487–488
 Guinevere in, 338
 lovers' complaints in, 488
 romance in, 488–489
 saint's lives in, 487–488
- Literature, Muslim Women: Western. See Muslim Women:
 Western Literature
- Literature, Norse, Skáldkonur and, 762–763
- Literature, Occitan, 195, 490–491, 493
 dawn songs of, 193, 490
 lovesickness in, 499
 pastourelle in, 632, 633
 Roman de Flamenca as, 710–711 troubairitz/troubadours in, 799–800
 woman's song in, 845
- Literature, Old English, 491–493
Beowulf, 491, 492
 Bible women in, 491
 Brown, Michelle on, 491
 epic in, 493
 Eve in, 491
 Judith in, 436, 492
 mead-giver in, 552
 Proverbs/Riddles/Gnomic Literature in, 678–679
 Virgin Mary in, 492
- Literature, Old French, 493–495
 Arthurian literature, 42
chansons de geste in, 493
 dawn songs of, 193
 defense of women in, 494
 fabliau in, 271–272, 493
 French Romance in, 716–718
 Guinevere in, 338
 lyric poetry in, 493
 of Marie de France, 512–514
Mélusine in, 556–557
 misogyny in, 493, 494
 pastourelle in, 632
Réponse du Bestiaire d'amour as, 709–710
Roman de la Rose as, 711–714
Roman de Silence as, 715 romance in, 493–494
 troubairitz in, 493
 trouvères as, 803–804 of Villon, 812
- Virgin Mary in, 494
 woman's song in, 846
- Literature, Old Norse, 495–496
 Ástriðr in, 495
 Clover on, 496
 fosterage sagas in, 297
 on marriage/concubinage, 523–524
 mead-giver in, 552
 Nordic prophets in, 674
 Valkyries in, 496
 violence in, 813
- Literature, Spanish. See Literature, Iberian
- Little Book of Eternal Wisdom, The*, 204
- Little Hours of Our Lady, as devotional book, 206–207
- Liturgy. See Nuns as Musicians. Ordination of Women as Priests
- Liutberga, sermons/preaching of, 736
- Lives* (Plutarch), 88
- Lives of the Brothers* (Gerard of Frachet), 761
- Lives of the Fathers*, 777
- Lives of the Older Sisters*, 762
- Livre de la Cité des Dames (Book of the City of Ladies)* (Pizan), 335, 854
- Livre de Leïscé (Book of Joy)* (LeFèvre), 196, 494, 571, 608
- Livre des lamentacions (Book of Lamentations)* (Matheolus), 570, 571
- Livre des Manières* (Fougères), 160, 571, 747
- Livre des Trois Vertus* (Christine de Pizan), 161
- Lochrie, Karma, 259, 745
- Locke, John, 566
- Lokasenna*, 552
- Lollards, 240, 317, 361, 496–497, 739
 Aston on, 497
 Chaucer of, 125
 Cross, Claire on, 497
 in England, 251
 heretics/heresy of, 496
 Kempe and, 440
 lay piety of, 497
 lay reform movement of, 462
 McSheffrey on, 497
 Wycliffe on, 496
- Lombard, Peter, 123, 625
 on betrothal, 71
 on impotence, 397
- “London Silkwomen of the Fifteenth Century” (Dale), 369
- Longchamp nunnery, 31
 in architecture, monastic, 34
- Longuyon, Jacques de, 608
- Loomis, Gertrude Schoepperle, 854
- López de Córdoba, Leonor, 498, 747
Memorias of, 498
 Virgin Mary as model for, 498
- Lorcin, Marie-Thérère, 271
- Loretta, Countess of Leicester, as anchoress, 18
- Loretta, Countess of Sponheim, 318
- Lorris, Guillaume de. See Guillaume de Lorris
- Lothar II, 215, 685
- Lothar of Italy (King), 7
- Love. See Courtly Love. Courtship
- Louis I (King), 154
- Louis II (King), 369
- Louis IV (King), 33, 245
- Louis IX (King), 76, 87, 160, 211, 212–213, 299, 310, 413, 590, 688, 703, 705, 803, 832
 clothing of, 148

INDEX

- Louis IX (King) (cont.)
 in crusade, 184
 on prostitutes, 677
- Louis of Taranto, 430
- Louis the Great of Hungary, 236, 535, 682
- Louis the Pious, 209
- Louis VI (King), 6, 689
- Louis VII (King), 157, 243, 244, 532, 641, 703
 in Second Crusade, 184
- Louis VIII (King), 76, 413, 803
- Louis X (King), 689
- Louis XI (King), 23, 161, 310, 506
- Louis XII (Orleans), 23, 281
- “Love,” in Ancrene Wisse, 20
- Lovesickness, 498–499
 Boccaccio on, 499
 Chaucer on, 499
 madness in, 499, 503
 Ovid on, 628
 in Sentimental Romance, 735
 troubadours on, 499
- Lowe, Kate, 708
- Lucena, Luis de, 735
- Lucius III (Pope), 385
- Ludmilla of Bohemia, 236
- Ludovico Sforza, duke of Milan, 187
- Lusignan family, Méhusine on, 556–557
- Lutgard of Aywières, 499–500
 asceticism of, 500
 fasting of, 500
 as prophet/healer, 500
- Luttrell Psalter*, marginalia in, 509, 643
- Lutz, Cora, 855
- Lydgate, John, 233, 488, 489, 716
- Lying-In, 500–501
 churching and, 500
 conjugal debt and, 500, 501 household management during, 501 for Jewish pregnancy/childbirth, 668
 midwives and, 500
 Wilson on, 500
- M
- Machaut, Guillaume de, 125, 261, 548
- Macleon, Ian, 371, 708
- MacNeill, Eoin, 408
- Macrins (Saint), 372
- Mad War of 1485, 23
- Madness, 503–504, 554
 of Christina the Astonishing, 503
 exemplum on, 503
 of Kempe, 503
 lovesickness in, 499, 503
 miracles and, 503
 misogyny and, 504
 spirit possession in, 503
- Maestà* (Duccio), 542
- Magdalena of Freiburg, 53
- Magic and Charms, 504–505
 in German literature, 473
 for impotence, 505
 for infertility, 403, 505 medicine of, 505, 554
 in paganism, 630
 for pregnancy/childbirth, 667
 of witches, 505
- Magna Carta, 250
- Magnús (King), 738
- Magnus, Albertus, 35, 672, 733, 749
- Magnus VII, 682
- Mahaut, countess of Artois and Burgundy, 8
- Maier, Anneliese, 854
- Maimonides, Moses, 425, 428, 460
- Makeup. See Cosmetics
- Makrembolitissa, Eudokia, as regent to Michael VII Doukas, 103
- Makrina, 585
- Malcolm Canmore (King), 731
- Malcolm III (King), 507
- Maldecir de mujere* (Torroella), 571
- Male Same-Sex Relations, in erotic literature, 262
- Malipiero, Giovanna Dandolo (Dogaressa), 218
- Malipiero, Pasquale (Doge), 218
- Malleus Maleficarum (Hammer of Witches, The)* (Tertullian), 137, 168, 267, 398, 562, 572
- Malory, Sir Thomas, 43, 415, 786
- Maltby, Judith, 674
- Malti-Douglas, Fedwa, 747
- Mambriano* (Cieco da Ferrara), 253
- “Man of Law’s Tale” (Chaucer), 126
- Man of Sorrows, 202
- Manly, John Matthews, 855
- Manning, Robert, 645
- Manosque, migration/mobility to town of, 562–564
- Mantegna, Andrea, 187
- Manuel II, 248
- Manuel, Juan, 479
- Manuel, Mencia, 391
- Manufacturing. See Home Manufacturing
- Manumission, of slaves, 764–765
- Manuscript Marginalia. See Marginalia, Manuscript
- Map, Walter, 570
- Mappah (Tablecloth)* (Isserles), 460
- Mappula Angliae* (Bokenham), 85
- Marana (Saint), 348
- Marbod of Rennes, 196
 on misogyny, 570
- Marburg hospital, Elisabeth of Hungary founding of, 14
- Marcha* (Battagli), 191
- Marchant, Guyot, 190
- Marcus Aurelius, 555
- Mareflete, Maria, 471
- Mären*, 475
- Margaret de Quincy, 361
- Margaret of Anjou, 472, 506, 689, 855
 diplomacy of, 211
 political significance of, 506
 as regent, 703
- Margaret of Antioch, 487, 506
 cult of, 506
 as intercessor for pregnancy/childbirth, 506
- Katherine Group on, 439
 as virgin martyr, 814
 virgin martyr of, 506
- Voragine on, 506
- Margaret of Bavaria, 639
- Margaret of Beaufort
 childhood betrothal of, 127
 Henry VII (King) as son of, 127
- Margaret of Brittany, 205

- Margaret of Burgundy, 420
- Margaret of Cleves, on Books of Hours, 91
- Margaret of Cortona, 351, 355, 463, 506–507, 658, 790
 canonization of, 507
 confraternity by, 507
 hagiography of, 507
 tertiary of, 507
- Margaret of France, 112, 688
- Margaret of Hainault, coinage of, 154
- Margaret of Hungary, 225, 350, 763
- Margaret of Provence (Queen), 87, 99, 590, 688
 in crusade, 184
- Margaret (Queen) of Scotland, 205, 350, 394, 507–508, 591, 731, 798
 diplomacy of, 211
 ecclesiastical patronage of, 507
 lay piety of, 507
- Margaret of York, 508, 534
 in Burgundian Netherlands, 508
 Charles the Bold as husband of, 508
 ecclesiastical patronage of, 638
 Edward IV (King) as brother of, 508 political activities of, 508
 widowhood of, 508
- Margaret “The Cripple” of Magdeburg, 19, 508
 as anchoress, 508
 disability of, 508
 lay education of, 508
- Margaret the lame, 213
- Margaret Tudor, 111, 112
- Margareta, 728
- Margareta von Schwangau, 848
- Margherita di Città di Castello, 434
- Margherita of Cortona, 434
- Margherita of Trento, 418
- Marginalia, Manuscript, 508–510
 in Books of Hours, 509
 Camille on, 509
 female figures in, 509 for household management, 509
 obscenity in, 509
 in Psalter, 508
 Randall on, 509
 subjects of, 508–509
 types of, 509
 Virgin Mary in, 509
- Margrethe, 510
 as idealist, 510
 political activities of, 510
 Queen of Scandinavia, 510
- Margrethe I (Queen), 310, 682
- Marguerite d’ Oingt, 423, 738
- Marguerite de Champagne, 804
- Marguerite of Flanders, 235
- Marguerite Porete, 68, 81, 301, 351, 510–511, 597, 600, 647, 798, 853
 on courtly love, 511
 heresy of, 361, 510, 511, 598, 778, 781, 798
 as heretic, 361
 on lay piety, 511
 on mysticism/mystics, 597
 scholasticism of, 511
 sermons/preaching of, 739
 theology of, 510–511
- Maria de Luna, as Queen-lieutenant, 703
- Maria de Molina, 391
 as regent, 703
- Maria della Scala, Giovanni di Paolo’s altarpiece of, 355
- Maria Maggiore (Saint), mosaics of, 544
- Maria of Castile, 211
 as Queen-lieutenant, 703
- Maria of Venice (Maria Sturion), 511–512
 Catherine of Siena and, 511
- Maria Regina*, 543
- Maria Sturion. See Maria of Venice
- Marian Doctrine and Piety, Virgin Mary and, 537–538, 539–540
- Marie de Champagne, 301
 patron of Chrétien de Troyes, 797
- Marie de France, 175, 301, 368, 414, 488, 494, 512–514, 627, 628, 717, 786, 849, 853
Fables by, 513
Lais by, 512–513
 on laughter, 450
 Ovid influence on, 513
 patronage of, 512
Saint Patrick’s Purgatory by, 513–514
 translation of, 512, 513–514, 798–799
- Marie de Valois, 167
- Marie of Luxemburg, 688
- Marie of Oignies, 48, 68, 300, 351, 372, 441, 467, 514, 739, 768
 as Beguine, 66
 hagiography of, 514
 lay woman, 462
 leper care by, 377
 as religious laywoman, 514
 religious poverty of, 664
 on sermons/preaching, 736, 737
- Market and Tradeswomen, 515–516
 alewives/brewing, 13–14
 in artisan families, 44–45
 in business, 515
 division of labor in, 515
 feme sole and, 283
 in Flanders, 294
 in guilds, 515
 legal protection of, 515 merchant family women in, 515
- Marks, Richard, 201
- Marozia of Rome, 516, 658
 as concubine, 516
 Theodora as mother of, 516
- Marriage
 canon law on, 452
 of Cathars, 114
 of girls/boys, 327
 Menchi on, 708
- Marriage and Concubinage, in Scandinavia, 523–524
 betrothal in, 523
 ecclesiastical doctrine in, 524
 illegitimacy in, 514
- Marriage Ceremonies, 516–517
 church on, 517
 preaching in, 517, 529–530
 for remarriage, 516, 517
 trousseau in, 516
- Marriage, Christian, 517–523
 ability in, 517–518
 Alexander III (Pope) on, 250
 betrothal in, 517
 canon law on, 520
 clandestine marriage in, 520–521

INDEX

- Marriage, Christian (cont.) communal system in, 518–519 conjugal debt in, 520, 522 consent in, 520 control issues in, 522 divorce/separation in, 214–215, 520
 dowry in, 518
 Duby on, 518
 exogamy in, 519–520
 in Flanders, 294
 gender ideologies in, 521–522
 impediments to, 518
 inheritance in, 518, 521
 legal agency in, 518–519
 love in, 521–522
merchet/leyrwite in, 559–560
 preaching in, 529–530
 property rights in, 518, 522
 rape and, 695
 remarriage in, 517, 518
 in Scotland, 731
 separatist system in, 518 social status in, 766–767, 768
 in Wales, 827
 widows in, 518, 522–523
- Marriage, Impediments to, 518, 524–527
 affinity in, 525–526 age in, 526
 betrothal in, 525, 526
 canon law on, 525
 chastity in, 526
 consanguinity in, 525
 impotence as, 397, 526
 incest in, 524
Ligamen/precontract in, 525 spiritual/legal kinship in, 526
- Marriage, Islamic: Iberia, 527–528
 divorce in, 527
 dowry in, 527
 husbands in, 527
 Ibn Hazm on, 528
 interreligious marriage of, 592
 Islamic laws on, 458, 527
- Marriage, Jewish, 427, 528–529, 668, 750
 betrothal in, 528
 divorce in, 528–529
 Gershom b. Judah on, 528
 Jewish law on, 459, 460
 mikveh in, 529
 remarriage in, 528
- Marriage of Philology and Mercury* (Capella), 648
- Marriage Preaching, 529–530
 of Cathars, 530
 theology of, 530
 of Vitry, 530
 in wedding ceremonies, 517
- Marseillais*, on prostitutes, 675
- Martha. See Mary and Martha
- Martin Luther, in Observant Movement, 619
- Martin of Tours, 581
- Martin of Troppau, 658
- Martin V (Pope), 75, 420
- Martini, Simone
 Mary Magdalene painting by, 355 paintings by, 535
- Mary and Martha, 136, 530–531
 Ambrose on, 531
 Augustine on, 530
 Bernard of Clairvaux on, 531
 mysticism action by, 597–598
 Virgin Mary and, 531
- Mary Magdalene, 207, 300, 420, 486, 531–534, 759
 attributes of, 533
 Bede on, 532
 Catherine of Siena on, 533
 devotional literature of, 533
 Dominican Order on, 533
 Donatello painting of, 355 feast day of, 533
 Goes, Hugo van der painting of, 355
 Gregory of Tours on, 532
 Gregory the Great (Saint) on, 531–532, 533
 Jacobus de Voragine on, 532
 Martini, Simone painting of, 355
 Mary of Egypt and, 532, 536 of Mary/Martha, 530–531
 miracles of, 532, 566–567
 pilgrimage sites of, 532–533
 preaching of, 532, 533, 736 propriety of dress of, 84
 as prostitute, 678
 on prostitutes, 532, 533
 relics of, 532–533
 textual tradition of, 532
 as woman in Bible, 73, 74
- Mary Magdalene* (Digby), 233
- Mary of Anjou, coinage of, 154
- Mary of Bethany, 355, 533
- Mary of Burgundy, 96, 235, 310, 508, 534–535
 Charles the Bold as father of, 534
 coinage of, 154
 Margaret of York as stepmother of, 534
- Mary of Egypt. See Mary the Egyptian
- Mary of Hungary I, 535
 art/ecclesiastical patronage by, 535
 Stephen V (King) as father of, 535
- Mary of Hungary II, 535–536
 Jadwiga as sister of, 535
 Louis the Great as father of, 535 succession of, 535
- Mary of Oignies
 of Beguines, 514
 chastity of, 124, 514
- Mary the Egyptian, 355, 486, 536
 hagiography of, 536
 Mary Magdalene and, 532, 536
- Mary the Younger, 536–537
 of Byzantium, 536
 domestic abuse of, 536
 fasting of, 536
 icon commemoration of, 536
 lay piety of, 536
 miracles of, 536
- Mary, Virgin, 531, 537–542
 Ambrose on, 538
 Anne (Saint) as apocryphal mother of, 24 architectural, ecclesiastical and, 31
 Aristotle on, 540
 Athanasius on, 538
 Augustine the Hippo (Saint) on, 538

