

Margaret Schaus, Editor

WOMEN AND GENDER IN MEDIEVAL EUROPE

AN ENCYCLOPEDIA

WOMEN AND GENDER IN MEDIEVAL EUROPE

AN ENCYCLOPEDIA

WOMEN AND GENDER IN MEDIEVAL EUROPE

AN ENCYCLOPEDIA

Margaret Schaus
Editor

 Routledge
Taylor & Francis Group
New York London

---

Routledge is an imprint of the Taylor & Francis Group, an informa business

Routledge
Taylor & Francis Group
270 Madison Avenue
New York, NY 10016

Routledge
Taylor & Francis Group
2 Park Square
Milton Park, Abingdon
Oxon OX14 4RN

© 2006 by Taylor & Francis Group, LLC
Routledge is an imprint of Taylor & Francis Group, an Informa business

Printed in the United States of America on acid-free paper
10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

International Standard Book Number-10: 0-415-96944-1 (Hardcover)
International Standard Book Number-13: 978-0-415-96944-4 (Hardcover)

No part of this book may be reprinted, reproduced, transmitted, or utilized in any form by any electronic, mechanical, or other means, now known or hereafter invented, including photocopying, microfilming, and recording, or in any information storage or retrieval system, without written permission from the publishers.

Trademark Notice: Product or corporate names may be trademarks or registered trademarks, and are used only for identification and explanation without intent to infringe.

Visit the Taylor & Francis Web site at <http://www.taylorandfrancis.com>

and the Routledge Web site at <http://www.routledge-ny.com>

CONTENTS

|  |        |
|--|--------|
| Introduction   | vii    |
| Note on The Routledge Encyclopedias of the Middle Ages           | xi     |
| Editorial Board  | xiii   |
| Contributors   | xv     |
| Alphabetical List of Entries                                     | xxv    |
| Thematic List of Entries   | xxxiii |
| Entries A to Z   | 1      |
| Appendices   |        |
| Appendix I: Calendar of Female Saints                            | 865    |
| Appendix II: Some Milestones in Medieval Women's History         | 869    |
| Appendix III: Encyclopedia Cited References                      | 873    |
| Appendix IV: Web Resources for Medieval Women and Gender Studies | 875    |
| Index  | 877    |

INTRODUCTION

Women and Gender in Medieval Europe: An Encyclopedia reflects the dramatic growth that has taken place in the study of medieval women and gender since the 1970s. Beginning then with essay collections and a handful of path-breaking journal articles, current research now yields a full scholarly palette ranging from monographs, editions of texts, and research articles to anthologies and introductions. This growth in scholarship has been matched by an increase in student interest and course offerings. Because much of the research in medieval women's and gender studies is published in journals and specialized volumes, it is time-consuming to access. Women and Gender in Medieval Europe serves as a much needed guide, making innovative scholarship available to a wider audience by explicating topics, providing interpretation, and selecting authoritative sources that will lead readers into the literature and research.

Scope

Women and Gender in Medieval Europe: An Encyclopedia addresses many areas of medieval women's activities, including female patronage of the arts and the church, female mysticism and devotional practices, women's medicine and understandings of the female body, and women's roles in politics and diplomacy. Gender issues are also of prime importance, and so masculinity is addressed in a variety of medieval contexts, ranging from chivalric tournaments to medieval views of St. Joseph. Identification and analysis of medieval gender roles provide an important context for understanding women's roles: a discussion of the norms and expectations for men provides the factual information needed to situate and compare the norms and expectations for women.

The entries in Women and Gender in Medieval Europe reflect the daily reality of medieval women from all walks of life. Such entries move beyond descriptions of individual women to address topics such as "Asceticism," "Clothing," "Procreation and Ideas of Conception," and "Social Status," providing a comprehensive understanding of medieval women's lives and experiences.

The individuals profiled in this reference work were chosen either for their historical significance or because they might represent groups of people, such as servants or the disabled. In the first category are such well-known figures as Geoffrey Chaucer, Joan of Arc, Christine de Pizan, and Matilda of Tuscany. In the second and smaller group are the mystic Gertrud of Ortenberg, the saintly servant Zita, and the nun artist Caterina Vigri. This two-tiered approach demonstrates the range of women's activities, unlike past scholarship that sometimes took account only of noble women.

Women and Gender in Medieval Europe takes Europe as its primary area from 450–1500 C. E., roughly the fall of the Roman Empire to the discovery of the Americas. Thus the entries dealing with Islamic topics treat conditions in Iberia or in Europe generally. The entries on Byzantine subjects are an exception geographically, but their inclusion is important both because of connections with Europe, like Theophano's impact as a Holy Roman empress, and for the comparisons between the two areas in terms of social practices.

This reference work takes a particular interest in historiography, in terms of the history of the field, documentary sources, and methodological approaches. Medieval women's history is treated at length. Entries cover many types of documents including household accounts, letters, and sister books (collective biographies of nuns). Groups of records are also included for the church, rural areas, and cities. For methodological approaches the volume gives detailed treatments to feminism and postmodernism as well as covering others approaches important to the study of the Middle Ages such as performance theory and queer theory. The aim is to help users develop a critical understanding of the historiography of medieval women and gender.

INTRODUCTION

Authors

The authors of the entries are scholars and researchers in the field. In many cases the authors who contributed entries have published the definitive monograph on the subject in question, bringing their knowledge and analysis to the discussion. Such command of the material allowed authors to offer discussions that put the issues into perspective and help dispel mistaken assumptions, such as the idea that male practitioners did not give medical care to women.

How to Use This Book

Organization

The 563 entries in this volume are arranged in an easily accessible A to Z format, reflected in the alphabetical list of entries. A thematic list of entries has also been provided to assist the reader in easily locating relevant information.

Users may also consult the thorough, analytical index.

Entry Features

The entries range from 250 to over 4500 words in length. They are accompanied by selective bibliographies, which include both primary and secondary sources for further reading and research. Cross-references at the end of an entry direct the reader to related entries in the volume.

Overview Entries

Included are series of entries that together treat broad topics. Country overviews deal with women's status in a particular region: Burgundian Netherlands, Byzantium, Eastern Europe, England, Flanders, France, Northern, Frankish Lands, Germanic Lands, Iberia, Ireland, Italy, Occitania, Russia, Scandinavia, Scotland, and Wales. These entries are represented in the thematic list under "Countries, Realms, and Regions."

Literature overviews deal with representations of women in the following literatures: German, Hebrew, Iberian, Irish, Italian, Latin, Middle English, Occitan, Old English, Old French, and Old Norse. These entries appear in the thematic list under "Literature."

The "Literature" category also includes surveys of female writers in various languages (German, Italian, Latin Middle English, Old French, and Spanish) under articles beginning "Women Authors: German Texts," as well as coverage of broad literary topics, such as "Ballads," "Devotional Literature," and "Ovid: Medieval Reception of."

For law, there is a series of articles that treat learned and regional legal traditions including "Roman Law," "Barbarian Law Codes" and entries following "Law" for English, French, German, Islamic, and Jewish practices in regards to women and gender.

Thematic Coverage

In addition to the categories outlined above, the entries in Women and Gender and Medieval Europe address the following themes:

- Art, Architecture, and Archaeology: These entries include examinations of representations of women and gender in art, artistic production by women, and architectural structures such as monasteries and the home.
- Documentary Sources: Entries in this category provide coverage of documentation by and about women in a variety of sources including ownership marks on books, convent chronicles, and official records.

- Economy and Society: Cultural and social traditions and norms as they affected women, such as cosmetics, guilds, and inheritance, are treated by entries falling in this category.
- Education and Learning: These entries examine the types of education available to women as well as female literacy.
- Family and Kinship: The medieval status of, and attitudes toward, family members, including spouses, children, and the elderly, is explored in these entries. Articles in this category also look extensively at medieval marriage.
- Gender and Sexuality: These entries cover topics including abortion, concubinage, concepts of femininity and masculinity, and virginity, thus providing broad coverage of key gender contexts.
- Historiography: Scholarly methodologies and critical theories are considered in relation to the study of medieval women and gender.
- Medicine and Science: These entries explore medieval theory and practice, as well as topics in medieval gynecology.
- Music and Dance: The roles medieval women played as participants in and audiences of music and dance are explored.
- Persons: These entries include biographies of queens, noble women, authors, and saints, as well as notable medieval thinkers such as Christine de Pizan and Trota of Salerno.
- Politics: The actions of queens, empresses, and other women in authority are discussed in these entries, as are such political topics as the Crusades and diplomacy.
- Religion and Theology: In addition to biographical sketches of saints and holy women, these entries cover groups such as nuns, Beguines, and religious laywomen. They also analyze key religious topics, such as asceticism, the cult of Mary, and women's monasticism.

Appendices

Appendix I: Calendar of Female Saints lists the days for female saints observed each month. The calendar is intended to suggest the variety and number of holy women celebrated during the liturgical year.

Appendix II: Some Milestones in Medieval Women's History highlights key translations and scholarly works in the field of medieval women's studies.

Appendix III: Encyclopedia Cited References is a list of those works cited most frequently in the individual bibliographies found at the end of each entry.

Appendix IV: Web Resources for Medieval Women's and Gender Studies provides readers with a number of websites that present valuable scholarship on medieval women.

Margaret Schaus

Acknowledgments

A volume like this gives new meaning to the term "group effort." Contributors, advisors, student assistants, and publishers have all worked unstintingly. We are grateful to the authors for their interpretations, filled with insights and fascinating examples. From the beginning of this project we benefited from advice and articulate viewpoints generously offered by colleagues, including Judith Bennett, Joan Ferrante, Jo Ann McNamara, Monica Green, and Nancy Partner. Our subject advisors Lisa Bitel, Jane Burns, Amy Hollywood, and Pamela Sheingorn have been invaluable in determining topics to cover, persuading people to write, and contributing major entries in their respective areas. Student assistants at Haverford College have since 2003 maintained databases, recorded queries, and generally kept the project afloat. Our thanks go to Robin Dean, David Fask, Veronica Faust, Sarah Hendry, and Elizabeth Piastra. At Routledge, Kristen Holt and Marie-Claire Antoine have brought their considerable experience to the project. We thank all of the participants who have helped to build this work wherein medieval women's lives can be known.

Margaret Schaus
Thomas Izbicki
Susan Mosher Stuard

THE ROUTLEDGE ENCYCLOPEDIAS OF THE MIDDLE AGES

Formerly the Garland Encyclopedias of the Middle Ages, this comprehensive series began in 1993 with the publication of Medieval Scandinavia. A major enterprise in medieval scholarship, the series brings the expertise of scholars specializing in myriad aspects of the medieval world together in a reference source accessible to students and the general public as well as to historians and scholars in related fields. Each volume focuses on a geographical area or theme important to medieval studies and is edited by a specialist in that field, who has called upon a board of consulting editors to establish the article list and review the articles. Each article is contributed by a scholar and followed by a bibliography and cross-references to guide further research.

Routledge is proud to carry on the tradition established by the first volumes in this important series. As the series continues to grow, we hope that it will provide the most comprehensive and detailed view of the medieval world in all its aspects ever presented in encyclopedia form.

- Vol. 1 Medieval Scandinavia: An Encyclopedia. Edited by Phillip Pulsiano.
- Vol. 2 Medieval France: An Encyclopedia. Edited by William W. Kibler and Grover A. Zinn.
- Vol. 3 Medieval England: An Encyclopedia. Edited by Paul E. Szarmach, M. Teresa Tavormin, and Joel T. Rosenthal.
- Vol. 4 Medieval Archaeology: An Encyclopedia. Edited by Pamela Crabtree.
- Vol. 5 Trade, Travel, and Exploration in the Middle Ages. Edited by John Block Friedman and Kristen Mossler Figg.
- Vol. 6 Medieval Germany: An Encyclopedia. Edited by John M. Jeep.
- Vol. 7 Medieval Jewish Civilization: An Encyclopedia. Edited by Norman Roth.
- Vol. 8 Medieval Iberia: An Encyclopedia. Edited by E. Michael Gerli.
- Vol. 9 Medieval Italy: An Encyclopedia. Edited by Christopher Kleinhenz.
- Vol. 10 Medieval Ireland: An Encyclopedia. Edited by Seán Duffy.
- Vol. 11 Medieval Science, Technology, and Medicine: An Encyclopedia. Edited by Thomas Glick, Stephen J. Livesey, and Faith Wallis
- Vol. 12 Key Figures in Medieval Europe: An Encyclopedia. Edited by Richard K. Emmerson.
- Vol. 13 Medieval Islamic Civilization: An Encyclopedia. Edited by Josef W. Meri.

The present volume, Women and Gender in Medieval Europe: An Encyclopedia, edited by Margaret Schaus, is Volume 14 in the series.

EDITOR

Margaret Schaus
Magill Library, Haverford College

EDITORIAL BOARD

Associate Editors

Thomas Izbicki
Milton S. Eisenhower Library, The Johns Hopkins Library

Susan Mosher Stuard
Haverford College

Advising Editors

Lisa Bitel
University of Southern California

E. Jane Burns
University of North Carolina

Amy Hollywood
University of Chicago

Pamela Sheingorn
City University of New York Graduate Center

CONTRIBUTORS

F. R. P. Akehurst
University of Minnesota

Barbara K. Altmann
University of Oregon

Katharina Altpeter-Jones
Duke University

Sahar Amer
University of North Carolina

Mark Angelos
Manchester College

Janice Archer
The Art Institute of Portland

Rowena E. Archer
Oxford University, U.K.

Elizabeth Archibald
University of Bristol, U.K.

Chara Armon
Independent Scholar

Dorsey Armstrong
Purdue University

Kathleen M. Ashley
University of Southern Maine

Denise Nowakowski Baker
University of North Carolina at Greensboro

Carroll Hilles Balot
Washington University in St. Louis

Sandra Bardsley
Moravian College

Teodolinda Barolini
Columbia University

Beth Allison Barr
Baylor University

Anne Clark Bartlett
DePaul University

Judith R. Baskin
University of Oregon

Elisheva Baumgarten
Bar-Ilan University, Israel

Alison Beach
The College of William and Mary

Cordelia Beattie
University of Edinburgh, Scotland

Brigitte Miriam Bedos-Rezak
New York University

Jeanette Beer
Purdue University

Susan Groag Bell
Stanford University

Constance H. Berman
University of Iowa

Jessalynn Bird
Oxford University, U.K., and Northwestern University

Lisa Bitel
University of Southern California

Alcuin Blamires
Goldsmiths College, University of London, U.K.

Virginia Blanton
University of Missouri–Kansas City

Elaine C. Block
Hunter College, City University of New York (emerita)

CONTRIBUTORS

Wim Blockmans

Netherlands Institute for Advanced Study in Humanities and Social Sciences, The Netherlands

Renate Blumenfeld-Kosinski

University of Pittsburgh

Katrinette Bodarwé

Seminar fuer Mittlere und Neuere Geschichte, Germany

Constance B. Bouchard

The University of Akron

Susan Boynton

Columbia University

Sally M. Brasher

Shepherd University

Dorothy Ann Bray

McGill University

Phyllis R. Brown

Santa Clara University

Matilda Tomaryn Bruckner

Boston College

James A. Brundage

University of Kansas (emeritus)

Caroline Bruzelius

Duke University

William E. Burgwinkle

Cambridge University

E. Jane Burns

University of North Carolina

Kristin L. Burr

St. Joseph's University

Kim E. Butler

American University

Montserrat Cabré

Universidad de Cantabria, Spain

Nancy Caciola

University of California, San Diego

Esperança Camara

University of Saint Francis

Joanna Cannon

Courtauld Institute of Art

Mary Carruthers

New York University

Madeline H. Caviness

Tufts University

Valentina Cesco

Pennsylvania State University

Jane Chance

Rice University

Fredric L. Chetty

Amherst College

Krijnie Ciggaar

University of Leiden, The Netherlands (emerita)

Katherine Clark

State University of New York, Brockport

Robert L. A. Clark

Kansas State University

Jeffrey Jerome Cohen

George Washington University

Olivia Remie Constable

University of Notre Dame

Rebecca W. Corrie

Bates College

Roisin Cossar

University of Manitoba, Canada

Andrée Courtemanche

Université Laval, Canada

Ann Crabb

James Madison University

Roger J. Crum

University of Dayton

Jo Ann Hoepfner Moran Cruz

Georgetown University

P. H. Cullum

University of Huddersfield, U.K.

Cynthia J. Cyrus

Vanderbilt University

Patricia Dailey

Columbia University

Roger Dalrymple
Oxford University, U.K.

Jean Dangler
Tulane University

David d'Avray
University College London, U.K.

Joyce de Vries
Auburn University

Theresia de Vroom
Loyola Marymount University

Elizabeth Valdez del Álamo
Montclair State University

Daisy Delogu
University of Chicago

Andrea Denny-Brown
University of California, Riverside

Marilynn R. Desmond
Binghamton University

Leah DeVun
Texas A&M University

Heath Dillard
Independent Scholar

Maria Dobozy
University of Utah

Eglal Doss-Quinby
Smith College

Anna Dronzek
University of Minnesota

Theresa Earenfight
Seattle University

Martha Easton
Bryn Mawr College

Bonnie Effros
Binghamton University

Donna Spivey Ellington
Gardner-Webb University

Dyan Elliott
Northwestern University

Marianne Elsackers
Independent Scholar

Michael J. Enright
East Carolina University

Elizabeth Ewan
University of Guelph, Canada

Sharon Farmer
University of California, Santa Barbara

Hugh Feiss
Monastery of the Ascension, Idaho

Joan M. Ferrante
Columbia University

Sean L. Field
University of Vermont

Joanne Findon
Trent University

Laurie Finke
Kenyon College

David A. Flory
Purdue University

Deborah Fraioli
Simmons College

Emily C. Francomano
Georgetown University

A. Daniel Frankforter
Pennsylvania State University, Erie

Allen J. Frantzen
Loyola University

Katherine L. French
State University of New York, New Paltz

Carole Collier Frick
Southern Illinois University, Edwardsville

Yvonne Friedman
Bar-Ilan University, Israel

Rhoda Lange Friedrichs
Douglas College, Canada

CONTRIBUTORS

Amy M. Froide
Clark University

Alison L. Ganze
Valparaiso University

Kathleen Garay
McMaster University, Canada

Lynda Garland
University of New England, Australia

Philip Gavitt
Saint Louis University

P. J. P. Goldberg
University of York, U.K.

Cristina González
University of California, Davis

Michael E. Goodich
University of Haifa, Israel

Kristi Gourlay
University of Toronto

Monica H. Green
Arizona State University

Kate Greenspan
Skidmore College

Fiona J. Griffiths
New York University

Joan Tasker Grimbert
The Catholic University of America

Karen A. Grossweiner
University of Alaska, Fairbanks

Noah Guynn
University of California, Davis

Linda Guzzetti
Technische Universität Berlin, Germany

Thomas Hahn
University of Rochester

Rosemary Drage Hale
Brock University, Canada

Dianne Hall
University of Melbourne, Australia

Wendy Harding
Université de Toulouse-Le Mirail, France

Ann T. Harrison
Michigan State University (emerita)

David Hay
University of Lethbridge, Canada

Sarah-Grace Heller
Ohio State University

Judith Herrin
King's College London, U.K.

Madonna J. Hettinger
The College of Wooster

Barbara Hill
Independent Scholar

Cynthia Ho
University of North Carolina

Amy Hollywood
University of Chicago

Carole Hough
University of Glasgow, Scotland

Jason M. Houston
University of Oklahoma

Martha Howell
Columbia University

David F. Hult
University of California, Berkeley

Lois L. Huneycutt
University of Missouri

Holly Hurlburt
Southern Illinois University, Carbondale

Ann M. Hutchinson
University of Toronto, Canada

Steinar Imsen
Norwegian University of Science and Technology

Thomas Izbicki
Johns Hopkins University

Katherine Ludwig JansenThe Catholic University of AmericaGerhard JaritzCentral European University, HungaryMadeleine JeayMcMaster University, CanadaJane E. JeffreyWest Chester University of PennsylvaniaJenny JochensTowson University (emerita)E. D. JonesUniversity of Western Australia, AustraliaRuth Mazo KarrasUniversity of MinnesotaMarie A. KelleherCalifornia State University, Long BeachHenry Ansgar KellyUniversity of California, Los AngelesTheresa D. KempUniversity of Wisconsin, Eau ClaireFrancis W. KentMonash University, AustraliaAnn KettleUniversity of St. Andrews, ScotlandRichard KeyserWestern Kentucky UniversityBeverly Mayne KienzleHarvard Divinity SchoolCatherine KingOpen University, U.K.Margaret L. KingBrooklyn College, City University of New YorkSharon KinoshitaUniversity of California, Santa CruzJulius KirshnerUniversity of Chicago (emeritus)Ellen E. KittellUniversity of IdahoGábor KlaniczayCentral European University, HungaryStacy KleinRutgers UniversityAnne L. KlinckUniversity of New Brunswick, CanadaDaniel T. KlineUniversity of Alaska, AnchorageLezlie KnoxMarquette UniversityLinda A. KochJohn Carroll UniversityMia KorpiolaUniversity of Helsinki, FinlandDesiree KoslinFashion Institute of TechnologyJoëlle KosterUniversity of Rhode IslandCatherine KovesiThe University of Melbourne, AustraliaMaryanne KowaleskiFordham UniversityRoberta L. KruegerHamilton CollegeThomas KuehnClemson UniversityIrmeli S. KuehnelIndependent ScholarNorris J. LacyPennsylvania State UniversityCarol LansingUniversity of California, Santa BarbaraLynn Marie LaufenbergSweet Briar CollegeJoanna L. LaynesmithIndependent ScholarBecky R. LeeYork University, Canada*

CONTRIBUTORS

Catherine Leglu

University of Bristol, U.K.

Elizabeth A. Leheldt

Cleveland State University

Maiju Lehmijoki-Gardner

Loyola College and University of Helsinki, Finland

Katherine J. Lewis

University of Huddersfield, U.K.

Erika Lauren Lindgren

University of Arizona

Amy Livingstone

Wittenberg University

Janet S. Loengard

Moravian College

Kimberly LoPrete

National University of Ireland, Ireland

William F. MacLehose

Alfred University

Elizabeth Makowski

Southwest Texas State University

Evyatar Marienberg

Tel Aviv University, Israel

Manuela Marín

Consejo Superior de Investigaciones Científicas (CSIC), Spain

Nancy Marino

Michigan State University

John Hilary Martin

Graduate Theological Union, California

Oscar Martin

Yale University

Therese Martin

University of Arizona

William P. Marvin

Colorado State University

Mavis Mate

University of Oregon

E. Ann Matter

University of Pennsylvania

Marie Anne Mayeski

Loyola Marymount University

Cristina Mazzoni

University of Vermont

June Hall McCash

Middle Tennessee State University (emerita)

Anne McClanan

Portland State University

Brian Patrick McGuire

Roskilde University, Denmark

Maud Burnett McInerney

Haverford College

Jo Ann McNamara

Hunter College, City University of New York (emerita)

Shannon McSheffrey

Concordia University, Canada

Carol M. Meale

University of Bristol, U.K.

Christine Meek

Trinity College, Ireland

Noël James Menuge

The Prince's Trust, U.K.

Gwenn Meredith

American University, Cairo, Egypt

Louise Mirrer

New York Historical Society

Scott B. Montgomery

University of Denver

Catherine M. Mooney

Weston Jesuit School of Theology

Leslie Zarker Morgan

Loyola College

Susan Signe Morrison

Southwest Texas State University

Joseph MorselUniversité Paris 1 Panthéon Sorbonne, FranceJoan MuellerCreighton UniversityWolfgang MuellerFordham UniversityCarolyn MuessigUniversity of Bristol, U.K.Anneke B. Mulder-BakkerUniversity of Leiden, The NetherlandsJohn H. MunroUniversity of Toronto, CanadaSaskia Murk-JansenRobinson College, Cambridge UniversityJacqueline MurrayUniversity of Guelph, CanadaMaría Narbona-CárcelesUniversidad de Navarra, SpainMary NatvigBowling Green State UniversityDerek NealNipissing University, CanadaCarol NeelColorado CollegeJanet NelsonKing's College London, U.K.Helen J. NicholsonCardiff University, WalesRenée NipUniversity of Groningen, The NetherlandsMargot McIlwain NishimuraRhode Island School of DesignCordula NolteUniversität Bremen, GermanyMarilyn OlivaFordham UniversityJudith OliverColgate UniversityLea T. OlsanUniversity of Louisiana at MonroeAlexandra H. OlsenUniversity of DenverSherri OlsonUniversity of ConnecticutLeah Otis-CourUniversité de Montpellier, FranceMark P. O'ToolUniversity of California, Santa BarbaraMonika C. OtterDartmouth CollegeGale R. Owen-CrockerUniversity of Manchester, U.K.William D. PadenNorthwestern UniversityNira PancerUniversity of Haifa, IsraelThalia A. PandiriSmith CollegeLetizia PanizzaRoyal Holloway, University of London, U.K.John Carmi ParsonsUniversity of Toronto, CanadaNancy PartnerMcGill University, CanadaCarol Braun PasternackUniversity of California, Santa BarbaraFrederik PedersenUniversity of Aberdeen, ScotlandElse Marie Wiberg PedersenAarhus Universitet, DenmarkBissera V. PentchevaStanford UniversityLisa PerfettiMuhlenberg College*

CONTRIBUTORS

Catherine Peyroux
New York University

Kim M. Phillips
University of Auckland, New Zealand

Lucy Pick
University of Chicago

Sara S. Poor
Princeton University

Karen Pratt
King's College, U.K.

Sara L. Preisig
Gonzaga University

Walter Prevenier
University of Gent

Darleen Pryds
Graduate Theological Union, Berkeley

F. Regina Psaki
University of Oregon

Helmut Puff
University of Michigan

Judy Quinn
Cambridge University, U.K.

Vivian Ramalingam
Independent Scholar

Adrian Randolph
Dartmouth College

Alisha Rankin
Harvard University

Ann Marie Rasmussen
Duke University

Sherry L. Reames
University of Wisconsin–Madison

Charles J. Reid, Jr.
University of St. Thomas

Thomas Renna
Saginaw Valley State University

Kathryn Reyerson
University of Minnesota

Rosalind Jaeger Reynolds
University of California, Berkeley

Geneviève Ribordy
St. Lawrence College, Canada

Amanda Richardson
University College Chichester, U.K.

Felicity Riddy
University of York, U.K.

Paula M. Rieder
University of Nebraska

Kathryn M. Ringrose
University of California, San Diego

Elizabeth Robertson
University of Colorado

J. Duncan Robertson
Augusta State University

Diana Robin
University of New Mexico

Joanne Maguire Robinson
University of North Carolina

Tova Rosen
Tel-Aviv University, Israel

Joel T. Rosenthal
State University of New York at Stony Brook

Miri Rubin
Queen Mary College, University of London, U.K.

Nina Rulon-Miller
Rowan University

Marianne Sághy
Central European University, Hungary

Claire L. Sahlin
Texas Women's University

Sarah Salih
University of East Anglia, U.K.

Eve Salisbury
Eastern Michigan University

Michelle M. Sauer
Minot State University

Francesca Canadé Sautman
Graduate Center, City University of New York

Helene Scheck
State University of New York at Albany

Wybren Scheepsma
Hogeschool Leiden, The Netherlands

Jane Tibbetts Schulenburg
University of Wisconsin–Madison

Marla Segol
Skidmore College

Dayle Seidenspinner-Núñez
University of Notre Dame

Miriam Shadis
Ohio University, Athens

Shulamith Shahar
Tel Aviv University, Israel (emeritus)

Pamela Sheingorn
Graduate Center, City University of New York

Karen Miriam Silen
University of California, Berkeley

Walter Simons
Dartmouth College

Katrin E. Sjursen
University of California, Santa Barbara

Patricia Skinner
University of Southampton, U.K.

Kathryn A. Smith
New York University

Susan L. Smith
University of California, San Diego

Susan Taylor Snyder
Benedictine College

Helen Solterer
Duke University

Janet T. Sorrentino
Washington College

Valerie Spear
The Australian National University, Australia

Claire Sponsler
University of Iowa

Peter Stabel
University of Antwerp, Belgium

Robin Chapman Stacey
University of Washington

Alan M. Stahl
Princeton University

Sarah Stanbury
College of the Holy Cross

Anne Rudloff Stanton
University of Missouri-Columbia

Robert Stanton
Boston College

Walter Stephens
Johns Hopkins University

Alexandra Sterling-Hellenbrand
Appalachian State University

Lorraine Kochanske Stock
University of Houston

Fiona Harris-Stoertz
Trent University, Canada

Steven Stofferahn
Indiana State University

Susan Mosher Stuard
Haverford College (emerita)

Almut Suerbaum
Oxford University, U.K.

Mary Suydam
Kenyon College

James Ross Sweeney
Pennsylvania State University

Victoria Sweet
University of California, San Francisco

Robert Sweetman
Institute for Christian Studies, Canada

Helen J. Swift
Magdalene College, Oxford University, U.K.

CONTRIBUTORS

Dana M. Symons

Simon Fraser University, Canada

Paul E. Szarmach

Medieval Academy of America

Alice-Mary Talbot

Dumbarton Oaks, Washington, D.C.

Andrew Taylor

University of Ottawa, Canada

Craig Taylor

University of York, U.K.

Jane Taylor

Collingwood College, University of Durham, U.K.

Isolde Thyrêt

Kent State University

Catherine Tkacz

Independent Scholar

Fiona Tolhurst

Alfred University

Laura Van Aert

University of Antwerp, Belgium

Elisabeth van Houts

Emmanuel College, Cambridge University

Sue Sheridan Walker

Northeastern Illinois University (emerita)

Martin W. Walsh

University of Michigan

Heather E. Ward

Independent Scholar

Andrew Wareham

King's College London, U.K.

Nancy Bradley Warren

Florida State University

Claire Waters

University of California, Davis

Nicholas Watson

Harvard University

Barbara F. Weissberger

University of Minnesota

Sarah Westphal-Wihl

Rice University

Merry E. Wiesner-Hanks

University of Wisconsin, Milwaukee

Ulrike Wiethaus

Wake Forest University

Rebecca Winer

Villanova University

Anne Winston-Allen

Southern Illinois University

Shelley Amiste Wolbrink

Drury University

Elliot R. Wolfson

New York University

Jeryldene M. Wood

University of Illinois

Shona Kelly Wray

University of Missouri

Ester Zago

University of Colorado at Boulder

Jan M. Ziolkowski

Harvard University

Amalia Zomeño

Consejo Superior de Investigaciones Cientificas (CSIC), Spain

Patricia Zupan

Middlebury College

ALPHABETICAL LIST OF ENTRIES

A

Abbesses
Abortion
Adela of Blois
Adelheid
Administration of Estates
Adolescence
Aethelflaed
Aethelthryth of Ely
Agnes of Prague
Agriculture
Alewives and Brewing
Almsgiving and Charity
Amalasantha
Amazons
Anchoresses
Ancrene Wisse
Angela of Foligno
Annales School of History
Anne of Beaujeu
Anne of Bohemia
Anne
Apprentices
Archaeology
Architecture, Domestic Architecture, Ecclesiastical
Architecture, Monastic
Aristotelian Concepts of Women and Gender
Arms and Armor
Art, Representations of Women in Arthurian Literature
Artisan Families, Women of Artists, Women
Asceticism
Audience, Women in the
Augustine, Influence of Autohagiography
Ava

B

Bake, Alijt
Ballads
Barbarian Law Codes
Beast Epic
Beatrice
Beatrice of Nazareth
Beaufort, Margaret
Beauty
Beguines
Belle Dame Sans Merci
Beowulf
Berenguela
Betrothals
Bible, Women in Birgitta of Sweden
Birgittine Order
Blanche of Castile
Boccaccio, Giovanni
Body in Literature and Religion
Body, Visual Representations of Bokenham, Osbern
Book Ownership
Books of Hours
Breastfeeding and Wet-Nursing
Bride of Christ: Imagery
Brigit
Brunhild and Fredegund
Burgundian Netherlands
Burials and Tombs
Business
Byzantium

C

Caesarean Section
Canonesses

ALPHABETICAL LIST OF ENTRIES

Canonization of Saints
Captivity and Ransom
Castles and Palaces
Castro, Inés de
Caterina Sforza
Caterina Vigri
Cathars
Catherine of Alexandria
Catherine of Genoa
Catherine of Siena
Celibacy: Clerical and Priests' Concubines
Cereta, Laura
Charivari
Charters
Chastity and Chaste Marriage
Chaucer, Geoffrey
Children, Betrothal and Marriage of Chivalry
Chrétien de Troyes
Christina of Markyate
Christina the Astonishing
Christine de Pizan
Chronicles of the Northern Low Countries
Church
Churching
Cistercian Order
Cities and Towns
Clare of Assisi
Clare of Montefalco
Clemence of Barking
Clothing
Clothing for Religious Women
Clothwork, Domestic
Clotilda
Cluniac Order
Coinage
Colette of Corbie
Compiuta Donzella
Concubines
Conduct Literature
Confraternities
Conjugal Debt
Constance
Constance of Sicily
Consumption
Contraception
Conversae and Conversi
Conversion, Religious
Cornaro, Caterina
Cosmetics
Courtly Love
Courtship
Crime and Criminals
Criseyde
Cross-Cultural Approaches

Cross-Dressing
Crusades and Crusading Literature
Cuckold

D

D'Este, Isabella and Beatrice
Dance
Danse Macabre des Femmes
Dante Alighieri
Datini, Margherita
Dawn Song (Alba)
Death, Mourning, and Commemoration
Debate Literature
Defenses of Women
Demography
Devotional Art
Devotional Literature
Devotional Practices
Dhuoda
Diplomacy and Reconciliation
Disabilities
Division of Labor
Divorce and Separation
Doctors and Healers
Dogaresse
Dolce of Worms
Domestic Abuse
Domesticity
Dominican Order
Dorothea of Montau
Double Monasteries
Douceline of Digne
Dowry and Other Marriage Gifts
Drama

E

Eastern Europe
Ebner, Margaretha
Economy
Edith
Education, Beguine
Education, Lay
Education, Monastic
Eleanor of Aquitaine
Eleanor of Scotland
Elisabeth of Hungary
Elisabeth of Schönau
Empresses: Byzantium
England

Epic, Italian
 Epic, Old French
 Epic, Spanish
 Ermengard
 Eroticism in Art
 Eroticism in Literature
 Eunuchs
 Evangiles des Quenouilles
 Eve
 Exemplum

F

Fabliau
 Family (Earlier Middle Ages)
 Family (Later Middle Ages)
 Fasting and Food, Religious Aspects of Fedele, Cassandra
 Feme Covert
 Feme Sole
 Femininity and Masculinity
 Feminist Theories and Methodologies
 Festivals of Misrule
 Fina of San Gimignano
 Flanders
 Floire and Blancheflor
 Fontevault, Abbey and Order of Fosterage
 Foy
 France, Northern
 Frances of Rome
 Frankish Lands

G

Gaze
 Gender Ideologies
 Gender in Art
 Gender in History
 Genealogy
 Gentry, Women of: England
 Germanic Lands
 Gerson, Jean
 Gertrude of Hackeborn
 Gertrude of Nivelles
 Gertrude of Ortenberg
 Gertrude the Great
 Gilbertine Order
 Girls and Boys
 Godelieve of Gistel
 Godparents

Goscelin of St. Bertin
 Gossip and Slander
 Gottfried von Strassburg
 Grave Goods
 Griselda
 Guibert of Nogent's Mother
 Guild Members and Guilds
 Guinevere
 Gynecology

H

Hadewijch
 Hagiography
 Hagiography, Iconographic Aspects of Heiresses
 Helena
 Heloise
 Heraldry
 Heretics and Heresy
 Hermaphrodites
 Herrad of Hohenbourg
 Hild of Whitby
 Hildegard of Bingen
 History, Medieval Women's Holy Kinship
 Home Manufacturing
 Honor and Reputation
 Hospitals
 Household Accounts
 Household Management
 Hrotsvit of Gandersheim
 Humanism
 Humiliati
 Humility of Faenza
 Hunting and Falconry
 Husbands and Husbandry

I

Iberia
 Icons, Byzantine
 Ida of Boulogne
 Illegitimacy
 Immaculate Conception, Doctrine of Impotence
 Incest
 Infants and Infanticide
 Infertility
 Inheritance
 Intercession

ALPHABETICAL LIST OF ENTRIES

Investment and Credit
Ireland
Irene
Isabel I
Isabel of Aragon
Isabelle of France
Isolde
Italy

J

Jacobus de Voragine's Golden Legend
Jacqueline of Bavaria
Jadwiga
Jerome, Influence of Jesus/God as Mother
Jewelry
Jewish Mystical Thought, Body and Soul in Jewish Women
Jewish Women: Latin and European Vernacular
Literature
Joan I
Joan of Arc
Joseph, Stepfather of Jesus
Jouarre and Chelles
Judith
Julian of Norwich

K

Katherine Group
Kempe, Margery
Kinship
Komnene, Anna
Kottaner, Helene

L

Ladies-in-Waiting
Landholding and Property Rights
Langmann, Adelheid
Laughter
Law
Law, Canon
Law, Customary: French
Law, English Secular Courts of Law, German
Law, Islamic: Iberia
Law, Jewish

Lay Piety
Laywomen, Religious
Legal Agency
Leoba
Lepers
Letter Writing
Literacy and Reading: Latin
Literacy and Reading: Vernacular
Literature, German
Literature, Hebrew
Literature, Iberian
Literature, Irish
Literature, Italian
Literature, Latin
Literature, Middle English
Literature, Occitan
Literature, Old English
Literature, Old French
Literature, Old Norse
Lollards
López de Córdoba, Leonor
Lovesickness
Lutgard of Aywières
Lying-In

M

Madness
Magic and Charms
Margaret of Anjou
Margaret of Antioch
Margaret of Cortona
Margaret of Scotland
Margaret of York
Margaret "the Cripple" of Magdeburg
Marginalia, Manuscript
Margrethe
Marguerite Porete
Maria of Venice (Maria Sturion)
Marie de France
Marie of Oignies
Market and Tradeswomen
Marozia of Rome
Marriage Ceremonies
Marriage, Christian
Marriage and Concubinage in Scandinavia
Marriage, Impediments to Marriage, Islamic: Iberia
Marriage, Jewish
Marriage Preaching
Mary and Martha
Mary Magdalen
Mary of Burgundy

Mary of Hungary I
 Mary of Hungary II
 Mary the Egyptian
 Mary the Younger
 Mary, Virgin
 Mary, Virgin: in Art
 Mary, Virgin: in Literature
 Mary, Virgin: in Music
 Mathilda and the Monastery at Essen
 Matilda of Tuscany
 Matilda the Empress
 Mead-Giver
 Mechthild of Hackeborn
 Mechthild of Magdeburg
 Medicine
 Meditation
 Mélusine
 Menstruation
 Merchant Families, Women of
 Merchet and Leyrwite
 Mermaids and Sirens
 Midwives
 Migration and Mobility
 Mikveh
 Minnesang
 Miracles and Miracle Collections
 Misericords
 Misogyny
 Modern Devotion
 Monastic Enclosure
 Monastic Rules
 Monastic Visitation
 Monasticism and Nuns
 Monasticism and Nuns, Byzantine
 Monasticism and Nuns, Celtic
 Monasticism, Women's: Papal Policy
 Mothers as Teachers
 Music, Women and
 Muslim Women: Iberia
 Muslim Women: Western Literature
 Mysticism and Mystics
 Mystics' Writings
 Mythology, Medieval Reception of

N

Naming
 Natural World
 Necrologies and Mortuary Rolls
 Nine Worthy Women
 Noble Women
 Nogarola, Isotta
 Nuns as Illuminators

Nuns as Musicians
 Nuns as Scribes

O

Oblates and Oblation
 Obscenity
 Observant Movement
 Occitania
 Old Age
 Olga
 Ordination of Women as Priests
 Ottonian Royal Women
 Ovid, Medieval Reception of

P

Paganism
 Parishes
 Paston Letters
 Pastourelle
 Patriarchy and Patrilineage
 Patronage, Artistic Patronage, Ecclesiastical Patronage, Literary
 Peasants
 Penitentials and Pastoral Manuals
 Performance in Lyric
 Performance Theory
 Personifications Visualized as Women
 Petitions
 Petrarch
 Petronila of Aragón
 Pilgrims and Pilgrimage
 Plague
 Poor Clares Order
 Pope Joan
 Portrait Medals
 Postcolonial Theory
 Postmodernism and Historiography
 Poverty
 Poverty, Religious
 Power, Eileen
 Pregnancy and Childbirth: Christian Women
 Pregnancy and Childbirth: Jewish Women
 Premonstratensian Order
 Private and Public Spheres
 Procreation and Ideas of Conception
 Prophets
 Prophets, Nordic
 Prosopography

ALPHABETICAL LIST OF ENTRIES

Prostitutes
Proverbs, Riddles, and Gnomie Literature
Psychoanalytic Theory

Q

Qasmūna Bint Ismā'īl
Queens and Empresses, Consorts of
Queens and Empresses: The West
Queer Theory

R

Radegund
Rape and Raptus
Reader-Response Criticism
Records, Ecclesiastical
Records, Rural
Records, Urban
Regents and Queen-Lieutenants
Relics and Reliquaries
Remarriage
Renaissance, Historiography of
Réponse du Bestiaire d'Amour
Roman de Flamenca
Roman de la Rose and Its Reception
Roman de Silence
Roman Law
Romance, English
Romance, French
Romance, German
Romancero
Romances of Antiquity
Rosary
Rose of Viterbo
Russia

S

Sanuti, Nicolosa Castellani
Satan
Scandinavia
Scholasticism
Scotland
Seals and Sigillography
Secrets of Women
Sentimental Romance
Sermons and Preaching

Servants
Sexuality: Extramarital Sex
Sexuality: Female Same-Sex Relations
Sexuality: Male Same-Sex Relations
Sexuality, Regulation of Sexuality: Sex in Marriage
Sheela Na Gigs
Shekhinah
Singlewomen
Sister-Books and Other Convent Chronicles
Skáldkonur
Slaves
Social Status
Song of Songs, Medieval Interpretations of Sophia Palaiologina
Soul
Space, Sacred: and Gender
Space, Secular: and Gender
Spirits: Discernment of and Possession by Spiritual Care
Spirituality, Christian
Stagel, Elsbeth
Strozzi, Alessandra
Succession, Royal and Noble
Sumptuary Law
Supernatural Women
Syon Abbey

T

Teresa de Cartagena
Tertiaries
Textile Production for the Market
Theodora
Theology
Tornabuoni de' Medici, Lucrezia
Tournaments
Translation
Trobairitz and Troubadours
Trota of Salerno
Trousseau
Trouvères, Women
Typology and Women

U

Unicorn
Universities
Urraca
Ursula and Her Companions

ALPHABETICAL LIST OF ENTRIES

V

Valkyries
Veronica's Veil
Villon, François
Violence
Virgin Martyrs
Virginity
Virile Women
Voice, Female: in Literature
Vowesses

W

Waldensians
Wales
Wallāda Bint al-Mustakfi
Wardship
Warfare
Wergild
Widows
Widows as Guardians
Wife of Bath
Wild Women
Wills and Testaments

Wisdom
Witches
Wolfram von Eschenbach
Woman on Top
Woman's Song
Women Authors: German Texts
Women Authors: Italian Texts
Women Authors: Latin Texts
Women Authors: Middle English Texts
Women Authors: Old French Texts
Women Authors: Spanish Texts
Women Medievalists in the Academy
Woodville, Elizabeth
Work

Y

Yvette of Huy

Z

Zita and Other Servant Saints

THEMATIC LIST OF ENTRIES

Art, Architecture, and Archaeology

Archaeology
Architecture, Domestic Architecture, Ecclesiastical
Architecture, Monastic
Art, Representations of Women in
Artists, Women
Body: Visual Representations of Books of Hours
Burials and Tombs
Castles and Palaces
Caterina Vigri
Clothwork, Domestic
Devotional Art
Eroticism in Art
Gaze
Gender in Art
Grave Goods
Hagiography, Iconographic Aspects of Icons, Byzantine
Jewelry
Marginalia, Manuscript
Mary, Virgin: in Art
Mikveh
Misericords
Nine Worthy Women
Nuns as Illuminators
Patronage, Artistic Portrait Medals
Seals and Sigillography
Sheela Na Gigs
Space, Sacred: and Gender
Space, Secular: and Gender
Veronica's Veil

Countries, Realms, and Regions

Burgundian Netherlands
Byzantium

Eastern Europe
England
Flanders
France, Northern
Frankish Lands
Germanic Lands
Iberia
Ireland
Italy
Occitania
Russia
Scandinavia
Scotland
Wales

Documentary Sources

Book Ownership
Charters
Chronicles of the Northern Low Countries
Coinage
Conduct Literature
Genealogy
Hagiography
Household Accounts
Letter Writing
Miracles and Miracle Collections
Monastic Rules
Monastic Visitation
Mystics' Writings
Necrologies and Mortuary Rolls
Penitentials and Pastoral Manuals
Petitions
Proverbs, Riddles, and Gnomonic Literature
Records, Ecclesiastical
Records, Rural
Records, Urban
Seals and Sigillography
Sermons and Preaching
Sister-Books and Other Convent Chronicles
Wills and Testaments

THEMATIC LIST OF ENTRIES

Economy and Society

Administration of Estates
Agriculture
Alewives and Brewing
Apprentices
Architecture, Domestic Arms and Armor
Artisan Families, Women of
Breastfeeding and Wet-Nursing
Business
Captivity and Ransom
Chivalry
Cities and Towns
Clothing
Clothwork, Domestic Consumption
Cosmetics
Death, Mourning, and Commemoration
Demography
Division of Labor
Domesticity
Dowry and Other Marriage Gifts
Economy
Feme Covert
Feme Sole
Fosterage
Gentry, Women of: England
Godparents
Gossip and Slander
Guild Members and Guilds
Heiresses
Heraldry
Home Manufacturing
Honor and Reputation
Household Accounts
Household Management
Hunting and Falconry
Inheritance
Investment and Credit
Ladies-in-Waiting
Landholding and Property Rights
Market and Tradeswomen
Mead-Giver
Merchant Families, Women of Midwives
Migration and Mobility
Naming
Noble Women
Old Age
Peasants
Poverty
Prostitutes
Servants

Singlewomen
Slaves
Social Status
Textile Production for the Market
Tournaments
Violence
Wardship
Warfare
Work

Education and Learning

Aristotelian Concepts of Women and Gender
Audience, Women in the Book Ownership
Books of Hours
Conduct Literature
Datini, Margherita
Devotional Literature
Dhuoda
Education, Beguine
Education, Lay
Education, Monastic
Exemplum
Fosterage
Humanism
Letter Writing
Literacy and Reading: Latin
Literacy and Reading: Vernacular
Mothers as Teachers
Nuns as Scribes
Proverbs, Riddles, and Gnostic Literature
Scholasticism
Sermons and Preaching
Universities

Family and Kinship

Adolescence
Betrothals
Chastity and Chaste Marriage
Children, Betrothal and Marriage of Churching
Conjugal Debt
Divorce and Separation
Domestic Abuse
Family (Earlier Middle Ages)
Family (Later Middle Ages)
Genealogy
Girls and Boys

Godparents
 Husbands and Husbandry
 Infants and Infanticide
 Kinship
 Lying-In Marriage Ceremonies
 Marriage, Christian
 Marriage and Concubinage in Scandinavia
 Marriage, Impediments to Marriage, Islamic: Iberia
 Marriage, Jewish
 Marriage Preaching
 Pregnancy and Childbirth: Christian Women
 Pregnancy and Childbirth: Jewish Women
 Remarriage
 Trousseau
 Widows
 Widows as Guardians

Gender and Sexuality

Abortion
 Aristotelian Concepts of Women and Gender
 Celibacy: Clerical and Priests' Concubines
 Charivari
 Chastity and Chaste Marriage
 Concubines
 Conjugal Debt
 Contraception
 Courtly Love
 Courtship
 Cross-Dressing
 Cuckold
 Defenses of Women
 Eroticism in Art
 Eroticism in Literature
 Eunuchs
 Femininity and Masculinity
 Festivals of Misrule
 Gender Ideologies
 Gender in Art
 Gender in History
 Hermaphrodites
 Illegitimacy
 Impotence
 Incest
 Menstruation
 Merchet and Leyrwite
 Misogyny
 Obscenity
 Patriarchy and Patrilineage
 Private and Public Spheres
 Procreation and Ideas of Conception

Prostitutes
 Rape and Raptus
 Sexuality: Extramarital Sex
 Sexuality: Female Same-Sex Relations
 Sexuality: Male Same-Sex Relations
 Sexuality, Regulation of Sexuality: Sex in Marriage
 Space, Sacred: and Gender
 Space, Secular: and Gender
 Virginitly
 Virile Women
 Woman on Top

Historiography

Annales School of History
 Cross-Cultural Approaches
 Demography
 Feminist Theories and Methodologies
 Gender in History
 History, Medieval Women's Performance Theory
 Postcolonial Theory
 Postmodernism and Historiography
 Power, Eileen
 Prosopography
 Psychoanalytic Theory
 Queer Theory
 Reader-Response Criticism
 Renaissance, Historiography of
 Women Medievalists in the Academy

Law

Barbarian Law Codes
 Crime and Criminals
 Feme Covert
 Feme Sole
 Law
 Law, Canon
 Law, Customary: French
 Law, English Secular Courts of Law, German
 Law, Islamic: Iberia
 Law, Jewish
 Legal Agency
 Marriage, Impediments to Merchet and Leyrwite
 Roman Law
 Sumptuary Law
 Wardship

THEMATIC LIST OF ENTRIES

Wergild
Witches

Literature

Amazons
Ancrene Wisse
Arthurian Literature
Audience, Women in the Ballads
Beast Epic
Beatrice
Beauty
Belle Dame Sans Merci
Beowulf
Body in Literature and Religion
Constance
Criseyde
Danse Macabre des Femmes
Dawn Song (Alba)
Debate Literature
Defenses of Women
Devotional Literature
Drama
Epic, Italian
Epic, Old French
Epic, Spanish
Eroticism in Literature
Evangiles des Quenouilles
Exemplum
Fabliau
Floire and Blancheflor
Griselda
Guinevere
Hagiography
Isolde
Jacobus de Voragine's Golden Legend
Jewish Women: Latin and European Vernacular
Literature
Katherine Group
Laughter
Literature, German
Literature, Hebrew
Literature, Iberian
Literature, Irish
Literature, Italian
Literature, Latin
Literature, Middle English
Literature, Occitan
Literature, Old English
Literature, Old French
Literature, Old Norse
Mary, Virgin: in Literature

Mélusine
Mermaids and Sirens
Minnesang
Misogyny
Muslim Women: Western Literature
Mythology, Medieval Reception of
Ovid, Medieval Reception of
Paston Letters
Pastourelle
Patronage, Literary
Performance in Lyric
Personifications Visualized as Women
Proverbs, Riddles, and Gnomonic Literature
Réponse du Bestiaire d'Amour
Roman de Flamenca
Roman de la Rose and Its Reception
Roman de Silence
Romance, English
Romance, French
Romance, German
Romancero
Romances of Antiquity
Sentimental Romance
Skáldkonur
Supernatural Women
Translation
Trobairitz and Trobadors
Trouvères, Women
Unicorn
Valkyries
Voice, Female: in Literature
Wife of Bath
Wild Women
Woman's Song
Women Authors: German Texts
Women Authors: Italian Texts
Women Authors: Latin Texts
Women Authors: Middle English Texts
Women Authors: Old French Texts
Women Authors: Spanish Texts

Medicine and Science

Abortion
Breastfeeding and Wet-Nursing
Caesarean Section
Contraception
Cosmetics
Disabilities
Doctors and Healers
Gynecology
Hospitals
Infertility

Lepers
 Lovesickness
 Madness
 Medicine
 Menstruation
 Midwives
 Natural World
 Plague
 Secrets of Women
 Trota of Salerno

Music and Dance

Dance
 Mary, Virgin: in Music
 Music, Women and Nuns as Musicians
 Performance in Lyric
 Trobairitz and Troubadours
 Trouvères, Women
 Woman's Song

Persons

Adela of Blois
 Adelheid
 Aethelflaed
 Aethelthryth of Ely
 Agnes of Prague
 Amalasantha
 Angela of Foligno
 Anne of Beaujeu
 Anne of Bohemia
 Ava
 Bake, Alijt
 Beatrice of Nazareth
 Beaufort, Margaret
 Berenguela
 Birgitta of Sweden
 Blanche of Castile
 Boccaccio, Giovanni
 Bokenham, Osbern
 Brigit
 Brunhild and Fredegund
 Castro, Inés de
 Caterina Sforza
 Caterina Vigri
 Catherine of Genoa
 Catherine of Siena
 Cereta, Laura
 Chaucer, Geoffrey
 Chrétien de Troyes

Christina of Markyate
 Christina the Astonishing
 Christine de Pizan
 Clare of Assisi
 Clare of Montefalco
 Clemence of Barking
 Clotilda
 Colette of Corbie
 Compiuta Donzella
 Constance of Sicily
 Cornaro, Caterina
 D'Este, Isabella and Beatrice
 Dante Alighieri
 Datini, Margherita
 Dhuoda
 Dolce of Worms
 Dorothea of Montau
 Douceline of Digne
 Ebner, Margaretha
 Edith
 Eleanor of Aquitaine
 Eleanor of Scotland
 Elisabeth of Hungary
 Elisabeth of Schönau
 Ermengard
 Fedele, Cassandra
 Fina of San Gimignano
 Frances of Rome
 Gerson, Jean
 Gertrude of Hackeborn
 Gertrude of Nivelles
 Gertrude of Ortenberg
 Gertrude the Great
 Godelieve of Gistel
 Goscelin of St. Bertin
 Gottfried von Strassburg
 Guibert of Nogent's Mother
 Hadewijch
 Helena
 Heloise
 Herrad of Hohenbourg
 Hild of Whitby
 Hildegard of Bingen
 Hrotsvit of Gandersheim
 Humility of Faenza
 Ida of Boulogne
 Irene
 Isabel I
 Isabel of Aragon
 Isabelle of France
 Jacqueline of Bavaria
 Jadwiga
 Joan of Arc
 Joan I
 Julian of Norwich

THEMATIC LIST OF ENTRIES

Kempe, Margery
Komnene, Anna
Kottaner, Helene
Langmann, Adelheid
Leoba
López de Córdoba, Leonor
Lutgard of Aywières
Margaret of Anjou
Margaret of Cortona
Margaret of Scotland
Margaret of York
Margaret “the Cripple” of Magdeburg
Margrethe
Marguerite Porete
Maria of Venice
Marie de France
Marie of Oignies
Marozia of Rome
Mary of Burgundy
Mary of Hungary I
Mary of Hungary II
Mary the Younger
Mathilda and the Monastery at Essen
Matilda of Tuscany
Matilda the Empress
Mechthild of Hackeborn
Mechthild of Magdeburg
Nogarola, Isotta
Olga
Petrarch
Petronila of Aragón
Qasmūna Bint Ismā’īl
Radegund
Rose of Viterbo
Sanuti, Nicolosa Castellani
Sophia Palaiologina
Stagel, Elsbeth
Strozzi, Alessandra
Teresa de Cartagena
Theodora
Tornabuoni de’ Medici, Lucrezia
Trota of Salerno
Urraca
Villon, François
Wallāda Bint al-Mustakfī
Wolfram von Eschenbach
Woodville, Elizabeth
Yvette of Huy
Zita and Other Servant Saints

Politics

Charters
Coinage

Crusades and Crusading Literature
Diplomacy and Reconciliation
Dogaresse
Empresses: Byzantium
Intercession
Noble Women
Ottonian Royal Women
Queens and Empresses, Consorts of
Queens and Empresses: the West
Records, Ecclesiastical
Records, Rural
Records, Urban
Regents and Queen-Lieutenants
Succession, Royal and Noble
Warfare

Religion and Theology

Abbesses
Almsgiving and Charity
Anchoresses
Ancrene Wisse
Anne
Architecture, Ecclesiastical
Architecture, Monastic
Asceticism
Augustine, Influence of Autohagiography
Beguines
Bible, Women in
Birgittine Order
Body in Literature and Religion
Books of Hours
Bride of Christ: Imagery
Canonesses
Canonization of Saints
Cathars
Catherine of Alexandria
Celibacy: Clerical and Priests’ Concubines
Chastity and Chaste Marriage
Church
Churching
Cistercian Order
Clothing for Religious Women
Cluniac Order
Confraternities
Conversae and Conversi
Conversion, Religious
Devotional Art
Devotional Literature
Devotional Practices
Dominican Order
Double Monasteries

THEMATIC LIST OF ENTRIES

Education, Beguine
 Education, Monastic
 Eve
 Exemplum
 Fasting and Food, Religious Aspects of Fontevrault, Abbey and Order of Foy
 Gilbertine Order
 Godparents
 Hagiography
 Hagiography, Iconographic Aspects of
 Heretics and Heresy
 Holy Kinship
 Humiliati
 Icons, Byzantine
 Immaculate Conception, Doctrine of
 Jacobus de Voragine's Golden Legend
 Jerome, Influence of
 Jesus/God as Mother
 Jewish Mystical Thought, Body and Soul in Jewish Women
 Joseph, Stepfather of Jesus
 Jouarre and Chelles
 Judith
 Katherine Group
 Law, Canon
 Law, Islamic: Iberia
 Law, Jewish
 Lay Piety
 Laywomen, Religious
 Lollards
 Magic and Charms
 Margaret of Antioch
 Mary and Martha
 Mary Magdalen
 Mary the Egyptian
 Mary, Virgin
 Mary, Virgin: in Art
 Mary, Virgin: in Literature
 Mary, Virgin: in Music
 Mathilda and the Monastery at Essen
 Meditation
 Mikveh
 Miracles and Miracle Collections
 Modern Devotion
 Monastic Enclosure
 Monastic Rules
 Monastic Visitation
 Monasticism and Nuns
 Monasticism and Nuns, Byzantine
 Monasticism and Nuns, Celtic
 Monasticism, Women's: Papal Policy
 Muslim Women: Iberia
 Mysticism and Mystics
 Mystics' Writings
 Necrologies and Mortuary Rolls
 Nuns as Illuminators
 Nuns as Musicians
 Nuns as Scribes
 Oblates and Oblation
 Observant Movement
 Ordination of Women as Priests
 Paganism
 Parishes
 Patronage, Ecclesiastical
 Penitentials and Pastoral Manuals
 Pilgrims and Pilgrimage
 Poor Clares Order
 Pope Joan
 Poverty, Religious Premonstratensian Order
 Prophets
 Prophets, Nordic
 Records, Ecclesiastical
 Relics and Reliquaries
 Rosary
 Satan
 Sermons and Preaching
 Shekhinah
 Sister-Books and Other Convent Chronicles Song of Songs, Medieval Interpretations of Soul
 Space, Sacred: and Gender
 Spirits: Discernment of and Possession by
 Spiritual Care
 Spirituality, Christian
 Syon Abbey
 Tertiaries
 Theology
 Typology and Women
 Ursula and Her Companions
 Veronica's Veil
 Virgin Martyrs
 Virginité
 Virile Women
 Vowesses
 Waldensians
 Wisdom

A

---

ABBESSES

The title of abbess (Latin abbatissa) has been constructed as the feminine form of abbas (abbot/father) to correspond generally to the role of an abbot, the superior in spiritual and temporal matters of a community of monks. It represents the attempt to construct a female superior for a monastery of nuns with legal, ecclesiastical, and spiritual functions of leadership not usually granted to women. Therefore, the office of abbess does not merely exemplify the superior as mother of the community but as a kind of female father with paternal rights.

This concept did not arise with the earliest religious women's communities. The first leaders of female religious groups were called mater monasterii, mater monacharum, or, as by Augustine, praeposita. For the first time in 514, the title abbess appears in a sepulchral inscription for the superior Serena of an ancient monastery in Rome near the Basilica of St. Agnes extra muros. Bishop Caesarius of Arles was the first bishop to use the title abbess, in the rule which he wrote together with his sister Caesarea between approximately 512 and 534. Starting with an identification of the leading figure as prior, senior, or mater, he later uses the title abbatissa more and more, especially to indicate the formal independence of the leader from her bishop. In the following centuries the title came into general use by the popularization of the Benedictine Rule and its adaptation for women's monasteries. But, following the full establishment of the Benedictine Rule as the one and only monastic rule in Latin Europe during the tenth and eleventh centuries, the problem of abbesses' source of authority was never fully resolved in female communities. This was the reason why their jurisdictional rights and liturgical abilities were under constant discussion and why monastic rules had to be provided with explications of an abbess' authority (see, for example, Abelard, Letter 1: Ad amicum suum consolatoria, c. 54).

Abbesses are known as leaders of Benedictine monasteries, of houses of canonesses (Stifte) or Augustinian communities, and also of some of the later monastic congregations, such as Cistercians, Poor Clares, Fontevrists, and Birgittines. A lot of other women's communities never had their own abbesses, but continued to call their leaders mater or prioress. These terms referred to a merely temporary leadership, as was, for example, customary for the Dominicans, or the subordinated position of the nunnery, which was supervised by the abbot of a nearby cloister.

Election and Consecration

The office of an abbess is, in principle, elective. Commonly, the abbess was elected by all the nuns of a community, but in double monasteries or monasteries with added communities of canons, men were in some cases entitled to vote as well. The diocesan bishop had to preside over the election and confirm the elected candidate; in exempt houses he acted merely as a delegate of the pope. Women's monasteries that were part of a monastic congregation had to invite the minister general to preside over the election (as stated, for example, in the *bull*a of Pope Innocent IV for the Clares dating from 9 August 1253). The bishop or minister had the right to intervene if no candidate received the required number of votes and, in exceptional cases, could even select the successor. Although Gregory the Great tried to introduce an age limit and recommended that only virgins be elected, every honourable and fully valid member of the convent could become abbess, irrespective of age and social origin.

In reality, a great part of the better known abbesses descended from the noblest and more influential families. Often they were, therefore, invited from other monasteries or even enthroned as children as young as eleven or twelve years old, although the outside candidates had, nevertheless, to accept the way of life and rule of their new convent. This phenomenon of noble abbesses is interpreted differently. On the one hand, many founders of religious communities reserved the leadership for descendants of their own family at least for some generations, thus guaranteeing the further political and economic use of the land and wealth given to the monastery, as well as continuous commemoration (memoria) by prayers for the members of their family. Most foundation charters or royal confirmation charters granted the right of a free election of the abbess only if no suitable offspring of the founding family was available. But even that did not hinder kings or bishops from securing the office for their own candidates, especially kinswomen; even a letter of application is known from the eighth century. Thus, until the twelfth century, most abbesses seem to have been nominated by royal or noble families, and nunneries, therefore, must have been influenced to elect the already nominated candidates. On the other hand, it has been argued that the nunnery itself would have been disposed to elect the woman with the best political connections and noblest family background to secure its own interests. Furthermore, difficulties could arise from medieval society's notions of status and nobility; as when the abbess was less noble than other community members (see, for example, the problems in S. Croix, Poitiers, in 589). Formalised procedures of election are known predominantly from the high and late Middle Ages.

After the election, the abbess was usually consecrated by the bishop of the diocese according to the rites prescribed in the Pontificale Romanum, as well as in many monastic rituals. The ceremony took place during the Mass; as symbols of her office and a copy of the monastic rule were conferred on the new abbess. While some of the rites, for example the Romano-Germanic Pontifical, compiled c. 950, do not mention giving a baculum (a kind of pastoral staff) to the abbess, it seems to have been common for abbesses to use a staff as regalia. Further, it is unknown whether medieval abbesses were allowed to wear a ring as abbots and bishops did. In some communities the ceremony included the enthronement or the coronation of the abbess; on rare occasions she was even placed onto the altar (for example, in Herford, Germany).

From the eleventh century a division between abbess and community can be documented: some abbesses—especially of the more wealthy monasteries—had their own residences with chapels, separate incomes, and separate administration.

Internal Authority of the Abbess

The abbess exercised supreme domestic authority not only over the nuns of the community, but also over the canons or priests living there and the servants and all the families on the monastery's dependencies. In some areas, especially in Anglo-Saxon England and early medieval France, as well as later in the twelfth century at Fontevrault Abbey, double monasteries with joint communities of nuns and monks were led by abbesses. In accordance with the rule or the statutes of the particular order, the abbess could demand complete obedience from her nuns and ordain whatever was necessary for the maintenance of discipline in the community and the proper observance of the rule. Furthermore, she decided on the distribution of food and clothing and assigned the duties.

The abbess was responsible for the mundane welfare of the women whose care was entrusted to her and also for their eternal salvation, despite being incapable of performing the spiritual functions of the priesthood due to her gender. Therefore, she was only allowed to bless her nuns in the way a mother blessed her children, and, although she had to hear their daily confessions to impose discipline, she was deprived of the right to administer the sacrament of penance in the ninth century. Neither was the abbess allowed to preach publicly; she had to exhort her nuns in chapter to instruct them about the Christian faith and the interpretation of the Bible. It was difficult to draw a line between performing spiritual functions of the priesthood and fulfilling abbatial duties, so again and again during the Middle Ages canon law prohibited abbesses from overstepping their boundaries by blessing men or taking vows from their nuns or novices (as appears in the Capitularies of Charlemagne and in Innocent III's warning in 1210 concerning the Cistercian abbesses of Burgos and Palencia in Spain).

External Duties of the Abbess

The abbess acted for her monastery in the secular world and also represented the outside world within the monastery. In strictly cloistered monasteries she was the only contact to the outside; otherwise she, together with the sister acting as gatekeeper, had to welcome and care for guests. Often their secular and spiritual duties forced abbesses into frequent contacts and even travels, as, for example, to visit their holdings or to represent their communities' interest before the secular and ecclesiastical rulers, although for less demanding tasks they could rely mostly on male officials, as, for example, a provost. However, throughout the Middle Ages, the discussion of an abbess' external authority was determined largely by her independence from clerical hierarchies and the question of enclosure, seen as necessary for women because of their inferior gender and their uncontrolled sexuality. Within the Carolingian reform, for example, the liberty of the abbess to leave her monastery was restricted by royal edicts. However, in the Anglo-Saxon era and in early medieval Saxony, as later in the more famous ladies' chapters (Damenstifte), the role of the abbess was less restricted and of great political importance, as exemplified by Mathild, abbess of Quedlinburg (+ 999), who represented King Otto III in Saxony.

(a) Powers Concerning Secular Jurisdiction

Abbesses were empowered to administer the temporal possessions of the monastery; therefore, they held seigniorial rights over fiefs, holdings, and serfs, and all secular rights in their domains. As sovereigns, abbesses began using seals in the twelfth century. Sporadically, they even had the privilege of coinage. In honour of their position they were entitled to officia principalia, such as a marshal or a chamberlain. Sometimes they were even entrusted with the administration of entire shires or counties (Sophie of Gandersheim, + 1039). In Germany the abbesses of Quedlinburg, Gandersheim, Lindau, Buchau, Regensburg, and other monasteries all belonged to the nobility of the Empire, and as such, they sat and voted in the Diet as members of the Rhenish bench. As an ecclesiastical sovereign, however, the abbess could only decide on issues of minor jurisdiction; for questions of life and death, as well as war, she was dependent on her reeve.

(b) Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction

Although the office of abbess had no priestly functions and its own limitations were defined by canon law, in some exceptional cases abbesses whose monasteries were exempt were permitted to exercise a most extraordinary power approaching that of a bishop in terms of ecclesiastical jurisdiction.

In the diocese of Münster (Germany) most of the abbesses of the noble collegiate foundations were even called "archdeaconess," which further certified their quasi-episcopal jurisdiction and conferred on them an aspect of the bishop's ecclesiastical official duties. They were responsible for the religious and moral life of the population and the clerics. One of their duties was to guarantee people access to the sacraments and possibilities of penance. Furthermore, these abbesses had to organize the church services and the calendar of saints. Another part of this quasi-episcopal jurisdiction was the right to hold assemblies and to convoke synods, as well as to participate in them. The importance of Abbess Hild at the Synod of Whitby in 664 is the best-known example of such participation. Such abbesses gave canonical investiture to the holders of prebends, made visitations, held courts, regulated the activities of canons and priests, and reigned over the other monasteries in their region. They could even impose censures and excommunication. As archdeaconesses, abbesses were entrusted with the preservation of the Faith and the maintenance of ecclesiastical discipline. The spiritual care included the welfare of the poor, the establishment of hospitals, and the protection of Jews. Although some abbesses installed capellani as their agents or asked abbots in the vicinity for help, their authority to make decisions stayed unaffected until modern times.

Similar to such archdeaconesses, the abbess of the Cistercian monastery of Santa Maria la Real de las Huelgas was called "lawful administratrix in spirituals and temporals...of all the contents, churches, and hermitages of its filiation, of the villages and places under its jurisdiction, seigniorly, and vassalage ... with plenary jurisdiction, privative, quasi-episcopal, nullius diocesis." At a General Chapter of the Cistercians held in 1189, she was even made Abbess General of the Order for the Kingdom of Leon and Castile. Equal rights of jurisdiction have been exercised by the Cistercian abbess of Conversano in Italy and the abbesses of Fontevault in France and Herford in Saxony.

Overall, despite their disputed position of office, abbesses were well known and quite successful rulers in the Middle Ages and an integral part of secular and ecclesiastical networks. However, there still remain comparative studies to be done, and in a lot of areas the knowledge about abbesses' rights and duties is based on assumptions. Even some relatively basic questions, such as under which circumstances a monastic community could install an abbess or which symbols were in use for the investiture, cannot yet be answered satisfactorily.

KATRINETTE BODARWÉ

References and Further Reading

- Baucher, Joseph. "Abbesses." In Dictionnaire de Droit Canonique, Vol. 1, edited by Raoûl Naz. Paris: Letouzey & Ané, 1935 pp. 62–71.
- Fürstenberg, Michael Freiherr von. "Ordinaria loci" oder "Monstrum Westphaliae"? Zur kirchlichen Rechtsstellung der Äbtissin von Herford im europäischen Vergleich (Studien und Quellen zur westfälischen Geschichte Bd.29). Paderborn: Bonifatius, 1995.
- Lifshitz, Felice. "Is Mother Superior? Towards a History of Feminine Amtcharisma." In Medieval Mothering (Garland Reference Library of the Humanities 3), edited by John Carmi Parsons. New York, London: Garland Publishing, 1996, pp. 117–138.
- Macy, Gary. "The Ordination of Women in the Early Middle Ages." Theological Studies 61, 3 (2000): 481–507.
- Skinner, Mary S. "French Abbesses in Action: Structuring Carolingian and Cluniac Communities." Magistra: A Journal of Women's Spirituality in History 6, 1 (2000): 37–60.
- Stafford, Pauline. "Powerful Women in the Early Middle Ages: Queens and Abbesses." In The Medieval World, edited by Peter Linehan and Janet L. Nelson. London: Routledge, 2001, pp. 398–415.
- Van Engen, John. "Abbess: 'Mother and Teacher.'" In Voice of the Living Light: Hildegard of Bingen and Her World, edited by Barbara Newman. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998, pp. 30–51.

See also Birgittine Order; Canonesses; Church; Cistercian Order; Double Monasteries; Fontevault, Abbey and Order of; Hild of Whitby; Law, Canon; Monastic Rules; Monasticism and Nuns; Ordination of Women as Priests; Patronage, Ecclesiastical; Poor Clares Order; Sermons and Preaching

ABORTION

Throughout the Middle Ages, members of the church hierarchy reminded Christians that abortion constituted a mortal sin and was worthy of eternal damnation. Reiterating precepts of ancient church councils, compilations of ecclesiastical (canon) law in the East and West instructed the faithful of the old patristic equation of abortion with manslaughter (homicidium) and imposed appropriate penances. In addition, early medieval books of penance spread the "biblical" distinction (from the Greco-Jewish Septuagint) between killings of unformed and formed fetuses, with only the latter amounting to actual rather than intended homicide. In trying to uncover medieval experiences of abortion, we depend on Christian sources consistently written by authors hostile to the practice. We will never know just how many medieval women resorted to abortion, the precise sex ratio (male versus female) of the victims, or how their number compared to the total of individuals using contraception or committing infanticide. All we can infer from the incessant admonitions in writing is that each form of birth control was common enough to worry medieval clerics. People seem to have accepted the notion that abortion entailed sin and warranted penance. At the same time, consequences other than spiritual peril remained unlikely as long as the decision to abort was backed by sufficient communal consent. Women were well advised to enlist the support of husbands and relatives prior to terminating a pregnancy. Abortions performed in the privacy of a home and shielded by family acquiescence were neither thoroughly investigated nor viewed as particularly "dishonorable."

In both the Eastern and the Western Churches the redemption of aborting sinners involved elements of "public" and "communal" justice, such as the initiation of the penitential process by way of anonymous denunciations or the performance of penance before everyone's eyes. It was only in the Latin West and not until the twelfth century, however, that abortion began to be treated as something more than a sin redeemable through fasting, shameful exposure, and pilgrimages. In formulating coherent and comprehensive doctrines for their newly established scholastic disciplines, academic jurists and theologians agreed that the penitential equation of abortion with homicide should extend to criminal prosecutions as well. In church courts, guilty clerics were to be barred or suspended from spiritual office. Before the secular judge, laypersons who had intentionally killed an "animated" (formed) human fetus would face execution for voluntary homicide. The killing of an unformed and not yet "human" fetus during the first forty to eighty days of gestation was regarded as attempted homicide.

By 1250, scholastic thinkers had created a sophisticated theory of criminal abortion. It was profoundly inspired by Christian standards and taught widely throughout the Latin West. Adoption of the new theory in actual court proceedings progressed at a much slower pace, allowing for local and procedural variations best understood as adjustments of ingrained assumptions about fertility as a family matter. Resistance to scholastic criminal norms was strongest in jurisdictions that relied on local and non-professional jurors, such as the German Schöffengerichte and the English common law courts. The Ius commune taught at the continental law schools seems to have encouraged greater rigidity, considering that the passing of the final sentence was left to professionally trained judges (inquisitores) instructed to act impartially and without regard for local interest groups. Yet, in line with jurors hesitant to monitor the reproductive behavior of their peers, inquisitores were held in check by highly restrictive procedural guidelines. In order to convict a defendant of criminal abortion, they had to find two eyewitnesses or obtain a full confession of guilt. Trials would not even begin unless a dead body had been recovered and there was proof of a concealed pregnancy.

There is disagreement among modern scholars as to the quality of medieval medical knowledge concerning abortions. Some have argued that midwives, contrary to the male establishment at the emerging faculties of medicine, possessed considerable expertise in contraceptive and abortive prescriptions. Sources leave no doubt that law courts regularly consulted women as sworn witnesses in matters pertaining to pregnancies and that scholastic teaching did not include midwifery in its curriculum. Still, only a limited amount of information about the abortive effect of herbal concoctions was passed on from antiquity. Academic physicians failed to distinguish clearly between reproductive and digestive organs and frequently offered the same medical advice for both. Proper dosage was of little concern. Below the university level, the creation of an organized body of information relating to “safe” abortions was hampered by the lack of a common language (Latin would have come closest) and the absence of a uniform nomenclature. Consequently, trust in the effectiveness of specific abortive treatments depended above all on individual perspective. Among those frightened by the prospect of an unwanted baby, reliance on “wise women” may have been strong. Meanwhile, the scholastic Ius commune punished with death the use of abortive potions, even if the fatal outcome was accidental and the fetus had not yet been animated.

Jurists considered tampering with medication as notoriously dangerous to mother and child. To deter unlicensed practitioners, they were prepared to eliminate important procedural safeguards. Abortions allegedly brought on by potions could be tried without eyewitnesses, the presence of a corpse, or prior concealment of pregnancy. Defendants could be subjected to torture at the judge’s discretion. Specific cases of “dynamic” abortion (i.e., caused by herbal infusion) rarely appeared in late-medieval criminal courts. Allowing for condemnations on the basis of exceptionally weak judicial evidence, however, the charge facilitated the prosecution of a novel category of suspects: from the 1430s onward, accusations of witchcraft were routinely bolstered by allegations of dynamic abortion.

WOLFGANG MUELLER

References and Further Reading

- Cohn, Samuel K. “Prosperity in the Countryside: The Price Women Paid.” In Women in the Streets: Essays on Sex and Power in Renaissance Italy, edited by Samuel K. Cohn. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1996, pp. 137–165.
- Hewson, M. Anthony. Giles of Rome and the Medieval Theory of Conception: A Study of the ‘De formatione corporis humani in utero.’ London: Athlone Press, 1975.
- Hoffer, Peter, and N. Hull. Murdering Mothers: Infanticide in England and New England 1558–1803. New York: New York University Press, 1981.
- Kieckhefer, Richard. “Avenging the Blood of Innocent Children: Anxiety Over Child Victims and the Origins of the European Witch Trials.” In The Devil, Heresy, and Witchcraft in the Middle Ages: Essays in Honor of Jeffrey B. Russell, edited by Alberto Ferreiro. Leiden: Brill, 1998, pp. 91–109.
- Langbein, John. Torture and the Law of Proof: Europe and England in the Ancien Régime. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1977.
- Müller, Wolfgang P. Die Abtreibung. Anfänge der Kriminalisierung 1140–1650. Cologne, Weimar, and Vienna: Böhlau, 2000.
- . “Canon Law Versus Common Law. The Case of Abortion in Late Medieval England.” In Proceedings of the Tenth International Congress of Medieval Canon Law, edited by Kenneth Pennington and Keith Kendall. Vatican City: Biblioteca Apostolica Vaticana, 2002, pp. 964–975.
- Nardi, Enzo. Procurato aborto nel mondo greco-latino. Milan: Giuffrè, 1971.
- Noonan, John. “An Almost Absolute Value in History.” In The Morality of Abortion: Legal and Historical Perspectives, edited by John Noonan. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1970, pp. 1–59.
- Riddle, John. Eve’s Herbs: A History of Contraception and Abortion from the Ancient World to the Renaissance. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1997.
- Troianos, Spiros. “The Embryo in Byzantine Canon Law.” Biopolitics 3 (1991): 179–194.

See also Contraception; Crime and Criminals; Gynecology; Infants and Infanticide; Inquisitions; Law, Canon; Midwives; Penitentials and Pastoral Manuals; Pregnancy and Childbirth: Christian Woman; Procreation and Ideas of Conception; Scholasticism; Single women; Witches

ADELA OF BLOIS

Conceived after her father's consecration as king of England, Adela (c. 1067–1137) was the youngest daughter of William the Conqueror and his wife Mathilda of Flanders, born almost certainly between November 1067 and May 1068. She became fully literate in Latin, as exemplified when she read aloud at a ceremony to translate relics, authenticated charters by writing her own name, and received praise for her literacy in the complex prose and verse works directed to her by leading literary figures of her generation. Most likely educated as a child alongside her professed sister, Cecilia, at Holy Trinity, the nunnery her parents founded in Caen, Adela, in turn, hired tutors to oversee the education of her children and promoted the use of written documents. When, as a wife and widow, she became a noted power broker, renowned for her wealth and the prudent generosity with which she distributed it, Adela could add literary patronage to the bribes and bribes that served as the currency in the largely personalized politics of her day.

Betrothed in the early 1080s, Adela was married at Chartres, shortly after her fifteenth birthday (c. 1083 and certainly by 1085), to Stephen-Henry (b. c. 1044–1048), eldest son of count Thibaud III of Blois and Troyes, who was at least eighteen years her senior. Her dowry apparently consisted of moveable wealth rather than land, although her dower comprised castles, estates, and a forest across her husband's domains. Bearing one son, at the least, before her father-in-law's death (September 1089), the young countess secured her place in her new family; she eventually bore five sons and perhaps three daughters. When her husband became count of Blois, Chartres, and Meaux in his own right, she participated in all nonmilitary aspects of lordship, serving as a virtual co-count alongside him—the result of her high status, the age difference between the spouses, and the breadth of his domains. She was perfectly suited to serve as regent during Stephen's crusade ventures (1096–1099; 1101–1102) and after his death in the Holy Land (May 1102). Associating her sons in lordship as they came of age (William c. 1103 and Thibaud in 1107), she continued to rule as countess until she became a nun at Cluny's daughter house of Marcigny (April/May 1120).

As regent Adela earned a reputation for diplomacy, both for resolving vexed intermonastic disputes and in reconciling her brother, Henry I of England, with two exiled archbishops, Anselm of Canterbury (1105) and Thurstan of York (1120). She also generously supported Pope Paschal II during his 1107 tour of northern France and intervened with several prelates to ensure the election of her correspondent Baudri of Bourgueil as archbishop of Dol. Although her careful cultivation of the Capetian kings would not prevent warfare with Louis VI once he joined the coalition of princes intent on unseating Henry I as duke of Normandy (1111), Adela played a key role in the negotiations that led to a peace designed to last (1120) and served as the backdrop to her monastic retreat.

Personally devout—a saint's relics once cured her fevers, and she dedicated her youngest son to God—Adela supported a range of religious communities, from well-established Benedictine abbeys (e.g., St. Père in Chartres, St. Lomer in Blois, St. Ayoul in Provins, St. Germain in Auxerre, and multiple priories of Marmoutier) to newer foundations such as Tiron, the Cistercians, and the leper hospital in Chartres. She also worked with her most prominent bishop, Ivo of Chartres, to reform monasteries, from the nuns at Faremoutiers (her one notable intervention for a community of women) to houses of secular canons. Many of Adela's pious bequests had important economic and political benefits, as well as spiritual ones, and her cooperation with Ivo led to his support for her at critical political junctures, in spite of their occasional disputes. This lordly experience served her well during her last seventeen years at Marcigny, where Adela, most likely as prioress, served as a spiritual guide to her sisters, consolidated her community's lands and intervened in the counties she had left behind. Though she died on 8 March 1137, her memory was kept alive with anniversaries celebrated in churches across England and France and in the pursuits of the three sons who outlived her: count Thibaud IV of Blois (II of Troyes) (d. 1152), King Stephen of England (d. 1154), and Bishop Henry of Winchester (and abbot of Glastonbury) (d. 1172).

KIMBERLY LOPRETE

References and Further Reading

- LoPrete, Kimberly A. "Adela of Blois and Ivo of Chartres: Piety, Politics, and the Peace in the Diocese of Chartres." Anglo-Norman Studies 14 (1991): 131–152.
- . "Adela of Blois as Mother and Countess." In Medieval Mothering (The New Middle Ages series, 3), edited by John Carmi Parsons and Bonnie Wheeler. New York & London: Garland, 1996, pp. 313–333.
- . "Adela of Blois: Familial Alliances and Female Lordship." In Aristocratic Women in Medieval France, edited by Theodore Evergetes. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999, pp. 180–200.
- . "The Gender of Lordly Women: The Case of Adela of Blois." In Studies on Medieval and Early Modern Women: Pawns or Players?, edited by Christine Meek and Catherine Lawless. Dublin: Four Courts Press, 2003, pp. 90–110.

Otter, Monika. “Baudri of Bourguiel, ‘To Countess Adela.’” Journal of Medieval Latin 11 (2001): 60–141.

See also Diplomacy and Reconciliation; France, Northern; Literacy and Reading: Latin; Monasticism and Nuns; Noble Women; Patronage, Ecclesiastical; Regents and Queen-Lieutenants

ADELHEID

Adelheid (or Adelaide) (c. 932–999), daughter of the Burgundian king Rudolf II, had a great influence on European politics as queen of Italy and East Francia, and later as Roman empress. After the death of her father, she was educated at the court in Pavia, and in 947, she married King Lothar of Italy. When he died suddenly in 950, Adelheid became the center of the struggles for the Italian crown. At one point, she was captured but escaped to King Otto I of East Francia (later Germany), whom she married in 951. Being named consors regni, her influence is visible especially in Italian politics—one highlight was her coronation as empress in 962. After Otto’s death in 973, Adelheid was the most influential advisor of her son Otto II, sometimes even his representative in Pavia. When he died suddenly in 983, she secured the succession of her young grandson Otto III with her daughter-in-law Theophano, the Byzantine princess. As advisor to her daughter Emma, queen of West Francia, Adelheid also influenced French politics. Dowries and inheritance enabled her to found and support several monasteries. She was especially attached to the reform movement of Cluny. After Otto III’s coming of age, she retired to her favourite foundation in Selz until her death in 999. With the assistance of Cluny, a cult was established in remembrance of her ecclesiastical interests, and Adelheid was canonized in 1097. Adelheid as a person is well known through sources such as her biography, written by the monk Odilo of Cluny, as well as her correspondence and her personal memorial notes, which were preserved in the necrology of Merseburg. She was one of the most important political figures of her time, a mater regnorum (mother of several kingdoms).

KATRINETTE BODARWÉ

References and Further Reading

Corbet, Patrick, ed. Adélaïde de Bourgogne: genèse et représentations d'une sainteté impériale; actes du colloque international du Centre d'Études Médiévales, Auxerre 10 et 11 décembre 1999. Dijon: Ed. de l'Univ. de Dijon, 2002.

Föbel, Amalie. Die Königin im mittelalterlichen Reich: Herrschaftsausübung, Herrschaftsrechte, Handlungsspielräume. Stuttgart: Thorbecke, 2000.

Gilsdorf, Sean, ed. Queenship and Sanctity: The lives of Mathilda and the Epitaph of Adelheid, translated by Sean Gilsdorf. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America Press, 2004.

Stafford, Pauline. “Powerful Women in the Early Middle Ages: Queens and Abbesses.” In The Medieval World, edited by Peter Linehan and Janet L. Nelson. London: Routledge, 2001, pp. 398–415.

Weinfurter, Stephan. “Kaiserin Adelheid und das ottonische Kaisertum.” Frühmittelalterliche Studien 33 (1999): 1–19.

See also Cluniac Order; Hagiography; Ottonian Royal Women; Patronage, Ecclesiastical; Queens and Empresses: The West

ADMINISTRATION OF ESTATES

For those women who were either born to land or married into landed families, there was the prospect of a life in great part taken up by estate management. The fact that on marriage the land was technically the property of husbands did not make much difference to the question of its management as far as women were concerned. A succession of medieval treatises assumed that women would be directly involved, either during their marriages or afterwards in widowhood. In her 1405 manual of advice for women, the Franco-Italian author Christine de Pizan stated that women needed to know how to administer estates because their husbands were so often absent. She insisted that such women needed to know all about the land, its value, revenues and expenditures, the rhythms of the year, all aspects of husbandry, and how to choose, supervise, and dismiss servants. Women needed a basic knowledge of the law and had to be able to defend the land in the courts or, if necessary, by military means.

How they learned these skills is not well recorded, since most education was informal. Much was undoubtedly taught by their mothers, husbands, and, as a last resort, by direct experience. As levels of lay literacy began to rise, landed women would certainly have learned to read. In his rules of estate management, written c. 1240 for the widowed countess of Lincoln, Robert Grosseteste clearly assumed that the countess could read, and, in the early fourteenth century, Francesco da Barberino declared that formal education was essential for any woman who was likely to inherit land. Responsibility for estates could fall to women at a very young age. Katherine Neville was but fifteen when her husband, John Mowbray, earl of Nottingham, went off to fight in France in 1415, and, during his unbroken absence between 1417 and 1422, it was she who was running the estates.

Under all circumstances, a woman's (or a man's) first resort was to turn to a council of advisers, but final administrative decisions rested with her or him. Recourse to the law was common, and, despite the absence of any legal status, it is clear that landed women did, in practice, pursue cases through the courts, especially if the land under threat was from their own patrimony. In 1420 Elizabeth Berkeley, countess of Warwick, appeared in person before the king's council to defend her claims to her Berkeley estates when they were challenged by a nephew. Between 1473 and 1476 Anne Neville, dowager duchess of Buckingham, had suits pending against twenty-three people, and Lady Margaret Beaufort brought twenty-eight suits for debt on the estates of her ward Edward, duke of Buckingham, in 1497–1498.

On many occasions, landed women faced the dangers of assault and attacks on property, and it is clear that de Pizan's advice on defense was not just theoretical. Elizabeth Berkeley complained that her nephew had put an armed force into the rectory house at her manor of Wotton-under-Edge and that his men had fired arrows and shouted obscenities at her.

It is among the archives of widows that historians have the best chance of observing female administration, for the widow not only had a legal status which made her fully legally responsible, rather than merely accountable to her husband, but she was also, in many cases, mistress of a considerable area. After 1215, a widow in England was entitled to both one-third of her husband's estates and to any jointure, land settled jointly in survivorship on a couple at the time of their marriage. These rights were not reduced by remarriage, and indeed successive widowhoods could increase land holdings substantially. Some of the best surviving administrative accounts of the period are for such women, one of the best sets being those of Elizabeth de Burgh, lady of Clare (d. 1360), who administered her lands alone for thirty-eight years. These show that women maintained the system of accounting common to all estates and that they could be extremely exacting and vigilant. The receivers-general, receivers, bailiffs, reeves, and many other lesser administrators were required to tender their annual accounts, and the system of taking valors (estimates of the likely annual revenues) was widely used by widows, doubtless driven by the experience they had gathered as wives. Incompetence or profligacy, such as that of Anne Talbot, the mother of Thomas Courtenay, Earl of Devon between 1422 and 1441, when the income from the comital estates appears to have dropped by one fifth, was rare. Unusual too was the disposal of land, such as that by Joan de Mohun in 1376 at the expense of the heirs. More common was the maintenance of high standards of administration and often some improvement, especially in reducing the burden of debt on estates. One of the best recorded widows of the later Middle Ages is Mahaut, countess of Artois and Burgundy, who was left in 1303 with three young children. Herself the heiress of Artois, she first had to fight off the claims of Robert, her nephew, before settling down to rule the territory, maintaining law and order through her officials, regularly checking her accounts, issuing charters to local towns to encourage trade, and distributing patronage to extend her networks of control. Wives and widows across Europe showed commitment to, and shared responsibility for, the administration of estates.

ROWENA E. ARCHER

References and Further Reading

- Archer, Rowena E. "How Ladies...Who Live on Their Manors Ought to Manage their Households and Estates": Women as Landholders and Administrators in the Later Middle Ages." In Woman Is a Worthy Wight: Women in English Society, c. 1200–1500, edited by P. J. P. Goldberg. Farnham, England: Alan Sutton Publishing Ltd., 1992, pp. 149–181.
- . "The Estates and Finances of Margaret of Brotherton, c. 1320–1399." Bulletin of the Institute of Historical Research 60 (1987), 264–280.
- de Pizan, Christine. The Treasure of the City of Ladies, or the Book of the Three Virtues, translated by Sarah Lawson. Harmondsworth: Penguin Publishing, 1985.
- Henley, Walter de. Walter of Henley's Husbandry and Other Treatises on Estate Management and Accounting (1890). Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1971.
- Ward, J. English Noblewomen in the Later Middle Ages. Harlow: Longman Publishing, 1992.
- . Women in Medieval Europe, 1200–1500. London: Pearson Education Limited, 2002.

See also Beaufort, Margaret; Education, Lay; Heiresses; Household Accounts; Inheritance; Landholding and Property Rights; Law, English Secular Courts of; Literacy and Reading; Vernacular; Noble Women; Widows

ADOLESCENCE

Did medieval young people experience a well-defined adolescence? The debate began in the 1960s when Philippe Ariès, a modern historian looking at family life throughout European history, argued that the concept of adolescence, as we understand it, only emerged in the eighteenth century. Subsequent scholars have found it necessary to distinguish between biological adolescence (the physiological transformation that takes place over the course of five or six years) and social adolescence (the extent to which a given society recognizes adolescence as a life stage distinct from childhood and full social adulthood). Since both anthropological and historical studies suggest that social adolescence, where it appears, is not universal in nature, but is instead to some degree situational, affected by factors such as wealth, vocation, social class, life experience, and culture, it seems likely that historians will never entirely agree about the presence or nature of adolescence in the Middle Ages.

Adolescence in the early Middle Ages (roughly 500 to 1050) has received relatively little attention from historians. Edward James argues that early medieval people had a theoretical conception of adolescence, based on ancient literature, but showed little awareness of it in their social practices or descriptions of individuals. Training for adult careers could begin well before puberty, and individuals often entered fully into adult roles around the age of fifteen. The age of majority—the legal age at which individuals could inherit property and act independently—varied among states, but usually was set in the mid-teens, again suggesting that social adolescence was not well defined.

Adolescence emerged as a more distinct life phase, for males at least, during the high and later Middle Ages (1050–1500). This can be attributed in part to the increasing complexity of society, including the widespread growth of cities, more centralized states, and literacy. Anthropologists find that more complex societies tend to have more prolonged adolescences. The growing complexity of society meant that young men had a wider range of career options than in the early Middle Ages. Training periods for careers such as knighthood and trades grew longer, and new institutions specializing in adolescent education, such as universities, emerged. Lawmakers in many regions raised the age of majority to the early twenties.

As the duration of adolescence changed, so did its image. Authors increasingly depicted adolescence as a time of license and irresponsibility, ideas found frequently in the Greek and Roman books being rediscovered at the time. Concerns about adolescent misbehavior and free choice encouraged monasteries to exclude children and adolescents until their mid-teens or twenties, and to supervise young people more carefully.

Although women shared in these changes to a degree, female adolescence was usually less distinct than that of men. Women had fewer new career or educational options, and their ages of majority rose less than men's during the high Middle Ages, often remaining in the mid-teens. Likewise, female monasteries were more likely to admit children and teenagers than were male monasteries. The extent to which women experienced a distinct social adolescence depended on region and social group. Where ages of marriage were higher, women appear to have enjoyed a more prolonged adolescence. In northwestern Europe, most women and men married in their mid-twenties. In Mediterranean regions, women married at younger ages, most often in their late teens or early twenties, and were more likely to be significantly younger than their husbands. This affected the career patterns of women. In England, girls often worked as servants during their adolescence, leaving home and experiencing a certain measure of freedom. In other parts of northwestern Europe, girls as well as boys might become apprentices, although there were always far fewer female apprentices. In Mediterranean regions such as Italy, unmarried girls did not usually undertake apprenticeship before marriage. Elite women, regardless of region, tended to marry younger than women in other social classes, because of the need for political alliances. Women in the highest ranks of English and French society often married at or before age twelve, the legal age of puberty for women. To a considerable degree, women entered an adult world at marriage and were expected to behave accordingly, although some allowances were made for very young brides—for example, consummation was delayed in some cases. Elite men also often married young, but their social adolescence did not end so abruptly, as they tended to continue their vocational training and wild behavior after marriage. James Schultz, examining elites in high medieval German romances, found little recognition of female adolescence. In general, even when social adolescence existed, females were not usually allowed the license given to their male peers.

FIONA HARRIS-STOERTZ

References and Further Reading

- Ariès, Philippe. Centuries of Childhood: A Social History of Family Life, translated by R. Baldick. New York: Random House, 1962.
- Chojnacki, Stanley. "Measuring Adulthood: Adolescence and Gender in Renaissance Venice." Journal of Family History 17 (1992): 371–395.
- Eisenbichler, Konrad, ed. The Premodern Teenager: Youth in Society, 1150–1650. Toronto: Centre for Reformation and Renaissance Studies, 2002.
- Goldberg, P. J. P. Women, Work, and Life Cycle in a Medieval Economy: Women in York and Yorkshire c. 1300–1520. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1992.
- Hanawalt, Barbara A. "Historical Descriptions and Prescriptions for Adolescence." Journal of Family History 17 (1992): 341–351.
- Harris-Stoertz, Fiona. "Young Women in France and England, 1050–1300." Journal of Women's History 12 (2001): 22–46.

ADOLESCENCE

- James, Edward. "Childhood and Youth in the Early Middle Ages." In Youth in the Middle Ages, edited by P. J. P. Goldberg and Felicity Riddy. York: York Medieval Press, 2004, pp. 11–23.
- Levi, Giovanni, and Jean-Claude Schmitt, eds. Ancient and Medieval Rites of Passage: A History of Young People in the West, Vol. I. Cambridge and London: Belnap Press of Harvard University Press, 1997.
- Lewis, Katherine J., Noël James Menuge, and Kim M. Phillips, eds. Young Medieval Women. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1999.
- Phillips, Kim. Medieval Maidens: Young Women and Gender in England, 1270–1540. Manchester: Manchester University Press, 2003.
- Schlegel, Alice, and Herbert Barry III. Adolescence: An Anthropological Inquiry. New York: The Free Press, 1991.
- Schultz, James A. The Knowledge of Childhood in the German Middle Ages, 1100–1350. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1995.

See also Apprentices; Children, Betrothal and Marriage of; Demography; Education, Lay; Education, Monastic; Fosterage; Girls and Boys; Inheritance; Monastic Rules; Servants; Universities

AETHELFLAED

Eldest daughter of Alfred the Great, sister of Edward the Elder, and aunt and fosterer of Aethelstan, Aethelflaed of Mercia (d. 918) led troops against the Vikings, built forts, endowed churches, issued charters, dealt with Irish-Norwegian pressures, and received the submission of the men of York. When her husband Aethelred died (911), she became the sole political and military authority in Mercia, working, as she and her husband had done earlier, in cooperation with Edward the Elder and recognizing his overlordship as King of Wessex. (In fact, given Aethelred's apparent illness and incapacity, Aethelflaed was de facto in power beginning c. 902.) This cooperation was ultimately successful in eliminating the Danish threat to Anglo-Saxon England and paved the way for the eventual unification of Mercia and Wessex.

The primary evidence for Aethelflaed's achievements occurs in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle in versions B, C, and D. Versions B and C present a "Mercian Register" or an "Annals of Aethelflaed," perhaps based on a now-lost Latin source. This section violates the chronological order in B and C, and suddenly introduces a focus on Mercia. Aethelflaed is styled "Lady of the Mercians," which some scholars take as a semantic dodge for "queen," possibly reflecting uneasiness with queens (Alfred's wife Ealhswith never had the title) or downplaying royal aspirations in the face of Edward. The clumsy insertion of the Mercian Register in B and C compares with its smoother incorporation in D, where Aethelflaed's exploits are diminished and folded into the story of the House of Wessex.

PAUL E. SZARMACH

References and Further Reading

- Bailey, Maggie. "Aelfwynn, Second Lady of the Mercians." In Edward the Elder, edited by N. J. Higham and D. H. Hill. London and New York: Routledge, 2001, pp. 112–127.
- Keynes, Simon D. "Edward, King of the Anglo-Saxons." In Edward the Elder, edited by N. J. Higham and D. H. Hill. London and New York: Routledge, 2001, pp. 40–66.
- Szarmach, Paul E. "Aethelfaed of Mercia: Mise en Page." In Words and Works: Studies in Medieval English Language and Literature in Honour of Fred C. Robinson, edited by Peter S. Baker and Nicholas Howe, Toronto, Buffalo, and London: University of Toronto Press, 1998, pp. 105–126.
- Thompson, Victoria. Dying and Death in Later Anglo-Saxon England. Woodbridge: The Boydell Press, 2004.
- Wainwright, F. T. "Aethelfaed, Lady of the Mercians." In New Readings on Women in Old English Literature, edited by Helen Damico and Alexandra Hennessey Olsen. Bloomington and Indianapolis: Indiana University Press, 1990, pp. 44–55. Originally published in The Anglo-Saxons: Studies in Some Aspects of the History and Culture, Presented to Bruce Dickins, edited by Peter Clemoes. London: Bowes and Bowes, 1959.

See also History, Medieval Women's; Literature, Old English; Noble Women; Virile Women; Warfare

AETHELTHRYTH OF ELY

Aethelthryth (c. 630–679, also known as Etheldreda or Audrey) founded an important monastery at Ely, Cambridgeshire in 672/673. Her life is witnessed by Stephen of Ripon in the Life of Wilfrid (written after 709) and Bede in The Ecclesiastical History of the English People (completed in 731). An East Anglian princess, Aethelthryth was related by marriage to Hild, abbess of Whitby, and to Aebbe, abbess of Coldingham. She first wed Tonberht, a man of the South Gyrwe, and later wed Ecgrith, prince of Northumbria, and she is reputed to have retained her virginity in both marriages. The second alliance was formalized c. 660, and when Ecgrith was crowned in 670, Aethelthryth became Queen of Northumbria.

Stephen of Ripon indicates that Aethelthryth held Bishop Wilfrid of York in high esteem and gave him land at Hexham on which to build a monastic church. Her spiritual devotion led the queen to divorce Ecgrith, and in 671/672, she became a nun at Coldingham, under Ecgrith's aunt. After a year, she returned to East Anglia and founded a monastic church on the Isle of Ely for both women and men.

Aethelthryth's asceticism is well documented by Bede, but little is known about her administration of the double house. At Aethelthryth's death in 679, her sister, Seaxburh, succeeded as abbess of Ely, and, in 695, she authorized the transfer of Aethelthryth's body from the cemetery into the church. Seaxburh found the corpse intact, which was understood to prove Aethelthryth's chastity within marriage. At this revelation, the community initiated a devotional cult, one that was interrupted by the Danish invasions but resumed c. 970 when Bishop Aethelwold of Winchester refounded Ely as a males-only institution.

Aethelwold's promotion of Aethelthryth as an icon of virginity is evident in the ornate representation of the abbess included in a sumptuous benedictional made for his personal use, as well as in the endowments he lavished upon the monastery in her honor. His gifts of patronage positioned Ely as the second wealthiest foundation at the Domesday inquest. The Anglo-Norman monks who took over the administration of the monastery embraced this important Saxon cult, and, during the twelfth century, they used the history of Aethelthryth's sovereignty to establish Ely as an episcopal see. The community's ability to promote their founder is manifested by twenty-five extant accounts of the saint's life (written in Latin, French, and English), records of significant pilgrim donations at Aethelthryth's shrine, church dedications throughout southern England, and over 100 surviving images of the saint in various media. These documents show that Aethelthryth was the most widely celebrated native female saint in late medieval England. Reverence for her continued after the Reformation, when her feast was included in the Book of Common Prayer.

VIRGINIA BLANTON

References and Further Reading

- Bede. Bede's Ecclesiastical History of the English People, edited by Bertram Colgrave and R. A. B. Mynors. 1969. Reprint, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1992.
- Blanton-Whetsell, Virginia. "Imagines Aetheldredae: Mapping Hagiographic Representations of Abbatial Power and Religious Patronage." Studies in Iconography 23 (2002): 55–107.
- Keynes, Simon. "Ely Abbey 672–1109." In A History of Ely Cathedral, edited by Peter Meadows and Nigel Ramsay. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell, 2003, pp. 3–58.
- Stephen of Ripon. The Life of Bishop Wilfrid by Eddius Stephanus, edited by Bertram Colgrave. 1927. Reprint, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1985.
- Wogan-Browne, Jocelyn. "Queens, Virgins and Mothers: Hagiographic Representations of the Abbess and Her Powers in Twelfth- and Thirteenth-Century Britain." In Women and Sovereignty, edited by Louise Olga Fradenburg. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1992, pp. 14–35.

See also Abbesses; Asceticism; Chastity and Chaste Marriage; England; Hild of Whitby; Monasticism and Nuns; Queens and Empresses: the West; Virginity

AGNES OF PRAGUE

The Bohemian princess Agnes of Prague (1211–1282), joined Clare of Assisi in politicking for, and eventually securing, a Franciscan rule for women. The youngest of nine children, Agnes was born to King Přemysl Otakar I of Bohemia and Queen Constance of Hungary. Eager to expand his influence, Otakar engaged Agnes to Henry VII, son of Emperor Frederick II of Germany. Agnes began her formation as queen in Vienna, but Duke Leopold VI of Austria undermined Otakar's plans by arranging for his daughter, Margaret, to wed Henry instead.

In 1231, Frederick II sought Agnes's hand. In response, Agnes wrote to Pope Gregory IX and obtained permission to enter religious life. Enamored of the Franciscan ideal, Agnes built a hospital in Prague for the poor and sick in 1233, drawing upon her royal dowry, and established the Crosiers of the Red Star to administer the institution and care for its inmates. She also built a large monastery for women with a small convent attached for the Franciscan friars who would attend to their needs.

On June 11, 1234, Agnes entered the monastery that she had established, hoping to follow the example of Clare of Assisi. Clare wrote to Agnes, congratulating her on her choice. During the course of her life, Clare also wrote Agnes three other letters of advice and instruction. Unfortunately, Agnes's letters to Clare have been lost.

Agnes's greatest contribution was a series of privileges that she won from the papacy to secure the poverty of her monastery and a continued relationship with the Franciscan friars. These privileges paved the way for the papacy's 1253 approval of the Rule of St. Clare.

Agnes died in Prague on March 2, 1282.

JOAN MUELLER

References and Further Reading

- Mueller, Joan. "Agnes of Prague and the Rule of St. Clare." Studies in Spirituality 13 (2003): 1–12.
- . Clare's Letters to Agnes: Texts and Sources. St. Bonaventure, N.Y.: The Franciscan Institute, 2001.
- Soukupová, Helena. The Convent of St. Agnes of Bohemia. Prague: The National Gallery in Prague, 1993.

See also Clare of Assisi; Monasticism and Nuns; Patronage, Ecclesiastical; Poor Clares Order; Poverty, Religious

AGRICULTURE

Agriculture was central not only to the European economy of the Middle Ages but also to the daily and seasonal rhythms of the vast majority of medieval women and men. While peasant producers were directly involved in the cycles of intensive labor related to the land, noble and ecclesiastical landlords were dependent on the fruits of that agricultural labor to support their interests as warriors, clerics, and power brokers within the feudal and religious hierarchies. With approximately 90 percent of the population engaged in the production of food, the agricultural system of the Middle Ages (in many places called manorialism, as large landholders' estates were divided among different manors) created social as well as economic ties. The peasant family and village were the basic units of production within that system.

Peasant families did not own the land they worked; rather, they held, or had tenure of, the right of access to a number of acres in common fields distributed among the village as a whole. In exchange for this access to the land, they owed their manorial landlords three or four days of labor per week on the fields reserved for the lord (the demesne lands) as well as a variety of extra services and dues at certain times in the agricultural calendar. Due to the seasonal nature of agricultural tasks and the costs of farm implements and the animals to pull them, much of the work on individual holdings and on the lord's demesne had to be done cooperatively by members of the community. Women's agricultural tasks typically included the maintenance of animals such as chickens, cows, and other animals whose byproducts could be taken to market. Women were also responsible for the extensive gardens that supplemented the family diet and served as seasonal cash crops for local markets. While men did most of the ploughing, women often participated in the harvest and were especially involved in the processing of the harvested grain.

Crops, equipment, and patterns of land usage varied across regions and from one period of economic development to the next. Nonetheless, some generalizations are useful. The predominance of grain production, leguminous crops, viticulture, or pastoral farming in any given area was determined by climate and topography. Because cereal grains were a staple in the European diet, wheat, rye, barley, and oats were grown wherever the soil could be broken by the plough. The heavy, wheeled plough, pulled by a team of eight oxen, was the norm on the denser soils of northern Europe. In the later Middle Ages, an improved iron cutting edge that dug deeper into the soil and a moldboard that turned the soil to expose new nutrients made the plough more efficient and led to higher yields per acre. These improvements, along with the development of the horse collar, which allowed the team of oxen to be replaced by horses, helped to extend the arable land (or area under cultivation), as did the clearing of forests and drainage of swamps. With this extended arable area, many areas of western Europe were able to change from a two-field rotation of crops, with one field planted and one field lying fallow to rest and preserve its nutrients, to a system that allowed for one field to be used for a winter crop, such as wheat, one field for a spring crop, such as oats, and the third field to rest fallow. While this three-field crop rotation had the benefit of putting two-thirds of the arable land into production each year, it did not always guarantee a surplus crop, and peasant producers lived close to the margin of existence until the plague of the fourteenth century decimated the human population and made more land available to the survivors.

The marginal nature of grain harvests from year to year meant that most grain production could supply only local or regional markets. Legumes, such as peas and beans, were likewise grown for local markets. Viticulture, or the cultivation of vines, played a significant role in the distribution of agricultural land and tasks in regions of France, Burgundy, and parts of Italy, and it allowed production for a larger, long-distance market. In the later Middle Ages, more land was devoted to the raising of sheep for wool, especially in parts of England, Italy, and Spain, and this too allowed producers to be involved in long-distance markets.

Much of our knowledge of the intricate economic and social systems of agricultural production in the Middle Ages comes from records kept by the agents who managed the estates and held peasants to the terms of their contracts. Through these accounts we have learned that agricultural life was as socially complex as it was physically challenging.

MADONNA J. HETTINGER

References and Further Reading

- Berman, Constance Hoffman. Medieval Agriculture, the Southern French Countryside, and the Early Cistercians: A Study of 43 Monasteries. Philadelphia: American Philosophical Society, 1986.
- Coulton, G. G. The Medieval Village. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1931.
- Duby, Georges. Rural Economy and Country Life in the Medieval West, translated by Cynthia Postan. London: Arnold, 1968.
- Hallam, H. E., ed. The Agrarian History of England and Wales II: 1042–1350. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988.
- Hanawalt, Barbara H. The Ties That Bound: Peasant Families in Medieval England. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- Postan, M. M. The Agrarian Life of the Middle Ages (Cambridge Economic History of Europe. Vol. I, 2nd ed.) Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1966.
- Power, Eileen. Medieval People. London: Methuen, 1924.

See also Administration of Estates; Demography; Division of Labor; Household Management; Landholding and Property Rights; Migration and Mobility; Peasants; Plague; Records, Rural; Social Status; Work

ALBA

See Dawn Song (Alba)

ALEWIVES AND BREWING

Ale was the common drink of people in northern Europe; it also played a prominent part in medieval culture. Safer to drink than water, the grain-based beverage provided an important part of people's daily nutritional requirement. Brewing was practised among the Celts, Scandinavians, and Germanic peoples from at least late antiquity. For most of the Middle Ages, brewing was dominated by women. Because of its importance, ale's production and sale became subject to extensive regulation; as a result, alewives (women who brewed and/or sold ale) are much more visible in the records than most other medieval female workers.

In England, the late-thirteenth-century assize of ale, enforced by local officials, regulated the price and quality of ale. Similar regulations existed in Scottish towns. Breakers of the assize were fined. In England, although not Scotland, these fines effectively became a licensing system, with all brewers paying fines; the resulting lists of names have allowed historians to trace brewing households in some English communities over many years. Some lists also exist for Welsh and Scottish towns. On the Continent, increasing regulation in northern European cities, as brewing became more urbanised and commercialised in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, also made brewers more visible.

Brewing was a domestic skill expected of medieval women. Because ale spoiled quickly, many rural households alternated between brewing their own ale and selling any surplus, and purchasing it from neighbors. Brewing for sale was a part-time occupation, undertaken to supplement household income, although some women did brew full-time. In England, and probably elsewhere, demand for ale increased with rising living standards after the Black Death, providing more opportunities for women to earn a full- or part-time living from brewing, especially in the towns. Lists of citizens liable for brewing fees in some fifteenth-century German towns include large numbers of women. In England, there was an increase in the number of alehouses, where customers purchased ale and socialised. Women were also tavernkeepers in Germany, Denmark, and Poland.

Brewing offered women opportunities not found in many other trades. In England, a few women exercised office as ale-tasters. There is also some evidence of attempts to organise as a trade. However, the new opportunities may have mainly benefited married women. The number of single female brewers seems to have decreased during the fifteenth century, as commercial brewing increasingly became the preserve of married women who had the household and capital to undertake it. Single women in England mainly found employment in selling ale. In Scotland, in contrast, it was still common in 1500 for single women to set up as independent brewers.

The introduction of hopped beer, first produced in German towns in the thirteenth century and spreading through northern Europe in the fourteenth century, affected women's participation in brewing, although in different ways in different parts of Europe. Hopped beer lasted longer and could be made in larger quantities, but required greater capital outlay. Women were less able than men to invest, and the labor-intensive process was more difficult to balance with other domestic responsibilities. As a result, the more profitable beer brewing became dominated by men. In Europe, many women found employment working in the breweries. In England, hopped beer was introduced around 1400. Early English beer brewing was centered in London, where the number of female brewers declined over the fifteenth century, as women moved from brewing to retailing the new drink. Ale-brewing continued in much of the countryside, however, and in Scotland, it continued to dominate the brewing industry until well after 1500.

The effects of these economic changes on women have been debated. Some historians suggest that they had little effect, as women moved from low-status brewing in the eleventh to fourteenth centuries to low-status retailing in the fifteenth century. Others question whether the status of married brewers in the earlier period was as low as that of the later alewives and suggest that there was indeed some decline in women's status. Alewives were regarded in popular culture as swindlers and sexually promiscuous, and alehouses and taverns were commonly associated with licentiousness and disorder. There were increasing attempts in many countries in the late Middle Ages to regulate women's work in taverns, mainly because of their association with prostitution. On the other hand, there seems to have been little change in women's position in the brewing trade in the Low Countries until the seventeenth century, while in some European towns, the new opportunities provided by beer brewing benefited widows who took over breweries upon their husbands' deaths.

ALEWIVES AND BREWING

ELIZABETH EWAN

References and Further Reading

- Bennett, Judith. Ale, Beer and Brewsters in England: Women's Work in a Changing World, 1300–1600. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.
- Howell, Martha C. Women, Production, and Patriarchy in Late Medieval Cities. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1986.
- Martin, A. Lynn. Alcohol, Sex, and Gender in Late Medieval and Early Modern Europe. Houndmills: Palgrave, 2001.
- Peters, Christine. Women in Early Modern Britain, 1450–1640. Houndmills: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004.
- Uitz, Erika. Women in the Medieval Town. London: Barrie & Jenkins, 1990.
- Unger, Richard. Beer in the Middle Ages and the Renaissance. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2004.

See also Business; Division of Labor; Honor and Reputation; Market and Tradeswomen

ALMSGIVING AND CHARITY

Almsgiving and charity towards the poor, sick, and needy were enjoined upon all Christians, and by the later Middle Ages Christ was identified with the poor, so that giving alms to the poor was the same as giving them directly to Christ. This was based on the Biblical verse Matthew 25:41: "For I was hungry, and you gave me not to eat; I was thirsty, and you gave me not to drink. I was a stranger, and you took me not in; naked, and you covered me not; sick and in prison, and you did not visit me." These acts of charity were codified as the Seven Works of Mercy by the addition of the burial of the dead, based on the Book of Tobit. Women and children were also regarded as particularly vulnerable, and thus acts of charity could be gendered, as widows and orphans might be regarded as preferential recipients. While there is evidence that the early Church did see these last two groups as the major recipients of charity, with bishops being charged with their support, by the later Middle Ages they were less likely to be singled out, and women were more likely to be recipients because of their poverty than their gender or marital status.

Thomas Aquinas discussed almsgiving in his Summa Theologica (c. 1266–1273). He agreed on the need for almsgiving by all Christians but limited the extent to which dependents such as wives and servants could disburse the goods that belonged to the head of the household. This view was shared by other Italian writers, such as Bernardino of Siena (d. 1444), but may have been less of a concern in northern Europe, where wives may have been more economically independent.

There is disagreement among scholars as to how far there was increasing hostility towards the poor after the Black Death. There were concerns about the threat from able-bodied (male) laborers, but less so about the sick and needy of either sex. There is evidence for concern about the "shame-faced poor," that is, people of previously good economic and social standing who had fallen into poverty.

Practice

Almsgiving could either be organised within the household or directed through an institution such as a monastery or hospital. The female householder usually organised household giving, donating leftover food or outworn clothing to beggars at the kitchen door. Some women practised an extreme form of charity as devotion to Christ, where they gave away not only the waste and spare supplies, but large quantities of food and other goods belonging to the family. This could bring them into conflict with male family members, as it potentially threatened the economic stability of the family. This is found in the hagiographical accounts of several female saints, including Elisabeth of Hungary (d. 1231) and the servant Zita of Lucca (d. 1278) (although not always in eyewitness accounts). These suggest clerical support for female charity, and that the practice of charity was seen as particularly appropriate to women. Elisabeth founded a hospital at Marburg, where she tended the sick with her own hands, and gave away her money. Frances of Rome (d. 1440) also gave large quantities of food away, and begged alongside the poor. These women were probably trying to identify with the poor as well as help them. Some aristocratic and episcopal households had an almoner, a male official who was responsible for regular and formal support, often to a specific number of poor dependents, who might live in their own homes or within the household. Preference might be given to elderly or infirm former servants and tended to benefit males more than females, as male servants were more common (for example, Staindrop hospital in County Durham, founded in 1408 by Ralph, Earl of Westmorland, supported around a dozen poor gentlemen, grooms and yeomen, former servants of the earl). Charity and almsgiving are most easily seen in wills. Women usually only left wills as widows, and they were likely to distribute goods in kind, whereas men were more likely to distribute money, reflecting the resources available to them. Women were also more likely to distribute to a smaller circle, mainly of people known to them, whereas men were more likely to give to abstract collectivities and institutions. There is some evidence that women gave a higher proportion of their goods to charity, but this may be because the circumstances in which they were most likely to leave a will (as widows, and possibly without surviving children) encouraged the giving of alms. The nature of charity could be shaped by local circumstances, as in the giving of fuel by women in northern England in the later fourteenth and fifteenth centuries.

The main route by which almsgiving was directed via institutions was through monasteries and hospitals, and was performed by both men and women. However, women can also be found giving to other charitable purposes, such as prisons and the building of bridges and roads (such as the bridge at Puente la Reina in Spain, built to aid pilgrims on the road to Santiago de Compostela). This is traditionally ascribed to Queen Urraca of Leon-Castile but is probably older; however, the name (Queen's Bridge) indicates a female patron. Some Beguines also served the poor and sick in hospitals and leprosaria and distributed alms. In the later Middle Ages, guilds often took on the care of the needy, though there was often preference for their own members, which tended to benefit men more than women.

Monte delle doti (dowry investment funds) were established in Florence and a number of other northern Italian towns in the fifteenth century and provided a means by which poor fathers could invest towards dowries for their daughters. Guilds such as the Annunciation Guild of Rome also sometimes provided dowries for poor girls. In England, donations for poor girls' dowries can be found in wills, mainly of men, but were not institutionalised. Also to be found in Mediterranean Europe were houses for reformed prostitutes, such as the Casa de las Arrepentidas at Valencia, Spain, founded in 1345 by Na Soriana, a Dominican tertiary. These provided shelter for women who wished to leave prostitution. Civic authorities sometimes paid the dowries of such women.

The redemption of captives, that is, Christians who were in the hands of non-Christians (usually Muslims, for example, through seizure by North African pirates) was also a charitable activity from the later twelfth century, and a greater concern in Spain and Mediterranean Europe than in the north. It was mainly organised by the Mercedarian and Trinitarian orders, which dedicated a third of their incomes to this purpose. Redemption was mainly by the payment of ransom, but members of the orders sometimes offered themselves as substitutes for those they sought to redeem. Those who negotiated the release of captives were always men. The majority of those redeemed were male—primarily soldiers and sailors—but did include women and children.

P. H. CULLUM

References and Further Reading

- Aquinas, Thomas. Summa Theologica. <http://www.newadvent.org/summa/>, 1920.
- Boanas, Guy, and Roper, Lyndal. "Feminine Piety in Fifteenth-Century Rome: Santa Francesca Romana." In Disciplines of Faith: Studies in Religion, Politics and Patriarchy, edited by Jim Obelkevich, Lyndal Roper, and Raphael Samuel. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul Ltd, 1987, pp. 177–193.
- Brodman, James William. Charity and Welfare: Hospitals and the Poor in Medieval Catalonia. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1998.
- Bynum, Caroline Walker. Holy Feast and Holy Fast: The Religious Significance of Food to Medieval Women. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1987.
- Cullum, P. H. "'And Her Name was Charite': Charitable Giving by and for Women in Late Medieval Yorkshire." In Woman is a Worthy Wight: Women in English Society c. 1200–1500 (reprinted as Women in Medieval English Society), edited by P. J. P. Goldberg. Stroud, England: Sutton Publishing Ltd, 1992, pp. 182–211.
- . "Gendering Charity in Medieval Hagiography." In Gender and Holiness: Men, Women and Saints in Late Medieval Europe, edited by Samantha J. E. Riches and Sarah Salih. London: Routledge, 2002, pp. 135–151.
- Farmer, Sharon. Surviving Poverty in Medieval Paris: Gender, Ideology and the Daily Lives of the Poor. Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 2002.
- Henderson, John. Piety and Charity in Late Medieval Florence. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1994.
- Knowles, David, and R. Neville Hadcock. Medieval Religious Houses: England and Wales. Harlow: Longman, 1971.
- Orme, Nicholas, and Margaret Webster. The English Hospital, 1070–1570. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1995.
- Otis, Leah Lydia. Prostitution in Medieval Society: The History of an Urban Institution in Languedoc. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1985.
- Rawcliffe, Carol. Medicine and Society in Later Medieval England. Stroud, England: Sutton Publishing Ltd, 1995.
- Rubin, Miri. Charity and Community in Medieval Cambridge. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1987.
- Taylor, Bruce. Structures of Reform: the Mercedarian Order in the Spanish Golden Age. Leiden and Boston: Brill, 2000.

See also Beguines; Disabilities; Elisabeth of Hungary; Fasting and Food, Religious Aspects of; Hagiography; Hospitals; Lay Piety; Lepers; Patronage, Ecclesiastical; Poverty; Prostitutes; Wills; Zita and Other Servant Saints

AMALASUNTHA

Amalasantha (498–535) ruled Italy and the Ostrogoths as regent for a son and sole queen at the start of the Middle Ages. Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths, occupied Italy and ruled it, with the approval of the eastern Roman emperor, until his death in 526. His throne passed to his ten-year-old grandson Athalaric. His daughter Amalasantha, the boy's mother, governed as regent. She faced no serious challenge to her authority until 532, when a faction of Gothic nobles won control of the young king. She fought back by dispatching three of its leaders to distant posts, where she arranged their assassinations. Two years later Athalaric died, and Amalasantha tried to stay in power by sharing the throne with the only surviving male in the royal line, her cousin Theodahad. She was initially protected by Theodahad's fear that an attack on her would invite reprisals from the Roman emperor in Constantinople. In 535, however, she was murdered. Relatives of the men she had assassinated were said to have killed her, but letters that passed between Theodahad and the emperor Justinian and Theodahad's wife and the empress Theodora (and the maneuvers of Justinian's ambassadors) suggest that Constantinople urged Theodahad to eliminate Amalasantha. When Theodahad took the bait, he gave Justinian the excuse he sought to invade Italy, evict the Goths, and restore the Roman homeland to direct imperial control.

A. DANIEL FRANKFORTER

References and Further Reading

- Aurelius Cassiodorus. Variarum libri duodecim. In Patrologia Latina, edited by Jacques-Paul Migne. LXIX:500-800. Paris, 1848. See also <http://pld.chadwyck.co.uk/>
- Burns, Thomas S. A History of the Ostrogoths. Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1984.
- Frankforter, A. Daniel. "Amalasantha, Procopius, and a Woman's Place." Journal of Women's History 8(2) (1996): 41–57.
- Mierow, Charles C., ed. and trans. The Gothic History of Jordanes. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1915; Merchantville, NJ: Evolution Publishing, 2006.
- Procopius of Caesarea. History of the Wars and Secret History, translated by Averil Cameron. New York: Twayne, 1967.

See also Italy; Regents and Queen Lieutenants; Theodora

AMAZONS

Mixing history, legend, and myth, Classical writers including Suetonius and Virgil described a tribe of fierce, bellicose women known as the Amazons. These representatives of female otherness inhabited the space just beyond the margins of the known landscape, variously located in areas of Anatolia, North Africa, and the Black Sea. In popular etymology, Amazon means "breastless," encouraging the erroneous notion that these women cut off one breast to practice archery more efficiently. The term more probably meant "those not breast-fed" or "moon women" from their devotion to Artemis, goddess of the hunt. Happily ignorant of cooking and sewing, activities that in ancient Greek culture typically gendered as "women's work," Amazons' chief pursuits were warfare, hunting, and training their female children to be warriors, reflecting their devotion to Ares, the god of war.

Wearing light armor and crescent-shaped shields, riding horses or chariots in lightning cavalry attacks, Amazons employed the bow and arrow, as well as the sword, javelin, or spear favored by male warriors. Targets of their empire-building assaults included the citadel of Athens. Celebrated male warriors with whom their various leaders reputedly engaged in battle, "Amazonomachy," included Achilles, who slew and loved Penthesilea, the Amazon mercenary fighting for Troy in the Trojan War; Hercules, who stole the "Girdle of Ares" worn by the Amazon queen Hippolyta; Theseus, whose siege of Hippolyta's Amazon kingdom and later marriage to either her or her sister Antiope provoked a counterattack on Athens; and Alexander the Great, who reputedly was seduced by the Amazon queen Thalestris during his Bactrian campaign in 329 BCE. These examples attest to the paradoxical fascination of the ancient Greeks with this otherwise abhorred female group who presented a distorted reflection of male-dominated Greek military society. Stories of these women carried over to medieval times and enjoyed wide popularity.

In the equally patriarchal culture of the European Middle Ages, female warriors inspired a similar attraction to and anxiety about the "power of women." Generally speaking, the downfall of mighty or authoritative biblical and historical male figures (Adam, Samson, Aristotle) was blamed on the women associated with them (Eve, Delilah, Phyllis). Because the Amazons' equestrian military culture paralleled the horse-dominated chivalric code of medieval knights, many medieval romances feature female characters either based on classical Amazons or representing fantasies about female knighthood. Twelfth- and thirteenth-century French "romances of antiquity" feature classical Amazons in romances adapted from epics: Penthesilea in the Romance of Troie; Camilla, Virgil's Amazon from the Aeneid, in the Romance of Eneas; and various Amazons in medieval romances about Alexander the Great. Giovanni Boccaccio's fourteenth-century Italian Thesiad, upon which English poet Geoffrey Chaucer later based his

Knight's Tale, depicts Theseus's war against the Amazons Hippolyta and Emelia. The Romance of Silence (c. 1250) portrays a spectacular cross-dressing female, Silence, who secretly impersonates a male knight to overcome a ban against female inheritance. Gyburc in Wolfram von Eschenbach's thirteenth-century German romance epic Willehalm dons armor and successfully defends the citadel of Orange in her husband's absence. Several works of the fifteenth-century author Christine de Pizan, especially the allegorical Book of the City of Ladies, which describes the building of a female citadel using stories about famous women as the foundation stones, included treatments of Amazons and other warrior women. De Pizan's 1429 Poem of Joan of Arc celebrates the military skills of her contemporary Joan of Arc, an authentic medieval female warrior.

Amazons were classified among the "marvels of the east," and popular late-medieval Spanish romances such as Amadis of Gaul and Esplandian responded with fantasies of gold and sexual fulfillment found on the Amazon queen Calafia's island, California. In response, early modern explorers named topographical features of the Americas, including the Amazon River and California, for Amazons.

LORRAINE KOCHANSKE STOCK

References and Further Reading

- Kleinbaum, Abby Wettan. The War Against the Amazons. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1983.
- Mayor, Adrienne, and Josiah Ober. "Amazons." In Experience of War: An Anthology of Articles from MHQ, The Quarterly Journal of Military History, edited by Robert Cowley. New York: Dell, 1992, pp. 12–23.
- McLaughlin, Megan. "The Woman Warrior: Gender, Warfare, and Society in Medieval Europe." Women's Studies 17 (1990): 193–209.
- Smith, Susan L. The Power of Women: A Topos in Medieval Art and Literature. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1995.
- Stock, Lorraine Kochanske. "'Arms and the (Wo)man' in Medieval Romance: The Gendered Arming of Female Warriors in the Roman d'Eneas and Helderis's Roman de Silence." Arthuriana 5 (1995): 56–83.
- Tyrrell, William Blake. Amazons: A Study in Athenian Mythmaking. Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins University Press, 1984.

See also Arms and Armor; Boccaccio, Giovanni; Chaucer, Geoffrey; Christine de Pizan; Joan of Arc; Roman de Silence; Romances of Antiquity; Virile Women; Warfare; Wolfram von Eschenbach; Woman on Top

AMULETS

See Magic and Charms

ANCHORESSES

Anchoresses were female anchorites or recluses, that is, those who chose to be enclosed in a single room or rooms, often attached to or nearby a church, for the purposes of prayer and contemplation of God. The word anchorite comes from the Greek anchoreta, to withdraw from the world as did the Desert Fathers. Anchorholds usually had at least two windows: one into the church, through which the anchoress could witness and participate in the mass, and one through which she could communicate with the outside world. Sometimes anchorholds consisted of several rooms and a garden. At times several anchoresses lived in groups, and even sometimes with servants. Although, in the early Christian Church, anchorites were indistinguishable from hermits, by the twelfth century the word anchorite had the specific meaning of enclosure, and for the anchoress, who was not allowed to wander without supervision, that meant enclosure in an anchorhold in a town or city, usually at its center.

There were technically two kinds of anchoresses, inclusa and reclusa. Inclusa were those who wished to pursue a more ascetic and ecstatic contemplative life within the walls of a monastery. They had already proven themselves stable, dedicated contemplatives. Usually there was a rigorous three-year training period before such includes were allowed to be enclosed. Most anchoresses, however, were not of this kind; rather, they were women, usually older women, who wished to pursue a contemplative life despite a lay history as wives, mothers, and landowners. Often their experiences as influential devout widows in their communities before enclosure were not markedly different from their experiences as anchoresses. Neither includes nor recluses should be confused with mystics; although some might have had mystical visions, most anchoresses were unexceptional members of the religious community. Often they participated in the religious education of members of the community; at times they acted as counselors or spiritual advisors. Sometimes, if criticism of them has any truth to it, they were a little too involved in the community, entertaining visitors, teaching children, and even acting as local bankers.

Popularity of Anchoritism

Anchoritism grew in popularity around the time of the Fourth Lateran Council of 1215. This council declared the necessity of each individual to confess yearly and inspired the production of confession manuals for priests, guides to religious self-scrutiny for the layperson, and vernacular religious literature of many kinds. Furthermore, it helped kindle the desire of many laypeople for a more strictly regulated religious life both within the monasteries and outside of them. This period marks the proliferation of numerous forms of monasticism and mendicancy, as well as some institutions for women, such as beguinages. Institutions for women that responded to this new ascetic fervor, however, were limited, especially in England, and this may account for the notable rise of anchoritism among women in England. The anchoritic life for women was also more popular in continental Europe than usually noted, although it seems to have taken a slightly different form. In Europe, especially northern Europe, the anchorhold was viewed as a respectable place of retirement for older women, especially widows—those devout women who wished to focus their spirituality and become more actively engaged in their communities as religious leaders. In England, however, anchoresses seem to have been less actively involved in community life and more interested in retirement and seclusion. Although anchorholds in England were not far from city centers and some, like Julian of Norwich's cell, were right next to the marketplace, others, like the anchorhold associated with the readers of the Ancrene Wisse, were more removed from city life.

Enclosure

Anchoresses were not always officially enclosed, but when they were, they were enclosed in a ceremony that articulated their metaphorical commitment to be “dead to the world.” In some enclosure rites, the anchoress was carried into the anchorhold in a coffin and then bricked in to the anchorhold while prayers from the Office of the Dead were said for her. Before entering an anchorhold, the postulant's credentials were carefully scrutinized, and afterwards her life was supervised—distantly by the bishop, and perhaps more locally by the parish priest or a spiritual advisor. The thirteenth-century Middle English religious guide for anchoresses, the Ancrene Wisse, tells us that the daily life of the anchoress consisted of a strict regime of prayers throughout the day and evening, manual labor in a garden if the anchorhold had a garden, and meetings with a spiritual advisor. The anchoress was discouraged from teaching, sewing, keeping animals (except a cat), gossiping with those outside the window of the anchorhold, and meeting with visitors, especially men, unless strictly supervised and attended by a servant, and only if absolutely necessary.

Social Status

Most anchoresses were anonymous. Records suggest that an anchoress was a prized member of a community, and they were often supported by small bequests from local lords; particularly famous anchoresses received bequests from the king. It was to one's spiritual well-being to contribute to the support of an anchoress, and indeed it was considered to be spiritually efficacious to have an anchoress in one's own town. Records also suggest that most anchoresses came from the upper and upper-middle classes, although there are some records that tell of a servant replacing an anchoress after her death. The anchoresses we know of suggest the wide range of education, motivations for entering an anchorhold, class, degree of political and ecclesiastical involvement, and temperament of those who pursued this form of religious life. One of the earliest English anchoresses we know of was Eve of Wilton (d. c. 1125), praised for her exceptional Latin literacy and known as a voracious reader. Loretta, Countess of Leicester, withdrew into an anchorhold in 1220 some time after her family fell out of favor with King John. The wealthy Katherine of Ledbury (b. 1272) gave up her lands some years after her husband's death and retired to an anchorhold supported by the revenues from that land. The most famous anchoress in England was the fourteenth-century Julian of Norwich, who entered an anchorhold after she had a series of mystical revelations. She acted as a leader in her community of nuns and even for those outside her spiritual community seeking spiritual advice. Margery Kempe tells of her visit to Julian's cell.

Anchoresses in northern continental Europe were particularly prominent and influential members of their communities. The widowed mother of Guibert of Nogent (c. 1055–c. 1125) chose to enter a cell she herself had commissioned and brought half of her family and her household with her. Living in her cell for at least forty years, she had dreams and visions, became known as a prophet, and grew to be highly influential locally. Yvette of Huy (1158–1228) entered an anchorhold after first withdrawing to a leper colony. From her cell she made predictions and commentaries that put pressure on the dean and canons of the town's main church, and she counseled wayward clerics, directing them to passages in the Bible. The prioress Juliana of Cornillon (1192–1258), who late in her life became an unofficial recluse, dedicated her life to developing a Feast of the Corpus Christi; although this was not realized in her lifetime, it came into being shortly after her death in 1264 through the influence of her confidante and student, the anchoress

Eve of St. Martin. Like Margaret of Magdeburg's (c. 1210–1250) special role was to act as a teacher to visitors to her cell. While these five European anchoresses, described thoroughly by Mulder-Bakker, demonstrate the public influence an anchoress could have in a community, there are records of thousands more anchoresses about whom we know very little. Perhaps they, too, enjoyed such a prominent social and religious role, but it is also possible that they may have preferred anonymity. Nonetheless, while an anchoress herself may not have been publically active, her anchorhold would certainly have played a public role in the community.

ELIZABETH ROBERTSON

References and Further Reading

- Clay, Rotha Mary. Hermits and Anchorites of England. London: Methuen, 1914. Reprint, Detroit: Singing Tree Press, 1968.
- Mulder-Bakker, Anneke B. Lives of the Anchoresses: The Rise of the Urban Recluse in Medieval Europe, translated by Myra Heerspink Scholz. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2005.
- Warren, Ann. Anchorites and Their Patrons in Medieval England. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1985.

See also Ancrene Wisse; Guibert of Nogent's Mother; Julian of Norwich; Margaret "the Cripple" of Magdeburg; Widows; Yvette of Huy

ANCRENE WISSE

The anonymous thirteenth-century Middle English work known as the Ancrene Wisse is a religious guide for female recluses, as well as a lively and psychologically astute instance of early Middle English prose. The title of the work, the Ancrene Wisse or Ancrene Riwe (these are editorial rather than authorial titles), means guide or rule for anchoresses. Anchoresses were devout religious women who chose to be enclosed for life in a small room or rooms, usually attached to a church, and often at the center of a community, in order to devote themselves completely to contemplation of God. Anchoresses entered anchorholds either after first living in a convent or directly from secular life. The original work was written at the request of three sisters for a guide to the anchoritic life in the first quarter of the thirteenth century, at about the time of the Fourth Lateran Council (1215), which, in advocating confession for everyone once a year, inspired a flourishing output of vernacular religious texts written for lay audiences. It is not entirely clear in what language the original text was written; it appears in French, Latin, and English versions. Its original audience most probably read all three languages with varying degrees of proficiency. Since Latin education for religious women at this date was limited, it is plausible that the text was originally composed in English or French, and the localization of its early versions to the southeast Midlands, and possibly Herefordshire, far from the continent and the English centers where French predominated as the literary language of choice, suggests that it may well have been originally composed in English. Because of manuscript marginalia, some have localized it even more specifically to Wigmore Abbey, but that association is not definitive. Despite its very specific purposes and audience, the work was quickly disseminated; it was adapted for larger groups of anchoresses and nuns, and even for male monastics. The name of the author, undoubtedly male, is unknown. The author's citations and references to specific aspects of monastic rules associate him either with Augustinian canons or, as Bella Millett has recently argued, with the Dominicans. He may well have been a spiritual advisor of the three anchoresses. Recently, Anne Savage has argued that the women themselves helped shape the content of the work.

The form of English in which the text appears in the earliest manuscripts was called long ago by J.R.R. Tolkien the "AB" dialect, "A" referring to the language of the Corpus Christi 402 manuscript of the Ancrene Wisse and "B" to the language of Bodley 34, a group of religious texts known as the Katherine Group, which includes three saints' lives, a tract on virginity, and a homily on the guardianship of the soul, which may well have served as additional reading for either these anchoresses or larger groups of female religious. The AB dialect is of particular interest because it presents an unusually uniform grammar and orthography. This suggests a deliberate attempt by those writing in the AB dialect to codify their language and, furthermore, provides unprecedented information about the state of the language in post-conquest England. That the Ancrene Wisse and the Katherine Group were written in this sophisticated form of the language suggests that these works were being produced from a self-conscious literary center in Herefordshire. They stand as some of the few known major original works in production in England at this date. That many if not all of these texts are primarily for female readers suggests the crucial role women played as an audience of Middle English at a time when English was threatened by the presence of a conquering language, Norman French.

The Ancrene Wisse is indebted to Aelred of Rievaulx's earlier letter to his sister on the reclusive life (c. 1160–1162), On the Education of Recluses. This work, written in Latin, shares with the Ancrene Wisse a general structure of an outer rule, with descriptions of daily anchoritic routines, and an inner rule, focused on spiritual refinement. Aelred's work ends with three spiritual meditations, on the past, present, and future. The meditation on the past is particularly compelling; in it Aelred proposes that the contemplative woman recreate Christ's life from birth to crucifixion as if she were present at these events. The meditation, with its wrenching evocation of Christ's suffering and dying designed to evoke compassion in the reader, is a fine example of the religious movement known as affective piety.

The Ancrene Wisse consists of an introduction and eight parts or distinctions. Like Aelred's letter, the work includes an outer rule concerning specifics of daily life and an inner rule concerning the spiritual life, but the Ancrene Wisse's directions for the pursuit of daily life and its spiritual goals are at once more flexible and more detailed. The introduction specifies the work's status as a guide, rather than a rule, and presents itself as a flexible work offering general rather than mandatory guidance. The first part, "Devotions" (following M.D. Salu's titles for the distinctions), provides the anchoresses with a list of specific prayers to be said at particular times. Centering on the twin celebration of the Five Joys of Mary and the Eucharist, prayers of special meaning for female contemplatives (who were often urged to use Mary as their model and who were also encouraged to cultivate an incarnational theology), the directions include an unusual focus on the bodily performance of devotions. The next five sections of the work move from this outer rule to an "inner rule of the heart" and focus on the anchoress's discipline of her body as well as her mind. Part Two, "The Custody of the Senses," examines each sense in turn and urges the anchoress to protect all her senses from possible temptation, especially by identifying with the suffering of Christ in each of his senses. Part Three, "The Regulation of the Inward Feelings," especially focuses on the need to control anger, an emotion that may well have been rife in small groups of contemplatives. Part Four, "Temptations," rather surprisingly focuses on temptations to which the anchoress will almost inevitably succumb. Part Five, "Confession," demonstrates how the anchoress must confess such sins. The next chapter, "Penance," paves the way for the anchoress's romantic union with Christ, celebrated in the penultimate section, "Love." Rather than ending on the ascent of the anchoress to union with God, the author returns in Part Eight to the everyday world of the anchoress in a discussion of external rules. Emphasizing the metaphorical and literal meaning of her enclosure in the anchorhold, where she is meant to become dead to the world, it includes warnings against a range of worldly activities, such as keeping animals, weaving and embroidery, meeting visitors, running a school, and others—the surprising worldly dangers of living in an anchorhold where the anchoress is easily subject to the curiosity and demands of a stream of community passersby and spiritual seekers.

The Ancrene Wisse describes a seemingly harsh, extreme life, and its vision of a female contemplative in particular need of protection from sins of the flesh suggests the author's endorsement of the dominant ecclesiastical view of women as defined by their bodies. Nonetheless, the author shows deep respect for his readers and for the extraordinary emotional range available to them in the anchorhold. Unlike mystical writings, the work engages the pressures and goals of a demanding daily routine with psychological acumen and wit. Despite being confined to a very small space in uncomfortable conditions, the anchoress learns to transform physical discomfort and worldly distraction, even the most mundane of experiences and objects, into touchstones to the spiritual world. The work is a compelling account of an extraordinary form of religious life, but is also a superb example of the capacity of Early English prose to convey literary power.

ELIZABETH ROBERTSON

References and Further Reading

- Aelred of Rievaulx (Aelredi Rievallensis). "De Institutione inclarum." In Opera Omnia, edited by A. D. Hoste and C. H. Talbot. Turnholti, Belgium: Brepols, 1971.
- . "The Life of a Recluse." In Treatises and the Pastoral Prayer and Works of Aelred of Rievaulx, translated by Mary Paul McPherson. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Cistercian Publications, 1971.
- Georgianna, Linda. The Solitary Self: Individuality in the Ancrene Wisse. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1981.
- Hasenfratz, Robert, ed. The Ancrene Wisse. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Medieval Institute Publications, 2000.
- Millett, Bella. Annotated Bibliographies of Old and Middle English Literature: II: Ancrene Wisse and the Katherine Group and the Wooing Group. Cambridge: D. S. Brewer, 1996.
- Robertson, Elizabeth. Early English Devotional Prose and the Female Audience. Nashville, Tennessee: University of Tennessee Press, 1990.
- Savage, Anne, and Nicholas Watson. Anchoritic Spirituality. New York: Paulist Press, 1991.
- Sitwell, Dom Gerard. The Ancrene Riwele, translated by M. B. Salu. South Bend, Ind.: Indiana University Press, 1955.
- Wada, Yoko. A Companion to the Ancrene Wisse. Cambridge: D. S. Brewer, 2003.

See also Anchoresses; Audiences, Women in the; Katherine Group; Spirituality, Christian

ANGELA OF FOLIGNO

The Italian Franciscan laywoman Angela of Foligno (d. 1309) is known almost solely due to a dossier of texts referred to as the Liber ("Book"). Aside from a brief mention of her in Ubertino of Casale's Arbor Vitae in 1305, her name scarcely appears in medieval sources. The earliest manuscript of the Liber identifies her only as "L.," later elaborated as "Lella," the diminutive of "Angela," and then as "Angela." The Liber is divided into two parts: the Memorial, about three thousand lines long, and the slightly longer Instructions, which is a series of thirty-eight brief texts. This early version of the Liber was subsequently abbreviated into a shorter version that survives in a number of manuscripts and that some scholars have mistakenly thought to be the earlier version.

The Memorial purports to be Angela's own account of her spiritual journey, dictated to a Franciscan scribe identified in the text only as "Brother A." A relative and confessor of Angela, Brother A. says he encountered Angela screaming outside the Basilica of St. Francis during a pilgrimage to nearby Assisi. Fearing she might be possessed by an evil spirit, he compelled her to provide details of her experience so he could record it and consult a wise spiritual man. Converted from skeptic to devotee upon hearing the details of her ecstatic encounter with God, Brother A. then continued to record Angela's experiences over the next several years. His account interweaves Angela's extensive quotations, spoken in Umbrian and rendered by him into Latin, with his own comments about Angela. Internal evidence, including Brother A.'s frequent comments regarding the complex redactional process of the Memorial, show his considerable influence in shaping the text, despite his proclaimed intention of being a simple and faithful scribe.

The Memorial provides relatively little biographical information about Angela's life. She was born sometime in the thirteenth century, resided in Foligno, married an unnamed man, and had an unknown number of children whose names and genders are never given. At some point, Angela began to adopt a penitential lifestyle. She struggled to strip herself of her worldly attachments, which included enough property to suggest she was well-to-do. She prayed, successfully, for the deaths of her mother, husband, and children. Living then with an unnamed female companion, Angela followed the "rule of St. Francis" for the laity, which at this time probably included prescriptions regarding prayers, penance, and other pious practices. Angela was part of a lay movement that gradually became institutionalized as the Third Order of St. Francis, although she is not explicitly identified as belonging to the "Third Order" until the late fourteenth century. A note appended to most manuscripts indicates that she died January 4, 1309.

Angela's spiritual experiences, which occupy most of the Memorial, include frequent visions and locutions. The penitent's journey to the cross takes her through spiraling experiences of desolation and consolation. Her growing awareness of her own sin and vileness causes her to suffer increasingly acute pains and torments. These are punctuated by experiences of ecstatic encounters with God. She swings dramatically between extreme doubt and absolute certainty until her experience of the cross finally plunges her so thoroughly into God that she experiences almost continual union.

Theological themes emphasized by Angela include the humanity of Christ, the Passion, the Trinity, and the Eucharist. Her insistence upon the priority of religious experience over learning, the ultimate ineffability of God, and the centrality of poverty and humility touch on points of bitter dispute among Franciscans of the time and suggest that she favored a stricter interpretation of the Franciscan rule.

The second part of the Liber, the Instructions, includes thirty-six "instructions," a brief notice about her death, and an epilogue. They were redacted by a variety of anonymous authors, perhaps including Brother A. Many of the texts were written only after Angela's death, some appearing for the first time only in later manuscripts. Their diverse ordering in the manuscript tradition suggests that no single authentic ordering ever existed. The texts, which vary in style and vocabulary, include Angela's own alleged accounts of mystical experiences and teachings, letters she wrote, and texts about her. Some instructions continue or elaborate themes found in the Memorial. Others introduce new material, including Angela's teaching about the Book of Life and the account given of her death.

The Instructions present Angela as the spiritual mother of a circle of devotees. These included male Franciscans, who probably wrote many or all of the texts and who are sometimes the subject or intended audience of the instructions. References to Angela's companion and other women and men in the Liber indicate that others also belonged to her circle.

CATHERINE M. MOONEY

References and Further Reading

Angela of Foligno and Brother A. Il libro della Beata Angela da Foligno (Edizione critica), edited by Ludger Thier and Abele Calufetti. Grottaferrata (Rome): Collegii S. Bonaventurae ad Claras Aquas, 1985.

- . Angela of Foligno: Complete Works, translated by Paul Lachance. New York: Paulist Press, 1993.
- Barone, Giulia, and Jacques Dalarun, eds. Angèle de Foligno. Le dossier. Rome: École française de Rome, 1999.
- Dalarun, Jacques. “Angèle de Foligno a-t-elle existé?” In Alla signorina: mélanges offerts à Noëlle de La Blanchardière. Rome: École française de Rome, 1995, pp. 59–97.
- Fusco, Roberto. Amore e compassione. L'esperienza di Angela da Foligno. Rome: Istituto Storico dei Cappuccini, 2001.
- Mooney, Catherine M. “The Authorial Role of Brother A. in the Composition of Angela of Foligno’s Revelations.” In Creative Women in Medieval and Early Modern Italy: A Religious and Artistic Renaissance, edited by E. Ann Matter and John Coakley. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1994, pp. 34–63.

See also Asceticism; Autohagiography; Lay Piety; Lay-women, Religious; Mysticism and Mystics; Mystics’ Writings; Theology.

ANGLO-SAXON LITERATURE

See Literature, Old English

ANNALES SCHOOL OF HISTORY

The Annales School was a group of reform-minded French historians who published their work in a journal entitled Annales d’Histoire Économique et Sociale, founded at the University of Strasbourg in 1929. Medievalist Marc Bloch (1886–1944) joined with an early modern historian named Lucien Febvre (1878–1956) in an attempt to replace the highly compartmentalized writing that had characterized French historical study from the late nineteenth century onward. In 1946 the journal was renamed Annales: Économies, Sociétés, Civilisations. For the founders this marked a more coherent mission to create a new encompassing history—histoire totale—as they phrased it. According to their thinking, the discipline of history had reached a state of crisis by failing to account adequately for the disaster-ridden first half of the twentieth century. With a move to Paris in the late 1930s they became the sixth section of the École des Hautes Études, a centrally funded institute for study of the social sciences. This encouraged rapprochement with other social sciences (geography and economics in particular), and history became the dominant study among the social sciences in France, which was unparalleled in western countries.

Joined by Fernand Braudel (1902–1985), the Annales School advocated a comparative method rather than a search for the origins of the modern state system. Annales historians cast their histories over the long term—la longue durée—and favored study of the masses, mentalities, popular unrest, rise and decline in population, prices, and other features of society and economy that affected daily life.

Annales School history was embraced by scholars from around the world, and certain works, like LeRoy Ladurie’s study of a village in medieval France, Montaillou (1975), became best sellers.

It would seem that this analytic framework was adequate for including women and gender in history, but women were absent from the pages of most Annales history. Their lives and work were not part of the Annales emphasis on the masses, or on uprisings, or even, more remarkably, on population trends. This meant that the vision of histoire totale embraced by the school ignored half the population, a regrettable omission. The framework advocated by the school was appropriate for the study of women’s daily lives and contributions to long-term change, but women were barely mentioned in the important texts of Bloch, Febvre, and Braudel.

Three initiatives begun in the 1970s changed that. The first, Ladurie’s Montaillou, featured women’s lives in a village of the Occitan that was investigated by the Inquisition for evidence of heretical leanings. The study provided anecdotal information on women’s lives; indeed, the compelling persons whose stories turned the study into a best-seller were largely women. Second, Christiane Klapisch-Zuber, a member of the Annales, joined with the American historian David Herlihy to enter the data of the Florentine Catasto of 1427 into computers for analysis. This resulted in the vast Tuscans and Their Families (original French edition, 1978), the earliest comprehensive census data study in Western history. Women’s lives and choices received significant attention, and gender became a category of analysis in this work. Klapisch-Zuber, who had become a directeur d’étude, followed this major study with numerous essays probing more deeply into women’s lives and choices in late medieval and early Renaissance Florence. Third, Georges Duby and Michelle Perrot, who were associated with Annales scholars, produced a multivolume Histoire des Femmes covering ancient times to the present. This was the result of an international seminar that met beginning in 1980 in Paris under the leadership of Duby, Perrot, Klapisch-Zuber, and Pauline Schmitt Pantel. Contacts multiplied; Annales School historians collaborated with scholars from other European countries and the Americas who shared a similar vision. Among the cross-currents that came to influence the Annales was the study of gender and the new women’s history.

More recently, Clio: Histoire, Femmes et Sociétés emerged in 1995 as a journal dedicated to women’s history. As a project it reconsiders the question of female culture and attempts to integrate methodological and conceptual notions of gender into a relational history of women and men. The very name of the journal echoes Annales: Économies, Sociétés, Civilisations, and indeed its mission statement declares the intention of modeling itself on Annales (the school rather than the journal) in order to investigate women's history. Clio works to close the gap between contemporary French scholars' interest in women's history and the paradoxical lack of published scholarship on women in France. Klapisch-Zuber continues to play an important role in this project. For example, in "Guda et Claricia: Deux 'autoportraits' déminins du XIIe siècle," Klapisch-Zuber brings to light two female artists of the twelfth century who signed their names and left their silhouettes on their work. The project of women's history has become an important, if separate, project from Annales School history itself.

SUSAN MOSHER STUARD

References and Further Reading

- Bloch, Marc. Feudal Society, translated by L. A. Manyon. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1962.
- Braudel, Fernand. The Mediterranean in the Age of Philip II, translated by Sian Reynolds (from the second French edition). New York: Harper, 1976.
- Burke, Peter. The French Historical Revolution: The Annales School, 1929–1989. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1990.
- Duby, Georges, and Michelle Perrot. History of Women in the West. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1992–1994.
- Fauré, Christine. "The Twilight of the Goddesses, or The Intellectual Crisis of French Feminism," translated by Lillian S. Robinson. Signs, Journal of Women in Culture and Society 7 (1981): 81–86.
- Febvre, Lucien. The Problem of Unbelief in the Sixteenth Century, translated by Beatrice Gottlieb. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1982.
- Herlihy, David, and Christiane Klapisch-Zuber. Tuscans and Their Families. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1985.
- Klapisch-Zuber, Christiane. "Guda et Claricia: deux 'autoportraits' féminins du XIIe siècle." Clio, histoire, femmes et sociétés 19 (2004): 159–163.
- . Women, Family, and Ritual in Renaissance Italy, translated by Lydia Cochrane. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1985.
- LeRoy Ladurie, Emmanuel. Montaillou, Promised Land of Error, translated by Barbara Bray. New York: Harper, 1979.
- Stuard, Susan Mosher. "The Annales School and Feminist History." Signs, Journal of Women in Culture and Society 7 (1981): 135–143. Reprinted in The Annales School, Critical Assessments, edited by Stuart Clark. London and New York: Routledge, 1999.
- Thébaud, Françoise, and Michelle Zancarini-Fournel. Clio, Histoire, Femmes et Sociétés: naissance et histoire d'une revue. <http://clio.revues.org/document42.html> (July 2005). Published in Clio 16 (2002).

See also Feminist Theories and Methodologies; Gender in History; History, Medieval Women's

ANNE OF BEAUJEU

Anne of Beaujeu (also known as Anne of France) (c. 1461–1522) was duchess of Bourbon and a steady influence in French royal affairs. Louis XI of France (r. 1461–1483) and his second wife, Charlotte of Savoy, had three children who lived to adulthood: Anne, Jeanne, and Charles. Anne was married young to Pierre de Beaujeu, son of the duke of Bourbon. When Louis died in 1483, Anne—not her mother—was named guardian of her brother, Charles VIII (r. 1483–1498). Louis had curtailed the power of the nobles, and they tried to recoup their losses upon Charles' succession. The leader of the opposition was Louis of Orleans, husband of Anne's sister Jeanne and heir presumptive to the throne. The Beaujeus decreased resistance to their guardianship of the king by sacrificing some of Louis XI's more unpopular servants and reducing taxes. This allowed them to dominate the Estates General of 1484 and to defeat Orleans in the so-called Mad War of 1485. The Beaujeus increased French power in Brittany by marrying King Charles to Anne, the duke's heiress, kept peace with the papacy, and permitted Henry of Richmond (Henry VII) to challenge Richard III for the throne of England.

When Charles VIII took control of the government in 1491, the Beaujeus, who had become duke and duchess of Bourbon, retired to Pierre's estates, where "Madame la Grande" educated ladies of good birth. One factor in their withdrawal from government was disapproval of Charles' desire to claim the throne of Naples by force. Nonetheless, Anne governed during her brother's Italian campaign and later did the same for Louis XII (Orleans) during his wars. Anne left behind a book of lessons for her daughter Suzanne, balancing conventional values with sound political advice. Anne died in 1522, during the reign of Francis I, having outlived her siblings, husband, and daughter.

THOMAS IZBICKI

References and Further Reading

- Anne of France. Lessons for My Daughter, translated by Sharon L. Jansen. Woodbridge, Suffolk, England: D. S. Brewer, 2004.
- Jansen, Sharon L. The Monstrous Regiment of Women: Female Rulers in Early Modern Europe. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2002.
- Pradel, Pierre. Anne de France, 1461–1522. Paris: Editions Publisud, 1986.

See also Conduct Literature; Education, Lay; Mothers as Teachers; Noble Women; Regents and Queen-Lieutenants

ANNE OF BOHEMIA

Anne of Bohemia (1366–1394), daughter of the Holy Roman Emperor Charles IV, married Richard II of England in 1381. Anne was initially scorned by some English contemporaries for her relative poverty and even her lack of beauty. In due course, however, she became immensely popular and was widely believed to have a calming influence on her erratic husband. Richard certainly loved her deeply. He demolished her palace at Sheen after her death.

As queen, Anne played a traditional role as merciful intercessor to the king, but the nature of her own interests is hard to determine. Her upbringing in Bohemia, home to a strong religious reform movement inspired by Jan Hus, and her advanced literacy gave her the reputation, shortly after her death, of having been a shield for English reformers (especially John Wycliffe) and their project to translate the Bible into English. On this basis, she was once claimed as one of the “nursing mothers of the Reformation,” but her own religious leanings may have been highly orthodox. Chaucer associates her with Alceste, the Queen of the God of Love, who chastises Chaucer for writing the story of Criseyde’s betrayal of Troilus and sets him to writing The Legend of Good Women as a penance.

The evidence suggests that Anne was pious, courageous, well educated, and politically astute. Her biography is largely limited to her public reputation, however, either as Richard’s loyal queen (which she undoubtedly was), or Wycliffe’s protector or Chaucer’s censor, roles that may have been largely or entirely legendary.

ANDREW TAYLOR

References and Further Reading

- Taylor, Andrew. “Anne of Bohemia and the Making of Chaucer.” Studies in the Age of Chaucer 19 (1997): 95–119.
- Thomas, Alfred. Anne’s Bohemia: Czech Literature and Society, 1310–1420. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1998.
- Wallace, David J. “Anne of Bohemia, Queen of England and Chaucer’s Emperice.” Litteraria Pragensia: Studies in Literature and Culture 5.9 (1995): 1–16.

See also Chaucer, Geoffrey; England; Intercession; Patronage, Literary; Queens and Empresses: the West

ANNE

Saint Anne was the apocryphal mother of the Virgin Mary and the focus of her own popular cult in the later Middle Ages. Not mentioned in the biblical account of Christ’s lineage, Anne first appears in the apocryphal Book of James (second century), in which the birth and childhood of Mary are described.

In the early Middle Ages, Anne is a type of the sterile woman who conceives through divine intervention. With the rise of the cult of Mary, attention turned to Anne’s role in Marian spirituality; debates over Mary’s immaculate conception, which engaged theologians during the high Middle Ages, inevitably referred to Anne. Some believed Mary was conceived without sin by her parents’ embrace before the Golden Gate of the Temple.

Another story about Anne that stimulated the imagination of writers and artists concerned her role as matriarchal founder of the Holy Kinship group. According to this narrative, Anne married three times—to Joachim, Cleophas, and Salome—each time producing a daughter named Mary. The three Marys then had sons who were Jesus and a number of his disciples. The story of the three marriages of Anne (the trinubium) was incorporated into the most influential legend of the later Middle Ages, Jacobus de Voragine’s Legenda aurea, and by that route became a well-known part of biblical history for both laity and clergy. Consistently in medieval iconography, therefore, Saint Anne is represented as a holy mother. She is not only central to the lives of her daughter Mary and her grandson Jesus, but she is the founder of Jesus’ matrilineal descent system, whose image was the Holy Kinship.

Theological controversies over the immaculate conception of Mary, as well as the circulation of narratives about the life of Anne and her large family, made her a popular saint in western Europe by the fourteenth century. Her feast was celebrated on July 26 in many places, and relics such as her veil at Apt or her head at Chartres stimulated pilgrimages to those shrines. Images of Saint Anne teaching the Virgin to read or sitting with both the Virgin and Christ on her lap (Anna Selbdritt) were common throughout Europe.

Like many medieval saints, Anne was also regarded as a saint to call on for help with specific problems of everyday life. Some of those problems were connected with her maternal and familial iconography; for example, she was regarded as one of the “marrying saints” who provided aid to married couples facing infertility. In many cases, however, prayers to Anne addressed situations unconnected to her place in the holy family. She was a patron of those in maritime vocations, a protector of those who faced the danger of voyages or storms. Elsewhere she was a patron of woodworkers, and she was often a saint to be invoked in time of plague. She was the name saint of many famous Annes, including Anne of Burgundy and Anne of Brittany. She was even adopted as the patron saint of Florence after an unpopular ruler was routed on Saint Anne's Day 1343.

The cult of Saint Anne was at its height in northern Europe around 1500, thanks to both ecclesiastical and bourgeois patronage. Numerous Lives of Anne circulated in the later fifteenth century with the support of humanist churchmen, including most notably Johannes Trithemius in his 1494 treatise, Tractatus de Laudibus Sanctissimae Matris Annae. Using these new texts about Anne, the ecclesiastical authorities promoted the foundation of shrines and confraternities dedicated to the saint in convent churches. There was also a significant increase in the production of paintings (often large altarpieces) with Anne and her family as subjects. In these paintings, Anne and her three daughters usually sit in a garden or enclosure with their children playing before them. The matrilineal message is emphasized since the husbands are absent or relegated to the back of the scene, peeping over the wall. Despite the matriarchal focus of Holy Kinship images, Anne and her husband Joachim could function in other sites as models for lay marriage. In their combination of piety and affluence, they represented the values of the urban middle class. By the early decades of the sixteenth century, however, the cult of Anne was under attack by reformers who denied the trinitium and wished to promote a male-centered Holy Family rather than the female-centered Holy Kinship. The Council of Trent (1545–1563) denigrated Saint Anne's role in sacred history with its consequent popular devotion, while art of the later sixteenth century shows Anne demoted from a powerful intercessory figure in her own right to the aged grandmother of Christ.

KATHLEEN M. ASHLEY

References and Further Reading

- Ashley, Kathleen, and Pamela Sheingorn, eds. Interpreting Cultural Symbols: Saint Anne in Late Medieval Society. Athens, Ga.: University of Georgia Press, 1990.
- Brandenburg, Ton. "Saint Anne: A Holy Grandmother and Her Children." In Sanctity and Motherhood: Essays on Holy Mothers in the Middle Ages, edited by Anneke B. Muldur-Bakker. New York: Garland, 1995, pp. 31–65.
- . "St. Anne and Her Family: The Veneration of St. Anne in Connection with Concepts of Marriage and the Family in the Early Modern Period." In Saints and She-Devils: Images of Women in the Fifteenth and Sixteenth Centuries, edited by Lene Dresen-Coenders. London: Rubicon Press, 1987, pp. 101–127.
- Nixon, Virginia. Mary's Mother: Saint Anne in Late Medieval Europe. University Park, Pa.: Pennsylvania State University Press, 2004.

See also Hagiography; Holy Kinship; Immaculate Conception, Doctrine of; Mary, Virgin; Mary, Virgin; in Art

APPRENTICES

Medieval industry was dominated by artisans, and women participated in artisan crafts, beginning their acquisition of skills as apprentices, as did men. However, overall, there were far fewer female apprentices than male in medieval Europe. Artisan industry was hierarchical, with at least three categories: apprentice or beginning employee, salaried employee or journeyman, and master, the head of a workshop. There is little, if any, evidence that women progressed to the top of this hierarchy. In a few trades, however, particularly in the region of Paris, women seem to have reached the status of master. Seven of the over one hundred guilds in Paris were led by women in the late thirteenth century. Women might also enjoy elevated status in a craft as the wives of guild masters. In other guilds across Europe, a woman could, at times, succeed to master status at the death of her husband. Overall, widows represented two to five percent of guild membership.

Female apprentices were recruited to those sectors of the medieval artisan industry in which women were most prominent: the food trades, encompassing occupations such as baker and brewster, and a host of occupations associated with the textile industries, including spinster, silk worker, gold thread spinner, and purse maker. Female guilds were concentrated in the luxury industry and export trade. Parisian female guilds focused on spinning silk and making decorative items, ribbons, head wear, and purses. Here women supervised the apprenticeship contracts of their workers. Women in Cologne had specialties in silk and in spinning of gold. In Rouen women were involved in guild activities and very likely trained and employed apprentices.

Geographically, the age of apprenticeship might differ, but the practical age of majority for women in the Middle Ages was twelve, and in Mediterranean Europe one finds contracts of apprenticeship binding women from approximately that age. For boys, fourteen was the age of majority. For both men and women, the legal age of majority followed the lead of Roman law at twenty-five.

Geographically, female apprentices might come from some distance to a large town to learn a trade. In general, boys and men came from farther afield and were recruited to a larger cross-section of trades than were girls and women. In terms of the length of apprenticeship, again, there is great variation. In Montpellier, the important distinction was not gender, but whether apprentices were of local or non-local origin, the latter dictating, in the case of both boys and girls, longer terms of apprenticeship. Then too, trades varied in the length of training required, and an apprentice's previous experience, most often unknown to the historian, might also affect the duration. Surviving apprenticeship contracts in Montpellier show women apprenticed two years for basket making and secondhand clothes marketing, while in tailoring, six years might be necessary, and in mercery work (ribbons, accessories, fabric adornments), eight years. There is one instance of a girl of twelve apprenticed ten years in the baking trade. Women generally did not apprentice themselves without the participation of a parent or relative, and the presence and authorization of a male relative were common. Boys of fourteen might apprentice themselves alone, but again, if they were foreigners, they usually had need of a sponsor or surety to vouch for them.

APPRENTICES

Apprenticeship arrangements included the length of time of indenture; the cost of training and/or the nature of support (whether in kind, in salary, or both) offered by the master; arrangements should the apprentice fall ill; the type of instruction offered; the requirements of the engagement, such as no departure before the end of the contractual term; and loyalty to the master. Contracts were binding and could carry penalties if breached. Generally, the structure of apprenticeship contracts was similar for men and women. Apprenticeship agreements survive for two English women from Yorkshire and Lincolnshire, to learn silkwork from the wives of London citizens. They were apprenticed to seven-year terms, with expectations of good behavior, loyalty to their masters, and stability in the household. In return, they were to receive instruction in their trade, discipline if necessary, food, clothing, and other necessities. In this case no payment was forthcoming, but there are instances where apprentices were paid. The apprenticeship contracts of southern Europe provide the same type of information regarding living conditions, arrangements in apprenticeship, recompense or the lack thereof for labor, and details on apprentice/master/mistress relations.

There is some suggestion that over time occupations such as the cloth industry became more male-dominated, with opportunities for women's participation diminished. In the late Middle Ages and early modern era, guild regulations were tightened as sworn corporations emerged. Future case studies can serve to pinpoint the specifics of women's experience in apprenticeship across a broad chronology and geography.

KATHRYN REYERSON

References and Further Reading

Bennett, Judith M., Elizabeth A. Clark, Jean F. O'Barr, and B. Anne Vilen, eds. Sisters and Workers in the Middle Ages. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press, 1989.

Epstein, Steven A. Wage Labor and Guilds in Medieval Europe. Chapel Hill and London: The University of North Carolina Press, 1991.

Hanawalt, Barbara A., ed. The Evolution of Adolescence in Europe. Special issue of The Journal of Family History 17 (1992).

See also Alewives and Brewing; Artisan Families, Women of; Girls and Boys; Guild Members and Guilds; Textile Production for the Market; Widows; Work

ARCHAEOLOGY

From the inception of archaeology as a professional discipline in late-nineteenth-century Europe, scholars frequently overlooked women as subjects of study and undervalued their roles in early societies. Despite the growing impact of second-wave feminism on academia as early as the 1960s, inequities in archaeology characterized by andocentric approaches were only redressed beginning in the mid-1980s. Reasons for the delay included the relative under-representation of women as professional archaeologists, the historic tendency to denigrate or underestimate women's creative, economic, and artistic contributions in prehistoric and more recent societies, and hesitation to embrace the concept of gender as a social construct rather than as an accurate reflection of biological sex. Now that most archaeologists have accepted gender as a legitimate category of research, greater attention is being paid not only to the changing aspects of women's labor, sexuality, and familial roles in various societies but also to related questions regarding the expression of masculinity, the nature and significance of homosexuality, and the constant evolution of gender-linked characteristics and activities.

Challenging Traditional Archaeology

On the whole, medieval archaeologists have been relatively slow to incorporate theory in comparison with their colleagues in anthropology and prehistoric archaeology, and thus the impact of gender approaches has been far less revolutionary. As opposed to the fields in which feminist scholars first sought to demonstrate the existence of matriarchal, or at least egalitarian, social hierarchies in hunter-gatherer communities, medieval archaeology has evolved more cautiously. Constrained by the written evidence of social mores for the period, gender archaeologists studying the medieval period have worked within the framework imposed by late pagan and early Christian descriptions of human activity in western Europe. Informed by gender methodology, however, they ask different questions of the evidence, and their discussions have stimulated long-overdue improvements in the excavation, conservation, display, and interpretation of medieval archaeological artifacts, monuments, and sites.

Early Middle Ages

In early medieval archaeology, the majority of studies traditionally focused on graves and cemeteries. Because burials often contained a large variety of artifacts in addition to skeletal remains, they were found with regularity in western Europe from the time of the Industrial Revolution, when the laying of rail lines, digging of ditches, and construction of new buildings occurred on an unprecedented scale. Before the advent of carbon 14 dating, the sites discovered with coinage and artifacts had the advantage of being more easily dated to specific chronological periods. Even those without coins might be classified and thus dated by their typological similarity to finds elsewhere. Although antiquaries and archaeologists initially used remains from early medieval cemeteries and churches to reinforce stereotypes of women as passive reflections of the status, wealth, and ethnic identity of their husbands or fathers, today these mortuary finds are being employed for very different objectives. Because sepulchers afforded families the opportunity to construct idealized portrayals of their deceased members, with gender identity comprising one facet of such images, grave remains represent an important source for understanding the contributions of women to kin and community.

Archaeologists have, therefore, used a combination of evidence from early medieval burial sites to challenge assumptions and create a more nuanced understanding of the division of labor, gender norms and expectations, and the gendering of space in the early Middle Ages. At the cemetery of Villey-St-Etienne in northern Gaul, for instance, despite the fact that grave #6 was enormous in size, the skeleton of a woman found inside it was accompanied by few grave goods; in this case, we may observe tension between the effort expended to bury her and the decision not to deposit the quantity and quality of artifacts usually found in a sepulcher of these dimensions. Although the interpretation of this site must remain uncertain since no written sources survive to document her identity or the circumstances in which she died, it has been proposed that she may have been a widow of high standing for whom grave goods were no longer considered necessary or desirable. Rather than reading this grave as symptomatic of lack of recognition of the status of women in early medieval society, archaeologists are now open to seeing more subtle distinctions in the expression of status since the woman's possessions may have indeed been handed down to her heirs.

As more accurate techniques for the biological sexing of skeletons through osteological and DNA analysis have been developed, early medieval archaeologists and anthropologists have been able to reassess sepulchers in which the occupants were originally sexed by means of the artifacts with which they were buried rather than through methods independent of the archaeological context. Although only a limited number of graves have been discovered in which there were discrepancies between biological sex and gender (in other words, graves containing artifacts normally not associated with a particular sex), improved methodology has allowed scholars to present a more nuanced picture of the ways in which gender ideology affected burial. Moreover, as the chemical and biological study of human heredity and disease have grown increasingly sophisticated, specialists have also had the opportunity to explore nutrition, congenital illnesses and genetic traits, epidemics, and physical injuries, and the ways they comparatively affected the male and female members of early medieval populations.

While cemeteries have enabled archaeologists to study everything from early medieval social structure to production and trade, research on early medieval habitation, by contrast, is still in its relative infancy, and only in recent decades have there been more consistent efforts made to excavate exceptional examples of intact villages, for instance, in their entirety. While it is more difficult to ascribe activities at such sites to individuals of specific gender, since normally it is not possible to identify precisely who was engaged in the production of ceramics or the baking of bread, there have been fairly successful attempts to contextualize these occupations through comparison with paraphernalia found at contemporary furnished graves and written descriptions of such activities. As in the study of any society, however, it is clearly more useful to avoid establishing absolute gender associations with specific activities. Gender-linked roles were dynamic and repeatedly negotiated within specific communities; they therefore varied by region and period. Weaving and beer making, which were traditionally understood as women's work in the early Middle Ages, were both activities appropriated by men as the increasingly lucrative labor was professionalized by late medieval guilds across western Europe.

Central and Late Middle Ages

With respect to the central and late Middle Ages, mortuary archaeology has not had the same broad impact as it has for earlier periods, due in part to the difficulty of identifying graves from the era, since most lack archaeological artifacts. Moreover, the heavy reuse of late medieval Christian cemeteries in or near churches resulted in the frequent exportation of bones to ossuaries, charnel houses, or catacombs. Therefore, few sites remained undisturbed. Many former cemeteries were also subsequently occupied for other purposes, such as housing and manufacturing complexes, as city suburbs were more intensively occupied in the early modern period and later. Although there have certainly been exceptions, like intensive studies undertaken of leper cemeteries and church burials, late medieval mortuary archaeology has focused more on art historical studies of grave inscriptions and monuments than on the human remains they contained.

The majority of late medieval archaeological excavations have focused on the architectural remains of religious foundations, castles and fortresses, and production sites such as ports and royal and monastic workshops. In these analyses, theory has not found a significant voice, despite the fact that these locations afford important opportunities for the exploration of notions of gender. Although late medieval archaeology has often served as the handmaid of history rather than functioning as an independent discipline in such contexts, archaeologists since the 1990s have begun to ask questions about the divisions existing in or alternative uses of religious space, domestic households, feasting halls, and other features of elite ways of life. In conjunction with contemporary historical and literary evidence, these studies demonstrate that gender archaeology is a very useful tool by which to document and supplement the written record, since the field has great potential and may provide new insight into late medieval culture in ways previously unanticipated by specialists in the field.

BONNIE EFFROS

References and Further Reading

- Conkey, Margaret W., and Janet D. Spector. "Archaeology and the Study of Gender." Advances in Archaeological Method and Theory 7 (1984): 1–38.
- Effros, Bonnie. "Skeletal Sex and Gender in Merovingian Mortuary Archaeology." Antiquity 74 (2000): 632–639.
- Gilchrist, Roberta. Gender and Archaeology: Contesting the Past. London: Routledge, 1999.
- . Gender and Material Culture: The Archaeology of Religious Women. London: Routledge, 1994.

Halsall, Guy. "Female Status and Power in Early Merovingian Central Austrasia: The Burial Evidence." Early Medieval Europe 5(1) (1996): 1–24.

Moore, Jenny, and Eleanor Scott, eds. Individual People and Processes: Writing Gender and Sexuality into European Archaeology. London: Leicester University Press, 1997.

Sørensen, Marie Louise Stig. Gender Archaeology. Cambridge: Polity Press, 2000.

Walde, D., and N. D. Willows, eds. The Archaeology of Gender: Proceedings of the 22nd Chacmool Conference. Calgary: University of Calgary Archaeological Association, 1991.

See also Architecture, Domestic; Burials and Tombs; Death, Mourning, and Commemoration; Division of Labor; Gender Ideologies; Grave Goods; Lepers

ARCHITECTURE, DOMESTIC

Gender was constituted notably in the context of architectural and settlement space, that is, both in the rooms which men and women frequented within buildings and in the layout of the wider settlement. In the medieval process of classifying female and male bodies, architectural segregation was fundamental for the social definition of values of masculinity and femininity, in monastic as well as in secular contexts. Such constructed values differed according to social status, so that the relationship of space and gender varied considerably across the settlement hierarchy, from hamlet or village to town or castle.

Like any other form of material culture, the architecture of segregation had many meanings that were also subject to change. The disposition of buildings and their interiors, different access and mobility, and materials and notions of permanence comprised gendered meaning and served as a stage for gendered performance. One sees the everyday experience of gender difference in the arena and architecture of domestic space.

Gendering Space

Investigation of access into buildings allows an objective identification of the degree of control and privacy, indicated by the relative position of a room within a structure. Such access analysis can show how social and gender relations within the household were architecturally arranged. Rooms reached immediately from the street may be seen as public space. They are unlikely to have been understood as private apartments, access to which was limited to selected members of the household. Such private spaces were located more deeply within the floor plan.

The relationship between gender and domestic buildings may be complicated by several issues, particularly the difficulty of distinguishing spaces that were specifically designed for, or used by, one sex rather than the other. Homes were often workplaces, and the same room might have been used for a variety of domestic and production purposes. Smaller houses had to be especially flexible in how their space was used. In the context of the medieval town, for instance, female and male routines surely coincided regularly. Moreover, the architecture of the urban home was a reflection of other kinds of status apart from gender. Class became more important in the design of the later medieval town houses. Accommodations for poorer urban dwellers—typical cottages containing no more than two rooms—offered no place for segregation; but overlapping spatial gender identities could be found even in the largest urban houses. The organization of domestic space into “safe,” that is, female, and “dangerous,” that is, male, zones may have been an influential ideal realized only in the wealthiest houses. The peasant home seems to have been a predominantly female domain for much of the year. Gender spheres there are likely to have been seasonal, with men in the house for greater periods during winter.

A larger number of existing or developing architectural and spatial subdivisions could lead to further and more explicit gendered distinctions. At least for urban England, an increase of gendered spatial differentiation may be assumed for the second half of the fifteenth century, when craft workshops became increasingly masculinized and mercantile households increasingly feminized. Detailed analysis, however, is often complicated by research problems with regard to dating and the chronology of change. In particular, the knowledge of the date of surviving buildings and how they were used and developed is often not sufficient to allow an easy correlation between changes in building type and short-term changes in social practice.

Upper-class women’s accommodations were situated with an emphasis on privacy and comfort, embellished by warmth, rich colors, and soft textures. Technological inventions and developments influenced the gendered functionality of rooms. The adoption of the indoor chimney and fireplace, first in wealthier homes of the twelfth and thirteenth century, fostered the small room and increased the trend toward privacy. The bower (that is, a solar reserved for the lady of the house) became an essential part of domestic accommodation in castles. Moreover, such enhanced privacy affected intimacy and sexual mores.

The bodies of high-status women classified through gender also had to be hidden from strangers through architectural mechanisms of segregation and enclosure that included towers, private facilities for worship, exclusively female households, and physical boundaries such as walls, gardens, and other filtering systems like fences, gates, or staircases, which regulated access. The castle provides a good case for understanding the meaning of such gender segregation in the upper-class milieu. From the eleventh to the fifteenth century, the specific forms of the English castle developed and changed, until eventually the military and domestic functions were disjoined. The military role of the castle constituted its personification as a purely masculine domain. The female quarters were positioned in the segregated innermost and uppermost spaces of the castles, at the greatest distance from the main entrance. From their elevated and segregated position, women would have enjoyed substantial views of the castle interior while remaining out of view themselves. Increasing status seems to have been accompanied by greater segregation of the households for male and female members of the castle. The bias towards female segregation is obvious even where women appear to have been active in commissioning their quarters. This tendency represents an example of the way in which women were both active in interpreting material culture and complicit with it.

For English royal castles and palaces, it can also be shown that the queen’s chambers were less permeable than those of the king from more “public” areas. The apartments of the queen were isolated from the ceremonial routes through the palace complexes. This segregation is evident not only in their siting, often close to gardens and courtyards, but also in the contemplative imagery within. While historical and architectural developments can be revealed that made their mark on kings’ apartments, the general layout and position of queens’ chambers appear to have remained constant. Changes in the function of the palace and the evolution of the household seem to have passed them by.

Issues of domestic architecture in the context of gendered performance were used metaphorically. Medieval medicine explained the physiology of the body through architectural metaphors, with the body’s interior perceived as contained, domestic, and feminine. “Interior space, be it of the house or of the body, is a feminine place” (Henry de Mondeville, Chirurgie, Montpellier, 1306–1320).

The castle also became a metaphor for the female body, as a tabernacle protecting the precious virginity kept within. Architectural space was used to construct and reinforce a gendering of women’s bodies that emphasized chastity and purity. The iconographic representation of chastity could be the tower, which had a central function in the martyrdom stories of the virgin saints, especially Saint Barbara, whose attribute it was.

GERHARD JARITZ

References and Further Reading

Dresbeck, LeRoy. "The Chimney and Social Change in Medieval England." Albion 3 (1971): 21–32.

Durning, Louise. "Woman on Top: Lady Margaret Beaufort's Buildings." In Gender and Architecture, edited by Louise Durning and Richard Wrigley. New York: Wiley, 1999, pp. 45–56.

Fairclough, Graham. "Meaningful Constructions: Spatial and Functional Analysis of Medieval Buildings." Antiquity 66 (1992): 348–366.

Gilchrist, Roberta. "Medieval Bodies in the Material World: Gender, Stigma and the Body." In Framing Medieval Bodies, edited by Sarah Kay and Miri Rubin. Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1994, pp. 43–61.

———. "Ambivalent Bodies: Gender and Medieval Archaeology." In Invisible People and Processes: Writing Gender and Childhood into European Archaeology, edited by Eleanor Scott and Jenny Moore. London: Leicester University Press, 1996, pp. 42–58.

———. Gender and Archaeology: Contesting the Past. London and New York: Routledge, 1999.

Grenville, Jane. "Houses and Households in Late Medieval England: An Archaeological Perspective." In Medieval Women: Text and Contexts in Late Medieval Britain. Essays for Felicity Riddy, edited by Jocelyn Wogan-Browne et al. Turnhout, Belgium: Brepols, 2000, pp. 309–328.

Rees Jones, Sarah. "Women's Influence on the Design of Urban Homes." In Gendering the Master Narrative: Women and Power in the Middle Ages, edited by Mary C. Erler and Maryanne Kowaleski. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2003, pp. 190–211.

Richardson, Amanda. "Gender and Space in English Royal Palaces c. 1160–c. 1547: A Study in Access Analysis and Imagery." Medieval Archaeology 47 (2003): 131–165.

See also Castles and Palaces; Private and Public Spheres; Social Status; Space, Secular: and Gender

ARCHITECTURE, ECCLESIASTICAL

Women have been centrally involved with the Christian religion from its earliest phases and played a prominent role in the events of the New Testament. Within several centuries of the founding of Christianity, however, the role of women in the church leadership and their physical location in religious space became marginalized, and they were progressively excluded from the hierarchy. However, evidence of gender separation within sacred space, although probable, is difficult to document before the sixth century in the east, and probably the seventh century in Rome.

In the Byzantine tradition, where churches were constructed with upper galleries, there is evidence that women were relegated to these spaces during liturgical services. In Roman architecture, generally basilican (that is to say, longitudinal as opposed to centralized) in plan, there are some indications that women occupied the north (left) aisle, sometimes separated from the nave by curtains suspended between the columns of the arcade. Mosaics occasionally suggest curtains as a form of separation between men and women in church interiors (at Sant'Apollinare Nuovo in Ravenna, for example). In some churches, the location of women was restricted to a small area of the church, sometimes at the west: this was the case, for example, in the twelfth century at Durham Cathedral in England, where women were not allowed beyond the westernmost piers of the nave.

The exclusion of women, or their separation from the main body of the church, is especially common in male monasticism, although important noble or royal female patrons were often allowed some access to the main sanctuary.

Rules and regulations on the separation of women religious from clergy and the lay congregation were particularly strict during periods of religious reform. The Gregorian reform of the eleventh century, and in particular the strictures of clerical celibacy, led to increased misogyny within the church and in literature produced by clerics. There is clear evidence of this in the context of women's monasticism, where strictures on enclosure became strikingly more rigid in the thirteenth century, especially in female branches of the new Mendicant orders; a particular example is the strict active enclosure of the Poor Clares (or Clarisses). This process culminated in the papal Bull Pericoloso, promulgated by Boniface VIII in 1300, in which strict enclosure was imposed upon all female communities of any order. There is evidence of opposition and resistance, as there was to be again with the renewed strictures imposed as a result of the Tridentine reform of the sixteenth century. In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, partly as a result of the early modern attempts at reform, Naples and Palermo developed particular types of raised choirs for nuns located above and behind the main altar, as well as high raised exterior loggias that gave a distant and protected view of the cities.

One important effect of the containment of women in reserved and enclosed sections of churches was their separation from the sacraments. This emerges quite clearly in the disposition of nuns' choirs, which were sometimes raised on balconies at the west end of the nave (for example, at Vadstena), from which they were further separated by a screen or a grill. Although the evidence of these arrangements is not always unambiguous, it is clear that in some examples the women religious would not have been able to see the elevation of the host at the altar. The examination of other surviving nunneries suggests that there was little, if any, visual participation in the Mass by choirs placed beside or behind the altar. The experience of the sacred thus seems to have become largely auditory rather than visual; this phenomenon has been associated with theories of the permeability (and lack of control) of the female body deriving from ancient philosophy and medicine.

There has been a long-standing association between the spaces allocated for women and the north side of the church. Representations of the Virgin Mary tend to locate her on the north (left) side of Christ (in scenes of the Coronation of the Virgin, or the Crucifixion, for example). This practice was confirmed not only in medieval parish practice (women seated on the north), but frequently also in burials.

Women have been notable patrons of ecclesiastical architecture and its decoration. Indeed, the role of women in founding churches and in pious works started in the earliest years of Christianity. In the Middle Ages, noble and royal women were conspicuous patrons of church decoration, as in the case of Queen Blanche of Castile, donor of the north transept rose window at Chartres Cathedral and the founder of the Cistercian convents of Maubuisson and Lys, both near Paris.

Perhaps one of the most important and striking periods of female patronage, however, is the late thirteenth and early fourteenth centuries in Europe in relation to the Mendicant orders (especially the Dominicans and Franciscans). Royal women played a pivotal role in the founding and building of churches and monasteries for both male and female communities of these orders, and they often requested burial for themselves and their families within the church. Striking examples are the nunneries of Pedralbes in Barcelona, Sta. Chiara in Naples, and Longchamp near Paris. The tie between royal women and the Franciscans was especially close.

A great many churches are dedicated to female saints, especially virgins and martyrs from the early Christian period (Saint Pudenziana, Saint Praesede, Saint Cecilia, Saint Restituta, Saint Catherine of Alexandria). But starting most conspicuously in the twelfth century and under the influence of Saint Bernard of Clairvaux, churches were increasingly dedicated to the Virgin Mary. The Virgin is also associated in particular with the main chapel on the central axis of large churches, and in the thirteenth century this developed into the phenomenon of lady chapels, especially frequent in Great Britain, where these became large and partially separate spaces behind the main altar, and sometimes, as at Ely, on the north side. Axial lady chapels can be seen at Salisbury and Wells cathedrals.

CAROLINE BRUZELIUS

References and Further Reading

- Barber, C. "The Imperial Panels at San Vitale: A Reconsideration." Byzantine and Modern Greek Studies XIV (1990): 19–42.
- Bruzelius, C. "Hearing Is Believing: Clarissan Architecture 1212–1340." Gesta XXXI (1992): 83–92. Reprinted in Medieval Religion: New Approaches, edited by C. Berman. Routledge, 2005, pp. 272–289.
- . "Nuns in Space: Strict Enclosure and the Architecture of the Clarisses in the Thirteenth Century." In Clare of Assisi: A Medieval and Modern Woman, edited by Ingrid Peterson. The Franciscan Institute, 1996, pp. 53–74.
- . "Queen Sancia of Mallorca and the Church of Sta. Chiara in Naples." Memoirs of the American Academy in Rome 40 (1995): 41–72.
- Bynum, Caroline Walker. Holy Feast and Holy Fast: The Significance of Food to Medieval Women. Berkeley, Calif.: University of California Press, 1988.
- de Benedictis, E. "The Senatorium and Matroneum in the Early Roman Church." Rivista di Archeologia Cristiana LVII (1965): 69–85.
- Elliott, J., and C. Warr. The Church of Santa Maria Donna Regina: Art, Iconography and Patronage in Fourteenth-Century Naples. Burlington, Vt.: Ashgate Publishing, 2004.
- Gilchrist, R. Gender and Material Culture: The Archaeology of Religious Women. London: Routledge, 1994.
- Matthews, T. "An Early Roman Chancel Arrangement and Its Liturgical Uses." Rivista di Archeologia Cristiana XXXVIII (1965): 73–95.
- Nichols, J. A., and L. T. Shank., eds. Medieval Religious Women: Distant Echoes. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Cistercian Publications, 1984.
- Rosenwein, B. "Inaccessible Cloisters: Gregory of Tours and Episcopal Exemption." In The World of Gregory the Great, edited by K. Mitchell and I. Wood. Leiden: Brill, 2002, pp. 181–198.
- Smith, J. "Women at the Tomb: Access to Relic Shrines in the Early Middle Ages." In The World of Gregory the Great, edited by K. Mitchell and I. Wood. Leiden: Brill, 2002, pp. 163–180.

See also Architecture, Monastic; Blanche of Castile; Mary, Virgin; Misogyny; Monastic Enclosure; Monasticism and Nuns; Patronage, Artistic; Patronage, Ecclesiastical; Space, Sacred; and Gender

ARCHITECTURE, MONASTIC

The architecture of monasticism, and especially that of major religious orders (Benedictines, Cistercians), is a rich and well-studied subject, but the buildings of women's communities received almost no attention until about 1990. The subject is therefore still in its infancy, in spite of a series of important and ground-breaking studies that took place in the fifteen or so years after 1990.

Sparse Evidence

There are still many difficulties, however: often the monasteries of women religious were especially vulnerable to the ravages of the Reformation, the Dissolution, and the ensuing religious wars. In France, the Revolution led to the almost complete obliteration of the monastic complexes of women. Greater evidence survives in Spain and Portugal, but here little historical or archaeological research has been undertaken and published. The best evidence for women's communities thus comes from those countries where there has been a continuous Catholic tradition and where women's monasticism has survived (Italy, Portugal, Spain). Yet (ironically) these structures, when still part of practicing communities, are difficult to study precisely because the rules of strict enclosure prohibit access to the internal spaces and often the archives, if they survive. As a rule, however, historical documentation of women's monasticism is either poor or entirely lacking. In the rare cases where monastic architecture does survive, it often does so in fragmentary form, as the economic conditions of nunneries, changes in the interpretation of the religious life, and, above all, the changes imposed by the regulations of the Council of Trent led to many modifications.

It should also be noted that in certain periods, and above all in the thirteenth century, women religious "inherited" or were given monastic complexes (often Benedictine) that had been designed and built for male communities; it is therefore sometimes difficult to differentiate the buildings of nuns from the (earlier) structures of male monasticism. This was particularly true of the monasteries established for the new female orders of the thirteenth century, such as those of the Poor Clares (or Clarisses), who were often installed in structures that were formerly occupied by Benedictine communities. Examples can be found at San Pietro in Vineis in Anagni, San Sebastiano outside Alatri, and San Silvestro and Santi Cosma e Damiano (San Cosimato) in Rome.

Archaeology has provided some of the most important evidence for early female communities, and here exceptional work has been done in Great Britain (Gilchrist, 1994). Other types of sources, such as the sixth-century rule written for a women's community by Caesarius of Arles, are important also. In all these instances, however, the student should recall that communities often underwent considerable change from one decade to another: choirs were moved, expanded, or contracted in relation to internal as well as external pressures. An excellent case in point is the location of the nuns' choir at Sta. Chiara in Assisi after c. 1260, which seems to have undergone numerous changes in location and character within the first decades of its existence.

There is one further consideration: monastic buildings were sometimes made of perishable materials, such as mud, cob, and wood. These types of structures can only be retrieved by archaeology, and then only at foundation level. The picture that we are now able to reconstruct of women's monasticism may, therefore, be biased in favor of those with more permanent, stone structures.

The Difficulties of Generalization

Under these circumstances, it is hazardous to generalize about monastic architecture for women. As numerous historians have noted, it is also true that women's houses tended to have greater economic difficulties than their male counterparts: the foundations were often smaller, and the nuns frequently depended upon male advisors or supervisors for the disposition and maintenance of their buildings, properties, and farms. Monasteries and their properties were also particularly vulnerable to attack or usurpation. Although women's monasteries were often initially established (in accordance with the Benedictine tradition) outside city walls, they were often moved to within cities or to suburban areas for greater protection. With few exceptions, it is only in the late twelfth and thirteenth centuries that we have evidence of monumental establishments founded by women for women, such as Pedralbes (Barcelona) and Sta. Chiara (Naples). This was the result of the development of a wave of spirituality and patronage among royal or noble women in particular, and it was particularly directed towards the Poor Clares.

As a result of these considerations, the architecture of women religious needs to be considered and studied with a different approach from that of male monasticism, as the creation of typologies and filiations is not often an effective tool for the study of women's houses. Rarely is there evidence of concern for a consistency of plan or layout within different orders of women's monasticism, nor did these institutions tend to have the organizational structures of general chapters or internal visitation that often existed among men's communities.

The evidence suggests that sometimes the architectural context was developed as much from domestic architecture as from an ecclesiastical tradition. This is especially true of urban communities, and it is a striking feature of some of the houses of the Beguines in the north. However, in other areas, such as parts of Umbria in Italy, the architectural structures of women's houses were closest to those of hermitages and anchoritic cells.

The anchoritic tradition is often evident in the modifications made to monastic churches converted to the use of a religious community of women. A good example of this phenomenon is the church of San Damiano outside Assisi, a small parish church modified for the use of women by the addition of a small choir beside the apse. Here, as in many structures for nuns, there may have been no direct view from the nun's choir of the altar, so that the liturgy was heard rather than seen by the female community. The separation of women from the altar and the resulting attenuation of their relationship to the Eucharist is one of the central features of monastic architecture for women, and this phenomenon may account for the high level of mysticism in many communities of religious women.

Enclosure

Although in the early medieval period there was considerable fluidity between male and female communities, or between monastic women and the lay public, the issue of enclosure soon became a central concept in the design of monastic spaces for women. Already in the sixth century, Caesarius of Arles mentioned that the nuns were prohibited from going into the church. The complexities of enclosure concerned the relationship of women religious not only to the lay public but also to the clergy, whose presence was essential for the administration of the sacraments. This was also the case in houses where there were communities of men and women, as at Fontevrault in the Anjou; here the women's community in the nave was distanced from the main altar by the choir of the male religious, and the separate spaces of the church were divided by metal grills. Elsewhere, the female community may have been separated by a wooden or masonry wall: Gilchrist (1994) proposed a reconstruction of St. Brigit's church in Kildare with a longitudinal wall between the male and female communities. This type of architecture is frequently found in the design of medieval hospitals, where men and women were also segregated from each other.

Women's monastic architecture was thus often modest and "domestic," in keeping with this tendency towards a less formalized architectural environment, but on the other hand it tended towards greater rigidity in the internal divisions of space between the areas accessible to the clergy and public and those identified for the nuns. Here there are also difficulties in understanding the material, as the internal dispositions of nunneries have often been changed on many occasions, especially in relation to reform movements (including Boniface VIII's bull, Pericoloso, of 1300 and the Counter-Reformation); it is therefore often difficult, if not impossible, to reconstruct the original character of the internal divisions of the Middle Ages.

Women's Role

Another aspect of women's monasticism that merits far more study is the role of women themselves in designing and determining the spaces of the communities in which they lived as nuns or which they had founded, or both. There are scattered indications of women religious shaping the spaces for their communities; the most conspicuous example is perhaps St. Birgitta of Sweden, whose churches were designed to serve double communities of men and women, whose paths, however, were not to intersect. There developed as a result a series of churches made up of suspended choirs and altars for the nuns, those for the women facing east, and the choir of the male community facing west (Vadstena, Sweden). Elsewhere in Europe, a series of late thirteenth- and early fourteenth-century queens were instrumental in the foundation and design of a series of women's monasteries; perhaps the most famous of these is Queen Sancia of Mallorca in Naples, whose great double house of Sta. Chiara (which had both Clarissan and Franciscan communities) was designed on a scale unprecedented at the time. Here the devotion of the queen to the consecrated host led not only to the original dedication of the church to Corpus Domini, but also to the location of the nuns' choir directly behind the altar, so that the women would have a privileged view of the elevated and consecrated host. In the case of Queen Sancia, she was part of what has been described as a "feminine surge" towards the Franciscans in the late medieval period: queens and princesses everywhere in Europe, from Portugal to the British Isles, were avid patrons of the Poor Clares and Franciscans, and often retired to these houses when they became widows. Perhaps the earliest figure in this movement was St. Elisabeth of Hungary (Thuringia), who established a model for charitable and pious noblewomen and who was canonized soon after her death in 1231. Isabelle, younger sister of Louis IX of France, who entered the Clarissan monastery of Longchamp, was another important example for religious women.

Surviving examples of monasteries tend to be those of large-scale and lavishly funded houses. A certain number survive in Germany from the tenth century forward; some of these were prestigious noble or imperial foundations (for example, Essen, Gernrode) in which it would appear that the female community occupied the galleries over the aisles, or, in the case of Essen, the upper story of a westwerk modeled on the palatine chapel at Aachen. In Germany, Scandinavia, and eastern Europe it appears to have been quite standard for the nuns' choir to be placed in an upper gallery at the western end of the church (Konigsfelden).

In Italy and Spain, there appears to have been a greater preference for choirs at ground level, often placed adjacent to or behind the apse. These were often ad hoc arrangements or additions made when a monastery was converted for the use of religious women. In some cases, however, the location of the choir seems strikingly original: at San Pietro in Vineis, in Anagni, for example, a nuns' choir was installed above the south aisle by raising the aisle roof to the level of the roof over the nave; in this case, the small openings that had originally served as windows now became "listening holes" so that the community could hear the liturgy below. At the nunnery of San Sebastiano in Alatri, on the other hand, which had also previously been a Benedictine monastery, the choir was installed in an upper room to the west of the nave; there was some sort of opening (replaced in modern times by a door) in the upper wall between the two spaces. The choirs usually had a niche carved into the wall for the reserved host and were often adjacent to the dormitory. In the case of Anagni and Alatri, the degree of separation of the nuns' space from the church may suggest that the term "oratory" is more appropriate than "choir."

Austerity and Art

The form and scale of the other monastic buildings was usually in keeping with the simplicity and austerity of the church and choir. In simpler and poorer foundations, there was often no cloister, but simply a square court, sometimes with one covered walkway. Apart from the great royal and noble foundations of the late thirteenth and early fourteenth centuries, there is little evidence of the types of sophisticated plumbing and water-supply systems that were developed for male monasticism. The most secluded part of a nunnery was usually the dormitory, while the spaces in which contact was permitted with either the clergy (especially for confession) or lay visitors tended to be located near the entrance to the church or alongside the apse.

One important element of monastic architecture for women was its decoration. Choirs were often painted with narrative cycles of frescoes of considerable importance. At Sta. Chiara in Naples, for example, the artist Giotto was employed by the king and queen to execute a cycle of frescoes in the choir that depicted the Apocalypse, among other subjects (very little survives of this program). Elsewhere, choirs were decorated with narrative scenes of the lives of saints or cycles of the life and passion of Christ. These pictorial cycles would have been an important counterpart to the sound of the liturgy and also would have served as patterns for pious meditation.

As part of urban and population growth in the late thirteenth century, the focus of women's monastic life moved into the city, and the pattern of monastic vocation shifted from Benedictine to Mendicant. Whereas earlier monasticism for women had been supported by aristocratic patronage, the new types of houses were associated with lay and communal piety. Zarri noted in 1973 that in Bologna in 1250 the number of women's houses had grown from seven to thirty-six. This phenomenon was parallel with that of pious women (pinzochere) who lived lives of penitence, good works, and mystical experience in a domestic context without taking monastic vows. Women's communities often found far more sympathetic support among the Mendicant friars.

CAROLINE BRUZELIUS

References and Further Reading

- Bond, James. "English Medieval Nunneries: Buildings, Precincts, and Estates." In Women and Religion in Medieval England, edited by Diana Wood. Oxford: Oxbow Books, 2003, pp. 46–90.
- Bruzelius, C. "Hearing Is Believing: Clarissan Architecture 1212–1340." Gesta XXXI (1992): 83–92. Reprinted in Medieval Religion: New Approaches, edited by C. Berman. Routledge, 2005, pp. 272–289.
- . "Nuns in Space: Strict Enclosure and the Architecture of the Clarisses in the Thirteenth Century." In Clare of Assisi: A Medieval and Modern Woman, edited by Ingrid Peterson. The Franciscan Institute, 1996, pp. 53–74.
- . "Queen Sancia of Mallorca and the Church of Sta. Chiara in Naples." Memoirs of the American Academy in Rome 40 (1995): 41–72.
- Bynum, Caroline Walker. Holy Feast and Holy Fast: The Significance of Food to Medieval Women. Berkeley, Calif.: University of California Press, 1988.
- Elliott, J., and C. Warr. The Church of Santa Maria Donna Regina: Art, Iconography and Patronage in Fourteenth-Century Naples. Burlington, Vt.: Ashgate Publishing, 2004.

Gilchrist, R. Gender and Material Culture: The Archaeology of Religious Women. London: Routledge, 1994.

Zarri, G. "I monasteri femminili a Bologna tra il XIII e il XVII secolo." Atti e memorie della Deputazione di storia patria per le province di Bologna, n.s. 24 (1973): 133–224.

See also Architecture, Ecclesiastical; Birgittine Order; Double Monasteries; Elisabeth of Hungary; Isabelle of France; Jouarre and Chelles; Matilda and the Monastery of Essen; Monastic Enclosure; Monasticism and Nuns; Patronage, Artistic; Patronage, Ecclesiastical; Poor Clares Order

ARISTOTELIAN CONCEPTS OF WOMEN AND GENDER

Aristotle's views on women, like those of Freud in his later life, have provoked considerable resistance from modern scholars, and rightly so. The fourth-century BCE philosopher consistently emphasizes the inferiority of women in relation to men, and his views proved immensely influential from the thirteenth century onward in scholastic thought. True to his own fascination with creating categories to describe all things, Aristotle's views on women can be divided into two distinct types: women's physiology and women's political role. His views, and those of his adherents in the central and later Middle Ages, have as many modern critics (plus at least one medieval critic) as they had medieval adherents. Central to both his political and his biological observations of women are their subordination and inferiority to men.

In his discussion of a woman's role (here confined to the role of the wife) in the ancient Greek polis or city-state, Aristotle relegates women to the oikos or household rather than the public realm by noting emphatically that "the male is by nature superior and the female inferior, the one rules and the other is ruled" (Aristotle, Politics, 1254b10, tr. by B. Jowett, quoted in Lefkowitz and Fant, p. 38). He also notes that male rule over women is less absolute relative to men's control of slaves and children in the household. He describes the husband's power over his wife as "constitutional," which he notes would imply an equality of the two. However, he argues that true equality in the husband's rule over his wife is not possible precisely because of female inferiority, a sexual inequality that he labels as "permanent." Women are excluded from political or public power for the same reason. To emphasize this point, Aristotle cites the example of the city-state of Sparta, where women were involved in the political realm with (to his eyes) disastrous results.

Underlying his arguments denying women access to the public realm are Aristotle's attempts to naturalize and even biologize sexual difference. His natural philosophical books are most instructive and influential in this regard. In his Generation of Animals, Aristotle argues for a fundamental difference but also a complementarity between males and females of all species: "Now of course the female, qua female, is passive, and the male, qua male, is active" (GA 1.21, 729b14). Such universalizing statements allow him to argue that, in the reproductive process, the female supplies only unformed matter, which the male seed then transforms and shapes into a living being. For Aristotle, this line of argument reflects his larger interest, apparent in his physical and metaphysical works, in the connections between matter, as potentiality, and form, as actuality. Aristotle genders the distinction of matter and form in stating that the female is definable by an incapacity (here, to produce anything more than matter or blood) and is consequently a deformed male, requiring the formative warmth of male seed to complete the process of procreation (GA 1.20, 728a18; 2.3, 737a28). Aristotle also pathologizes parts of the female body and notes that menstrual blood has negative powers, particularly the ability to dull mirrors (Aristotle, On Dreams, 459b–460a).

Most of Aristotle's texts dealing with gender were unavailable to the Latin West for centuries, until their reintroduction during the intellectual ferment of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, which witnessed a massive campaign of translation from Greek and Arabic sources. The New Aristotle, as modern scholars call the resurgence of his views in the West, quickly gained prominence in the early universities. Some of the earliest evidence of this renewal of Aristotelian natural philosophy, David of Dinant's notebooks, dating from the 1210s, incorporates the harshest elements of Aristotelian physiology: woman, like the child, is essentially an incomplete or even deformed man, and thus is the passive participant in reproduction (Davidis de Dinanto Quaternulorum Fragmenta (ed. Marian Kurdzialek, Studia Mediewisticzne 3 [Warsaw, 1963]), pp. 24 and 31). Despite opposition to some of his views, such as those on the eternity of the soul, thirteenth-century scholars actively continued and expanded upon the views of the Philosopher, as he became known. Albertus Magnus and many other scholastics attempted to reconcile Aristotle and the Christian heritage. Albertus argued that the female's imperfect state naturally desired perfection through union with the more perfect male (from Quaestiones de Animalibus 10.4, quoted in Cadden p. 160). In the 1270s, Giles of Rome emphatically sided with Aristotle in the debate over embryology, and denied "female sperm" or any active involvement by the female in conception and fetal development. This represented an assault on Galen's two-seed theory, in which both men and women provided seed at the moment of conception.

While Aristotelian views of women predominated from the thirteenth to the fifteenth centuries in western European thought, one famous voice resisted the Philosopher's claims of female inferiority. Christine de Pizan's Book of the City of Ladies, written in 1404–1405, criticizes many of the misogynist traditions her world had inherited, including those of Aristotle. First, de Pizan cites the contradictions between philosophers—and the contradictions between philosophy and theology—as evidence that his views should not be taken as “articles of faith.” Later in the text, de Pizan affirms that the knowledge of such female notables as Minerva, Sappho, and Isis has benefited the world more than the thought of Aristotle (1.38.5).

Aristotelian views of gender are built around binary oppositions and complementarity: male and female, active and passive, strong and weak, public and private, shaper and shaped. Aristotle's natural philosophical views and methods influenced western European thought for much of the later Middle Ages, and were used by many to reaffirm the belief in women's inherently flawed nature.

WILLIAM F. MACLEHOSE

References and Further Reading

- Allen, Prudence. The Concept of Women: The Aristotelian Revolution 750 BC–AD 1250. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1985.
- Cadden, Joan. Meanings of Sex Difference in the Middle Ages: Medicine, Science and Culture. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- de Pizan, Christine. The Book of the City of Ladies, translated by Earl Jeffrey Richards. New York: Persea Books, 1982.
- Hewson, M. Anthony. Giles of Rome and the Medieval Theory of Conception: A Study of the De formatione corporis humani in utero. London: Athlone Press, 1975.
- Lefkowitz, Mary, and Maureen Fant. Women's Life in Greece and Rome, second edition. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1992.
- Lemay, Helen. Women's Secrets: A Translation of Pseudo-Albertus Magnus' De secretis mulierum with Commentaries. Albany, N.Y.: State University of New York Press, 1992.
- Maccagnolo, Enzo. “David of Dinant and the Beginnings of Aristotelianism in Paris.” In A History of Twelfth-Century Western Philosophy, edited by Peter Dronke. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988, pp. 429–442.
- Macleane, Ian. The Renaissance Notion of Woman: A Study in the Fortunes of Scholasticism and Medical Science in European Intellectual life. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1980.

See also Christine de Pizan; Gender Ideologies; Misogyny; Private and Public Spheres; Procreation and Ideas of Conception; Scholasticism

ARMS AND ARMOR

Arms and armor were deployed to construct, define, and signify gendered identities throughout the Middle Ages. Shield, sword, and spear were recognizable symbols of men and masculinity, just as spindle and distaff were symbols of women and femininity. Among the Germanic warriors of the early Middle Ages, the ceremonial bestowal of shield and spear ushered free boys into manhood. Peasant, monastic, and bourgeois conceptions of masculinity were never tied quite so closely to martial prowess, but aristocratic men continued to define themselves as bellatores (“those who make war”) from the emergence of the knight in the eleventh century well into the early modern period. The twelfth-century chivalric poet and troubador Bertran de Born thus derided the manhood of those untrained in the use of lance and sword, while other knights shamed comrades into joining crusades by sending them presents of wool and distaffs. Scholastic authors such as Ptolemy of Lucca and Giles of Rome, together with secular and canon laws from regions as diverse as Lombard, Italy, high medieval Iceland, and late medieval France, attempted to enforce this gendered social order by explicitly forbidding women to bear arms or wear armor. Many cited Deuteronomy's prohibition (22:5) against crossdressing as precedent. Some legal collections made allowances for extraordinary circumstances, but the penalties prescribed were generally harsh—they ranged from fines and lesser outlawry up to execution (in the exceptionally politicized case of Jeanne d'Arc/Joan of Arc).

The normative prohibitions and binary symbolism of medieval arms and armor were not transparent reflections of social realities, however. Women operated the stonethrower that struck and killed Simon de Montfort the Elder, the leader of the Albigensian Crusade, at the siege of Toulouse in 1218, for example. While greater average upper-body strength may have given men a physical advantage when using certain close-combat weapons, modern archaeologists have now unearthed enough swords and spears from unmistakably female graves to show that men did not have a monopoly even on these. Women are known to have manufactured everything from bows and arrows to suits of mail, and some continued to use this equipment even as it grew heavier (and armor in particular became more common) in the high and later Middle Ages. In the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, knightly cavalry began to adopt the lance and great helm as opposed to the lighter spear and spangenhelm; chain armor not only grew to cover the lower arms and legs but also began to incorporate small plates designed to protect vital areas. In the late Middle Ages, both arms and armor grew heavier still, as full plate evolved out of chain/plate hybrids and the pike and halberd replaced the infantry spear. These changes do not appear to have had much effect on women, however—perhaps because few women were professional soldiers. Many women who took up arms did so in emergency situations such as sieges, where the use of unknighthly weapons (bows, crossbows, rocks, etc.) was a necessity and hence more socially acceptable. Others, such as the Jeannes (d'Arc, de Montfort, and de Penthièvre) of the age of the Hundred Years War, proved themselves capable of using even the heaviest late-medieval equipment. Christine de Pizan, a contemporary and admirer of Jeanne d'Arc, advised all noble ladies to familiarize themselves with weapons and war in order to be capable of defending their families' interests militarily.

Armed women were also popular—if somewhat problematic—characters in medieval art and literature. To ancient legends of warrior goddesses and Amazons, medieval Europe added a host of memorable new figures, from Valkyries and Celtic queens to the women jousting of The Ladies' Tournament. But because the sword, spear, and arrow were common metaphors for masculinity and the phallus, conventional artists faced a daunting challenge: to sustain the gendered social hierarchy while satisfying their audience's taste for exoticism and transgression. Romances thus had difficulty portraying women as both armored and feminine, while illuminations of Jeanne d'Arc vacillated between girding her in armor and clothing her in a dress.

One popular method of deflating such gender tensions was satire. Hence, the marginalia in one medieval manuscript transformed the phallus into the very symbol of femininity by depicting women jousting not with lances but with distaffs. Other artists portrayed armed women as “forgetful of their true selves” (that is, honorary men). Some romances even attempted to gender the very armor itself by adorning the men's with more “masculine” apotropaic gems, while fashioning the women's in tighter and more revealing styles. Through these various strategies, artists worked to present transgression in a manner that buttressed rather than undermined social norms. Arms and armor thus provided one of the keystones for medieval constructions of gender.

DAVID HAY

References and Further Reading

- Balzaretti, Ross. “‘These Are the Things That Men Do, Not Women’: The Social Regulation of Female Violence in Langobard Italy.” In Violence and Society in the Early Medieval West, edited by Guy Halsall. Woodbridge, Suffolk, England: Boydell, 1998, pp. 175–192.
- Blythe, James M. “Women in the Military: Scholastic Arguments and Medieval Images of Female Warriors.” History of Political Thought 22(2) (2001): 242–269.
- Clover, Carol J. “Maiden Warriors and Other Sons.” Journal of English and Germanic Philology 85 (1986): 35–49.
- de Pizan, Christine. Treasure of the City of Ladies, or The Book of Three Virtues, translated by Sarah Lawson. New York: Penguin, 1985.
- Evans, Michael R. “‘Unfit to Bear Arms’: The Gendering of Arms and Armour in Accounts of Women on Crusade.” In Gendering the Crusades, edited by Susan B. Edgington and Sarah Lambert. New York: Columbia University Press, 2002, pp. 45–58.
- Hadley, D. M., and J. M. Moore. “‘Death Makes the Man?’ Burial Rite and the Construction of Masculinities in the Early Middle Ages.” In Masculinity in Medieval Europe, edited by D. M. Hadley. London: Longman, 1999, pp. 21–38.
- Karras, Ruth Mazo. From Boys to Men: Formations of Masculinity in Late Medieval Europe. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2003.
- Nicholson, Helen, “Women on the Third Crusade,” Journal of Medieval History 23(4) (1997): 335–349.
- Orderic Vitalis. Ecclesiastical History, ed. and trans. Marjorie Chibnall, 6 vols. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1969–1978.
- Pulega, Andrea, ed. Ludi e spettacoli nel Medioevo: I Tornei di Dame. Cattedra di Filologia Romanza dell'Università degli Studi di Milano. Milan: Cisalpino Goliardica, 1975.
- Solterer, H. “Figures of Female Militancy in Medieval France.” Signs 16(3) (1991): 522–549.
- Stock, L. K. “‘Arms and the Woman’ in Medieval Romance: the Gendered Arming of Female Warriors in the Roman d'Eneas and Heldris's Roman de Silence.” Arthuriana 5 (1995): 56–83.
- Von der Hagen, Friedrich Heinrich, ed. “Der vrouwen turnei.” In Gesamtabenteuer: Hundert altdeutsche Erzählungen, 3 vols. 1850. Reprint, Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1961, vol. 1, pp. 371–382.

See also Amazons; Chivalry; Crusades and Crusading Literature; Tournaments; Valkyries; Violence; Warfare

ART, REPRESENTATIONS OF WOMEN IN

Visual representations are highly charged in Jewish, Christian, and Muslim thought. Inherited from antiquity was the notion that the sculpted or painted image “stood for” the real person, whether a divinity, a ruler, or an ordinary person. Images might thus deserve special protection and respect. Or they might be broken in order to damage the referent (the subject). Or making them might be taboo, as expressed in the second commandment to Moses: “Thou shalt not make to thyself a graven thing, nor the likeness of any thing that is in heaven above, or in the earth beneath, nor of those things that are in the waters under the earth,” although it was never completely adhered to. Representational codes that assert the difference between art and reality distinguish the art of the period 450–1500 throughout Europe and the Mediterranean world from the art of pagan Greece and Rome or of the post-medieval period. Signs of transience, such as cast shadows and emotive expressions (except women’s grief), were eschewed in the early period, and the radical physicality of anatomically correct bodies was not explored until the fifteenth century, and only in European art.

Eyck, Jan van (c. 1390–1441). Eve and Musical Angels. Right panels from the Ghent Altarpiece (Altarpiece of the Mystic Lamb). Location: Cathedral of St. Bavo, Ghent, Belgium. Credit: Scala / Art Resource, NY.

The situation was compounded by the notion that what we see impacts our very souls. In the Middle Ages it was thought that it might even have a physiological effect, such that if a pregnant woman looked at a malformed animal she would give birth to a freak; a thirteenth-century medical text called The Secrets of Women says that chimeras must not be painted on the bedroom walls for this reason. And ugly old women, as well as the mythical basilisk, could damage people with their gaze. Add to this one more element, gynophobia or anxiety about women’s generative power and sexuality, and we can expect representations of women to be very heavily freighted. Whereas visual metaphors for phallic power are redolent, allusions to female genitalia are very rare except in the strange exhibiting figures known as “sheela na gigs” that were sculpted on churches and castles.

Lim Limbourg Brothers (15th CE). June (Haymaking). In the background, the Palace and Sainte-Chapelle, Paris). Calendar miniature from the Très Riches Heures du Duc de Berry. 1416. Ms.65, f.6v. Photo: R.G. Ojeda. Location: Musée Condé, Chantilly, France. Credit: Réunion des Musées Nationaux / Art Resource, NY.

Since medieval belief systems indicate anxiety about seeing, we can assume that visual representations were contemplated soberly and that their making and positioning was a deliberative matter. Much more was expected of such images than we currently associate with the visual arts, which we generally pursue in a personal way for aesthetic or entertainment value. On the other hand, it is widely recognized that even seemingly casual cultural production contributes to the ideological work of reinforcing societal norms, such as class systems or gender polarity, and medieval art was no exception to this, as Alexander has argued. The discussion that follows is informed by medieval concepts of vision and the modern concept of ideology. Examples are drawn from European art, though some readings are suggested that pursue the topic in Byzantium and Islam.

Woman as Deformity/Woman as Ideal Beauty

Aristotle's precepts that a girl baby is a failed male and that hybrids are unnatural exerted an influence throughout the Middle Ages on representations of women in art, as did Horace's mockery of a creature with the head of a lovely woman who "ends below in a black and ugly fish." By the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, when freaks cavorted in the margins of manuscript pages and portals, mermaids and sirens were common among the deformities, especially in books made for male patrons. They warn of instability, and in some contexts hybrids had come to symbolize various aspects of sin. Thus it is puzzling that some Judaic illuminated manuscripts made in Germany in the fourteenth century show some biblical characters with birds' or beasts' heads. Mellinkoff has suggested that they are a subversive Christian artist's attempt to denigrate Jewish patrons. In one book, the "Birds' Head Haggadah" (available at the New York Public Library), only the women are depicted this way. Virtuous biblical women were appropriated as models for Christian queens; as Jordan has shown, Judith and Esther are treated as courteous heroines in the windows of the Sainte Chapelle (Palace Chapel) in Paris.

The Queen of Sheba was sometimes represented as black and beautiful (despite the Latin Bible's phrasing, "black but beautiful"), as in an enamel plaque made by Nicholas of Verdun for the pulpit of the Abbey Church of Königsfelden in Austria, in 1181. Yet she was viewed as a pagan temptress whose wiles had to be overcome by King Solomon. In fact, increased contact with darker-skinned people during the Crusades, whether Arabs or their African slaves, produced a reaction in the thirteenth century: for the first time, artists represented Europeans as white with pink cheeks (as opposed to shades of brown and pink), and this complexion was especially ascribed to beautiful women in art and literature. Thus, if she was seen as a prefiguration of Ecclesia (Church personified), the Queen of Sheba might be "pure" white.

The Problem of Nudity and the Female Body

Erotic nudes like the Venuses of antiquity disappeared almost completely from the artistic repertory in the Middle Ages, since they were pagan, seductive, and dangerous. Giles of Rome, an influential moralist whose treatises were used to raise the ruling class of the thirteenth century and later, described nude statues as hideous and liable to corrupt young men.

When a contemporary painter portrays some of the sensual beauty of Bathsheba as glimpsed by King David, he also follows the biblical story closely, emphasizing the dire consequences of this adulterous gaze. Eve was represented as the quintessential prototype of the nude female who entrapped a man and caused his downfall; she may mirror the serpent that tempts her if its head is represented as that of a woman. Even the sensual and vulnerable Eve on the wings of Van Eyck's great Ghent Altarpiece is associated with the painful outcome of her pregnancy, by means of the depiction above her of Cain killing Abel. In fact, being paraded naked in the street was represented in some municipal law books as a punishment for sexual sin (for men as well as women), so this naked Adam and Eve are also vested in shame.

Medical treatises generally avoided any naturalistic appearance of the body, presenting ideograms highly charged with strange notions such as that the female reproductive organs were those of a man turned inside; the invasive writing within the woman's body attests to the author's anxiety about the subject. Yet the body could be shown stripped for surgery, or for torture leading to sainthood, and representations of subjects like St. Agatha's and St. Catherine's mastectomies may have constituted a sado-erotic experience for the viewer.

Feminine Activities

The Genesis story was also used to reinforce notions of the gendered separation of work. A negative valence is created for manual work by virtue of the fact that it was a punishment. In the threefold class system envisaged by medieval writers, those who work are beneath those who fight and those who pray. Adam may be shown digging, and wearing an animal skin as if he is a herdsman, while Eve generally spins thread, and nurses a child. Comparable activities are being performed by women in the household of Potiphar in the sixth-century Byzantine Vienna Genesis manuscript. Weaving and sewing were domestic tasks assigned to women in the literature and art of antiquity and the Middle Ages. Modestly veiled female textile workers illustrate the Active Life on the north portal of Chartres Cathedral, facing nuns who embody the Contemplative Life. Their perfect containment in each building block of the arch gives them an aura of personification more than of individuality (vita, life, is feminine in Latin). They contrast with the fully clad but seductive prostitutes who actively cause the moral and fiscal downfall of the Prodigal Son in a window of the nave.

In the fourteenth century we hear that women who are too high-born to work at a loom might learn to read, and in fact there is evidence that French queens had large libraries of manuscripts in Latin and the vernacular and taught their children the alphabet. A popular model was provided by the image of Saint Anne teaching the Virgin Mary to read, as Sheingorn has shown. Yet the fact that these saintly prototypes are depicted standing, rather than comfortably seated, suggests that the function of female literacy was to read and chant from a prayer book, a reading that can be phonetic but not necessarily fully comprehended if the language is Latin. Individual book owners were often represented kneeling in prayer, as if they belonged to the class who pray even though married. The secular German law book known as the Sachsenspiegel or Saxon Mirror depicts a book among the property that passed down in the female line, along with the cloth-working tools, candle sticks, chests and mirrors, and the herds and flocks. Yet in the many other instances the illustrator wished to refer to this “women’s stuff,” s/he showed only the shears, or perhaps a goose, thus diminishing the housewife’s domain and accomplishments; no woman in the law book is shown reading or holding a book.

There are other omissions in the representation of work. A pictorial cycle of monthly agricultural activities was inherited from Roman art and depicted in western Europe throughout the Middle Ages in many church portals, as well as in the calendar section of devotional books. Although the historical record indicates that peasant women worked in the fields, and love poetry is full of easily seduced shepherdesses, there are no representations of such women on calendar pages until the fifteenth century. And when they make an appearance, as in the Très Riches Heures of the Duke of Berry, the reader is invited to become a voyeur, spying on their bare ankles and shoulders as they labor. Whereas the high-born women on other pages (for example, April and May) are elaborately draped, the surfeit of rich cloth denoting the wealth of the patron, the peasant women are to be despised for their lack of decoration. The rhetoric of naturalism in all such pictures is suspect; the artist conjures a reality through topographic and botanical details that are calculated to persuade us of a social reality, when in fact they conjure a fantasy world. Even though records indicate that the rich (men as well as women) wore damasked and embroidered silks and velvets on special occasions, we know relatively little of real peasant attire. We do know that peasants experienced malnutrition, but skeletally thin peasant women would not have provided a feast for the eye of the lord of the castle. At the end of this calamitous century, marked by famine, war, and plague, the artist seems eager to show that all is well and prosperous under his patron’s control. And well he might, because it was an old precept that bad rule led to such disasters.

Powerful Women

Women in the West were never accorded the secular authority of some Byzantine empresses, who ruled in their own right and are represented on their coinage bedecked in jewels and regalia. The good girl/bad girl polarity between the Virgin Mary and Eve carried over into secular representation in Europe and was accentuated toward the end of the Middle Ages.

Women might be placed on a pedestal in courtly love poetry (though we now realize that the standard metaphors often indicate that they were raped), but if they gained power over men they risked inverting the “natural” order that demanded a wife’s obedience to her husband. Inversions such as Phyllis riding Aristotle, or a wife beating a man, were cautions against women’s power, as Smith has shown.

Witchcraft in this era was seldom celebrated for its healing power (as it was originally), and became a pretext to accuse women, more than men, of poisoning or hexing their victims. The trials and burnings were seldom represented, but by 1500 prints showed nude female witches riding backwards on rams and enacting “Sabbath” rituals. Bad-girl images were elaborated in the illustrated Danse Macabre des Femmes (Dance of Death of Women), where females of all professions and classes are shown satirically at the moment of their death.

Yet Campbell has recognized that fourteenth-century scenes of love in the mural paintings of the Communal Palace of San Gimignano in Italy rise to a high level of human feeling and positive symbolism. And from the fifteenth century come several illustrated manuscripts that show the activities and influence of good lay women. Examples may be found in the works of Christine de Pizan, notably her City of Ladies, and in Giovanni Boccaccio’s De Claris Mulieribus (Concerning Famous Women), presented in French translation as Des Clercs et Nobles Femmes. By drawing on diverse historical examples, Boccaccio also constructs a history of noble women, including artists and writers.

MADLINE H. CAVINESS

References and Further Reading

- Alexander, Jonathan. “Labeur and Paresse: Ideological Representations of Medieval Peasant Labor.” The Art Bulletin 72 (1990): 436–452.

- Buettner, Brigitte. Boccaccio's "Des Cleres Et Nobles Femmes": Systems of Signification in an Illuminated Manuscript. College Art Association Monograph on the Fine Arts. Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1996.
- Cameron, Averil, and A. Kuhrt. Images of Women in Antiquity. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1983.
- Camille, Michael. The Gothic Idol: Ideology and Image-Making in Medieval Art. Cambridge New Art History and Criticism. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1989.
- Campbell, C. Jean. The Game of Courting, and the Art of the Commune of San Gimignano, 1290–1320. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1997.
- Caviness, Madeline H. Reframing Medieval Art: Difference, Margins, Boundaries. Medford, Mass.: Tufts University Press, 2001 (<http://Nils.lib.Tufts.edu/Caviness>).
- . Visualizing Women in the Middle Ages: Sight, Spectacle, and Scopio Economy. The Middle Ages Series. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001.
- Devisse, Jean. The Image of the Black in Western Art, from the Early Christian Era to the "Age of Discovery": From the Demonic Threat to the Incarnation of Sainthood, translated by William Granger Ryan. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1976.
- Grössinger, Christa. Picturing Women in Late Medieval and Renaissance Art. Manchester Medieval Studies. Manchester and New York: Manchester University Press, 1997.
- Harrison, Ann Tukey, ed. The Danse Macabre of Women: Ms. Fr. 995 of the Bibliothèque Nationale, with a Chapter by Sandra L. Hindman. Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 1994.
- Jordan, Alyce A. "Material Girls: Judith, Esther, Narrative Modes and Models of Queenship in the Windows of the Ste.-Chapelle." Word and Image 15(4) (1999): 337–350.
- Kalavresou, Yoli. Byzantine Women and Their World, Exhibition, Harvard University Museums, Cambridge. New York: Yale University Press, 2003.
- Mellinkoff, Ruth. Antisemitic Hate Signs in Hebrew Illuminated Manuscripts from Medieval Germany. Jerusalem: Center for Jewish Art and The Hebrew University of Jerusalem, 1999.
- Ruggles, D. Fairchild, ed. Women, Patronage, and Self-Representation in Islamic Societies. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2000.
- Sheingorn, Pamela. "'The Wise Mother': The Image of St. Anne Teaching the Virgin Mary." Gesta 32 (1993): 69–80.
- Smith, Susan L. The Power of Women: A Topos in Medieval Art and Literature. The Middle Ages Series. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1995.

See also Body, Visual Representations of; Book Ownership; Clothwork, Domestic; Courtly Love; Danse Macabre des Femmes; Empresses: Byzantium; Eroticism in Art; Eve; Gaze; Gender in Art; Hagiography; Literacy and Reading: Vernacular; Marginalia, Manuscript; Mary, Virgin: in Art; Mermaids and Sirens; Personifications Visualized as Women; Secrets of Women; Sheela Na Gigs; Witches; Woman on Top; Work

ARTHURIAN LITERATURE

Casual readers of medieval Arthurian texts are likely to see the Arthurian world as a predominantly masculine domain. Camelot and the Round Table are a kind of "men's club," where the knights enjoy fellowship, celebrate their martial victories and sometimes confess their defeats, and accept new challenges such as the Grail quest. The Round Table is thus the locus of conventional Arthurian male bonding.

However, since knights may seek love as well as adventure, female characters also command their attention, as well as ours. A good many of the women are nameless servants or messengers, who often play crucial roles in the narrative despite their anonymity. Others are named and prominent, and they are arguably more varied in their roles and more complex in their presentation than are their male counterparts. Arthurian romances include women who are active and resourceful; some even function as knights and distinguish themselves on the battlefield. Others, the objects of knights' love or lust, influence events and behavior by inspiring men, by challenging them to undertake tasks or quests, and by either accepting or rejecting male blandishments. This statement leads us to what is traditionally, if misleadingly, called courtly love.

Arthurian Women and Courtly Love

The term "courtly love" is a nineteenth-century invention by medievalist Gaston Paris, who drew his conclusions from a single romance, Lancelot, or The Knight of the Cart, composed by French author Chrétien de Troyes in the 1170s. Paris saw courtly love as a social and amorous system in which the knight/lover (Lancelot in this instance) is subordinate to the whim of his lady (here, Guinevere). In fact, this romance offers a striking example of the woman's power to determine both the fate of the knight and the direction of the text. In one of the most famous scenes in medieval literature, Lancelot, given the opportunity to find the abducted queen more quickly if he will disgrace himself by riding in a cart used to transport criminals, accepts the invitation, hesitating only slightly before doing so. Later, Guinevere will object that his hesitation indicated less than absolute devotion to her, and he must make amends by repeatedly, upon her command, accepting disgrace unquestioningly.

This description of the intrigue of Lancelot emphasizes Guinevere's power and Lancelot's subservience, even as he plays a heroic and messianic role in other events. To some readers this presentation of the woman on a pedestal, exercising her authority at the knight's expense, has seemed to represent a literary empowerment of women. However, given Guinevere's imperious attitude, we might just as easily construe this text, and courtly love in general, as a representation of medieval misogyny masked as gallantry. It may thus be a case of exalting women for the wrong reasons and thereby undercutting the praise and presentation of female characters.

The major flaw in Gaston Paris's theory is his reliance on a single text that is hardly typical of Arthurian romance. Further examination of female roles leads us to a more useful, and double, conclusion. First, female roles are much more diverse and complex than Paris suggested; second, female characters are generally located at the intersection of two powerful cultural forces: traditional clerical misogyny and courtly idealism.

Diversity of Female Roles

It is hazardous to generalize about the function of women in Arthurian (or, more generally, medieval) literature: dealing with numerous texts from different cultures and centuries, we confront a full range of human motivations, behaviors, and emotions. The conventional view, of active men and passive but commanding females, is seriously oversimplified, and even Chrétien de Troyes's other romances give the lie to this stereotype. Enide, the heroine of his first romance (Erec and Enide, c. 1170), provokes, if only unintentionally, the central action of the romance, and she intervenes actively on several occasions to save her husband. In the following romance, Cligés, the eponymous hero, distinguishes himself in martial affairs, but it is the woman, Fénice, who makes decisions that determine the course of their love and ultimately of their lives.

The legend of Tristan and Iseut (Isolde) was originally distinct from the Arthurian legend but was soon grafted onto it, tenuously in the early French romances by Béroul and Thomas of England (both c. 1175), and then completely in the French prose Tristan (c. 1235), where Tristan becomes a knight of the Round Table. In these works Iseut shows herself to be, in many instances, an active and resourceful character, as responsible as Tristan for the decisions concerning the conduct of their illicit love, and more effective than he in saving them from detection. In Béroul, for example, she devises a clever and equivocal "true lie," an oath that enables her to confess her sin with Tristan while also swearing, truthfully if deceitfully, that she has never betrayed her husband.

Although Guinevere may be the most conspicuous example of the imperious woman, she is, if not passive, at least restricted in the range of her activity. Yet even her role is by no means consistent from work to work. In Meraugis de Portlesguez, a thirteenth-century French romance, Arthur and his knights debate the relative merits of two men to decide which one will have the woman they both love. Guinevere interrupts the discussion and takes command, rebuffing Arthur's effort to silence her. She orders the men out of the room and convenes a "court" in which only women make the decision. The roles of women in this romance are varied and complex: the young woman herself is not permitted to make her own choice, yet Guinevere has the power to expel Arthur from his own court and make decisions in his stead. On the other hand, the image of a commanding queen is attenuated by her contention that questions of love—though not matters of war or politics—are the domain of women.

One of the most complex female Arthurian characters is Morgan le Fay, a sorceress most often presented as Arthur's half-sister. She is frequently Arthur's ally, and when Arthur is mortally wounded, it is generally Morgan who transports him to Avalon to have his injuries tended. Yet she is also a jealous and vengeful woman with a particular dislike for Guinevere. In the French Death of Arthur, part of the huge Lancelot-Grail cycle (1215-1235), she attempts to turn Arthur against Lancelot and Guinevere by showing him images that Lancelot, previously her prisoner, painted to depict his affair with the queen. In the Middle English Sir Gawain and the Green Knight (c. 1400), Morgan is a withered hag whose hatred of Guinevere leads her to concoct the plot in which Gawain ostensibly risks losing his life.

Characterizations of other Arthurian women would further demonstrate their diversity—from nameless messengers to loyal wives to jealous shrews—but would also reveal that most of them are defined in terms of their relationship to males. A female character who stands out from others is Silence, a young woman whose name is also the title of a French romance by Heldris de Cornuälle (second half of the thirteenth century). Independent, capable, and successful, Silence lives her life as a man, first as a minstrel and then as a knight. Thus she too illustrates both the active and the admirable traits of some Arthurian women and also the fact that, once again, authors appear to reflect a patriarchal, if not explicitly misogynistic, culture by presenting women as accessory to males or, in the case of Silence, almost as a male surrogate. Interpretation of this romance is further complicated by the narrative criticism of male-line inheritance and the insertion of several openly antifeminist digressions. Moreover, Silence's success as a man in a man's world ends in her relatively traditional marriage.

Perceval's unnamed sister represents yet another category. In the French Quest for the Holy Grail (part of the Lancelot–Grail cycle), in Sir Thomas Malory's Morte d'Arthur (c. 1470), and elsewhere, she plays a crucial role in the Grail quest, despite the fact that women are expressly excluded from the enterprise. The explanation is surely that she does not fall into the same category as ladies at court but is instead a kind of female counterpart to Galahad: the two of them are symbolic representations of an ideal of moral perfection, an ideal attained by no other Arthurian characters.

With regard to most Arthurian women (Perceval's sister and Morgan being exceptions), convention appears to inscribe in the construction of female characters a deep ambiguity, less in their overt behavior than in the way readers may be led, whether by tradition, personal inclination, or textual strategies, to interpret them. One reader may take satisfaction in finding a good many females in Arthurian romance who are strong, capable women, able to either command men or, like Iseut, use intelligence to outwit them. Another reader may construe that same strength and resourcefulness as shrewishness, that intelligence as the deviousness and mendacity, the "feminine wiles," to which a woman must stoop in order to manipulate men and events. A few brief examples will suggest, however cursorily, the directions of contemporary approaches to the problem of "reading" Arthurian women.

Critical Approaches

We lack a full and systematic study of female agency in romance, though important contributions have been made in that direction. Maureen Fries, without focusing squarely on agency, provides a very straightforward and practical tool for categorizing female characters, dividing them, according to their intentions, into "female heroes," heroines, and counterheroes. The unconventional term female hero refers to a character who escapes traditional definitions and is able to function heroically, as would her masculine counterpart. Thus, Fries's categories unavoidably continue to define females in terms of their relation to males and masculine societal roles. Nonetheless, establishment of these categories permits a reasonably clear delineation of roles, illustrating the diversity of female characters and the futility of conventional stereotypes.

Much recent feminist criticism of Arthurian (and more broadly, courtly) literature has gone beyond the straightforward categorizing of female characters and similarly beyond the tracking of overtly misogynistic treatments of women. Roberta L. Krueger, for example, studies the problem of women readers of romance. Adopting a triple perspective—women in particular texts, women as modern readers, and women as medieval audiences for romances—she suggests that the marginalization of women within romances corresponds to the marginalization of women historically, that is to say, their displacement from a subject position. She demonstrates as well the ways in which their displacement was the lot not only of female characters and most medieval women but also specifically of female patrons of romancers, such as Marie, the Countess of Champagne, who sponsored the Knight of the Cart, only to have Chrétien pass the completion of the project to another author. E. Jane Burns investigates the space in which we might read the "ambiguous status" of women—via their voices or their bodies—in medieval texts whose (generally) male authors appear to fill available space with prefabricated constructions of female characters.

Peggy McCracken, in The Romance of Adultery, studies questions of adultery and queenship, suggesting that the former offers a literary reflection of anxieties about real (historical) queens and about matters of legitimacy and succession. Paradoxically, the adultery of a romance queen (Guinevere or Iseut) may contribute to social stability, and it may be to the king's benefit to tolerate, if not approve, it: retribution would separate him from his favored knight and sow dissension in his court.

A good deal of the criticism concerning female characters in Arthurian literature serves not to solve or simplify their situation and role in romances but to problematize it and to demonstrate that the question is extraordinarily subtle and complex. Studies continue to identify the tensions underlying the construction of female characters, the product of an effort, by mostly male writers, to idealize women while promoting a masculine ethos within a culture in which misogyny was entrenched as doctrine and often as law.

NORRIS J. LACY

References and Further Reading

- Bloch, Howard. Medieval Misogyny and the Invention of Western Romantic Love. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1991.
- Burns, E. Jane. Bodytalk: When Women Speak in Old French Literature. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1993.
- . Courtly Love Undressed: Reading Through Clothes in Medieval French Culture. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2002.

- Burns, E. Jane, and Roberta L. Krueger, eds. "Courtly Ideology and Woman's Place in Medieval French Literature." Special issue of Romance Notes 25.3 (1985).
- Fenster, Thelma, ed. Arthurian Women: A Casebook. New York: Garland, 1996.
- Ferrante, Joan. Woman as Image in Medieval Literature from the Twelfth Century to Dante. New York: Columbia University Press, 1975.
- Gaunt, Simon. Gender and Genre in Medieval French Literature. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995.
- Gravdal, Kathryn. Ravishing Maidens: Writing Rape in Medieval French Literature and Law. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1991.
- Kay, Sarah. Courtly Contradictions: The Emergence of the Literary Object in the Twelfth Century. Stanford: Stanford University Press, 2001.
- Krueger, Roberta L. Women Readers and the Ideology of Gender in Twelfth-Century Verse Romance. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- Lejeune, Rita. "La Femme dans les littératures française et occitane du XIe au XIIIe siècles." Cahiers de Civilisation Médiévale 20 (1977): 201–217.
- McCracken, Peggy. The Romance of Adultery: Queenship and Sexual Transgression in Old French Literature. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1998.
- Partner, Nancy F. Studying Medieval Women: Sex, Gender, Feminism. Cambridge, Mass.: Medieval Academy of America, 1993.

See also Audience, Women as; Chrétien de Troyes; Courtly Love; Courtship; Cross-Dressing; Femininity and Masculinity; Feminist Theories and Methodologies; Guinevere; Isolde; Literature, German; Literature, Middle English; Literature, Old French; Marie de France; Misogyny; Patriarchy and Patrilineage; Roman de Silence; Romance, English; Romance, French; Romance, German; Sexuality: Extramarital Sex; Supernatural Women

ARTISAN FAMILIES, WOMEN OF

When at the end of the fourteenth century the founders' guild of York revised its ordinances, it provided that one Giles de Benoyne be allowed an additional apprentice "because he had no wife." Benoyne was presumably a widower, but his appeal illustrates a larger truth: a man in possession of a workshop must be married. The implication is that workshops regularly used the labour of wives, but also that a man was considered unfit to head a workshop unless he were (or at least had been) married. We may set this beside another observation. With the exception of building craftsmen, the place of work of the medieval artisan tended to coincide with his place of residence. This had two consequences: husbands did not go out to work and wives could work alongside their husbands whilst maintaining responsibility for those aspects of a household that were deemed women's work. It follows that, despite the optical illusion created by legal and administrative records that invariably identify workshops solely with the male "head," the medieval artisanal workshop was invariably associated with a married couple that constituted an essential partnership. Indeed, we are in danger of perceiving as real the medieval ideological notion that workshops were run by men and that women were merely ancillary; this is to ignore the evidence of widows running workshops and hence implicitly of wives being capable craftworkers in their own right.

Wives of artisans balanced two or three essentially complementary functions: they often assisted in the running of the workshop; they engaged in other economic activities; they managed households. The management of households involved day-to-day responsibility for the material welfare of husband, children, apprentices, and servants, particularly in terms of the provision of food, warmth, and clothing. Detailed letters of direction from the merchant Francesco Datini to his wife, Margherita, which mirror the voluminous instructions of the high bourgeois Le Menagier de Paris, indicate that high-status husbands were keen to maintain the notion that wives acted only on their husbands' authority. The same may have been true at this lower level of society, but this is not to deny such women considerable de facto autonomy. This is implicit in the English bourgeois normative text How the Goodwife Taught her Daughter, and also in the charitable provision made by bourgeois women of food, clothing, and fuel to the poor.

As our initial example implies, craft guilds, which were both devotional and economic in function, assumed that guild masters would normally be married. Given that, wives were understood to be associate members alongside their husbands, participating in guild feasts and aspects of the guild's devotional activities. These might include processions or even religious drama. (It is widely held that women were excluded from such drama, but this position tends to be rooted in surmise rather than evidence.) Equally, craft guilds sometimes made it explicit in their ordinances that women, including wives, were integral to the functioning of workshops. This is more conspicuous in some crafts, notably weaving, petty retailing, and candle making, than in others, though it is possible to find evidence of women in most occupations, even some that from a modern perspective would seem quite unexpected. In late-fourteenth-century Seville, for example, women were employed as masons and carpenters. We can also find examples of wives who followed occupations independently of their husbands. For example, a Florentine female weaver who took on two male apprentices in 1299 was married to a shoemaker. This example may be unusual, but the normative model of wives only working in their husbands' craft may mask more diverse social practice; it was commonplace for wives to pursue such supplementary trades as spinning or brewing as well as helping in the workshop or perhaps serving customers.

The capacity of wives to take an active role in workshop production, despite their general exclusion from apprenticeships and hence formally recognized routes to training, is beyond doubt. It is, for example, obliquely documented in wills, through evidence of husbands providing that apprentices remain with their widows or bequeathing them looms or other equipment. Similarly, widows sometimes left tools or even merchandise. Wives could and indeed must have learned hands-on from their husbands, if not previously as daughters or servants. It is apparent, however, that what may have appeared commonplace in late-fourteenth-century York was not necessarily true in other times and places. In northern Europe, at least from the later fifteenth century, we find craft guilds beginning to discriminate against women by restricting the ability of widows to maintain workshops or even, as with the weavers of Coventry in 1453 or Bristol in 1461, regulating against the participation of the wives of masters. This last was perhaps atypical, but is nevertheless symptomatic of a more conservative climate, which tended to see women as housewives and mothers rather than coworkers and business partners.

JEREMY GOLDBERG

References and Further Reading

- Cohn, S. K., Jr. "Women and Work in Renaissance Italy." In Gender and Society in Renaissance Italy, edited by J. C. Brown and R. C. Davis. London: Longman, 1998, pp. 107–126.
- Dillard, H. Daughters of the Reconquest: Women in Castilian Town Society, 1100–1300. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989.
- Goldberg, P. J. P. Women, Work and Life Cycle. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1992.
- Hanawalt, B. A., ed. Women and Work in Preindustrial Europe. Bloomington, Ind.: Indiana University Press, 1986.
- Herlihy, D. Opera Muliebria: Women and Work in Medieval Europe. New York: McGraw Hill, 1990.
- Howell, M. C. Women, Production, and Patriarchy in Late Medieval Cities. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1986.
- Kowaleski, M., and J. M. Bennett. "Crafts, Guilds, and Women." In Sisters and Workers in the Middle Ages, edited by J. M. Bennett, et al. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1989, pp. 11–38.

See also Alewives and Brewing; Apprentices; Business; Clothwork, Domestic; Feme Sole; Guild Members and Guilds; Household Management; Market and Tradeswomen; Textile Production for the Market; Widows; Work

ARTISTS, WOMEN

The ability of women to undertake a professional artistic career in the medieval period was mediated by several key institutional and social factors. One institutional determinant was access to guild membership. Guild records document women working side by side with men in most professions, including the production of artisanal goods. However, women rarely constituted more than a small percentage of total workers, and they did not receive equal remuneration. Documentary evidence further suggests that professional prospects often depended upon familial ties, since many female artisans enrolled in guilds were the widows or daughters of men in the same professions. Although female guild enrollments could vary significantly by time and place, a general statistical increase correlates with the rise of urbanization throughout Europe in the period.

Determination of female authorship of cultural products is complicated by the fact that women typically produced small-scale, less prestigious objects ("crafts"), rather than the large-scale works produced by male sculptors, monumental painters, goldsmiths, and architects, which are privileged in the traditional canon of Western art history ("art"). Notwithstanding isolated examples of women working as sculptors and mural painters, such as the putative twelfth-century Spanish sculptress Sanccia Guidisalvi and the early fourteenth-century Castilian fresco painter Teresa Díaz, women were generally restricted to the professions of textile embroidery and manuscript illumination. Attributions are made further ambiguous by the medieval tradition of scribal humility and pre-Renaissance conceptions of authorship, with the result that few medieval artisans and painters signed their products. In addition, the workshop convention of a single prevailing style—that of the head male artisan—impedes the identification of works by female hands. For example, efforts to differentiate the illuminations of Bourgot from those of her father, the celebrated illuminator Jean Le Noir, in the Book of Hours they produced for Yolande de Flandres c. 1353 have proven unsuccessful. Lastly, the affixing of one or more signatures to a cultural product in itself does not clearly define authorship, since signatures could refer variously to patrons, authors, designers, scribes, or illuminators. There is considerable debate, for instance, regarding the precise role of the noted intellectual Christine de Pizan (1364–1431) in the design of the pictorial cycles for her books. Whether the learned twelfth-century German abbesses Hildegard of Bingen and Herrad of Hohenbourg contributed to the illuminations of the manuscript each authored (the Scivias of 1142–1152 and the Hortus Deliciarum of c. 1170, respectively) is similarly debated. The design input of the female teams that embroidered the images adorning two of the finest textiles of the period, the Bayeux Tapestry of c. 1070 and the Syon Cope of c. the late thirteenth century, is likewise unresolved.

Private Consumption of Art in Nunneries

The clearest evidence regarding female artistic authorship is not found in public professional contexts, but in the pictures produced for private consumption in convents. Among the oldest surviving self-portraits in Western art are those of the twelfth-century German nun Guda, who portrayed herself twice in illuminations for the c. 1154 Codex Sintram, which were produced in collaboration with the monk Sintram. The collaboration of Guda and Sintram represents a late example of male and female religious living in double monasteries and working together in scriptoria, which was common prior to the monastic reforms of the tenth and eleventh centuries. In the late medieval period, nuns cloistered in monasteries gained greater agency in managing both embroidered textiles and manuscript production and design. Although some goods were sold to the public to generate revenue for the nunnery (at times prompting guilds to regulate their competition), many were produced to serve the communal and private devotional needs of the nuns themselves. The term Nonnenarbeiten has derogatory implications in traditional art history, due to the fact that much “nuns’ work” was technically naïve since access to the professional art world was especially limited for female religious. However, convents were often havens for learned women, including those of noble blood who served as abbesses, and young laywomen who received educations there. One particularly expressive self-portrait depicts the Bavarian laywoman Claricia, perhaps a student training in a scriptorium, swinging as the tail of the letter “Q” in a twelfth-century illuminated psalter.

Recent scholarship has explored the manner in which nuns developed a conceptually sophisticated visual vocabulary to complement their particular spiritual practices. Whether exploring unique interrelationships of word and image, devising liturgically based textual embellishments, or visualizing metaphors of bridal mysticism to figure the relationship between themselves and Christ, nuns used their authority to produce art that met their spiritual needs. Feminist art historians laud the identification of a uniquely gendered point of view in conventual art.

Poststructuralist art historians, with a complementary theoretical interest in deconstructing the multiple power structures informing historical phenomena, caution that this distinctive female devotional voice was mediated by corporate (that is, male-formulated) theology. For instance, in the case of the Poor Clare abbess, author, and painter Caterina Vigri in fifteenth-century Bologna, the metaphors of passionate maternity she visualized to serve the cloistered community of nuns functioned in concert with, and were ultimately subject to, institutionalized Franciscan theology of the Incarnation and Corpus Domini.

Although scant evidence pertains to female artists in non-Western areas, for example, Byzantium, Asia, and the Muslim world, limited documentation at present intimates similar institutional and social mediations (such as the correlation between patterns of professional access and urbanization, and access through paternal professional activity). Meanwhile, social historians persist in the archival investigations that will continue to produce more precise information regarding both Western and non-Western female cultural production in the medieval period.

KIM E. BUTLER

References and Further Reading

- Carroll, Jane L., and Alison G. Stewart, eds. Saints, Sinners, and Sisters: Gender and Northern Art in Medieval and Early Modern Europe. Burlington, Vt.: Ashgate Publishing, 2003.
- Chadwick, Whitney. Women, Art, and Society. 3rd ed. London and New York: Thames & Hudson Ltd., 2003.
- Hamburger, Jeffrey F. Nuns as Artists: The Visual Culture of a Medieval Convent. Berkeley, Los Angeles, and London: University of California Press, 1997.
- Harris Bluestone, Natalie, ed. Double Vision: Perspectives on Gender and the Visual Arts. Madison: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press; London and Cranbury, N.J.: Associated University Presses, 1995.
- Mitchell, Linda E., ed. Women in Medieval Western European Culture. New York: Garland Publishing, 1999.
- Parker, Roszika. The Subversive Stitch: Embroidery and the Making of the Feminine. London: Routledge, 1984.
- Slatkin, Wendy. Women Artists in History from Antiquity to the Present, 4th ed. Upper Saddle River, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 2001.
- Vigué, Jordi. Great Women Masters of Art. New York: Watson-Guption Publications, 2003.
- Weyl Carr, Annemarie. “Women as Artists in the Middle Ages: ‘The Dark is Light Enough’.” In Dictionary of Women Artists, edited by Delia Gaze. London and Chicago: Fitzroy Dearborn Publishers, 1997, pp. 3–21.
- Wood, Jeryldene M. Women, Art, and Spirituality: The Poor Clares of Early Modern Italy. Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1996.

See also Artisan Families, Women of; Caterina Vigri; Christine de Pizan; Clothwork, Domestic; Devotional Art; Double Monasteries; Feminist Theories and

Methodologies; Gender Ideologies; Guild Members and Guilds; Herrad of Hohenbourg; Hildegard of Bingen; Monasticism and Nuns; Nuns as Illuminators

ASCETICISM

The word asceticism comes from the Greek term for exercise or training. Rather than preparing for competitive games, however, the Christian ascetic disciplines her body in order to better serve God. Ascetic practice may take many forms: intensive prayer, vigils, fasting, flagellation, solitude, and sexual abstinence are among the most common. But whatever practice a person may embrace, the asceticism is informed by the same ideological underpinnings, centered on the notion that physical discipline serves the spiritual quest for God.

The Bible and the Eastern Church

There are a number of texts in the New Testament that support ascetic practice. Christ spoke about those who made themselves “eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven” (Matt. 19:11–12) in anticipation of the end of the world, a comment frequently interpreted as recommending chastity. But the ascetic strain in Christianity is especially indebted to the writings of St. Paul, who was influenced by the pagan philosophical tradition advocating disciplining the body so reason would prevail. Paul’s neoplatonic perspective discerned an ongoing tension between body and soul. Hence Paul spoke of an ongoing war between his flesh and spirit that hampered his spiritual progress (Rom. 7.23; cf. Gal. 5.17). Like the ancients, who believed that marriage and sexual activity conflicted with the life of the mind, Paul encouraged sexual abstinence if possible, reasoning that sex and family life were distractions from service to God (1 Cor. 7.32).

There are a number of complex reasons why the ascetic lifestyle was especially appealing to women. Both classical philosophical and medical traditions associated man with ascendant spirit and woman with unruly flesh, an association seconded by the Pauline tradition. The author of the Epistle to the Ephesians further ordained that a husband should rule his wife as Christ rules the church, but love her as he would his own body (Eph. 5.22–30). This deprecation of the female body gave rise to the widespread conviction that a woman who subdued her body through different types of self-mortification achieved equivalence with men. Sexual abstinence in particular not only helped women overcome their biological inferiority, but also spared them the dangers of childbirth and the rule of a husband. Patristic writers perceived female ascetics as triumphing over the frailty of their sex, and often described such women in masculine terms. Since there are practically no female-authored writings remaining from this period, we do not know the extent to which women internalized such imagery. But it is certainly suggestive that one of the few exceptions, the Carthaginian martyr Perpetua (d. 203), recounted a dream in which she was transformed into a male gladiator before battling Satan.

Christian asceticism first became widespread in the east, where women figure prominently in a number of different venues. There are scriptural references to an order of widows—women who lived a life of sexual abstinence after their husbands’ deaths and whose prayers were particularly valued by the Christian community (Acts 6.1; 1 Tim. 5.3–16). Consecrated virgins were a permanent fixture in the church from the second century. There are also scattered references to married couples who converted to absolute chastity, usually at the wife’s behest, and pursued an ascetic lifestyle in their homes. Women were also among the early solitaries who withdrew to the Egyptian and Syrian desert to do penance.

Occasionally female ascetics became the center of controversy. For instance, a number of church authorities were outraged by the practice of syneisaktism—a domestic arrangement in which the growing number of clerics vowed to celibacy began to form domestic units with consecrated virgins (referred to as syneisakttoi in the East and virgines subintroductae in the West). This practice was seen as a test and proof of holiness. Although syneisaktism was condemned at the Council of Nicaea (325), it continued sporadically prior to the spread of female religious communities.

With the conversion of the Roman Empire in the fourth century, asceticism necessarily replaced martyrdom as the ultimate way of expressing devotion to God, and the number of ascetics grew. Treatises extolling the virtues of virginity proliferated, while women were actively recruited as consecrated virgins by patristic writers such as Ambrose (d. 397) and Jerome (d. 420). Jerome in particular attracted a learned circle of ascetically inclined Roman women of patrician birth.

Western Developments

In the Germanic successor states to Rome, female asceticism became increasingly channeled into monasticism. The women in question were generally of royal blood. With rare exceptions, such as the former Frankish queen Radegund (d. 587), the ascetic practices of these women were not particularly extreme, focusing on their rejection of court life.

The face of female asceticism changed over the course of the twelfth century, however, in terms of both personnel and degree of severity. With the flourishing of popular piety and the development of the penitential movement, female asceticism became more broadly based socially and numerically, but also more individualistic. Although monasticism remained an ideal, and the tradition of saintly princesses continued to flourish among the royal families of eastern Europe, female asceticism was to be particularly associated with the lay penitential movement and the burgeoning bourgeoisie. Some penitential communities, such as the Beguines of the Low Countries, arose spontaneously. But there were also lay affiliates to the Franciscans and Dominicans, known as members of the third order or tertiaries, who lived by a rule adapted for secular society. Many of the women attracted to this lifestyle either were or had been wives and mothers.

Ascetic Practices

The asceticism associated with some of the most visible of these laywomen was harsh, even by the standards of the desert solitaries. Women became particularly noted for their food asceticism: the Beguine Marie of Oignies (d. 1213) undertook marathon fasts, while Dominican tertiary Catherine of Siena (d. 1380) was said to exist on the consecrated host alone. Some women practiced startling acts of self-mortification: Marie of Oignies cut a huge piece of flesh from her side; Christina the Astonishing (d. 1224) was said to throw herself into ovens, submerge herself in cold streams, and hang herself from gallows; Dorothea of Montau (d. 1394) burned her nipples to negate pleasure while nursing. Moreover, holy women also welcomed externally wrought suffering: the holiness of Lydwine of Schiedam (d. 1433), for example, was manifested by the patience with which she endured the torments of her decomposing body; the revelation received by Julian of Norwich (d. after 1413) was in the course of an illness that she solicited as a favor from God many years before; despite the celebrated example of Francis of Assisi (d. 1226), the stigmata were almost exclusively visited upon women.

With few exceptions, women's asceticism was more extreme than parallel practices among men, but the reasons for this discrepancy are a source of scholarly contention. Until recently, the prevailing view was that the women in question were suffering from internalized misogyny, hysteria, or both. Caroline Walker Bynum, however, has demonstrated the relationship between the intensely physical nature of female spirituality and the cult of the suffering Christ, a devotional orientation that coincided with the theological emphasis on the eucharist. Female asceticism and suffering was expressive of a deep identification with Christ's broken body. Rather than rejecting their bodies, these women could be regarded as sinking more deeply into their bodies, thereby representing Christ's humanity not only to themselves but to the Christian community at large. Because our perspective on these women is dependent on their male contemporaries, it is again impossible to know for certain the degree to which women themselves subscribed to this set of associations. Scholars such as André Vauchez and Dyan Elliott have drawn attention to the extent to which the male-authored hagiographies of female ascetics supported the church's larger theological program. Others, most notably Amy Hollywood, have argued that the preoccupation with the female body more accurately reflects the preoccupation of male authors rather than the spirituality of their female subjects.

The meaning of female asceticism, and the way it is expressed, changes greatly over time, yet there are certain elements that remain relatively static. From Christianity's earliest days, there has always been a large group of women who have chosen to express their piety in terms of ascetic abstention. Although we are unable to assess the spiritual gains, it is clear that asceticism brought with it some very tangible rewards. Ascetic chastity generally accorded women a degree of autonomy. Moreover, barred from positions of official authority in the church, women could distinguish themselves through ascetic practices, providing themselves with visibility, influence, and admiration not available to them through other means.

DYAN ELLIOTT

References and Further Reading

- Bell, Rudolph. Holy Anorexia. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1985.
- Brakke, David. Athanasius and Asceticism. Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins University Press, 1995.
- Brown, Peter. The Body and Society: Men, Women, and Sexual Renunciation in Early Christianity. New York: Columbia University Press, 1988.
- Bynum, Caroline Walker. Fragmentation and Redemption: Essays on Gender and the Human Body in Medieval Religion. New York: Zone Books, 1991.
- . Holy Feast and Holy Fast: The Religious Significance of Food to Medieval Women. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1987.

- Canon, Christopher. "Enclosure." In The Cambridge Companion to Medieval Women's Writings, edited by Carolyn Dinshaw and David Wallace. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2003, pp. 109–123.
- Castelli, Elizabeth. "'I Will Make Mary Male': Pieties of the Body and Gender Transformation of Christian Women in Late Antiquity." In Body Guards: The Cultural Politics of Gender Ambiguity, edited by Julia Epstein and Kristina Straub. New York: Routledge, 1991, pp. 29–49.
- Clark, Elizabeth. "Ascetic Renunciation and Feminine Advancement: A Paradox of Late Ancient Christianity." In Ascetic Piety and Women's Faith: Essays on Late Ancient Christianity, edited by Elizabeth Clark. New York and Toronto: Edwin Mellen Press, 1986, pp. 175–208.
- Cloke, Gillian. This Female Man of God: Women and Spiritual Power in the Patristic Ages, A.D. 350–450. London: Routledge, 1995.
- Elliott, Dyan. Proving Woman: Female Spirituality and Inquisitional Culture in the Later Middle Ages. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 2004.
- . "Woman: Flesh and Spirit." In The Yale Guide to Medieval Holy Women, edited by Alastair Minnis and Rosalynn Voaden. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, (forthcoming).
- Elm, Susanna. 'Virgins of God': The Making of Asceticism in Late Antiquity. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1994.
- Goodich, Michael. "The Contours of Female Piety in Later Medieval Hagiography." Church History 50 (1981): 20–32.
- Hollywood, Amy. "Inside Out: Beatrice of Nazareth and Her Hagiographer." In Gendered Voices: Medieval Saints and Their Interpreters, edited by Catherine Mooney. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999, pp. 78–98.
- Kieckhefer, Richard. Unquiet Souls: Fourteenth-Century Saints and Their Religious Milieu. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1984.
- Klaniczay, Gábor. Holy Rulers and Blessed Princesses: Dynastic Cults in Medieval Central Europe, translated by Eva Pálmai. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002.
- McNamara, Jo Ann. "The Need to Give: Suffering and Female Sanctity in the Middle Ages." In Images of Sainthood in the Medieval Europe, edited by Renate Blumenfeld-Kosinski and Tímea Szell. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1991, pp. 199–221.
- . A New Song: Celibate Women in the First Three Christian Centuries. New York: Haworth Press, 1983.
- Newman, Barbara. "Divine Power Made Perfect in Weakness: St. Hildegard on the Frail Sex." In Medieval Religious Women, Vol. 2, Peaceweavers, edited by John Nichols and Lillian Shank. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Cistercian Publications, 1987, pp. 103–122.
- . "Flaws in the Golden Bowl: Gender and Spiritual Formation in the Twelfth Century." In From Virile Woman to WomanChrist: Studies in Medieval Religion and Literature. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1995, pp. 19–45.
- Robertson, Elizabeth. "Medieval Medical Views of Women and Female Spirituality in the Ancrene Wisse and Julian of Norwich's Showings." In Feminist Approaches to the Body in Medieval Literature, edited by Linda Lomperis and Sarah Stanbury. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1993, pp. 142–167.
- Ruether, Rosemary. "Misogynism and Virginal Feminism in the Fathers of the Church." In Religion and Sexism: Images of Woman in the Jewish and Christian Traditions, edited by Rosemary Ruether. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1974, pp. 150–183.
- Salisbury, Joyce. Church Fathers, Independent Virgins. London and New York: Verso Books, 1991.
- Schulenburg, Jane Tibbetts. Forgetful of Their Sex: Female Sanctity and Society ca. 500–1100. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1998.
- Vauchez, André. "Prosélytisme et action antihérétique en milieu féminin au XIII<sup>e</sup> siècle: La Vie de Marie d'Oignies (d. 1213) par Jacques de Vitry." In Propagande et contre-propagande religieuses, edited by Jacques Marx. Brussels: Editions de l'Universitaire, 1987, pp. 95–110.
- . Sainthood in the Later Middle Ages, translated by Jean Birrell. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997.
- Warren, Nancy. Spiritual Economies: Female Monasticism in Later Medieval England. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001.
- Weinstein, Donald, and Rudolph Bell. Saints and Society: The Two Worlds of Western Christendom, 1000–1700. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1982.

See also Anchoresses; Ancrene Wisse; Angela of Foligno; Beguines; Body in Literature and Religion; Bride of Christ: Imagery; Catherine of Genoa; Catherine of Siena; Celibacy, Clerical and Priests' Concubines; Chastity and Chaste Marriage; Christina the Astonishing; Christina of Markyate; Devotional Literature; Devotional Practices; Dorothea of Montau; Douceline of Digne; Elisabeth of Hungary; Eunuchs; Fasting and Food, Religious Aspects of; Gender Ideologies; Hagiography; Jerome, Influence of; Julian of Norwich; Laywomen, Religious; Margaret of Cortona; Marie of Oignies; Mary Magdalen; Mary the Egyptian; Monasticism and Nuns; Penitentials and Pastoral Manuals; Radegund; Sexuality: Regulation of; Tertiaries; Virginité; Virile Women; Vowesses; Widows

AUDIENCE, WOMEN IN THE

It is not always easy to know whether women were readers, listeners, or spectators of a given medieval text. Factors that enable us to hypothesize a female audience include an author's appeal to a female patron, an overt declaration of writing for a female audience, records of manuscript ownership by women, content oriented towards women, and direct reference to women in the audience. These factors are not fully reliable, however. Studies of manuscript transmission show that many works reached readers not included among those explicitly addressed or envisioned by the author. We also know that women owned manuscripts that included works containing some of the most virulent misogyny. While the actual or even intended audience is often difficult to demonstrate, explicit addresses to women are sufficiently abundant to allow us a good understanding of the range of author–audience dynamics created for women when they were in the audience.

Underlying the relationship between the male author and his female readers was the belief—dominant among the clerical elite producing the majority of written texts in the medieval period—that because women were intellectually inferior, they tended to read superficially, at the literal rather than figurative or allegorical level. This attitude is exemplified in Chaucer’s Wife of Bath, an “experiential” reader who picks and chooses elements of an authoritative tradition in order to justify her own desire to remarry. The belief in women’s superficial reading is often manifested in the tone of condescension or paternalism towards female readers. It has been argued that didactic and conduct literature specifically written for women tended to use concrete imagery rather than abstractions and gave particular attention to engaging women’s emotions and appealing to their personal experiences. Yet this attitude was by no means shared by all authors, and it is noteworthy that preachers might rely on the greater piety of women in their congregation to bring wayward husbands back to the path of virtue.

The great number of texts that address female readers testifies to the strong interest in women in the audience. Authors like Chrétien de Troyes dedicated their works to female patrons and claimed to have written their works at their request, flattering them in their prologues. Giovanni Boccaccio addressed his Decameron to “ladies in love,” offering his stories as solace for the pains of love for which they had no other outlet because they were less free than men to engage in activities that would take them outside the home. Such overt declarations do not necessarily indicate an author’s sincere intention to write for women or on their behalf. An author may use flattery as a tactic to discipline his female reader and encourage her to conform to standard gender ideology, as in much conduct literature. In the Decameron, the deferential stance of the narrator is replaced elsewhere in the work with a more salacious tone, as when he encourages any women readers who doubt his weightiness (seriousness) as a writer to “weigh” him. Such sexual innuendo, common in other narratives (and in drama, such as the French farce), suggests that women, even when apparently the privileged recipients of a work, could be used for the entertainment of a masculine audience, although it should be noted that women may well have been able to appreciate the humor of a narrator’s banter or teasing.

Male authors were clearly concerned with how women would react to negative portrayals of female characters or other potentially offensive content. This anxiety is evident in the many “apologies” made to female readers, the sincerity of which is generally suspect. Chaucer apologizes for his representation of the faithless Criseyde by claiming he would more gladly have written about the faithfulness of Penelope. The narrator in the Roman de Silence closes the work by noting that the “good woman” ought not to be angry with his harsh portrayal of the romance’s female protagonist, implying that any reader who objects is a “bad woman.” Another pseudo-apology consists of blaming the author’s source, as does Jean LeFèvre concerning his translation into French of the Lamentations of Matheolus. Authors also counter women’s objections to their work by invoking the responsibility of the reader. Jean de Meun closes the Roman de la Rose by cautioning women to read properly and not to “defame” the great work or its author. Boccaccio tells any “prudish” or “self-righteous” ladies in his audience that his stories are blameless and that it is instead their dirty minds that are at fault. By the later Middle Ages, the ubiquitous dubious apology to women has itself become a topos exploited for humorous effect. Chaucer’s Nun’s Priest, in his tale of Chauntecleer the cock, facetiously bids the audience to pass over his blame of women because “Thise been the cokkes wordes, and nat myne.”

While both flattery of female readers and apologies to them for offensive content are ultimately more in the service of men than of women, feminist scholars since the 1990s have investigated the extent to which women may actively have resisted the misogyny of the works they read. Given the paucity of written records of women’s responses, assessing how women might have reacted to texts is a speculative endeavor relying on indirect evidence. Implicit in the author’s apology, for example, is anxiety that his work will meet with resistance; the apology is an effort to forestall objections to his work. Another clue to women’s resistant reading is the many inscribed female “readers” or respondents who challenge their male interlocutors. These challenges vary from the mocking put-downs of the passing knight’s advances by the shepherdess of the pastourelle to the well-crafted replies of the women in the lyric (tenso or jeu-parti) to the more learned and rhetorically sophisticated response of the female respondent in Richard de Fournival’s Bestiaire d’Amour. They also occur in the medieval Arab adab (collections of anecdotes, traditions, and etiquette). Female respondents offer contrary perspectives on love and courtship and critique the misogyny of the written tradition. The Wife of Bath famously hurled her husband’s “Book of Wicked Wives” into the flames, thus dramatizing a woman’s rejection of clerical antifeminism. Such resistant female readers in fiction were, of course, used most often to ironic effect; rarely should they be seen as straightforward advocates for women. Yet the recurrent use of such resistant figures suggests an awareness, even an anxiety, that women could resist the ideology of the authoritative tradition.

The arguments of fictional female readers also would later be used by the most famous female reader of the Middle Ages, Christine de Pizan, whose attacks on the Romance of the Rose have been foundational in our thinking about women's reception of medieval texts. Christine criticized Jean de Meun and other male authors not only for defaming women but for failing to consider the effect of this misogyny on women who read their works. Her allegorical Book of the City of Ladies (1405) opens with Christine reading the Lamentations of Matheolus and coming to detest herself and the entire feminine sex. Christine's self-loathing as a result of her reading is happily countered when Lady Reason appears before Christine and instructs her on the goodness of women through historical examples of exemplary women. Christine is also noteworthy in explicitly addressing her work to a female audience. Whereas male authors were particularly self-conscious in addressing women in the audience, female authors made surprisingly few such references. Marie de France dedicated her work to a male patron and nowhere addresses women in particular. While many known female authors wrote within a religious community, and thus can be said to have a primarily female audience, they also wrote for male spiritual advisers or benefactors and the audience addressed in their works was often gender neutral. Christine, however, consistently addresses women both in her City of Ladies and in The Book of the Three Virtues, which she wrote "for the instruction of women," hoping that it would be copied and read for years to come by women throughout the world.

LISA PERFETTI

References and Further Reading

- Ashley, Kathleen, and Robert L. A. Clark, eds. Medieval Conduct. Minneapolis and London: University of Minnesota Press, 2001.
- Bartlett, Anne Clark. Male Authors, Female Readers: Representation and Subjectivity in Middle English Devotional Literature. Ithaca and London: Cornell University Press, 1995.
- Farmer, Sharon. "Persuasive Voices: Clerical Images of Medieval Wives." Speculum 61(3) (1986): 517–543.
- Grisé, C. Annette. "Women's Devotional Reading in Late-Medieval England and the Gendered Reader." Medium Aevum 71(2) (2002): 209–225.
- Krueger, Roberta. Women Readers and the Ideology of Gender in Old French Verse Romance. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993.

- Mann, Jill. Apologies to Women. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1990.
- McDonald, Nicola F. "Chaucer's Legend of Good Women, Ladies at Court and the Female Reader." Chaucer Review 35(1) (2000): 22–42.
- Pratt, Karen. "The Strains of Defense: The Many Voices in Jean LeFèvre's Livre de Leescce." In Gender in Debate from the Early Middle Ages to the Renaissance, edited by Thelma S. Fenster and Clare A. Lees. New York: Palgrave, 2002, pp. 113–133.
- Robertson, Elizabeth. Early English Devotional Prose and the Female Audience. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1990.
- Solterer, Helen. The Master and Minerva: Disputing Women in French Medieval Culture. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1995.

See also Boccaccio, Giovanni; Chaucer, Geoffrey; Christine de Pizan; Debate Literature; Defenses of Women; Literacy and Reading: Latin; Literacy and Reading: Vernacular; Misogyny; Pastourelle; Patronage, Literary; Reader-Response Criticism; Réponse du Bestiaire d'Amour; Roman de la Rose and Its Reception; Roman de Silence; Wife of Bath

AUGUSTINE, INFLUENCE OF

Augustine, who lived from 354 to 430, was born in the small town of Thagaste in Roman North Africa. He studied rhetoric in Carthage and, except for five years in Rome and Milan, where he taught rhetoric and converted to Christianity, spent most of his life in North Africa. He returned home from Italy in 388 and served as bishop of the city of Hippo from 395 until his death. Although he spent most of his life in a provincial backwater, Augustine had an enormous importance in the development of western Christian ideas about gender and sexuality; many have blamed him outright for the oppression of women in the Christian tradition. It is clear that Augustine, like most late antique Christian authors, was comfortable assuming that women were subordinate to men according to the order of creation, and, indeed, were created to bear children for men. In the Christian version of this scheme, male domination of women is a consequence of the original sin brought upon humans by the fall of Adam and Eve.

Relationships with Women

Augustine did have some intense and powerful relationships with women, especially his mother, Monica. Monica was a Christian, and it is her persistent attention to her son's spiritual life to which he attributes his ultimate conversion to Christianity after years of exploring more fashionable religious traditions like those of the Neoplatonists and the Manichees. Augustine's early dialogues portray her as a philosophical interlocutor, and it was with her, shortly before her death, that he had an experience of mystical union at the seaport of Ostia. The other important woman in Augustine's life was his companion, the mother of his son Adeodatus. She is often called his concubine, although Augustine never refers to her this way, and in his autobiographical Confessions, he describes his break with her as the painful price he needed to pay to marry into a good Christian family, something much desired by Monica. After this relationship, Augustine struggled with chastity but never did marry; rather, he adopted an ascetic life.

Unlike his contemporary Jerome, Augustine did not cultivate female companions, but he did have female correspondents, important Roman women who had taken refuge in North Africa after the sack of Rome by the Visigoths in 410. Augustine wrote to Proba about the nature of prayer and to Juliana about the decision of her daughter Demetrias to consecrate her virginity to God. His letters to other consecrated virgins and widows offered spiritual counsel on such topics as the death of family members, the vision of God in the next world, the equality of men and women in the Resurrection, heretics, and study. In letter 262, Augustine responds to Ecdicia's complaints about her husband's infidelity, that this is due in part to her one-sided decision to live a life of chaste asceticism against his will. Even though Augustine had a high view of sexual renunciation, and while he certainly did not approve of her husband's behavior, he tells Ecdicia that her marriage vows are holier than her quasi-monastic life. Augustine's letters 210 and 211 are addressed to the community of nuns in Hippo that had been led by his widowed sister. In letter 211 he offers a set of rules for the community; this is one (and some say the earliest) version of Augustine's monastic rule.

The Inferiority of Women

In spite of these relationships with women, Augustine believed they were inferior to men by reason of physicality, but he also taught a type of spiritual equality between men and women. Insofar as women participated in the category "human being," as this category was defined by men, they were spiritual equals of men. In a famous passage of De trinitate, Augustine tries to clarify how women are in God's image only when they are considered "humanity" along with males, but not as embodied female human beings:

The woman together with the man is the image of God, so that the whole substance is one image. But when she is assigned as a helpmate, which pertains to her alone, she is not the image of God; however, what pertains to man alone, he is the image of God just as fully and completely as he is joined with the woman into one. (De trinitate XII,7,10)

This is a restatement of 1 Corinthians 11:7, in which Paul says that men are forbidden to cover their heads because they are the reflection of God, but women must cover their heads since they are, rather, the reflection of the male. As feminist scholars have noted, this Pauline line seems to contradict Genesis 1:27–28, which states that male and female were both created in the image of God. But still, as Augustine's defenders have noted, in this limited sense, women and men are equally in the image of God, and equally able to be in the divine presence in the Resurrection. That means that women should be baptized and could be saved. But, even when women have the same rights to embodiment as men, they are still reminders of fallen human nature. Furthermore, in comparison to men, women are weak. Some women, like Saints Perpetua and Felicity, are still capable of heroic courage and fortitude in the face of martyrdom, but this is because famous female saints behaved viriliter—in a manly way.

Theoretical Perspectives

Some twentieth-century scholars of early Christianity have argued that it is to Augustine's credit that he insisted that women also participate in the category homo, and therefore in the image of God; even feminist scholars have made this argument. These sympathetic portraits conclude that the problem for Augustine is sexuality, not women, and that, for his culture, he was in fact rather positively disposed towards women since he considered women spiritual equals before God and treated the women he knew with respect. Of course, this explanation is not at all comforting to many feminist historians and theologians, some of whom have argued that Augustine's views on women were just a product of his negative attitude towards sexuality in general, influenced by his own experience. The tragedy, they say, is that these ideas of women's existential limits are enshrined in medieval theology and canon law and thus became the basis for Roman Catholic theology on those subjects. As early as 1977, Clark and Richardson showcased the obvious texts, prefacing Augustine's words with brief remarks highlighting how they affected later Christian doctrine. This has become the main modern critique of Augustine on gender: Augustine makes the body “the cornerstone of his theology” and is ultimately to blame for Christian sexual repression and misogyny altogether because of his pessimistic views of sexuality, politics, and human nature, ideas that eventually dominated in Western culture. Thus, it is not what Augustine meant but rather his legacy that really counts, since it is the source of Western Christian patriarchal anthropology. The most recent analysis of the issue brings to bear many pertinent facets of Augustine’s culture, for example, the context of a slave society, to suggest important and still unexplored consequences of the relegation of women to the private sphere, including the history of the status and power of Christian women ascetics. The very fact that Ecdicia evoked such a reaction from Augustine suggests the tensions ascetic women were creating in fifth-century Christian society and looks ahead to the tensions that will be evident in medieval discussions of consecrated and enclosed women.

It is, then, not just the power of Augustine’s writings but how well they fit into a late antique Christian anthropology that made such an impact on the Western Christian tradition. The irony of this is evident when the ever-changing Western Christian community has, from age to age, turned to see what Augustine, whose understanding of human nature has been thought to transcend the limits of his place and time, can explain about the humanity of women and the role of gender in human life.

E. ANN MATTER

References and Further Reading

- Augustine of Hippo. Confessions, translated by Henry Chadwick. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- , Letters, translated by Sister Wilfred Parsons. Fathers of the Church, vols. 12, 18, 20. New York: Fathers of the Church, 1951–1953.
- Børresen, Kari Elisabeth. “In Defence of Augustine: How ‘Femina’ is ‘homo.’” In Collectanea Augustiniana. Festschrift für T. J. van Bavel. Leuven: Leuven University Press, 1990, pp. 411–428.
- Clark, Elizabeth, and Herbert Richardson. Women and Religion: A Feminist Sourcebook of Christian Thought. New York: Harper & Row, 1977.
- Daly, Mary. The Church and the Second Sex. New York: Harper & Row, 1968.
- Matter, E. Ann. “Augustine and Women.” In Augustine Through the Ages: An Encyclopedia, edited by Allan Fitzgerald. Hamden, Conn.: Garland Publishing, 2000, pp. 887–892.
- Miles, M. R. Carnal Knowing: Female Nakedness and Religious Meaning in the Christian West. Boston: Beacon Press, 1989.
- Pagels, Elaine. Adam, Eve, and the Serpent. New York: Random House, 1988.
- Power, Kim. Veiled Desire: Augustine on Women. New York: Continuum, 1996.
- Ruether, Rosemary Radford. Sexism and God-Talk: Toward a Feminist Theology. Boston: Beacon Press, 1983.
- See also Chastity and Chaste Marriage; Eve; Gender Ideologies; Jerome, Influence of; Monastic Rules; Theology; Virile Women

AUTOHAGIOGRAPHY

Autohagiography is an account of a holy person’s life written or told by its subject, usually a woman. Although medieval autohagiographies are often called “spiritual autobiographies,” they distinguish themselves from that capacious genre by their thematic, essentially ahistorical focus. Moreover, the authors often explicitly expressed their desire to convey a universal and spiritual, rather than a personal, truth. In the service of such truth, Julian of Norwich counseled the readers of her revelations, “for God’s sake, ... for your own profit, ... leave off picturing the wretched worm ... to whom [the visions were] shown, and ... mightily, wisely, lovingly and meekly think of God, who, out of his courteous love and endless goodness would have this vision shown generally for the comfort of us all.”

Autohagiographies rarely appear as texts unto themselves. Most often, autobiographical elements are contained within other forms: didactic treatises, letters, revelations, even poems; autobiography is an attribute of these works, not their purpose. Though they are indeed stories of lives told by their subject, autohagiographies reject the direct revelation of outward and inward experience that later became the identifying features of autobiographical writing. Many women’s autohagiographies began as oral recitations: confessions to a priest, revelations to an abbess or a friend, sermons to fellow nuns, words uttered in ecstasy. Such texts were frequently taken down by others, copied, translated, retranslated, and finally incorporated into holy biographies. Magdalena of Freiburg’s Erklärung des Vaterunsers, a lengthy line-by-line meditation on the Pater Noster, appears in manuscript as a copy of jottings taken down swiftly, as the scribe strives to keep up with the mystic’s outpourings. Elisabeth of Schönau dictated her visions to her brother, the monk Ekbart; Angela of Foligno’s experiences and spiritual instructions were written, often in her voice, by her confessor, a friar to whom she had been supernaturally directed by St. Francis; Hildegard of Bingen chose as amanuensis Volmar, a monk with whom she felt special spiritual harmony, so that she could trust him to take down her words as she spoke them, correct her grammar, and read back the final version for her approval. In such cases, autohagiography served a public, myth-making purpose, not an individual one.

More closely related to traditional hagiography than to autobiography in the modern sense, autohagiography recounts natural and supernatural events with equal conviction, often advancing only the latter as explanation or justification for its subject's action. The genre shares with hagiography the intention to represent the life as exemplary rather than real, taking as its literary models earlier lives of the saints and martyrs, Bible stories and scripture-based narratives (like the popular devotional texts, Meditations on the Life of Christ), and religious allegories. Most significantly, autohagiography reconstructs the life of its subject to conform to cultural conceptions of holiness. Like the autobiographer, the autohagiographer arranges selected thoughts, feelings, and events into a coherent narrative, but, like the hagiographer, she (or he) reshapes those elements into conventional forms.

If autohagiography is not strictly autobiography, neither is it precisely hagiography, whose primary purposes are to honor the heroic deeds of the saints and to evoke admiration, imitation, and faith in readers and listeners. To write of oneself in the hagiographic mode, then, might be construed as an act of repellent self-regard, utterly at odds with hagiography's intentions. And indeed, autohagiographers, acutely aware of the problem, specifically denied writing for the purpose of honoring themselves or demonstrating their right to membership in the company of the saints. Rather, they wrote for the purpose of inspiring a feeling of shared human experience in their readers. In her introduction to Le Sette Armi Spirituali, Caterina of Bologna prays that "anyone who takes notice of this little work, made with divine assistance by me ... not attribute it to the vice of presumption, nor take any error from this little book, which I, the abovementioned little dog, have written in my own hand, solely for fear of the divine rebuke if I should be silent concerning what might be helpful to others."

This meant expressing a common identity, not an individual one, and expressing truths that existed beyond the realm of human sensibilities. To do so, autohagiographers sought to efface themselves in their text by using formulae of humility and submission. Margery Kempe, for example, is well known for her use of the phrase "this creature" to refer to herself throughout her Book; other writers referred to themselves as "a certain virgin," "a servant of God," "a poor little womanly figure," or even "a wretched worm." For similar reasons, autohagiographers often repressed historical detail, maintaining a deliberate silence about external particulars that might have distinguished them from their fellows, for identifiable events and personalities were bound to obscure the spiritual truth they wished to convey. Caterina of Bologna's Sette Armi Spirituali is a case in point. In this two-part treatise she proposes her own personal trial, obedience, as the central problem of monastic life. In the first part she allegorically "arms" novices with the eponymous seven weapons, while in the second part she shows how the weapons are to be used in a disguised version of her own struggles with submission. The disguise consists of three elements characteristic of autohagiography: use of the third person; transformation of the personal into the general (for example, relatives offering to help her leave the convent become the devil trying to tempt "a certain virgin"); and rearrangement of accidental chronological order into spiritually significant order (the three visions chronicling her travails escalate in intensity, whereas the historical events which generated the visions occurred in a different, rather anticlimactic sequence).

Except when relating revelations, autohagiographers used few, if any, dates, nor did they regularly name people or places. They often omitted the parts of their lives that predated their conversion and disguised selected remaining incidents by arranging them, as Caterina did, to invoke the larger pattern of salvation history. They derived their devotional formulae from classical rhetoric, especially humility topoi, conventions of courtly submission, and apologies for failures of style or talent.

Autohagiography shares with other forms of medieval religious literature a concern for spiritual truth, orthodoxy, and authority. Expression of an individual's experience was expected to claim an authority greater than the writer's own (a Church Father, God, or a worthy pagan); to fit into a familiar pattern; and to illustrate a point of general applicability. Ostensibly personal elements also function conventionally within the genre, setting the scene for the central allegory, the battle between the World and the Spirit. The use of such conventions conferred legitimacy upon a genre in which women preached and taught, despite traditional prohibitions. Thus, for example, the scriptural dictum (I Cor. i.xxvii) that God has elected the weak to confound the strong (often cited in women's autohagiographies), cancelled, for many, St. Paul's ban on women's preaching and teaching. Catherine of Siena quoted the Lord as explaining, "I decided to send women, unknowing, weak and fragile by nature, but rich in my divine wisdom, to confound their [powerful men's] pride and rashness." Julian of Norwich addressed the issue even more directly: "God forbid that you should say or assume that I am a teacher, for I do not mean it so ... for I am a woman, ignorant, weak and frail.... But I know well what I am saying here, for I have it by the showing of him that is the sovereign teacher.... Just because I am a woman, should I therefore not tell you of the goodness of God, since I saw at the that same time that it is his will that it be known?" Women's authority to write, therefore, came not only from their visionary experience, from the mandate of God and the command of their confessor, but from the form in which they wrote. That is, they replaced traditional auctores not with experience but with genre.

The combination of intense religious fervor (the oft-noted "feminization" of late medieval piety), old-fashioned hagiographic models, such as those that glorify monastic virtues, and allegorical presentation of personal experience constitutes the particular feminine contribution to the art of autohagiography in the Middle Ages. But the visions, revelations, and admonitions in autohagiography also claimed authority, based upon events in their authors' own lives, for the composition of autohagiographies arose out of real, not fictive, experience. In accounts of their spiritual development almost all autohagiographers referred, however obliquely, to crucial events in their lives: the crises that precipitated their conversion, their loss of family, their rejection of marriage, their temptations. One of the most striking instances of autobiography recast as autohagiography appears in Angela of Foligno's Liber de Verum Fidelium Experientia. "It happened that my mother, who was a great impediment to me, died; and a short while later my husband and all my children died as well. And because, since the time I began to take the spiritual path, I had prayed to God that they would die, I felt great consolation...." Angela's intention here is to express an exemplary desire for God, not, as it might appear, callous selfishness. That family members constitute "impediments" to her spiritual development does not suggest that she does not love them or mourn their passing. But these are not the concerns of autohagiography. The spiritual message, to leave behind human attachments and devote oneself to God, erases the expression of personal feelings. Nevertheless, readers are meant to identify with Angela's loss in order that they may redirect their own unruly emotions into the more capacious channel of God's love and, like her, receive consolation.

KATE GREENSPAN

References and Further Reading

- Atkinson, Clarissa. Mystic and Pilgrim: The Book and the World of Margery Kempe. Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1983.
- Bynum, Caroline Walker. Holy Feast and Holy Fast. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1987.
- Curtius, Ernst R. European Literature and the Latin Middle Ages, translated by Willard R. Trask. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1973.
- Dronke, Peter. Women Writers in the Middle Ages: A Critical Study of Texts from Perpetua (+203) to Margu rite Porete (+1310). Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984.
- Erskine, John A. "Margery Kempe and Her Models: The Role of the Authorial Voice." Mystics Quarterly 15 (1989): 75–85.
- Gold, Penny Schine. The Lady and the Virgin: Image, Attitude, and Experience in Twelfth-Century France. Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1985.
- Greenspan, Kate. "Autohagiography and Medieval Women's Spiritual Autobiography." In Gender and Text in the Middle Ages, edited by Jane Chance. University of Florida Press, 1996, pp. 216–236.
- Heffernan, Thomas J. Sacred Biography: Saints and Their Biographers in the Middle Ages. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1988.
- Heilbrun, Carolyn G. Writing a Woman's Life. New York: Ballantine Books, 1988.
- Hilary, Christine R. "The Confessio Tradition from Augustine to Chaucer." Dissertation, University of California–Berkeley, 1979.
- Joensen, Leyvoy. "The Flesh Made Word: Allegory in the Book of Margery Kempe." In Auto-Biographical Studies: a/b 6(2) 1991, 169–182.
- Johnson, Lynn Staley. "The Trope of the Scribe and the Question of Literary Authority in the Works of Julian of Norwich and Margery Kempe." Speculum 66 (1991): 820–838.
- Kieckhefer, Richard. Unquiet Souls: Fourteenth-Century Saints and Their Religious Milieu. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1984.
- Newman, Barbara. Sister of Wisdom: St. Hildegard's Theology of the Feminine. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1987.
- Nichols, John, and Lillian T. Shank, eds. Peaceweavers. Medieval Religious Women 2. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Cistercian Publications, 1987.
- O'Brien, Elmer. Varieties of Mystic Experience. New York and Toronto: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1964.
- Pascal, Roy. Design and Truth in Autobiography. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1960.
- Petroff, Elizabeth Alvilda. Medieval Women's Visionary Literature. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- Smith, Sidonie. A Poetics of Women's Autobiography. Bloomington, Ind.: Indiana University Press, 1987.
- Thi baux, Marcelle, trans. The Writing of Medieval Women. New York & London: Garland Publishing, 1987.
- Weinstein, Donald, and Rudolph M. Bell. Saints and Society: The Two Worlds of Western Christendom, 1000–1700. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1982.
- Weintraub, Karl. The Value of the Individual: Self and Circumstance in Autobiography. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1982.
- Wilson, Katharina M., ed. Medieval Women Writers. Athens, Ga.: University of Georgia Press, 1984.
- Wyschogrod, Edith. Saints and Postmodernism: Revisiting Moral Philosophy. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1990.

See also Angela of Foligno; Audience, Women as; Bible, Women in; Bride of Christ: Imagery; Caterina Vigri; Devotional Literature; Feminist Theories and Methodologies; Hagiography; Hildegard of Bingen;

Julian of Norwich; Kempe, Margery; Letter Writing; Mysticism and Mystics; Mystics' Writings; Sister-Books and Other Convent Chronicles

AVA

The last lines of a poem on the Last Judgement, transmitted in the twelfth century Vorau manuscript (Vorau Stiftsbibliothek, cod. 276), identify the author as a woman called Ava, the mother of two sons. It has been suggested that this Ava may be identical to a recluse whose death in 1127 is recorded in the annals of the monastery of Melk.

Her oeuvre consists of short religious poems. Two of these, the life of John the Baptist and an account of the life of Jesus, closely follow the gospel readings of the liturgical year and narrate events from the birth of John the Baptist to the resurrection. John is portrayed as the precursor of Christ; his birth marks the beginning of a new era in salvation history, and the epilogue recommends him as a powerful intercessor. The "Life of Jesus" concentrates on the events of Christ's life as recounted in the gospels, but it shows a marked predilection for dialogue scenes. In the miracle stories selected, women appear to play a prominent part, from the role of Mary at the wedding in Cana to the anointing of Jesus' feet, which is here attributed to Mary, the sister of Martha. The final section of the "Life of Jesus," a list of the seven gifts of the Holy Spirit, and two additional poems, the "Antichrist" and the "Last Judgement," complete the framework of salvation history that links all four poems.

While Ava addresses her audience in first-person plural forms, which highlight the effect of the narrated events for all Christians, she frequently refers to her work as a book, which may suggest that she was familiar with contemporary models of learned authorship.

ALMUT SUERBAUM

References and Further Reading

Ava, Ava's New Testament Narratives: When the Old Law Passed Away, trans. by James A. Rushing Jr. Kalamazoo, MI: Medieval Institute Publications, 2003.
Maurer, Friedrich, ed. Die Dichtungen der Frau Ava. Tübingen: Niemeyer, 1966.

See also Literature, German; Theology; Women Authors: German Texts

B

---

BAKE, ALIJT

Following a period during which she tried disparate forms of the spiritual life, Alijt Bake (1415–1455) chose, in 1440, the enclosed convent of canonesses at Galilea in Ghent. Galilea had only recently joined the Chapter of Windesheim, the monastic branch of the Devotio Moderna (Modern Devotion). Disappointed with the quality of the life of asceticism and virtue she encountered there, Bake was thrown into a deep spiritual crisis. But Christ Himself showed her the way in a vision on Ascension Day: she must remain at Galilea and from there bring about reforms of the monastic life.

Five years later Alijt Bake was elected prioress of Galilea, giving her the opportunity to put her plans for reform into action. Her own writings constitute the most important witness to this. Around 1446 the newly elected prioress wrote a number of treatises, which she intended to serve as testaments for her fellow sisters. The central theme of her teaching is most explicitly laid out in her treatise De vier kruiswegen (The Four Ways of the Cross), in which she argues for a radical emulation of the Suffering of Christ. Between 1451 and 1452 the prioress worked on a spiritual autobiography in two parts (of which the first part, the Boeck der tribulatie [Book of Tribulations], has been lost). In part two, Mijn beghin ende voortganck (My Beginning and Progress), she describes her spiritual path, a path that was certainly not without its trials. But in constant association with Christ, in visions and internal dialogues, she was able to shape her exceptional destiny.

Alijt Bake's last treatise carries the telling title Brief uit de ballingschap (Letter from Exile). In 1455, her life took a dramatic turn. By the authority of the administration of the Chapter of Windesheim, Bake was dismissed from her leadership position and banished. The Letter reveals that she had a serious clash of opinion with the administrators of Windesheim: Bake was a proponent of an interior life, based on a personal relationship with Christ. The Chapter of Windesheim held that women should limit themselves to external, visible forms of piety, such as obeying one's superiors or doing hard manual labor. At the same time, all nuns in the Windesheim monasteries were forbidden to write about their religious experiences. Alijt Bake died in 1455, at the age of 40.

WYBREN SCHEEPSMA

References and Further Reading

- Bollmann, Anne. "'Being a Woman of My Own': Alijt Bake (1415–1455) as Reformer of the Inner Self." In Seeing and Knowing: Women and Learning in Medieval Europe, 1200–1550, edited by Anneke B. Mulder-Bakker. Turnhout: Brepols, 2004, pp. 67–96.
- Dijk, Rudolf. Th. M. van. "De mystieke weg van Alijt Bake (1415–1455)." Ons geestelijk erf 66 (1992): 115–133.
- Lievens, Robrecht. "Alijt Bake van Utrecht (1415–1455)." Nederlands archief voor kerkgeschiedenis 42 (1958): 127–151.
- Ruh, Kurt. Geschichte der abendländische Mystik, vol. 4, Die niederländische Mystik des 14. bis 16. Jahrhunderts. München: C. H. Beck, 1999.
- Scheepsma, Wybren. Deemoeden devotie: De koorvrouwen van Windesheim en hun geschriften. Amsterdam: Prometheus, 1997.

- . “Mysticism and Modern Devotion: Alijt Bakes (1415–1455) Lessons in the Mystical Way of Living.” In Spirituality Renewed: Studies on the Significant Representatives of the Modern Devotion, edited by Hein Blommestijn, Charles Caspers, and Rijklof Hofman. Leuven: Peeters, 2003, pp. 157–167.
- . Medieval Religious Women in the Low Countries: The Modern Devotion, the Canonesses of Windesheim, and their Writings, translated by David F. Johnson. Woodbridge, Suffolk, England: The Boydell Press, 2004.
- . “‘Van die memorie der passien ons heren’ van Alijt Bake.” Ons geestelijk erf 68 (1994): 106–128.
- . “De trechter en de spin. Metaforen voor mystiek leiderschap van Alijt Bake.” Ons geestelijk erf 69 (1995): 222–234.
- Spaapen, B. “Middeleeuwse Passiemystiek, II. De vier kruiswegen van Alijt Bake.” Ons geestelijk erf 40 (1966): 5–64.
- . “Middeleeuwse Passiemystiek, III. De autobiografie van Alijt Bake.” Ons geestelijk erf 41 (1967): 209–301 and 321–350.
- . “Middeleeuwse Passiemystiek, IV. De brief uit de ballingschap.” Ons geestelijk erf 41 (1967): 351–367.
- . “Middeleeuwse Passiemystiek, V. De kloosteronderrichtingen van Alijt Bake, I De weg van de ezel.” Ons geestelijk erf 42 (1968): 5–32.
- . “De lessen van Palmzondag.” Ons geestelijk erf 42 (1968): 225–261.
- . “De louteringsnacht van de actie.” Ons geestelijk erf 42 (1968): 374–421.
- . “De weg der victorie.” Ons geestelijk erf 43 (1969): 270–304.

See also Asceticism; Canonesses; Modern Devotion; Devotional Literature; Flanders; Monasticism and Nuns; Mysticism and Mystics

BALLADS

Most medieval ballads are narrative tales characterized by simple language and meter and episodic plots that emphasize dialogue and action. Usually sung or recited, they offered a compressed storyline driven by heightened emotional tension, fast-paced action, or spectacular events to audiences of both men and women ranging throughout the social scale, many of them already familiar with the stories being told. Some ballads were clearly part of memorial culture, while others have closer ties to literary works, suggesting a pattern of composition and dissemination involving both oral and literary traditions. Particularly in cases of oral transmission, ballads are notoriously difficult to date, and the extant medieval ballads were for the most part recorded in the fifteenth century or later, in many instances a long time after they were first enjoyed. The content of early ballads most often comes from medieval romance and epic, offering tales of heroic or royal figures and their adventures. Other common subjects included family life or love and relationships, often with an emphasis on courtship, seduction, rape, adultery, pregnancy, or star-crossed lovers. Though they occasionally come out on top, women are frequently involved in situations that emphasize their vulnerability, and violence is common—at times the woman perpetrates it, but usually she is the excuse or the target for violence. Though women may exert a fair degree of agency, it is often with dire consequences.

The action of many domestic ballads suggests a need to contain femininity and assert masculine power. The motif of the “walled-up wife,” possibly of medieval origin, remains popular throughout the Balkans, with analogues in India. The variants involve the sacrifice of a woman who is immured alive or drowned in order to complete a building project that continually falls down or to fix a well that will not fill with water (Dundes 186–188, 190–192). Most often the woman is sacrificed by her husband or brothers, men who traditionally held power over medieval women’s lives. Women are equally powerless in tales involving forced or prohibited marriages, as in the Hungarian ballad “Kate Kádár,” thought by some scholars to originate in the late Middle Ages (Kadar 20). The ballad tells of how Martin Gyulai’s mother forbade him to marry Kate Kádár because of her low social status. When Martin insists, his mother has Kate drowned, whereupon Martin drowns himself (Kadar 30–36). The mother’s attempt to exercise power over her son is punished, but Kate’s fate also points to the particular precariousness of the unmarried woman’s position.

In the courtship story and its variations, women often play the role of love object, a figure of desirable sexuality to be obtained by men, with or without her consent. The woman may be in love with the hero, but equally a man may attempt to seduce or rape her when she refuses him. In medieval Castilian ballads, the rape of Muslim women serves as a way for Christian men to dominate Muslim men, and both Muslim and Jewish men talk and act submissively in response to the aggressive actions and language that define the masculinity of Christian men (Mirrer 49–50, 70–77). In many medieval Scandinavian ballads, the problem of rape is resolved by the death of the rapist (though in a few cases the woman marries him). Either the woman herself or her male relatives stab the man to death, or he is beheaded by the king or representatives of local justice (Jonsson et al. D145–93). These would seem to operate as cautionary tales—women were often warned not to go out where they could be seen by men, lest they be desired—that reveal the vulnerability of women in the medieval world.

In contrast, ballads involving outlaws or heroic figures focus, with very few exceptions, on male protagonists, paying little or no attention to women. In heroic ballads the hero surmounts impossible odds, and in most cases the focus is on fighting. Women, when present at all, serve as the motive for action (needing to be rescued or avenged) or as markers of status. Among the earliest English ballads are those of the outlaw Robin Hood. In these tales action centers on Robin's adventures, and Maid Marian is entirely absent from all but three ballads. Sometimes Robin defeats and kills those who set out to harm him, but more often he encounters and fights another man in the forest until the two become friends. Here, fighting serves as a way of bonding the two men in fellowship as they prove their worth by establishing themselves as equals. A figure like Marian would disrupt the focus on male interactions the ballads emphasize. In fact, "Robin Hood and Maid Marian," a late ballad and the only one to figure her prominently, places Marian in the position usually occupied by these male figures: disguised as a page, she wanders in search of Robin and ends up fighting him to a draw before they recognize one another. Other early modern ballads frequently featured cross-dressed women who succeeded in defying the strictures of society and parents to undertake adventures at sea or in war (Dugaw 31–42). But these were not the only ballads focused on women's lives in England during this period; cautionary antifeminist tales persisted in stories embellished from current events of women who were punished for crimes such as murdering their husbands or children.

DANA M. SYMONS

References and Further Reading

- Bennett, Philip E., and Richard Firth Green, eds. The Singer and the Scribe: European Ballad Traditions and European Ballad Cultures. Amsterdam: Rodopi, 2004.
- Child, Francis James. The English and Scottish Popular Ballads. 5 vols. New York: Dover Publications, 1965.
- Dugaw, Dianne. Warrior Women and Popular Balladry, 1650–1850. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989.
- Dundes, Alan. "The Ballad of 'The Walled-Up Wife.'" In The Walled-Up Wife: A Casebook, edited by Alan Dundes. Madison, Wis.: University of Wisconsin Press, 1996, pp. 185–204.
- Jonsson, Bengt R., et al. The Types of the Scandinavian Medieval Ballad: A Descriptive Catalogue. Oslo: Universitetsforlaget, 1978.
- Kadar, Marlene. "The Tragic Motif in the Ballad of 'Kata Kádár.'" Hungarian Studies Review 9(1) (1982): 19–38. [Includes a translation of the ballad.]
- Knight, Stephen, and Thomas Olgren. Robin Hood and Other Outlaw Tales. 2nd ed. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Medieval Institute Publications, 2000.
- Mirrer, Louise. Women, Jews, & Muslims in the Texts of Reconquest Castile. Ann Arbor, Mich.: University of Michigan Press, 1996.

See also Audience, Women in the; Courtship; Crime and Criminals; Cross-Dressing; Domestic Abuse; Infants and Infanticide; Marriage, Impediments to; Misogyny; Rape and Raptus; Sexuality, Regulation of; Singlewomen; Violence

BARBARIAN LAW CODES

The barbarian law codes are the written laws of the Germanic peoples who migrated to western Europe in late antiquity and the early medieval period. The barbarian laws, or leges barbarorum, were codified between the late fifth and ninth centuries CE. They were written in Latin, with the exception of the Old English laws. Many of the barbarian laws were part of the oral tradition before codification. The Germanic law codes were based on the principle of personality of law, which means that they applied to people of a certain group, not to people living in a certain area (territorial law).

The first Germanic tribes to settle in the former Roman Empire were the Visigoths (Spain), Ostrogoths (Italy), Burgundians (southeastern Gaul/France), and Franks (Gaul, Belgium, and Netherlands south of the Rhine). They were also the first to put their laws into writing. The leges Visigothorum (laws of the Visigoths) consist of a series of laws promulgated by Visigothic kings between the late fifth and early eighth centuries. The Lex Romana Visigothorum (LRV) or Breviarium Alarici (Alaric's Breviary) was issued by the Visigothic king Alaric II for his Roman subjects (506). It is a compendium of late Roman law, based chiefly on the Codex Theodosianus (438), a collection of fourth- and fifth-century imperial Roman law published by the Roman emperor Theodosius II. The LRV remained in use as a manual of Roman law throughout the Middle Ages. The compilations of Roman law issued by some Germanic kings are called leges romanae, 'Roman laws,' as opposed to the leges barbarorum.

The Burgundian law code, the Lex Burgundionum (also called Liber Constitutionum or Lex Gundobada), was devised in the early sixth century and influenced by Roman law. Its lex romana counterpart, the Lex Romana Burgundionum, contains Roman law for the Burgundian king's Gallo-Roman subjects and appeared in the same period. Also from the early sixth century is the Ostrogothic Edictum Theoderici, which was based primarily on Roman law and intended for both Ostrogoths and Romans. It was probably issued by king Theoderic the Great, but is often ascribed to the mid-fifth-century Visigothic king Theoderic II.

The laws of the Salian Franks, by far the most popular and influential Germanic codes, consist of the sixth-century Pactus Legis Salicae (PLS) and the eighth-century Lex Salica (LS). At least eighty manuscripts containing the various redactions of the PLS and LS have survived, including the ninth-century Lex Salica Karolina redactions. For dealings with their Roman subjects, the Frankish kings used the LRV. The term Lex Salica is also used to denote all the laws of the Salian Franks. The Lex Ribuaria (early seventh to eighth century) was based on various LS redactions and contains the laws of the Riparian Franks, a Frankish tribe from the vicinity of Cologne.

The earliest redaction of the laws of the Alamans (southwestern Germany, Alsace, Switzerland), the Pactus Legis Alamannorum, belongs to the early seventh century; the later redaction, the Lex Alamannorum, was compiled in the early eighth century. The Lex Baiuvariorum, the code of the Bavarians (southeastern Germany, Austria), was codified in the mid-eighth century. After the demise of the Ostrogothic kingdom in 554, the Lombards—also called Langobards—settled in northern and central Italy. Their laws, the Leges Langobardorum, were promulgated between 643 and 866; the oldest Lombard law is the Edictum Rothari (Rothari's Edict).

The latest barbarian codes written in Latin were compiled at the instigation of emperor Charlemagne for the four Germanic tribes living in the northernmost part of the Frankish empire (c. 802/803): the Lex Frisionum, Lex Saxonum, Lex Thuringorum, and Lex Francorum Chamavorum. They contain the laws of the Frisians (Frisia, northern Netherlands), Saxons (northwestern Germany), Thuringians (central Germany), and Chamavian Franks (between Utrecht, Netherlands and Münster, Dutch-German border).

The Salic, Alamannic, Bavarian, and Lombard laws all contain ancient legal terms in the regional vernacular (called Malberg glosses in Salic law). The Anglo-Saxon law codes were the first Germanic codes issued in the vernacular. Æthelberht's code, two other Kentish codes, and Ine's West Saxon law code were written in Old English in the late sixth and seventh centuries; the other Anglo-Saxon laws, including the laws of the West Saxon king Alfred, are from the ninth century. Only one translation of Germanic law is known, an East Franconian translation of the LS (c. 830), of which only a fragment has survived.

Germanic law is mainly concerned with settling disputes in an agricultural society. Disputes involving private law (inheritance, property, livestock, etc.) and criminal law (theft, injuries, murder, rape, etc.) were settled by paying a compensatory sum of money to the injured party in order to avoid a feud. The accused is allowed to provide proof of his innocence or his statement with the aid of oath-helpers; sometimes proof by an ordeal (for example, boiling water) is demanding. Characteristic of Germanic law are the injury tariffs with their detailed fines for personal injuries. For instance, PLS 29.4 awards fifty solidi for cutting off a freeman's thumb—a quarter of the full wergeld (Old English wergild) for an adult male, and sexual harassment (“touching a woman's breast”) must be compensated for with forty-five solidi (PLS 20.4). The compensation due for (fatal) injuries is linked to a person's wergeld, that is, the monetary value of a person's life. The amount of wergeld is related to a person's gender, age, and social status (free, half free, or slave). In Salic law the wergeld for a free woman who is capable of bearing children is six hundred solidi; for a woman in menopause or a young girl before menarche it is two hundred solidi (PLS 24.8, 24.9, 41.15). Women were legally represented by male relatives or their husbands (mundium). However, a woman could inherit and own property that her husband was not allowed to dispose of without her consent. Usually her property consisted of her marriage endowment, that is, the bride-price (pretium) paid by her future husband, her father's wedding gifts, and the “morning gift” she received from her husband on the morning after their wedding.

MARIANNE ELSAKKERS

References and Further Reading

- The standard editions of the Latin barbarian codes are published in the series Monumenta Germaniae Historica (MGH), Leges Nationum Germanicarum, vols. 1, 2.1, 3.2, 4.1, 4.2, 5.1, and 5.2 (Hannover: Hahn, 1892–1969), and in the older Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Leges, vols. 4–5 (Hannover: Hahn, 1863–1889). (See also: <http://www.dmgh.de>)
- Beck, Heinrich (ed.). Reallexikon der Germanischen Altertumskunde (RGA). 2nd ed. Berlin: De Gruyter, 1968.
- Bitel, Lisa M. Women in Early Medieval Europe, 400–1100. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002.
- Christie, Neil. The Lombards; the Ancient Longobards. In The Peoples of Europe. Oxford: Blackwell, 1995.
- Drew, Katherine Fischer. Law and Society in Early Medieval Europe: Studies in Legal History. London: Variorum Reprints, 1988.
- , ed. and trans. The Burgundian Code: the Book of Constitutions or Law of Gundobad; Additional Enactments. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1949. Reprint, 1992.
- , ed. and trans. The Lombard Laws. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1973.
- , ed. and trans. The Laws of the Salian Franks. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1991.
- Erler, A., E. Kaufmann, and W. Stammeler (ed.). Handwörterbuch zur Deutschen Rechtsgeschichte, 5 vols. Berlin: Schmidt, 1971–1998.
- Haenel, Gustav F. Lex Romana Visigothorum. Leipzig: Teubner, 1849. Reprint, Aalen: Scientia, 1962.
- Klinck, Anne. “Anglo-Saxon women and the law.” Journal of Medieval History 8 (1982): 107–121.

- Liebermann, Felix (ed.). Die Gesetze der Angelsachsen. 3 vols. Halle am Saale: Niemeyer, 1903–1916.
- Lutz, Liselotte (ed.). Lexikon des Mittelalters, 10 vols. München: Artemis Verlag, 1977–1999.
- McKitterick, Rosamond. The Carolingians and the Written Word. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989.
- Oliver, Lisi, ed. and trans. The Beginnings of English Law. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2002.
- Reuter, Timothy. Germany in the Early Middle Ages, c. 800–1056. London: Longman, 1991.
- Rivers, Theodore John, ed. and trans. Laws of the Alamans and Bavarians. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1977.
- , ed. and trans. Laws of the Salian and Riparian Franks. New York: AMS Press, 1986.
- Scott, S. P., ed. and trans. The Visigothic Code (Forum Judicum). Boston: The Boston Book Company, 1910. Reprint, Littleton, Colo.: Rothman & Co., 1980. (<http://libro.uca.edu/vcode/visigoths.htm>)
- Temporini, Hildegard (ed.). Aufstieg und Niedergang der Römische Welt: Geschichte und Kultur Roms im Spiegel der neueren Forschung. Berlin: De Gruyter, 1972.
- Wemple, Suzanne F. Women in Frankish Society; Marriage and the Cloister 500 to 900. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1981.
- Wolfram, Herwig. History of the Goths, translated by Thomas J. Dunlap. Revised edition. Berkeley, Calif.: University of California Press, 1990.
- Wood, Ian N. The Merovingian Kingdoms 450–751. London: Longman, 1994.
- Wormald, Patrick. The Making of English Law: King Alfred to the Twelfth Century. Vol. 1. Legislation and its Limits. Oxford: Blackwell, 1999.

See also Crime and Criminals; Frankish Lands; Germanic Lands; Iberia; Italy; Legal Agency; Migration and Mobility; Social Status; Wergild

BEAST EPIC

The medieval European beast epic, popular in the twelfth century, represented an allegorical genre that used animal figures to satirize the courtly values and mores of the aristocratic courts in France and the Germanic realm. The concepts of courtly love and romantic love played a major role in the themes of medieval narratives, and the animal epic arose as a vehicle of satire intended to cast the values of the aristocratic class in a humorous light. The beast epic has its roots in the fables of ancient Greece and Rome, and scholars have traced the earliest connections to Aesop's fables. Examples of beast epics written in Middle Latin include Ecbasis captivi (1140–1145) and Isengrimus (1148–1150). These two early works were written by Germanic priests and were intended to expose the corrupt lower clergy as well as the corrupt nobility. The earlier beast epics led to a specific form of twelfth-century fox and wolf verse narratives, and one of the most notable examples is the Old French Roman de Renart (between 1174 and 1205). It spawned several late medieval adaptations, created in the Dutch and Flemish region. These included the late-twelfth-century variants Van den vos Renaerde and Reinaerts Historie, as well as the verse epic Reinke de vos. In addition to the Dutch/Flemish works, an obscure Middle High German poet, Heinrich der Glichezare, produced a version of the fox epic, Reinhart Fuchs (c. 1189/1190).

The main themes in the medieval fox and wolf epics depict a series of confrontations between the fox and the wolf and his wife, the she-wolf Hersant, who are all masquerading as mock courtly figures. Hersant represents a courtly lady who is subsequently raped by the fox, who appears as a scoundrel and criminal. The ideals of courtly love, chivalry, honor, and justice are depicted in a satirical light, meant to ridicule the nobility's lack of morals, the justice system, and the Church.

Early research in the nineteenth century on beast epics in general and on the fox and wolf epics specifically concerned itself with studies of different manuscripts as sources for the literary material. Different versions of manuscripts were juxtaposed linguistically and thematically, and the comparative studies examined how Germanic versions related historically to the Middle Latin or Old French predecessors.