- Ave Maria* prayer of, 539, 540
 Bride of Christ imagery and, 541
 Bynum on, 541
 Coletti on, 541
 Ellington on, 541
 Eve and, 536
 Feast of Assumption for, 538
 Gerson on, 539
 Gibson on, 541
 Gregory of Tours on, 538
 Holy Kinship on, 374
 icons of, 542–543
 Immaculate Conception/Assumption of, 538, 540 intercession of, 539, 542
 Jerome on, 422, 423
 Jesus unity with, 540–541
 lay piety symbol of, 462
 López de Córdoba on, 498
 Marian Doctrine/Piety and, 537–538
 Mendicant Orders and, 540 Middle Ages piety of, 539
 miracles of, 566–567, 567
 in music, 539–540
 in Old English literature, 492
 in Old French literature, 494
 prayer to, 537–538
 relics of, 538–539, 705
 scholarship on, 541
 Song of Songs and, 539–540, 769
 theology of, 541
 Warner on, 541
 as woman in Bible, 73, 74
- Mary, Virgin: in Art, 40, 260, 267, 313, 539, 542–546
   Ainsworth on, 543
   Anne (Saint) in, 24
   Bacci on, 545
   Belting on, 544
   Biddick on, 545
   Bynum on, 544, 545
   Byzantine icons of, 393
   Camille on, 544
   Caviness on, 545
   child/host in, 545
   Derbes on, 545
   Forsyth on, 545
   Freedberg on, 545
   images of Mary/women in, 544–545
   Lane, Barbara on, 544, 545
   in marginalia, 509
   Miles, Margaret on, 544, 545
   Murray on, 542
   narrative circles of, 544
   naturalism/eucharistic theme in, 544
   Neff on, 545
   Norman on, 542
   royal virgin image in, 543–544
   Sandona on, 545
   seals/sigillography of, 733
   Steinberg on, 545
- Mary, Virgin: in Literature, 267, 429, 474, 546–548
   exemplum of, 546
   in Golden Legend, 420
   in Iberian literature, 478
   intercession, 547
   in Latin literature, 486
   Mary's many faces in, 547 miracles in, 547
   in mythology, 601
   in Old English literature, 492
   preaching in, 547
   psychological analyses of, 547 religious/political pressures of, 546–547 theatrical plays in, 547
- Mary, Virgin: in Music, 539–540, 548–549
   Hildegard of Bingen on, 548
   for liturgy, 548 masses/feasts for, 548
   in Song of Songs, 548
- Masculinity. See Feminity and Masculinity
- Master of Game, The* (Edward of Norwich), 387
- Matheolus, 50, 196, 570, 571
- Mathilda and Monastery at Essen, 442, 549–550 monastic architecture in, 34
   translation by, 549
- Mathilda of Flanders, 152
   Adela of Blois as daughter of, 6
- Mathilda of Holy Trinity, mortuary roll for, 607
- Mathilda of Quedlinburg, 3, 319, 549, 821
- Mathilda of Tuscany, 821
- Matilda (Empress), 274, 318, 339, 350, 356, 394, 635, 798, 850
   patronage of, 472
- Matilda (Queen), 732
- Matilda, Countess of Tuscany, 318
- Matilda Makejoy, 233
- Matilda of Anjou, 296
- Matilda of Boulogne, 394
   letter writing of, 468
- Matilda of England (Empress), 210, 310, 467, 682
   coinage of, 154
   letter writing of, 468
- Matilda of Saxony, 641
- Matilda of Scotland, 551
   diplomacy of, 211
- Matilda of Tuscany, 184, 211, 356, 417, 550–551
   ecclesiastical patronage by, 550
   landholding of, 550
   letter writing of, 468
- Matilda the Empress, 551
   ecclesiastical patronage by, 551
   Henry I (King) as father of, 551
   Matilda of Scotland as mother of, 551 succession of, 551
- Matrix*, 373
- Matrologia Latina* (King), 372
- Matter, Ann, 745
- Matthew of Vendôme, description of beauty, 64–65
- Matthus, Siegfried, 436
- Maximilian I, 508, 590
- Maximilian of Habsburg, 534
- Maxims*, 678
- Mayfreda de Pirovano, 418
- Mazzos-Karras, Ruth, 677
- McCracken, Peggy, 43
- McKee, Sally, 765
- McNamara, Jo Ann, 289, 314, 370, 372–373
- McSheffrey, Shannon, 497
   on private/public spheres, 670
- Mead-giver, 551–552, 679
   alewives/brewing and, 552

INDEX

- Mechthild of Hackeborn, 205, 323, 364, 423, 552, 553
 devotional literature of, 552
 as German woman author, 847
 as oblate, 618
- Mechthild of Magdeburg, 81, 319, 322, 423, 463, 552–553, 600, 738, 780, 798, 822
 on bride of Christ, 95
 on courtly love, 553
 as German woman author, 847
 writings of, 553–554
- Medea* (Euripides), 219
- Medicine
 gynecology in, 554
 Hildegard of Bingen on, 366
 in Iberian literature, 479
 for madness, 554
 magic/charms for, 505, 554
 for plague, 654–655
- Medieval English Numerics c. 1275 to 1535* (Powers), 666
- Medieval Interpretations of Theology of Clement, 595
 of Origen, 595
- “Medieval Misogyny” (Bloch), 373
- Medieval People* (Power), 666
- Medieval Prosopography: History and Collective Biography*, 675
- Medieval Women* (Baker), 371
- Medieval Women in Modern Perspective* (Bennett), 372
- Medievalists in the Academy, Women. See Women Medievalists in the Academy
- Medioli, Francesca, 708
- Meditation, 554–556, 739
 Carruthers on, 203
 devotional practice of, 554–555
 Hamburger, Jeffrey on, 203
 of Melania the Younger, 555 spiritual care in, 555
- Meditationes Vitae Christi* (Johannes de Caulibus), 207
- Meditations* (Marcus Aurelius), 555
- Meditations on the Life of Christ*, 54, 202, 204, 441
- Meditations on the Song of Songs* (Teresa of Avila), 769–770
- Melania the Elder, pilgrimage of, 653
- Melania the Younger, 585
 meditation of, 555
 as nun as scribe, 614
- Melisende (Queen), 356
- Mellinkoff, Ruth, 39
- Mellis Stoke, 135
- Mélusine, 556–557
 by Coudrette, 556
 by Jean d’Arras, 556
 Le Goff on, 556
 Le Roy Ladurie on, 556 on Lusignan family, 556–557 translations of, 556
- Memling, Hans, Ursual painting by, 354
- Memmi, Lippo, 354
- Memorial*, on Angela of Foligno, 21, 280, 791
- Memoriale*, of tertiaries, 790
- Memorias (Memoirs)* (López de Córdoba), 498, 853
- Ménagier de Paris, 472, 767 conduct literature of, 161 devotional guide of, 207
- Ménard, Philippe, 271
- Menchi, Silvana Seidel, 708
- Mendicant Order, 30, 34, 463, 612
 religious poverty of, 665
 tertiaries (lay members) of, 789
 on Virgin Mary, 540
- Menstruation, 340, 557–558
 contraception and, 557–558
 as Eve’s curse, 558
 in gender ideologies, 309
 Gregory the Great on, 558
 mikveh for, 558, 563
 Pliny on, 557
 Secrets of Women on, 733 sex in marriage and, 755
 Trotula on, 557
- Mental Illness. See Madness
- Meraugis de Portlesgues*, 42
- Merchant Families, Women of, 558–559
 of Datini, 558, 559
 household management of, 558 investment/credit of, 408, 559
 market/tradeswomen in, 515
 in Russia, 723
 social status of, 766, 767
 Strozzi and, 558, 559, 783
- Merchant of Prato* (Origo), 369
- Merchet and Leyrwite, 559–560
 for extramarital sex, 743
 of singlewomen, 760
- “Mercian Register, of Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, 10
- Mère d’Enfance*, 292
- Mère Follie*, 292
- Mère Sotte*, 292
- Merecina, 476
- Merlo, Grado, 825
- Mermaids and Sirens, 560–561
 prostitution of, 560
- Merovingian Period, 305, 306, 322, 349–350, 435
- Merovingian queen
 Brunhild as, 96
 Fredegund as, 96
- Merovingians, 303. See Frankish Lands
- Merseburg charms, 473
- Messe de Notre Dame* (Machaut), 548
- Metamorphoses* (Chrétien), 129
- Metamorphoses* (Ovid), 362, 498, 602, 627, 628
 incest in, 401
- Metham, John, 488
- Meun, Jean de. See Jean de Meun
- Michael III, 412
- Michael V, 102
- Michael VII Doukas, 103
- Middle English Literature. See Literature, Middle English
- Middle English Texts, Women Authors. See Women Authors: Middle English texts
- Midwives, 561–562
 abortion and, 5
 for Caesarean section, 561 for childbirth by Christian women, 561 for childbirth by Jewish women, 561 doctors and, 561–562
 lying-in and, 500
 for pregnancy/childbirth, 667, 668
- Migration and Mobility, 562–563
 of criminals, 562
 in crusades, 562

- to Manosque town, 562–563
 in pilgrimages, 562 positive approach to, 562–563
 of prostitutes, 562
- Mikveh, 140, 563–564
 Jewish law on, 563
 in Jewish marriage, 529
 for Jewish women, 563–564
 for menstruation, 558, 563
- Milagros de Nuestra Señora* (Berceo), 479, 547
- Miles, Margaret, 544
- Mill, John Stuart, 287
- Millett, Bella, 19
- Mills, Robert, 259
- Minnelied*, 474
- Minnesang, 261, 553, 564–566, 847
 in Hadewijch, 345–346
 misogyny in, 564
 Neidhart on, 565
 woman's song and, 846
- Miracle at the Bridge of San Lorenzo* (Bellini), 173
- Miracles of St. Dominic, The* (Cesarini), 224
- Miracles/Miracle Collections, 566–567, 704
 of Clare of Assisi, 566
 of Elisabeth of Hungary, 566
 of Geneviève, 567
 Hume on, 566
 of Jean Gobi the Elder, 532 in Jewish literature, 429
 Locke on, 566
 madness in, 503
 of Mary Magdalene, 532, 566–567
 of Mary the Younger, 536
 of Olga, 567
 pilgrimages for, 653 of relics, 566
 of Virgin Mary, 547, 566, 567
- Miroir de mariage* (Mirror of Marriage) (Deschamps), 570–571
- Miroir historique* (Beauvais), 84
- Mirouer des simples ames* (Mirror of Simple Souls) (Marguerite Porete), 852
- Mirrer, Louise, 719
- Mirror for Lovers* (Jean de Meun), 712
- Mirror of Gold for the Sinful Soul, The*, 205
- Mirror of Our Lady, The*, 204
- Mirror of Simple Annihilated Souls and Those Who Only Remain in Will and Desire of Love* (Marguerite Porete), 68, 351, 510, 600, 739, 781, 798
- Mirror of Simple Souls*. See Mirror of Simple Annihilated Souls and Those Who Only Remain in Will and Desire of Love (Marguerite Porete)
- Misericordia Maggiore, confraternity of, 163
- Misericords, 567–569, 855
 conjugal relationship in, 568 domestic clothwork on, 568
 in England, 568
 in erotic art, 260, 568
 in Spain, 568
 women with devil in, 568–569 women working on, 567–568 women's representation of vice in, 568
- Mishneh Torah* (Maimonides), 460
- Misogyny, 30, 49, 351, 569–573
 antiwoman/antimarrriage in, 570–571
 Aristotelian concepts of, 569
 Arthurian concepts of, 35–36, 43
 ascetic/philosophical, 570
 Bloch, R. Howard on, 571
 Boccaccio and, 78
 defenses of women in, 195
 depiction of women, 79–80
 Deschamps on, 570–571
 in devotional literature, 205
 in epic, Old French, 255
 in Ely/women's souls in, 569–570
 in fabliau, 272
 fabliau for, 571
 in festivals of misrule, 292
 in Frankish lands, 305
 in Hebrew literature, 477
 in Iberian literature, 480
 of incest, 400
 in Ireland, 410, 481
 Krueger on, 572
 in La Contenance des Femes (The Ways of Women), 494 of Le Bestiare d'amour, 709 in Le Blame des fames (The Blame of Women), 494 in Le Chastimusart (The Fool's Comeuppance), 494 literary contexts for, 571–572 madness and, 504
 in minnesang, 564
 in mythology, 601
 of Ovid, 628
 in Roman de la Rose, 713
 in Secrets of Women, 733, 734 texts for, 570–571 of troubadours, 571–572
 in widowhood, 832
 on Wife of Bath, 836
 of witches, 842
 on witches, 572
 of Woman on Top, 844
- Mijn beghhin ende voortganck* (My Beginning and Progress) (Bake), 57
- Mobility. See Migration and Mobility
- Mocedades del Cid*, 256
- Modern Devotion, 300, 573–574, 762
 asceticism in, 573
 Bake, Alijt of, 574
 Brinkerinck and, 573
 Chapter of Utrecht in, 574
 Chapter of Windesheim in, 574
 by Grote, 573
 Observant Movement and, 619, 620
 Sister-Books of, 573
 Sisters of the Common Life of, 573
- Mohun, Joan de, 8
- Monastery, 1, 3, 6, 14, 31 adolescents and, 9
 Agnes of Prague and, 11
 almsgiving/charity through, 15 of Ely by Aethelthryth, 10 of Santa Maria Nuova, 302
- Monastery at Essen. See Mathilda and Monastery at Essen
- Monastery of San Damiano, Clare of Assisi and, 144
- Monastic Architecture. See Architecture, Monastic
- Monastic Enclosure, 574–575, 581, 589, 737
 Benedict of Aniane on, 575
 Caesarius of Arles (Bishop) on, 575 of Carolingian period, 576