Subsequent scholarship in the first third of the twentieth century focused on comparing animal fabliaux in European countries and interpreting the techniques used in the different narratives for depicting human and societal foibles. For example, the Flemish/Dutch epics were compared thematically with the Old French Roman de Renart. Twelfth-century law and justice were examined in light of the legal processes in both France and Germanic Alsace, particularly in light of the rape trial of the fox. These studies illustrate an initial questioning of the sex roles depicted by the rapist fox, the cuckolded husband wolf, and the rape victim, Hersant.

From the late 1970s onward, the scholarship concentrated on specific themes in beast epics vis-à-vis fox and wolf tales, such as examining the individual characters in the narratives for their meaning. As an example, the figure of the lion king in the fox and wolf epics has been highlighted as the representation of either a corrupt or a weak secular leader. Scholars produced in-depth studies on the relationship between fox and wolf figures and how they relate to the female wolf figure from a sexual viewpoint.

In the 1990s, critical studies of the beast epic have centered on specific thematic interpretations of the events and characters. One examination looks at the entire legal system of justice and the application of law during the Germanic Staufer regime (in the twelfth-century Alsatian region) as depicted in the Reinhart

Fuchs epic. In particular, Hersant's rape trial is dissected in light of the legal context of twelfth-century Germanic Alsace. Historical legal sources are compared to the events and main characters in the trial proceedings to show how Reinhart Fuchs, in particular, represents a scathing satire of the system of justice in that era.

In 1997, the fox and wolf epic Reinhart Fuchs was reinterpreted using a gendered reading. The issues of courtly love, marriage, family, adultery, and rape became the focal points of this study, which casts a new light on how the main animal characters interact in gender roles. Future research calls for similar gendered reinterpretations of other beast epics like Roman de Renart and its European variants in the Flemish/Dutch region and Iberia.

IRMELI S. KUEHNEL

References and Further Reading

- Baesecke, Georg. "Heinrich der Glichezare." In Zeitschrift für Deutsche Philologie 52 (1927): 1–22.
- Best, Thomas W. Reynard the Fox. Boston: Twayne Publishers, 1983.
- Bloch, R. Howard. Medieval French Literature and Law. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1977.
- Colledge, Eric. "Introduction." In Reynard the Fox and Other Medieval Netherlands Secular Literature. London: Sythoff Leyden/Heinemann, 1967, pp. 7–52.
- Jauss, Hans Robert. Untersuchungen zur mittelalterlichen Tierdichtung (Examinations of Medieval Animal Narratives). Tübingen: Max Niemeyer Verlag, 1959.
- Kuehnel, Irmeli S. Reinhart Fuchs: A Gendered Reading. Göttingen: Kümmerle Verlag, 1997.
- Robertson, Sharon Short. "Those Beastly People: A Study of Human Beings in Animal Epics." In Le Roman de Renard: On the Beast Epic, edited by Adrian. Vaan den Hoven and Haijo Westra. Canadian Journal of Netherlandic Studies Special Issue, (1983): 63–68.
- Terry, Patricia, ed. Renard the Fox. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1992.
- Wehrli, Max. "Vom Sinn des mittelalterlichen Tierepos." In German Life and Letters. N. S. 10 (1956/1957): 219–228.
- Widmaier, Sigrid. Das Recht im "Reinhart Fuchs". Berlin: Walther de Gruyter, 1993.

See also Chaucer, Geoffrey; Courtly Love; Crime and Criminals; Fabliau; Honor and Reputation; Law, Customary: French; Law, German; Literature, German; Literature, Old French; Obscenity; Rape and Raptus

BEATRICE

Beatrice is a major figure in two works by Dante (1265–1321), the Vita Nuova and the Divine Comedy. She is cast as the inspiration for the love lyrics Dante cites in the Vita Nuova, and for the journey to a vision of God he undertakes in the Comedy. The name, meaning "one who blesses," may have been chosen for that reason or because it was the name of a woman Dante knew in Florence (Beatrice Portinari was identified by early commentators). In that name, Dante may also have been evoking several women important in Italian history: Beatrice, "duke" of Lorraine and countess of Tuscany, mother of Matilda of Tuscany, empress Beatrice, wife of Frederick I and mother of Henry VI, and particularly Beatrice of Savoy, mother of the four queens Dante mentions in Paradise VI, the youngest of them also a Beatrice, heir to Provence, and, as the wife of Charles of Anjou, queen of Sicily; among the several other Beatrices in the Savoy family were Beatrice dei Fieschi and the Beatrice who married Manfredi, son of Frederick II.

The Beatrice of the Vita Nuova dies in the middle of the story Dante constructs around his lyrics; the loss leads him to see a spiritual purpose in her life and his love. He leaves off the story of the Vita Nuova determined to find a more suitable mode to honor her, which he apparently finds in the Comedy. There she is the messenger of the Virgin Mary, sent from heaven to summon the classical poet Virgil to guide Dante on a journey through history, morality, and politics in Hell and Purgatory.

At the top of Purgatory, in the Earthly Paradise, Beatrice arrives to guide Dante the rest of the way to a vision of the Trinity. When she meets Dante she plays the role of a priest, confessing and absolving him. As she guides him through Paradise, she also teaches him theology, correcting him and major theologians along the way.

JOAN M. FERRANTE

References and Further Reading

- Boccaccio, Giovanni. The Life of Dante, translated by Vincenzo Llettino. New York and London: Garland Publishing, 1990.
- Ferrante, Joan M. Dante's Beatrice: Priest of an Androgynous God. Binghamton, N.Y.: MRTS, 1992.
- Harrison, Robert P. The Body of Beatrice. Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins University Press, 1988.
- Holmes, Olivia. "Dante's Two Beloveds: Ethics as Erotic Choice." Annali d'Italianistica 19 (2001): 25–50.
- Scott, John. "Dante's Admiral." Italian Studies 27 (1972): 28.
- Singleton, Charles S. Dante Studies 2: Journey to Beatrice. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1958.

See also Dante Alighieri; Literature, Italian

BEATRICE OF NAZARETH

Beatrice (c. 1200–1268) (also known as Beatrice of Tienen) was born at Tienen, near Leuven, the youngest of six children in a bourgeois family. She died in the Cistercian cloister of Nazareth, at Lier in the vicinity of Antwerp, where she had been prioress since 1237.

According to a Latin biography, Vita Beatrice (The Life of Beatrice), written after her death by an anonymous cleric, presumably around 1275, Beatrice received a thorough education. When she was seven, she was sent to live with a community of Beguines at Zoutleuven and was taught the liberal arts in a coeducational school for a year and later at the Cistercian monastery of Bloemendaal (or Florival). After she was allowed to make her profession as a nun in 1216, she continued her education at the Cistercian community of Rameia, where she studied manuscript production, especially of liturgical choir books. Thus fully educated, by the standards of her time, she, in 1218, helped found a new monastery, Maagdendaal, near her hometown. From 1221 she was back in Bloemendaal, where, in 1225, she was consecrated a virgin (the ritual taking place when a nun or a monk, after the novitiate, takes her or his monastic vows). Finally, in 1235, Bloemendaal sent her to help found a new daughter community, Nazareth, for which she copied choir books. Apart from being a copyist, Beatrice also functioned as teacher (officio magistrali), instructing in the “mysteries of the holy Scripture” (VB III, 230).

The biographer or hagiographer claims to have built his information on Beatrice’s own vernacular diary-notes (cedulae), which she had kept secret until shortly before her death (VB, prologue). The fact that these notes (which seem to have been reflections on the Christological and Trinitarian mysteries rather than recollections of events in the community and society) are lost has given rise to much speculation. One likely theory is that these vernacular notes were disposed of around the year of 1275 in order to avoid accusations from inquisitors in a period when mulieres religiosae (religious women) were especially under suspicion from the church institution for their vernacular expositions on “the mysteries of Scripture which are scarcely accessible to experts in divine writings,” according to Gilbert of Tournai.

Besides the diary notes, supplemented with information from those who had known Beatrice, the biographer incorporated his Latinized version of a vernacular treatise that Beatrice had also written: De septem modis sancti amoris. In 1926 Reypens succeeded in identifying a Middle Flemish manuscript as being her original, vernacular text: Seven manieren van heiliger minnen (Seven Manners of Holy Love), placed in a collection of sermons, Limburgsche Sermonen, from the fourteenth century. The vernacular treatise, the date of which we cannot determine, shows even more than the vita the depth of her theology. It shifts focus from the Christological and Trinitarian mysteries of the cedulae to Minne (love), rendering a brief and clear description of the growth of a personal love of God in line with the love theology of Bernard of Clairvaux. Beatrice describes seven different manieren (ways, not grades) of loving God in the interaction of the soul’s movements between purifying love (I), unselfishness of love (II), painful desire (III), infusion of love (IV), stormy or vehement (the term orwoed, a vehement storm or fire, that is also employed by Hadewijch and Ruusbroec) love (V), triumphant love (VI), and the desire for eternal love (VII).

There is a considerable difference between the hagiographer’s version, where bodily elements are recurrently stressed, and Beatrice’s own treatise, where the spiritual desire to be united with God is the focus. Whereas the vita is an exemplum depicting Beatrice as an exemplary, holy woman, Beatrice’s own treatise is a systematic rendition of the lived faith of a contemplative woman. Her vernacular theology reflects the interrelation between self-knowledge and knowledge of God characteristic of Bernard’s teaching, and she usually conveys her theology dialectically, which also applies to her thorough explication of the range and polarities of holy love. Propounding a theology of love, her focus is on the creation and recreation of the individual’s godlikeness (Genesis 1:26–27) much more than on sin, and it is her conviction that she has been created by a loving God in his image and likeness. It should be noted that, whereas she follows tradition in her understanding of earthly life as an exile from the godlikeness for which humanity was created, Beatrice never refers to the biblical narrations on Adam and Eve. Perhaps because of her gender, both her theology and her understanding of humanity are formulated in the dialectic between God and humanity, not between man and woman.

ELSE MARIE WIBERG PEDERSEN

References and Further Reading

- De Ganck, R. The Life of Beatrice of Nazareth. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Cistercian Publications, 1991.
- . Beatrice of Nazareth in her Context. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Cistercian Publications, 1991.
- . Towards Unification with God: Beatrice of Nazareth in her Context, Part Three. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Cistercian Publications, 1991.
- Pedersen, E. M. W. “Image of God—Image of Mary—Image of Woman: On the Theology and Spirituality of Beatrice of Nazareth.” Cistercian Studies Quarterly 29 (1994): 209–220.
- . “The In-Carnation of Beatrice of Nazareth’s Theology.” In New Trends in Feminine Spirituality: The Holy Women of Liège and Their Impact, edited by Juliette

BEATRICE OF NAZARETH

Dor, Lesley Johnson, and Jocelyn Wogan-Browne. Brepols, 1999, pp. 61–79.

See also Beguines; Cistercian Order; Education, Monastic; Flanders; Hadewijch; Monasticism and Nuns; Theology

BEAUFORT, MARGARET

Margaret Beaufort (1443–1509) was descended from John of Gaunt, third son of Edward III of England, and his mistress (later third wife) Catherine Swynford. Beaufort was a key figure in the Tudor succession to the throne. Her father, John Beaufort, duke of Somerset, died in 1444, when his daughter was an infant. She was a ward of William de la Pole, Duke of Suffolk, who arranged her marriage to his son John. Upon the duke's death, the marriage was dissolved, and Margaret was married, on the initiative of King Henry VI, to his half-brother Edmund Tudor in 1453. Edmund died of the plague in 1456 while his young bride was pregnant with their son, Henry "Lord Richmond." Richmond was raised by others much of the time, but Margaret and her son remained close throughout their lives.

Margaret married Sir Henry Stafford in 1458, and through him she tried to promote the interests of her son during the reign of Edward IV. A marriage between Henry and Edward's oldest daughter, Elizabeth of York, was proposed as one means of reconciling Henry, a Lancastrian by descent through his mother, with the Yorkist king. Following Stafford's death in 1471, Margaret married Thomas Lord Stanley (d. 1504). With the death of Edward IV and the usurpation of the throne by Richard III in 1483, Margaret took an active role in conspiracies against the new king. At one time she was confined under her husband's care by Richard's command.

The victory of Henry of Richmond at Bosworth Field in 1485 was aided by the Stanleys. This promoted their interest, but Margaret attained even higher status as the mother of King Henry VII and the source of his claim to the throne. Henry also fulfilled her original intention by marrying Elizabeth of York. Margaret Beaufort took a vow of chastity and set herself up as feme sole, thus separating herself somewhat from Thomas Stanley, although he continued to visit her.

Lady Margaret became powerful in the land, collecting revenues and estates and pursuing legal claims to debts, even those owed her by servants; she also executed justice on her son's behalf, especially in Lincolnshire and the Midlands. Margaret Beaufort outlived her son by a few months, overseeing the execution of his will and the coronation of her grandson, Henry VIII. Margaret died in 1509 and was buried in Westminster Abbey with a tomb image executed by Pietro Torrigiano.

Apart from her assiduous promotion of the Tudor dynasty, Margaret Beaufort was a generous patron of piety and learning. She lived a devout but not overly austere life. Among her achievements was her own English translation, from a French version, of book four of The Imitation of Christ. She also commissioned a translation of the first three books from the Latin. These translations were published with Lady Margaret's patronage, as were other early printed books. Margaret Beaufort also supported the English universities, founding professorships of theology at Oxford and Cambridge. Guided by her confessor, John Fisher, she particularly enriched Cambridge University. She helped transform God's House into Christ's College. This was in part a memorial to Henry VI, a patron of that establishment, whom the Tudors tried to have canonized. Lady Margaret intended another foundation, turning St. John's Hospital into a college. This intention was not fulfilled until John Fisher secured papal support to protect the college from both royal and private claims on the Beaufort estate. These benefactions, combined with Margaret Beaufort's shrewd use of power, made her a formidable figure in early Tudor England.

THOMAS IZBICKI

References and Further Reading

Jones, Michael K., and Malcolm G. Underwood. The King's Mother: Lady Margaret Beaufort, Countess of Richmond and Derby. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1992.

See also Feme Sole; Noble Women; Patronage, Ecclesiastical; Universities; Wardship

BEAUTY

Colour and light formed the foundations of medieval beauty. Clarity and vividness were associated with the divine but also with the things of this world, including human beauty. Ideals of male and female beauty were also dependent on age and social status.

From the twelfth century onwards, authors (including Chrétien de Troyes, Marie de France, Gottfried von Strassburg, and the authors of the Welsh Mabinogion) offer detailed accounts of female beauty. Matthew of Vendôme (c. 1175) and Geoffrey of Vinsauf (early thirteenth century) prescribe the chief elements: golden hair, curving dark eyebrows, gleaming white skin, rosy cheeks, delicate nose, sparkling grey or blue eyes, small red mouth, long white throat, sloping shoulders, long slender arms and fingers, small high breasts, a tiny waist, a rounded belly, long graceful legs, and dainty feet. Authors generally avoid describing female buttocks, hips, and genitals (“here the imagination speaks better than the tongue,” says Geoffrey of Vinsauf), but visual representations of female nudes often show curving hips and hairless genitals. A slender silhouette is admired, though a rounded, thrust-forward belly is common in visual arts by the fourteenth century and is indicative not of pregnancy but of admiration for an S-bend posture. The female nude is not yet established as a dominant mode of representing the feminine ideal: nudity is reserved for Eve, personifications of luxuria, and the bodies of the saved and the damned. The beautiful female body is generally the clothed or “sartorial body,” and poetic descriptions often linger over clothing and ornaments. Luminescence could thus be achieved through dress and jewels as well as complexion, while cosmetic procedures for plucking foreheads and eyebrows and obtaining white skin and teeth and blonde hair were described in medical texts, although condemned by moralizing authors. A handful of contemporary letters indicate that the slender ideal had appeal in life as well as in art. Although feminine beauty was heavily standardized, some room for variation was possible. The Virgin Mary, St. Katherine, Mary Magdalene, and courtly heroines occasionally have brown or auburn hair. The fourteenth-century Franciscan missionary Odoric of Pordenone describes the women of southern China as the most beautiful in the world, yet they can hardly have conformed to the poetic ideal.

Beautiful men were almost indistinguishable from women. Twelfth-century homoerotic poetry describes boys with wavy hair, ivory necks, sparkling eyes, blooming cheeks, lily-like flesh, perfect noses, red lips, and lovely teeth. Their beauty is said to fade as quickly as their youth. Other such works eschew androgyny in celebrating large penises. Examples of beautiful youths are found in non-homoerotic works too, including the Mabinogion and Gottfried’s Tristan. Chrétien’s lovers Cligés and Fenice “were both so fair that their beauty gave forth a ray which brightened the hall just like the sun,” yet fifteen-year-old Cligés (with hair “like fine gold” and a face “like a freshly opened rose”) is not entirely androgynous. “He has the wood as well as the bark,” knowing about swordsmanship, archery, hawks, and dogs. By this metaphor, men had “the bark” of youth and beauty but also “the wood” of strength and valour, maturing to the handsomeness of middle age. This conforms with medieval models of the “ages of man” in which adolescentia was celebrated as a period of youthful beauty, energy, and romantic love, but middle age, with its peak of physical and mental strength, was the perfect age of man. Depictions of Christ in majesty represent a man in perfect age (solemn, kingly, bearded), where the Virgin Mary maintains the youthful maidenly state of woman’s perfect age.

Texts as diverse as The Song of Roland and Norse sagas emphasize the size and strength of heroic men. Descriptions of actual kings sometimes mirror these themes. Einhard’s description of Charlemagne highlights the Emperor’s height, breadth, impressive bearing, and cheerful countenance. More than 600 years later, English, Italian, and French observers agreed that the English king Edward IV was “very princely to behold, of visage lovely, of body mighty, strongly and clean made.” Just as men were allowed to go beyond the youthful ideal which limited the aesthetic appeal of women, so were they freed from the requirement of slenderness: both Charlemagne and Edward IV were excused their middle-aged corpulence.

In sum, the slim, white-skinned, small-breasted, radiantly luminous woman was by necessity also young, preferably virginal or pre-maternal, and of high social status. The ideal man was of equal nobility, yet could go beyond beauty to achieve a strength and stature to match his worldly authority.

KIM M. PHILLIPS

References and Further Reading

- Boswell, John. Christianity, Social Tolerance and Homosexuality: Gay People in Western Europe from the Beginning of the Christian Era to the Fourteenth Century. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1980.
- Burns, E. Jane. Courtly Love Undressed: Reading Through Clothes in Medieval French Culture. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2002.
- Chrétien de Troyes. Arthurian Romances, translated by D. D. R. Owen. London: Dent, 1987.
- Eco, Umberto. Art and Beauty in the Middle Ages, translated by Hugh Bredin. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1986.
- Eco, Umberto, ed. On Beauty: A History of a Western Idea, translated by Alastair McEwen. London: Secker and Warburg, 2004.
- Einhard. “The Life of Charlemagne.” In Two Lives of Charlemagne, translated by Lewis Thorpe. Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1969.
- Gantz, Jeffrey, trans. The Mabinogion. Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1976.
- Geoffrey of Vinsauf. “The Poetria Nova.” In The Poetria Nova and its Sources in Early Rhetorical Doctrine, edited and translated by Ernest Gallo. The Hague: Mouton, 1971.
- Gottfried von Strassburg. Tristan, translated by A. T. Hatto. Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1960.

BEAUTY

- Heller, Sarah-Grace. "Light as Glamour: The Luminescent Ideal of Beauty in The Romance of the Rose." Speculum 76(4) (2001): 934–959.
- Marie de France. The Lais of Marie de France, translated by Glyn S. Burgess and Keith Busby. Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1986.
- Matthew of Vendôme. The Art of Versification, translated by Aubrey E. Galyon. Ames: Iowa State University Press, 1980.
- Odoric of Pordenone. The Travels of Friar Odoric, translated by Henry Yule. Grand Rapids, Mich.: Eerdmans, 2002.
- Owen, D. D. R., trans. The Song of Roland. Woodbridge, Suffolk, England: Boydell Press, 1990.
- Phillips, Kim M. "Maidenhood as the Perfect Age of Woman's Life." In Young Medieval Women, edited by Katherine J. Lewis, Noël James Menuge, and Kim M. Phillips. New York: St Martin's Press, 1999, pp. 1–24.
- Ross, Charles. Edward IV. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1997.
- Schultz, James A. "Bodies That Don't Matter: Heterosexuality Before Heterosexuality in Gottfried's Tristan." In Sexualities in History: A Reader, edited by Kim M. Phillips and Barry Reay. New York: Routledge, 2002, pp. 71–89.
- Sekules, Veronica. "Women and Art in England in the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Centuries." In Age of Chivalry: Art in Plantagenet England 1200–1400, edited by Jonathan Alexander and Paul Binski. London: Royal Academy of Arts, in association with Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1987, pp. 41–48.
- Udry, Susan. "Robert de Blois and Geoffrey de la Tour Landry on Feminine Beauty: Two Late Medieval French Conduct Books for Women." Essays in Medieval Studies: Proceedings of the Illinois Medieval Association 19 (2002): 90–102.

See also Art, Representations of Women in; Body, Visual Representations of; Clothing; Cosmetics; Courtly Love; Eroticism in Art; Eroticism in Literature; Femininity and Masculinity; Gender in Art; Portrait Medals

BEGUINES

Beguines were lay women who lived a religious life alone or in communities but did not take solemn religious vows and were not considered nuns by the Catholic Church. Originating in the Low Countries (present-day Belgium and the Netherlands) around the year 1200, their movement spread to most parts of western Europe in the following decades. Although their way of life and activities were often a source of controversy, Beguine communities continued to exist in what is now Belgium and the Netherlands until very recently.

The Beguine movement had its roots in the religious and social changes that marked the high Middle Ages. While the Gregorian reform of the eleventh and early twelfth centuries attempted to strengthen church institutions and elevate the moral and spiritual authority of the priesthood, growing urbanization and the rise of a money economy generated new questions about Christian life in an evolving world, where attitudes toward wealth, poverty, and, more globally, traditional power structures seemed in need of revision. Lay people, now better educated and more literate, were interested in participating in these debates but found relatively few outlets within existing Church structures to do so. This was particularly true for women, who could not be ordained and whose work as nuns received scant recognition. The various heretical movements that developed in northwestern Europe in the High Middle Ages gave voice to such demands, yet they also testified to the growing intransigence of Church institutions in the face of dissent.

At the turn of the thirteenth century, a growing number of lay women in various towns of the Low Countries began to practice a new, informal religious lifestyle, either alone or with a few companions, within the confines of their family homes, at anchorholds, or at urban hospitals. Some of these women drew the attention of clerical admirers like James of Vitry and Thomas of Cantimpré, who regarded them as saintly role models and contributed an extensive hagiographical literature on the early Beguines. From these and other sources, we can identify four leading figures. Yvette (or Juetta) of Huy, an eighteen-year-old widowed mother of three, around 1181 began to devote her life to the care of lepers. Ten years later, she withdrew to an anchorhold, where she lived for thirty-six years until her death in 1228. Marie of Oignies, like Yvette, entered an arranged marriage at a young age (she was probably fourteen) but soon afterward agreed with her husband to lead a chaste life; from about 1191 onward she and her husband served lepers at the leprosarium of Willambroux, just outside Nivelles. Around 1207 Marie moved to Oignies, where until her death in 1213 she lived as a recluse close to the monastery of St. Nicolas, a house of regular canons. In Liège, a certain Odilia, also a widow, chose a life of chastity while remaining "in the world" around 1203; after her death in 1220, her son John continued her work by supporting other women who followed in her footsteps. The fourth inspirational leader was Jutta of Borgloon, an anchoress, who around 1200 guided Christina the Astonishing, Lutgard of Aywières, and possibly many others toward spiritual perfection. All of these women lived in the diocese of Liège, in the southeastern Low Countries, and were probably in touch with one another, but it is not at all certain that they coordinated their actions. The sources further suggest that, while these women were quite extraordinary because of their charisma, their visionary experiences, and (with the exception of Jutta) the support they received from influential clerics of the region, they were in fact only the most prominent among many women who around 1200 advocated the “semi-religious” life in the diocese of Liège and in other parts of the southern Low Countries but who have remained anonymous. It is therefore problematic and misleading to attribute the foundation of Beguine life to a single or even a few individuals.

By the 1230s these religious women (mulieres religiosae, as they were commonly called in contemporary Latin sources) began to organize themselves locally into more formal communities, “beguinages,” acquiring common property and constructing their own chapels, houses for individual or communal life, and hospitals for the care of elderly Beguines and other women (the male counterparts of the Beguines, called “beghards,” far less numerous than the women, were never affiliated with beguinages). These communities were often simple gatherings of up to a dozen or more women living in one or two houses, called Beguine “convents,” whose members attended services in local parish churches. In the Low Countries (rarely elsewhere), Beguine communities could also take the form of “court beguinages” (curtes beguinarum), enclosed compounds of Beguine houses and convents, usually arranged around a central “Beguine” church, with hospitals and service buildings of all kinds close by. Such beguinages tended to be served by specially appointed priests who ministered to the Beguines in their own church but resided in homes just outside the compound. The latter type of Beguine community is first attested to in Aachen (1230), Cambrai (1233), Leuven and Ghent (1234), Namur (1235), and Valenciennes (1239). They became more numerous in the 1240s and 1250s, especially in the populous cities of Flanders and Brabant, where they constituted same-sex neighborhoods, some of which were quite large: Mechelen’s beguinage of St. Catherine’s probably housed about 1500 Beguines in the early sixteenth century. (In 1998, thirteen court beguinages that still survive in Flemish cities were placed on Unesco’s “World Heritage List.”) In the southern Low Countries alone, more than 300 Beguine communities of both types can be attested to before the mid-sixteenth century. The movement spread to the northern Low Countries; to northern France, including Paris; to the areas along the Rhine (with numerous communities in Cologne and Strasbourg) as far south as the Lake Constance region; to most of Germany, Switzerland, and parts of Bohemia; and even to the region of Marseilles in the south of France, where Douceline of Digne directed a small cluster of Beguine houses comparable to those of the Low Countries.

Members of Beguine communities made a vow of celibacy and obedience to the beguinage’s rule and to its superior (the “mistress”), but usually not a vow of poverty: in fact, Beguines were expected to provide for themselves through work or income from their personal property, unless they were elderly or sickly. If a Beguine left the community (which she was allowed to do at any time), she could take her property with her, but would lose any investment she had made in the collective fund of the beguinage. Although Beguines did not adhere to the traditional monastic standard prescribing individual poverty, they quite clearly posited the ideal of a simple life that shunned material wealth and encouraged active charity to those in need, both within the Beguine community and in the larger urban world. The Vitae of such Beguines as Marie of Oignies, Ida of Nivelles, Ida of Leuven, and Margaret of Ypres (who all lived in the first half of the thirteenth century) often denounce the urban money economy and emphasize the virtue of manual labor and charitable works. Although some Beguines of a noble or urban upper-class background were quite wealthy, most of them, drawn from the lower strata of rural and urban society, earned only a modest living at the bottom ranks of the textile industry or as nurses and maids in hospitals and leprosaries.

Such concrete engagement with social problems should not obscure the fact that Beguines to a considerable degree withdrew from the world and often rejected conventional social roles for women. Many women joined a beguinage because they did not want to get married, or simply sought protection in an urban environment that was often dangerous for single women. They were also known to have helped women who wished to flee from an arranged or abusive marriage. Others, perhaps fewer in number, became Beguines because they did not have the kind of wealth or social status that would have gained them entry into traditional nunneries, or because they regarded themselves as poorly suited for life as a nun, which by the thirteenth century had become more strictly regulated. For those with a religious vocation, the rather informal Beguine existence allowed them to combine the active and contemplative life in new and creative ways. But whatever her reasons for joining may have been, the medieval Beguine devoted considerable time to daily prayer, both alone and in communal services, and to the exploration of a more profound religiosity through conversations with her peers.

Beguine spirituality was firmly centered on the contemplation of divine love. In its simplest form, it expressed itself in a devotion to the Eucharist, to Christ’s Passion, and to the Virgin Mary. Juliana of Mont-Cornillon and Eve of St. Martin, respectively a Beguine and anchoress at Liège, instituted the feast of Corpus Christi in the 1240s; many Beguines expressed a particular desire to receive the Eucharist as often as possible, or gained miraculous sustenance from it throughout their ascetic life. Meditation on the Passion story and on Mary's role often led to the desire to follow in Christ's footsteps by experiencing His pain (for instance, Marie of Oignies and Elisabeth of Spalbeek were said to have displayed the Stigmata) or the Virgin Mary's Sorrows. In its more complex manifestations, Beguine reflection on the love of God inspired a mystical spirituality usually called "bridal mysticism" or "courtly mysticism." It was much inspired by twelfth-century monastic writings on the nuptial relationship between the soul and God as allegorized in the Song of Songs, and by the courtly love ideals of secular literature of the same period. Yet it often added other layers or themes: intricate contemplation of the mystery of the Trinity, the possibilities of deification, and, in a few cases, the supremacy of perfect love of God over other means of salvation. The "mystical" approach to knowing God necessarily became part of Beguine teaching, both orally and written, using vernacular languages rather than Latin. For that reason, the work of such early Beguines as Hadewijch and Mechthild of Magdeburg, to name only the better known authors, is often viewed as an important contribution to the rise of a "vernacular theology" in the thirteenth century.

The Beguines' penchant for mystical exploration of the divine drew skeptical and sometimes hostile reactions from different quarters. University-trained theologians tended to dismiss much of it as irrational or ill-advised, while Church officials had reservations about the Beguines' teaching activities, which sometimes resembled preaching (normally forbidden to women) or included the translation of Scripture into the vernacular, which always raised the possibility of heretical interpretation. The fact that some Beguines criticized immoral priests naturally antagonized members of the clergy.

The name Beguine demonstrates this suspicion. First given in its Latin form (beggina or beguina) in sources from around 1220, it was a pejorative term intended to cast doubts about Beguine orthodoxy. Although historians long thought that the word was derived from the Latin term Albigenses, used to describe the Cathar heretics of southern France (after the city of Albi, an important Cathar center), it is now firmly established that beguina is related to the Indo-European root begg-, which means "to mumble," to speak indistinctly, hence dishonestly. Critics of the movement frequently accused Beguines of false piety; their teachings were thus not to be trusted, and their claims to special knowledge of the divine dangerously misleading. Although Pope Honorius III had informally approved of their lifestyle in 1216, and papal letters of protection were sent out to various Beguine communities from 1233 onward, these doubts persisted. By the end of the thirteenth century, individual Beguines were sometimes formally accused of heresy. Large-scale persecution of Beguines began in earnest after the condemnation and execution of the French Beguine Marguerite Porete, the author of The Mirror of Simple Souls, in 1310, followed by several decrees against recalcitrant Beguines issued by the Council of Vienne in 1311–1312.

Because Beguine communities functioned largely independently from one another—each community observing its own rule—and no formal relations existed among them, they did not mount a concerted defense against the charges. A sharp industrial contraction that initiated the late medieval economic crisis around 1300 further undermined their position, because many Beguines employed in the manufacturing of textiles found themselves unemployed. In the end, their fate depended much upon their standing in the local community. In most parts of western Europe, Beguine communities were either suppressed or converted into houses of Franciscan or Dominican tertiaries. In the Low Countries, many small Beguine convents were closed, but the large court beguinages were maintained, albeit under closer scrutiny, by ecclesiastical and secular authorities. Although new waves of persecution did occur occasionally in later centuries, Beguine life persisted into the early modern era (the seventeenth century saw a great revival of Beguine communities in the southern Low Countries), and even into the modern period. By the end of the twentieth century, however, their numbers were significantly reduced. In the early twenty-first century, only a few quite elderly Beguines are left.

WALTER SIMONS

References and Further Reading

- Dor, Juliette, Lesley Johnson, and Jocelyn Wogan-Browne, eds. New Trends in Feminine Spirituality: The Holy Women of Liège and Their Impact. Turnhout: Brepols, 1999.
- Galloway, Penelope. "'Discreet and Devout Maidens': Women's Involvement in Beguine Communities in Northern France, 1200–1500." In Medieval Women in Their Communities, edited by Diane Watt, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1997, pp. 92–115.
- Hollywood, Amy. The Soul as Virgin Wife: Mechthild of Magdeburg, Marguerite Porete, and Meister Eckhart. Notre Dame, Ind.: University of Notre Dame Press, 1995.
- Lerner, Robert. The Heresy of the Free Spirit in the Late Middle Ages. Notre Dame, Ind.: University of Notre Dame Press, 1972.
- Makowski, Elizabeth. A Pernicious Sort of Woman: Quasi-Religious Women and Canon Lawyers in the Later Middle Ages. Washington, D.C.: The Catholic University of America Press, 2005.

- McDonnell, Ernst. Beguines and Beghards in Medieval Culture, with Special Emphasis on the Belgian Scene. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1954.
- McGinn, Bernard. The Flowering of Mysticism: Men and Women in the New Mysticism (1200–1350). Vol. 3 of The Presence of God: A History of Western Christian Mysticism. New York: Crossroad, 1998.
- Mulder-Bakker, Anneke B. Lives of the Anchoresses: The Rise of the Urban Recluse in Medieval Europe, translated by Myra Meerspink Scholz. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2005.
- Murk-Jansen, Saskia. Brides in the Desert: The Spirituality of the Beguines. Maryknoll, N.Y.: Orbis Books, 1998.
- Simons, Walter. Cities of Ladies: Beguine Communities in the Medieval Low Countries, 1200–1565. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001.
- . “‘Staining the Speech of Things Divine’: The Uses of Literacy in Medieval Beguine Communities.” In The Voice of Silence: Women’s Literacy in a Men’s Church, edited by Thérèse de Hemptinne and Maria Eugenia Góngora. Turnhout: Brepols, 2004, pp. 85–110.
- Wehrli-Johns, Martina, and Claudia Opitz, eds. Fromme Frauen oder Ketzerinnen?: Leben und Verfolgung des Beginen im Mittelalter. Freiburg: Herder, 1998.
- Wilts, Hans. Beginen im Bodenseeraum. Sigmaringen: Jan Thorbecke Verlag, 1994.

See also Bride of Christ; Imagery; Church; Douceline of Digne; Education, Beguine; Flanders; Hadewijch; Heretics and Heresies; Laywomen, Religious; Marguerite Porete; Monasticism and Nuns; Mysticism and Mystics; Tertiaries

BELLE DAME SANS MERCI

The formidable Lady who refuses to accord her favour to any suitor originates in Alain Chartier’s best-known and most popular poem, La Belle Dame Sans Merci (1424). Composed in eight hundred octosyllabic lines, it consists of a debate between the Lady and an aspirant Lover that is overheard by the poet-narrator. Chartier presents in a mixed tone that is part courtly, part satirical the Lady’s rational skepticism as she cuts through the conventional courtly rhetoric of the Lover’s appeals. Her position is radical: eloquent and spirited, she does not resemble the silent, idealized, female love-object of earlier lyric poetry; her stance as an independent woman is unprecedented.

The poem provoked a long series of literary responses and imitations, beginning with letters of outrage said to be written by ladies and men of the court, to which Chartier penned an apology, L’Excusacion aux dames. Both the poet and his female character are criticized for alleged defamation of women through the portrait of the heartless Lady. A subsequent cycle of fictional, poetic responses put the Lady on trial before a series of increasingly complex courts of law. The allegation of antifeminine sentiment incorporated the Belle Dame controversy into the larger querelle des femmes, the late-medieval literary debate about women. The case of the Lady is taken up in her favour by Martin Le Franc’s Le Champion des dames (c. 1442); elsewhere, Chartier is recruited for the misogynists’ cause.

The debate continued into the sixteenth century. An English translation, now believed to be by Richard Ros, appeared c. 1526.

HELEN J. SWIFT

References and Further Reading

- Angelo, Gretchen. “A Most Uncourtly Lady: The Testimony of the Belle Dame Sans Mercy.” Exemplaria 15(1) (2003): 133–157.
- Cayley, Emma J. Debate and Dialogue: Alain Chartier in his Cultural Context. Oxford University Press, forthcoming.
- Chartier, Alain. Alain Chartier and the Quarrel of the “Belle Dame Sans Mercy,” edited and translated by Joan E. McRae. New York: Routledge, 2004.
- Chartier, Alain, Baudet Herenc, and Achille Caulier. Le Cycle de “La Belle Dame Sans Mercy,” edited and translated by David F. Hult and Joan E. McRae. Paris: Champion, 2003.
- Ros, Richard. “La Belle Dame Sans Mercy.” In The Complete Works of Geoffrey Chaucer, vol. 7 (supplement): Chaucerian and Other Pieces, edited by Walter W. Skeat. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1897, pp. 299–326.
- Solterer, Helen. The Master and Minerva: Disputing Women in French Medieval Culture. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1995, pp. 176–199.
- Swift, Helen J. “Alain Chartier and the Death of Lyric Language.” Acta Neophilologica 35(1–2) (2002): 57–65.

See also Courtly Love; Debate Literature; Defenses of Women; Literature: Old French; Misogyny

BEOWULF

Unlike most Old English literature, Beowulf presents a heroic world, set in fifth-century pagan Scandinavia; however, its manuscript, inscribed in the late tenth or early eleventh century, places it in a Christian intellectual context. About one-third of Beowulf narrates events concerning female characters, depicting powerful women who influence their society through speech and gesture, who through their marriages are meant to make peace between warring peoples, and who defend the rights of their sons, as well as women whose “masculine” violence needs to be tamed. Whether composed orally near the time of its setting or written at the time of the manuscript’s creation, the fact that it does not show the serial monogamy and at least occasional polygyny practiced by high-status males in Anglo-Saxon England and other Germanic and Frankish regions suggests a fictive “conversion” of the heroic world to something more acceptable to the clerics who produced manuscripts.

Wealththeow, wife to Hrothgar, the king of the Danes, exemplifies powers considered proper to noble women. Described as “wise in words,” she is one of the major figures who evaluates Beowulf’s claim that he will slay the marauding Grendel (lines 613–642). She contributes to order in the hall, as, “gold adorned,” she carries the ceremonial drinking cup from king to older retainers, then younger, then guests. Wealththeow argues against Hrothgar’s desire to take Beowulf “as a son” after his victory over Grendel, asserting the rights of her own sons, and she herself negotiates with Beowulf by bestowing gifts (1168–1232). Hygd, wife to Hygelac, the king of Beowulf’s people, the Geats, resembles her in demeanor and success in carrying out her queenly duties.

The limitations imposed by gender emerge in interspersed stories about problematic women and marriages. The marriage of Hildeburh, a Danish queen of the Frisians, dissolves in violence when the two peoples cannot keep peace in a single hall, and Beowulf predicts a similar bloody end for the planned marriage of Wealththeow’s daughter. While these stories indicate the frequent futility of “peaceweaver” marriages, “though the bride be good” (2031), other stories show inappropriately violent women. Hygd is contrasted with a “foreign queen” who “criminally” executed anyone who stared at her (1931–1940), until she married the “spear-bold” Offa and bore a son who was “helpfully . . . skillful in violence” (1949–1962), his proper violence confirming the gendering of her impropriety. Whether “mind-force” (mod-pryðo) is her name or a quality she wields (1931), her story suggests a desire to contain such force. In Grendel’s mother, we see an aglæcwif (female fearsome assailant) who avenges her son’s death, killing Hrothgar’s favorite retainer. The poet depicts Beowulf’s battle with her in sexual terms—an underwater cave, male and female bodies grappling, the male warrior’s sword failing him, an ancient, “giantish” sword melting upon cutting off her head. Possibly a contest of the masculine against a more primal feminine or an enactment of the symbolic element of culture emerging from the semiotic (see Hala), the episode suggests the cultural vitality of the contest over violence, power, and gender; that God “grants victory” to the male warrior, rays of sun marking his blessing (1553–1556, 1570–1572), indicates the ecclesiastical bias of the manuscript culture.

CAROL BRAUN PASTERNAK

References and Further Reading

Damico, Helen. Beowulf’s Wealththeow and the Valkyrie Tradition. Madison, Wis.: University of Wisconsin Press, 1984.

- Hala, James. “The Parturition of Poetry and the Birthing of Culture: The Ides Aglæcwif and Beowulf.” Exemplaria 10(1) (1998): 29–50.
- Ingham, Patricia Clare. “From Kinship to Kingship: Mourning, Gender, and Anglo-Saxon Community.” In Grief and Gender: 700–1700, edited by Jennifer C. Vaught and Lynne Dickson Bruckner. New York: Palgrave-Macmillan, 2003.
- Jack, George, ed. Beowulf: A Student Edition. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1994, pp. 17–31.
- Liuzza, R. M., trans. Beowulf: A New Verse Translation. Orchard Park, N.Y.: Broadview Literary Texts, 2000.
- Olsen, Alexandra Hennessey. “Gender Roles.” In A Beowulf Handbook, edited by Robert E. Bjork and John D. Niles. Lincoln, Neb.: University of Nebraska Press, 1997, pp. 311–324.
- Overing, Gillian R. Language, Sign, and Gender in Beowulf. Carbondale, Ill.: Southern Illinois University Press, 1990.
- Shippey, Tom. “Wicked Queens and Cousin Strategies in Beowulf and Elsewhere.” The Heroic Age 5 (2001). <http://www.mun.ca/mst/heroicage/issues/5/toc.html>. (Accessed August 2005.)

See also Diplomacy and Reconciliation; England; Femininity and Masculinity; Frankish Lands; Gender Ideologies; Kinship; Marriage, Christian; Literature, Old English; Literature, Old Norse; Mead-Giver; Noble Women; Paganism; Queens and Empresses; The West; Scandinavia; Violence; Virile Women

BERENGUELA

Berenguela (1180–1246), princess of Castile and queen of León, was the eldest child of the Castilian king Alfonso VIII and his wife Leonor (Eleanor) Plantagenet. Castilian custom ordained that Berenguela would inherit the throne of Castile if none of her brothers survived. In 1198 Berenguela married her father’s cousin Alfonso IX of León, in an effort to bring peace to the two kingdoms. Pope Innocent III forced the consanguineous couple to separate in 1203, but not before they had had five children: Leonor, Fernando, Berenguela, Constanza, and Alfonso. Berenguela returned to Castile; in 1214, she became the regent for her brother, Enrique I. Berenguela lost the regency, however, to the nobleman Alvaro de Lara, and civil war ensued. In 1217, Enrique was accidentally killed. Berenguela, declining the throne for herself, installed her son as King Fernando III; she ruled with him until her death. She arranged his marriages, and also the marriages and clerical careers of her other children and grandchildren, always promoting the interest of Castile. She arbitrated Fernando’s peaceful accession to the throne of León, thus uniting the two kingdoms. Berenguela counseled her son regarding his crusades in al-Andalus, and ruled Castile-León in his absences. Berenguela was a powerful noble in her own right, possessing a number of territories and castles in Castile and León, and in the family tradition was a special patron of the Cistercian Order. She died in November 1246, and was buried, legend has it, in a plain tomb at the royal abbey of Las Huelgas in Burgos.

MIRIAM SHADIS

References and Further Reading

- O'Callaghan, Joseph F. A History of Medieval Spain. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1975.
- , trans. The Latin Chronicle of the Kings of Castile. Tempe, Ariz.: Arizona Center for Medieval and Renaissance Studies, 2002.
- Shadis, Miriam. "Berenguela of Castile's Political Motherhood: the Management of Sexuality, Marriage and Succession." In Medieval Mothering, edited by Bonnie Wheeler and John Carmi Parsons. New York: Garland, 1996, pp. 335–358.
- . "Piety, Politics and Power: The Patronage of Leonor of England and Her Daughters Berenguela of León and Blanche of Castile." In The Cultural Patronage of Medieval Women, edited by June Hall McCash. Athens, Ga.: University of Georgia Press, 1996, pp. 202–227.

See also Blanche of Castille; Cistercian Order; Iberia; Queens and Empresses: The West; Regents and Queen-Lieutenants; Succession

BESTIAIRE D'AMOUR

See Réponse du Bestiaire d'Amour

BETROTHALS

Throughout the Middle Ages, creating a marriage was a long process that began with discussion between two families and ended with consummation. Betrothals represented the first official step of this process, as they concluded the marriage negotiations, announced the upcoming wedding, and ensured the realization of the alliance.

Early in the Middle Ages, betrothals existed in both the Roman and the Germanic traditions, albeit in two very different forms. In Roman law, a marriage was announced by the sponsalia, an engagement between the spouses. Often contracted many years before the wedding, this promise could be broken, and the betrothed could part before their union was formalized. The German version of the betrothal, the desponsatio, was much more binding. This first irrevocable step created a matrimonium initiatum (initiated marriage); during the ceremony, the bridegroom received authority over his future wife and, in return, delivered the bride price. The traditio puellae (transfer of the girl) followed later, as the woman was handed over to her husband and the marriage consummated. This Germanic two-step marriage was the dominant model throughout much of the early Middle Ages, with betrothals occupying a central place in the matrimonial process.

During the twelfth century, when the rules of marriage were becoming set in theology and canon law, Peter Lombard (c. 1100–1160) imposed the Roman sponsalia as the ecclesiastical form of the betrothals. These verba de futuro (words of the future) were simply the announcement of the marriage and could be dissolved as long as consummation had not taken place. Only the verba de presenti (words of the present) exchanged in church on the day of the wedding created a lasting marriage. In the eyes of the Church, betrothals were no longer essential and could be broken for serious motives such as a subsequent marriage, religious vows, dementia, prolonged delay, or fornication with one of the betrothed's relatives. While the Church recommended the adoption of its betrothal rites, such as a priestly blessing, these were no more necessary than the betrothals themselves.

Although canon law reduced the role of betrothals in favor of the wedding ceremony, medieval society continued to view them as an integral part of the creation of a valid union. Medieval documents rarely made the distinction between verba de futuro and verba de presenti, between a betrothal and a wedding. It appears that the two exchanges of consent were equally important steps of the matrimonial process, and that betrothals were as binding as a legal marriage.

The betrothals' importance is primarily linked to their role in the conclusion of the marriage negotiations. They concretely signaled that the talks had led to an agreement. During these negotiations—which were sometimes conducted in person and sometimes undertaken through representatives such as masters, lords, older family members, or, in the case of the aristocracy, embassies—families expressed their wishes and concerns regarding the alliance. With the betrothals, they expressed their satisfaction with the agreement and officially gave their son or daughter in marriage. On the day of the betrothals, the negotiations were sealed by a marriage contract that was signed by members of the two families and which dealt with all material and financial considerations and, in particular, with the crucial question of the dowry.

Considering the importance of the negotiations and of the marriage contract, the betrothals were very much a family affair. The parents' involvement varied with social class. Among the lower classes, the union was frequently the result of cooperation between parents and children; among the higher classes, families generally dictated the path to follow. At all levels, however, a good marriage was always supervised by parents, sometimes by masters and lords, and was based on economic and political considerations rather than on sentimental choices. Very often, the betrothed met for the first time on the day of their engagement, and their only role in the consent process was to acquiesce to their parents' decision.

BETROTHALS

Betrothals created a new alliance through an exchange of consents, officially between the future spouses but, in reality, between the families of the spouses. This event was surrounded by a number of rites, which varied socially and geographically. The betrothed pledged their truths (in old English, their troth, from which the word betrothal originates) through oral or written words, through exchanges of gifts, rings, or coins, which acted as tokens of the agreement, and through the joining of hands or the seal of a kiss. These various gestures symbolized the creation of a bond between them. In some areas, such as northern France, a Church ceremony accompanied the family celebrations; elsewhere, as in northern Italy, the procedure remained private, centered around the signature on a contract before a notary. Usually, a shared meal (a sumptuous feast among the nobility) accompanied betrothals. Whether private or public, these celebrations served to officially announce the agreement and the upcoming marriage.

Weeks, sometimes years, later, betrothals were followed by the wedding ceremony and by consummation, which concluded the marriage process. Much time could elapse between the two steps, especially if the betrothed were young, far apart, or in need of money for a dowry, qualifications for a trade, or land to support a family. When many years separated the two events, betrothals truly played their role: as a promise and pledge to marry, they ensured that the marriage agreement would be upheld. In a society where honor and the given word were of the utmost importance, betrothals were instrumental in ensuring that the wedding would take place. Although they were optional according to canon law, in reality a betrothal was an important event that could be revoked only exceptionally and with great difficulty. Most church courts would have rather imposed the completion of a marriage initiated by a public betrothal than applied canon law and allowed couples to renounce their word and break their promise. In the eyes of society, betrothals were a binding step in the marriage process, a proof that the marriage was on solid ground and approved by all, family and spouses alike.

GENEVIÈVE RIBORDY

References and Further Reading

- Brundage, James A. Sex, Law and Marriage in the Middle Ages. Aldershot: Variorum, 1993.
- Gaudemet, Jean. Le mariage en Occident: Les mœurs et le droit. Paris: Cerf, 1987.
- Gottlieb, Beatrice. The Family in the Western World from the Black Death to the Industrial Age. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1993.
- Klapisch-Zuber, Christiane. Women, Family and Ritual in Renaissance Italy. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1985.
- Ribordy, Geneviève. "Les fiançailles dans le rituel matrimonial de la noblesse française à la fin du Moyen Âge: tradition laïque ou création ecclésiastique?" Revue historique 303(4) (2001): 885–911.
- Rousseau, C. M., and J. T. Rosenthal, eds. Women, Marriage, and Family in Medieval Christendom. Essays in Memory of Michael M. Sheehan. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Medieval Institute Publications, 1998.

See also Children, Betrothal and Marriage of; Courtship; Dowry and Other Marriage Gifts; Family; Law, Canon; Marriage, Christian; Sexuality; Sex in Marriage; Weddings

BIBLE, WOMEN IN

The Old Testament is foundational for both Jews and Christians, while the New Testament is the other key text for Christians. Within these Scriptures, women are participants in the covenant with God and often active in salvation history. The human person, whether male or female, has moral autonomy and accountability (for example, Adam and Eve; Ananias and Sapphira, Acts 5:1–11).

The soul, in relation to God, is often imaged as a woman and her beloved (for example, in the Song of Songs). The community in relation to God is likewise personified as female, both positively, as the faithful bride and fruitful spouse (for example, Isa. 9:1, Jer. 4:14, and Ezek. 16:8–14), and also negatively, as when the community acts idolatrously, as a prostitute or adulteress (Hos. 1–3). For Christians, these personifications culminate in the images of the Whore of Babylon as companion of the anti-Christ (Rev. 17), whose reign is brief, and the church (Ecclesia, a feminine noun) as the Bride of the Lamb, the reign of which is eternal (Rev. 21:9–14, 22:17).

The masculine generic is used throughout the Bible. Significantly, the biblical writers perceived it as inclusive. For instance, in the history of Susanna, the language of Psalm 118, one of the Beatus vir psalms ("Blessed is the man. . .") is used to praise the woman Susanna (Dan. 13:35); and the Mosaic law's punishment for perjury against one's "brother" and "neighbor" (Exod. 20:16, Deut. 5:20, 19:18–21) is applied to the perjurers against her (Dan. 13:61). In the New Testament, the Beatitudes are expressed in the masculine generic and are clearly universal. This generic use continues in church practice. For instance, in Byzantium, the two Sundays before Christmas celebrate the Holy Ancestors of Christ and the righteous of the Old Testament, both male and female.

A trait of Semitic narrative is sparseness. Often persons are referred to by their roles rather than their names, particularly if they admirably fulfill that role, as do the Magi, or if they abysmally fail to do so, as does Potiphar's wife. Adele Reinhartz has shown that, compared to men, women are more frequently named in scripture. Although all priests are men, as are most prophets, judges, and rulers, Huldah and Anna are prophetesses, Deborah is a judge, and Sheba is ruled by a queen.

Mothers are involved in the education of their children in Scripture (Prov. 31, written by a queen; 4 Macc. 16:21–23, 18:12–14; Dan. 13:3). Though comments on schooling are rare, the education of a woman, Susanna, is emphasized (Dan. 13:3). Origen, Jerome, and Abelard drew on this passage to affirm that parents have a responsibility to educate their daughters as well as their sons. A medieval Jewish midrash presents Rebecca taking her sons to school.

Jesus emphasizes the spiritual equality of women. He converses with, heals, forgives, and teaches both men and women. As a result of Jesus' example, from the earliest days of Christianity women received the sacraments of baptism, anointing, and the Eucharist. Christ's parables and prophecies often include paired examples, and his example led to the balanced representation of the sexes in Christian preaching and art. A vivid example is the choir in the Minster in Ulm (1469–1474). Each half has carvings of several saints, male on the Gospel side and female, including twenty biblical women, on the Epistle side. A pastoral interest in providing each believer with a same-sex model at key points in life is seen in the medieval communion prayers, which cite the centurion and the woman with the ointment; in prayers for catechumens, which cite Abraham and Susanna, and in scriptures read during anointings, which cite the paralytic and Peter's mother-in-law.

A Christian innovation was to interpret biblical women, as well as men, as prefigurations of Christ. The Gospels, for example, present Susanna as a type of Christ by using her history as the narrative template for the Passion narratives. This new interpretation of women expressed the recognition that "women are equally capable with men of becoming holy" (the topic of a sermon by Clement of Alexandria). Other types of Christ include Jephthah's daughter, Judith, Esther, the widow of Zarephath, Jairus' daughter, the woman in the parable who finds the lost coin, and perhaps Mary Magdalene. At least once, the Jews interpreted Ruth as a type of the Messiah.

For the Jews Esther had considerable importance. Each year, as Christians read Esther's history during Lent, Jews read it during Purim. The antithesis of Esther is the daughter of Herodias, traditionally called Salome. Both Esther and Salome use their beauty to elicit a rash promise from a ruler, but Esther does so heroically at the risk of death in order to save the entire Jewish people from death, while Salome does so vindictively at no risk in order to put John the Baptist to death.

In the Eucharistic celebration, women's words are commemorated through the scripture readings and in hymns. In the East from the ninth century onwards, Martha's profession of faith (John 11:27) is focal in the prayer of the faithful recited before receiving communion. Miriam's song at the crossing of the Red Sea (Exod. 15:20–23) is sung at Vespers on Holy Saturday. Ephrem the Syrian and Jacob of Saruq praise her in hymns influential in the West (Hunt, par. 6).

Women's words are sung in both Gregorian and Byzantine chant. The words of Mary the Mother of God and of Elizabeth became independent prayers and hymns (Magnificat, Hail Mary). Annually, or even several times a year, the words of Martha of Bethany, the Samaritan woman, the Canaanite woman, and, from the Old Testament, Judith, Esther, Sarah, and Susanna are sung. The parable of the Ten Virgins (Matt. 25:1–13) became a liturgical play in Germany. Eastern hymnody often presents Eve, raised with Adam at Christ's Resurrection, as the herald of salvation; Eve is therefore sometimes designated "apostle."

Of key importance are the women present at Christ's tomb: Mary Magdalene, Joanna, Mary the mother of James, and Salome, the wife of Zebedee, and others. Several hymns focus on the angel's commission to these women to announce the Resurrection to the disciples, and Eastern church decoration frequently depicts their meeting with the angel at the tomb and Mary's encounter with the risen Christ. Gospel manuscripts and pilgrimage art also depict these events. The first liturgical drama in the West developed from the Easter dialogue between Mary Magdalene and the angel at the tomb. Legal texts cite these women to demonstrate the value of female witnesses.

For their roles in evangelizing, Mary Magdalene, Photina (lit. "enlightened woman," the woman at the well), Mariamne (the sister of Philip), and Junia (Rom. 16:7) are designated "Equal to the Apostles." The cycle of the Church year includes Sunday feasts named for the Samaritan woman (who was credited with evangelizing Carthage) and for the women at the tomb. Hymns by Romanos the Melode, Ephrem the Syrian, Kassia the nun, and others, as well as commentaries by Thomas Aquinas and others, praise these women.

The Byzantine East used the Septuagint, with Theodotion for the Book of Daniel. The biblical text for the medieval West was the Latin Vulgate. Significant losses affecting women in Scripture occurred when Luther redefined the biblical canon to imitate that of the Jews: Judith, Susanna, and the heroic mother of the Maccabees disappeared entirely, and Esther's Christ-like prayer was removed.

CATHERINE TKACZ

References and Further Reading

- Hunt, Hannah M. "The Tears of the Sinful Woman: A Theology of Redemption in the Homilies of St. Ephraim and His Followers." Hugoye: Journal of Syriac Studies 1(2) (1998). <http://syrcom.cua.edu/Hugoye/Vol1No2/HV1N2Hunt.html>.
- Menn, Esther M. "No Ordinary Lament: Relecture and Identity of the Distressed in Psalm 22." Harvard Theological Review 93(4) (2000): 301–341.
- Ranft, Patricia. Women and Spiritual Equality in Christian Tradition. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1998.
- Reinhartz, Adele. "Why Ask My Name?": Anonymity and Identity in Biblical Narrative. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Tkacz, Catherine Brown. "Singing Women's Words as Sacramental Mimesis." Recherches de Théologie et Philosophie Médiévales 70(2) (2003): 275–328.

See also Eve; Judith; Mary and Martha; Mary Magdalene; Mary, Virgin; Typology and Women

BIRGITTA OF SWEDEN

Birgitta Birgersdotter (also known as Bridget) of Sweden (1302/1303–1373) was a prolific visionary writer, controversial moral reformer, founder of the Order of the Holy Savior (the Birgittine Order), and the only woman canonized in the fourteenth century. She was born into a powerful family in Uppland that was distantly related to the ruling Folkung dynasty. In 1316 Birgitta married Ulf Gudmarsson (d. c. 1344), who served as a judge in the province of Närke and a member of the king's council. During her marriage, she gave birth to eight children and oversaw a large estate. According to her hagiographers, she was a pious wife who encouraged her husband's spiritual progress, instructed her children in religious matters, cultivated ascetic practices, and cared for the poor and sick. Birgitta also served in the royal court as an advisor to the Queen of Sweden, following the marriage in 1335 of King Magnus Eriksson to Blanche of Namur.

In the mid-1340s Birgitta was transformed from an aristocratic wife and mother to a visionary reformer and monastic founder. After undertaking a pilgrimage with her husband to Santiago de Compostela, and being widowed shortly thereafter, she reportedly heard a divine voice speaking to her from a bright cloud, calling her to become Christ's bride and channel of the Holy Spirit. For the remainder of her life, Birgitta transmitted over seven hundred visions, which she received in a trance-like state of ecstasy and presented as communications from God and other divine beings, including Christ, the Virgin Mary, and many saints. Four different clerics—Canon Mathias of Linköping, Prior Peter Olofsson of Alvastra, Master Peter Olofsson of Skänninge, and Alfonso Pecha of Jaén—served as scribes, translators, and editors of Birgitta's voluminous Revelations, which are filtered through uneven layers of editing. Although individual revelations sometimes correspond to specific political events and struggles in Birgitta's life, they generally proclaim God's imminent judgment on sinners and exhort corrupt political and ecclesiastical leaders to repent. They are characterized by vivid metaphors and corporeal imagery drawn from the Bible, nature, or domestic life; images of motherhood, clothing, and food are especially common.

After her husband's death, Birgitta resided periodically at the Cistercian monastery of Alvastra and participated in the life of the male religious community. She also traveled throughout Sweden, presenting messages harshly condemning the vices of Swedish aristocrats. Authenticated by an assembly of Swedish bishops, her early revelations circulated in written form and were also preached from the pulpit by priests. In 1346–1347 clerical supporters conveyed to an international audience her revelations proposing an end to the Hundred Years' War and exhorting the papacy in Avignon to return to Rome. During the latter half of the 1340s, Birgitta also received visions directing her to found a new religious order, dedicated to the Virgin Mary and intended primarily for women. The original house of the Birgittine Order was founded in Vadstena, and its first nuns and monks were officially consecrated in 1384.

In 1349 Birgitta moved permanently to Rome, in order to be present for the Jubilee Year of 1350, to seek approval for her monastic rule, and to work for the return of the papacy to the Eternal City. In Italy she adopted a quasi-monastic life along with her daughter Catherine (later venerated as a saint), traveled to shrines, and further established her reputation as a living conduit of divine revelation. Presented in her Revelations as God's chosen instrument and compared to the Hebrew prophets and the Virgin Mary, Birgitta offered advice to clerics and political leaders while recording messages about Christian practices, doctrines, and the spiritual conditions of the living and the dead. In 1372 Birgitta went on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, where she received visions about the life of Christ, including an influential vision of the Nativity. Following her death on July 23, 1373, her remains were transported to Vadstena, Sweden, where her grave and the monastery she founded became a popular destination for pilgrimages and site of many purported miracles.

Pope Boniface IX canonized Birgitta of Sweden in 1391, and her canonization was reconfirmed by John XXIII in 1415 and Martin V in 1419. Her authority was debated during her lifetime and after her death, particularly at the Council of Constance, where Jean Gerson questioned the authenticity of her claims to divine inspiration, and at the Council of Basel, where theologians examined extracts from her Revelations for heresy. Despite the controversies, manuscripts and printed editions of Birgitta's Revelations circulated widely for well over three hundred years in Latin and many vernacular languages.

CLAIRE L. SAHLIN

References and Further Reading

- Bridget of Sweden. Birgitta of Sweden: Life and Selected Revelations, edited by Marguerite Tjader Harris and translated by Albert Ryle Kezel. New York: Paulist Press, 1990.
- . The Revelations of St. Birgitta of Sweden, translated by Denis Searby. Introduction and notes by Bridget Morris. 4 vols. New York: Oxford University Press, 2005.
- . Corpus Reuelacionum sancte Birgitte (The Revelations of St. Bridget), edited by Sara Risberg. Riksarkivet. <http://www.ra.se/ra/diplomatariet/crb/>.
- Morris, Bridget. St. Birgitta of Sweden. Woodbridge: The Boydell Press, 1999.
- Morris, Bridget, and Veronica O'Mara, eds. The Translation of the Works of St. Birgitta of Sweden into the Medieval European Vernaculars. Turnhout: Brepols, 2000.
- Sahlin, Claire L. Birgitta of Sweden and the Voice of Prophecy. Woodbridge: The Boydell Press, 2001.

See also Birgittine Order; Bride of Christ: Imagery; Canonization of Saints; Gerson, Jean; Hagiography; Heretics and Heresy; Italy; Lay Piety; Mary, Virgin; Monastic Rules; Monasticism and Nuns; Noble Women; Pilgrims and Pilgrimage; Prophets; Scandinavia; Sermons and Preaching; Syon Abbey; Widows; Women Authors; Latin Texts

BIRGITTINE ORDER

The Order of the Most Holy Savior (Ordo Sanctissimi Salvatoris), commonly known as the Birgittine Order, was founded by Birgitta of Sweden (1302/1303–1373), who claimed to receive its detailed monastic Rule (the Regula Salvatoris) through divine revelation. Birgitta established the Order in honor of the Virgin Mary and primarily for women, while envisioning that the Order would include a unified community of women and men under the authority of an abbess. According to her richly symbolic vision, sixty nuns and twelve brothers would represent the disciples of the early Christian community, while priests would signify the apostles and the abbess would correspond to the Virgin Mary. Possibly inspired by the double monastery at Fontevraud in France, Birgitta intended for the sisters and brothers to inhabit the same enclosure, although their quarters were to remain physically separate. The nuns were to be strictly enclosed and contemplative, responsible for singing and reading a liturgical office in honor of the Virgin Mary, the Song of the Sisters (Cantus sororum). Birgitta's series of revelations in praise of Mary's exalted role in salvation history, the Word of the Angel (Sermo angelicus), forms the basis of the office, which is interwoven with hymns composed by Peter Olofsson of Skänninge (d. 1378), Birgitta's confessor and close companion. Birgitta also ordained that the nuns wear a distinctive headdress, a white crown with five evenly spaced red spots symbolizing Christ's five wounds and crown of thorns. The ordained male members of the Order, under the guidance of their leader, known as the confessor general, were entrusted with preaching and administering the sacraments to the laity who visited the convent church as well as ministering to the spiritual needs of the sisters by serving the Eucharist, hearing confession, and providing religious instruction.

The mother house of the Birgittine Order was established on the shores of Lake Vättern in Vadstena, Sweden, at the royal estate donated in 1346 by King Magnus Eriksson and Queen Blanche of Namur. During Birgitta's lifetime, while she resided in Rome seeking approval for her monastic rule, a group of women and men congregated in Vadstena in anticipation of the Order's official establishment. Birgitta may have hoped to enter the Order herself, but she died before returning to Sweden. In 1370 and 1378 Popes Urban V and Urban VI approved Birgitta's monastic house in Vadstena, her Rule with modifications, and the monastic Order. Although it was not Birgitta's intention, her Order was instituted under the Augustinian monastic Rule with the Birgittine Rule subordinated to it.

BIRGITTINE ORDER

In 1384 Vadstena Abbey was formally dedicated, and the first group of nuns, priests, and brothers was consecrated. Vadstena Abbey and its Gothic-style church, which Birgitta had designed and which housed her relics and those of her daughter Catherine, attracted throngs of pilgrims throughout the fifteenth century. Because of large donations, it became one of the most influential and wealthiest religious centers in late-medieval Scandinavia. The monastery held an extensive library of theological texts and sermon collections; approximately one-third of the manuscripts survive today. Its priests, whose sermons frequently quoted Birgitta's Revelations, became known for their prolific preaching, while the sisters were noted for their work as copyists and producers of ecclesiastical textiles.

The Birgittine Order quickly spread throughout Europe in the later Middle Ages, despite controversies in the fifteenth century concerning the right of monastic churches to grant certain indulgence privileges as well as the propriety of sisters and brothers living in one monastery under the authority of an abbess. Approximately twenty-five foundations were established by the end of the fifteenth century in Italy, Poland, Estonia, England, Denmark, Norway, Germany, Finland, and the Low Countries. Especially prominent among these monastic foundations was Syon Abbey in England, established at Twickenham by King Henry V in 1415 and still existing today, despite the Reformation, with an unbroken history. Recusant nuns from Syon Abbey went into exile in 1539 and again in 1559 until they returned to England in 1861. Like Vadstena, the abbey in Syon was known in the fifteenth century for its monastic library and preaching to pilgrims; its sisters were eager readers of vernacular religious texts.

During the reformations of the sixteenth century, many Birgittine monasteries were suppressed. The last brothers left Vadstena in 1550, and in 1595 the few remaining sisters took refuge with Birgittine nuns in Danzig, Poland, when Vadstena Abbey was closed. Today, the Birgittine Order exists in four different branches with houses not only throughout Europe, but also in Mexico, South America, India, the Philippines, the United States, Palestine, and Cuba.

CLAIRE L. SAHLIN

References and Further Reading

Bridget of Sweden. Opera minora 1: Regula Salvatoris (The Rule of the Savior), edited by Sten Eklund. Samlingar utgivna av Svenska fornskriftsällskapet, Ser. 2, vol. 8:1. Stockholm: Almqvist and Wiksell, 1975.

———. The Word of the Angel, translated by John E. Halborg. Toronto: Peregrina, 1996.

Cnattingius, Hans. Studies in the Order of St. Bridget of Sweden: The Crisis in the 1420s. Stockholm: Almqvist and Wiksell, 1963.

Morris, Bridget. St. Birgitta of Sweden. Woodbridge: The Boydell Press, 1999.

Nyberg, Tore. Birgittinische Klostergründungen des Mittelalters. Lund: C. W. K. Gleerup, 1965.

Zieman, Katherine. "Playing Doctor: St. Birgitta, Ritual Reading, and Ecclesiastical Authority." In Voices in Dialogue: Reading Women in the Middle Ages, edited by Linda Olson and Kathryn Kerby-Fulton. Notre Dame, Ind.: University of Notre Dame Press, 2005, pp. 307–334.

See also Abbesses; Birgitta of Sweden; Double Monasteries; England; Fontevraud, Abbey and Order of; Literacy and Reading; Vernacular; Mary, Virgin; Monastic Enclosure; Monastic Rules; Monasticism and Nuns; Monasticism, Women's: Papal Policy; Scandinavia; Sermons and Preaching; Syon Abbey

BLANCHE OF CASTILE

Blanche of Castile (1188–1252) was born to Alfonso VIII of Castile and Leonor of England and christened "Blanca." In 1200, Blanche was chosen by her maternal grandmother, Eleanor of Aquitaine, to marry Louis, the son of Philip Augustus of France. This arrangement resulted from a treaty between John of England (Blanche's uncle) and Philip Augustus. Blanche grew up with her young husband at the Parisian court. Her first child, born in 1205, died; ultimately Blanche had at least eleven children. Only Louis, Robert, Isabelle, Alphonse, and Charles survived to adulthood. Blanche also raised her nephew, the future Afonso III of Portugal. Although Blanche never returned to Castile, she corresponded with her family there, especially her sister, Berenguela of Castile.

In 1223, Blanche became queen of France when her husband succeeded to the throne as Louis VIII. Blanche's tenure as queen is obscure; she came into her own, however, after her husband's unexpected death in 1226. Louis's deathbed testament dictated that Blanche would be regent of the kingdom of France as well as guardian of their children. She immediately saw to the knighting and coronation of her young son Louis IX, and faced down the rebellious barons of France who opposed her regency. Although their discontent has often been ascribed to Blanche's gender and her origin as a Castilian, it was also likely that the barons opportunistically seized this unexpected weakness in the Capetian monarchy to advance their own interests. Over the next five years, Blanche secured her position by eliciting oaths of allegiance, handing out rewards, leading armies, razing and building castles (including the fortress still standing at Angers), and making treaties.

By 1234 she had pacified her most formidable opponent, Pierre Mauclerc, count of Brittany, and by 1235 had negotiated an important treaty with Henry III of England. Through personal negotiation she secured the allegiance of the young count of Champagne, Thibaud. This relationship inspired Thibaud's courtly love poetry addressed to the queen, and malicious gossip from other quarters. In 1231, conflict with the University of Paris provoked further lascivious doggerel about the queen. In her own time and since, Blanche's gender has attracted the attention of both her critics and her admirers: always in play is the idea that she somehow exceeded expectations of her sex.

Throughout her life, she worked to strengthen her son's power and authority. It is unclear when Blanche gave up her regency; historians assume it was in 1234, when Louis married Marguerite of Provence. Blanche's arrangement of Louis's marriage was part of a larger scheme to increase royal influence in the regions of Provence and Toulouse, a goal furthered by the marriages of Louis's brothers Alphonse and Charles to Jeanne of Toulouse and Beatrice of Provence, respectively.

Louis's assumption of full royal authority did not diminish Blanche's power: she worked closely and somewhat jealously with her son, overshadowing his wife Marguerite as queen of France. When, in 1248, Louis embarked on the Seventh Crusade, he named his mother as regent of France, despite her objections. Blanche, endowed with full royal powers, met this new challenge with the same determination, intelligence, and skill as before, raising money for the crusade, finishing many of Louis's projects, and stabilizing the government. It is noteworthy that, unlike her first regency, Blanche met with no opposition to her government in this period.

Deeply devout, Blanche taught her children (who included the future St. Louis and the Blessed Isabelle of France) to be profoundly pious. She worked closely with numerous churchmen, including popes, but she did not shy away from challenging the institutional church. Her conflict with the bishop of Beauvais epitomized several struggles in which Blanche successfully defended royal privilege against episcopal claims of jurisdiction.

Blanche of Castile was also an important patron, notably of the Cistercian Order, in the tradition of her natal family. Her foundations included the female abbeys of Notre-Dame la Royale (Maubuisson) and Notre-Dame du Lys. She also endowed the north transept window at Notre-Dame de Chartres. This window depicts the Virgin Mary enthroned with her son, surrounded by symbols of biblical, French, and Castilian power. It celebrates a major theme of Blanche's life, the power of a royal mother and her son.

Upon her deathbed, Blanche assumed the Cistercian habit; her body was buried at Maubuisson, and her heart at Notre-Dame du Lys. After her death in 1252, Blanche was widely mourned as a strong—even virile—ruler of France, and she is credited by historians with greatly strengthening the French monarchy and expanding the kingdom of France.

MIRIAM SHADIS

References and Further Reading

- Berger, Élie. Histoire de Blanche de Castille, reine de France. Paris: Thorin et Fils, 1895.
- Gronier-Prieur, Armande. L'abbaye Notre Dame du Lys à Dammarie-les-Lys. Verneuil-l'Étang, France: Amis des monuments et des sites de Seine-et-Marne, 1971.
- Jordan, William Chester. Louis IX and the Challenge of Crusade: A study in rulership. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1979.
- Kinder, Terryl N. "Blanche of Castile and the Cistercians." Commentarii Cistercienses 27(3,4) (1976): 161–188.
- Pernoud, Régine. Blanche of Castile, translated by Henry Noel. New York: Coward, McCann and Geoghegan, 1975.
- Shadis, Miriam. "Blanche of Castile and Facinger's 'Medieval Queenship': Reassessing the Argument." In Cape-tian Women, edited by Kathleen Nolan. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2003, pp. 137–161.

See also Berenguela; Cistercian Order; Eleanor of Aquitaine; France, Northern; Isabelle of France; Queens and Empresses: The West; Regents and Queen-Lieutenants; Virile Women; Widows

BLANCHEFLOR

See Floire and Blanche-flor

BOCCACCIO, GIOVANNI

The model of the Italian prose tradition and pre-eminent Latin humanist Giovanni Boccaccio (1313, Tuscany?–1375, Certaldo [Florence]) is the most enigmatic of Italy's Tre Corone (Dante, Petrarch, and Boccaccio). Boccaccio's works span almost fifty years and numerous literary genres, from lyric poetry in the Italian vernacular to enormous encyclopedic works written in Latin. In the impressive variety of Boccaccio's literary tapestry few patterns stand out as boldly as his purported interest in portraying women. While it is remarkable that Boccaccio often writes to a female audience, the sheer multiplicity of voices that Boccaccio layers around his texts makes any conclusive statement of Boccaccio's attitude toward women difficult, if not impossible, to deduce.

The figure of Fiammetta personifies Boccaccio's ambiguous relationship to the literary conventions characterizing women in his time. In Boccaccio's earliest works, Fiammetta takes a role similar to Dante's Beatrice or Petrarch's Laura: she is the source of poetic inspiration and is more idealized than a real woman. However, because Fiammetta was always more corporeal and sexually charged than either Beatrice or Laura, her character reveals Boccaccio's tendency towards parody of existing literary conventions. Boccaccio's most interesting early work, The Elegy of Lady Fiammetta, demonstrates his ability to thematize and parody gender conventions while never programming explicit criticism in the text. Fiammetta gives voice to the objectified woman of the lyric tradition of Dante and Petrarch, although Boccaccio portrays her as more overwrought than psychologically complex. It is typical of Boccaccio's authorial self-seclusion that his Fiammetta is less his own invention than a female version of the iconic figure of the scorned lover present in the classical and medieval traditions. Boccaccio's questioning of gender categories written into the poet/lover relationship developed by Dante and Petrarch is couched in the conventions of the tradition itself.

In the Decameron, Boccaccio's best known and most complex work, Fiammetta becomes one of a chorus of characters who tell stories (one hundred in all) that obsessively return to discourses that highlight the role of women. Recent years have produced numerous fruitful readings of the Decameron in terms of feminist and gender studies. It is emblematic of the inherent flexibility in Boccaccio's text that the conclusions of these studies have determined the Decameron to be both a revolutionary proto-feminist text and overwhelmingly misogynistic. The "Proem," the "Introduction," and many of the stories of the Decameron indeed give women both autonomy and the ability to profit from their ingenuity. Other stories, and the "Introduction to the Fourth Day," fall into conventional misogyny. The final story of the Decameron, Griselda, has famously left generations of readers in a state of confusion about male and female gender roles and their relationship to human virtue. The most convincing readings of the Decameron view Boccaccio as undercutting all social conventions, including gender, political, ecclesiastical, and so on, as he playfully destabilizes his society's retreat into conventional thinking in the wake of the Black Death. Thus Boccaccio's questioning of gender falls into a broader project of experimentation with rhetoric and genre. This reading also helps put Boccaccio's most troubling text, the vehemently misogynistic Corbaccio, into a credible literary context.

Although trying to tie Boccaccio down to one authorial stance on questions of gender is missing the point, it is important to note that Boccaccio wrote more about women than any of his contemporaries. Most of Boccaccio's early works have either a female protagonist or a strong female voice. In Boccaccio's later years (1355–1375) he produced mostly encyclopedic works in Latin, and one of these later works shows his continued interest in exploring questions of gender. His Famous Women follows the conventions of the classical biography of Plutarch and Suetonius and the humanist revival of that genre found in Petrarch and Boccaccio's own Fates of Illustrious Men. Boccaccio both imitates and subverts the generic conventions by not selecting the women to include in his catalogue based on classical or Christian virtues; rather, Boccaccio seems to qualify women's status on the same terms (political power, fame, or infamy) as classical biographies employed for men.

The balance of Boccaccio's literary works do not allow him to be classified as a proto-feminist, feminist, or misogynistic author. It is not that too little evidence exists to support a case. Instead, Boccaccio presents his reader with all possible perspectives so that she may arrive at her own decision. In this sense, Boccaccio does reveal himself to be a precociously modern writer. Boccaccio understood that his audience is gendered (and otherwise differentiated), and, as such, will necessarily play their own different games as readers.

JASON M. HOUSTON

References and Further Reading

- Boccaccio, Giovanni. The Decameron, translated by Mark Musa and Peter Bondanella. New York: Mentor, 1982.
- . The Elegy of Lady Fiammetta, edited and translated by Mariangela Causa-Steindler and Thomas Mauch. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press, 1990.
- . The Corbaccio, or the Labyrinth of Love, translated and edited by A. Cassell. Binghamton, N.Y.: Medieval and Renaissance Texts and Studies, 1993.
- . Tutte le opere di Giovanni Boccaccio, edited by V. Branca. 10 vols. Milan: Mondadori, 1964–1994.
- . Famous Women, edited and translated by Virginia Brown. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 2001.
- Barolini, Teodolina. "‘Le parole son femmine e i fatti sono maschi.’ Toward a Sexual Poetics of the Decameron (Decameron II 10).” Studi sul Boccaccio 21 (1993): 175–197.
- Hollander, Robert. Boccaccio's Two Venuses. New York: New York University Press, 1977.

- Marcus, Millicent. "Misogyny as Misreading: A Gloss on Decameron VIII, 7." Stanford Italian Review 4 (1984) 23–40.
- Migiel, Marilyn. A Rhetoric of the 'Decameron.' Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2003.
- Psaki, F. Regina. "Women in the 'Decameron.'" In Approaches to Teaching Boccaccio's 'Decameron', edited by James H. McGregor. New York: The Modern Language Association of America, 2000, pp. 79–86.
- Psaki, F. Regina, and C. Thomas Stillinger, eds. Boccaccio and Feminist Criticism. Annali d'Italianistica book series, forthcoming.
- Smarr, Janet Levarie. Boccaccio and Fiammetta: The Narrator as Lover. Urbana, Ill.: University of Illinois Press, 1986.

See also Beatrice; Constance; Dante Alighieri; Defenses of Women; Feminist Theories and Methodologies; Gender Ideologies; Griselda; Literature, Italian; Misogyny; Petrarch

BODY IN LITERATURE AND RELIGION

Disassociating gender traits from the biological body has long proven to be impossible, for beliefs about the body dovetail with notions of masculinity and femininity. In the Middle Ages, the female body was often believed to be the inverted mirror image of its male counterpart: both sexes possessed the same physical characteristics, but men had sufficient vital heat to expel their genitals from within, whereas women's reproductive organs remained hidden from view. Because of this difference in heat, medical theory held that women's bodies were less perfect than those of men. The female body was associated with passivity, softness, and weakness, all traits justified by physical sexual differences. At the same time, the body also ensured that women had important functions in society both because of its reproductive capacity and its ability to represent concretely abstract concepts. A family's continuation relied on procreation, and marriages created political alliances between families.

The body's significance also derived from its representational potential, for images of the human form helped to establish social hierarchies. Just as Christ was the head of the church, tending members of the religious body of believers, spiritual leaders became the heads of their flocks, providing guidance. Similarly, the metaphor of the body defined relations between men and women: men served as the head, giving order to the (female) body, thereby reinforcing notions of male rationality and female emotionality.

In both literature and religion, representations of the female body could bolster conventional beliefs concerning gender roles. They could also challenge assumptions about what social position women were to occupy. Intentionally or not, these images could suggest that the interpretation of physical distinctions between the sexes depends on cultural factors. That is, the importance of male and female genital differences is not predetermined; historical circumstances influence the conception of appropriate behavior.

The Inspirational Body in Literature

Women's roles in literature mirror those of their non-fiction counterparts: female characters frequently wed and become (or ostensibly will become) mothers. The female figure is particularly notable, however, for its inspirational potential. In lyric poetry, the woman's body inspires desire, providing the foundation for the phenomenon that modern scholars have termed courtly love. Whether the narrator knows his beloved or falls in love with a faraway lady without ever having seen her, he presents himself as subservient to his lady. She thus theoretically holds him in her power, and his longing for her can cause great torment. Even when couched in spiritual terms, the narrator's desire is highly sensual. Nonetheless, gaining intimate knowledge of the lady's body proves challenging because she is traditionally of more noble social status and already married. The lady can show mercy to her suitor, but often she is haughty and maintains her distance, resulting in additional suffering in the name of love.

Often described in great detail from head to toe, the female body plays an equally inspirational role in the courtly romances first appearing in the twelfth century. Embodying the ideal physical appearance of the time, the lady motivates the knight wooing her to demonstrate his valor on the battlefield. Once he has established his superiority, he earns the right to claim the lady as his companion; she becomes his reward. The heroine's body thus serves as an object of admiration and pursuit, important for the chivalric feats that it occasions. The knight's body, too, merits attention, but for its prowess rather than its attractiveness. Happy endings depend on the pairing of the loveliest lady and the most accomplished knight. While the lady's beauty confirms that she has a noble moral character, her worth lies first and foremost in her body.

The Desiring Body in Literature

While the female body continued to play an inspirational role in literature throughout the Middle Ages, a more misogynistic depiction of women appeared with increasing frequency beginning in the thirteenth century. Authors highlight women's voracious sexual appetite, particularly in the fabliaux. The overwhelming desire to satisfy their bodily needs offers additional evidence of women's inability to master themselves and their bodies. Sexually desirous female characters are rarely faithful to one man, constantly seeking gratification outside the bounds of sanctioned relationships.

The Repugnant Body in Literature

The unseemly conduct of a lascivious woman could make her body repellent. Similarly, bodies that did not conform to medieval standards of beauty were considered repugnant. Owing to the correlation between physical appearance and moral character, bodies deemed ugly frequently heralded trouble in literature. Dwarves, for instance, may behave reprehensibly, striking other characters for no reason. Old women, too, often have a disruptive presence, displaying their ability to manipulate men or seeking to impede a hero's progress on quests.

The ugly female body takes on special importance in a number of late medieval English texts, including John Gower's Confessio amantis, Chaucer's "Wife of Bath's Tale," and the anonymous Wedding of Sir Gawain and Dame Ragnelle. In these tales, which adopt the folktale motif of the loathly lady and raise the issue of what women desire, an unappealing hag is transformed into a beautiful lady.

Literary Challenges to Convention

Literary works could also question assumptions concerning the female figure. Long before Christine de Pizan engaged in the fifteenth-century debate about female virtue or vice, multiple literary genres invited closer scrutiny of women's bodies. The inclusion of a female voice in works by either men or women could cast doubt upon the accuracy of gender stereotypes based on the body. Tales in which women cross-dress as men and successfully establish a male persona (such as the Romance of Silence), for example, imply that weakness and passivity are not inherently feminine traits. In these cases, the body serves as a site of performance, and the clothes influence spectators' perception of the body beneath them. Furthermore, accentuating the desirous female nature—which may involve false accusations of infidelity—draws attention to the fear that a seductive woman could cause men to lose control over their own flesh, pointing to male desire or the inability of men to sexually satisfy a woman. The body could thus become a site of instability.

Works by female authors do not necessarily depict female characters in a flattering light, just as texts by men do not always portray women negatively. Nonetheless, certain female composers do focus on a woman's point of view. The unhappily married heroines in some of Marie de France's lais, which date to 1160–1170, bring to light the potential for jealous husbands to view the female body as a possession. In addition, they underscore the importance of maintaining virtue, highlighting the need for fidelity and silence in love. The trobairitz, writing in southern France in the late twelfth and the thirteenth centuries, echo the awareness of the perils of lost honor. Female narrators may acknowledge desire for the men who seek their love, yet reject a physical relationship out of concern for preserving their reputation. At times, they also uncover contradictions in the position of a lover claiming to place himself in his beloved's power when he in fact seeks equality. Calling attention to the female body and the importance of avoiding talk of lax morals, authors could point to the ways in which social codes shape the conception of female nature.

That texts raise questions, directly or indirectly, about the validity of stereotypes does not mean that they are feminist in today's terms. To the contrary, many authors refuting misogynistic portrayals of women underscore conventional traits, concentrating on devoted wives, daughters, and mothers. Similarly, threats that nontraditional heroines pose to hierarchies remain temporary. Eventually, these women re-assume their expected place in society, often by marrying. Still, by implying that gender stereotypes stem from social norms rather than biology, their actions could provoke discussion and inspire the audience to reexamine notions about the female body and its role. In short, focusing on a woman's figure revealed the complex relationship between dominant ideologies and the body, gave the lie to strict binary oppositions differentiating men and women, and raised the possibility that the body was as much a product of culture as it was of nature.

The Body in Religion

The biblical image of the Word becoming flesh ensured that the body would be of particular interest to medieval religious writers. Church fathers had long struggled with the relationship between the body and the soul, at times manifesting contradictory stances in their work by simultaneously privileging and denigrating flesh. The human body was at once necessary and dangerous. It could serve as a medium for the soul and as a locus of learning; alternatively, its attachment to the material world could turn humankind away from focusing on salvation. Female flesh proved to be especially problematic. As in literary texts, the (inferior) female body often stands in counterpoint to the (superior) male mind. Women are frequently portrayed as weak, loquacious, and given to carnal and sensual pleasures, all traits suggestive of a lack of control over the inherently difficult body.

The Celibate Body

Yet women could be held up as models for their holiness. Until the late twelfth century, they attained this status chiefly by rising above their sex and becoming “like men.” Doing so meant denying their sexuality; thus, virgins merited particular respect. Especially in hagiographic texts, their desire to avoid sexual relations permits them to engage in otherwise unacceptable behavior. Future female saints who cross-dress as men to ward off male sexual advances or prevent marriage act laudably. Those who do wed but refuse to consummate the marriage often even inspire their husbands to live piously. Married women with children, too, can gain spiritual authority in religious texts. Sacrificing their children for a higher purpose (as the Virgin Mary did) demonstrates a stronger commitment to God than to their family. Mothers who agree to their children’s demise also prove their self-control and resistance to excessive emotionality. All of these women thus negate the body and become sexless.

The Maternal Body

During the twelfth century, religious language increasingly incorporated feminine imagery, focusing especially on the breasts and women’s capacity to nurture. Drawing upon the belief that women possess an inherently loving body that can nourish and instruct, Bernard of Clairvaux (d. 1153) and the Cistercians in particular present abbots as mothers in their communities. Like mothers, they are to love and suckle those in their care. Twelfth-century authors also emphasize the image of Christ as a mother, a portrayal stretching back centuries to the Greek and Latin fathers. Because medieval medical theory held that mother’s milk was processed blood, the interchangeability of the two fluids links Christ to mothers: just as a nursing mother feeds a child with her body, so Christ feeds his followers with his blood during the Eucharist.

The greater use of maternal imagery both reflected and reinforced the growing importance of the Virgin Mary. Mary’s role as Christ’s mother endowed her body with special significance: like that of other women in its reproductive capacity, it retained its purity even in bearing a child. Without original sin because she conceived immaculately, Mary was free of the pain of childbirth, as well. Virginity and motherhood converge in one exceptional body.

The rise of the veneration of Mary—seen as the “New Eve” and thus redeeming woman for her part in humankind’s fall from grace—fostered the feminization of religious language. A greater emphasis on Christ’s humanity during the twelfth century also contributed to the tendency. The depiction of men as mothers, however, remains symbolic; no writer suggests that possessing nurturing traits actually transforms men into women. Yet a more positive view of the female body had important implications for women, for whom the image was far more than allegorical. Those defending women against their critics could turn stereotypes of feminine weakness and carnality to their advantage. For instance, if Eve’s creation from Adam’s rib placed her in a subordinate position, having been fashioned from bone rather than earth also made her inherently more noble. Likewise, if her dependence on the bodily senses left her more prone to cede to the serpent’s temptation, it also meant that she deserved less blame than Adam, whose rationality should have prevented him from succumbing.

The Bridal Body

Embracing the flesh in a spiritual context offered women a means of authority later in the Middle Ages. Beginning in the thirteenth century, communities of women—notably the nuns of Helfta and Beguines such as Hadewijch (early to mid-thirteenth century), Mechthild of Magdeburg (d. c. 1282/1297), and Marguerite Porete (d. 1310)—garnered attention for their visions in which God communicated directly with the mystic. Such visions conferred indubitable authority upon the woman, although giving voice to them could also lead to charges of heresy. Not infrequently, mystics employ erotic bridal imagery to describe their experiences. Desiring union with her beloved, the mystic can celebrate her body’s capacity to join with her spouse. Instead of negating her flesh, she emphasizes her whole self; her body unites with Christ’s body, and her will merges with God’s.

Spirituality can thus permit women to honor the body; desire, however, is directed toward God rather than earthly pleasures. Paradoxically, the emphasis on physicality and sexuality may lead to the destruction of the body, subsumed by love.

The Suffering Body

Mystics of the late fourteenth and early fifteenth centuries, such as Margery Kempe and Julian of Norwich, often place special emphasis on the Passion. Christ's body and female flesh become linked in their common ability to suffer physically. In crucifixion visions, the visionary's body can stand in for that of Christ on the cross. Moreover, the blood from Christ's pierced side stands in parallel to the nourishing milk emanating from a mother's breast. In the case of ascetics, control over the flesh—manifested through fasting and other forms of physical deprivation—evokes Christ's physical afflictions. The Eucharist offered an especially potent symbol of Christ's physicality and humanity, uniting women's bodies and Christ. Many female visionaries display great devotion to the Eucharist, finding spiritual ecstasy in the physical act of taking communion.

Focusing on the female body could also provide a means for women to draw closer to Christ figuratively. Like the crucified Christ, whose death and resurrection offered salvation to the faithful, women, too, could sacrifice for others. Precisely because of their embodied state and capacity to suffer, women could serve as intercessors, using their tears, hunger, and prayers to replace the suffering of another. This role relies on the stereotype of woman as nurturer and mediator, qualities attributed to mothers. Nevertheless, it also places women in a position of influence, connecting them to God as they intercede for others.

KRISTIN L. BURR

References and Further Reading

- Blamires, Alcuin. The Case for Women in Medieval Culture. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1997.
- Burns, E. Jane. Bodytalk: When Women Speak in Old French Literature. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1993.
- Bynum, Caroline Walker. Holy Feast and Holy Fast: The Religious Significance of Food to Medieval Women. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1988.
- . Jesus as Mother: Studies in the Spirituality of the High Middle Ages. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1982.
- . The Resurrection of the Body in Western Christianity, 200–1336. New York: Columbia University Press, 1995.
- Cadden, Joan. Meanings of Sex Differences in the Middle Ages. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993.

- Chance, Jane, ed. Gender and Text in the Later Middle Ages. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 1996.
- Colby, Alice M. The Portrait in Twelfth-Century French Literature. Geneva: Librairie Droz, 1965.
- Ferrante, Joan. Woman as Image in Medieval Literature. New York: Columbia University Press, 1975.
- Gold, Penny Schine. The Lady and the Virgin. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1985.
- Kay, Sarah, and Miri Rubin, eds. Framing Medieval Bodies. Manchester and New York: Manchester University Press, 1994.
- Lomperis, Linda, and Sarah Stanbury, eds. Feminist Approaches to the Body in Medieval Literature. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1993.
- Miles, Margaret R. Fullness of Life: Historical Foundations for a New Asceticism. Philadelphia: The Westminster Press, 1981.
- Newman, Barbara. From Virile Woman to WomanChrist: Studies in Medieval Religion and Literature. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1995.
- Petroff, Elizabeth A. Medieval Women's Visionary Literature. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- Wiethaus, Ulrike. "Sexuality, Gender, and the Body in Late Medieval Women's Spirituality." Journal of Feminist Studies in Religion 7 (1991): 35–57.

See also Asceticism; Beauty; Beguines; Body, Visual Representations of; Bride of Christ: Imagery; Christine de Pizan; Courtly Love; Cross-Dressing; Debate Literature; Defenses of Women; Fabliau; Fasting and Food, Religious Aspects of; Femininity and Masculinity; Gender Ideologies; Julian of Norwich; Kempe, Margery; Marie de France; Marie of Oignies; Marguerite Porrete; Mechthild of Magdeburg; Procreation and Ideas of Conception; Romance of Silence; Romance, English; Sexuality: Extramarital Sex; Sexuality: Female Same-Sex Relations; Sexuality: Male Same-Sex Relations; Sexuality, Regulation of; Sexuality: Sex in Marriage; Trobairitz and Trobadors; Virginité; Virile Women

BODY, VISUAL REPRESENTATIONS OF

The female body in the Christian, Jewish, and Muslim visual arts was almost always demurely covered. Ubiquitous dress for married women included long sleeves, robes that touched the ground, and a veil or wimple that covered the hair (also worn by Christian nuns). The naked female body demonstrated gynecological traits, stood as a figure for a nonphysical abstraction such as the soul, or invoked forbidden pagan goddess cults. It also narrated illicit sexual attraction, torment in hell, or the torture of saints. Unlike the nude male body, it never signified the microcosm, the zodiac, or even all humankind. A fundamental divide from ancient Greek and Roman as well as post-Renaissance western European art is that it very rarely conveyed the kind of sensuality or voluptuousness that we associate with "the nude."

Herr Bernger von Hornheim and his lady. Manesse-Lieder manuscript. (Cod. Pal. germ. 848, fol. 178, recto Location: University Library, Heidelberg, Germany. Credit: Foto Marburg / Art Resource, NY.

Nakedness conveyed no such comfort with sexual desires, an attitude strongly enforced by the Church fathers' reading of the temptation and fall in Genesis.

Yet clothing was often extremely sensuous in color, texture, and over-abundance, functioning at a symbolic level to embody both spiritual and courtly love and desire. Thus, visual representations of women's clothing cannot be taken as literal records of what real women wore, even though images must make some reference to conventions, social attitudes, and material wishes, and they are not contaminated by historicism. Indeed, they have much in common with modern fashion drawings and photographs that instill desire in women and play to their fantasies, yet also instruct them in feminine attire so that they will respect gender boundaries. Men's shorter hair and styles of dress functioned in the same way, but denote a wider range of activities and stations in life. A recent revival of interest in decorative men's clothing in our culture also brings us close to an appreciation of the rich and fashionable clothing seen on Christian men of the High Middle Ages, when princes and priests seem to have outshone ladies. Dressing was and is part of the performance of gender, class, and piety.

Depictions of Eve

In accordance with the biblical text of Genesis, Adam and Eve are represented completely nude before the fall. Eve's temptation of Adam to sin, by proffering him a forbidden apple from the Tree of Knowledge, was generally interpreted as sexual; St. Augustine and others speculated on the nonsexual means of reproduction available to humankind before the fall. In pictorial representations Eve often holds the apple close to her breast, and the couple invariably hides their genitals after the fall. She is closely associated with the serpent, which in the bronze doors of Hildesheim (1015) inserts itself between her legs. The horizontal pubescent figure of Eve from the Cathedral of Autun, showing a repentance that is appropriate to the portal where sinners petitioned for pardon, is nonetheless conflated with the serpent gliding on its belly through the garden as its punishment. By the thirteenth century Eve may be somewhat voluptuous, but her face is often mirrored in that of the serpent, into which she gazes with homosexual desire.

The Medical Body

Representations of birthing in sacred and secular narratives show the infant emerging from the folds of a long chemise, and women depicted as medical patients are also fully clothed, except in surgery or autopsy. Many writers disapproved of the latter, citing the case of Nero, who they said had his mother dissected to see where he came from, a scene often gruesomely depicted in manuscripts. Medical texts of all periods diagram the female body. One early-fifteenth-century colored outline drawing that is very traditional in its flat graphic rendering of the body inscribes sites of disease on a frontal nude with internal organs displayed, but a coiffed head renders the woman's pregnancy respectable since it is a sign of married status; her uterus is repeated above to demonstrate four fetal positions (London, Wellcome Museum, MS 49, fol. 38). Unlike the sheela na gigs treated elsewhere, the labia are seldom depicted.

The Taboo Body

From Early Christian times until about 1400, pagan statues were represented only in contexts of false-idol worship, including their attribution to Jewish and Muslim use in the High Middle Ages, as demonstrated by Camille. Even then, female idols were usually draped from the waist down. Idols of Venus, whose pagan nude statue still drew attention in Rome, made appearances in illuminated manuscripts of the Miroir historiale of Vincent of Beauvais and the Roman de la Rose of Guillaume de Lorris and Jean de Meung, but they are usually half-length or draped. A cult statue of Diana in Matthew Paris's chronicle of about 1245 has winged ankles like Eros, her head sprouts antlers and long ears, and her hands cover her breasts. She is evidently the impure counterpart of the devotional statues of the Virgin that so often appear on altars. Lot's wife was turned into a statue as a punishment; if she is represented naked she covers her pudenda, but the preferred form was an almost inhuman pillar of salt.

Formal Court Attire, Queen of Heaven and Earthly Empresses

In early Christian and Byzantine art it became conventional to dress the Mother of God in heavy imperial robes, with jeweled crown, earrings, and necklaces. This sumptuous attire resonates with the representations of living empresses, such as the famous frontal standing figure of Empress Theodora in the mid-sixth-century mosaics of the church of San Vitale in Ravenna. Figures that personified Ecclesia (Church) or Sapientia (Wisdom) were similarly represented throughout the Middle Ages, but with headdresses varied according to fashion. Some of the most splendid personifications of this kind are in the manuscripts of Hildegard of Bingen's works.

In the West, reigning queens are as elegantly dressed as their Byzantine counterparts but never as authoritative; in coronation scenes they adopt the humbly bowed head of the Virgin Mary enthroned beside Christ in heaven. Between the early thirteenth century and the late fourteenth, such figures are marked by a continuous proliferation of folds, eventually exhibiting linings of complimentary colors and an overabundance of cloth, as spectacular consumption.

The Narrow Line of Propriety in Dress

The femme fatale, whether a prostitute seducing the Prodigal Son, Potipher's wife tempting Joseph, or even Judith visiting Holofernes' camp, was dressed to kill. Sculptors and painters quickly responded to the new texture of imported silks in the twelfth century, as Snyder has shown, and for a while clinging drapery revealed the thighs and breasts, even of good women. The good girl/bad girl distinction may be very subtle, but a tight girdle creates an hourglass figure for the prostitutes in the stained glass of Chartres of c. 1205. Hildegard of Bingen was criticized for dressing the nuns of Rupertsberg in flowing white silk, with diadems in their long, loose hair. The manuscript of her Liber divinorum operum, illuminated fifty years after her death, shows such slim-waisted creatures as God's Love (caritas) strengthened by wisdom, humility, and peace.

Generally, St. Paul's dictum that "Nature herself teaches you that while flowing locks disgrace a man, they are woman's glory. For her locks were given for covering" (I Corinthians 11:13–15) seems to have been taken to refer to virgins. Origen had castigated women for wearing cosmetics, and later churchmen ranted against their elaborate hairstyles and veils—which, however, evidently intrigued artists and patrons, especially in fashion-conscious secular fourteenth-century circles. The margins in women's books are full of elegant girls with netted hairdos, chaplets, and tightly fitted chemises. Sumptuary laws seem to have had little effect on representation and did not displace traditional color codes; for instance, although scarlet and purple were reserved for royalty (and cardinals), Mary Magdalene is recognizable by the red robes and luxury ointments of a prostitute.

Romantic and Spiritual Lovers

Few illustrations of romance literature did justice to the description of rich clothing, but an exceptional set of images accompanies the German poems in an early-fourteenth-century collection known as the Manesse Codex (Heidelberg, Universitätsbibliothek, cpg 848). The artists created a lyrical world of rose bowers, castles, and hills where lovers courted each other. Their layered colorful garments often had linings of vair (squirrel fur), denoting high birth (see illustration). On the other hand, just as women's "mystical" love of Christ is textualized in more carnal terms than romantic love, so too it is in devotional representations: In the late-thirteenth-century Rothschild Canticles, a fully clothed woman gazes longingly at the naked and wounded body of Christ, and a robed Christ addresses a naked female soul (anima).

Gender Bending

Cautionary texts inform us that cross-dressing was seldom approved of, unless a miracle provided a female saint like St. Uncumber, alias Wilgeforte, with a beard. Vernacular tales of women passing as men are seldom illustrated, but if so their long hair gives them away. Rulers and bishops are represented in garments only slightly shorter than women's, made of similarly rich and colorful fabrics. Yet their short hair and insignia of office (scepter, sword, or crosier) were exclusively masculine, preempting any suggestion that they appear effeminate.

MADLINE H. CAVINESS

References and Further Reading

- Burns, E. Jane. Courtly Love Undressed: Reading Through Clothes in Medieval French Culture. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2002.
- Caviness, Madeline H. "Gender Symbolism and Text Image Relationships: Hildegard of Bingen's Scivias." In Translatio Theory and Practice in the Middle Ages, edited by Jeanette Beer. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Medieval Institute Publications, 1997, pp. 71–111.
- . "Hildegard as Designer to the Illustrations to Her Works." In Hildegard of Bingen: The Context of Her Thought and Art, edited by Charles Burnett and Peter Dronke. London: The Warburg Institute, 1998. Reprinted in Madeline H. Caviness. Art in the Medieval West and its Audience. Aldershot, England: Ashgate, 2001, pp. 29–42.
- Derolez, A., and Peter Dronke, eds. Hildegardis Bingensis Liber Divinorum Operum, Corpus Christianorum Continuatio Mediaevalis, 92. Turnhout: Brepols, 1996.
- Hamburger, Jeffrey F. The Rothschild Canticles: Art and Mysticism in Flanders and the Rhineland Circa 1300. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1990.
- Jones, Peter Murray. Medieval Medical Miniatures. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1985.
- . Medieval Medicine in Illuminated Manuscripts. London and Milan, Italy: The British Library; Centro Tibaldi, 1998.
- Katzenellenbogen, Adolf. Allegories of the Virtues and Vices in Medieval Art: From Early Christian Times to the Thirteenth Century, translated by Alan J. P. Crick. Nendeln, Liechtenstein: Kraus Reprint, 1968.
- Sekules, Veronica. Medieval Art, Oxford History of Art. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Snyder, Janet. "Cloth from the Promised Land: Appropriated Islamic Tiraz in Twelfth-Century French Sculpture." In Medieval Fabrications: Dress, Textiles, Clothwork, and Other Cultural Imaginings, edited by E. Jane Burns. New York and Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004, pp. 147–164.

See also Art, Representations of Women in; Body; Clothing; Cross-Dressing; Empresses; Byzantium; Eroticism in Art; Femininity and Masculinity; Gender Ideologies; Gender in Art; Personifications Visualized as Women; Queens and Empresses: The West; Sheila Na Gigs; Social Status; Sumptuary Law; Theodora

BOKENHAM, OSBERN

An Augustinian friar at Clare Priory, Suffolk, Bokenham (c.1392/1393–after 1463) authored the only known Middle English collection of lives of female saints. Written between 1443 and 1447, the untitled legendary survives in a single manuscript, British Library Arundel 327. It contains the vitae of Saints Margaret of Antioch, Anne, Christine, Ursula and the eleven thousand virgins, Faith, Agnes, Dorothy, Mary Magdalene, Catherine of Alexandria, Cecilia, Agatha, Lucy, and Elizabeth of Hungary. Scholars have debated the meaning of the work's structure: Edwards proposes that a later compiler assembled the lives in no particular order; Delany holds that Bokenham modeled the legendary on Chaucer's Legend of Good Women; and Hilles argues that the legendary promotes motherhood and fertility in the interest of Yorkist monarchical ambitions.

In any case, the legendary is notable for Bokenham's detailed dedications to his patrons, prominent East Anglian women such as Katherine Denston, Isabelle Bouchier, Katherine Howard, and Elizabeth de Vere. The regional network of female patrons described by Bokenham corresponds to other evidence for a growing lay, largely female, audience for works of vernacular piety. The legendary's emphasis on feminine piety and fertility and Yorkist dynastic claims is extended in Bokenham's Mappula Angliae (1440s), a translation of portions of Ranulf Higden's Polychronicon. The same emphasis is found in two works widely attributed to Bokenham: a 1445 translation of portions of Claudian's De consulatu Stilichonis (On the Consulship of Stilicho) and an untitled genealogical poem, "A Dialogue Betwix a Secular Asking and a Frere Answering at the Grave of Dame Johan of Acres" (1456).

CARROLL HILLES BALOT

References and Further Reading

- Bokenham, Osbern. Legendys of Hooly Wummen by Osbern Bokenham, edited by Mary S. Serjeantson. Early English Text Society O.S. 206. London: Oxford University Press, 1938.
- Delany, Sheila. Impolitic Bodies: Poetry, Saints, and Society in Fifteenth-Century England: The Work of Osbern Bokenham. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Edwards, A. S. G. "The Transmission and Audience of Osbern Bokenham's Legendys of Hooly Wummen." In Late Medieval Religious Texts and Their Transmission. Essays in Honour of A. I. Doyle, edited by A. J. Minnis. Cambridge: D. S. Brewer, 1994.
- Hilles, Carroll. "Gender and Politics in Osbern Bokenham's Legendary." New Medieval Literatures 4 (2001): 189–212.

See also Anne; Audience, Women in the; Body, Visual Representations of; Catherine of Alexandria; Chastity and Chaste Marriage; Chaucer, Geoffrey; Devotional Literature; Elizabeth of Hungary; Hagiography; Jacobus de Voragine's Golden Legend; Lay Piety; Literacy and Reading: Vernacular; Literature, Middle English; Margaret of Antioch; Mary Magdalene; Noble Women; Patronage, Literary; Translation; Violence; Virgin Martyrs

BOOK OWNERSHIP

Up until the mid-fifteenth century, upon the invention of printing in the West, all "books" were manuscripts—that is, they were written by hand. Thus, any reference to a "book" or "books" in this article should be understood to mean a manuscript or manuscripts. Manuscripts made of animal skins called parchment, or its more luxurious and carefully prepared version known as vellum, could be rolls (of parchment), bound leaves, or pages. Most users and readers of books were men and women in religious institutions, either in colleges preparing men for the priesthood, monasteries, or convents. Most books in the early Middle Ages until the fourteenth century were written in Latin, and thus that language was a requirement for readers. Like priests and monks, nuns learned and read Latin. Benedictine monks and nuns following the Rule (formulated by the possibly mythical sixth-century siblings Benedict of Nursia and his sister Scholastica) were among the earliest such communities. Monasteries and convents owned all material objects, including books, in common, and hand-written books were so precious that in their libraries they were often chained to the desks where they could be read.

Private book ownership for individuals in this time was extremely expensive and unusual. Because only men could be priests, and nuns were cloistered in monasteries, individual women book-owners were very rare indeed. From known and accessible sources such as women's inventories, women's wills, dedications to women, and inscriptions in the books themselves, or from internal textual comments, certain statistics are clear. Thus research shows that approximately 150 individual women between the ninth and fifteenth centuries owned no more than one book each. But by the fifteenth century, a very small number of women owned what might be termed large collections, as for example Gabrielle de la Tour, who owned two hundred manuscripts in 1474. However, discovery of female book owners in this early period is complicated by the fact that many private possessions owned by women, or indeed acquired by women, were hidden in the accounts, wills, inventories, and libraries of their fathers, husbands, or brothers. Thus the actual number of female book-owners, and certainly the number of readers, was much larger than shown by figures such as those above that can definitely be ascribed to women. Moreover, the large area of central Europe reaching from Magdeburg east into the depth of Russia covered by laws known as the Sachsenspiegel (Saxon Mirror, promulgated in 1215 and summarizing customs of the previous three centuries) claimed that women should inherit religious books, as women were the customary readers of such books. In this part of Europe it was therefore considered unnecessary to bequeath such books to wives or daughters—it was the law.

Books of Piety

Indeed, most books during this period consisted of various religious texts, for example, sections of the Old and New Testaments, which comprise the Hebrew and Christian Bible. Sometimes only small sections of the Bible were prepared, such as "Psalters" (the whole or parts of the book of Psalms) in later medieval centuries, the Golden Legend (that is, apocryphal stories) supplemented biblical texts. Finally, most popular during the later Middle Ages was the "Book of Hours." Books of Hours varied and could be collections of prayers, biblical texts, or selections from the Golden Legend to be read at certain hours of the day. The most precious of these books were handsomely illustrated with gold leaf and exquisitely painted illustrations depicting the stories told within them. First and foremost of these stories were the lives of Christ and the Virgin Mary, with the expulsion of Adam and Eve from the Garden of Eden a close second. They often showed gory details of the martyrdom of innumerable saints. Occasionally, they exhibited the artist's or possibly the patron's or book-owner's sense of humor. For example, the Duke of Berry's Belles Heures (Beautiful Hours) tells the apocryphal story of St. Jerome's humiliation and depicts him with a long dark beard and tonsure in a bright blue woman's dress. In the later Middle Ages they were also often decorated with phenomena showing the artists' realistic understanding of nature, such as flowers, birds, insects, and animals, and calendar illustrations of the months of the year depicting seasonal labor of farm laborers, and aristocratic sports like deer and boar hunting and hawking.

Mothers as Teachers

While priests and preachers could improve their congregations' souls, it was considered especially important for women to be able to read, as they were expected to teach reading to their young children of both sexes, but particularly to their daughters, in order to instill the rudiments of the Christian religion in them. This concept was expressed in a letter to a woman friend by St. Jerome as early as 403, when he gave detailed instructions of how this was to be done: "Have a set of letters made for her of boxwood or of ivory and tell her their names. . . ." Jerome's principles were repeated throughout the medieval period by Christian moralists.

Most books available were used as teaching tools for mothers. Thus Blanche of Castile ordered a large Psalter, in the early thirteenth century, in order to teach her son, the future Louis IX of France, to read. The notorious queen of France, Isabeau of Bavaria, ordered a book of hours for teaching her daughter Jeanne in 1398 and a special alphabet Psalter and "A, b, c. de Psaumes" for her daughter Michelle in 1403. Isabeau also owned a copy of Christine de Pizan's Enseignements moraux (Moral Teachings), which had been written for Christine's own son and may have been used for the Dauphin, the Duke of Guienne, as it was presented to his mother, Queen Isabeau.

Women as Ambassadors of Culture

Book ownership was clearly the prerogative of the highest or wealthiest strata of society because it was very expensive, even though reimbursement to the scribe was minimal, as he would often be paid with room and board at the court or on the family estate. Because women of such high status were almost always married to achieve the political and economic projects of their male relatives, they were frequently forced into alliances across borders, bringing their books with them on marriage. For this reason it is difficult to consider women book-owners as members of specific nations or countries. As early as the eleventh century we know of Judith of Flanders, who first married Tostig, earl of Northumbria, and who, as his widow, later brought large English gospels illustrated in the English Winchester style to her second marriage to Welf of Bavaria. Other interesting examples are the fourteenth-century daughter of the Emperor Charles IV, Anne of Bohemia, who brought Czech and German gospels to England on her marriage to Richard II, and Valentina Visconti, who brought a variety of Italian books to France on her marriage to Louis d'Orleans. The transfer of books from various European countries or nations across borders was often responsible for the transfer of artistic styles recognizable in the obvious changes in manuscript illuminations following the immigration of a book-owning bride. A good example of this is the collection of books that Anne of Bohemia brought from Prague in 1382 on her marriage to Richard II. Anne of Bohemia is also an important link in the late fourteenth century to the pre-Lutheran reforms, not only in religious thought but also its corollary, the need for vernacular biblical expression. The English reformer John Wycliffe used her arrival in London with her multi-language Bibles to promote his case against the bishops' insistence on Latin.

Secular Books and Books Translated into the Vernacular

Although books of piety as described in the previous section were predominant during most of the centuries under discussion, a variety of secular books also existed and were owned and surely read by women. These included chronicles, annals, romances, and instructions for planting, cooking, general deportment, and housekeeping. Chronicles and their cousins, "annals," were collections of histories, personal accounts, and anecdotes, usually anonymous, although in later centuries chroniclers were named. They were amusing to read and are often still used as historical source material despite their often fictive, or at least unsupported, information.

As book-owners and as readers, throughout the Middle Ages, women owned secular books written in the vernacular going back to the mid-thirteenth century. Eleanor of Provence, who married Henry III of England in 1236, owned a French copy of The Roman of William the Conqueror. A generation later, Eleanor of Castile, steeped in the tradition of her family's literary court and its vernacular translations of chronicles and law codes, continued with her interest in vernacular literature, Arthurian and Castilian romances, when she became the wife of the future Edward I of England in 1254. In c. 1233, when the future St. Louis, King Louis IX of France, commissioned a manuscript of the Speculum Historiale (Mirror of History) in Latin, his queen, Margaret of Provence, commissioned a concurrent vernacular French translation. Anne of Bohemia made a point of having her German books translated into English when she arrived in London to help her learn the language of her new realm. Her sister, Margaret, left Prague as a child bride to marry the king of Poland, with a Psalter in Latin, German, and Polish, having benefited from Anne's experience in England.

As early as 1170 Theodora Comnena ordered a translation of the Song of Roland into German when she established a literary court in Vienna with her husband Henry Jasomirgott. But by the end of the fourteenth century a number of women owned books of vernacular poetry by such diverse poets as the English Geoffrey Chaucer and the French Guillaume de Lorris, Eustache Dechamps, and Christine de Pizan. Chaucer, for example, wrote his Legend of Good Women in 1386 for the queen, Anne of Bohemia, because she had taken exception to his Troilus and Criseyde for painting women as disloyal. Like almost all poets of the later Middle Ages, Guillaume de Lorris and Christine de Pizan wrote allegorical poetry. Lorris's celebrated Roman de la Rose (Romance of the Rose) (c. 1230), an allegory about courtly love, was translated into Middle English during the lifetime of Chaucer, who died in 1400. In contrast, some of Christine de Pizan's poems extolled the delight of married love and the sadness of her widowhood.

Books Specifically Written for Women

A significant body of writing intended specifically for women (although it may also have been written with male readership in mind) was owned by women. These were writings suggesting the correct education and deportment for women. This type of literature comprises Vincent of Beauvais's treatise De eruditione filiorum nobelium (On the Education and Instruction of Noble Children), commissioned by the Queen of Louis IX of France, Margaret of Provence, between 1247 and 1249; Francesco da Barberino's Regimento e costumi di donna (Rule and Customs for Ladies), c. 1320; the Goodman of Paris (Le ménagier de Paris), whose 1393 Traité de morale et d'économie (Treatise of Morals and Economy) was a veritable housekeeping manual composed by this middle-aged man for his very young wife; and in 1405 Christine de Pizan's Le Livre des trois Vertus (The Book of Three Virtues).

Barberino, who had spent some time at the court in Provence, was intrigued by the customs of life that produced the literature of courtly love. The Ménagier de Paris, on the other hand, was specific and careful to give his child bride practical suggestions for every aspect of her married life and behavior. Thus he ensured that when she remarried after his death, she would not reflect badly upon himself. His instructions detailed her employment and care of her servants (including when they were ill), the preservation of meats and fish, how to air sheets, and how to protect furs from moths. Presumably only one copy of his work existed—that owned by his young wife. Christine de Pizan's Book of Three Virtues, however, existed in innumerable manuscript copies in the collections of fifteenth-century women.

Finally, books describing and enumerating large numbers of heroic or exemplary women from the past and modeled on Plutarch's Lives were privately owned by an appreciable number of women. These books could act as inspiration to others. Well-known and significant examples of such books are Boccaccio's De mulieribus claris (About Famous Women) (1355, translated into French in 1401) and Christine de Pizan's Le livre de la cité des dames (1405) (The Book of the City of Ladies), in which she expressed her unique views.

SUSAN GROAG BELL

References and Further Reading

- Bawcutt, Priscilla. "My Bright Buke": Women and Their Books in Medieval and Renaissance Scotland." In Medieval Women: Texts and Contexts in Late Medieval Britain. Essays for Felicity Riddy, edited by Jocelyn Wogan-Browne, Rosalynn Voaden, Arlyn Diamond, Ann Hutchinson, and Carol M. Meale Johnson. Turnhout, Belgium: Brepols, 2000, pp. 17–34.
- Bawcutt, Priscilla, and Bridget Henisch. "Scots Abroad in the Fifteenth Century: The Princesses Margaret, Isabella and Eleanor." In Women in Scotland, c. 1100–1750, edited by Elizabeth Ewan and Maureen M. Meikle. East Linton, UK: Tuckwell Press, 1999, pp. 45–55.
- Bell, Susan Groag. "Medieval Women Book-Owners, Arbiters of Lay Piety and Ambassadors of Culture." SIGNS: Journal of Women in Culture and Society 7:4 (1982) 742–768.
- Brown, Michelle P. "Female Book Ownership in England During the Ninth Century: The Evidence of the Prayerbooks." Old English Newsletter 28(3) (1995): A-57.
- Cavanaugh, Susan. A Study of Books Privately Owned in England, 1300–1450. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1980.
- Caviness, Madeline H. "Anchoress, Abbess and Queen: Donors and Patrons or Intercessors and Matrons?" In The Cultural Patronage of Medieval Women, edited by June Hall McCash. Athens, Ga., and London: The University of Georgia Press, 1998, pp. 105–154.
- Dutton, A. M. "Passing the Book: Testamentary Transmission of Religious Literature to and by Women in England." In Women, the Book and the Godly: Selected Proceedings of the St. Hilda's Conference, 1993, edited by L. Smith and J. H. M. Taylor. Woodbridge, UK: D. S. Brewer, 1995, pp. 41–54.
- Friedman, John B. Northern English Books, Owners and Makers in the Late Middle Ages. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1995.

- Hanna, Ralph. "Some Norfolk Women and Their Books, c. 1390–1440." In The Cultural Patronage of Medieval Women, edited by June Hall McCash. Athens, Ga., and London: The University of Georgia Press, 1998, pp. 288–305.
- Jambeck, Karen. "Patterns of Literary Patronage: England, 1200–c.1475." In The Cultural Patronage of Medieval Women, edited by June Hall McCash. Athens, Ga., and London: The University of Georgia Press, 1998, pp. 228–265.
- Legaré, Anne-Marie. "Reassessing Women's Libraries in Late Medieval France: The Case of Jeanne de Laval." Renaissance Studies 10:2 (1996).
- Meale, Carol. ". . . All the bokes that I haue of latyn, english, and frensch': Laywomen and Their Books in Late Medieval England." In Women and Literature in Britain, 1150–1500, edited by Carol Meale. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993, pp. 128–158.
- Parsons, John Carmi. "Of Queens, Courts, and Books: Reflections on the Literary Patronage of Thirteenth-Century Plantagenet Queens." In The Cultural Patronage of Medieval Women, edited by June Hall McCash. Athens, Ga., and London: The University of Georgia Press, 1998, pp. 175–201.
- Penketh, Sandra. "Women and Books of Hours." In Women and the Book: Assessing the Visual Evidence, edited by L. Smith and J. H. M. Taylor. London and Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1997, pp. 266–281.

See also Books of Hours; Christine de Pizan; Conduct Literature; Defenses of Women; Education, Lay; Education, Monastic; Literacy and Reading: Latin; Literacy and Reading: Vernacular; Monasticism and Nuns; Mothers as Teachers; Patronage, Literary; Translation

BOOK PRODUCTION

See Nuns as Scribes

BOOKS OF HOURS

The book of hours was the principal prayer book of the late medieval laity, and the most commonly produced illuminated manuscript of the late Middle Ages and Renaissance. Although the majority of horae (the Latin plural for "hours," now used to signify a book of hours) were made in the bookshops of Paris, Rouen, Tours, Ghent, Bruges, and other cities in France and Flanders, where the genre enjoyed its greatest popularity, books of hours were produced in nearly every region of Europe, in printed editions as well as manuscripts. The central text of a book of hours is the Latin Hours, or Little Office, of the Virgin, a series of psalms, hymns, and other devotions, the majority excerpts from scripture, glorifying and invoking the aid of the Virgin Mary. An abbreviated version of the prayers in the breviary recited by the clergy during the celebration of the Divine Office, the text of the Hours of the Virgin is divided into eight sections, or hours, which correspond to the canonical hours—Matins, Lauds, Prime, Terce, Sext, None, Vespers, and Compline—the traditional times of the day established for clerical prayer. Books of hours may contain other offices, prayers, and devotional texts that give evidence of the religious preferences of their owners. Moreover, the vast majority of horae, even the modestly produced ones, seem to have been illustrated. The emergence of the book of hours is thus connected to some of the most significant developments in later medieval culture, including the growth of the Cult of the Virgin; lay aspiration to, and appropriation of, clerical forms of spirituality; the expansion of lay literacy and book ownership; the increase in public and private religious art; and the development of new forms of devotional imagery.

Master of Adelaide of Savoy (15th CE) and Master of Jean Rolin: January, the coronation of the queen and bean king. The book of hours of Adelaide of Savoy, duchess of Burgundy. French. Ms.76, fol.1R. 21.9x15 cm. Photo: R.G. Ojeda. Location: Musée Condé, Chantilly, France. Credit: Réunion des Musées Nationaux / Art Resource, NY.

Origins, Development, Content, and Decoration

The practice of reciting the Hours of the Virgin originated in the monastic milieu and can be traced to at least the tenth century; the earliest manuscripts containing the Hours are dated a century later. In its original context, therefore, recitation of the Hours formed a part of the liturgical prayer regime of members of the religious orders and the clergy. The early medieval tradition of personal prayer books for private devotion is also relevant to the development of the book of hours. By c. 1200, the Hours of the Virgin had achieved broader popularity, and the clergy and lay nobility began to commission psalters—volumes of the book of Psalms, the principal private prayer book during this period—with the text of the Hours appended to them. The earliest independent books of hours date to the mid-thirteenth century, and from c. 1300, the popularity of the genre increased steadily, eclipsing, for the laity, that of the psalter-hours and, eventually, the psalter. The heyday of the book of hours was the fifteenth century, when the market for these manuscripts included all strata of the nobility as well as the middle classes.

The ideal devotional routine of the owner of a book of hours entailed reciting the Hours at seven different times of the day, in imitation of clerical practice: Matins and Lauds at night or upon rising, Prime at 6:00 AM, Terce at 9:00 AM, Sext at noon, None at 3:00 PM, Vespers in the early evening, and Compline before going to bed. The realities of lay life made this regime impractical, however, and many laypeople appear to have recited the Hours all at once, in the morning. Most examples are small-format, portable volumes that could easily be carried from the chamber to church or private chapel, the principal settings in which books of hours were used.

Unlike liturgical service books, whose contents were determined by Church mandate, the textual programs of books of hours could vary significantly according to the preferences and means of their patrons, as well as local custom: the only text required for a manuscript to be defined as a book of hours is the Hours of the Virgin itself. Nonetheless, certain texts occur in horae with enough regularity to be considered standard features of the genre. The majority of books of hours open with a calendar, which lists the major feasts and saints' days, graded (or ranked) by color to indicate their importance in the liturgical year, in the region, or to the book owner. The Penitential Psalms, a Litany of Saints, and the Office of the Dead occur in most examples, usually following the Hours of the Virgin. The texts of the Hours and

Office of the Dead vary slightly according to the diocese or region for which the book was made: identifying a manuscript's "use" and the style of its illumination can aid in localizing and dating it. Memorials or suffrages (short prayers) of the saints are usually included, sometimes in the hour of Lauds. By the late fourteenth century, a series of gospel extracts was typically included following the calendar and preceding the Hours. The prayers "Obsecro te" ("I beseech you") and "O intemerata" ("O immaculate one"), petitions to the Virgin for her intercession written in the first person, also feature regularly. Books of hours frequently contain prayers and shorter offices devoted to a variety of sacred personages or entities. Among the most popular of these were the Hours of the Cross and the Holy Spirit; the "Salve sancta facies," the prayer to the holy face of Christ; and the "Stabat Mater," a rhymed prayer on the Virgin's grief at Jesus's sufferings.

Although books of hours are generally in Latin, vernacular languages played a role in the history of the genre. Many books of hours made in France include a calendar, rubrics, and popular prayers written in French. At the opposite end of the spectrum are North Netherlandish books of hours, which were almost always written in Dutch, the Latin text of the Hours having been translated into that vernacular language by the cleric Geert Grote (d. 1384) in the context of the religious reform movement known as the Devotio Moderna. Many books of hours produced in England before the late fourteenth century include significant amounts of devotional material written in Anglo-Norman French. Middle English texts occur primarily in later examples, including printed primers (as books of hours were also known in England).

Images were integral to books of hours. They marked important texts and served as foci and springboards for devout contemplation, structuring the book owner's experience of the devotions in her/his manuscript as well as mediating the reception of other texts, imagery, and rituals in the religious environment. In a typical example, a historiated initial or, more commonly, a miniature, opens each of the major text divisions. The standard cycle of images for the Hours of the Virgin was a series of Infancy subjects that emphasized the motherhood and queenship of the Virgin. Alternatively, the Hours were accompanied by a Passion cycle, an option popular with English and Dutch patrons. When illustrated, the calendar features imagery of the labors of the months and signs of the zodiac. Imagery of the saints embellished the suffrages or was included as full-page pictures. The Office of the Dead, whose recitation was believed to lessen the time spent by the deceased in Purgatory, was usually prefaced by an image of the Last Judgment or a funeral service. While there were established traditions of illustration for nearly every important text in books of hours, many examples feature pictorial programs tailored to personalize the manuscripts for their owners. Books of Hours were also personalized through the inclusion of owner portraits, found most frequently at Matins of the Virgin and prefacing the “Obsecro te” and “O intemerata,” which were usually illustrated with the Virgin and Child and Pietà, respectively. Owner portraits visualize both the practice of devout prayer and its goal: direct communication with the divine. At Matins in her book of hours of c. 1400, Margaret of Cleves, Duchess of Bavaria-Holland, kneels at a prie-dieu and wears prayer beads around her neck as she offers a petition, its words inscribed on a speech scroll, to the seated Virgin and Child. In the miniature illustrating the “Obsecro te” in her manuscript, produced in the third quarter of the fifteenth century, Amadée de Saluces, daughter and heiress of the marshall of Savoy, prays to the enthroned Virgin and Child, her illuminated book of hours open before her on a prie-dieu. The most lavishly decorated books of hours were embellished with elaborate frames or borders on every page or extensive programs of marginalia.

Ownership, Patronage, and Use

Although it achieved universal popularity, in its early history the book of hours appears to have been strongly connected to female ownership. The evidence of owner portraits and the incidence of prayers written in the feminine form suggest that the majority of extant thirteenth-century French, Franco-Flemish, and English horae were made for women. This does not mean that all of these manuscripts can be ascribed to female patronage, however: books of hours were frequently commissioned for women by their husbands, sometimes on the occasion of their marriage, or by their spiritual advisers. Several early-fourteenth-century English examples appear to have been commissioned by women or to have been the product of joint patronage. Around 1325, for instance, Hawisia de Bois, a member of a knightly family that had flourished in the English Midlands, commissioned a large, lavishly illustrated book of hours designed, in part, to facilitate pious commemoration of her distinguished ancestors, feudal associates, and neighbors. Our picture of manuscript patronage in the late fourteenth and early fifteenth centuries is dominated by the activities of the great royal and ducal bibliophiles, particularly Jean, Duc de Berry, who commissioned several books of hours famous for their exceptionally lavish, strongly personalized, and influential pictorial programs. The vast majority of fifteenth-century horae were produced for women and men of more modest means whose identities are largely unknown, and their book of hours may have been the only book they owned.

Although the book of hours was principally a vehicle of personal, private devotion, its uses spanned the private and public realms, and the practice of devout prayer using a book of hours had larger familial, communal, and social ramifications. As already noted, books of hours were used not only at home but also in the public context of the church, where they were contemplated and their prayers recited during the Mass or other services. A richly decorated book of hours was regarded as a sign of status and an important element of a fashionable self-presentation. Eustache Deschamps (d. 1406), court poet of the French king Charles V, satirized women’s desire to own and display books of hours thus:

A book of hours, too, must be mine,
Where subtle workmanship will shine,
Of gold and azure, rich and smart,
Arranged and painted with great art,
Covered with fine brocade of gold;
And there must be, so as to hold
The pages closed, two golden clasps.

The social obligation of pious remembrance and intercession on behalf of deceased family members and associates was achieved through recitation of the Office of the Dead and other texts in a book of hours. For the many book owners who recorded births, marriages, and deaths in the calendars of their volumes, horae served as archives of family history. As personalized devotional compendia, books of hours were frequently enriched by prayers or charms to be recited in a variety of situations, such as during childbirth or travel, for particular illnesses, or to guardian angels and patron saints, and these ancillary devotions reveal much about lay piety during the late Middle Ages. Moreover, as with psalters and psalter-hours before them, books of hours were the “first readers” of the late medieval laity. An important role of parents, and particularly mothers, was to teach their children to pray and to read using religious manuscripts; the programs of a few surviving horae were tailored to accommodate these pedagogical uses. The accounts of Isabeau of Bavaria, queen of Charles VI of France, reveal that she ordered a book of hours for her six-year-old daughter, Jeanne, in 1398. Around 1335, Isabel de Byron, wife of the Lancashire knight Robert de Neville of Hornby, commissioned a profusely illustrated book of hours whose pictorial program was adapted, in part, for the eyes of Isabel’s young, unnamed daughter or granddaughter, portraits of whom occur on several folios of the manuscript. Books of hours were typically recited aloud, in a low voice, but their use has also been associated with the spread among the laity of the practice of silent reading. The pictures and texts in books of hours offered supernatural role models of piety, literacy, charity, compassion, obedience, humility, and fertility, and thereby inscribed in their owners socially sanctioned values and behaviors. The prayers in books of hours forged relationships not only between the individual devotee and the supernatural community, but also between the book owner and the “human community” of which she/he was a member.

KATHRYN A. SMITH

References and Further Reading

- Backhouse, Janet. Books of Hours. London: The British Library, 1985.
- Bell, Susan Groag. “Medieval Women Book Owners: Arbiters of Lay Piety and Ambassadors of Culture.” Originally published in Signs 7(4) (1982), pp. 742–768. Reprinted in Sisters and Workers in the Middle Ages, edited by Judith M. Bennett, Elizabeth A. Clark, Jean F. O’Barr, B. Anne Vilen, and Sarah Westphal-Wihl. Chicago and London: The University of Chicago Press, 1989, pp. 312–332.
- Bennett, Adelaide. “A Thirteenth-Century French Book of Hours for Marie.” The Journal of The Walters Art Gallery 54 (1996): 21–50.
- Brayer, Edith. Lives d’Heures contenant des textes en français. Centre National de la Recherche Scientifique, Bulletin d’Information de l’Institut de Recherche et d’Histoire des Textes 12 (1963): 31–102.
- Caviness, Madeline H. “Patron or Matron? A Capetian Bride and a Vade Mecum for Her Marriage Bed.” Speculum 68(2) (1993) 333–362.
- De Hamel, Christopher. A History of Illuminated Manuscripts. Boston: David R. Godine, 1986, second, revised edition, London: Phaidon.
- . “Books of Hours: ‘Imaging’ the Word.” In The Bible as Book: The Manuscript Tradition, edited by John L. Sharpe III and Kimberly van Kampen. London: The British Library Publications; and New Castle, Del.: Oak Knoll Press, 1998, pp. 137–143.
- Delaisé, L. M. J. “The Importance of Books of Hours for the History of the Medieval Book.” In Gatherings in Honor of Dorothy E. Miner, edited by Ursula E. McCracken, Lilian M. C. Randall, and Richard H. Randall, Jr. Baltimore: The Walters Art Gallery, 1974, pp. 203–225.
- Donovan, Claire. The De Brailes Hours: Shaping the Book of Hours in Thirteenth-Century Oxford. Toronto and Buffalo: University of Toronto Press, 1991.
- Drigsdahl, Erik. “New Tests for the Localization of the Hore Beate Marie Virginis.” Center for Håndskriftstudier i Danmark. http://www.chd.dk/use/hv\_chdtest.html (1997–2002).
- Duffy, Eamon. The Stripping of the Altars: Traditional Religion in England 1400–1580. New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 1992.
- Harthan, John. Books of Hours and Their Owners. London: Thames and Hudson, 1977.
- Leroquais, Victor. Les Livres d’Heures manuscrits de la Bibliothèque Nationale. 2 vols. Paris: Protat Frères, 1927.
- . Supplément aux Livres d’heures manuscrits de la Bibliothèque Nationale (acquisitions recent et donation Smith-Lesouëf). Mâcon: Protat Frères, 1943.
- Muir, Bernard J. “The Early Insular Prayer Book Tradition and the Development of the Book of Hours.” In The Art of the Book: Its Place in Medieval Worship, edited by Margaret M. Manion and Bernard J. Muir. Exeter: University of Exeter Press, 1998, pp. 9–19.
- Naughton, Joan. “A Minimally-Intrusive Presence: Portraits in Illustrations for Prayers to the Virgin.” In Medieval Texts and Images: Studies of Manuscripts from the Middle Ages, edited by Margaret M. Manion and Bernard J. Muir. Chur, Switzerland and New York: Harwood Academic Publishers, 1991, pp. 111–206.
- Penketh, Sandra. “Women and Books of Hours.” In Women and the Book: Assessing the Visual Evidence, edited by Jane H. M. Taylor and Lesley Smith. London: The British Library Publications; Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1997, pp. 266–281.
- Reinburg, Virginia. “Hearing Lay People’s Prayer.” In Culture and Identity in Early Modern Europe (1500–1800): Essays in Honor of Natalie Zemon Davis, edited by Barbara B. Diefendorf and Carla Hesse. Ann Arbor, Mich.: University of Michigan Press, 1993, pp. 19–39.
- Saenger, Paul. “Books of Hours and the Reading Habits of the Late Middle Ages.” In The Culture of Print, edited by Roger Chartier and translated by Lydia G. Cochrane. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1989, pp. 144–176.
- Smith, Kathryn A. Art, Identity and Devotion in Fourteenth-Century England: Three Women and Their Books of Hours. London: The British Library Publications; Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2003.
- Wieck, Roger S. Time Sanctified: The Book of Hours in Medieval Art and Life. New York: George Braziller, Inc., in association with The Walters Art Gallery, Baltimore, 1988.
- . Painted Prayers: The Book of Hours in Medieval and Renaissance Art. George Braziller, Inc., in association with The Pierpont Morgan Library, New York, 1997.

The author wishes to acknowledge the assistance of Adelaide Bennett, Lucy Freeman Sandler, and Roger S. Wieck in preparing this entry.

See also Art, Representations of Women in; Anne; Book Ownership; Modern Devotion; Devotional Art; Devotional Practices; Education, Lay; Hagiography; Lay Piety; Literacy and Reading; Latin; Literacy and Reading; Vernacular; Marginalia, Manuscript; Mary, Virgin; Mary, Virgin: in Art; Mothers as Teachers; Patronage, Artistic

BOYS

See Girls and Boys

BREASTFEEDING AND WET-NURSING

The relationship between mothers and infants is universally complicated, especially in premodern, environmentally stressed societies. Most societies, with very few exceptions, have extolled maternal breastfeeding. This is true even when those women who could afford it sent their infants out to wet nurses. Before the widespread use of methods of artificial feeding, wet-nursing was critical to the survival of infants whose mothers died in childbirth or who were otherwise unable to feed them. Some historians of medieval society have seen in the apparent reluctance of women to breastfeed a reluctance to invest emotionally in an infant whose survival was precarious. Other historians have suggested that wealthy families who sent their children out to nurse did so as a matter of strategy, since lactation impedes fertility and wealthy women and their families wished to space births as close together as possible.

Attitudes towards maternal breastfeeding and wet-nursing in medieval Europe owed much to ancient medical literature by Soranus of Ephesus (fl. early second century CE) and Galen (129–c. 199 CE) as well as to Latin translations by Gerard of Cremona (d. 1187) of Arabic texts by Avicenna (d. 1037), and broad compendia such as those written by Bartholomaeus Anglicus (fl. early thirteenth century). Although there were wide divergences of opinion among medical authorities, virtually all believed that in the first few days after birth the newborn should have nothing to eat, or if the infant seemed hungry, to feed it with goat's milk. Some commentators followed Soranus in suggesting that the mother's milk was unsuitable for the first three weeks; others followed Galen in allowing breast milk to be given after the third day. Thus medical opinion, both medieval and ancient, contributed to high infant mortality by denying infants the immunological benefits of colostrums (the easily digested breast milk produced in the first few days after birth).

Where ancient and medieval medicine did not necessarily accord a preference to breastfeeding or wet-nursing, Roman moralists in particular insisted on the importance of maternal breastfeeding and on avoiding wet nurses, who not only might disrupt the maternal bond but who also, via their milk, could pass on to the nursing child their defects of character. This did not completely exclude the possibility of using animal milk as a substitute for breastfeeding, but fears that children nursed on the milk of such animals would imbibe their animal natures made most experiments in this direction scattered and tentative. In the eyes of moralists, the human defects of wet nurses' characters were legion, ranging from their perceived rural coarseness, which could interfere with the child's proper speech development, to infanticide by overlaying (accidental suffocation in bed) and starvation. The most common accusation leveled against wet nurses was that they allowed children under their care to die but continued collecting payments. Stereotypes of wet nurses portrayed them as greedy and negligent peasant women, although areas that were highly urbanized often drew their wet nurses from within the urban population, especially in cities that were part of thriving trade networks that ensured a steady supply of slaves and servants.

Certain rural economies, especially in Mediterranean Europe, became known as places for the urban upper class as well as foundling hospitals to send their children. The wealthiest urban families might take in a wet nurse temporarily, but especially in periods of epidemic disease, they often sent their children into the countryside in the belief that rural air, especially in the mountains, had important health benefits for the child. Women who took up wet nursing as an occupation, at least in central Italy during the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, were usually married, and their income served as a secondary rather than a primary household support. Medieval processions often included wet nurses as a corporate social group, with its own carnival songs praising the skill and efficiency with which they soothed children and changed their swaddling bands.

Both urban and rural wet nurses risked being caught up in an endless cycle of poverty as well as having to give up their own infants on either a temporary or a permanent basis. Wet nurses who worked for foundling hospitals often gave their own infant to the foundling hospital in order to be paid for providing milk to another of the hospital's charges. Hospital officials often accused wet nurses of defrauding the institution by surreptitiously arranging to have their own children returned to them and receiving payments from the hospital. Female infants who survived the institutional rigors of high mortality rates might receive a small dowry with which they eventually could marry and then take up wet nursing themselves.

Accusations of infanticide by overlaying were quite common, although in the cases where evidence is most abundant, patterns of mortality by age and gender suggest that many of these were cases of sudden infant death syndrome, since males under the age of fourteen months were the most vulnerable to "suffocation." Girls at wet nurse were more likely to suffer death by starvation. Certainly moralists and families alike found in the practices of both breastfeeding and wet-nursing yet another opportunity to project their anxieties concerning race, class, and gender onto a group of women who might be economically and socially marginal, but into whose hands parents entrusted the power of life and death over their progeny.

PHILIP GAVITT

References and Further Reading

Blaffer-Hrdy, Sarah. "Fitness Tradeoffs in the History and Evolution of Delegated Mothering with Special Reference to Wet-Nursing." Ethology and Sociobiology 13 (1992): 409–442.

Demaitre, Luke. "The Idea of Childhood and Child Care in Medical Writings of the Middle Ages." Journal of Psychohistory 4 (1977): 461–490.

Fildes, Valerie. Breasts, Bottles, and Babies: A History of Infant Feeding. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1986.

———. Wet Nursing: A History from Antiquity to the Present. Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1988.

Gavitt, Philip. Charity and Children in Renaissance Florence: The Ospedale degli Innocenti, 1410–1536. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1990.

———. "Infant Death in Late Medieval Florence: the Smothering Hypothesis Reconsidered." In Medieval Family Roles: A Book of Essays, edited by Cathy Jorgensensn Itnyre. New York and London: Garland Publishing, 1996, pp. 137–153.

Haas, Louis. The Renaissance Man and His Children: Childbirth and Early Childhood in Florence, 1300–1600. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1998.

Klapisch-Zuber, Christiane. "Blood Parents and Milk Parents: Wet Nursing in Florence, 1300–1530." In Women, Family, and Ritual in Renaissance Italy, translated by Lydia Cochrane. Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1985.

Otis, Leah L. "Municipal Wet Nurses in Fifteenth-Century Montpellier." In Women and Work in Pre-Industrial Europe, edited by Barbara Hanawalt. Bloomington, Ind.: Indiana University Press, 1986.

Origo, Iris. "The Domestic Enemy: Eastern Slaves in Tuscany in the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Centuries." Speculum 30 (1955): 321–366.

Ross, James Bruce. "The Middle-Class Child in Urban Italy, Fourteenth to Early Sixteenth Century." In The History of Childhood, edited by Lloyd de Mause. New York: The Psychohistory Press, 1974, pp. 183–228.

Shahar, Shulamith. "Infants, Infant Care, and Attitudes Towards Infancy in the Medieval Lives of Saints." Journal of Psychohistory 10 (1983): 281–309.

Trexler, Richard. "Infanticide in Florence: New Sources and First Results." History of Childhood Quarterly 1 (1973): 98–116.

Wickes, I. G. "A History of Infant Feeding." Archives of Disease in Childhood 28 (1953): 151–158, 232–240, 332–340, 416–422, 495–502.

See also Contraception; Fosterage; Hospitals; Infants and Infanticide; Pregnancy and Childbirth

BREWING

See Alewives and Brewing

BRIDE OF CHRIST: IMAGERY

Medieval bridal imagery is devotional and pedagogical rather than theological. It is found most frequently in what is generally termed "bridal," "affective," or "love" mysticism. Bridal imagery reached its peak of popularity in western Europe between the twelfth and fourteenth centuries, with much of its pervasiveness indebted to the reform-driven milieu of Cistercian monasticism. The imagery is more textual than artistic, and can be found in diverse religious genres, from poetry to sermons.

The ritual prototype for medieval bridal spirituality is found in the consecration liturgy for nuns as brides of Christ. It constitutes a variation of the hieros gamos (sacred marriage) symbolism found in other world religions. Christian doctrine assigned divinity to the bridegroom only, with the effect of reinforcing masculine gender privileges. Devotional practices, however, sometimes challenged such gender asymmetry by claiming "divine" status for the bride in her three interrelated manifestations as Ecclesia (Church), as the Virgin Mary, and as the human soul.

Bridal imagery is paradoxical and conflicted. It presents explicit erotic content, yet it also extols celibacy and pronounces the inherent sinfulness of sexual desire (concupiscence). From its scattered origins in Hebrew and Christian Scriptures (e.g., Song of Songs, Isaiah 54:4–7; Jeremiah 2:32; Revelation 19:7; Psalm 45:10–17), bridal imagery is circumscribed by its polar opposite, the prostitute (Hosea 1:2), underscoring the discriminatory double standard applied to female social and sexual roles, whether assigned to men or women.

The devotional use of bridal imagery emerged in the context of non-Christian Western social systems, which recognized a variety of marital and sexual contracts geared toward the maintenance of kinship systems and the economic and social survival of groups. Traditionally, a betrothal was negotiated between families rather than individuals, and could be contracted for children. Marriage was publicly recognized through the adult couple's initiation of sexual activities. Bridal spirituality thus evoked a strong erotic undercurrent and a host of contractual obligations and family alliances in an uneasy relationship with an increasingly restrictive Christian model.

Scholars generally credit the Cistercian reform movement with the revitalization and dissemination of bridal spirituality. Bridal metaphors appealed to an adult population of converts in that they could ease the radical transition from a secular to a religious lifestyle. It framed conversion as a betrothal and the contractual entry into a prestigious new spiritual “kin” with Christ as bridegroom and the human soul as chaste, that is, celibate bride. The psycho-spiritual aspects of bridal symbolism were articulated most prominently by the Cistercian abbot Bernard of Clairvaux (1090–1154), and further developed by contemporaries such as William of Saint-Thierry (1070/1090–1148). Vernacular adaptations flourished across Europe, as in the St. Trudperter Hohelied (c. 1150/1160) or in Middle English poetry devoted to the Virgin Mary.

Bernard’s writings expound on all three manifestations of bridal imagery. The strand of images closest to biblical sources identifies Ecclesia as bride of Christ (cf. II Cor. 11:2; Rev. 19:6 ff). Medieval exegetes extended the bride-whore rhetoric to denounce Judaism, the opposite of Ecclesia, in the figure of Synagoga. Even an author valorizing the nuptial femininity of Ecclesia, such as the abbess Hildegard of Bingen (1098–1187), followed in the steps of Church Father St. Augustine (354–430), who declared that “A great and singular honor belongs to the bridegroom [Christ]: he found [Ecclesia] a harlot and made her a virgin” (Sermo I.8). Hildegard evoked Synagoga as wounded and maimed, as “pale from the head down to the navel and black from the navel to the feet, which were bloody. . . she had no eyes” (Scivias I.5).

Female mystics of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries developed audacious interpretations of the bride as a noble and strong woman transformed through love into full divinity, at times adapting courtly love metaphors as well. Prominent among them are the Beguine authors Mechthild of Magdeburg (c. 1212–1282) and Hadewijch (fl. middle of thirteenth century). Other women experienced visions of marrying Christ the bridegroom, including Gertrude the Great of Helfta (1256–1301/1302), Angela of Foligno (1248/1249–1309), and Catherine of Siena (1347–1380), who received stigmata in the form of a wedding band.

The third symbolic category identifies the Bride of Christ with Mary, Mother of God. As Regina Coeli, Queen of Heaven, she is coregent with Christ. The coronation of the Virgin Mary as Heavenly Bride and representative of Ecclesia is one of the most frequent artistic depictions of bridal imagery.

Further scholarly exploration of bridal imagery is needed in regard to apocalyptic themes, such as the marriage of the Lamb and the New Jerusalem (Rev. 19:7 ff), mutual influences of Christian and Jewish bridal language, especially in regard to interpretations of the Song of Songs, and the confluence of bridal mysticism with other mystical schools of thought.

ULRIKE WIETHAUS

References and Further Reading

- Bynum, Caroline Walker. Jesus as Mother: Studies in the Spirituality of the High Middle Ages. Berkeley and Los Angeles, 1982.
- Mechthild of Magdeburg. The Flowing Light of the Godhead, translated and introduced by Frank Tobin. New York: Paulist, 1998.
- Neaman, Judith. “The Harlot Bride: From Biblical to Mystical Topos.” In On Pilgrimage, edited by Margot H. King. Winnipeg: Peregrina Publishing, 1994.
- Newman, Barbara. Sister of Wisdom: St. Hildegard’s Theology of the Feminine. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1987.

See also Betrothals; Bible, Women in; Cistercian Order; Courtly Love; Devotional Literature; Eroticism in Literature; Femininity and Masculinity; Gender Ideologies; Hadewijch; Mary, Virgin; Mechthild of Magdeburg; Minnesang; Mysticism and Mystics; Sexuality: Extramarital Sex; Sexuality: Female Same-Sex Relations; Sexuality: Male Same-Sex Relations; Sexuality, Regulation of; Sexuality: Sex in Marriage; Song of Songs, Medieval Interpretation of; Soul; Typology and Women; Virginity

BRIGIT

Brigit (c. 452–524/528) of Kildare was the founder and patron saint of the monastery of Kildare in the medieval Irish kingdom of Leinster. She is the earliest recognized female saint and abbess in Ireland. Her feast day is February 1. What is known of her rests entirely on legend and tradition, which has it that she was born in the mid-fifth century; that her father was a nobleman and her mother his slave; that she performed several miracles throughout her life; and that she was renowned for her charity and hospitality. Some have even seen her as a euhemerization (the result of the process of a human becoming worshipped as a god) of an Irish goddess of the same name, as she acquired several of the same attributes as the goddess, such as being the patron of poets, smiths, healers, and women in childbirth. She was revered as one of the leading saints of early medieval Ireland, together with Patrick and Columba. Her foundation at Kildare was a double house for both men and women, the only one recorded in Ireland, and an important episcopal seat in the medieval Irish Church. The abbess ruled as an equal to the bishop; one legend relates that Brigit was actually consecrated a bishop, but this cannot be proven in fact. Brigit is described in a seventh-century text as the abbess “whom all the abbesses of the Irish revere,” and the office of abbess of Kildare remained the most prestigious position for an Irish female religious up until the twelfth century.

DOROTHY ANN BRAY

References and Further Reading

- Connolly, Seán, trans. "Vita Prima Sanctae Brigitae." Journal of the Royal Society of Antiquaries of Ireland 119 (1989): 5–49.
- Connolly, Seán, and J.-M. Picard, trans. "Cogitosus's Life of St Brigit." Journal of the Royal Society of Antiquaries of Ireland 117 (1987): 5–27.
- Harrington, Christina. Women in a Celtic Church: Ireland 450–1150. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2002.
- Ó hAodha, Donncha, ed. and trans. Bethu Brigte. Dublin: Dublin Institute for Advanced Studies, 1978.

See also Abbesses; Double Monasteries; Hagiography; Ireland; Monasticism and Nuns, Celtic

BRUNHILD AND FREDEGUND

Brunhild (d. 613) and Fredegund (d. 596/597) are among the best known Merovingian queens. Both were heavily criticized by contemporary sources and became symbols of political perversity. Fredegund was a low-born servant who started her career as King Chilperic's mistress and ended as queen of Neustria. Although she is accused of ordering the assassination of Galswintha, Brunhild's sister, there is no evidence that she instigated the murder. After her husband's death, she functioned as regent for her surviving son, the future king Clothar II.

Unlike Fredegund, Brunhild was a Visigothic princess. She married Sigebert of Austrasia. As a royal widow, she became regent for her son and grandsons. She was a powerful queen and ruled Austrasia with little hindrance. In 613, abandoned by the Austrasian aristocracy, she was put to death by Clothar II. Brunhild and Fredegund were enemies, because each played a leading role in Merovingian dynastic conflicts.

Although different in their social origins and careers, these two queens can be considered archetypes of female power in a period when the notion of queenship had not yet crystallized. Lacking any institutionalized role, Merovingian queens were reliant on their husbands or sons, but alongside this dependence, they enjoyed a certain amount of sexual freedom and could participate in the cycle of violent feuds. Beyond their gendered weakness and reputations for evil, these two Merovingian queens exemplify the traditional political behavior which characterized the Merovingian elite.

NIRA PANCER

References and Further Reading

- Gregory of Tours. The History of the Franks, edited and translated by Lewis Thorpe. Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1974.

- Harrison, Dick. The Age of Abbesses and Queens. Sweden: Nordic Academic Press, 1998.
- Nelson, Janet. "Queens as Jezebels: the Careers of Brunhild and Balthild in Merovingian History." In Medieval Women, edited by Derek Baker. Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1985, pp. 31–77.
- Pancer, Nira. Sans peur et sans vergogne: De l'honneur et des femmes aux premiers temps mérovingiens. Paris, Albin Michel, 2001.
- Stafford, Pauline. Queens, Concubines and Dowagers: The King's Wife in Early Middle Ages. Athens, Ga.: University of Georgia Press, 1983.
- Wood, Ian. The Merovingian Kingdoms, 450–751. London: Longman, 1994.

See also Frankish Lands; Queens and Empresses: The West; Violence

BURGUNDIAN NETHERLANDS

Dominating the economic, political, and cultural life of northwestern Europe in the late fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, the Burgundian Netherlands (1384–1556) comprised most of the modern-day Low Countries. This territory was under the control of the Burgundian dukes, a cadet branch of the French royal house. In contrast to the preceding period, the Burgundian era witnessed a general constriction in the political, social, and economic roles of women. The Burgundian dukes—Philip the Bold, John the Fearless, Philip the Good, and Charles the Bold—centralized their authority by expanding the bureaucracy, and women were no longer appointed to bureaucratic positions. What never disappeared was the capacity of women to hold princely office. Upon the death of her father, Charles, in 1477, Mary of Burgundy (1477–1482) became duchess; fifteen years later, her daughter, Margaret of Austria, was chosen governor of the region (1507–1530), in large part because the local populace preferred her to her father, Maximilian of Hapsburg. The region's preeminence in the later Middle Ages, however, owed more to its continuing vibrant and diverse economy than to political innovation. Industrialization and specialization, particularly in the manufacture of textiles, attained a degree of sophistication virtually unrivaled throughout late medieval Europe.

Women found employment at all levels of the economy and thus were able to maintain some degree of autonomy. They were not only peasants, fruit sellers, and innkeepers, but also fishers, tanners, and moneylenders. Above all, they combed, spun, wove and dyed wool, sheared, selvedged, and sold cloth. Such occupations were skilled, and travelers to the region, such as Luigi Guicciardini, remarked on the breadth and depth of literacy, in both French and Dutch, for women as well as men in the region. Access to the workplace, in conjunction with inheritance practices that generally privileged the spouse over progeny, enabled women to hold property (both movable and immovable) in their own name. These circumstances underlay the relatively large proportion of women identified as single in places such as Hulst (where they comprised one-quarter of all taxpayers in 1441), and in the fishing town of Blankenberghe, where, in the first quarter of the fifteenth century, single women made up almost twenty-three percent of the population.

Women were not generally considered to be under male legal guardianship. Although in most regions married men had become recognized as heads of households, single women could still make contracts, sue and be sued, testify, and stand surety. Because women tended to disappear into the conjugal unit, it has widely been assumed that, when they left the single state behind, they also relinquished rights—particularly property rights, which had been essential to their survival as autonomous single persons. Married women, however, retained interest not only in the property they brought to a marriage (dowries were uncommon), but also in that property which was acquired during the relationship. They often acted for the family in the absence of the male spouse and occasionally even when he was present. Throughout the later Middle Ages, women with their bastard children continued to constitute a legally and socially recognized, although somewhat disadvantaged, unit. Single women and their children, for example, made up a large proportion of the poor.

Marriage, albeit often in an unblest form, remained the preferred state for both men and women. Even a notable portion of the clergy maintained quasi-marital households. Burgundian marriage practices were shaped by a number of circumstances. There is evidence that, before the Counter-Reformation, both men and women took pleasure in sex, both inside and—despite canonical teachings to the contrary—outside of marriage. This, combined with the twin pressures of economic constriction and family ambition, led to an uncoupling of marriage and sexual experience. While there is no doubt that some unions were based on passion and companionship, hard-headed concerns for economic and social status meant that many marriages were contracted on a less sentimental basis. Marriage opportunities came out of a matrix of propinquity, family networks and interests, class expectations, and economic concerns. Increasingly frequent abductions, both violent (rape) and voluntary (elopement), nonetheless reflect widespread attempts, however, to thwart convention.

Women's experience in the Burgundian Netherlands must be viewed against a backdrop of increasing constriction, due not only to the crises of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, but also to increasing centralization of ducal government and the institutionalization of city offices. The imposition of French administrative procedures and Roman law valorized Parisian norms in both language and social practice. The infractions for which women were most often punished became increasingly those perceived as specific to a gendered female role: prostitution, neglect of house or of children, and quarrelling. This combination of economic, political, moral, and social constriction increasingly forced women out of the marketplace and into the increasingly dominant social unit, the household. Women began to find positions in trade and guilds closed off to them. In certain places, Beguines, for example, came to be prohibited from selling cloth. The refocusing of manufacture on cottage households effectively diminished women's autonomy, submerging and subordinating their economic activity within a domestic social unity now perceived as headed by a male householder.