INDEX

- Monastic Enclosure (cont.)
   Cistercian Order on, 575
   Cluniac Order on, 575
   Dominican Order on, 575
   ecclesiastical architecture in, 30–31
   monastic architecture in, 33
   in northern France, 300
   Pericoloso on, 575, 576 of Poor Clares Order, 575, 657
   Power, Eileen on, 575
   of Radegund, 694
   visitation for, 578–579
 Monastic Rules, 576–578
   for abbesses, 1–3
   Armstrong on, 577
   Augustinian Rule in, 576
   Benedictines in, 576–577
   Birgittines in, 577–578
   Cistercian Order in, 577
   Crean on, 576
   Fontevrault Order in, 577 in Gilbertine Order, 324
   on laughter, 450
   Mendicant Orders in, 577
   on oblates/oblation, 617
   in Premonstratensian Order, 669–670
   of Radegund, 693
 Monastic Visitation, 578–579
   Caesarius of Arles on, 575 exemptions for, 579
 Monasticism and Nuns, 579–585
   Adela of Blois and, 6
   Aethelthryth of Ely and, 10
   in architecture, ecclesiastical, 30 artistic patronage by, 636–637
   asceticism and, 47–48
   Augustinian Rule for, 582 autonomous rules in, 580–581 Benedictine Rule for, 582 canonesses in, 582 of Chapter of Windesheim, 574
   in church, 138
   conversae in, 583 councils for, 582
   double monastery of, 581 early Christian communities in, 580
   in Eastern Europe, 236
   in Flanders, 294
   in Fontevrault Abbey, 296
   in hagiography, 349, 350
   Hildegard of Bingen and, 364 imperial regulation of, 582
   in Ireland, 411
   Isabelle of France and, 413
   Jouarre/Chelles for, 435
   in late Middle Ages, 584
   Laven on, 708
   Leoba of, 465
   literate expectations of, 469–470
   Margaret of Cortona on, 507
   Mathilda and, 549
   Mediolan on, 708
   missionaries of, 581 monastic orders in, 583–584 monastic rules of, 576–577
   necrologies/mortuary rolls for, 607
   of noble women, 610
   nuns as illuminators in, 611–612 nuns as musicians in, 613
   oblates in, 617
   Premonstratensian Order of, 669–670 reform in, 582–583
   religious poverty of, 664–665
   sacred space in, 772
   in Scandinavia, 728
   sermons/preaching in, 736–737
   singlewomen in, 759
   Sister-Books for, 761 spiritual care for, 777
   spirituality of, 779
   of Syon Abbey, 787
   virginity in, 479, 580
   for widows, 833
   women artists in, 46
 Monasticism and Nuns, Byzantine, 585–586 lay patrons for, 585–586 monastic rules for, 585 social services of, 586 traditions of, 586
 Monasticism and Nuns, Celtic, 586–587
   Augustinian rule in, 587
   in Ireland, 586
   Irish monastic rules in, 587
   in Scotland, 586–587
   of Scotland, 731
   in Wales, 587
 Monasticism, Women's: Papal Policy, 587–598
   500 - 1100, 598–588
   1100 - 1298, 588–589
   Gregorian reform for, 587–588
   Pericoloso/After, 589
 Mondeville, Henry de, 29, 111
 Money. See Coinage
 Monica (Saint), 51, 52, 354
   Augustine (Saint) son of, 348
Montailou (Ladurie), 22
 Montandon, Alain, 161
Monte delle Doti, 231
 Montfort, Jeannes de, 37
 Montfort, Simon de, 36
Morte D'Arthur (Malory), 43, 338, 414, 786
 Mortification of the Flesh. See Asceticism Mortuary Rolls. See Necrologies and Mortuary Rolls
 Mothers as Teachers, 589–590, 738
   books for, 590
   Dhuoda as, 209, 590
   by Guibert of Nogent's mother, 336
   Jerome on, 589
   in lay education, 240
   Margaret of Provence as, 590
   Yvette of Huy as, 861
Mountain of Contemplation, The (Gerson), 321
 Mourning. See Death, Mourning, and Commemoration Mowbray, John, 7–8
 Muktafi, Abbasid Caliph, 210
 Mulder-Bakker, Anneke B., 19
 Münster, diocese of, 3
 Murder, of Amalasantha, 16
 Murray, Jacqueline, 746
 Murray, Stephen, 542

- Music, Women, 590–591 composition of, 591
 of Hildegard of Bingen, 591
 of trobairitz, 591
- Musicians. See Nuns as Musicians
- Muslim Women: Iberia, 591–593
 al-Andalus conditions of, 593 captives of, 110
 in Christian Spain, 593
 Floire as, 295
 in Iberia, 389–390
 interreligious marriage in, 592
 Islamic law on, 459
 in Islamic marriage, 527–528
 in Romancero, 719, 720
 slave women in, 592
 sources for, 592–593
 Wallada Bint al-Mustakfi as, 827–828
- Muslim Women: Western Literature, 593–595
 Qasmuna Bint Isma'il, 681
 Sarcen women in, 594
 Shajarrat Ad-Durr of, 594
 Wallada Bint al-Mustakfi in, 594
- Myrc, John, 645
- Mystical Thought, Body and Soul in, Jewish. See Jewish Mystical Thought, Body and Soul in
- Mysticism and Mystics, 595–599 action/contemplation in, 597–599
 of Angela of Foligno, 597
 autohagiography of, 53–55, 599
 of Beguines, 598
 Beguines and, 596, 597
 Bouyer on, 595
 Certeau on, 596
 Christian spirituality of, 779–780
 Clement on, 595
 definition of, 595
 devotional practices of, 597
 Dionysius on, 597
 of Dominican Order, 224, 598
 Douceline of Digne and, 228 of Eckert, 597
 fasting of, 280
 female voice in literature in, 822
 of Franciscan Order, 598
 Gerson on, 597, 598
 of Hadewijch, 345, 597
 Julian of Norwich, 437
 Marguerite Porete on, 597, 598
 Mechthild of Magdeburg, 553
 in northern France, 300
 Origen on, 595
 Roisin on, 598
 sources for, 596–597
 spirits and, 775
 of tertiaries, 791
 women/gender in Middle Ages of, 596–597
- Mystics' Writings, 599–601
 of Angela of Foligno, 21
 autohagiography of, 53–55, 600
 of Beatrice of Nazareth, 599–600
 by Ebner, Margaretha, 237
 of Elisabeth of Schönau, 246
 of Hadewijch, 599–600
 of hagiography, 599
 of Julian of Norwich, 436, 600
 of Mechthild of Magdeburg, 553, 600
 in Sister-Books, 761
 of Stigel, 782
- Mythology, Medieval Reception of, 601–602
 Augustine on, 601
 Christine de Pizan on, 602
 Gerson on, 602
 misogyny in, 601
 Ovid and, 628
 as texts for learning Latin, 601
- ## N
- Na Prous Boneta
 as heretic, 361
 sermons/preaching of, 739
- Na Soriana, Dominican tertiary of, 15
- Naming, 603–605
 by godparents, 329
 of kinship, 603–605
 of noble women, 604–605
- Natural History* (Pliny the Elder), 105
- Natural World, 605–606
 domestic clothwork in, 605
 Hildegard of Bingen on, 605–606
 Trota of Salerno on, 605–606
- Necrologies and Mortuary Rolls, 606–608
 for confraternities, 607 of Engelberg Abbey, 607
 for monasticism/nuns, 607
 of Notre Dame de Saintes, 607 by nuns as scribes, 615 of San Nicola dell Cicogna, 607
 in Sister-Books, 762
- Neff, Amy, 545
- Neidhart, on Minnesang, 565
- Neilson, Nellie, 855
- Nersessian, Sirarpie Der, 855
- Nesta, concubine of Henry I (King), 157–158
- Neville, Anne, administration of estate by, 8
- Neville, Katherine, 7–8
- Neville, Richard, 506
- New Life* (Dante), 651
- Newman, Barbara, 372, 781
- Ni Dhonnchadha, 481
- Niccolini, Giovanni, 230
- Nicene Creed, 422
- Nicholas IV (Pope), 658, 790
- Nicholas of Verdun, 39
- Nicholas V (Pope), 611
- Nikephoros II Phokas, murder of, 102
- Nine Worthy Women, 608–609
 artistic representations of, 608
 Thomas of Saluzzo on, 608
- Njáls Saga*, 495
 on fosterage, 297
- Noble Women, 609–611
 Adela of Blois, 609
 Anne of Beaujeu as, 23
 Bloch, Marc on, 609
 in Eastern Europe, 235
 ecclesiastical patronage of, 639
 Eleanor of Aquitaine, 609
 household account management by, 379, 381 hunting/falconry by, 386–387

INDEX

Noble Women (cont.)

- in Iberia, 391
- Ida of Boulogne, 394
- inheritance of, 609–610
- Jacqueline of Bavaria, 420–421
- ladies-in-waiting for, 447–448
- Marozia of Rome, 516
- Mary of Burgundy, 534
- Matilda of Tuscany, 550, 609
- monasticism of, 610
- naming of, 604–605
- patronage of, 610
- pilgrimage of, 610
- portrait medals of, 659
- powers of, 609
- as regents, 609
- Nogarola, Isotta, 281, 611, 849
  - humanism of, 384
  - as humanist, 611
  - letter writing of, 611
  - Renaissance historiography of, 611
- Norbert of Xanten, 669
  - founder of Premonstratensian Order, 228
- Norman Conquest, 250, 487
- Norman, Diana, 542
- Norse Literature. See Literature, Old Norse
- Northanger Abbey* (Austen), 287
- Nottingham, Earl of, Mowbray as, 7–8
- Numismatics. See Coinage
- Nunnery
  - Holy Trinity, 6
  - Longchamp, 31, 34
  - Pedralbes, 31, 32
  - Sta. Chiara, 31, 32, 33, 34
- Nuns. See also Monasticism and Nuns
  - Adela of Blois as, 6
  - Aethelthryth as, 10
  - as bride of Christ, 94
  - canonesses v., 106–107
  - Cistercian, 142
  - in Dominican Order, 223
  - in England, 249
  - Festivals of Misrule of, 292–293
  - as illuminators, 46
  - Savigniac houses of, 142
- Nuns as Illuminators, 611–612
  - in double monasteries, 612
  - in Gothic convent art, 612
  - Herrad of Hohenbourg, 612
  - Hildegard of Bingen, 612
  - in music books, 612
- Nuns as Musicians, 548, 613–614
  - duties of, 613
  - in monastery, 613
  - Rule of St. Clare and, 613
- Nuns as Scribes, 614–616
  - Benedictine Rule by, 614
  - Caesaria the Younger, 614
  - at Chelles monastery, 614
  - in double monasteries, 615
  - for Hrotsvit of Gandersheim, 614
  - Leukardis as, 615
  - Melania the Younger as, 614
  - in Premonstratensian Order, 615
- Nun's Priest (Chaucer), 50

O

- Oberge, Eilhart von, 414
- Oblates and Oblation, 326, 617–618
  - Benedictine Rule on, 617
  - Cluny on, 617
  - Council of Mainz on, 617
  - Gertrude the Great as, 618
  - Hildegard of Bingen as, 618
  - Mechthild of Hackeborn as, 618
  - monastic rules on, 617
- Obscenity, 618–169
  - Augustine on, 618
  - in erotic art, 260
  - in fabliau, 619
  - in festivals, 618
  - in Latin, 618
  - in margiinalia, 509
  - of sheela na gigs, 756–757
- Observant Movement, 619–620
  - Benedictine Order in, 619–620
  - Colette of Corbie in, 619
  - Dominican Order in, 619
  - Elm, Kaspar on, 619
  - Franciscan Rule in, 619
  - Martin Luther in, 619
  - Modern Devotion and, 620
- Observant Reform, 223
- Occitan Literature. See Literature, Occitan
- Occitania, 620–623
  - Catharism participation in, 622
  - on courtly love, 621–622
  - criminal justice in, 622
  - dowry in, 621
  - Eleanor of Aquitaine of, 620
  - Ermengard and, 258, 620
  - Jewish women, 621
  - legal status in, 620–621
  - lyric performance in, 646
  - trobairitz in, 622
  - work in, 621
- Odido, of Cluny, 7
- Odilia of Liège, as Beguine, 66
- Odyssey* (Homer), 406, 803
  - sirens/mermaids in, 560
- Oetenbach Sister-Book, 761
- Offenbarungen* (“Revelations”) (Ebner, Margaretha), 237
- Offering of Judah the Misogynist, The* (Shabbetai), 570
- Office of the Dead prayers, 18
  - in Books of Hours, 90
- Olaf, 310, 682
- Olav, 510
- Old Age, 623–624
  - almsgiving/charity for, 624
  - care for, 624
  - lack of respect for, 623–624
  - obscenity in, 619
  - woman's social age in, 623
- Old English Literature. See Literature, Old English
- Olga (Queen), 348, 624
  - Helen as Christian name, 236
  - Igor (Prince) has husband of, 236
  - of Russia, 723
  - as Russia's first Christian ruler, 624
- Olivi, Peter John, 434

- On Distinguishing True from False Revelations* (Gerson), 321
On Dreams (Aristotle), 35
On Famous Women. See De claris mulieribus (On Famous Women) (Boccaccio)
On Love (Capellanus), 262, 263
On the Conditions of Women, 168
 “On the Death of an Ass” (Cereta), 120
On the Discernment of Spirits (Gerson), 321
On the Education of Recluses (Aelred), 19
On the Examination of Teachings (Gerson), 321
On the Family (Alberti), 773
On the Laws and Customs of England, 282
On the Mixed Life, 205
On the Testing of Spirits (Gerson), 776
On Virgins (Ambrose), 815
 O’Rahilly, T. F., 408
Orations (Anselm of Canterbury), 207
 Orcagna, Andrea, Catherine of Alexandria painting by, 354
Ord Virtutum (Hildegard of Bingen), 648 Order of Friars Preachers, 223
 Order of Sempringham. See Gilbertine Order Order of St. Francis, Clare of Montefalco and, 146
 Order of St. Savior, 149
 Order of the Kingdom of Leon and Castile, 3
Order of the Sciences, The (Fedele), 281 Ordination of Women as Priests, 624–626 abbesses and, 2, 526
   canon law on, 625
   Humiliati and, 625
   preaching of, 625
   theology of, 625–626
   Waldensians and, 625, 825–826
Ordo Virtutum (Play of the Virtues) (Hildegard of Bingen), 232, 367, 591, 613
Orestia (Aeschylus), 219
 Origen, 595
 “Origin and Early History of Double Monasteries” (Bateson), 369
 Origo, Iris, 369
Orlando Innamorato (Boiardo), 253
Ormesby Psalter, marginalia in, 509
 Osmund of Astorga, 394
 Otfried, 474
 “Other Voice in Early Modern Europe, The” (King/Rabil), 708
 Otis, Leah, 677
 Otis, Lydia, 371
 Otto I (King), 7, 107, 318, 381, 442, 549, 582, 627
 Otto II (King), 7, 218, 318, 382, 626, 815
 Otto III (King), 3, 7, 210, 468, 549, 627
   coinage of, 627
 Otto of Brunswick, 430
 Ottonian Royal Women, 318, 626–627
   Adelheid as, 7, 210, 626
   letter writing of, 457–468
   Matilda as, 210
   Theophano as, 626, 627
   as virile women, 821
 Ovid, 126, 159, 193, 196, 243, 362, 468, 487, 488, 601, 651, 712 age of, 261–262
   contradictions of, 262
   Marie de France and, 513
 Ovid, Medieval Reception of, 627–628
   eroticism in literature of, 627–628 influential classical author of, 628
   on lovesickness, 628
   misogyny of, 628
   Ovidian themes for, 628
   troubadours in, 628
- P
- Pachomius
   in Byzantine monasticism/nuns, 585
   monastic rule of, 580–581
 Paganism, 629–630
   magic/charms in, 630
   Nordic prophets in, 629
   in Scandinavia, 629, 630
   supernatural women in, 629
   valkyries in, 629
   witches in, 841
 Palaces. See Castles and Palaces
 Panizza, Letizia, 708
 Papal Policy, Women’s Monasticism. See Monasticism, Women’s:
   Papal Policy
 Papal Schism, 133
 Paraclete, 359
Paradiso (Dante), 191
Parapherna, 802
 Paris, Gaston, 41
   on courtly love, 174, 175
 Parishes, 630–631
   canon law on, 630
   confraternities in, 630–631
   for lay piety, 630–631
   patronage of, 639
   raising money for, 630–631
Parliament of Fowles, The (Chaucer), 125, 195, 649
 Parshall, Peter, 203
Parson’s Tale (Chaucer), 645
Partonopeud de Blois, 717
Parzival (Eschenbach), 843, 844
 Paschal II (Pope), 6, 850
Passion (Perpetua), 138
Passional of Abbess Kunigunde, The, 313 Paston, Agnes, 631
 Paston, Anne, 716
 Paston, Elizabeth Poynings, 631
 Paston Letters, 631–632, 851
   on business, 631
 Paston, Margaret Mautby, 316, 631
 Pastoral Care. See Spiritual Care
 Pastoral Manuals. See Penitentials and Pastoral Manuals
 Pastourelle, 632–633
   Christine de Pizan on, 633
   female voice in literature in, 822
   on peasant women, 643
   rape in, 633
   social status and, 768
   by troubadours, 632
 Pateman, Carol, 670
Pater Noster prayer, 206, 327
Path of Long Study, The (Christine de Pizan), 134
 Patriarchy and Patrilineage, 633–634
   church on, 634
   heraldry in, 360
   of husbands/ husbandry, 634
   incest in, 400
   in inheritance, 634
   in landholding/property rights, 633–634
   in legal agency, 464