ELLEN E. KITTELL

References and Further Reading

- Blockmans, Wim, and Walter Prevenier. The Promised Lands: The Low Countries Under Burgundian Rule, 1369–1530. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999.
- Danneel, Marianne. Weduwen en wezen in het laat-middeleeuwse Gent. Leuven: Garant, 1995.
- Godding, Philippe. Le droit privé dans les Pays-Bas méridionaux du 12e au 18e siècle. Brussels: Palais des Académies, 1987.
- Howell, Martha. The Marriage Exchange: Property, Social Place, and Gender in Cities of the Low Countries, 1300–1550. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1998.
- . Women, Production, and Patriarchy in Late Medieval Cities. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1986.
- Kittell, Ellen, and Mary Suydam, eds. The Texture of Society: Medieval Women in the Southern Low Countries. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004.
- Prevenier, Walter, and Wim Blockmans. The Burgundian Netherlands. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1986.
- Simons, Walter. Cities of Ladies: Beguine Communities in the Medieval Low Countries, 1200–1565. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001.

See also Beguines; Cities and Towns; Clothwork, Domestic; Education, Lay; Flanders; Hadewijch; Landholding and Property Rights; Market and Tradeswomen; Marriage, Christian; Mary of Burgundy; Rape and Raptus; Singlewomen; Textile Production for the Market; Work

BURIALS AND TOMBS

Funerary monuments provide some of the most visible material documents of the status of medieval women. Guardians of family memory, women took an active part in the commemoration of the deceased, including the planning and design of tombs. Examples of female patronage and imagery survive from almost every major medieval society. Because tombs of the upper classes were more prominent, more protected, and more likely made of durable materials, their burials are more easily documented than others.

Christian Rome and the Frankish Lands

In contrast with pre-Christian culture, aristocratic women of Christian Rome were encouraged to take a public role in constructing monuments, including mausolea and chapels at saints' burial sites. Such funerary monuments were intended to reinforce group identity, whether of relatives, social group, or coreligionists. The empress regent Galla Placidia

Eleanor of Aquitaine. Wife of Henry II and mother of Richard I, the Lionhearted. Died 1204 in Fontevrault, France. Tombs of the Plantagenet Kings. 13th c. Location: Abbey, Fontevrault, France. Credit: Erich Lessing / Art Resource, NY.

(r. 425–437) constructed a mausoleum as part of the palace chapel in Ravenna. Renowned for its mosaics, the vaults are ornamented with starry skies and paradisaical foliage. Family status is suggested by the Good Shepherd in imperial robes, and family origins by an image of Vincent of Saragossa. If Galla Placidia planned to be buried there, she did not achieve her purpose, for she died in Rome in 450 and her burial place is unknown.

The practise of burial ad sanctos, near the body of a saint, transformed cities during the early Middle Ages. Despite prohibitions against burials within city walls, religious communities sought to keep relics of their precious saints with them. The case of the saintly Queen Radegund (d. 587) documents the laments of the nuns who would not be able to tend her grave outside of Poitiers, since they were not allowed to leave their monastery. Eventually she was translated to a church within the city walls. As relics like hers were brought into urban churches, graveyards grew up surrounding church grounds. Well-to-do families established burial chapels within monasteries, a custom that endured past the Middle Ages. Individuals who could afford epitaphs or decorated tombs marked their resting places thus. Burial itself, like that of Radegund, could include embalming with herbs and spices in a linen shroud. Aristocrats were richly attired when buried, accompanied by weapons and luxury objects to indicate their status. On the other hand, Gertrude of Nivelles (d. 659), a member of the family that founded the Carolingian dynasty, requested to be buried in her old hair shirt and a linen veil left to her by a woman pilgrim. Such clothing attested to the abbess's humility, as well as to the sanctity of the donor.

Theodechilde (d. c. 662–667), abbess of the double monastery of Jouarre, was provided with an ornamental stone sarcophagus and an inscription celebrating her virtue. Using imagery traditional for women's monuments since early Christianity, the inscription describes her inviting the nuns to meet the bridegroom Christ as did the Wise Virgins (Matthew 25:1–13).

Iberia

Although tomb imagery was not always gender-specific, especially in the early Middle Ages, such themes were consistently associated with women. Sancha, wife of Fernán González, first Count of Castilla (d. c. 970), was buried in a late antique sarcophagus with a contemporary lid. Such reuse of older sarcophagi was frequent. To emphasize her status as wife, the portrait of a couple on her tomb was recarved with Sancha and Fernando's features. More individualized monuments developed from the late eleventh century onward. The sarcophagus of the Aragonese princess, Doña Sancha (d. 1096), was sculptured to depict her rank and expected salvation. Her soul appears as a nude child ascending to heaven, flanked by clergy and an image of Sancha herself enthroned with her sisters. They were eventually buried in the same sarcophagus at the convent she founded. On the back of the tomb are scenes of men in combat, which may refer to the Reconquest, but also to the struggle of virtue with vice.

The sarcophagus of Queen Blanca of Navarra, who died as a result of childbirth in 1156, is notable for its particularly rich expression of female experience. The queen is shown in her deathbed attended by angels who lift her soul, as if a newborn child, towards Christ on the lid above. On either side are male and female mourners, including her grief-stricken husband. It was in the Spanish kingdoms that tombs frequently depicted the death and burial of heroic or beloved figures with mourners lamenting their loss. Biblical imagery included the Visitation, the Adoration of the Magi, the Judgment of Solomon, the Massacre of the Innocents, Mary lamenting Jesus's crucifixion, and the Wise and Foolish Virgins. The woman's value as mother, intercessor, and protector of family interests is illustrated there. Blanca was interred in the Navarrese royal pantheon in Nájera, while her husband, Sancho (d. 1158), was laid to rest in Castilian Toledo. Their deceased infants were buried in Soria (Castilla); only one, Alfonso VIII, survived to maturity.

Queens and Empresses

As with Blanca, queens were not necessarily buried with their kings, but could exercise different prerogatives, depending upon circumstances and ambition. While ten Byzantine empresses from the fourth through the eleventh centuries shared their husbands' sarcophagi at the Church of the Holy Apostles in Constantinople, the same number had their own tombs. Several twelfth-century Crusader kings of Jerusalem found burial within the Church of the Holy Sepulcher, at the tomb of Jesus. Some Crusader queens (Morphia, d. before 1129, and her daughter Melisende, d. 1161) were interred in a corresponding situation, at the Church of Our Lady in Jehosaphat, where a cenotaph honored the Virgin Mary. It had been assumed that many French queens were "excluded" from the royal resting place of Saint-Denis, but recent research indicates a separate reginal tradition there, as in England. Several, such as Adelaide of Maurienne (d. 1154), chose to be buried at monasteries they supported.

In other instances, women were the instigators in establishing and maintaining family monuments consolidating, at the same time, political claims. Fernando I (d. 1065), was persuaded by his queen, Sancha (d. 1067), to abandon his Castilian family's burial site in favor of her more prestigious royal pantheon in San Isidoro in León. Their granddaughter, Queen Urraca (d. 1126), commissioned frescoes for the crypt, including her grandparents kneeling at the Crucifixion. In contrast with the splendidly painted ceiling, the tombs themselves are undecorated. Around 1200, Eleanor of Aquitaine probably commissioned the innovative effigies of her second husband, Henry II of England (d. 1189), their son Richard I (d. 1199), and herself (d. 1204) at the convent of Fontevraud in the Aquitaine. These are among the earliest surviving life-size sculptured effigies. Although the kings are shown lying in state, Eleanor is alive and reading a book, a frequent attribute of aristocratic women.

Family and Territory

In the Low Countries and England between the thirteenth and fifteenth centuries, the tomb of kinship developed as a means to articulate familial identity and establish territorial hegemony. Typically, these monuments displayed an effigy of the occupant accompanied by members of the family, alive or deceased. Unlike Spanish examples, these figures do not participate in the funeral but are arranged on the tomb chest, in a hierarchy reflecting family history or relationships, identified by inscriptions, heraldic devices, or dress. The tomb of Queen Philippa of Hainault (d. 1369) exemplifies this genre. Consort of Edward III, she articulated English ambitions to claim the French throne and perhaps also to Hainault and Holland in the design of her tomb. Her most important male kin, all regents, appear at the head and foot of the tomb, with her children and their spouses along the sides. As these examples illustrate, funerary monuments consistently provided noble women an instrument by which to commemorate their role as procreators and promoters of family consciousness.

ELIZABETH VALDEZ DEL ÁLAMO

References and Further Reading

- Brown, Peter. The Cult of the Saints: Its Rise and Function in Latin Christianity. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press, 1981.
- Caldwell, Susan Havens. "Urraca of Zamora and San Isidoro in Leon: Fulfillment of a Legacy." Woman's Art Journal 7 (1986): 19–25.
- Carrasco, Magdalena Elizabeth. "Spirituality in Context: The Romanesque Illustrated Life of St. Radegund of Poitiers." The Art Bulletin 72(3) (1990): 414–435.
- Caviness, Madeline. "Anchoress, Abbess, and Queen: Donors and Patrons or Intercessors and Matron?" In The Cultural Patronage of Medieval Women, edited by June Hall McCash. Athens, Ga.: University of Georgia Press, 1996, pp. 105–154.
- Effros, Bonnie. Caring for Body and Soul: Burial and the Afterlife in the Merovingian Period. University Park, Pa.: Pennsylvania State University Press, 2002.
- Erlande-Brandenburg, Alain. Le roi est mort: étude sur les funérailles, les sépultures et les tombeaux des rois de France jusqu'à la fin du XIIIe siècle. Geneva: Droz, 1975.
- Geary, Patrick J. Phantoms of Remembrance: Memory and Oblivion at the End of the First Millennium. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1994.
- Mackie, Gillian. "New Light on the So-Called Saint Lawrence Panel at the Mausoleum of Galla Placidia, Ravenna." Gesta 29(1) (1990): 54–60.
- Martin, Therese. "The Art of a Reigning Queen as Dynastic Propaganda in Twelfth-Century Spain." Speculum 80(4) (2005): 1134–1171.
- . "Queen as King: Patronage at the Romanesque Church of San Isidoro in León." Ph.D. dissertation, University of Pittsburgh, 2000.
- Morganstern, Anne McGee. Gothic Tombs of Kinship in France, the Low Countries, and England. University Park, Pa.: The Pennsylvania State University Press, 2000.
- Nolan, Kathleen. "The Queen's Body and Institutional Memory: The Tomb of Adelaide de Maurienne." In Memory and the Medieval Tomb, edited by Elizabeth Valdez del Alamo with Carol Stamatis Pendergast. Aldershot: Ashgate, 2000, pp. 249–267.
- . "The Queen's Choice: Eleanor of Aquitaine and the Tombs at Fontevraud." In Eleanor of Aquitaine: Lord and Lady, edited by Bonnie Wheeler and John Carmi Parsons. New York and Houndmills, England: Palgrave Macmillan, 2002, pp. 377–405.
- Panofsky, Erwin. Tomb Sculpture: Four Lectures on its Changing Aspects. New York: Abrams, 1964. Reprint, 1992.
- Parsons, John Carmi. "'Never was a body buried in England with such solemnity and honour': The Burials and Posthumous Commemorations of English Queens to 1500." In Queens and Queenship in Medieval Europe, edited by Anne Duggan. Woodbridge, England: Boydell and Brewer, 1997, pp. 317–337.
- Ruiz Maldonado, Margarita. "La contraposición Superbia-Humilitas. El sepulcro de Doña Sancha y otras obras." Goya 146 (1978): 75–81.
- Simon, David. "Doña Sancha Sarcophagus." In The Art of Medieval Spain A.D. 500–1200. New York: The Metropolitan Museum of Art/Abrams, 1993, pp. 229–232.
- Valdez del Alamo, Elizabeth. "Lament for a Lost Queen: The Sarcophagus of Doña Blanca in Nájera." The Art Bulletin 78 (1996): 311–333. Reprinted in Memory and the Medieval Tomb, edited by Elizabeth Valdez

- del Alamo with Carol Stamatis Pendergast. Aldershot: Ashgate, 2000, pp. 43–79.
- van Houts, Elizabeth. Memory and Gender in Medieval Europe, 900–1200. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1999.
- Yasin, Anne Marie. "Funerary Monuments and Collective Identity: From Roman Family to Christian Community." The Art Bulletin 87(3) (2005): 433–457.

See also Architecture, Ecclesiastical; Art, Representations of Women in; Bible, Women in; Book Ownership; Books of Hours; Death, Mourning and Commemoration; Devotional Art; Eleanor of Aquitaine; Family (Earlier Middle Ages); Family (Later Middle Ages); Gender in Art; Gertrude of Nivelles; Grave Goods; Hagiography; Jouarre and Chelles; Kinship; Mary, Virgin: in Art; Monasticism and Nuns; Noble Women; Patronage, Artistic; Patronage, Ecclesiastical; Queens and Empresses: the West; Radegund; Soul; Urraca

BUSINESS

It is possible to trace women's participation in business in cities and towns, as lead investors in commercial and artisan industrial enterprises, as masters apprenticing assistants in some few guilds, and as real estate investors, among other occupations. Women were also household managers, procuresses of brothels, and simple market sellers, or shopkeepers. In rural areas women managed large estates in the absence of their men, and in the peasant context, peasant widows might succeed, as they did in medieval Provence, to the powers of patria potestas, the paternal authority enjoyed by their late husbands, as household heads.

In some instances husbands and wives worked together in the family enterprise. Certainly this was true in an agricultural context where men did major fieldwork, and women gardened and tended to household and child-rearing chores closer to the homestead. It was also the case in artisan industry and commerce that women might work with their husbands. At times wives had independent business careers. Margery Kempe ran brewing and wheat-milling establishments though her husband was a successful merchant in Lynne. Women owned their own shops in the wool industry in Barcelona in the early fourteenth century. Women of modest station sold foodstuffs, often fruits and vegetables, in urban market squares, setting up collapsible stands daily. Widows of artisans and merchants might direct businesses that they inherited from their late husbands. Noble heiresses and wives of nobles away on military or other matters ran large rural estates, and a few noble women, such as the twelfth-century vicountess Ermengard of Narbonne, directed lordships where political, economic, and legal responsibilities were intertwined. Although not as owners, abbesses administered their monasteries, managing economics and politics on a high level. On the other hand, there is some evidence that women inherited commercial tools and commercial spaces such as breweries; occupations could be passed down from one generation to the next.

The legal agency of women in business varied geographically across Europe. The married woman of northern Europe and Britain was legally a feme covert, engaging in business only under the supervision and legal responsibility of her husband. On the other hand, the feme sole was empowered to engage in business on her own. In the German law of the Sachsenpiegel (Saxon Mirror), husbands acted as guardians of their wives' goods, limiting business control. However, according to Les Etablissements de Saint Louis (The Establishments of St. Louis), a married tradeswoman in northern France could defend herself legally in affairs involving her own business. In some Italian cities, such as Lucca, married women needed the consent of their husbands and close male relatives to sell or dispose of property. In southern France, Roman law allowed women to forgo legal protection, under the authority of the Senatusconsultum Velleianum, which theoretically prevented women from assuming legal engagements on behalf of others. This carved out greater legal agency for women, laying the foundation for their involvement in business. In Mediterranean Europe women invested in commercial partnerships, frequently as investors; they rarely functioned as traveling merchants.

Typically, women were most often present in the textile and food sectors of the medieval economy. In 1270 Etienne Boileau noted five guilds in northern France related to the silk industry that were female-dominated. The Parisian Books of the Taille, tax records with seven levies extending over the period 1292–1313, reveal women in 172 occupations in 1292 and in 130 in 1313, about half the representation of men in both instances. Women were noted in money changing, jewelry production, mercery (ribbons, accessories, fabric adornments), in clothing production, as artists and scribes, as keepers of taverns, as peddlers, and others. Women of the Mediterranean world participated in similar activities. Genoese noblewomen directed the manufacture of gold thread. In the late Middle Ages, women of London enjoyed participation in the silk industry. In Ghent women served as moneychangers, lenders, innkeepers, and cloth wholesalers. Women were excluded from the notariate and from the law, and their participation in medicine was limited and officially prohibited in the later Middle Ages, as medicine became university-based in training, though the presence of women in the care of the sick and in folk remedies persisted.

In all of these capacities, women would appear to be business “owners.” While women’s economic involvement in the Middle Ages was not a direct parallel of men’s roles, women were well integrated into the local business community and conspicuous within the urban and rural economies of western Europe. Women found ways of operating independently and benefited from their extended networks of family and friends. More research would be useful in those areas of Europe in which the laws seem to limit business activities of women to determine whether practice followed the prescriptions of statute and law code.

KATHRYN REYERSON

References and Further Reading

- Hanawalt, Barbara A., ed. Women and Work in Preindustrial Europe. Bloomington, Ind.: Indiana University Press, 1986.
- Herlihy, David. Opera Muliebria. Women and Work in Medieval Europe. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1990.

See also Abbesses; Administration of Estates; Alewives and Brewing; Apprentices; Artisan Families, Women of; Ermengard; Feme Covert; Feme Sole; Investment and Credit; Kempe, Margery; Peasants; Widows; Work

BYZANTIUM

Although Byzantine society was undeniably patriarchal, attitudes toward women were ambivalent. They were arguably a marginalised group, strictly controlled within a patriarchal framework, and if there was no seclusion per se, at least separation of the genders was ideologically considered a norm. In theory women, as the inferior sex, were supposed to be seldom seen and never heard in public. They were denied the power of giving instruction in church and debarred from all priestly functions. Nevertheless, the church acknowledged that women were spiritually equal to men, and there were many well-known female martyrs and saints, while the Theotokos (the ‘Mother of God’) was always a central figure in the devotion of both men and women and was seen as the mediator between humanity and Christ. The icon of the Theotokos holding the Christ child, known as the Hodegetria, was one of the holiest relics in Constantinople. While virginity was considered to be a primary virtue for both men and women, unless women entered the monastic life their major functions were expected to be marriage and the procreation of children. Motherhood was exalted in the cult of the Theotokos and infertility was thought to be a curse.

Gynaikonitis

It is increasingly clear, however, that women were not “secluded” in the Byzantine world, though, conventionally, they were supposed to lead quiet lives at home. The gynaikonitis (women’s quarters), which was a feature of the palace and noble homes, was not an area to which women were restricted, but one where the women of the family could enjoy some privacy and pursue their normal occupations, such as spinning and weaving. It was generally staffed with eunuchs; males were not excluded, but those from outside the immediate family would not enter without invitation. “Respectable” women from the higher socio-economic class were clearly privileged enough to be able to stay at home and delegate activities outside the household to servants and retainers. The majority of the female population, however, which could include anything from housewives and small-scale retailers to prostitutes, maintained a ubiquitous presence on the streets of Constantinople as part of their daily routine. Some women had to work outside the house as a matter of course, and women generally would leave their homes to shop, attend church services, visit the baths or relatives, and participate in festivals and saints’ days. We even know of girls and upper-class women (“women who had never before left the gynaikonitis”) taking part in a spontaneous street riot, when the empress Zoe was threatened with tonsure and exile by her adopted nephew Michael V in April 1042:

I myself saw many women, whom nobody till then had seen outside the women’s quarters, appearing in public and shouting and beating their breasts and lamenting terribly at the empress’s misfortune, but the rest were borne along like Maenads, and they formed no small band to oppose the offender. . . . (Michael Psellos, Chronographia, 5.26)

While the gynaikonitis in the palace certainly did not involve harem-like seclusion, on a number of occasions it was the site of conspiracy and intrigue: the murders of Nikephoros II Phokas and Romanos III Argyros were plotted there by their wives, and Theodora, wife of Justinian, was said to have hidden the heretic patriarch Anthimos in her quarters unsuspected for twelve years. While the story is certainly apocryphal, it conveys the popular perception of the size and secrecy, as well as the qualities of mystery and intrigue, seen as belonging to the imperial gynaikonitis.

In Byzantium, aristocratic women could be shop-owners or supervise a workshop in the basement of their house, and women were deeply involved in retail trade and could be bakers, cooks, innkeepers, bath keepers, washerwomen, gynaecologists, midwives, dancers, prostitutes, weavers, matchmakers and sorcerers, or silk-workers. In the fourteenth century most of the sellers in the markets of Constantinople were women. Aristocratic women could be extremely wealthy in their own right: Danielis, a widow from Patras, in the ninth century, controlled “not a small part of the Peloponnese,” and reportedly owned innumerable slaves, three thousand of whom were freed and settled in southern Italy. Such women were expected to take an active role in the maintenance of their household and supervision of family, servants, and property. Byzantine women had very important rights: a woman possessed her dowry, and daughters could inherit equally with their brothers in cases of intestate succession; widows were left as guardians of their children, and women appeared in court to present their own cases for property disputes and control of dowries.

Empresses

It has been widely accepted that there was segregation of men and women at court, at least before the period of the Komnenoi (1081–1185 CE), and that it was customary for men and women to be separated for ceremonial purposes such as receptions and banquets. Certainly the empress possessed her own court where she would preside over her own ceremonial sphere, consisting of the wives of officials of the state hierarchy. These women were granted court titles corresponding to those of their husbands, such as magistrissai, patrikiai, protospathariai, and kandidatissai (magistrissai were the wives of courtiers with the rank magistros, for example), and their public lives revolved around that of the empress. The need for an empress to oversee a court ceremonial sphere for women was generally accepted, and even validated Leo VI’s third marriage to Eudokia Baiane in 900, which was technically illegal, because the women of the court needed an empress. Males and females at court shared the same space at least some of the time. In the time of Constantine VII Porphyrogenetos, the most eminent patrician woman (the zoste patrikia) ranked fourth in honour in the seating at imperial banquets, even if other women were notably absent from the guest lists for imperial banquets in the ninth and tenth centuries. Given a possible total of some two thousand male courtiers at the end of the ninth century, we have to postulate the existence of a proportionate number of “socially invisible” wives, who would have maintained a presence at specific imperial functions centred around the empress. The empress, when she travelled, could be accompanied by a vast retinue: Theodora, the wife of Justinian, was accompanied by no less than four thousand attendants when she visited the spa at Pythion, though her escort included some of the emperor's officials and not merely her own. It was even possible for an empress-consort to transcend gender boundaries, like Euphrosyne, the wife of Alexios III (1195–1203), who was considered by the historian Choniates to go to unacceptable extremes in holding her own court, at which not merely the wives of dignitaries, but all the dignitaries themselves had to pay her homage.

In the Byzantine empire, power was technically vested in the emperor. Nevertheless, a number of empresses played an important part in government and even took control of the empire when appropriate. Most commonly empresses came to power as regents for young sons, but not all regents were ready to step aside: Irene had her son Constantine VI blinded so that she could stay in power, and Eudokia Makrembolitissa was appointed as regent for her son Michael VII Doukas, even though he was technically of age. Co-ruling regents were officially acknowledged on coins, in acclamations, and in dating formulas, although generally (but not always) yielding precedence to the young emperor. Empresses could also, in exceptional circumstances, rule in their own right, though it was considered more normal that they should take the opportunity to choose a husband and make him emperor. Empresses also possessed power as consorts, but in these circumstances they were naturally bound by the wishes and temperaments of their husbands. The principle of collegiality, however, ensured that in certain cases they were seen almost as co-rulers. An empress interested in politics was able to interview ministers, clerics, and foreign ambassadors without reference to her husband, and correspond privately with world leaders. While the empress primarily presided in her own ceremonial sphere, she also could be present at court banquets, audiences, and the reception of envoys, as well as taking part in processions and in services in the city's churches; one of her main duties was the reception of the wives of foreign rulers and heads of state. Nor were empresses restricted to the capital: empress-consorts also accompanied their husbands on campaign.

Upon the death of an emperor without a nominated heir, the empress had the power to transfer the throne to a new incumbent, generally by marrying him. Zoe Porphyrogenneta, the heir to the throne in her own right, did so four times, legitimising the rule of three husbands and an adopted son. But widowed empress-consorts who had no blood tie with the dynasty were still able to determine the imperial succession, and it was usual but not necessary for the empress to marry this new candidate. Empresses ruled in the same way as emperors: they presided over the court, appointed officials, issued decrees, settled lawsuits, received ambassadors and heads of state, fulfilled the emperor's ceremonial role, and made decisions on matters of financial and foreign policy. They were, however, disadvantaged in not being able to lead an army.

Brides

In Byzantium, beauty was considered of great importance in young girls and a criterion for consideration as a bride even at an imperial level. Between 788 and 882, bride-shows were held five times to select a bride for the heir to the empire. Commissioners were sent out with a picture (lavraton) which portrayed an imperial ideal and had to compare the girls' faces to this ideal portrait, measure their height against an ideal measure, and check their feet against an ideal shoe size. The finalists were brought to the imperial palace where the heir to the throne would choose between them. In these bride-shows the background and family of the girls involved were not a primary consideration, and it is possible that this practice was instituted to avoid pressure from aristocratic families who wanted a daughter chosen as empress. Aristocratic Byzantine women were very aware of their family background, as is shown increasingly in their nomenclature, as they did not need to take the name of their husband or of their father. By the late twelfth century, women, like men, openly displayed all their family connections (such as Irene-Euphrosyne Komnene Doukaina Philanthropene Kantakouzene, an otherwise unknown nun who died c. 1202), and it was customary for empresses to retain their family name as empress.

Prostitution

Prostitution was endemic in the capital. Both Justinian and Michael IV established "homes" for women who wanted to escape from such a life, and Justinian instituted heavy penalties for those who entrapped young girls in prostitution. Nevertheless prostitutes could be encountered on the streets at all periods of Byzantine history, particularly in organised brothels, public baths, inns, and hippodromes, and took part in street festivals and riots. Theatrical performers such as circus artists and actresses were also expected to provide sexual services: Theodora, wife of the emperor Justinian, was a circus artist before her marriage. Prostitutes and mistresses were also a feature of life at court at most periods, and mistresses could be openly paraded as alternative empresses. Imperial mistresses would normally generate little more than lampoons in the street, but Constantine IX Monomachos' passion for his mistress, Skleraina, nearly led to a public riot and his deposition in March 1044 because the people feared for the safety of the elderly empress Zoe, whom they thought he intended to divorce or exile in favour of Skleraina.

Authors and Patrons

Women could play an important role as abbesses and nuns, and noble ladies founded monasteries and acted as patrons of literature. Female literacy was primarily confined to a reading knowledge of the Bible and certain saints' lives, but Byzantium did produce some exceptional female writers. One was the abbess Kassia, a poet and hymnographer of the ninth century who, in her nonliturgical poems, gives us unvarnished observations on friendship, beauty, women, good and bad fortune, the rich and the poor, and vices such as envy and stupidity. Another was the historian Anna Komnene, eldest daughter of the emperor Alexios I Komnenos, who had enjoyed an exceptional education and wrote a biography of her father, the Alexiad, in the first half of the twelfth century.

LYNDA GARLAND

References and Further Reading

- Abrahamse, Dorothy de F. "Women's Monasticism in the Middle Byzantine Period: Problems and Prospects." Byzantinische Forschungen 9 (1985): 35–58.
- Beauchamp, Joelle. Le statut de la femme à Byzance (4e–7e siècle). 2 vols. Paris: de Boccard, 1990.
- Garland, Lynda. "The Life and Ideology of Byzantine Women: A Further Note on Conventions of Behaviour

- and Social Reality as Reflected in Eleventh and Twelfth Century Historical Sources." Byzantion 58 (1988): 361–393.
- . Byzantine Empresses. London: Routledge, 1999.
- Herrin, Judith. "In Search of Byzantine Women: Three Avenues of Approach." In Images of Women in Antiquity, edited by A. Cameron and A. Kuhrt. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1983, pp. 167–189.
- . "Women and the Faith in Icons in Early Christianity." In Culture, Ideology and Politics. Essays for Eric Hobsbawm, edited by R. Samuel and G. Stedman Jones. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1983, pp. 56–83.
- . Women in Purple. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 2001.
- Hill, Barbara. "A Vindication of the Rights of Women to Power by Anna Komnene." Byzantinische Forschungen 23 (1996): 45–53.
- Kazhdan, Alexander P. and Alice-Mary Talbot "Women and Iconoclasm." Byzantinische Zeitschrift 84/85 (1991/1992): 391–408.
- Laiou, Angeliki E. "Observations on the Life and Ideology of Byzantine Women." Byzantinische Forschungen 9 (1985): 59–102.
- . Gender, Society and Economic Life in Byzantium. Aldershot: Variorum, 1992.
- Nicol, Donald M. The Byzantine Lady: Ten Portraits 1250–1500. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994.
- Ringrose, Kathleen M. "Living in the Shadows: Eunuchs and Gender in Byzantium." In Third Sex, Third Gender: Beyond Sexual Dimorphism in Culture and History, edited by G. Herdt. New York: Zone Books, 1994, pp. 85–110.
- Talbot, Alice-Mary. "Blue-Stocking Nuns. Intellectual Life in the Convents of Late Byzantium." In Okeanos: Essays Presented to Ihor Shevchenko on his 60th Birthday, edited by C. Mango and O. Pritsak. Cambridge, Mass.: Ukrainian Research Institute, Harvard University, 1984, pp. 604–618.
- . Holy Women of Byzantium: Ten Saints' Lives in English Translation. Washington, D.C.: Dumbarton Oaks, 1996.
- Topping, Eva C. "Women Hymnographers in Byzantium." Diptycha 3(1982/1983): 98–111.
- Treadgold, Warren T. "The Bride-Shows of the Byzantine Emperors." Byzantion 49 (1979) 395–413.
- See also Empresses, Byzantine; Eunuchs; Icons, Byzantine; Irene; Komnene, Anna; Mary the Younger; Monasticism and Nuns, Byzantine; Ottonian Royal Women; Theodora

C

---

CAESAREAN SECTION

The term Caesarean birth was not used before the Renaissance (François Rousset, the surgeon, originated it in his 1581 treatise on the operation), but the surgical extraction of fetuses had already been attested in ancient Rome. Pliny the Elder (23–79 CE), in his Natural History, connected surgical birth to the family name Caesar, and his remarks led to the mistaken assumption that Julius Caesar (d. 44 BCE) had been born that way.

The operation was almost exclusively performed post mortem in order to save the child of a woman who had died during the birth. This fact probably explains why ancient medical authorities did not mention the operation in their treatises. In the Middle Ages the first mentions of Caesarean births occur toward the end of the twelfth century. They do not come from medical texts but from decrees issued at various church councils. It appears that Odo of Sully, bishop of Paris from 1196 to 1208, was the first Church official to recommend that women who had died during childbirth should be cut open if the child was believed to still be alive. The Council of Canterbury (1236) made the same recommendation, adding that the mother's mouth should be held open during the procedure to supply the fetus with breath and that a midwife should have water at the ready for an emergency baptism. The problematic nature of making decisions at such a critical moment is dramatized by a decree of the Council of Trèves (1310), which states that, if the child dies right after the extraction (before being baptized), it will have to be buried in unconsecrated ground. If, however, it dies while still in the mother's womb, both of them can be buried in consecrated ground. In all these texts it is assumed that midwives perform Caesareans.

The first physician to mention Caesareans was Bernard of Gordon in his 1305 Practica sive liliū medicinae (The practice or the lily of medicine). Here he tells novice obstetricians of the possibility that a fetus may be kept alive after the mother's death in childbirth through the air in her arteries. If this happens, as quickly as possible the child should be extracted through an incision in the mother's abdomen, while her mouth and cervix are held open. Bernard must have received this advice from midwives, since no ancient textual tradition on Caesareans existed. While Bernard addressed male physicians, Guy de Chauliac, in his famous Grande Chirurgie (Great Surgery) of 1363, spoke to midwives in the context of Caesareans. His prescriptions for Caesareans are similar to Bernard's, except that he specifies the mother's left side for the incision.

Piero d'Argellata (d. 1423) was the first male physician to describe his own performance of a Caesarean in his Chirurgia (Surgery). He specified that he used a razor and made the incision along the mother's linea alba. It is not until Rousset in 1581 that we find a physician who claims that mothers survived a Caesarean. But Rousset's contemporaries doubted his accounts.

Images of Caesarean births can be found primarily in depictions of Julius Caesar's birth, especially in later manuscripts of the early-thirteenth-century

Birth of Julius Caesar. Julius Caesar is born by Caesarian section: a midwife lifts the mature-looking baby out of an incision in the mother's uterus. Shelfmark ID: Roy.16.G.VII. Folio No: 219. Min. Location: British Library, London, Great Britain. Credit: HIP / Art Resource, NY.

Faits des Romains (Deeds of the Romans) and some other accounts of Roman history, but for the most part not in the illustrations of medical texts. In some manuscripts of these Roman histories, a curved knife is shown as appropriate for the operation; the mother usually lies lifeless in a splendid bed, while attendants bathe the newborn. Interestingly, in the images dating from before 1400, midwives are shown as performing Caesareans, while later manuscripts show male physicians. This changeover corresponds to the indications in the medical texts where we find the first accounts of male participation in the operation in the fifteenth century. The professionalization of medicine and the exclusion of women from universities explain the growing absence of midwives from surgical births.

In addition to Julius Casear, other personages were believed to have been born by Caesareans. The twelfth-century German poet Eilhart claimed that Tristan had been born that way, and some German kings had the same legend attached to them. Especially striking are the late medieval images of Antichrist's birth by Caesarean, a tradition that cannot be found in any corresponding texts. The artists who chose to depict Antichrist's birth in this way probably wanted to highlight the unnaturalness of his birth and of his subsequent nefarious actions. But the Virgin Mary also performed Caesareans, as a number of miracle accounts attest. Today almost routine, Caesareans signaled a special destiny throughout the medieval period.

RENATE BLUMENFELD-KOSINSKI

References and Further Reading

- Bernard of Gordon. Practica sive liliun medicinae. Lyon: Antoine Lambillon and Marinus Saracenus, 1491.
- Blumenfeld-Kosinski, Renate. Not of Woman Born: Representations of Caesarean Birth in Medieval and Renaissance Culture. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1990.
- Bullough, Vern. The Development of Medicine as a Profession. New York: Hafner, 1966.
- Guy de Chauliac. La grande chirurgie. translated by E. Nicaise. Paris: Félix Alcan, 1890.
- Laget, Mireille. Naissances: L'accouchement avant l'âge de la clinique. Paris: Seuil, 1982.
- Pieto Argellata. Chirurgia. Venice: Octavianus Scotus, 1497.
- Pliny. Natural History. with an English translation by H. Rackham. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1942.
- Pundel, J. Histoire de l'opération césarienne. Brussels: Presses Académiques Européennes, 1969.
- Siraisi, Nancy C. Medieval and Early Renaissance Medicine: An Introduction to Knowledge and Practice. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1990.
- Wyman, A. L. "The Female Practitioner of Surgery, 1400–1800." Medical History 28 (1984): 22–41.
- Young, John H. Caesarean Section: The History and the Development of the Operation from Earliest Times. London: H. K. Lewis, 1944.

See also Doctors and Healers; Gynecology; Infants and Infanticide; Midwives; Pregnancy and Childbirth

CANONESSES

The term canoness first appears in the Latin West in the eighth century, although it had been used in the East to identify Christian women who held a special place in the life of the church—most likely as widows and virgins—from at least the fourth century. The origins of the term are obscure; perhaps it derived from the women's adherence to a rule, or canon, or perhaps it reflects their presence on the church's register, signaling their reliance on the church for material support. By the early Middle Ages, however, canonesses were generally recognized as women who had adopted the religious life and who lived in community, but yet differed from nuns in several important respects: they made no permanent vows, and thus could leave the community whenever they wished; they did not relinquish private property upon entering the community and even maintained separate residences and servants; they wore secular clothing rather than the black habit of Benedictine nuns; and they performed various public duties, largely freeing them from the requirement of claustration. Yet despite these differences, it is often difficult in practice to distinguish between nuns and canonesses during the early period, particularly given the tendency in the sources to refer to both as sanctimoniales.

With the reorganization of the Carolingian church in the eighth and early ninth centuries, attempts were made to impose order on the religious life and to subject all those who professed it to a recognized rule. Religious women were offered a choice, according to the late-eighth-century Council of Frankfurt, between the regular life in accordance with the Benedictine Rule and the canonical life. Some years later, at the Council of Aachen (816), the reformer Benedict of Aniane sought to bring the lives of canonesses more in line with monastic observance, requiring increased claustration, the veiling of canonesses, and limiting the women's contact with members of the opposite sex—even their priests. The rule for canonesses that resulted, the Institutio Sanctimonialium, comprised twenty-eight canons and combined selections from the writings of the Fathers with stipulations concerning the life of the community. However, the fact that the Institutio survives in only a few ninth-century copies suggests that it may not have been widely followed. Canonesses continued to maintain their distinctive way of life, as records from the period attest.

Communities of canonesses reached their apogee in Germany during the ninth and tenth centuries, when a series of new foundations with strong ties to the imperial court were established. The women of these communities, who came from noble families, maintained their power and prestige within the community and were active beyond its walls as well. Under the late-tenth-century rule of abbess Gerberga II, a niece of Otto I, the community at Gandersheim developed into an enormously powerful and independent house, with its own courts, the power to mint coins, a representative at the imperial assembly, and the right to direct protection from the pope. Gandersheim was also, like many houses of canonesses, a center of learning where daughters of the aristocracy could gain an education. The Latin writings of Hrotsvit of Gandersheim demonstrate her knowledge of a range of classical and medieval authors and reflect the richness of the community's library. Other communities, like Chelles, where Charlemagne's sister Gisela was abbess, were active in book production and included female scribes amongst their number.

By the middle of the eleventh century, reformers, concerned to rid the church of perceived corruption, once again turned their attention to houses of canonesses, denouncing the canonical way of life as degenerate. As with their criticism of unreformed or "secular" canons, these reformers focused on canonesses' ownership of private property, their rejection of a common dormitory, and their failure to live according to a recognized rule. Criticism of canonesses was renewed at the Second Lateran Council (1139) and, less than ten years later, at the Council of Rheims (1148). In response, many houses of canonesses adopted the Rule of Augustine and are known as "regular" rather than "secular" canonesses. As reform enthusiasm spread through the eleventh and twelfth centuries, many newly founded communities also adopted the Augustinian Rule, which, unlike the Benedictine Rule, included a version addressed specifically to women. In many cases, these reformed Augustinian houses maintained close ties with houses of canons, who as priests provided them with much-needed pastoral care. By the middle of the twelfth century, Augustinian houses were at the forefront of reform. However, canonesses in these communities were increasingly similar to nuns. Of the secular canonesses, with their traditions of independence and erudition, Jacques de Vitry scoffed in the early thirteenth century that they "prefer the nobility of the world to nobility of manners and religion."

FIONA J. GRIFFITHS

References and Further Reading

- Crusius, Irene, ed. Studien zum Kanonissenstift. Göttingen: Vandenhoeck and Ruprecht, 2001.
- Heinrich, Mary Pia. The Canonesses and Education in the Early Middle Ages. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1924.
- McNamara, Jo Ann Kay. Sisters in Arms: Catholic Nuns through Two Millennia. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1996.
- Parisse, Michel, "Les chanoinesses dans l'Empire germanique (IXe - XIe s.)." Francia 6 (1978):107–126.
- Schaefer, K. H. Die Kanonissenstifter im deutschen Mittelalter. Stuttgart: F. Enke, 1907.
- Wemple, Suzanne Fonay. Women in Frankish Society: Marriage and the Cloister, 500 to 900. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1981.

See also Abbesses; Education, Monastic; Herrad of Hohenburg; Hrotsvit of Gandersheim; Jouarre and Chelles; Monastic Enclosure; Monastic Rules; Monasticism and Nuns; Spiritual Care

CANONIZATION OF SAINTS

To canonize someone is to put him or her on a list (canon) of those who are now in heaven. The Roman Catholic Church declares a person a saint to confirm that he or she is indeed among the blessed and can, therefore, be so venerated and can be asked to intercede before God. While the current process of canonization is under the authority of the pope, the procedure developed slowly in the Middle Ages. The process or cause involved both miracles and a holy way of life, since canonization acknowledges the saint's presence at the throne of God and affirms the saint's conduct on earth as worthy of imitation.

CANONIZATION OF SAINTS

Martyrs and Confessors

For the first thousand years of Christianity there was no uniform method of making saints, or even a formal process. While St. Paul used the word saint simply to designate members of the Christian communities, the term quickly became associated with Christian martyrs, who were compared to Jesus, the first martyr. To die for the faith was deemed the ultimate sacrifice, which required no further evidence of the person's sanctity. Individual churches declared their heroes to be among the martyrs. By the third century the Christian communities inscribed them in martyrologies. When the era of the persecutions ended in 313 with the Edict of Milan, the liturgical significance of the martyrs rapidly expanded. The literature which recorded and embellished their heroic deaths—in the Acts, Passions, and letters—became part of the communal worship, which included translations of the martyr's remains to a shrine or church.

After Constantine the new "martyr" was the "confessor," another kind of hero who suffered by combating heretics and schismatics. Chief among these were the doctors of the Church, such as Jerome, Ambrose, Basil, and Augustine. Another type of martyr was the ascetic who practiced heroic virtue in the desert or in a monastery. Some of these ascetics became saints not by any juridical pronouncement of the clergy, but simply by the "voice of the people." The name of the servant of God was often incorporated into the Mass, martyrologies, processions, pilgrimages, and prayers of petition. In the liturgy and sometimes in written Lives the saint's feast was celebrated on his or her "birthday," the day of death and entrance into heaven. Sanctity was largely local, although a few saints were known over wide areas. The reputation of some were disseminated by biographies, such as Athanasius' Life of Anthony and Sulpicius Severus' Life of Martin of Tours (d. c. 397). Saints' vitae became a literary genre, as the tales came to develop certain common characteristics, as would be expected, since the prototype "saint" was Christ. Hence certain aspects of a saint's career were taken from scripture.

In the fourth and fifth centuries the veneration of saints was closely tied to their tombs and to the miracles attributed to them after their deaths. This association of tomb and miracle accelerated with the conversion of the German peoples, who were particularly attracted to holy relics. The body of a saint was a locus of divine power. While the saint as an archetype of virtue was, to be sure, never forgotten, the servant of God's role as a powerful intercessor before the Almighty became paramount. The faithful appealed to the saint for military victories, good crops, protection from danger, and, above all, cures from physical ailments. Particularly influential in promoting the literary image of the saint as thaumaturge and intercessor was Pope Gregory the Great's (d. 604) biography of Saint Benedict of Nursia in his Dialogues.

Issues of Control

After the sixth century the role of the bishops over saints' cults increased, as they gained more control over the translations of saints' relics and the approval of new ones. The word saint was increasingly applied to those whose names appeared in the liturgical calendars. Monasteries in particular often promoted their own saints' cults, along with biographies that often made use of folklore. Carolingian councils attempted to impose some order on the proliferation of relics and translations. It was perhaps inevitable that the bishops of Rome would become more involved in the recognition of saints as the papacy grew in importance after the tenth century.

Pinturicchio (1454–1513) Canonization of Saint Catherine of Siena: scenes from the life of Pope Pius II. Location: Duomo, Siena, Italy. Credit: Scala / Art Resource, NY.

The first papal canonization occurred in Rome in 993, when Pope John XV proclaimed Bishop Ulric of Augsburg a saint. Gregory VII insisted on the exceptional sanctity of some previous pontiffs, and by the late twelfth century some popes claimed the right of the Roman Church to canonize and to translate the bodies of saints. As the causes of saints increased, so did the juridical basis of papal pronouncements. Innocent III explicitly related his power to make saints to his fullness of power. Prelates throughout Europe asked the Roman Church to canonize local servants of God. When, in 1234, the Decretals of Gregory IX made the right of canonization a papal reservation, episcopal canonization quickly disappeared.

Centralization

During the thirteenth century the papacy developed procedures to evaluate the proofs of a person's sanctity, which largely meant assessing the validity of miracles performed in the saint's name. The Curia often requested, moreover, a written vita to attest to the holy person's virtue. Thomas of Celano's Life of Francis of Assisi is a case in point. The request for canonization often came from religious communities—or even from an entire order—and civic authorities, both lay and ecclesiastic, as well as from bishops. The involvement of these groups was often necessary to obtain a favorable verdict from Rome, as the cost of pursuing a cause soared. The need for written evidence of the servant of God's virtues was not only for saints long deceased, but also for recent saints. The petitioner, who initiated the cause with the approval of the local bishop, appointed a postulator, who made a report on his investigation of the saint's life. The assessment of the miracles performed at the saint's tomb, or from a distance, involved numerous witnesses who testified on the servant of God's behalf. The vitae and legends (stories intended to be read aloud) of the saints were often compiled and distributed. An example is the famous Golden Legend (1260), compiled by the Dominican Jacobus of Voragine. These accounts of the saints became increasingly important in papal canonizations. By the early fourteenth century the process of canonization was established, whereby the commission of inquiry made its report to a commission of three cardinals, who in turn made their recommendation to the holy see.

The canonization of saints in the High Middle Ages should be viewed not only as a juridical procedure, but as an integral part of social life. Christians looked upon saints as being living members of the Church, which included the heavenly and the earthly. Saints permeated every aspect of religious life, as intercessors, patrons, objects of pilgrimages and processions, models of behavior, and liturgical activities. The process of canonization gives the historian an insight into the changing patterns of spirituality, theology, and moral expectations.

THOMAS RENNA

References and Further Reading

- Cunningham, Lawrence S. The Meaning of Saints. New York: Harper & Row, 1980.
- , A Brief History of Saints. Malden, Mass./Oxford, UK: Blackwell, 2005.
- Dodds, Bill. Your One-Stop Guide to How Saints Are Made. Ann Arbor, MI: Servant, 2000.
- Kemp, Eric W. Canonization and Authority in the Western Church. New York: AMS, 1980.
- Menesto, Enrico. "The Apostolic Canonization Proceedings of Clare of Montefalco, 1318–1319." In Women and Religion in Medieval and Renaissance Italy, edited by Daniel Bornstein and Roberto Rusconi. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1996, pp. 104–129.
- Vauchez, A. Sainthood in the Later Middle Ages. translated by Jean Birrell. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997.
- Woodward, Kenneth L. Making Saints: How the Catholic Church Determines Who Becomes a Saint, Who Doesn't, and Why. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1996.

See also Hagiography; Jacobus of Voragine's Golden Legend; Miracles and Miracle Collections; Relics and Reliquaries

CAPTIVITY AND RANSOM

Rarely featured in chronicle accounts or chansons de geste, though sometimes found in miracle stories, most medieval captives were in fact women. Often spared along with children in siege capitulations, women could also be taken captive from civilian camps near battlefields.

It was seen as self-evident that captive women were raped. For most women, survival in captivity or the chance of being ransomed depended mainly on beauty and/or high rank. As women commanded lower ransoms than men, there was less incentive to keep female captives alive. Nonetheless, a captor might guard a beautiful or high-ranking captive and her virtue in hopes of upping her price. On the other hand, women's lower valuation facilitated their redemption from captivity.

Another survival mechanism was to marry into the opposing camp, frequently documented for female captives in Muslim sources. From both the Muslim and Christian perspective, a woman who fell into opposing hands faced a fate worse than death; women were expected to prefer death to sexual defilement. Jewish law differed in assuming that female captives were unable to remain sexually pure, thus allowing them to be reintegrated into their communities. Eastern Jewish marriage contracts contained clauses obligating a husband to redeem a captive wife.

Wives or daughters of important men could find themselves used as hostages in treaty agreements. This practice, prohibited in Spanish municipal law, is attested in the Latin East, where Baldwin II used his daughter as a hostage.

Even if ransomed, this by no means ended the tribulations of female captives. Reentry into their former societies was economically and socially difficult.

YVONNE FRIEDMAN

References and Further Reading

- Blidstein, Gerald I. "The Personal Status of Apostate and Ransomed Women in Medieval Jewish Law" (Hebrew). Shenaton Ha-Mishpat Ha-Ivri: Annual of the Institute for Research in Jewish Law 3-4 (1976-1977): 35-116.
- Friedman, Yvonne. "Captivity and Ransom: The Experience of Women." In Gendering the Crusades, edited by Susan B. Edgington and Sarah Lambert. Cardiff: University of Wales Press, 2001, pp. 121-139.
- . Encounter between Enemies: Captivity and Ransom in the Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem. Leiden: Brill, 2002, pp. 162-186.
- Goitein, Salomon D. "Tyre-Tripoli-'Arqa Geniza Documents from the Beginning of the Crusade Period." Jewish Quarterly Review 66 (1975): 69-88.
- Hitti, Philip K. An Arab-Syrian Gentleman and Warrior in the Period of the Crusades: Memoirs of Usamah ibn-Munqidh. New York: Columbia University Press, 1929.
- Kulp-Hill, Kathleen. Songs of Holy Mary of Alfonso X, The Wise: A Translation of the Cantigas de Santa Maria. Tempe, Ariz.: Arizona Center for Medieval and Renaissance Studies, 2000. (Song 325) pp. 394-395.
- Schmidt, Paul Gerhard. "Peregrinatio periculosa: Thomas von Froidmont über die Jerusalemfahrt seiner Schwester Margareta." In Kontinuität und Wandel: Lateinische Poesie von Naevius bis Baudelaire Franco Munari zum 65. Geburtstag, edited by Ulrich Justus Stache, Wolfgang Maaz, and Fritz Wagner. Hildesheim: Weidmann, 1986, pp. 461-485.

See also Rape and Raptus; Warfare

CASTLES AND PALACES

Scholars of medieval castles and palaces have traditionally been silent on questions of gender and women. Palaces have acted as the backdrop to studies of court bureaucracy or constitutional history peopled almost entirely by "great men," while castles have been studied almost exclusively in terms of defense and warfare. From the early 1990s, however, analyses of domestic space in particular have put gender firmly on the historical agenda, and even where documentary sources are lacking, the complexity of interior patterns of access in high-status domestic architecture is recognized as having gendered significance. Yet European coverage remains patchy even where making women "visible" is concerned. For example, French high-status architecture has been subjected to meticulous scholarly analysis, but the apartments of French royal women have yet to receive detailed attention.

Although castles are now recognized as complex structures of which defense was just one facet, most people could confidently put forward a definition. "Palaces" are rather more problematic. Though the earliest surviving written reference in England dates to the late tenth century, and the concept was familiar in Europe from c. 800, only a tiny number of royal residences were referred to as such during the Middle Ages. Consequently, scholars have tended to reserve the term for the noncastle residences of the crown and higher nobility. Yet such distinctions were probably less clear-cut to contemporaries. Even the Tower of London, clearly a fortress, encompassed suites of well-appointed royal apartments. Compared with most castles, palaces generally did not emphasize defense. However, in regard to domestic space, the terms can be used interchangeably.

Late medieval palaces reemerged as a field of study in the early 1990s, and attention was paid to the involvement of royal women. In particular the influence of foreign-born queens consort on the development of English palatial architecture was hypothesized. To paraphrase O'Keefe, such narratives reveal not the story of palaces, but a story of the construction of palaces, and although women were now included in that story there was little explicit discussion of gender. Parallel developments can be seen in castle studies. Valuable works have been, and still are, produced that include whole chapters on women as castellans and defenders. However, few explicitly address gender as part of the overall narrative, or acknowledge the role of architecture in its social construction. A significant proportion of female Irish castle-builders or owners, for example Rohesia de Verdun (d. 1247), seem to have flouted gender stereotypes generally, and it has been suggested that active involvement with castles might have influenced women's gender identities—a proposal that would repay further study.

The idea that architecture not only replicates but also constructs gender ideologies is not new. In the 1980s, high-status late Anglo-Saxon planning—notably the communal hall—was considered to be symptomatic of a relatively egalitarian social structure. That is, the comparatively unsegregated space of the hall both reflected and actively encouraged greater access to power for women and other less advantaged groups. This premise has since been disputed. Concomitantly the “retreat” from such communal spaces, represented by the establishment of separate households for noblemen and women by the early thirteenth century, has been read as evidence of a decline in women's status. However, the meaning of such segregation has now been problematized. Many interpretations center on contemporary ideas about the female body. The French surgeon Henri de Mondeville (1260–1320), for example, proposed that “interior space...is a feminine place; for the first dwelling-place of man is buried deep in the secret places of women” (Gilchrist). Scholars have recently correlated these ideas with the architecture of public and private space. More generally, women's association with the most “private” areas of castles and palaces is no longer equated solely with political and social marginalization. The household of Eleanor of Provence (d. 1291), for example, seems to have afforded her a unique power base during the factional struggles of the Lusignans, half-brothers of King Henry III, and her Savoyard relatives.

Detailed comparative studies of gendered spatial patterns in late medieval Europe might reveal much about similarities and differences in regional social organization. In continental Europe and in Scotland, kings' and queens' apartments were usually on different floors, the queen's traditionally above the king's as in King Charles V's (r. 1364–1380) Louvre, Paris, and the Emperor Charles IV's (r. 1346–1378) Karlstein Castle, near Prague. Yet when stacked lodgings briefly became popular in England at the end of the fifteenth century, the kings' rooms invariably occupied the higher floors. Through most of the Middle Ages, however, English royal apartments were generally on one level, as were those in the fourteenth-century palace of the Kings of Majorca at Perpignan near the French/Spanish border. Like many later royal residences, this was divided into kings' and queens' “sides,” the queen closer to the great hall than the king—another rare pattern in English palaces and castles.

The great hall as a center of power, however symbolic, remains key to understanding gender dynamics. Here the ideal of separate gender domains organized according to a public/private divide is evident in the startling dearth of imagery depicting women in English halls throughout the later Middle Ages. Moreover from the mid-fourteenth century, as the meeting-places of chivalric brotherhoods, halls appear to have become equated with the martial ethic increasingly underlying the gender role of the male nobility. For example Edward the Black Prince (1330–1376) deliberately had his chambers built onto the impressive, ceremonial hall of Kennington Palace c. 1350. In contrast the apartments of his wife, Joan of Kent (1328–1385), were spatially distanced from it. Such a hypothesis calibrates other work. In particular the joint tombs fashionable from the third quarter of the fourteenth century—for example that of Richard II (r. 1377–1399) and Anne of Bohemia (d. 1394)—have been seen as symbolizing women's increased political marginalization by replicating the growing emphasis on their intercessory role. That is, the tombs embodied the joint responsibility for just rule underscored in the English coronation ordo, which stressed the queen's mercy and her role as mediator between her husband and the realm. But if fourteenth-century English halls were “male space,” epitomised by the statues of kings commissioned for Westminster Hall by Richard II, this may not have been the case throughout Europe. The contemporary series of “kings” in the hall of the Palais de la Cité, Paris, included queens consort despite the exclusion of women from the succession under Salic Law.

Evidence from contemporary art, chronicles, and romances confirms that sexual segregation was practiced at formal occasions such as feasts and tournaments. Yet the picture was more complex in everyday life. Guests of both sexes would have been received in female households, as well as male officials and administrators, so that they were more sexually and socially mixed than those of their male counterparts. This is reflected in the types of imagery employed in the gendered domains of castles and palaces. In the chambers of medieval English kings, depictions of men far outweighed those of women, while in queens' rooms “mixed” imagery predominated—either depicting both sexes or neutral patterned motifs.

Many of the social patterns observed here continued into the early modern period. For example, sexual segregation was still practiced at formal occasions. During the 1503 wedding celebrations of Margaret Tudor (b. 1489) and James IV of Scotland at Holyrood, the king's and queen's parties dined in separate halls. Margaret's party remained socially and sexually diverse; noblewomen, including the ladies of her household, sat at one table, another accommodated noblemen, a third was occupied by gentlewomen, and a fourth by gentlemen.

A further aspect of gendered space in castles and palaces deserves highlighting. It was to Margaret's great chamber that James IV later went to dance. Although evidence is scant, such nuggets may indicate how queens' chambers were actually used through the Middle Ages. Certainly in 1302, Edward I and Margaret of France were sharing a bedchamber when fire broke out at Winchester Castle, and a 1238 attempt on Henry III's life at Woodstock was foiled because he was sharing a bed with Eleanor of Provence in her chamber—to the chagrin of the would-be assassin. Spatial segregation in medieval castles and palaces may have replicated ideas about gender difference and the social order, but the relative privacy of noblewomen's apartments clearly held resonance for both sexes.

AMANDA RICHARDSON

References and Further Reading

- Coulson, Charles. Castles in Medieval Society: Fortresses in England, France, and Ireland in the Central Middle Ages. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2003.
- Dunbar, John G. Scottish Royal Palaces: The Architecture of the Royal Residences during the Late Medieval and Early Renaissance Periods. Edinburgh: Tuckwell Press, 1999.
- Gilchrist, Roberta. "The Contested Garden: Gender, Space and Metaphor in the Medieval English Castle." In Gender and Archaeology: Contesting the Past, by Roberta Gilchrist. London: Routledge, 1999, pp. 109–145.
- Howell, Margaret. Eleanor of Provence: Queenship in Thirteenth-Century England. Oxford: Blackwell, 1998.
- James, T. B. The Palaces of Medieval England c. 1050–1550. London: Seaby, 1990.
- Johnson, Matthew. Behind the Castle Gate: From Medieval to Renaissance. London: Routledge, 2002.
- Meiron Jones, G. et al., eds, The Seigneurial Residence in Western Europe AD c. 800–1600. (BAR International Series 1088). Oxford: Archaeopress, 2002.
- O'Keefe, T. "Concepts of 'Castle' and the Construction of Identity in Medieval and Post-Medieval Ireland." Irish Geography 34 (1) (2001): 69–88.
- Parsons, John C. "'Never was a body buried in England with such solemnity and honour': The Burials and Post-humous Commemorations of English Queens to 1500." In Queens and Queenship in Medieval Europe, edited by A. J. Duggan. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell and Brewer, 1997, pp. 317–337.
- Richardson, A. "Gender and Space in English Royal Palaces c. 1160–c. 1547: A Study in Access Analysis and Imagery." Medieval Archaeology 47 (2003): 131–165.
- Stane, John M. The Archaeology of Power: England and Northern Europe AD 800–1600. Stroud: Tempus, 2001.
- Tibbetts Schulenburg, J. "Female Sanctity: Public and Private Roles c. 500–1100." In Women and Power in the Middle Ages, edited by Mary Erler and Maryanne Kowaleski. Athens, Ga.: University of Georgia Press, 1988, pp. 102–125.

See also Noble Women; Queens and Empresses: The West; Space, Sacred: and Gender; Space, Secular: and Gender; Warfare

CASTRO, INÉS DE

Inés Pérez de Castro (d. 1355) was a daughter of the Galician nobleman, Pedro Fernández de Castro. In 1340, around the age of fifteen, she accompanied the Castilian Infanta Constanza to Portugal as a lady-in-waiting, when Constanza married the Portuguese heir, Pedro. The young Inés was notoriously beautiful, endowed with the nickname "Heron's neck," or Colo de Garça. Soon, a love affair began between Pedro and Inés, scandalizing the court and more seriously threatening Portuguese relations with Castile. King Afonso IV, Pedro's father, banished Inés, fearing her influence as well as the influence of her ambitious brothers. However, after Constanza died in 1345, having given birth to the eventual king Fernando, Pedro installed Inés in a household in Coimbra; eventually the couple had four children. With Inés's rise to power, her brothers gained influence at the Portuguese court, and anxiety increased as well concerning the legitimate succession to the throne. Alarmed, Afonso IV allowed his knights to assassinate Inés in 1355. Civil war ensued, with Pedro rebelling against his father, supported by Inés's brothers. Upon his succession in 1357, Pedro sought revenge against her murderers, and claimed that he and Inés had secretly been married. He erected a pair of elaborate marble tombs to memorialize her at the royal monastery of Alcobaça. Inés's sons lived to influence the Portuguese court, but Inés's story has been important historically mainly as the inspiration for many dramatic and poetic interpretations.

MIRIAM SHADIS

References and Further Reading

- Jones, Haydn Tiago. Historical and literary perspectives in the episode of Inês de Castro. Ph.D. thesis, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, 1998.
- Livermore, H.V. History of Portugal. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1947.

See also Iberia; Ladies-in-Waiting

CATERINA SFORZA

Caterina Sforza (1462/1463–1509) is famous for her rule of the papal fiefs of Imola and Forlì in the Romagna region of Italy. An illegitimate daughter of the Duke of Milan, she married Girolamo Riario, nephew of Pope Sixtus IV, in 1477. When Riario was assassinated in 1488, Sforza seized control of his territories and proclaimed her triumph with a lewd gesture indicative of her political audacity (see Hairston). She then governed for twelve years as regent for her son. Considered a virago by her peers, Sforza constructed a ruling persona as loyal widow/mother and triumphant regent, and managed local and international conflicts through cunning diplomacy and strong defenses. Her performance as a powerful widow-regent was so successful that she was able to maintain lovers in her court, and even bore sons by Giacomo Feo and Giovanni di Pierfrancesco de' Medici (both possibly secret husbands). In 1500, Sforza personally fought Cesare Borgia's forces; nevertheless, she lost her territories. She spent her final years in Florence, where she concentrated on improving her family's status through the advancement of her sons' careers and management of their patrimony.

Throughout her life Sforza promoted her own fame and power through, among other things, cultural patronage. After her death, others exploited her history for diverse agendas including family glory and gender politics. Her legend was developed first by Niccolò Machiavelli and her descendants the Medici Grand Dukes of Tuscany, then by Italian nationalists beginning in the nineteenth century, and finally by twentieth and twenty-first century scholars of history and gender studies.

JOYCE DE VRIES

References and Further Reading

- Breisach, Ernst. Caterina Sforza: A Renaissance Virago. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1967.
- de Vries, Joyce. "Casting Her Widowhood: Contemporary and Posthumous Portraits of Caterina Sforza." In Widowhood and Visual Culture in Early Modern Europe, edited by Allison Levy. Hampshire: Ashgate Press, 2003, pp. 77–92.
- Hairston, Julia L. "Skirting the Issue: Machiavelli's Caterina Sforza." Renaissance Quarterly 53 (3) (2000): 687–712.
- Jansen, Sharon L. The Monstrous Regiment of Women: Female Rulers in Early Modern Europe. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2002.
- Kelly, Joan. "Did Women Have a Renaissance?" In Becoming Visible: Women in European History, edited by Renate Bridenthal, Susan Mosher Stuard, Merry E. Wiesner. Second Edition. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1987, pp. 175–201. Reprinted in Women, History, and Theory: The Essays of Joan Kelly. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1984, pp. 19–50.

See also Diplomacy and Reconciliation; Gender Ideologies; Illegitimacy; Italy; Noble Women; Patronage, Artistic; Regents and Queen-Lieutenants; Sexuality; Extramarital Sex; Virile Women; Warfare; Widows

CATERINA VIGRI

Caterina Vigri (St. Catherine of Bologna) (c. 1413–1463) is an example of a fifteenth-century woman artist emerging from the cultural tradition of learned nuns. Versed in Latin, music, and painting, she was known for the mystical piety recorded in her spiritual writings, including Le sette armi spirituali (The Seven Spiritual Weapons). Vigri was born in Bologna and educated at court in Ferrara, where she entered the Convent of the Poor Clares in 1427. Elected abbess after moving to a new house established in Bologna in 1456, she composed spiritual tracts and painted images as acts of devotion and good works.

Vigri's surviving pictorial oeuvre is small (two independent paintings on panel and two on paper, an illumination and a number of decorated pages in her texts, and a painted wooden Christ Child) and is technically unsophisticated; however, her works are formally and conceptually complex in their intermingling of text and image. Furthermore, her art represents well the propensity of Nonnenarbeiten ("nuns' works") to address conventual spiritual practices in a unique way. Her biographer and fellow Clare, Suor Illuminata Bembo, recorded Caterina's particular love of painting images of the Divine Word represented by the swaddled Infant Christ. Although the pictorial emphasis on the Christ Child as subject reflects corporate (e.g., Franciscan) devotion to the cult of Corpus Domini and the Incarnation, it also figures the nuns' special identification with the passionate maternity of the Virgin Mary. As erotic metaphors are converted to ardent devotion toward Christ in Vigri's texts and images, so too the material richness typical of her works recasts early exposure to aristocratic wealth into a metaphor of spiritual splendor. Caterina Vigri died in Bologna in 1463. Her cult received papal authorization in 1524; she was beatified in 1592 and canonized in 1712.

KIM E. BUTLER

References and Further Reading

- Chadwick, Whitney. Women, Art, and Society. 3rd ed. London and New York: Thames & Hudson Ltd., 2003, pp. 88–90.
- Hamburger, Jeffrey F. Nuns as Artists: The Visual Culture of a Medieval Convent. Berkeley, Los Angeles, and London: University of California Press, 1997.
- Wood, Jeryldene M. Women, Art, and Spirituality: The Poor Clares of Early Modern Italy. Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1996.
- . "Vigri, Caterina [St. Catherine of Bologna]." In Dictionary of Women Artists, edited by Delia Gaze. London and Chicago: Fitzroy Dearborn Publishers, 1997. vol. II, pp. 1408–1410.

See also Artists, Women; Devotional Art; Mysticism and Mystics; Nuns as Illuminators; Poor Clares Order

CATHARS

Catharism was a Christian dualist movement that flourished in parts of western Europe, particularly southern France and northern Italy, between the twelfth and the fourteenth centuries. Among Cathars, belief varied widely from community to community but essentially this group taught the existence of two gods or principles, one good and the other evil. The good god, the God of the New Testament, had created the spiritual world, while the evil god, or Satan, identified by some Cathars with the god of the Old Testament, later created the physical world. All visible matter, including human bodies, was, therefore, tainted with sin. Human souls were genderless angels trapped in material bodies by Satan and doomed to be reborn in new, sinful bodies in every generation. Modern historians have debated whether the Cathars' rejection of the body, sex, and procreation as creations of Satan drew women to the sect or drove them away from it.

The Cathars taught that salvation lay only in a ritual called the consolamentum. This ritual, a sort of baptism by the laying on of hands, reunited the soul of the believer to the spirit paraclete. This process perfected the believer and made him or her incapable of sin and ensured entry into heaven upon physical death, thus releasing the believer from the cycle of reincarnation. Anything that the new perfect did before receiving the consolamentum did not affect salvation, and any sins committed after it showed that the ritual had been flawed in some way, and the subject could receive the ritual again. The perfects, those who had received the consolamentum, acted as the clergy of the sect through preaching and administering to the spiritual needs of believers who had not yet undergone the ritual. They also seem to have received at least a rudimentary theological education. Yet every perfect had to embrace an extremely ascetic life. Cathar perfects were not allowed to touch members of the opposite sex and even kept a rather strict diet that excluded all eggs, meat, and dairy products because they believed that eating any product of coitus would negate the consolamentum by proving that they had not been able to escape the teachings of Satan.

Because both men and women could become perfects, many twentieth-century historians argued that women were drawn to Catharism because of the promise of a sacerdotal role denied to them by the all-male Catholic priesthood. Peter Biller has challenged this notion by arguing that the Cathars' theological antagonism to sex and the body expressed a strong misogynistic tendency. Catharism denied the validity of marriage and, therefore, drove away women, particularly married women, because it insisted that they could not achieve salvation without renouncing their spouses and families. This interpretation of Cathar belief implied a conflict between Cathar doctrine and many women's social realities that women could only resolve by rejecting Catharism. Other historians, such as Anne Brenon, objected to such arguments because they were based primarily upon Catholic theological treatises and argued that in inquisitorial depositions very few women mentioned the Cathar doctrine of sex and the body as deterrents to involvement in the movement. Brenon believed that familial ties to Catharism influenced women's religious beliefs far more than personal concerns about doctrine and that, in fact, the importance of the family in the transmission of Cathar belief actually made women's roles as wives and mothers important to the movement in a functional sense, even if rejected by Cathar theology.

Undoubtedly, women who became perfects had the authority to preach, teach, and perform the consolamentum. Female believers, on the other hand, lived much as their Catholic neighbors did; they married and bore children and were subject to the same property rights and inheritance practices as other women. The practice of the endura, in which a believer could receive salvation through the consolamentum on his or her deathbed, meant that not all Cathar believers had to take up the extreme asceticism of the perfects. Cathar doctrine, therefore, most likely had little impact on the life of the average Cathar woman.

The persecutions of the thirteenth century, including the Albigensian Crusades (1208–1227) and the advent of the inquisition in 1232, forced most perfects into hiding, and their numbers steadily declined over the next century. During the very late period French Catharism began to exclude female perfects and became increasingly misogynistic. The last recorded French perfects, who were active in the first decades of the fourteenth century, performed the consolamentum on women only if the women were near death. They also reportedly taught that a woman had to be reborn as a man before she could achieve salvation. Late Italian perfects, on the other hand, continued to include women among their numbers.

SUSAN TAYLOR SNYDER

References and Further Reading

- Barber, Malcolm. "Women and Catharism." Reading Medieval Studies 3 (1977): 45–62.
- . The Cathars: Dualist Heretics in Languedoc in the High Middle Ages. New York: Longman, 2000.
- Biller, Peter. "Cathars and Material Women." Medieval Theology and the Natural Body, edited by Peter Biller

- and A. J. Minnis. Woodbridge: York Medieval Press, 1997, pp. 61–107.
- Brenon, Anne. “The Voice of the Good Women: An Essay on the Pastoral and Sacerdotal Role of Women in the Cathar Church.” Women Preachers and Prophets Through Two Millennia of Christianity, edited by Beverly Mayne Kienzle and Pamela J. Walker. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998, pp. 114–133.
- Lambert, Malcolm. The Cathars. Malden, Mass. Blackwell, 1998.
- Lansing, Carol. Power and Purity: Cathar Heresy in Medieval Italy. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Le Roy Ladurie, Emmanuel. Montaillou: Cathars and Catholics in a French Village, 1294–1324. translated by Barbara Bray. Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1990.

See also Heretics and Heresy; Lay Piety; Lollards; Waldensians

CATHERINE OF ALEXANDRIA

Catherine of Alexandria was the most popular female saint in medieval Europe, second only to the Virgin Mary, and deemed a powerful intercessor for her devotees. She is believed to have been martyred in the early fourth century, but the earliest references to her appear in the ninth century, and the first extant versions of her life date from the tenth. Thus it is highly unlikely that she was an historical person. The most influential version of the life of Saint Catherine was a Latin account known as the Vulgate, composed in the mid-eleventh century. It enjoyed a wide circulation even before being used by Jacobus of Voragine as the basis for his version of her life in the Golden Legend. Subsequently her Life was translated into many vernacular languages: English, Irish, Welsh, Anglo-Norman, Polish, Czech, Hungarian, French, German, and Spanish, often surviving in not just one, but several different versions. The Anglo-Norman Life of Catherine, written by Clemence of Barking, is one of the few medieval saints' lives known to have been written by a woman. Many churches and monasteries were dedicated to Catherine, as well as chapels and altars within churches, and she was a common guild patron. Representations of her life are also found in the form of wall paintings (e.g., Sporle church in Norfolk), stained glass (Erfurt Cathedral), altarpieces (the Getty altarpiece by the D'Arezzo brothers), manuscript illuminations (the Très Belles Heures), and embroidery (the Pienza Cope). In an attempt to kill her, the Emperor Maxentius had a torture device of spiked wheels created, but angels destroyed it. This gave rise to her iconographic emblem of the spiked wheel.

The starting point for the spread of the cult of Catherine in medieval Europe was her shrine at Mount Sinai, where, according to her Life, angels had carried her decapitated body. Her relics were discovered on the mountain at the end of the tenth century. With devotion chiefly from the Normans, relics of the saint were carried from Sinai to Europe to the monastery of the Holy Trinity in Rouen in the 1030s, where the cult spread more widely across western Europe. Therefore, Catherine's cult appeared sometime after the cults of other virgin martyrs such as Agatha, Agnes, and Cecilia had been established. Its great popularity partially rested on the ways in which her legend was based on an existing hagiographic type, but also presented a development of it, because the Life of Catherine provides the most detailed version of the basic virgin martyr pattern. Moreover, the life presents her as exceptional, even for a virgin martyr, particularly with respect to her status as a sovereign queen, and as a woman who received an explicitly academic education. This enabled her to defeat fifty philosophers whom Maxentius had brought in to try and convert her back to paganism. It was commonplace for virgin martyrs to describe themselves as the bride of Christ, but from the mid-thirteenth century onwards the Life of Catherine included a “prequel,” which described her early life and mystical marriage to Christ. This became a standard part of her life during the fourteenth century and exists in two forms: a Continental version in which she weds the Christ child in a vision and an Anglo-Norman/English version in which she marries the adult Christ in an actual wedding ceremony.

These unique elements in her life can be related to the interest in her cult shown by particular groups. Her status as a queen probably accounts in part for her attraction to royal devotees such as the emperor Charles IV, Philip the Good Duke of Burgundy, and Richard III of England. Her education made her an appropriate patron for clerics and universities. In presenting her as the bride of Christ some fifteenth-century versions of her Life identify Catherine as a model of interiority and affective lay piety. Catherine's appeal was clearly wide ranging, encompassing people of all social backgrounds and of both sexes, but it appears that a particular connection was felt to exist between Catherine and women. Catherine's steadfast adherence to Christianity and virginity made her an obvious model for religious women. For example, the Catherine Group version of her Life was composed to provide inspiration for anchoresses. However, her appearance in conduct literature such as The Book of the Chevalier of the Tour Landry demonstrates that she was also presented as a model of demure femininity to lay women.

KATHERINE J. LEWIS

References and Further Reading

- Beatie, Bruce A. "Saint Catherine of Alexandria: Traditional Themes and the Development of a Medieval Hagiographic German Narrative." Speculum 52 (1977): 785–800.
- Jenkins, Jacqueline, and Katherine J. Lewis. St Catherine of Alexandria: Texts and Contexts in Western Medieval Europe. Turnhout: Brepols, 2003.
- Lewis, Katherine J. The Cult of St Catherine of Alexandria in Late Medieval England. Woodbridge, Suffolk: The Boydell Press, 2000.
- MacBain, William. "Five Old French Renderings of the 'Passio Sancte Caterine Virginis.'" In Medieval Translators and their Craft, edited by Jeanette Beer. Studies in Medieval Culture 25. Kalamazoo: Medieval Institute Publications, 1989, pp. 41–65.
- Voragine, Jacob of, "The Life of St Catherine." In The Golden Legend: Readings on the Saints II, translated by William Granger Ryan. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1993, pp. 334–341.
- Winstead, Karen A. "Capgrave's St. Catherine and the Perils of Gynecocracy." Viator 25 (1994): 361–376.

See also Bride of Christ; Imagery; Clemence of Barking; Conduct Literature; Hagiography; Hagiography, Iconographic Aspects of; Jacobus of Voragine's Golden Legend; Katherine Group; Relics and Reliquaries; Virgin Martyrs

CATHERINE OF GENOA

Born in Genoa to the aristocratic and ecclesiastically well-connected Fieschi family, Catherine (1447–1510) was refused entrance into a convent at age thirteen on account of her youth. In 1463, she was forced to marry Giuliano Adorno, an unfaithful and authoritarian nobleman who impoverished them and caused Catherine great suffering. Her mental anguish reached crisis proportions in 1473, when she was suddenly wounded by God's love and made acutely aware of her own wretchedness and God's mercy.

This life-changing experience shaped Catherine's spiritual teaching, ascetic practices, and charitable works. She believed God's love draws the creature to see its misery, to seek and suffer through the annihilation of its own will and humanity, until entirely absorbed in God. Similarly, in the fires of Purgatory God's burning love consumes sin until the soul becomes one with God. Catherine experienced visions and ecstasies, and was devoted to the Eucharist. Her extreme asceticism included wearing a hair shirt, swallowing filth to overcome her disgust, and prolonged prayer and fasting.

Her charitable activities for the poor and sick were renowned. After converting her husband, she lived celibately with him for about twenty years in the Hospital of Pammatone, which she directed from 1490 to 1496, performing heroically during several plagues. She inspired religious and charitable foundations, including the influential Oratory of Divine Love.

Catherine chose not to have a spiritual confessor for most of her life. She refuted a Dominican who contended her lay status made her less prepared to love God. Her large circle of disciples included priests, religious, and laity.

Catherine's life and teaching were recorded by disciples and a confessor (and not Catherine) in three Italian texts—her Life, the Treatise on Purgatory, and the Spiritual Dialogue. Their precise authorship is still debated.

Catherine died an excruciating death after a prolonged illness. She was canonized in 1737.

CATHERINE M. MOONEY

References and Further Reading

- Bonzi, Umile. S. Caterina Fiesch Adorno, vol. 2. Edizione critica dei manoscritti cateriniani. [Torino]: Marietti, 1962.
- Catherine of Genoa. (Spiritual Dialogue). Purgation and Purgatory; The Spiritual Dialogue. translated by Serge Hughes. New York: Paulist Press, 1979.
- Life and Doctrine of Saint Catherine of Genoa*. New York: Catholic Publication Society, 1874. Reprinted, The Spiritual Doctrine of St. Catherine of Genoa. Rockford, Ill.: Tan Books, 1989. Online, "Life and Doctrine of Saint Catherine" at <http://www.ccel.org/ccel/catherine-q/life.toc.html>

See also Almsgiving and Charity; Asceticism; Chastity and Chaste Marriage; Confraternities; Devotional Practices; Lay Piety; Laywomen, Religious; Mystics' Writings

CATHERINE OF SIENA

Although she only lived to the age of 33, Catherine di Giacomo di Benicasa (1347–1380) had a considerable impact on her city and the church. Catherine was born twenty-fourth of the twenty-five children of a Siense wool dyer of comfortable means, and his wife. It is difficult to disentangle fact from legend in accounts of Catherine's youth. It is reasonably certain, however, that she was religious from her youth, refusing any chance to marry. Raymond of Capua, a prominent Dominican and her principal biographer, tells us that Catherine cut off her hair at age 15 to discourage suitors. At 18 she was granted a Dominican habit as one of the mantellate (penitent women wearing religious robes), and she lived a solitary life of prayer in her room. She only left it to attend services at San Domenico, the Dominican church in Siena. In 1368, she experienced a mystical marriage to Jesus, who then told her to serve the sick and impoverished.

Catherine's life of service bred legends. She practiced extreme austerities that did not keep her from doing nursing and caring for poor persons. Most famously, Catherine comforted Niccolò Toldo, a young man who had been condemned to death. Catherine soon was drawn into the politics of Siena, offering counsel and praying for the citizens. In the period from 1374 onward, Catherine began to travel outside Siena, trying to direct Christians away from feuding to the recovery of the Holy Land. This included a mission to Avignon on behalf of Florence that the Florentines promptly disowned in an effort to make a favorable peace with the pope. She also began sending letters to many persons, including a harsh rebuke of Florentine duplicity and advice to Pope Gregory XI that he should return the papacy from Avignon to Rome. Catherine's earnestness and love of truth occasionally blinded her to others' motives, but she never gave up her efforts to improve the state of church and Christendom. In this period (c. 1376), Catherine received the stigmata of Christ, but the marks were (at her request) invisible to others.

Catherine's final years were difficult. The Florentines once again used her as a diplomatic pawn in relations with the papacy. Irked by this, Catherine returned to Siena. Pope Gregory returned the papacy to Rome, but he died there in 1378 while preparing to return to Avignon. Gregory's death was followed by a schism that divided Christendom. Rival popes sat in Avignon and Rome. Catherine wrote letters urging acceptance of the Roman claimant, Urban VI, and he called her to Rome. Catherine's health collapsed, but she continued her life of prayer for a divided church. She dispatched Raymond of Capua to go to Avignon as an emissary for the ending of the Great Schism (1378–1418), but he did not risk the journey. Catherine remained in the Holy City, each day dragging her ailing body to St. Peter's for Mass. She died in Rome in 1380, and her body remained at the Dominican convent of Santa Maria sopra Minerva. Catherine was canonized by Pope Pius II, himself a Sienese, in 1461.

Catherine left a large corpus of letters. Recipients range from her mother, Mona Lapa, to the popes of her time. They include the mercenary leader John Hawkwood, the queen mother of Hungary, and a prostitute, to whom she wrote on the urging of the woman's brothers. These letters express both divine love and Catherine's love for God and neighbor. Her self-presentation is one of an apostle, living a life of self-sacrifice while serving others. Catherine's mystical teachings appear in the Dialogue, which dwells on God's love for humanity. (God is described as "mad" for love of the human race.) The Dialogue also reflects the author's concerns for the reform of the church. Nor was the welfare of individuals absent from the text. One of those closest to her thoughts was Raymond of Capua, who helped in the composition of the text. Besides being Catherine's confessor and biographer, Raymond was active in ecclesiastical affairs. (As Master General of his order, he advanced reform of the friars' lives, launching the Observant movement of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries.) Raymond's biography must be used carefully, because it presents Catherine as he wished her to be seen, de-emphasizing her active life, but it provides evidence from one of the persons closest to her life, which was indeed both active and contemplative.

THOMAS M. IZBICKI

References and Further Reading

- Catherine of Siena. The Dialogue. translated by Suzanne Noffke. New York: Paulist Press, 1980.
- . The Letters of Catherine of Siena. translated by Suzanne Noffke. 2 vols. Tempe: Arizona Center for Medieval and Renaissance Studies, 2000.
- Del Pozzo, Joan P. The Apotheosis of Niccolò Toldo: An Execution "Love Story": Appendix A Translation of Saint Catherine of Siena's Most Celebrated Letter. MLN: Modern Language Notes 110-1 (1995): 164–177.
- Noffke, Suzanne. Catherine of Siena: Vision Through a Distant Eye. Collegeville, Minn.: Liturgical Press, 1996.
- Scott, Karen. "This is why I have put you among your neighbors": St. Bernard's and St. Catherine's Understanding of the Love of God and Neighbor." In Atti del simposio internazionale cateriniano-bernardiniano, Siena, 17–20 aprile 1980, edited by Domenico Maffei and Paolo Nardi. Siena: Accademia Senese degli Intornati, 1980. pp. 278–294.
- . "St. Catherine of Siena, 'Apostola.'" In Church History 61. 1 (March 1992): 34–46.
- . "Mystical Death, Bodily Death: Catherine of Siena and Raymond of Capua on the Mystic's Encounter with God." In Gendered Voices: Medieval Saints and Their Interpreters, edited by Catherine M. Mooney. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999. pp. 136–167.
- . "Catherine of Siena and Lay Sanctity in Fourteenth-Century Italy." In Lay Sanctity, Medieval and Modern: A Search for Models, edited by Ann W. Astell. South Bend, Ind.: University of Notre Dame Press, 2000, pp. 77–90.

See also Asceticism; Bride of Christ; Imagery; Church; Dominican Order; Laywomen, Religious; Mysticism and Mystics; Spiritual Care; Tertiaries

CELIBACY: CLERICAL AND PRIESTS' CONCUBINES

Beginning as early as the Council of Elvira in 306, church councils, especially those in the western portions of the Roman Empire, attempted to enforce celibacy for all clergy by legislating against both clerical marriage and concubinage. Laws that targeted concubinage, however, were difficult to enforce, especially during the early Middle Ages, when reformers were more likely to focus on the more troubling issue of clerical marriage. Even during the eleventh century, when Pope Gregory VII made clerical celibacy a core part of his reform legislation, clerical concubinage remained a widespread phenomenon.

By the High Middle Ages, however, reformers had largely put an end to the practice of clerical marriage, freeing them up to turn their attention to the related issue of clerical concubinage. In 1123, the First Lateran Council reiterated earlier prohibitions on clerical concubinage, and the canons of Lateran II (1139) further mandated that concubinous clerics be stripped of their benefices. Local councils and diocesan synods—often with the support of secular authorities—followed suit, advocating the suspension of concubinous clerics and excommunication of their concubines and declaring the offspring of such unions illegitimate.

Reform Efforts

Unfortunately for reformers, increasingly strict legislation against clerical concubinage in no way eradicated the practice. The presence of anticoncubinage legislation in the decrees of the Council of Trent (1545–1563) indicates that canonists and theologians continued to wrestle with the problem throughout the High and later Middle Ages. Part of the blame for the ineffectiveness of the new sanctions rests with the ecclesiastical courts, which tended to commute penalties against the clergy to fines, thereby blunting the impact of the intended reforms. Records of parish visitations further suggest that both concubines of clergy and their ecclesiastical partners were, in many cases, fully integrated into their communities. Parish records indicate that many concubines lived openly with their ordained partners, with the couple sometimes raising children together in the home they shared. Most parishioners reported incidences of clerical concubinage in a matter-of-fact manner, suggesting that clerical concubinage sparked no greater moral outrage than did the frequent incidence of fornication, reported in a similarly dispassionate tone.

There is no single pattern that defines all or even most relationships between clergy and their concubines in the Middle Ages; rather, these relationships varied as much as those between laypeople. Some couples remained together for only a short time, while others formed lasting unions in which the couple shared a home, children, and even grandchildren, and continued to do so even in the face of ecclesiastical censure. In many regions, these relationships were common knowledge among parishioners, who reported couples living together openly, and who sometimes compared such couples to legitimate marriages. Some historians have suggested, however, that rural clergy were only open about their relationships because there was little possibility of hiding them within a small parish, where clergy were integrated into the life of the community; urban clergy seem not to have been as open about their relationships, and urban parishioners may have been less tolerant of clergy who kept concubines. Even in rural parishes, records attest to the fact that at least some clergymen tried to keep their relationships secret by discreetly maintaining their concubines, and sometimes their children, in towns or cities outside the parish.

Concubines

The concubines themselves seem to have been as varied as the relationships in which they took part. Historians have often assumed that concubines, whether of clergy or of laymen, were women on the margins of the social order for whom marriage was not an option. Parish records to a certain extent support this picture: many clerics' concubines were converts from Judaism or Islam, or women with few connections to the communities in which they lived. The majority of concubines, however, appear to have been ordinary women, fully integrated into the life of their communities, with strong family ties. Such women may have chosen a concubinage relationship over marriage for a number of reasons, including (but not limited to) unavailability of a husband, or impossibility of raising a dowry, or even marriage to a man from whom they were now separated. But the fact that many of these relationships persisted for years or even decades suggests that historians should not rule out genuine affection as a motivating factor for women who chose to become the concubines of clergymen.

A few clerics' concubines were ostracized within their own communities, as evidenced by the insulting language that some co-parishioners used when referring to them in the parish visitations. But negative portrayals of these women may well have been due to factors apart from their unorthodox relationships: many of the women singled out for insulting language were also accused by their neighbors of prostitution, pimping, or usury. It is certainly possible that such accusations themselves may have stemmed from parishioners' negative opinions of clerical concubines. Nevertheless, it is significant that instances in which parishioners characterized clerics' concubines so negatively are relatively rare, suggesting that, unlike canonists, ordinary laypeople did not view the status of cleric's concubine as automatic cause for censure.

Some historians, in fact, have gone so far as to propose that clerical concubinage offered women a degree of stability comparable to that enjoyed by married women. They argue that the concubine of a member of the clergy was in a special position since, unlike a layman's concubine, the cleric's concubine ran no risk of being displaced by a wife, and may have even enjoyed a portion of her partner's status within the community. But whereas a woman married in secret could eventually come forth to claim legitimate status as a wife, a clergyman's concubine could never harbor expectations of her position becoming legitimate. Centuries of legislation against clerical concubinage meant that, however well-accepted she might be within her community, a clerical concubine lacked status as such at law, and thus had no legal recourse if her partner repudiated her, either on his own initiative, or in response to orders from ecclesiastical superiors. In such cases, the women (and sometimes children) involved found themselves in untenable circumstances, as most clerics' concubines were economically dependent on their ordained partners. Sometimes a cleric who abandoned his concubine provided her with a dowry so she could make a good marriage, but such gestures were at the discretion of the individual clergyman, and parish records contain numerous stories of families and neighbors indignant at the desperate straits in which a concubine found herself after having been abandoned. Clearly there was a significant gap between, on the one hand, church authorities' insistence that concubinous clergy sever all ties with their "families," and, on the other hand, community expectations that a woman had a right to some measure of material support from her partner, even after separation.

To what extent, then, do the history of legislation against clerical concubinage and the historical experience of the concubines themselves correspond? The prescriptive sources tell a relatively linear tale of increasing restrictions against clerical "families," but descriptive sources like ecclesiastical court records and parish visitations paint a more complicated picture of relationships between clergy and their concubines. Although clerics' concubines had no official status in law, local records indicate that they were not necessarily marginalized within their communities. Furthermore, repeated legislation against clerical concubinage suggests the persistence of the practice, rather than its gradual disappearance. Although popes, councils, and synods had legislated against these unions since the earliest centuries, the concubines of clergymen remained a part of parish life throughout the Middle Ages, and beyond.

MARIE A. KELLEHER

References and Further Reading

- Barstow, Anne Llewellyn. Married Priests and the Reforming Papacy: The Eleventh-Century Debates. New York and Toronto: E. Mellen Press, 1982.
- Bornstein, Daniel. "Parish Priests in Late Medieval Cortona: The Urban and Rural Clergy," in Quaderni di Storia Religiosa 4 (1997): 165–193.
- Brooke, Christopher N. L. "Gregorian Reform in Action: Clerical Marriage in England, 1050–1200." In Change in Medieval Society: Europe North of the Alps, 1050–1500, edited by Sylvia Thrupp. New York: Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1964, pp. 49–71.
- Cochini, Christian. Apostolic Origins of Priestly Celibacy, trans. Nelly Marans. San Francisco: Ignatius Press, 1990.
- Frassetto, Michael, ed. Medieval Purity and Piety: Essays on Medieval Clerical Celibacy and Religious Reform. New York and London: Garland, 1998.
- Gaudemet, Jean. "Le célibat ecclésiastique: Le droit et la pratique du XIe au XIIIe s." Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, kanonistische Abteilung 68 (1982), 1–31.
- Haboucha, Reginetta. "Clerics, Their Wives, and Their Concubines in the 'Partidas' of Alfonso el Sabio," in Homo Carnalis: The Carnal Aspect of Medieval Human Life, edited by Helen Rodite Lemay. Binghamton, NY: SUNY Binghamton, 1990, pp. 85–104.
- Kelleher, Marie A. "'Like Man and Wife': Clerics' Concubines in the Diocese of Barcelona." Journal of Medieval History 28 (2002): 349–360.
- Lynch, John E. "Marriage and Celibacy of the Clergy: The Discipline of the Western Church, a Historico-Canonical Synopsis." The Jurist 32 (1972): Part I, 14–38; Part II, 189–212.
- McNamara, Jo Ann. "Chaste Marriage and Clerical Celibacy." In Sexual Practices and the Medieval Church, edited by Vern L. Bullough and James Brundage. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus Books, 1982, pp. 22–33.
- Rath, Brigitte. "'De sacramentis, concubinatu et ludo taxillorum...': Über ein böhmisches Visitationsprotokoll aus dem 14. Jahrhundert," in Von Menschen und ihren Zeichen. Sozialhistorische Untersuchungen zum Spätmittelalter und zur Neuzeit, edited by Ingrid Matschinegg et al. Bielefeld: Verlag für Regionalgeschichte, 1990, pp. 41–59.

See also Concubines; Illegitimacy; Law, Canon; Parishes; Records, Ecclesiastical; Sexuality; Extramarital Sex; Sexuality, Regulation of

CELIBACY, LAY

See Chastity and Chaste Marriage; Singlewomen

CERETA, LAURA

One of the last great female humanist writers active in fifteenth-century Italy, Laura Cereta (born in Brescia, 1469–1499) was the first to put women's issues and her friendships with women front and center in her works. The daughter of a Brescian attorney, at the age of fifteen Cereta married a Venetian merchant, Pietro Serina, and was widowed a year later. Schooled in Latin and the classics by nuns, Cereta participated in humanist circles both in Brescia and the monastery at Chiari, where she may have first presented her comic dialogue “On the Death of an Ass” and read selections from her letterbook. Her letters, half of them to women, indicate how fully she saw herself as enmeshed in a historically constituted community of female intellectuals—a republic of women, muliebris respublica, as she portrayed the world she imagined (Robin 1997, p. 80). Containing eighty-two Latin epistles and her satirical dialogue, also in Latin, her collected Epistolae circulated widely, bringing her fame in her own lifetime, although the work did not appear in a printed edition until 1640, in Padua. Among her most passionately charged letters are those to her husband, revealing her struggle for power in the relationship and later her terrible grief at his death (Robin 1997, pp. 87–113). In a dispatch to the Brescian magistrate Luigi Dandolo she exposes the atrocities of war she witnessed with her own eyes when German troops invaded Rovereto and Calliano (Robin 1997, pp. 160–169). And in a pair of feminist manifestos, she dismisses the institutions of marriage and motherhood as traps to enslave women (to Pietro Zecchi, in Robin 1997, pp. 64–72). She also defends women’s right to higher education, arguing that the female sex already has a brilliant history of poets, orators, scholars, and prophets (to Bibolo Semproni, in Robin 1997, pp. 72–80). Another diptych of philosophical letters, to the nun Deodata di Leno and a woman she calls “Europa solitaria,” argues the case for and against Epicureanism. She asks, should the pleasures of the body be chosen at risk of abandoning one’s duties as a citizen (Robin 1997, pp. 115–128)? Cereta’s letters anticipate themes associated with the early feminism of the Enlightenment: namely, the representation of women as a collective and a community; the preoccupation with reconceptualizing gender; the privileging of the emotions in a genre assumed to be the exclusive domain of reason (humanist letters); the construction of housework as a barrier to women’s intellectual aspirations; and the use of the salon and salon writing (for Cereta, the monastery and the letter) as a bridge for women into the public arena.

DIANA ROBIN

References and Further Reading

- Cereta’s letterbooks are extant in Rome (Vatican City, Biblioteca Apostolica Vaticana. Vat. Lat. 3176. Cart. 3. XVI in 73 fols. Contains eighty-three items); and Venice (Biblioteca Nazionale Marciana. Marc. Cod. Lat., XI.28 [4186] mbr. XV, 154 fols. Includes seventy-four items containing many lacunae.)
- Cereta, Laura. Laurae Ceretae Brixiensis Feminae Clarissimae Epistolae iam primum e MS in lucem productae, edited by Jacopo Filippo Tomasini. Padua: Sebastiano Sardi, 1640.
- . Collected Letters of a Renaissance Feminist, translated and edited by Diana Robin. Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1997.
- King, Margaret L. and Albert Rabil, Jr. Her Immaculate Hand: Selected Works By and About the Women Humanists of Quattrocento Italy. Binghamton, NY: Medieval and Renaissance Texts, 1983.
- Palma, M. “Cereto, Laura,” in Dizionario biografico degli italiani 729–730.
- Rabil, Albert Jr. Laura Cereta: Quattrocento Humanist. Binghamton, NY: Medieval and Renaissance Texts and Studies, 1981.
- Robin, Diana. “Space, Woman, and Renaissance Discourse,” in Sex and Gender in Medieval and Renaissance Texts: The Latin Tradition, edited by Barbara K. Gold, Paul Allen Miller, Charles Platter. Albany: State University of New York of New York Press, 1996, pp. 165–187.
- . “Humanism, Italy,” pp. 153–157; “Laura Cereta,” pp. 46–48; “The Querelle des Femmes in Renaissance Italy,” pp. 270–273; “Learned Women,” pp. 169–171, in the Feminist Encyclopedia of Italian Literature, edited by Rinaldina Russell, Westport, Conn: Greenwood Press, 1997b, pp. 153–157.
- . “Culture, Imperialism, and Humanist Criticism in the Italian City-States,” in The Cambridge History of Literary Criticism, Volume 3: The Renaissance. 1500–1700, edited by Glyn P. Norton. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1999, pp. 355–363.
- . “Cereta, Laura,” in Encyclopedia of the Renaissance. Editor in Chief, Paul F. Grendler. New York: Charles Scribner’s Sons, 1999, 1: 393–394.
- . “Humanism and Feminism in Laura Cereta’s Public Letters,” in Women in Italian Renaissance Culture and Society, edited by Letizia Panizza. Oxford: Legenda European Humanities Research Centre, University of Oxford, 2000, pp. 368–384.
- . “Laura Cereta: Biography, Latin Texts, Translations,” in Laurie Churchill, ed., Women Writing Latin, Vol. 3. New York: Routledge, 2002, pp. 83–108.

See also Defenses of Women; Fedele, Cassandra; Humanism; Italy; Letter Writing; Nogarola, Isotta; Renaissance, Historiography of; Sanuti, Nicolasa Castellani; Women Authors: Latin Texts

CHARIVARI

From the French, charivari was a pervasive and popular ritual of shaming and humiliation, designed to single out, mock, punish and ultimately absorb deviant couples. The early versions of the ritual are found in the literature, iconography, and drama of the Middle Ages, but the charivari comes to us in full-blown form during the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. The charivari is found across Europe and in various permutations. In English it is called “rough music,” the “Skimmington ride,” or “the riding of the stang”: in Italian, the scampanate and mattinata; in German it appears in various versions of the haberfeld-treiben, thierjagen, and katzenmusik.

Charivaris were characterized in general by noisy processions, attended by “rough music,” cacophonies of banging pots, lampooning songs or rhymes, pounding marrow bones and whistles, animal bladders filled with rattling peas, shouts, and sometimes gunshots. The term charivari, was meant to mimic the noise made during the ritual. Charivaris frequently occurred at night (often on successive nights), and although they may have had various functions as censors of societal behavior outside the norm, they were largely associated with deviance in marriage, the most usual subjects being: the age difference between couples who were about to marry; the censure of premarital sex; the exposure of adultery and cuckoldry; the punishment for wife-beating; or the humiliation of the hen-pecked husband and/or the shrewish wife. They were also commonly used when a wedding deviated from expectation, for example, when a ritual “fee” in the form of either money, food, or drink to the guests was withheld.

Besides “rough music,” the charivari might be composed of several other dramatic elements. These might include the parading and/or burning of effigies; the “production” of a mime or play upon a cart; imagined hunt; parodies of religious or legal rituals; the parading of men “armed” with household weapons such as pitchforks and coalrakes; and the display of horns. But the most important and pervasive aspect of the charivari involved the “riding” of the subject(s). This involved a mount of some sort, either a donkey or a horse, sometimes a cart, or a substitute horse; in England a “cowlstaff” or “stang” pole carried on men’s shoulders. The riders might be the victims themselves, or there might be a proxy victim or an effigy; and riders might be presented as transvestite or unmasculine in nature. Sometimes victims were pelted with filth and might end up being ducked, sometimes with a “cucking stool,” into a shallow pool of dirty water, a duck pond, or a ditch. Often a rider was made to face backwards, and sometimes ridings were seasonal, actually imbedded in local festivals, as opposed to the singling out of a particular couple. The ride of the victim(s) could range from comic to violent, resulting sometimes only in humiliation, other times in injury or even death.

THERESIA DE VROOM

References and Further Reading

Klapisch-Zuber, Christiane. Women, Family and Ritual in Renaissance Italy. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1985. See the chapter “The Mattinata in Medieval Italy,” pp. 261–282.

Mathews, Grieco S. F., “The Body, Appearance, and Sexuality.” In A History of Women in the West: Resistance and Enlightenment Paradoxes, edited by Natalie Zemon Davis and Arlette Farge. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1993, pp. 46–84.

Vroom, Theresia de. “In the Context of ‘Rough Music’: The Representation of Unequal Couples in Some Medieval Plays.” European Medieval Drama 2 (1998): 237–260.

See also Honor and Reputation; Marriage, Christian; Sexuality: Extramarital Sex; Sexuality: Female Same Sex Relations; Sexuality: Male Same-Sex Relations; Sexuality, Regulation of; Sexuality: Sex in Marriage

CHARMS

See Magic and Charms

CHARTERS

Charters are documents written in a standardized way certifying such legal acts as contracts, donations, or testaments, as well as juridical, royal, or papal instructions. From the downfall of the Roman administration until the sixth century, recording and keeping the former more temporary charters to testify a juridical act was of increasing importance in the Middle Ages. For its value it was vital to include all people related to the act in the written testament as well as to name as many witnesses as possible. Charters therefore are considered valuable sources because, contrary to normative texts, they describe authentic situations, and further unintentionally reveal information regarding social, political, and religious history. On the other hand, charters were subject to severe stylization. This resulted in the generous addition of invented details, where the common form required them; at the same time, uncommon features were left out.

Although limited in their ability to exercise and defend their rights, medieval women participated in these documented transactions as issuers, recipients, or subjects, but rarely as witnesses. Furthermore, noble women and abbesses had the privilege of certifying documents with their own seals from the twelfth century onward.

However, because of problematic and imbalanced textual traditions, charters of interest to ecclesiastical institutions are better preserved than, for example, charters of endowment or grants in marriage, which are known through formularies and example-collections. Nevertheless, considering the chances of survival, important differences in time and area and even between male and female religious communities must be noted. In Italy, for example, traditions of late antiquity resulted in early municipal documentation preserving private charters in great numbers.

Overall research on charters with regard to gender is still in its early stages. Herlihy (1962) undertook a quantitative analysis of the surviving early medieval private charters to gain an overview of the participation of women in donations to churches. Based on the results, he noted changes in women's general abilities to possess land. He, as well as Wemple (1981), who concentrated her study on charters from the monastery of Lorsch, tried to explain the fluctuations in their statistics of donations through changes in law of succession and family structures. However, new research found that these changing patterns of interaction were caused by declining interest in recording details: the more accepted the institution was, the less interest there was in documenting all persons participating in the transaction. The transactions of female donors especially got lost.

Unintended documented details about social life in private charters and testaments such as information about tenure structures and family organization, casual remarks about inheritance or purchase of holdings, as well as listings of owned or dedicated objects are rather more informative than quantitative studies. Donations can inform us about cults of saints, commemoration, and liturgical practices. However it is important to be aware of the formulaic and stylized elements in these documents.

Up to now, research regarding royal charters and women has focused on queens using their influence to intercede on behalf of protégées, and on situations in which queens issued charters themselves. Both situations concern women's political influence at royal courts.

As recipients female monasteries have also figured in studies interpreting the number and relevance of charters they received, and whether they could draft, copy, or archive them properly. Recent discussions have shown that religious women possessed fewer charters than their male counterparts, but whether that is due to lesser political relevance or a smaller chance of survival remains to be seen.

Overall the investigation of charters as sources, especially for women's history, is still in the process of development. There are still voluminous collections of private charters and even complete monastic archives, which are not edited or even catalogued, especially regarding late medieval documents, which deserve more attention. Basically, while using charters as sources, one has always to consider the special forms of these texts, as well as the individual interests, chances of survival, and context of transmission.

KATRINETTE BODARWÉ

References and Further Reading

- Bodarwé, Katrinette. "Frühmittelalterliche Urkunden als frauengeschichtliche Quelle - Schenkerinnen und Zeuginnen in Fulda." In Vielfalt der Geschichte: Lernen, Lehren und Erforschen vergangener Zeiten, edited by Sabine Happ and Ulrich Nonn. Berlin: Wiss. Verl. Berlin, 2004, pp. 86–108.
- . "Gender and the Archive. The Preservation of Charters in Early Medieval Communities of Religious Women." In Saints, Scholars and Politicians: Gender as a Tool in Medieval Studies: Festschrift in Honor of Anneke Mulder-Bakker, edited by Mathilde van Dijk and René Nip. Turnhout: Brepols, 2005, pp. 109–130.
- Broer, C. J. C. "Echtgenote, deelgenote, lotgenote: Over oorkonden als bron voor de vrouwengeschiedenis." In Vrouw, familie en macht. Bronnen over vrouwen in de Middeleeuwen, edited by Marco Mostert and others. Hilversum: Verloren, 1990, pp. 147–165.
- Goetz, Hans-Werner. Frauen im frühen Mittelalter: Frauenbild und Frauenleben im Frankenreich. Weimar: Böhlau, 1995.
- Gold, Penny S. "The Charters of le Ronceray d'Angers. Male/Female Interaction in Monastic Business." In Medieval Women and the Sources of Medieval History, edited by Joel T. Rosenthal. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1990, pp. 122–132.
- Hellmuth, Doris. Frau und Besitz. Zum Handlungsspielraum von Frauen in Alamannien (700–940). Sigmaringen: Thorbecke, 1998.
- Herlihy, David. "Land, Family and Women in Continental Europe (701–1200)." Traditio 18 (1962): 89–120
- Signori, Gabrieli. Vorsorgen - Vererben - Erinnern: kinder- und familienlose Erblasser in der städtischen Gesellschaft des Spätmittelalters. Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2001.
- Skinner, Patricia. Women in Medieval Italian Society, 500–1200. Harlow: Longman, 2001.
- Stieldorf, Andrea. Rheinische Frauensiegel: zur rechtlichen und sozialen Stellung weltlicher Frauen im 13. und 14. Jahrhundert. Cologne: Böhlau, 1999.
- Wemple, Suzane Fonay. Women in Frankish Society: Marriage and the Cloister (500 to 900). Philadelphia, Pa.: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1981.

See also Administration of Estates; Monasticism and Nuns; Records, Ecclesiastical; Records, Rural; Records, Urban

CHASTITY AND CHASTE MARRIAGE

Christianity has traditionally elevated chastity over marriage, a ranking supported by the New Testament. Although Christ's elliptical references to "eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. 19:11–12) have been interpreted as a recommendation for chastity, the real impetus came from St. Paul. His preference for chastity over marriage was largely pragmatic: the end of the world was at hand and, in this context, marriage and sexuality were dangerous distractions. Hence he urged individuals not yet married to remain so while those who "have wives be as if they had none" (1 Cor. 7:29).

His ambiguous instructions regarding the marriage of an anonymous virgin is also widely understood as endorsing total chastity in marriage, a phenomenon that came to be known as spiritual marriage (1 Cor. 7:36–38). Paul’s apprehension of sexual activity was reinforced by the philosophical tradition which represented marriage as incompatible with the life of the mind. Already in the second century, however, zealous factions in the church began to ascribe a special meaning to the purity associated with chastity, especially virginity, as a realization of the angelic life that the elect would enjoy at the world’s end (Matt. 22:30). The presence of groups of consecrated widows and virgins in the early church indicate that women were understandably drawn to a life of chastity. In addition to freeing women from the dangers of childbirth, a vow of chastity was widely perceived as enabling a woman to transcend her physical inferiority to achieve parity with men.

Spiritual Marriage

With the fourth-century conversion of the Roman Empire, ascetic fervor was on the rise and the virginal ideal began to make permanent inroads into the Christian ideology of marriage, lending theoretical ballast to spiritual marriage. Orthodox authorities such as Ambrose (d. 397) and Jerome (d. 420) extolled the merits of virginity and even claimed it was accorded extra merit in heaven, prompting an anti-ascetic backlash. In an effort to assert parity between marriage and virginity, Jovinian argued that Mary and Joseph went on to have children subsequent to the incarnation—a perfectly reasonable assumption in view of the scriptural references to Christ’s brethren (Matt. 12:48; Luke 21:23). Jerome, however, countered with the assertion that both Mary and Joseph had consecrated their virginity to God and that their union remained unconsummated. Although Jerome regarded Joseph as Mary’s guardian rather than husband, Augustine (d. 430) would uphold the spiritual marriage of Mary and Joseph as the ideal, asserting that its exceptional purity rendered it more perfect and more durable than its carnal counterpart. Augustine’s argument was based on Roman matrimonial law, which emphasized consent over consummation in the formation of the contract. In the twelfth century, Augustine’s consensual delineation of marriage would be upheld in the Sentences of Peter Lombard (c. 1140), and the union of Mary and Joseph enshrined at the center of Christian marriage.

Spiritual marriages existed well before they became the center of theological debate. In the second century, the Sentences of Sextus urged sexual abstinence in marriage; the visionary Hermas was advised by his angelic guide to live with his wife as a sister; Clement of Alexandria also commended matrimonial chastity. Moreover, the apocryphal gospels, written sometime in the second and third centuries, represented spiritual marriage as a lively possibility in the ascetic circles of the Eastern church.

Spiritual marriage tends to follow two basic models. Either the couple would vow virginity on their wedding night, as eventually became exemplified in the fifth-century hagiographical representation of the marriage of Saints Cecilia and Valerian, or they would make a seasoned transition to chastity, usually after having children. In practice, spiritual marriage was something of a compromise formation, since it was often initiated by women who would have preferred a life of chastity, but were compelled to marry.

Women participating in spiritual marriages often enjoyed the relaxation of gender roles associated with female chastity, an effect that was already a bone of contention in the patristic period. Augustine wrote a very stern letter to the matron Ecdicia who, having convinced her husband to vow chastity, began to dress like a widow and assert financial autonomy. In keeping with his view of consensual marriage, Augustine argued the husband’s rule was not impaired but actually strengthened by the suspension of sexual activity. But there were a number of contemporary examples that suggest the opposite. After nearly dying in childbirth, Melania the Younger (d. 438) finally convinced her husband, Pinian, to vow chastity and emerged as the dominant party of their union.

Separation of Spouses

As monasticism increasingly became an option, couples tended to pursue their vocation to chastity in separate religious communities. Such separations were favored by church authorities, who had gradually come to regard intramarital chastity with suspicion, not only for fear of sexual relapses but also for the potential disruption of normative gender roles. Even so, the phenomenon continued in a number of guises. In the Germanic successor states, many a queen was represented as either convincing her husband to vow chastity or unilaterally refusing to consummate the marriage. Bede claims that Queen Aethelthryth of Northumbria (d. 679) managed to preserve her chastity through not just one, but two marriages, before her exasperated second husband finally permitted her to take the veil. Chroniclers and hagiographers often put the topos of spiritual marriage to a somewhat cynical use: it was a convenient excuse for the repudiation of an infertile wife, as in the case of the Carolingian queen Ricardis (d. c. 895). It could also dignify an infertile union, as with the cult surrounding Empress Cunegund (d. 1033).

Even though spiritual marriage was usually undertaken voluntarily, it was temporarily wielded by the Western church as a disciplinary measure in its struggle to establish a celibate clergy. Authorities such as Pope Leo I (d. 461) forbade any husband ordained subsequent to marriage to abandon his wife, recommending cohabitation as brother and sister. There are a number of saintly bishops, such as Severus of Ravenna (d. c. 390), who allegedly succeeded in this transition. But conciliar evidence and the testimony of historians such as Gregory of Tours (d. 594) suggest that all too many of these clerical couples lapsed into marital relations. The church finally abandoned this strategy in the eleventh century when the Gregorian Reformers led an all-out attack on clerical marriage, reversing its previous position by forcing clerics to abandon their wives.

With the rise of popular piety in the High and later Middle Ages, spiritual marriage plays a visible role in a number of pious wives' struggle for autonomy. In keeping with the general democratization of sanctity in this period, moreover, spiritual marriage is not just attributed to a handful of elite saints, but becomes more broadly based socially. The fourteenth-century Provençal saints Elzéar de Sabran and Dauphine de Puimichel, whose marriage of twenty-four years was never consummated, were members of the aristocracy. But women such as Mary of Oignies (d. 1213) and Margery Kempe (d. after 1438), who converted their husbands to chastity in the course of their marriages, were both members of the bourgeoisie.

Spiritual marriage as a practice was probably pioneered by pious women as a vehicle for greater freedom, but the concept was often manipulated for the opposite purpose. Augustine would argue that the transition to chastity increased the husband's authority; hagiographers could invoke the theme of spiritual marriage to conceal the repudiation of a wife; while it was deployed by the church to enforce clerical chastity. These many applications testify to the instability and ultimate malleability of any ideological construct.

DYAN ELLIOTT

References and Further Reading

- Atkinson, Clarissa. "'Precious Balsam in a Fragile Glass': The Ideology of Virginitas in the Later Middle Ages." Journal of Family History 8 (1983): 131–143.
- Brown, Peter. The Body and Society: Men, Women, and Sexual Renunciation in Early Christianity. New York: Columbia University Press, 1988.

- Bugge, John. Virginitas: An Essay in the History of a Medieval Ideal. The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff, 1975.
- Castelli, Elizabeth. "Virginitas and Its Meaning for Women's Sexuality in Early Christianity." Journal of Feminist Studies in Religion 2 (1986): 61–88.
- Clark, Elizabeth. "John Chrysostom and the Subintroductae." Church History 46 (1977): 171–185.
- De Gaiffier, Baudouin. "Intactam sponsam relinquens à propos la vie de S. Alexis." Analecta Bollandiana 65 (1947): 157–195.
- Elliott, Dyan. Spiritual Marriage: Sexual Abstinence in Medieval Wedlock. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1993.
- Elm, Susanna. 'Virgins of God': The Making of Asceticism in Late Antiquity. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1994.
- Evans, Ruth. "Virginitas." In The Cambridge Companion to Medieval Women's Writing, edited by Carolyn Dinshaw and David Wallace. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2003, pp. 21–39.
- Gold, Penny. "The Marriage of Mary and Joseph in the Twelfth-Century Theology of Marriage." In Sexual Practices and the Medieval Church, edited by Vern Bullough and James Brundage. Buffalo and New York: Pantheon, 1982, pp. 102–117, 249–251.
- Labriolle, Pierre de. "Le 'mariage spirituel' dans l'antiquité chrétienne." Revue historique 137 (1921): 204–225.
- McNamara, Jo Ann. "Chaste Marriage and Clerical Celibacy." In Sexual Practices and the Medieval Church, edited by Vern Bullough and James Brundage. Buffalo and New York: Pantheon, 1982, pp. 22–33, 231–235.
- Salih, Sarah. Versions of Virginitas in Late Medieval England. Woodbridge, Suffolk: D. S. Brewer, 2001.
- Vauchez, André. The Laity in the Middle Ages: Religious Beliefs and Devotional Practices, edited by Daniel Bornstein. Trans. Margery Schneider. South Bend, Ind.: University of Notre Dame Press, 1993.
- Wogan-Browne, Jocelyn. "Chaste Bodies: Frames and Experiences." In Framing Medieval Bodies, edited by Sarah Kay and Miri Rubin. Manchester and New York: Manchester University Press, 1994, pp. 24–42.

See also Asceticism; Augustine, Influence of; Celibacy, Clerical and Priests' Concubines; Conjugal Debt; Gender Ideologies; Hagiography; Jerome, Influence of; Laywomen, Religious; Marriage, Christian; Sexuality: Regulation of; Virgin Martyrs; Virginitas; Virile Women; Vowesses

CHAUCER, GEOFFREY

Geoffrey Chaucer's father was a prominent London vintner and deputy to the king's butler, and as a boy Chaucer (c. 1340–1400) entered the royal household as a page to the Countess of Ulster, wife of Lionel, son of Edward III. He later served in a variety of civil service capacities for the king. Eventually made a knight, he was part of a rising class of "esquires en service" who earned the rank of knight by money and service rather than by blood and warfare. His position as inside and outside of the court marked Chaucer as a liminal figure, a position perhaps reflected in such characters as Pandarus in Troilus and Criseyde, a notorious go-between in the royal household, and certainly in his self-portrait in the Canterbury Tales, where he appears as one who is at once oblivious to his surroundings and unusually knowledgeable of all those around him. Described there as an elvish “popet,” or doll, Chaucer’s liminality might associate him with the feminine.

Chaucer traveled abroad frequently on the king’s business, and during his trips to Italy in the 1370s was introduced to the poetry of Dante, Petrarch, and Boccaccio, all of whom, in combination with the great French writers of the day, such as Guillaume de Machaut, influenced his writing profoundly. A skilled diplomat—despite his association with numerous courtiers who came into conflict with Richard, some eventually executed—Chaucer managed to avoid condemnation even after the deposition of Richard II. He apparently suffered an initial setback in finances when Henry IV came to the throne, but his pension was reinstated by the new king, perhaps in response to his short poem, “A Complaint to His Purse,” a lyric in which Chaucer describes his purse as a hard-hearted, fair lady who refuses to grant him favors. He was also associated with a group of so-called Lollard-knights, though Chaucer’s relationship to Lollardy, a movement which would later become heretical, is unclear. Although Chaucer may well have written for the court, his primary sources of income derived from his services to the king’s household, and he is buried in what later became poet’s corner of Westminster Abbey, not for his poetry but for these services.

Chaucer and Women

Little is known about Chaucer’s relationships to women. Probable compliments to Richard’s wife, Anne of Bohemia, in the Legend of Good Women and in Troilus and Criseyde, suggest he was an admirer of Anne. He had close ties to the royal household since he was married to Philippa Roet, sister of Katherine Swynford, long-time mistress, then third wife, of Richard II’s uncle, John of Gaunt. Chaucer’s early poem the Book of The Duchess was written in honor of Blanche of Lancaster, Gaunt’s first wife, who died of the plague.

A tantalizing fragment of the Life Records (a collection of records concerning Chaucer’s life as a courtier, diplomat, and civil servant from civil, ecclesiastical, and private sources) tells us that in 1380 Chaucer was released from the charge of raptus by Cecily Chaumpaigne. Almost nothing is known about Cecily, and the surviving documents concerning this raptus are difficult to interpret. The term raptus is ambiguous and can refer to forced coitus or abduction, often for the purposes of marriage. Christopher Cannon has argued that the term raptus in this case does refer to forced coitus. Whatever the meaning of the document, its implications for Chaucer’s poetry are difficult to construe. Representations of rape do occur with some regularity in Chaucer’s writing (for example, an attempted rape in “The Man of Law’s Tale,” a rape of a mother and daughter in “The Reeve’s Tale,” threat of rape in Troilus and Criseyde, and rape in the “Legend of Philomela”) and Chaucer’s understanding of rape is worth considering; indeed, Chaucer is one of the first to use the term rape in English, though the passage in which this word occurs in Troilus and Criseyde certainly refers to abduction without physical violation.

Writing in English

Chaucer is known as “the Father of English poetry,” an attribution associating him with the establishment of a patriarchal English literary voice. Although his writing encompasses a variety of classes from the royal to the middle classes with a glance at laborers, his work is directed to the concerns and interests of the aristocracy, to whom he most likely read his work. He probably wrote initially in the language of literature of the court, French, and had some training in Latin. He is known above all, however, as the first to produce a large body of literature specifically written in English. His works include translations of Boethius and the Romance of the Rose, a number of short lyrics and several dream visions (The Book of the Duchess, The House of Fame, The Parliament of Fowles), the long narrative poem Troilus and Criseyde, the Legend of Good Women, and the Canterbury Tales, a collection of 29 poems, several of which are in the voices of women. Chaucer was well acquainted with the predominant courtly idiom, in which women are placed on a pedestal by a longing adulterous male lover, but his works suggest dislike of such motifs and many criticize courtly conventions, celebrating instead married love.

Portraits of Women

Chaucer was dubbed by Gavin Douglas as “womanis frend.” Critics have debated whether or not his varied portraits of women are favorable to women. Carolyn Dinshaw and Elaine Tuttle Hansen investigate Chaucer's complex and sensitive engagement with contemporary misogyny, articulated most clearly in the writings of the Church Fathers. His representations of women range from aristocratic courtly heroines to milkmaids, from contemporary figures including cloth merchants and prioresses to historical figures such as saints and classical heroines. His two most famous characters are Criseyde and the Wife of Bath. Chaucer bases much of his portrait of Criseyde on Boccaccio's Il Filostrato. Unlike Boccaccio, however, Chaucer resists condemning Criseyde as the quintessential faithless woman. In Jill Mann's view, Chaucer's unexpected play with gender roles, in which he allows Troilus to demonstrate feminine attributes, suggests Chaucer's sensitivity to the constructed nature of gender.

In the Legend of Good Women, fictionally occasioned by the God of Love's criticism of Chaucer for writing negative portraits of women, Chaucer contributes to the debate about women popular in continental literature and especially engaged by Christine de Pizan. He writes nine tales of classical women drawn from Ovid's Heroides. Chaucer's purposes in his defense of women are difficult to construe since the work is incomplete and since each female heroine is extolled for her passive victimization.

The female characters in the Canterbury Tales provoke controversial readings. The Wife of Bath is understood, on the one hand, as a skillful manipulator of Christian misogynistic discourse, perhaps a would-be cleric demonstrating her mastery of rhetoric despite her lack of formal education, and as a visionary rewriter of romance; on the other hand, she is seen as a wistful, aging woman who cannot envision herself as having an identity outside marriage and who in her tale inscribes male wish fulfillment. Constance, of the "Man of Law's Tale," is seen by some as a passive nothing subject to the whims of a Christian patriarchy, and by others as a skillful promulgator of Christianity and an effective agent despite apparent passivity. Griselda, heroine of the "Clerk's Tale," is particularly problematic, seen, on the one hand, as a passive victim of a brutal patriarchal economy whose passivity is so extreme that she allows her own children to be killed, and, on the other hand, as an exemplar of free will—by upholding a promise she makes to herself as much as to others she asserts her relative autonomy as a Christian subject. Despite the fact that major critical studies have presented thorough considerations of both positive and negative views of Chaucer, much work on Chaucer's historical relationships to women and on his representations of women still needs to be done.

ELIZABETH ROBERTSON

References and Further Reading

- Benson, Larry et al. The Riverside Chaucer. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1987.
- Cannon, Christopher. "Raptus in the Champaigne Release and a Newly Discovered Document Concerning the Life of Geoffrey Chaucer." Speculum 68 (1993): 74–94.
- Cox, Catherine. Gender and Language in Chaucer. Gainesville: University of Florida Press, 1997.
- Crane, Susan. Gender and Romance in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1991.
- Dinshaw, Carolyn. Chaucer's Sexual Poetics. Madison, Wis.: University of Wisconsin Press, 1989.
- Hansen, Elaine Tuttle. Chaucer's Fictions of Gender. Berkeley, Calif.: University of California Press, 1992.
- Mann, Jill. Feminizing Chaucer. Cambridge, U.K.: D. S. Brewer, 1991, 2002.
- . The Canterbury Tales. New York: Penguin, 2005.
- Martin, Priscilla. Chaucer's Women: Nuns, Wives and Amazons. Iowa City, Iowa: University of Iowa Press, 1990.
- Patterson, Lee. Chaucer and the Subject of History. Madison, Wis.: University of Wisconsin Press, 1991.

See also Constance; Courtly Love; Criseyde; Literacy and Reading, Vernacular; Literature, Middle English; Lollards; Patronage, Literary; Rape and Raptus; Wife of Bath

CHELLES

See Jouarre and Chelles

CHILDBIRTH

See Pregnancy and Childbirth: Christian Women; Pregnancy and Childbirth: Jewish Women

CHILDREN

See Children, Betrothal and Marriage of; Family (Earlier Middle Ages); Family (Later Middle Ages); Girls and Boys

CHILDREN, BETROTHAL AND MARRIAGE OF

Medieval canonists and theologians distinguished promises to marry at a future time (betrothal) from promises to marry in the present (marriage), although this distinction was not as sharply etched in the minds of the laity. Formal betrothal contracts (sponsalia), with detailed specification of performance contingencies, were ordinarily concluded by high-status couples whose families and kinsmen were adroit at arranging socially and politically consequential marriages.

These acts of family diplomacy frequently affected very young children. The large majority of couples doubtlessly entered into informal, private agreements for future marriage or contracted marriages without the preliminary betrothal.

Under Roman civil and canon law, the minimum age for contracting marriage was twelve for girls and fourteen for boys, the ages roughly corresponding to the onset of puberty. The church followed Roman civil law in setting the minimum age for betrothal at the completion of seven years. A valid betrothal and marriage under civil and canon law was grounded in the freely given consent of the bride and groom. In southern Europe, it was customary for parents and kinsmen, with the assistance of professional matchmakers, to arrange the marriage of a nubile girl—namely, choose a spouse, establish the dates of the betrothal and marriage, and settle the amount of her dowry. Unless the girl contested the betrothal, claiming that she was forced by her parents or kinsmen to accept the arranged marriage, her consent was presumed valid under civil and canon law.

While quantitative data on the ages at which couples were betrothed in the Middle Ages are not abundant, they can be estimated from ages at first marriage. In Italy women were married in their late teens to older men. The extreme case was fifteenth-century Florence, where the average age at first marriage for women was eighteen, and for men, thirty-one years. The available evidence suggests short intervals between betrothal and marriage, typically a year or less. In England after the Black Death, rural women tended to marry between their late teens and early twenties; urban women, in their twenties. In both cases husbands were three to four years older than their brides. English women were betrothed later than Italian women, while English men were betrothed earlier than their Italian counterparts.

Carolingian polyptychs, Norse sagas, saint's lives, chronicles, records of legal disputes, and family archives are among the primary sources testifying to the marriage of girls shortly after puberty. Chaucer's indefatigable Wife of Bath had married five times since the age of twelve. Likewise, at the age of twelve, Margaret of Beaufort was married to Edmund Tudor, and at age thirteen she became both a widow and the mother of the future King Henry VII. Royal and aristocratic families regularly secured alliances through the betrothal of children under twelve years of age. Isabelle of France was seven when her betrothal to King Richard II of England was arranged. The eleven betrothals and marriages celebrated by the Neville family between 1412 and 1436 included thirteen children under sixteen years, eight of whom had not yet reached twelve, and one of whom was only six. Uncertainty hovered around the betrothals of docile young children, who, upon reaching marriageable age, were required to publicly affirm or disaffirm before a bishop or his court betrothals arranged on their behalf by parents and kinsmen. Consent transformed these betrothals into enforceable contracts.

An exceptional source for studying betrothals and marriages of young children is the Decretals of Gregory IX (1244). At the beginning of the title, "The Betrothal of the Prepubescent" (X 4. 2), Isidore of Seville (Etym. XI, 2) was cited as the source for the definition of pubescence, which he derived from pubis, named for the pudenda where the body's soft hair first appears. Puberty was not strictly determined by reaching the threshold ages, fourteen and twelve, but occurred when males could generate and females could become pregnant (X 4. 2. 3, Puberes). Making the physical capacity to engage in procreative sexual intercourse the defining feature of marriageable age made sense, given the difficulties in ascertaining someone's precise age in this period. In a dispute in which an older man "was betrothed to a certain girl in her cradle" and then married the girl's mother, Pope Alexander III (1159–1181) ruled that if the marriage of the man and the mother had been celebrated before the girl had reached the age of seven, they could remain joined in marriage, for betrothals "made in the cradle" were not enforceable (X 4. 2. 4, Litteras tuae). Another case concerned a girl just under the age of twelve whose parents married her off. Upon attaining the age of twelve, she sought dissolution of the marriage and permission to marry someone else, denying that she had consented to marriage with the man chosen by her parents or that she had had conjugal relations with him. Alexander decided that in cases in which the husband alleged under oath that he had had conjugal relations with his wife, as here, and she denied it, truth resided with the husband. In addition, he held that if a girl under, but nearing, the age of twelve years consented to her betrothal, it was binding insofar as it had been approved by her parents, blessed by a priest, and followed by sexual relations with the groom (X 4. 2. 6, Continebatur).

Disputed betrothals and marriages of young children not surprisingly entailed allegations of forced consent resulting in unions tantamount to bondage. Pope Urban III (1185–1187) adjudicated a Pisan case in which a twelve-year-old girl was betrothed to a boy aged nine or ten. She alleged that her parents had installed her against her will in the home of the boy's father; that she was forced to stay there for about a year until she eventually returned home; and that notwithstanding her mother's threats, "she [did] not want to have the boy as a husband." The Archbishop of Pisa reported that the boy in fact had neither reached the age of fourteen nor had sexual relations with the girl. Urban instructed the archbishop to admonish the girl to wait for the boy to complete his fourteenth year. Should she decide not to wait, she was permitted to take another man as her husband (X 4. 2. 11, Ex litteris). These and other papal decretals sought to reconcile the requirement that children's consent to betrothal and marriage be freely given against children's natural obligation to obey the wishes of parents and kinsmen.

Few young children could, or would, resist the force of parental domination, as the determined twelve-year old in the Pisan case had done. Yet, it would be naïve to dismiss the practical relevance of the decretals on the grounds that more often than not a child's consent was a formality. If the papal decretals were far from definitive and unevenly translated into practice, they certainly established authoritative points of departure employed by jurists and judges in dealing with the perennial questions of consent and coercion attending child betrothals and marriages.

JULIUS KIRSHNER

References and Further Reading

- Cavallar, Osvaldo and Julius Kirshner. "Making and Breaking Betrothal Contracts (Sponsalia) in Late Trecento Florence," in 'Panta rei': Studi dedicati a Manlio Bellomo, edited by Orazio Condorelli. Rome: Il Cigno, 2004. Vol. 1, pp. 395–452.
- Goldberg, P. J. P. "For Better or Worse: Marriage and Economic Opportunity for Women in Town and Country," in Women in Medieval English Society, edited by P. J. P. Goldberg. Phoenix Mill, Stroud, Gloucestershire: Sutton Publishing, 1997, pp. 108–125.
- Herlihy, David, and Christiane Klapisch-Zuber. Tuscans and Their Families: A Study of the Florentine Catasto of 1427. New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 1985.
- Onclin, Willy. "L'âge requis pour le mariage dans le doctrine canonique médiévale," in Proceedings of the Second International Congress of Medieval Canon Law, edited by Stephan Kuttner and J. J. Ryan. Vatican City: Vatican Library, 1965, pp. 237–247.
- Ribordy, Geneviève. 'Faire les nopces': Le mariage del noblesse française (1375–1475). Toronto: Pontifical Institute of Medieval Studies, 2004, pp. 76–82; Women, Marriage, and Family in Medieval Christendom: Essays in Memory of Michael M. Sheehan. Kalamazoo: Medieval Institute Publications, 1998.
- Valsecchi, Chiara. "Causa Matrimonialis est gravis et ardua. Consiliatores e matrimonio fino al Concilio di Trento," in Studi di storia del diritto II. Milan: Giuffrè, 1999, pp. 407–580.

See also Betrothals; Girls and Boys; Marriage, Christian

CHIVALRY

An idealized set of behaviors for mounted warriors, and by extension for all noble men, developed in France into a more or less explicit set of expectations in the twelfth century, collectively called chivalry (both then and now—chevalerie in Old French). Chivalry is known especially through literary works, epics, and romances. Although modern writers sometimes speak of a "code" of chivalry, it is a mistake to do so, as that would imply a clear set of guidelines that everyone recognized, whether or not they followed them. In fact, the expectations of chivalry were inherently contradictory, which meant that it was impossible for one man to meet them all (even if he had wanted to). A major reason why chivalry failed to develop into a coherent set of rules is that it was an amalgam of a number of very different sorts of expectations.

Originally the word chevalerie simply meant battlefield virtues: being a good fighter, brave, and loyal to one's fellows. A warrior on horseback (mounted on a cheval, or horse) was a knight (chevalier) and should, it was assumed, practice chivalry. This is the meaning that chivalry has, for example, in the Song of Roland. Nobly born men from the twelfth century onward defined themselves militarily; and young nobles were trained to be knights, that is, mounted fighters. Among the wealthy, a young man would undergo a knighting ceremony to mark his coming of age, often including a tournament to show off his combat skills.

But this basic meaning of the term, implying a warrior, quickly combined with other meanings as well. Most significantly, chivalry increasingly became united with courtesy (cortoisie), a term simply meaning suitable behavior for someone at court. By the time that Chrétien de Troyes wrote his romances in the final decades of the twelfth century, "chivalry" was assumed to include both battlefield and courtly attributes. A noble courtier was someone well-educated, who knew how to dance elegantly, perhaps play a musical instrument, who kept himself clean and finely attired, and was always polite and gentle to ladies. In addition, courtliness contained within it many of the assumptions—ultimately derived from classical stoicism—of correct manly behavior as constituting self-control and a composed demeanor. Unsurprisingly, warrior violence and restrained good manners mingled uncomfortably.

This already uneasy mix was further complicated by attempts to Christianize chivalry. The "knight of Christ" was an old topos within Christian thought, meaning someone who fought on the side of God. Often the fighting was metaphorical; monks, for example, often referred to themselves as knights of Christ, fighting evil with their prayers. But both church leaders and knights themselves believed it possible for secular warriors also to be good Christians, by defending the poor and helpless or especially by fighting the infidel in the Holy Land. By the thirteenth century elaborate ceremonies began to be developed that stressed a young knight's simultaneous adoption of the attributes of a warrior and those of a devout Christian. A young man might spend the night in prayer before his formal knighting, and religious symbols were attached to his equipment; the sword, for example, was considered to represent the sign of the cross as the blade met the hilt.

In practice, of course, as everyone recognized, no one could at the same time be a ferocious fighter, a gentle wooer of ladies, and a deeply religious man. The inherent contradictions within any definition of chivalry were used as the starting point for many contemporary works of literature. Every author came up with his own definition, which seems to have been intended in part to refute the definitions of other authors. Many twelfth-century authors started their stories by saying that the deeds took place in ancient times, when men still understood chivalry, "unlike today." This false sense of nostalgia is rather ironic, given that the authors were writing when chivalry was brand new. Rather than simply glorifying chivalry, the authors critiqued many of its aspects, particularly its violence, and sought to indicate that not even the most glorious heroes of old could live up to chivalry's requirements. Indeed, the plots of many epics and romances turned on irreconcilable demands, such as those of love and honor, both of which were considered aspects of a chivalrous knight but which heroes, like Chrétien's Erec, discovered they could not simultaneously follow. Only at the end of the Middle Ages, in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, did systematic treatises seek to set out clear definitions and guidelines on how a knight could meet them—and the multiplication of such treatises itself indicates that no single definition yet predominated.

CONSTANCE B. BOUCHARD

References and Further Reading

- Bouchard, Constance Brittain. "Strong of Body, Brave and Noble": Chivalry and Society in Medieval France. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1998.
- . "Every Valley Shall Be Exalted": The Discourse of Opposites in Twelfth-Century Thought. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2003.
- Chickering, Howell, and Thomas H. Seiler, eds. The Study of Chivalry. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Medieval Institute, 1988.
- Flori, Jean. "La notion de chevalerie dans les chansons de geste du XIIe siècle: Étude historique de vocabulaire." Le moyen âge 81 (1975), 211–244, 407–445.
- . L'essor de la chevalerie, XIe-XIIe siècles. Geneva: Droz, 1986.

- Jaeger, C. Stephen. The Origins of Courtliness: Civilizing Trends and the Formation of Courtly Ideals, 939–1210. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1985.
- Kaeuper, Richard W. Chivalry and Violence in Medieval Europe. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- Karras, Ruth Mazo. From Boys to Men: Formations of Masculinity in Late Medieval Europe. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2003.
- Keen, Maurice. Chivalry. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1984.
- Painter, Sidney. French Chivalry. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1940.

See also Courtly Love; Gender Ideologies; Tournaments; Warfare

CHRÉTIEN DE TROYES

All we know about Chrétien de Troyes comes to us from his unusually abundant corpus. His extant works include five romances (c. 1165–1191), two lyric poems in the style of the troubadours, a translation of Ovid's Philomela (surviving only in the fourteenth-century Ovide moralisé), and possibly Guillaume d'Angleterre, a saint's life cast as a romance and signed by Chrétien (the attribution is disputed by scholars). The prologue to his second romance, Cligès, begins with an inventory of his works: Erec et Enide (the first Arthurian romance), translations of Ovid's treatises on love, two tales from the Metamorphoses (his tale of Pelops has been lost), and a story of "King Mark and Yseut the Blond," no longer extant but whose unexpected title tantalizingly evokes a version of the popular Tristan legend, which Chrétien continually reinvents in his romances. In Le Chevalier de la Charrette (The Knight of the Cart), commissioned by Marie de Champagne, Chrétien rewrites Arthurian history (as represented by Geoffrey of Monmouth and his French translator Wace), by introducing Lancelot as the queen's rescuer and lover. Their open-ended love story powers the enormous expansion of the Prose Lancelot at the heart of the thirteenth-century Vulgate Cycle and serves as the model for Gaston Paris's invention of "courtly love" in the nineteenth century, a term whose definition continues to cause passionate debate. Allusions to the Charrette in Le Chevalier au lion (The Knight of the Lion) suggest that Chrétien wrote both romances simultaneously, which may explain why a second author finished Lancelot's story, according to Chrétien's design, as Godefroi de Leigni claims in the epilogue. Chrétien's last romance, Le Conte du graal (The Story of the Grail), dedicated to Philip of Flanders, was left unfinished despite its unusual length (nine thousand plus verses rather than the usual seven thousand). Like the Charrette, it launched a powerful new story that generated countless retellings across the Middle Ages and into the modern era.

Chrétien's name and literary patrons locate him in the courtly culture of northern France. His works address an aristocratic public of ladies, knights, counts, and barons, connoisseurs able to appreciate his highly refined fictions, his art of finding in common matter—oral and written, Classical and vernacular, Breton and French—a point of departure for his own experiments in rewriting. Chrétien arranges stories into a “very beautiful conjointure” (joining), whose patterns woven into the narrative require us to discover the possible meanings they inscribe. Read out loud to a courtly audience, his romances invite the listeners to enjoy the apparent distance of Arthurian adventures, as well as their obvious, if indirect reflection of contemporary problems that undoubtedly engaged a twelfth-century public, as they continue to interest us: the balance of power among men, and between men and women, the relation between courtly values, especially love and prowess, the difficulty of deciphering truth in a world of appearances, the pitfalls and promise of language, the gray areas of life that mitigate against any easy solutions into black and white.

If women are by definition secondary in a world of romance centered on chivalric heroism, Chrétien has nevertheless invented a constellation of memorable female characters who play a variety of necessary roles that orient, support, and elucidate the heroes' quests. The title of his first romance fittingly gives equal billing to its male and female protagonists, as it puts into play the difficulties of integrating love and marriage, while maintaining an appropriate balance between public and private obligations, chivalry and love. Chrétien's romances show an unusual commitment to marital love but they by no means limit love's domain to the confines of social institutions; witness the extramarital liaisons of Fenice and Cligès, and Guenevere and Lancelot. Critics argue about the attitudes expressed toward these couples through narrators' voices and authorial architecture; what remains certain is Chrétien's focus on contradictory values and experiences, left unresolved in his romances through ambiguities and puzzles. Feminist critics suggest that Chrétien gives less and less place to heroines, but one might also argue that as each romance explores different issues, other roles for female characters emerge, including author-figures like Thessala and Lunete whose machinations move ahead the stories of Cligès and Yvain, the proliferation of ladies and damsels attracted by the erotic force field around Lancelot, or the mothers of Perceval, Gauvain, and Arthur, who assume enigmatic importance in the last romance, where the relationship between love and the (not yet holy) grail remains problematic.

MATILDA TOMARYN BRUCKNER

References and Further Reading

- Bruckner, Matilda Tomaryn. “A Case for mise en abyme: Chrétien's Chevalier de la Charrete.” In Shaping Romance: Interpretation, Truth, and Closure in Twelfth-Century French Fictions. Philadelphia, Pa.: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1993.
- Burns, E. Jane. “Rewriting Men's Stories: Enide's Disruptive Mouths.” In Bodytalk: When Women Speak in Old French Literature. Philadelphia, Pa.: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1993, pp. 151–202.
- Chrétien de Troyes. Yvain: The Knight of the Lion. translated by Burton Raffel. New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 1987.
- . Erec and Enide. translated by Burton Raffel. New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 1997.
- . Cligès. translated by Burton Raffel. New Haven/London: Yale University Press, 1997.
- . Lancelot: The Knight of the Cart. translated by Burton Raffel. New Haven/London: Yale University Press, 1997.
- . Perceval, The Story of the Grail. translated by Burton Raffel. New Haven/London: Yale University Press, 1999.
- Gaunt, Simon. “The Knight Meets his Match: Romance.” In Gender and Genre in Medieval French Literature. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995, pp. 71–121.
- Grimbert, Joan. “On Fenice's Vain Attempts to Revise a Romantic Archetype and Chrétien de Troyes's Fabled Hostility to the Tristan Legend.” In Reassessing the Heroine in Medieval French Literature. edited by Kathy M. Krause. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 2001, pp. 87–106.
- Haidu, Peter. Aesthetic Distance in Chrétien de Troyes: Irony and Comedy in Cligès and Perceval. Geneva: Droz, 1968.
- Hunt, Tony. Chrétien de Troyes: Yvain. Critical Guides to French Texts. London: Grant & Cutler, 1986.
- Kelly, Douglas. “Sens” and “Conjointure” in the “Chevalier de la charrette.” The Hague and Paris: Mouton, 1966.
- Krueger, Roberta. Women Readers and the Ideology of Gender in Old French Verse Romance. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- Lacy, Norris. The Craft of Chrétien de Troyes: An Essay on Narrative Art. Leiden: Brill, 1980.
- Lancelot and Guinevere: A Casebook*. edited by Lori Walters. New York/London: Garland, 1996.
- Maddox, Donald. The Arthurian Romances of Chrétien de Troyes. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991.
- McCracken, Peggy. The Romance of Adultery: Queenship and Sexual Transgression in Old French Literature. Philadelphia, Pa.: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1998.
- Pickens, Rupert. The Welsh Knight: Paradoxicality in Chrétien's Conte del Graal. Lexington, KY: French Forum, Publishers, 1977.
- The Romances of Chrétien de Troyes: A Symposium*. Edited by Douglas Kelly. Lexington, Ky.: French Forum Publishers, 1985.

Primary Sources

- Chrétien de Troyes. Romans, suivis des Chansons, avec, en appendice, Philomena. La Pochothèque. Paris: La Librairie Générale Française, 1994.

See also Arthurian Literature; Courtly Love; Guinevere; Isolde; Literature: Old French; Marie de France; Ovid: Medieval Reception of; Patronage: Literary; Romance: French; Trobairitz and Troubadours

CHRISTINA OF MARKYATE

Christina of Markyate (b. 1096–1098; d. 1155–1156), virtually unknown for centuries, has in the past fifty years emerged as a key figure in the history of female spirituality. She filled numerous roles that exercise the modern imagination: vowed virgin resisting forced marriage, resolute heroine fighting the cruel socialization of her family, spiritual friend and confidante of important churchmen, and leader of a major, well-supported female community at Markyate, near the monastery of St. Alban, Huntingdonshire. Most of what we know about Christina comes from the Gesta Abbatum, a chronicle of St. Alban's compiled in the 1250s; the St. Albans Psalter, a lavishly illuminated manuscript compiled during Christina's lifetime and commemorating her family and friends; and a vividly dramatic Life (c. 1140–1150) drawing on Christina's own reminiscences. Christina, née Theodora (she renamed herself Christina sometime after her religious calling), was born into the Anglo-Saxon nobility in Huntingdon. As a girl, she vowed in a parish church to remain a virgin for life. At sixteen, she fended off the sexual advances (caused by Satan, according to the Life) of Ranulf Flambard, the powerful bishop of Durham. Flambard subsequently arranged her marriage to Burthred, a young nobleman, with the approval of Christina's parents, who forced her to consent to the marriage, then tried to make her consummate it. The family then embarked on an extraordinary campaign of coercion, combining the temptations of aristocratic society (fine clothes, banquets, the chance to head a noble household), flattery, threats, and ugly sexualized violence worthy not just of hagiographical villains but of fairy tale menaces. Christina's mother, Beatrix, maddened by her daughter's adamant refusals, declared that "she would not care who deflowered her daughter, provided that some way of deflowering her could be found." In successive lurid scenes in the Life, the parents encouraged Burthred to rape Christina, alternately thrust her into freezing water and burned her, and her mother tore out Christina's hair, beat her, and exhibited her at a banquet. (Parenthetically, it should be noted that decades later, Christina's family, who had fallen on hard times, sought out her protection, and that they were even singled out for prayers in the St. Alban's Psalter, which was altered for Christina's use.)

Christina initially obtained support from the local bishop, but bribed by her parents, the bishop ultimately ruled against her. Finally, she ran away and obtained sanctuary at the cell of Alfwen, a local hermit, where she lived for two years; for four further years, she stayed with the hermit Roger, in a cranny about fourteen inches wide. Burthred finally released her from her marriage vow, and she continued to reside at Markyate, where her holy solitude attracted many admirers and imitators. Geoffrey, abbot of St. Alban's, helped formalize her community at Markyate into a priory with Christina at its head, encouraged the writing of the Life, commissioned the magnificent psalter, and subsequently gave the priory extensive financial backing and much public favor. Geoffrey's close friendship with Christina and his support of Markyate priory caused great resentment in the St. Alban's community: his frequent visits to Christina's cell at Markyate gave rise to many rumors about a sexual relationship, and the diverting of rents and agricultural income to Markyate and others of Christina's favorite charities was a source of great hostility among the monks. There is strong evidence that the Life remained unfinished, and its transmission was suppressed, because of lingering resentment towards Christina at St. Alban's.

Christina's life contains many features crucial to the history of spirituality, sexuality, marriage, and mysticism. Her childhood vow of virginity—which she accompanied with the payment of a penny and which was confirmed by Sueno, a canon of Huntingdon—took the form of a wedding with Christ, and was formalized much later at St. Alban's, at Geoffrey's insistence. This vow—in canon law as in the hagiography—took precedence over her forced consent to marriage (although, if she had consummated it, the situation might have been different). In narrative form, thematic use of commonplaces, and personal psychology, the Life strongly resembles earlier virgin martyr stories. Christina's visions were highly personal: in her youth, they involved the support of Christ and the Virgin Mary for her virginity vow, and in later years they often took the form of predictions and intimate knowledge of others' thoughts. Relations with men loom large in her visionary life: she attracts, and is attracted by, the hermit Roger; she and an unnamed cleric struggle at length with mutual sexual attraction (sometimes in the form of lurid demonic visions); and her friendship with Geoffrey and other spiritual companions was full of intimacy and passion. This spiritual love, cast by the biographer in a language reminiscent of eroticism, was not the same as generalized caritas: personal and exclusive, it can perhaps be best described as a passion of the soul.

ROBERT STANTON

References and Further Reading

- Fanous, Samuel and Henrietta Leyser, eds. Christina of Markyate: A Twelfth-Century Holy Woman. London and New York: Routledge, 2005.
- Head, Thomas. "The Marriages of Christina of Markyate." Viator 21 (1990): 75–101.
- Holdsworth, Christopher J. "Christina of Markyate." In Medieval Women, edited by Derek Baker. Oxford: Blackwell, 1978, pp. 185–204.
- Karras, Ruth Mazo. "Friendship and Love in the Lives of Two Twelfth-Century English Saints." Journal of Medieval History 14 (1988): 305–320.
- Koopmans, Rachel M. "The Conclusion of Christina of Markyate's Vita." Journal of Ecclesiastical History 51.4 (October 2000): 663–697.
- Pächt, Otto; Dodwell, C.R.; and Francis Wormald, eds. The St. Albans Psalter. London: Warburg Institute, 1960.
- "The St. Albans Psalter Website." University of Aberdeen. <http://www.abdn.ac.uk/stalbanspsalter/english/index.shtml> (August 2005).
- Stanton, Robert. "Marriage, Socialization and Domestic Violence in the Life of Christina of Markyate." In Domestic Violence in Medieval Texts, edited by Eve Salisbury, Georgianna Donavin, and Merrall Llewellyn Price. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 2002, pp. 242–271.
- Talbot, C. H. The Life of Christina of Markyate. Oxford Medieval Texts. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1959. Reprint Toronto and Buffalo: University of Toronto Press, 1987.

See also Bride of Christ; Imagery; England; Hagiography; Monasticism and Nuns; Noble Women; Virginity

CHRISTINA THE ASTONISHING

Christina the Astonishing was born in St. Trond, close to the Flemish-French language border, in what we now call Belgium. She achieved local notoriety during her lifetime (1150–1224), and a cult emerged after her death. She was mentioned by James of Vitry in his Life of Marie d'Oignies and became the subject of her own Life in 1232 at the hands of the Dominican Thomas of Cantimpré.

She grew up the youngest of three daughters of a burgher family. She and her sisters lived a religious life together even after their parents died. At some point she died, or seemed to, for at the wake, she revived and told of her soul's journey to purgatory, hell and then paradise, where she chose to return to her body so as to use her life's example to turn sinners toward a saving penitence. At first she fled human contact and so, suspected of demon possession, was jailed. After gaining her freedom, she took on a regime of spectacular public suffering. She was incarcerated a second time. After again gaining her freedom, she adopted a more moderate life pattern. Thereupon, she is recorded as living a mendicant life of begging, exercising a gift of prophesy, taking on a penitential regime on behalf of the souls of purgatory, and coming to a holy end marked by confirming signs and the solemn translation of her body.

Christina's Life is an odd piece of hagiography. It has been difficult for scholars to categorize it within the conventions of one or another hagiographical model. It has been suggested that she be viewed in terms of the type of the "fool for Christ," as a "somatic preacher" who uses her resurrected body, with its glorious qualities, to live purgatory as an object lesson for her onlookers, as a "demoniac saint" whose "madness" is the very condition for a certain agency. All of these types are extreme. Indeed, her hagiographer's use of hyperbole and spectacle allows her Life to function as a test case for theses about women and their religious experience, or alternatively about a male hagiographer's expectations about women and their religious worth and experience.

For all of that, however, it is doubtful whether Christina would have come to assume the place she has in discussions of medieval women and their religious experience had it not been for the success of Caroline Walker Bynum's use of Carol Gilligan and symbolic anthropology to identify the form of an intensely embodied feminine spirituality demonstrably distinct from contemporary male analogues. Her eye for and clever deployment of what might be termed "spiritual grotesques" (with which the Life of Christina the Astonishing is replete) has created a taste for medieval spiritual spectacle that has allowed this strange riddle of a medieval woman and her brief, idiosyncratic Life to assume an outsized place in the current scholarly consciousness of medieval women's spirituality and religious experience.

ROBERT SWEETMAN

References and Further Reading

- Bynum, Caroline Walker. Holy Feast and Holy Fast: The Religious Significance of Food to Medieval Women. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1987.
- King, Margot H. "The Sacramental Witness of Christina Mirabilis: The Mystic Growth of a Fool for Christ's Sake." In Peaceweavers: Medieval Religious Women, edited by John A. Nichols and Lillian Thomas Shank. Kalamazoo: Cistercian Publications, 1987: 145–164.
- Newman, Barbara. "Possessed by the Spirit: Devout Women, Demoniacs, and the Apostolic Life in the Thirteenth Century." Speculum 73 (1998): 733–770.
- . "Devout Women and Demoniacs in the World of Thomas of Cantimpré." New Trends in Feminine Spirituality: The Holy Women of Liège and Their Impact, edited by Juliette Dor, Lesley Johnson, and Jocelyn Wogan-Browne. Turnhout: Brepols, 1999, pp. 35–60.
- Sweetman, Robert. "Christine of Saint-Trond's Preaching Apostolate: Thomas of Cantimpré's Hagiographical Method Revisited." Vox Benedictina 9 (1992): 67–97.

Thomas of Cantimpré. Vita beatae Christinae mirabilis virginis, edited by J. Pinius in Acta Sanctorum 32 (24 July, 5). Paris: Victor Palme, 1868. pp. 650–660.
 Thomas of Cantimpré. The Life of Christina Mirabilis. Trans. Margot H. King. Toronto: Peregrina, 1995.

See also Asceticism; Flanders; Hagiography; Laywomen, Religious; Lutgard of Aywières; Marie of Oignies; Prophets

CHRISTINE DE PIZAN

Though born in Venice in 1364, Christine de Pizan carries the name of her father's birthplace, Pizzano. Her father, Tommaso da Pizzano, was recruited by the French king, Charles V, to be his court astrologer; as a consequence, Christine moved from Venice to Paris as a child in 1368. About 1379 she became the wife of Etienne de Castel, a notary and royal secretary, and by 1385 she was the mother of two sons and a daughter. When her husband died unexpectedly of the plague in 1389, she suddenly found herself a widow with three children and a widowed mother to provide for, her father having died just before her husband. These circumstances induced her to begin composing and circulating poetry early in the 1390s, both as a vehicle to express her grief at the loss of her husband and as a means of acquiring royal or ducal patronage in order to support her dependants. Her initial poems earned her significant attention, and over the next twenty-five years she produced a wide range of texts in prose, as well as verse for a number of patrons in a variety of genres. During this time she was also involved in the production of manuscripts of her works; her skillful use of the institutions of patronage and book production have led modern scholars to designate her the first professional woman of letters in European history. In 1418, the civil conflict between the Burgundians and Armagnacs forced Christine to withdraw from Paris to the safety of an abbey outside the city, perhaps to Poissy where her daughter was a nun. Removed from the court and scriptorium, her literary activity all but ceased, although she composed a final poem in 1429 to celebrate the triumph of Joan of Arc in lifting the siege of Orleans and having Charles VII crowned in Rheims. Since no more is heard from Christine de Pizan after the composition of this poem, she is generally thought to have died before witnessing Joan of Arc's trial and death in 1431.

Christine de Pizan giving instructions. From the "Works of Christine de Pizan." France, 15th CE. Harl.4431. Fol. 261v. (detail). Location: British Library, London, Great Britain. Credit: HIP / Art Resource, NY.

Times

Christine lived during a tumultuous period in late medieval France, and she witnessed a considerable amount of war and social upheaval. The Hundred Years' War (1337–1451), a conflict between the French and English kings, led to intermittent battles and the siege of French cities by English armies throughout her lifetime. In addition, a dispute between two factions in the royal family, the Burgundians and the Armagnacs, erupted into open conflict in Paris from 1411 onward; it was this civil war that prompted Christine to leave Paris in 1418. In addition, both the monarchy and the papacy experienced crises in leadership. From 1368 until 1422, France was ruled by Charles VI, a king who experienced frequent bouts of madness, and from 1378, the Papal Schism resulted in the election of two competing popes. Throughout her writings, Christine frequently speaks of her personal trials, particularly her widowhood, but she addresses as well these military and political events that concerned France and shaped life in late medieval Paris.

Works

Christine de Pizan left a corpus of texts that would be considered remarkable for any medieval author, but is especially extraordinary for a woman writer whose gender placed her at a substantial disadvantage in terms of education and court culture. A survey of her major textual productions illustrates the range and pace of her literary activity. After gaining recognition for her lyrical compositions in the 1390s, she authored a verse epistle in 1399 (The Letter of the God of Love) that satirically criticizes the attitude towards women in the Romance of the Rose, a thirteenth-century allegory, and she proceeded to circulate three prose letters that offer a serious critique of the Rose as part of an epistolary debate on the merits of that poem (1401–1402). In 1400, she produced a mythological treatise, the Letter of Othea to Hector, a text composed in both prose and verse; in luxury manuscripts of her works, the Othea is a densely illustrated text that contributes as much to visual as to textual culture. She then wrote several texts that directly addressed French politics: a dream allegory, The Path of Long Study (1402–1403); a long verse narrative on universal history, the The Transformations of Fortune (1404); as well as a prose biography of her father's patron, Charles V, a book commissioned by the Duke of Burgundy (1404). When she came to write the Book of the City of Ladies in 1405, a prose allegory in defense of women, she focuses specifically on the gendered nature of history and culture, issues that had been ignored in the vision of universal history in The Transformations of Fortune. However, soon after producing the City of Ladies, she composed The Book of the Three Virtues (1405), a conduct book for women that endorsed the status quo rather than the visionary possibilities for women proposed by the City of Ladies. She also composed a political treatise organized as an autobiographical narrative, Christine's Vision (1405), as well as a treatise on political philosophy, the Book of the Body Politic (1404–1407); a book on the mechanics of warfare, the Book of Deeds of Arms and of Chivalry (1410), as well as a treatise on peace, The Book of Peace (1414). In addition, she wrote several debate poems and a significant number of devotional texts in prose. Her final text is the poem on Joan of Arc, the Tale of Joan of Arc (1429) previously mentioned.

The trajectory of Christine's literary career took her from poetry on personal topics into the composition of overtly political writings, including prose treatises; nonetheless, she continues to foreground herself as narrator of her texts throughout her literary career. While it is conventional for late-medieval poets to represent themselves as the speaker of their texts, Christine's gender calls attention to her authorial performance as a woman writer, not only when she writes about love or widowhood, but also when she attempts to use her writings to intervene in contemporary political crises. As a consequence, the corpus of her work offers a series of female voiced texts on the most serious political and social topics of her day, such as war, politics, and history, as well as on the status and conduct of women. Several of her texts were translated in the late medieval and early modern period (into English, Flemish, and Portuguese), and her writings survive in numerous manuscripts and early printed books. In addition, her writings on the Romance of the Rose are thought to have initiated the early modern debate on women known as the querelle des femmes.