INDEX

- Patriarchy and Patrilineage (cont.)
 for peasants, 643
 in Roman de Silence, 715
- Patronage, Artistic, 634–638
 by Aethelthryth (Queen), 635 of Bathild (Queen), 635
 in double monasteries, 636
 of Elizabeth de Burgh, 636
 by “Living Saints,” 635
 by Mary of Hungary I, 535
 of Matilda (Queen), 635 of monastic architecture, 34
 of noble women, 610
 by nuns, 634–635
 portrait medals for, 659
 by prominent families’ relatives, 636
 by rulers, 635
 of Theodora, 635
 by widows of rulers, 635–636
 by wives of rulers, 635
 of Wolfram von Eschenbach, 843 of women of artisan families, 636
 by women’s monasteries, 636–637
- Patronage, Ecclesiastical, 638–640
 of Beaufort, Margaret, 638
 of Colette of Corbie, 639 of ecclesiastical architecture, 31
 of Elizabeth de Burgh, 638
 Lawrence on, 639
 of Margaret of Bavaria, 639
 of Margaret of Scotland, 507
 of Margaret of York, 638
 by Mary of Hungary I, 535
 by Matilda (Empress), 551
 by Matilda of Tuscany, 550 of monasteries, 638–639
 of monastic architecture, 33
 of noble women, 610
 of parish churches, 639 political benefits of, 639 of relics/reliquaries, 705
 Schulenburg on, 639
 Thompson on, 638
 of Urraca, 809
 by widows, 638
 of Woodville, 855
- Patronage, Literary, 51, 640–642
 of Adela of Blois, 472
 for courtly love, 641
 of Eleanor of Aquitaine, 640, 641 of Eleanor of Castile, 472 of Ermengard of Narbonne, 640
 gender in, 640, 641
 of Isabeau of Bavaria, 640
 of Marie de France, 512
 by Mathilda, 549 of Matilda, 472 networks for, 641
 of noble women, 610
 for troubadours, 641 in vernacular literacy/reading, 472
 of Woodville, 855
- Paul (Saint), 47, 54
 on chastity, 122–123
 on conjugal debt, 164
 on dress propriety, 84 on femininity/masculinity, 284–285
 on marriage, 751
 on sexuality, regulation of, 751 theology of women in church, 136
- Paul III (Pope), 281
 Paul V (Pope), 303
 Paula, 469, 580
 letter writing to, 468
 Pavan, Elisabeth, 676
 Pavinis, Joannes Franciscus, 579
 Payer, Pierre J., 749
 Peace and Truce of God movement, 210
 Peasants, 642–644
 and agriculture, 11–12
 artistic depictions of, 643
 Christine de Pizan on, 642, 643
 fabliau on, 643
 gossip/slander of, 643
 household management by, 381 husbandry of, 643
 in Italy, 416–417
leyrwrite of, 560 literary representations of women, 643
 in northern France, 300–301
 pastourelle on, 643
 patriarchy for, 643
 Power, Eileen on, 642 rape of, 643
 rural records of, 700
 social status of, 766
 widows as, 643
 women’s status, 642–643
 women’s work, 642 work of, 857
- Peckham, Katherine, 471
 Pedralbes nunnery, 31, 32
 Pedro, Dom, 735
 Pedro I (King) of Castile, 211, 853
 Pedro III (King), 413
 Pedro IV (King), 472
 Pelagius, 422
 “Penance,” in Ancrene Wisse, 20
Penitential of Theodore (Theodore of Canterbury), 644
 Penitentials and Pastoral Manuals, 644–646
 canon law on, 645
Decorum of Gratian, 644–645
Decretum of Burchard of Worms, 644 of Gregory the Great, 644
 for male same sex relations, 749
 of Manning, 645 of Myrc, 645
 of Robert of Flamborough, 645
 for sexuality regulation, 645 of Theodore of Canterbury, 644
 on witches, 841
- Pentesilea, 16
 Penthièvre, Jeannes de, 37
 Pepin the Short, 685
 Perceval (Chrétien of Troyes), 43, 717, 843
 Perchta, 848
Performance and Transformation: New Approaches to Late Medieval Spirituality (Suydam/Ziegler), 647
 Performance in Lyric, 646–647
 of conduct literature, 646

- in France, 646
 in Iberia, 646
 in Occitania, 646
 Performance Theory, 647
   Schechner on, 647
   Suydam on, 647
   Ziegler on, 647
Pericoloso, 33, 463, 576, 658 by Boniface VIII (Pope), 30
   on monastic enclosure, 575
 Pernoud, Régine, 369
 Perpetua (Saint), 137–138, 148, 348, 821, 849
 Perrot, Michelle, 22, 708
 Perry, Mary Elizabeth, 676
 Personifications Visualized as Women, 647–650
   allegory in, 647–648
   Capella on, 648
   classical influences on, 648
   Dante on, 648
   gendered personifications in, 649 Lady Philosophy as model of, 648–649
   portrait medals for, 659
   Prudentius on, 648
   in Song of Songs, 648
   wisdom as, 840
 Peter Abelard. See Heloise
Peter Idley's Instructions to His Son, 220
 Peter the Chanter, 362
 Peter the Venerable, 350
 Petitions, 650
   at Vatican Archives, 650
 Petrarch, Francis, 125, 261, 269, 482, 611, 623, 650–652, 707
   Decameron Latin translation by, 334
   eroticism in literature of, 651
   humanism of, 383
   in Italian literature, 483–484
   Laura character of, 650–651
   in Occitan literature, 590
 Petronila of Aragón, 652
   queen consort of, 652 Petronilla of Cheminé, 170, 296
 Philip I (King), 157, 732
 Philip II (King), 216, 688
 Philip III (King), 688
 Philip IV (King), 211
 Philip of Burgundy, 413
 Philip of Navarre, 361
 Philip the Good, 420, 432
 Philip, the Good Duke of Burgundy, 115
 Philip VI (King), 210
 Philippa (Queen) of Hainault, tomb of, 99
 Philippe de Mézières, 335
 Philippe de Rémi, 627
 Phillpots, Bertha, 287
Philomela (Ovid), 129
Philosophia, 243
Physica (Hildegard of Bingen), 605, 606
 Physicians. See Doctors and Healers. Medicine
 Piero d'Argellata, on Caesarean section, 105
 Pierre de Beaujeu, Anne of Beaujeu as wife of, 23
Piers Plowman (Langland), 222, 648, 649, 700
 Pietro IV Candiano (Doge), 217
 Piety. See Devotional Art. Devotional Literature.
   Devotional Practices. Lay Piety. Pilgrims and Pilgrimage
 Pilgrims and Pilgrimage, 652–654
   in Crusades, 653
   of Elizabeth de Burgh, 653
   Finucane on, 653
   of Helena, 357, 653
   of Kempe, 440
   of Mary Magdalene, 532–533
   of Melania the Elder, 653
   migration/mobility in, 562
   of noble women, 610
   to relics/reliquaries, 705 representations of women on, 653–654 sources on, 652–653
   Turner, Victor/Edith on, 653
   for Virgin Mary, 544–545
 Pippin I, 322
 Pistoia, Cino da, 482
 Pius II (Pope), 590, 611
 Pius IX (Pope), on Immaculate Conception, 538
 Pius XII (Pope), 538
 Pizan, Christine de. See Christine de Pizan
 Placidia, Galla, 98
 Plague, 654–656
   of Black Death, 653
   Boccaccio on, 655
   chronicles after, 655
   John of Reading on, 655
   Justinian, 654
   leprosy and, 466–467
   penance in, 655
   work and, 655
Plaint of Nature (Alan of Lille), 262, 263, 649
 Plantagenet, Henry, 296
 Plays. See Drama
 Pliny the Elder, on Caesarean section, 105
 Plumpton, Margaret, 472
 Plumpton, William, 356
Poem of Joan of Arc (Christine de Pizan), 17
Poema de Santa Oria (Berceo), 479
Poetic Edda, 811, 821
 Polcelina of Blois, 428
Policraticus (John of Salisbury), 363, 570
Politics (Aristotle), 35
 Politics and Power. See Diplomacy and Reconciliation; Empresses:
   Byzantium; Noble Women; Regents and Queen-Lieutenants
 Polyptyques
   as charters, 697–698
   in rural records, 70
 Pons de Léras, 170
Ponthus et la belle Sidoine (Eleanor of Scotland), 245
Pontificale Romanum, 2
Pontus und Sidonia (Eleanor of Scotland), 245
 Ponziani, Lorenze de', 302
 Poor Clares Order, 1, 30, 33, 236, 323, 342, 350, 577, 589, 656–658, 738, 739, 766
   architecture, monastic of, 32
   Francis of Assisi, 656
   of Franciscan Order, 656
   Franciscan Order origins in, 656–657
   Franciscan Penitent Women in, 657–658
   Isabel of Aragon and, 413
   on monastic enclosure, 575
   in northern France, 299
   in Occitania, 622
   Order of Saint Clare in, 657

INDEX

- Poor Clares Order (cont.)
 pastoral care in, 657
 Rose of Viterbo and, 722
 Vigni and, 113
- Pope Joan, 658–659
 cross-dressing of, 658
 story of, 658
- Popular Religion. See Devotional Practices. Hagiography. Lay Piety. Pilgrims and Pilgrimage
- Porete, Marguerite. See Marguerite Porete
- Pornocracy. See Marozia of Rome
- Portrait Medals, 659–660
 as artistic representations of women, 659
 as coinage, 659
 for diplomacy/reconciliation, 659 of honor/reputation, 659
 of noble women, 659
 for personification of virtues, 659
- Portugal. See Iberia
- Possession* (Byatt), 556
- Possession. See Spirits: Discernment of and Possession
- Postan, M.M., 666
- Postcolonial Theory, 660–661
 Bartlett on, 660 on conquest/annexation, 660
 Heng on, 660
- Postmodernism and Historiography, 661–663
 applications to medieval women's history, 662–663 historical research/writing for, 661–662 narrative theory in, 662 performance theory in, 647
 postcolonial theory in, 660
 Psychoanalytic theory in, 680
 White, Hayden on, 662
- Poulet, George, 696
- Poverty, 350, 663–664
 almsgiving/charity for, 14, 663
 Brodman on, 664
 in Christian spirituality, 780
 of Elisabeth of Hungary, 790
 Karras on, 663
 of prostitutes, 677
 of singlewomen, 663
 of widows, 663–664
- Poverty, religious, 664–665
 Agnes of Prague and, 11
 of Beguines, 664
 Cistercian Order and, 664
 of Clare of Assisi, 665
 of Dominican Order, 665
 of Mendicant Orders, 665 religious movements for, 664 voluntary, 664
 of Waldensians, 665
- Power, Eileen, 370, 665–666, 854
 Economic History Society by, 665
 on feminist theory, 287–288
 on home manufacturing, 374
 on monastic enclosure, 575
 on peasants, 642
- Practica* (Trota of Salerno), 800–801
- Praise of Folly* (Erasmus), 384
- Preaching. See Sermons and Preaching
- Pregnancy and Childbirth: Christian Women, 561, 666–668
 birthing chamber for, 667
 Caesarean section in, 667 diet for, 666–667
 doctors/healing for, 667 infants in, 402
 infertility of, 403
 lying-in process of, 500–501
 magic/charms for, 504, 505, 667
 Margaret of Antioch as intercessor for, 506 midwives for, 667
 procreation/conception of, 671–672 signs of, 666
- Pregnancy and Childbirth: Jewish Women, 561, 668
 diet for, 668
 infertility of, 403
 lying-in of, 668
 lying-in process of, 500–501 midwives for, 668
- Premonstratensian Order, 228, 583, 588, 669–670
 Augustinian Rule of, 669
 canonesses of, 669
 Norbert of Xanten as founder of, 227, 669 nuns as scribes in, 615
 statutes of, 669
- Premysk Otakar I (King), 11
- Preuses, Neuf*. See Nine Worthy Women
- Priests. See Celibacy: Clerical and Priests' Concubines. Ordination of Women as Priests
- Prince, Gerald, 696
- Prise d'Orange*, 594
- Private and Public Spheres, 670–671, 774
 Coole on, 670
 of division of labor, 670
 Duby on, 670
 McSheffrey on, 670
 Pateman on, 670
 Rosaldo, Michelle on, 670
 Rosaldo on, 670
- Processo de cartas de amores (Process of Love Letters)* (Segura), 735
- Procopius, 795
- Procreation and Ideas of Conception, 671–673
 Aristotle one-seed theory on, 671, 672
 Arthurian concepts of, 35–36
 Hippocrates/Galen two-seed theory on, 671–672
- Property Rights. See Landholding and Property Rights
- Prophets, 673–674
 Birgitta of Sweden as, 739
 Catherine of Siena as, 673
 Dhuoda as, 673
 Elisabeth of Schönau as, 673
 Heloise as, 673
 Hildegard of Bingen as, 673
 Leoba as, 673
 Lutgard of Aywières as, 500
 preaching of, 673
 Rose of Viterbo as, 722
 Theuda as, 737
 visionary, 673
- Prophets, Nordic, 674
 paganism of, 629
 in Scandinavia, 728
 sibyls of, 674
 in Skáldkonur, 762
 supernatural women of, 674
- Prose Lancelot* (Chrétien), 129, 175

- Prose Tristan* (Chrétien), 175
 Prosopography, 574–675
   Maltby on, 674
   rural/urban records of, 674–675
 Prostitutes, 675–678
   of alewives, 13
   Aquinas on, 675
   Augustine on, 675, 754
   Brundage on, 678
   Casa de las Arrepentidas house for reformed, 15 contraceptives for, 168–169 courtship v., 178
   double standards for, 675
   in economy, 238
   in England, 251
   Gratian on, 754
   hospital care by, 378
   in Iberia, 391
   identification of, 676–677
   institutionalization of, 676
   Justinian and, 103
   Marseillais on, 675
   Mary Magdalene, 532, 533
   Mary of Egypt, 532
   Mazzo-Karras on, 677
   mermaids/sirens as, 560
   migration/mobility of, 562
   names of, 676
   Otis on, 677
   Pavan on, 676
   Perry on, 676
   poverty and, 663, 677 public control of, 677
   rape and, 676, 743
   redemption of, 677–678
   Rossiaud on, 676, 677
   singlewomen as, 759, 780
   social status and, 768
   sumptuary law for, 677
   Trexler on, 676
   victimization of, 676
   Villon on, 812
Prostitution in Medieval Society (Otis), 371 Protestant Reformation, 584
Protevangelion (Early Gospel of James), 537
 Proverbs, Riddles, and Gnostic Literature, 678–680
   Exeter Book of, 678
   FtM in, 678, 679
   GfM in, 678, 679
   Maxims in, 678, 679
 Prudentius, 648
 Psalter (Book of Psalms), 86, 87, 88, 150, 194, 590 of Bonne of Luxembourg, 203
   in Books of Hours, 90
   Carolingian Utrecht, 151
   clothwork metaphor in, 152
   in devotional practices, 206
   Eadwine, 151
   for lay education, 240
   marginalia in, 509
   St. Albans, 131
 Psychoanalytic Theory, 680
Psychomachia (Conflict of the Soul) (Prudentius), 648 Ptolemy of Lucca, 36
 Public justice, for abbesses, 4
 Public Sphere. See Private and Public Spheres
 Pucci, Florentine, 196
 Puff, Helmut, 747
Purgatorio 3 (Dante), 191, 560
Purgatory of St. Patrick, The, 301 Putnam, Emily James, 288
- ## Q
- Qasmuna Bint Isma'il, 428, 681
   poetry of, 681
Quaestiones de Animalibus (Magnus), 35 Quedlinburg, 3 coinage right of, 154
   in Germanic lands, 318
Queen Mary's Psalter, 386, 387
   marginalia in, 509
 Queen of Heaven
   Virgin Mary as, 95, 537, 539, 542 visual representations of body of, 84
 Queen of Sheba, 39
 Queen-Lieutenants. See Regents and Queen-Lieutenants Queens and Empresses of Eastern Europe, 236
   in England, 250
   of northern France, 298–299
 Queens and Empresses, Consorts of, 681–683
   Alfonso of Aragon as, 682
   Andreas of Hungary as, 682
   Ferdinand of Aragon as, 682
   Geoffrey as, 682
   Hakon as, 682
   military role of, 682
   Urraca, 809
 Queens and Empresses: The West, 683–691
   Adelheid as, 7
   Aethelthryth of Ely as, 1
   almsgiving/charity of, 689
   Anne of Bohemia, 24
   arranged marriages of, 688
   artistic patronage of, 635–636
   childbearing of, 688
   childlessness of, 685–686
   chroniclers of, 690 commemoration of, 690
   consorts of, 681–682 coronation of, 686 coronation rite of, 686–687 diplomatic marriages of, 687
   in early Middle Ages, 683–685
   Edith as, 239
   Eleanor of Aquitaine as, 244
   Empresses of, 683
   in high Middle Ages, 686
   intercession by, 407
   Isabel I, 412–413
   Isabel of Aragon as, 413
   Jadwiga as, 421
   Joan I, 430
   Kottaner on, 445
   ladies-in-waiting for, 447–448
   Margaret of Anjou of, 506
   Margrethe of, 510
   Mary of Hungary I, 535
   Matilda (Empress), 551

INDEX

Queens and Empresses: The West (cont.)

- of Ottonian royal women, 626–627
  - patronage of, 690
  - Petronila of Aragón, 652
  - position by marriage of, 684
  - Queens image of, 689–690
  - Queens role in royal family, 687
  - raising royal children by, 688–689
  - regents/Queen-lieutenants of, 703
  - royal ceremonials of, 689
  - royal charters of, 689
  - in royal household, 685
  - royal widows of, 689
  - in Scotland, 730–731
  - security/insecurity of, 687–688
  - successions of, 690, 783–784
  - transitions of, 685–686
  - Urraca as, 809
  - Woodville, Elizabeth as, 855–856
- Queer Theory, 691
- Butler on, 691
  - for female same sex relations, 746
  - for male same sex relations, 749
  - Sedgwick on, 691
- Querelle des Femmes*. See Defenses of Women
- Querelle de la Rose* (Christine de Pizan), 195, 713–714. See Roman de la Rose and Its Reception
- Quest of the Holy Grail*, 338
- Quintilian, 555

R

- R. Jacob b. Meir (Rabbenu Tam), 460
- Rabil, Albert Jr., 708
- Radbertus, Paschasius, 539
- Radegund (Queen), 48, 98, 242, 304, 305, 349, 693–694, 736, 849
- asceticism of, 693, 694
  - Bride of Christ imagery and, 693, 694
  - letter writing of, 468, 693
  - on literacy/reading, 693
  - monastic enclosure of, 694
  - preaching of, 736
  - relic of, 694
  - Rule of Caesarius of, 693
- Radway, Janice, 696
- Ralph of Westmorland (Earl), 14
- Ramiro, 652
- Ramiro II, 652
- Ramón Berenguer IV, 652
- Randall, Lilian, 509
- Ransom. See Captivity and Ransom
- Rape and Raptus, 694–696
- in ballads, 58
  - in captivity/ransom, 109
  - Carter on, 695
  - Chaucer on, 125
  - of Christina of Markyate, 131
  - criminalization of, 695
  - in extramarital sex, 743
  - German law on, 457
  - of girls, 327
  - of Helen of Troy, 694
  - King, Andy on, 695
  - in pastourelle, 633
  - of peasant women, 643
  - on pilgrimages, 653
  - prostitutes and, 676, 743
  - Roman law on, 695
  - in Romancero, 719
  - of virgin martyrs, 815
  - virginity/chastity and, 694, 695
- Rashi. See Schlomo ben Isaac
- al-Rashid, Caliph Harun, 411
- Ravenna chapel, mausoleum in, 98
- Raymond of Capua, 116, 117, 619
- Observant Movement and, 620
- Reader-Response Criticism, 696–697
- Crosman on, 696
  - Iser on, 696
  - Jauss on, 696
  - Poulet on, 696
  - Prince, Gerald on, 696
  - Radway on, 696
  - Suleiman on, 696
- Reading. See Literacy and Reading
- Reception theory. See Reader-Response Criticism
- Reconciliation. See Diplomacy and Reconciliation
- Records, Ecclesiastical, 697–699
- cartularies in, 698
  - in charters, 697–699
  - charters of, 122
  - of church court, 453
  - early records of, 697
  - on impotence, 398
  - of monastic visitation, 579
  - of patronage, 697, 699
  - polyptyques in, 697–698
  - transactions in, 699
- Records, Rural, 699–702
- on administration of estates, 700
  - on agriculture, 701
  - cartularies in, 700
  - court records/inventories in, 700
  - documents of theory/practice in, 699–700
  - of peasants, 700
  - of polyptychs, 700
  - prosopography of, 674–675
  - women's roles in, 700–701
- Records, Urban, 701–702
- demography in, 702
  - literate culture for, 701
  - notarial registers for, 702
  - prosopography of, 674–675
  - tax records for, 702
  - town court rolls for, 702
  - wills as, 702
- Regents and Queen-Lieutenants, 703–704
- Adela of Blois as, 6, 703
  - Adelheid of Burgundy as, 318
  - Amalasantha as, 16
  - Anne of Beaujeu, 703
  - appointment of, 310
  - Blanche of Castile as, 211, 310, 703
  - Brunhild as, 96
  - Byzantium empresses as, 103
  - Caterina Sforza as, 112–113
  - Constance of Sicily as, 166
  - description of, 703
  - diplomacy/reconciliation of, 211
  - Fredegund as, 96

- Irene as, 310, 411, 703
 Isabelle of France as, 703
 Margaret of Anjou as, 211, 703
 Margrethe I (Queen) as, 310, 682
 Maria de Molina as, 703
 noble women as, 609
 Olga as, 624
 Placidia as, 98
 Theophano as, 318, 626–627
 Theophanu as, 210
- Reggimento e Costumi di Donna (Rules and Customs for Ladies)*
 (Francesco da Barberino), 88, 160, 464, 590
- Regino of Prüm (Abbot), monastical procedural guidelines by, 578
- Regula pastoralis* (Gregory the Great), 529
- “Regulation of the Inward Feelings, The,” in Ancrene Wisse, 20
- Reinhart Fuchs* (Glichezare), 62
- Reinhartz, Adele, 73
- Relics and Reliquaries, 704–706
 canon law on, 705
 classes of, 704 display of, 705
 of Elisabeth of Schönau, 246 forms of, 704–705
 of Mary Magdalene, 532–533 miracle collections of, 566 patronage for, 705
 of Radegund, 694
 of Ursula and her companions, 809, 810
 value of, 705
 of Virgin Mary, 538–539, 543
- Religious Conversion. See Conversion, Religious
- Remarriage, 706–707
 canon law on, 706
 children and, 706
 Constantine I on, 706
 due to impotence, 398–399 of elite class, 706
 in Jewish marriage, 528
 Leo I (Pope) on, 706
 in literary texts, 707
 marriage ceremonies for, 516, 517 Theodosius II (Emperor) on, 706
 of widows, 706
 of widows as guardians, 835
- Remedia Amoris (Remedy for Love)* (Ovid), 627
- Renaissance, Historiography of, 707–709, 747, 748
 Chojnacki on, 708
 Duby on, 708
 Grendler on, 707
 Herlihy on, 708
 humanism in, 707
 Kelly on, 707–708
 King on, 708
 Klapisch-Zuber on, 708
 Kristeller on, 707
 Lavenoon on, 708
 Lowe on, 708
 Maclean on, 708
 Medioli on, 708
 Menchi on, 708
 Nogarola on, 611
 Panizza on, 708
 Perrot on, 708
 Rabil on, 708
 Stevenson on, 708
 Weaver on, 708
 Zarri on, 708
- Renaissance Notion of Woman: A Study in the Fortunes of Scholasticism and Medical Science in European Intellectual Life* (Maclean), 371, 708
- Repertorium Iuris Utriusque* (Bertachini), 765
- Repetición de amores (Recitation on Love)* (Lucena), 735
- Réponse du Bestiaire d’Amour (Fournival), 50, 175, 709–710
- Reputation. See Honor and Reputation
- Responsa*, 460
- Reupert of Deutz, 539–530
- Revelations* (Birgitta of Sweden), 74, 76, 351, 355, 600, 798
- Revelations* (Ebner, Margaretha), 224
- Revelations of Divine Love, The* (Julian of Norwich). See Showings (Julian of Norwich)
- Revelations of St. Gertrude, The* (Gertrude the Great), 351
- Riario, Girolamo, 112
- Riccoboni, Bartolomea, 224
- Richard FitzGilbert de Clare (Strongbow), 411
- Richard I (King), 99, 250
- Richard II (King), 87, 111, 125, 127, 687, 688
- Richard III (King), 23, 24, 115, 856
 Beaufort conspiracy against, 64
- Richard of York, 689, 783
- Richard the Englishman, on infertility, 403
- Richard the Lionhearted, 296
- Richardson, Herbert, 52
- Riché, Pierre, 209
- Richter, Elise, 855
- Rickert, Edith, 855
- Ricwera, 669
- Riddles. See Proverbs, Riddles, Gnomonic Literature
- Rigaud, Eudes, 579
- Ringbom, Sixten, 202
- Riquier, Guiraut, 490
- Robert Bruce (King), 731
- Robert de Blois, 160, 196–197
- Robert III, 361
- Robert of Arbrissel, 299, 577 found of Fontevrault Abbey, 296 as founder of Fontevrault Order, 227
- Robert of Baudricourt, 431
- Robert of Beaumont, 157
- Robert of Flamborough, penitential by, 645
- Robert the Wise, 430, 682
- “Robin Hood and Maid Marian,” as ballad, 59
- Roch (Saint), as the plague saint, 213
- Rodrigo Diaz de Vivar (el Cid), 256
- Rodríguez de Padrón, Juan, 735
- Roet, Philippa, 125
- Roger II (King), 165
- Roig, Jaume, 480
- Roisin, Simone, on mysticism/mystics, 598
- Rojas, Fernando de, 571
- Rolle, Richard, 205, 441, 473
- Roman de Brut* (Wace), 339, 716
- Roman de Flamenca*, 490, 710–711, 799
 dance in, 188
- Roman de la Rose (Romance of the Rose)* (Guillaume de Lorris/Jean de Meun), 50, 51, 84, 88, 134, 175, 176, 195, 330, 358, 489, 494, 571, 602, 628, 648, 649, 717, 822
 Chaucer translation of, 125
 dance in, 188
 Gerson on, 321
 misogyny in, 571

INDEX

- Roman de la Rose (Romance of the Rose)* (Guillaume de Lorris/Jean de Meun) (cont.)
obscenity in, 619
- Roman de la Rose and Its Reception, 711–714, 717
Huot on, 713
interpretive ambiguities in, 713
obscenity in, 619
Querelle of the Rose on, 713–714
- Roman de Silence, 715–716
Cornuälle, Heldris de by, 715
warfare in, 831
- Roman de Silence (Romance of Silence, The)* (Cornuälle), 17, 50, 80, 148, 175
cross-dressing in, 182
in Old French literature, 494
- Roman de Thèbes (Romance of Thebes)*, 181, 716, 720
Paston, Anne ownership of, 716
- Roman de Troie (Romance of Troie)* (Benoît de Sainte-Maure), 16, 628, 716, 720
- Roman d'Enéas (Romance of Eneas)* (Ovid), 16, 627, 716, 718, 720
- Roman Law, 308, 451
in Barbarian Law Codes, 59
canon law in, 715
on divorce, 752
on dowry, 715
in gender ideologies, 309
legal agency in, 464, 465
male guardianship in, 714
in Occitania, 620–621
on raptus, 695
slave trade and, 764
on wills, 838
- Romance, English, 716
of Chaucer, 716
Dante on, 716
- Romance, French, 472, 710, 716–718
adulterous queen in, 718
allegory in, 717
Arthurian literature in, 717
in Old French literature, 493–494
translation of, 716
of Tristan/Isolde, 414–415
women/gender representation in, 717–718
- Romance, German, 474, 718–719
Arthurian literature in, 719
Floire/Blancheflor in, 295, 719
Gawain tradition in, 719
by Gottfried von Strassburg, 331–332
Lancelot tradition in, 719
Minnesang in, 719
of Old French literature, 718 Tristan tradition in, 719
of Tristan/Isolde, 414–415
wild women in, 836–837
of Wolfram von Eschenbach, 843–844
- Romance of Adultery, The* (McCracken), 43
- Romance of Aenas, The*, 175
- Romance of Tristan*, 148, 175, 176
- Romancero, 719–720
Buetler on, 719
Catarella on, 719
gender ideologies in, 719
Goldberg, Harriet on, 719
Lanz on, 719
Mirrer on, 719
- Romances of Antiquity, 720–721
Eleanor of Aquitaine of, 720
eroticism in, 720, 721
French Romance in, 716
male same sex relations in, 721
- Romanos III Argyros, 248 murder of, 102
- Romanos IV, 248
- Rome, Adelheid as empress of, 7
- Room of One's Own, A* (Woolf), 288
- Rosaldo, Michelle, 670
- Rosary, 722
confraternity for, 722
as devotional practice, 722
Dominican Order on, 722
lay piety of, 722
- Rose of Viterbo, 722
heresy attacks by, 722
preaching of, 722
as prophet, 722
sermons/preaching of, 738, 778
- Rosen, Tova, 425
- Rossiaud, Jacques, 676, 768
- Round Table, The, 41, 42, 489
- Rousset, François, on Caesarean section, 105
- Royal/Noble
genealogy of, 315
in Germanic lands, 318
- Rudolf II (King), 7
- Rudolf of Fulda, 465, 466, 737, 850
- Rufinus of Aquileia, 422
- Ruiz, Juan, 261
- Rule for Virgins* (St. Caesarius), 617
- Rule of Benedict. See Benedictine Rule
- Rule of Columbanus, 581
- Rule of St. Augustine. See Augustinian Rule
- Rule of St. Clare, 11, 145 for nuns as musicians, 613
- Rule of St. Francis. See Franciscan Rule
- Rule of the Holy Savior* (Birgitta of Sweden), 351
- Rule of the Master* (St. Caesarius), 617
- Rules, Monastic. See Monastic Rules
- Rules of St. Benedict*, 468
- Rupert of Deutz, 139, 363, 364, 434
- Russia, 722–724
charters in, 723
diplomacy in, 723
Kievan period in, 723 law code of, 723
Olga of, 624
Sophia Palaiologina and, 770 women's economic rights in, 723
- Russo, Mary, 293
- Rutebeuf, 547
- Rykener, John, 183
- ## S
- Sachsenspiegel (Saxon Mirror)* (Eike von Repgow), 457
- Saga of Erik the Red, The*, 674
- Saint, 31, 33
Aethelthryth as female, 11
Agnes of Prague as, 236
Anne, 24, 25, 40
Brigit as earliest female saint, 95