MARILYNN R. DESMOND

References and Further Reading

- Altmann, Barbara K. and Deborah L. McGrady. Christine de Pizan: A Casebook. New York: Routledge, 2003.
- Christine de Pizan. The Treasure of the City of Ladies or, The Book of the Three Virtues. translated by Sarah Lawson. Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1985.
- . The Writings of Christine de Pizan. New York: Persea, 1993.
- . The Selected Works of Christine de Pizan. translated by Renate Blumenfeld-Kosinski and Kevin Brownlee. New York: Norton, 1997.
- . The Book of the City of Ladies. Trans. Rosalind Brown-Grant. London: Penguin, 1999.
- Desmond, Marilyn. Christine de Pizan and the Categories of Difference. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1998.
- Willard, Charity Cannon. Christine de Pizan: her Life and Works. New York: Persea, 1984.

See also Conduct Literature; Defenses of Women; Literature, Old French; Patronage, Literary; Roman de la Rose and Its Reception; Widows; Women Authors: Old French Texts

CHRONICLES OF THE NORTHERN LOW COUNTRIES

The northern Low Countries fell almost entirely within the diocese of Utrecht, however without being a political and cultural entity. Most influential on Dutch historiography were several chronicles of the County of Holland and Zeeland. They had their origin in hagiography (from the tenth century) and were composed at the Abbey of Egmond, founded by Count Thierry II (d. 988), or at the court, where the focus shifted to the reigns of the counts. The history of the counts was interwoven with that of Utrecht and Gelre, Hainault and Brabant. Chronicles served to promote legitimation and identity and the main themes were politics, power, and war.

Incorporation into the Burgundian state in the fifteenth century meant a new impulse for historiography. Regarding women in the chronicles, the story about Countess Jacqueline of Bavaria, who was forced in 1433 to resign the county to Philip the Good of Burgundy, was added, but essentially the tone did not change. Women played a minor role, although documentary sources prove that countesses were actively involved on behalf of husbands or children. Most information concerns dynastic relations, but women were mentioned only occasionally. In chronicles from the north, where central government was lacking, dynastic elements were absent, and so were women. The same can be said of town chronicles.

In monastic chronicles women were judged according to ecclesiastical interests. Abbesses, female founders, and benefactors figure in positive roles. The outstanding founders of the abbey of Berne, Folkold and Bescela, starting as an adulterous couple, ended like saints. However, Lady Reinwidis, benefactor and recluse of the abbey of Kloosterrade, caused a disturbance c. 1130 by surrounding herself with women. According to the chronicler, a woman on her own could not live without maids.

Chroniclers divided women into two categories according to status: on the one hand, wives and mothers, and, on the other hand, religious women. About 1000, Alpertus of Metz compared two sisters, Adela, wife of Balderic, and Abbess Liutgard. Adela talked too much, her dress reflected her debauchery and her face betrayed fickleness, but she taught her maids all kinds of textile arts and made the most sumptuous fabrics. Liutgard was wise, hospitable, visited the poor and benefited the church. Out of greed, Adela tried to poison her and destroy the nunnery. When chroniclers paid attention to women, they were presented as either extremely pious or as troublemakers. For instance, after her husband's death, Countess Petronilla (d. 1144) ruled the County of Holland and Zeeland for ten years, although her son had come of age. The chroniclers, nonetheless, picture her as a benefactor of the abbey of Egmond and founder of the nunnery of Rijnsburg.

Countess Aleida of Cleve (c. 1202) was described as a troublemaker, damaging the abbey of Egmond, despite the fact that she defended the county effectively against the Frisians. The chroniclers continue telling how, shortly after her husband's death in 1203, she married their only surviving child, Ada (d. 1223), to the Count of Loon (d. 1218), against her husband's intentions. The nobility rose in revolt because they did not want a foreign ruler tied to Aleida's apron-strings, and they were fearful that a woman always had a fickle mind. Ada's case, after Aleida's death, was very similar to that of Jacqueline of Bavaria. Her paternal uncle claimed the county, and successfully supported her adversaries. She died childless. The Herald of Bavaria (c. 1400) was the first to state that Ada rightfully inherited the county. He wrote this after Emperor Lewis III of Bavaria (d. 1347) invested his wife Margaret (d. 1354) with the county, when, in 1345, her brother, Count William IV, had died childless. Margaret and her son William, who first acted as her substitute, got caught in the faction struggle of the Cods and the Hooks. As a result, the chronicles tell, mother and child came to stand in opposition to one another. Like Ada before and Jacqueline after her, Margaret was defeated.

The chronicles of Melis Stoke (d. after 1314) and Willem the Procurator (d. 1335) also contain romantic stories, which might originate from troubadour songs and shed more light on women. For instance, there is the story of the Countess of Clermont who fell in love with Count Floris IV of Holland, who was killed in 1234 at a tournament in Corbie by her jealous husband. Or, the cunning Countess of Gelre, who persuaded her husband to marry their daughter Aleida to Count William I of Holland (d. 1222) and thus made peace between the counties. And, Countess Jeanne of Valois, who was very sad about the marriage of her daughter, because in her foresight she sensed trouble.

Historiographers of the sixteenth century and later did not focus on the role that a woman performed, but emphasized more and more her femininity.

RENÉE NIP

References and Further Reading

- Augustus, L. and J. T. J. Jamar, ed. and tran. Annales Rodenses. Kroniek van Kloosterrade. Maastricht: Rijksarchief Limburg, 1995.
- Bruch, H., Ed. Chronographia Johannis de Beke. Rijks Geschiedkundige Publicatiën, g.s. 143. The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff, 1973.
- Bruch, H., Ed. Johannes de Beke, Croniken van de Stichte van Utrecht ende van Hollant. Rijks Geschiedkundige Publicatiën, g.s. 180. The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff, 1982.
- Burgers, J. W. J. "Geschiedschrijving in Holland tot omstreeks 1300," Jaarboek voor Middeleeuwse Geschiedenis 3 (2000): 92–130.
- Burgers, J. W. J., ed. Rijmkroniek van Holland 366–1305 door een anonieme auteur en Melis Stoke. Rijks Geschiedkundige Publicatiën, g.s. 251. The Hague: Instituut voor Nederlandse Geschiedenis, 2004 (www.inghist.nl).
- Cordfunke, E. H. P. Gravinnen van Holland. Huwelijk en huwelijkspolitiek van de graven uit het Hollandse huis. Zutphen: Walburg Pers, 1987.
- Gumbert-Hepp, Marijke ed. and tran. Willem Procurator, Kroniek. Hilversum: Verloren, 2001.
- Hugenholtz, F. W. N. "Ada van Holland." In Middeleeuwen over vrouwen. Ed. R. E. V. Stuip and C. Vellekoop. Utrecht: H&S, 1985, vol. 1, pp. 12–26.
- Janse, Antheun, ed. Johan Huysen van Kattendijke-kroniek. Den Haag: Instituut voor Nederlandse Geschiedenis, 2005.
- Narrative Historical Sources from the Medieval Low Countries*. www.narrative-sources.be

- Nip, Renée. "Conflicting Roles: Jacqueline of Bavaria (d. 1436), Countess and Wife." In Saints, Scholars and Politicians, edited by Mathilde van Dijk and Renée Nip. Turnhout: Brepols, 2005, pp. 189–207.
- Oppermann, O., ed. Fontes Egmundenses. Utrecht: Kemink en Zoon N.V., 1933.
- Rij, Hans van, ed. and tran. Alpertus van Metz. Gebeurtenissen van deze tijd en Een fragment over bisschop Diederik I van Metz. Amsterdam: Verloren, 1980.
- Rij, H. van, ed. and tran. Het stichtingskroniekje van de Abdij van Berne. In Egmond en Berne. Twee verhalende historische bronnen uit de middeleeuwen. Den Haag: Brill, 1987.
- Romein, Jan. Geschiedenis van de Noord-Nederlandsche geschiedschrijving in de middeleeuwen. Haarlem: Tjeenk Willink, 1932.
- Stein, Robert. Politiek en historiografie. Het ontstaansmilieu van Brabantse kronieken in de eerste helft van de vijftiende eeuw. Leuven: Peeters, 1994.
- Verbij-Schillings, Jeanne. Beeldvorming in Holland. Heraut Beieren en de historiografie omstreeks 1400. Amsterdam: Prometheus, 1995.
- Vis, G. N. M. Marco Mostert, and P. J. Margy, ed. Heiligenlevens, Annalen en Kronieken: Geschiedschrijving in middeleeuws Egmond. Hilversum: Verloren, 1990.

See also Burgundian Netherlands; Gender Ideologies; Jacqueline of Bavaria; Noble Women

CHURCH

Even though Pentecost, the day the Holy Spirit descended upon the Apostles after the Ascension of Jesus (Acts 2), is traditionally considered the birthday of the Church, the development of an institutionalized form of Christianity took many years. The main reason for this delay is the fact that early Christians lived in vivid expectation of the parousia, the end-times marked by the second coming of Christ and, therefore, did not give much thought to establishing an institution. But as generations, and then centuries, passed, Christians increasingly shaped more overt forms of Christianity. Each group of Christians who met for worship was called an ekklesia, an assembly; as the connections between these groups grew stronger, the ekklesia, the Church, was seen as an ever-more structured hierarchy.

Early Church

By the second century, Christians were organized into geographical regions (called dioceses, a term taken from Roman imperial administration) each headed by a bishop. As the ecclesiastical hierarchy took shape, the nature of Christian leadership changed dramatically. In the earliest Christian communities, women had roles of diakonia, service to the community, usually interpreted as teaching and spreading the faith. We see evidence of this in the story of Mary and Martha, sisters of Bethany and leaders of a Christian community, in the Gospel of Luke, although it has been pointed out that the attention Luke gives to women leaders in the Christian community is muted by his concern for the appropriate secondary roles that women needed to take. The same ambivalence is found in the writings of the Apostle Paul; even though many scholars have pointed out Paul's undisputed role in the theology of male headship and women's subordination (1 Corinthians 7:3–4, 1 Corinthians 11:3–5), it is also the case that Paul argues for women's equality in a general way (Galatians 3:28) and mentions many women leaders. It has also been noted that Paul's distinctions of status in the community have at least as much to do with social rank as with gender. In general, one could say that the works of the New Testament canon, which were all written by the second decade of the second century show some hints of women's leadership roles (the stories of Mary and Martha, Mary Magdalene and Thecla), but also are clear about the reality of male authority. The New Testament writings that are most discriminatory with regard to gender are the so-called Pastoral Epistles (1 and 2 Timothy and Titus); they date from the early second century and model the "household code" of the late Roman Empire. In this world, men fill all the important Church offices. These writings had a great deal of authority in the Middle Ages because they were ascribed to Paul and were thought to be the incontrovertible teachings of the Apostles.

By the end of the second century, an increasingly exclusive male hierarchy was being established. The Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus of Rome is very concerned with role distinctions, and draws a firm line between those church offices that require ordination by the laying on of hands and those that can be filled by appointment. Hippolytus names a great many church offices, including some that were held exclusively by women, such as the order of widows. He is careful to make clear, though, that widows do not have the same authority as (male) ministers consecrated by the laying on of hands, since they should be instituted by word only. The role of widows continued to be a troubling issue, as is clear from the Didascalia Apostolorum, a work purporting to be from the first century but probably written several centuries later. It refers to "good" and "bad" widows, and gives a number of counsels for keeping the latter under control. This work is very concerned with making clear categories of church offices, and forbids women from participating in ministries such as baptism, healing, and prayer. The Didascalia does recognize the office of deaconess

(a clue that it is probably from the Eastern part of the Church) whose office was to minister particularly to other women. Although actual Christian life may not have been as tidy as the Didascalia Apostolorum wants to make it, it is noteworthy that this text limits women's charismatic and sacramental roles, while it does recognize the order of deaconesses, although under male clerical control.

Yet another early Christian text, the Apostolic Constitutions, a fourth-century document from Syria, weaves together sections from Hippolytus, the Didascalia and other early sources into a discussion of church hierarchy that places women firmly at the bottom. The first book of the Apostolic Constitutions combines a description of women's innate weakness with a warning about women's seductive power. This looks forward to an equation of women with carnality on the one hand and spiritual and intellectual weakness on the other, themes that become commonplace in later Latin Christianity. Indeed, the Apostolic Constitutions relates women's religious practices to paganism, emphasizing another accusation against women that will be seen throughout the Middle Ages. In some very important ways, then, the gender basis for church hierarchy had been established before the end of the classical period of the formulation of Christian doctrine. This gender-based hierarchy informed the thousand years of medieval Christianity and was not to change significantly before the twentieth century, when the ordination of women to ministerial positions equal to those of men became accepted in many Protestant denominations.

Once this pattern of male domination had been established, it was authorized by references to biblical verses of both the Old and the New Testament. The story of the Fall of Adam and Eve in Genesis 3 was especially important. In Genesis 3:17, Adam's curse is linked particularly to the fact that he listened to the voice of his wife; for this, he was condemned to work the earth for his living, and to die and return to the dust from which he came. This theme, that human hardships are primarily due to the weakness of women, is heard from Tertullian in the third century to the late fifteenth-century Malleus Maleficarum (The Hammer of Witches). The Dominican author of this late medieval treatise explicitly retells the story of the third chapter of Genesis to explain why women are morally inferior to men: this is because the first woman was made from a bent rib, and so women are bent in a direction contrary (reversed order) to male human beings. The Malleus even gives an explanatory etymology for the word femina, the Latin word for woman; it comes, the text says, from fe minus, "less faith," because women are, by their very nature, weaker in faith than men.

Subordinate or Equal?

Such an understanding of Christian scripture was helped, no doubt, by the generally male-dominated societies of late antiquity and the Middle Ages. But one western theologian in particular, Augustine of Hippo, was fundamental in establishing a theological basis for the fundamental subordination of women to men. It has been noted that an important part of Augustine's theology was the idea that "man" was made in the image of God. But is this "man" to be understood as generic, encompassing all of humanity, male and female, or is "man" understood as specifically male? Augustine's answer to this is complicated. On the one hand, women must be in the image of God if they are capable of, even worthy of, salvation, since the central idea of the Incarnation of Jesus was that, by becoming human, Christ took on and made reparation for human sins. So, in this broad ontological way, Augustine says, women are in the image of God. Yet, in a more specific and incarnate way, with regard to the physical reality of women's bodies, women are not in the image of God in the way that men are. This argument, egalitarian in the most ontological sense and yet strictly hierarchical in the embodied reality of humans on earth, is another example of how the leadership roles available for women in the Church were severely limited by the fifth century, since women's spiritual inferiority could be understood as a reason to deny them the possibility of leadership in the Church. Women may have been thought to stand equally with men before God at the Last Judgment, but they certainly did not have equal access to the esoteric roles of spiritual and liturgical leadership here on earth.

Nevertheless, the possibility of salvation was an obvious catalyst for the religious devotion of many Christian women. In the second and third centuries, the period of the persecution of Christians by the powers of the Roman Empire, many women became famous as martyrs for the faith. Often these stories of exemplary women involve the refusal of marriage to a pagan king or official, followed by the glorious, if gory, death of the brave women. The classical version of this is the legend of Saint Catherine of Alexandria, who stood firm when tortured on the wheel, but was finally killed by beheading, after which angels took her head to Mount Sinai, where it is preserved today in the Monastery of Saint Catherine. Such women were praised for their lack of sexuality, the opposite attribute ascribed to their seductive first mother, Eve. In this way, women martyrs were thought to be viriliter, man-like. The primary example of this trick of a sex-change is the martyrdom of Saint Perpetua, who died in the Arena of Carthage in 203 when she was torn apart by a wild heifer. The Passion of Perpetua and her servant Felicity, said to have been written by Perpetua herself and redacted by another hand (some say Tertullian's), gives the most explicit example of how a woman is sanctified by becoming a man. Perpetua has a number of prophetic dreams in prison; in one, she enters into battle with a "foul Egyptian," that is, the devil. When Perpetua strips to prepare herself for battle, she finds that she has been turned into a man. This transformation does the trick; not only does Perpetua then prevail in battle, but she even throws the Egyptian down on the sand and treads on his head, an obvious reference to God's curse on the serpent in Genesis 3:15, when Adam is promised the power to tread on the serpent's head. The martyrdom texts in general, and the Passion of Perpetua in particular, make clear that women can shake off their weak and sinful nature, and become true leaders of the community, only by becoming male.

Monasticism

But where could a medieval Christian woman become male? Medieval women's lives were tightly controlled by their reproductive potential, as their divinely ordained life on earth was centered on the ability to bear children for men. But there was one earthly realm where women were equal to if separate from men, that is, the cloister. The institution of monasticism has a long and complex trajectory with regard to gender, beginning and ending in strict control by male ecclesiastics, with a moment of female empowerment in between. Women's monastic life was instituted by authors like the sixth-century Caesarius of Arles as a way of controlling the weak, sinful nature of women. But medieval monasticism, an institution that mediated much of the authority of the medieval church, turned out to be one place where women could actually exert some power. In the century after Caesarius, an abbess named Hilda ruled over a monastery of men and women at Whitby in northern England, and presided at a council where it was decided that the British church would follow the Roman rather than the Celtic liturgical calendar. By the twelfth century, there were such "double monasteries" of men and women on the Continent as well. In the cloister, the ancient stories of manly women saints were read in Chapter and at meals, and nuns were thus presented with a model of holiness, sternly celibate, stripped of weak feminine characteristics, that they could emulate.

We know that medieval abbesses did, in fact, take on many tasks that had been since the fourth century designated for men only, including preaching, reading the Gospel, and hearing confessions from the nuns of the community. In the twelfth century, Peter Abelard seemed to tacitly approve of some of these ministerial functions by women when he compared the office of abbess to that of deaconess in the early church. But there had been many restrictions put on women's ministry between the early deaconesses and the twelfth-century abbesses, and so it is not surprising that, in the early thirteenth century, Pope Innocent III made a point of forbidding "certain abbesses" in Spain the right to exercise any of these ministries. Innocent seems to have had in mind the well-connected community of Cistercian women at Las Huelgas, near Burgos, where the abbess had a good deal of worldly power as well as spiritual authority within her community. Whatever sense such power wielded by a monastic woman may have made in thirteenth-century Spain, the papal prohibition harked back to "apostolic" authority forbidding women to do such things; Innocent may have had in mind the patristic handbooks of ecclesiastical roles, or perhaps the New Testament as interpreted by Augustine, but he was clear about claiming this restriction to have been "apostolic." So once again, and now with a reference to ancient custom, women, were officially forbidden to take part in the roles of power and leadership of the Church. This prohibition became legal in yet another way when Innocent's letter on this case was quoted at length in the Decretals of Pope Gregory IX, under the heading "An abbess cannot bless monastics, hear confessions, and preach in public." The exclusion of women from the hierarchy of the Church, a concept that had become standard by the fourth century, was thus made into a legal definition in the thirteenth.

Brides of Christ

And yet, at the same time, there was another way in which the medieval church was marked by gender, the vision of the church as the Bride of Christ. Many scholars have commented on the irony of a male defined and identified institution portraying itself as a feminized, passive partner, but this image held great power in the Middle Ages. The Church as Bride was a biblical metaphor, found most explicitly at the end of the Apocalypse to John (21:9–10), where the Church, in the guise of the Heavenly Jerusalem, descends, bedecked as a bride, to her wedding with the Lamb. This image was joined in the medieval exegetical imagination to the passionate love between the Bride and the Bridegroom portrayed in the Song of Songs, a book of the Bible that was largely understood in medieval Christianity as the love song between Christ and the Church. This interpretation begins as early as Origen of Alexandria in the third century, and is powerfully recapitulated in the Song of Songs commentary of the fourth-century Cappadocian Gregory of Nyssa. But in the Latin Church, this powerful image comes into its own in the two great periods of medieval Latin exegesis, the ninth century (Haimo of Auxerre) and the twelfth century (Honorius Augustodunensis, Rupert of Deutz, and especially Bernard of Clairvaux). It is striking that some of the most profound religious thinkers of the medieval period were deeply involved in the image of the feminized church. Having removed women as much as possible from the life in the Church on earth, medieval male authors then turned around and made the Church into an idealized female figure, the protagonist of some heavily eroticized spirituality.

Given this irony, perhaps it is no surprise that this feminized image was not, actually, so popular among the strong women leaders of medieval Christianity. In fact, both Hildegard of Bingen in the twelfth century and Catherine of Siena in the fourteenth went out of their way to avoid referring to themselves as “Brides of Christ,” or using the Song of Songs in any self-referential way, although their male confessors, spiritual directors, and biographers had no qualms about remembering them this way. This is one of the many ways in which medieval women’s experience was mediated through a filter of male ecclesiastical control, a pattern that had many repercussions for the way some holy women are found in medieval hagiography. Other medieval women, in contrast, took this imagery and used it to their own empowerment. Clare of Assisi and Gertrude the Great, both head of women’s communities in the thirteenth century, made the connection to the image of Bride a major reference point, encouraging their sister nuns to think of themselves this way. So did Hadewijch of Antwerp, a thirteenth-century Flemish Beguine. In some ways this seems very passive, yet there is also a way in which the imagery could be used subversively, in the very fact that the Bride was at once the human soul (the soul of a humble nun) and at the same time the church, the Heavenly Jerusalem, the Mother of us all.

Restricted Autonomy

The general pattern we observed in the early Church, that opportunities for women’s autonomy and leadership in the Christian community diminished with every century, becoming more legalistically expressed and more strictly enforced, has to be seen, in one way, as the increasing masculinization of the Church. In the later Middle Ages and early modern periods, this suspicion of women turned into hostility, as a concern about women’s claims of sanctity led to persecution of women accused of “false sanctity,” and, eventually, to the witch craze of the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries, in which women in particular were targeted as enemies of the Church. Yet, this trend was accompanied and somewhat mitigated by an enduring romance with the image of the Church as inherently feminine. Perhaps medieval ecclesiastics (all male and celibate by definition) gained some spiritual solace from this ironic dichotomy, even as they continued to raise the barriers to women’s full participation in the community. Medieval Church women (all celibate nuns by definition, and increasingly constricted by legislation about obedience and enclosure) were faced with a more difficult dilemma, but they could, for most of the Middle Ages, still gain some spiritual power from this imagery.

An analysis of the roles of women and gender in the Church, then, must take place on a number of levels. Institutional history shows a clear decline in the power of women from the second century to the fourth, and then a hardening of the prohibitions on women’s leadership roles supported by claims to apostolic authority. By the High Middle Ages, this “eternal truth” of women’s inferiority was inscribed in canon law. In the late Middle Ages and early modern period, it became part of a rationale for the persecution of women as witches. Increasing restrictions on women’s societal roles mirrored all of this. And yet, the concomitant feminization of the church in theology, exegesis, and spiritual writings gave men and women both a way to identify with the spiritualized Church as especially beloved of God, the Bride of Christ.

E. ANN MATTER

References and Further Reading

- Børresen, K. E. Subordination and Equivalence: The Nature and Role of Woman in Augustine and Thomas Aquinas, translated by C. H. Talbot. Washington, D.C.: The University Press of America, 1981.
- Caesarius of Arles. The Rule for Nuns, translated by Maria Caritas McCarthy. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University Press, 1960.
- Cardman, Francine. “Women, Ministry, and Church Order in Early Christianity,” in Ross Shepard Kraemer and Mary Rose d’Angelo, Women & Christian Origins. New York: Oxford, 1999, pp. 300–329.
- Castelli, Elizabeth A. “Paul on Women and Gender,” in Ross Shepard Kraemer and Mary Rose d’Angelo, Women & Christian Origins. New York: Oxford, 1999, pp. 221–235.

CHURCH

- Coakley, John. "Friars as Confidants of Holy Women in Medieval Dominican Hagiography," in Images of Sainthood in Medieval Europe, edited by Renate Blumenfeld-Kosinski and Timea Szell. Ithaca and London: Cornell University Press, 1991, pp. 222–246.
- D'Angelo, Mary Rose. "Women Partners in the New Testament," Journal of Feminist Studies in Religion 6 (1990): 65–86.
- . "(Re) Presentations of Women in the Gospel of Matthew and Luke-Acts," in Ross Shepard Kraemer and Mary Rose d'Angelo, Women & Christian Origins. New York: Oxford, 1999, pp. 171–195.
- Johnson, Penelope D. Equal in Monastic Profession: Religious Women in Medieval France. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1991.
- Kramer, Heinrich. Malleus Maleficarum, translated by Montague Summers. London: The Pushkin Press, 1948, and widely anthologized, for example, in Witchcraft in Europe, 400–1700: A Documentary History, 2nd ed. edited by Alan Charles Kors and Edward Peters, revised by Edward Peters. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001.
- MacDonald, Margaret Y. "Reading Real Women Through the Undisputed Letters of Paul," in Ross Shepard Kraemer and Mary Rose D'Angelo, Women & Christian Origins. New York: Oxford, 1999, pp. 199–220.
- Matter, E. Ann. "Innocent III and the Keys to the Kingdom of Heaven," in Women Priests: A Catholic Commentary on the Vatican Declaration, edited by Leonard Swidler and Arlene Swidler. New York: Paulist Press, 1977, pp. 145–151.
- . "The Undebated Debate: Gender and the Image of God in Medieval Theology" for Gender in Debate, edited by Clare Lees and Thelma Fenster. New York: Palgrave, 2002, pp. 41–55.
- McLaughlin, Mary Martin. "Abelard and the Dignity of Women: Twelfth-Century 'Feminism' in Theory and Practice," in Pierre Abélard, Pierre le Vénéral. Cluny: Abbaye de Cluny, 1972, pp. 288–334.
- Perpetua of Carthage. The Passion of Sts Perpetua and Felicitas, translated by H. R. Musurillo, in Medieval Women's Visionary Literature, edited by Elizabeth Alvilda Petroff. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986, pp. 70–77.
- Raming, Ida. The Exclusion of Women from the Priesthood: Divine Law or Sex Discrimination?, translated by N. R. Adams. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1976.

See also Abbesses; Asceticism; Augustine, Influence of; Bride of Christ; Imagery; Catherine of Alexandria; Catherine of Siena; Clare of Assisi; Double Monasteries; Eve; Gertrude the Great; Hadewijch; Hild of Whitby; Hildegard of Bingen; Law, Canon; Mary and Martha; Monastic Enclosure; Monastic Rules; Monasticism and Nuns; Ordination of Women as Priests; Song of Songs, Medieval Interpretations of; Virgin Martyrs; Virile Women; Witches

CHURCHING

Churching, kirchgang in German, was a ritual of purification performed for a woman on the occasion of her first visit to church after the birth of a baby.

The French term, les relevailles, refers to the more social aspect of the ritual: the end of the mother's lying-in. Women from every level of society were churching, usually after every birth. Thus, churching was a common, though not universally practiced, custom throughout medieval Europe.

The origins of the ritual, however, are obscure. Many medieval references connect it with Leviticus 12:1–6, which forbids women from entering sacred space until they have completed a period of purification and presented an offering to the priest. The length of this period depended upon the sex of the child, either 40 days for a boy or 80 for a girl. Medieval practice certainly had some connection with these Mosaic proscriptions but was different enough that it ought not be considered simply a Christian adaptation of Jewish practice. In particular, canon law in the West never prohibited a woman from entering a church after giving birth, though it was a common and devout custom in many places and some clerics enforced the custom strictly. In addition, Christian mothers did not use ritual bathing (mikveh) as a part of their purification after childbirth, as did Jewish mothers. Finally, the length of time a mother was expected to refrain from entering a church varied according to local custom but was not determined by the sex of the baby. In both France and England evidence suggests that mothers waited about a month before returning to church.

Churching was also associated with the Feast of the Purification, which celebrated Mary's fulfillment of the Mosaic Law. The celebration included a procession with candles, hence the common name for the feast, Candlemas. This, perhaps, explains the fact that medieval women sometimes offered a candle at the time of their purification. In England, it was customary to bring a candle and other gifts as well, especially the child's christening cloth. In the later Middle Ages in both France and England, the candle was accompanied by or replaced with a monetary offering.

Early medieval evidence for the idea that women were considered impure after childbirth comes from the penitentials, which often closely follow Levitical proscriptions. An early ninth-century Frankish penitential mentions women coming to church for purification with a candle and an offering, and Carolingian chronicles mention the practice of women observing a period of purification after childbirth. The earliest liturgical evidence comes from the eleventh century. Liturgies of churching, as with other aspects of the rite, varied. Some German rites included the child, while French liturgies never did; French rites typically included a mass, other rites often did not. All of the liturgies included a blessing of the new mother, usually with holy water, as a rite of purification.

The meaning of churching was, however, complex and changed over time. In the early Middle Ages, restricting new mothers from entering a church was intended to protect sacred space from blood pollution. In the central Middle Ages, French bishops used the rite as a means of enforcing ecclesiastical legislation on marriage and clerical understanding of the marital debt, eventually transforming churching into a rite that honored marriage. In sermons, however, many French clerics continued to refer to the rite as purification from the pollutions of a bloody birth and the taint of lust experienced in the process of conception. In England, analysis of the liturgy suggests it was not only a rite of purification but also of transition and thanksgiving. The element of transition was marked by the mother's return to public life in the parish as well as to her husband's bed. Perhaps in acknowledgment of these, by the late Middle Ages the liturgical celebration was followed by a public celebration, which varied in character according to the social class of the mother. There are descriptions of elaborate feasts for English queens, more modest feasts among French bourgeoisie, and gatherings at taverns for poorer women. These occasions allowed families to demonstrate their social status and to declare the birth of a legitimate child. In contrast, Italian evidence, which has not yet been thoroughly studied, suggests that the ritual had little social importance and was not celebrated with feasting of any kind.

Outside England and France, research on medieval churching has been very limited. Further study of this ritual would add a great deal to our understanding of women in the Middle Ages.

PAULA M. RIEDER

References and Further Reading

- Gibson, Gail McMurray. "Blessings from Sun and Moon: Churching as Women's Theater." In Bodies and Disciplines: Intersections of Literature and History in Fifteenth-Century England, edited by Barbara Hanawalt and David Wallace. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1996, pp. 139–154.
- Lee, Becky R. "The Purification of Women after Childbirth: A Window onto Medieval Perceptions of Women." Florilegium 14 (1995–1996): 43–55.
- . "Men's Recollections of a Women's Rite: Medieval English Men's Recollections Regarding the Rite of Purification of Women after Childbirth." Gender and History 14.2 (2002): 224–241.
- Pierce, Joanne M. "'Green Women' and Blood Pollution: Some Medieval Rituals for the Churching of Women after Childbirth." Studia Liturgica 29 (1999): 191–215.
- Rieder, Paula M. "Insecure Borders: Symbols of Clerical Privilege and Gender Ambiguity in the Liturgy of Churching." In The Material Culture of Sex, Procreation, and Marriage in Premodern Europe, edited by Anne L. McClanan and Karen Rosoff Encarnación. New York: Palgrave Press, 2002, pp. 93–113.

———. On the Purification of Women: Churching in Northern France, 1100–1500. New York: Palgrave Press, 2006.

See also Conjugal Debt; Law, Canon; Lying-In; Mikveh; Pregnancy and Childbirth: Christian Women; Pregnancy and Childbirth: Jewish Women; Sexuality, Regulation of; Sexuality: Sex in Marriage

CISTERCIAN ORDER

Among twelfth-century monastic reform groups who sought more austere religious lives, the Cistercians were the most popular. The traditional story told by Cistercians of the later twelfth century is that Cîteaux was founded in 1098 by Robert of Molesme. It was one of many groups that sought to reform Benedictine monastic life in imitation of the lives of the early Apostles and Desert Fathers. Robert soon returned to Molesme, itself a reform community of circa 1075, but some of his followers remained at Cîteaux. After difficult early years daughter-houses of Cîteaux began to be founded circa 1113. Among the first was Clairvaux, founded after the entrance into Cîteaux of Bernard of Fontaines, usually known as Bernard of Clairvaux, a convert to the religious life with earlier training in the urban schools, who would become the great early intellectual and spiritual leader of the Cistercians. Bernard was soon sent to found Clairvaux, where he remained as abbot until his death in 1153. Bernard's active preaching throughout Europe inspired many individuals to convert to the religious life at Clairvaux, among them the future Pope Eugenius III (1145–1153). Although there is no evidence that women were among those founding Cîteaux or Clairvaux, there were women at Molesme; and a daughter-house for them would be founded at Jully, not far from Clairvaux, in 1113. There female relatives of Bernard and his companions, including Bernard's sister Humbelina, became nuns. Bernard maintained close ties to Jully until the mid-1140s, when Eugenius III firmly attached those nuns to Molesme.

After the mid-twelfth century, bishops and popes seemed to have actively encouraged a move towards centralization in the practice of the religious life and monastic "umbrella-groups," the religious orders appeared. Such orders shared customs, internal dispute resolution, and visitation and were ruled by a head or governing body. In the Cistercian case this was the General Chapter, an annual, universal, mandatory assembly of all abbots held in mid-September at Cîteaux, where disputes were resolved and legislation aimed at unanimity of practice was adopted. Despite the fact that the Cistercian mother abbey at Cîteaux had been founded in 1098, the earliest written evidence for the Cistercian Order as an administrative entity comes from the 1150s. As more new reform houses sought affiliation with the Cistercians a written Charter of Charity was produced circa 1165. By the 1180s, many of the organizational issues for the regulation of such an order had been resolved, and an official version of the order's customary was produced around that time. By the end of the century papal exemption from local episcopal visitation led to the creation of filiation trees to organize visitation by leaders of the order. By 1215, the Cistercian Order had become the largest and most famous of the new religious orders, its rhetoric asserting its precocity in creating such an institution; and its prestige was confirmed when it was held up as the ideal by the Fourth Lateran Council, which enjoined all monastic communities to identify themselves with such a group.

In the early 1120s, Cîteaux's abbot, Stephen Harding, had founded a community of nuns at le Tart that developed its own congregation of daughter-houses. Cistercian nuns of Montreuil near Laon are reported circa 1150 by Herman of Tournai as working not at spinning and women's work but in the fields like the brothers of Clairvaux. Some reform communities seeking affiliation included both men and women, like the double-community at Obazine which, upon Cistercian affiliation in the 1160s, created a separate house for its women at nearby Coyroux. Savigniac houses of nuns were also attached to the Cistercian Order along with the rest of the Savigniacs in the 1160s. By 1189 the importance of women's houses among affiliated houses was such that the king of Castile wanted to create a congregation of women's houses, in imitation of those associated with le Tart, under the authority of his newly founded abbey of Cistercian nuns at las Huelgas near Burgos; the abbots refused, explaining that they had no authority to force existing houses of nuns in Spain to adhere to las Huelgas, but this does not mean there were no Cistercian nuns.

Contrary to received opinion, the huge religious and economic success of the Cistercians was not because of an overflowing of monks from the houses of Burgundy or because Cistercians created new religious communities on the frontiers of Europe. Cistercian numbers and wealth accumulated with the incorporation of independently founded houses each with recruits and endowment, the return to simplicity in liturgical practice, building, and lifestyle, by a rationalization of long-fragmented land and improvement of cultivation, intensive pastoralism and animal husbandry, tithe-exemptions, the introduction of lay-brothers and -sisters who worked on granges created out of land purchased from previous occupants, and the growth of demand in the twelfth-century economy, particularly for the meat and animal products that Cistercian practice encouraged because raising animals was less labor-intensive than cultivating fields.

The widespread affiliation of independently founded houses meant that the Cistercian Order numbered more than 500 men's houses by the end of the twelfth century. There were many twelfth-century women's houses, but the great surge of women's foundations was led by important secular women founders. In addition to such new foundations, the incorporation of many groups of religious women acting as sisters in hospitals in the first half of the thirteenth century meant that by the century's end the order's women's houses outnumbered those for men. Women's houses gradually lost possibilities for mutual support and local protection which had been associated with earlier visitation by abbesses or bishop-founders when in the mid-thirteenth century visitation of women's houses was placed under the authority of abbots of neighboring men's houses. The numbers of recruits and the assiduity with which thirteenth-century abbesses and their patrons created endowment and recruited novices meant that women's communities remained full to capacity at a time when men's were suffering a crisis of recruitment. As had the order's monks from an earlier date, communities of Cistercian nuns by the thirteenth century controlled large and productive tracts of land in many regions.

In the difficult years of the fifteenth century, particularly in areas hard hit by the Hundred Years' War, a number of houses of Cistercian women were suppressed (about twenty percent of those in what is today France), and their properties taken over by men's communities with the assent of the abbots of the General Chapter. The rest, along with most men's houses survived until the Reformation in England and the Empire, and elsewhere until the French Revolution. A series of reforms of the Cistercians in the early modern period led to the creation of the Strict Observance, a reform of the Cistercians revived in the nineteenth century. Its members today are the Trappists or Trappistines, but there also remain a few communities, primarily with roots in eastern Europe, of pre-Trappist Cistercians.

CONSTANCE H. BERMAN

References and Further Reading

Berman, Constance H. Medieval Agriculture, the Southern French Countryside, and the Early Cistercians: A Study of Forty-Three Monasteries. Philadelphia: American Philosophical Society, 1986.

———. "Cistercian nuns and the development of the order: the Abbey of Saint-Antoine-des-Champs outside Paris," in The Joy of Learning and the Love of God: Essays in

- Honor of Jean Leclercq, OSB*, edited by E. Rozanne Elder. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Cistercian Publications, 1995, pp. 121–156.
- . “Abbeys for Cistercian Nuns in the Ecclesiastical Province of Sens: Foundation, Endowment and Economic Activities of the Earlier Foundations,” Revue Mabillon 73 (1997): 83–113.
- . “Cistercian Women and Tithes,” Cîteaux 49 (1998): 95–128.
- . “Were there Twelfth-Century Cistercian Nuns?” Church History 68 (1999): 824–864.
- . “Diversité et unanimité des cisterciens du XIIe siècle,” Unanimité et diversité cisterciennes, edited by Nicole Bouter. Saint-Etienne: 2000, pp. 189–193.
- . The Cistercian Evolution: The Invention of a Religious Order in Twelfth-Century Europe. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2000.
- . “The Labors of Hercules, the Cartulary, Church and Abbey for Nuns of La Cour-Notre-Dame-de-Michery,” The Journal of Medieval History 26 (2000): 33–70.
- . Women and Monasticism in Medieval Europe: Sisters and Patrons of the Cistercian Reform. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Published for TEAMS by Medieval Institute Publication, Western Michigan University, 2002.
- Constable, Giles. Medieval Monasticism: A Select Bibliography. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1976.
- . The Reformation of the Twelfth Century. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1996.
- Degler-Spengler, Brigitte. “The incorporation of Cistercian nuns into the order in the twelfth and thirteenth century,” Hidden Springs: Cistercian Monastic Women: Medieval Religious Women 3:1, edited by John A. Nichols and Lillian Thomas Shank. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Cistercian Publications, 1995, pp. 85–134.
- Lekai, Louis Julius. The Cistercians: Ideals and Reality. Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 1977.
- Leyser, Henrietta. Hermits and the New Monasticism: A Study of Religious Communities in Western Europe, 1000–1150. London: Macmillan, 1984.
- Mahn, Jean Berthold. L'ordre cistercien et son gouvernement, des origines au milieu du XIII siècle (1098–1265). Paris: E. de Boccard, 1951.
- Newman, Martha G. The Boundaries of Charity: Cistercian Culture and Ecclesiastical Reform, 1098–1180. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1996.

See also Abbesses; Conversae and Conversi; Monastic Visitation; Monasticism and Nuns; Spiritual Care

CITIES AND TOWNS

Cities and towns multiplied in Europe from the tenth century on, and immigration of men and women from rural areas caused urban populations to grow. Women, usually single, left the reassurance of rural social networks, including family, friends, and known contacts, for a new life in cities and towns. In the city they formed new communities, often with an occupational or spiritual focus. The urban economy offered more new occupational opportunities to women. As urban society became more complex, many social strata emerged. Urban mercantile women were part of an elite group, perhaps more confined to household management, as elaborated by the Ménagier de Paris in his advice to his young wife, or by Francesco Datini in letters to his wife, than working women of artisan or more modest strata. Prescriptive literature limiting the agency of elite urban women (Leon Battista Alberti) may not represent the norm.

Marriage was a matter of negotiation in medieval Europe. In most instances women needed a dowry to marry, leading in Italian towns to the establishment of dowry funds for girls. Cash, business investments, real property, or a combination thereof formed the basis of urban dowries. Testamentary legacies for poor girls to marry were common. Women's rights in inheritance varied according to the regional or local inheritance system. Daughters, having received dowries, were excluded from paternal inheritance in some towns of southern France and Italy.

The age of marriage varied from place to place across Europe. Women of the urban elite married earlier than artisan women and may, as a result of biology and fortune, have produced more children. In a city such as Genoa, men and women artisans married in their late twenties after they had established their careers. In Mediterranean towns where the marriage age of women of the urban elite was young, they often found themselves widowed, having married older men. In Florence the fate of the elite widow was not pleasant as she frequently remained in the control of her natal family, while her young children lived with their father's family. In general, though, widowed status was perhaps the most privileged for women of both urban and rural environments.

There is regional diversity across Europe in terms of the legal agency of women. Urban women used the court system in southern France, on their own behalf or as guardians of their children. They also appeared as witnesses in inquest proceedings in England, where women needed representation in court unless they were femes soles. In northern France, a married woman could defend herself in court in matters involving her own business. Sumptuary laws were passed throughout Europe in an attempt by authorities to control conspicuous consumption, for example, in the matter of silk fabrics. Sales and recognitions of debt denote the acquisition of silks by women, however, and last wills and testaments contain legacies of luxury garments to women who were not authorized by law to wear them. Urban women were punished for calumny and reprimanded for gossip and were guilty, at times, of sexual misconduct.

Women participated in many aspects of the urban economy as innkeepers, shopkeepers, domestic servants, peddlers, brewsters, tavernkeepers, wet-nurses, prostitutes, business, trade, and real estate investors, money lenders and borrowers, and even money changers in northern Europe, in a city such as Ghent. They appeared as heads of households in fiscal inventories for towns and cities. Women were generally excluded from university professions and from the notariate.

Throughout the Middle Ages women were denied a political role in urban government, though one does find noble women, such as the twelfth-century Vicountess Ermengard of Narbonne, occupying the position of lord in a town. The thirteenth-century countesses of Flanders, Jeanne and Margaret, ruled a principality where cities and towns were very important. Women did not attend political assemblies in most towns and had no participation on municipal councils. They were citizens of their towns but lacking in political enfranchisement. Women were not formally engaged in the urban militia or in the defense of urban fortifications, though their informal roles in siege crises must have been significant; some were skilled in combat as in Ghent.

Female religious, often from privileged families, filled urban monasteries. Women religious of orthodox inspiration might be cloistered, but not all religious women were so confined. In Italy, penitent women like Catherine of Siena frequently lived at home and were advised by local friars. In the case of Beguines of the Low Countries, they offered services to the sick, leaving the confines of their urban beguinages to do so. Lay women were also active in urban parishes and in urban philanthropy.

The old paradigm of a patriarchal society has been set aside in newer studies of urban women in favor of a situation in which they were able to function effectively in legal, social, and economic contexts. These findings need further testing across a diverse geography.

KATHRYN REYERSON

References and Further Reading

- Farmer, Sharon. Surviving Poverty in Medieval Paris. Gender, Ideology, and the Daily Lives of the Poor. Ithaca and London: Cornell University Press, 2002.
- Hanawalt, Barbara A., ed. Women and Work in Preindustrial Europe. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1986.
- Nicholas, David. The Domestic Life of a Medieval City: Women, Children, and the Family in Fourteenth-Century Ghent. Lincoln and London: University of Nebraska Press, 1985.

See also Artisan Families, Women of; Beguines; Conduct Literature; Datini, Margherita; Dowry and Other Marriage Gifts; Ermengard; Feme Sole; Gossip and Slander; Inheritance; Laywomen, Religious; Legal Agency; Marriage, Christian; Merchant Families, Women of; Monasticism and Nuns; Sumptuary Law; Warfare; Widows; Widows as Guardians; Work

CLARE OF ASSISI

Clare of Assisi (1194–1253) was the daughter of Offreduccio di Favarone, an Assisi knight, and his wife, Ortolana. One of the earliest followers of St. Francis, Clare ran away from her noble palazzo and had her hair tonsured by Francis, making her unfit for marriage. When the knights of her family discovered her missing, they rode in force to the Benedictine church of San Paolo delle Abbadesse, where she had taken shelter. As Clare clung to the altar cloth in the abbey church, she removed her veil, showing her shaved head. Realizing her worthlessness as a bride, Offreduccio's knights left her to her fate.

Clare's sister Agnes also escaped to join her. Both Clare and Agnes were received by Francis and given the Monastery of San Damiano just outside Assisi. In the Church of San Damiano Francis had been given the command to "Go, repair my house, can't you see that it is falling into ruin." Clare spent the rest of her life in this monastery.

Clare's vision of religious life followed the theology of Francis best summarized in the scripture passage, "If you wish to be perfect, go, sell what you have and give the money to the poor, and you will have treasure in heaven. Then come follow me" (Matthew 19:21). Since religious life was considered to be the "life of perfection," those wishing to be perfect were given these instructions, according to the thinking of Francis, by Jesus himself. Anyone who wished to follow Jesus began by literally selling everything and giving it to the poor.

For Clare and Agnes, this meant that they needed to give their noble dowries to the poor rather than using them to endow their monastery. They wanted to rely totally on alms and on the resources of a few Franciscan brothers who begged for them.

Organizing a Monastic Life

In an effort to bring order to numerous expressions of religious enthusiasm at the time, the 1215 Fourth Lateran Council legislated that all religious houses needed to accept an approved rule. No doubt as a result of this, Francis demanded that Clare accept the title "abbess," possibly signaling an acceptance of the Benedictine Rule. Since the Franciscan Rule was not approved until 1223, the brothers were exempt from the Lateran decree by the will of the papacy, which realized their worth as preachers for the papal cause. Pope Honorius III, however, assigned the organization of the many communities of sisters in the central and northern Italian peninsula to Cardinal Ugolino Conti de Segni, who would later become Pope

Gregory IX. Ugolino fulfilled this task with considerable vigor, offering papal protection in return for the acceptance of the Benedictine Rule and his own constitutions.

Understanding that the core of her vocation was the following of the poor Christ by living without possessions, Clare accepted the demands of Ugolino, but not before she had secured a papal privilege that would protect the Franciscan nature of her life. This privilege, “the privilege of poverty,” granted by Pope Gregory in 1228, was the right not to be forced to accept possessions. This meant that the sisters within the Monastery of San Damiano could remain completely dependent upon alms. In order to maintain this economy, it also meant that Franciscan brothers would need to live at the monastery to attend to the spiritual and temporal needs of the sisters.

While accepting the title of abbess, Clare defined her role as that of the servant of the San Damiano monastery. An example of silence, fasting, and prayer, Clare was remembered by her sisters primarily for her tenderness. She covered her sisters from the cold at night, washed the feet of the serving sisters, and did perhaps the most difficult job in the monastery, cleaning up after the sick sisters. Francis sent ill brothers to her, and the people of Assisi came to her with prayer petitions and with their sick children.

Advice to Agnes of Prague

In 1234, the Bohemian princess, Agnes of Prague, inspired by Clare’s vision, began a Franciscan monastery for women. Over the course of her lifetime, Clare wrote four letters to Agnes. Masterpieces of Franciscan literature, these letters outline Clare’s spirituality, her understanding of the Franciscan vocation, and, when read in context with other papal and royal correspondence, reveal the struggle of early Franciscan women to remain in poverty after Francis’s death. Clare’s first letter welcomes Agnes into the Franciscan life, describing her conversion as a “sacred business deal” with God by which she is destined, according to the Gospel, to gain “one-hundred fold.” Comparing Agnes of Prague with her namesake, the ancient virgin-martyr Agnes of Rome, Clare congratulated the Bohemian princess on her choice of the Franciscan life over a life of courtly pomp.

Clare’s second letter to Agnes supports the Bohemian princess’s struggle to acquire the “privilege of poverty” for her own monastery. Her third letter congratulates Agnes on obtaining this privilege and instructs her concerning the fasting customs practiced at San Damiano. These fasting practices, of course, were directly related to the chosen poverty of the sisters who ate little in order to survive on alms. A fourth letter, written shortly before Clare’s death, outlines Franciscan prayer as the meditation and contemplation of Christ at his birth, in his public life, on the cross, and risen in glory.

Rule of Saint Clare

Papal pressure to accept property continued under Pope Innocent IV. With the help of the politicking of Agnes of Prague and the genuine discontent among Franciscan sisters who were forced to profess the Benedictine Rule, Clare finally received papal approval of a Rule that she had written on her deathbed. Although much of this Rule is pieced together from the Rule of St. Francis and papal legislation, Clare placed an autobiographical chapter in the Rule in which she carefully described the poverty of her monastery as being without endowments and guaranteed income. This hard-won privilege, however, did not extend beyond San Damiano and a few other houses.

Clare died, surrounded by the sisters of San Damiano, on August 11, 1253. Two months later, the papacy initiated an inquiry into her sanctity. She was canonized by Pope Alexander IV on August 15, 1255.

JOAN MUELLER

References and Further Reading

- Armstrong, Regis. Clare of Assisi: Early Documents. St. Bonaventure, N.Y.: The Franciscan Institute, 1993.
- Bartoli, Marco. Clare of Assisi. Quincy, Ill.: Franciscan Press, 1993.
- Gennaro, Clara. “Clare, Agnes, and Their Earliest Followers: From the Poor Ladies of San Damiano to the Poor Clares.” Women and Religion in Medieval and Renaissance Italy, edited by Daniel Bornstein and Roberto Rusconi. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1996, pp. 39–55.
- Mooney, Catherine M. “Imitatio Christi or Imitatio Mariae? Clare of Assisi and Her Interpreters.” In Gendered Voices: Medieval Saints and Their Interpreters, edited by Catherine M. Mooney. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999, pp. 52–77.
- Mueller, Joan. Clare’s Letters to Agnes: Texts and Sources. St. Bonaventure, N.Y.: The Franciscan Institute, 2001.
- . “Poverty Legislation and Mutual Relations in the Early Franciscan Movement.” Collectanea Franciscana 71 (2001): 389–419.
- . Clare of Assisi: The Letters to Agnes. Collegeville, Minn.: Liturgical Press, 2003.

See also Agnes of Prague; Hagiography; Monastic Rules; Monasticism and Nuns; Poor Clares Order; Poverty, Religious

CLARE OF MONTEFALCO

Clare (1268–1308) was the abbess of a monastery in Montefalco, Umbria, who was famous for her opposition to the heresy of the Free Spirit and for her penitential piety. Since she was associated with the Third Order of St. Francis before her monastery adopted the Augustinian Rule in 1290, her spiritual outlook always retained some Franciscan characteristics.

While growing up in Montefalco, Clare, from the age of six, visited her sister Giovanna at a hermitage nearby. This small community of women, common in Italy at the time, soon became a monastery, with Giovanna as the first abbess. With her passing in 1291, Clare, already well known for her pious devotion and ecstatic prayer, was elected in her stead. Some Franciscan members of the Free Spirit tried to win her over to their views. This sect did not believe in hell, and presumed they were exempt from the commandments because of their closeness to God. Like other contemporary women mystics Clare was considered a prophet, who possessed spiritual gifts and upheld Catholic orthodoxy. Clare was distinguished by her love of the poor, her emphasis on gratitude to God, and her ability to read minds. Her focus on Christ's passion is typical of attitudes of the time.

The extant sources reveal much about Clare's family, monastery, and the town of Montefalco. Her life is detailed in a biography (written c. 1309) by Berengar of Saint-Affrique and in a lengthy process of canonization of 1318–1319. These works emphasize her "miracle of the heart," a cross and other instruments of the Passion that were discovered inside her heart immediately after her death. (Her nuns, without permission, dissected her body.) For unknown reasons the process was interrupted and she was not declared a saint until 1881.

Clare's illustrious career tells us about the influence of women's communities in central Italy, c. 1300.

THOMAS RENNA

References and Further Reading

- Berengario di Donadio. Saint Clare of the Cross of Montefalco. translated by M. J. O'Connell. Villanova, Pa.: Augustinian Press, 1999.
- Menesto', Enrico. Il processo di canonizzazione di Chiara da Montefalco. Regione dell'Umbria—La Nuova Italia Editrice, Florence, 1984.
- Park, Katherine. "Relics of a Fertile Heart: The 'Autopsy' of Clare of Montefalco." In The Material Culture of Sex, Procreation, and Marriage in Premodern Europe, edited by Anne L. McClanan and Karen Rosoff. Encarnación, New York: Palgrave, 2002, pp. 115–133.

See also Abbesses; Canonization of Saints; Hagiography; Heretics and Heresies; Italy; Monasticism and Nuns; Prophets

CLEMENCE OF BARKING

A signature at the end of a late twelfth-century Anglo-Norman verse life of St. Catherine of Alexandria, the virgin martyr, is all we have to identify the poet Clemence: "Jo ki sa vie ai translatee, / Par nun sui Clemence numee. / De Berkinge sui nunain. / Pur s'amur pris cest oeuvre en mein" (ll. 2689–2692: I who have translated [St. Catherine's] life, by name am called Clemence. I am a nun of Barking. For the love of her I undertook this work).

Barking Abbey, located just east of London, founded c. 670, had become by the twelfth century an important center for vernacular writing. Shortly before Clemence composed her life of St. Catherine, another nun there had written a verse translation of the life of St. Edward the Confessor by Aelred of Rievaulx. Other writings associated with the abbey include Guernes de Pont-Sainte-Maxence's life of Thomas Becket, patronized by abbess Marie, Thomas's sister; and Adgar's Gracial, a collection of miracles of the Virgin dedicated to another abbess, Henry II's natural daughter Maud. These references illustrate the political importance, and indeed the strong "feminist" tradition, of an institution where resident noblewomen encouraged the cultivation of vernacular letters, in accordance with their own cultural and spiritual needs.

Clemence's poem celebrates St. Catherine as the personification of the nun's vocation. Clemence translates faithfully her source, an eleventh-century Latin prose life known as the Vulgata. She adds moralizing digressions, and considerably amplifies a number of the saint's discourses, inflecting the legend toward the cult of the Virgin Mary. In these original passages, Clemence demonstrates her own, considerable literary skill and theological sophistication. Her understanding of the Incarnation, as Jocelyn Wogan-Browne has argued, reveals a familiarity with the thought of St. Anselm of Canterbury. Echoes of other vernacular verse lives—St. George, St. Lawrence, and St. Mary the Egyptian—and an apparent familiarity with Thomas's Tristan romance, place her in the center of the Anglo-Norman literary community, at a privileged moment in its history.

J. DUNCAN ROBERTSON

References and Further Reading

- Batt, Catherine. "Clemence of Barking's Transformations of courtoisie in La Vie de sainte Catherine d'Alexandrie," in Roger Ellis, ed., Translation in the Middle Ages, New Comparison 12 (1999): 102–133.
- MacBain, William. The Life of St. Catherine of Alexandria by Clemence of Barking, Anglo-Norman Text Society 18. Oxford: Blackwell, 1964.

Robertson, Duncan. "Writing in the Textual Community: Clemence of Barking's Life of St. Catherine," French Forum 21 (1996): 5–28.

Wogan-Browne, Jocelyn. Saints' Lives and Women's Literary Culture: Virginité and its Authorizations. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001, pp. 227–245.

Wogan-Browne, Jocelyn and Glyn S. Burgess, Virgin Lives and Holy Deaths: Two Exemplary Biographies for Anglo-Norman Women. The Life of St Catherine, The Life of St Lawrence. London: Everyman, 1996.

See also Hagiography; Literature, Old French; Virgin Martyrs; Women Authors: Old French Texts

CLOTHING

Clothes and other adornments in the Middle Ages were highly charged indicators of wide-ranging cultural distinctions; their use and meaning, whether historically or in literary and visual representations of clothed bodies, extended far beyond the functions of practical cover or decorative adornment. From the historical Joan of Arc, whose cross-dressing as a warrior knight defied her interrogators' expectations of both class and gender, to the literary Griselda, whose banishment in a simple shift gave Christine de Pizan a forum for denouncing wife abuse, medieval clothing was used materially and symbolically to regulate social identities and to challenge them.

Regulatory and Ritual Clothing

In many instances, specific items of medieval dress provided a visual accounting of social classification and status. Garments were used to mark religious, military, and chivalric orders in the Middle Ages and to single out pilgrims, Jews, Muslims, heretics, lepers, prostitutes, the insane, and individuals condemned to death. Heraldic imagery recorded and displayed publicly the lineage of elite families. Saracens could not wear clothes that might allow them to be confused with Franks, and the devil was often represented in stripes for quick recognition. Complex robing and coronation rituals defined social relationships between royal, ecclesiastical, and warrior figures from Central Asia through Persia, the Byzantine Empire and the Middle East, to the medieval West. European liturgical vestments, endowed with official symbolism that maintained a hierarchy of rank and orders, were also deployed publicly in elaborate rituals of dressing and undressing priests. Clothing and bodily adornment for the dead held special symbolic significance. Even undergarments often served, in medieval literary texts, as key indicators of gendered social status.

Legal and Moral Restraints

Sumptuary laws, vernacular sermons, and didactic literary texts, which were marshaled to help regulate the consumption, display, and dispersal of clothing, also often expressed concern that individual items of dress had failed to perform an appointed regulatory function. Although sumptuary legislation varied widely among western European countries and municipalities, these laws attempted in general to regulate, seemingly with little effect, the extravagant use of costly fabrics and excessive yardage, focusing at times on the reputed excesses of women in particular, and at others, on making lesser nobles visually distinct from royalty or commoners distinct from the nobility.

However, the very materiality of clothing as a portable and highly valued commodity allowed it to circulate as currency, which could easily produce visual confusion among social ranks. English and French wills containing bequests of clothing provide important information about gift giving across status groups. Through the courtly culture of largesse, or generous giving, luxury garments circulated widely among members of both courtly and noncourtly worlds, as jongleurs and innkeepers were said to be compensated in rich clothes and furs, much as knights and other nobles were. Joan of Navarre's reputed exasperation at seeing hundreds of bourgeois women outfitted in silks and furs as if they were queens encapsulated the dilemma. If publicly displayed luxury clothing could fashion Joan into a French queen, it could also mint bourgeois queens in her image.

Demarcating and Defining Gender

Gender was also regulated through the monitoring of medieval clothing. Clerical authors typically expressed concern that excessive expenditure on women's costly attire would bring financial impoverishment to men, and that men's participation in donning lavish clothes would result in their own moral ruin. Even more important, however, was the fear often expressed in vernacular and Latin sermons that if men began to dress in the opulent style "of women," their extravagant clothing and adornment could obscure, rather than delineate, biological differences. Thus Saint Bernard exhorted knights not to wear the trinkets of women, to cut their effeminate long locks and discard their billowing tunics. And yet the possibility that changing clothing could alter or blur gender distinctions was explored at length in historical, pseudo-historical, hagiographic, and literary narratives of transvestite heroines. While female saints from Perpetua to Hildegund of Schönau cross-dressed as men, female protagonists, like the heroine in the Romance of Silence, disguised themselves as minstrels, knights, and warriors. Courtly lovers in the High Middle Ages sometimes profited from unisex garb to facilitate clandestine heterosexual liaisons. Whereas armor, the quintessential marker of chivalric masculinity, ironically provided the perfect cover for disguised females, loose-fitting unisex articles of courtly clothing were frequently bestowed upon men by female attendants in romance texts. Women who clothe men in this way, along with others like Queen Iseut, who elaborately dressed her disguised adulterous lover for the famous trial scene in the French Romance of Tristan, provided important alternatives to the traditional scenario of Pygmalion shaping and clothing Galatea.

Breaking the Rules

Ample evidence from the medieval period suggests that clothes could define their wearers socially both within and against established conventions. Conduct books, which record moral concerns about the production and consumption of fashionable clothes, also reveal that women's management of clothing and linens provided new opportunities for self-definition. Other sources show pious women using religious garb as a covert form of resistance against their husbands. Courtly literary texts feature female protagonists who deploy the clothing most often used to attire them as dolled-up beauties to starkly different effect. These heroines use clothes to create alternative systems of female passion, pleasure, and love service, signaling the lady's will, her command, her gift, and contract. Embroidery and clothwork, often used by literary courtly ladies in the making of love tokens, along with women's scarves or detachable sleeves given to knights to wear on their helmets in tournaments, can mark the lady's potentially substantial influence in shaping the course of the love scenario. Even the choice of a woman's dress to represent, allegorically, philosophical learning in Boethius's Consolation of Philosophy has been read as an image of feminine bodily difference that challenges, rather than underwrites, masculine wisdom. And surviving leather shoes from the Netherlands, decorated with embossed scenes from the Tristan story, show how that courtly narrative could be recast to reflect concerns with urban marriage.

Foreign Imports

At times, clerical denunciations of the excessive use of fabric and luxury garb also reveal an anxiety about foreignness. The costly silks, gems, and precious metals so often deprecated by moralists were not only imported; they originated from distant and unknown eastern cultures. And yet by the thirteenth century at least, eastern fabrics fashioned into western garments were used systematically in literary texts to signal ostensibly European identities. Literary courtly ladies, whose pure white skin and delicate facial features are typically augmented by extravagant attire, stand firmly at the cultural crossroads between Christian France and the Middle Eastern cities that give their names to the clothes these ladies wear: Phrygia, Damascus, Constantinople. Clerical and lay figures carved on French cathedral facades from the mid-twelfth century onward wear western-style garments decorated with Islamic detailing. European Church treasures in the High Middle Ages are filled with liturgical vestments and altar cloths fashioned from rich silks imported from Spain, Constantinople, and cities of the Levant. Many surviving Christian European alms purses, made of imported Islamic silks, are aptly if ironically termed "Saracen work."

Medieval garments also played an important role as holy relics: whether in the historical, extant chemise of King Louis IX held in the treasury of Notre Dame in Paris or the more elusive but widely known Virgin's chemise (shift) from Chartres Cathedral. As clothes no longer worn, these garments-turned-relics held special significance as bodily substitutes because of having touched the flesh of saints reputed to have possessed them.

E. JANE BURNS

References and Further Reading

- Burns, E. Jane. Courtly Love Undressed: Reading Through Clothes in Medieval French Culture. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2002.
- , ed. Medieval Fabrications: Dress, Textiles, Clothwork, and Other Cultural Imaginings. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004.
- Crane, Susan. "Clothing and Gender Definition in Joan of Arc." Journal of Medieval and Early Modern Studies 26:2 (1996): 207–232.
- . The Performance of Self: Ritual, Identity and Clothing During the Hundred Years War. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2002.
- Crowfoot, Elizabeth, Frances Pritchard, and Kay Staniland. Textiles and Clothing. London: HMSO, 1992.
- Gordon, Stewart, ed. Robes and Honor: The Medieval World of Investiture. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2001.

- Hotchkiss, Valerie R. Clothes Make the Man: Female Cross Dressing in Medieval Europe. New York: Garland, 1996.
- Pastoureau, Michel, ed. Le Vêtement: histoire, archéologie et symbolique vestimentaires au Moyen Age. Paris: Léopold d'Or, 1989.
- Piponnier, Françoise and Perrine Mane. Dress in the Middle Ages. Trans. Caroline Beamish. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1997.
- Snyder, Janet and Désirée Koslin, eds. Encountering Medieval Textiles and Dress: Objects, Texts, Images. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2003.

See also Arms and Armor; Christine de Pizan; Clothing for Religious Women; Clothwork, Domestic; Conduct Literature; Courtly Love; Cross-Dressing; Gender Ideologies; Grave Goods; Griselda; Social Status; Sumptuary Law

CLOTHING FOR RELIGIOUS WOMEN

Simple and inexpensive clothing for virtuous virgins was programmatic as the early Church developed. Uniformity of dress, however, and specificity as to color, cut, and accessories evolved only with the expansion of the reformed monastic orders from the twelfth century onwards. Patristic writers such as Tertullian (c. 160–225), Jerome (345–420) and John Chrysostom (c. 347–407) condemned female frivolity in dress and equated it with vice and lust. Undyed woolen cloth, preferably dark and made into body-concealing, generic garments, was prescribed for religious women during the early centuries, whereas the rules for later female orders enumerated colors and fabric types in detail. The Rule of Caesarius of Arles (c. 470–542), for instance, calls for simple clothing in natural white sheep's wool. By contrast, the rule of the Order of St. Saviour established by Birgitta of Sweden (c. 1302–1373), is explicit as to items like the gray wadmal cloth to be used, the sleeves' length, and buttons made of wood.

Monastic garments were modeled on ideals of apostolic simplicity; and late antique shapes and names were retained. The dress of the medieval religious, now often termed "habit," consisted of a T-shaped tunica of wool, always worn with a belt. Underneath was a full-length, sleeved camisia, a shift made of wool, hemp, or linen. A woolen cloth rectangle with a hole for the head, the scapular, covered the tunic's front and back; its original use was for protection during manual work. During the divine service, and particularly among the contemplative orders, the cuculla, or choir cloak, was worn over the tunic. In medieval depictions, the cuculla's sweeping dimensions and hanging sleeves are easily identified. Outside and in cold weather, a semicircular mantle, sometimes lined with fur, was worn over the tunic. As footwear, most of the religious orders used shoes. Only the more radical tertiaries wore sandals or went barefoot. Hose, sewn from bias-cut woolen cloth, was specified for some orders. Two sets of basic clothing were often provided to nuns for day-to-day and seasonal changes. Worn-out garments were passed on to the truly poor.

Religious women wore head veils and wimples covering throat and chest, just like most medieval secular females. Only unwed and royal women could show their hair. The veil was fastened by means of pins attached to a close-fitting bonnet, coif, or linen bands wrapped around the head, vittae. A nun-to-be, accepted as a postulant in a religious house, wore a white veil over the white linen under-veil. Prior to profession, she was tonsured with a short haircut; and, at the consecration ceremony, the bishop placed a black veil over the new nun's under-veil. This black veil would also be used for her burial. More than any other clothing item, the black veil was the nun's signifier.

Medieval religious orders may be divided by their founding rules. Dress styles and colors (black [B] and white [W] the most common) can be linked to this classification. Those obeying the fifth-century Rule of St. Benedict, considered the "First" order, were primarily contemplative orders and are therefore usually seen in cucullae. They are, in order of their founding: Benedictines (B); Cistercians (W); Gilbertines (W); Camaldolese (W); Vallombrosans (B); Carthusians (W); Olivetans (W), Humiliati (W); and Sylvestrines (B). The "Second" orders were governed by the Rule of St. Augustine, which allowed modifications to the tenets of obedience and poverty. These orders are less easily classified by their dress, to which changes were made over time. The tunic's color may be different from the scapular and mantle. This group includes: the Hospital orders, whose mantles often carried cross insignia; Premonstratensians (or Norbertines) (W); Trinitarians (W, with blue-red cross); Servites (B); Carmelites (B tunic, W mantle); Dominicans (W tunic, B mantle); and Birgittines (all gray). "Third" orders, obeying the Rule of St. Francis, incorporate several penitential groups as well as the Franciscan branches. Their various brown, gray, or light neutral dress colors evoke the shades of the coarse, unsorted sheep's wool made into cloth that was neither dyed nor fulled as well as finer wool fabrics. St. Clare's mantle survives today in her convent in Assisi, its lean cut and rough texture speaking eloquently of the adherence to the tenets of poverty.

The level of actual observance to the orders' clothing prescriptions is less easy to assess. Bishops visiting female houses often complained that the order's dress codes were ignored, either due to lack of funds or to the wish for sartorial display. Some nuns' testaments reveal that they owned secular garments in bright colors to give away. It seems clear that wealthy institutions could afford to follow the rule, and that some appear to have been lenient in the dress code's implementation, whereas poorer houses would have to make do with less than the rule's ideas of apostolic clothing and appearance.

CLOTHING FOR RELIGIOUS WOMEN

DESIREE KOSLIN

References and Further Reading

- Flury-Lemberg, Mechtild. Textile Conservation and Research. Bern: Abegg-Stiftung, 1988.
- Hélyot, Pierre. Histoire des Ordres Monastiques Religieux. Paris: Nicolas Gosselin, 1714–1719.
- Koslin, Désirée. The Dress of Monastic and Religious Women as seen in the Art from the Early Middle Ages to the Reformation. PhD dissertation, New York University, 1999.
- McNamara, Jo Ann. Sisters in Arms: Catholic Nuns Through Two Millennia. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1996.
- Warr, Cordelia. "Religious Habits and Visual Propaganda. The Vision of the Blessed Reginald of Orléans," Journal of Medieval History 28 (2002): 43–72.

See also Birgittine Order; Cistercian Order; Clare of Assisi; Clothing; Dominican Order; Gilbertine Order; Humiliati; Monastic Rules; Monastic Visitation; Monasticism and Nuns; Poor Clares Order; Premonstratensian Order; Tertiaries

CLOTHWORK, DOMESTIC

Tradition associates the textile crafts with women. Clothmaking tools—spindle whorls, wool combs, shears, and weaving beaters—are characteristic female grave-goods in early medieval Europe. At that time, women wove wool or linen on a vertical loom, either the two-beam variety, or the warp-weighted loom which made use of weights made of clay or stone. Weaving remained an exclusively feminine occupation only until the introduction of mechanisation about the eleventh century. The horizontal loom, incorporating treadles operated by the feet, was, initially at least, a masculine tool. Its introduction coincided with increased urbanisation and facilitated professional manufacture of long lengths of cloth. Meanwhile the vertical loom, operated by women, survived in rural contexts, particularly in Scandinavia, or was diverted to specialist functions such as tapestry weaving. Women continued to weave narrow wares on small band looms and they braided belts and edgings on tablets throughout the Middle Ages. Female workers were particularly associated with products made from imported silk, playing a large part in the marketing as well as the manufacture of silk goods.

Spinning

Spinning, unlike weaving, remained in the feminine realm until modern times, even after the introduction of the spinning wheel sped up production; indeed, the term spinster is still applied solely to women. Since the proportion of time needed to prepare thread was much greater than that required to weave it into cloth, spinning must have been a constant, necessary occupation. Originally carried out with a distaff held in the left hand and a drop spindle rotated by the right, spinning could continue as a woman walked or watched a pot boil, and be set aside without damage as she attended to other tasks. When a woman is not engaged in spinning, the raw fibre is wound round the distaff, the spindle dangling from it by a length of spun thread.

Although spinning was associated with virtuous womanhood, and idleness at the distaff with sloth, satire suggests that men may have found the incessant spinning irritating and alienating—misericords at Malvern and Westminster show irate wives chasing husbands with raised distaff, while in the margin of fol. 60r of the Luttrell Psalter a woman brandishes her distaff to beat a man crouching abjectly at her feet. One of the earliest comic characters in English drama, Noah's wife in the Wakefield cycle of Mystery Plays, insists, as the Flood waters rise, that she cannot go into the ark as she has to finish her spinning.

Clothmaking

Until the Industrial Revolution, textile manufacture was intensely physical. Every thread in every item of clothing had passed between some woman's finger and thumb. Flax was kept moist during spinning with constant licks of saliva, loose rovings of wool were rolled down the thigh, and skeins were wound on the hands. Threads and cloth were measured against the human body. Clothworking was a communal feminine activity, and since, unlike production on modern machinery, it was not noisy, there was opportunity for talking, perhaps even singing. (The latter is recorded among early modern hand-fullers in Ireland who used the rhythm of the song to coordinate their work.) An Icelandic story tells of women's conversation at sewing. Weaving a large piece of cloth, such as a blanket or cloak, would be facilitated if two women worked together, passing the weft thread on a bobbin from one to the other. In the domestic sphere it was labour for mother to share with daughter. Great estates would employ whole workshops of women, to prepare the clothing and other textile necessities for the community. Illustrations in the Carolingian Utrecht Psalter and the English Eadwine Psalter show a group of women, talking animatedly, with a large hank of thread and a partially prepared loom.

The labour-intensive nature of cloth production made textiles precious. Their alteration and maintenance was an essential household task which largely fell to women—wives, daughters, female servants, and, in the monastic world, nuns. At the top of the social hierarchy, garments of the rich and royal, made of velvet and decorated with gold thread, were donated to churches where they were remade into vestments and other ecclesiastical cloths. In contrast the clothing of a male corpse found in a peat bog at Bernuthsfeld, Germany, radio-carbon dated to c. 660 A.D., included a tunic made up of a patchwork of forty-five pieces, an economical use of precious scraps of cloth. The employees of great households were regularly supplied with new clothing; used garments were given to social inferiors, sold, or recycled. Clothing was bequeathed. Enlarging garments for growing children, or adjusting them for new owners, were essential tasks at domestic and institutional levels. Women were occupied also with laundry, stain removal, repair work, and the constant renewing of garments and bed linen by cutting out worn parts and remaking the remainder, until the textile was reduced to rags. Even rags had their uses: in the ship-building industry at the Viking Age emporium of Haithabu (Hedeby, Germany), ships were tarred and caulked with torn up garments. Later, rags were used in papermaking, which first appeared in Europe in twelfth-century Italy, the technique imported from China, via Arabs. By the mid-fifteenth century, rag collection from industrial centres was a major occupation throughout Europe. Rags were taken to mills for sorting and pulping with water, a process that continued until the eighteenth century when a shortage of rags led to the substitution of vegetable fibres in paper production.

Clothmaking spanned the social scale. In the early medieval period, textile workers, even skilled ones, were sometimes slaves. Cloth manufacture for profit was evidently a respectable occupation for middle-class women (in the fourteenth century, Chaucer's Wife of Bath boasted of her expertise at weaving, combining this career with successive marriages). It was also a desirable skill for those of top status.

Charlemagne, King of the Franks and Holy Roman Emperor (742–814), had his daughters taught to spin. The burial of a high-ranking woman and her attendant, deposited in 834 at Oseberg, Norway, contained incomplete tablet weaving, a tapestry, looms, and equipment for winding thread. Royal women across western Europe created and patronised gold and silk embroidery of the highest standard, often for ecclesiastical use: Alpeide, sister of Holy Roman Emperor Charles the Bald, embroidered an inscription on a precious silk cushion for the head of Saint Remigius at the translation of that saint's relics in 852; Ælfflæd, wife of the English king Edward the Elder, commissioned in the early tenth century a stole and maniple, originally for the Bishop of Winchester but later given to the shrine of St. Cuthbert, now in Durham. Edith, who married the English king Edward the Confessor in 1045, exercised her personal skills and patronage to equip her husband more splendidly than any previous English king; his garments were decorated with gold embroidery, gemstones and pearls; his throne was covered with gold-embroidered textile and his floors with Spanish carpets.

However, illustrations in late medieval manuscripts of richly dressed ladies carrying out textile crafts should not be assumed to be an authentic representation of medieval life: their subject is often either biblical or classical. For example, the early fifteenth-century manuscript British Library Royal 16 G v (a French translation of Boccaccio's De claris mulieribus) has illuminations depicting Arachne, Gaia Caecilia and her ladies, Pamphila, daughter of Plates and Penelope, variously spinning, carding, and weaving according to the legends associated with them.

Embroidery

Decorative stitching on woven cloth—embroidery—is known from antiquity and examples from medieval Europe exist from the seventh century onward. Embroidery can be utilitarian—for example to personalize linen in communal laundry—or decorative in a simple way, concealing seams or edging a garment at the neckline, wrist, or hem. It can also be extremely elaborate and expensive, especially the prestigious gold and silk work that reached its apogee in the fourteenth and early fifteenth centuries. Embroidered motifs may be instructive, iconic, or symbolic, especially on ecclesiastical vestments and royal regalia. It is usually assumed that women carried out embroidery in medieval times and in fact the names of several early exponents are documented. The feminine aspect of embroidery has probably been exaggerated, however. The tradition that Mathilda, wife of William the Conqueror, was responsible, with the ladies of her court, for the Bayeux Tapestry (c. 1066–1087) has no authority, and indeed the Tapestry is clearly the product of professional workshops. Male embroiderers were employed in France by the eleventh century, and in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries when embroidery production was highly professionalized and well-documented, male workers were paid more than female.

Metaphors from Clothwork

The spinning of thread, and the cutting of it, occurs as a metaphor for life and death in many mythologies and religions and is often expressed in imagery of female cloth workers. Biblical use of the metaphor is reflected in the loom preparation scenes in Psalters, previously mentioned. Pagan female deities were imagined spinning and weaving: the Greek Moirai “Fates”, three sisters, respectively spun the thread of human life, measured it out and cut it when the time came to die. Their Roman equivalents were the Parcae and the Scandinavian, the Norns. Northern mythology also included Valkyries, “choosers of the slain,” female warriors who were depicted in the Icelandic poem Darraðarljóð as grisly weavers, with entrails for threads and severed heads as loom-weights.

Metaphorical use of woman as textile worker continued in Christian tradition. In apocryphal gospels, the young Virgin Mary was described as a skilled weaver and spinner. She was chosen to prepare the purple thread for weaving the veil of the temple, which would be severed at the crucifixion. Mary’s spinning, therefore, is a metaphor for her part in Christ’s incarnation. In medieval art she is often pictured with spinning, weaving, or knitting implements, familiar and domestic, but also reflecting both the apocryphal stories and the theological concept that Mary, by bearing Jesus Christ, clothed him in flesh. An illustration in a fourteenth-century pseudo-Bonaventure manuscript depicts Mary sewing, accompanied by two other women, one spinning, the other with scissors, thus offering a link between Christian theology and the pagan conception of woman creating and cutting cloth, which symbolises life itself.

GALE R. OWEN-CROCKER

Note: For References and Further Reading, see Textile Production for the Market

See also Clothing; Clothing for Religious Women; Home Manufacturing; Household Management;

Misericords; Sumptuary Law; Textile Production for the Market; Valkyries

CLOTILDA

Clotilda, queen of the Franks (474–545), was the daughter of the Burgundian King Chilperic. Although most Burgundians professed Arianism, she was trained in the orthodox faith by her mother. After her parents’ murder by her uncle King Gundobad in 490, she took refuge with her other uncle, King Godgisil, at Geneva. There, Clovis, the pagan king of the Franks, proposed marriage. She accepted his offer on the condition that her children would be baptized in the orthodox faith. According to Gregory of Tours, she played an important part in Clovis’s conversion. After her husband’s death, she retired to Tours, devoting her life to piety and charity. She died in 545 and was buried in the Church of the Apostles (St. Geneviève), which she built together with Clovis.

Although considered one of the most pious Merovingian queens, Clotilda’s actions sometimes reflected a barbarian mentality. Her campaign for revenge against her parents’ murderers corroborates the fact that she still obeyed a Germanic code of honor, far from the Christian ideal of caritas (divine love). Yet, beyond this paradoxical behavior, Clotilda certainly incarnates the traditional model of the holy royal missionary consort whose vocation was to bring her husband to Christianity. Her vita, based on Gregory of Tours’s account, was written by Adson of Montier-en-Der between 956 and 960. It is interesting to note that in this later version, un-Christian Germanic behavior has been totally eradicated. From the tenth century onward, Clotilda was remembered as a dutiful Christian woman and a saintly queen.

NIRA PANCER

References and Further Reading

- Gregory of Tours. The History of the Franks, edited and translated by Lewis Thorpe, Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1974.
- Harrison, Dick. The Age of Abbesses and Queens. Sweden: Nordic Academic Press, 1998.
- Scheibelreiter, Georg. “Clovis, le païen, Clotilde, la pieuse: À propos de la mentalité barbare,” in Clovis: Histoire et mémoire, edited by Michel Rouche, 2 vols. Paris: Presses de l’Université de Paris-Sorbonne, 1997. t.1, pp. 348–367.
- Stafford, Pauline. Queens, Concubines and Dowagers: The King’s Wife in Early Middle Ages. Athens, Ga.: University of Georgia Press, 1983.
- Wood, I. N. The Merovingian Kingdoms, 450–751, London: Longman, 1994, pp. 120–139.

See also Conversion, Religious; Frankish Lands; Queens and Empresses: The West

CLUNIAC ORDER

The monastery of Cluny, founded in Burgundy by the Duke of Aquitaine in 909–910, was one of a number of foundations of the Carolingian era that sought to return to the standards of Saint Benedict's sixth-century "Rule." Cluny's origins were rather humble, yet it was always considered a holy house, where the monks renounced the comforts of the world and practiced individual poverty. This meant that although the house itself might own a great deal, individual monks had nothing of their own. Their holiness was safeguarded by the duke's stipulation that no bishop or secular lord—including himself—should interfere in the monks' internal affairs, which were subject solely to the distant pope.

During the tenth century, it was a fairly common practice for a monastic house experiencing difficulties to be placed under the direction of a flourishing monastery. Then, once that house had been reformed, and when the abbot who had headed both houses died, the monks of each house would elect their own abbots. Cluny's own first abbot, Berno, also headed the monastery of Gigny, although after his death the two monasteries went their separate ways. Such houses as St. Bénigne of Dijon were reformed by Cluny in this way in the tenth century.

But in the eleventh century it became more common for a monastery given to Cluny to remain under the authority of Cluny's abbot. Such houses were known as priories, headed by a prior rather than an abbot. The monastery of Paray-le-Monial was the first important house to come permanently under Cluny's direction. Other Burgundian houses soon followed, including St. Marcel-lès-Chalon and La Charité.

In the later eleventh century, under Abbot Hugh (1049–1109), Cluny became the most influential monastery in western Europe, attracting gifts from kings as far away as Spain and grants of immunity from the pope. A number of Cluniac monks became bishops. Several monasteries, most notably Vézelay, came under Cluny's direction, although they kept their own abbots. The great church known as Cluny III was built, and it was the biggest church in Christendom until the end of the Middle Ages. An enormous church was needed because of the great flood of converts, comprised of boys offered to the monastery by their parents and mature adults who left the secular world to finish their lives in an aura of sanctity. The Duke of Burgundy, for example, became a monk at Cluny in 1078 after being wounded in battle.

Normally a married man could not leave his wife for the monastery, unless she too agreed to enter the church. The nunnery of Marcigny, some fifty kilometers from Cluny, was founded in 1054 for the wives and daughters of men who entered Cluny. The founders were the lords of Semur, the family of Abbot Hugh, and in the 1080s most of the secular members of the family followed their ecclesiastical relatives into Cluny and Marcigny.

The monastic life at Cluny at the end of the eleventh century was one of great display. The assumption was that to glorify God one needed the best in everything, including constant prayers and psalms, a beautifully designed and decorated church, and fine vestments. But another strand developed in eleventh-century thought, centered on the notion that God was best glorified through simplicity and poverty. Although Cluny and its monks could not be considered corrupt, by the twelfth century other groups of monks, especially the Cistercians, were often considered more holy and began to attract the bulk of gifts and converts.

The Cistercians had begun with the foundation of Cîteaux in 1098, a house originally scarcely distinguishable from a hermitage but which quickly attracted many young adult converts. Like the Cluniacs, they followed a version of the "Benedictine Rule," but with a much greater emphasis on simplicity and manual labor. By the middle of the twelfth century, the popularity of the Cistercians led to the foundation of numerous daughter-houses and to the creation of a true Order, in which the relationships between the different houses was spelled out and standards for everything from form of dress to the liturgy to the placement of churches was specified and enforced.

This kind of uniformity had no precedent at Cluny, where many houses had come under Cluny's direction and left again, and some (like St. Bénigne of Dijon and St. German of Auxerre), formerly under Cluny's direction, began to acquire their own priories. By the middle of the thirteenth century, however, by which time the number of Cluniac priories had expanded from a handful to dozens, there was a deliberate effort to establish some sort of uniformity, in part in imitation of the Cistercians, leading for the first time to a true Cluniac Order.

CONSTANCE B. BOUCHARD

References and Further Reading

- Bouchard, Constance B. Sword, Miter, and Cloister: Nobility and the Church in Burgundy, 980–1198. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1987.
- . "Merovingian, Carolingian, and Cluniac Monasticism: Reform and Renewal in Burgundy." Journal of Ecclesiastical History 41 (1990), 365–388.
- Hunt, Noreen. Cluny Under Saint Hugh, 1049–1109. London: Edward Arnold, 1969.

- Iogna-Prat, Dominique. Order and Exclusion: Cluny and Christendom Face Heresy, Judaism, and Islam (1000–1150). translated by Graham Robert Edwards. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2002.
- Richard, Jean, ed. Le cartulaire de Marcigny-sur-Loire (1045–1044): Essais de reconstitution d'un manuscrit disparu. Dijon: Bernigaud et Privat, 1957.
- Rosenwein, Barbara H. Rhinoceros Bound: Cluny in the Tenth Century. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1982.
- . To Be the Neighbor of Saint Peter: The Social Meaning of Cluny's Property, 909–1049. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1989.
- Van Engen, John. "The 'Crisis of Cenobitism' Reconsidered: Benedictine Monasticism in the Years 1050–1150." Speculum 61 (1986), pp. 269–304.
- Wischermann, Elsa Maria. Marcigny-sur-Loire: Gründungs- und Frühgeschichte des ersten Cluniacenserinnen priorates (1055–1150). Munich: W. Fink, 1986.

See also Cistercian Order; Monasticism and Nuns

COINAGE

The placing of a woman's name on medieval coinage was a declaration of her political rights and a recognition, at least by the officials of her mint, of her effective rule. As coins were the most widely disseminated government product, their message would have been available to people of all social groups, at least those with enough literacy to recognize the ruler's name on them. During the course of the Middle Ages, the names of about one hundred women appeared on the coinages of Europe, Byzantium, and the Islamic world; in most cases this recognition came as the culmination of a process of political, legal, and even military struggle.

The only group of medieval women who had an ipso facto right to mint were the abbesses of convents who received the privilege of "moneta" along with those to markets and tolls, usually in foundation charters issued by imperial rulers of the central Middle Ages. This right was exercised by nine German houses, most notably Eschwege, Gandersheim, Herford, and, especially, Quedlinburg (whose coinage continued well into the modern period). As was the case with other aspects of monastic rights throughout Europe, the control of coinage frequently became a source of conflict between the abbess and the lay advocate, who was theoretically her representative in secular matters. In the case of Eschwege, this conflict was resolved in a decree of Frederick Barbarossa of 1188 which confirmed that the abbess had the unquestioned right of setting the standards and images on the coinage and that the advocate's role was that of "amicable and competent service" to her. The dispute between the abbess of Quedlinburg and her lay advocate resulted in the appearance of the image of an armed knight next to a nun on one issue of the coinage; it was finally settled by a decree of Innocent III in 1207, which confirmed to the abbess and the chapter the sole right to the striking of coins.

Other women exercised a right to coinage as a result of their inheritance of other political powers, usually in the absence of a male heir. The ninth-century Byzantine empress Theodora appeared on both sides of her coinage during her sole rule, but had to give way in other periods to her sister Zoe's husband and adopted son. Another heiress who minted her own name was Empress Matilda of England, daughter of Henry I, whose coinage was issued during her twenty-year struggle for the throne with her cousin Stephen of Blois. Margaret of Hainault issued one of Europe's first high denomination coins in 1244 as successor to her father, Baldwin IX (the first Latin Emperor of Constantinople), and her older sister Johanna (who did not put her name on coins). When her political rights were challenged, Saint Louis restored to Margaret her lands and coinage until her death, at which time they were to be divided between her sons.

For an heiress, marriage did not always bring a loss of identity regarding coinage. Urraca of Castile may have ceded minting to her husband, Alfonso of Aragon, during their brief marriage, but for most of her reign, from 1109 to 1126, she put her name and image on her coinage and even granted minting rights to the monastery of Sahagún. Mary of Burgundy, daughter of Charles the Bold, kept her name on the coinage of many mints of the Low Countries in the fifteenth century even after her marriage to Maximilian of Austria.

Sometimes the question of the coinage rights of a married heiress was settled by compromise. Constance I of Sicily shared numismatic recognition with her husband, the emperor Henry VI, on the Sicilian coinage of the 1190s—her name appeared on the bronze coins, his on the gold, and both on the alloyed silver pennies. The best known numismatic couple is Isabella of Castile and Ferdinand of Aragon, each of whom brought a kingdom to their joined realm; their dual portrait appeared on the gold doubloons that were to have such a major history in the post-medieval world.

In most cases, however, a woman lost her inherited right to coinage along with her other political powers when she married. Mary of Anjou was typical of many heiresses in terms of recognition on the coinage; her name appeared only on the three years between the death in 1382 of her father, Louis I of Hungary, and her marriage to Sigismund of Luxembourg, whose name then was borne by the coins. The most famous medieval woman to issue coins was Eleanor of Aquitaine, whose issues in Aquitaine bear only her title of duchess and not her name; they were probably minted only after 1189, when her son Richard the Lionhearted became king of England.

As in many areas of medieval politics, the right to coinage was governed more by circumstance and power than by customary or statutory law. The appearance of women's names on coinage throughout the Middle Ages is testimony of the fact that many succeeded in establishing their rights, though often in the face of strong opposition.

ALAN M. STAHL

References and Further Reading

- Brubaker, Leslie, and Helen Tobler. "The Gender of Money: Byzantine Empresses on Coins (324–802)." In Gendering the Middle Ages, edited by Pauline Stafford and Anneke B. Mulder-Bakker. Oxford, U.K.; Malden, Mass.: Blackwell, 2001, pp. 42–64.
- Grierson, Philip. "Numismatics." In Medieval Studies: An Introduction, edited by James M. Powell. 2nd edition. Syracuse: Syracuse University Press, 1992, pp. 114–161.
- Stahl, Alan M. "Coinage in the Name of Medieval Women." In Medieval Women and the Sources of Medieval History, edited by Joel Rosenthal. Athens, Ga.: University of Georgia Press, 1990, pp. 321–341.

See also Abbesses; Constance of Sicily; Eleanor of Aquitaine; Isabel I; Matilda the Empress; Seals and Sigillography; Succession, Royal and Noble; Urraca

COLETTE OF CORBIE

Colette (1381–1447) was born in the town of Corbie in Picardy, France, to Robert Boellet and Marguerite Moyon. Colette's extraordinary piety manifested itself during her youth; however, when her parents died and Dom Raoul de Roye, abbot of St. Pierre, became her guardian, he wanted her to marry. Eventually she convinced him to allow her to undertake life as a nun, and she was then enclosed as an anchoress. After a few years, she was released from her anchoritic vows. Accompanied by her confessor, Henri de la Baume, she gained an audience with Pope Benedict XIII, who authorized her to begin founding reformed houses for Franciscan nuns.

Colette's connection with Henri de la Baume, and this papal audience, mark her entry into the overlapping worlds of ecclesiastical and secular politics. Henri came from a family with strong ties to the house of Burgundy; Burgundian dukes and duchesses became important patrons for many of the foundations that Colette created during her lifetime. In turn, as the Burgundians struggled with their Armagnac rivals in France, and worked to assert their authority in the Low Countries, they benefited from association with a woman who was already widely revered for sanctity in her lifetime.

Even Colette's powerful secular supporters, however, did not enable her to overcome the opposition of the Benedictine monks of St. Pierre to her founding a nunnery in Corbie. The monks were not alone in opposing Colette. When she turned her attention to reforming Franciscan friars, she faced substantial resistance. Also, within the Franciscan Order she had to deal with the attempts of the Observant Friars, particularly under the leadership of John of Capistrano, to assimilate her independent reforms.

Colette died March 6, 1447, in Ghent. In spite of her far-reaching reputation for sanctity in the fifteenth century, she was not beatified until 1740 and not canonized until May 24, 1807.

NANCY BRADLEY WARREN

References and Further Reading

- Corblet, Jules. Hagiographie du diocèse d'Amiens, vol. 1. Paris: Dumoulin; Amiens: Prevost-Allo, 1868.
- Lopez, Elisabeth. Culture et sainteté: Colette de Corbie (1381–1447). Saint-Etienne: Publications de l'Université de Saint-Etienne, 1994.
- . Histoire de Sainte Colette. Paris: Desclée, 1998.
- . Petite vie de Sainte Colette. Paris: Desclée, 1998.
- Warren, Nancy Bradley. Women of God and Arms: Female Spirituality and Political Conflict, 1380–1600. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2005.

See also Agnes of Prague; Clare of Assisi; Flanders; France, Northern; Monastic Rules; Poor Clares Order

COMPIUTA DONZELLA

The poetic voice known as Compiuta Donzella (Accomplished Maiden), the earliest named female poet in Italian, is an historical enigma. Three sonnets are assigned to her, in only one (though major) manuscript collection of lyric poems, Vatican lat. 3793. Because the name Compiuta, while widely attested in the thirteenth century, is also a generic description, it has long been considered a pseudonym, and scholars have disagreed on whether this figure really existed as a female poet or was rather a literary pose by a male poet. Other thirteenth-century poets, such as Guittone d'Arezzo, Mastro Torrigiano, and (possibly) Chiaro Davanzati, praise the erudition and poetic talent of a figure who might be Compiuta Donzella; such references tend to support her historical existence. Indeed, based on historical and stylistic evidence, prominent Italianists such as Contini and Kleinhenz, have argued in favor of it.

Of the three sonnets attributed to her, two are particularly well-known. The first half of “A la stagione che ’l mondo foglia e flora” (In the season when the world leafs out and blooms) extols the beauty of spring, but the second half yokes the conventional nature-introduction to a contrastive lament over her imminent forced marriage. “Lascia vorria lo mondo, e Dio servire” (I would like to leave the world and serve God) can be read as a sequel to the first, although it can also stand alone: the poet finds the world wholly unsatisfactory and wishes to withdraw from it. The third poem is her reply in a debate poem on the subject of her own poetic prowess.

Regardless of her historical identity, the poems attributed to Compiuta Donzella are aesthetically accomplished and affectively vivid. They represent a dimension of women’s experience and emotion that enriches the overwhelmingly masculine perspective of medieval Italian lyric poetry.

F. REGINA PSAKI

References and Further Reading

Contini, Gianfranco, ed. Poeti del Duecento, Vol. 1, part 1: Testi arcaici, scuola siciliana, poesia cortese. Rpt. Milan and Naples: Classici Ricciardi-Mondadori, 1995, pp. 433–438.

Kleinhenz, Christopher. “Pulzelle e maritate: Coming of Age, Rites of Passage, and the Question of Marriage in Some Early Italian Poets.” In Matrons and Marginal Women in Medieval Society, edited by Robert R. Edwards and Vickie Ziegler. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell Press, 1995, pp. 89–110.

See also Literature, Italian; Women Authors: Italian Texts

CONCUBINES

Concubinage is sometimes misconstrued as a forced liaison between a woman and man. However, illicit sexual relationships of concubinage during the European Middle Ages differed from those of biblical histories. The simple definition of the term concubine is usually confused with that of mistress, but until the seventeenth century, a mistress only referred to a married woman or older spinster, whereas during the medieval period, concubine meant a woman engaged in extramarital sexual relations. Evidence of concubines and concubinage appears throughout the ages; often concubines were grimly depicted as kept, immoral women. Yet, during the eleventh and twelfth centuries, particularly in the Anglo-Norman kingdom, women and men entered into sexual liaisons that boosted a family’s political status without bringing legal or ecclesiastical condemnations upon themselves, any of their sexual partners, or their offspring.

Reasons for becoming a concubine varied over time and place. Some women of poor status became concubines of lords and even priests for survival. These relationships would see to their protection, and ensure that their basic needs of feeding and clothing, of paramount importance to women of the lower classes, were met. Widows without dowries or the means to support themselves might be tempted into concubinage, even against the will of families and the Church. Carol Lansing, Gene Brucker, and others concentrate on the occurrences of concubinage and the plight of lower-class women primarily in Italy and France during the periods between the thirteenth through the fifteenth centuries, while Margaret Rosenthal introduces an Honest Courtesan by the name of Veronica Franco (1546–1591), in her book of the same name. These are equally significant to the study of concubines; each instance needs separate consideration for an accurate portrayal of concubinage in the European Middle Ages.

Concubines of Clergy

A controversial issue relating to concubinage was that of women living with priests. These women, not legal wives, had children and, usually in all eyes except those of the Church, considered themselves bound to their men. This practice came under intense scrutiny by the Church when some very zealous arbiters of ecclesiastical practices took it upon themselves to sever these concubinal relationships regardless of the ages or families involved. One example is Gerald of Wales who, as archdeacon of Brecknock in the later twelfth century, entered the home of an aging priest who refused to give up his concubine. Gerald literally threw the man into the street. While this priest refused to accept his archdeacon’s criticisms, the trend for blind acceptance of concubinal relationships was a divisive issue between the Church and the laity by the end of the twelfth century.

In analyzing this controversy, it is important to note that women and men did not always receive similar treatment from the Church. For example, certain sexual lapses in England might be ignored, whereas in France, Spain, or the Holy Roman Empire, the same behaviors would be condemned outright. For example by 1215, during the Fourth Lateran Council, Pope Innocent III spent much of the Council’s time deciding where and how illegitimate sons of priests who wished to enter the Church could serve. This demonstrates a further instance of the sexual lapses of priests not remaining celibate. Though a great deal of effort was devoted to the sons of these relationships, little or no attention was paid to the fate of the women, pseudo-wives, or daughters produced by these relationships.

Interpretations of Concubinage

The manner in which or the reasons why medieval women became concubines, and subsequent interpretations of concubinage, have lacked fairness and in-depth examination. One particular weakness of appraisal involves the matter of the identity of those who recorded the events that give the closest accounts of medieval women. The sources tend to deny that concubines were legitimate members of society. The necessity of revising biased perspectives has done much to add women's experiences to the body of history, although the study of medieval women has limitations (for example, the study of women from the lower classes is limited due to the dearth of written records about them).

Thus concubinage in the Middle Ages is one critical vehicle by which women can be studied, rather than merely marginalized within society. Women, usually young girls, would be offered as concubines to ensure political stability; however, it can be suggested that women would voluntarily offer themselves to certain men for more personal advantage. On closer inspection of chronicled accounts, it appears that women and men frequently entered into sexual relationships that did not harm individuals or their offspring politically, socially, or ecclesiastically. As a result of their nobility, bastard children received political and social honors, high appointments within the Church, and knighthood, as did their "legitimate" counterparts.

Women such as Bertrade of Montfort, married to the French king Philip I, ran away with Fulk IV, count of Anjou (c. 1095). Church hierarchy considered her to be in a state of concubinage, as her divorce from Philip and subsequent marriage never received proper ecclesiastical recognition. Isabella of Vermandois, wife of Robert of Beaumont, left her husband and ran away with the earl of Warwick prior to her husband's death (c. 1114–1115), after which time she married the earl, to whom she bore several children. Her initial relationship with the earl of Warwick was considered to be one of voluntary concubinage, as there is no suggestion that the earl coerced Isabella into leaving her first husband. The infamous relationship between Heloise and her tutor/lover Abelard (c. 1122) reached the heights of scandal within the French Church even after Heloise succumbed to Abelard's entreaties first to marry him and then take holy vows with reluctance. While Abelard suffered physical humiliation for his sexual liaison with Heloise, it can be argued that Heloise suffered emotionally at her enforced separation from Abelard, for whom, in her own words, she would rather be his "whore than his wife." The relationship between Eleanor of Aquitaine and Henry of Anjou (c. 1152) had no future until she voluntarily divorced her husband, Louis VII, King of France. This imbroglio exemplifies the actions of a woman who not only had the personal will, but the wealth and independence to divest herself of an unwanted marriage and, according to the Church, become an "illegitimate" wife of another. Queen Isabella, wife of Edward II (r. 1307–1327), had a concubinal relationship with Roger Mortimer, earl of Wigmore; eventually he lost his life, and she her power, through their political intrigues. In addition to Isabella, Alice Perrers, concubine of Edward III (r. 1327–1377), used her influence with the king to create political disturbances, but the king appeared to accede to her wishes in most instances. The same applied to Katherine Swynford, concubine and later third wife of John of Gaunt, third son of Edward III. She was influential with Gaunt through his first two marriages as his concubine, eventually becoming his wife.

Offspring of Concubines

In addition to these women are many who aligned themselves to Henry I of England (r. 1100–1135). Henry's illegitimate offspring numbered between twenty-four and twenty-six. Even without his two legitimate offspring, Henry fathered more children than any other English king. Unfortunately, the chroniclers omitted the names of most of the women who became his concubines, with only six names gleaned from contemporary documents, but these six women gave birth to fourteen of the more than twenty attributed to his concubinal relationships. Two of the most prolific women were Nesta, daughter of prince Rhys ap Tewdwr of South Wales, and Sybil Corbet, daughter of Robert Corbet, a minor Norman baron.

Nesta maintained successful relationships with two husbands and three lovers, not always discriminating between these liaisons. The result of these multiple relations was twelve, possibly thirteen children, all who survived infancy, with each one, sons and daughters, prospering in marriages, wealth, and conquest throughout the twelfth century and beyond. This amounted to active sexual and child-bearing years for Nesta between ages fifteen and forty-five, a thirty year period (c. 1090–1120). Sybil Corbet, on the other hand, had relations with only two men, Henry and her husband, Herbert fitz Herbert. Yet her relationship with these two men appeared as self-directed as Nesta's. She bore eight children, five to Henry and three to Herbert (c. 1105–1135). Sybil's husband replaced his father as Chamberlain, thereby giving her access to the royal circle, in constant contact with both the king and his respective wives. Her children received great honors, titles, and property; one illegitimate daughter was given in marriage to the king of Scotland. Neither Nesta nor Sybil suffered ecclesiastical or legal sanctions, nor did their husbands for accepting wives who engaged in concubinal relationships. Other women known to have illicit connections with Henry were Edith d'Oilly, wife of Robert constable of Oxford. Edith gave birth to two children from each man, gave to the Church, and established her children in successful political and social marriages. The Church willingly embraced Edith and her gifts, ignoring her concubinage to Henry in the face of her generosity.

Ansfride, Henry's first known concubine (c. 1084), bore three children to Henry, one while she was married to another man, and the other two during her widowhood. The Church accorded her full dignity "with a celebrated interment by the Abingdon brothers" in a "cloister before the host of the church" at Abingdon (c. 1118–1120). Grace de Tracy had one son with Henry I whose noble legacy extended to Grace's grandson, a king's knight, who was one of the men responsible for murdering Thomas Becket at Canterbury (1170). Henry's last known concubine was Isabella of Beaumont, youngest daughter of the previously mentioned Isabella of Vermandois, who had a daughter with Henry, his last known illegitimate child (c. 1128). This child was born after Henry's second marriage when he was sixty to Isabella's nineteen years. Isabella remained in high political favor as the wife of Gilbert de Clare and mother of the famous knight "Strongbow" who received honors under Henry II.

There appeared to be no negative effects for concubinage for these and many other women of this period nor for their respective husbands or children. Stories of the successful careers of their numerous children testify to this effect, though unfortunately the chroniclers, medieval men of the Church, failed to enumerate full accounts of the women. When they did record the lives of women in extramarital relationships, it was usually with the intent to condemn the sexual freedoms that had become common during this period. But not to be overlooked is the significant factor emphasizing the changes in concubinage by examining the legal situation of the children.

Legitimization of children varied over time. For example during early twelfth century England,

Henry I merely recognized his illegitimate offspring in documents either giving them the "surname" fitz Roi, or fitz Henry, signifying his paternity. In some cases he would go further, as in the situation of Robert, later earl of Gloucester. Henry continually improved his recognition of this son by giving him the surname fitz Roi, then eventually calling him his most loved son. But this was only a favored filial position that never legitimized him in any statutes. It was not until later, during the High Middle Ages, that legitimization would take place. John of Gaunt legitimized his bastard children by his concubine (later third wife) Katherine Swynford long after the death of his second wife, but these children were still prevented from inheriting the throne of England. Yet from these descendents of Katherine Swynford and John of Gaunt the Tudor line emerged. By the sixteenth century, Henry VIII went through Parliamentary procedure to legitimize or bastardize his children, depending on his marital status.

By the later Middle Ages, the Church's message began to make an impression on the laity, leading to eventual changes in the sexual practices of Christendom. Gradually, concubinage and concubines were relegated to the backdrop of society, neither automatically enriching women's positions nor those of their illegitimate children.

GWENN MEREDITH

References and Further Reading

- Bennett, Judith M. "Writing Fornication: Medieval Leyr-wite and its Historians," in Transactions of the Royal Historical Society 13 (2003). 131–162.
- Brucker, Gene. Giovanni and Lusanna: Love and Marriage in Renaissance Florence. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2004.
- Brundage, James A. Law, Sex, and Christian Society in Medieval Europe. Chicago and London: The University of Chicago Press, 1987.
- Lansing, Carol. The Florentine Magnates: Lineage and Faction in a Medieval Commune. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1991.
- . "Concubines, Lovers, Prostitutes: Infamy and Female Identity in Medieval Bologna," in Beyond Florence: The Contours of Medieval and Early Modern Italy, edited by Paula Findlen, Michelle M. Fontaine, and Duane J. Osheim. Palo Alto, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 2003, pp. 85–100, 256–258.
- McNamara, Jo Ann. "Women and Power Through the Family Revisited", in Gendering the Master Narrative: Women and Power in the Middle Ages, edited by Mary C. Erler and Maryanne Kowaleski. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2003, pp. 17–30.
- Meredith, Gwenn. "Henry I's Concubines," in Essays in Medieval Studies, Proceedings of the Illinois Medieval Association, Vol. 19, edited by C. Stephen Jaeger and Allen J. Frantzen. Morgantown, W.V.: West Virginia University Press for the Illinois Medieval Association, 2002.

Rollo-Koster, Joëlle. "From Prostitutes to Brides of Christ: The Avignonese Repenties in the Late Middle Ages," in Journal of Medieval and Early Modern Studies 32, 1 (Winter 2002): 109–144.

Rosenthal, Margaret. The Honest Courtesan. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press, 1992.

See also Celibacy: Clerical and Priests' Concubines; Sexuality: Extramarital

CONDUCT LITERATURE

Literature imparting counsel about the conduct of life has a long history in Western culture. From antiquity, Greek poets and philosophers often offered advice on the household, the family, and social behavior within mythic, scientific, historical, or theoretical writings. Roman authors continued to impart instructions on marriage, the family, education, youth, adolescence, and old age, and moral, economic, and political life in a range of genres, including treatises, letters, and fables. Some works, such as those of Ovid, offered advice with a dose of irony. Although it is impossible to generalize about such a vast corpus, conduct-of-life books tended to advise restraint in self-governance, savvy management of emotions and passions, care of the soul as well as the body. Such didactic texts offer explicit or implicit views on sexuality and gender roles and, consequently, provide a rich field of investigation for historians of women and gender.

Didactic Works in Latin

Medieval moralists adapted many of the precepts devised in antiquity to Christian teachings and to the realities of contemporary social life. Classical authors continued to be copied in Latin and adapted throughout the Middle Ages. Numerous original works on social, moral, and spiritual life were also composed in Latin. One popular text, originating in the early Christian era, was the Distichs of Cato, a Latin collection of short rhyming couplets with moral sentences; it was widely used in schools throughout the Middle Ages, in Latin and vernacular editions. Christian morality, with its strictures on sexual behavior, frequently conflicted with pagan views, for example, with Ovid's cynical portrayal of love as predatory aggression disguised as artful seduction. The Bible, the lives of Saints, and the writings of the Church fathers became increasingly important sources for didactic literature. Beginning in the twelfth century, clerics began to translate and adapt classical authors into the vernacular and to compose original moral treatises in medieval Occitan, French, German, English, Italian, Spanish, and Portuguese.

Terminology and Genre

The genre of the "medieval conduct book" is difficult to pinpoint with precision. The terms conduct books (or literature) and courtesy books (or literature) are often used interchangeably in medieval scholarship to designate texts offering counsel to readers of either gender about social behavior. Some scholars distinguish between courtesy literature, which advises specifically about behavior and manners at court and in elite society (and tends to address men), and conduct literature, often addressed to women, which advises compliance within more confined spheres. Others employ "conduct literature" as a broad term encompassing many kinds of texts that attempt to systematize social behavior. Precepts about sociability and comportment are conveyed within a very broad array of medieval texts, some of which may be concerned primarily with practical, moral, and spiritual affairs. All such instructional texts fall within the broad domain of medieval didactic literature, which includes forms as diverse as rules for religious orders, treatises on table manners and carving, sermons, estates literature, exempla, bestiaries, fables, allegories and arts of love, dialogues, devotional manuals, mirrors for princes, and books on hunting, gardening, and housekeeping. This essay refers to selected key works and focuses on those addressed to women or written by women.

Early Didactic Literature

The earliest medieval books regulating conduct were composed for men and women in religious orders. The first books of lay instruction were written for royal and noble courts; princes and ladies were usually addressed in discrete sections or separate volumes. Pious precepts, moral teachings, and traditional views of social relations that upheld the feudal hierarchy tended to characterize the earliest vernacular works. As paper manuscripts replaced parchment, book production extended to the growing middle classes of artisans, merchants, and civil administrators for whom ownership of conduct books could be a means of social advancement. Later medieval books continue to espouse conservative views of family and marriage, but also often describe women's important contributions to household economies and their role as social agents.

Medieval Conduct Books for Women

A number of medieval conduct books are addressed in part or in their entirety to women, and a few were written by women authors. The eighth-century Frankish noblewoman Dhuoda wrote a Latin handbook for her son, William, who was separated from his mother as a boy. As she advises her son on piety and family honor, she reveals the strong role that literate women could play in shaping their children's education. Among the earliest lay works for women is the Occitan Ensenhamen of Garin lo Brun (late twelfth century), allegedly written at the behest of a high-born lady, which blends practical advice on dress with cautionary remarks on love. The Livre des Manières of Etienne de Fougères (late twelfth century), a poem about social estates or statuses, includes advice for clerks, knights, and serfs, as well as for all women, the fourth estate, who are categorized by their degree of virtue. St. Louis, King Louis IX, wrote a letter of instruction for his daughter, as well as one for his son; both espoused piety and religious duty, but Isabelle's sphere of action is more restricted than that of Philippe, destined to rule. The figure of a parent offering advice to a child or children remained popular as a frame for conduct books throughout the Middle Ages; it was often probably a fictional device.

Conduct books are generally considered to participate in the construction of social status and gender roles. In separate books for noblemen and ladies by the Catalan or Gascon poet Amanieu de Sescàs (c. 1290s), both sexes are enjoined to practice "courtly" behavior. Yet some texts seem to encourage critical analysis of or even debate about that process. Robert de Blois's Chastoiement des dames (mid-thirteenth century), written as a companion to his Enseignement des Princes, was compiled within a courtly romance, Beudous, in which a mother offers Robert's instructions to her sons. The mother's lessons include Floris et Lyriopé, a tale featuring a knight who cross-dresses to be near his beloved lady—a fascinating exemplum that calls into question the assimilation of sex and gender roles thought to be natural.

Another intriguing pair of works addressed to noblemen and noblewomen are the thirteenth-century German lyric poems Der Winsbecke and Die Winsbeckin, which are compiled together in the same lavish manuscript, the Codex Manesse. It has been noted by Rasmussen that the witty dialogue between mother and daughter in the Winsbeckin contrasts with the sermon-like speech of father to son in the Winsbecke, thus bringing a spirit of debate into the dissemination of moral advice.

Thirteenth and early fourteenth-century didactic works were often in verse; prose was the preferred form for later medieval treatises. One of the most substantial manuals for women is Francesco da Barberino's Reggimento et costumi di donna (1308–1320), composed of twenty lengthy sections that mix verse and prose. Written ostensibly for a Florentine lady who asks the author to offer advice to women, as he previously had to men, the book emphasizes the importance of virginity, patience, self-control, temperance, discernment, self-restraint, and a good reputation—all with the aim of creating a companionable wife, upon whose virtue a happy couple depends.

Works for Women after c. 1350

The earliest extant work of instruction for lay women in English, What the Good Wife Taught Her Daughter (mid-fourteenth century), promoted values associated with the developing urban mercantile class. Written in the voice of a mother imparting instructions to her daughter, the book advises girls to attend church regularly, work diligently, and comport themselves respectably within the confines of the home. Riddy has suggested that Good Wife's author may have been a cleric who wrote not only for young women but also for adult women who supervised girls as servants and apprentices in urban bourgeois households.

As later medieval conduct books were transmitted in paper manuscripts and early printed editions, they reached audiences beyond their original intended readers. Geoffroy, Chevalier de la Tour Landry, a minor provincial knight from Anjou, wrote his book (1371–1372) for the instruction of his daughters, whom he described as "young and lacking reason" and whom he wished to protect against the kind of irresponsible men he had known in his youth. The author combines Biblical exempla of virtuous and wicked women with anecdotes from his personal experience to counsel his daughters about piety, chastity, modest demeanor and dress, sober comportment, and speech. His colorful tales sometimes portray crude behaviors, and the punishments meted out to women who transgress are often cruel. The Chevalier's occasionally ribald or grotesque tales, his insistence on female honor, his simultaneous espousal of conservative dress and acknowledgement of fashion's appeal, create an intriguing text that evidently appealed to new audiences. There are twenty-one extant French manuscripts, including paper copies, as well as English and German translations. Caxton published a Middle English version, The Book of the

Knight of the Tower, one of the earliest printed books. Der Ritter vom Turm, translated by Marquard vom Stein, is accompanied by woodprints portraying poignant, occasionally violent scenes of family life that are sometimes attributed to early Dürer.

In the Ménagier de Paris (c. 1385), an elderly husband offers advice to his young bride, an orphan whom he married at the age of fifteen. This vast compendium not only contains numerous moral exempla illustrating wifely obedience and chastity, including the tale of Griselda and the story of Prudence and Melibee. It also includes treatises on gardening and hawking and one of the earliest cookbooks, with hundreds of recipes. The Ménagier's book attests to woman's central role in the household and to the growing importance of books as instruments of domestic management and social advancement in urban bourgeois settings.

Christine de Pizan (c. 1364–1430) composed numerous works of moral instruction and political guidance for members of the courts of King Charles VI and the Dukes of Burgundy. She penned Enseignements [teachings] for her son and moral proverbs, both in verse. Le Livre des Trois Vertus (The Book of Three Virtues) was composed for young Margaret of Burgundy, who was only eleven when she married the dauphin, Louis de Guyenne. Christine's book is the first female-authored conduct book for lay women, and one of the first books to offer specific counsel to women of each social class (the princess, ladies at court, ladies on manors, religious women, wives of merchants and townspeople, poor women, and prostitutes). The book is sometimes compiled in manuscripts with the Cité des Dames (City of Ladies), Christine's eloquent defense of women against misogynistic slander, which offers numerous examples of virtuous women throughout history. Also known as the Trésor de la Cité des Dames (Treasury of the City of Ladies), the Livre des Trois Vertus was intended as a practical handbook to provide women with the moral instruction and social skills that would enable them to survive as honorable women within communities still pervaded by antifeminist prejudices. The Cité des Dames and Trois Vertus are key texts for the study of representations of female virtue and piety, women's authority and agency as well as women's complex social, moral, economic, social, and political roles. Christine's works were transmitted in lavishly illustrated manuscripts for elite readers, as well as in more modest paper manuscripts, and some were among the first printed books. Her precepts evidently reached a great number of readers; Trois Vertus was translated into Portuguese. It also inspired an instructional manual written in 1504 by Anne of Beaujeu, daughter of Louis XI, for her daughter, Suzanne de Bourbon. Christine's didactic works can be seen as the continuation of a long classical and medieval tradition and as the bridge to the genre's continued popularity in the Renaissance.

Although conduct books and other forms of didactic literature were enormously popular throughout the Middle Ages, they have received until recently less attention from modern scholars than medieval epic and lyric poetry and verse and prose romance—genres with greater aesthetic appeal. The sociologist Norbert Elias argued that the “civilizing process” began in earnest with the publication of Renaissance courtesy texts, but medieval scholars have demonstrated that the process was well underway in medieval didactic literature. The French scholar Alain Montandon has embarked on a collaborative pan-European project to investigate the vast corpus of manuals of “savoir-faire,” beginning with the Middle Ages, and there are numerous recent studies and editions of individual texts. Although their representations must be read as prescriptions of social ideals rather than as descriptions of social realities, medieval conduct books offer valuable insights into the construction of gender roles and into medieval views on masculinity, femininity, sexuality, and the family. Of evident value for social historians, these books have also attracted renewed attention from literary critics, who stress the complexities, ambiguities, and contradictions that subtend many of these apparently orthodox texts.

ROBERTA L. KRUEGER

References and Further Reading

- Anne de France. Les Enseignements d'Anne de France, Duchesse de Bourbonnais et d'Auvergne à sa fille Susanne de Bourbon, edited by A. M. Chazaud. Moulins: C. Desrosiers, 1878. Repr. Marseilles: Lafitte, 1978.
- Ashley, Kathleen A. and Robert L. A. Clark, eds. Medieval Conduct. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 2001.
- Barberino, Francesco da. Del Reggimento e Costumi di Donna, edited by Giuseppe Sansone. Torino: Loescher/Chiantore, 1957. 2nd ed. Roma: Zauli, 1995.
- Bornstein, Diane. The Lady in the Tower: Medieval Courtesy Literature for Women. Hamden, Conn.: The Shoe-string Press, 1983.
- Cato. The Distichs of Cato: A Famous Medieval Textbook. Ed. and trans. Wayland Johnson Chase. University of Wisconsin Studies in the Social Sciences and History 7. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1922.
- Christine de Pizan. The Treasure of the City of Ladies or the Book of the Three Virtues. translated by Sarah Lawson. New York: Penguin Books, 1985.
- . Le Livre des Trois Vertus, edited by Charity Cannon Willard and Eric Hicks. Paris: Champion, 1989.
- De Gendt, Anne Marie. L'Art d'Eduquer les nobles damoiselles: le 'Livre du chevalier de la Tour Landry.' Paris: Champion, 2003.

- Dhuoda. Handbook for William: A Carolingian Woman's Counsel for Her Son, edited by Carol Neel. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1991.
- Elias, Norbert. The Civilizing Process. translated by Edmund Jephcott. New York: Urizen Books, 1978.
- Etienne de Fougères. Le Livre des manières, edited by R. Anthony Lodge. Geneva: Droz, 1979.
- Garin lo Brun. L'Ensegnamen alla dama, edited and translated by Laura Regina Bruno. Roma: Archivio Guido Izzi, 1996.
- The Good Wife Taught Her Daughter. The Good Wyfe Wold a Pylgremage. The Thewis of Gud Women*, edited by Tauno F. Mustanoja. Helsinki: Soumalaisen Kirjallisuuden Seuran, 1948.
- Hentsch, Alice A. De la littérature didactique du moyen âge s'adressant spécialement aux femmes. Cahors: A Coueslant, 1903. Geneva: Slatkine Reprints, 1975.
- Johnston, Mark. "Gender as Conduct in the Courtesy Guides for Aristocratic Boys and Girls of Amanieu de Sescàs." Essays in Medieval Studies 20 (2003): 75–84.
- Le Ménagier de Paris*, edited by Georgina E. Brereton and Janet M. Ferrier. translated by Karin Ueltschi. Lettres Gothiques. Paris: Livre de poche, 1994.
- Montandon, Alain. Pour une histoire des traités de savoir-vivre en Europe. Clermont-Ferrand: Association des publications de la Faculté des lettres et sciences humaines de Clermont-Ferrand, 1994.
- . Bibliographie des traités de savoir-vivre en Europe du moyen âge à nos jours. Vol. 1: France-Angleterre-Allemagne, edited by A. Montandon. Clermont-Ferrand: Association des Publications de la Faculté des Lettres et Sciences Humaines de Clermont-Ferrand, 1995.
- Nicholls, Jonathan. The Matter of Courtesy. Medieval Courtesy Books and the Gawain Poet. Woodbridge: Suffolk: D. S. Brewer, 1985.
- Rasmussen, Anne-Marie. "Fathers to Think Back Through: The Middle High German Mother-Daughter and Father-Son Advice Poems Known as Die Winsbeckin and Der Winsbecke." In Ashley and Clark, Medieval Conduct, pp. 106–134.
- Riddy, Felicity. "Mother Knows Best: Reading Social Change in a Courtesy Text." Speculum: A Journal of Medieval Studies 71 (1996): 66–86.
- Robert de Blois. Robert de Blois: son œuvre didactique et narrative. Etude linguistique et littéraire suivie d'une édition critique avec commentaire et glossaire de 'L'Enseignement des Princes' et du 'Chastoiement des dames', edited by John Howard Fox. Paris: Nizet, 1950.
- Roussel, Claude. "Le Legs de la Rose: modèles et préceptes de la sociabilité médiévale." In Pour une histoire des traités de savoir-vivre en Europe, edited by A. Montandon. Clermont-Ferrand: Association des Publications de la Faculté des Lettres et Sciences Humaines de Clermont-Ferrand, 1994, pp. 1–90.
- La Tour Landry, Geoffrey de. The Book of the Knight of the Tower. Trans. William Caxton, edited by M.Y. Offord. New York: Oxford University Press, 1971.
- . Le Livre du Chevalier de la Tour Landry pour l'Enseignement de ses filles, edited by Anatole de Montaiglon. Paris: P. Jannet, 1854. Reprint Millwood, N.Y.: Krauss Reprint, 1982.
- Winsbeckische Gedichte nebst Tirol und Fridebrant*, edited by Albert Leitzmann. Revised by Ingo Reiffenstein. 3d ed. Altdutsche Textbibliothek, vol. 9. Tübingen, Germany: Niemeyer, 1962.

See also Anne of Beaujeu; Book Ownership; Christine de Pizan; Defenses of Women; Dhuoda; Education, Lay; Femininity and Masculinity; Gender Ideologies; Griselda; Misogyny; Mothers as Teachers; Ovid: Medieval Reception of; Social Status

CONFESSORS AND SPIRITUAL ADVISORS

See Spiritual Care

CONFRATERNITIES

Confraternities (sometimes known as religious guilds or fraternities) were religious associations founded and administered by lay people with the support of local clergy, including bishops, priests, and members of the mendicant orders (Dominicans and Franciscans). They developed in cities and in the countryside across western Europe, and appeared as early as the tenth century in some places. As institutions, confraternities were flexible and long lasting; while much confraternity activity peaked in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, many survived the Catholic Reform movement of the sixteenth century, adapting to suit new social and religious realities. Confraternities ranged in size from small to very large; some were formed around individual parishes, while others drew members from across large cities.

Lay people in their confraternities furthered their own salvation by engaging in devotional, charitable, or penitential pious activities. Members of devotional confraternities frequently gathered to sing hymns, while charitable groups gave alms in the form of food, wine, and money to the poor, sick, and members of religious orders. Those who joined penitential confraternities often took part in rituals of self-flagellation as penance for sin. Despite their differences, all confraternities shared a few fundamental similarities: membership was voluntary, members' activities were determined by a set of written rules or statutes, and the governors of the associations were lay men. As well, all groups shared common activities, including regular religious services in which they prayed and listened to sermons together. In addition to their religious functions, confraternities throughout Europe also had social and political goals. Members saw themselves as kin and assisted each other during times of personal crisis, such as sickness or the death of a family member. The associations also played a role in the public life of their communities, including participation in attempts to pacify warring civic factions, and sponsorship of pageants designed to emphasize the confraternity's role within the community. The records left by confraternities are largely unpublished, and include membership or matriculation lists, statutes, records of property transfer, last wills or testaments, and minutes of meetings. These records provide valuable information about the complex nature of medieval religious culture.

Women played a role within many confraternities during the Middle Ages. They were usually eligible to join confraternities, especially those with a charitable and devotional focus. Confraternal statutes made provisions for them, noting, as in the 1262 statutes of the Congregation of the Virgin in the Italian city of Arezzo, that since there was no distinction between the souls of men and women before God, women could enter the company and engage in the same devotional activities as their male counterparts, thus sharing equally with men in the spiritual benefits of membership. Despite these inclusive statements, confraternal statutes also stipulated that men, not women, were eligible to serve as officials of the associations. This restriction reflected a broader limitation on women in medieval society: they were barred from active participation in the public realm. Confraternal offices were part of that realm, and thus were closed to women. Other restrictions on women's activities within confraternities reflected social consensus about their physical and emotional weakness. For instance, women who wished to join penitential companies that practiced self-flagellation needed permission from a male relative to do so. Once they became members, women were barred from flagellating themselves.

Scholarship on women in confraternities is in its infancy. Interest in the subject has arisen from the newly emerging field of confraternity studies as well as studies of medieval women's religiosity. As a result of this interest, scholars have examined confraternity records for examples of female members, with notable results. Examples of female participation in confraternities include the more than 1,700 women who joined the confraternity of the Misericordia Maggiore in the Italian city of Bergamo between the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. As a result of these discoveries, scholars have debated the significance of women's membership in the associations. Some have argued that high levels of female participation in confraternities represented equally high levels of female influence in the associations. On the other hand, Giovanna Casagrande has posited a distinction between women's presence in confraternities and their real worth to the organizations. She argues that although women may have had their names recorded in confraternal matriculation lists, female members did not normally participate fully in the activities of the institutions. She also argues that rather than presenting women with an opportunity to escape the confines of secular society, confraternities reflected the restrictions women encountered in the outside world. Related studies have shown that women's participation in confraternities waned over time, with highest participation in the thirteenth century, followed by falling levels of participation by the end of the fourteenth century.

But what did medieval women themselves think about confraternities? To find the answer, we examine sources such as testaments, which reveal that confraternities and religious guilds remained significant to women in the Middle Ages, even though female members occupied a lesser role within the associations as time passed. During the fourteenth century, women continued to name confraternities as recipients of their testamentary bequests. Female testators clearly believed that the institutions would provide them with spiritual assistance, even if they were unable to participate fully in the public life of confraternities. Recent work on religious guilds in late medieval England also suggests that the significance of women's participation in these groups should not be discounted. For instance, all-female guilds created to maintain the lights in parish churches were more informally constituted than those groups dominated by men, but both male and female guilds of this type took on similar responsibilities. Rather than lamenting women's lack of official influence in confraternities, then, scholars in the future may redefine participation, looking at ways in which women employed unofficial channels to work within confraternities. Another direction for future research might include a synthesis of women's roles in confraternities throughout western Europe. Studies to date have been confined to individual places. A broader study which synthesizes information from many locales could emphasize continuities as well as discontinuities in women's experience within these associations.

ROISIN COSSAR

References and Further Reading

- Banker, James. Death in the Community: Memorialization and Confraternities in an Italian Commune in the Late Middle Ages. Athens, Ga.: University of Georgia Press, 1988.
- Brolis, Maria Teresa. "A Thousand and More Women: the Register of Women for the Confraternity of Misericordia Maggiore in Bergamo, 1265–1339." Catholic Historical Review. 88, 2 (2002): pp. 230–246.
- Casagrande, Giovanna. "Confraternities and Lay Female Religiosity in Late Medieval and Renaissance Umbria." In The Politics of Ritual Kinship, edited by Nicholas Terpstra. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000, pp. 48–66.

CONFRATERNITIES

Cossar, Roisin. "‘A Good Woman’: Gender Roles and Female Religious Identity in Late Medieval Bergamo." The Memoirs of the American Academy in Rome. 46 (2001): 119–132.

Meersseman, Giles Gerard. Ordo Fraternalitatis: Confraternite e Pietà dei Laici nel Medioevo. Rome: Herder Editrice, 1977.

Peters, Christine. Patterns of Piety: Women, Gender and Religion in Late Medieval and Reformation England. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2003.

See also Almsgiving and Charity; Devotional Practices; Lay Piety; Parishes; Records, Ecclesiastical; Rosary; Spirituality, Christian; Wills

CONJUGAL DEBT

Conjugal debt was a doctrine of medieval theology, enforceable under canon law, that a married person possessed a tightly correlated set of rights and duties to claim sexual relations from his or her marital partner. The idea of the conjugal debt takes its origin in medieval reflection on the teaching of St. Paul that "the wife has not authority over her body, but the husband; the husband likewise has not authority over his body, but the wife. Do not deprive each other, except...by consent, for a time, that you may give yourself to prayer" (1 Corinthians 7: 4–5).

Patristic authors as early as St. Augustine (354–430) made the conjugal debt a feature of their theology when describing the obligation parties were under to satisfy the sexual demands of the other party. St. Augustine was inclined to stress the onerous nature of the conjugal debt, as in his letter to Ecdicia, a Roman noblewoman who, motivated by ascetism, had broken off sexual relations with her spouse. St. Augustine insisted that she was obliged to meet her husband's demands, but assured her that if she honored St. Paul's teaching it would count as a great good on her behalf before the heavenly court.

The canonistic writers of the High Middle Ages transformed this moral admonition into legally enforceable rights derived from the natural structure of marriage. The twelfth-century canonist Gratian (c. 1140) explored the limits of the Pauline verse that taught that married persons might only deprive one another of sexual relations through mutual consent and concluded that where both parties freely consented they might renounce their marital rights. Gratian's use of the language of rights to describe these steps would color subsequent ecclesiastical descriptions of marital relations until nearly our own day.

The canonists who followed in Gratian's steps built a large lattice-work of laws to protect the conjugal debt/right in the context of medieval life. The problem of the spouse who contracted leprosy tested the limits of these legal protections. Leprosy was one of the most feared diseases of the Middle Ages. Lepers, who had no hope of being cured, were ostracized and forced to move to the margins of medieval society. They were required to reside in leprosaria or in encampments on the edges of towns and villages. The uniform policy of the Middle Ages toward lepers was one of quarantine and isolation.

Marriage—and its accompanying conjugal debt—posed a great problem for this policy. Marriage, after all, was sacramental, unbreakable, and conferred inalienable and natural conjugal rights on both parties. The canonists resolved this seeming conflict in favor of the ill spouse. The healthy spouse might not be compelled to have sexual relations with the ill partner, but was still obligated to live close by and to tend to the ill partner's needs. The ill party, the canonists reasoned, had done nothing wrong, and so could not be deprived of her or his conjugal rights, now broadly understood to embrace material and moral assistance in the face of debilitating and deadly illness.

Feudal overlords were also expected to respect the conjugal rights of those subject to their authority. The canonists posed the question: Where a feudal lord demanded that a serf accompany him on military campaign and the serf's wife requested the conjugal debt, which obligation was to receive priority? The canonists sought out compromises that reflected the origin of the conjugal debt in natural law but that also did not entirely deprive the overlord of his rights within the feudal order. On the whole, the canonists were more sympathetic with the situation of the serf than one might have expected, recognizing that wives ordinarily had the greater claim except in emergencies, as when the lord was under direct attack by enemies and in danger of being defeated.

The use of rights language to describe the obligations parties owed one another was problematic in other contexts, however. Thus canonists were required to consider the question of the forcible consummation of marriage. At least a few canonists were willing to countenance the forceful use of "self-help" in situations where the other spouse was reluctant to go along, because of the rights that were at stake. The canonists here engaged in artificial and formalistic reasoning, grounding their conclusion on the formal equality that each party was understood to enjoy with respect to the conjugal debt.

The language of conjugal debts and conjugal rights has persisted to our own day. Within ecclesiastical law, one still finds regular references to rights within marriage. And the broader secular law, borrowing from canonistic sources, has made the language of conjugal debts and conjugal rights a feature of legal reasoning.

CHARLES J. REID, JR.

References and Further Reading

- Elliott, Dyan. "Bernardino of Siena Versus the Marriage Debt." In Desire and Discipline: Sex and Sexuality in the Premodern West, edited by Jacqueline Murray and Konrad Eisenbichler. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1996, pp. 168–200.
- Makowski, Elizabeth M. "The Conjugal Debt and Medieval Canon Law," Journal of Medieval History 3 (1977): 99–114.
- Reid, Charles J. Jr., Power Over the Body, Equality in the Family: Rights and Domestic Relations in Medieval Canon Law. Grand Rapids, Mich.: Eerdmans, 2004.

See also Law, Canon; Marriage, Christian; Sexuality, Regulation of; Sexuality: Sex in Marriage

CONSTANCE

The Constance story is known to modern audiences primarily through Chaucer's "The Man of Law's Tale" in his Canterbury Tales, which has its sources in Nicholas Trivet's Anglo-Norman Chronique and Book II of John Gower's Confessio Amantis. All three versions tell how Constance (Custance), daughter of the Roman emperor, travels to marry the sultan of Syria, only to witness the slaughter of her bridegroom and the newly converted Syrian Christians at the hands of a conspiracy led by the sultan's mother. Constance is set adrift at sea for several years until she wrecks on the shore of Northumbria, where she is accused by a spurned suitor of murdering the wife of the constable who rescued her. Triumphantly acquitted through divine intervention, the beleaguered Constance marries the king of Northumbria and bears his son, but the king's jealous mother accuses her of birthing a changeling and again Constance is set adrift, this time with her child. After several more years Constance finds herself on the shores of Italy and returns to Rome, where she is eventually reunited with both father and husband.

The story participates in a constellation of folkloric motifs, including false accusations of unnatural or monstrous offspring, the heroine set adrift, and the mother-in-law as chief persecutor. It is generally thought to derive from two narrative groups common in folklore: the accused queen and the flight from an incestuous father. Elements from romance and hagiography are manifest in the Constance story as well. Its most widely recognized analog is the Middle English romance Emare; other analogs include the romances Octavian and Valentine and Oursson, and the Flemish play Esmoreit. There are also a number of parallels with Boccaccio's Decameron V, 2 and, possibly, II,7.

Most critics read Constance as a positive example of spiritual steadfastness, often in opposition to the Man of Law's materialism. There is less agreement among scholars as to whether Constance may be considered a figure of feminine strength or passivity. Recent studies have focused on the elision of the incest motif, particularly in Chaucer, whose narrator excoriates those who would speak of such abominations in the introduction to his tale.

ALISON L. GANZE

References and Further Reading

- Archibald, Elizabeth. Incest and the Medieval Imagination. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 2001.
- Black, Nancy B. Medieval Narratives of Accused Queens. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 2003.
- Bryan, W. F. and Germaine Dempster, eds. Sources and Analogues of Chaucer's Canterbury Tales. New York: Humanities Press, 1958.
- Delaney, Sheila. Writing Woman: Women Writers and Women in Literature Medieval to Modern. New York: Schocken Books, 1983.
- Manning, Stephen. "Chaucer's Constance: Pale and Passive." In Chaucerian Problems and Perspectives: Essays Presented to Paul E. Beichner, C. S. C., edited by Edward Vasta and Zacharias P. Thundy. South Bend, Ind.: University of Notre Dame Press, 1979, pp. 13–23.
- Robertson, Elizabeth. "The 'Elvyssh' Power of Constance: Christian Feminism in Geoffrey Chaucer's The Man of Law's Tale." Studies in the Age of Chaucer 23 (2001): 143–180.
- Schlauch, Margaret. Chaucer's Constance and Accused Queens. New York: New York University Press, 1927. Repr. AMS Press, 1973.

See also Chaucer, Geoffrey; Hagiography; Incest; Romance: English

CONSTANCE OF SICILY

Constance (1154–c.1198), queen of Sicily and Holy Roman Empress, was the daughter of King Roger II of Sicily, wife of the German emperor Henry VI, whom she married c. 1186, and mother of Emperor Frederick II, born in 1194. When her nephew William II died in 1189, Constance was left as the only legitimate heir to the kingdom of Sicily. However, her husband's ambition to add Sicily to his domains was temporarily blocked by Pope Clement III's approval of Roger's illegitimate grandson, Tancred Count of Lecce, as king. Constance thus found herself at the center of a scrappy war between her husband and her own kin, even being taken captive by Tancred. Although she was released without condition, her husband's unwillingness to come to a truce with Tancred when Constance was captured may have strained the marriage. When Henry finally prevailed, upon the death of Tancred without an effective heir in 1194, it seems he went to some trouble to minimise Constance's effective power in Sicily. Nevertheless, she appears regularly making grants in her own name, and when Henry died in 1197, Constance ruled as regent for her young son Frederick until her own death in 1198. Dante placed her in the lowest sphere of heaven (Paradiso, Canto III) because she left the monastery to marry but remained a nun at heart.

CONSTANCE OF SICILY

PATRICIA SKINNER

References and Further Reading

- Abulafia, David. Frederick II: a Medieval Emperor. London: Allen Lane, 1988.
- Clementi, Dione. "Some Unnoticed Aspects of the Emperor Henry VI's Conquest of the Norman kingdom of Sicily," Bulletin of the John Rylands Library 36: (1953–1954), 328–359.
- Fröhlich, W. "The Marriage of Henry VI and Constance of Sicily," Anglo-Norman Studies, 15: (1992), 99–116.
- Matthew, Donald. The Norman Kingdom of Sicily. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1992.

See also Italy; Queens and Empresses: the West

CONSUMPTION

The economic definition of consumption is the using up of goods and services, both necessities and luxuries, the definition of which varies with social class and income, and changes over time. In the medieval period, there was a sharp distinction in consumption that hinged on poverty or wealth. Rich courts and townspeople generally had available a higher level of goods, including artwork, spices, dyestuffs, and luxury clothing and ornament, whereas consumption for rural peasants consisted of the rudimentary basics of food, clothing, and shelter, and could vary dramatically between the occasional feast and famine. Early medieval practice and the mentality of the entire era (including the influence of mendicant ethical teachings about wealth) worked to contain material indulgence while still upholding the value of free economic competition. The moral issue of over-consumption in medieval Europe was a subject of societal concern, and excess was condemned by the Church and legislated against by both ecclesiastical law and secular government. Europeans believed that human consumption should be governed by the virtue of temperance. Christianity taught that gluttony and pride were two of the seven deadly sins (luxuria became a prominent sin by the fourteenth century).

Two events in medieval European history transformed the level at which people consumed: the material revolution of the twelfth century that flooded medieval Europe with newly available luxury goods, generating the first European sumptuary laws (Genoa, 1157), and the 1348 pandemic of plague that wiped out between one-third to one-half the population, ultimately revising the social order and redistributing the wealth.

Concern with consumption in Western civilization had existed since pre-Christian Greece, beginning in sixth-century BCE Sparta. Both Greek and Roman society passed legislation against public consumption that covered public display such as excesses in dining, the costumes of gladiators, numbers of flutists at social events, and even ostentatious furniture. Over-consumption was thought to bring disorder to society and even destabilize the established hierarchy. Tertullian was especially vocal among early Christian Church Fathers. Singling out women, he equated make-up and extravagant clothing with worldly sin, a diabolically inspired offense against God's creations. After Constantine's conversion of the Empire to Christianity in 325, ecclesiastical dicta concerning excesses of consumption (from the second Council of Nicaea in 787 to the Council of Constance in 1414–1418), were directed primarily at containing the sartorial display of clergy, however not the laity. Early Carolingian Europe saw little concern with consumption, due to a relative lack of luxury goods. However when the opportunity for indulgence did appear, regulations followed as well. Charlemagne's edict of 808 limited prices allowed for silks and fur.

As medieval European society stabilized, sumptuary laws were passed first in Italy, then France (1229), and Spain (1234). Legislation in the north followed with England (1316) and the lands of the Holy Roman Empire (1304–1350). It was in Italy, however, where the bulk of laws were enacted, over three hundred between 1157 and 1500. Public rites of passage such as weddings, baptisms, and funerals were especially targeted to control the splendor of guests' clothing, number of courses served, types of food and drink, numbers of gifts, and display of candles and silver plate. For funerals, emotional excesses such as wailing, the tearing of hair, or dramatically long pauses during services were banned. Excessive public display was considered a form of social "disorder" that could result in rowdy expressions of dissatisfaction with the government, which was to be avoided at all costs. Laws in northern Europe and in the southern Italic peninsula were issued largely by the edict of royal courts and, therefore, had a conservative agenda that sought to restrict any challenge to the ruling group. In northern Italy, however, the independent city-states (Florence, Venice, Siena, Genoa, and others), passed local legislation that tended to rein in the display of noble power, which allowed a new merchant elite to emerge.

Condemnations evolved from an emphasis on food and consumables to clothing and fashion by the later Middle Ages. Women's clothing, designed as displays of their familial wealth, became increasingly singled out for sumptuary regulation. Marie de Valois, wife of the French podestà in Florence in 1326, famously obtained permission for women there to wear formerly banned yellow and white silk braids in their hair, and in 1436, Christine Corner and other Venetian matrons successfully appealed to the pope to be able to sport "honorably" magnificent clothes. Fifteenth-century Florentine communal statutes concerning all kinds of consumption were collected under the telling rubric "De ornatu mulierum." In late medieval Europe, consumption rose to unprecedented heights among the rich. But laws passed to curb it only seemed to cause its proliferation. The ability to consume luxury goods demonstrated power, and even the Church began to change its attitude toward the ideal of poverty, wealth and consumption coming to be seen as the mark of honor and even an aid to salvation.

CAROLE COLLIER FRICK

References and Further Reading

- Bynum, Caroline W. Holy Feast and Holy Fast: The Religious Significance of Food to Medieval Women. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1987.
- Cipolla, Carlo M. "[The Economic Policies of Governments:] V: The Italian and Iberian Peninsulas," in Postan M. M. and H. J. Habbakuk eds. The Cambridge Economic History of Europe. vol. 3, Economic Organisation and Policies in the Middle Ages, edited by M. M. Postan, E. E. Rich, and Edward Miller. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1963, pp. 397–429.
- De Roover, Raymond. San Bernardino of Siena and Sant'Antonino of Florence. The Two Great Economic Thinkers of the Middle Ages. Boston, 1967.
- Dyer, Christopher. "The Consumer and the Market in the Later Middle Ages," Economic History Review 43 (1989): 305–327.
- Killerby, Catherine K. Sumptuary Law in Italy 1200–1500. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2002.
- Wood, Diana. Medieval Economic Thought. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002.

See also Clothing; Plague; Poverty, Religious; Sanuti, Nicolosa Castellani; Sumptuary Law

CONTRACEPTION

Contraception refers to methods or practices meant to allow heterosexual activity yet avoid production of offspring. The line between contraception (preventing conception from occurring in the first place) and abortion (the termination of a pregnancy that had already begun) was less clear-cut in the Middle Ages than it is now, largely because the conceptus was not really considered a fetus until it "quickened" or was "ensouled" (that is, until the woman perceived the movement of the fetus). Whether the methods and practices used to prevent pregnancy in the Middle Ages were fully effective is less important than evidence of the desire to separate the sex act from reproduction. Three criteria are therefore relevant to understanding medieval contraception: (1) whether there is evidence of the intent to prevent pregnancy and how it was viewed by religion and law; (2) what kinds of contraceptive knowledge were available; and (3) whether contraception was the concern of women only or also of men.

Islamic and Jewish Attitudes

The different religious traditions of medieval Europe had differing attitudes toward contraception and early abortion. In the Islamic world, contraception was permissible, and abortion was tolerated, though physicians were often more uncomfortable with the latter than were religious jurists. Because sexual relations between a male master and a female slave were considered licit (that is, in the eyes of the law they did not make the man adulterous vis-à-vis his wife or wives) yet produced other problems if she conceived (once she had borne him children she could not subsequently be sold), males often had reason to use contraception. Contraceptive methods might also be motivated, for both men and women, out of fear of the dangers of childbirth or to preserve the woman's beauty. Coitus interruptus (the man's withdrawal of his penis prior to ejaculation) was a favored method, though medical texts offer numerous chemical means of contraception. Woman-controlled methods (such as vaginal suppositories, which offered physical, as well as chemical, barriers to the man's semen) outnumber male-controlled methods by about four to one. Muslim jurists debated whether men or women could practice contraception without their partners' consent.

Among Jewish communities, use of a contraceptive sponge was permitted during lactation lest a new pregnancy rob the nursing child of its nourishment. There seems to have been no stigma attached to this practice, and it is referred to openly in rabbinical literature. Coitus interruptus, on the other hand, and other forms of "destruction of the seed" were prohibited.

Christian Attitudes

In Byzantium, Christian orthodox views equated abortion with murder, though some considered contraception more egregious because it killed many potential fetuses rather than just one. Among Latin Christians, views on contraception and abortion were primarily influenced by Saint Augustine of Hippo (d. 430), who had defined offspring as the second of three “goods of marriage” (the others being sexual fidelity and the sacrament that bound the husband and wife to God). Thus, any attempt to thwart the purpose of marriage was condemned. Canon law pronounced that it was more sinful for a man to impede conception when having intercourse with his wife than to engage in adultery with another woman.

In the early Middle Ages, religious writers spoke exclusively of “procuring poisons of sterility” (venena sterilitatis procurare), which has generally been interpreted as use of oral abortifacients; terminology for contraception per se is entirely absent from penitentials prior to the ninth century. In the early twelfth century, theologians and canon lawyers began to speak of “avoidance of offspring” (vitatio prolis), a more general concept that seems to have included such practices as coitus interruptus and anal intercourse.

Contraceptives

Contraceptives and abortifacients were never suppressed from early medieval Latin gynecological texts (which were derived largely from pagan Greek and Roman traditions), and some elements of Muslim attitudes and practices were adopted when Arabic medical writings were translated in the eleventh and twelfth centuries. The Benedictine monk Constantine the African (died before 1098–1099) did not translate a chapter on abortion from an Arabic text he was rendering into Latin, yet he openly supported the use of contraceptives on the belief that regular heterosexual activity was necessary for women’s health, even if pregnancy should sometimes be avoided. This view was adopted by some other Latin medical writers, although, aside from Italian writers, it was rare for them to devote a separate chapter to the subject.

On Constantine’s authority, the anonymous author of a twelfth-century Salernitan text, On the Conditions of Women, listed several contraceptive amulets—substances to be worn around the neck or carried in the hand to prevent pregnancy which, from our modern perspective, could not possibly have had anything more than a placebo effect. Nevertheless, a thesis proposed in the 1990s argued that medieval women had ample knowledge of chemically effective pharmaceutical agents to “provoke the menses” or “expel the fetus,” thereby regularly maintaining control of their fertility. The flaw with this argument is that while certain herbal substances could be used to limit reproduction, not every attempt to provoke the menses was motivated by the desire to contracept, nor was every attempt to expel a fetus done because the child had been unwanted.

“Retained menses” (what we would call amenorrhea) was a major concern in medieval gynecology, and it was recognized that women could not conceive unless they were menstruating regularly. As the twelfth-century medical writer Trota of Salerno put it, emmenagogues (drugs or agents used to bring on or quicken menstruation) were “for provoking the menses because of whose retention the woman is unable to conceive.” And “expelling the fetus” was a frequently necessary obstetrical intervention when the fetus had died in utero and did not emerge spontaneously. In other words, both practices could be motivated by pronatalistic concerns, not the desire to limit fertility.

Trota herself includes neither contraceptives nor abortifacients in her medical writings, and those medical authors who did so usually justified the inclusion on the grounds of preserving the woman’s health. In fact, the widespread modern belief that medieval midwives were all experts in the knowledge of contracepting and aborting has never been documented. The belief may reflect an overly literal reading of the 1496 Dominican witch-hunters’ manual, The Hammer of Witches, which made wild claims that “witch-midwives” regularly inhibited fertility. It is clear that magical practices were indeed associated with the placenta and other products of birth, and curses of sterility or impotence were common elements of witchcraft accusations. Yet midwives’ contraceptive knowledge or practices are never mentioned by medical writers. Rather, it was more common for male writers to focus on prostitutes, whose low fertility was a commonplace, though even here they credited the nature of prostitution (for example, the belief that prostitutes did not experience pleasure in intercourse and therefore did not emit their own “seed”) as much as prostitutes’ own active contraceptive knowledge.

Whether women beyond those trained in the arts of prostitution were generally aware of contraceptive techniques is less clear. Beatrice de Planissoles, a suspected heretic in early fourteenth-century Montailou (southern France), recounts how her male lover, a priest, brought to their trysts a contraceptive amulet which he had her wear when they made love; he was always sure to take it back from her when he left, lest she take another lover. Clearly, control over contraceptive knowledge in this situation lay with the man, who was concerned not only with avoiding pregnancy but also with controlling his partner's sexuality. Coitus interruptus, which Biller suggests may have been the main method of "avoiding offspring" from the thirteenth century, likewise gave the male partner control over contraception.

Christian medical writers became increasingly cautious about how they shared contraceptive knowledge toward the end of the Middle Ages. In Latin gynecological texts contraceptive instructions were sometimes put into cipher; in vernacular gynecological texts addressed to women they were deleted entirely. Even "legitimate" remedies to expel the dead fetus were hedged with warnings that they should not be shared with suspect women. Statements about "womanly arts" of limiting fertility suggest that there existed an "underground" female culture where contraceptive and abortifacient knowledge circulated freely. If so, historians have yet to find adequate evidence to prove it.

MONICA GREEN

References and Further Reading

- Barratt, Alexandra, ed. The Knowing of Woman's Kind in Childing: A Middle English Version of Material Derived from the 'Trotula' and Other Sources. Medieval Women: Texts and Contexts, 4. Turnhout: Brepols, 2001.
- Baumgarten, Elisheva. Mothers and Children: Jewish Family Life in Medieval Europe. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 2004.
- Biller, Peter. The Measure of Multitude: Population in Medieval Thought. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- Boswell, John E. The Kindness of Strangers: The Abandonment of Children in Western Europe from Late Antiquity to the Renaissance. New York: Pantheon Books, 1988.
- Brundage, James A. Law, Sex, and Christian Society in Medieval Europe. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1987.
- Elsackers, Marianne. "Abortion, Poisoning, Magic, and Contraception in Eckhardt's Pactus Legis Salicae." Amsterdamer Beiträge zur älteren Germanistik 57 (2003): 233–267.
- Fournier, Jacques. "Inquisition Records." In Readings in Medieval History. Volume II. The Later Middle Ages, edited by Patrick J. Geary. Peterborough: Broadview Press, 1999, 524–544. Includes the testimony of Beatrice de Planissoles.
- Green, Monica H. "Constantinus Africanus and the Conflict Between Religion and Science." In The Human Embryo: Aristotle and the Arabic and European Traditions, edited by G. R. Dunstan. Exeter: Exeter University Press, 1990, pp. 47–69.
- . review of John Riddle, Eve's Herbs: A History of Contraception and Abortion in the West (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1997). In Bulletin of the History of Medicine 73 (1999): 308–311.
- , ed. and trans. The 'Trotula': A Medieval Compendium of Women's Medicine. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001.
- Green, Monica H. and Linne R. Mooney. "The Sickness of Women." In Sex, Aging, and Death in a Medieval Medical Compendium: Trinity College Cambridge MS R.14.52, Its Text, Language, and Scribe, edited by M. Teresa Tavormina. Medieval and Renaissance Texts and Studies. Tempe, Ariz.: Arizona State University Press, 2005.
- McClanan, Anne. "'Weapons to Probe the Womb': The Material Culture of Abortion and Contraception in the Early Byzantine Period." In The Material Culture of Sex, Procreation, and Marriage in Premodern Europe, edited by Anne L. McClanan and Karen Rosoff Encarnación. New York: Palgrave, 2002, pp. 33–57.
- Musallam, B. F. Sex and Society in Islam: Birth Control Before the Nineteenth Century. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1983.
- Noonan, John T. Contraception: A History of Its Treatment by the Catholic Theologians and Canonists. Enlarged edition. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1986.
- Patlagean, Evelyne. "Birth Control in the Early Byzantine Empire." In Biology of Man in History: Selections from the Annales, économies, sociétés, civilisations. Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins University Press, 1975, pp. 1–22.

See also Abortion; Breastfeeding and Wet-Nursing; Gynecology; Infertility; Menstruation; Penitentials and Pastoral Manuals; Pregnancy and Childbirth: Christian Women; Pregnancy and Childbirth: Jewish Women; Prostitutes; Secrets of Women; Sexuality; Sexuality: Extramarital Sex; Sexuality: Female Same-Sex Relations; Sexuality: Male Same-Sex Relations; Sexuality, Regulation of; Sexuality: Sex in Marriage; Trota of Salerno

CONVERSAE AND CONVERSI

Conversae and conversi are associated with the new monasticism of the central Middle Ages (and up into the modern age). The term's meaning is not consistent. Only in the mid-twelfth century did it come to refer to a second-class religious, a female or male celibate laborer within the religious community. In the late eleventh century, conversae/i were those who entered a monastery ad conversionem, the "converted ones" who entered religious life from some other status. Conversae were often widows or, like conversi, had been married before. Sometimes their entire family entered the religious life. Such "converts" could also be secular priests or canonesses who converted to a life following a religious rule. In late-eleventh century documents from la Sauve Majeure near Bordeaux conversi were distinguished from child-oblates; many of its "converts" were knights converted from a life of violence.

A particular apt example of such a convert was the former knight Pons de Lérás, founder of a southern French hermitage that became a monastery at Silvanès. In the 1130s, Pons “converted,” placed his wife and two children in monastic houses, did public penance, and made restitution to his victims. He soon established a hermitage that had become a Cistercian abbey by the 1170s. Seen from the viewpoint of the eleventh century the former knight Pons was an adult convert to the religious life, and to be referred to as a convert said nothing about status. The same is true of Petronilla of Cheminé, an aristocratic widow chosen by the wandering preacher Robert of Arbrissel to rule as the first abbess of the religious community of Fontevrault. In the “Life of Robert,” written circa 1118 by Baudri of Dol, Petronilla the abbess is referred to as conversa laica. Petronilla was chosen as abbess because of her considerable experience in the secular world. This experience was something that a virgin brought up in a religious house would not have had. Such adult conversion was the norm among the new religious reformers of the twelfth century, and often provided leaders to the community. Indeed many new religious communities forbade entrance by child oblates.

At about the middle of the twelfth century, a second meaning of the terms conversae/i began to emerge within the monastic context. It came to be associated among the Cistercians with entrants from humble backgrounds, often peasants who had held land coming into monastic hands. These conversae/i or lay-sisters and lay-brothers worked with nuns and monks in the fields, and on the new satellite granges associated with the Cistercians. Mid-century charters from houses like Silvanès reveal promises to admit peasants as “fratri” or “sorores,” or conversae/i; some who had come from marginal settlements must have sought the security of monastic life. Although Cistercian rhetoric is full of an ideal of charitable equality among all members of the community, by mid-twelfth century conversae/i are described as working on the granges so that monks and nuns could remain within the ambit of the monastic enclosure. By late in the twelfth century, conversae and conversi appear as dairy-maids and shepherds at the house of nuns at Nonenque. Among the earliest Cistercian texts, moreover, are those on the rights and duties of lay-brothers that appear to date to the mid century, after the earlier moment of primitive equality when all religious members of a community, nuns and conversae, or monks and conversi, had worked together in the fields, at least during the harvest.

Conversae/i soon came to be identified with laborers within the monasteries. This was the accepted meaning of the term in the “Life of the Pons de Lérás,” the knight turned conversus previously mentioned. Writing no earlier than the 1170s about a foundation at Silvanès made 40 years earlier, the author of the Life, who had found Pons’ name identified as conversus among the earliest Silvanès charters, described Pons as having “remained a lay-brother out of humility.” Clearly by the time this author wrote, conversus had come to mean “laborer,” and in the 1188 Cistercian statutes, abbots concurred that knights entering the order could not be conversi. For the thirteenth century as more and more conversi were no longer recruited along with Cistercian land acquisition, numerous conversi rebellions are recorded. Although the terms conversus and conversa were attached most often to laborers, the earlier meaning can also be found in cases in the mid-thirteenth century. Often it was used when widows “converted” and lived as conversae in the vicinity of men’s houses; these were not female servants. It is difficult to estimate the numbers of conversae/i at typical Cistercian or other reform houses. Narrative accounts of conversi in the hundreds probably exaggerate, but abbeys for men may have had nearly double the number of lay-brothers as monks during the twelfth century. Houses of nuns could have lay-brothers attached who took vows directly from the abbess or were deputized from neighboring houses of monks. A house of nuns might have between two or three and a dozen lay-brothers, but no more than one conversa for every three or four nuns.