- burial practices of, 98
 canonization of, 107–109
 Catherine of Alexandria, 115
 Catherine of Genoa as, 116
 Elisabeth of Hungary as, 14, 236, 245
Golden Legend on, 419–420
 Gregory the Great's (Pope) promotion of, 108
 Hildegard of Bingen as, 350
 Jadwiga of Poland as, 236, 421
 Margaret of Hungary as, 236, 350 martyrdom of, 348
 Paul, 47, 54
 Rose of Viterbo as, 722
 veneration of, 108
 Zita of Lucca as, 14
Saint Alban's Psalter, 635
Saint Patrick's Purgatory. See Espurgatoire Seint Patriz
 (St. Patrick's Purgatory) (Marie de France)
 St. Albans monastery, 131
St. Albans Psalter, 131
 St. Augustine, 95
 St. Ayoul abbey, 6
 St. Brigit's church, 33
 St. Germain abbey, 6
 St. Katharinenthal Sister-Book, 761
 St. Lomer abbey, 6
 St. Père abbey, 6
St. Trudperter Song of Songs, 769
 Sta. Chiara nunnery, 31, 32, 33
     Giotto and, 34
 Salian Franks law codes, 59, 273, 303, 304, 310
 Salu, M.D., 20
 Salutati, Coluccio, 602
     humanism of, 383
 Samuel ha-Nagid, 476
 San Bernadino of Siena, 538
 Sancha of Castile, 391
     Fernán González as husband of, 98
     sarcophagus of, 98
 Sancho II (King), 257
 Sancho IV (King), 683
 Sancia (Queen), 686
 Sandona, Mark, 545
 Sanuti, Nicolosa Castellani, 725
     on clothing, 725, 785
     on defense of women, 725
 Sara de Cabestany, 427
 Saracen women, 493
     in epic, Old French, 255
 Sarcophagus of Blanca (Queen) of Navarra, 99 of Doña Sancha, 99 of Sancha, 98
 Satan, 726–727
     demonic forces and, 726
     Eve temptation by, 726
     Fourth Lateran Council on, 726
     spirits and, 775
     theology of, 726
     witches and, 726, 841
Sátira de felice e infelice vida (Satire of the Fortunate and Unfortunate Life) (Pedro), 735
 Sauer, Michelle, 746
 Sautman, Francesca Canadé, 745, 747
 Savage, Anne, 19
 Savigniac, houses of nuns, 142
 Savonarola, Girolamo, 224, 738
Saxon Manor, 40
Saxon Mirror, on business law, 101
 Sayers, Dorothy, 854
 Scandinavia, 727–728
     agriculture in, 727
     ale brewing in, 13
     architecture, monastic in, 34
     Beowulf setting of, 69
     betrothal in, 523
     Birgitta of, 74–75
     Birgittine Order in, 728
     Christianity in, 728
     clothwork in, 727
     economic roles in, 727 family in, 727–728
     fosterage in, 297
     infanticide prohibition in, 728
     inheritance in, 727–728
     Margrethe as Queen of, 510 marriage/concubinage in, 523–524, 727–728
     Nordic prophets of, 674
     Old Norse literature in, 495
     Olga of, 624
     prophets in, 728
     religion in, 728
     Skáldkonur of, 762–763
     slaves in, 763
 Schechner, Richard, 647
 Schibanoff, Susan, 747
 Schlomo ben Isaac (Rashi), 460
 Schmid, K., on kinship, 442
 Schmitt Pantel, Pauline, 22 Scholarship. See Education (all entries). Humanism. Literacy and Reading (all entries). Mothers as Teachers Scholasticism, 729–730
     abortion and, 5
     Aristotle in, 729
     Arthurian concepts in, 35–36
     education in, 730
     of Immaculate Conception, 396 impact on women of, 729
     of Marguerite Porete, 511 monastic/lay education of, 730
     of soul, 770–771
     theology of, 729
     in universities, 808
     universities for, 730
 Schulenburg, Jane Tibbetts, 347
     on ecclesiastical patronage, 639
 Schultz, James, on adolescence, 9
Scivias (Hildegard of Bingen), 45, 246, 355, 364, 365
     Hart/Bishop editing of, 372
     illuminations in, 365
 Scotland, 730–732
     ale brewing in, 13
     brewing in, 731
     dowry in, 731
     Margaret of Scotland in, 507
     marriage in, 731
     monasticism/nuns in, 586–587, 731
     Tacitus on, 731
     women's economic role in, 731
 Scott, Joan, 290

INDEX

- Scribes. See Nuns as Scribes
- Seafarer, The*, 679
- Seal of Blessed Mary* (Augustodunensis), 539
- Seals and Sigillography, 732–733
 of abbesses, 732–733 of Byzantine icons, 393
 gender in, 732
 heraldry in, 360
 iconography in, 732–733
 Virgin Mary in, 733
- Seaxberga, 684
- Seaxburh, Aethelthryth as sister of, 11
- Second Council of Lyons, 739
- Second Crusade, 184
 Eleanor of Aquitaine in, 243
- Second Lateran Council, on canonesses, 107
- Second Nun's Tale* (Chaucer), 816
- Second Sex, The* (Beauvoir), 289
- Secret History* (Procopius), 795
- Secrets of Women, 733–734
 Aristotelian views on, 733–734
 audience for, 734
 gynecology in, 733 Magnus, Albertus and, 733 medical text of, 38, 557–558
 on menstruation, 733 menstruation for, 557–558
 misogyny in, 733, 734
 on witches, 734
- Secretum (My Secret)* (Petrarch), 651
- Sedgwick, Eve Kosofsky, on Queer theory, 691
- Segalen, Martine, 857
- Segura, Juan de, 735
- Self-Mortification. See Asceticism
- Sentences* (Lombard), 123, 625
- Sentimental Romance, 734–736
 on courtly love, 734
 in literature of Iberia, 734–735
 lovesickness in, 735
- Separation. See Divorce and Separation
- Ser Giovanni Sercambi, 335
- Serfs. See Peasants
- Sergius III (Pope), 516
- Sermo generalis* (Augustodunensis), 268
- Sermons and Preaching, 323, 736–740
 of abbesses, 2–3
 of Beguines, 739
 of Bernardino of Siena, 533 of Berthold, 533
 of Birgitta of Sweden, 739, 778
 Bynum on, 736–737
 of Caterina Vigri, 739–740
 of Catherine of Siena, 738, 778
 in early Middle Ages, 736–737
 in early Modern Era, 739–780
 exemplum in, 268
 of Franciscan Order, 540
 from/after Gregorian Reforms, 737
 of Hildegard of Bingen, 365, 596, 736 of Humility of Faenza, 386, 736, 738, 778
 in Italy, 738–739
 of Kempe, 440
 of Leoba, 736 of Liutberga, 736 Marie of Oignies on, 736
 in marriage, 529–530
 of Mary Magdalene, 532, 534
 on moral behavior, 738 of Na Prous Boneta, 739 of prophets, 673
 of Radegund, 736
 of Rose of Viterbo, 722, 738, 778
 in Sister-Books, 738
 social status and, 767
 suspicious claims to, 739 of Theoda, 737
 on Virgin Mary, 547
 women as audience for, 737–738 of women ordained as priests, 625, 825–826
- Servant Saints. See also Zita and Other Servant Saints
 Zita of Lucca as, 863
- Servants, 741–742
 apprentices as, 741 conduct literature on, 741–742
 as Ladies-in-Waiting, 741 poverty of, 663
 singlewomen as, 741, 759
 social status of, 741, 767
- Service of Ladies* (Lichtenstein), 565
- Sescás, Amanieu de, 160
- Seven Graces, The* (Dorothea of Montau), 351
- Seven Revelations* (Brocadelli), 224
- Seven Sages of Rome, The*, 710
- Seven Spiritual Weapons, The* (Caterina Vigri), 351, 778
- Seven Ways of Loving God* (Beatrice of Nazareth), 600
- Seven Works of Mercy, 14
- Severus, Sulpicius, 108
- Sevillana medicina (Medicine of Seville)* (Aviñón), 479
- Sexburga of Ely, 349
- Sexual Inversion* (Ellis), 748
- Sexuality: Extramarital Sex, 742–745 adultery in, 743–744
 canon law on, 743–744
 charivari for, 121
 chastity and, 743
 church on, 743, 744
 concubines and, 744
 crimes for, 744
 double standards for, 743, 744
 fornication in, 742–743 of Guinevere, 338
 illegitimacy in, 395
marchet/leyrwrite on, 560 procreation/conception in, 671–672
 prostitution in, 674–678
 rape/raptus in, 743
 sexual transgressions in, 744
- Sexuality: Female Same Sex Relations, 745–747 Amer on, 747
 Beguines and, 746
 Benkov on, 747
 Bennett on, 746
 Brooten on, 746
 Clark, Robert on, 747
 Crompton on, 745
 cross-dressing in, 746
 Forteguerrri on, 747
 Foucault on, 745
 Fuss, Diana on, 745
 Guthrie on, 747

- historiography of, 745
 Hutcheson on, 747
 Jankowski on, 746
 “lesbian-like” in, 746–747
 Malt-Douglas on, 747 Matter, Ann on, 745
 Murray, Jacqueline on, 746
 Puff, Helmut on, 747
 Queer theory for, 691
 queer theory for, 745–746
 Sauer on, 746
 Sautman on, 745, 747
 Schibanoff on, 747
 Sheingorn on, 745, 747 trial records for, 747
 Vanita on, 747
Sexuality in Medieval Europe: Doing unto Others (Karras), 261
 Sexuality: Male Same Sex Relations, 748–750
   Bailey on, 749
   Boswell on, 749
   Brundage on, 749
   church on, 749
   cross-dressing in, 749
   Ellis on, 748
   Foucault on, 749
   homosocial relationships in, 749
   Jordan, Mark on, 749
   Payer, Pierre J. on, 749
   penitentials for, 749
   queer theory for, 749
   Queer theory of, 691
   Rykner of, 183
 Sexuality, Regulation of, 750–755
   asceticism in, 47
   Biblical teaching of, 750–751
   canon law for, 753–754
   for chastity, 751
   for clerics’ celibacy, 751, 753
   in extramarital sex, 742–744
   French customary laws for, 454
   of Germanic peoples, 752–753
   Gratian on, 753–754
   patristic teachings of, 751–752
   penitentials for, 645, 753
   for prostitutes, 677
   Reform Movement and, 753
   for virginity, 751
 Sexuality: Sex in Marriage
   asceticism in, 755
   Chaucer on, 756
   conjugal debt in, 755
   fabliau for, 756
   impotence in, 397, 398 literature on, 756
   medicine for, 756
   procreation/conception in, 671–672
   religious viewpoints of, 755–756 taboos for, 756
   two-seed theory in, 756
 Shabbetai, Judah Ibn, 570
 Shahr, Shulamith, 325
 Shajarrat Ad-Durr, 594
 Shakespeare, William, 185, 479
 Sheela Na Gigs, 83, 560, 756–757
   art representation in, 38
   in erotic art, 260
   Freitag on, 757
   for infertility, 403
   Jerman on, 756
   Weir on, 756
 Sheingorn, Pamela, 745, 747
 Shekhinah, 757–758
   female aspect of the divine, 425
   rabbinic conception of, 757
Ship of Fools, The, 205
 “Shipman’s Tale, The” (Chaucer), 222
 Shivaree. See Charivari
Showings (Julian of Norwich), 351, 424, 436
   Jesus as mother in, 423
Shulhan Arukh (Set Table) (Caro), 460
 Sibyls, Nordic prophets as, 674
 Sicelgaita of Salerno, 416
Siege of Thebes (Lydgate), 716
Siervo libre de amor (The Free(d) Servant of Love (Rodríguez de Padrón), 735
Siete Partidas (Alfonso X), 478
 Sigillography. See Seals and Sigillography
 Sigismund of Luxembourg, 535
SIGNS: A Journal of Women in Culture and Society (journal), 371 Silence. See Roman de Silence
 Singlewomen, 759–761
   Beguines and, 759
   brewing by, 759
   in countryside, 760
   English secular court law on, 455
   as German woman authors, 848
   leyrwite for, 760
   merchet of, 559
   poverty of, 663
   as prostitutes, 759, 760
   as servants, 741, 759
   social status of, 760
   in town life, 759
 Sintram Codex, 612
Sir Degrevant, 716
Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, 42, 786, 821
 Sirens. See Mermaids and Sirens
 Sister-Books and Other Convent Chronicles, 237, 761–762, 819
   Adelhausen Sister-Book, 761
   in Chapter of Windesheim, 574
   of Dominican Order, 761, 762
   Ebner and, 761
   Engelthal Sister-Book, 761 of German women authors, 847
   Gotteszell Sister-Book, 761
   hagiography in, 761
   Kirchberg Sister-Book, 761 of Modern Devotion, 573
   of mysticism/mystics, 597
   necrologies/mortuary rolls of, 762
   Oetenbach Sister-Book, 761
   sermon impact in, 738 of sermons/preaching, 740
   St. Katharinenthal Sister-Book, 761 of Stägel, 761, 782
   Töss Sister-Book, 761
   Unterlinden Sister-Book, 761
   Weiler Sister-Book, 762
 Sisters of the Common Life, of Modern Devotion, 573
 Sixtus IV (Pope), 112, 397, 770

INDEX

- Skáldatal (List of Poets)*, 763 Skáldkonur, 762–763 of Norse literature, 762–763 prophets in, 762
   Valkyries in, 762
 Slander. See Gossip and Slander
 Slaves, 763–766
   canon law for, 763 early Medieval slavery of, 764 Heyd on, 764
   manumission of, 764–765
   McKee on, 765
   slave trade for, 763–764, 764, 765
   social status of, 766, 767
   Strozzi on, 764
 Smalley, Beryl, 854
 Smith, Susan, 844
 Social Status, 766–768
   Archer, Janice on, 767 conduct literature and, 767 courtly love literature and, 768
   in domestic architecture, 29
   dowry and, 767
   Farmer, Sharon on, 767, 768
   gender and, 767
   Gravdal on, 768
   household management and, 767
   Klapisch-Zuber on, 767
   Lansing on, 767, 768
   marriage and, 766–767, 768 pastourelle and, 768
   of peasants, 642–643
   peasants in, 766
   of prostitutes, 768
   responsibilities of, 767
   Rossiaud on, 768
   sermons/preaching and, 767 of servants, 741
   of singlewomen, 760
   of slaves, 766, 767
   social-economic groups of, 766 spirituality/sanctity of, 768 stereotypes for, 767–768
   of widows, 767
   Wolf, Kenneth on, 768
   of women in artisan families, 766, 767 of women in merchant families, 766, 767
 Social systems, of agricultural production, 12
 Solente, Suzanne, 854
 Solomon (King), 39
Solutiones triginta octo quaestionum (Solutions for Thirty-Eight Questions) (Hildegard of Bingen), 366
Song of Roland, 65, 88, 128, 594
 Song of Songs, 204, 260, 280, 396, 583, 595, 648, 737, 779
   Bernard of Clairvaux on, 597
   Christ in, 312
   Jerome commentary on, 422
   Virgin Mary in music in, 548 virginity imagery in, 819
 Song of Songs, Medieval Interpretations of, 539–540, 769–770
   Bride of Christ in, 769
   eroticism in literature for, 769
   gender ideologies in, 769
 Song, Woman's. See Woman's Song Sophia Palaiologina, 248, 770. See also Zoe (Empress)
   of Byzantium, 770
   Russia union with, 770
 Sophronios, on Mary the Egyptian, 536
 Soranus of Ephesus, medical literature of, 93
 Sorokin, Pitrim, 347
 Soul, 770–771
   Aquinas on, 771
   Aristotelian concepts of, 771
   Augustine of Hippo on, 771
   in Jewish mystical thought, 425
   scholasticism of, 770–771
   theology of, 770
Soul's Journey into God (Bonaventure), 777
 Space, Sacred: and Gender, 771–773
   in double monasteries, 772
   in ecclesiastical architecture, 30–31, 772 exclusionary practices for, 772
   in monastic architecture, 772
   for monasticism/nuns, 772
   private/public spheres of, 670
 Space, Secular: and Gender, 773–775
   in domestic architecture, 28–29, 774
   private/public spheres of, 670, 774
 Spain. See Iberia
 Spain, Daphne, 670
 Spanish Epic. See Epic, Spanish
 Spanish Literature. See Literature, Iberian Spanish Texts, Women Authors. See Women Authors: Spanish Texts
Speculum Ecclesiae, 204
Speculum: the Journal of the Medieval Academy of America, 372
Spill o Libre de les dones (Mirror or book on women) (Roig), 480 Spirits: Discernment of and Possession by, 775–776
   demonic possession of, 775
   divine possession of, 775
   Gerson on, 321
   madness in, 503
   mysticism/mystics and, 775 prophets and, 775
   Satan and, 726, 775
   witches and, 775
 Spiritual Advisors. See Spiritual Care
 Spiritual Care, 776–778
   inspirational literature for, 777
   of Maria of Venice, 511–512 meditation in, 554–555
   from monks/frairs, 777 for nuns, 777
   parish priests in, 776–777
   penitentials/pastoral manuals for, 644–645
   of Premonstratensian Order, 669–670
   women's provision of, 777–778
Spiritual Exercises (Gertrude the Great), 323
 Spirituality, Christian, 779–782
   in Ancrene Wisse, 19–20
   Christ's suffering as model of, 780
   Eucharistic spirituality in, 780–781 humanity of Christ in, 780 Latin literacy in, 779 monastic spirituality of, 779
   Newman on, 781
   secular culture and, 779–780 spiritual power in, 781
 Spurgeon, Caroline, 854
 Stafford, Pauline, 239