CONSTANCE H. BERMAN

References and Further Reading

- Aubrun, Michel. La vie de Saint Etienne d’Obazine. Clermont-Ferrand: Institut des études du Massif Central, 1970.
- Berman, Constance H. Medieval Agriculture, the Southern French Countryside, and the Early Cistercians: A Study of Forty-Three Monasteries. Philadelphia: American Philosophical Society, 1986.
- . The Cistercian Evolution: The Invention of a Religious Order in Twelfth-Century Europe. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2000.
- . “Distinguishing between the Humble Peasant Lay Brother and Sister and the Converted Knight in Medieval Southern France” for Lay and Religious edited by Janet Burton and Emilia Jamrozik. Brepols Medieval Church Studies, in press.
- . “Knights and Conversion to the Religious Life in the Central Middle Ages,” for volume in honor of Bernard Bachrach, forthcoming.
- Constable, Giles. The Reformation of the Twelfth Century. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1996.
- Donnelly, James S. The Decline of the Medieval Cistercian Lay-Brotherhood. New York, 1949.
- Kienzle, Beverly M. “The Tract on the Conversion of Pons of Lérás and the True Account of the Beginning of the - Monastery of Silvanès." Cistercian Studies Quarterly 29 (1995): 219–243.

- Lekai, Louis Julius. The Cistercians: Ideals and Reality. Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 1977.
- Leyser, Henrietta. Hermits and the New Monasticism. A Study of Religious Communities in Western Europe, 1000–1150. London: Macmillan, 1984.
- Venarde, Bruce. Robert of Arbrissel. A Medieval Religious Life. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America Press, 2003.

See also Cistercian Order; Fontevrault, Abbey and Order of; Monasticism and Nuns; Servants; Social Status; Work

CONVERSION, RELIGIOUS

In medieval Europe processes of conversion, whether individual or collective changes of religion or religious affiliation, took place in various directions. In the early Middle Ages Germanic gentes (peoples) gave up their traditional cults in favor of Arian or Orthodox Christianity. Former Arians adopted Orthodox Christianity. Christians in Arabic Spain and—in the era of the crusades—in the Frankish Levant passed over to Islam and sometimes to Judaism. Vice versa, Muslims and Jews converted to Christianity. The processes of Christian and Islamic conversion in particular transformed the religious map of Europe until the turn of the millennium.

Changing from one religious practice to another had immediate consequences with regard to women's and men's lives. Questions arose as to whether a convert's former social bonds were broken. Was a Christian whose partner had converted to Islam allowed to remarry? Should a formerly "pagan" man who had turned Christian dismiss his wife in the event that she did not convert as well? Did the baptism of a Jew mean that his or her ties to family and community were cut?

In the long run the conversion of entire societies changed the concepts and structures of marriage, family, and kinship (e.g., the introduction of monogamous, indissoluble marriage as a result of Christianization). Within the frame of a specific theological anthropology images of women and men were propagated that influenced their social position and gender-relations. In Christian society, for instance, a tradition of thinking became dominant that proclaimed the subordination of women to men due to the notion of a female physical, intellectual, and moral frailty that was supposed to result from Eve's Fall.

Between the fourth and the twelfth centuries, Christianity in its orthodox (Catholic) form made its way into Germania, Gaul, Britain, Scandinavia, and large parts of the Slavic world. Thus around 1300, the orthodox Christianization of Europe was essentially finished as far as the formal acceptance of the Christian cult was concerned. The process of conversion in the meaning of an inner reorientation took much longer and lasted in some European regions well into the age of the Reformation.

Women participated in this process of orthodox Christianization in several ways: as addressees of missionaries (monks, priests, bishops, and popes), as converts, as convert-makers, and as missionaries. Their activities spanned the characteristic forms of conversion in early medieval societies. Aiming at converting whole gentes (peoples), Christian missions first of all had to win over the ruler and his great men at the head of the gens. This leading group decided about the acceptance of Christianity and received baptism in a collective act. The conversion of other social strata then followed according to the same collective principle. Usually whole households were baptized along with the pater familias (the head of the house). However, in a family different religious practices might coexist for a while.

Due to the importance of the ruler's conversion medieval narratives provide detailed descriptions of these acts. In this context there are some explicit references to rulers' wives as convert-makers of their husbands. In the sixth century for instance, Gregory of Tours, the historiographer, reported on how the Merovingian King Clovis († 511) had reluctantly agreed to be baptized and had thus initiated the Christianization of the Frankish Kingdom. According to this narrative Clovis's Orthodox wife, Queen Clotilda († 544), had "preached to her husband unceasingly" and managed to have her sons baptized. Though Clotilda's tireless preaching apparently did not directly achieve the king's change of mind, it nevertheless played a significant role in his final decision to be baptized with his leaders. As may be expected, bishops and popes emphatically admonished royal wives to engage in converting their husbands and thus push forward the Christianization of an entire gens.

However, there is comparatively little evidence of the conversion of royal or aristocratic women themselves and even less about women of lower social standing. For example, the Bishop Eucherius of Orléans († 738) was reported to have successfully exhorted a woman to give up "pagan error" and to have acted as godfather of her son. Mothers like this and like Clotilda, who cared for the baptism and the Christian education of their children, created the basis for Christianity to become rooted among coming generations.

Apart from the family as a field of conversion, women actively engaged as missionaries. In the eighth century, a net of Anglo-Saxon women and men who were akin to each other worked on the continent on the initiative of Boniface (672/675–754). When Boniface called his relative Leoba (700/710–780/782) to join him, she left the monastery of Wimborne in Wessex together with several other women, and became abbess of Tauberbischofsheim, the monastic center of Boniface's mission. Far from being confined to the limits of her monastery, Leoba performed episcopal functions by regularly visiting and controlling other monasteries. She worked as a teacher, preacher, and spiritual mentor, offering pastoral care and instructions even to bishops who used to discuss theological and ecclesiastical questions with her. According to Leoba's Life, Boniface appreciated her as his equal partner in the mission.

Due to the collective character of conversion and its initial centering on rulers medieval, historiography does not offer a complete picture of women's roles in this process. However, by combining these narratives with other material such as saints' lives, reports on miracles, letters, sermons, and archaeological findings, we may conclude that women in the contexts of family, monastery, and mission decisively contributed to the Christianizing of Europe.

CORDULA NOLTE

References and Further Reading

- Geary, Patrick. "Die Bedeutung von Religion und Bekehrung im frühen Mittelalter." In Die Franken und die Alemannen bis zur "Schlacht bei Zülpich" (496/97), edited by Dieter Geuenich (Ergänzungsbände zum Reallexikon der Germanischen Altertumskunde 19). Berlin/New York: de Gruyter, 1998, pp. 438–450.
- [Gregory of Tours, Ten Books of Histories] Gregorii episcopi Turonensis libri historiarum X, edited by B. Krusch and W. Levison. 2nd ed. Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Scriptorum rerum Merovingicarum 1.1, Hannover Imaensis Bibliopol: 1951<sup>2</sup>.
- [English Translation of the "Ten Books of Histories"] Gregory of Tours: The History of the Franks. translated by Lewis Thorpe, Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1974.
- [Gregory the Great, Letters] S. Gregorii Magni Registrum epistularum, edited by Dag Norberg. Corpus Christianorum. Series Latina 140 and 140A, Turnhout, 1987.
- Kruger, Steven F. "Conversion and Medieval Sexual, Religious, and Racial Categories." In Constructing Medieval Sexuality, edited by Karma Lochrie, Peggy McCracken, and James A. Schultz (Medieval Cultures 11). Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1997, pp. 158–179.
- [Life of Bishop Eucherius of Orléans] Vita Eucherii episcopi Aurelianensis. edited by W. Levison. Monumenta Germaniae historica, Scriptorum rerum Merovingicarum 7, Hannover and Leipzig 1920, pp. 46–53.
- Lifshitz, Felice. "Les femmes missionnaires: l'exemple de la Gaule franque." Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique 83 (1988): 5–33.
- Morrison, Karl F. Understanding Conversion. Charlottesville and London: University Press of Virginia, 1990.
- Muldoon, James, ed. Varieties of Religious Conversion in the Middle Ages. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 1997.
- Muschiol, Gisela. "Königshof, Kloster und Mission – die Welt der Lioba und ihrer geistlichen Schwestern." In Bonifatius – Apostel der Deutschen. Mission und Christianisierung vom 8. bis ins 20. Jahrhundert, edited by Franz J. Felten (Mainzer Vorträge 9). Wiesbaden: Steiner, 2004, pp. 99–114.
- Nelson, Janet L. "Women and the Word in the Earlier Middle Ages." In Women in the Church. Papers Read at the 1989 Summer Meeting and the 1990 Winter Meeting of the Ecclesiastical History Society, edited by W. J. Sheils and Diana Wood. Oxford: Blackwell, 1990, pp. 53–78.
- Nirenberg, David. "Conversion, Sex, and Segregation: Jews and Christians in Medieval Spain." The American Historical Review 107.3 (2002): 1065–1093.
- Nolte, Cordula. Conversio und Christianitas. Frauen in der Christianisierung vom 5. bis 8. Jahrhundert (Monographien zur Geschichte des Mittelalters 41). Stuttgart: Hiersemann, 1995.
- Nolte, Cordula. "Gender and Conversion in the Merovingian Era." In Varieties of Religious Conversion in the Middle Ages, edited by James Muldoon. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 1997, pp. 81–99.
- [Rudolf of Fulda, Life of Leoba] Vita Leobae abbatissae Bischofesheimensis auctore Rudolfo Fuldensi, edited by George Waitz. Monumenta Germaniae historica, Scriptorum 15.1, Hannover 1887, Reprint 1963, pp. 121–131.
- Sawyer, Birgit. "Women and the Conversion of Scandinavia." In Frauen in Spätantike und Frühmittelalter. Lebensbedingungen – Lebensnormen – Lebensformen, edited by Werner Affeldt, Sigmaringen: Thorbecke, 1990, pp. 263–281.

See also Abbesses; Clotilda, Frankish Lands; Gender Ideologies; Hagiography; History, Medieval Women's; Husbands and Husbandry; Jewish Women; Kinship; Leoba; Letter Writing; Marriage, Christian; Miracles and Miracle Collections; Mothers as Teachers; Monasticism and Nuns; Noble Women; Scandinavia; Sermons and Preaching; Spiritual Care; Wives and Husbands

CORNARO, CATERINA

In 1472, Venetian noblewoman Caterina Cornaro (1454–1510) arrived in Cyprus as the new bride of King Jacques II Lusignan. This union served the interests of her wealthy merchant family, as well as her homeland, which granted her the title "Daughter of the Republic." Both her spouse and her infant son died shortly thereafter, leaving her the titular ruler of the island for fifteen years, from 1474–1489. Increased tensions with the Ottoman Empire and marriage proposals from the Neopolitan throne prompted Venice to annex the island directly, forcing an unwilling queen to abdicate in 1489. In exchange, reigning Doge Agostino Barbarigo granted Cornaro a sizeable lifetime pension and lifetime dominion over the Veneto hill town of Asolo. Cornaro's patriotic sacrifice received notable visual commemoration in the sixteenth-century program of Venetian triumphs for the Great Council Hall in the Doge's Palace, where Cornaro was the only nonallegorical female depicted.

Cornaro spent her retirement in both Venice and Asolo, where she entertained regional dignitaries and luminaries, and hosted a series of elaborate social gatherings for family and friends. Such assemblies provided the setting and inspiration for her kinsman Pietro Bembo's pastoral dialogue Gli Asolani. Gentile Bellini painted Cornaro's portrait, and placed her in his Miracle at the Bridge of San Lorenzo; it is possible that other Venetian cultural figures attended her court. In addition to cultural activities, Cornaro frequently petitioned the Venetian government on Cypriot affairs. Cornaro's kin persisted in evoking their status as a royal family in Republican Venice long after her death.

HOLLY HURLBURT

References and Further Reading

Arbel, Benjamin. "Royal Family in Republican Venice: The Cypriot Legacy of the Corner della Regina." Studi Veneziani 15 (1988): 131–152.

———. "The Reign of Caterina Cornaro as a Family Affair." Studi Veneziani 26 (1993): 67–85.

Hill, George. A History of Cyprus. Vol. 3. Cambridge, Cambridge University Press, 1972.

See also Noble Women; Patronage, Artistic; Queens and Empresses: the West; Regents and Queen-Lieutenants

COSMETICS

The care and embellishment of the body is a practice that different societies share. Together with language, adornment is regarded as indicative of the peculiarly human ability for symbolizing, and it is considered the definitive archaeological trace that distinguishes human beings from other creatures. As a basic cultural feature, adornment in the Middle Ages was a means to create and enhance both identity and difference.

Appearance

There was no clear division between cosmetics and adornment in the Middle Ages. In learned contexts, the Latin words ornatus and decoratio were used to refer to a wide array of procedures to maintain and modify the natural appearance of the body, as well as for the use of objects and clothes to improve one's image. In western Europe, this semantic connection expresses the conceptual continuum shared by different activities devoted to the external care of the self. Although theological and moral thinking on individual appearance had been important in the classical world, Christianity, in particular through Tertullian's De cultu feminarum (The Appearance of Women), decisively transformed the theme by associating cosmetics and adornment almost exclusively with a negative concept of women. Medieval misogynistic traditions sustained and spread the vision of the female body as naturally defective, and women's investments in care for their appearance were seen as ways to deceive God's will and conceal their moral and physical abjection. Although someone like Hildegard of Bingen valued the adornment of her nuns' bodies, theological thinking was dominated by denunciations from male preachers, such as Bernardino of Siena or Francesc Eiximenis, who attacked what they describe as women's extensive interest in their appearance.

Both men and women, nevertheless, were concerned about their outward aspect. Misogynistic discourses notwithstanding, the care of the embodiment of both femininity and masculinity was seen in a positive light by some religious, moral, medical, and natural philosophical traditions. Regional, chronological and cultural differences still need to be studied, but Arabic medicine especially portrays a concern with male appearance. Cosmetics offered corrective measures to signify sexual difference, as women's and men's cosmetic practices were often in opposition, particularly regarding hair. Men's use of fake beards and their care of hair and whiskers are well attested, whereas women were concerned with depilating every body surface except the head. Medieval physicians and natural philosophers understood the distribution of the hair on the body as an expression of a basic physiological distinction between male and female complexions, explaining hair in males as a result of their way of ridding themselves of the superfluous bodily substances that women processed through menstruation.

Cosmetics and Perfumes

Cosmetics and perfumery had been considered aspects of medicine since antiquity, and had a physiological aspect. Pleasant smells had therapeutic as well as preventive value for both sexes; odors could control the air—one of the six unnatural things that could cause imbalance within the body, leading to illness. Significant parts of learned medical and surgical handbooks were devoted to describing procedures to care for and embellish the surfaces of the skin and the hair, with the aim of preventing aging, improving appearance and modifying color, texture, or shape. These works recommended preparations for skin diseases such as rashes, warts, fissures, or pimples, as well as hair dyes and different kinds of softeners and mollifiers. Pharmacological texts also record systematically the cosmetic properties of plants, and they offer detailed lists of the uses of simple or compound medicines as beautifying agents. Greek, Latin, Jewish, and Arabic learned medical cultures provide practical descriptions of how to prepare and apply cosmetics, but offer little theoretical discussion, remaining in the empirical domain. Medical texts often present various procedures for a single cosmetic goal, particularizing different variants according to local traditions, time investment, or disparity in access to economic resources.

Men's interest in cosmetics is well substantiated, either as part of their work as health practitioners or for their own personal use. However, nonmisogynist cultures also associated cosmetics strongly with femininity and with women: as users of medicines to command their own image, as makers of cosmetic products, and as authors of texts describing beautifying procedures. Medieval Galenism assumed Galen's attribution to Cleopatra of an otherwise unknown cosmetic treatise that he quoted extensively, De scriptis a Cleopatra in decorativis (Cleopatra's Writings on Cosmetics), as it was called in Latin. An early medieval Greek text ascribed to Metrodora contains a long section on perfumes and cosmetic recipes dealing with the care of the breasts, skin, and hair. The Salernitan medical world distilled into Latin early Arabic cosmetic lore, and produced an anonymous twelfth century De ornatu mulierum (On Women's Cosmetics) that, as part of the Trotula compendium of women's medicine, became the most popular cosmetic text in western Europe. The emerging literature in Hebrew and the vernacular languages welcomed cosmetic works, often anonymous or written by male compilers. In the form of collections of recipes, these works were addressed to women or stated clearly women's interest in cosmetics, acknowledging as sources not only other texts but also the living practices of women. Beyond misogyny and men's involvement, cosmetics emerge as a province of knowledge and practice particularly privileged by women.

MONTSERRAT CABRÉ

References and Further Reading

Bartlett, Robert. "Symbolic Meanings of Hair in the Middle Ages." Transactions of the Royal Historical Society, Sixth Series, 4 (1994): 43–60.

- Caballero-Navas, Carmen. The Book of Women's Love and Jewish Medical Literature on Women. Sefer Ahavat Nashim. London: Kegan Paul, 2004.
- Cabré, Montserrat. "From a Master to a Laywoman: A Feminine Manual of Self-Help," Dynamis. Acta Hispanica ad Medicinae Scientiarumque Historiam Illustrandam 20 (2000): 371–393.
- Cadden, Joan. Meanings of Sex Difference in the Middle Ages. Medicine, Science and Culture. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- Colish, Marcia L. "Cosmetic Theology: The Transformation of a Stoic Theme." Assays. Critical Approaches to Medieval and Renaissance Texts 1 (1981): 3–14.
- Green, Monica. "The Possibilities of Literacy and the Limits of Reading: Women and the Gendering of Medical Literacy." In Women's Healthcare in the Medieval West. Texts and Contexts. Aldershot: Ashgate, 2000. Essay number VII, pp. 1–76.
- . The Trotula: A Medieval Compendium of Women's Medicine. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001.
- Moulinier-Brogi, Laurence. "Esthétique et soins du corps dans les traités médicaux latins à la fin du Moyen Âge." Médiévales 46 (2004): 55–72.
- Schalick, Walton O. "The Face Behind the Mask: 13th and 14th-Century European Medical Cosmetology and Physiognomy." In Medicine and the History of the Body. Proceedings of the 20th, 21st and 22nd International Symposium on the Comparative History of Medicine—East and West, edited by Yasuo Otsuka, Shizu Sakai, and Shigehisa Kuriyama. Tokyo: Ishiyaku Euroamerica, 1999, pp. 295–312.
- Les Soins de Beauté. Moyen Age, Début des Temps Modernes. Actes du IIème Colloque International, Grasse (26–28 avril 1985)*, edited by Denis Menjot. Nice: Faculté des Lettres et Sciences Humaines, 1987.

See also Beauty; Body; Clothing; Conduct Literature; Doctors and Healers; Femininity and Masculinity; Gender Ideologies; Jewelry; Medicine; Misogyny; Secrets of Women; Sumptuary Law; Trota of Salerno

COURTLY LOVE

Courtly love was born, the story goes, with the earliest troubadour, William IX, at the end of the eleventh century. It was not named, however, until 1883, when the French medievalist Gaston Paris coined the term to characterize the passionate love uniting Lancelot and Guinevere in Chrétien de Troyes's twelfth-century Old French verse romance, Lancelot or the Knight of the Cart (c. 1178–1180). Referring to this single tale, Paris defined courtly love principally from the male lover's point of view, characterizing it as an illicit, extramarital liaison that placed the lover in the service of and at the mercy of a haughty and capricious lady. Although her love, grudgingly bestowed, could inspire courageous feats and refined behavior, to obtain that coveted love, the male suitor had to conform to codified rules of proper conduct, somewhat analogous to the tenets regulating chivalry. The amorous paradigms governing courtly love in the European Middle Ages display significant variations from one national literature to the next, appearing in German, English, Italian, and Spanish literary traditions, but French literature provides the dominant paradigm. It is important to note, however, that Paris's neologism, amour courtois, does not appear in the text of the Lancelot itself nor in the works of the troubadour poets that predate it (c. 1150–1210). In fact, courtliness in the French literary tradition does not necessarily include the practice of love. The lovesick and wildly heroic Lancelot exemplifies courtly love (amour courtois), for example, while his utterly courtly but measured and honorable chivalric companion Gauvain, who is not “in love,” exhibits only courtly conduct (courtoisie).

The Courtly Corpus

The male-centered view of courtly love first articulated by Gaston Paris derives from an ill-defined corpus of literary texts generally considered to display it. In addition to Occitan lyric poems from southern France, which bear formal characteristics linking them to Hispano-Arabic poetic composition, there are literary inheritors of troubadour lyric in northern France known as the trouvère poets who composed from 1150 to 1300. A group of romances from the early twelfth century attests to the classical roots of the courtly tradition, in particular The Romance of Aeneas (c. 1156), which recasts its Virgilian source by adding a lengthy description of Aeneas falling in love with Lavinia. The best-known twelfth-century Arthurian romances by Chrétien de Troyes (1170–1191), including the Lancelot, along with versions of the Tristan story by Béroul and Thomas of England (both c. 1170), incorporate elements from Celtic folk-tale into narratives of adulterous passion that hark back to troubadour lyric. These key texts are rewritten and expanded in the thirteenth century into prose romances such as the Prose Lancelot and other stories in the Lancelot-Grail Cycle, some of which draw heavily on Biblical tales, and the Prose Tristan. Equally important is the highly problematic relation of these literary works to what can be considered a more didactic (or perhaps satiric) current found in Andreas Capellanus's Latin treatise on the Art of Courtly Love (1180s), which derives in part from Ovid's Ars Amatoria, and in both parts of the allegorical Romance of the Rose, authored initially by Guillaume de Lorris in 1245 and continued by Jean de Meun in 1268.

Courtly love in the French tradition, then, draws on an unwieldy corpus of literary texts covering at least two cultures (Occitanian and northern French), three languages (Occitan, Old French, and Latin), and at least two centuries of literary and historical development (the twelfth and thirteenth centuries). While some texts stage courtly love within marriage (Erec and Enide, c. 1170), others cast it as the result of a magic potion over which the adulterous lovers have no control (Romance of Tristan, c. 1170). Still others add to the competing demands of love and knight-hood the conflict between a knight's secular duties and his Christian or spiritual commitment to God (Lancelot-Grail Cycle, c. 1220–1235).

Broadening the Canon

Courtly love begins to look quite different, however, if we move beyond the core Lancelot stories, classic examples of troubadour love songs, and canonized romance narratives to examine literary texts that have fallen traditionally outside the courtly canon. Our assessment of the meaning of courtly love shifts sharply if we include songs by the women troubadours (trobairitz), who often critique the amorous paradigms of troubadour lyric, or if we consider northern French sewing songs, which show female protagonists working their way to successful love liaisons with partners they have chosen. Our perspective shifts further if we include the brief narratives (lais) by Marie de France, which often contest the limited amorous model provided by Lancelot and Guinevere, or when we survey examples of single women in the courtly corpus.

Notions of courtliness change considerably when we examine heroines in noncanonical texts such as Richard de Fournival's Bestiaire d'Amours, which appends to its relatively standard catalogue of love's attributes a critique delivered in the voice of a lady, or when we think about feminocentric romances that feature women practicing the arts of cloth work and embroidery. We might also include courtly heroines in the twelfth-century version of Ovid's “Philomela,” where two sisters savagely murder the son of a tyrannical rapist-spouse, or the thirteenth-century cross-dressed heroine Silence in the Romance of Silence, who finds herself temporarily split between male and female identities, along with a number of other transvestite romance heroines. In addition, certain female figures within the most canonical courtly texts can be seen substantially to disrupt and reconfigure the very system they have been thought to represent: the outspoken heroine in the conjugal love story Erec and Enide, the deft Iseut in the adulterous Romance of Tristan, or the female figures Oiseuse (Idleness), Lady Fortune, Lady Reason, or La Vieille (The Old Woman) in the allegorical Romance of the Rose.

COURTLY LOVE

Feminist Interpretations

Early feminist writings on courtly love focused to a large extent on the lady's social status and standing. Revising previous assessments of the courtly beloved's position as idolized and influential, these analyses tended to see her instead as disempowered and displaced. With some historians arguing for increased status for women in the High Middle Ages, and others claiming that women's status declined, feminist literary critics reassessed the significance of women cited as dedicatees and patrons, concluding that those references provided little evidence that the genre promoted women's interests or that women exerted a substantial influence in literary composition. Additionally, the Old French lyric form known as the pastourelle and some Arthurian tales of love were shown to mask sexual violence against women in the form of rape, attempted rape, and forced marriage, rather than promoting women's social position.

An Affair between Men

These feminist readings of courtly love tended to converge with Marxist/materialist, psychoanalytic, and more formalist interpretations, all of which demonstrated, although often without critiquing this key observation, the extent to which courtly love marginalized women. Materialist critics had read courtly love as a literary strategy used to mediate and reconcile social tensions arising between men competing for status in the feudal courts of the twelfth century. For Lacanian critics, the courtly lady was a textualized object of masculine desire, a metaphor for the enigma of femininity and a cipher for male poetic practice. Some formalist critics analyzed troubadour lyric as elaborate and playful word games in which love and the ladylove became thematic foils for serious linguistic sparring between men.

In these and later readings, the courtly love affair was revealed often to be an affair between men that left women out. Troubadour songs, which appeared to feature the all-powerful domna (lady), were shown to stage instead a crucial struggle between contradictory positions on sex and marriage represented by the male lay and clerical interests at court. The twelfth-century Latin treatise on courtly love, Andreas Capellanus's De Amore, was read as teaching the male art of making love poetry rather than the art of making love to women. Even Gaston Paris's invention of the term courtly love itself was shown to form part of a homosocial professional discourse at the end of the nineteenth century that attempted to tame and suppress spontaneous and instinctual passions, coded as feminine, in favor of rule-governed scientific observation, analysis, and mastery. The key text in Gaston Paris's analysis of courtly love, Chrétien de Troyes's Lancelot, while ostensibly about love, did not necessarily celebrate the heterosexual bond between Lancelot and Guinevere or even a bond between knights, but a bond between two clerical authors whose joint literary project determines the fate of fictional knights.

Resistant Readings

A second strain of feminist approaches to courtly love, evident from the mid-1980s to the present, built upon studies that outlined women's displacement and disenfranchisement. Looking instead for points of weakness within the dominant courtly paradigm of unrequited male desire and putative devotion to women, they read "for" women and gender in ostensibly male-centered texts. These studies revealed alternative configurations of female desire, pleasure, and subjectivity in the works of female authors such as the women troubadours (or trobairitz) in the southern French (Occitan) tradition, the women trouvère poets in the north, and the Anglo-Norman author Marie de France, among others. Resistance to courtly norms was also found among female protagonists in male-authored texts where counter narratives of women's disruptive speech or sparring response contested and undermined established conventions. At times, female subjectivity emerged, even in the most misogynistic texts, through allusions to women readers who were given double messages warning of female danger while also revealing possibilities of female empowerment. A number of courtly texts were shown to contain subtexts of women's mastery that challenged conventionally gendered terms of knowledge and wisdom. Others staged an important tension between the display of female sexuality as a form of symbolic capital in the aristocratic household and the function of women as authoritative literary patrons.

Feminist readings made visible other aspects of courtly love previously unseen and unacknowledged. The traditional focus on the coupling of knights and ladies in the courtly world had obscured a significant number of single women in courtly literary texts, female protagonists not defined primarily by their relation to a husband, male lover, or knight-savior. New attention was given to a range of courtly women joined in same-sex relations, whether homosocial, homoaffective, homoerotic, or more mystical and metaphorical, that offered other paths of resistance to heterosexual courtly coupling. Literary incidents of male and female cross-dressing, although often used ultimately to reinforce the gendered status quo, were seen to provide important alternative love scenarios that challenged an understanding of gender as fixed and immutable. The feminocentric embroidery romances and spinning songs often contained within them offered portrayals of women's work—cloth work in particular—as an alternative poetic of love. Considerations of material culture, especially clothing and the many uses to which it is put by female characters, revealed expressions of desire that fell beyond and complicated in various ways the sex-based binary terms of male and female.

Once recognized, these forms of resistance to the amorous status quo within the courtly world of knights and ladies pointed toward the possibility of more flexible subject positions than were previously acknowledged. Medieval scholars had long recognized that the courtly lady in the French tradition, following her counterpart in the Occitan lyric, possessed a curiously hybrid gender. While maintaining stereotypically female sexuality, she also held, in principle at least, the status of a feudal lord. Standard readings of courtly love for over a hundred years tended to minimize the import of this model of potential gender fluidity, asserting that the lady was only playing the role of the lord temporarily and only metaphorically. More recently, scholars have begun to acknowledge the wider implications of this cross-gendered paradigm at the heart of courtly love.

Falling in love in the medieval French tradition does not necessarily mean following the literary models of Narcissus or Pygmalion; nor does it necessitate falling into rigid categories of sexual difference. Indeed, courtly models of heterosexual coupling not only contain but often rely upon subtle mechanisms of complex gender crossing that call into question the exclusionary mode of male desire and pleasure thought more typically to represent courtly love.

E. JANE BURNS

References and Further Reading

Bloch, R. Howard. Medieval Misogyny and the Invention of Western Romantic Love. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1991.

- Bruckner, Matilda Tomaryn. "Fictions of the Female Voice: The Women Troubadours." Speculum 67.4 (1992): 865–891.
- Bumke, Joachim. Courtly Culture: Literature and Society in the High Middle Ages. translated by Thomas Dunlop. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1991.
- Burns, E. Jane. Courtly Love Undressed: Reading Through Clothes in Medieval French Culture. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2002.
- Burns, E. Jane and Roberta L. Krueger, eds. "Courtly Ideology and Woman's Place in Medieval French Literature." Special Issue of Romance Notes 25.3 (1985).
- Ferrante, Joan. Woman as Image in Medieval Literature from the Twelfth Century to Dante. New York: Columbia University Press, 1975.
- Ferrante, Joan and George Economou. In Pursuit of Perfection: Courtly Love in Medieval Literature. Port Washington, N.Y.: Kennikat Press, 1975.
- Gaunt, Simon. Gender and Genre in Medieval French Literature. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995.
- Goldin, Frederick. The Mirror of Narcissus and the Courtly Love Lyric. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1967.
- Gravdal, Kathryn. Ravishing Maidens: Writing Rape in Medieval French Literature and Law. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1991.
- Huchet, Jean-Charles. L'Amour discourtois: La "Fin' Amor" chez les premiers troubadours. Toulouse: Privat, 1987.
- Hult, David F. "Gaston Paris and the Invention of Courtly Love." In Medievalism and the Modernist Temper, edited by R. Howard Bloch and Stephen G. Nichols, Jr. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1994, pp. 192–224.
- Jaeger, C. Stephen. Ennobling Love: In Search of a Lost Sensibility. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999.
- Kay, Sarah. Courtly Contradictions: The Emergence of the Literary Object in the Twelfth Century. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 2001.
- Krueger, Roberta L. Women Readers and the Ideology of Gender in Old French Verse Romance. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- McCracken, Peggy. The Romance of Adultery: Queenship and Sexual Transgression in Old French Literature. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1998.
- Schultz, James A. Courtly Love, the Love of Courtliness, and the History of Sexuality. Forthcoming.

See also Chivalry; Chrétien de Troyes; Clothwork, Domestic; Feminist Theories and Methodologies; Gender Ideologies; Guinevere; Isolde; Literature, Old French; Literature, Occitan; Marie de France; Pastourelle; Réponse du Bestiaire d'Amour; Roman de la Rose and Its Reception; Roman de Silence; Sexuality; Extramarital Sex; Trobairitz and Troubadours; Women's Song

COURTSHIP

Courtship was a functional and effective behavior of many medieval couples, at least if their intention was to become betrothed or married of their own free will. This approach became available, and soon omnipresent, outside royal and noble circles. The canonist Gratian (c. 1140) considered a marriage to depend on the free consent of the partners, and the Fourth Lateran Council of 1215 formally introduced the free will of groom and bride as a condition for a legal marriage. Moreover, Chrétien de Troyes and other twelfth-century writers believed that physical love and emotions formed a single whole.

Issues of Social Status

Within the social elites, however, this concept was largely ruled out, as all these marriages were family arranged and had no need of courtship. On the level of princes and high nobility matrimonial negotiations produced sophisticated political alliances. For the urban elites of Italy and the Low Countries social concerns dominated, in a way that the dichotomy between patricians on the one side and the lower strata on the other, kept segregated social universes alive. Commercial and professional networks in big cities, such as London, provided the ideal forum and clearinghouse for the latest information on potential spouses, based on precise data on the families' wealth and property. But the definition of social capital is larger than estate and dowry. In Venice, in 1455, a delicate marriage deal between the Dolfini and the Gabriels failed, because the first family belonged to the old urban nobility, so-called case vecchie, with long-standing distinction and a power position, while the Gabriels' wealth and business connections were rather recent, with political prominence merely in the present. Strange calculations often poisoned the free marriage market: in 1413 in England one father from the Derbyshire gentry kept a blank space for the bride's name in the marriage contract as he "had not yet decided which of his daughters he would marry off."

Among the urban elites socially-mixed marriages appear at least from the fifteenth century. Anthony Molho discovered that no less than thirty-seven percent of the fifteenth century Florentine marriages were socially mixed and based more often on romance than on materialistic reasons. Genuine courtship must have preceded most of these marriages. The letters exchanged in England in 1477 between John Paston and Margery Brews reveal a fine balance between sentiments and economics. Stanley Chojnacki found that the marriage strategies of many wealthy fathers profoundly involved the well being of their children, including the very rational claim that affection between the partners, on top of material benefits, was better insurance for a long-standing union and for the continuity of the business. Literature from the fifteenth century Burgundian Netherlands, such as the play Mirror of Love (1480–1500) and the Cent nouvelles nouvelles (1456–1461), suggests that marriages for love between socially unequal partners ought to be permitted, even when status-conscious parents were opposed.

In lower middle- and working-class families courtship was an ordinary preamble for marital alliances. Here, the market was not regulated at all, and certainly not by patrimonial calculations. Spontaneous encounters with marriageable girls at work, school, Sunday mass, local feasts, or public events, gave numerous opportunities for tentative, as well as for adventurous, acquaintance. Fortuitous sexual encounters often resulted in pregnancies, mostly followed by marriage. The rituals of charivari and carnival clearly reveal the standards of a "normal" courtship: it expresses irony for a significant difference in age and in social background; it criticizes all kinds of materialistic calculations; it idealizes emotional courtship apart from outside pressures.

In daily life the development of courtship for most individuals was not determined by formal rules, but by ritualized traditions and by economics. Many young people in late medieval Flanders postponed their marriage because of their long apprenticeships and economic insecurity. They thought themselves too vulnerable to support a family: single-person households, half of them women, inhabited 20.3 percent of houses in Ypres in 1412. On average, young men did not marry before twenty-five, but they did not forgo sexual experiences. Prostitutes were available in any town and village and were the easiest way to meet men's needs. Prostitution was tolerated since it supported the social order more than it disrupted it, supposedly preventing rape and other violence against women. In addition there were trial courtships, écraignes, in which young men experienced love play with marriageable girls, involving all kinds of petting short of penetration. This type of sexuality had, for both sides, the double advantage that they avoided unwanted pregnancies and did not infringe upon the marriage strategies of their parents. Many boys, however, did not respect the limitations of the game, so that the records of the Ghent aldermen around 1450 bulge with unwanted pregnancies and unmarried mothers. Indeed, many sons of wealthy families, courting girls of lower status as an emotional tryout, or for mere sexual pleasure, backed out of their fatherly obligations, did not marry the girl, and opted for paying a substantial sum for her trouble and her lying-in and an annuity for the rest of her life, that would be transferred to the natural child should the mother misbehave.

Generational Conflicts

In many wealthy and even less well-to-do families, the courtship of the couple did not please the parents on one or both sides, for reasons of old feuds or because of social imbalance. Conflicts were generated by children's frustration at their inability to act independently, as well as from the authoritarian use of parental rights to impose their own candidate for marriage. If the trouble escalated, the girl mostly fled of her own free will from the family nest with her lover. In the mildest form of oppositional lifestyle the young people lived in an informal cohabitation with mutual promises of faithfulness. Going one step farther, they entered into a clandestine marriage without the consent of the parents, and with or without the presence of a priest. This type of free-will marriage was considered valid by the Church, on the basis of the canonical consent ideology. Priests had few moral scruples in helping the union be regularized in church, even if that was against the parents' wishes. The parents, of course, used civil law to prevent or to undo the disobedience of their children, by considering their behavior as abduction (against the will of the woman), even if in fact it was no more than a case of seduction (with the consent of the woman). In Flanders ordinances of 1297 defined seduction as an offense against the family, punishable with a banishment of three years. Abduction was sanctioned by death or banishment for life and the loss of all property and inheritance. Young people reacted with a variety of precautions. In 1438, Wouter Janszoon fled with his beloved from Middelburg, Zeeland, against the will of her parents. In a village in Brabant they legally married before a priest. Before the local aldermen the girl declared that she freely accompanied her lover. The girl's family introduced a complaint for abduction against her husband, but the Court of Holland rejected it, because legal proofs documented the free consent. In other cases, the parents used all possible moral and material pressure to bring the girl back into the family.

We may presume, however, that the vast majority of children must have obtained the blessing of their family for their courtship, as the social expectations of both parents and offspring normally coincided. Medieval parents had an all-embracing judicial authority over their underage children. They decided on the settlements involving the family property associated with the marriage, negotiated formal deals with the other family on dowry and inheritance, and properly registered these arrangements before the bench of aldermen. Members of the extended family also asserted themselves unofficially, as the social and financial capital of the new couple was a factor for their own social status. They became legally involved as guardians of minor orphans and had a large share in their upbringing, education, and partner choice.

Parental consent was not required for the ceremony in church. During the twelfth century, marriage became a sacrament, based on free consent of the partners, and unbreakable after a successful sexual consummation. The first step is the formal betrothal, in which a priest accepts the first promise in verba de futuro, and publishes three times the banns on the church door. This announcement allows third parties to introduce objections under canon law, such as too close a degree of kinship between the partners or an already existing marriage. Holy matrimony follows two months later with the second promise in verba de presenti.

There are many basic motivations to begin a courtship. Marriages of princes, noblemen, and top officials, reflected political strategies and materialistic calculations. Patricians eagerly brought together patrimonies and political power positions. But most medieval couples certainly looked for affection, love, warmth, and psychological compatibility. In a testimony before the court in Champagne in 1383, Jehannette Coleau explained that she left the matrimonial home of her free will in favor of a new lover because "her love for him was greater than for anyone else." From the fact that discrepantia morum (incompatibility of character) was accepted as an argument for separation of body and dwelling before ecclesiastical courts, we may conclude that affection was seen as an essential factor for a successful marriage. Physical charms and sexual attraction are explicitly mentioned, in fiction and in trial records, as criteria in approaches between individuals, including in the rituals of seduction and adultery.

WALTER PREVENIER

References and Further Reading

- Brooke, Christopher N. L. The Medieval Idea of Marriage. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1991.
- Chojnacki, Stanley. Women and Men in Renaissance Venice. Twelve Essays on Patrician Society. Baltimore and London: The Johns Hopkins University Press, 2000.
- Fleming, Peter. Family and Household in Medieval England. Houndmills, Basingstoke, Hampshire and New York: Palgrave, 2001.
- Le Goff, Jacques and Jean-Claude Schmitt, Ed. Le Charivari : actes de la table ronde organisée à Paris, 25-27 avril 1977. Paris: L'école des hautes études en sciences sociales, and New York: Mouton, 1981.
- MacFarlane, Alan. Marriage and Love in England: Modes and Reproduction, 1300-1840. Oxford and New York: B. Blackwell, 1986.

Molho, Anthony. Marriage Alliance in Late Medieval Florence. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1994.

Prevenier, Walter, ed. Marriage and Social Mobility in the Late Middle Ages. Mariage et mobilité sociale au bas moyen âge. Gent: Studia Historica Gandensia, 1992.

Prevenier, Walter. "Les réseaux familiaux." In Le prince et le peuple. Images de la société du temps des ducs de Bourgogne, 1384–1530, edited by Walter Prevenier. Anvers: Fonds Mercator, 1998, pp. 184–231.

Schnell, Rüdiger. Sexualität und Emotionalität in der vormoderne Ehe. Cologne: Böhlau Verlag, 2002.

Sheehan, Michael M. Marriage, Family and Law in Medieval Europe. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1996.

See also Betrothals; Charivari; Family (Later Middle Ages); Festivals of Misrule; Marriage, Christian; Prostitutes; Rape and Raptus; Sexuality; Social Status

CRIME AND CRIMINALS

Female crime and victimization had distinct patterns, different from those of men. The sources for medieval crime are indirect. Law codes give us the history of rules, but how they related to actual crime is not obvious. Scattered court records exist, particularly from late medieval towns. They also are not a straightforward measure of criminality. For example, men accused of rape often sought to exonerate themselves by proving that the victim had the reputation of a prostitute. This surely does not imply that most rape victims were prostitutes, but only that it was a relatively easy and successful defense. Further, people often tried to use the courts to settle scores or apply pressure: a rape charge could be an effort to force a marriage. Nevertheless, these legal sources suggest clear patterns.

First, women were far less apt than men to be charged and convicted of serious crime. Typically, about twenty percent of convicted criminals were women. Poor women were charged with petty crimes: theft, assault, or verbal defamation. Women in the shops and markets of medieval towns were quick to go to court over insults, often over sexual reputation and care for children; "You whore! You drowned your babies," or "You whore! You prostituted your daughter." Medieval men had a monopoly not on physical violence but on weaponry. Women were quick to resort to blows, but rarely were charged with assault with weapons. Theft charges against women usually involved opportunistic robbery by a low status person within the household: a servant, an orphaned niece, or a nurse.

Women were rarely charged with successful homicide. In thirteenth-century England women comprised fewer than ten percent of accused murderers. They might, however, be accused of attempted poisoning or complicity in murder, as when a husband killed a wife and his concubine was accused of masterminding her death. The exception was infanticide, considered a woman's crime. It is hard to judge how often this was true. It could be difficult to distinguish accidental death from murder, and prosecutions for infanticide were rare. A woman with an illegitimate child might be driven to infanticide by poverty, though child abandonment was a common alternative. Fears of repercussions were real. No infanticide charges survive from thirteenth-century Bologna, but in five cases, pregnant women were beaten to death by male kin. The fact that male babies were more apt to survive overall does suggest the murder or neglect of infant girls, but not that mothers rather than fathers were culpable.

Wives were charged with adultery, particularly in regions where conviction meant the husband could keep the dowry. Sodomy charges against women existed but were extremely rare, reflecting a lack of interest and imagination on the part of male accusers. Women were often charged with pimping. Prostitution cases can reveal a gulf between norms and practice. The law maintained a dichotomous view of women as either of good or bad repute, but in practice, women might sell sex informally without being common women. The trend in late medieval towns was toward legalized, controlled prostitution. This turned a part-time source of income into an identity, with women living in brothels, often trapped in debt peonage. Women suspected of sexual criminality might be charged with love magic as well. However, this was not yet distinctively feminine: men were also accused of practicing magic.

What of female victims of crime? The most severe were rape and murder. Rape was surely common but convictions terribly rare. In thirteenth-century England, 142 prosecutions for rape led to only twenty-three cases and then a single conviction. Why? Proof of rape was difficult. Further, most rape laws encouraged private settlement, either by marrying the victim to her attacker or by his provision of a dowry. This preserved respectability for the victim and her family by enabling her to marry. Sometimes, this cloaked a consensual union, perhaps an elopement, but at times it did mean a woman was forced to marry a man who had violated and perhaps abducted her. The extent of domestic violence is debated. Wife battery prompted charges only when actual bloodshed was reported to the court; a husband was expected to beat his wife. The rarity of husbands accused of assault thus is probably not a good measure of domestic abuse. In late medieval Bologna, when women were murdered the husband was the killer about half the time.

Finally, this varied by status: poor women were more apt to resort to petty crime, girls with dowries more apt to suffer abduction.

CAROL LANSING

References and Further Reading

Kittell, Ellen E. "Reconciliation or Punishment: Women, Community, and Malefaction in the Medieval County of Flanders." In The Texture of Society: Medieval Women in the Southern Low Countries, edited by Ellen E. Kittell and Mary A. Suydam. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004, pp. 3–30.

Medieval Crime and Social Control, edited by Barbara A. Hanawalt and David Wallace. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1999.

See also Abortion; Domestic Abuse; Gossip and Slander; Honor and Reputation; Infants and Infanticide; Magic and Charms; Prostitutes; Rape and Raptus; Social Status; Violence

CRISEYDE

In his long narrative poem Troilus and Criseyde, written in rhyme royal and set during the Trojan War, Geoffrey Chaucer tells the story of the Trojan royal son Troilus's love affair with Criseyde, a beguiling Trojan widow whose father, Calchas, betrays the Trojans and abandons her in Troy. Criseyde eventually succumbs to Troilus, and their love is consummated. The Trojan leaders agree to trade Criseyde for Antenor, and Criseyde, against Troilus's wishes, is sent to the Greek camp where the Greek Diomedes falls in love with her. Whether or not Criseyde betrays Troilus is unclear, but she fails to meet Troilus on an appointed day, and Troilus's heart is broken.

Criseyde is Chaucer's most fully realized enigmatic heroine. E. T. Donaldson's famous claim that every reader falls in love with Criseyde has been disputed by Carolyn Dinshaw, who questions Donaldson's assumption that the reader is male. Although drawing upon Boccaccio's Il Filostrato and the Roman de Thebe, Chaucer illustrates Criseyde's thought processes, constraints, motives, and choices to the point that Criseyde becomes one of the first fully realized novelistic subjects of English literature. Chaucer refrains from the misogynistic condemnation of women expressed by his sources. He gives us partial glimpses into a complex subjectivity, showing us the depth of her ability to assess her circumstances and desires as she contemplates Troilus's proposition. At the same time that Chaucer demonstrates Criseyde's cunning, he increases our understanding of her victimization, making it difficult for us to judge her.

ELIZABETH ROBERTSON

References and Further Reading

Aers, David. "Criseyde: Woman in Medieval Society." In Critical Essays in Chaucer's Troilus and Criseyde and His Major Early Poems, edited by C. David Benson. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1991, pp. 128–148.

Dinshaw, Carolyn. "Reading Like a Man: The Critics, the Narrator, Troilus, and Pandarus." In Chaucer's Sexual Poetics. Madison, Wis.: University of Wisconsin Press, 1989, pp. 28–64.

Donaldson, E. Talbot. "Criseide and her Narrator." In Speaking of Chaucer. London: The Athlone Press, 1970, pp. 65–83.

Robertson, Elizabeth. "Public Bodies and Psychic Domains: Rape, Consent and Female Subjectivity in Geoffrey Chaucer's Troilus and Criseyde." In Representing Rape in Medieval and Early Modern Literature, edited by Elizabeth Robertson and Christine Rose. New York: Palgrave, 2001, pp. 281–310.

See also Chaucer, Geoffrey; Romances of Antiquity

CROSS-CULTURAL APPROACHES

Comparative studies across divergent cultures are a recent development in scholarly inquiry. In the twentieth century, comparative typically meant a comparison between European and American countries. In the study of literature, for example, "Comparative Literature" only became a subject area with the Modern Language Association in the 1950s; and then it was dominated by European studies. Cross-cultural approaches with a truly global sensibility are a developing area of study. Cross-cultural approaches to studying the roles of women in society, both East and West, must include questions about each culture's ideology of sexual identity and gendered roles: what are their physiological, religious, and social assumptions about the similarities and differences in the sexes and genders? Western medieval gender ideology was based on the physiological concept that woman was an inadequately formed male, that she was the religious downfall of men, and that she was socially relegated to a natural subordination to the male. In contrast, Asian cultures, informed by Confucianism and other beliefs, typically focused on women's social subordination to men. Notable women of medieval Europe and Asia (Heian Japan, medieval China, and Hindu India) confronted these obstacles with remarkably similar methods. Women attempted to placate the patriarchal system by acknowledging certain standards of marriage, motherhood, and obedience. At the same time, they utilized the vernacular (as opposed to the languages of the male educated elite) and used popular genres (compared to canonical forms) to express both feminine and universal concerns.

CYNTHIA HO

References and Further Reading

Amer, Sahar. "Integrating Multiculturalism in the Medieval Studies Classroom: The Challenge of the New Millennium. (A Short Reflection, a Pedagogical Methodology, and a Select Bibliography)." Medieval Perspectives 15.2 (Fall 2000): 61–80. Theme issue: At the Turn of the Millennium: Methodological Approaches to Medieval Scholarship in the Twentieth Century.

Crossing the Bridge: Comparative Essays on Heian Japanese and Medieval European Women Writers, edited by Cynthia Ho and Barbara Stevenson. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2000.

See also Gender Ideologies; Postmodernism and Historiography

CROSS-DRESSING

Clothes are signifiers to the external world. In medieval times, dress could signal a wearer's gender, marital status, religious affiliation, occupation, social station, geographical origin, and other information relevant to a person's place in a community or society. At times, badges, colors, or specific articles of clothing even communicated political allegiance. Clothes functioned as a "symbolic surface between self and world" (Claudia Benthien). To change one's cover therefore bore the potential to also trade one's social status or gender.

Since late antiquity, Christian hagiography featured many female saints in a male disguise. Commonly, their transvestism made possible a transition from worldly pursuits to a religious life in monastic communities. Cistercian writers circulated the story, for instance, that a certain Hildegund had lived an exemplary, pious life as Brother Joseph in the Schönau monastery until her true sex was discovered after her death (around 1188). "Whether Hildegund was an imagined woman or an actual one, her story is one that these Cistercian authors had made their own and presented to their audiences as true" (Martha G. Newman, p. 1191).

Cross-dressing was both a cultural fantasy and a social practice. Medieval literature is replete with tales that tell of a change in sartorial identity. Legends tell of women whose change to a male attire marked their rise to exemplars of religious life. Fables, novellas, and novels foreground sexual comedies of errors. In epics, the virago figures as the exceptional manly woman who had overcome the limitations of her sex. While didactic texts teach that one should stick to one's dress as well as to one's station, Arthurian romance sometimes challenges the notion that a wearer's dress reflects true personhood unequivocally. The most elaborate plot of literary cross-dressing is probably the French Roman de Silence (late-thirteenth century). In various ways, these texts show the gendered social order as malleable. But the question of whether such representations uphold or undermine this same order needs to be discussed for each text individually. While most narratives restore proper identities at the plot's end, such resolutions are tentative in some cases. In Dietrich von Glezze's The Belt (1270–1290), a lady cross-dresses as a knight in order to woo her departed male lover—an unusually daring story that both conjures up and disavows male-male erotic desire.

Not accidentally, these themes and anxieties attached themselves to textiles, a product of the greatest importance to medieval industry and trade. In medieval cities, where various social groups cohabited in close quarters, dress became a subject of concern to civic authorities. City councils hoped to secure textile codes by regulating what was worn in their communities. They introduced new signifiers, such as the articles of clothing and colors that marked Jews or prostitutes as marginal. They attempted to limit excessive spending for fashionable clothes among the urban elites. Some medieval cities also prohibited women from wearing men's clothes and vice versa. Such legislation can be traced back to the biblical condemnation of such behavior as an "abomination to the Lord" in Deuteronomy 22:5. This passage inspired similar bans in canon law, penitentials, and other prescriptive literature.

Textile masks were not always transgressive, however. During carnival, donning the opposite sex's garb was common. In the world-turned-upside-down temporarily, the wearer's actual self could remain see-through to the observer. When the male actors of fifteenth-century Nuremberg carnival plays assumed female roles their audience must have been aware of the fact that they acted under cover. Also, protection, for instance during travel, justified women's passing as men, at least in the eyes of lawmakers. Yet it would be erroneous to assume that one exchanged clothes easily or at will. In the later Middle Ages, rulers used them for identification purposes. It is this persistent relation of dress to identity that lent cross-dressing its symbolic significance.

Medical theories, according to which women were physically inverted men, may have contributed to this fascination with the changeability of a person's sex. Characteristically, most changes of dress were upwardly mobile. Women assumed a male self via dress more frequently than vice versa. This highlights the gender hierarchies that underlie the discourse of cross-dressing. Only rarely is a man represented as a cross-dresser. In Ulrich von Liechtenstein's humorous quasi-autobiography, the narrator masquerades as the goddess Venus in his Service to Women (mid-thirteenth century). John Rykener was a rare case of a male transvestite and prostitute. Known as Eleanor, he was apprehended in London in 1394 while having sex with another man. Women who passed as men usually expanded their social, economic, occupational, religious, and erotic options. The fact that before her discovery Katharina Hetzeldorfer was able to live as a man caused great unease among her interrogators in the German city of Speyer in 1477, who condemned her to being drowned. According to the trial document, Hetzeldorfer enacted a roguish masculinity. As a man, she courted several women and had sexual relations with a woman she introduced as her sister, a gender performance helped by her self-made dildo. The little we know about her life serves as a reminder that the assumption of a new sartorial self was predicated on embodying the other sex by physical comportment.

Arguably, Joan of Arc is the most well-known cross-dresser of the Middle Ages. Multiple registers were at stake in her self-presentation and the debate that flared up before, during, and after her trial. Joan invoked male garb primarily as protective of her virginity. Some observers saw saintliness in the female warrior. Others condemned her Amazon-like behavior as a sign of social disorder and heresy. Here, as elsewhere, our term cross-dressing encompasses modes of thinking that were viewed as incompatible in the medieval world.

HELMUT PUFF

References and Further Reading

- Anson, John. "The Female Transvestite in Early Monasticism: The Origin and Development of a Motive." Viator 5 (1974): 1–32.
- Boyd, David Lorenzo and Ruth Mazo Karras. "The Interrogation of a Male Transvestite Prostitute in Fourteenth-Century London." GLQ 1 (1995): 459–465.
- Bullough, Vern L. "Transvestism in the Middle Ages." In Sexual Practices and the Medieval Church, edited by Vern L. Bullough and James Brundage. Buffalo: Prometheus, 1982, pp. 43–54.
- Cadden, Joan. Meanings of Sexual Difference in the Middle Ages: Medicine, Science, and Culture. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- Gaebel, Ulrike. "Weibliche Krieger: Crossdressing in deutschen Chanson-de-geste Adaptationen des 15. und 16. Jahrhunderts." Jahrbuch der Oswald von Wolkenstein Gesellschaft 11 (1999): 363–382.
- Garber, Marjorie. Vested Interests: Cross-Dressing and Cultural Anxiety. New York: Routledge, 1991.
- Hotchkiss, Valerie R. Clothes Make the Man: Female Cross Dressing in Medieval Europe. New York: Garland 1996.
- Newman, Martha G. "Real Men and Imaginary Women: Engelhard of Langheim Considers a Woman in Disguise." Speculum 78 (2003): 1184–1213.
- Puff, Helmut. "Female Sodomy: The Trial of Katherina Hetzeldorfer (1477)." The Journal of Medieval and Early Modern Studies 30 (2000): 41–61.
- . "The Sodomite's Clothes: Gift-Giving and Sexual Excess in Early Modern Germany and Switzerland." In Personal Objects, Social Subjects: The Material Culture of Sex, Procreation, and Marriage in Pre-Modern Europe, edited by Karen Encarnacion and Anne McClanan. New York: Palgrave 2002, pp. 251–272.

See also Amazons; Body in Literature and Religion; Body, Visual Representation of; Clothing; Femininity and Masculinity; Festivals of Misrule; Gender Ideologies; Joan of Arc; Roman de Silence; Sexuality: Extra-marital Sex; Sexuality: Female Same-Sex Relations; Sexuality: Male Same-Sex Relations; Sexuality: Regulations of; Sexuality: Sex in Marriage

CRUSADES AND CRUSADING LITERATURE

Despite the fact that cultural norms in western European Christian society in the Middle Ages did not require that women should take part in fighting, women were involved in crusading in various roles from the beginning of the movement. The crusades, a series of military campaigns promoted by the Latin (Catholic) church from the late-eleventh century onward in defense of western Christendom, presented a contradiction for women. Although pious Christian women had a spiritual role to play in prayer support for the undertaking, as physical and sexual beings they were perceived by Christian commentators as a threat to the spiritual purity of Christian warriors. Because expansionist Islam posed the greatest territorial threat to Latin Christian Europe at this period, it was the most common opponent of crusading expeditions. (Muslim commentators depicted the involvement of Christian women in crusades as a measure of the "otherness" and barbarity of Christian culture, while depicting Muslim women as potential victims of Christian ungodliness who must be protected.)

As crusades were also pilgrimages, initially women were involved in crusading expeditions as peaceful pilgrims. Christian women joined the First Crusade (1095–1099) also as traders who helped to supply the army, and as partners and family of male pilgrims. Women could perform various support tasks during expeditions, such as bringing water to warriors on the battlefield, undertaking labouring tasks, and hurling missiles at the enemy. They could also undertake basic medical and hygienic care and encourage warriors to fight. But in times of defeat they were blamed for introducing sexual temptation to the crusading army, and the religious leaders of the army would send all women out of the military camp as part of a ceremonial cleansing intended to recover divine approval for the undertaking.

Crusade preachers depicted women as holding back their male relatives from going on crusade and warned of dire consequences should they do so; but in fact women were often promoters of crusades, encouraging their male relatives to take part. Noblewomen accompanied their husbands on crusade, as Eleanor of Aquitaine accompanied King Louis VII of France on the Second Crusade, 1147–1148, and in 1247–1254 Margaret of Provence accompanied her husband, King Louis IX of France, on crusade to Egypt. When Louis was taken prisoner by Egyptian forces, Margaret commanded the crusaders' defence from her childbed.

Even though a noblewoman would not normally fight on the battlefield, she could hire and command warriors who did so. In 1087, Countess Matilda of Tuscany was one of the sponsors of a naval campaign against the North African Muslim coastal city of al-Mahdiyyah, a precursor of the later crusades to the Middle East; in the Iberian peninsula in the 1120s, Countess Teresa of Portugal (1097–1128) and Queen Urraca of Castile (1109–1126) pursued war against their Muslim neighbours. From the early thirteenth century onward popes encouraged noncombatants, including women, to give money to finance warriors on the crusade rather than going in person, while canon lawyers debated whether a woman could legally take a crusading vow. Nevertheless some women continued to go to the front line. According to the contemporary Annales de Terre Sainte, in 1288, Countess Alice of Blois traveled to the city of Acre in Palestine with a large military force and financed the construction of a tower to defend against Muslim attack.

In frontier societies where crusading conflicts were in progress, women were more than likely in settled societies to have to resort to military force in defence of self, family, or family possessions, and many accounts in medieval records show such women using force against their enemies in a crusade situation. Although moralizing Christian commentators depicted women in crusades either as pious helpers or as temptresses, fictional Christian literature gave them a wider role, reflecting their role in reality. In the "Old French Crusade Cycle," begun in the early twelfth century and repeatedly expanded and rewritten in the following centuries, Christian women acted as supporters of their men folk on the battlefield, while Muslim women appeared as intelligent and well educated, advising their men folk on the danger presented by the Christians. Muslim princesses were depicted in fiction as potential converts to Christianity, as authors assumed that women would see what they regarded as the essential truth of Christianity more readily than men and persuade their men folk to convert. This fictional image was perhaps reflected in the suggestion by the French writer Pierre Dubois, made in the early fourteenth century, that noble Christian girls could be married to Muslim princes in order to bring about their conversion to Christianity.

HELEN J. NICHOLSON

References and Further Reading

- "Annales de Terre Sainte," in "Documents – IV. Textes Divers. Annales de Terre Sainte," edited by R. Röhrich and G. Raynaud. Archives de l'Orient Latin. 2 (1884): 427–461.
- Brundage, James. "Prostitution, Miscegenation and Sexual Purity in the First Crusade." In Crusade and Settlement: Papers Read at the First Conference of the Society for the Study of the Crusades and the Latin East and Presented to R. C. Smail, edited by Peter W. Edbury. Cardiff: University College of Cardiff Press, 1985, pp. 57–65.
- Cartulaire général de l'ordre des Hospitaliers de Saint-Jean de Jérusalem, 1100–1310*, edited by Joseph Delaville Le Roux. 4 vols. Paris: Ernest Leroux. 1884–1906. Nos. 38–39, 61.
- Dubois, Pierre. The Recovery of the Holy Land. translated by Walther I. Brandt. New York: Columbia University Press, 1956.
- Edgington, Susan and Lambert, Sarah, ed. Gendering the Crusades. Cardiff: University of Wales Press, 2002.
- Geldsetzer, Sabine. Frauen auf Kreuzzügen, 1096–1291. Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 2003.
- Joinville, Jean de. The Life of Saint Louis. In Joinville & Villehardouin, Chronicles of the Crusades. translated by M. R. B. Shaw. Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1963.
- Maier, Christoph. "The Roles of Women in the Crusade Movement: A Survey." Journal of Medieval History 30.1 (2004): 61–82.
- Nicholson, Helen. "Women on the Third Crusade." Journal of Medieval History 23.4 (1997): 335–349.
- The Old French Crusade Cycle*, edited by Emanuel J. Mickel, Jan A. Nelson, et al. 10 vols. Tuscaloosa and London: University of Alabama Press, 1977–2003.
- Powell, James M. "The Role of Women in the Fifth Crusade." In The Horns of Hattin, edited by Benjamin Z. Kedar. Jerusalem: Yad Izhak Ben-Zvi and London: Variorum, 1992, pp. 294–301.

See also Eleanor of Aquitaine; Muslim Women: Western Literature; Pilgrims and Pilgrimage; Warfare

CUCKOLD

This once-common English word is tellingly related to "cuckoo," the bird that lays its eggs in other birds' nests. In the imaginations of premodern Europeans, the cuckold—the man whose wife has betrayed him by having sex with another man—was more like the cuckoo's dupe or victim, and his plight carried analogous associations of stupidity, passivity, and shame. A man who could not maintain his wife's fidelity was, by one set of standards, the very model of degraded masculinity. Not only had he failed to exert the control necessary to keep his wife in line, he had possibly also caused her to stray by failing to meet her sexual needs (the "conjugal debt"), prompting her to look to other men. The common medieval and early modern assumption that women were more sexually driven than men, and less able to control their lusts, combined with the legal and customary responsibility of husbands for their wives' behaviour, meant that a cuckold ultimately only had himself to blame; his was more a risible than a pitiable situation. Even the earthly father of Jesus, Joseph, was sometimes (to the Church's dismay) popularly understood as a cuckold.

Our knowledge about the meaning of cuckoldry in premodern Europe comes from two kinds of sources. Legal evidence reveals that fights, wife-beatings, and even homicides could originate in men's anxiety that their wives had made them cuckolds, or in the use of the word cuckold as an insult between men. The use of horns (the cuckold's emblem) to ridicule such men also surfaces in folk rituals. Probably more influential, however, for modern scholars are cultural sources, whether literature or art. French fabliaux, Italian stories by Boccaccio and others, German tales, and English poems and plays from Chaucer to Shakespeare all reveal the seemingly endless potential of the cuckold as a source of humour. While not the most direct form of evidence for lived reality, literary sources reveal a culture's significant anxieties and concerns—in the case of the cuckold, the power of women's sexuality to imperil masculine identity.

DEREK NEAL

References and Further Reading

- Foyster, Elizabeth. Manhood in Early Modern England: Honour, Sex and Marriage. London: Longman, 2000.
- Hale, Rosemary Drage. "Joseph as Mother: Adaptation and Appropriation in the Construction of Male Virtue," in Medieval Mothering, edited by John Carmi Parsons and Bonnie Wheeler. London and New York: Garland, 1996, pp. 101–116.
- Miller, Mark. "Naturalism and its Discontents in the Miller's Tale." ELH 67.1 (2000): 1–44.
- Weinstein, Donald. The Captain's Concubine: Love, Honor, and Violence in Renaissance Tuscany. Baltimore and London: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2000.

See also Boccaccio, Giovanni; Chaucer, Geoffrey; Conjugal Debt; Domestic Abuse; Fabliau; Femininity and Masculinity; Gender Ideologies; Honor and Reputation; Husbands and Husbandry; Joseph, Step-father of Jesus; Misogyny; Sexuality: Sex in Marriage

D

---

D'ESTE, ISABELLA AND BEATRICE

The daughters of Ercole I d'Este, the reigning duke of Ferrara (Italy) from 1471–1505, Isabella (1474–1539) and Beatrice (1475–1497), married two leading Italian princes: respectively, Francesco II Gonzaga, duke of Mantua, and Ludovico Sforza “il Moro,” duke of Milan. Imitating their father, a patron of artists and humanists, and their mother, Eleanora of Aragon (daughter of the king of Naples), a learned woman herself, Isabella and Beatrice, equipped with humanist educations, actively promoted the arts and learning in the courts over which they presided as consorts.

Isabella especially gathered about her a circle of artists (including such luminaries as Andrea Mantegna and Giovanni Bellini), whom she employed in the construction and beautification of the ducal residence, one of the most magnificent in Italy. In her dealings with artists, she gave minute instructions about narrative program and figures, as well as size, color, and specifications for delivery. She hired musicians to sing in the ducal chapel, supported writers, including the great Ariosto, and enhanced the ducal library. Meanwhile, she excelled in statecraft, dealing ably with diplomats, and ruling Mantua as regent for her husband from 1509–1512, when the latter was held hostage abroad. On Francesco's death in 1519, Isabella remained a behind-the-scenes power during the reign of her son, Federico II, and saw to the promotion of her second son, Ercole, to the cardinalate.

At the even grander court of Milan, Beatrice also supported circles of writers (including Castiglione) and artists (including Leonardo da Vinci), but had little time to make her mark: she died in childbirth just six years after her marriage.

MARGARET L. KING

References and Further Reading

- Cartwright, Julia. Beatrice d'Este, Duchess of Milan, 1475–1497, 8th ed. London: J. M. Dent; New York: E. P. Dutton, 1920. Reprint, Miami: University Press of the Pacific, 2002.
- Cartwright, Julia. Isabella d'Este, Marchioness of Mantua, 1474–1539: A Study of the Renaissance. 2nd ed. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1915.
- Felisatti, Massimo. Isabella d'Este: la primadonna del Rinascimento. Milan: Bompiani, 1982.
- Prizer, William F. “Una Virtù Molto Conveniente A Madonne: Isabella D'Este as a Musician.” Journal of Musicology 17. 1 (1999): 10–49.

See also Humanism; Italy; Noble Women; Patronage, Artistic

DANCE

Dancing is frequently mentioned in medieval sources as an important aspect of civic and courtly celebrations, both as a social pastime and a performance for an audience. Social dances were performed for the pleasure of participants and observers, while male and female professional dancers incorporated tumbling and acrobatic feats into their dances. Despite the large number of references to dance, however, medieval writers recorded surprisingly few details about specific dance movements or steps before the middle of the fifteenth century, when a few Italian dance masters produced the earliest known manuals. Fortunately, a great deal of information about earlier dance practices can be gleaned from medieval sources, including chronicles, saints' lives, preachers' aids (especially collections of sermons and moral tales called exempla), and treatises of the vices and virtues. Also, narratives such as The Romance of Flamenca and The Romance of the Rose describe courtly and professional dancers, while images of dance and texts of medieval dance song lyrics provide additional information. By comparing a wide range of sources it is possible to determine many important characteristics of medieval dance practice and to appreciate the wide variety of opinions that dancing elicited among writers.

The ladies dance a roundelay, a medieval dance, typical of life at court, in one of the murals of the knights' hall in Runkelstein castle, South Tyrol, Italy. Right, in dark dress, Margarete Maultasch ("sachel-mouth"), countess and ruler of Tyrol (1318–1369). Fresco, 14th CE. Location: Runkelstein Castle, South Tyrol, Italy. Credit: Erich Lessing / Art Resource, N.Y.

The form of social dance most frequently referred to in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries was the French carole (English "carol," Italian carola, German reien or reihen, and Latin chorea), a type of dance that scholars define by its social, physical, and musical structures. Caroles were performed by both men and women, either in same-sex or mixed-group dances. Dancers sang while they danced, with a leader singing the verses and the remaining dancers singing a refrain. Dancers often held hands to form a circle (with the leader in the middle) or sometimes formed a procession or line. The carole's popularity may have been due in part to its adaptability: it could be performed anywhere space was available, without need of musicians, as only the leader needed to remember (or be able to improvise) the verses of the song. Caroles were described in both formal and informal settings, among courtiers, peasants, knights, bourgeoisie, and even members of the clergy. They were performed inside halls and outside in gardens and meadows, city streets, town squares, and churchyards. On occasions when professional entertainers performed, musicians accompanied dancing in lieu of the dancers' singing, a practice that appears more frequently in descriptions of dance from the fourteenth century onwards.

Medieval clerics recorded such widely different attitudes about dance that it is impossible to generalize about them; at one end of the spectrum dancing was interpreted as an expression of joy, love, honor, and respect, and as a valid form of religious praise. Other writers praised the social benefits of dance if performed by the proper people on appropriate occasions, while some clerics condemned dance as the tool of the devil. In the earliest days of Christianity parishioners adapted pagan practices and incorporated dancing into religious celebration, performing in churchyards and graveyards, and in church buildings on holy days. Later medieval sources record similar practices, sometimes attempting to regulate or suppress the dances but acknowledging that they had been tolerated in the past. Without more conclusive evidence, scholars must speculate (and often disagree) about how widespread such dances were and about whether they ought to be understood as religious dances or as social dances performed on religious and holy days. Also disputed is whether the rise in the number of religious commentaries on dance over the course of the thirteenth century reflected an increase in dancing or in new forms of writing.

Although both men and women danced, women's dancing received special and passionate attention in two types of medieval sources. Some writers of books on vices and virtues attacked women's dancing, focusing on the sins of pride and vanity of women who lavished attention on their hair, dress, and make-up, or in the lust their songs inspired in men. In marked contrast, hagiographers (writers of saints' lives) described the dancing of holy women such as Beatrice of Nazareth as a sign of religious ecstasy or evidence of spiritual union with Christ. In these cases writers judged dancers not by their movements but by the activities and people associated with the dances and especially by what they determined to be the intentions of the dancers. Dancing enjoyed for its healthful and social benefits, rather than as a means of physical or spiritual pleasure, encountered fewer objections and less impassioned responses by clerical writers.

KAREN MIRIAM SILEN

References and Further Reading

- Arcangeli, Alessandro. "Dance and Punishment." Dance Research 10.2 (1992): 30–42.
- Blodgett, E. D., ed and trans. The Romance of Flamenca. New York and London: Garland Publishing, 1995.
- De Ganck, Roger, ed and trans. The Life of Beatrice of Nazareth, 1200–1268, with translation assistance by

- John Baptist Hasbrouck. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Cistercian Publications, 1991.
- de Grocheo, Johannes. Concerning Music (De Musica). Colorado Springs, Colo.: Colorado College Music Press, 1967.
- de Lorris, Guillaume, and Jean de Meun. The Romance of the Rose, translated by Charles Dahlberg. Hanover and London: University Press of New England, 1986.
- Greene, Richard Leighton, ed. The Early English Carols. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1935 and 1977.
- Guglielmo, Ebreo of Pesaro. De Practica seu Arte Tripudii: On the Practice or Art of Dancing, edited and translated by Barbara Sparti. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1995.
- MacMullen, Ramsay. Christianity & Paganism in the Fourth to Eighth Centuries. New Haven, Conn. and London: Yale University Press, 1997.
- Markus, R. A. The End of Ancient Christianity. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998.
- McGee, Timothy J. Medieval Instrumental Dances. Bloomington, Ind.: Indiana University Press, 1989.
- Mullally, Robert. "Dance Terminology in the Works of Machaut and Froissart." Medium Aevum 69.2 (1990): 248–259.
- Page, Christopher. The Owl and the Nightingale: Musical Life and Ideas in France 1100–1300. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1989.
- Rimmer, Joan. "Carole, Rondeau and Branle in Ireland 1300–1800: Part 1, The Walling of New Ross and Dance Texts in the Red Book of Ossory." Dance Research 7.1 (1989): 20–46.
- Silen, Karen Miriam. "Dancing with God: Dance Practice and Theory in Thirteenth-Century Northern France and French Flanders." Ph.D. dissertation, University of California at Berkeley, forthcoming.
- Simons, Walter. "Reading a Saint's Body: Rapture and Bodily Movement in the 'Vitae' of Thirteenth-Century Beguines." In Framing Medieval Bodies, edited by Sarah Kay and Miri Rubin. Manchester and New York: Manchester University Press, 1994, pp 10–23.
- Stevens, John. Words and Music in the Middle Ages: Song, Narrative, Dance and Drama, 1050–1350. Cambridge, London, New York: Cambridge University Press, 1986.
- Ziegler, Joanna E., and Susan Rodgers. "Elisabeth of Spalbeek's Trance Dance of Faith: A Performance Theory Interpretation from Anthropological and Art Historical Perspectives." In Performance and Transformation: New Approaches to Late Medieval Spirituality, edited by Mary A. Suydam and Joanna E. Ziegler. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1999, pp. 299–355.

See also Beatrice of Nazareth; Courtly Love; Danse Macabre des Femmes; Festivals of Misrule; Hagiography; Mary, Virgin: In Music; Mysticism and Mystics; Penitentials and Pastoral Manuals; Performance Theory; Roman de Flamenca; Roman de la Rose and Its Reception; Romance, French; Sermons and Preaching; Woman's Song

DANSE MACABRE DES FEMMES

The Danse Macabre des Femmes is a fifteenth-century didactic poem, intended to inspire piety. In a series of paired strophes (Death calls, the victim answers), women are summoned to join the Dance of Death, starting with the queen, who is followed by over thirty women, presented according to the social hierarchy of the period.

The text survives in five manuscripts (B.N. [Bibliothèque nationale] f. f. 1186; N. A. f. f. 10032; B. N. f. f. 25434; B. N. f. f. 995; Arsenal 3637) and two printed editions. Both printings and one manuscript (B. N. f. f. 995) are extensively illustrated, with one woodcut or illumination for each role. The earliest manuscript, B. N. f. f. 1186, dated 1482, contains thirty roles; the latest and most elaborate, B. N. f. f. 995, undated, presents thirty-six.

In form and purpose, the Danse Macabre des Femmes (DMF) mirrors the Danse Macabre des Hommes (DMH), and in all manuscripts and printed editions the two poems appear together, the Men's Dance always presented first. Historically, the first occurrence of the DMH precedes the earliest DMF by nearly sixty years: the DMH is first attested to in 1424, attributed to Jean Gerson, and it was supposedly painted on the walls of the Cimetière des Innocents (Cemetery of the Innocents) in Paris.

The verses for each individual called by Death contain brief comments about her activities and interests, which elaborate the role name (or occupation) heading each response strophe and the woodcut or illumination. Thus the Women's Danse Macabre provides glimpses into daily life at the turn of the sixteenth century. The following roles are found in La Grant Danse Macabre des Femmes (B. N. f. f. 995): queen, duchess, regent, knight's lady, abbess, squire's lady, prioress, young lady, townswoman, widow, merchant, bailiff's lady, virgin, theologian, newlywed, pregnant woman, old maid, Franciscan, friendly woman, wet-nurse, shepherdess, woman on crutches, village woman, old woman, saleswoman, prostitute, bathhouse attendant, girl, nun, witch, bride, darling wife, chambermaid, hosteller, hypocrite, and fool.

Although the text is traditionally attributed to Martial d'Auvergne, who is cited as author only in B. N. f. f. 25434, he is not named in the earliest extant version of the poem (B. N. f. f. 1186, dated 1482) and there is no reference to him in any other manuscript or printing.

Guyot Marchant, a Parisian printer and friend of Martial d'Auvergne, published both printed editions of the DMH and DMF (1486 and 1491).

The content of the poem, its language (Parisian Middle French), and several individual figures indicate Parisian connections for the work, but only the printed texts can be accurately and precisely identified as having been made in Paris.

ANN T. HARRISON

References and Further Reading

The Danse Macabre of Women: MS. Fr. 995 of the Bibliothèque Nationale, edited by Ann T. Harrison. Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 1994.

See also Devotional Literature; Gerson, Jean; Literacy and Reading; Vernacular; Literature, Old French

DANTE ALIGHIERI

Women were central to Dante, from his earliest love poetry until the end of the Commedia. Dante began his poetic journey as a lyric love poet. In the tradition of courtly love, his poetry projects his own fears and desires, without exploring the subjectivity of the lady. In the theologized variant of courtly love Dante calls stil novo poetry (most of Dante's stil novo poems are gathered in the book that tells the story of his love for Beatrice, the Vita nuova), the poet learns to ask no reward of the lady and to find the act of praising her its own reward. Nevertheless, there is no exploration of her subjectivity or assignment to her of moral agency. The ladies of Dante's early lyrics—whose names include Violetta, Fioretta, Lisetta, and the stony cold donna petra as well as Beatrice—have in common the fact that they do not speak.

Beatrice

By contrast, the Beatrice of the Commedia is loquacious; she is a veritable Beatrix loquax. Starting with this anomaly—a lyric lady (not a shepherdess, as in the Occitan pastorela) who speaks—we can see the Beatrice of the Commedia as a hybrid figure. On the one hand, she conserves many of the erotic markers of the lady in the courtly lyric; her poetic existence is predicated on the needs of her lover-poet. Beatrice's behavior in the Commedia is always centered on Dante. Although the poet's use of a young Florentine woman as his vehicle to God may reflect positively on the female sex, fundamental limitations are built into the representation of Beatrice. The limitations imposed on Beatrice are those imposed on the courtly lady; they are culturally derived from the same matrix, the courtly ideology that exalts the lady as a Platonic ideal, rather than viewing her as a human agent with her own inner life and subjectivity. She is supreme, but within a context in which the frame of reference is entirely determined by the needs of the lover-poet.

On the other hand—and this is why Dante's Beatrice is an anomalous hybrid—within the Commedia she possesses an absolutely unprecedented and masculine authority. Most importantly, she exerts this authority in language, in speech: she develops from the silent icon of stilnovist verse and the Vita nuova to the talkative Beatrix loquax of the Commedia. Her hybridity is such that, in the space of two verses, Dante can move from a courtly topos to describe Beatrice's smile to characterizing her speech as infallible: she can both ray her lover with a smile "such that it would make a man happy in the flames," and then use that same mouth to say "according to my infallible judgment" (Par. 7.18–19). The use of the word infallible for female speech is itself stunning, given the long and documented tradition of female speech as the special focus and target of misogyny. Dante's Beatrice is a radically new construct: while the traditions he inherits boast female abstractions like Boethius's Lady Philosophy who speak authoritatively, in a voice that is coded as not gender-specific, that is, masculine, and female non-abstractions who either do not speak or speak within the province of the gender-specific, in Beatrice Dante creates a historicized object of desire—not a personification—who yet speaks. Indeed, in the Paradiso, she speaks like a man, free from the content or modality normatively assigned to female discourse.

Francesca da Rimini

As one of only three characters in the Commedia, along with Virgil and Dante himself, to develop over a long textual span, Beatrice is a singular case, created in a mold used only for her. On the whole, the women of the Commedia, like the men, are represented in brief encounters with the pilgrim; they include classical figures, mainly literary (for example, Dido, Thais), biblical figures (for example, the Virgin to whom St. Bernard prays at the poem's end), and contemporary ones. The most celebrated encounter with a woman in Dante's poem is certainly in Inferno 5, where the pilgrim meets Francesca da Rimini, condemned to the second circle of hell for her adulterous lust.

Critical reaction to the Commedia is governed by theologized hermeneutic guidelines that Dante structured into his poem, guidelines that postulate interpretive categories not significantly more complex than "Dante places Francesca in hell, so his view of her is negative." In recent times criticism has noted Dante's association of female characters with lust and added a typical medieval misogyny to his assessment of Francesca. But a historicist reconstruction of Inferno 5 uncovers a submerged "feminist" agenda embedded in Dante's Francesca da Rimini, a historically obscure and marginal figure to whom Dante grants prominence, celebrity, and agency.

If we look at Dante's handling of Francesca outside of the poem's theologized guidelines, if we historicize Francesca and our reading of Inferno 5, a picture emerges in which Dante writes a gendered story that places unusual value on the personhood of the dynastic wife. Dynastically unimportant, Francesca was forgotten by contemporary chroniclers. The first and most authoritative chronicler of Rimini was Marco Battagli, whose history Marcha contains a section called "On the Origins of the Malatesta" (1352). Battagli alludes to the event in which Francesca died without naming her, indeed without acknowledging her existence, except as an implicit cause of her lover Paolo's death, which occurred causa luxuriae: "Paolo was killed by his brother Giovanni the Lame on account of lust." One son of Malatesta da Verucchio, the founding patriarch of the Malatesta dynasty, killed the other; this fact is of interest because it affects the history of the dynasty. Francesca matters not at all as herself. And, in fact, the only historical document that records her name is the will of her father-in-law, in which he refers to "the dowry of the late lady Francesca." Otherwise, silence.

Dante preserved Francesca, recording her name, giving her a voice, and saving her from consignment to historical oblivion. He broke the silence of the historical record. And, as though to make this point crystal clear, Francesca's is the only contemporary name registered in Inferno 5: Paolo's name is absent, as is Gianciotto's. In canto 5, she is the protagonist, she is the agent, and she is the one who speaks, while Paolo stands by weeping. Through the intervention of Inferno 5, Francesca became a cultural touchstone and reference point, achieving a dignity and a prominence—a celebrity—that in real life she did not possess. The woman who in real life was merely a dynastic pawn, whose brutal death did not even cause a serious rupture between the Malatesta of Rimini and the Polentani of Ravenna, emerges in Dante's version as the canto's unchallenged protagonist. The woman who in real history had no voice and no name emerges in the poem's history as the only voice and only name.

Dante acted as the historian of record for Francesca da Rimini—and for many other women as well. Moreover, in sharp contrast to the courtly poetry of his youth, Dante's portraits of women in the Commedia explore their subjectivity and assign moral agency. He seems particularly drawn to cases of marital and family abuse: we think of Pia in Purgatorio 3 and Piccarda in Paradiso 3. While there are famous women in the Commedia, such as Clare of Assisi and the Empress Constance, the text engages more fully with women otherwise consigned to historical oblivion; indeed, even Beatrice Portinari falls into this category. Any serious assessment of Dante's role in the history of women will have to take the measure of this achievement.

TEODOLINDA BAROLINI

References and Further Reading

- Barolini, Teodolinda. "Dante and Francesca da Rimini: Realpolitik, Romance, Gender." Speculum 75 (2000): 1–28.
- . "Francesca da Rimini." In The Dante Encyclopedia. New York and London: Garland, 2000.
- . "Beyond (Courtly) Dualism: Thinking about Gender in Dante's Lyrics." In Dante for the New Millennium, edited by Teodolinda Barolini and H. Wayne Storey. New York: Fordham University Press, 2003, pp. 65–89.
- . "Lifting the Veil? Notes Toward a Gendered History of Italian Literature." In Medieval Constructions in Gender and Identity: Essays in Honor of Joan M. Ferrante, edited by Teodolinda Barolini. Tempe, Ariz.: Arizona Center for Medieval and Renaissance Studies, 2005.
- Ferrante, Joan M. Woman as Image in Medieval Literature from the Twelfth Century to Dante. New York: Columbia University Press, 1975.
- . "Dante's Beatrice: Priest of an Androgynous God." CEMERS Occasional Papers, 2. Binghamton, N.Y.: State University of New York Press, 1992.
- . "Women." In The Dante Encyclopedia. New York and London: Garland, 2000.
- Kirkham, Victoria. "A Canon of Women in Dante's Commedia." Annali d'Italianistica 7 (1989): 16–41.
- Jacoff, Rachel. "Transgression and Transcendence: Figures of Female Desire in Dante's Commedia." Romanic Review 79 (1988): 129–142.
- Psaki, F. Regina. "The Sexual Body in Dante's Celestial Paradise." In Imagining Heaven in the Middle Ages, edited by Jan S. Emerson and Hugh Feiss. New York: Garland, 2000, pp. 47–61.

See also Beatrice; Clare of Assisi; Constance of Sicily; Courtly Love; Italy; Literature, Italian; Mary, Virgin; in Literature; Misogyny; Personifications Visualized as Women

DATINI, MARGHERITA

Margherita Bandini Datini (1357–1423) is known through her correspondence with her husband Francesco Datini (1335–1410). Margherita, of a dispossessed but elite Florentine family, married the rich, self-made "merchant of Prato" in Avignon when she was nineteen and he forty-one. After returning to Italy, their relationship deteriorated, and they often preferred to be apart, moving separately between Prato and nearby Florence, the cities where Francesco had his principal businesses. Margherita and Francesco's core problem was a failure to have children, Margherita's "fault," since Francesco had two illegitimate children during the marriage (which did not help the relationship). Margherita's failure to conceive was linked to the debilitating pains she suffered before her menstrual periods, probably the condition now called endometriosis, and although the couple searched for remedies until Margherita was in her late thirties, she remained childless.

Margherita compensated for infertility through acting as loving stepmother to Francesco's illegitimate daughter and a niece, through religious devotion, and, except during periods of poor health, by striving to be the model of a competent woman. She managed a large household, its personnel, and, in Prato, the related agricultural, building, business, and political activities. She contributed to Francesco's business by overseeing apprentices, assisting in debt collection, and sewing and cooking saleable objects, and she contributed to Francesco's social ambitions by acting as a well-mannered hostess. She also contributed to the marriage by reporting regularly to Francesco by letter. Margherita could read and write at an elementary level throughout her marriage, but her poor skills long made her dependent on scribes. Nonetheless, she prided herself on oral composition; nor did she let scribes prevent her from giving vent to her sharp tongue. Then, in her mid-thirties, she worked to improve her reading and letter writing and in 1399 she produced a spate of twenty-one substantial autograph letters. After 1399, she returned to using scribes. She had, however, more than proven her facility in letter writing.

ANN CRABB

References and Further Reading

- Byrne, Joseph P., and Eleanor A. Congdon. "Mothering in the Casa Datini." Journal of Medieval History 25.1 (1999): 35–56.
- Crabb, Ann. "Ne pas être mère: l'autodéfense d'une Florentine vers 1400." Clio: Histoire, Femmes et Sociétés: Maternités 21 (2005): 150–161.
- Datini, Margherita. Per la tua Margherita: Lettere di una donna del '300 al marito mercante. CD-Rom. Prato: Archivio di stato, 2002.
- Origo, Iris. Merchant of Prato. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1957. Reprint, Boston: David R. Godine, 1986.

See also Household Management; Infertility; Italy; Letter Writing; Literacy and Reading; Vernacular; Merchant Families, Women of; Strozzi, Alessandra

DAWN SONG (ALBA)

The dawn song (or alba) is a lyric monologue or dialogue staging the moment when lovers see that their night together is about to end. As dawn songs appear in many cultures and are often connected to either religious festivals or wedding rituals, one of the key debates concerns their identification as a genre on the basis of formal criteria, rather than as a common erotic theme found in poetry and narratives from Ovid's Amores (I, 13) onwards.

There is an identifiable group of courtly dawn songs in medieval European poetry, found especially in the Iberian peninsula, France, and Germany, dating from the twelfth to the early fourteenth centuries. The most accessible sample and discussion of these songs is the survey edited by Arthur Hatto in 1965. Over fifteen dawn songs survive in Old Occitan, attributed to troubadours active in what are now southern France and Catalonia. It is no longer assumed that these are the models for the songs in other languages; but a poetic treatise composed after 1250 gives guidelines for the alba, a song set at day-break that either praises or blames both the lady and the dawn, and the gaita (watchman), a song in which the watchman intervenes, which is set at night. Only one Catalan example survives of a gaita, but there are several dawn songs in which watchmen speak. Most courtly dawn songs were sung by a soloist; some are mini-dramas. These may include the participation of a supportive watchman or male friend, or the intervention of a jealous husband. Many trace a progression from the first light of dawn to day-break; others present the speaker's reaction to bird-song or watchmen's cries. The courtly dawn songs tend to have refrains and share similar emotional content: the speaker expresses dismay at the arrival of dawn, because it means that the lovers will part. Some (not all) describe an illicit or adulterous relationship; one German poem depicts a married couple. There are allusions to the Song of Songs in the lovers' meetings and partings at dawn as well as in the interaction of the lovers with watchmen (2:17, 3:6, 5:7). This influence has been traced especially in religious dawn songs, of which a number survive in several languages.

One of the early aims of research into the dawn song was to establish whether it constitutes the survival of an older tradition located especially in the Iberian peninsula. Folklorists traced similarities with erotic songs sung by women at weddings, or at springtime and midsummer festivals. The deciphering of feminine-voiced poetic fragments in the Romance and colloquial Arabic end-strophes (kharjas) to Hispano-Arabic and Hebrew poems composed in al-Andalus (around 1050–1150) seemed to prove this hypothesis, but the language and content of these verses have not been interpreted conclusively. The major problem with identifying the courtly dawn song as a survival of popular women's song is that many of them have a male speaker, and all are preserved in anthologies intended for an aristocratic audience. The Old French dawn songs are related to dance songs but these may be "popularising" (to quote Pierre Bec), not authentically popular pieces.

Another strand of scholarship sought sources in Christian liturgy, as well as in Latin poems such as the tenth-century Phæbi claro, which has a refrain in a Romance dialect, but depicts watchmen, not lovers. Once again, it is hard to untangle a poem that happens to mention the sunrise from a dawn song.

Critics in the later part of the twentieth century moved away from theories of origins towards interpretations of individual poems as works of literature, set within their historical and cultural context. This has enhanced their complexity, for a reference to the appearance of the morning star may be read as either an allusion to Venus as goddess of erotic love or to the Last Judgement (Revelation, 2:29 and 22:16).

Many dawn songs have been read as meditations on the tensions between religious and erotic love. The courtly dawn song has also been reinterpreted, in the light of feminist criticism, as an attempt by lyric poets to construct a subjective voice for the courtly lady. No trobairitz are credited with dawn songs, and the genre seems to be mostly male-authored. It still remains to be established whether the similarities between dawn songs in this wide range of languages stem from a logical development in the scenario of courtly love poetry or whether explicit connections between different poetic schools can be traced.

CATHERINE LEGLU

References and Further Reading

- Battles, Paul. "Chaucer and the Traditions of Dawn-Song." Chaucer Review 31 (1997): 317–338.
- Bec, Pierre. La Lyrique française au Moyen Âge (XIIe-XIIIe siècle). Contribution à une typologie des genres poétiques médiévaux. 2 vols. Paris: Picard, 1977–1978.
- Empaytaz de Croome, D. Albor: Mediaeval and Renaissance Dawn-Songs in the Iberian Peninsula. Ann Arbor, Mich.: UMIT, 1980.
- Hatto, Arthur T., ed. and trans. Eos, An Enquiry into the Theme of Lovers' Meetings and Partings at Dawn. The Hague: Mouton, 1965.
- Menocal, Maria R., Raymond Scheindlin, and Michael Sells, eds. The Literature of al-Andalus. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000.
- Poe, Elizabeth W. "La Transmission de l'alba en ancien provençal." Cahiers de civilisation médiévale 31 (1988): 323–345.
- . "The Three Modalities of the Old Provençal Alba." Romance Philology 37 (1984): 259–272.
- . "A New Light on the Alba." Viator 15 (1984): 139–150.
- Sigal, Gail. Erotic Dawn-Songs of the Middle Ages: Voicing the Lyric Lady. Gainesville, Fla.: University Press of Florida, 1996. (List of poems, pp. 215–216.)

Spence, Sarah. "Oh, Criator!: The Subversive Role of the Watchman in 'Gaité de la Tor.'" Philological Quarterly 63 (1984): 116–125.

See also Courtly Love; Eroticism in Literature; Literature, German; Literature, Iberian; Literature, Occitan; Literature, Old French; Performance in Lyric; Trobairitz and Troubadours; Woman's Song

DEATH, MOURNING, AND COMMEMORATION

Death marked the inevitable end of a person's life. With birth, it was one of the two essential phases of an individual's life cycle. The practical day-to-day care of the terminally ill and dead was primarily a task for women. The washing and laying out of the bodies, the wrapping up in shrouds, and the preparation for burial took place in the home, and all indications are that the job was done by women with expertise in such matters. Each village would have someone who often combined the task with that of midwife. These women would also organise the mourning within the family prior to the burial in the local churchyard. Wailing and tearing of hair, as outward signs of distress and grief, were also reserved for the females. Keeping wake near the body, especially during the night, would guarantee that the dead would be protected against bad spirits. The procedures for mourning and burial in these basic guises were fairly universal in medieval Europe. With the advance of Christianisation we see a reduction in cremations in favour of the burial of shrouded bodies to facilitate the resurrection of the body at the Last Judgement. The growing acceptance of Christianity with its emphasis on the afterlife (in heaven or hell) made proper spiritual preparation before death an essential liturgical task that was set aside for the (male) clergy of the church. Thus an essential process of collaboration between laity and clergy developed to ensure that the practical and spiritual cares were put in place.

One of the tools offered by the clergy for spiritual guidance was praying. Prayers were said to God to ask him for forgiveness for the dead person's sins and they were also addressed to the saints on the understanding that they would intercede with God on behalf of the dead and their families. After the millennium the belief existed that prayers by women were most efficacious. This at least is how Abelard, the early twelfth-century philosopher in Paris, recommended a Psalter to his former lover Heloise for "prayers of the faithful especially those of women on behalf of their dear ones and of wives for their menfolk," adding that those by religious women were the most effective.

Apart from the liturgical and lay care around the moment of death, there was the much longer and more elaborate process of commemoration that continued long after death had occurred. Commemoration took many different forms. There was the physical manifestation of the tomb slab or stone marking the dead person's grave in the churchyard. In Scandinavia there exists from the millennium a series of stone slabs erected on cross roads and near bridges with elaborate descriptions of blood relationships and inheritance bequests. Away from the physical burial site there were also written records listing the names of the dead. From the ninth century, libri vitae (books of life) were kept in many monasteries and cathedral churches. They would list the names of the dead, often grouped according to their kin, or for women, with their marital families. Sometimes, too, as in the eleventh-century book of Thorney Abbey, we find a king and queen (Cnut and Emma) listed with their followers. From the mid-twelfth century onwards such records are replaced by more elaborate prose narratives, the family chronicles, commissioned by (female) members of a particular family, as they offered greater scope for detailed accounts of individual acts of bravery, a good example being Lambert of Ardres' history of the counts of Guînes written c. 1210. Similarly, there is evidence of tapestries, embroideries, and other artifacts created specifically for memorial purposes, the most famous of which is the Bayeux Tapestry, recording the battle of Hastings in 1066, and being a rare example that has survived. The Book of Ely, however, records a similar hanging, now lost, by Aelfflaed for her husband Brythnoth, who died while fighting against the Vikings in 991. Men and women in families collaborated in the process of remembering the dead, with women being especially prominent in the oral tradition.

ELISABETH VAN HOUTS

References and Further Reading

- Geary, Patrick. Phantoms of Remembrance: Memory and Oblivion at the End of the First Millennium. Princeton, N.J., 1994.
- Geuenich, Dieter, and Otto G. Oexle, eds. Memoria in der Gesellschaft des Mittelalters. Göttingen, 1994.
- Innes, M. "Keeping It in the Family: Women and Aristocratic Memory, 700–1200." In Medieval Memories: Men, Women and the Past, 700–1300, edited by Elizabeth van Houts. Harlow, 2001, pp. 17–35.
- Le Jan, R. Famille et pouvoir dans le monde Franc (VIIe-Xe siècle). Essai d'anthropologie. Paris, 1995.
- McKitterick, Rosamond. History and Memory in the Carolingian World. Cambridge, 2004.
- McLaughlin, Megan. Consorting with Saints: The Ideology of Prayer for the Death in Early Medieval France. Ithaca, N.Y., 1993.

Oexle, Otto G. "Memoria und Memorialüberlieferung im früheren Mittelalter." Frühmittelalterliche Studien 10 (1976): 70–95.

Sawyer, Birgit. The Viking-Age Rune-Stones: Custom and Commemoration in Early Medieval Scandinavia. Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.

Van Houts, Elizabeth. Memory and Gender in Medieval Europe, 900–1200. Toronto-Basingstoke, 1999.

See also Burials and Tombs; Church; Demography; Grave Goods; Heloise; Necrologies and Mortuary Rolls

DEBATE LITERATURE

Speaking and writing in medieval European culture were defined by the arts of debate. At the schools and universities during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, thousands of men and some women, such as Heloise in France and Hildegard of Bingen in Germany, were trained to understand language as an argumentative exchange. Whether clerics operated orally or through written texts, they learned how to face off with their interlocutors. The disputatio, or disputation, engaged them in energetic, often furious exchanges. And it equipped their language actions with a Biblical mythology: Adam inaugurating the first authoritative words when he named the animals; Eve joining in, questioning her mate. In their fallible line, human speakers had to work hard to secure this power of language that, otherwise, was deemed a divine prerogative.

This conception of debate conditioned vernacular literature from the earliest twelfth-century texts. In genres such as the Occitan tenso, lovers were represented in countless rounds of dialogue, contesting just how genuine their passions were. Such contests were projected onto animals in the Parliament of Fowles, even onto different members of the human body, hearts, minds, and souls that we find in German, French, and Spanish narrative poetry.

Across Europe, there was no living form too small to be considered a medium for debate. These struggles were internal, cast in the psychological battles (psychomachia) suffered by characters in romances such as those by Chrétien de Troyes; they were also external, taking on grand cosmic dimensions in allegories like Dante's Divine Comedy, where supernatural divine forces were pitted against evil ones.

By the fifteenth century, the tradition of debate was so deep-seated that it implicated the social status of literary texts, particularly courtly texts depicting women. The Romance of the Rose touched off a polemical exchange, known as the Querelle de la Rose, involving Parisian humanists, including Christine de Pizan, and the theologian Jean Gerson. Literature not only represented debate, it became the very subject of it. At stake was the fictive figure of a woman who disputed, and the possibility of women authors challenging conventional wisdom and entering fully into the ongoing debates at the heart of medieval culture.

HELEN SOLTERER

References and Further Reading

Blamires, Alcuin. The Case for Women in Medieval Culture. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1997.

Brown, Catherine. Contrary Things: Exegesis, Dialectic, and the Poetics of Didacticism. Stanford, 1998.

Brown-Grant, Rosalind. Christine de Pizan and the Moral Defence of Women: Reading Beyond Gender. Cambridge, 1999.

Enders, Jody. "The Theater of Scholastic Erudition." Comparative Drama 27 (1993): 341–363.

Hult, David. Le Cycle de la Belle dame sans mercy: une anthologie poétique du Xve siècle. Paris: Champion, 2003.

Solterer, Helen. The Master and Minerva: Disputing Women in French Medieval Culture. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1995.

See also Chrétien de Troyes; Christine de Pizan; Dante Alighieri; Gerson, Jean; Roman de la Rose and Its Reception; Scholasticism; Universities

DEFENSES OF WOMEN

The case for women in medieval European culture was inextricably linked to the all-pervasive misogyny it sought to dispute. Throughout the Middle Ages writers enthusiastically debated the morality of the female sex, often in isolated passages within longer narratives, but increasingly in didactic texts that presented the evidence for and against women. By the later Middle Ages a new genre had developed—the defense of women. It consisted of works in Latin and the vernaculars designed to refute the claims of overtly antifeminist literature and to rehabilitate the female sex. Although most contributors to the genre were men, some anonymous, the most famous exponent was Christine de Pizan, who in her Letter of the God of Love, City of Ladies, and correspondence with supporters of Jean de Meun expertly challenged clerical misogyny while debating the issues provoked by her reading of the Roman de la Rose.

Roots of Profeminine Writings

The roots of profeminine material, like those of misogyny, predate the Middle Ages. The apocryphal third book of Esdras includes several "proofs" of the power of women, while patristic discussion of woman's role in the biblical narratives of the Creation, Fall, Incarnation, and Passion furnishes positive arguments to counter the derogatory remarks of Ovid, Juvenal, Jerome, and others. Consequently, medieval defenders of women had the following categories of argument at their disposal:

1. The social benefits of women: They give birth to, nurture, clothe, and feed men; they improve their behavior and inspire them to great feats of prowess or artistic achievement.
2. The theological privileges of women:
  - E loco*—God favored woman by creating her inside paradise;
  - E materia*—she was fashioned from Adam’s rib, superior material to clay (admittedly man’s creation preceded woman’s, but God’s second attempt surpassed his first);
  - In conceptione*—God became flesh through a woman, thus honoring all womankind;
  - In apparicione*—after the Resurrection, Christ appeared to women first;
  - In exaltatione*—the Virgin Mary, by being crowned Queen of Heaven, was raised above all other creatures, including the angels.
3. The exoneration of Eve: Without Eve’s sin there would have been no Virgin Mary; Adam, as the stronger character, was responsible for the Fall, while the devil exploited Eve’s innocent susceptibility.
4. To “defame” women is uncourtly (reflecting badly on their male detractors) and illogical (all men are born of women, thus criticism of mothers damages oneself).
5. Men slander women out of ignorance and spite (impotent clerics abuse those they can no longer woo).
6. Misogyny relies too much on generalisation and negative exempla. Although some women are evil, they are not representative of their sex and many contrary examples (from the Virgin Mary to contemporary good women) can be adduced.
7. Etymology: The Latin term mulier implies woman’s sweetness and softness (mollis), hence her ability to pacify hot-headed males.

To a modern reader many of these arguments seem dangerously misogynistic, especially when the faults of the “weaker sex” are used in her defense, or when she is praised for behaving better than her nature would predict. Yet medieval views on gender were fundamentally essentialist, and rather than challenge received ideas about woman’s nature, her defenders preferred to rehabilitate her “essentially feminine” characteristics, turning weakness, naivety, even her humoral “coldness” into virtues.

Replies to Misogynous Texts

Profeminine literature is always either implicitly or explicitly in dialogue with misogyny. Sometimes writers would create diptychs, pairing a misogynous text with one complimentary to women. An early example of this is Marbod of Rennes (c. 1035–1123), who followed his De meretrice, a diatribe against women, with their encomium in De matrona; in the fourteenth century Jean LeFèvre composed the Livre de Leësce as a lengthy palinode (retraction) to his misogamous translation of the Lamentationes Matheoluli; and in fifteenth-century Spain, Pere Torrellas produced several defenses of women to counter his antifeminist Coplas de las calidades de las donas. The composition of medieval manuscripts could also encourage debate: laudatory Minnereiden (lyrics on love) mingle with derogatory ones in several extant German compilations, and in a thirteenth-century French manuscript (Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale de France, fonds français 837) the complimentary Bien des femes has been copied together with the condemnatory Blasme des femes. Debate is most obviously generated, however, by works in which two speakers argue the pro and contra alternately. Examples include the late-thirteenth-century Middle English poem The Thrush and the Nightingale and the Florentine Pucci’s Il Contrasto delle donne. However, despite the inclusion of negative opinions, these works still qualify as defenses of women, since in both the pro-woman speaker is given the last word, the female Nightingale triumphantly invoking the example of the Virgin Mary to clinch her case. Similarly, in Albertano of Brescia’s Book of Consolation and Advice (1246) Prudence eventually succeeds in persuading her somewhat misogynous husband Melibeus that a wife’s advice is worth taking.

In these defenses both forensic and epideictic (legal and oratorical) rhetoric are employed. The Leësce creates a courtroom scenario in which an advocate for women, the allegorical figure Joy, refutes point by point the accusations made by the arch-misogynist Mathéolus before concluding with a list of praiseworthy women. However, when considering possible reader responses to defenses of women the issues of voice and tone are crucial. Despite the occasional reference, even apology, to ladies in the audience, most male-authored texts create, through the use of pronouns and forms of address, an implied addressee gendered masculine. Thus women are objectified by profeminine discourse, making it difficult for their male “supporters” to escape charges of misogyny. Besides, ostensibly positive works, such as Robert of Blois’s L’Honneur des dames, are rather androcentric, focusing on the beneficial effects ladies have on men and on the undesirable consequences for male honour of slandering women. When male authors invent female speakers to defend their cause, there is also the possibility, as in the case of Leësce, of the female advocate being humorously undermined. Moreover, not all works that debate the woman question end with a clear, positive judgement, and one suspects that many clerics used the genre to display their rhetorical and dialectical virtuosity, rather than to make a serious contribution to social and moral debate.

Christine de Pizan

Nevertheless, LeFèvre's 4,000-line palinode contains much persuasive profeminine material, which Christine de Pizan (1365–c. 1430), a committed defender of women, adapted to her own unambiguous ends. Employing many of the rhetorical strategies used by clerical misogynists (exempla, the citation of authorities, enumeration, analogy, allegory), she undermines her opponents' accusations through ironic mimicry, eschews generalisation, challenges their logic, and defends women by invoking experience supported by carefully selected textual authority. In her Letter of the God of Love, she employs the authoritative voice of Cupid to challenge the defamation of women; in her City of Ladies, three allegorical figures (Reason, Rectitude, and Justice), aspects of her own authorial persona, help her to clear away the rubble of misogyny and build a city for virtuous women who can take pride in their female heritage. Although many of her exempla are also present in Boccaccio's Concerning Famous Women, Christine's selective rewriting of their stories removes the ambivalence that prevents Boccaccio's work (like Chaucer's Legend of Good Women) from being a totally convincing defense.

Although the case for women could become as repetitive and assertive as the discourse of misogyny, medieval writers injected variety into their defenses through the adoption of different textual formats, voices, and registers, and by selecting from a growing stock of profeminine arguments the material most appropriate to their aims and audiences within specific geographical and historical contexts. Examination of the genre from the perspective of rhetorical variation and local specificity would bear further critical fruit.

KAREN PRATT

References and Further Reading

- Blamires, Alcuin, Karen Pratt, and C. W. Marx, eds. Woman Defamed and Woman Defended: An Anthology of Medieval Texts. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1992.
- . The Case for Women in Medieval Culture. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1997.
- Blumenfeld-Kosinski, Renate. "Jean le Fèvre's Livre de Leesce: Praise or Blame of Women?" Speculum 69 (1994): 705–725.
- Brown-Grant, Rosalind. Christine de Pizan and the Moral Defence of Women: Reading Beyond Gender. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1999.
- Christine de Pizan. The Book of the City of Ladies, translated by Rosalind Brown-Grant. Harmondsworth: Penguin Classics, 1999.
- Fenster, Thelma S., and Mary Carpenter Erler, eds. Poems of Cupid, God of Love. Leiden: Brill, 1990.
- Fenster, Thelma S., and Clare A. Lees, eds. Gender in Debate from the Early Middle Ages to the Renaissance. New York: Palgrave, 2002.
- Fiero, Gloria K., Wendy Pfeffer, and Mathé Allain, eds. Three Medieval Views of Women. New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 1989.
- Solterer, Helen. The Master and Minerva: Disputing Women in French Medieval Culture. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1995.
- See also Aristotelian Concepts of Women and Gender; Boccaccio, Giovanni; Christine de Pizan; Debate Literature; Eve; Exemplum; Femininity and Masculinity; Gender Ideologies; Gynecology; Mary, Virgin; Mary, Virgin in Literature; Misogyny; Roman de la Rose and Its Reception

DEMOGRAPHY

Historical demographers study births, marriages, migration, and deaths in order to understand the characteristics of past populations and how they changed over time. Their analyses can tell us the size of a specific population (such as England in 1377 or Florence in 1427) and details about this population's age structure, marital status, household size, and balance of men and women. Historical demographers also study the processes that helped to create these characteristics, particularly fertility (the rate at which women bear children), nuptiality (the frequency, features, and dissolution of marriages), mortality (death rates), and migration. But they are interested as well in dissecting how particular social, economic, cultural, and religious factors may have influenced these processes and thus the characteristics of a specific population over time. Although methodological debates are a notable feature of historical demography, the discipline has more to tell us about non-elite populations and women than any other historical approach because of its focus on the domestic lives of all people, not just the well-documented and elite members of society. Several demographic measures, including sex ratio, age at marriage, and marital status, provide especially useful insights into the role of women in the society and economy of the Middle Ages.

Sex Ratio

The sex ratio measures the proportion of women to men and is usually expressed as the number of men to every 100 women in a population; thus a sex ratio of 90 indicates that there are 111 women for every 100 men in a society. Since the sex ratio at birth is 105, but evens out to 100 by adulthood (because mortality is higher for boys than girls), testing for sex ratios prompts scholars to explain why there might be more or fewer women in a population than there should be. For example, researchers analyzing ninth-century medieval estate surveys of peasants have shown that adult sex ratios ranged from about 110 to 253 men for each 100 women, an extraordinarily skewed numerical balance that scholars have struggled to explain.

One controversial explanation attributes the imbalanced sex ratio to female infanticide: in a time of subsistence agriculture and scarcity, families deliberately or unconsciously chose to favor their male children, perhaps even going so far as to abandon their baby girls in times of famine, a practice documented in early saints' lives as well as law codes. The fact that mothers tended to nurse their male babies longer than their female babies, and that the households with the smallest amount of farming land tended to have the most male children, lends weight to this argument. Other explanations point to the higher mortality women faced because of the risks of childbirth, the rigors of agricultural work, and iron deficiencies in the diet, although this does not explain why the sex ratio of children was also higher than average. Another explanation focuses on the under-reporting of women (a perennial problem in any kind of medieval tax assessment), because many young single women were living and working in the lord's workshops (often oriented towards the production of cloth) and thus escaped the survey. What is interesting to note here is that the arguments demographers have formulated to explain their results help to open up our understanding of many aspects of women's lives, including the treatment of girls compared to boys, the delicate balance that poor peasant women faced in the struggle for survival, and the characteristics of women's work in the early medieval economy.

No other medieval societies show such a high sex ratio as these early surveys, although analyses of cemetery burials and late medieval taxes (such as the English poll tax of 1377 or local assessments in German and French towns) suggest that there was a tendency for there to be more men than women in the countryside, but more women than men in towns, particularly during the late Middle Ages, when sex ratios of around 90–95 were not unusual in medieval towns.

Scholars suggest that these lower urban sex ratios were due to female migration to towns in search of work, which was more plentiful and varied for women in towns than in rural villages. The more favorable laws in towns regarding inheritance and trade may also have prompted female-led migration to urban centers. To support this thesis about female immigration, scholars have exploited some unusual sources, from depositions made by servants in church courts about their past movements, to court fines assessed on lodgers and vagrants, to archaeological analysis of medieval skeletons in rural and urban cemeteries.

Age at Marriage

Demographers have focused much effort on determining at what age women married and how many women never married, because these two measures are so important for calculating potential fertility, which helps us assess whether a population is growing or declining. Women who marry at age sixteen, for example, are going to have more children than women who first marry at twenty-six. Age at marriage also had an effect on a woman's married life; younger brides, for instance, were more likely to enter marriages arranged by their kin and less likely to have gained the maturity and experience that came from a period of working for a wage. If they married men who were on average ten years older (the marriage pattern that prevailed in late medieval Tuscan towns), the older husband probably dominated decision-making in the marriage. In contrast, a woman who married in her twenties normally had an opportunity to work for several years and to circulate socially to meet a husband of her own choosing, often someone closer to herself in age. These companionate marriages made by older women were, many historians argue, more common amongst artisans and the poor than among women of the landed elite or rich bourgeoisie, who tended to marry in their teens. Where one lived also seems to have made a difference since in general women married at an earlier age in Mediterranean regions than in northern Europe; in late medieval Tuscany, for example, women in both towns and the countryside married around the age of eighteen, although wealthy women married around sixteen. Men from wealthier families, however, married later (around the age of thirty-one) than poorer men, who married closer to the age of twenty-eight.

A variety of factors could influence the age of marriage of women (which is far more important for calculating potential fertility than the age of marriage for men). In hard times, for instance, when land was scarce, wages low, and prices high, peasant and working-class women seem to have delayed marriage until they and their spouses could save enough to start a new household. This sensitivity to economic climate was, however, less of a factor among the wealthy households of the landed elite or rich merchants. In Italian cities, moreover, there was a strong tendency among the mercantile and aristocratic elite for the newly married couple to reside with the groom's family, where the new, young bride was subject to the authority of her in-laws as well as her husband. Scholars are more divided about whether rising standards of living and opportunities for work, such as occurred in the labor-starved period of the late Middle Ages, after one-third or more of the population died from plague in 1348–1350, promoted or hindered the age at which women chose to marry. On the one hand, peasants would have had easier access to the landed resources needed to set up a new household, but on the other hand, there is also intriguing evidence that many peasant women chose to migrate to towns in search of work where, freer from parental influence, they delayed marriage until their mid- to late twenties. Indeed, migration appears to have strongly influenced the age of marriage by driving it upwards. Other scholars (especially those working in southern Europe) argue that because the late medieval mortality crises caused life expectancy to fall, there was increased pressure on women to marry and reproduce. Those working in Mediterranean cultures, however, have also argued that cultural imperatives to marry made women relatively impervious to the influence of social conditions in deciding when to marry.

One of the biggest debates in historical demography concerns when women began marrying later. Early modern demographers, who draw on the detailed information available in parish registers, have shown that, although there were always regional variations, the average age at first marriage was creeping upwards, so that by the seventeenth century women in northern Europe usually waited until their mid- to late twenties to marry, while those in southern Europe were delaying marriage until their early to mid-twenties. These later marriages have been associated with what is called the "European marriage pattern," a demographic regime characterized by not only a late age at marriage (at least twenty-three for women and twenty-six for men), but also a high percentage (around ten to twenty percent) of people who never married. Although medievalists lack direct data on age at marriage (except for late medieval northern Italy), they have discovered other markers of the European marriage pattern, including large numbers of female servants and "life-cycle service," a system that delayed marriage because men and women left home as adolescents to work in the homes of others for several years before marrying.

Marital Status

An individual's married status not only tells us something about her domestic life, but for demographers also helps to predict whether there were enough child-bearing women to stimulate population growth. Recently demographers have realized that the proportion of lifelong singlewomen (those who never marry) could exercise more influence over the total size of pre-modern populations than any other single factor. Since it is almost impossible to measure how many never-married women there were in any one medieval community, scholars have focused on finding the structures—such as life-cycle service and large numbers of domestic servants—that were associated with singlewomen, as well as examining how a singlewoman's choice or ability to marry was influenced by female employment and wages, by mortality rates, or by cultural and religious mores. In Mediterranean regions where an honor system stressing the sexual purity and respectability of women prevailed, for example, the proportions of women who had not married by age fifty were extremely low: 3.8 percent in Florence and a miniscule 1.7 percent in the countryside.

It is easier to calculate the proportions of life-cycle singlewomen (women who had reached reproductive age but were as yet unmarried) in past populations, although demographers are careful to distinguish them from single widowed women. The proportion of this group was determined by age at marriage. Where women married young, as in Tuscany, singlewomen rarely accounted for more than twenty percent of the adult female population, but in England in 1377 the proportion was almost thirty percent, and rose to forty percent in many late medieval towns of Germany, northern France, and England. Although the proportions of lifelong singlewomen changed little in Mediterranean Europe, the size of groups of life-cycle singlewomen increased as the age at marriage rose in the final decades of the fifteenth century.

The vast majority of medieval women eventually married, although they did so earlier and in greater proportions in southern Europe, and somewhat later and in lesser proportions in towns, especially in northern Europe. The scarce evidence that we do have about fertility suggests that married women began bearing children within a year of marriage, but that infant mortality was so high (approaching thirty-five to forty percent in the late Middle Ages) that few families had more than three children who lived to adolescence. Urban households were always smaller than rural households, a reflection of greater urban mortality and the precarious subsistence of many urban households. Wealth, however, made a huge difference in the lives of married women; richer women became mothers at an earlier age, and their better diet allowed them to bear more children and raise them to adulthood; the elites' practice of sending their newborns out for wet-nursing also allowed wealthier mothers to become pregnant again more quickly. A matter of considerable controversy is whether medieval women practiced any effective forms of birth control, although seasonal cycles of births and rising clerical invective against contraceptive practices suggest that many couples found ways to prevent births.

The experience of widowhood varied in southern and northern Europe. The Mediterranean honor culture and dowry system discouraged remarriage for women, for example, so that widows represented a hefty twenty-five percent of adult women in 1427 Florence (and seventeen percent of women in the countryside), a trend magnified by the tendency of Florentine women to marry men much older than themselves. There is also some evidence that by the twelfth century women were outliving men, a trend that continues to the present day. Old age for many of these widows was, however, a dismal experience, since tax records show that households headed by widows were amongst the poorest and the smallest. In early sixteenth-century Coventry, which had suffered severe economic decline in the previous decades, there were over eight times as many widows as widowers, and half of the widows lived alone, many in abject poverty. In Mediterranean Europe, however, widows were often absorbed into the households of their children (especially their sons), so they did not appear as often as heads of households. And, once again, wealth could make a difference. Wealthy widows (especially if they were young) were much more likely to remarry than poor widows, who could bring fewer resources to the new marriage. Remarried widows often brought children from their first marriage into their new household, where children from their new husband's previous marriage might also reside. The emotional tensions such remarriages involving children could entail are evident in the "wicked stepmother" motifs so prevalent in fairy tales and folklore.

MARYANNE KOWALESKI

References and Further Reading

Coleman, Emily. "Infanticide in the Early Middle Ages." In Women in Medieval Society, edited by Susan Mosher Stuard. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1976, pp. 47–70.

- Goldberg, P. J. P. Women, Work and Life-Cycle in a Medieval Economy: Women in York and Yorkshire, c. 1300–1520. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1992.
- Herlihy, David. Medieval Households. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1985.
- Herlihy, David, and Christiane Klapisch-Zuber. Tuscans and Their Families: A Study of the Florentine Catasto of 1427. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1985.
- Klapisch-Zuber, Christiane. Women, Family and Ritual in Renaissance Italy, translated by Lydia G. Cochrane. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1985.
- Kowaleski, Maryanne. "Singlewomen in Medieval and Early Modern Europe: The Demographic Perspective." In Singlewomen in the European Past, 1250–1800, edited by Judith M. Bennett and Amy M. Froide. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999, pp. 38–81, 325–344.
- Molho, Anthony. Marriage Alliance in Later Medieval Florence. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1994.
- Pythian-Adams, Charles. Desolation of a City: Coventry and the Urban Crisis of the Late Middle Ages. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1979.
- Poos, L. R. A Rural Society After the Black Death: Essex 1350–1525. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991.
- Rheubottom, David B. "'Sisters First': Betrothal Order and Age at Marriage in Fifteenth-Century Ragusa." Journal of Family History 13 (1988): 359–376.
- Smith, Richard M. "Geographical Diversity in the Resort to Marriage in Late Medieval Europe: Work, Reputation, and Unmarried Females in the Household Formation System of Northern and Southern Europe." In Woman Is a Worthy Wight: Women in English Society c. 1200–1500, edited by P. J. P. Goldberg. Wolfenboro Falls, N. H.: Alan Sutton, 1992, pp. 16–59.
- Smith, Richard M. "Some Reflections on the Evidence for the Origins of the 'European Marriage Pattern' in England." In The Sociology of the Family: New Directions for Britain, edited by Chris Harris. Keele: University of Keele, 1979.
- Thoen, Erik. "Historical Demography in Late Medieval Rural Flanders: Recent Results and Hypotheses." In Peasants and Townsmen in Medieval Europe: Studia in Honorem Adriaan Verhulst, edited by Jean-Marie Duvosquel and Erik Thoen. Ghent: Snoeck-Ducaju, 1995, pp. 573–582.

See also Artisan Families, Women of; Cities and Towns; Contraception; Infants and Infanticide; Infertility; Marriage Ceremonies; Merchant Families, Women of; Migration and Mobility; Noble Women; Old Age; Peasants; Plague; Records, Rural; Records, Urban; Remarriage; Servants; Singlewomen; Widows; Work

DEVOTIO MODERNA

See Modern Devotion

DEVOTIONAL ART

Devotional art is a category that encompasses a wide variety of objects intended to aid individuals in prayer. Such images survive in a variety of media throughout the medieval period, such as manuscript illuminations, panel paintings, and sculptures created from precious metals or ivory, and also were available on a relatively inexpensive basis in the single-leaf woodcuts produced at the very end of the era. Typical subjects included biblical figures, saints, or biblical narratives distilled to the minimum of figures needed to identify the scene. Depictions of the Virgin and Child, such as the thirteenth-century ivory sculpture illustrated here, were particularly popular throughout the medieval period.

Madonna and Child, from the Treasury of Sainte-Chapelle, Paris. 1250-60. H: 41 cm. Location: Louvre, Paris, France. Credit: Erich Lessing / Art Resource, N.Y.

Devotional images often have been defined specifically by their role in private prayer. Yet a majority of surviving medieval images could be said to have performed a devotional role; indeed, a history of devotional art is very nearly a history of the Christian image. Mural and sculptural decoration in churches was intended to provide an atmosphere conducive to a worshipful state, as well as to instruct. Richard Marks has argued that such public images, particularly in the late medieval English context he studies, provided devotional foci for all classes of viewers. Wealthier worshippers, of course, could afford devotional objects of their own. Ivory sculptures of the type illustrated here often graced altars in the private chapels wealthy patrons endowed in local churches or had consecrated in their homes. The ivory Virgin and Child, for example, may have been used in the Sainte-Chapelle in Paris, the private chapel of the ruling Capetian family.

Devotional Art in the Early Middle Ages

Devotional art was distinguished from narrative art from the early Christian period onward, as Christians sought to distinguish themselves from idol-worshipping pagans, and struggled with the second of Moses' Ten Commandments: "Thou shalt not make to thyself a graven thing..." (Douay-Rheims Bible, Exodus 20:4). Around the year 600 Pope Gregory I, in response to the concerns of an iconoclastic bishop, argued that images were needed to instruct the ignorant who could not read. His words were frequently resurrected in support of images that depicted biblical events and holy persons. More relevant here is Gregory's second justification for religious images, which held that images could aid in devotion. The public and private use of icons—panel paintings that depict biblical or saintly figures, usually in non-narrative contexts—developed in the early centuries of the Christian era and became indelibly linked with the traditions of eastern Christianity.

Concern that the power of images would lead to idolatry spurred iconoclastic movements, most notably in Byzantium during the eighth and ninth centuries. In the early eighth century, John of Damascus's In Defense of Icons compared Jesus as the Incarnate God with images of the incorporeal and, by extension, argued that veneration of an image of a holy person was veneration of the person represented. The codification of this argument in the Second Council of Nicaea (787) led eventually to the acceptance of depictions of biblical figures and saints. In the east the Byzantine icon tradition reappeared after the end of Iconoclasm in 830, and devotional art in western Europe developed, on its own or with inspiration from eastern icons, during the early medieval and Romanesque periods. If the type is delimited by private use, the majority of surviving examples from the early medieval period are found in illuminated manuscripts, while reliquaries and ornate book covers also would have performed a private devotional function on occasion.

Devotional Function and Gender in the Later Medieval Period

Works of art produced for devotional use survive in far greater numbers from the thirteenth through the fifteenth centuries. Many scholars have examined the development of new types of and contexts for devotional art in this period and explored why devotional art seems to have increased so dramatically in popularity. Reasons advanced include improved access to materials from Byzantium and the Holy Land, changes in religious practice that were supported by new vernacular devotional texts aimed at a new class of literate laity, increasing prosperity that allowed more individuals to commission or purchase private devotional objects, and changes in the scholarly and popular understanding of the workings of memory and vision.

Hans Belting, for example, noted the influx of Byzantine icons into western Europe in the thirteenth century, after Constantinople was occupied by Latin Crusaders. These icons were welcomed by a Western audience primed for a closer, more intimate devotional experience. For Belting and Sixten Ringbom, the devotional image worked through the psychological impact of its presence. A sculpted or painted figure, particularly if composed to create the illusion of eye contact with the viewer, might effectively stand in for the depicted person. Enlarged eyes, often in a frontally depicted face, are a feature of Byzantine icon paintings and also appear in the West in new or newly popular iconographic types such as the Veil of Veronica and the Man of Sorrows.

The imported icons came into the possession of private individuals as well as churches, members of the laity as well as the clergy. Factors such as increasing wealth and a growth in lay literacy heightened the interest of consumers, including women, in devotional art and new varieties of texts intended for devotional use. The devotional practices of the Gothic period emphasized a more personal reading of the lives of Mary and Jesus that expanded the biblical narrative with a variety of “eyewitness” accounts. For example, the Meditations on the Life of Christ, written by a thirteenth-century Franciscan, includes a wealth of intimate details about the life of Mary and the childhood and Passion of Jesus. The author used vivid imagery and encouraged readers to imagine the most striking moments from the narrative as prompts for meditation, emphasizing the physicality and either the preciousness or the violence of the mental image. The proliferation of expanded stories about the infancy of Christ in particular played directly to the concerns of lay women, inviting their participation in the events of the nativity and adding detail to the biblical story. In her visions, the late medieval Englishwoman Margery Kempe not only witnessed the birth of Christ, but swaddled him with her own hands and gave Mary the benefit of her own extensive experience with babies. Knowledge of such visions and other stories enriched the ancient, but increasingly humanized, image of the Virgin and Child. The ivory statuette, for example, features a smiling toddler, and the mother seems so young that we can easily imagine her turning eagerly to Margery Kempe for advice.

Devotional art played an important role for both men and women, but women in particular were viewed as being in critical need of both spiritual guidance and some kind of sense-based stimulus in their prayer. Furthermore they were responsible for the spiritual well-being of their households. New types of devotional books, such as the book of hours, became a part of the education of children in the home and were popular with female owners. These books could be illuminated with images that, while creating narrative linkages between the prayers for each liturgical hour, acted as devotional foci to increase the power of those prayers. Very often book owners were depicted within the miniatures, present at the Nativity or the Resurrection, or venerating the Virgin and Child, or the Crucifixion. Significantly, the biblical images are at times represented as sculptures or altarpieces themselves. In the well-known illumination of Yolande of Soissons in prayer from her combined psalter and book of hours (New York, Pierpont Morgan Library MS 729, fol. 232v), Yolande kneels before an open prayerbook, but gazes up into the eyes of a painted sculpture of the Virgin and Child as the image of the Child reaches out with a blessing. No clerical mediator is depicted, suggesting that Yolande is in control of her own devotional experience. The inclusion of the image of the owner further heightens the mimetic possibilities of the images and mirrors the insertion of the self into biblical or hagiographic narrative that was an important aspect of late medieval devotion.

Recent explorations of medieval optical theory, particularly in studies by Michael Camille and Susannah Biernoff, stress the importance of images in devotional practice. Camille’s work presents clear discussions of the two main medieval paradigms for understanding how vision works: extramission, which was more prevalent in the earlier centuries, and intromission, which came into play in the later medieval period. He argued that the explosion of devotional art in the later medieval period could be understood in the context of intromission, in which the object was thought to participate in the process by emitting rays that enter the eye and interact with the intellect of the viewer. In this paradigm, a devotional object is no longer a passive thing but becomes an active partner in the genesis of a prayerful state. The Christ child in Yolande of Soisson's altarpiece responds to her prayers with a blessing, as they enter into what Susannah Biernoff has called an "ocular communion," a "reciprocal gaze" that depicts a deep and intimate connection between an enlivened devotional image and its viewer. This connection could provide devotional images with considerable powers, as demonstrated by the stories related in the fourteenth-century Hedwig Codex. Here we read that St. Hedwig always kept her own ivory Virgin and Child statuette with her and often used it to miraculously heal the sick; the dedication portrait depicts the standing saint clutching her ivory statuette, her rosary, and her prayerbook (Malibu, J. Paul Getty Museum MS Ludwig XI.7, fol. 12v).

The idea of looking directly into the eyes of Christ, as does Yolande, is striking, and would have been made even more striking by the many liturgical and narrative associations with Infancy and Passion narratives that would have surrounded these images. Peter Parshall, in an exploration of late medieval Passion imagery, has discussed the importance of memory practices for understanding the way devotional art affected its viewers. He notes that medieval treatises on memory advised the attachment of items or ideas to imagined images, thus creating a visual itinerary for one's memory. The more striking the image, the stronger the memory.

Mary Carruthers has connected later medieval memory techniques, based very much on this model, with monastic treatises in which devotional art was used to stimulate meditation. Jeffrey Hamburger has written extensively on devotional/meditative images and image-cycles produced for (and often by) nuns, and has argued that devotional art played a critical role in the education and spiritual care of female monastics. Hamburger also suggested that the use of devotional images in monastic circles, particularly practices intended for nuns, was highly influential among the laity. One of the most striking of late medieval devotional images, the Wound in the side of Christ, first appeared in an early fourteenth-century manuscript compiled and illuminated for Kunigunde, the abbess of a nunnery in Prague (Prague, National and University Library, MS XIV A.17), but almost immediately appeared in manuscripts intended for the laity, including the Psalter of Bonne of Luxembourg (New York, Cloisters Museum, MS 69.96, before 1349). The image of the Wound illustrates the fragmentation and distillation of narrative images into devotional images mentioned near the beginning of this essay. Depicted as a large vertically oriented oval, pointed at the top and bottom and shaded to black at the center, the Wound was usually surrounded by the arma Christi, the instruments used in the Passion. The image of the Wound is reminiscent of both the vagina and the mandorla, the full-body halo that surrounds the figure of Christ in many Christ in Majesty images. Its associations with gendered passages—sexual, maternal, and mortal—were spelled out in contemporary devotional literature. As a portal for the viewer, a way to enter into the sacred presence, the Wound of Christ was perhaps the ultimate devotional image of the later medieval period.

ANNE RUDLOFF STANTON

References and Further Reading

- Barnet, Peter, ed. Images in Ivory: Precious Objects of the Gothic Age. Detroit Institute of Arts exhibition catalogue. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1997.
- Belting, Hans. The Image and Its Public in the Middle Ages: Form and Function of Early Paintings of the Passion, translated by Mark Bartusis and Raymond Meyer. New Rochelle, N.Y.: Caratzas, 1990.
- Biernoff, Suzannah. Sight and Embodiment in the Middle Ages. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2002.
- Camille, Michael. The Gothic Idol: Ideology and Image-Making in Medieval Art. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989.
- . "Before the Gaze: the Internal Senses and Late Medieval Practices of Seeing." In Visuality Before and Beyond the Renaissance: Seeing as Others Saw, edited by Robert S. Nelson. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2000, pp. 197–223.
- Carruthers, Mary. The Book of Memory: A Study of Memory in Medieval Culture. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1990.
- Freedberg, David. The Power of Images: Studies in the History and Theory of Response. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1989.
- Gee, Loveday Lewes. Women, Art and Patronage from Henry III to Edward III, 1216–1377. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell Press, 2002.
- Hamburger, Jeffrey. "The Use of Images in the Pastoral Care of Nuns: the Case of Heinrich Suso and the Dominicans." The Art Bulletin 71 (1989): 20–46.
- . "The Visual and the Visionary: The Image in Late Medieval Monastic Devotions." Viator 20 (1989): 161–182.
- . Nuns as Artists: The Visual Culture of a Medieval Convent. Berkeley and London: University of California Press, 1997.
- Lewis, Flora. "The Wound in Christ's Side and the Instruments of the Passion: Gendered Experience and Response." In Women and the Book: Assessing the Visual Evidence, edited by Jane H. M. Taylor and Lesley Smith. London and Toronto: The British Library and Toronto University Press, 1997, pp. 209–229.
- Marks, Richard. Image and Devotion in Late Medieval England. Phoenix Mill: Sutton Publishing, 2004.
- Parshall, Peter. "The Art of Memory and the Passion." The Art Bulletin 81 (1999): 456–472.

DEVOTIONAL ART

- Ragusa, Isa, and Rosalie B. Green, trans. Meditations on the Life of Christ. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1961.
- Ringbom, Sixten. Icon to Narrative: The Rise of the Dramatic Close-up in Fifteenth-Century Devotional Painting. Acta Academiae Aboensis, Ser. A., Vol. 31 nr. 2. Abo: Abo Akademi, 1965.
- . “Devotional Images and Imaginative Devotions: Notes on the Place of Art in Late Medieval Private Piety.” Gazette des Beaux-arts 6th ser. 73 (1969): 159–170.
- Smith, Kathryn A. Art, Identity and Devotion in Fourteenth-Century England: Three Women and Their Books of Hours. Toronto and London: University of Toronto Press and The British Library, 2003.
- Van Os, H. W. The Art of Devotion in the Late Middle Ages in Europe, 1300–1500. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1994.
- Williamson, Beth. “Liturgical Image or Devotional Image? The London Madonna of the Firescreen.” In Objects, Images, and the Word: Art in the Service of the Liturgy, edited by Colum Hourihane. Index of Christian Art Occasional Papers XI. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 2000, pp. 298–318.

See also Art, Representations of Women in; Audience, Women in the; Bible, Women in; Body: Visual Representations of; Books of Hours; Devotional Literature; Devotional Practices; Education, Lay; Gaze; Gender in Art; Hagiography; Hagiography, Iconic Aspects of; Icons, Byzantine; Jacobus of Voragine’s Golden Legend; Kempe, Margery; Lay Piety; Literacy and Reading; Vernacular; Mary, Virgin: in Art; Meditation; Monasticism and Nuns; Mothers as Teachers; Mystics’ Writings; Nuns as Illuminators; Patronage, Artistic; Penitentials and Pastoral Manuals; Pilgrims and Pilgrimage; Poor Clares Order; Relics and Reliquaries; Rosary; Sermons and Preaching; Spiritual Care; Spirituality, Christian; Theology; Veronica’s Veil

DEVOTIONAL LITERATURE

Devotional literature functions as something of a catch-all term in anglophone medieval studies, designating the largest and most diverse body of surviving manuscripts and books in Latin and in all of the European vernacular languages. The subjects treated by these texts can be conveyed in a few of its most celebrated titles, for example, The Mirror of Our Lady, The Little Book of Eternal Wisdom, Meditations on the Life of Jesus Christ, Speculum Ecclesiae, and The Ladder of Perfection. Short devotional pieces occur in books of hours, and in other liturgical and service books, while longer works appear in religious and secular compilations of all types.

The origin of the classification “devotional literature” in modern scholarly discourse is uncertain, and recent work in the field has offered such provocative substitutes as “vernacular theology” and “the literature of spiritual formation.” Each of these terms provides a useful lens on the material, but none fully comprehends its dual intellectual and affective purposes. The goals of a devotional text are resolutely twofold: first, to provide basic instruction in religious doctrine, and second, to heighten its audience’s emotional response to this didactic content. To be sure, devotional literature seeks to educate its readers in religious doctrine, but it also attempts—sometimes flamboyantly—to stimulate their joy, admiration, longing, grief, reverence, and tears.

Latin Texts

The earliest devotional literature circulated chiefly in Latin among small and relatively homogeneous clerical and monastic textual communities. It offered instruction and exhortation in the form of sermons, treatises, and letters on such topics as the joys and risks of friendship between monks, the value of virginity, and the literal and figurative meanings of the Song of Songs, the Psalms, and the Creation narratives and commentaries.

The religious and education reforms of the eleventh and twelfth centuries (articulated decisively in the Fourth Lateran Council of 1215) stimulated the transmission of devotional literature beyond the communities of religious professionals of European cloisters, cathedrals, and courts. Translations and loose adaptations of the Latin devotional classics began to appear in the thirteenth century. Along with this proliferation of vernacular spiritual instruction and encouragement developed the notion of “the mixed life,” a program for living a religious life in the world. Thus, the ascetic ideals and practices of the monastic life came to be adopted by the men and women of the aristocracy, nobility, and gentry. By the end of the fourteenth century, devotional literature helped bring about what can be aptly called a democratization of ecclesiastical discourse, which made the mysteries of the faith, the stories of the holy dead, and the penitential disciplines of the body accessible to a far broader audience than had previously been the case. The development of literate technologies such as cursive book hands and abbreviations, the use of paper rather than parchment, and the rise of commercial dealers in rented gatherings (pecias) and books further stimulated the availability of devotional discourse, and prominent laypeople sought the enhanced reputation and the spiritual benefits that came with providing patronage for the dissemination of a favorite devotional text or compilation. The introduction of the printing press dramatically enhanced these opportunities.

Vernacular Texts

Vernacular devotional discourse survives in a variety of genres: stories, poems, letters, visions, collections of wise sayings, allegories, and quasi-systematic expositions of the Mass, the creation of the world, the vices and virtues, monastic rules, and the lives of the saints. Its guided meditations on biblical material, particularly the life and Passion of Christ, are frequently presented by religious authorities as safe substitutes for actual Bibles, which were usually deemed too dangerous to be left to the interpretation of the laity.

Traditional scholarship has sometimes dismissed devotional literature as derivative, pedestrian, and overwhelmingly didactic, and there is some validity in these criticisms. Medieval texts routinely borrow material without attribution, adapt it freely, and credit the results to revered authorities like Richard Rolle, Augustine, or “the Fathers.” However, the importance of devotional discourse is not in its originality or its stylistic innovations, such as they are. Rather, this body of literature is critical for the information it provides about the active engagement of medieval people in a broad range of literate, spiritual, and cultural practices.

Evidence for Women’s Lives

Devotional texts are particularly useful for what they reveal about female participation in medieval intellectual and spiritual life. Women played prominent roles in the patronage, translation, and circulation of devotional discourse throughout medieval Europe. A few of the women associated with this material include Margaret of Scotland, Christine de Pizan, Margaret of Brittany, Mechthild of Hackeborn, Birgitta of Sweden, and Cecily of York. Medieval authors and compilers regularly dedicated and addressed their copies of devotional treatises to individual women and general female audiences. For example, Simon Wynter’s version of the life of Saint Jerome urges its patron, Margaret, duchess of Clarence, to copy the text for others after reading it herself and to encourage other readers to do the same. Lady Margaret Beaufort was a particularly avid reader and supporter of devotional literature. She translated a variety of texts, including The Mirror of Gold for the Sinful Soul and The Ship of Fools, and she commissioned versions of The Fifteen Oes, On the Mixed Life, and The Stairway of Perfection, among many other titles. The household accounts of Cecily, duchess of York, show a similarly profound engagement with a wide range of devotional texts. Women’s monastic foundations served as sites for the reading and discussion, as well as the production and transmission, of much of this material.

The fact that clerical discourse has persistent misogynistic components has attracted significant attention from scholars of gender and devotional literature. The antiwomen sentiments in a particular text can range from mild reminders of the theological inheritance of Eve to sweeping condemnations of all women as sources of and incitements to sin. Such variable assessments can occur alongside celebrations of biblical and historical women, virtues that are allegorically cast as feminine, and the rare claim that the best cleric is the man or the woman who loves God the most. It has convincingly (and sometimes simultaneously) been argued that devotional texts are psychologically astute, virulently misogynistic, covertly erotic, and complexly indeterminate. Further complicating this line of inquiry are the courtly and contemplative literary conventions and counter-discourses that challenge the hegemony of the misogynistic claims.

Since the 1970s, the relationships between devotional literature and its female readers have attracted significant scholarly attention, and this topic invites much further inquiry. Many of the texts discussed here are currently available only in unpublished dissertations or in outdated or expurgated editions. Some works survive only in manuscript form, and references to women readers and their books continue to emerge in newly edited documents. No doubt much further information awaits discovery in the archives. New research on book ownership and patronage will continue to illuminate the literary activities of women readers and female audiences, as well as the intellectual and spiritual alliances between women and men. After three decades or so of theoretically and historically informed scholarship, it is time to re-examine some of our most fundamental assumptions about women and gender in the Middle Ages, to consolidate and synthesize our findings, and to re-examine the intellectual landscapes that emerge.

ANNE CLARK BARTLETT

References and Further Reading

Bartlett, Anne Clark. Male Authors, Female Readers: Representation and Subjectivity in Middle English Devotional Literature. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1995.

DEVOTIONAL LITERATURE

- Bell, David N. What Nuns Read: Books and Libraries in Medieval English Nunneries. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Cistercian Publications, 1995.
- Erler, Mary C. Women, Reading and Piety in Late Medieval England. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2002.
- McCash, June Hall, ed. The Cultural Patronage of Medieval Women. Athens, Ga.: The University of Georgia Press, 1996.
- Meale, Carol M., ed. Women and Literature in Britain 1150–1500. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1993. Reprint, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996.
- Newman, Barbara. "Flaws in the Golden Bowl: Gender and Spiritual Formation in the Twelfth Century." In From Virile Woman to WomanChrist: Studies in Medieval Religion and Literature. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1995, pp. 111–146.
- Powell, Susan. "Lady Margaret Beaufort and Her Books." The Library 20.3 (1998): 197–240.
- Robertson, Elizabeth. Early English Devotional Prose and the Female Audience. Knoxville, Tenn.: University of Tennessee Press, 1990.
- Stock, Brian. The Implications of Literacy. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1986.
- Voaden, Rosalynn, ed. Prophets Abroad: The Reception of Continental Holy Women in Late-Medieval England. Rochester, N.Y.: D. S. Brewer, 1996.
- Watson, Nicholas. "Censorship and Cultural Change in Late-Medieval England: Vernacular Theology, The Oxford Translation Debate, and Arundel's Constitutions of 1409." Speculum 70 (1995): 822–864.
- Wogan-Brown, Jocelyn. Saints' Lives and Women's Literary Culture c. 1150–1300: Virginité and Its Authorizations. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

See also Audience, Women in the; Beaufort, Margaret; Birgitta of Sweden; Book Ownership; Books of Hours; Christine de Pizan; Devotional Practices; Eve; Lay Piety; Literacy and Reading; Vernacular; Liturgy; Margaret of Scotland; Mechthild of Hackeborn; Misogyny; Patronage, Ecclesiastical; Patronage, Literary; Translation

DEVOTIONAL PRACTICES

The devotional practices of medieval men and women, one of the most prevalent cultural features of the time, were doubtless as varied as the individuals who observed them, a fact that, while seemingly self-evident, is somewhat obscured by the nature of the evidence upon which we rely for understanding of this far-reaching phenomenon. The prescriptive aspect of rules, guides, manuals, and prayer books complicates considerably our ability to arrive at a proper understanding of how individuals may have actually used such aids to devotion. Furthermore, much of what remains in the way of devotional texts and artifacts was produced for clerical or monastic patrons or, in the later period especially, for lay men and women of means, with the consequence that our knowledge of the practices of the vast majority of medievals is fragmentary at best. This entry focuses on broad trends in devotional practices, especially regarding the increased importance of women's practices, also in the later period, as consumers and/or patrons of devotional texts.

Devotional practices could take many forms, from making the sign of the cross, a practice attested to by Tertullian in the second century, to the elaborate, personalized programs incorporating gestures, attitudes, and texts of the late Middle Ages. Though thus multifaceted across time and limited or determined by context, medieval devotional practices also present a central unifying feature: virtually all are closely related to prayer, and the evolution of the practice of prayer, including the material objects and spaces connected with it, will inform the discussion here. Prayer was, in the early period (roughly to the eleventh century) above all a clerical and monastic practice and therefore collective and indeed "professional" by definition, if for no other reason than that participation supposed literacy in Latin (or dependence on those who possessed it). The chanting of the canonical hours and the prayers associated with the liturgy were the privileged forms of devotion. The development of prayer in the vernacular for the laity, a marked feature of late medieval devotion, was driven by the desire, among both the clergy and the laity, for greater affective participation of the latter in the worship of God, the veneration of saints, and the celebration of the mysteries of the faith, but also by the desire on the part of the clergy for orthodoxy and indoctrination among the laity.

Psalters and Books of Hours provide a particularly useful index for charting the transition from liturgical to extra-liturgical practices and the development of private prayer among the laity. Psalters allowed lay men and women to recite the Psalms of the Breviary, as was the practice of liturgical, and particularly monastic, communities, without having to observe their rigorous routine. Other texts were often included in Psalters besides the Psalms. In a survey of common prayers added to French translations of the Psalter dating from the twelfth to the fifteenth century, E. Brayer and A.-M. Bouly de Lesdain found that the Pater Noster was the most frequently added prayer, followed by the Credo, the Gloria, and the Ave Maria. For example, a bilingual Latin–French Psalter from the first third of the fourteenth century (Paris, Bibl. Mazarine, MS 58) once belonging to Jeanne and Marguerite, daughters of Godefroy de Brabant, includes the first of these three prayers but not the Ave.

With the vast development of Marian devotion in the thirteenth century, the Little Hours of Our Lady, extracted from the Breviary, became the most important type of devotional book during the later

Middle Ages. Hundreds of exemplars survive, from the lavish productions for royal princes (for example, the Très Riches Heures of Jean, duc de Berry) to humble, unillustrated copies, either manuscript or printed. The abbot Victor Leroquais, who catalogued the Books of Hours in the French National Library, observed that, although based on liturgical practice, Books of Hours were destined for private devotion and imposed no obligatory use or program. In effect, their use escaped clerical control, which doubtless explains much of their appeal for men and women alike. Those wealthy enough to have a Book of Hours made for themselves could have prayers to their patron saint included. In other instances, such prayers were added by later owners who used blank pages for this purpose as well as for recording their ownership of the book and family events such as births, deaths, and marriages. Books of Hours, even of the humble sort, were prized personal possessions and often appear in wills.

Prayers in Books of Hours and other devotional books often contain information as to how they were meant to be used. For example, one of the accessory texts most frequently included in Books of Hours, especially from the fifteenth century, the Fifteen Joys of the Virgin, indicates that the person reciting the prayer should genuflect fifteen times in honor of each of the Fifteen Joys. This prayer, with its emphasis on Mary's maternity and the childhood of Jesus, invited both men and women to contemplate and indeed participate vicariously in the joys and mysteries of motherhood, thus allowing a fluidity of gender positions and identifications that is typical of late medieval forms of devotion. Also typical is the (at times jarring) juxtaposition of a concern for the proper physical attitude and gestures (sometimes of a mechanical sort, as here) with the solicitation of the most varied emotional or psychological states. An especially important influence for the increased emphasis on affect in late medieval devotion is the Orationes sive meditationes attributed to Anselm of Canterbury (1033–1109). The prayers in this collection were intended for private, meditative reading, but here again we find a very real tension between the inner, meditative cast of these prayers and the highly dramatic form they can take, when, for example, the reader is invited to join Mary Magdalene at the foot of the cross, apostrophize Christ with her, and assume her grief at the Crucifixion while engaging in an interrogation of his or her own sins. At a later date, the Franciscans also contributed greatly to the increased importance given to affect in contemplative literature, partly through the focus on the humanity of Christ and his mother. For example, in the Meditationes Vitae Christi composed by Johannes de Caulibus between c. 1346 and 1364, the author addresses the reader, an otherwise unidentified "sister," on how to contemplate the life of Christ, saying to tell things "as they occurred or as they might have occurred according to the devout belief of the imagination and the varying interpretation of the mind."

The prayer cited above was one of several from Anselm's Orationes that was translated into French and included with dozens of other prayers and devotions in a fourteenth-century guide made for the use of an unidentified noblewoman (BNF, nouv. acq. lat., MS 592). After the opening calendar and the Hours of the Holy Spirit, the manuscript contains over 150 folios of prayers and devotions, many in Latin with French translation, with accompanying instructions for their use. Some are for different moments of the day (upon rising, while in Church, upon retiring); others, like the prayers from Anselm's collection, for meditative reading. Such guides or manuals are an especially rich source for understanding how spiritual advisors sought to inform the devotional practices and subjectivity of medieval men and women; and texts written for women, of which ms. 592 is but one of many examples, are particularly revelatory of how the boundaries between the spiritual and the mundane were often intentionally blurred. These devotional guides are thus a type of conduct literature and share many features with such well-known examples as the Menagier of Paris, in which an anonymous middle-aged bourgeois "householder" provides instruction to his young wife in how to manage herself, her servants, and her household and in which catechetical and moral concerns (the wife's obedience and chastity) far outweigh devotional practices per se. Doubtless written by a spiritual advisor, the text includes advice on how the young wife should conduct her private devotions at home (prayers upon rising and retiring), how to comport herself in church (according to her station), and how to prepare herself for communion and confession.

Jean Gerson (1363–1429), chancellor of the University of Paris and one of the most powerful theologians of his day, wrote a much shorter guide for his sisters, Sur l'excellence de la virginité, in which he enjoined them to dress and act without ostentation; say their hours regularly and attend as many masses as possible; live soberly, drinking only diluted wine and avoiding spicy foods; live in peace with each other; never speak to men they don't know unless it be in public in front of others; never go dancing; and, lastly, learn to read French (romant) so that they could read the letters and devotional books that Jean would send them. In a devotional guide composed after 1408 by an anonymous disciple of Gerson's (Bibliothèque de l'Arsenal, MS 2176, fol. 86ff.) and included in a survey by G. Hasenohr of fifteen such texts, the author enjoins the harried wife to turn her thoughts from the turmoil in her household to “Noah, to the ark of contemplative prayer,” and, once she has freed herself from the labors of the world, to take refuge in her room where she can deliver herself freely to highly emotive and eroticized devotions including tears, sighs, bitter cries, laments, complaints, laments, humble sighs, prostrations, kneeling, beating the breast in great contrition, kissing the ground in great and humble devotion, raising the eyes and hands to heaven in great desire, bending and intertwining the arms as if embracing a lover (amy) in great love, and stretching the body out on the ground or standing, as if on a cross, in great compassion.

These few examples should make clear the extremely broad range of devotional texts written for medieval women of noble or bourgeois standing. They suppose the active role of a spiritual director; a household space for private devotions (in most cases the chambre, in which there might be a private altar, or, for the wealthy, an oratory or private chapel); and, last but not least, literacy. For men and women of more humble social position, the parish or a nearby mendicant church or a confraternity chapel or guild-hall might provide a context for collective or private devotions, such as the saying of the rosary. The devotional activities of confraternities and guilds were extremely varied: liturgical services; processions on the feast day of the patron saint, perhaps followed by a banquet with a sermon, recitation of devotional poetry, or performance of a play; collective singing, such as practiced by the Italian societies devoted to the performance of laude (another genre that allowed male participants to adopt a variety of shifting gender positions); or penitential practices, including self-mortification and flagellation (a practice that spread from northern Italy to northern and central Europe after the Black Death). While confraternities were generally male-dominated institutions, many welcomed female members or participants in their celebrations.

This entry has focused primarily on well-documented examples of devotional practices, such as those recorded in prayer books, but the culture provided many opportunities for the less fortunate to receive either direct or indirect instruction in this area. Spiritual direction from the clergy, sermons and exempla, and medieval religious theater, with its numerous representations of rituals, devotion, and prayer, are but a few of the ways in which Christians of all stations were enjoined to express their faith through actions that were paramount in the shaping of religious culture and the fashioning of religious subjects.

ROBERT L. A. CLARK

References and Further Reading

- Amsler, Mark. “Affective Literacy: Gestures of Reading in the Later Middle Ages.” Essays in Medieval Studies 18 (2001): 83–109.
- Brayer, Edith. “Livres d’heures contenant des textes en français.” Bulletin de l’Institut de Recherche et d’Histoire des Textes 12 (1963): 31–102.
- Brayer, Eoita, and Anne-Marie Bouly de Lesdain. “Les Prières usuelles annexes aux anciennes traductions françaises du Psautier.” Bulletin de l’Institut de Recherche et d’Histoire des Textes 15 (1967–68): 69–120.
- Brereton, Georgina E., and Janet M. Ferrier. Le Mesnager de Paris, translated by Karin Ueltschi. Collection Lettres Gothiques. Paris: Librairie Générale Française, 1994.
- Clark, Robert L. A. “Constructing the Female Subject in Late Medieval Devotion.” In Medieval Conduct, edited by Kathleen Ashley and Robert L. A. Clark. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 2001, pp. 160–182.
- Gerson, Jean. “Sur l’excellence de la virginité.” In Oeuvres complètes, edited by Palémon Glorieux. 10 vols. Paris: Desclée, 1966, v. 7, pp. 292–339.
- Hasenohr, Geneviève. “La vie quotidienne de la femme vue par l’Eglise: L’enseignement des ‘journées chrétiennes’ de la fin du Moyen-Age.” In Frau und spätmittelalterlicher Alltag. International Congress, Krems an der Donau, Oct. 2–5, 1984. Österreichische Akademie der Wissenschaften, Philosophisch-Historische Klasse, Sitzungsberichte 473. Veröffentlichungen des Instituts für mittelalterliche Realienkunde Österreichs 9. Vienna: Österreichischen Akademie der Wissenschaften, 1986, pp. 19–101.
- Johannis de Caulibus. Meditaciones Vite Christi, edited by Mary Stallings-Taney. Corpus Christianorum, Continuatio Mediaevalis 153. Turnhout: Brepols, 1997.
- Leroquais, abbé Victor. Les Bréviaires manuscrits des bibliothèques publiques de France. 6 vols. Paris, 1932–1934.
- . Les Livres d’Heures manuscrits de la Bibliothèque Nationale. 3 vols. Paris, 1927.
- Ragusa, Isa, and Rosalie B. Green. Meditations on the Life of Christ. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1961.
- Rondeau, Jennifer Fisk. “Conducting Gender: Theories and Practices in Italian Confraternity Literature.” In Medieval Conduct, edited by Kathleen Ashley and Robert L. A. Clark. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 2001, pp. 183–206.
- Sinclair, Keith V. French Devotional Texts of the Middle Ages: A Bibliographic Manuscript Guide. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1979.
- . French Devotional Texts of the Middle Ages: A Bibliographic Manuscript Guide. 1st Supplement. Westport, Conn.: 1982. Reprint, 1988.
- Sonet, Jean. Répertoire d’incipit de prières en ancien français. Geneva: Droz, 1956.
- Ward, Benedicta, trans. The Prayers and Meditations of Saint Anselm. Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1973.
- Wieck, Roger S. Time Sanctified: The Book of Hours in Medieval Art and Life. New York: Braziller, 1988.

See also Book of Hours; Devotional Literature; Lay Piety; Rosary; Spiritual Care

DHUODA

In the middle of the ninth century, during civil wars ensuing from the death of the Frankish emperor Louis the Pious, the noblewoman Dhuoda composed a book for her young son William about how he might best conduct himself in such troubled times. Dhuoda was wife of the magnate Bernard of Septimania and wartime lord of her absent husband's broad dominions in southern Francia. She had been educated in Charlemagne's palace school and was likely a relation of the Frankish royal house. Separated from her family—William, her fifteen-year-old addressee, as well as her husband and their infant boy—and living at Uzès near Nîmes in the period of her work's composition between late 841 and early 843, she represented her love for her elder son and her hopes for his development as best she could: she sent him a book of her own making. Dhuoda wrote of both spiritual and secular matters from the apex of the Frankish elite at the moment of its highest achievement and imminent ruin. Her Liber manualis (Manual or Handbook in English) is the only extant book-length work from a European woman's hand between the late antique record of travels to Jerusalem by the Western pilgrim Egeria and the tenth-century plays of Hrotsvit of Gandersheim. But Dhuoda's text's importance for women's history extends beyond its authorship; a mother's work for a maturing child, it sheds light on the histories of mothering, childhood and adolescence, and gender and families.

Dhuoda's Handbook explores the meaning of Western Christianity for the personal and historical experience of Frankish nobles such as herself and William. She understands the events of her life—most importantly her separation from her two children—as spiritual travails in a kingdom as fragmented as that of the Hebrews in the time of the rebellion of David's son Absalom. Dhuoda counsels her son that a spiritual practice and spiritually grounded construction of social and political life nonetheless offer hope for the reestablishment of peace between father and son, king and warrior. Ironically, Dhuoda's husband, Bernard, was at the time of her writing a leader in the Frankish nobles' rebellion against Charlemagne's grandson, Charles the Bald. Meanwhile William, the elder son of Dhuoda and Bernard, was held hostage against his father's further violence, and would eventually be executed by the Carolingian heir for following his father in rebellion.