- Stagel, Elsbeth, 761, 782, 847
 Suso and, 782
 Töss Sister-Book by, 782
Stairway of Perfection, The, 205
 Stanbury, Sarah, 307
Stans Puer ad mensam, 220
 Status of Women. See Country articles beginning with Eastern Europe and England
 Steinberg, Leo, 259, 545
 Stenton, Doris Mary, 369, 370
 Stenton, Dorothy, 854
 Stephen of Blois, 356, 468, 551
 Stephen of Bourbon, 658, 737
 Stephen (King) of England, 6, 154, 339, 394
 Stephen (King) of Hungary, 394
 Stephen of Ripon, 10
 Stephen V (King), 535
 Stephen-Henry, 6
 Stevenson, Jane, 708
Stifte (houses of canonesses), 1
 Strict Observance, Cistercian Order reform of, 142
 Strozzi, Alessandra, 558, 559, 767, 783
 letter writing of, 783
 of merchant family, 558, 559, 783 on slaves, 764
 Stuard, Susan Mosher, 289
Studies in English Trade in the Fifteenth Century (Power/Postan), 666 Studies in Renaissance Thought and Letters (Kristeller), 707 Sturluson, Snorri, 763 Succession, Royal and Noble, 783–784
 inheritance in, 783
 Jacqueline of Bavaria in, 420
 in kinship, 783
Lex Salica legal code for, 783–784
 males as priority to, 783 of Mary of Hungary II, 535 of Matilda (Empress), 551
 of noble women, 609–610
 in Northern France, 784
 political elites in, 783
 of Queens/Empresses of West, 690
 Suleiman, Susan, 696
Summa de arte praedicandi (Thomas of Chobham), 737
Summa Theologica (Aquinas), 14, 625
 Sumptuary Law, 784–785
 for clothing, 784, 785 consumption and, 784–785
 of Italy, 784
 for prostitutes, 677
 Sanuti and, 785
 social status and, 784, 785
 Supernatural Women, 786–787
 in Arthurian literature, 42–43, 786
 Guinivere as, 786
 in Irish literature, 481
 in Mélusine, 556–557
 mermaids/sirens as, 560, 786
 Nordic prophets of, 674, 786
 in paganism, 629
 valkyries and, 811
 wild women as, 837
Supra Montem, 658
 Suso, Henry, 782
 Suydam, Mary, 647
Swan Knight, Henry of Brabant in, 394
 Swynford, Katherine, 157
Symphonia harmoniae caelestium revelationum (Symphony of Harmony of Heavenly Revelations) (Hildegard of Bingen), 591
 Synesaktism, asceticism and, 47
 Synod of Whitby, Abbess Hild and, 3
 Syon Abbey, 787–788
 of Birgittine Order, 787
 Birgittine Order and, 76 devotional practice in, 787
 monasticism/nuns of, 787
 Syon Cope, 46
- ## T
- Tacitus, 629
 on Scotland, 731
Táin Bó Cúailnge (Cattle Raid of Cooley) (O’Rahilly/MacNeill), 409, 481
 Talbot, Anne, 8
Tale of Joan of Arc (Christine de Pizan), 134 Talmud, Jewish law in, 459
Talumd, Babylonian, 459
Taming of the Shew, The (Shakespeare), 479
 Tancred Count of Lecce (King), 165
 Tawney, R.H., 666
Tawq al-hamama (The Dove’s Neckring) (Ibn Hazm), 478
 Teachers. See Education, Beguine; Education, Lay; Education, Monastic; Literacy and Reading: Latin; Literacy and Reading: Vernacular; Monasticism and Nuns; Monasticism and Nuns, Byzantine; Monasticism and Nuns, Celtic; Mothers as Teachers Teachers, Mothers as. See Mothers as Teachers Teenagers. See Adolescence “Temptations,” in Ancrene Wisse, 20
 Teresa de Cartagena, 480, 789, 853–854
 deafness of, 789
 Iberian literature of, 789
 Teresa of Avila, 584, 600, 769–770
 Teresa of Portugal (Countess), 184, 391
 Tertiaries, 355, 463, 789–891
 Angela of Foligno as, 791
 asceticism of, 48
 charity/mysticism of, 791 Franciscan/Dominican groups of, 789, 790 guidelines for, 790
 Margaret of Cortona as, 507 religious laywomen of, 790 ways of life for, 790
 Tertullian, 149, 173, 398, 562, 570
 on devotional practices, 206
 on Eve, 267
 on extravagant consumption, 166
 Teutonicus, Johannes, 221, 625
 Textile Production for the Market, 791–795 apprentices and, 26
 of artisan families, 45
 division of labor in, 791
 in Flanders, 294
 in Germanic lands, 319–320
 guilds in, 337, 794
 Howell on, 794
 of Humiliati, 385
 Industrial Revolution and, 792, 794 poverty in, 663

INDEX

- Textile Production for the Market (cont.)
 pre-finishing process in, 792–793 weaving revolution in, 793–794
 of women, 856
 woolens and, 792
 worsteds and, 792
- Thalestris, 16
- Theobald of Blois, 428
- Theodahad, 16
- Theodechilde, 98
- Theodolinda (Queen), 349
- Theodora (Empress), 84, 104, 247, 248, 249, 393, 412, 516, 627, 678, 795
 Amalasantha and, 16
 artistic patronage of, 635, 795
 of Byzantium, 795
 coinage of, 154
 Justinian as husband of, 103, 795 travel of, 103, 795
- Theodore of Canterbury, 644
- Theodoric II the Great (King), 16
 Burgundian law code by, 59
- Theodoric of Echternach, 365
- Theodosia (Saint), 393
- Theodosian Code, 714
 Justinian on, 714–715
- Theodosius II (Emperor), 59, 348, 714
 on divorce, 706
- Theology, 346, 796
 Angela of Foligno emphasis of, 21 of Aristotle, 796
 Augustine influence on, 52–53, 796 of Ava, 56
 of Beatrice of Nazareth on love of God, 63
 of Beguines, 68
 of Christian spirituality, 779 of Chrysostom, 538
 Dhuoda on, 209
 Gerson on, 320, 329, 796
 of Gertrude the Great, 323
 of Gregory the Great, 796
 of Immaculate Conception, 396
 Jerome influence on, 422, 796 of Jesus, 423, 796
 of Julian of Norwich, 423–424, 437
 of Marguerite Porete, 510–511, 796
 on marriage, 530
 medieval interpretation of, 595 on priest ordination, 625–626 on Satan, 726
 of scholasticism, 729, 796
 of Shekhinah, 757–758
 of soul, 770
 of spiritual care, 778
 St. Paul on, 136
 of Teresa de Cartagena, 789
 in universities, 796
 of Virgin Mary, 541, 796
- Theophano, 7, 318, 468, 536, 626, 815
- Theophanu, 210
- Theophrastus, 570
- Theotokos* (Mother of God), 537, 538, 543, 627 as mediator between humanity/Christ, 101
- Theseus, 16
- Thesiad* (Boccaccio), 16
- Theuda
 as prophet, 737
 sermons/preaching of, 737
- Theutberga, 215
- Thibaud II, 361
- Thibaud III, 6
- Thibaud IV, 6
- Third Crusade, Eleanor of Aquitaine and, 244
- Third Lateran Council, 466
- Third Order of St. Francis, 21
- Thomas Aquinas. See Scholasticism
- Thomas d'Angleterre, 717
- Thomas of Cantimpré, 514
- Thomas of Celano, 109
- Thomas of Chobham, 407, 737
 on prostitutes, 675
- Thomas of Saluzzo, on Preuses, 608
- Thomassy, Marie-Jospeh-Raymond, 369
- Thompson, Sally, on ecclesiastical patronage, 638
- Three Virtues. See* Book of the Three Virtues, The (Christine de Pizan)
- Thrush and the Nightingale, The*, 196
- Thuringian War, The* (Radegund), 493
- Thurstand of York, 6
- Ties That Bound, The* (Hanawalt), 372
- Titarel* (Eschenbach), 843, 844
- Tochmarc Étaine*, 552
- Todros, David (Rabbi), 428
- Tolkien, J.R.R., on “AB” dialect, 19
- Tombs. See Burials and Tombs
- Tonberht, 10
- Tornabuoni, de' Medici, Lucrezia
 devotional literature of, 796
 of Italy, 796
 patronage of, 796
- Tornabuoni de' Medici, Lucrezia, 253, 796–797
- Torroella, Pere, 571
- Töss Sister-Book (Stagel), 761, 782
- Tournament of Ladies*, warfare in, 831
- Tournaments, 797
 arms/armor in, 37, 797
 chivalry in, 797
 warfare in, 797
- Towns. See Cities and Towns
- Tractatis de Laudibus Sanctissimae Matris Anne* (Trithemius), 25
- Tracy, Grace de, concubine of Henry I (King), 158
- Tradeswomen. See Market and Tradeswomen
- Traité de morale et d'économie (Treatise of Morals and Economy)* (Goodman), 88
- Transformation of Fortune, The* (Christine de Pizan), 134
- Translation, 797–799
 of Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, 549 of Beaufort, Margaret, 64, 205 of Books of Hours, 90 of Christine de Pizan, 798 of Clemence of Barking, 798 of Decameron, 334, 335
 by Ekbert, 246–247
 of French Romance, 716
 of Hildegard of Bingen, 798 into Latin, 798
 literary patronage of, 797–798
 of Marie de France, 512, 513–514, 798–799 of Mathilda, 549 of Mélusine, 556

- of Vulgate Bible, 422 women on, 798–799
 Transvestism. See Cross-Dressing
 Travel. See Migration and Mobility; Pilgrims and Pilgrimage
Treasury of the City of Ladies (Christine de Pizan), 161, 380
Treatments for Women (Trota of Salerno), 341, 605 Treaty of Troyes of 1420, 432
Très Riches Heures (Jean, Duke of Berry), 40, 207
Tretis of the Tua Maritt Wemen and the Wedo (Dunbar), 451
 Trexler, Richard C., 676
 Tridentine reform, 30
Tristan (Strassburg), 42, 146, 148, 289, 331, 414, 494, 536, 572, 717, 718
   courtly love in, 175
   Isolde and, 414–415
Tristan and Isolde (Wagner), 415
Triste deleytación (Sorrowful Delectation), 735 Trithemius, Johannes, 25
Triumph of Chastity (Petrarch), 803
Triumph of Fame (Petrarch), 803
Triumph of Love (Petrarch), 803
Triunfo de amor (The Triumph of Love) (Flores), 735
 Trobairitz and Troubadours, 711, 779, 799–800
   Duby on, 800
   Ermengard as patron of, 259
   in erotic literature, 261
   literary patronage for, 641
   on lovesickness, 499 in lyric performance, 646
   misogyny of, 571–572
   of music, women, 591
   in Occitan literature, 490, 622
   in Old French literature, 493
   in Ovid medieval reception of, 628 of pastourelle, 632
   trouvères and, 803
   woman's song of, 845
Troilus and Criseyde (Chaucer), 24, 88, 125, 499, 602, 628, 716
 Trojan War, 16
 Trota of Salerno, 216, 240, 342, 470, 561, 800–801, 849 cosmetics of, 801
   as doctor/healer, 800–801
   on gynecology, 341
   on infertility, 403 medical writer, 168
   on natural world, 605–606
   Practica of, 800–801
   Treatments for Women by, 801
Trotula: A Medieval Compendium of Women's Medicine, The (Green), 372, 733
   on menstruation, 558
 Troubadours. See Trobairitz and Troubadours
 Trousseau, 801–803
   Cassoni in, 803 clothing as, 802
   consumption and, 802
   dowry and, 802
   jewelry in, 802
   for Jewish women, 802
   in marriage ceremonies, 516
   Parapherna in, 802
 Trouvères, Women, 803–804
   Blanche of Castile as, 803
   song in, 804
 Tudela, Guilhem de, 490
Tudor Economic Documents (Power/Tawney), 666
 Turner, Edith, 653
 Turner, Victor, 653
Tuscans and Their Families (Herlihy/Klapisch-Zuber), 22 Typology and Women, 804–805
   Judith in, 805
   Mary Magdalene in, 805
   women as types of Christ in, 805
- ## U
- Ubertino of Casale, 21
 Ugo of Arles, 218
 Underhill, Evelyn, 854
Undoing Gender (Butler), 312
 Unicorn, 807
   artistic representations of, 807
   for courtly love, 807
   virginity and, 807
 Universities, 601, 807–808
   Aristotelian concepts in, 808
   Christine de Pizan on, 808
   for medical licensing, 217
   patronage for, 638
   scholasticism and, 730, 808
   theology in, 796
   women's nonparticipation in, 808
 University of Strasbourg, Annales School of History in, 22
 Unterlinden Sister-Book, 761
 Urban III (Pope), 127, 413
 Urban IV (Pope), 413, 577 on Order of Saint Clare, 657
 Urban V (Pope), 577
   on Birgittine Order, 75
 Urban VI (Pope), 117, 430, 739
   on Birgittine Order, 75
 Urraca (Queen), 184, 258, 652, 682, 809
   Alfonso VI as father of, 808
   burial of, 99
   coinage of, 154
   consort of, 809
   ecclesiastical patronage of, 809
   of Iberia, 809
   moral laxity of, 809
 Ursula and Her Companions, 246, 705, 809–810
   Elisabeth of Schönau on, 809
   iconographic hagiography of, 809 Memling painting by, 354
   relics/reliquaries of, 809, 810
Ut mulieribus ornamentar restituantur (That Ornaments Be Restored to Women) (Sanuti), 725
Uta Codex, 242
 Utrecht, diocese of, 134
- ## V
- Vadstena church, 30, 33, 76
 Valdemar IV, 510
 Valence, Joan de, household accounts of, 379
 Valencia, 217
 Valentinian I, 422
 Valkyries, 811
   arms/armor of, 37, 152
   in Beowulf, 811
   in Old Norse literature, 496

INDEX

- Valkyries (cont.)
 in paganism, 629
 in Skáldkonur, 762 supernatural women and, 811
- Van Mierlo, Joseph, 345
- Vanita, Ruth, 747
- Vaucher, André, 48
- Vecchietta, Catherine of Siena altarpiece by, 355
- Veil of Veronica, 202
- Ventadorn, Bertrand de, 498, 641
- Verdon, Theobald de, 357
- Verdun, Rohesia de, as castle builder, 110–111
- Vergerio, Pier Paolo, humanist teacher, 383
- Vernacular theology. See Devotional Literature
- Veronica's Veil, 811
 Boniface VIII (Pope) on, 812
 Christ likeness in, 812
 in Golden Legend, 812
- Vézelay, Mary Magdalene pilgrimage site of, 532
- Vienna Genesis*, 39
- Vigri, Caterina. See Caterina Vigri
- Villemagne, Preciosa de, 427
- Villena, Isabel de, 480
- Villey-St-Etienne cemetery, 27
- Villon, François, 812–813
 on prostitutes, 812
- Vincent of Beauvais, 590
- Violence, 813–814
 arms/armor in, 36–37
 in ballads, 58–59
 Barbarian Law Codes for, 813
 Beowulf portrayal of, 70 of crimes/criminals, 814 cross-dressing/female, 814 of Dorothea of Montau, 225 female, 813
 for honor/reputation, 813
 in Old Norse literature, 813
 theoretical issues of, 814 vengeance/vindication as purposes of, 813 of virgin martyr, 815
 in warfare, 814
 wergild and, 831
- Virgil, 243, 601, 803
- Virgin Martyrs, 814–816 of Agnes, 814
 ascetic as, 108
 canonization of saints of, 108
 Catherine of Alexandria as, 115, 814, 818 of Cecilia, 814 Christ as first, 108
 in church, 137–138
 Ebba of Coldingham as, 349
 Foy as, 298
 in hagiography, iconographic aspects of, 354, 816
 hagiography of, 814
 historical development of, 815
 Hrotsvit of Gandersheim on, 815 influence/afterlife of, 815–716
 Katherine Group on, 439–440
 legends for, 815
 Margaret of Antioch as, 506, 814, 818
 rape and, 815
 saints as, 348
 violence of, 815
 virginity of, 818
- Virgin Mary, 31, 196, 278, 309, 355. See Mary, Virgin (all entries)
 Anne (Saint) and, 14
 art representations of, 40
 Birgittine Order in honor of, 75 in Book of Hours, 89
 books of piety on, 86
 bride of Christ and, 95
 Caesarean section by, 106 elements of beauty of, 65
 Elisabeth of Schönau on, 246
 maternal imagery and, 81
 as Queen of Heaven, 95
 Vigri's art of, 113
 weaving/spinning of, 152
- Virginité, 349, 751, 816–820
 of abbesses, 819
 Aethelthryth as icon of, 10–11
 Ambrose on, 123
 asceticism of, 570, 819
 Augustine (Saint) on, 817
 Christian concept of, 817
 of Christina of Markyate, 818
 conduct literature on, 818 for cultural production, 819 of Edward the Confessor, 819 of Eustochium, 422
 gender ideology aspect of, 311
 hagiography for, 818 of Herrad of Hohenbourg, 819
 of Hildegard of Bingen, 819
 Hildegard of Bingen on, 818
 imagery of Bride of Christ in, 819
 Jerome on, 123
 of Joan of Arc, 431
 Katherine Group on, 439–440
 as life stage, 818
 lifelong, 818–819
 male, 819
 medical concepts of, 817–818
 of monasticism/nuns, 579–580
 of Radegund, 693
 rape/raptus and, 694
 in Song of Songs, 819
 unicorn and, 807
 virgin martyr and, 818
 Virgin Mary and, 538, 540
 of vowesses, 823
- Virile Women, 285, 820–821
 Amazons and, 16–17
 Augustine on, 52
 gender ideologies for, 820
 in Irish literature, 481
 landholding/property rights of, 821
 as leaders in Europe, 821
 Matilda of Tuscany, 550
 Ottonian royal women as, 821
- Visconti, Valentina, as ambassador of culture, 87
- Visigoths, 52, 581
 Athanagild as king of, 684
 Barbarian Law Codes for, 59 laws of, 59
- Vision of Bake, Alijt, 57
 of Birgitta of Sweden, 74