Dhuoda's text is arranged in eleven short sections labeled "books" in editions and translations. Her prologue and several chapters of the tenth book offer all known biographical information about her and set a highly emotive context for the rest of her work. The first two and last seven of Dhuoda's books treat general principles of Christian theology and practice, reflecting the Carolingian laity's formation according to an ecclesiastical culture well known from other sources. Dhuoda's third and fourth books, however, are distinctive and thus have been the center of much modern attention devoted to her work. In these longer sections, Dhuoda advises her son on how his spiritual life may enhance his success as a secular nobleman. Here, she exhibits powerful maternal authority even as she supports patriarchy within the family and in the failing Frankish empire. Dhuoda's secular voice thus departs from clerical literary models, articulating noble self-definition in terms of family allegiance and military prowess, as well as Christian devotion. Moreover, her sensitivity to framing her discussion with language and content she describes as age-appropriate for her young son is important evidence for an early medieval sense of the differences among children, youths, and adults.

Dhuoda's work survives in only a few medieval manuscripts. Her elder son may never have read it; if he did, it clearly failed in its intent to educate him for his own safety. The work seems, however, to have been preserved by her younger son, unnamed at her writing but later christened Bernard after his father. This younger Bernard's descendants were dukes of Aquitaine, among them William the Pious, founder of the great abbey of Cluny. Medieval copies of Dhuoda's Handbook date from the tenth and fourteenth centuries. Since the definitive edition by the eminent Carolingianist Pierre Riché in 1971, the work has been much discussed as a source for understanding early medieval elites—their literacy and religious learning, family structures, construction of gender, and understanding of human development. Two recent English translations attest to the Handbook's wide readership in medieval and women's studies.

CAROL NEEL

References and Further Reading

- Claussen, M. A. "Fathers of Power and Mothers of Authority: Dhuoda and the Liber manualis." French Historical Studies 19.3 (1996): 785–809.
- Dhuoda. Handbook for Her Warrior Son: Liber Manualis, edited and translated by Marcelle Thiébaux. Cambridge Medieval Classics 8. Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1998.
- . Handbook for William, translated by Carol Neel. Lincoln, Neb.: University of Nebraska Press, 1991. Reprint with afterword, Medieval Texts in Translation. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America Press, 1999.

———. Manuel pour mon fils, edited by Pierre Riché and translated by Bernard de Vregille and Claude Mondésert. Paris: Editions du Cerf, 1974. Revised edition, Sources chrétiennes 225 bis. Paris: Editions du Cerf, 1991.

Mayeski, Marie Ann. Dhuoda: Ninth Century Mother and Theologian. Scranton, Pa.: University of Scranton Press, 1995.

Olsen, Glenn W. "One Heart and One Soul (Acts 4:32 and 34) in Dhuoda's Manual." Church History 61.1 (1992): 23–33.

See also Frankish Lands; Literature, Latin; Mothers as Teachers; Noble Women; Women Authors: Latin Texts

DIPLOMACY AND RECONCILIATION

Diplomacy in the modern sense, with permanent embassies and well-trained professional bureaucracies, did not exist until the sixteenth century. In the early Middle Ages, diplomacy was essentially the maintenance of personal and familial relations enacted in the public political arena by political entities—kingdoms, duchies, counties, and religious institutions—and women played an active role. By 1550, the professional practice of diplomacy was regularized and women's role changed accordingly. Reconciliation, on the other hand, was both part of formal legal litigation and an informal means of resolving disputes outside the law courts. The flip side of feud, vendetta, and lawlessness, throughout the Middle Ages it was to keep women of all ranks busy building alliances and mending fences. Women's authority to engage in either formal diplomacy or informal reconciliation stemmed from the laws and customs that established their rights concerning landholding and lordship. Such clearly political actions were deemed socially acceptable because they were regarded as the feminine intercessory complement of the masculine warrior-knight, with the Biblical queen Esther and the Virgin Mary as models. Anglo-Saxon noblewomen and queens such as Æthelberga of Kent, wife of Edwin of Northumbria (d. c. 632), and Eanfled, wife of Oswy of Northumbria (d. c. 669), often brokered peace among their natal and marital relatives by their marriages, by direct intervention, or both. Ottonian queens Matilda, wife of Henry the Fowler, and Adelheid, wife of Emperor Otto I, typify the combination of saintliness and worldliness that provided models of intercessory and conciliatory queenship. The wide and varied examples of women's intercession, conciliatory actions, and diplomacy are associated with other traditionally feminine activities, such as managing households, keeping peace within the household, and arranging marriages.

Reconciliation

Women as intercessors can be seen clearly in the early medieval court, where bonds of vassalage were intertwined with household offices, and women often mediated legal disputes involving feud and vendetta. Low-status women—such as townswomen, the gentry, Muslims, and Jews—surely engaged in reconciliation, but their actions are difficult to discern. Their disputes may have been handled quietly among families, may not have been documented, or the records may have been destroyed or lost in pogroms or expulsions. Reconciliation and subtle diplomacy also played a part in the ritualized hospitality built around social networks of women like Dame Alice de Breine, an English gentry woman of the later Middle Ages. In the tenth and eleventh century, the Peace and Truce of God movement provided legal and theological underpinnings for formal reconciliation and added further weight to women's actions. Legal records, land conveyances, and church documents describe the many and varied ways that Christian women made peace among families and settled quarrels involving property, personal injury, and commercial transactions.

Diplomacy

Diplomacy, on the other hand, was always the domain of women of high social rank who possessed sufficient legal and political authority to directly negotiate disputes among kingdoms, principalities, the Empire, landed clergy, and the papacy. Countesses and queens are the most visible diplomats, with political relations and warfare the most common backdrops, and their actions are well documented in chronicles and royal, comital, regional, and municipal archives. Women's engagement in diplomacy was common in the early Middle Ages, when, for instance, Theophanu was regent from 984 to 991 for her son German Emperor Otto III. Adela, countess of Blois, in the eleventh century, smoothed relations with the church in France, and Berta, countess of Tuscany, in the tenth century, established diplomatic ties with Abbasid Caliph Muktafi. Ermengard, the twelfth-century countess of Narbonne, enshrined in troubadour literature, was a key figure in settling disputes and reconciling feuding families in southern France. During her widowhood, Jeanne of Valois, countess of Holland, Zeeland, and Hainault and sister of King Philip VI of France, was a prominent local, regional, and international diplomat on the eve of the Hundred Years' War. In this, she was one in a long line of Flemish countesses who mediated the many disputes that arose between Flanders and France, and towns and the crown, as early as the eleventh century.

In the later Middle Ages, queens were less involved in diplomacy because trained lawyers and bureaucrats assumed the job, but they did not drop out of the picture altogether. Queens-regent were active and visible diplomats as they governed for their minor sons and ill or absent husbands. For instance, Blanche of Castile negotiated treaties in 1227 and 1231 for her minor son, Louis IX of France, and again when he was away on Crusade, an event that, like the Hundred Years' War, propelled many noble women and queens into diplomacy. Isabelle of France, daughter of Philip IV of France and wife of Edward II of England, found herself working both sides of the negotiating table. Her marriage built a diplomatic bridge between England and France in 1314 that collapsed in 1337, despite her best efforts, when her son and her Valois cousins debated the French succession, setting in motion the Hundred Years' War. Nearly a century later, Isabeau of Bavaria brokered a treaty in 1420 between the French and English. Margaret of Anjou, regent for her husband, King Henry VI of England, was both ally and enemy of her uncle, King Charles VII of France, during negotiations for ceding Maine to the French at the close of the Hundred Years' War.

Religious Disputes

Women were often called on, or volunteered, to resolve religious disputes. In 1077, Matilda of Tuscany famously got German Emperor Henry IV and Pope Gregory VII to work out temporarily their differences over lay investiture. Saint Margaret of Scotland, wife of Malcolm, combined politics with saintliness as she maintained peace at home and promoted diplomatic relations between Malcolm and the church. Margaret's daughter Matilda of Scotland was instrumental in resolving the investiture dispute in England during the reign of her husband, Henry I. The Bohemian queen Johanna of Rozmital was an active diplomat during the Hussite wars. Sainted, or merely pious, women were valued practitioners of dispute resolution. Catherine of Siena is well known for her intervention in papal politics in 1376, and Joan of Arc went to war to make peace at the end of the Hundred Years' War.

But sanctity was only one way to practice diplomacy. Queens, shielded by their rank and proximity to the king, could practice a forceful diplomacy that used anger and outright threats as rhetorical weapons. Eleanor of Castile used barely veiled threats during the English baronial revolt in the late thirteenth century to get the earl of Cornwall, count of Bigorre, and bishop of Worcester to comply with royal wishes. In 1429, Maria of Castile used her own anger as a diplomatic tool and averted war by literally setting up her tent on the battlefield between the armies of her husband, Alfonso V of Aragon, and her brother, Juan II of Castile.

Diplomatic Marriages

Another effective form of diplomacy that routinely involved women was negotiating marriages to build or secure a political alliance. Women were the brides as well as the principal negotiators, if not instigators, of many marriages, and were intimately involved in the high-stakes negotiations between kings, princes, dukes, and counts. Emma (Ælfgifu) of Normandy adroitly, some would say coldly, married the Danish King Cnut, the man who defeated her first husband, Æthelred II, in 1017. In the twelfth century, Eleanor of Aquitaine's carefully arranged marriages of her children linked England with the major European royal houses, as did those of her contemporary, Alfonso VII of Castile. In 1371, John of Gaunt, seeking the crown of Castile during the Hundred Years' War, married Constanza, daughter of King Pedro I of Castile. The marriages of their daughters Philippa, to João of Avis, king of Portugal, and Catalina, to Enrique of Trastámara, king of Castile, created an Anglo-Castilian alliance that continued into the early modern period with the marriage of Katherine of Aragon to Arthur and Henry Tudor (later Henry VIII). Brides could be unwilling participants, pawns, or virtual hostages to guarantee compliance with treaties, as was Catherine of Valois when she married Henry V of England in 1415.

TERESA EARENIGHT

References and Further Reading

- Brown, Elizabeth A. R. "Diplomacy, Adultery, and Domestic Politics at the Court of Philip the Fair: Queen Isabelle's Mission to France in 1314." In Documenting the Past, edited by J. S. Hamilton and Patricia J. Bradley. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell Press, 1989, pp. 53–83.
- Cheyette, Fredric. Ermengard of Narbonne and the World of the Troubadours. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2001.

- Chibnall, Marjorie. The Empress Matilda: Queen Consort, Queen Mother, and Lady of the English. Oxford: Blackwell, 1991.
- Davids, Adelbert, ed. The Empress Theophano: Byzantium and the West and the Name of Theophano in Byzantium. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995.
- Diggelmann, Lindsay. "Marriage as a Tactical Response: Henry II and the Royal Wedding of 1160." English Historical Review 119. 483 (2004): 954–964.
- Earenfight, Theresa. "Queenship, Politics, and Government in the Medieval Crown of Aragon: The Lieutenancy of María of Castile, 1420–23 and 1432–53." Ph.D. dissertation, Fordham University, 1997.
- Evergates, Theodore, ed. Aristocratic Women in Medieval France. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999.
- Gibbons, Rachel. "Isabeau of Bavaria, Queen of France (1385–1422): The Creation of an Historical Villainess." Transactions of the Royal Historical Society, 6th ser. 6 (1996): 51–73.
- Goodman, Anthony. John of Gaunt: The Exercise of Princely Power in Fourteenth-Century Europe. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1992.
- Huneycutt, Lois L. "Intercession and the High-Medieval Queen: The Esther Topos." In Power of the Weak, edited by Jennifer Carpenter and Sally-Beth Carpenter. Urbana, Ill.: University of Illinois Press, 1995, pp. 126–146.
- Klassen, John. Warring Maidens, Captive Wives, and Hussite Queens: Women and Men at War and Peace in Late Medieval Bohemia. New York: Eastern European Monographs, 1999.
- Kunz, Elizabeth Gibson. "Hospitality, Conviviality, and the English Gentry: Social Networks of the Landed Elite in Late Medieval Suffolk." Ph.D. dissertation, Fordham University, 2001.
- LoPrete, Kimberly A. Adela of Blois, Countess and Lord (ca. 1067–1137). Dublin: Four Courts Press, 2001.
- Maurer, Helen E. Margaret of Anjou: Queenship and Power in Late Medieval England. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell Press, 2003.
- Menache, Sophia. "Isabelle of France, Queen of England—A Reconsideration." Journal of Medieval History 10 (1984): 107–124.
- Nolan, Kathleen, ed. Capetian Women. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2003, pp. 147–177.
- Parsons, John Carmi. "The Queen's Intercession in Thirteenth-Century England." In Power of the Weak, edited by Jennifer Carpenter and Sally-Beth Carpenter. Urbana, Ill.: University of Illinois Press, 1995.
- , ed. Medieval Queenship. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1993.
- Rizzo, Catia Renzi. "Riflessioni sulla lettera di Berta di Toscana al califfo Muktafi: l'apporto congiunto dei dati archeologici e delle fonti scritte." Archivio Storico Italiano 159: 587 (2001): 3–47.
- Stafford, Pauline. Queens, Concubines, and Dowagers: The King's Wife in the Early Middle Ages. Athens, Ga.: University of Georgia Press, 1983.
- Wheeler, Bonnie, and John Carmi Parsons, eds. Eleanor of Aquitaine, Lord and Lady. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2002.

See also Adelheid; Blanche of Castile; Catherine of Siena; Eleanor of Aquitaine; Emma of Normandy;

Ermengard; Intercession; Margaret of Anjou; Margaret of Scotland; Matilda of Tuscany; Noble Women; Ottonian Royal Women; Queens and Empresses: The West; Regents and Queen-Lieutenants

DISABILITIES

Disability touched all levels of medieval society, from the nobility to peasants to saints, yet experiences and perceptions of disabled people in the Middle Ages are not well known because disability has only recently become a subject of academic inquiry. This field has drawn on studies of gender, sexuality, race, and ethnicity to argue that disability is a socially constructed category imbued with negative stereotypes that have been imposed upon people with physical and cognitive differences to ignore, oppress, or eliminate them. Disability affects all social categories and can lower a person's status because of preconceived notions of what it means to be disabled and because of lost economic opportunities. While this scholarship has focused primarily on the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, a few studies have revealed greater nuance in medieval society than was once imagined.

Two levels of ideology have obscured readings of evidence about medieval disabled people: a medieval Christian association of disability with sin, which blamed either disabled people or their parents for the disability, and the modern medical model, which continues to perpetuate a system of values that blames the individual for failing to become cured, and thus colors our own readings of the sources. Together, they have inhibited scholars from analyzing disability as a social issue rather than an individual problem.

The emphasis on sin greatly influenced the medieval church's doctrine on disability and illness, but theory and practice were more complex than stated doctrine. The canons of the Fourth Lateran Council in 1215 stated that sin caused illness and so ordered hospitals to require confession of their patients. Thirteenth-century preachers instructed disabled audiences that they must accept their disability as a divine test, like the Old Testament figures Job and Tobit, and live moral lives so that they would be worthy of charity and of God's mercy. Hospitals relied on the belief that their patients were a locus of spirituality, as people of all social levels donated money to support hospitals and the sick. Yet, many of these hospitals refused to admit people with permanent disabilities. In thirteenth- and fourteenth-century Paris, for example, only the Hôpital des Quinze-Vingts (Hospital of the Three Hundred), which King Louis IX founded in the 1250s to house blind people and their guides, welcomed any category of the permanently disabled.

Social status and gender also affected the treatment and perception of disabled people. Thirteenth- and fourteenth-century Europe witnessed a growing hostility toward the poor that was harmful to the disabled, especially disabled men. Gendered stereotypes of men from the laboring classes created an expectation that men should work and not be dependent. Preachers feminized disabled male beggars by associating them with bodily temptation and argued that such men were not worthy of charity because they used artifice to make themselves appear disabled, just like prostitutes used makeup to appear more alluring. Distrust of disabled male beggars also drives several Old French farces, such as the thirteenth-century Le garçon et l'aveugle (The Boy and the Blind Man), which portrays the blind beggar as a drain on society because he is vulgar, wanton, and miserly. Conversely, because predominant gender stereotypes obscured women's role in the workforce, dependent women were more acceptable and thus deemed more worthy of charity.

Familial acceptance was instrumental to the lives of disabled people, particularly those with congenital differences. Parents' responses to disabled offspring ranged from rejection and infanticide to reluctant acceptance. The birth of disabled children also affected the parents, as people inquired into what they might have seen, thought, or done to cause such a portent to appear. Familial care even informed the structure of the Hôpital des Quinze-Vingts, which encouraged residents to marry so that the sighted spouse could assist the blind one but forbade the marriage of two blind people, assuming that they could not care for each other. When familial care was insufficient, disabled people, particularly the poor, relied on their own social networks and on charity. The thirteenth-century miracles of Saint Louis reveal how poor disabled people, especially women, relied on networks of other women when family could or would not help them.

This is but a sample of medieval perceptions and experiences of disability. Medieval authors and artists employed images of disability to explore the meanings of sin, humanity, and power, yet the ramifications of this discourse have not been adequately explored. Regional and chronological differences need greater exploration too, as Old Norse literature and medieval Islamic society appear more accommodating than medieval Christian society. Scholars should also consider how disability marginalized so many, but exalted others, like Saint Margaret the Lame and Saint Roch, the plague saint. Such inquiries will deepen our knowledge of the medieval past and the modern world by challenging conceived notions of disability and encouraging a closer examination of the body, in all its variations and its social meanings.

MARK P. O'TOOL

References and Further Reading

- Bragg, Lois. "From the Mute God to the Lesser God: Disability in Medieval Celtic and Old Norse Literature." Disability and Society 12.2 (1997): 165–177.
- Eberly, Susan Schoon. "Fairies and the Folklore of Disability: Changelings, Hybrids and the Solitary Fairy" Folklore 99.1 (1988): 58–77.
- Farmer, Sharon. Surviving Poverty in Medieval Paris: Gender, Ideology, and the Daily Lives of the Poor. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2002.
- Kudlick, Catherine. "Disability History: Why We Need Another Other." American Historical Review 108.3 (2003): 763–793.
- Linton, Simi. Claiming Disability: Knowledge and Identity. New York: New York University Press, 1998.
- Malti-Douglas, Fedwa. "Mentalités and Marginality: Blindness and Mamluk Civilization." In The Islamic World from Classical to Modern Times: Essays in Honor of Bernard Lewis, edited by Clifford E. Bosworth, Roger Savory, and Abraham L. Udovitch. Princeton, N.J.: Darwin Press, 1988, pp. 211–237.
- Wheatley, Edward. "'Blind' Jews and Blind Christians: Metaphorics of Marginalization in Medieval Europe." Exemplaria 14.2 (2002): 351–382.

See also Almsgiving and Charity; Body in Literature and Religion; Body, Visual Representations of; Doctors and Healers; Feminist Theories and Methodologies; Hospitals; Infants and Infanticide; Lepers; Madness; Margaret "the Cripple" of Magdeburg; Medicine; Old Age; Plague; Poverty; Social Status

DIVISION OF LABOR

Depictions of Adam working the land while Eve spins, and sometimes additionally cares for her children, can be found in various forms across Europe, probably originating in ninth-century Byzantium. This division of labor was incorporated into a proverb—"When Adam delved, and Eve span, who was then a gentleman?"—which first appeared in English sources in the late fourteenth century but is later found in a variety of languages. The origin of the motif is in part the Genesis story that Adam's punishment for listening to Eve was to toil for their food, whereas hers was the pain of childbirth and the rule of her husband. The ideology of separate roles for men and women can be found in a variety of sources, particularly clerical ones, but the extent to which it was a social reality is disputed.

One theory is that a gendered division of labor is less pronounced in preindustrial economies, as men and women labor together at or near their homes, than in industrialized ones. Another is that women are always more likely to specialize in household activities than men because breastfeeding makes childcare activities initially easier for women. The debate thus centers around the household and the conjugal unit, although it should be recognized that not all workers, male and female, were married. For the medieval period, the debate has largely focused on rural society, particularly on peasants in thirteenth- to fifteenth-century England, although most manufacturing was also carried out in the household in medieval Europe. The household was a key unit in the organization of medieval labor, but peasant labor not only consisted of that for the household (working their own land for subsistence, and household chores such as cooking, cleaning, and childcare), but also labor for the market (producing surplus goods for sale), labor for the lord (services owed at certain times by bonded tenants), and labor that was hired for wages.

As regards labor for the household, Hanawalt has used reports of death by misadventure from thirteenth- to fifteenth-century England to hypothesize that peasant men and women not only undertook different tasks but had separate spheres of activity. She found that most women died in or around their homes, for example, while fetching water, whereas men were more likely to die in the fields or forests, for example, while carting. Thus women's main sphere of work was the home, whereas men's was the fields and forests. Her main conclusion has been challenged by Goldberg, who pointed out that certain tasks, such as fetching water and carting, might be more risky and therefore over-represented in the sources. While other evidence suggests that carting was considered men's work, and fetching water was viewed as women's work, he argues that it does not necessarily follow that women were not undertaking other less dangerous activities in the fields, such as weeding, milking, shearing, reaping, and binding. Men and women, particularly at harvest time, performed many of the same tasks outside the home. Yet while there is evidence that women did work in the fields, household chores and childcare were clearly viewed as women's tasks. Mothers might delegate the care of children to others, but generally to older daughters or other women.

Manorial accounts show that women did undertake some of the same work as men for pay, such as reaping, binding, thatching, and shearing sheep. English wage evidence has led to debate about whether men and women received comparable pay, particularly after the Black Death of 1348–1349, which created a shortage of labor. Of relevance here is the argument that men could command higher wages because the most highly paid jobs, such as mowing and ploughing, continued to be reserved for men. Although there are examples of women undertaking such jobs, these are few and far between, with women making most inroads into the unskilled labor market. Hatcher has argued that this is because medieval men as a group were physically stronger than medieval women as a group and so were more productive, but Bardsley counters that women might have more stamina and that physical factors alone do not explain their exclusion from certain jobs. Although there is much evidence, from urban areas as well as rural, that women undertook a wide variety of jobs, there is less evidence of women being trained in those seen as highly skilled and so highly paid. Gender ideologies thus had some impact on a division of labor.

CORDELIA BEATTIE

References and Further Reading

- Bardsley, Sandy. "Reply." Past and Present 173.1 (2001): 199–202.
- Emigh, Rebecca Jean. "The Gender Division of Labour: The Case of Tuscan Small Holders." Continuity and Change 15.1 (2000): 117–137.
- Goldberg, P. J. P. "The Public and the Private: Women and the Pre-Plague Economy." In Thirteenth-Century England, edited by Peter R. Coss and S. D. Lloyd. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell Press, 1991, pp. 75–89.
- Hanawalt, Barbara A. The Ties That Bound: Peasant Families in Medieval England. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- Hatcher, John. "Women's Work Reconsidered: Gender and Wage Differentiation in Late Medieval England." Past and Present 173.1 (2001): 191–198.
- Middleton, Christopher. "The Sexual Division of Labour in Feudal England." New Left Review 113–114 (1979): 147–168.

See also Agriculture; England; Household Management; Work

DIVORCE AND SEPARATION

Law and practice on the matter of divorce and separation were subject to a number of different influences and underwent major changes between c. 450 and 1500. Divorce was widely available in Roman times. Marriages were automatically dissolved in certain circumstances, such as the captivity or enslavement of one of the spouses; divorce by mutual consent was easy, and either party could seek a divorce unilaterally.

The attitude of the early Christians was decidedly different, since there was an emphasis on the equality of men and women before God and marriage as a spiritual bond. The Christian fathers therefore tended to stress indissolubility, despite certain pronouncements by Christ which seemed to allow a man to divorce his wife for adultery. Early Church councils prohibited divorce in general, but allowed it in the case of Christians married to Jews, pagans, or heretics. They vacillated over the question of divorce or separation on grounds of adultery, with considerable variation in pronouncements as to whether this was allowable at all, and, if so, whether it was applicable equally to both sexes and whether or not either spouse could remarry. Secular laws promulgated by Christian emperors allowed men to divorce their wives for adultery, sorcery, or procuring, while women could divorce husbands for homicide, sorcery, or desecrating tombs. However, the prohibition of remarriage or the imposition of a delay that varied according to the seriousness of the grounds for divorce makes it clear that divorce could still, in practice, be obtained for trivial causes.

Divorce was also practised among the Germanic tribes, as reflected in their law codes. Divorce by mutual consent was generally available, and men could divorce their wives unilaterally, not only for adultery but also for sorcery, barrenness, or violation of tombs, and without any serious grounds if they were prepared to offer monetary compensation. Women either could not divorce their husbands at all or could do so only for such serious offences as homicide, sorcery, or violation of tombs or for homosexuality or forcing them into sexual acts with another man. The church made no effort to combat such divorces, concentrating its attention on the prohibition of incestuous marriages, including those of couples linked by affinity as a result of marriages of relatives or by godparenthood, as well as blood relationships. Since such couples were encouraged to part, this must have increased the number of separations insofar as these strictures were effective and it was necessary to check abuses, such as women standing as godmother to their own children in order to obtain separation from their husbands.

Matrimonial jurisdiction was still regarded as a secular matter; but, under the Carolingians, efforts were made to establish the indissolubility of marriage by limiting the grounds on which a marriage could be dissolved and not permitting even a man who separated from a wife on grounds of adultery to remarry during her lifetime. Practice always lagged some way behind these principles, at least for the kings and nobles to whom most records relate. Until the seventh century, Merovingian rulers had practised polygamy, and even after that, unilateral repudiations of wives were not unknown. Charlemagne himself repudiated at least one wife, the daughter of Desiderius, king of the Lombards, in that case with the support of the pope, who had opposed a marriage alliance with his Lombard enemies. But the climate of opinion was changing, and bishops were taking a more active role in matrimonial cases, though not claiming exclusive jurisdiction. The change became clear when, in 858, Lothar II of Lotharingia attempted to free himself from his marriage to Theutberga in order to marry his concubine, Waldrada. He did not simply repudiate Theutberga, as Charlemagne had done with King Desiderius' daughter, but felt it necessary to accuse her of the very serious crime of incest with her brother before her marriage, which, if proven, would indeed have precluded her from contracting any subsequent marriage. The case dragged on before secular and ecclesiastical assemblies, with references to Hincmar, archbishop of Reims, and appeals to the pope; Lothar was compelled at last to take Theutberga back and finally obtained absolution in Rome only just before his own death in 869. One of the most significant aspects of this and other contemporary cases is the increased involvement of bishops and the papacy in matrimonial questions.

The Church's View of Marriage

In the context of the Gregorian Reform and the development of canon law the church sought to obtain exclusive jurisdiction over marriage disputes and impose its own view of marriage, both in defining what constituted a valid marriage and in establishing the principle of indissolubility. It based marriage on the consent of the two parties, provided they were of canonical age to marry, which was normally twelve for a woman and fourteen for a man, and were not debarred from contracting the marriage by reason of kinship within the prohibited degrees, ties of affinity or spiritual kinship, marital ties to some other party, or religious vows. If a couple who were thus free to contract marriage pronounced the intention of taking each other as man and wife at that present moment (per verba de presenti) and or also in the future (per verba de futuro), and if that declaration was completed by consummation, their marriage was indissoluble. There could be no divorce in the modern sense of the ending of an undoubtedly valid marriage and the freeing of the couple to contract new unions.

There were limited circumstances under which a divortium could be pronounced, but these always constituted either an annulment or a separation, not a divorce in the modern sense. Despite the fact that the church based marriage on consent and not consummation, it was possible to obtain an annulment (divortium a vinculo) on the grounds that one of the spouses was unable to consummate the marriage. With that exception, annulments had to be justified on the basis that the marriage had never existed because of an impediment, such as a precontract by one or both of the parties, ties of consanguinity or affinity, or the fact that one or both parties were under the canonical age for marriage or had been forced into consenting. If an annulment was granted, the parties were as free to marry someone else as they had been before the disputed union. Divortium a mensa et thoro or separation could be granted on the grounds of adultery, heresy, apostasy, or cruelty. This authorised the couple to live apart but did not bring the marriage to an end, and neither party could remarry during the lifetime of the other.

Despite notorious cases among kings and the nobility, such as Philip II of France's attempt to divorce his wife Ingeborg, and despite the records of many matrimonial cases brought before church courts in the later Middle Ages, petitions for divorce were not very frequent. Suits to enforce a disputed marriage were far more common than cases where a divorce or separation was sought. Divorce or separation was not easy to obtain. Ecclesiastical courts were aware of the danger of collusion and were unwilling to accept the declarations of the parties without evidence. Standards of proof were exacting, where such things as consanguinity or cruelty were alleged, and by no means were all those petitioning for divorce or separation successful. Court records and casual references in other sources suggest that many ordinary people did not have recourse to the courts if they wanted to end their marriage but simply left their spouse and went to live as man and wife with someone else. Some subsequently found themselves before the courts, but many more were probably successful in avoiding attention.

CHRISTINE MEEK

References and Further Reading

- Airlie, Stuart. "Private Bodies and the Body Politic in the Divorce Case of Lothar II." Past and Present 161 (1998): 3–38.
- Bishop, Jane. "Bishops as Marital Advisors in the Ninth Century." In Women of the Medieval World, edited by Julius Kirshner and Suzanne F. Wemple. Oxford: Basil Blackwell, Oxford, 1985.
- Brundage, James A. Law, Sex and Christian Society in Medieval Europe. Chicago and London, University of Chicago Press, 1987.
- Conklin, George. "Ingeborg of Denmark, Queen of France, 1193–1223." In Queens and Queenship in Medieval Europe: Proceedings of a Conference Held at King's College London, edited by Anne J. Duggan. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell Press, 1997, pp. 39–52.

- Esmein, Adhemar. Le mariage en droit canonique. 2 vols., Paris: Larose et Forcel, 1891.
- Finch, Andrew. "Repulsa uxore sua: Marital Difficulties and Separation in the Later Middle Ages." Continuity and Change 8 (1993): 189–204.
- Helmholz, Richard H. Marriage Litigation in Medieval England. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1974.
- McNamara, Jo Ann, and Suzanne F. Wemple. "Marriage and Divorce in the Frankish Kingdom." In Women in Medieval Society, edited by Susan Mosher Stuard. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1976, pp. 95–124.
- Pedersen, Frederick. Marriage Disputes in Medieval England. London: Hambledon Press, London, 2000.
- Sheehan, Michael M. "The Formation and Stability of Marriage in Fourteenth-Century England: Evidence of an Ely Register." Medieval Studies 33 (1971): 228–263.

See also Children, Betrothal and Marriage of; Marriage, Christian; Marriage, Impediments to; Remarriage

DOCTORS AND HEALERS

Medical practice in medieval Europe encompassed a diverse array of healers. Learned physicians competed with a wide variety of lay practitioners for patients, and doctors did not always have an advantage over other healers in terms of expertise. Female practitioners treated both men and women, and female patients also sought help from men as well as women. This pluralism presented both opportunities and constraints for medieval women who practiced medicine. Women were excluded from universities and often from guilds, the formal institutions of medicine, limiting their ability to practice with an official license. At the same time, a large number of women worked informally as unlicensed healers.

There were a few officially sanctioned female healing professions. Until the seventeenth century, midwives were invariably female, and midwifery frequently fell under town or church licensing procedures. Ideals of female modesty, especially in southern Europe, dictated that male practitioners could not touch the female body, which meant that midwives often worked in conjunction with male practitioners. In hospitals, which were run by religious orders, nuns worked as doctors and nurses, especially for female patients. A number of women also gained renown as general practitioners before the advent of medical licensing. Most famous among these was the twelfth-century healer Trota of Salerno. Moreover, the example of Hildegard of Bingen, a German abbess in the mid-twelfth century, demonstrates that women could be highly learned in medical theory. Hildegard's medical treatise, Causae et Curae (Causes and Cures), presented a complex system of disease and health that drew on works of Aristotle and Galen, two pillars of academic medicine.

By the fourteenth century, however, licensing regulations made it difficult for women to work as healers legally. Universities, the gold standard of medical education from the thirteenth century onward, excluded women, a policy that continued until the late eighteenth century. Nevertheless, a number of women did gain recognition as physicians. Several Muslim women were licensed as general practitioners in fourteenth-century Valencia, while in late fourteenth- and early fifteenth-century Frankfurt, a few Jewish women practiced as eye doctors. It was often easier for non-Christian women to work as physicians, since both Muslims and Jews, who were also banned from the universities, had separate systems of medical licensing. All the same, in Italy and England, women occasionally surfaced in town records as medica (doctor), and there were certainly others who did not make it into official records. It is often easiest to find female practitioners through court trials against them; in 1322, for example, Jacoba Felice was convicted of practicing medicine without a university license in Paris.

Women had an easier time gaining membership in guilds, which licensed surgeons, barbers, and apothecaries. Most English barber and surgical guilds accepted women after licensing began in the late fourteenth century, and a number of women worked in these professions. Surgical guilds in Italy frequently permitted women to practice as well; in thirteenth- and fourteenth-century Naples, for example, twenty-four women were listed as surgeons. Even so, the numbers of women operating as licensed practitioners in traditionally male professions was fairly small, and in many cases those who did practice took over a family business from a deceased husband or father. Female medical practitioners worked most often as part-time healers, and many women had difficulty both affording the steep guild fees and working the long hours required for professional practitioners.

Most of the medical care women provided took place outside of official licensing systems. Women generally were responsible for the basic care of a household or estate, which included making medical salves, pills, drinks, baths, and other remedies. They frequently oversaw the cultivation of herb gardens, which provided many of the ingredients for medications. Letters between members of the English Paston family show that women considered themselves competent medical practitioners, and household medical care of this sort was ubiquitous and routine.

In addition to domestic care, women worked commercially in a variety of informal, unlicensed vocations, as herb gatherers, leeches, wise-women, nurses, and empirics. Although this technically was illegal, prosecutions generally took place only when a licensed practitioner complained of loss of clientele. Physicians and surgeons took great pains to restrict competition, and they frequently demanded stricter licensing procedures and criticized women healers as dangerous. Nonetheless, health care in medieval Europe was a fluid system, and women healers abounded in all areas despite official restrictions.

ALISHA RANKIN

References and Further Reading

- Broomhall, Susan. Women's Medical Work in Early Modern France. Manchester: Manchester University Press, 2004.
- “The Case of a Woman Doctor in Paris.” In The Portable Medieval Reader, edited by James Bruce Ross and Mary McLaughlin. New York: Penguin, 1977, pp. 635–640.
- Glaze, Florence Eliza. “Medical Writer: ‘Behold the Human Creature’.” In Voice of the Living Light: Hildegard of Bingen and Her World, edited by Barbara Newman. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998, pp. 125–148.
- Green, Monica H., ed. The Trotula. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001.
- Green, Monica. “Women’s Medical Practice and Health Care in Medieval Europe.” Signs: Journal of Women in Culture and Society 14 (1989): 434–473.
- . “The Possibilities of Literacy and the Limits of Reading: Women and the Gendering of Medical Literacy.” In Women's Healthcare in the Medieval West, Essay 7. Aldershot: Ashgate Variorum, 2000.
- Park, Katharine. “Medicine and Magic: The Healing Arts.” In Gender and Society in Renaissance Italy, edited by Judith Brown and Robert C. Davis. London: Longman, 1998.
- Rawcliffe, Carole. Medicine and Society in Later Medieval England. London: Sandpiper Books, 1995.
- Stoudt, Debra L. “Medieval German Women and the Power of Healing.” In Women Healers and Physicians: Climbing a Long Hill, edited by Lilan R. Furst. Lexington: University of Kentucky Press, 1997, pp. 13–42.
- Whitaker, Elaine E. “Reading the Paston Letters Medically.” English Language Notes 31. 3 (1993): 19–27.

See also Gynecology; Hildegard of Bingen; Hospitals; Magic and Charms; Medicine; Midwives; Plague; Trota of Salerno; Universities

DOGARESSE

Sources often referred to the wife of the doge of Venice as ductrix or dogaressa. The office of dogaressa evolved in conjunction with that of her spouse. In the eighth through twelfth centuries the dogeship was a quasi-hereditary position with few limits on its authority. During this time doges and their families often sought interregional and international alliances, so that several early dogaressa were foreign-born, royal, and powerful. For example, Doge Pietro IV Candiano (960–976) repudiated his first wife to marry Waldrada, a descendant of the Lombard

King Ugo of Arles, and claim a sizable dowry of territories on the mainland. After his murder, Waldrada used her royal status to seek the protection of Empress Adelaide, the mother of German Emperor Otto II, whose intervention resulted in the return of Waldrada's dowry and her husband's property. Similarly, eleventh-century Doge Domenico Selvo enhanced his personal wealth and prestige as well as Venice's ties to the Byzantine Empire through his marriage to Teodora Ducas, the sister of Byzantine Emperor Michael Ducas.

The Venetian move towards a more republican model of statehood in the late Middle Ages created in the dogaressa a much altered and virtually unique female civic position. Venetians installed a series of institutions and legislative restrictions meant to check the doge's unlimited authority. In particular, the promissione ducale (oath of office) defined the identity of the late medieval dogaressa and restricted her mobility and authority, but also laid out some of her ceremonial functions. This document, revised for each doge, intimated that his spouse should be Venetian, and required that she, along with the doge and their descendants, limit their commercial dealings and their exchange of gifts. The oath codified the political obligations of the dogaressa through its concern with her ability to build alliances or intercede on the behalf of family or friends. Her husband's elected position and concerns about the threat of dynastic tyranny further denied the dogaressa the maternal influence and patronage exercised by consorts in courtly societies. While Venetian political structures, and particularly the promissione, limited her overt authority, the oath also confirmed the dogaressa's significant place in ducal, civic, and religious ceremony.

The promissione directed that the dogaressa swear to uphold the oath in a governmental ritual, making her the only nonruling European female to take a constitutional vow. An increasingly elaborate entrance ceremony followed the dogaressa's oath. Escorted by governmental representatives in lieu of her husband, whose absence negated royal implications, the dogaressa proceeded from her home to the church of San Marco, and then to the Doge's Palace, in a ritual that mimicked Venetian marital rites, featured dozens of women, and highlighted the social networks and offspring that females contributed to the state. In addition to her entrance, the dogaressa worshipped daily in San Marco, and regularly attended religious rituals there with her spouse. Kneeling votive images of the dogaressa on the tombs of several medieval doges are further indicative of unique female piety. Together the doge and dogaressa promoted the civic values of family and religiosity.

By the fifteenth century, some dogaressa became yet more prominent and visible, as their spouses attempted to harness the symbolism and personal charisma employed by their mainland princely neighbors. Marina Nani Foscari, the wife of ambitious expansionist Doge Francesco Foscari (1423–1457), functioned as an envoy in the frequent guided tours of Venice she conducted for the visiting wives of Italian and European dignitaries, demonstrating the mercantile and military strengths of her city as she helped to forge diplomatic alliances. Foscari and his successor, Doge Pasquale Malipiero (1457–1462), expressed their princely ambition with artistic and architectural patronage, mimicking nearby courtly societies. Dogaressa Giovanna Dandolo Malipiero achieved similar public visibility to her predecessor when her image appeared on the reverse of a medal of her spouse that imagined doge and dogaressa jointly as rulers and protectors of the city-state. Dogaressa Taddea Michiel Mocenigo, spouse of Doge Giovanni Mocenigo (1478–1485) achieved comparable public prominence only in death; the plague claimed her life in 1479 and prompted the institution of an elaborate funeral for the dogaressa based on that of the doge.

The prominent place achieved by the medieval dogaressa in the civic ideology of Venice largely diminished after the fifteenth century. From 1485 until the end of the republic, only ten doges had living wives. In the sixteenth century, two dogaressa became the focal point for elaborate public spectacles, but the more common widowed or bachelor doges of the early modern period rendered the dogaressa rare relics with greatly diminished public prominence and significance.

HOLLY HURLBURT

References and Further Reading

- Hurlburt, Holly S. The Dogaressa of Venice: Wife and Icon. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2005.
 Molmenti, Pompeo. La dogaressa di Venezia. Turin: L. Roux, 1887.
 Muir, Edward. Civic Ritual in Renaissance Venice. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1981.

See also Italy

DOLCE OF WORMS

Dolce of Worms (d. 1196) came from medieval German Jewry's elite leadership class. The wife of Rabbi Eleazar ben Judah of Worms (1165–1230), a leading figure in the Hasidei Ashkenaz, the German–Jewish pietist movement, Dolce supported financially an extensive household, including children, students, and teachers. According to her husband's eyewitness account, she was murdered, with her daughters Bellette and Hannah, by intruders who were probably attracted by Dolce's reputation as a moneylender. In accordance with the Emperor's mandate protecting the Jews of his realm, the miscreants were quickly captured and executed. Closely based on Proverbs 31, praising the "woman of valor," R. Eleazar's Hebrew elegy details his wife's domestic, religious, and communal endeavors, and, despite its formulaic structure, is an important source for medieval Jewish women's activities. R. Eleazar designates Dolce as hasidah (pious or saintly) and tzadeket (righteous); in addition to domestic management and business finesse, he praises her needlework, recounting that she prepared thread and gut to sew together books, Torah scrolls, and other religious objects. Unusually learned for a woman of her milieu, Dolce taught other women and led them in prayer. She adorned brides and prepared the dead for burial, meritorious endeavors in Jewish tradition. R. Eleazar especially reveres his wife for facilitating the spiritual activities of the men of her household; the reward he invokes for Dolce at the conclusion of his lament is to be wrapped in the eternal life of Paradise, a tribute to her deeds, on which so many depended.

JUDITH BASKIN

References and Further Reading

- Baskin, Judith R. "Women Saints in Judaism: Dolce of Worms." In Women Saints in World Religions, edited by Arvind Sharma. Albany, N.Y.: State University of New York Press, 2000, pp. 39–69.
- . "Dolce of Worms: The Lives and Deaths of an Exemplary Medieval Jewish Woman and Her Daughters." In Judaism in Practice: From the Middle Ages Through the Early Modern Period, edited by Lawrence Fine. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 2001.

See also Death, Mourning, and Commemoration; Germanic Lands; Investment and Credit; Jewish Women; Literature: Hebrew; Marriage, Jewish

DOMESTIC ABUSE

Domestic abuse and/or violence has emerged as an important area of scholarly inquiry in medieval studies. Prompted by the efforts of social historians and anthropologists to provide a broader picture of the history of the institution of marriage as well as family life, kinship relations, child-rearing practices, and domestic customs in the Middle Ages, the body of work available on this topic has grown rapidly.

Such growth is sustained by the widespread representation of acts of familial violence in the many genres produced by medieval culture, including romance, hagiography, spiritual autobiography, biography, drama, sermons, conduct and advice manuals, family sagas, penitentials, wisdom literature, folk tales, iconography, and other visual media. Of particular concern to scholars in this area of research is the relationship of cultural production to everyday medieval life.

Biblical Examples

Many of the representations found in the genres named above reiterate scenes of family disharmony depicted in the Old Testament. Extreme family violence—fratricide, matricide, patricide—and milder forms of abuse demonstrated in corporal punishment or psychological intimidation become recurrent motifs in subsequent genres. From the disobedience of the first parents of Genesis to Cain's murder of his brother, Abraham's interrupted sacrifice of Isaac, and the contentious family relations of patriarchs such as Noah, tests of faith in the Old Testament depend upon an urgent need for discipline and obedience to an often angry and jealous deity.

The familial harmony depicted in New Testament scenes of the Holy Family appears to mitigate the harsh characterization of the Old Testament family; constructed as a unique model of human relationship, this exceptional family suggests that the gap between the literal and the spiritual worlds can be bridged not only by faith but by divine transformation. Whether cast in symbolic language or more material terms, the family remains an important touchstone for early conceptions of Christianity. Yet Paul's epistles offer contradictory advice on how best to achieve family harmony. On the one hand, wives and children were admonished to obey their husbands and fathers (Ephesians) while on the other marriage was proclaimed to be a union based upon mutual respect (1 Corinthians). The gap between an implicit hierarchy in the former and an egalitarian ideal of mutuality in the latter suggests that negotiations between spouses could be left open to interpretation.

These sorts of concerns are not unique to scriptural texts; they also appear in the mythologies, epic poetry, and literature of the ancient world. From the poetry of Homer to the domestic tragedies of Aeschylus's Orestia, Sophocles' Oedipus trilogy, and Euripides' Medea, the concerns of the family are paramount to public governance and the idea of justice. However the idea of that most basic of social units is construed at different times and in different places, it stands as the cornerstone of human civilization and the raw material from which cultural representations of all kinds emerge. The tales that these ancient works reiterate time and again are didactic and cautionary, yet the reiteration of the tropes of domestic abuse/violence over time in so many genres in such a wide variety of venues suggests that it has always been possible to represent the “dysfunctional” family because it has always been a feature of human society.

Paternal Power

The Middle Ages did not invent domestic abuse, but as with all cultures immersed in the values represented by traditional narratives of the past as well as actively engaged in their reproduction, medieval writers and lawmakers inherited many assumptions and legal proclivities from the past. Roman and Germanic law codes, patristic writings, scriptural archetypes, proverbial wisdom, and customary practices and entrenched ritual traditions contributed to a model of domestic governance predicated upon the entitlement of the paterfamilias and his right to presume legitimate authority (patria potestas) over the subordinate members of his household—wife, children, and various others. At the same time, obedience remained a tacit dictum for members of the household living under the aegis of this ruling authority.

Despite its lack of a semantic category (“domestic abuse” and/or “domestic violence” are contemporary terms), the medieval discourse on the subject often revolved around disciplinary customs and procedures underwritten by some of the inherited assumptions mentioned above. Household justice incurred was expected to be reasonable and appropriate to the infraction. Moreover, the episodes of domestic abuse discernible in the literature, as well as in the documentary evidence, suggest that medieval European populations had a keen awareness of the boundaries between acceptable discipline and outright cruelty. In spiritual autobiographies such as Augustine’s Confessions or the Book of Margery Kempe, for instance, the allusions to domestic abuse—the abuse of Monica, Augustine’s mother, or the suffering of a small child that prompts empathy in Margery—are presented as features of everyday life that one simply had to assimilate in order to acquire the discipline needed to endure this life in preparation for the next. Nonetheless, what distinguished a form of mild abuse from a cruel violation of personhood was largely a matter of interpretation. Stripes on the back or bruises to parts of the body typically covered and hidden from public view were marks of violation not as likely to arouse intervention from extended kin or concerned neighbors as more public forms of domestic violence would be, that is, if the perpetrator carried on the abuse in plain view of witnesses.

Domestic Rebellion

Just as domestic tyranny accompanied by acts of violence was not condoned, so too was domestic rebellion by subordinate household members strongly discouraged. Disrespectful or assertive wives could find themselves on a cucking stool or in the stocks for a minor infraction such as a burned dinner or talking back to their husbands. Should a wife’s silent protracted suffering suddenly explode in an act of retaliation or self-defense (that is, murder of her husband), she could find herself condemned both for homicide and treason for which she would be burned at the stake. In terms of the law, a wife in England was deemed a feme covert, located literally sub virga et potentate (“under the rod and authority”) of her husband.

Guidelines for Behavior

Legal records, papal epistles, eyewitness accounts, and various other kinds of written testimony point to the fact of domestic abuse as well as to the existence of an ongoing debate about how the household should be equitably governed, how children should be raised and educated, how spousal relations should be negotiated. Then, as now, there were many approaches to achieving stability within the household and conflicting attitudes about how parents should discipline their children. The famous proverb attributed to Solomon, “spare the rod and spoil the child,” popular among authoritarian-minded adults, endorsed the beating of a child as a demonstration of a parent’s love and concern for the child’s salvation. The opposing point of view was constructed as a feminine and therefore ineffective means by which to discipline unruly young men. Didactic literature on the topic includes Stans Puer ad Mensam, Peter Idley’s Instructions to His Son, and How the Good Man Taught His Son, while advice to young women rendered along similar lines appears in works such as How the Good Wife Taught Her Daughter, The Book of the Knight of the Tower, and Christine de Pizan’s Book of the Treasury of Ladies.

Guidelines for behavior also find articulation in the sermons of Bernardino of Siena and the written rules for marriage, such as Cherubino of Spoleto's Regale della vita matrimoniale, which encourages a husband to correct his wife's offenses gently before deploying more aggressive methods such as beating. Even canon law, written down by Gratian in his Decretum, assumed a husband's familial entitlement to be nearly sacrosanct; husbands were assumed to be capable of wielding their authority judiciously, and capable of making appropriate determinations on how much and what kind of discipline should be deployed for the adequate correction of household members. Neither Gratian nor the commentators of the Glossa Ordinaria (Ordinary Gloss) such as Johannes Teutonicus advocated severe corporal punishment; they simply made it clear that a husband had the legal right to any form of "castigation" that he deemed appropriate for the circumstances.

In a system that most often assumed husbands and fathers governed their households reasonably, it is easy to understand how a gap could arise between a theory of family relationship and its interpretation both by individuals and by legal institutions. Domestic abuse could be construed as a prerequisite for measuring the potential of a saint, hero, or heroine, in an enactment of the kind of discipline needed to hone the protagonist or the aspiring martyr into readiness. Suffering was considered a means by which to prepare the human will to face the consequences of a cruel world; it functioned as a marker of human mortality and a reminder to prepare the soul for the afterlife. It is no coincidence that the icons of suffering in the Middle Ages are the Virgin Mary and her son.

It is important to note that regional variations as well as historical differences affect how we understand domestic abuse in the Middle Ages. Most cases in the legal records address the husband's abuse of his wife, though there are variations on this theme and numerous ways for the courts, most often ecclesiastical, to render judgment should a complaint reach that level of adjudication. Nonetheless, the increasing number of court documents and various other kinds of testimony that continue to surface from the historical archives indicate a tangible link between actual incidents of domestic abuse and representations of that abuse.

EVE SALISBURY

References and Further Reading

- Bednarski, Steven. "Keeping It in the Family? Domestic Violence in the Later Middle Ages: Examples from a Provençal Town (1340–1403)." In Love, Marriage, and Family Ties in the Later Middle Ages, edited by Isabel Davis, et al. Turnhout: Brepols, 2003, pp. 277–297.
- Brozyna, Martha A. "Not Just a Family Affair: Domestic Violence and the Ecclesiastical Courts in Late Medieval Poland." In Love, Marriage and Family Ties in the Later Middle Ages, edited by Isabel Davis, et al. Turnhout: Brepols, 2003, pp. 299–309.
- Brundage, James A. "Domestic Violence in Classical Canon Law." In Violence in the Middle Ages, edited by Richard Kaeuper. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell & Brewer, 2002, pp. 183–195.
- Hanawalt, Barbara. "Violence in the Domestic Milieu of Late Medieval England." In Violence in the Middle Ages, edited by Richard Kaeuper. Rochester: Boydell Press, 2002, pp. 197–214.
- Hoppenbrouwers, P. C. M. "Vengeance Is Ours? The Involvement of Kin in the Settlement of 'Cases of Vengeance' in Later Medieval Holland." In Love, Marriage, and Family Ties in the Later Middle Ages, edited by Isabel Davis, Miriam Muller, and Sarah Rees Jones. Turnhout: Brepols, 2003, pp. 241–275.
- Maddern, Philippa C. Violence and Social Order: East Anglia 1422–1442. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.
- McSheffery, Shannon. Love and Marriage in Late Medieval London. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Medieval Institute Publications, 1995.
- Müller, Miriam. "Conflict, Strife, and Cooperation: Aspects of the Late Medieval Family and Household." In Love, Marriage, and Family Ties in the Later Middle Ages, edited by Isabel Davis, et al. Turnhout: Brepols, 2003, pp. 311–329.
- Murray, Jacqueline, ed. Love, Marriage, and Family in the Middle Ages: A Reader. Peterborough: Broadview Press, 2001.
- Salisbury, Eve, Georgiana Donavin, and Merrall L. Price, eds. Domestic Violence in Medieval Texts. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 2002.

See also Conduct Literature; Family; Feme Covert; Godelieve of Gistel; Husbands and Husbandry; Kempe, Margery; Law, Canon; Marriage Ceremonies; Marriage, Christian; Marriage and Concubinage in Scandinavia; Marriage, Impediments to; Marriage, Islamic; Iberia; Marriage, Jewish; Marriage Preaching; Violence; Woman on Top

DOMESTICITY

Domesticity can be identified in fourteenth-century England as a specifically urban set of values associated with a particular mode of living. It was characteristic of the households of the "burgesses," men who formed the privileged group from whom the towns' elites and officeholders were drawn. These households or familiae—husband and wife, children, servants, and apprentices—lived and worked together in multiroom houses, increasingly built of timber-frame (a new technology in the thirteenth century) on several floors. Their houses were not only residential spaces but were also sites of business and manufacture. The later separation of the workplace (gendered masculine) from the home (gendered feminine) cannot have been the norm among the fourteenth-century bourgeoisie.

By the fifteenth century the distinction between the housing of the poor and that of the better-off was well-established. The record-keepers of Coventry, for example, regularly distinguished between cottages of one or two rooms and what they called “hall places”; in Winchester the larger houses were identified as “tenements.” Already in Colchester in 1301, however, multiroom houses are in evidence in inventories made for tax purposes. Many households occupied two-room dwellings, but a minority lived in larger houses: one of the biggest was Roger the Dyer’s house, which had four rooms: a hall, a chamber, a kitchen, and a brewhouse. This is very like the house of Emma Hatfield, a London chandler’s widow, who died in 1373, or Thomas Baker, a York stringer, who died in 1436: the houses of both consisted of a hall, a chamber, a kitchen, and a shop, and Emma Hatfield had a storehouse in addition.

Many of their contemporaries lived in slightly larger houses with up to a dozen rooms. They were versatile and flexible spaces for eating and sleeping, for buying, selling, and storing goods, and for manufacture and production. Surviving inventories show that in the fourteenth century the inhabitants of geographically quite distant towns had a shared understanding of the organization of domestic space. There was always an aula (hall) in which people sat and ate. There was also always at least one room called a camera (chamber) in which people slept, though often not alone. There was frequently a kitchen and, in addition, very often a shop (which could be a workroom or a retail space), a storeroom, a brewhouse, and a boulting-house (where flour was sieved). Beyond these basic rooms, larger houses had other rooms such as a parlour, a winecellar, a grainroom, or occasionally a chapel, as well as additional chambers.

These homes differed from aristocratic townhouses in both size and the uses to which space was put. In the former, men and women lived and worked in close proximity to one another. The medieval meanings of the word homely (domestic) cluster around ideas of intimacy. Although as workplaces these houses were in some sense public and the work that went on them was subject to guild regulation and scrutiny, nevertheless, they were also understood as private. Domestic privacy was protected by law: eavesdropping, for example, was a punishable offence. Household members were able, if they chose, to eat, sleep, and work in different places, unlike the poor in their one-room cottages. Nevertheless, this spatial differentiation must have been a matter of control as well as of privacy. Hospitality, orderliness, a place for things, tidying away, the imposition of routines, and the management of time: these were more easily achievable and thus more desirable domestic goals when a whole family did not occupy one room in which eating, sleeping, childcare, and working endlessly overlapped.

The well-regulated burgher household was not, in these circumstances, one where trade or manufacture was separated from the rest of living (which became a nineteenth-century ideal), but one where trade, manufacture, business, preparing food, cooking, eating, and sleeping were all understood as separate but interrelated aspects of domestic life and ordered as such. Domesticity, as a burgher value, is a reconceptualization of everyday space and time, a way of making intimacy tolerable rather than oppressive. William Langland’s evocation in Piers Plowman of the hardships of women who live in a single room can be contrasted with Geoffrey Chaucer’s distillation of the bourgeois way of life in “The Shipman’s Tale.” The poor woman in her hovel, cold and hungry, rocks the cradle, cards and combs wool, patches and washes, cleans flax, winds yarn, and strips rushes. The merchant’s wife calls her husband down from his upstairs office to a meal prepared by their cook, after spending the early morning chatting in her garden, accompanied by her servant girl. Her guest has drawn attention to the hour on his portable timepiece. It is no coincidence that this orderly and differentiated way of life should become visible in the fourteenth century, during the period of the time revolution, with the invention of the fixed hour.

FELICITY RIDDY

References and Further Reading

- Chaucer, Geoffrey. “The Shipman’s Tale.” In The Riverside Chaucer, edited by Larry D. Benson, et al. 3rd ed. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1987.
- Davidoff, Leonore, and Catherine Hall. Family Fortunes: Men and Women of the English Middle Class 1780–1850. London: Routledge, 1987.
- Dohrn-van Rossum, Gerhard. History of the Hour: Clocks and Modern Temporal Orders, translated by Thomas Dunlap. Chicago: Chicago University Press, 1996.
- Grenville, Jane. Medieval Housing. London and Washington: Leicester University Press, 1997.
- Langland, William. Piers Plowman: the C-Text, edited by Derek Pearsall. Exeter: Exeter University Press, 1994.
- Rybczynski, Witold. Home: A Short History of an Idea. New York: Viking, 1986.
- Schofield, John. Medieval London Houses. New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 1994.

See also Architecture, Domestic; Artisan Families, Women of; Home Manufacturing; Household Management; Merchant Families, Women of

DOMINICAN ORDER

Dominic de Guzman (c. 1170–1221) cooperated with religious women long before Honorius III formally approved his Order of Friars Preachers (Ordo Fratrum Praedicatorum) on 22 December 1216. He was still a canon under Bishop Diego of Osma when the two helped to found a community for women in Prouille in southern France (1206). That these women were converts from Catharism, as is often claimed, cannot be substantiated and, even if true, the monastery became a seedbed for orthodoxy when its sisters were sent to guide women in new Dominican foundations. Even as the first constitutions of the Dominican order were passed in the general chapters of 1220 and 1221, the friars already had established ties with two other communities of religious women, a house in Madrid (1220) and San Sisto in Rome (1221). In 1223 Diana d'Andalo founded St. Agnes in Bologna in cooperation with Jordan of Saxony, Dominic's successor as the master general. By the mid-1240s several monasteries in Italy, France, and, in particular, Germany functioned in association with the friars, including Unterlinden in Colmar, Germany and St. Dominic in Montargis, France.

Nuns and Lay Women

Women's responses to Dominican friars' preaching were enthusiastic, but their position within the order remained ambiguous throughout the Middle Ages. While the friars themselves formed an organization with a clear chain of command from master general and general chapter to provincial leaders and priors of individual convents, the arrangements concerning women's houses were varied and subject to frequent, often disruptive, readjustments. In fact, the only feature consistently shared by all women's houses associated with Dominican friars was their adherence to the rather vague Rule of St. Augustine. Many communities were positioned under local bishops, but enjoyed the spiritual care of the Dominicans, hence the expression "nuns of the Order of St. Augustine under the care of the Friars Preachers," or moniales Ordinis Sancti Augustini sub cura fratrum praedicatorum. Some houses earned papal privileges that placed them directly under jurisdiction of Dominicans and enabled them to complement the Augustinian rule with the constitutions inspired by the Dominican ethos, but even these arrangements were markedly varied. Master General Humbert of Romans modified the friars' constitutions for women's use in 1259, but he failed to produce the intended uniformity, for many communities continued to follow the older constitution originally used at San Sisto, Rome, or simply abided by local statutes of various types.

The constitutionally complex histories of Dominican women's communities were matched by the equally intricate origins of these communities. Many houses began as communities for Beguines or other independent religious women. Such was the case with the vibrant German houses Engeltal and Katharinental (Diessenhofen), both of which secured a position within the order during the 1240s. Some were acquired from other orders, among them the renowned reformed monastery Corpus Domini (1394) in Venice, originally a Benedictine community. A few monasteries resulted from royal or aristocratic bequests, including King Bela IV of Hungary's foundation for his daughter Margaret (1242–1270), a future saint. More typically, however, Dominican monasteries were urban foundations by wealthy widows, signorial rulers, or powerful merchant families.

As there was no central planning concerning the administration of the houses for Dominican women, the state of individual communities was a sum of multiple variants, ranging from the resourcefulness of the women themselves and the standing of their secular patrons to the ever-changing reactions of the friars and the conflicting stances taken by bishops and popes. Some popes granted considerable favors to women's communities. Among them were Innocent IV, who in the mid-1240s sweepingly incorporated several women's houses into the order, and Clement IV, who in 1267 laid out clear guidelines concerning Dominican friars' spiritual duties toward nuns. But these statements hardly closed the debate concerning the cura mulierum (care of women) within the order. The subsequent pronouncements by the popes, bishops, and leaders of the order continued to adjust or even reverse earlier privileges. A notable exception in this pattern was the Observant Reform, which was launched in the late 1380s and prevalent throughout the fifteenth century. Within this movement, aimed at reviving the religious rigor associated with the early years of the order, some monasteries, such as Corpus Domini in Venice, St. Dominic in Pisa, Schönensteinbach near Colmar, and St. Catherine in Nuremberg, received unprecedented institutional stability in exchange for their prohibition of private ownership, otherwise common in medieval nunneries, and adherence to strict enclosure (clausura).

The question of women's status within the order was further complicated by the presence of laywomen. While the friars welcomed the rich mystical culture of the laity, and many groups met in their churches or even wore the order's colors of black and white, the friars were reluctant to formalize the bonds with these mulieres religiosae, who were often perceived as religiously heterodox and economically unstable. It is therefore striking that Catherine of Siena (1347–1380), who lived as a Dominican penitent before Innocent VII approved the Dominican lay rule in 1405, was the only woman associated with the order to be canonized during the Middle Ages (1461). (The canonizations of nuns Margaret of Hungary and Agnes of Montepulciano [1268–1317] and the laywoman Zdislava of Lemberk [1220–1252] from Poland all occurred in the modern era.)

Dominican nuns' way of life was clearly distinct from that of the friars. Whereas the friars were committed to the itinerant life of learning and preaching, women's piety was essentially shaped by the traditional monastic ideal of communal prayer in seclusion.

The friars also received often considerable bequests in exchange for their spiritual services, but women were principally dependent on their dowries and support from wealthy patrons.

Spirituality

Despite their institutionally precarious position, Dominican women nonetheless made notable contributions to Dominican spirituality. The sole surviving text attributed to St. Dominic is, in fact, his undated letter to the prioress of the Dominican sisters in Madrid. Jordan of Saxony's letters to Diana d'Andalo, written during the 1220s and early 1230s, paint a vivid picture of the order's growth as Jordan interlaced his spiritual advice with enthusiastic reports concerning his successful recruitment throughout Europe. Diana's letters to Jordan have not survived, but Jordan's responses reveal that Diana promptly urged him to act on her behalf when the religious services offered by the local friars did not meet her high standards or when the friars and local clergymen questioned the arrangements between her community and the Dominican order. Diana thus shrewdly used her epistolary connections with the head of the order to shield her community against the pressures felt at the local level. This correspondence, together with Diana's savvy acquisitions of land and successful networking with the nuns at San Sisto, created a solid foundation for her community. The four nuns who moved from San Sisto to assist Diana's community had personally cooperated with Dominic. Among them was Cecilia Cesarini, who almost a half century after the saint's death dictated to a fellow nun her recollections, The Miracles of St. Dominic. This account offers a valuable perspective on Dominic as a popular preacher and a miracle-maker who enjoyed a considerable appeal among religious women. The Miracles also shows that, not unlike the friars, the women turned to the past, and in particular to their recollections of St. Dominic, in order to create continuity in their fragmented institutional history.

Also, the chronicles or nonnenbücher, produced by Dominican nuns in German-speaking countries principally during the fourteenth century, viewed the past through mysticism and miracles, but as women used these texts to legitimize the existence of their communities, the texts had a stringent practical function as well. Mysticism as a communally revitalizing and collectively celebrated phenomenon was particularly prominent in Engeltal, home of two visionary authors, Christine Ebner (1277–1356) and Adelheid Langmann (1312–1375). Bartolomea Riccoboni's early-fifteenth-century narration of Corpus Domini (Venice), a rare surviving example of women's chronicle writing outside German-speaking countries, aptly shows that nuns keenly followed the ecclesiastical events from their strictly enclosed community.

The chronicles are complemented by a few other notable mystical accounts by medieval women. Revelations by Margaretha Ebner (1291–1351), a nun at Maria Medingen in Bavaria, presents a case of a striking imitation of Christ's passion through prolonged illness. Catherine of Siena's Dialogue, a conversation between God and a soul, opens a panoramic vision to God's grace and Christian virtues, and her nearly four hundred letters show a fierce religious reformer inspiring both religious leaders and ordinary people to pious action. Seven Revelations of Lucia Brocadelli (1476–1544), a Dominican laywoman, is a triumphant account of a soul's visit to the heavenly court.

Women's corporal mystical experiences attracted the attention of the friars and even resulted in spiritual friendships, as was the case with Peter of Dacia and Christine of Stommeln, a Beguine known for her dramatic encounters with the devil; Henry of Nördlingen and Margaretha Ebner; and Raymond of Capua and Catherine of Siena. These spiritual bonds produced a rich body of hagiographic texts commemorating the passion of Christ through the celebration of women's self-denial and eucharistic piety. Religious reform provided a uniquely fertile ground for cooperation between women mystics and friars. This was particularly evident in the case of the visionary reformer Girolamo Savonarola, whose ascetic and eschatological message was kept alive among Dominican women mystics long after he was burned as a heretic in 1498.

MAIJU LEHMJOKI-GARDNER

References and Further Reading

- Catherine of Siena. The Dialogue, translated and introduced by Suzanne Noffke. New York: Paulist Press, 1980.
- Catherine of Siena. The Letters of Catherine of Siena, translated with introduction and notes by Suzanne Noffke, 2 vols. Tempe, Ariz.: Arizona Center for Medieval and Renaissance Studies, 2000, 2001.
- Cesarini, Cecilia. The Miracles of St. Dominic. In Saint Dominic: Biographical Documents. Washington, D.C.: The Thomist Press, 1964.
- Coakley, John. "Friars as Confidants of Holy Women in Medieval Dominican Hagiography." In Images of Sainthood in Medieval Europe, edited by Renate Blumenfeld-Kosinski and Timea Szell. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1991, pp. 222–246.
- Ebner, Margaret. Major Works, translated and edited by Leonard P. Hindsley. New York: Paulist Press, 1993.
- Grundmann, Herbert. Religious Movements in the Middle Ages, translated by Steven Rowan. Notre Dame: University of Notre Dame Press, 1995.
- Hinnebusch, William A. The History of the Dominican Order: Origins and Growth to 1500. Volume 1. Staten Island, N.Y.: Alba House, 1966.
- Lehmijoki-Gardner, Maiju, ed., trans. Dominican Penitent Women. With contributions by Daniel E. Bornstein and E. Ann Matter. New York: Paulist Press, 2005.
- Lehmijoki-Gardner, Maiju. "Writing Religious Rules as an Interactive Process: Dominican Penitent Women and the Making of Their Regula." Speculum 79 (2004): 660–687.
- Lewis, Gertrud Jaron. By Women, for Women, About Women: The Sister-Books of Fourteenth-Century Germany. Toronto: Pontifical Institute of Mediaeval Studies, 1996.
- Riccoboni, Bartolomea. Life and Death in a Venetian Convent: The Chronicle and Necrology of Corpus Domini, 1395–1436, edited and translated by Daniel Bornstein. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press, 2000.
- Tugwell, Simon, ed. Early Dominicans: Selected Writings. New York: Paulist Press, 1982.
- Vann, Gerald. To Heaven with Diana!: A Study of Jordan of Saxony and Diana d'Andalo, with a translation of the letters of Jordan. London: Collins, 1960.
- Winston-Allen, Anne. Convent Chronicles: Women Writing About Women and Reform in the Late Middle Ages. University Park, Pa: The Pennsylvania State University Press, 2004.

See also Catherine of Siena; Clothing for Religious Women; Ebner, Margaretha; Langmann, Adelheid; Monastic Enclosure; Monastic Rules; Monasticism and Nuns; Monasticism, Women's; Papal Policy; Mysticism and Mystics; Observant Movement; Sister-Books and Other Convent Chronicles; Spiritual Care

DOROTHEA OF MONTAU

Born into a prosperous peasant family, Dorothea (1347–1394) experienced her first mystic vision at seven, and then began the harsh regime of fleshly mortification—burning herself with hot oil, branding herself with heated irons, and scourging herself with nail-studded whips—that continued throughout her life. At seventeen, Dorothea unwillingly married Adalbert, a weaponsmith more than twice her age, who physically and verbally abused her. She resented the dual expectations of sexual intercourse and wifely obedience, believing that obeying Adalbert meant betraying Christ. She mourned the loss of her virginity, and hated the birth of each of her nine children, only one of whom survived beyond childhood. Finally, Dorothea persuaded her husband to live chastely for the final ten years of their marriage.

In 1390, Dorothea made a pilgrimage to Rome, during which time Adalbert died. Free to pursue her spirituality, Dorothea needed a powerful confessor. After narrowly escaping heresy charges, Dorothea moved to Marienwerder and met one of the magisters, Johannes (d. 1417), an ambitious young Dominican and former canonical expert from the University of Prague, who became her sponsor. With his help, she became an anchoress during the final months of her life.

After Dorothea's death in 1394, Johannes undertook the task of securing her canonization. As part of that process, he compiled her official vita, which is based on Dorothea's own dictations to him, and derived from Dorothea's spiritual conversations with Johannes, but recast in a politically advantageous manner. Prussia was in a tenuous position, situated between their powerful neighbor Poland and the predominantly non-Christian Lithuania. Securing the canonization of the first native Prussian saint would not only have improved Johannes' own position within the Church, but would also have protected Prussian interests. Accounts of abuse are framed by discussions of stoic endurance as prayer. Scenes of marital rape are layered with glorious visions of spiritual union with Christ. Obedience, Dorothea's problem in life, becomes her mark of sainthood in death.

Although Dorothea was never officially canonized, her popularity never waned. In 1976, Pope Paul VI confirmed her cult as saint based on long-standing veneration.

MICHELLE M. SAUER

References and Further Reading

- Elliott, Dyan. "Authorizing a Life: The Collaboration of Dorothea of Montau and John Marienwerder." In Gendered Voices: Medieval Saints and Their Interpreters, edited by Catherine M. Mooney. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999, pp. 168–191, 245–246.
- Kieckhefer, Richard. Unquiet Souls: Fourteenth-Century Saints and Their Religious Milieu. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1984.

Marienwerder, Johannes. The Life of Dorothea von Montau, A Fourteenth-Century Recluse, translated by Ute Stargardt. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edward Mellen, 1997.

Sauer, Michelle M. "Anchoritism & Authority: Self-Signification in Dorothea von Montau's Vernacular Hagiography." Anchoritic Spirituality: Texts and Contexts, edited by Elizabeth Herbert McAvoy. Turnhout, Belgium: Brepols, forthcoming.

See also Anchoresses; Asceticism; Chastity and Chaste Marriage; Hagiography; Rape and Raptus; Sexuality; Sex in Marriage; Violence

DOUBLE MONASTERIES

Double monastery is a comparatively modern term coined by scholars to refer to a medieval religious community that housed both monks and nuns in the same institution, usually sharing a common superior and common worship space. Such communities were virtually never referred to as double monasteries by contemporaries, and lassifying all such houses by this anachronistic phrase has facilitated, in some scholarship, an empirically false unification of monastic institutions that were chronologically, regionally, and in practical and regulatory matters, extremely disparate and certainly unconnected. Thus there is a strong argument to be made for abolishing the term and even for discarding the dual-sex house as a category for historical analysis. But the term has become entrenched in scholarly writing on medieval monasticism, and the category itself has proven to have continued value as a site for historical examination of those institutions or monastic reform movements where professed men and women undertook religious life and vows in dual-sex communities. As a consequence, refined use of the term rather than abolition seems both prudent and necessary. To be sure, the specific fact that a monastery housed both women and men as religious does not itself predict the order, rule, or intentions with regard to gender relations or spiritual equality of the sexes for the founders, lay supporters, or actual members of any given house. But the fact of a monastery's sexual doubleness does open up potentially fruitful questions about all these things, and so continues to warrant historically contextualized consideration.

Changing Frameworks for Research

It is fitting that an encyclopedia entry on the double monastery as an institution should begin with a debate about its very validity as a term, because dual-sex houses have been a source of scholarly debate for almost two centuries. In the nineteenth century, double houses were the subject of open concern. Scholars could use the words bizarre and dangerous for those many early medieval houses that were governed by abbesses. The evident fact of religious women's authority over male monastics caused consternation because it seemed to reverse nineteenth-century patterns of sexual dominance. The evidence for monastic women "on top" of monks was all the more troubling in the nationalist ecclesiastical histories of the day because it appeared to document a situation of gender disorder at an ordinary moment for European Christianity. In the course of the nineteenth century the circumstances of the abbesses' rule over male religious came to be explained, or rather, explained away, in terms of national predispositions attributed largely to Irish monks who could be associated with the foundation of some double houses in the Frankish and Anglo-Saxon kingdoms. Double monasteries were thus catalogued as evidence for, and as the consequence of, a disorderly Celtic strain in the broader early medieval church.

This framework of analysis has undergone sharp revision in the last half century. At present, neither explaining away monastic disorder nor racialist attention to Celtic monastic types persists in serious scholars' research on double houses. In contrast, twentieth-century research has generally been positive about dual-sex monasticism, often celebrating such houses as sites of sexual equality where, especially, the early medieval rule of the abbess over male monastics and the institutionalized association of the two sexes in monastic devotion have come to signify a period of greater spiritual egalitarianism between the sexes. In this more recent view, scholars have been interested in making sense of the opportunities such monasteries created for constructing different gender relationships between medieval religious women and men. To this end, scholars have found it essential to discard the deceptively simple notion of the double monastery as a single, continuous historical phenomenon, and to consider evidence for dual-sex houses with attention to the specific contexts that surrounded them.

Evidence for and Significance of Dual-Sex Houses

The first step towards analyzing double monasteries is to recognize the variety of social and religious environments that produced them. Early medieval double houses, which flourished in the West from the sixth through ninth centuries, demonstrate a profoundly regional diversity of configuration; in this they are very much like the early medieval church that created them. Dual-sex monasteries are well attested to in France, Spain, Ireland, and England. In the early Middle Ages, there is no single type of unified male/female monastic community. As has long been noticed, Frankish and Anglo-Saxon double houses as a group were socially and ecclesiastically high-profile institutions, founded and governed by the families of local elites. Aristocratic and royal women in such houses were notable for the religious authority they exercised in and from their monastic identities. For example, Hild of Whitby's seventh-century Anglo-Saxon monastery is well documented as a center of Christian mission and hagiographical and poetic production, as well as having hosted, at the Synod of Whitby (664), a crucial debate over liturgy and observance for the Anglo-Saxon church. It is important to note that Hild herself did not concur with the prevailing ecclesiastical opinion about the observance of Easter and that she was, in fact, in a position to disagree with the bishops of her church (five of whom had been trained at her own double house). Sources attest that the nuns Leoba and Walburga left double monasteries to participate in the Anglo-Saxon mission to Christianize pagan regions on the Continent, founding new houses there. As a rule, early Anglo-Saxon monasteries that housed women of Hild's social prominence were double houses; it is clear that this configuration was far from "bizarre," nor was it, in the eyes of contemporaries, "dangerous."

The general acceptance of such houses was comparable for seventh- and eighth-century France, where dual-sex communities were founded around noble and royal women and where the integration of such houses into the mainstream of the larger local church is reflected in high degrees of literacy and scribal skills of nuns, as well as the close family connections between female inhabitants of dual-sex houses and the regional elites, both lay and clerical, that supported them. In Ireland, in contrast, only the double monastery of Kildare clearly documents the social configuration of close ties to the local ruling polity for both female and male religious. But the authority of Brigit, Kildare's founder and patron saint, is portrayed by her hagiographer as rivaling that of the northern bishopric of Patrick's foundation at Armagh in its claims to serve the whole of Ireland, and the pastoral role of the monastery is comparable to that of any male-centered monastic institution in early medieval Ireland.

Yet another and very different picture of the role of dual-sex monasteries emerges from Visigothic Spain in the seventh century, where unified male/female communities were forming in less-well-documented circumstances: here the rather obscure contemporary sources are consistently hostile to joint male-female institutions, and provide a record of clerical anxiety, not confidence, about the proliferation of what appear to have been small monasteries centered around the commitment of whole families to monastic life. The early medieval double monasteries fade in importance and generally disappear over the course of the ninth and tenth centuries. No simple answer explains this fact, although a variety of causes have been adduced by modern scholars, prominent among them clerical reforms that reduced women's spiritual authority within the church as a whole, coupled with the general destruction of monasteries by Vikings, and subsequent absence of impetus for refoundations on the earlier dual-sex model.

Monastic Revival

However we explain the demise of early medieval forms of dual-sex monasticism, it is clear that when monastic reformers and spiritual leaders in the twelfth through fourteenth centuries came to create orders of specifically dual-sex houses, the church in which these orders were created, and the idiom of their spiritual meaning, had been transformed. In comparison with the range of early medieval women's religious authority and activities, scholars of the monastic orders that made provision for joint male-female houses in the high Middle Ages have tended to see patterns of diminished influence for women, as evidenced in the relatively reduced prominence of women monastics from such houses in the wider church as well as decreasing evidence for such women's educational and scribal achievements—though double houses still appear to have provided women with comparatively richer educational opportunities than were possible at most single-sex women's houses.

High medieval Europe witnessed a grand revival of monastic fervor. Contemporaries attested to the eagerness of women to participate in the founding of new monastic institutions and new monastic configurations; individual monasteries evidently could become double in practice, and by default, under the pressure of women devotees' urgency to join in the reformation of religious life. But only a few orders made deliberate and formal provision for intentionally organizing women and men religious in joined houses. The twelfth-century orders created by Norbert of Xanten, founder of the Premonstratensian order, Robert of Arbrissel, founder of the order of Fontevault, and Gilbert of Sempringham, who founded the Gilbertine order, grew out of what were initially male-centered movements of monastic reform advocating embrace of the revived ideals of apostolic poverty and social abasement. Of these three, the Premonstratensians and Gilbertines evolved monastic systems that made grudging provisions to accommodate nuns under the supervision of male religious superiors; by the end of the twelfth century the Premonstratensians had come to refuse new women adherents. Only Robert of Arbrissel's Fontevrists turned the twelfth-century search for male monastic humility into an acceptance of an abbess's religious and spiritual authority, and even that acceptance was intermittent after the visionary founder's demise. The wider church climate was scarcely hospitable to dual-sex configurations, seeing in them a cause for scandal.

In the mid-fourteenth century, a Swedish noblewoman named Birgitta envisaged a new order, based on the authority of her own experience of mystical revelations from Christ, that combined a symbolic number of female and male monastics in the same institution. The pope from whom she sought approbation initially refused to condone the rule she had received and disallowed the dual-sex configuration that lay at the core of her understanding of her vision. Even once the Birgittines, or the Order of the Holy Savior, had received acceptance with a compromised Augustinian rule, subsequent popes resisted Birgitta's plan for unified male-female monasteries, and for a time in the fifteenth century prohibited dual-sex houses outright. Only a few houses, though socially prominent, including Vadstena and Syon, persisted past the fifteenth century to bear witness to Birgitta's project unifying monastic life for women and men.

CATHERINE PEYROUX

References and Further Reading

- Bateson, Mary. "Origin and Early History of Double Monasteries." Transactions of the Royal Historical Society 13 (1899): 137–198.
- Beach, Alison. Women as Scribes: Book Production and Monastic Reform in Twelfth-Century Bavaria. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2004.
- Elkins, Sharon. Holy Women of Twelfth-Century England. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1988.
- Foot, Sarah. Veiled Women. 2 Vols. Aldershot: Ashgate Publishing, 2000.
- Gold, Penny Schine. The Lady and the Virgin: Image, Attitude, and Experience in Twelfth-Century France. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1985.
- Golding, Brian. Gilbert of Sempringham and the Gilbertine Order, c. 1100–1300. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1995.
- Harrington, Christina. Women in a Celtic Church: Ireland 450–1150. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2002.
- Hilpisch, Stephanus. Die Doppelklöster: Entstehung und Organisation, Beiträge zur Geschichte des alten Mönchtums und des Benediktinerordens 15. Münster: Aschendorff, 1928.
- McKitterick, Rosamond. "Nuns' Scriptoria in England and Francia in the Eighth Century." Francia 19 (1992): 1–35.
- McNamara, Jo Ann. Sisters in Arms: Catholic Nuns Through Two Millennia. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1996.
- Schulenberg, Jane Tibbetts. Forgetful of Their Sex: Female Sanctity and Society, ca. 500–1100. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1998.
- Wemple, Suzanne. Women in Frankish Society: Marriage and the Cloister, 500–900. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1985.

See also Abbesses; Aethelthryth of Ely; Birgitta of Sweden; Birgittine Order; Brigit of Kildare; Education, Monastic; Fontevrault, Abbey and Order of; Gertrude of Nivelles; Gilbertine Order; Hild of Whitby; Law, Canon; Leoba; Literacy and Reading: Latin; Monasticism and Nuns; Premonstratensian Order; Syon Abbey; Woman on Top

DOUCELINE OF DIGNE

Mystic and founder of a lay religious order for women in Provence, Douceline de Digne (c. 1215–1274) belongs to the high medieval tradition of saintly visionary women established most notably in Germany by Hildegard of Bingen. Douceline's vita, composed by a member of one of the houses she founded, also shows her to be a leading figure in both the promotion of Franciscan spirituality and the development of the Beguine movement in southern France, a religious way of life for women that did not require monastic vows or enclosure.

Born in 1215 or 1216, probably in the town of Digne in Provence, the daughter of a pious and wealthy merchant, Douceline spent her childhood in her mother's home town of Barjols. After her mother's early death the family moved to Hyères, where they were closer to Douceline's brother Hugh, who had joined the Franciscan community there. A well-known theologian and preacher, Hugh played a significant role in assisting Douceline in the achievement of her spiritual mission.

In many ways the life of Douceline adheres closely to the model being established during her lifetime by the vitae of mystic women in Flanders: an exceptionally pious childhood, a "conversion" experience followed by a life of intense prayer, visions, and prophecy as well as the performance of miracles, both before and after death. Douceline's vita, however, also includes two less familiar elements: firstly, a detailed portrait of the daily practices of the founder and administrator of a religious community, which was to attract recruits and support from the aristocracy of Provence and, through the devotion of the Count and his wife, the royal house of France; and secondly, the vivid, carefully documented descriptions of Douceline's ecstatic raptures, which often resulted in levitations. Although her communities seem not to have long survived her death, her spectacular devotional practices made her both a public spectacle and an influential exemplum of Franciscan spirituality. While she was never officially canonized, her cult endured for centuries in southern France.

KATHLEEN GARAY and MADELEINE JEAY

References and Further Reading

Garay, Kathleen, and Madeleine Jeay, eds. and trans. The Life of Saint Douceline, a Beguine of Provence. Woodbridge, Suffolk: D. S. Brewer, 2001.

See also Beguines; Hagiography; Mysticism and Mystics; Occitania

DOWRY AND OTHER MARRIAGE GIFTS

Dowry, the dos of Roman origin, which was given at marriage, formed a major instrument for the transfer of family wealth in medieval times. Today we postpone such transfers of wealth until the death of a senior generation, prompting some economists to bewail the loss in opportunities from capital tied up in the estates of fiscally conservative elders. Medieval people relied on a distribution of wealth more advantageous to youth that encouraged economic growth. In the early medieval era in particular, people were more conscious than we are of the great difficulty and expense of establishing the married couple in a new household. By tradition and custom, families supported the creation of new households with a variety of marital gifts. Nevertheless dowry, or dos, triumphed over other marital assigns by the close of the Middle Ages.

Male-to-Female Marriage Gifts

In early Lombard law a quarta of family wealth was given to a son when he married so that he could sustain his new household. This, the so-called "male" dowry of early medieval society, was the chief marital gift among Germanic peoples and propitious for the growth of a young, and expanding, society. A husband's kin apportioned out family wealth so that he could support a wife and children. Population expansion, assarting new land (turning untilled lands to agriculture), and trade benefited from the generous distribution of familial wealth to the young through the eleventh and early twelfth centuries. Wedding gifts reversed the direction in which they moved soon thereafter.

This was certainly the case for the Mediterranean region, where traditional husbands' gifts to wives were replaced by the Roman dowry: a bride's inheritance or Falcidian quarter (a daughter's share in the patrimony and generally not a true quarter) that would terminate her legal demands for support on her natal family. In earlier times women had owned their gifts from husbands as outright possessions, whereas the revived Roman dowry was more ambiguously assigned. According to statute laws in cities, a husband supported his wife and her offspring, and dowry became insurance against his death; as such it fell under his control, to increase but not to squander or lose. This momentous shift in the direction in which capital moved (wife's family to husband rather than husband or his family to wife) occurred over the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. As Pierre Bonnassie has argued for the region around Barcelona in Spain, Roman dowry was likely to be the earliest instance of family wealth converted from property to cash. It answered a strongly felt need to preserve the bride's natal family land holdings intact; as a result, daughters received cash, while sons were destined to inherit property.

The system of dower, as it was understood in the common law tradition of England, marked a method comparable to the Lombard quarta for husbands to support the burden of marriage and insure the future of a wife and her offspring. Women brought a reciprocal maritagium to marriage, generally in the form of land or rents over which they maintained some control. This gift helped provide for offspring of the marriage, including daughters (de Trafford). Generally speaking, wedding gifts from husbands differed in name and mode of distribution, but all assumed that husbands and their kin, as well as wives and their kin, needed to amass, and give, wealth at the time of marriage. Brideprice, morgengabe (morning gift), and antefactum (prior gift) were terms for marital gifts from husbands. These were often restricted in statute laws, while the Roman dos or dowry was occasionally monitored by law but seldom restricted. As a result dowries rose to prodigious sums of cash as Europeans prospered.

Roman Dowry in the Italian City-States

Manlio Bellomo has argued that Roman dowry was converted to cash in Italian towns so that husbands were assured of capital sums for investment purposes.

In Italian towns laws stated that, although a woman owned her Roman dowry, and would have it for support if she became a widow, while her husband lived, he had control of it. He could invest it and make profit from it but the sum must remain intact. He was not to alienate it or lose it, a tall order when commerce entailed economic risk.

This shift in marital assigns and the conversion of dowry to cash are some of the more momentous economic developments of the medieval era, yet they went largely unrecognized by historians until the last quarter of the twentieth century, because dowry was viewed as a rather inconsequential familial concern. Capital investment, the cash economy, and the very nature of urban households were reconfigured by this effort to live “in all things according to Roman law,” as lawmakers in Siena asserted (Riemer). As Bellomo has argued, the ready cash that fell into the hands of men when they married underwrote European commercial expansion. Even if, as laws dictated, new husbands invested dowry funds conservatively, their “cash flow” position would be enhanced considerably by marriage, along with their prestige, and the stature of their lineage. Husbands were able to use whatever other cash they had on hand in high-risk ventures because their financial positions were sustained by large dowry awards from brides’ families.

The conversion of marriage gifts to cash is an important theme to consider for the late medieval period as well. Just as the Roman dowry, given in cash, transformed investment opportunities for men in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, conversion of other marital gifts to cash further enhanced husbands’ economic position in later decades. Husbands preferred wedding gifts from the bride’s family in cash; its liquidity appealed far more than gifts of clothes, “plate,” linens, hangings, cassone (painted chests), and fine ornaments. The bride’s wardrobe could be a bone of contention for a newlywed couple, and although husbands continued to give gifts to their brides, even when restricted by law, they apparently resented the money spent on brides’ wardrobes in familial efforts to keep up appearances.

By the fifteenth century in Venice a strong initiative was mounted to turn the husband’s counter-gift to his bride into a cash award so that he could invest the amount he gave as capital rather than see it expended on his bride’s wardrobe. Jane Fair Bestor argues that, according to late medieval Roman law, a man did not even alienate his property when he gave gifts to his wife because, when given, the gift remained part of his patrimony. As such, it could be recalled, or pawned, or sold, that is, turned into cash.

Still, no urban Italian family of any wealth or standing was content with the simple award of cash at marriage, so husbands frequently augmented the dos, as the dowry was called, with all sorts of counter-gifts, trousseaux, corredi, and wedding paraphernalia. In 1353 the Florentine Giovanni Niccolini arranged for his ward, Tommasa, a wedding gift beyond her cash award of dowry: “one belt, mounted in silver with a purse with silver enamel, [worth] three gold florins.” Tommasa received as well two sets of silver buttons, an old green cloth for a gown, fine crimson cloth for another gown, new green cloth for a coat, three pairs of slippers, and three pairs of shoes, twelve caps, one mirror and comb, linen thread, wimples, miniver and samite for two fur hats, stockings, and veils, as well as linens and other household items (Niccolini). As Alesandra Strozzi bragged a century later, her daughter Caterina had 400 florins on her back in gifts that her bride groom, Marco Parenti, gave her (Phillips). Costs added up, particularly for clothes and precious accessories, since they were commonly paid for in gold florins, the currency of long-distance trade.

Investment of Dowries

Not only did conflict arise between husband and wife, but husbands were often of two minds themselves, seeking wedding gifts in cash yet constrained by the demands of honor and prestige to add their own rich presents to the array of the bride’s gifts. In Venice in 1360 sumptuary laws solved men’s quandary by dictating that no husband might give more than thirty lire di grossi in dress or jewels to his bride, and that extended through the first four years of marriage. Roman dowries were registered but not limited, so these awards continued to rise.

Since dowries were awarded in cash, leaving patrimonial funds for surviving brothers, the transfer of wealth from a dowry in cash was regarded as beneficial to a bride’s brothers and a valuable asset to a husband and his kin. By the thirteenth century city-states in Italy eyed the cash awards of dowry as funds to be invested in government securities. In Venice, and by law, dowry was a woman’s property, and a husband could invest it only when its value was secured; until 1233 dowry value was secured by real estate, but thereafter gold or silver plate could be substituted and its cash equivalent released to the husband so he could invest it. By 1316 the Grain Office began borrowing dowries lying idle, with the city-state providing surety as required by law. In 1329 dowries became even more accessible to the state. All dowries on deposit could be given for investment to the Grain Office, which provided surety.

Florence solved its own liquidity problem when strapped for cash by turning to invested dowry funds. The Monte delle Doti, launched in 1424–1425, gained speculative and actuarial elements over the decades that attracted private investors. By 1433 a deposit of sixty florins produced a 500-florin dowry in fifteen years, provided the girl still lived. If a daughter entered a convent the original deposit was returned since convents required a dowry as well but were generally content with a small one. Unintentionally perhaps, the Monte allowed families to bet on daughters' life expectancies. A number of families took up this challenge, and in one instance 879 deposits were made over two months, providing the state with 67,231 florins, or enough to pay one-third of the carrying charges on the Florentine funded debt. Later dowry deposits could be used to purchase Monte credits that were then transferred to a new account in the endowed daughters' names. At the due date officials cashed in the number of credits necessary to raise the dowry. This made the Monte delle Doti a kind of revolving fund. By the 1450s credits were being purchased in the marketplace, and there were almost three million florins in Monte accounts. The Monte had become an essential instrument for state funding, and as such its original purpose of providing capital to establish new households and to serve as insurance for a wife and her offspring in event of a husband's death was obscured.

The transformation of dowry from its original purpose of providing insurance for a new family into an investment instrument for state finance exerted significant external pressures on families. In Florence a family need only reclaim its original investment in the Monte to place a daughter in a convent rather than pay dowry to a prospective husband. In these circumstances it was convenient for a family strapped for funds to shunt a daughter off to a convent, since it cost much less. To end the increasing demands of husbands in negotiations for marriage, brides' families married off daughters at very young ages. Florentine husbands from wealthy backgrounds might be twice the age of their young brides at marriage. Canon law required consent from both parties for valid marriage, but dowry considerations increased so dramatically in wealthy families that daughters' preferences were largely subordinated to financial considerations. Rather than a foundation for sound marriage, dowry gifts had become an end in themselves with family wealth, prestige, and connections dictating the choice of marriage partners.

If dowries were not paid promptly husbands were likely to chide their wives, or worse, and very likely to importune their in-laws for funds. Widows were known to suffer severe problems in regaining control over their dowries on the death of their husbands, requiring them to sue in court or pursue long, tedious negotiations to obtain restitution from their husbands' kin. On occasion widows found it necessary to fight off their husbands' creditors to keep their dowries as their own, and their underage heirs', livelihood. If an improvident husband had squandered a dowry, his widow was thrown back on her family connections for bed and board, creating considerable resentment and acrimony.

Conclusion

Roman dowry moved with the commercialization of the European economy. Venice and the Adriatic region had practiced Roman dowrying traditionally, as had Byzantine lands to the east, but dowry became the chief marital assign of most Europeans, even in lands with significant German settlement. With the monetarization of rural Europe, Roman dowry came to be practiced in most western European communities. As such, cash awards characterized the marriages of those European families wealthy enough to support the marriages of their offspring. Poorer girls worked to amass a dowry that would make them attractive marriage partners. Charitable foundations awarded dowries to orphans and poor girls as the only way to assure them of marriage partners.

Since Roman dowry satisfied a daughter's claims of inheritance on her natal kin, it was within the law to limit a daughter's share of her patrimony to her dowry—although, in practice, many parents wrote wills that gave married daughters further inheritance rights. Sons, whose share in the family patrimony increased because of the dotal regime, preferred Roman dowry since it ensured them a better proportion of a shared patrimony. It is difficult to find any advantage in Roman dos for daughters, except as insurance in widowhood. Dowered daughters did not control this award in cash although, technically speaking, it was theirs. From husbands' gifts, that brides owned and controlled, wedding gifts had become Roman dowries that brides owned but did not control by the close of the Middle Ages.

SUSAN MOSHER STUARD

References and Further Reading

Bellomo, Manlio. Ricerche sui rapporti patrimoniali tra coniugi. Milan: Giuffrè, 1961.

DOWRY AND OTHER MARRIAGE GIFTS

- Bestor, Jane Fair. "Marriage Transactions in Renaissance Italy." Past and Present 164 (1999): 4–46.
- Chojnacki, Stanley. "From Trousseau to Groomgift in Late Medieval Venice." In Medieval and Renaissance Venice, edited by Ellen Kittell and Thomas Madden. Urbana, Ill.: University of Illinois Press, 1999, pp. 141–165.
- di Camugliano, Ginevra Niccolini, ed. The Chronicles of a Florentine Family, 1200–1470. London: J. Cape, 1933.
- de Trafford, Claire. "Share and Share Alike? The Marriage Portion, Inheritance, and Family Politics." In Studies on Medieval and Early Modern Women: Pawns or Players?, edited by Christine Meek and Catherine Lawless. London: Four Courts Press, 2003, pp. 36–48.
- Esmein, Adhemar. Le mariage en droit canonique: Études sur l'histoire du droit canonique privé. Paris: L. Larose et Forcel, 1891.
- Hughes, Diane Owen. "From Brideprice to Dowry in Mediterranean Europe." Journal of Family History 3 (1978): 262–296.
- Kirshner, Julius, and Anthony Molho. "The Dowry Fund and the Marriage Market in Early Quattrocento Florence." Journal of Modern History 50 (1978): 403–438.
- Klapische-Zuber, Christiane. Women, Family, and Ritual in Renaissance Italy, translated by Lydia Cochrane. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1985.
- Kreutz, Barbara. "The Twilight of Morgengabe." In Portraits of Medieval and Renaissance Living, edited by Samuel K. Cohn, Jr., and Steven A. Epstein. Ann Arbor, Mich.: University of Michigan Press, 1996, pp. 131–147.
- Molho, Anthony. Marriage Alliance in Late Medieval Florence. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1994.
- Mueller, Reinhold C. Money and Banking in Medieval and Renaissance Venice, Vol. 2, The Venetian Money Market: Banks, Panics, Public Debt, 1200–1500. Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins University Press, 1997.
- Newett, Margaret. "The Sumptuary Laws of Venice." In Historical Essays, edited by T. F. Tout and James Tait. London: Longmans Green, 1902, pp. 245–278.
- Phillips, Mark. The Memoir of Marco Parenti. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1987.
- Riemer, Eleanor. Women in the Medieval City: Sources and Uses of Wealth by Sienese Women in the Thirteenth Century. Ph.D. dissertation, New York University, 1975.
- Roush, Sherry, and Cristelle L. Baskins, eds. Medieval Marriage Scene: Prudence, Passion, Policy. Tempe, Ariz.: Arizona Center for Medieval and Renaissance Studies, 2005.
- Stuard, Susan Mosher. "Dowry Increase and Increments in Wealth in Medieval Ragusa (Dubrovnik)." Journal of Economic History 41 (1981): 795–811.

See also Family (Earlier Middle Ages); Family (Later Middle Ages); Marriage, Christian; Trousseau; Widows

DRAMA

Although the extent of their involvement remains contested, many scholars agree that women participated in medieval drama—writing, acting in, sponsoring, and watching plays and other mimetic entertainments. Moreover, women and, more broadly, gender and sexuality were fundamental to the subjects represented in early drama.

Authors and Sponsors

The authors of most medieval plays are unknown, but there is evidence that women composed dramas. The canoness Hrotsvit of Gandersheim (c. 935–973) wrote six one-act plays in Latin designed as Christian imitations of the Roman dramatist Terence. These plays are often regarded as closet dramas meant to be read aloud, but mimed action might have accompanied the recitation. The Ordo Virtutum of the abbess Hildegard of Bingen (1089–1179) is a music drama seemingly designed for performance; it features the character Felix Anima (Happy Soul), who is caught up in a conflict between the Virtues and Vices. The example of Katherine of Sutton, abbess of the English convent at Barking from 1363–1376, who wrote twenty-one texts of the Visitatio Sepulchri, which dramatizes the visit of the three Marys to the sepulcher of Jesus, suggests that abbesses less famous than Hildegard also composed convent plays that survive from medieval nunneries.

Women also sponsored plays and helped produce playscripts outside of convents. At Chester, the "wurschippful Wyffys" put on an Assumption play in the late fifteenth century that was later incorporated into Chester's cycle of plays. Wives of guildsmen in Chester were paid for providing food, drink, and cloth for the cycle plays. They also helped with scripts: Chester's cooper's guild in 1574–1575 paid a woman to make a performance copy of their play from a master text. Evidence from Somerset shows that women often served as churchwardens overseeing parish festivities, especially at hocktide and Easter, and supplied costumes and goods for performances of plays. Women were also part of civic sponsorship of entertainments in Cambridge, as widows of master waits. Records from the continent suggest that there, too, women sponsored plays, such as the play of Saint Catherine that was commissioned and staged by a wealthy woman in Metz in 1468.

Performance

Although the usual practice was for cross-dressed boys and youths to play women's parts, there is evidence that women performed in plays. In convents, women impersonated the three Marys in the Visitatio plays and may also have played men's roles on occasion, a practice lampooned in satirical comedies that describe nuns dressing like men to perform their parts. In at least one case, in the convent at Origny in France, a woman played God. Girl abbesses (like boy bishops) were also apparently common in inversionary performances on Innocents' Day in convents and abbeys. Women also acted in plays outside of convents. In France, the Mons Passion Play (1501) and the Valenciennes Passion (1547) both list girls ("jeunes filles") as cast members. The Trois Doms play of Romans (1509) included eleven women, some of whom played more than one part; nine of the women were married, many to influential men, which corroborates evidence from Chester that women's participation in civic drama could be prestige-based. A glazier's daughter acted the lead role at Metz in the 1468 play of Saint Catherine; the actress is not named, but she is praised for her beauty, pathos, and prodigious memory. The London Goldsmiths' castle pageant for a royal entry in 1377, 1382, and 1392 included "maidens," while records from other English towns show the participation of girls and women in public plays and processions. Women also performed in parish rituals and festivities, such as summer games and morris dancing—which was often a mimetic activity that included a Maid Marion—as well as in court-related ceremonies. Some records point to professional female entertainers. Matilda Makejoy, dancer and acrobat, performed for kings Edward I and II of England, and iconography shows women tumblers, acrobats, and other entertainers. Most known professional acting companies were made up of men, but there is evidence of itinerant women players in the sixteenth century, usually as part of a husband-wife team. Women also acted in rituals that were exclusively their own, such as childbed and churching ceremonies, which acknowledged their reproductive labor in a way analogous to the affirmation of male labor in the cycle plays and processions.

The frequency with which women performed in plays is debatable, but there is little controversy over their importance as subjects of medieval drama. Extant play-texts and information about unscripted ritual performances reveal how persistently women, their experiences, and their social positions shaped the content of early drama. Women figure prominently in liturgical plays like the Visitatio Sepulchri as well as in plays about female saints. The large-scale Digby Mary Magdalene, for example, recounts the entire adult life of the saint from before her fall into prostitution through her conversion and final legendary years in the wilderness, all seen as a model for both men and women. Female characters in the cycle plays include the Virgin Mary at various stages of her life, Mary's mother St. Anne, Elizabeth, Eve, the mothers in the Slaughter of the Innocents pageants, the rebellious wife of Noah and her gossips, Mak's wife and accomplice Gyll in the Towneley Second Shepherds' pageant, and Pilate's wife Procula. Women also feature as characters in civic and court pageantry and seasonal entertainments. As these examples indicate, female characters represented a spectrum of attributes and ideals, from dutiful submission to irreverent subversion, that spoke to the concerns and desires of spectators.

Spectators

Those spectators would have included not just men but women, who were members of virtually every audience for medieval performances. That women might have formed an actively engaged audience for drama is implied by evidence from Chester, where in 1568 women went to court to try to protect their access to good viewing space for the town's cycle. Margery Kempe's autobiography offers another glimpse of engaged female spectatorship when, while returning home from a trip to York in 1413, where she probably had gone to watch York's cycle play, Margery is inspired to extract a vow of chastity from her husband. And John Lydgate's Christmas mumming, devised in the 1420s for the young Henry VI and his mother, Queen Katherine, show royal entertainments being specifically directed towards female spectators.

Scattered though it may be, this and other evidence suggests that women played a more central role in medieval drama than is commonly assumed and that their impact on early performances deserves continued exploration.

CLAIRE SPONSLER

References and Further Reading

- Davidson, Clifford. "Women and the Medieval Stage." Women's Studies 11 (1984): 99–113.
- Muir, Lynette R. "Women on the Medieval Stage: The Evidence from France." Medieval English Theatre 8 (1985): 107–120.
- Ogden, Dunbar H. "Women Play Women in the Liturgical Drama of the Middle Ages." In Shakespearean Illuminations: Essays in Honor of Marvin Rosenberg, edited by Jay L. Halio and Hugh Richmond. Newark, Del.: University of Delaware Press, 1998, pp. 336–360.

DRAMA

- Rastall, Richard. "Female Roles in All-Male Casts." Medieval English Theatre 7 (1985): 25–50.
- Stokes, James. "Women and Mimesis in Medieval and Renaissance Somerset (and Beyond)." Comparative Drama 27 (1993): 176–196.
- Twycross, Meg. "'Transvestism' in the Mystery Plays." Medieval English Theatre 5 (1983): 123–180.
- Wack, Mary. "Women, Work, and Plays in an English Medieval Town." In Maids and Mistresses, Cousins and

Queens: Women's Alliances in Early Modern England, edited by Susan Frye and Karen Robertson. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1999, pp. 33–51.

See also Abbesses; Audience, Women in the; Cross-Dressing; Guild Members and Guilds; Hildegard of Bingen; Hrotsvit of Gandersheim; Kempe, Margery

E

---

EASTERN EUROPE

In what sense did the condition of eastern European women differ from their western European counterparts in the patriarchal world of the Middle Ages? Women's legal, social, and economic functions are less documented in central and eastern Europe, and the surviving evidence is scant and contradictory. There seems to be here a sharper disparity between the female ideal and the reality of women's lives. Representations of women in hagiography bear no resemblance to their portrayal in chronicles and their rights as recognized under law.

Property Rights

The most important difference between eastern and western legal customs was that noble women were more often excluded from inheriting land. In the aristocratic kindred, landed property passed on to the male heir while women received their part of the inheritance in cash. The phenomenon of wealthy heiresses such as Eleanor of Aquitaine, Marguerite of Flanders, or Mary of Burgundy, who became political figures because of their huge landed possessions, did not exist in eastern Europe.

Noble women in eastern Europe had fewer rights than their counterparts in the West. They were in a subordinate legal position and never obtained the full legal rights enjoyed by men. Daughters were placed under paternal authority; wives were subject to their husbands. In the patrilinear aristocratic family "blue blood" was thought to originate with, and pass through, the father; the mother's status was considered of secondary importance.

Marriage

In the Christian societies of eastern Europe, marriage was supposed to be consensual for both parties (matrimonium consensualis). Women received wedding gifts (res paraphernales) from the bridegroom's family and a dowry (dos) from their own families, paid in moveable goods, cash, or precious objects. In Hungary, the dowry came to a quarter of the paternal estate (quarta filialis), always to be paid in cash due to the closed inheritance system of the noble kindred, which prohibited the alienation of ancestral estates, striving to keep lands within the ancient lineage. This meant that noble women were excluded from inheriting land, except in those cases when they married a nonnoble, or when the survival of the kindred and of the estate were at stake and the estate passed on to a male member of the kindred. If there were no male relatives left and daughters were the only heirs, it was possible for them to inherit land. Royal prerogatives "transformed female offspring into men" to avoid the extinction of a noble family and the dispersion of the paternal estate. The privilege of declaring women "true heirs and male successors" of their fathers was called praefectio and was mostly practiced in fourteenth-century Hungary under the Angevin kings. Praefectio, however, remained a royal privilege and never developed into a full-fledged legal reform because of the fierce opposition of the noble kindred who benefited most from the inalienability of possession (avicitas).

The social function of the noble woman was to maintain the status and prestige of the kindred and to participate actively in the marital strategies of the aristocratic family. In eastern and central Europe, women got married earlier than in the West and they had more children. Women's identity was defined by their male relatives. Even aristocratic women are seldom mentioned by name. Most often they are referred to as daughters of their fathers, or wives/widows of their husbands.

Widows enjoyed a somewhat more independent existence and often wielded considerably more power as dowager queens or as managers of their late husbands' estates. They could pass on family property and their personal wealth to their offspring.

Nonnoble women enjoyed more freedom both within their families and in economic life. Daughters of burghers and of free peasants had more rights and could inherit paternal possessions in the form of landed property as well. They could participate in, or continue the family enterprise, or go into business themselves. Urban and peasant women alike participated in various commercial activities. The percentage of women living and paying taxes on their own ranged between 8 percent and 38 percent in towns. Urban women had equal rights with men, although, if a woman was offended verbally or hurt physically by a man, he had to pay twice the fine he would have had to pay if he offended another male.

Pious Women and Political Scapegoats

Yet women were equal to men before God. The number of female religious communities, however, was much lower in eastern Europe compared to the West, with the ratio of male to female monasteries being 10 to 1. From the thirteenth century, the mendicant orders became particularly popular in Hungary, Bohemia, and Poland due to the generous support of the ruling dynasties. Basilite monasteries for women enjoyed the moral and financial aid of the princely courts in the orthodox principalities of Rus, Bulgaria, and Moldova. Spaces for silence and culture, these monasteries were often the places where princesses took the veil and dowager queens finished their days in religious retirement. Founding monasteries and furnishing them with precious objects was a privileged area of queenly patronage: Elizabeth of Poland (1300–1380), wife of Louis the Great of Hungary, created more than thirty religious foundations, among them the exquisite cloister of the Poor Clares in Óbuda. Her granddaughter, Jadwiga of Poland, was a special patroness of the Pauline monastery of Czestochowa.

Women—mulier suadens, persuasive woman—are often represented as pious Christians and converters of their pagan husbands, sons, or grandsons. Narratives of Christianization are often narratives about women in early eastern European hagiography. Ludmilla of Bohemia (860–921), wife of Boriwoj, was baptized by Methodius in 871. She then acted as the spiritual mother of her grandson, Wenceslas, whom she instructed in the Christian faith, thus securing the transmission of Christianity within the Premyslid dynasty. Ludmilla was murdered by her pagan daughter-in-law, Drahomira. The Kievan princess Olga (879–969), wife of Prince Igor, was a strong supporter of paganism until she was baptized in Constantinople, where she received a Christian name, Helena, and a Christian identity modeled after Saint Helena. She was the first of the Rurik dynasty to be baptized, even before the conversion of her grandson, Prince Vladimir, in 988. He claimed Olga as the founder of Christianity in Kievan Rus.

Eastern European royal houses boasted a large number of female saints. Ornamenting their families with reflected heavenly glory, Saint Agnes of Prague, Saint Elisabeth and Saint Margaret of Hungary, and Saint Jadwiga of Poland heightened the prestige of their dynasties.

As opposed to these holy and virgin daughters, queens were usually portrayed as scapegoats in medieval chronicles. The Bavarian princess Gisela (c. 980–1065), sister of Emperor Henry IV, disciple of Saint Wolfgang, and wife of Stephen of Hungary, was denigrated by hagiographers, who attributed the evils that befell the country after the death of King Stephen to her and to her German retinue. Gisela, however, ended her life as abbess of Passau and was canonized. Saint Elisabeth's mother, Gertrude of Meran (1185–1213), wife of Andrew II of Hungary, was murdered by Hungarian aristocrats, who blamed her for the privileges accorded her German barons and for her spendthrift habits. Only one foreign queen, Jadwiga of Anjou (1374–1399), Queen of Poland, managed to become a saint by returning to the older pattern and acting as a converter of pagans.

MARIANNE SÁGHY

References and Further Reading

Klaniczay, Gábor. Holy Rulers and Blessed Princesses. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002.

Klassen, John M. Warring Maidens, Captive Wives, and Hussite Queens. Boulder: East European Monographs, 1999.

“Women and Power in East Central Europe: Medieval and Modern.” Edited by Marianne Sághy and Nancy F. Partner. Special issue of East Central Europe 20–23 (1) 1993–1996.

See also Elisabeth of Hungary; Jadwiga; Mary of Hungary II; Monasticism and Nuns; Noble Women; Olga; Queens and Empresses: the West; Russia

EBNER, MARGARETHA

Margaretha Ebner (1291–1351) was born in Donauwörth, near Regensburg, to a patrician family and, at an early age, entered the Dominican cloister of Maria-Mödingen. She was buried there in the nave of the chapel in 1351. When she was 40 years old, Heinrich von Nördlingen, her Dominican confessor, convinced her to write a record of her spiritual journey. Without the aid of an amanuensis, she wrote her Offenbarungen (“Revelations”) in Alemannic, a dialect of Middle High German. Belonging to a corpus of medieval Dominican convent literature, Margaretha’s Offenbarungen is an important medieval German vernacular mystical text. A lengthy manuscript for the Middle Ages (over 100 folio pages) the work follows a chronological description of her spiritual life from 1312 to 1348, with the experiences arranged according to the liturgical calendar. Margaretha’s text belongs to a medieval religious genre that is referred to as autohagiography, religious writing that is by its very nature autobiographical, narrating personal revelations and reflecting the lifelong spiritual journey of a single author.

Medieval women’s mystical writing, such as Margaretha’s Revelations, both shaped and reflected the culture of the cloister, as well as that of the wider society of the Christian world. Traditional monastic elements such as the liturgy and sermons are woven into the fabric of Margaretha’s narrations. She makes use of doctrinal sources such as the Bible and the breviary, as well as Jacobus of Voragine’s Legenda Aurea (“Golden Legend”) and Caesarius of Heisterbach’s Dialogus miraculorum (“Dialogue of Miracles”). Two other Dominican sisters wrote autohagiographies bearing strong similarities to Margaretha’s; both Christina Ebner (1277–1356) and Adelheid Langmann (1306–1375) were from the convent of Engelthal. Also distinctly related to these autohagiographical texts is a collection of writings referred to as the Sister-Books or Nonnenbücher, written during the first half of the fourteenth century at Adelhausen, Unterlinden, Gotteszell, Engelthal, Kirchberg, Töss, Oetenbach, Diessenhofen, and Weiler.

The religious experiences that Margaretha narrates typify those of ecstatic women mystics described in a variety of texts produced in late medieval Europe. Margaretha narrates her experience of divine union, recounting auditions and visions of God and of Mary and the Christ-child. In the opening chapters of her book she describes the three years (1312–1315) she was seriously ill, suffering from a variety of afflictions. It is worth noting that illness narratives are a common feature reported in medieval women’s religious writing. Once she recovered, Margaretha undertook a rigorous program of asceticism, self-mortification, fasting, and flagellation. In keeping with fourteenth-century piety, her devotions center on the humanity of Christ, primarily on his birth and death. Visual images and material culture objects are important sources in addressing the prominent influences and inspirations for medieval women mystics such as Margaretha. Among these are crucifixes, both on the altar and owned personally; sculpted and painted images of Mary with the infant Christ or in the Pieta; the sculpted image of St. John the Evangelist with his head on Christ’s breast; tapestries often produced within the cloister; Christ-child effigies and cradles; and illustrated manuscripts. All, along with textual sources, were profoundly important in shaping the visionary elements of the religious experiences narrated in her book of revelations. Significant to Margaretha’s religious experience is a small carved figure of the Christ-child and a cradle she was given by a friend. In one chapter, she narrates an experience of miraculous lactation when the Christ-child figure used in her devotions asks to be nursed. Throughout the text she describes a devotional relationship with the wooden figure, caring for it, swaddling it, placing it in a cradle, and rocking it to sleep. The same Christ-child figure can be seen today above the altar in the Dominican chapel of Maria-Mödingen.

Appended to the nineteenth-century edition of her Offenbarungen are more than fifty letters from Heinrich von Nördlingen, her Dominican confessor. Although the letters were clearly intended as spiritual instruction, there are notable moments of affectionate sentiment. Without doubt, Dominican sisters like Margaretha were well-acquainted with the works of Meister Eckhart, Johannes Tauler, and Heinrich Seuse, and in many cases knew the preachers personally. On one occasion Margaretha Ebner recollects a conversation with Tauler; and, in several of his letters to Margaretha, Heinrich von Nördlingen refers to both Tauler and Seuse.

Overall, Margaretha’s autohagiography is typical of late medieval women’s religious experience, expressing an embodied spirituality where devotion to and union with the divine is played out on the mystic’s body. Texts such as Margaretha's Revelation provided the flourishing Dominican monasteries with descriptions of devotional practices and stories of exemplary holy lives worthy of imitation.

ROSEMARY DRAGE HALE

References and Further Reading

- Hale, Rosemary Drage. "Rocking the Cradle: Margaretha Ebner (Be)Holds the Divine." In Performance and Transformation: New Approaches to Medieval Spirituality. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1999, pp. 210–241.
- Margaretha Ebner und Heinrich von Nördlingen*, edited by Philipp Strauch. Freiburg i. B. and Tübingen: Akademische Verlagsbuchhandlung von J. C. B. Mohr, 1882. Reprint. Amsterdam: Verlag P. Shippers, 1966.
- Margaretha Ebner: Major Works*, translated by Leonard P. Hindsley with an introduction by Margot Schmidt and Leonard P. Hindsley. New York: Paulist Press, 1993.
- Wiethaus, Ulrike. "Thieves and Carnivals: Gender in German Dominican Literature of the Fourteenth Century," In The Vernacular Spirit: Essays on Medieval Religious Literature, edited by Renate Blumenfeld-Kosinski, Duncan Robertson, and Nancy Bradley Warren. New York: Palgrave, 2002, pp. 209–238.

See also Autohagiography; Devotional Practices; Dominican Order; Langmann, Adelheid; Mysticism and Mystics; Mystics' Writings; Sister-Books and Convent Chronicles; Spiritual Care

ECONOMY

It is safe to assume that medieval women worked for a living and the rendering of that work to the economy was determined by their wealth, social standing, talents, age, marital status, child-bearing, and child-rearing. Because women's life cycle differed in many respects from men's, historians have argued that women had a weaker work identity than men, thus a more marginal position in the economy. Yet they labored hard and effectively, producing growth for the medieval economy. In agriculture women often complemented their husband's roles. The milchpfennig (butter and egg profits) earned at market by German women added to farm income. In guilds women often held secondary positions to men in a division of labor favoring skilled craftsmen, who were predominantly males and had served long apprenticeships. Nevertheless guilds exclusive to women did exist, like the silk workers' guild in Paris. Women were sometimes admitted to guilds in predominantly male occupations, although often they exercised only secondary privileges. Women dominated the production of ale in northern villages, where alewives took turns brewing for their neighbors, that is, until brewing became a commercialized industry in towns.

Wages earned by women tended to be lower than those earned by men. Here, as well, some significant exceptions may be found, for example, in early printing workshops in Lyon. Young, single women servants sometimes worked for a lump sum that became their dowry after their contracted years of service. Slaves worked for no wage at all. In textile industries women sometimes worked in a putting-out system, where they were paid by the piece and produced their work at home. Women from Lucca unwound the fragile threads of silk worm cocoons in great kettles, laboring without leaving much trace in the historical record because a middleman controlled their pay and conditions of work. Women's work was often subsumed under their husband's name in artisan trades like leather working or goldsmithing, although both husband and wife labored at the craft.

Legal status arbitrated women's work, in particular inheritance rights, rights to own personal property, and control of that property over a lifetime. Under the common law in England a single woman (feme sole) lost property rights to her husband upon marriage when she became a feme covert, but gained them again if and when she became a widow. She might then maintain her husband's position in his guild and continue his business by right of inheritance. Widows often married other practitioners of their husbands' trades.

Market- and tradeswomen existed in many European towns with high profiles in tavern-owning, spinning, and the second-hand clothing market (Rose the Regrator or Second-hand Rose was an important medieval character). In medieval Europe as well women served as wet nurses and earned wages, or as skilled midwives, or as prostitutes. The very nature of their employment choices suggest that it was easy for women to fall into poverty, and it was difficult to escape out of it. In some towns women were prohibited from contracting debts, but women could extend credit and loan money if they were wealthy or heiresses, so this became an avenue into business ownership and trade. Jewish women scored some important successes in investment in trade in towns like Perpignon.

Perhaps the greatest impediment to women's economic progress lay in their limited landholding and property rights. Much land was entailed to a male heir in the medieval era, while merchant families tended to leave property to their sons. In those families a daughter's dowry was her last legal claim on her natal family's wealth. While even wealthy women from noble or wealthy merchants' families worked at household and estate management, their labor was not compensated with a wage. Meanwhile brides' dowries provided their husbands with wealth and prestige in the community. Some wealthy women saw it as their right and privilege to provide patronage for convents, although women's religious houses were less well endowed than men's houses, generally speaking. Within religious houses women were required by their vows to work, and to an extent their labor compensated for poorer endowments. Less likely to be apprenticed than sons, women have often been wrongly viewed as merely consumers in medieval economic life, whereas their labor and skills were critical to a swiftly developing European economy.

SUSAN MOSHER STUARD

References and Further Reading

- Goldberg, P. J. P. Women, Work, and Life Cycle in a Medieval Economy: Women in York and Yorkshire, c. 1300–1520. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1992.
- Herlihy, David. Opera Muliebria: Women and Work in Medieval Europe. New York: McGraw Hill, 1990.
- Women and Work in Pre-industrial Europe*, edited by Barbara Hanawalt. Bloomington, Ind.: Indiana University Press, 1986.

See also Agriculture; Alewives and Brewing; Apprentices; Artisan Families, Women of; Beguines; Breast-feeding and Wet-Nursing; Business; Clothwork, Domestic; Consumption; Division of Labor; Dowry and Other Marriage Gifts; Feme Covert; Feme Sole; Gentry, Women of; England; Guild Members and Guilds; Heiresses; Home Manufacturing; Inheritance; Investment and Credit; Landholding and Property Rights; Market and Tradeswomen; Merchant Families, Women of; Midwives; Monasticism and Nuns; Patronage, Ecclesiastical; Peasants; Poverty; Prostitutes; Servants; Slaves; Textile Production for the Market; Work

EDITH

As wife of Edward I “the Confessor,” daughter of the powerful Earl Godwine of Essex, and sister of King Harold, Edith (c. 1020/1030–1075) found herself at the center of a turbulent and traumatic period in English history. She is the addressee and arguably the main subject of the extraordinary Vita Aedwardi Regis (1065–1067), written by an anonymous cleric. Pauline Stafford argues that the work reflects Edith's perspective and political interests to such a degree that the queen ought to be considered its shadow author.

Edith received a good education at the royal monastery of Wilton—her learning and accomplishments were frequently noted—and was married to King

Edward in 1045. The marriage did not go smoothly, and included a brief period of separation in 1051–1052, during a major falling-out between the king and Edith's family. At least a secondary reason for Edith's banishment must have been her childlessness. (The notion that the marriage had remained chaste by mutual agreement appears to be a bit of political “spin,” which gained momentum as a pious motif in the later hagiography of King Edward.) After 1066, Edith's support of William the Conqueror's claim to the throne earned her a comfortable dowagership; she spent her final years largely at Wilton. While contemporary assessments of her character and political skills vary (William of Malmesbury disparages her; the Vita Aedwardi is, of course, flattering), modern historians regard her as an active royal consort and a shrewd actor on a difficult political stage.

MONIKA C. OTTER

References and Further Reading

- Barlow, Frank, ed. and trans. The Life of King Edward Who Rests at Westminster. 2nd ed. Oxford: Clarendon, 1992.
- Mason, Emma. The House of Godwine: The History of a Dynasty. London: Hambledon, 2004.
- Otter, Monika. “Closed Doors: An Epithalamium for Queen Edith, Widow and Virgin.” In Constructions of Widowhood and Virginity in the Middle Ages, edited by Cindy Carlson and Angela Jane Weisl. New York: St. Martin's, 1999, pp. 63–92.
- Stafford, Pauline. Queen Emma and Queen Edith: Queenship and Women's Power in Eleventh-Century England. Oxford: Blackwell, 1997.

See also Chastity and Chaste Marriage; England; Patronage, Literary; Queens and Empresses: The West

EDUCATION, BEGUINE

Beguines in northwestern Europe accepted girls as students from the very beginning of their movement, around 1200. Following a tradition established by nuns and recluses, they often took charge of girls, who were raised within the Beguine community (beguinage) and received instruction from one or more Beguine teachers but were not necessarily expected to join the community as adults.

The “Lives” of Beatrice of Nazareth, Ida of Nivelles, Ida of Gorsleew, and Juliana of Mont-Cornillon include references to their education by informal Beguine groups in the first half of the thirteenth century. Their instruction probably included not only reading and writing in the vernacular, but sometimes also in Latin. These and other sources reveal that some Beguines also instructed young female students in the study and translation of Scripture, Christian spirituality, and mysticism. In the more formally organized beguinages that spread from the Low Countries in the 1230s, internal rules sometimes regulated the number of boarders per Beguine teacher or set other limitations. Beguine education was also hampered by the lack of institutionally supported libraries. While generally basic, Beguine education could nevertheless reach sophisticated heights when dispensed by teachers who were particularly gifted or motivated (one may imagine Hadewijch of Brabant, whose “Letters” and “Visions” were fundamentally didactic works, as such a teacher). In a few cases, boys up to the age of puberty were allowed to attend Beguine schools; male teachers occasionally assisted Beguines.

WALTER SIMONS

References and Further Reading

Galloway, Penelope. “‘Life, Learning, and Wisdom’: The Forms and Functions of Beguine Education.” In Medieval Monastic Education, edited by George Ferzoco and Carolyn Muessig. London; New York: Leicester University Press, 2000, pp. 153–167.

Simons, Walter. Cities of Ladies: Beguine Communities in the Medieval Low Countries, 1200–1565. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001.

See also Beatrice of Nazareth; Beguines; Burgundian Netherlands; Flanders; Hadewijch

EDUCATION, LAY

In the early medieval centuries, when literacy involved Latin learning, opportunities for laywomen to secure a reading education in Latin texts existed mainly in those monasteries open to schooling lay children and in aristocratic or royal courts, under a tutor. At the elementary reading level, where one learned one’s letters, the Psalter and other Latin devotional or scriptural prayers and passages, a father, uncle, mother, or governess may have been the teacher. Elementary learning was also available to girls (and boys) in local, perhaps very informal schools. There are scattered indications of such coeducational schools as early as the ninth century in Italy and France, and their numbers increased in subsequent centuries.

By the twelfth century, Latin learning was becoming more institutionalized. Emerging fee charging grammar schools and universities excluded women. As a consequence women could no longer compete, and learned women, such as Heloise and a significant but small number of other women from the early twelfth century, became more rare. For example, there are no known examples from England of girls in grammar schools. At the same time, the quality of Latin learning in monasteries declined. The example of Trota (and other anonymous female doctors at Salerno) suggests, however, that Latinate literacy for women could have a professional and practical application and may have been transmitted via a kind of apprenticeship. And women continued to learn Latin reading for devotional purposes.

The education of women continued to be informal and unstructured. It could be predominately oral in nature, the result of listening to (and perhaps memorizing and memorializing) recitations, group readings, instructions, prayers, sermons, songs, dramatized plays, or liturgical singing. Lay sisters, for example, in Heloise’s Abbey of the Paraclete, learned by listening to edifying readings from the nuns, while women from the lower classes learned the prayers posted on tablets and in stories detailed in images on church walls (sometimes with Latin inscriptions), or secured small pieces of parchment with prayers that might be memorized. Among heretical groups, the Waldensians permitted women to preach and young girls to learn the words of the gospels and epistles. Cathars and Lollards also memorized and passed on religious texts they had heard, although a select group of Lollard women also learned to read. Other such learning communities might be children taught by anchoresses or beguines, women listening to sermons, mothers teaching children prayers and proverbs, or women at court listening to the reading of devotional or romantic works.

It was the growing use of European vernaculars by the twelfth and thirteenth centuries that allowed for the dramatic expansion of lay female interactions with written texts. Women (the mother or perhaps a governess) were often the teachers of girls in a household, perhaps training them in more than one vernacular tongue, teaching them their alphabet, syllables, words and reading, and, in Latin, the reading of prayers and scripture in primers, psalters, and books of hours. A poem from c. 1300 includes the following sentence: “woman teacheth child on book.”

By the fourteenth century there was also an increasing assortment of venues in which a girl could be educated. Monasteries continued to educate girls, although increasingly in vernacular devotional readings and liturgical responses rather than in Latin learning. Anchoresses sometimes taught small groups of children (both boys and girls), as did the beguines in Germany. Household tutors and clergy taught girls as well as boys. By the fourteenth century girls were being educated by schoolmistresses; in Paris, in 1380, for example, there were twenty-two licensed schoolmistresses. Girls were being educated in numerous coeducational elementary and often quite informal reading schools, and, by the fifteenth century, even in parish song schools.

Those who learned to read might then receive books from a female relative (as devised in her will), might borrow books from a local Carthusian library, or circulate texts among family members, perhaps as a common-profit library. Whether listening to a group reading or reading with book in hand (as an increasing number of images of the Virgin being taught by St. Anne, illustrate), more and more women were gaining access to the written word.

The education of women often involved learning tasks more than texts. Although, by the late Middle Ages, there are conduct books and household manuals, most women learned household tasks, manners, and Christian virtues from informal verbal instruction, perhaps from a mother or husband. Female apprentices were taught a trade or craft but rarely to read or write. Those few girls who were apprenticed as scribes might be taught the task of writing formularies, but it is unclear how much they would have understood what they wrote.

It was uncommon for women to learn to write. Writing was a separate skill, often taught by specialized writing masters. Medieval women's signatures, for example, are relatively scarce and often show an unpracticed hand. A signature alone cannot tell us much about the education of the signatory. Even women trained to read would have been unlikely to have picked up quills and written. And, indeed, writing skills for women were less valued than the ability to read. As the Knight de la Tour-Landry put it in his fourteenth-century advice to his daughters, "Reading is profitable to all women," but he did not recommend that they learn to write. The late medieval portrait of the author Christine de Pizan sitting at her desk writing is unusual and remarkable, as was her passionate advocacy of female education and the role of learned women.

JO ANN HOEPPNER MORAN CRUZ

References and Further Reading

- Barron, Caroline. "The Education and Training of Girls in Fifteenth-Century London," in Courts, Counties and the Capital in the Later Middle Ages, edited by Diana E. S. Dunn. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1996, pp. 139–153.
- Clanchy, Michael. "Learning to Read in the Middle Ages and the Role of Mothers," in Studies in the History of Reading, edited by Greg Brooks and A. K. Pugh. Reading: Centre for Teaching of Reading, 1984, pp. 33–39.

Ferrante, Joan. "The Education of Women in the Middle Ages in Theory, Fact, and Fantasy," in Beyond Their Sex: Learned Women of the European Past, edited by Patricia H. Labalme. New York: New York University Press, 1984, pp. 9–42.

Phillips, Kim M. Medieval Maidens: Young Women and Gender in England, 1270–1540. Manchester: Manchester University Press, 2003.

Scase, Wendy. "St. Anne and the Education of the Virgin," in England in the Fourteenth Century, edited by Nicholas Rogers. Stamford, 1993, pp. 81–96.

Shahar, Shulamith. Childhood in the Middle Ages, translated by Chaya Galai. London: Routledge, 1990.

See also Book Ownership; Conduct Literature; Education, Beguine; Education, Monastic; Girls and Boys; Letter Writing; Literacy and Reading, Latin; Literacy and Reading, Vernacular; Mothers as Teachers

EDUCATION, MONASTIC

Medieval Christian attitudes toward the education of women were marked by deep ambivalence. Churchmen believed that women ought not to teach, an idea founded on Paul's suggestion that Eve's teaching had led to the Fall (1 Timothy 2:11–14). Yet despite restrictions on women's teaching within the public sphere, women within the monastery functioned as both teachers and learners throughout the medieval period. Indeed, the provision of religious instruction and basic education was a primary function of the monastic community—whether that community was male or female.

The Monastic Rules

Early monastic rules emphasize the importance of study within the cloister. Alongside manual labor, Benedict (c. 480–c. 560) required that all monks devote themselves to private reading each day (chapter 48) and that meals within the monastery be accompanied by communal reading (chapter 38). Rules written specifically for women mirror Benedict's emphasis on reading and study. Writing in the sixth century, Caesarius of Arles advised that the women of St. Jean learn to read (chapter 7) and required that time be set aside each day for both private and communal reading (chapters 18–20). Caesarius also stipulated that nuns should learn to write, a fact that is confirmed by his hagiographer, who observed that they copied sacred texts. Other rules for women—including those of Aurelian of Arles and Donatus of Besançon—contained a similar emphasis on education and placed learning at the heart of female, like male, monasticism.

Saints' Lives

Early medieval hagiographers reported regularly on the educational achievements of their female subjects, depicting learning as one manifestation of sanctity in women. The seventh-century female hagiographer Baudonivia wrote that Radegund devoted herself to divine meditation, both day and night. At night, she would engage one of the other nuns to read to her. If this reader ceased even for a moment, Radegund would chastise her, a motif that also appears in the life of the eighth-century Anglo-Saxon nun and missionary, Leoba. Other women were praised for their mental agility in both sacred and secular studies. Gertrude of Nivelles's biographer praised her memory, as does Leoba's biographer, noting that she had been taught the "sacred sciences" as a girl. Similarly, the eleventh-century life of Adelheid of Vilich, written by Bertha, a member of Adelheid's community, reported that the saint immersed herself in "philosophic studies" as a girl.

Female Authorship and Scribal Activity

Women's writing in Latin was evidence of their education. Like Baudonivia and Bertha, some monastic women composed saints' lives. In the eighth century, Hugeburc of Heidenheim wrote a life of St. Willibald; in the twelfth, Hildegard of Bingen wrote the life of St. Rupert, patron of her foundation at the Rupertsburg. Other women, like Gisela and Rotrude, Charlemagne's sister and daughter, corresponded with prominent churchmen. Still other women contributed to the preservation of the past either through their historical writing or by commissioning or copying histories. During the tenth century, the playwright and canoness Hrotsvit of Gandersheim composed two historical works, including a history of her monastery, while a nun of Quedlinburg recorded the annals of her monastery. Still other women—like Hildegard of Bingen and Elisabeth of Schönau—produced visionary and theological works. Hildegard's vast corpus also included medical and scientific works, music, and a morality play. Many anonymous texts may also have been written by women.

Women were similarly engaged in book production. Early medieval nuns provided books for newly established monasteries in England during the seventh century and Germany during the eighth. The Anglo-Saxon missionary Boniface wrote to Eadburga, abbess of Minster-in-Thamet, requesting that she supply him with books for his mission. Women also copied books to fill their own libraries and functioned as monastic librarians. Although most of these female scribes remain anonymous, some are known by name. The most famous is Diemut of Wessobrunn, who copied more than forty books during the first half of the twelfth century. The twelfth-century nun-scribes of Admont, a Benedictine double house, produced a substantial manuscript collection, took dictation from Abbot Irimbart, and probably composed their own theological works as well. In some cases, the evidence suggests that men and women collaborated on manuscript production within a single scriptorium.

Women as Teachers

Despite prohibitions against women's public teaching women were permitted to teach within their communities until the thirteenth century. Women's houses frequently served as educational centers where young women were sent to be educated before returning to the world to marry. In some cases, boys were also educated by religious women. The eleventh-century Uta Codex, commissioned by Uta, abbess of Niedermünster, included a depiction of a woman teaching three children, no doubt reflecting educational practice within her community. Female teachers were remembered with fondness by their pupils. At Vilich, Adelheid was recalled as an affectionate yet demanding figure. Her biographer reports that she would rise early in winter and rub the girls' feet once they had returned to their beds after matins. But Adelheid could also be strict. Visiting the schoolroom, she would drill the students on grammatical questions, rewarding correct answers with a kiss. At other times, she would box the ears of girls who sang out of tune in the choir. Hrotsvit of Gandersheim acknowledges the influence of her teacher, Rikkardis, whom she describes as "our most learned and gentle novice mistress." Similarly, the twelfth-century abbess and author Herrad of Hohenbourg pays tribute to her teacher, Relinde, in her Hortus deliciarum (Garden of Delights).

Scholarship within the Women's Community

Monastic education tended to focus primarily on religious instruction, namely the Scriptures and the Psalms. Yet within certain monasteries, women were also educated in the liberal arts. At Barking in the seventh century, Aldhelm records that women studied history, grammar, and metrics. Similarly, Hrotsvit's writings reveal her familiarity with a wide range of classical and medieval authors, among them Terence, Ovid, and Virgil, as well as Jerome, Prudentius, Boethius, and Isidore of Seville. Hrotsvit also studied (and possibly taught) arithmetic. A long section in her play Sapientia explores the qualities of various numbers in order to provide the ages of the three daughters of Sapientia. At Hohenbourg in the twelfth century, women followed a broad curriculum that included contemporary monastic and scholastic texts. The broad ranging contents of the Hortus deliciarum demonstrated that women at Hohenbourg read works of theology, biblical history, and even canon law, replicating the reading patterns of monks and students in the emerging Parisian schools. The depiction of Philosophia that appears in the manuscript suggests that the liberal arts also formed part of their curriculum. Clearly, the level of education within women's communities could be high. Heloise, who gained her early education at the female monastery of Argenteuil, was already famed for her learning before she met Abelard, as Peter the Venerable attested. Her erudition was demonstrated in her letters and in the Problemata, a series of biblical questions that she sent Abelard based on her study with the women at the Paraclete. Further evidence for the sophistication of women's education was provided in Abelard's letter 9, "On Educating Virgins," in which he encourages the women of the Paraclete to pursue their studies under Heloise's care, noting her facility not only in Latin and Greek, but also Hebrew.

The Later Middle Ages

By the later medieval period, monasteries were no longer vibrant educational centers, as universities rapidly moved to the forefront of medieval education. Although many monastic women continued to read and to study, women's sanctity was increasingly divorced from education after the thirteenth century, and holy women from this period were regularly described as illiterate or lacking in formal education. Even so, monastic women could still attain high levels of education, as the example of the sixteenth-century German nun Caritas Pirckheimer suggests.

FIONA J. GRIFFITHS

References and Further Reading

- Abelard. Letter 9. "On Educating Virgins." In Guidance for Women in Twelfth-century Convents. translated by Vera Morton. Cambridge: D. S. Brewer, 2003, pp. 121–138.
- Beach, Alison I. Women as Scribes: Book Production and Monastic Reform in Twelfth-century Bavaria. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2004.
- Caesarius of Arles. The Rule for Nuns of St. Caesarius of Arles, edited by Maria Caritas McCarthy. Washington, DC: Catholic University of America Press, 1960.
- Ferrante, Joan M. "The Education of Women in the Middle Ages in Theory, Fact, and Fantasy." In Beyond Their Sex: Learned Women of the European Past, edited by Patricia H. Labalme. New York: New York University Press, 1980, pp. 9–42.
- Griffiths, Fiona. The Garden of Delights: Reform and Renaissance for Women in the Twelfth Century. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, Forthcoming.
- Heinrich, Mary Pia. The Canonesses and Education in the Early Middle Ages. Washington, DC: Catholic University of America, 1924.
- Heloise. "The Problemata of Heloise." translated by Anne Collins Smith. In Women Writing Latin: From Roman Antiquity to Early Modern Europe. Vol. 2. Medieval Women Writing Latin, edited by Laurie J. Churchill, Phyllis R. Brown, and Jane E. Jeffrey. New York: Routledge, 2002, pp. 173–196.
- Herrad of Hohenbourg. Hortus Deliciarum, edited by Rosalie Green, Michael Evans, Christine Bischoff, and Michael Curschmann. 2 vols. Studies of the Warburg Institute, 36. London: The Warburg Institute, 1979.
- Mater spiritualis: The Life of Adelheid of Vilich*, edited by Madelyn Bergen Dick. Toronto, Ontario: Peregrina Pub., 1994.
- McKitterick, Rosamond. Books, Scribes, and Learning in the Frankish Kingdoms, 6th–9th Centuries. Aldershot: Variorum, 1994.
- Wemple, Suzanne Fonay. Women in Frankish Society: Marriage and the Cloister, 500 to 900. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1981.

See also Abbesses; Book Ownership; Heloise; Herrad of Hohenburg; Hildegard of Bingen; Hrotsvit of Gandersheim; Leoba; Letter Writing; Literacy and Reading; Latin; Monastic Rules; Monasticism and Nuns; Nuns as Illuminators; Radegund; Universities; Women Authors: Latin Texts

ELEANOR OF AQUITAINE

Eleanor (c.1122–1204), queen of France and of England, was one of three children of Duke William X of Aquitaine and his wife Eleanor. Her brother, mother, and father were all dead by 1137, leaving her the heiress to the vast county which stretched from the Loire river to the Pyrenees. Her wealth made her an attractive marriage prospect, and in July 1137 she was married to the future Louis VII, King of France. The marriage does not seem to have been personally harmonious. Their first daughter was not born until 1145. It was probably the need for a male heir that led Louis and the French nobility to allow the queen to accompany them on the Second Crusade. The 1147 venture seems to have exacerbated underlying tensions in their marriage. In 1148, when they reached Antioch, scandal arose because Eleanor was perceived to be suspiciously close to her paternal uncle Raymond, ruler of the territory. The crusade itself was a spectacular failure. On the return trip, the queen was captured by a Greek naval commander. After their reunification in Sicily, Louis and Eleanor journeyed together to Rome where Pope Eugenius III encouraged the couple to reconcile and even provided a royally decorated bed upon which he urged them to resume marital relations. A second daughter was born the following year. The reconciliation proved temporary, and in 1152, the couple was divorced on grounds of consanguinity, with Louis gaining custody of the two daughters and Eleanor regaining control of the territories she had brought into the marriage.

The divorced queen was no less a tempting prospect than had been the young countess. After two noblemen tried and failed to kidnap her and force her into a marriage, she agreed to marry Henry of Anjou in May 1152. Henry was about nineteen years old and she was about thirty, and since he was occupied in consolidating his hold on his continental territories as well as securing his claim to the throne of England, she may have believed that she could dominate the young count. The death of King Stephen of England in 1154 brought Henry and Eleanor to the throne, and Henry set about incorporating her territories into his vast empire. The next fifteen years of Eleanor's life were punctuated by pregnancy and childbearing. She gave birth to at least five sons and three daughters between 1153 and 1166–1167. Eleanor also appeared with Henry at ceremonial court gatherings, helped negotiate marriage alliances for her children, intervened in legal proceedings, issued royal mandates, and witnessed royal charters.

As her sons came of age, Eleanor and Henry began to train them to carry out their duties in the territories they would inherit. The daughters were married strategically. As the sons began to assume partial responsibility for their assigned territories, tension arose because they resented their father's continued control. The king and Eleanor's relationship had also soured over time, and by 1173, the sons were in revolt against the king, aided and abetted by Eleanor and the French king, who resented the loss of Eleanor's territories and England's growing dominance. Henry quelled the revolt and imprisoned Eleanor for her part in it. Eleanor did not regain her freedom until Henry died in 1189 and her son Richard ordered her freed and returned her revenues and territories to her.

Until her death in 1204, Eleanor assisted her sons Richard (d. 1199) and then John (d. 1215) in governing. She took oaths of loyalty in Richard's name upon his accession to England's throne, assisted in the regency government while he was away on the Third Crusade, and negotiated his release when he was taken captive. In 1200, she traveled to Castile to accompany a granddaughter, Blanche, to Paris to become the bride of the future King Louis VIII. During John's reign, she took charge of improving England's coastal defenses when France threatened invasion. She was involved in ecclesiastical affairs, including negotiations with the papacy during both of her sons' reigns. She spent her last years at her favored monastery of Fontevault. As late as 1203, she was still issuing writs and working to secure John's rights in Aquitaine.

Eleanor is remembered as a patron of art and literature as well as an impressive political figure throughout her long life. While popular representations of her presiding over the Courts of Love are unfounded, she was literate and had many works dedicated to her. She may have chosen the design for her tomb effigy, which shows her holding a book.

LOIS L. HUNEYCUTT

References and Further Reading

- Bull, Marcus, and Catherine Leglu, eds., The World of Eleanor of Aquitaine: Literature and Society in Southern France Between the Eleventh and Thirteenth Centuries. Woodbridge and Rochester: Boydell Press, 2005.
- Kibler, William, ed., Eleanor of Aquitaine: Patron and Politician. Austin, Texas: University of Texas Press, 1976.
- Martindale, Jane. "Eleanor of Aquitaine." In Janet T. Nelson, ed., Richard Coeur de Lion in History and Myth. London: King's College London Centre for Late Antique and Medieval Studies, 1992, pp. 17–50.
- Wheeler, Bonnie, and John Carmi Parsons eds. Eleanor of Aquitaine: Lord and Lady. New York: Palgrave MacMillan, 2003.

See also Blanche of Castile; England; Occitania; Queens and Empresses: the West

ELEANOR OF SCOTLAND

Eleanor of Scotland (1433–1480), also known as Eleonore von Österreich (Eleanor of Austria), was one of six daughters of James I of Scotland, himself the author of The Kingis Quair, and Joan Beaufort, niece of the bishop of Winchester and the chancellor of England. Starting in 1445, she lived at the court of Charles the Seventh in France. In 1448, at the age of fifteen, she married Archduke Sigismund von Tirol. An avid traveler, Eleanor was literate in several languages.

Household accounts reveal that Eleanor received and presented books. This involvement with literature culminated in Eleanor's translation and rewriting of a French romance, Ponthus et la belle Sidoine, whose source was the English ballad King Horn. Eleanor's Pontus und Sidonia dates from between 1449 and 1465, and was first printed in 1483. It was popular, as evidenced by its numerous printings during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.

Twice taking over the leadership of the realm during her husband's absence, from 1455 to 1458 and again in 1467, Eleanor's international political skill and marital relationship are reflected in her revisions of the source text to increase the political role of women. Only the courts with effective female advisors successfully retain their stability. Her emphasis on the importance of mutual desire in aristocratic marriages may have come from her own experience in an arranged marriage. She, along with Elisabeth von Nassau-Saarbrücken (c. 1393–1456), is recognized as having introduced a new genre to German literature, the prose novel.

SUSAN SIGNE MORRISON

References and Further Reading

- Bawcutt, Priscilla and Bridget Henisch. "Scots Abroad in the Fifteenth Century: The Princesses Margaret, Isabella and Eleanor." In Women in Scotland c. 1100–c. 1750, edited by Elizabeth Ewan and Maureen M. Meikle. East Linton: Tuckwell Press, 1999, pp. 45–55.
- Classen, Albrecht. "Die leidende und unterdrückte Frau im Roman des 15. Jahrhunderts: Zur Verfasserschaft des frühneuhochdeutschen Romans Pontus und Sidonia." Seminar 29 (1993): 1–27.
- Eleonore von Österreich. "Pontus und Sidonia" In Volksbücher vom sterbenden Rittertum, edited by Heinz Kindermann. Weimar: Böhlau, 1928. [1500 Printing].
- Kellermann-Haaf, Petra. Frau und Politik im Mittelalter. Untersuchungen zur politischen Rolle der Frau in den höfischen Romanen des 12., 13. und 14. Jahrhunderts. Göttingen: Kümmerle, 1986.
- King Horn, Floriz and Blanchefleur, the Assumption of Our Lady*. Ed. (1866) J. Rawson Lumby. Ed. (1962) George H. McKnight. Early English Text Society, 58 London: Oxford University Press, 1962.
- Liebertz-Grün, Ursula. "Autorinnen im Umkreis der Höfe." In Frauen—Literatur—Geschichte: Schreibende Frauen vom Mittelalter bis zur Gegenwart, edited by Hiltrud Gnüg und Renate Möhrmann. Stuttgart: Suhrkamp, 1985, pp. 16–34.
- Liepe, Wolfgang. Elisabeth von Nassau-Saarbrücken: Entstehung und Angänge des Prosaromans in Deutschland. Halle A. S.: Max Niemeyer, 1920.
- Morrison, Susan Signe. "Women Writers and Women Rulers: Rhetorical and Political Empowerment in the Fifteenth-Century." Women in German Yearbook 9 (1994): 25–48.
- Müller, Jan-Dirk. "Volksbuch/Prosaroman im 15./16. Jahrhundert—Perspektiven der Forschung." Internationales Archiv für Sozialgeschichte der deutschen Literatur, edited by Wolfgang Frühwald, Georg Jäger, and Alberto Martino. Tübingen: Max Niemeyer Verlag, 1985, pp. 1–128.

See also Germanic Lands; Literature, German; Marriage, Christian; Noble Women; Scotland; Women Authors: German Texts

ELISABETH OF HUNGARY

Born the daughter of King Andrew II of Hungary and Gertrude of Meran, betrothed at the age of four to the son of Hermann I, Landgrave of Thuringia, Elisabeth of Hungary (1207–1231) was brought up in the Thuringian court at Eisenach and Wartburg. She married Louis IV of Thuringia in 1221. According to the testimonies of her life she had a happy marriage with him, and bore three children, Hermann (1222), Sofia (1224), and Gertrud (1227). At the same time, moved by the novel religious ideas of the Franciscans, she turned away from the luxury of courtly life and, under the influence of her severe confessor, Conrad of Marburg, she dedicated herself to charity and ascetic piety. After the death of her husband (1227), she financed from her dower a leper's hospital in Marburg, dedicated to Saint Francis. She lived there in excessive renunciation and dedicated her life to the care of the sick. She died at the age of twenty-four (1231).

Elisabeth's cult emerged soon after her burial, and her tomb became a new site for pilgrimage and miraculous healings. Between 1232 and 1235, an exemplary canonization process elevated her to sainthood. The testimonies of her handmaids (Dicta quatuor ancillarum) provided an engaging account of her life of renunciation. She became one of the most popular female saints in the Middle Ages. A caring wife and mother, then an exemplary widow, she became a model for pious princesses in royal courts, a saint of charity in towns, an ideal for the Franciscan Third Order and other semi-religious groups.

GÁBOR KLANICZAY

References and Further Reading

- Klaniczay, G. Holy Rulers and Blessed Princesses: Dynastic Cults in Medieval Central Europe. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002.
- Sankt Elisabeth: Fürstin, Dienerin, Heilige*. Sigmorigen Thorbecke, 1981.
- Werner, M. "Mater Hassiae - Flos Ungariae - Gloria Teutoniae," In Politik und Heiligenverehrung im Hochmittelalter, edited by J. Petersohn. Sigmorigen Thorbecke, 1994, pp. 449–540.

See also Almsgiving and Charity; Canonization of Saints; Germanic Lands; Hagiography; Hospitals

ELISABETH OF SCHÖNAU

Elisabeth of Schönau (1128/29–1164/65) was a Benedictine nun, famous during her life as a visionary, whose works enjoyed great popularity after her death. Born in the Rhineland to a well-established and well-connected family, she entered the double monastery at Schönau, a Benedictine community of monks and nuns, when she was twelve. At the age of twenty-three, she began to have visionary experiences which lasted until her death, and before 1156 she became magistra (mistress) of the nuns at Schönau. She related her visions in three diaristic Books of Visions (Libri Visionum I-III); she also wrote a treatise on the paths to heaven, Liber viarum Dei (Book of the Ways of God); a text on the martyrdom of St. Ursula and her companions, Revelatio de sacro exercitu virginum Coloniensium (The Revelation about the Sacred Company of the Virgins of Cologne); a short collection of her visions about the bodily resurrection of the Virgin Mary, Visio de resurrectione beate virginis Marie (Vision about the Resurrection of the Blessed Virgin Mary), and twenty-two letters.

Elisabeth's visionary gift first manifested itself after a bout of suffering and temptation by the devil. In the first book of the Visions, titled in its earliest version Liber eiusdem de temptationibus inimici, quas primo sustinuit et de revelationibus divinis quas post modum vidit (On the Temptations of the Enemy, which She First Endured, and Her Subsequent Divinely Revealed Visions), she describes the acedia (not-caring) which prevented her from finding comfort in the Psalms, such that she even hurled the psalter she was reading across the room. She tells how she questioned Christ's divinity and in her tristitia (sadness, the sin of despair that made Judas hang himself) contemplated suicide. Her affliction and temptation place her in the company of early holy men, but the particular, vivid details of her account point to an intensity of lived experience. The devil tormented her in the chapel as a tiny apparition wearing a monk's cowl; as a human, short, stocky, red-faced, with a darting fiery tongue and taloned feet and hands; as a repulsive dog; and as a huge bull threatening to gobble her up. Finally, she saw Mary in a wheel of light during mass, heard her comforting words, and caught her first glimpse of the handsome young angel who became her guide. However, the devil still competed with Mary and with the crucified Christ for Elisabeth's attention. Disguised as a seductive young clerk, he stalked her as she tried to escape, and compelled her to stare at his lewd gestures.

Throughout her life, Elisabeth's community witnessed her physical suffering and waking trances, and the nuns wrote down the words she spoke and the visions she recounted. Elisabeth's monastic community tended and supported her with prayer and sometimes with self-flagellation to help her carry out the guiding angel's commands. Her visions, inextricably connected to the devotional practices of the monastery, affirmed and deepened the way others experienced their daily religious rituals. But, although what she saw in trance often conformed to what her sisters and brothers believed, some visions were unusual, even radical: Mary in priestly garb officiating at the altar; Christ as a radiant female virgin, the form of Christ's humanity, as her angel confirmed.

Two years after her visions began, Elisabeth's angel commissioned her to proclaim God's word as a prophet. Urging reform, she addressed abbots and the archbishop of Trier in letters, speaking as "a certain small spark sent from the seat of great majesty, and a voice thundering in the heart of a small worm-person." Her prophetic mandate and her concern with pastoral matters and reform found expression in the Book of the Ways of God, which admonishes both religious and lay people. Quite different from, but perhaps inspired by Hildegard of Bingen's Scivias (Know the Ways), it shows Elisabeth's astute awareness of the world outside the cloister in unexpected ways, as when she warned against sibling incest among young children who are unaware of sin. In a lengthy narrative that survives in only three manuscripts she noticed that an adolescent monk brought up in the monastery had been seduced by an older, worldly companion. Elisabeth convinced him to open his heart to her and repent, and then took charge of the objects the young men had stolen to finance their flight. The boy was saved, while his seducer stole the abbot's horse and fled. Her psychological astuteness, her compassion, and her decisive firmness all suggest that as mistress of the nuns, a position second to that of abbot, she played a much more practical role than her visionary diaries suggest.

When inscriptions and bones were found in the Cologne cemetery believed to be the site where Ursula and her company of virgins were martyred, abbot Gerlach of Deutz turned to Elisabeth for inside information about the authenticity of the relics. In a series of visionary conversations, Elisabeth was able to account for the presence of men and children in the company of female virgins. Her revelation, full of complex, novelistic subplots, differed from pre-existing narratives. Her reshaping of the legend validated both male and female virginity, construed martyrdom as bearing witness through one's life to God's grace, and emphasized the power of love in a community of the pious.

Elisabeth's voice remained distinctive, but modern scholars have debated her brother Ekbert's role in shaping her works. Educated in Paris and groomed for a career in the church, he left his deaconate in Bonn to become a monk at Schönau and to serve as Elisabeth's scribe, translator, and editor. Elisabeth received and spoke her visions sometimes in Latin and sometimes with an admixture of German. Ekbert averred that he translated the German faithfully, took away nothing and added nothing of his own. Yet he did edit and shape the narratives to some extent, and both shorter and longer versions survive. Elisabeth's visionary narratives and concerns become more sophisticated over the years, but one should not rule out her own development while becoming more important both within and outside Schönau. Nor should one take literally the claims that she knew no Latin: miraculous knowledge of Latin stresses the divine origin and authority of utterance. From the time she was eight, Elisabeth read and recited the Psalms in Latin every day. Each day of her life as a Benedictine nun was punctuated by Latin prayer, services, and by readings in Latin during meals. She "speaks Bible fluently," and she thought in biblical and liturgical Latin. Nothing in the style of her narratives is alien to her linguistic background.

The communal, devotional, and pastoral concerns of Elisabeth's visions struck a responsive chord in her own times. Important churchmen turned to her for inside information from her angel. Was Mary resurrected in the body? (Elisabeth learned that she was.) During her final illness, she was surrounded by her brothers and sisters, who loved her and valued her divinely inspired wisdom, and throngs of outsiders came to hear her last words. Her works were transmitted in at least 145 medieval manuscripts, often grouped with works by writers like Bernard of Clairvaux. A decade after her death, Roger of Ford, an English Cistercian, came upon The Book of the Ways of God in France; he sent a copy to his abbot with a letter telling how the book was "eagerly copied and read and heard not only by the unlearned but by bishops and our abbots," and asked that another copy be made and sent to the convent where his mother lived. At the Cistercian abbey of Saint Mary at Himmerod, The Book of the Ways of God was selected for reading at collation. Less than a century after her visions began many monastic libraries in Germany and France owned copies of her works. Most popular were the revelations about the Virgin Mary and the Cologne martyrdom of Ursula and her companions. The Resurrection of the Blessed Virgin was translated into Anglo-Norman verse and into Icelandic in the early thirteenth-century. In the fourteenth century, The Book of the Ways of God was translated into French, and 1513 saw the first printing of her visions.

THALIA A. PANDIRI

References and Further Reading

- Clark, Anne L. Elisabeth of Schönau: A Twelfth-Century Visionary. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1992.
- . "Holy Woman or Unworthy Vessel? The Representations of Elisabeth of Schönau." In Gendered Voices: Medieval Saints and Their Interpreters, edited by Catherine M. Mooney. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999, pp. 35–51.
- Elisabeth of Schönau. The Complete Works. translated and introduced by Anne L. Clark. New York: Paulist Press, 2000.
- Ferrante, Joan M. To the Glory of Her Sex: Women's Roles in the Composition of Medieval Texts. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1997.
- Pandiri, Thalia A. "Autobiography or Autohagiography? Decoding the Subtext in the Visions of Elisabeth of Schönau." In Women Writing Latin, from Roman Antiquity to Early Modern Europe (in Three Volumes), vol. 2 Medieval Women Writing Latin, edited by Laurie J. Churchill, Phyllis R. Brown, Jane E. Jeffrey. New York and London: Routledge, 2002, pp. 197–229.
- Roth, F. W. E., Ed. Die Visionen der hl. Elisabeth und die Schriften der Aebte Ekbert und Emecho von Schönau. Brünn: Verlag der Studien aus dem Benedictiner-und Cistercienser Orden, 1884.