- Visitatio Spulchri* (Katherine of Sutton), 232, 233
 Visitations, Monastic. See Monastic Visitations
Vita (Gilbert), 324
Vita Aedwardi Regis, 239
Vita Christ (Life of Christ) (Villena), 480
Vita Merlini (Geoffrey of Monmouth), 786
Vita Nuova (Dante), 62, 190
Vitae Patrum, 486
 Vitry, Jacques de, 107, 309, 500, 547, 656 on Marie of Oignies, 514
   sermons/preaching of, 530
 Vitry, Jean de, 676
 Vladimir (Prince), 723
 Voice, Female: in Literature, 821–822
   in Beowulf, 821
   in Consolation, 822 in death lament, 822
   in Divine Comedy, 822
   in Evangiles des Quenouilles, 266 in female-authored texts, 822 in Lancelot, 821 in Laxdaela Saga, 821 in love complaint, 822 mysticism and, 822
   in pastourelle, 822
   in Poetic Edda, 821
   in Romance of the Rose, 822 in Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, 822 of trobairitz/troubadours, 799–800 of trouvères, 803–804
 Volmar, 365, 366
 Vorau manuscript, 56
 Vowesses, 822–823
   chastity/chaste marriages of, 823
   as religious laywomen, 812
   virginity of, 823
   widows as, 822, 833
Vows of the Peacock (Longuyon), 608 Vulgate, 146, 717
   on Catherine of Alexandria's life, 115
   Jerome translation of Bible, 422
- W
- Wagner, Richard, 415
 Waldemar IV (King), 310, 682
 Waldensians, 361, 417, 739, 825–826
   lay reform movement of, 462
   Merlo on, 825
   religious poverty of, 664
   sermons/preaching of, 825–826
   on witches, 841
   on women's ordination as priests, 625 women's spiritual leadership in, 825–826
 Waldrada, 217, 218
 Wales, 826–827
   Christian marriage in, 827
   divorce in, 827
   inheritance in, 826
   landholding/property rights of women in, 826–827
   monasticism/nuns in, 587
   women's literacy in, 827
 Walker, Sue Sheridan, on landholding/property rights, 448 Wallada Bint Al-Mustakfi, 478, 592, 827–828
   poetry of, 828
Wanderer, The, 679
 Wardship, 828–829
   betrothal of children in, 828 feudal, 828
   of girls/boys, 326
   heiresses in, 828
   landholding/property rights in, 828
 Warfare, 829–831
   Adela of Blois and, 830
   Amazons and, 16
   arms/armor in, 36–37
   chivalry in, 128
   in crusades, 829
   female violence in, 814 Iberian chronicles of, 830
   of Joan of Arc, 432–433
   Nine Worthy Women in, 608 representation in, 830
   roles in, 829–830
   in Roman de Silence, 831
   in Tournament of Ladies, 831
   in tournaments, 797
   of valkyries, 811
   women warriors in, 830
   women's influence on, 830
 Warner, Marina, 541
 Wealththeow, as major figure in Beowulf, 70
 Weapons. See Armor and Weapons
 Weaver, Elissa, 708
 Website resources
   Feminae index of articles, 373
   Matrix for monastic house listings, 373
Wedding of Sir Gawain and Dame Ragnell, The (Chaucer), 786 Weddings. See Marriage Ceremonies
 Weiler Sister-Book, 672
 Weinstein, Donald, 347
 Weir, Anthony, 756
 Welles, Cecily, 473
 Wemple, Suzane Fonay, 122, 289, 370, 371
 Wergild, 60, 831–832
   for abortion, 831
   Barbarian Law Codes for, 60, 831
   for crimes/criminals, 831
   German law for, 457
   violence and, 831
 Wernher, Prester, 474
 Weston, Jessie, 854
 Wet-nursing. See Breastfeeding and Wet-nursing
Wfl. See Wife's Lament, The Wiborada (Saint), 350
 Widows, 832–835
   administration of estates by, 8 alternative for, 833
   as anchoresses, 18
   Beguines for, 833
   Blanche of Castile as, 832
   in Christian marriage, 519, 522–523
   demography of, 200
   in Eastern Europe, 236
   ecclesiastical patronage of, 638
   in England, 251
   English secular court law on, 456
   feme covert and, 282 feudal law on, 832
   French customary laws for, 454

INDEX

Widows (cont.)

- Guibert of Nogent's mother as, 336
- heiresses as, 834
- independence of, 834
- landholding/property rights of, 448–449
- law for, 452
- Margaret of York as, 508
- misogyny and, 832
- monasticism/nuns for, 833
- in old age, 623, 624
- peasants as, 643
- poverty of, 663–664
- problems of, 832–833
- remarriage of, 706, 832, 833–834
- vowesses as, 822
- Yvette of Huy as, 861
- Widows as Guardians, 835–836
  - in Iberia, 836
  - in Italy, 836
  - for Jewish women, 835
  - Jewish women for, 427
  - legal agency in, 464
  - remarriage of, 835
  - Roman law for, 835
  - in wills, 838
- Wife Beating. See Domestic Abuse
- Wife of Bath, 50, 330, 335, 451, 486, 623, 653, 702, 707, 756, 786, 801, 832, 836, 844
  - as Chaucer character, 126, 127
  - clothmaking by, 151
  - as critic of male medieval history, 287
  - Jerome on, 836
  - misogyny on, 836
- Wife of Bath's Tale* (Chaucer), 628
- Wife's Lament, The* (Wfl), 492, 679
- Wigalois* (Grafenberg), 836
- Wild Women, 836–837
  - Chaucer on, 837
  - sexualization of, 837
  - supernatural, 837
  - in Wigalois, 836–837
  - in Wolfdietrich B, 836
- Wilfrid of York (Bishop), 10, 685
- Willard, Charity Cannon, 854
- Willehelm* (Eschenbach), 17, 474, 843
- Willem the Procurator, 135
- William, 6
- William I (Count), 135
- William II, 403
- William IV (Count), 135
- William IX, 174
- William of Aquitaine, 498
- William of Auvergne, 726
- William of Habsburg, 421
- William of Malmesbury, 358
- William of Rievaulx, 324
- William of Saint-Thierry, 95
- William of Ware, 396
- William the Conqueror, 6, 152, 239, 274, 731, 783, 830
- William the Pious, 209
- William VI (Count), 420
- Wills, 837–839
  - almsgiving/charity in, 14–15, 838
  - in Annales School of History, 838
  - for dame schools, 471
  - dowries in, 839
  - English secular court law on, 455
  - genealogy in, 838
  - as historical sources, 838
  - inheritance in, 406, 838
  - legal practices in, 837–838
  - Roman law on, 838
  - for urban records, 702
  - women as guardians in, 838
  - women in others', 838–839
- Wilson, Adrian, 500
- Wimbourne, double monastery of, 465
- Winstead, Karen A., on Golden Legend, 420
- Wisdom, 840
  - allegories for, 840
  - Christine de Pizan and, 840
  - Hildegard of Bingen and, 840
  - Jesus as mother comparison to, 423
  - women personification of, 840
- Witches, 331, 840–843
  - and abortion, 5
  - in art, 40
  - art representations of, 40
  - canon law on, 841
  - European stereotype of, 840–842
  - executions of, 841
  - as female, 842
  - as heretics, 362, 841
  - impotence by, 398
  - Innocent VIII (Pope) on, 842
  - magic/charms of, 505
  - medieval precursor of, 842
  - misogyny on, 572, 842
  - paganism of, 841
  - penitential manuals on, 841
  - Satan and, 726, 841
  - in Secrets of Women, 734
  - Waldensians on, 841
  - witchcraft/sorcery of, 840
- Wladislaw III (King), 445
- WLE*. See Wulf and Eadwacer
- Wogan-Browne, Jocelyn, 146
  - on Golden Legend, 420
- Wolf, Kenneth, 768
- Wolfdietrich B*, 836
- Wolfram von Eschenbach, 17, 719, 843–844
  - on Amazons, 17
  - Arthurian literature and, 841
  - Chrétien de Troye and, 843
  - German literature of, 843–844
  - on infants, 402
  - patronage of, 843
- Wollstonecraft, Mary, feminist theory of, 287
- Woman on Top, 844–845
  - Aristotelian concepts of, 844
  - cross-dressing of, 844, 845
  - in double monasteries, 226
  - Eve and, 844
  - in festivals of misrule, 292
  - misogyny of, 844
  - Smith on, 844
  - visual arts for, 845
- Woman on Top* (Davis), 844
- Woman's Song, 845–846
  - of courtly love, 845

- dance for, 845
 Dawn Song (Alba) in, 846
 Klinck on, 845, 846
 lyric performance of, 646
 minnesang and, 846 of troubairitz/troubadours, 799–800, 845
 of trouvères, 804
- Women
 in agriculture, 12
 almsgiving/charity of, 14–15
 in architecture, monastic, 33–34
 Aristotle and, 35
 as patrons of architecture, ecclesiastical, 31
- Women Authors: German Texts, 319, 847–849
 Ava as, 56, 847
 Dominican nuns as, 847–848
 Elisabeth of Schönau as, 245, 847
 Gertrude of Hackeborn as, 847
 Gertrude the Great as, 847
 Hätzlerin as, 848
 Herrad of Hohenbourg as, 363, 847
 Hildegard of Bingen as, 381–382, 473, 847
 Hrotsvit of Gandersheim as, 847
 Kotanner as, 848
 literacy of, 848
 Mechthild of Hackeborn as, 847
 Mechthild of Magdeburg as, 553, 847 religious writings of, 847–848 of Sister-Books, 761–762
 Stigel as, 782
- Women Authors: Italian Texts, 849
 Angela of Foligno as, 849
 Catherine of Siena as, 849
 King, Margaret on, 708
 Nogarola, Isotta as, 611, 849
 Panizza on, 708
 Rabil on, 708
 Tornabuoni de' Medici, Lucrezia as, 796–797
 Trota of Salerno as, 849
- Women Authors: Latin Texts, 761–762, 849–850
 Adela of Blois literacy of, 6
 Barbarian Law Codes of, 60
 Caesaria of Arles as, 849
 Cereta as, 120, 850
 devotional literature in, 204
 Dhuoda as, 850
 Elisabeth of Schönau and, 247
 Hildegard of Bingen as, 849
 Hrotsvit of Gandersheim as, 381, 849
 humanism in, 850
 Humility of Faenza and, 385–386
 for lay education, 240
 literacy/reading of, 469–471
 Perpetua as, 849
 Radegund as, 693, 849
 Stevenson on, 708
- Women Authors: Middle English Texts, 851–852
 Beaufort, Margaret as, 851
 Berners as, 851
 Hull, Eleanor as, 851
 Julian of Norwich as, 437, 851
 Kempe as, 851
 Paston letters as, 851 religious works of, 851
- Women Authors: Old French Texts, 852–853
 Christine de Pizan as, 133–134, 289, 301, 852–853
 Marguerite Porete as, 510–511, 852
 Marie de France as, 289, 301, 512–514, 853 narrative poems of, 852
 in Old French literature, 494
- Women Authors: Spanish Texts, 853–854
 López de Córdoba as, 498, 853
 Teresa de Cartagena as, 789, 853–854
- Women, Family and Ritual* (Klapisch-Zuber), 371
Women: From the Greeks to the French Revolution (Bell, Susan Groag), 371 “Women Humanists: Education for What?” (Jardine), 708
Women in Frankish Society: Marriage and the Cloister, 500 to 900 (Wemple), 371
Women in Medieval Society (Herlihy), 370 Women Medievalists in the Academy, 370, 371, 373, 854–855 list of, 854–855
 Power, Eileen as, 666
- Women of: England, Paston letters of, 631–632
Women of the Renaissance (King), 708
Women, Production and Patriarchy in Late Medieval Cities (Howell), 372 “Women Traders in Medieval London” (Abram), 369
Women under Monasticism, Saint-Lore and Convent Life between AD 500 and 1500 (Eckenstein), 369
Women Work and Life-Cycle in a Medieval Economy: Women in York and Yorkshire (Goldberg), 372
Women’s Cosmetics (Trota of Salerno), 801
- Woodville, Elizabeth, 855–856
 ecclesiastical patronage of, 855
 literary patronage of, 855
Wooing of Our Lord, The, 851
- Woolf, Virginia, 288, 486, 632
- Work, 856–859
 apprentices in, 25–26, 858
 art representations of women at, 40
 of artisan families, 44–45, 858
 Bennett on, 858
 Dyer on, 857
 erosion of women’s position in, 858 of Flanders women, 295
 Hanawalt on, 857
 Herlihy on, 858
 market/tradeswomen in, 515
 on misericords, 567–568
 in northern France, 300
 in Occitania, 621
 peasant women’s, 642, 857
 after plagues, 655
 in rural records, 700–701
 in Scandinavia, 727
 in Scotland, 731
 Segalen on, 857
 of singlewomen, 759
 of textile production, 791–794 in towns, 858
 urban records for, 702
 waged work, 857–858
- Worthy Women. See Nine Worthy Women
 Wotton-under-Edge manor, 8
 Wound of Christ, 203
- Writing. See Letter Writing. Literacy and Reading (all entries).
 Nuns as Scribes
Wulf and Eadwacer (Wi), 492
Wulf and Eadwacer (WIE), 679

INDEX

Wycliffe, John, 24 on Lollards, 496
Wynter, Simon, 205

Y

Yolande de Flandre, 361
Yolande of Soisson, altarpiece of, 203
Yvain (Chrétien de Troyes), 716 Yvette of Huy, 351, 467, 861
  as anchoress, 18
  asceticism of, 861
  as Beguine, 66
  leper care by, 377
  as widow, 861

Z

Zaida of Seville, 593
Zarri, Gabriella, 34, 708
Zdislava of Lemberk, 224
Zerbi, Gabriele, 624
Zita and Other Servant Saints, 863
Zita of Lucca, 418, 768, 863
  almsgiving/charity of, 14
Zoe (Empress), 102, 104, 248, 627, 770. See also Sophia Palaiologina
Zohar, body viewpoint of, 425

Cover image: Women playing music; early 15th century.

Record Number: 2960; Shelfmark: Royal 16 G.V.; Page Folio: f.3v; By Permission of the British Library.

Cover design: Elise Weinger Printed in the U.S.A.

 Routledge
Taylor & Francis Group
www.taylorandfrancisgroup.com

270 Madison Avenue
New York, NY 10016
2 Park Square, Milton Park
Abingdon, Oxon OX14 4RN, UK