See also Autohagiography; Education, Monastic; Germanic Lands; Hagiography, Iconographic Aspects of; Hildegard of Bingen; Jesus/God as Mother; Letter Writing; Literacy and Reading; Latin; Mary, Virgin; Monasticism and Nuns; Mystics' Writings; Relics and Reliquaries; Sermons and Preaching; Ursula and Her Companions; Virgin Martyrs; Women Authors: Latin Texts

EMPRESSES: BYZANTIUM

Wives, widows, mothers, and daughters of emperors in Byzantium might all be called empress and many exercised considerable power during the millennial epoch of imperial rule in Constantinople (330–1453). The official titles augousta (from the Latin augustus) and basilissa/basilida, the feminine equivalent of basileus (emperor), were bestowed at coronation and marriage. Despoina (lady, mistress, from despotes, lord, master), was also used, for instance when Theodora said: "May I never be separated from this purple, and may I never live to see the day when people do not address me as despoina," during the Nika riot in 532. Here she also emphasizes the significance of the imperial color purple, which was restricted to the ruling family.

Role at Court

Within the Byzantine court the empress had supreme authority over the women's quarters (gynaikonitis), with her own hierarchy of officials, often eunuchs, who served and guarded her (e.g., bedroom, wardrobe, dining room, and treasury staff). She could also summon generals, doctors, monks, bishops, and her husband's counselors to attend her. The empress's power was enshrined in the gendered structure of court activities, in which she provided a feminine counterpart to the emperor's ceremonies. Whenever he received or entertained male officials, she presided over the feminine side, receiving the wives of senators and office holders, for instance. This feature was so fundamental to official banquets that when Leo VI's wife died he was forced to crown his young daughter to fulfill this formal role. While many official acclamations and ceremonies took place inside the Great Palace, the empress also performed public rituals in Constantinople and farther afield. She might also make private visits to shrines or relatives, and would often accompany the emperor on campaign.

Dynastic Responsibilities

The key function of a Byzantine empress was dynastic: through the birth of legitimate children she secured the transmission of imperial authority within the ruling family from generation to generation. A son would inherit his father's power as emperor; daughters could be advantageously married. Even those who did not produce children could retain a powerful position as widows, as Pulcheria and Ariadne did in the fifth century. This late antique practice became less common in the Middle Ages, but it was not forgotten due to the incorporation of written records in the Byzantine Book of Ceremonies compiled by Constantine VII Porphyrogenetos in the tenth century. In addition, oral accounts of determined empresses like Theodora and Sophia, wives of Justinian I and II respectively, probably sustained models of feminine ambition.

Empresses played a major role in disputed successions throughout Byzantine history. As widows or daughters of emperors they could favor one candidate over another in the transmission of imperial authority. During the eleventh century Zoe, daughter of Constantine VIII, raised four men (three husbands and a nephew) to the position of emperor. Widowed empresses might also hold the balance of power as regent for their young sons (e.g., Irene in 780, Theodora in 843, Zoe Karbonopsina in 912, Eudokia Makrembolitissa in 1067, and Anna of Savoy in 1341).

This aspect of maternal power was recognized in Byzantine law and allowed Anna Dalassena to attain a position of exceptional dominance. When her son Alexios I Komnenos set off on campaign in 1081, he drew up a legal document that left her control. This stated, "Because of her vast experience of secular affairs...whatever she decrees in writing...shall have permanent validity...whatever decisions or orders are made by her...shall be regarded as coming from myself." Such a total transference of authority by an adult emperor was unusual, but mothers of younger rulers regularly drew on the principle of maternal protection of their rights in order to exercise supreme power.

Imperial Marriages

Since a woman normally became empress by marrying the emperor or his son, her selection was a matter of great importance. For political reasons she might be of foreign birth, chosen to consolidate an alliance with Byzantium (e.g., the Khazar princess Čiček who was renamed Irene [Peace], on her marriage to Constantine V in 732). This policy became very common from the twelfth century onwards, as imperial families sought to bolster their power through foreign treaties and sought wives from Western, crusading, and Balkan families as empresses (e.g., Agnes-Anna of France, wife first of Alexios II and then of Andronikos I; Ioanna-Anna of Savoy, wife of Andronikos III; and Helena Dragaš, who married Manuel II). Other women might be favored by their physical appearance, through a legendary tradition of bride-shows in which the young prince selected the most beautiful. This medieval Judgement of Paris probably disguises quite rational reasons for the choice of a woman from a particular family or region, with which the imperial house wished to make an alliance. It served an important function in binding the provincial aristocracy to the center.

Representations in Art

Empresses are regularly depicted in Byzantine art wearing their official robes of office or presenting gifts to Christ and the Virgin, often accompanied by their children, for instance in the gallery mosaics of St. Sophia (Zoe and Irene, wives of Constantine IX and John II respectively), on ivories (Eudokia with Romanos, who has been identified both as Romanos II and IV), and in manuscripts (e.g., Eudokia Ingerina with Basil I [Parisinus graecus 510]). Some empresses feature on the official coinage, and Empress Irene put her own portrait on both sides of the gold nomisma. Many founded monasteries and patronized spiritual leaders.

Conclusion

Since the Byzantine Empire had no constitution, there was unlimited potential for empresses to influence their husbands, the court and imperial policy. Procopius claims that Theodora exercised a strong and nefarious influence on Justinian but he also documents their joint patronage of the church. Empress Irene (as regent and sole ruler), Anna Dalassena (regent from 1081 onwards), and Anna of Savoy (regent 1341–1351, and ruler in Thessalonike 1351–c. 1365) illustrate the range of powers that might be claimed. Anna Komnene clearly hoped to attain a similar position, but was frustrated by her brother John II. The experience of successful empresses inspired others but was only enjoyed by a few.

JUDITH HERRIN

References and Further Reading

- Garland, Lynda. Byzantine Empresses. Women and Power in Byzantium 527–1204. London: Routledge, 1998.
- “The Imperial Feminine in Byzantium,” Past and Present 169 (2000): 3–35.
- Herrin, Judith. Women in Purple. Rulers of Medieval Byzantium. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 2001.
- Hill, Barbara. Imperial Women in Byzantium 1025–1204. London: Longman, 1999.
- James, Liz. Byzantine Empresses and Imperial Power. Leicester: Leicester University Press, 2000.
- Vinson, Martha. “The Life of Theodora and the Rhetoric of the Byzantine Bride Show.” Jahrbuch der Oesterreichischen Byzantinistik 49 (1999): 31–60.

See also Byzantium; Irene; Komnene, Anna; Queens and Empresses: The West; Theodora

ENCLOSURE

See Monastic Enclosure

ENGLAND

As in the rest of Europe, women in medieval England were regarded as weaker both physically and intellectually than the males around them. A young girl was expected to marry, run a household, and take care of children. Whereas a man was often identified by his profession—a knight, a carpenter, a fisherman—a woman was identified by the stage in her life cycle in relation to marriage—a virgin or single woman, a wife, and a widow. Her well-being would partly depend on her age, partly on her marital status, but also on her social class. Whereas married women remained under the legal authority of their husbands, widows were legally autonomous and could hold property in their own right; they could spend their income as they wished; urban widows might run their husbands’ business, and aristocratic widows could control large estates and dominate local affairs. In addition an upper-class woman might have greater opportunities to exercise public power as abbess or queen and almost certainly would have more opportunities to receive some form of education.

Nuns

The introduction of Christianity into England opened up to women an alternative to marriage—the religious life. In some places, in the seventh century, double monasteries were founded, housing communities of men and women, but under the authority of the abbess. Abbesses such as Hild of Whitby participated in theological debates, church synods, and missionary activity. They were able to exercise such influence as they did partly because the fledgling church did not yet have any formal, political, religious, or educational structures and partly because they were extremely wealthy and members of one of the royal families. At a time when very few people, either male or female, were literate, a few noblewomen received a formal literary education comparable to that of a religious male. The nuns of Barking, for example, studied the scriptures and commentaries on them, as well as the writings of historians and chroniclers.

Their influence, however, was short-lived. The Viking invasions destroyed a number of female houses. New parochial and educational structures were established. In the twelfth century the church, in both England and the Continent, underwent a reform movement, which stressed the importance of the mass and the celibacy of the clergy. Women were seen as a source of temptation. The double houses of men and women disappeared, and, when new houses were established, women were confined to single-sex institutions that eventually were strictly cloistered. At neither the new houses nor the older foundations that survived the Viking invasions did monastic learning attain the earlier levels of scholarship. Few of the nuns who joined the new foundations came from royal or noble families and not one of the new abbesses enjoyed the same independence as her seventh-century predecessors.

Queens and Noble Women

The Norman Conquest produced little change in the rights and status of women, who remained subject to male authority, first that of their father, and subsequently that of their husband or other male kin. Although a queen, especially if she was independently wealthy and belonged to a powerful family, might be able to exercise considerable influence, she was very dependent on the support of her husband and son. The best example comes from the life of Eleanor of Aquitaine, the wife of the Angevin king Henry II. Henry allowed Eleanor to exercise authority in her Duchy of Aquitaine when it suited him, but after she encouraged her sons in their rebellion against their father, he was able to keep her under strict surveillance in England during the last years of his life. It was only during the reign of her son, Richard I, that his absence abroad allowed Eleanor to take over the governing of the country.

Moreover, as the power of the king grew, aristocratic women found themselves the tools of royal favor. The Anglo-Saxon king, Aethelred (c. 978–1016), in his efforts to gain allies, arranged the marriages of widows and heiresses without their consent. Although subsequent rulers promised that widows would not be forced to remarry, this did not stop them from charging high fines on widows for the right to marry or not to marry. It was not until the granting of Magna Carta (1215), in clauses 7 and 8, that a widow was promised that she should not be compelled to pay anything to secure her rights in land and that she should not be compelled to remarry and thus required to pay a fine to remain celibate.

Marriage

A woman's social class profoundly affected the age at which she married and the degree of freedom she might exercise over the choice of her marriage partner. In the early Anglo-Saxon period, it may have been impossible for the poor to partake in a formal marriage ceremony and provide for a bride-price (paid to the bridegroom's family), a morning gift (given to the bride), and a feast. Many young couples entered into a loose domestic association, and the women enjoyed greater freedom of choice than their aristocratic peers, subject to the influence of kin and crown. Gradually, under pressure from church courts, in regard to all social classes, the old ceremonies were replaced by new Christian ones. Fathers almost certainly retained a great deal of influence over the choice of a partner. In addition unfree families (villeins) were required to pay a tax (merchet) to the lord for the right to marry their daughters. In the twelfth century, the church's new ruling on what constituted a valid marriage did provide some protection against forced marriages. Pope Alexander III (1159–1181) decreed that what made a marriage was the consent of the contracting parties. Yet the spread of this idea among the general populace was slow, and it was not until the fifteenth century that most people knew that words or vows could make a marriage. Unmarried women who left home to work as servants found it easier to escape from parental influence. Some were able to earn enough money to pay their own merchet, and to set up a new household, but they often could not do so until their mid-twenties.

Married women contributed to the economic well-being of their families through unpaid labor—taking care of the family's pigs and poultry as well as crops growing in the garden—but also through paid labor, by brewing, spinning, or selling home-produced goods, eggs and the like, in local markets. In towns they helped their husbands run their businesses and might claim the status of feme sole, that is the right to trade as if they were single women and to be solely responsible for their debts. In London, where women were encouraged to make a formal declaration of this status, those who did so worked predominantly as hucksters. By the twelfth century, occupational sex segregation was clearly in force, with areas such as laundry, the dairy, and petty retailing seen as women's work.

Work Life

When the population fell after 1348, with the Black Death and recurrent outbreaks of plague, women (both single and married) joined the labor force in larger numbers. Some female harvesters were paid at the same rate as men, but elsewhere they received less. Highly skilled and better paid jobs such as shepherd and ploughholder remained the province of men. Similarly within towns women, who had little opportunity to be apprenticed to a trade, were concentrated in low-paid, low-skilled work in the food trade, in textiles, and as spinsters and servants. The yearly earnings of any of these women are impossible to gauge, but in large towns such as York, many lived in "mean cottages and cheap tenements" (Goldberg, 1988, 107). Only widows who chose to continue their husbands' business might profit from such high status, high paid work as mercer or overseas trader.

Did a married woman's ability to produce a cash income make her in any way an economic equal with her husband or afford her some independence of action and "a very real degree of economic clout within the familial economy" (Goldberg 1991, 82; Barron, 40)? A few women may have controlled the family's purse-strings, but legally a husband, as head of the household, controlled all the material resources of the household, including any money that his wife earned. The hucksters and spinsters, who made up such a large proportion of the female workforce, worked long hours for low profits. Their income was unlikely to be equal to that of a shoemaker or master mason, who had undergone a long apprenticeship. Nor did the economic contribution of the women bring them any political power. Even though married women could join some guilds and craft fellowships as members and paid annual dues, they were not eligible for guild office. So too, although women were active members of religious fraternities, they tended to fill traditional roles—cooking and sewing—and there is no evidence of women holding office.

If a single woman could not find regular, full-time employment, she might engage in casual prostitution, picking up customers in a street or tavern. However, she was not separated from the wider community. On the other hand, the full-time, professional prostitutes, who lived and worked in a regulated brothel, were clearly set apart from their fellows. They were often forced to wear distinctive clothing; they were forbidden to walk in certain parts of the town; and, as "common women," they were not allowed to have their own lovers. In the late fifteenth century, however, brothels came under attack, and some were closed down. In the town of Coventry, in 1492, this distrust was extended to all single women and new legislation forbade a single woman under the age of forty to set up house for herself.

Over the course of the Middle Ages, the economic opportunities open to women diminished. In the fifteenth century, London silk weavers virtually monopolized the trade, but they never established a formal guild. When men began to move into silk-weaving, the women were unable to prevent them taking over the craft. Similarly in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries women had dominated brewing. At that time it was a small-scale local industry that women undertook in their homes on an intermittent and casual basis. As the market for ale expanded, brewers began to work full-time, producing on a larger scale. Most public, professional ale-brewers were married women, although a few widows continued to work and support themselves. If her husband was already active in the food trade, a hosteller for example, female brewing contributed to the family business, but, in many instances, brewing allowed women to carry out a trade that was separate and independent from that of their spouses. This opportunity diminished as beer, produced with hops, became more popular. Apart from an occasional widow, carrying on her husband's trade, beer brewers were male. As the number of beer brewers increased, the number of ale brewers inevitably declined, until, by the mid-sixteenth century, in ports and in London and Southwark, ale brewing, in the hands of women virtually disappeared. The retailing of both ale and beer, however, was usually carried out by female tapsters and tipplers, even in those places where their husbands, as head of household, were held responsible by the courts.

Education and Religion

Since they did not learn Latin, young girls had no access to the grammar schools, the universities, or the inns of court. Yet most aristocratic women taught by their mothers could read, but not write, English. Many also possessed service books—psalters and books of hours—that made private prayer and meditation possible. Books were also read aloud, thus reaching a wider audience. Reading aloud was particularly important for the women who joined the unorthodox religious group known as Lollards in the fifteenth century, since most of them were illiterate. They were then able to teach what they had heard through informal conversations with family, friends, and neighbors, but the leadership of the organization and public preaching remained firmly in male hands.

Women as visionaries—the instruments and medium of God's voice—sometimes acquired a voice that was otherwise denied to them. By the early fifteenth century, works by and about Continental woman visionaries like Birgitta of Sweden and Catherine of Siena had been translated into English and made the work of English mystics like Julian of Norwich more acceptable. Julian, however, was an anchoress, shut away from the world. Margery Kempe, on the other hand, attempted to lead a quasi-religious life, while remaining within the world. Although her loud sobbing at every verbal or symbolic reminder of the Passion angered many of her contemporaries, she was strengthened in her resolve to lead this highly unconventional life by her visionary conversations with the saints and Christ. Her account of her religious experiences, The Book of Margery Kempe, shows that it was possible for a woman of determination to follow her own path.

MAVIS MATE

References and Further Reading

- Barron, C. "The Golden Age of Women in Medieval London." Reading Medieval Studies, 15 (1989): 35–58.
- Barron, C., and A. Sutton, eds. Medieval London Widows, 1300–1500. London: Hambledon, 1994.
- Bennet, Judith. "Medieval Women, Modern Women: Across the Great Divide." In Culture and History, 1350–1600, edited by David Aers. London: Harvester, 1992, pp. 147–175.
- . Ale, Beer, and Brewsters in England: Woman's Work in a Changing World, 1300–1600. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1996.
- Goldberg, P. J. P. "Women in Fifteenth Century Town Life." In Towns, Townspeople in the Fifteenth Century, edited by J. A. F. Thomson. Gloucester: Alan Sutton, 1988, pp. 107–128.
- . "The Public and the Private: Women in the Pre-Plague Economy." In Thirteenth Century England, III, edited by P. R. Coss and S. D. Lloyd. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell, 1991, pp. 75–89.
- . Women, Work and Life-Cycle in a Medieval Economy: York and Yorkshire c. 1300–1520. Oxford: Clarendon, 1992.
- Mate, M. Daughters, Wives and Widows after the Black Death: Women in Sussex, 1350–1530. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell, 1998.
- Stafford, Pauline. Queen Emma and Queen Edith: Queenship and Women's Power in Eleventh-Century England. Oxford; Malden, Mass.: Blackwell, 1997.
- Women and Religion in Medieval England*, edited by Diana Wood. Oxford: Oxbow Books, 2003.

See also Abbesses; Alewives and Brewing; Demography; Double Monasteries; Dowry and Other Marriage Gifts; Education, Lay; Education, Monastic; Feme Covert; Feme Sole; Eleanor of Aquitaine; Guild Members and Guilds; Hild of Whitby; Inheritance; Julian of Norwich; Kempe, Margery; Law, English Secular Courts of; Literacy and Reading: Latin; Literacy and Reading: Vernacular; Lollards; Marriage, Christian; Merchet and Leyrwite; Monasticism and Nuns; Mysticism and Mystics; Noble Women; Peasants; Prostitutes; Queens and Empresses: the West; Servants; Social Status; Widows; Work

EPIC, ITALIAN

Epic narratives in the Italian vernacular began in the thirteenth century and continued well past the end of the fifteenth. Three forms characterized epic material: the Old French chanson de geste, ottava rima, and prose. During this period, the matières of Britain (Arthurian), Rome (classical), and France (Charlemagne and his men) united in Italy to create epics new in language, metrics, and content. Women appear in various roles, from Amazon to falsely accused queen, from enchantress to warrior maiden.

The French chanson de geste, written in laissez, arrived in Italy through oral transmission along pilgrimage routes in the late twelfth century (based on evidence in art and onomastics) and in manuscripts popular in northern Italian courts (as inventories indicate). Texts in Franco-Italian, a linguistic hybrid, date from the end of the thirteenth century through the first half of the fifteenth. Some chansons merely copy French models, but others are Italianized based upon pre-existing characters and plots. There are three Franco-Italian versions of the Chanson de Roland; one, of the late twelfth century, gives Aude, Roland's betrothed, an important role. This role not only appeals to the female audience, but also her visions emphasize genealogical considerations in the French line. The Geste Francor (first half of the fourteenth century) reinforces the importance of women in royal genealogy: it narrates the history of Carolingians from Pepin through Louis, and is built around a series of persecuted women. Bovo d'Antona's wife must raise twins alone in exile. Pepin's wife, Berta dai piedi grandi, is betrayed by a look-alike friend. She bears Charlemagne while the guest of a widower woodsman, and repays his hospitality by teaching his daughters needlepoint. Similarly, Charlemagne's half-sister bears Roland in the Italian woods. Charlemagne's wife, Blançiflor, is accused of adultery and flees to Hungary, where she gives birth to his heir, Louis. Parallels to biblical history compare Roland's mother and father to Mary and Joseph fleeing to Egypt. These women accept responsibility for their (mis)deeds, suffer to regain their position, and extricate themselves from difficulties within the social structure, like their menfolk.

Not all Franco-Italian epics allot important roles to women; L'Entrée d'Espagne, the best-known Franco-Italian epic, only narrates three offers of marriage to Roland in the East, and a Sultan's daughter pines for him. Some think Franco-Italian chansons de geste, specifically the Geste Francor, reflect northern Italian bourgeois interests: Pepin's representatives must inspect Berta naked to make sure the "merchandise" is sound. The importance of Mediterranean trade for Italian city-states means that attitudes toward non-Christians, men and women, differ from those of early Crusade-era chansons. In Franco-Italian epics, conversions to Christianity are important, but non-Christian women are primarily sources of wealth, like Christians.

Contemporary with Franco-Italian are literary epics. Vernacular tradition as well as classical epic influenced Dante and Boccaccio. Dante includes no Carolingian-cycle women in his Commedia, but Dido and Helen inhabit Hell. Boccaccio possibly invented ottava rima (eight-verse stanzas of hendecasyllables rhymed ABABABCC), in which he wrote his Filostrato (1330s) and Teseida delle nozze d'Emilia (1339–1341), epics of classical subject, ensuring the form's popularity.

Following Boccaccio's lead, through the fifteenth century and afterwards, anonymous poems written in ottava rima-cantari narrate stories from mythology, history, and hagiography, Arthurian and Carolingian tradition. Cantari, Tuscan in origin, can be short, narrating a single event (Cantare di Pirramo e di Tisbe) or long, like Spagna in Rima that recounts Charlemagne's seven years in Spain before Roncevaux. Prose rewrites of Italian epic subjects coexist with cantari. The best-known authors are Florentine: Antonio Pucci (c. 1310–1388) produced numerous cantari on all subjects; Andrea da Barberino (c. 1370–c. 1431) wrote prose versions of the Reali di Francia, Aspramonte, Re Ansuigi, Le Storie di Rinaldo, Nerbonesi, Ugone d'Alvernia, Aiolfo del Barbicone, and Guerrin Meschino, that utilize French conventions. The women in both forms vary according to the traditions from which they derive. Andrea elaborates upon the Berta e Milone story from the Geste Francor: Berta demonstrates more initiative, arranging for Milone to disguise himself as a woman to see her. The anonymous Innamoramento di Berta e Melone further elaborates the original. Certain new character types appear: Pucci wrote three cantari centered on women: Gismirante, Madonna Lionessa, and Historia della Reina d'Oriente. The latter exemplifies sex change stories: the heiress of an eastern kingdom passes as a boy, but when faced with a trial bath, a prayer changes her sex. A new development not in French texts is Galiziella, a warrior woman who appears in Italian Aspramonte versions.

From anonymous cantari derive the more famous epics of Florence and northern Italy. Lorenzo de' Medici's mother, Lucrezia Tornabuoni, asked Luigi Pulci (1432–1484) to rehabilitate the literary Charlemagne's reputation. The resulting Morgante (1478–1483) is a rewritten amalgam of two long cantari, the Orlando and Spagna in rima. He gives women a wide variety of roles, from the usual wives and mothers of paladins to non-Christian ladies—princesses in need of assistance, who love Rinaldo, Ulivieri, or Orlando. Short-lived love affairs provide paladins wandering in the East emotional support and occasional physical assistance (e.g., Chiariella helps Orlando escape from prison). An affair can end badly: Forisena kills herself when Ulivieri leaves. Women frequently aid Pulci's verbal humor: Arcalida, an Amazon troop leader, creates a series of double entendres when conquered by Rinaldo and his men; Florinetta provides comic relief during Morgante and Margutte's trip through the woods. The beautiful Antea, endowed with magic weapons and armor, defeats all comers, and she and Rinaldo fall mutually in love in spite of being enemies. At the head of an army she travels through Europe, seeking Rinaldo, and finally returns unharmed to Bambillonia. Meridiana remains undefeated when Orlando disdains combat with her. Creonta, an ugly giantess, is killed like male giants.

In Ferrara, Maria Matteo Boiardo (1440/1441–1494) wrote his Orlando Innamorato ([Roland in Love], 1478–1482/1483, 1485) at the court of Ercole d'Este and Eleonora of Aragon, where it was read aloud to Eleonora and her daughter Isabella. Roland and all paladins are smitten by Angelica, and pursue her. Women in general get the better of Orlando, who is depicted as not savvy in love. Boiardo's women are Christian wives, oriental princesses who need saving, and, as in Morgante, two beautiful warrior women. Bradamante, the valiant Christian, falls in love with Rugiero; she also plays with gender roles: Fiordesina falls in love with her thinking she is a man. The hard-fighting pagan Marfisa, who seems to be Boiardo's invention, contrasts with the delicate but conniving pagan Angelica, an enchanter's daughter. Boiardo furthermore develops enchantresses, maleficent and beneficent: Alcina, Dragontina, Falerina, and Febosilla create obstacles for heroes as well as learning experiences. Critics suggest that they not only function in the plot but also embody Boiardo's pedagogical strategies that advocate careful reading. However, even Fiordelisa, a courtly Christian, can be seen as critiquing literary tradition. Bradamante and enchantresses also appear in Mambriano, by Ciccio da Ferrara, begun in 1490 and published in 1502.

At the end of the fifteenth century, Italian epic tradition flourished in written and printed form, and would soon be exported through Ariosto, Tasso, and works they inspired. The “woman warrior,” the Amazon, and the scheming enchantress join the persecuted ruler's daughter of the French repertoire as part of western European literary tradition, the results of a unique fusion of medieval Breton, classical, and French literary sources, popular at all social levels in the Italian peninsula.

LESLIE ZARKER MORGAN

References and Further Reading

- Allaire, Gloria. “The Warrior Women in Late Medieval Prose Epics.” Italian Culture 12 (1994): 33–43.
- . Andrea da Barberino and the Language of Chivalry. Gainesville, Fla.: University Press of Florida, 1997.
- Anceschi, Giuseppe, ed. Orlando Innamorato. Mario Matteo Boiardo. Milan: Garzanti, 1978.
- Andrea da Barberino. L'Aspramonte. Romanzo cavalleresco inedito, edited by Marco Boni. Collezione di opere inedite o rare. Nuova serie. Bologna: Antiquaria Palmarverde, 1951.

- . I Reali di Francia, edited by Aurelio Roncaglia and Fabrizio Beggiano. Brucherio-Milan: Gherardo Casini Editore, 1987.
- Balduino, Armando, ed. Cantari del Trecento. Scrittori italiani. Sezione letteraria. Milan: Marzorati, 1970.
- Barini, Giorgio, ed. Cantari cavallereschi dei secoli XV e XVI. Collezione di opere inedite o rare dei primi tre secoli della lingua. Commissione pe' testi di lingua nelle provincie dell'Emilia. Bologna: Romagnoli dall'Acqua, 1905.
- Bendinelli Predelli, Maria. "La Donna guerriera nell'immaginario italiano del tardo medioevo." Italian Culture 12 (1994): 13–34.
- Boccassini, Daniela. "Love, Magic, and Storytelling in Boiardo's Orlando Innamorato: The Dragontina Episode." In Studi filologici e letterari in memoria di Danilo Aguzzi-Barbagli, edited by Daniela Boccassini. Filibrary Series, 13. Stony Brook, N.Y.: Forum Italicum, 1997, pp. 35–58.
- Bonucci, Anicio, ed. Historia della Reina d'Oriente di Anton Pucci, Fiorentino. Poema cavalleresco del XIII secolo. Scelta di curiosità letterarie inedite o rare dal secolo XIII al XIX, 41. Bologna: Romagnoli, 1862.
- Braghirolli, Willelmo, Gaston Paris, and Paul Meyer. "Inventaire des manuscrits en langue française possédés par Francesco Gonzaga I, capitaine de Mantoue, mort en 1407." Romania 9 (1880): 497–514.
- I Cantari, struttura e tradizione. Atti del Convegno Internazionale di Montreal: 19–20 marzo 1981*, edited by M. Picone and M. Bendinelli Predelli. Florence: Olschki, 1984.
- Catalano, Michele, ed. La Spagna: Poema cavalleresco del secolo XIV. 3 vols. Collezione di opere inedite o rare, 111–113. Bologna: Commissione per i testi di lingua Casa Carducci, 1939–1940.
- Cavallo, JoAnn. "The Role of the Woman in the Orlando Innamorato." Carte Italiane 8 (1986–87): 31–36.
- Dionisotti, Carlo. "Appunti su antichi testi." Italia medievale e umanistica 7 (1964): 99–131.
- Duggan, Joseph J. "L'Épisode d'Aude dans la tradition en rime de la Chanson de Roland." In Charlemagne in the North: Proceedings of the Twelfth International Conference of the Société Rencesvals. Edinburgh 4th to 11th August 1991, edited by Philip E. Bennett, Anne Elizabeth Cobby, and Graham A. Runnalls. Edinburgh: Société Rencesvals Branch, 1993, pp. 273–279.
- Everson, Jane. "Les Personnages féminins dans le Mambriano de Francesco da Ferrara." In Charlemagne in the North. Proceedings of the Twelfth International Conference of the Société Rencesvals. Edinburgh 4th to 11th August 1991, edited by Philip E. Bennett, Anne Elizabeth Cobby, and Graham A. Runnalls. Edinburgh: Société Rencesvals Branch, 1993, pp. 281–290.
- Fatini, Giuseppe, ed. Il Morgante di Luigi Pulci. 1948. Classici italiani UTET. Turin: Unione tipografico-editrice torinese, 1984.
- Franceschetti, Antonio. "Rassegna di studi sui cantari." Lettere italiane 25 (1973): 556–574.
- Holtus, Günter. "Plan- und Kunstsprachen auf romanischer Basis IV. Franko-Italienisch/Langues artificielles à base romane IV. Le franco-italien." Lexikon der romanistischen Linguistik. Vol. 7, edited by Günter Holtus et al. Tübingen: M. Niemeyer, 1998, pp. 705–756.
- Krauss, Henning. Epica feudale e pubblico borghese. Per la storia poetica di Carlomagno in Italia. translated by F. Brugnolo and A. Fassò. Padua: La Garangola, 1980.
- Lejeune, Rita, and Jacques Stiennon. La Légende de Roland dans l'art du Moyen Age. 2 vols. Brussels: Arcade, 1967.
- Limentani, Alberto. "Struttura e storia dell'ottava rima." Lettere italiane 13 (1961): 20–77.
- Luzio, Alessandro. "Isabella d'Este e l'Orlando Innamorato." In his Studi su Matteo Maria Boiardo. Bologna: Zanichelli, 1894, pp. 147–154.
- Morgan, Leslie Zarker. "Female enfances: At the Intersection of Romance and Epic." In The Court Reconvenes: Courtly Literature Across the Disciplines. Selected Papers from the Ninth Triennial Congress of the International Courtly Literature Society, University of British Columbia, Vancouver, 25–31 July 1998, edited by Carleton W. Carroll and Barbara K. Altmann. Woodbridge, Suffolk, UK: Boydell and Brewer, 2003, pp. 141–149.
- Rosellini, Aldo, ed. La Geste Francor di Venezia. Edizione integrale del Codice XIII del Fondo francese della Marciana. Saggi e monografie, 6. Pubblicazioni del Centro di Linguistica dell'Università Cattolica. Brescia: La Scuola, 1986.
- Ross, Charles S. "Angelica and the Fata Morgana: Boiardo's Allegory of Love." MLN 96 (1981): 12–22.
- Ross, Charles Stanley, trans. Orlando Innamorato. With an Introduction and Notes by Charles Stanley Ross. Foreword by Allen Mandelbaum. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1989.
- Thomas, Antoine, ed. L'Entrée d'Espagne. Chanson de geste franco-italienne. Société des anciens textes français. Paris: Firmin Didot et C<sup>ie</sup>, 1913.
- Tomalin, Margaret. The Fortunes of the Warrior Heroine in Italian Literature. L'Interprete, 33. Ravenna: Longo, 1982.
- Tusiani, Joseph, trans. Morgante. The Epic Adventures of Orlando and His Giant Friend Morgante. Introduction and notes by Edoardo A. Lèbano. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1998.
- Vitulo, Juliann Marie. "Contained Conflict: Wild Men and Warrior Women in the Early Italian Epic." Annali d'Italianistica 12 (1994): 39–59.
- . Constructing an Urban Mythology: The Chivalric Epic in Medieval Italy. Gainesville, Fla.: University Press of Florida, 2000.

See also Amazons; Boccaccio, Giovanni; Dante Alighieri; Epic: Old French; Literature, Italian; Tornabuoni de' Medici, Lucrezia

EPIC, OLD FRENCH

Up until the rise of feminist criticism, the Old French epic, or chanson de geste, was seen as a form of literature containing little or no female presence, causing it to frequently be termed "male-world" literature (Gold). This appellation came in large part from early studies that recognized the superiority of the oldest extant epic poem, the Chanson de Roland, which accords minimal space to its two female characters. Beginning in the late 1980s, however, attention has been given to the women who are found in early epics, and their importance has been reconsidered.

These female roles can be divided into three main categories. First, there are the Christian women, described as fair-skinned, blond-haired, and blue-eyed, who are mentioned, yet only occasionally active during parts of the story. Overall, they are scarce and frequently silent. The famous “sudden death” of Aude in Roland is just that: she speaks very few lines, learns of Roland’s passing, and drops dead on the floor. Traditionally, her presence in the story is seen as a demonstration of the greatness of the unbearable loss of the hero. In some early French epics, however, Christian women contribute significantly to the story, to the battles even, and to the overall outcome of the conflicts. Specifically, there are the mothers in Raoul de Cambrai, who advise their sons, attempt to avoid unnecessary warfare, and act out to protect their family pride and property. While their acts end up being the cause of the main conflicts and battles, this is only because men within the story do not respect their requests and advice.

The remaining categories are those occupied by the various Saracen women, who are, in fact, the most frequently encountered consequential members of the “fairer sex.” The Saracen women generally fit into one of the following two groups: the black Saracen and the Saracen princess.

The four black Saracen women found among the seventy-four Old French epic texts play the role of the faithful enemy woman who fights for her family, husband, and people. She is sometimes captured and released only to be put to death by her own people, sometimes she dies alongside the pagans, fighting in a savage and indecent manner (Weever). She is never somebody with whom a Christian audience could identify or whom they could admire. While commendable for her loyalty and steadfastness, her behavior as well as her appearance—she is black “like a demon” and scantily clothed—make her an unacceptable model.

The seventeen white Saracen women, on the other hand, are very much the type of woman who physically can be admired and accepted by the audience for whom they were created. They are fair-skinned, blond, and have blue eyes. They are usually dressed much like the Christian women as well, or are described in appealing exotic clothing. These women belong to the “Saracen princess” group. The Saracen princess falls in love with the Christian knight, uses her inside knowledge to help him escape from her people, if he has been captured, or conquer her people if he is attacking. She betrays her father or, in some cases, her husband to come to the aid of the Christians and, in the end, converts to Christianity—though not out of a realization of the superiority of the Christian god, rather for the love of a knight whom she often marries at the end of the story. The best example of this character is Orabel in the Chanson de Guillaume who then changes her name to Guibourc when she becomes Christian and marries Guillaume.

One explanation for the greater richness of the Saracen woman’s role in these older epics is that there is no need for her to conform to the social norms that would apply to a good Christian woman. It is thus possible for her to have outspoken and active behavior that would have shocked a contemporary audience were she one of their own. In line with this notion is the fact that often, once the Saracen princess has converted to Christianity, she disappears from the action of the story and becomes similar to the Christian women of the epic.

Some feminist scholars consider these roles assigned to women in the older epics as being in line with the misogynistic tones of the genre as a whole, while others argue that not all women represented are quite so demeaning to their gender. In any case, much work remains to be done in this field.

SARA L. PREISIG

References and Further Reading

- Burns, E. Jane. Bodytalk: When Women Speak in Old French Literature. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1993.
- Gold, Penny Schine. The Lady & the Virgin: Image, Attitude and Experience in Twelfth-Century France. Chicago and London: The University of Chicago Press, 1985.
- Kay, Sarah. The Chansons de geste in the Age of Romance: Political Fictions. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1995.
- Spiegel, Gabrielle. Romancing the Past: The Rise of Vernacular Prose. Historiography in Thirteenth-Century France. Berkeley, Los Angeles, Oxford: University of California Press, 1993.
- Weever, Jacqueline de. Sheba’s Daughters: Whitening and Demonizing the Saracen Woman in Medieval French Epic. New York: Garland, 1998.

See also Audience, Women in the; Beowulf; Captivity and Ransom; Floire and Blancheflor; Misogyny; Muslim Women: Western Literature

EPIC, SPANISH

Epic, by its military focus, is the realm of stereotypical masculine ethos. For these reasons, women tend to have, at least in theory, a more subdued role. This is in clear contrast, however, to medieval Castilian epic, where women have a central role in the action. An assessment of women’s representations in medieval Castilian epic poetry is, however, embedded in general problems concerning the development of this literary genre in the Iberian Peninsula. This is because in contrast to other literary traditions that present an extensive corpus of preserved poems, there are only three preserved medieval epic texts in Castilian. One of them is a small fragment of Carolingian material, Cantar de Roncesvalles, while the other two, Cantar de mio Cid (c. 1207) and Moçedades (beginning of the fourteenth century), celebrate the deeds of the proto-national Spanish hero, Rodrigo Díaz de Vivar, immortalized as el Cid (c. 1043–1099). This scarcity in documentation and narrow focus has forced scholars to posit a wider epic tradition, concerned especially with the origins of Castile. This material is irredeemably lost but may be retrievable via chronicles, learned narrative poetry, or ballads.

The Cid

The protagonist of these two preserved poems is the historical Castilian warrior Rodrigo Díaz, whose history can be accessed cautiously using twelfth century sources plainly favorable to the Cid. The historical protagonist (c. 1043–1099) played an important role during the reign of Alfonso VI (1065–1109), with whom, according to later texts (most of them pro-Cid), he had a turbulent relationship that led to his exile by the king, first in 1081–1086 and later, and for good in 1089. These two exiles, which the pro-Cidian historiography presented in terms of aristocratic invidia and royal anger, consolidated the enmity between the Cid and powerful Castilian Lords like Count García Ordóñez, who became his archrival. In 1094, the Cid conquered for himself the great Moorish kingdom of Valencia, which he was able to maintain against Almoravid attacks. He died in Valencia in 1099 as ruler of the town, having secured profitable marriages for his daughters, Maria and Cristina, who married, respectively, a Navarrese aristocrat and the Count of Barcelona. In 1101, the Cid's widow, the noble Jimena, abandoned Valencia, taking his remains to the monastery of San Pedro de Cardeña, where she was buried in 1113. Historically, Valencia remained in Muslim hands until 1236. In spite of the caution with which the biographical profile should be assessed, it is reasonable to point out that his military heroism is tied to his capacity for arranging good marriages for his daughters, a motif concerning lineage that was exploited in subsequent epic poems.

The most substantial preserved epic, the so-called Cantar (or Poema) de mio Cid, is preserved in a fourteenth century manuscript. It was shaped by French epic models, and 1200 is a reasonable date for the composition of the preserved version, as it fits, politically with a time of stress in medieval Castile after the severe defeat by the Almohads at Alarcos in 1195. The first plot of the poem thematizes freely some of the historical material concerning Rodrigo Díaz's exiles. In the poem, however, there is just one exile (engineered by invidious courtiers) that is ended by the social reintegration of the Cid into Alfonso VI's court and the recuperation of the honra publica (reputation) that was lost by the unjust exile. This rehabilitation rests first on the military prowess of the Cid, ending in the conquest and defense of Valencia; but it rests especially on the progressive enrichment of the protagonist by his individual effort and leadership and his ability to transfer this enrichment to all of his followers. It is important to note, however, that exile and the social reintegration of the Cid is tied to female domesticity as well. Throughout the poem, the hero is presented as an exceptional father and spouse, adding to his moral and military value his remitting respect for the welfare of the family. This is important because the poem depicts explicitly the domestic aspects of the Cid's relation to his wife Jimena (whom he calls muggier ondrada) and his daughters (historically called doña Elvira y doña Sol) with whom an emotional bond is created to manipulate the audience. The poem, however, does not differentiate the characteristics of Jimena or the daughters. The poem emphasizes clearly, although framed by conventional gesture, rituals that pervade all the relationships in the poem, particularly the submission of daughters to father and the harmony between the two spouses; this is based, however, on complete deference toward the Cid on the female side. It was always been said that domesticity opens up the poem to emotional characterization, giving the hero a more humane and mundane perspective, but it is also important to note that it is used to emphasize the social and material conditions of the family's dependence upon the Cid.

The Cid's exile clearly demarcates masculine and feminine spheres. While the first is the space of war and struggle, of male wealth production and distribution, feminine characters live in enclosed spaces, separated from the physical activity of war but receiving and profiting from it. The daughters' value as social currency through which to transform this military prowess and economic accumulation into marriages and lineage is, however, nonexistent at that moment because social reintegration and recuperation of legal fatherhood is necessary to further social advancement.

This domestic dimension of social reintegration into the res publica, is clearly marked by the king, who, in addition to official sanctioning the Cid's rehabilitation in a public ceremony, gives him the possibility of socially advantageous marriages for his daughters to two aristocratic brothers: the Infantes de Carrión, who by their greed, jealousy, and cowardice, are the antithesis of the moral values embodied by the Cid and his band. In spite of the Cid's tepid reaction, which is shared by Jimena, the marriages go ahead, although they are performed in a juridical situation that will make the king responsible for their outcome.

This legal disclaimer on the Cid's part and royal responsibility form the basis of the second plot, that of private honor (honora privada). This second plot unfolds when the Infantes, after having profited materially from the Cid's generosity, decide to take revenge on him by dishonoring his daughters because they have been publicly humiliated at his court for their lack of manhood in war against the Muslims. Thus, in a clearly elaborated scene, the Infantes, while taking the Cid's daughters to their homeland, first have sex with the daughters and then savagely beat them, leaving them in the wilderness for beasts to kill. This scene is reminiscent of female Christian martyrs. This prompts the Cid to turn to royal justice, which decides that honor should be avenged by duels. Once honor has been vindicated, the two daughters marry the princes of Navarre and Aragon, forebears of the kings ruling at the time of the poem's composition. The ahistorical second plot focuses, then, on women as bearers of lineage and markers of masculine honor.

The Cantar de mio Cid, which uses the Cid's military career and his moral representation as an ideal model of military effort, private enrichment, warrior masculine ethos, and monarchical justice, is also didactic in its representation of female characters, who are extolled as passive participants whose role is to be the building block of family harmony and prestige but who must be, at the same time, submissive, dependent, and not individualized. The moral tale is, however, emphasized when female characteristics are transferred unnaturally and monstrously to male characters, like the Infantes, who, in contrast to the Cid and his band, are not meeting their military obligations.

Jimena

Jimena, the beloved wife in the Poema, is completely different in the other Cidia epic preserved, the Mocedades del Cid, dealing with the fantastic deeds of the young Rodrigo Díaz. In this late medieval epic, Jimena is presented in a more active role, as an avenging woman whose father has been killed by a young and arrogant Rodrigo. She demands justice from the king, dissuading her brothers from taking private vengeance on Rodrigo de Vivar. While she displays the same concerns for lineage and marriage presented in Cantar de mio Cid, she is portrayed now as a young, courageous, and determined woman, contrasting starkly with the complacent wife presented in the Poema. Her action is accepted, however, because her wedding prevents an unending cycle of private vengeance.

Other Epics

Women played important roles in other Spanish epics for which evidence is only indirect. These include: Los siete infantes de Lara, Cantar de Fernán González, la Condesa Traidora, el Cantar de Sancho II (in two versions), and el Romanz del Infant Garcia.

Los siete infantes de Lara was possibly the first epic Spanish poem (around 1000). It is a bloody tale of vengeance whose echoes can be heard in the Primera Crónica General (c. 1270). It is a women, Doña Lambra, who is responsible for the clan's catastrophe. According to the chronicle, on the day of her wedding to Roy Blazquez, she publicly made a comment on the virility of her cousin, Alvar Sanchez. This clearly denigrates the masculinity of the Lara family, which is formed, in part, by seven brothers, Roy Blazquez's nephews. This prompts fighting, which is symbolically a contest over masculinity, the assassination of Doña Lambra's cousin, and the intervention of Doña Lambra's husband to defend the honor of his wife. Eventually, this leads to the definitive vengeance of Doña Lambra, who makes her husband betray his own cousins of the Lara Family, killing them all. The cycle of vengeance is closed by the Mudarra, the Infante's half brother, who sets fire to Doña Lambra.

In the case of el Cantar de Sancho II, or Cantar del Cerco de Zamora, women's representation is complicated by the fact that Urraca is the unmarried princess of Zamora. This locates the epic in another realm where, instead of focusing on issues of masculine honor and lineage, it deals with the relation of morality and legality to gender and active female governance. According to the Cronica najerense (mid-twelfth century) and Primery Crónica General (c. 1270), she defended her territory vehemently against the attack of her aggressive brother, The Castilian King Sancho II. This character is interesting, however, because she resists her brother, showing both empowerment and decision. However, at the same time, there are some hints of concupiscence in Urraca, who seems to use her femininity not only to manipulate young Rodrigo Díaz, fighting for his Castilian King, to maintain a dubious love for her brother Alfonso, and, especially, to entice Belldio-Dolfos with sexual promises to betray and kill the Castilian

King. It presents, then, several characteristics that resemble those of Doña Lambra, especially sexual desire and treachery, but the absence of husbands or brothers who would force her into a customary dependent position causes her to adopt masculine characteristics like aggression and the acceptance of political responsibilities. Those disruptive aspects will, however, be attenuated in a later version of this epic, where the emphasis switches to Rodrigo Díaz, and Urraca and her brother Alfonso are not so clearly guilty in the betrayal of their brother.

In conclusion, Castilian epic seems to represent women clearly in two ways. While some texts present strong women, most of them are punished for not being loyal to their lineage, governing duties, and the male hierarchy. Active females are always presented as aggressive, especially those not meeting their biological imperatives, and are almost always several criticized because of their disruption of social networks, which causes catastrophes. In contrast, women who are passive and submissive are extolled as embodying family and social harmony, while presenting at the same time a possibility of social advancement. Overall, the passive women, as found in the Cantar de mio Cid, are not typical of the active females in the rest of the corpus.

OSCAR MARTIN

References and Further Reading

- Amago, Samuel. "Sexual Pollution, Social Legitimacy, and the Economics of Power in the Legend of the Siete Infantes de Lara." Revista de Estudios Hispánicos 36.1 (2002): 3–22.
- Crónica Najerense*. ed. Juan Antonio Estévez Solá. Madrid: Akal, 2003.
- Deyermond, Alan. "Cantar de mio Cid" y la épica medieval española. Barcelona: Sirmio, 1987.
- . Literatura perdida de la Edad Media castellana: catálogo y estudio. Salamanca: Ediciones Universidad de Salamanca, 1995.
- Duggan, Joseph J. Cantar de mio Cid: Poetic Creation in Its Economic and Social Contexts. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989.
- Lacarra, María Eugenia. "Los paradigmas de hombre y de mujer en la literatura epicolegendaria medieval castellana." In Estudios históricos y literarios sobre la mujer medieval. Málaga: Servicio de Publicaciones, Diputación Provincial de Málaga, 1990, pp. 9–34.
- . "La representación de la mujer en algunos textos épicos castellanos." In Actas del II Congreso Internacional de la Asociación Hispánica de Literatura Medieval. 2 vols. Alcalá: Universidad, 1992, pp. 395–408.
- Las Mocedades de Rodrigo: estudios críticos, manuscrito y edición*, edited by Matthew Bailey. London: King's College, Centre for Late Antique & Medieval Studies, 1999.
- Montaner, Alberto. "Las quejas de doña Jimena: Formación y desarrollo de un tema en la épica y en el Romanero." In Actas del II Congreso Internacional de la Asociación Hispánica de Literatura Medieval. 2 vols. Alcalá: Universidad, 1992, pp. 475–508.
- The Poem of mio Cid. A Bilingual Edition with Parallel Text*. translated by Rita Hamilton and Janet Perry, London: Penguin Books, 1975.
- Poema de Fernán González*, edited by Juan Victorio. Madrid: Cátedra, 1981.
- Primera Crónica General. Editada por Ramón Menéndez Pidal; con un estudio actualizador de Diego Catalán*. 2 vols. Madrid: Gredos, 1977.
- Ratcliffe, Marjorie. "Women and Marriage in the Medieval Spanish Epic." Journal of the Rocky Mountain Medieval and Renaissance Association 8 (1987): 1–14.
- . Jimena: A Woman in Spanish Literature. Potomac, Md: Scripta Humanistica, 1992.
- Roncesvalles; étude sur le fragment de cantar de gesta conservé à l'Archivo de Navarra (Pampelune)*, edited by Jules Horrent. Paris: Les Belles Lettres, 1951.
- Sponsler, Lucy A. Women in the Medieval Spanish Epic and Lyric Tradition. Lexington: Kentucky University Press, 1975.
- Victorio, Juan. "La mujer en la épica castellana." In La condición de la mujer en la edad media. Actas del Coloquio celebrado en la Casa de Velázquez, del 5–7 de noviembre de 1984. Madrid: Casa de Velázquez, 1986, pp. 77–84.

See also Epic: Old French; Honor and Reputation; Iberia; Literature, Iberian

ERMENGARD

Ermengard (c. 1129–1196), viscountess of Narbonne, succeeded her father, Viscount Aymeri II, in 1134 when he was killed before the walls of Fraga in Spain. She was only four or five years old at the time. Her two older brothers had died young, and only she and her younger sister, Ermessend, remained. Sometime around 1139, Alphonse Jordan, count of Toulouse, took over Ermengard's city of Narbonne, then one of the major ports of Occitania (now southern France) and he married her in 1142. The marriage provoked a military response from the count's rivals in the region. Defeated, Alphonse was forced to give up both the city and the viscountess. The allies then quickly married her to one of their own allies, Bernard of Anduze. From then on, Ermengard ruled her city by herself. Before she was twenty years old, Ermengard was a full partner in the dynastic diplomacy and conflicts in Occitania.

In Narbonne, Ermengard's palace stood next to the main market square and the old Roman bridge that crossed the Aude River, which carried goods to and from the port at its mouth downstream. She drew a significant portion of her revenues from tolls and market taxes and so was particularly attentive to promoting commerce. She ordered that a new road be built from Narbonne to Roussillon, inland from the old Roman coastal road. She also sent embassies to negotiate commercial and military treaties with Pisa (1164, 1174) and Genoa (1166, 1181).

Ermengard was a patron of major troubadour poets, including Bernart de Ventadorn, Peire d'Alvernhe, Giraut de Bornelh, Azalais de Porcairagues, and Peire Roger. As a result of her connection to the troubadours, Andrew the Chaplain turned her into a judge of an imaginary "court of love."

Ermengard had no children. She adopted her nephew, Pedro de Lara, as her successor. In 1194, Pedro ousted her from the city. She died in exile, April 30, 1196.

FREDRIC L. CHEYETTE

References and Further Reading

Caille, Jacqueline. "Ermengarde, Vicomtesse de Narbonne (1127/29–1196/97): Une grande figure féminine du Midi aristocratique." In La Femme dans l'histoire et la Société méridionales (IXe-XIXe s.). Montpellier: Fédération historique du Languedoc méditerranéen et du Roussillon, 1995, pp. 9–50.

Cheyette, Fredric L. Ermengard of Narbonne and the World of the Troubadours. Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 2001.

See also Noble Women; Occitania; Succession, Royal and Noble; Trobairitz and Troubadours

EROTICISM IN ART

A typical modern understanding of medieval art is that it is almost exclusively prudishly religious and, therefore, relatively free of sexual, erotic imagery. In fact, images of kissing, nudity, and heterosexual and homosexual interactions are not at all uncommon in medieval art, both religious and secular. Ironically, it has perhaps been a modern tendency to separate the sacred and the sexual that has censored this material, but increasingly scholars have begun to engage in the project of unraveling the visual codes of eroticism in the art of the Middle Ages.

The definition of the erotic in medieval art is complex and even contradictory. Certain visual images suggesting the erotic, especially in art that is ostensibly religious in nature, might in fact be interpreted as signifying the spirit rather than the flesh. Much like the often-eroticized language of medieval mystics, scholars have sometimes been at a loss to determine whether such verbal and visual emphasis on the carnal is allegorical or actual, referring to spiritual or sexual experience, or some elision between the two.

The Meanings of Images

A famous debate about the meaning of seemingly sexualized images took place between Caroline

A couple in bed making love, c. 1300–c. 1310. A man embracing a woman in bed. Illustration from a page of French text discussing marriage, from "Le Roman de la Rose" (The Romance of the Rose) by Jean de Meun and Guillaume de Lorris. Eger.881. Folio No: 126.Min. Location: British Library, London. Credit: HIP / Art Resource, NY.

Bynum and Steinberg. According to Leo Steinberg, medieval and Renaissance images emphasizing the genitals of Christ focus on his sexuality as evidence of his full humanity. Bynum suggests instead that modern viewers see breasts and genitals as erotic, but we should not assume that medieval people did. Rather, she believes that medieval viewers would think of Christ's body as connoting nourishment, suffering, and ultimately salvation. Despite their different approaches and conclusions, both Steinberg and Bynum proffer theological explanations and responses for the exposed body of Christ, while scholars such as Karma Lochrie and Robert Mills have opened up the possibilities for sexual and homosexual responses to this kind of imagery. Certainly images such as the isolated and vagina-like side-wounds of Christ, popular in the fourteenth century, might suggest interpretations beyond the theological, especially for a viewer encountering such a sight in the private space of a manuscript. The definition of “erotic,” then, is akin to the definition of pornographic—it is at least in part a matter of position. For whom is it erotic/homoerotic—male or female; artist, patron, or viewer; medieval, modern? And are those categories necessarily at odds with each other?

Some medieval images that are ostensibly religious show encounters that seem suggestive, such as illustrations of the Sponsus and Sponsa from the Song of Songs. The erotic language of the biblical text informs images of these figures kissing or embracing, and the fact that the Bridegroom and the Bride are usually interpreted as Christ and the personified Church, and the Church further identified as the Virgin Mary, lends these images complicated and even incestuous overtones. The question of interpretation remains: are these to be seen solely as symbolic, or are other meanings possible with such freighted imagery?

Nudity

Nudity is much more likely to be found in religious rather than secular imagery in the Middle Ages, but it can be confusingly coded. Adam and Eve are represented nude in their prelapsarian state of innocence; in early medieval images, their bodies are often barely distinguishable. It is only after the Fall that their nakedness becomes shameful. Images of the Last Judgment often explicitly contrast the blessed, fully robed and resplendent in heaven, with the damned writhing in their nakedness, much as they did in the sexual sins that condemned them to hell. But virgin martyrs such as Agatha and Barbara were often represented partially or fully nude; especially in the later Middle Ages they are depicted as the visual embodiments of the ideal women described in love poetry and romances, with their long blond hair, fair complexions, swelling bellies, and high, apple-like breasts. Such images may provoke both religious and erotic responses in viewers, both medieval and modern. In his famous treatise on the art of courtly love, Andreas Capellanus maintained that desire resided in sight, that it was created from the “inborn suffering” produced from looking at the opposite sex. The many images of David gazing on the undraped form of Bathsheba aptly illustrate this idea, and further complicate the gaze of the viewer on undressed female saints.

Explicitness

Paradoxically, it seems that (at least in the later Middle Ages) the most explicit images are found in religious contexts, but they were probably meant to have a didactic message, to be censorious rather than celebratory of eroticism and love. The pairs of same-sex lovers in one of the early-thirteenth-century moralized Bibles appear in conjunction with God’s banishment of Adam and Eve as well as a moralizing text. Sheelanagigs, sculpted images of hag-like female figures squatting and pulling back the lips of their vaginas, inhabit the exterior of many Romanesque churches, especially in the British Isles. Also on church exteriors, pairs of heterosexual and homosexual lovers grimace and grind on corbels. All types of salacious themes are found carved on misericords, underneath choir seats—lovers in baths (probably a reference to prostitution); bare-breasted mermaids and sirens; men exposing their buttocks and genitals; naked women astride animals. What many of these images have in common is that they appear in the margins, outside the frame, “on the edge.” These spaces seem to be areas where the proper order of things is reversed, the world is turned upside down, and the transgressive able to be depicted, perhaps in order to render it powerless, perhaps to harness its power apotropically. Yet some of the most graphic marginal imagery may have other functions; the image of a naked couple seeming either to copulate or engage in oral sex in the top margin of a Book of Hours has been shown by Camille to be a reference to a biblical phrase on the same folio.

Ironically, when couples copulate in secular manuscripts such as romances or even medieval sex manuals, they are usually in bed and covered up. In fact, secular images, especially those associated with courtly love, illustrate direct physical erotic experience but do so in metaphorical terms. The luxury trade in ivory mirrorbacks, combs, and caskets in the fourteenth century produced large numbers of objects with images of heterosexual couples; in reading these images in conjunction with medieval literature such as romances, pastourelles, and fabliaux, where sexual encounters (usually seduction/rapes described from the male point of view) are bawdily if euphemistically recounted, it becomes more clear that the chaplets, roses, falcons, squirrels, swords, chess games, and castle stormings are thinly veiled sexual puns. In part a question of survival, but probably also an impression of importance or even appropriateness, such secular objects are much more rarely the subjects of scholarly study.

MARTHA EASTON

References and Further Reading:

- Bynum, Caroline Walker. "A Reply to Leo Steinberg." Renaissance Quarterly 39(1986): 399–439.
- Camille, Michael. Image on the Edge: The Margins of Medieval Art. Cambridge, Mass: Harvard University Press, 1992.
- . The Medieval Art of Love: Objects and Subjects of Desire. New York: Harry N. Abrams, 1998.
- Caviness, Madeline H. Visualizing Women in the Middle Ages. Sight, Spectacle, and Scopio Economy (The Middle Ages Series). Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001.
- Easton, Martha. "Saint Agatha and the Sanctification of Sexual Violence." Studies in Iconography 16(1994): 83–118.
- Lochrie, Karma. "Mystical Acts, Queer Tendencies." In Constructing Medieval Sexuality, edited by Karma Lochrie, Peggy McCracken, and James A. Schultz. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1997, pp. 180–200.
- Mills, Robert. "Ecco Homo." In Gender and Holiness: Men, Women and Saints in Late Medieval Europe, edited by Samantha J. E. Riches and Sarah Salih. London and New York, Routledge, 2002, pp. 152–173.
- Salih, Sarah. "When is a Bosom Not a Bosom? Problems with 'Erotic Mysticism'." In Medieval Virginites, edited by Anke Bernau, Ruth Evans and Sarah Salih. Toronto and Buffalo: University of Toronto Press, 2003, pp. 14–32.
- Steinberg, Leo. The Sexuality of Christ in Renaissance Art and in Modern Oblivion. 2nd ed. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1995.

See also Art, Representations of Women in; Body, Visual Representations of; Courtly Love; Eve; Fabliau; Gaze; Hagiography, Iconographic Aspects of; Marginalia, Manuscript; Mary, Virgin: in Art; Mermaids and Sirens; Misericords; Obscenity; Pastourelle; Personifications Visualized as Women; Romance de Silence; Romance, English; Romance, French; Romance, German; Sheela Na Gigs; Song of Songs, Medieval Interpretations of; Virgin Martyrs

EROTICISM IN LITERATURE

In Sexuality in Medieval Europe: Doing unto Others, Ruth Mazo Karras observes that modern readers have typically divided medieval sexuality into two tidy but reductive categories: on the one hand, it is marked by a repressive, ascetic religious culture that considers all sexual behavior and the body itself to be malignant and sinful; on the other, it is influenced by a permissive, earthy secular culture that celebrates the body, its appetites, and its excesses. While these images are not entirely incompatible with historical and textual evidence, Karras insists that they tell only a small part of the story. The Middle Ages spans one thousand years of history, a vast geographical area, and an extraordinary array of cultures, subcultures, and belief systems. It should come as no surprise, then, that the Middle Ages also embraces an extremely broad spectrum of attitudes toward sexual desires and acts. Indeed, it is not at all unusual to find a number of different, and apparently discordant, perspectives on sexuality converging within a single period, milieu, author, or text. Moreover, the fact that much of the available evidence is textual and literary belies attempts by critics to generalize a stable, monolithic set of cultural beliefs regarding sexuality. Since only certain segments of the population (principally but not exclusively clerical men) were literate, the textual evidence is inevitably partial and skewed. And given that medieval literature is unusually rhetorical, polysemous, and oblique, it cannot offer an unmediated reflection of social realities. More often than not, the extant sources evince the irreducible complexities of a fully heterogeneous, but not fully knowable, sexual culture.

This entry focuses on a particularly celebrated and richly suggestive body of erotic texts: those that emerged in the Christian West during the High Middle Ages, roughly 1100–1300. These texts do not epitomize medieval eroticism generally; on the contrary, they are in many respects quite exceptional. At the same time, the interpretive and methodological problems they raise could profitably be extended to the study of other medieval sources, cultures, and periods. Those problems include, most notably, the refraction or pluralization of perspective and irresolvable ambiguities of intention, tone, meaning, and desire.

The Age of Ovid

The High Middle Ages has long been thought of as a period of cultural renaissance. This is due in large part to a renewal of interest in Roman erotic literature on the part of both Latin authors (whose audiences were largely ecclesiastical, educated, and male) and vernacular authors (whose audiences were largely aristocratic, illiterate, and mixed-gender). Ludwig Traube refers to this period as an "Age of Ovid," and certainly among the pagan poets known to medieval readers, Ovid's influence was second only to Virgil's. The nature of that influence was extremely broad and multifaceted. Ovidian sources were used in the schools and universities to teach a variety of topics, including grammar, rhetoric, history, mythography, and ethics. Yet it is in the field of poetry and imaginative literature that Ovid's legacy was most deeply felt. Authors as diverse as the troubadours and trobairitz, the Minnesänger, Chrétien de Troyes, Guillaume de Lorris, Jean de Meun, the Carmina Burana poets, Dante, Juan Ruiz, Petrarch, Boccaccio, Machaut, and Chaucer were under the sway of the Roman “preceptor of love.” What these medieval authors have in common is, however, far more than simply a corpus of erotic narratives, symbols, and theories. They also share a profound ambivalence about the psychological, moral, social, and spiritual value of erotic love and a fascination with the shifting nature of sexual desire and textual meaning. Ovid is himself a bundle of contradictions: he teaches the art of love but also advocates its rejection; he is a callous debaucher but also defends lawful marriage; and his writings alternate, sometimes quite abruptly, between obscenity and tenderness. If some medieval authors sought to minimize the equivocalness of Ovid’s poetry, assigning pious or moral glosses to texts that, for a variety of reasons, were considered problematic, others magnified the slipperiness of the source material, exaggerating its ambiguities. Indeed, the erotic literature of the High Middle Ages is nearly always preoccupied with the conflict between the unpredictable force of desire that cannot be mastered and the norms governing sexual conduct. The medieval Ovidian tradition, therefore, should not be categorized as either permissive or repressive. Rather, it deftly negotiates the gap between pleasure and constraint, typically without achieving, or even necessarily seeking out, resolution.

Latin Texts

A particularly telling example of Ovidian ambivalence can be found in Alan of Lille’s Plaint of Nature, a twelfth-century Latin allegory intended for an elite audience of scholars trained in philosophy, theology, and the liberal arts. The theme of the text is the relationship between man and cosmos, nature and ethics; it uses myths drawn from Ovid in order to stigmatize fleshly incontinence and “unnatural” vice, especially homosexuality. The denouement of the text is a formal edict of excommunication in which the priest Genius, speaking on Lady Nature’s behalf, curses those who violate natural law and excludes them from the order of nature. The moral austerity and disciplinary force of Alan’s text should be fairly obvious from this description, and in fact the Plaint was read throughout the medieval period as a tract against sodomy and other carnal sins. However, it would be reductive to describe Alan’s text as purely ascetic, antierotic, and homophobic. On the contrary, the Plaint shifts erratically between moral diatribe and sexual titillation, sometimes going so far as to traduce in practice the very laws it seeks to promulgate in theory. The narrator is drawn to metaphors, puns, and images that render his own sexual desires ambiguous; while Nature and Genius indulge in rhetorical excesses that tend to complicate, or perhaps even invalidate, their moral claims. Some scholars see the playfulness of Alan’s language as part of the text’s disciplinary strategy: the reader is trapped in the poem’s equivocal language and requires clerical mediation in order to achieve moral restoration. Others have argued that the text is so conspicuously at odds with its own moral intentions that it should be read as a diatribe against Ovidian poetry rather than sexual deviance.

Another twelfth-century Latin treatise, Andreas Capellanus’s On Love, offers a similar hodgepodge of incongruous ingredients and exegetical difficulties. The text opens with a preface in which Andreas agrees to teach his disciple Walter about erotic love, and in which he implicitly designates himself as heir to Ovid’s title “preceptor of love.” The text that ensues is indeed a compendium Ovidian love doctrine, filtered through the lenses of scholastic method and a medieval clerical worldview. In Book 1, Andreas defines love, explains how it is acquired, and illustrates his argument with dialogues. Book 2 discusses how love may be preserved and is devoted in large part to erotic casuistry. A third and final book offers what appears to be a palinode to the first two: in an abrupt about-face, Andreas bitterly denounces love and women and exhorts Walter to wed himself instead to the divine Bridegroom in preparation for Judgment Day. Though Andreas’s vision of human sexuality is very different from Alan’s, his work nonetheless shares with the Plaint a common set of intellectual references and a profoundly Ovidian fascination with ambivalence. It is unclear, for instance, whether On Love should be taken as a straightforward rulebook on the courtly love tradition or whether it should be read instead as an ironic or parodic subversion of that tradition. Those readers who favor an ironic reading in turn disagree on the function of irony in the text. Some argue for Andreas’s orthodoxy and privilege the moral decrees of Book 3 over the profane themes and ribald humor of the first two. Others make the reverse claim. Perhaps the most sensitive readers are those who refuse to privilege any one perspective over another. Like Ovid, Andreas does not seek to limit the meaning of erotic love but instead endows it with multiple, discrepant meanings and a seemingly endless capacity for metamorphosis. By complicating his own authorial viewpoint, he allows the reader to glimpse the tensions and dissensions internal to the sexual culture of his time period. If modern critics impose unity on Andreas’s treatise and generalize its love doctrine, it is at the expense of the playfulness of the text, which eschews thematic and stylistic coherence.

Vernacular Texts

Though the vernacular literature of the High Middle Ages was intended for a very different audience, it nonetheless shares with Alan's Plaint and Andreas's On Love a marked tendency toward fragmentation and undecidability. Two examples will have to suffice: romance (idealizing fictions concerned with chivalric valor and courtly love) and the fabliaux (obscene, comic texts that caricature the common folk and their questionable sexual mores). Many critics have argued that romance feeds cultural anxieties about the disruptive effects of the libido and seeks to empower feudal institutions to regulate sexual acts and desires. Romance is particularly fascinated with female adultery and male homosexuality, which it views as directly threatening to patrilineal systems of descent and the political hierarchies and institutions that rest upon them. Other critics have argued, by contrast, that romance incorporates so many different perspectives and addresses itself to so diverse an audience that its cultural and ideological significance cannot be easily defined. It would be reductive, in their view, to read romances simply as cautionary tales illustrating simple lessons about sexual morality and political stability. Indeed, many critics have argued that female characters in romance typically speak on several levels at once, both sustaining and undermining the conventions that govern women's lives. If romance initially appears to instantiate and endorse a repressive sexual ideology, it also works to expose the tensions and fault lines within that ideology. Thus, for instance, the knightly solidarity that is so fundamental to the romance ethos depends upon intimate homosocial bonds that are never fully distinguished from homoerotic desire. Similarly, the chivalric hero must prove his virility by devoting himself to the courtship of an idealized woman; yet in the process he reveals that his value as a man requires his submission to his supposed inferior.

Still greater ambiguities can be found in the fabliaux. Far from being naïve folk tales or artless depictions of medieval popular culture, the fabliaux are instead highly sophisticated, self-reflexive fictions that focus attention on the malleability of discursive meaning and the protean nature of the body qua sign. They are particularly interested in the genitalia, which are described less as anatomical markers of sexual difference than as verbal, metaphorical, and fictional constructs. Typically, the humor of the fabliaux depends upon a misinterpretation of, or slippage within, the genital metaphor, culminating in a repetition of traditional misogynistic themes: women's insatiability, prolixity, treachery, and so on. By linking the genitals to semantic indeterminacy, however, the fabliaux poets also belie certain assumptions about the nature of gender and sexuality. To begin with, if the fabliaux consider gender to be a cultural construct rather than a biological fact, then they must also have understood it to be arbitrary and unstable rather than absolute and universal. Moreover, if gender is fictional, then patriarchy itself must rest upon conventions and fabrications rather than indisputable, natural facts. Finally, the conceit of the fabliaux that the body proliferates alternate meanings suggests that the body's appetites can never be fully controlled. Like Ovid's own poetry, the fabliaux suggest that the body restlessly undermines the limitations placed upon it and limitlessly metamorphoses desire.

Conclusions

What kinds of general conclusions can we draw about medieval eroticism on the basis of the literary evidence described here? To begin with, we can confidently assert (as does Karras) that there simply is no such thing as medieval sexuality. There is only an extraordinarily multifarious set of social, cultural, textual, and literary practices that stubbornly resist facile categorization and univocal meaning. This is not to dismiss the value of typological methods, which are altogether crucial for situating medieval erotic texts within their social, cultural, and historical contexts. Literary critics must always consider material evidence before they begin the work of analysis, including factors such as a text's likely provenance, its manuscript tradition, and its anticipated and actual readership. At the same time, scholars of literature and history alike must never lose sight of the fundamental evasiveness and equivocalness of medieval literary genres and traditions. There is considerable danger in overdetermining medieval texts by assigning to them singular meanings or by considering them as transparent social and cultural documents. Often, medieval literature is itself conscious of the contingency of linguistic and cultural meaning, especially when it comes to the body and sexual pleasure. Though modern readers may initially find the ambivalence and self-reflexivity of medieval texts disconcerting, these should ultimately be considered its greatest assets. Medieval erotic literature encompasses, and casts a critical gaze upon, a multitude of attitudes, beliefs, and norms regarding the body and desire. In the process, it offers the assiduous reader a vantage point from which to glimpse the extraordinary diversity and complexity of human sexual culture.

NOAH GUYNN

References and Further Reading

- Allen, Peter. The Art of Love: Amatory Fiction from Ovid to the "Romance of the Rose." Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1992.
- Baldwin, John W. The Language of Sex: Five Voices from Northern France around 1200. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1994.
- Bloch, R. Howard. Medieval Misogyny and the Invention of Western Romantic Love. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1991.
- Brown, Peter. The Body and Society: Men, Women, and Sexual Renunciation in Early Christianity. New York: Columbia University Press, 1988.
- Brundage, James A. Law, Sex, and Christian Society in Medieval Europe. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1987.
- Bullough, Vern L, and James A. Brundage. Handbook of Medieval Sexuality. New York: Garland, 1996.
- Burger, Glenn, and Steven F. Kruger, eds. Queering the Middle Ages. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 2001.
- Burgwinkle, William. Sodomy, Masculinity, and Law in Medieval Literature: France and England, 1050–1230. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2004.
- Dinshaw, Carolyn. Chaucer's Sexual Poetics. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1989.
- . Getting Medieval: Sexual Communities, Pre- and Post-Modern. Durham: Duke University Press, 1999.
- Fradenburg, Louise and Carla Freccero. Premodern Sexualities. New York: Routledge, 1996.
- Frantzen, Allen J. Before the Closet: Same-Sex Love from Beowulf to Angels in America. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1998.
- Gaunt, Simon. Gender and Genre in Medieval French Literature. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995.
- Guynn, Noah D. Allegory and Sexual Ethics in the High Middle Ages. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2006.
- Holsinger, Bruce. Music, Body, and Desire in Medieval Culture: Hildegard of Bingen to Chaucer. Stanford: Stanford University Press, 2001.
- Karras, Ruth Mazo. Sexuality in Medieval Europe: Doing unto Others. New York: Routledge, 2005.
- Leupin, Alexandre. Barbarolexis: Medieval Writing and Sexuality, translated by Kate M. Cooper. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1989.
- Lochrie, Karma. Heterosyncrasies: Female Sexuality When Normal Wasn't. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 2005.
- Lochrie, Karma, Peggy McCracken, and James A. Schultz, eds. Constructing Medieval Sexuality. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1997.
- Lomperis, Linda and Sarah Stanbury. Feminist Approaches to the Body in Medieval Literature. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1993.
- McCarthy, Conor. Love, Sex, and Marriage in the Middle Ages: A Sourcebook. New York: Routledge, 2004.
- Minnis, Alastair. Magister Amoris: The Roman de la Rose and Vernacular Hermeneutics. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Sautman, Francesca Canadé and Pamela Sheingorn. Same Sex Love and Desire among Women in the Middle Ages. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2001.

See also Arthurian Literature; Audience, Women in the; Boccaccio, Giovanni; Body in Literature and

Religion; Body, Visual Representations of; Chaucer, Geoffrey; Chrétien de Troyes; Christine de Pizan; Courtly Love; Cross-Dressing; Cuckold; Dante Alighieri; Fabliau; Femininity and Masculinity; Feminist Theories and Methodologies; Floire and Blancheflor; Gaze; Gender Ideologies; Gottfried von Strassburg; Guinivere; Isolde; Lovesickness; Minnesang; Misogyny; Mythology, Medieval Reception of; Obscenity; Ovid, Medieval Reception of; Pastourelle; Petrarch; Queer Theory; Roman de la Rose and Its Reception; Romance de Flamenca; Romance de Silence; Romance, English; Romance, French; Romance, German; Romances of Antiquity; Sexuality: Extramarital Sex; Sexuality: Female Same-Sex Relations; Sexuality: Male Same-Sex Relations; Sexuality: Regulation of; Sexuality: Sex in Marriage; Trobairitz and Troubadours; Wife of Bath; Wolfram von Eschenbach; Woman on Top; Women Authors: German Texts; Women Authors: Italian Texts; Women Authors: Latin Texts; Women Authors: Middle English Texts; Women Authors: Old French Texts; Women Authors: Spanish Texts

EUCCHARIST

See Fasting and Food, Religious Aspects of

EUNUCHS

Eunuchs were a feature of Middle Eastern and Asian court and religious life for thousands of years. They appear in Mesopotamian texts from 2000 BCE, in Egyptian texts from 1300 BCE, and in Chinese texts from 1100 BCE. The practice of having eunuchs was continued by Persian, Hellenistic, Roman, Byzantine, and Muslim rulers. In the Byzantine Empire eunuchs were important participants in the life of the church and the imperial court. Practices involving eunuchs spread from Byzantium to southern Italy, Sicily, and North Africa. They existed in most Muslim courts. Even as of 2006, the last of the eunuch tomb guards at the tomb of the Prophet Muhammad are dying.

Eunuch is a very broad term. In the Byzantine world (325 CE to 1453 CE) it could refer to a man who was celibate; a man whose genitals were deformed, making procreation impossible; or a man whose genitals accidentally or intentionally were mutilated in infancy, childhood, or after puberty. The term eunuch, therefore, refers to a man's reproductive capacity, not to any particular kind of mutilation.

In Byzantium eunuchs were castrated by crushing or tying off the testicles or through a surgical procedure that removed the testicles from the scrotal sac. The latter was believed to be the safer procedure. Total removal of the genitals was not practiced in Byzantium.

In ancient societies adult men were castrated as an act of sexual dominance, usually in connection with warfare or as a punishment. Prepubescent boys and young children were castrated for very different reasons. Servile boys who were especially attractive were castrated to preserve their youthful appearance, which some men found sexually attractive. As these castrated boys matured they did not go through normal puberty. Lacking testosterone they did not grow beards and their facial features and skin retained a feminine delicacy. Their faces developed a characteristic triangular shape and their bodies elongated. The result was a tall, slender individual who was lightly boned, lacked muscular development, had fat deposits distributed in a feminine pattern, and retained a high-pitched voice. He did not lose his hair to baldness as he aged, but did suffer from early and severe osteoporosis. In late antiquity eunuchs were often associated with sexual sin.

During the Byzantine period, while young men were still castrated for the reasons stated previously, and their appearance was believed to bring elegance to the court, eunuchs began to be perceived in other ways. Drawing on very old traditions that presented boys, and therefore eunuchs, as magical, liminal individuals who served as priests or elite servants, the status of eunuchs improved. Since eunuchs were not sexually active, they were assumed to have intellectual powers superior to those of other men. Since they did not marry and establish families, it was assumed that they would be unfailingly loyal to their masters or patrons. The etymology of the term eunuch illustrates this change. Although it comes from the Greek word εὐνή, which means bed chamber, in the Byzantine world it was assumed to come from εὐνοοσ or “well-minded.”

By the ninth century, eunuchs were major figures in both the Byzantine court and the Orthodox Church. As the elaboration of the imperial bureaucracy distanced the emperor from his subjects, he increasingly depended on his staff of eunuchs both to protect him from outsiders and to act as a liaison to those outside the imperial circle. The eunuchs of the court controlled the palace doors, the imperial regalia, palace protocol, and the imperial audiences. They stage-managed imperial milestones: births, marriages, and deaths. Because they were competent and trusted servants they often commanded armies and acted as imperial envoys. By the tenth century the emperor's chief eunuch was usually the most powerful bureaucrat in the empire.

Eunuchs' relationships with the church were complex. On the one hand the church was suspicious of eunuchs because of their early connection to sexual sin. It considered that their condition was “unnatural,” a violation of the integrity of the male body. On the other hand the church admired the eunuch's celibacy and saw it as a requirement for fulfilling perfect service to God. In Byzantine art and literature eunuchs are regularly mistaken for angels and vice versa. They are seen to share a number of attributes: liminality, asexuality, a boyish appearance, and lives dedicated to service.

Despite the importance of eunuchs in Byzantine society, castration was officially frowned upon. Late Roman and Byzantine legal codes repeat earlier Roman injunctions against castration. Under the civil code those who practiced or arranged for castrations were to be punished with death, confiscation, exile, or fines. It was permissible, however, to buy a eunuch who had been castrated by barbarians outside the boundaries of the empire. Ecclesiastical law echoes these regulations, though it does allow an individual who has been castrated by others against his will to become a priest. By the ninth century there are signs that men were ignoring this legislation. Since Roman law allowed castration for medical reasons, a remarkable number of young eunuchs seem to have been castrated because they suffered from hernias. Sources talk about parents arranging for a son's castration so that he could attain a job at the palace or a career in the church.

In both church and state, eunuchs were perceived to be guardians of women and children. They were personal servants, advisors, tutors, and companions. When a holy woman needed to find an appropriate place to set up as an urban hermit in the city of Constantinople, her faithful eunuch examined available real estate on her behalf. When an emperor wished to marry, a delegation of eunuchs looked over appropriate women on his behalf. If the supply of eunuchs in the palace began to decline a senior eunuch went looking for bright young men who might be willing to be castrated and join the corps.

Modern scholars ask whether eunuchs were a third sex. Except in the worst of the pejorative literature about eunuchs, the language associated with them treats them as men. In terms of modern biological categories they were men, but surgically altered men who had been acculturated into modes of self-presentation and behavior that the Byzantine world associated with women. They were beardless, had soft, smooth skin, luxuriant hair, high-pitched voices, and somewhat feminized bodies. They were perceived to be emotionally unstable, unable to control their desire for food, drink, money, and power. They were charged with being ambiguous, with resembling magicians, and with constantly changing the face they presented to society. Eunuchs, therefore, were perceived as a distinct kind of man that had unique abilities and culturally determined feminine characteristics. In other words they constituted a distinct gender that was neither male nor female but was gendered as something else.

KATHRYN M. RINGROSE

References and Further Reading

- Asher-Greve, Julia M. "Mesopotamian Conceptions of the Gendered Body." In Gender and the Body in the Ancient Mediterranean, edited by Maria Wyke, Oxford: Blackwell, 1998, pp. 8–37.
- Ayalon, David. Eunuchs, Caliphs and Sultans. Jerusalem: Magnes Press, 1999.
- Baldwin, Barry. Studies in Late Roman and Byzantine History, Literature and Language. Amsterdam: Blackwell, 1984.
- Boulhol, Pascal, and Isabelle Cochelin. "La réhabilitation de l'eunuque dans l'hagiographie (IIe - VIe siècles)." In Memoriam sanctorum venerantes: Miscellanea in onore de Monsignor Victor Saxer, Vatican: Citia del Vaticano, 1992, pp. 49–73.
- Brower, Gary. "Ambivalent Bodies: Making Christian Eunuchs." Ph.D. diss., Duke University, 1996.
- Gleason, Maud W. Making Men: Sophists and Self-Presentation in Ancient Rome. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1995.
- Hopkins, M. Keith. Conquerors and Slaves. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1978.
- Kuefler, Mathew S. The Manly Eunuch: Masculinity, Gender Ambiguity, and Christian Ideology in Late Antiquity. Chicago: Chicago University Press, 2001.
- Marmon, Shaun E. Eunuchs and Sacred Boundaries in Islamic Society. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1995.
- Ringrose, Kathryn M. The Perfect Servant: Eunuchs and the Social Construction of Gender in Byzantium. Chicago: Chicago University Press, 2003.
- Roller, Lynn E. "The Ideology of the Eunuch Priest." In Gender and the Body in the Ancient Mediterranean, edited by Maria Wyke, Oxford: J. C. Gieben, 1998, pp. 118–135.
- Tougher, Shaun F. "Byantine Eunuchs: An Overview, with Special Reference to their Creation and Origin." In Women, Men and Eunuchs: Gender in Byzantium, edited by Liz James, London: Routledge, 1997, pp. 168–184.

See also Empresses, Byzantine; Femininity and Masculinity; Gender Ideology; Sexuality, Regulation of

EVANGILES DES QUENOUILLES

The Evangelies des Quenouilles (Gospel of Distaffs) is a compilation of folk wisdom produced in the Burgundian lands of French-speaking Flanders between 1466 and 1474. The earlier, "primitive" version, a listing of 152 "gospels," or beliefs, divided into three parts, is attributed in the manuscript to three otherwise-unknown authors, maistre Fouquart de Cambray, maistre Anthoine du Val, and Jehan d'Arras dit Caron. The later version, a major reworking that expands the number of beliefs to approximately 230 divided into six evenings, is anonymous. The text presents the familiar problematic of the mediation of popular or women's oral culture through clerical written culture, a dynamic consciously staged by the text's narrative framing: it is presented as the record made by a male secretary of the utterances of women who gather to spin and exchange wisdom during the long winter evenings between Christmas and Candlemas. The later version adapts the Boccaccian form of a series of "days" or, more properly, evenings, each presided over by one of six "présidentes" who deliver their "gospels," to which other participants offer glosses in a model clearly derived from clerical lectio. The "truths" provide a feminine perspective on such concerns as love, marriage, sexuality, child-bearing, health, healing, and prosperity, including the relationship to both the natural and supernatural world. The narrativization made possible by the frame, the imitation of biblical and scholastic models, and the choice of the participants' names and "professions" (prostitution, divination, etc.) belie the ironic and misogynist intentions of the clerical compilers, who destined the work for a reading public fascinated by popular customs and beliefs. The large place accorded to "superstitious" practices (charms, interpretation of signs and dreams) including beliefs related to sorcery may partly explain the elaborate framing with its attendant distancing. The work was quite popular, surviving in two manuscripts; eleven early printings, including six before 1500; translations into English, Dutch, and German; and a verse adaptation into the Gascon dialect.

References and Further Reading

- Les Evangiles des Quenouilles*, edited by Madeleine Jeay. Paris: J. Vrin, 1985.
- Gates, Laura Doyle. "Distaff and Pen: Producing the Evangelies de Quenouilles." Neophilologus 81, 1 (1997): 13–20.
- Jeay, Madeleine. Savoir-faire: Une analyse des croyances des "Evangelies des Quenouilles" (XV<sup>e</sup> siècle). Le Moyen Français 10. Montreal: CERES, 1982.
- Paupert, Anne. Les Fileuses et le clerc: Une étude des Evangelies des Quenouilles. Paris-Genève: Champion-Slatkine, 1990.

See also Literature, French; Voice, Female: in Literature

EVE

The figure of Eve, from the book of Genesis, was central in shaping Western attitudes toward women from the earliest days of Christianity. The North African theologian Tertullian asked Christian women of the late second century, "Do you not know that every one of you is an Eve?" Tertullian viewed Eve as a paradigm for all women; and according to the Genesis account, Eve had been responsible for the original fall of the human race into sin. Disobedient to God, Eve was tempted by the serpent to eat the fruit of the Tree of the Knowledge of Good and Evil. She then encouraged her husband, Adam, to join her in sinning. A few Gnostic groups in the second century interpreted Eve's actions more positively, seeing in her a powerful symbol of spiritual wisdom, but it was the negative orthodox Christian evaluation of Eve that triumphed and colored all subsequent discussions of the Genesis text and of women themselves.

In early Christian scripture, Eve emerged as the symbol of all who allow themselves to be deceived by evil (2 Cor. 11:3) and as the prime justification for refusing to allow women to instruct men in the Church (1 Tim. 2:12–14). In the second century, several themes soon emerged that were destined to become permanent fixtures in the structure of Christian theology. The most significant is that, as in Tertullian's indictment, Eve became the model for understanding all women as persons whose nature makes them likely to tempt others to sin. Second, Genesis describes Eve as being created after Adam; this will be used to prove the secondary and subordinate status of women to men, even before Eve's sin. Third, for Christian writers inclined to argue the value of celibacy over marriage, Eve came to represent the lure of the body and sexuality drawing Christians away from a single-minded service of God and entangling them instead in the coils of lust and worldly concerns. The work of St. Augustine of Hippo (354–430) only heightened this perspective. Crucial for determining the direction of theology in the Middle Ages, Augustine argued that sexual desire is itself a punishment for original sin and that all sexual intercourse, tainted by uncontrollable desire, is at least venially sinful. Furthermore, he held such sexual desire responsible for passing on the stain of original sin to future generations. Eve, and thus all women, became symbols of a body and sexuality no longer under rational control, inescapably inciting men to desire participation in the foremost effect of the Fall itself. Finally, and perhaps more positively, Eve was also portrayed as the precursor of Mary, the Second Eve, whose obedience to God resulted in the Incarnation and the eventual overthrow of the very serpent who had tempted her predecessor.

Throughout the medieval centuries, Eve remained central to discussions of women and of humanity in general. The rediscovery of Aristotle's work in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries allowed theologians to add a "biological" explanation for the supposed inferiority of Eve and of all women, due to his belief that women are deformed males. Nature intends to create a male; but something frustrates the natural development and a female is produced instead. While theologians like St. Thomas Aquinas stopped short of seeing women as inherently more biologically defective than men, late medieval witch hunters Heinrich Kramer and Jacob Sprenger carried the physical debility of Eve to an extreme. They asserted in the Malleus maleficarum (The Hammer of Witches), that Eve was naturally prone to sin because she was created from a "bent rib" of Adam, an assertion that calls into question even the creative technique of God.

In medieval artwork, Eve was often depicted naked, suggesting both the innocence of the original creation but also Eve's role as a symbol of the carnal. The association with lust is especially obvious when a naked Eve is contrasted with a fully clothed Virgin Mary, supreme symbol of sexual purity.

Medieval writers, particularly women, could nevertheless discuss Eve in creative and positive ways. Margaret Miles argues that Hildegard of Bingen portrays Eve as an expression of Adam's love, stressing the interdependence of men and women in God's plan. Eve, formed from Adam's body, in turn produces "Man" in her offspring. Also, Caroline Walker Bynum shows that both Hildegard and St. Catherine of Siena equate Eve, and therefore women, with humanity and body because Eve was made solely of Adam's flesh rather than the dust of the ground. This led to a connection between the female flesh of Mary, the second Eve, and the body of Christ formed in her womb, making it possible to assert that female flesh was crucified for the sins of humanity. In his Passion sermon, fifteenth-century theologian Jean Gerson depicts the Virgin Mary at the cross, asserting that the fleshly unity between herself and Jesus enables her to suffer with him and "buy back" the sin of Eve.

The Western tradition has most often seen in Eve a means for arguing the inferiority of women. Nevertheless, for some medieval writers, Eve could stand as a symbol of a human nature fallen but recreated in the common humanity of Mary and Jesus.

DONNA SPIVEY ELLINGTON

References and Further Reading

- Allen, Prudence, R. S. M. The Concept of Woman: The Aristotelian Revolution, 750 B.C.–A.D. 1250. Grand Rapids, Mich.: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1985.
- Bynum, Caroline Walker. Holy Feast and Holy Fast: The Religious Significance of Food to Medieval Women. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1987.

- Dronke, Peter. Women Writers of the Middle Ages: A Critical Study of Texts from Perpetua to Marguerite Porete. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1984.
- Horowitz, Maryanne Cline. "The Image of God in Man: Is Woman Included?" Harvard Theological Review 72 (1979): 175–206.
- Miles, Margaret R. Carnal Knowing: Female Nakedness and Religious Meaning in the Christian West. Boston: Beacon Press, 1989.
- Newman, Barbara. Sister of Wisdom: St. Hildegard's Theology of the Feminine. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1987.
- Pagels, Elaine. Adam, Eve, and the Serpent. New York: Vintage Books, 1989.

See also Aristotelian Concepts of Women and Gender; Augustine, Influence of; Bible, Women in; Body in Literature and Religion; Body, Visual Representations of; Catherine of Siena; Gender in Art; Gerson, Jean; Hildegard of Bingen; Mary, Virgin; Mary, Virgin: in Art; Mary, Virgin: in Literature; Mary, Virgin: in Music; Sexuality, Regulation of

EXEMPLUM

While the word exemplum (plural exempla) can simply mean "example," in many medieval contexts it designates a short narrative used to illustrate or reinforce a point, often in a sermon. In Greek and Roman rhetoric, an account of notable figures or events might be used to convey the value of a quality such as chastity or good governance, and such narratives often reappear in medieval texts that offer advice to princes. The parables told by Jesus in the New Testament surely contributed to the development of the medieval sermon exemplum, although they differ from it in presenting imaginary, rather than (supposedly) historical events. And early Christian preaching recognized the usefulness of exempla; Pope Gregory I (d. 604), for instance, comments that examples are often more moving than mere words of instruction, and monastic preaching of the eleventh and twelfth centuries turned increasingly to such narratives as one of the sermon's modes of persuasion.

It was not until the preaching revival of the late twelfth and thirteenth centuries, however, that the term exemplum came into widespread use in preaching theory and sermons, and this is the main context in which the genre is studied today. In the period following the Gregorian Reform, the ecclesiastical establishment increasingly recognized a need to improve and expand preaching activity to ensure that the Church's message reached the laity more effectively. One form that endeavored to do so was the sermon ad status, a sermon directed toward a particular professional or social group—although while men were usually grouped by profession, secular women were often addressed as a single group, or according to marital status as wives or widows. The earliest surviving Latin collection of ad status sermons, the Sermo generalis of Honorius Augustodunensis, a prolific religious author of the first half of the twelfth century, provides brief addresses to priests, merchants, and married people, among others. Honorius ends each of his eight model sermons with a brief narrative about a representative of the group in question; a sermon to farmers concludes with the tale of a woman who, granted a vision of the eternal fates of her quiet, hard-working, long-suffering father (enjoying the fruits of heaven) and her garrulous, lustful, spendthrift mother (tormented in hell by demons and serpents), thereafter lives a life of steadfast virtue. As this suggests, exempla in sermons did not necessarily involve characters who were members of the group being addressed; exempla about women appear in sermons to men, and vice versa, although the desire to make an example compelling for the audience did mean that sermons to women were somewhat more likely to involve female characters. Exempla may draw on anything from biblical or classical stories, to folklore, to daily life for their subjects, but in many cases the depiction of recognizable, contemporary situations and characters (however fictional) lay at the heart of the medieval exemplum's authority.

Later preachers similarly emphasized the value of exempla; the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries were the period of the greatest diffusion of the form. The priest, canon, and later bishop James of Vitry (d. 1240), one of the most famous preachers of the early thirteenth century, made extensive use of illustrative stories, arguing that they were particularly useful for teaching laypeople, for whom narrative is more appealing and comprehensible than doctrine. It is important to note that examples appear in sermons and other works directed to monks and priests, as well as those directed to the laity or to nuns (who were often grouped with the "unlearned"), but exempla were nonetheless strongly associated with lay or uneducated audiences. The tales were seen as, above all, valuable for pastoral work, a quality that made them attractive to the preachers of the Franciscan and Dominican orders, which had been created in part to respond to the demand for more and better preaching to laypeople. Exempla became so characteristic of their sermons that the orders were criticized for their use of "vain fables" at the expense of more serious matter, reflecting a longstanding concern about the appropriateness of narrative in sermons.

Scholars have recently debated whether the exemplum tends primarily to separate preacher and audience or to associate them. Collections of exempla for preachers' use were transmitted in Latin manuscripts that would have been inaccessible to most laypeople, and theoretical discussions of such tales often stress their appeal to simplicity and unlearnedness, emphasizing the distinction between preacher and audience. On the other hand, the preacher's acknowledged need to gain his hearers' attention and inspire their belief led him to participate in a narrative form that was popular across social groupings, drawing him to some degree into his audience's world.

The breadth of the exemplum's appeal for medieval audiences can be seen in its literary manifestations beyond the preaching tradition. The "classical" or "public" exemplum was widely used throughout the later Middle Ages, and while sermon exempla as they survive in written form are generally quite brief, offering a narrative kernel rather than a full-fledged story, medieval authors not infrequently borrowed these brief tales and elaborated on them. The tale of Griselda, which was told by Petrarch, Boccaccio, and Chaucer, is essentially an exemplum illustrating the virtues of patience and obedience. In such contexts, however, the exemplary story (like the fables and fabliaux that often resemble it) gains a new independence, standing on its own rather than acting as a support for a larger point, and in this regard is a distinctly different phenomenon than the sermon exemplum.

CLAIRE WATERS

References and Further Reading

- Bremond, Claude, Jacque Le Goff, and J.-C. Schmitt. L'Exemplum. Typologie des sources du moyen âge 40. Turnhout: Brepols, 1982.
- Crane, Thomas Frederick. The Exempla or Illustrative Stories from the Sermones Vulgares of Jacques de Vitry. London: David Nutt for the Folk-Lore Society, 1890.
- Mosher, Joseph A. The Exemplum in the Early Religious and Didactic Literature of England. New York: Columbia University Press, 1911.
- Owst, G. R. Preaching in Medieval England: An Introduction to the Sermon Manuscripts of the Period c. 1350–1450. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1926.
- Scanlon, Larry. Narrative, Authority, and Power: The Medieval Exemplum and the Chaucerian Tradition. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994.

See also Boccaccio, Giovanni; Chaucer, Geoffrey; Dominican Order; Fabliau; Griselda Petrarch; Sermons and Preaching; Spiritual Care

F

---

FABLIAU

The fabliaux are a corpus of some 150 short French narratives, dating roughly from 1200 to 1340; the majority are anonymous, though some are by authors who identify themselves and who are in some cases known and respected for other compositions. In addition, several of Chaucer's Canterbury Tales (e.g., The Miller's Tale) are often designated fabliaux. The classic definition of fabliaux is that of Joseph Bédier, who in 1894 termed them contes à rire en vers ("comic tales in verse"). The definition has proved durable even though it is not entirely accurate, in that a number of texts commonly accepted as fabliaux are, in their apparent intent, more moralizing than humorous. Nonetheless, the majority of them are designed primarily for entertainment in some form, even though a good many conclude with morals; one of the common ones is "he who believes a woman is a fool." The morals sometimes follow logically from the tale but just as often seem to be a mere convention with little or no discernable connection with the events of the story.

The majority of the fabliaux deal with erotic subjects, often involving a triangle (a married couple and a third person, frequently a priest), a man who attempts to seduce a woman (married or not), or a woman whose wiles are directed against her husband or a suitor. In other instances, the point of the story is an account of legitimate revenge or even a simple joke or ruse; but sexual themes predominate.

Noting that female sexuality was often considered the "work of the devil," Levy has analyzed some of the more extreme and explicit reflections of that thinking in the fabliaux; but, like almost all commentators, he concludes that fabliau antifeminism was ambivalent and was in general less extreme than many other medieval condemnations of women. Lorcin contends that the fabliaux were no more antifeminist than other medieval genres, and Ménard actually describes the genre's misogyny as "a minor motif."

Those views tend to reduce the subject to a catalogue of female attributes or actions, demonstrating women's devious ways or their voracious sexual appetites but often failing to take into account the narrative function of those characteristics within the boundaries of works intended for amusement.

In regard to women's roles, two examples will illustrate the extremes of the genre. The Castrated Lady concerns a woman who, following her mother's precepts and practice, contradicts her new husband repeatedly. As a lesson in proper wifely comportment, the husband diagnoses the mother as having testicles; he viciously slices the woman's thighs and appears to remove the offending items—actually palmed bull testicles—that accounted for her presumption. Through the violence and the threat of its repetition, the wife learns her lesson, and the narrator appears to approve heartily. Near the other end of the fabliau spectrum stands Berenger Long-Ass, in which a wife resorts to deception—without narratorial censure—to correct the flaws of her equally deceptive but also shamefully cowardly and pretentious husband. In other fabliaux we find the full range of female behaviors, from simple and naïve women to devious ones, from victims to strong and powerful women, from those who are offended by sexual advances to a great many who initiate such advances and relish carnal pleasures.

Feminist criticism of the fabliaux has proceeded very fitfully, with most commentary on the misogyny of the genre merely echoing the judgments previously cited. However, Anne Ladd responded, as long ago as 1976, to these problems by asking, "What kind of antifeminism is it that in over fifty percent of male-female conflicts shows the woman winning?" Quoting Ladd's question, Lesley Johnson points out that "winning women of the fabliaux are above all cunning and high-spirited (rather than adulterous and deceitful)." It is certainly true that for every evil woman in the fabliaux, there is one who is either virtuous or victimized. More important, for every woman who is devious or conniving, there is a man who is brutish or brutal. Generally speaking, feminine cupidity is matched by masculine stupidity. Yet, it is unarguably the case that some narrators, in asides or major digressions or in morals, hold women in exceedingly low esteem and consider them collectively responsible for many of the travails of men and of society. All in all, the question of antifeminism in the fabliaux is far less straightforward than it has sometimes been made to appear, and further consideration of that subject, within the context of gender studies, is a clear desideratum.

NORRIS J. LACY

References and Further Reading

- Fries, Maureen. "Feminae Populi: Popular Images of Women in Medieval Literature." Journal of Popular Culture 14.1 (1980): 79–86.
- Johnson, Lesley. "Women on Top: Antifeminism in the Fabliaux?" Modern Language Review 78.2 (1983): 298–307.
- Lacy, Norris J. "Women in the Fabliaux." Chap. 5 of Reading Fabliaux. New York: Garland, 1993, pp. 60–77.
- Ladd, Anne. "Classifications of the Fabliaux by Plot Structure." In Proceedings of the International Colloquium held at the University of Glasgow on the Beast Epic, Fable and Fabliau, edited by Kenneth Varty. Glasgow: privately printed by Kenneth Varty, 1976. pp. 92–107.
- Levy, Brian J. Patterns and Images in the Old French Fabliaux. Amsterdam and Atlanta: Rodopi, 2000.
- Lorcin, Marie-Thérèse. Façons de sentir et de penser: les fabliaux français. Paris: Champion, 1979.
- Ménard, Philippe. Les Fabliaux: contes à rire du moyen âge. Paris: PUF, 1983.

See also Eroticism in Literature; Literature, Old French; Misogyny; Sexuality

FAMILY (EARLIER MIDDLE AGES)

Any discussion of family, as wider kin group or small nuclear unit, in the earlier Middle Ages inevitably needs to start with considerations of language and vocabulary. This is because the Latin word familia that looks at first sight to mean family as we understand the term meant something quite different. The Latin word familia meant household and comprised all those living together as one economic and social unit: parents and children together with servants. Neither Latin nor the Romance languages have a word for the small nuclear unit (parents and children) that in the Germanic languages is called Gesinnde (German) or Gezin (Dutch). The absence of such a specific word in the Latinate world, however, does not mean that nuclear families did not exist. On the contrary they occur frequently in the sources: saints' Lives, miracle stories or chronicles, as well as in documents such as estate surveys of large monasteries, or legal texts, where we can reconstruct them on the basis of references to "father," "mother," and "children." Archaeological excavations, too, suggest that the nuclear unit of parents and children lived normally under one roof. The family as a larger unit of the kin group, in Latin cognatio, linea, or generatio, consisted of the relatives of any individual on father's (agnatic) and the mother's (cognatic) side. The extent to which the small family group interacted with the cousins of various degrees on both sides in any time was very fluid depending entirely on status, wealth, and geographical location.

Technical Vocabulary

Central to the scholarly discussion on the relationship between the family as household and (wider) kin group is the interpretation of technical vocabulary (Latin fara, or Irish fine) for the kin group in the period before 1000. Everyone agrees that the vocabulary denotes large groups bound by kinship, usually going back to a shared ancestor and also usually at any one time headed by one person who seemed to have exercised some authority over the group. Such groups, too, were reasonably fluctuating in whom they embraced. The crucial question is to what extent the individual members in such groups recognized a sort of membership in practice and how in reality they enacted their individual responsibility towards others in such a group. Furthermore, the extent to which the smaller family units within them were linked to each other in a micro-organization with firm social and legal rules is very hard to identify. Heavily influenced by social and anthropological research on contemporary traditional societies in Africa and South America modern historians did at one time consider them as large clans. More recently, medievalists following Herlihy (himself influenced by Goody) and Bouchard have shifted their opinion significantly away from this view based primarily on reading of legal codes that present a normative picture of responsibilities and social bonds linking cousins across generations and horizontal degrees of blood relationship that are hard to verify in the sources. An obligation to help pay for the legal defense of one's cousin, for example stipulated in the Salian Laws or to pay wergeld, a fine, to exonerate a blood relation who had committed a crime in Anglo-Saxon law, should not be interpreted in the sense that all cousins are responsible every time to pay such fines under all circumstances, nor that such norms signify actual and frequent contact between all members of the same kin. Surely, such rules were meant as guidelines that in emergencies some members of the kin might come to the help of their relative if this was practical. Therefore, theoretical rules as set out in legal codes are no blueprint for our reconstruction as to the historical reality of living or working arrangements binding all these individuals together in more than relatively loose terms. Meshing the information from legal sources with their emphasis on kinship and legal obligation with practical information about daily reality is difficult. The detailed evidence from the Saint-Germain polypych, a Frankish estate survey from c. 844, is revealing. The majority of the 1,412 households consisted of only two generations (parents and children); among the 3,470 women only twenty-six were grandmothers. Of the households just under half were headed by people of the same generation (brothers, or brother and sister). So, for all the startling evidence of multiheaded households and relative absence of grandparents, the lack of information about the kinship between any of the households makes it impossible to test the evidence from the Salian Laws on one Frankish community of Saint Germain for which we have details on households.

Degrees of Kinship

How did early medieval people describe their family relationships and what structures did they recognize? The vocabulary used for the description of family bonds dates from the Roman period. The Romans took the individual as its center and counted back to a common ancestor, then forward to the targeted relative. The number of people touched, minus one, constituted the degrees of kinship. Thus the father and mother of the self were related to the self in the first degree, the self's sister or brother in the second degree, and a first cousin in the fourth degree. Through the church the early medieval people stuck to counting as belonging to the cognatio any one related within seven degrees. This changed from the ninth century when the church stipulated that consanguinity ended at four degrees. As part of the Reform movement in the mid-eleventh century the seven degree rule was reintroduced before it was finally abolished as unworkable at the Fourth Lateran council of 1204. What is crucial to understand is that any individual's family in the wider sense, beyond the immediate circle of parents and siblings, is a group that consists of people chosen or recognized by that individual as active kin. The Bouchard school would say that a medieval person would construct his wider family group, in particular depending on lines of inheritance. Dhuoda, a ninth-century Frankish noble woman, exhorted her sixteen-year-old son William to remember specific relatives on his father's side, with all of whom he had to collaborate in one way or another in order to keep the family lands intact. This does not mean that he did not have other paternal kin besides the ones mentioned by Dhuoda, but we do not know about them, presumably because they were less important. The example also demonstrates that it was Dhuoda's, and, through her, William's choice that determined her, and his, conception of one part of their family at one particular moment in time. The spotlight nature of our sources should always be borne in mind when we try to reconstruct medieval families in the wider sense. Moreover, for modern scholars interpreting snippets of detailed family history, such as given by Dhuoda, in conjunction with more abstract legal obligations within kin groups as set out in Frankish (and for that matter Old English, Irish, or Norman) law codes, it is a challenge that remains one of our most difficult tasks.

Marriage Ties

Another important aspect concerning early medieval families, nuclear and wider, is the blood relationship resulting from multiple marriages or other unions such as concubinage. Given the relatively high incidence of women's death in childbirth and the demise of men as a result of accident or fighting, remarriage was common and nuclear units comprized then, as now, stepparents and stepchildren. Half siblings were even more competitive rivals for any share of an inheritance than full siblings. Examples of this are rife from the chronicle accounts of aristocratic families ranging from important imperial/royal lines to small provincial ones. The troubled history of the Carolingian family, descendants of Charlemagne (d. 814) and his wives and concubines, of which he had at least nine, is the most notorious. Four generations of descendants fought over ever-changing portions of the vast realm conquered by Charlemagne.

FAMILY (EARLIER MIDDLE AGES)

Fosterage

Other categories of alternative kin group structures were the result of fostering, very common in Scandinavian and Irish societies and a particularly prominent theme in their respective sagas and law codes (problematic sources in themselves because so many date from manuscripts of the later Middle Ages). A slightly different type was temporary fostering for a variety of purposes, especially among the aristocracy. Young boys received a military education in different households sometimes of a neighbor, sometimes of a cousin or godparent (Simon of Vexin [d. 1088] was brought up at the Norman court of his godmother Matilda, married to William the Conqueror), or they spent time elsewhere as a hostage (Dhuoda's son William at Charles the Bald's court). Girls were sent to live with their prospective in-laws so that from as early as eight or nine years old they would be embedded in their new family to take on its customs and language in order in turn to pass them on to their children. Empress Matilda was eight when she left England for Germany in 1110.

Family Consciousness

And how did people see their family and how did they construct a family consciousness? If we accept that from the early Middle Ages family groups could develop along patrilinear and matrilinear lines and that combinations of the two, depending on the view of the individual who constructed the family, always existed, what tool existed to express the family bond? From the Merovingian period, that is, the late sixth century onwards there exist rudimentary genealogical tracts, descent lines, of families. They would either be written as biblical accounts of "X begat Y, who begat Z," or they would center on the individual who recounted his or her ancestors starting with parents and grandparents. Another form of large groupings of names, usually of individuals related to each other by blood, appears in commemoration books designed to memorialize the souls of those mentioned. From c. 900 onward genealogical tracts become available, usually written in monasteries, to record the gifts over several generations of a particular family. In those cases, however, as in Dhuoda's, we must remember that the actual blood relation group on biological grounds would always be larger than the group recorded in sources. Thus narrowing of groups for practical or inheritance reasons always presents the family as an artificially constructed group.

One of the most intractable problems faced by historians of the family, whether in the wider or more constricted sense, is the role of the church in the creation of the records on which we now rely. With the growing importance of the church as the overarching administrative organization before c. 1000, we shall never know to what extent idealized normative images of the family were being constructed. The fact that, according to ecclesiastical authorities, it was considered unlawful to marry a goddaughter or a stepmother does not mean that in practice people did abstain from such action. For, surely, the existence of legislation of this kind suggests strongly that such actions took place frequently, because otherwise the legal rules would have been superfluous. In other words, reading the normative sources against the grain yields valuable information for the ways in which families as small coresidential units and wider kin enacted, or ignored, their blood relationships.

ELISABETH VAN HOUTS

References and Further Reading

- Bauduin, P. Désigner les parents: le champ de la parenté dans l'oeuvre des premiers chroniqueurs normands, Anglo-Norman Studies 24. Proceedings of the Battle conference 2001, edited by J. Gillingham. Woodbridge: Boydell Press, 2003, pp. 71–84.
- Bitel, L. M. Women in Early Medieval Europe 400–1100. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002.
- Bouchard, C. B. "Those of My Blood" Constructing Noble Families in Medieval Francia. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001.
- Bullough, D. "Early Medieval Social Groupings: The Terminology of Kinship." Past and Present 46 (1969): 3–18.
- "Famille et parenté dans l'Occident médiévale," edited by G. Duby and J. Le Goff, Collection de l'Ecole française de Rome 30, Rome: Ecole Française de Rome, 1977.
- Goody, J. The Development of the Family and Marriage in Europe. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1983.
- Jochems, J. Women in Old Norse Society. Ithaca and London: Cornell University Press, 1995.
- Le Jan, R. "Famille et pouvoir dans le monde franc" (VIIe–Xe siècle): essai d'anthropologie sociale. Paris: Publication de la Sorbonne, 1995.
- Lynch, J. L. Godparents and Kinship in Early Medieval Europe. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1986.
- Murray, A.C. Germanic Kinship Structure: Studies in Law and Society in Antiquity and the Early Middle Ages. Toronto: Pontifical Institute of Medieval Studies, 1983.
- Schmid, K. "The structure of the nobility in the earlier middle ages." In The Medieval Nobility: Studies on the Ruling Classes of France and Germany from the Sixth to the Twelfth Century, edited and translated by T. Reuter. Amsterdam: North Holland, 1978, pp. 37–59.

Werner, K. F. Die Nachkommen Karls des Grossen bis um das Jahr 1000 (1.-8. Generation), Karl der Grosse: Lebenswerk und Nachleben, edited by W. Braunsfels. Düsseldorf, 1965–1968, vol. 4.

Werner, K. F. Naissance de la noblesse: l'essor des élites politiques en Europe. Paris, 1998.

See also Barbarian Law Codes; Church; Death, Mourning, and Commemoration; Dhuoda; Family (Later Middle Ages); Fosterage; Genealogy; Kinship; Law, Canon; Marriage, Christian; Marriage, Impediments to; Necrologies and Mortuary Rolls

FAMILY (LATER MIDDLE AGES)

The nuclear family of parents and unmarried children, living in their own household or domestic arrangement, was a basic unit of medieval society. Taking all social levels into account, this model covered a reasonable proportion of the population across the face of Europe. However, there were so many alternative models and practices and arrangements that no discussion of the family and kinship—looking at structure, definitions and boundaries, functions, change across time, regional and socioeconomic variations, spiritual analogues, and so forth—can be limited to this single and simple form. As there was no specific word in medieval Latin that meant what family does in English, the concept was never focused or narrowed to meet, or to be confined to what seems in the industrial or postindustrial West as the most basic or particular version of the social (and biological) unit. Famulus meant servant, and its medieval usage emphasized a domestic unit comprising those living together in a household (in which only some were “family” in the modern sense).

As a group of men and women linked through recognized ties of blood, marriage, spiritual kinship, and such bonds of fictive kinship as sworn brotherhoods in knightly or religious orders or brotherhood or sisterhood in guilds and confraternities, family was a major building block or principle of social organization. A treatment of the medieval family can be presented both in terms of its structure as an institution or aggregation of similar institutions and the diversity of its functions. Questions about the role of family are not only answered differently as we move from its shape and scope in “the first feudal age” of the ninth and tenth centuries (with the Carolingians as the overarching model), let alone from earlier centuries of Germanic invasion and settlement, to the fourteenth or fifteenth century, but there are vast distinctions across the breadth of Europe (as there were different modes of agriculture and production, different levels of urbanization, different conditions of servile service and tenancy, a varying strength of kinship ties, etc).

Of particular significance is the vast gulf between families possessed of significant property, especially real property or real estate, and those without. This distinction separates families for whom inheritance and transmission patterns were of such prime importance that they often became areas of strategic planning that covered arranged marriages between unborn children and the spinning of complex webs of “estate planning” and testamentary disposition from those many families where the burdens of bearing and raising children might only be compensated for by the unwaged labor they would eventually contribute to the common enterprise. These latter contributions to the family by its members between childhood and marriage could be a key factor in the scramble to survive, let alone to climb the slippery slope toward prosperity and upward mobility.

The Nuclear Family

While family as a social unit and as a concept is most readily grasped if we begin with the nuclear unit, it spreads widely in many directions, and in some respects the medieval family was not even limited to those alive at any given time (as shown by a look at those named when prayers for the dead were being specified). Marriage is a good point at which to begin. By the twelfth century marriage (matrimony) was coming to be accepted as one of the essential sacraments of Christian life. This enhanced the church’s control of the definition of marriage and the special relationship of bride and groom as a new social and sexual unit. Though the church’s blessing of a marital union need not precede the binding agreement of the two parties (and this agreement rendered them incapable of making other or subsequent arrangements), an ecclesiastical interest, expressed in the power to define, to intervene, and to sanctify, covered and controlled such marital- and family-related issues as legitimacy, the degrees of consanguinity within which marriage was forbidden (at least without a dispensation), the indissolubility of marriage, the age of consent for marriage (12 for girls, 14 for boys), a spouse’s “right” to sex with her or his partner, the tangles generated by second marriages and spiritual vows, the freedom of married persons to enter monastic life, and issues like the binding power of testamentary bequests and of prayers for the family’s dead. All of these had immense repercussions regarding the transmission of property and the primacy of competing family lines and claims—as they did regarding the grace of private life and the way identity was defined through links to one’s ancestors, to living kin, and to one’s progeny.

Degrees of Kinship

Beyond the narrow world of parents and children lay many concentric circles of kinship and degrees of relationship; all were family, albeit of varying (and diminishing) degrees of importance and relationship. By the twelfth century, if not before, models of kinship and family that had accorded roughly equal affinity or symmetry to kin of either sex on the mother's side (cognatic kin) with those on the father's (the agnatic kin) were yielding across much of Europe to legal and social conventions that privileged the latter. The need to meet the military obligations that went with the distribution of fiefs probably contributed to this process, while for most of rural Europe lords of the manors were happy to endorse or impose a comparable model on the peasantry. This made the descent or transmission of peasant holdings easier to assign and police, though in practice economic factors may have been as important as kinship links and male succession patterns in tracking the actual movement of and market in manorial holdings. While society could well have gone in the other direction and maintained the symmetry of the kinship structure (or even given priority to cognatic kin), family came more and more to be a construct traced through and boasted about by way of the male line. That this development took place in the years (eleventh and twelfth centuries) in which primogeniture was also, or simultaneously, being accepted as the basic pattern for inheritance was hardly a coincidence. The two social forces or factors can be seen as the two sides of a coin.

The widespread acceptance of unitary patterns of inheritance, with a bias in favor of the eldest son, certainly tilted a definition of family toward the male line of descent at most social levels, at least whenever fertility and survival made this the feasible route to follow. Alternate systems, whereby lands were divided among all or some of the children (male and even female), or when an individual other than the eldest son inherited (as in ultimogeniture, which favored the youngest son), did exist at various times and places and exercised some influence upon the working definition of family. However, such practices were never more than exceptions to the general rule of patrilineal descent, and the emergence of primogeniture. Through most of Europe, cognatic kinship was likely to be just a fall-back, at least for legal, political, and economic concerns; in the realm of social or interpersonal relationships (touching sex and marriage) symmetry or bilateral kinship continued as an operative institution. But unless the woman's family (i.e., the mother's line of descent) was of much greater social or historical prominence than the father's, her genealogical tree was apt to be relegated to second place as such matters were proclaimed through the growing use of coats of arms and personal seals, the creation and display of genealogical and Jesse trees, the testimony accepted in legal disputes, and the widespread adoption of surnames (which came about in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries; a century or two later for people of lower social status). The misogyny that characterized so many aspects of medieval life and thought certainly was a strong factor in the creation of this hierarchy of kinship and inheritance and in the disappearance of many of the social roles that had once been the province of the extended family.

If parents and children represent the nuclear or the vertical family (covering two generations), those many other kin included in the wide embrace of the horizontal family also counted—if not for quite as much, and perhaps only in times of need or special circumstances. We find their presence taken seriously in tracing those patterns of inheritance that were of such concern; a local jury might elaborate on the descent of an estate to distant and remote kin in the absence of more obvious heirs and claimants. We see it in the ranking of levels or degrees of relationship, either traced to a common ancestor or emanating outwards from the self. Such a genealogical data bank was widely understood, it being the key to the church's injunctions against marriages within the forbidden circles of consanguinity or incest. This ecclesiastical insistence on exogamous marriage posed problems for the intertwined crowned and aristocratic families who ruled Europe, as it also did for the women and men of the thousands of villages that saw few newcomers come to stay and marry. Following on Roman law (and biblical injunctions), the church developed a sweeping definition of consanguinity by which it decreed that marriage was forbidden between people related within the fourth degree, which would reach as far as second cousins. And because of the complexities of symmetrical kinship and the strength of cognatic links in matters of remarriage and spiritual kinship, the full universe of forbidden partners was much larger than what it would be in modern society under the same definitions of blood or marital ties. Thus the social and sexual control of marriage defined or redefined kinship. This Christianized view of the relationship and of the large kinship circles of which the subject and the subject's marriage comprised the center replaced earlier ones that had revolved around such institutions or constructs as clans, blood feuds, and myths about eponymous founding fathers from whom all (in a tribe, village, or war band) were descended.

Aristocratic Families

The aristocratic family of the High or Central Middle Ages was the basic operative unit of political life. With royal families as the most visible and trend-setting models, establishing and maintaining the hegemonic position of the patriarchal family was a motivating force behind many issues and actions of the state. Royal marriages and the production of heirs were basic pillars of public life, and the elaboration of royal and aristocratic genealogies an enterprise of public import, with the “triumph” of primogeniture as the basic line of transmission, by the twelfth century, making father–son links the most important of all. Through her success in producing children the queen’s role was one of unmatched importance, though this did little, per se, to raise her status at court or in council. Queens might rise to prominence by force of personality, or through marital affection and partnership, or because of the king’s absence or early death (leaving an heir of minor age), and her own family might even hope to achieve power through this tie. But basically, it was her childbearing capacity that defined her role, and the long-term success of such dynasties as the Capetians in France (with direct father–son succession from 987 until 1328) rested on a series of kings’ wives, the queens of France, who fulfilled their primary duty. Against this, dynastic turnover and the frequent failure of direct male heirs among the later Carolingians and in the various succeeding imperial dynasties thwarted grandiose plans in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries for a realm that would dominate both sides of the Alps. Stocking the royal nursery was as important, at the top of the social pyramid, as having seed for next year’s planting was for the peasantry. When a family of power failed in the direct line, then and only then were more distant kin accepted in the line of succession. At the other extreme, when rulers like the English kings Edward I (1272–1307) or Edward III (1327–1377) had at least a half dozen children survive to the age of marriage the dynastic possibilities and the complicating entanglements were the stuff of high politics, war, and diplomacy.

Urban Families

The bourgeois or urban family, drawing its income and status from trade or craft production, grew in importance through the later Middle Ages. Though children and other kin were invariably part of a royal court or an aristocratic household, the young men and women actually bound there by close bloodlines made up a very small proportion of the hundreds who might surround a king or emperor or even of the dozens or scores in attendance upon a duke or bishop. But in the urban setting, with work and business and the apprenticeships all housed under one roof, the family unit (in the medieval sense) is apt to be a domestic rather than a kin-centered or blood-defined one. The children of the parental figures, along with servants (mostly young and likely to move on in a few years) and the apprentices (often children of like families, now being trained in a comparable household) together comprised the household unit, and the line between blood and nonblood might be flexible. While no prosperous bourgeois would wish to see his enterprise pass in the next generation to a rank outsider, towns and guilds depended on new blood and newcomers arrived, married, and became integrated more readily than they did into the conservative ranks and families of the feudal aristocracy. At the same time, in the self-replicating social world in which most urban craftsmen and merchants lived there was a high degree of in-group interaction and intermarriage between the children and between the widows and the widowers of the insiders. Thus the chances are that many were related to others in their circle, in one of the various fashions or permutations mentioned, and we find this whether we look at the merchants and artisans of London or Bruges or Florence. Given the prevalence of so much kin linkage, we can ask how effective or reliable it was in terms of bonding, cooperation, and family-oriented culture—a question we can also ask regarding the royal lines of Europe, from the Slavic kingdoms of the East to those of the Iberian peninsula, and Scandinavia.

Peasant Families

The overwhelming bulk of the population of medieval Europe worked the land and drew a living, usually at something close to the subsistence level, directly from such labor. For the peasant family rural and village life was life spent among many who were related, and the functional definition of family in these instances may be seen in terms of those who could be called upon to help work the holdings or to stand as surety in a manorial or village dispute. Propinquity and mortality must often have brought the families of siblings or in-laws or cousins into more cooperative arrangements than formal custom or manorial law worried to define. Children usually could expect to succeed to the parental holdings, as well perhaps as to succor surviving parents as they aged and became economically and physically dependent. Manorial court records tell of intramanorial quarrels and negotiations, as well as of domestic ones, and it is no surprise to find that kinship bonds were major lines of social organization, partisanship, and long-remembered alliances. The size of the peasant household as a domestic unit probably was no more than four or five in most cases; more hands to do the work also meant more mouths to feed (nor would all that many bourgeois or urban households have run to double figures either when all heads were counted).

FAMILY (LATER MIDDLE AGES)

The Role of the Church

To move away from a structural presentation of family is to open many doors. Much of the church was organized through quasi-familial categories, often expressed in the metaphors of family. Though the clergy of the western church were being held to vows of celibacy by the end of the eleventh century, the church's views about and role in marriage and matters of kinship and family were major determinants of lay life and behavior. Marriage did not become a civil matter in Europe until the seventeenth century, at the earliest, and, while canon lawyers and theologians might debate such questions as whether it was consent rather than consummation that solidified a marriage, or whether the priest's blessing at the church porch sufficed for his endorsement (rather than a nuptial mass), these differences of opinion were accepted by the laity as issues properly falling within the ecclesiastical purview.

But beyond its role in defining and supervising lay activity in the realms of marriage and sex, the church was a vast alternative social structure with its own equivalents to or parallels for family. It not only determined the degrees of consanguinity that controlled marital choices for the laity, it held (with little challenge in theory if not always in practice) that co-sponsorship of an infant's baptism created spiritual kinship, thus making the sponsoring parties, the baby's godparents, ineligible to marry each other. And for those vast numbers within the embrace of clerical and monastic vows, there were similarities to the secular family. The head of the monastery was the abbot ("father"), and though "mother superior" is not a medieval term, the very concept indicates the quasi-maternal role of the prioress or abbess over her house and her charges. Furthermore, nuns were held to be the brides of Christ; vows to enter religious life were comparable to marriage vows. Saints with wide popular appeal, like the mythical Catherine of Alexandria or the historical Catherine of Siena (1347–1380) were thought to have entered a special relationship with Jesus; hence the "mystic marriage" that set them apart, even from other saints. The ever-growing role of the Virgin in popular religion emphasized her role as mother even more than as Virgin, and the rising importance of both Joseph and St. Anne, Mary's mother, made the holy family an accessible model for the lay imagination. The Nativity scene, with its prosaic shepherds and its mysterious Wise Men, combined the domestic and familiar with the transcendental. Reflections about the nature of Christ and his sacrifice produced a body of thought—some coming from women—that we sum up as "Christ as mother," since nurturing was easily accepted as a feminine attribute. Mystical writings, again with women as major contributors, often described an intense spiritual union with Jesus in the language of the erotic poetry of the day. Ecclesiastical art contributed to the portrayal of sacred themes in a family and kin-oriented context. Byzantine icons, with their powerful influence on Western manuscript illumination and then on painting, had a heavy focus on the maternal aspect of Mary (a theme picked up and developed by Duccio and his Siennese followers in the fourteenth century). Icons distinguished between aspects of the Virgin's maternal roles: Mary immediately after giving birth, Mary nursing, Mary gazing at her child and lamenting the sorrow yet to come, Mary expanding her own mothering into a universal protective role, etc.

The Public Sphere

Did "family" change through the period? The development of bureaucratic kingship and secular chanceries in the twelfth century, along with the development of a highly structured ecclesiastical machine, meant that many functions once dealt with by kin groups became issues for the public sphere: disputes over property, crime and criminal justice rather than torts and feuds, universal rules about kinship and marriage over private arrangements, to name but some. But this great transition had to be carried out and implemented by people many of whom continued to see their ties to each other—defined and solidified by the many definitions and variations of kinship and family—as paramount factors of identity and social bonding. Whether we look at the diplomacy of royal marriages and alliances, or at the arrangements for marriage between the prosperous burgers of the Low Countries, or at the pledging and sureties of manorial and village life, it continues to be family that made many things explicable as well as workable, both to those on the spot and to scholarly examination. Though men (and women) often treated each other and their offspring with a harshness that makes for uncomfortable reading today, they would probably have been in accord that it was all being done for the sake of family, by which they usually meant the patriarchal line (and perhaps the marriage of daughters).

The complex definitions of kinship meant that every woman and man was the center of an individualized geometry of kinship; a sibling's in-laws, a former husband's stepchildren, a half-brother's sworn brothers in a chivalric order, the sister of the man with whom one had stood sponsor at the baptism of a friend's daughter, and much more of this sort. A knight might realize, while maneuvering for a skirmish while on crusade in Syria, that the warrior beside him (whom he had only met that morning) was his second wife's first cousin's brother-in-law—and that they could both trace the links that bound them. People at all social levels assimilated a great deal of complex genealogical information as part of their cultural identity. That medieval society cared to know these relationships, with full awareness of their effect on marriage and property and naming patterns, is a powerful reminder of how much society continued to be structured and organized along the many (and diverging) spokes of the wheel of family.

Threats to Family

The values of society and family life were traditional and conservative, as befits the slow-changing pace of medieval life. Sex outside of marriage was invariably condemned, though the sexual double standard tempered the sword of retribution, especially for men. Marriage was held to be insoluble, though there were dispensations, elastic definitions, and flight over the hill to another village, all tactics to temper the adamant dictates of canon law. Alternate lifestyles were condemned, which also must mean they were not so unusual but that they were considered by theologians, canon lawyers, and mendicant preachers to pose a threat to “family values.” But just as there was a widespread acceptance of bastard children (though with impediments regarding inheritance and entry into the church), so there may have been more unvoiced tolerance of discrete homosexual behavior than extant records or normative texts are ever likely to reveal. Nor were the basic structures of family life seriously threatened by any of the reform movements that remained within the embrace of the church, while heresies and utopian ideologies that seemed to advocate “free love” or some form of collective social and sexual life deemphasizing traditional family structure and kinship bonds were marginalized and repressed. The knots of family were too many, too important to the basic workings of society at every level, and too well integrated into the medieval world view of both church and laity, to be untied.

JOEL T. ROSENTHAL

References and Further Reading

- Ashley, Kathleen and Pamela Sheingorn, ed. Interpreting Cultural Symbols: Saint Anne in Late Medieval Society. Athens, Ga., and London: University of Georgia Press, 1990.
- Bennett, Judith M. Women in the Medieval English Countryside: Gender and Household in Brigstock before the Plague. Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1987.
- Brooke, Christopher N. L. The Medieval Idea of Marriage. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1989.
- Brundage, James A. Law, Sex, and Christian Society in Medieval Europe. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1987.
- DeWindt, Edwin. Land and People in Holywell-cum-Needlingworth: Structures of Tenure and Patterns of Social Organization in an East Midland Village, 1252–1457. Toronto: Pontifical Institute of Mediaeval Studies, 1972.
- Duby, Georges. Medieval Marriage: Two Models from Twelfth-Century France, translated by E. Forster. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1978.
- . Love and Marriage in the Middle Ages, translated by Jane Dunnett. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1994.
- Esmein, Adhémar. Le mariage en droit canonique. 2nd edition, edited by R. Génestal. Paris: Librairie du Recueil Sirey, 2 volumes, 1929–1935.
- Evergates, Theodore, ed. Aristocratic Women in Medieval France. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999.
- Gold, Penny S. The Lady and the Virgin. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1985.
- Goody, Jack. The Development of the Family and Marriage in Europe. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1983.
- Hanawalt, Barbara A. The Ties that Bind: Peasant Families in Medieval England. Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- Helmholz, Richard H. Marriage Litigation in Medieval England. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1978.
- Herlihy, David. Medieval Households. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1985.
- Herlihy, David, and Christiane Klapisch-Zuber. Tuscans and their Families: A Study of the Florentine Catasto of 1427. New Haven & London: Yale University Press, 1985.
- Mitchell, Linda. Portraits of Medieval Women: Family, Marriage, and Politics in England, 1225–1350. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2003.
- Murray, Jacqueline, ed. Love, Marriage, and Family in the Middle Ages: A Reader. Orchard Park, N.Y.: Broadview Press, 2001.
- Neel, Carol, ed. Medieval Families: Perspectives on Marriage, Household, and Children. Toronto and Buffalo:

FAMILY (LATER MIDDLE AGES)

University of Toronto Press, for the Medieval Academy of America, 2004.

Parson, John Carmi, and Bonnie Wheeler, eds. Medieval Mothering. New York and London: Garland Publishing, 1996.

Razi, Zvi. Life, Marriage, and Death in a Medieval Parish: Economy, Society and Demography in Halesowen, 1270–1400. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1980.

Sheehan, Michael M. Marriage, Family, and Law in Medieval Europe: Collected Studies, edited by James K. Farge. Toronto and Buffalo, N.Y.: University of Toronto Press, 1996.

See also Church; Family (Earlier Middle Ages); Genealogy; Godparents; Heraldry; Holy Kinship; Inheritance; Kinship; Law, Canon; Marriage, Christian; Marriage, Impediments to; Queens and Empresses: the West; Seals and Sigillography; Sexuality: Extramarital Sex; Sexuality: Female Same-Sex Relations; Sexuality: Male Same-Sex Relations; Sexuality, Regulation of; Sexuality: Sex in Marriage; Social Status; Succession, Royal and Noble

FAIRIES

See Mélusine; Supernatural Women

FASTING AND FOOD, RELIGIOUS ASPECTS OF

Fasting and the Eucharist have been from early Christian times essential religious practices for all believers. In the medieval period, Christians fasted or abstained from meat throughout Advent and Lent, and, with some regional variations, every Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday of the year. At a time when access to consecrated wine was restricted to priests alone, and the consecrated bread was not available to laypeople on a frequent basis, writings by and about Christian holy women abound in descriptions of fasting from regular food and of focusing one's appetite on consecrated bread and wine. This double emphasis has been identified as a religious devotion central to women's spirituality and as a primary inspiration for their visions and ecstasies. Women's association with the body in traditional European culture has led to their identification with Christ as God made flesh—a flesh that in giving life suffers like women's in childbirth, a flesh that, like women's, feeds human beings with itself in pregnancy and lactation (through the blood flowing like milk from Christ's breast as well as through Christ's gift of the Eucharist, his body). Clare of Assisi (1193–1253) is said to have drunk milk at Christ's breast and the German Dominican Margaretha Ebner (c. 1291–1351) wrote that she took a statue of the Christ-child to her naked breast and suckled it.

For many medieval Christian holy women, Eucharistic enjoyment and Eucharistic miracles were essential to the spiritual life. Food being an area of their lives that women could control (unlike, for example, sex or money), fasting held great religious importance because food was something women could effectively deny themselves and give up in sacrifice. Clare of Assisi's Rule for her nuns, the first written by a woman, was very strict in terms of diet: unless excused by sickness, Clare's followers were to abstain from meat and eat very minimally except for Sundays and Christmas.

Several disciplines have contributed to the study of the relationship between religion, food, and women. Drawing from the anthropological work of Mary Douglas, psychoanalyst Julia Kristeva has elaborated the concept of abjection and cited Christian mystics as a prominent example: religion laywoman Angela of Foligno (c. 1248–1309) drank the water used to wash a leper's sores, Catherine of Siena (1347–1380), a Dominican Tertiary, ingested a cup of pus; both found filth sweet to the mouth. The most influential contributions come from historians Caroline Walker Bynum and Rudolph Bell; the former has identified women's patterns of fasting from daily food in order to better feast on the Eucharist, while the latter has provocatively compared the extreme religious fasting of holy women to modern anorexia. Catherine of Siena, for example, likely fasted to the point of self-starvation.

In the relationship between Christian holy women and regular food, scholarly emphasis has been placed on fasting and abstaining, although the texts written by holy women reveal more positive patterns as well. The metaphor of sweetness is a prevalent one to describe God's love; more specifically honey, occasionally coupled with sugar, is a favored visionary ingredient: its sweetness is a biblical reflection of spiritual consolation. Like honey, fruit appears in the Song of Songs—a central biblical text for medieval women's mysticism—as another bearer of divine grace and of the pleasures of the spiritual life. Thus Margaretha Ebner is given to taste, in one of her visions, two apples—one sweet, the other sour.

The learned German nun Hildegard of Bingen (1098–1179) employed kitchen metaphors in her works in order to explain the workings of God the Creator, at times comparing his actions to those of a cook. Another German Benedictine, Elisabeth of Schönau (1129–1165), described God as tasting of cinnamon. The thirteenth-century beguine Hadewijch of Antwerp (active c. 1220–1240), a visionary poet, employed passionate and sometimes violent images of mutual eating to express in verse the bond of love uniting humans and God. In Angela of Foligno's

Memorial, the representation of food is a positive one, effectively mediating between the mystic and God. It is probable that women who had been wives and mothers, like Angela, had a closer and more physical relationship to food than those who lacked the experience of cooking for their family: this helps explain the images used by English laywoman Margery Kempe (c. 1373–c. 1438), a former brewster and miller as well as mother of fourteen, who in her Book describes her attachment to God with the processes of skinning boiled stockfish and cutting meat for the pot. While her mystical predecessors experienced food miracles in renouncing earthly food and in feeding on the Eucharist instead, Margery epitomizes a parallel tradition that found miracles in the kitchen and God at the dinner table.

CRISTINA MAZZONI

References and Further Reading

- Bell, Rudolph. Holy Anorexia. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1985.
- Bynum, Caroline Walker. Holy Feast and Holy Fast: The Religious Significance of Food to Medieval Women. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1987.
- Mazzoni, Cristina. The Women in God's Kitchen: Cooking, Eating, and Spiritual Writing. New York: Continuum, 2005.

See also Angela of Foligno; Asceticism; Catherine of Siena; Clare of Assisi; Ebner, Margaretha; Elisabeth of Schönau; Hadewijch; Hildegard of Bingen; Kempe, Margery; Mysticism and Mystics; Song of Songs; Medieval Interpretations of

FEDELE, CASSANDRA

By the 1490s, Venetian-born Cassandra Fedele (1465–1558) was the best known woman humanist living in Europe. Her storied literary career, recounted in every early modern Italian catalogue of famous women, overshadowed that of her fellow humanists Isotta Nogarola and Laura Cereta. But most of what was recorded about Fedele appears to be untrue. The biographical tradition attests to her having written a book titled The Order of the Sciences (Ordo scientiarum) and to the beauty of her Latin poetry; but no trace of her alleged book or poems has surfaced. Having been taught Greek and Latin grammar, rhetoric, and philosophy by the Servite friar Gasparino Borro, Fedele's legendary erudition is barely perceptible in her 121 posthumously published Latin letters, which document her connections with royalty and renowned scholars but not a distinctive literary style. She exchanged letters with Duchess Beatrice d'Este of Milan, Queen Beatrice d'Aragona of Hungary, Duchess Eleonora d'Aragona of Ferrara, Marchese Francesco Gonzaga of Mantua, King Louis XII of France, Duke Lodovico Sforza of Milan, and Columbus's patron, Queen Isabella of Castile—who tried unsuccessfully to persuade Fedele to join her court in Spain. The renowned Paduan Aristotelian Niccolò Leonico Tomei and the Florentine Hellenist Angelo Poliziano were also among Fedele's correspondents.

Despite the faux tradition that haunted her, Fedele received genuine acclaim when her first public oration, delivered on the occasion of her cousin's baccalaureate at the University of Padua, was published in Modena, Nuremberg, and Venice (1487, 1488, 1489). Until the end of her life, her earliest biographers continued to praise Fedele for her virginity, despite her long marriage to Gian-Maria Mapelli, a physician from Vicenza, with whom she lived from 1499 until his death in 1521. Widowed, she spent the 1530s and 1540s desperately looking for a stipend. Finally, in 1547, she obtained an appointment from Pope Paul III as prioress of the orphanage of San Domenico di Castello in Venice. She presented her last public oration before the Venetian senate and the doge Francesco Venier in 1556, when she was ninety-one, on Queen Bona Sforza of Poland's arrival in Venice. When Fedele died in 1558, the Republic honored her with a state funeral.

DIANA ROBIN

References and Further Reading

- Capelli, Adriano. "Cassandra Fedele in relazione con Lodovico Il Moro." Archivio Storico Lombardo 3, 4 (1895): 387–391.
- Cavazzana, Cesira. "Cassandra Fedele erudita veneziana del Rinascimento." Ateneo Veneto 29, 2 (1906): 73–79, 249–275, 361–397.
- Fedele, Cassandra (1465–1558). Clarissimae Feminae Cassandreae Fidelis Venetae Epistolae et Orationes, edited by Giacomo Filippo Tommasini. Padua: Franciscus Bolzetta, 1636.
- No manuscript collections of Fedele's letters are known; five letters not included in the Tommasini edition are published in Capelli, Cavazzana, Pesenti, and Petrettini (cited below).*
- . Oratio pro Bertucio Lamberto. Modena: 1487; Venice: 1488; Nuremberg: 1489.
- King, Margaret L., and Albert Rabil, Jr., eds. Her Immaculate Hand. Selected Works by and about the Women Humanists of Quattrocento Italy. Binghamton, N.Y.: Medieval and Renaissance Texts and Studies, 1983; 2nd revised paperback edition, 1991.
- Pesenti, G. "Lettere inedite del Poliziano," Athenaeum 3 (1915): 299–301.
- Petrettini, Maria. Vita di Cassandra Fedele. Venice: Dall'Imperial Ro Stamperia Pinelli, 1814, reprint 1852.
- Robin, Diana. "Cassandra Fedele (1465–1499)." In Rinaldina Russell, ed. Italian Women Writers: A Bio-Bibliographical Sourcebook. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1994, pp. 119–127.

———. “Cassandra Fedele’s Epistolae (1488–1521): Biography as Effacement.” In The Rhetorics of Life-Writing in Early Modern Europe: Forms of Biography from Cassandra Fedele to Louise XIV, edited by Thomas Mayer and Daniel Woolf. Ann Arbor, Mich.: University of Michigan Press, 1995. pp. 187–203.

*For the early modern catalogues with vitae of Fedele see Battista Fregosa (a.k.a. Campofregosa, 1483); Jacopo Filippo da Bergamo (1497), Jean Tixier de Ravisius (1521); Giuseppe Betussi (1545); Giovanni Battista Egnazio (1554); Giacomo Alberici (1605); Jacopo Filippo Tommasini (1644).

See also Cereta, Laura; Defenses of Women; D’Este, Isabella and Beatrice; Humanism; Isabel I; Italy; Letter Writing; Nogarola, Isotta; Patronage, Literary; Renaissance, Historiography of; Sanuti, Nicolasa Castellani; Women Authors: Latin Texts

FEME COVERT

Feme covert may be defined simply as a married woman. In medieval England the implications were complex, restrictive, and illustrate the consequences of marriage for woman. The free tenures were feudal or military; socage; and burgage. It was common to hold land of more than one tenure. After 1066, a married woman was said to be “covered” by potestas (power) of the husband with the result that her legal personality was merged with his. In the eyes of the law, both canon and common lawyers agreed that husband and wife were one person and that one person was the husband (J. H. Baker 550–551). However, the legal personality of the wife revived upon the death of the husband or with her husband’s agreement. Widows, like single women, could hold property, buy and sell, and make wills.

In the thirteenth century treatise, On the Laws and Customs of England [De Legibus et Consuetudinibus Angliae] commonly called Bracton, a married woman was said to be “under the rod” of her husband who was her sovereign and her lord. In the legal French texts of the next generation, the wife was said to be feme covert as opposed to feme sole. Her husband was said to be baron or lord and looked after both his wife and her property. A common saying and a legal fiction was that husband and wife were one person and that person was the husband. However, the maxim was not limitless: a wife was not punished for her husband’s crimes nor responsible for his debts. Land tenure made a significant difference in that under burgage law, for example, women could trade independently of their husbands. The fact that the church allowed married women to make wills enhanced their power within the married state. The individual personalities, age, health, and economic circumstances of the parties to the marriage undoubtedly shaped their functioning within these legal rules concerning coverture.

Because some husbands controlling their wives’ property and other entitlements did not always act in their spouses’ best interests, a remedy was created. The writ cui in vita allowed a widow to go to law to alter dispositions made during the “lifetime of the husband” when she had been a feme covert and “could not gainsay him.” The Wakefield Court Rolls 1331–1333 contain many references to husbands “attorning” to their wives and one woman claiming in widowhood property settled in the lifetime of her husband (p. 165). Despite the vast amount of original sources, much of what transpired in a marriage is undocumented. Thus many a feme covert may not have been a silent partner in marriage and its legal, social, and economic activities.

SUE SHERIDAN WALKER

References and Further Reading

- Baker, J. H. An Introduction to English Legal History. London: Butterworths, 1990.
- Bracton on the Laws and Customs of England*. 4 vols, edited by S. E. Thorne. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of the Harvard University Press, 1969–1977.
- Earliest English Law Reports*, vols. 111 and 112, London: Seldon Society, 1995 and 1996.
- Early Registers of Writs*, edited by Elsa De Haas for the Seldon Society vol. 87, London: Quartitch, 1970.
- The Treatise on the Laws and Customs of the Realm of England, Commonly Called Glanvill*, edited by G. D. H. Hall. London: Nelson, 1965.
- Walker, Sue Sheridan. Lexikon des Mittelalters, esp. “Ehe, “Frau, “Familie” and “Englisches Recht.”
- . Wife and Widow in Medieval England. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1993.

See also Feme Sole; Landholding and Property Rights; Law, English Secular Courts of; Widows

FEME SOLE

Feme sole literally means “single woman,” that is, not married. The term in its ordinary usage indicated a woman who had never married. Technically a widow was also a feme sole for most legal purposes, but she was not usually referred to as such; the Latin vidua was more common. Annulment of a marriage restored a woman’s status as an unmarried woman.

A feme sole at English common law stood in roughly the same circumstance as a man with regard to criminal law. She was responsible for any crime she committed. Technically she could not be outlawed, but she could be “waived,” which had the same consequences. With few exceptions, the penalties prescribed for a criminal offense (e.g., theft) did not depend upon gender, although, in practice, there was often a lower rate of conviction for women defendants. If a crime was committed against a feme sole, she was at a disadvantage in using the appeal procedure—the procedure whereby a victim of a crime essentially brought a private prosecution—because, at least in theory, a single woman could appeal only for violence to her own person.

When, in the thirteenth century, the use of a jury of presentment (the ancestor of the grand jury) became widespread, however, the significance of the limitation declined. A feme sole was also treated like a man in matters of tort (private wrongs) and contract; she was responsible for her own wrongdoing and contract obligations and could be sued for them. She could also bring suit for torts done to her person or property—for example, a trespass—or to enforce a contractual obligation. If she married after contracting a debt, however, her husband became liable for it.

A feme sole could inherit real property, although because of the English rule of primogeniture a brother would generally inherit their father's land to the exclusion of his sister, whether or not she was older than he. She could, however, purchase or lease real property. She could inherit, purchase, take by gift, or otherwise acquire personal property and she could give it away or sell it while alive or by will. There were no restrictions—other than those imposed on all testators—on her ability to make a testament.

At public law a feme sole was not treated like a man. She could not serve as a juror, lawyer, or judge. Her testimony was not received in disputes concerning another's free or villain status, nor could she be an "oath helper" for a male defendant in cases where proof was to be by compurgation (i.e., by a specified number of people testifying to the truth of a defendant's oath).

"Feme sole" has a more limited but significant meaning in connection with women who exercised a trade or craft. It created an exception to the common law rule that a married woman's personal property became her husband's upon their marriage. A feme sole trader was a woman who, although married, was able to trade on her own account by the custom of a place. The custom existed in London and a number of other towns and cities, among them Worcester, Lincoln, Exeter, Winchelsea, and Hastings. The means whereby she was declared feme sole is not entirely clear, but a feme sole trader was defined as a woman who exercised a trade or craft without intermeddling by her husband. Barring exceptional cases, such as prolonged overseas absence of her husband, she was required to work in a field separate from his; otherwise she was presumed to be working for him.

As a feme sole trader she could incur debts, enter contracts, and sue or be sued in her own name for them, although her husband would be named in the writ "for compliance." If she did not pay a debt her goods could be seized or she could be sent to debtors' prison, but her husband's goods and person were not liable. A husband might have agreed to his wife's feme sole status as part of a marriage settlement where she already had a thriving trade; or he could have wanted it to protect him from liability for debts resulting from the failure of her enterprise. Trading as a feme sole did not affect any other aspects of a woman's marriage nor did it alter her legal position as feme covert in other areas such as inheritance.

JANET S. LOENGARD

References and Further Reading

- Abrams, Annie. "Women Traders in Medieval London." Economic Journal 26 (1916): 276–285.
- Barron, Caroline M. "The 'Golden Age' of Women in Medieval London." In Medieval Women in Southern England. Reading Medieval Studies, 15. Reading: University of Reading, 1989, pp. 35–58.
- Bateson, Mary. Borough Customs, vol. I. Selden Society vol. 18. London: B. Quaritch, 1904, pp. 227–228.
- Beattie, Cordelia. "A Room of One's Own? The Legal Evidence for the Residential Arrangements of Women without Husbands in Late Fourteenth and Early Fifteenth Century York." In Medieval Women and the Law, edited by Noël James Menuge. Woodbridge, Suffolk: The Boydell Press, 2000, pp. 41–56.
- Dale, Marian K. "The London Silkwomen of the Fifteenth Century." Economic History Review, 4, 3 (1933): 324–335.
- Hutton, Diane. "Women in Fourteenth Century Shrewsbury." In Women and Work in Pre-Industrial England, edited by Lindsey Charles and Lorna Duffin. London: Croom Helm Ltd, 1985, pp. 83–99.
- Jewell, Helen. Women in Medieval England. Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1996.
- Kowaleski, Maryanne. "Women's Work in a Market Town: Exeter in the Late Fourteenth Century." In Women and Work in Preindustrial Europe, edited by Barbara Hanawalt. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1986, pp. 145–164.
- Lacey, Kay E. "Women and Work in Fourteenth and Fifteenth Century London." In Women and Work in Pre-Industrial England, edited by Lindsey Charles and Lorna Duffin. London: Croom Helm, 1985, pp. 24–82.
- Maitland, Frederic William, and Sir Frederick Pollock. The History of English Law. 2nd ed. Reissued with intro. by S.F.C. Milsom. 2 vols. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1968.
- Power, Eileen, Medieval Women, edited by M. M. Postan. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1975. Canto ed. repr. 2000.

See also England; Feme Covert; Guild Members and Guilds; Home Manufacturing; Investment and Credit; Law, English Secular Courts of; Legal Agency; Market and Tradeswomen; Work

FEMININITY AND MASCULINITY

The medieval understanding of the concepts of femininity and masculinity was rich and complicated. Femininity and masculinity were terms that denoted gender expectations, that is, the social and cultural behavioral norms for men and women. These could vary significantly across social status, so that the appropriate behavior for men of the upper ranks of society was decidedly different than that appropriate for the common man. In a similar way, gender norms could also differ according to a man's religious status, that is, if he were a cleric or a monk or a bishop rather than a layman.

For women, the concept of femininity was distinguished in different ways than masculinity was for men. For example, religious women were expected to avoid feminine behavior because women who had taken vows of chastity were supposed to have rejected the earthly social roles of women. The rich literature of the Middle Ages presents aristocratic women displaying a form of femininity that appears at odds with responsibilities that these women were expected to shoulder in daily life. On the other hand, common women would have been criticized for putting on airs had they dared to behave according to the ideals held out for aristocratic women.

Another factor that rendered the notions of femininity and masculinity more complicated in medieval society is that they were values not only embedded in social expectation, but also characteristics linked to an individual's own temperament. As a result, various physiological factors could render men more or less masculine and women more or less feminine. Thus, the medieval view of femininity and masculinity was comprised of both the social expectations for men and women and their differing physiological characteristics.

The Physiology of Gender

According to the medical perspectives that medieval thinkers inherited from antiquity, men and women were found at different points on a continuum of sex and gender. One end of this continuum, the female end, was cold and wet; the other, male, end was characterized as hot and dry. This meant that in general a woman's temperament would be colder and wetter than that of a man. However, it was possible for biological women to be found all along the continuum, moving towards the masculine end. Consequently, such women, sometimes referred to as viragos, were believed to be more "manly." This nature might be manifested in physical factors such as strength or build, or in behavioral ways, such as in women who were braver or more intelligent than expected. Such women were frequently criticized by moralists for being headstrong or rebellious.

Men, too, could be found at different points on the continuum. Men who were colder in temperament were considered less virile and so better able to control—or less likely to experience—the urge to have sexual intercourse. Men who were extremely hot, on the other hand, would be so lusty that they would be liable to spontaneous emissions of semen, masturbation, or nocturnal emissions. If a man dissipated his natural heat through excessive intercourse or masturbation, he would become colder and weaker, less virile, and more like a woman. It was their natural heat that made men strong and physically superior to women.

Many of the differences ascribed to men and women were an outgrowth of their perceived biological, sexed natures. Men were considered to be active and women were passive in the Aristotelian system. This extended to the popular understanding of sexual intercourse and procreation. Women were sexually passive and it was up to men to initiate sex and it was men's semen that was critical in procreation (especially according to Aristotle). Even the two-seed theory of Galen, that taught that both men and women contributed semen that commingled to produce a fetus, also taught that women's semen was thinner and weaker than that of men. Men were the active sexual partners and women the passive bodies with which men had sex. In a variety of types of sources, ranging from court cases to manuals for confessors, men are described as having sex with women. A woman is never described as the active initiator of sex, nor is there attention given to how women might have experienced sex. This lack of attention is the logical consequence of women's biological inferiority and passivity. Thus, while men and women were on a single biological continuum, their innate natures reinforced the prevailing gender hierarchy that decreed men to be superior and active and women subordinate and passive in their social roles.

The Influence of Christianity

The understanding of femininity, in particular, was significantly influenced by Christianity and the theological interpretations of the Church Fathers and subsequent theologians. Christian Scripture placed women second in creation since Adam had been created first, with Eve coming from Adam's rib (Genesis 2:21–22). This, then, reinforced women's social subordination. Similarly, the Apostle Paul had instructed that women should be silent in church (1 Corinthians 14:34–35) and obedient to their husbands (Ephesians 5:22–25). These admonitions were incorporated into the medieval values for femininity. The ideal woman was chaste, silent, and obedient. This view of femininity encompassed the Virgin Mary herself, who exemplified obedience to God and, despite her special status, obedience to her earthly husband. As a result of the ethical interpretation that the Church Fathers overlaid on the biological understanding of the nature of gender, women were understood to be weaker and subordinate, both biologically and spiritually. Women were closer to nature and believed to be more consumed by lust and less guided by reason than were men. There was an inherent contradiction here, since lust correlated to heat, but women's weaker bodies were nevertheless more prone to lust despite being colder according to prevalent thinking. The result of this melding of science and theology was a social subordination of women, as well as a definition of femininity that reflected women's acceptance of that subordination.

As a result of the views of Church Fathers such as Jerome in the early Middle Ages, the ideal for women came to be a repression of femininity. If a woman were to refuse marriage and childbirth, and reject her female body and tame her desires through acts of penitence, she would become more virile, more manly. In this way, through repression of femaleness and femininity, a woman could enhance her gender identity, becoming more virile. Thus, nuns and other religious women were considered the epitome of womanhood, although they had explicitly rejected femininity, in particular the kind of secular femininity that would make them attractive as lovers, wives, and mothers.

Masculinity, too, was heavily influenced by Christian morality. The fundamental privileging of chastity for both male and female believers meant that men needed to tame their bodies and repress their natural heat. Through this struggle of the flesh a man would be able to prove his superiority by resisting the baser urges and exercising reason over desire. Similarly, Christian masculinity was built upon the model of Jesus' behavior recorded in scripture. Consequently, this view of masculinity incorporated the values of obedience to God and one's superiors, kindness, humility, and rejection of the riches of the world. Equally as important as chastity was the rejection of violence and military activities. Thus, monks who withdrew from the world and avoided the temptations of women, wealth, and worldly affairs were, in the early Middle Ages, the epitome of Christian masculinity. Their vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience summarized their rejection of secular values in favor of Christian ideals of manhood. Indeed, the behavior and values that Christianity promoted for both women and men were so similar that some scholars have suggested that medieval religious, both male and female, collectively formed a third gender in society.

Secular Femininity and Masculinity

The qualities of femininity and masculinity found in secular society were very different from those found in religious life. For women, secular gender norms confirmed the subordination of women found in scientific, medical, and theological discourses. Women were considered inconstant and faithless, prone to seducing men and being seduced by men. Consequently, women's nature needed to be constrained through obedience, first to their fathers and subsequently, to their husbands. Indeed, one sign of a man's masculinity was his ability to rule his household and control his wife, children, and servants. In this way, femininity as obedience and subordination reinforced masculinity as the right to exercise power and control.

Many of the ideal qualities identified as feminine were rooted in the courtly literature that began to appear in the late twelfth century and won increasing popularity throughout the remainder of the era. The deeds of King Arthur and his knights, in particular, captured the imagination of the aristocracy. In courtly romances, the ideal woman was a lady of rank, chaste and beautiful, and usually married. The grace and comeliness of her carriage and the elegance of her dress would attract the attention of the men of the court, usually the unmarried knights who owed their allegiance to the woman's husband. This view of women of the upper ranks of society, as presiding at feasts, attending jousts and other entertainments, and generally decorating their husbands' or fathers' court is in startling contrast to the qualities that real women needed to carry out their daily roles. The wife of a lord was expected to be an able household administrator, educate and rear their children, and possess the personal qualities that would permit her to exercise the authority of her husband, including military responsibilities, during his frequent absences. The qualities valued in practice, then, were at considerable odds with the feminine ideal presented in romances.

The qualities of secular masculinity grew out of the biological and scientific understanding of masculinity, coupled with those personal characteristics that were most needed in a world that was encountering military threats from invaders or neighbors. A truly masculine man was physically powerful and exhibited the martial skills that were needed to ensure the safety of his family, dependents, and lands. Among the lower ranks of society, this kind of masculinity could be demonstrated by a man's ability to be economically successful as a farmer or artisan, providing for his family and leaving his children a significant inheritance. Virility was also an important aspect of masculinity. A man was judged by his ability to have sex with women and engender children, in particular male heirs. This virility could manifest itself in male sexual promiscuity, adultery, and even rape. In the early Frankish kingdom, before the religious principal of marital monogamy had been fully ingrained in secular society, men would display their masculinity through taking numerous wives and concubines, then rearing the children of different mothers together in the same household. Even in the High Middle Ages, after the church had successfully imposed the view of sacramental marriage as monogamous and indissoluble, men continued to display their virility and sexual prowess through sexual conquests, sometimes through seduction, other times through violence.

One of the consequences of this focus on sexual virility as a sign of masculinity, was that female chastity came to be linked with a man's honor. Thus, virginity and chastity within marriage came to be regarded as the most important qualities for a woman. Her good name and chastity were the roots of her honor, and a wife or daughter's behavior stood as the source of a man's honor. Only a weak man, lacking in the qualities of masculinity, would be a cuckold or have a disobedient wife or daughter.

Gender Slippage and Other Anomalies

The intersection of social gender and biological sex, coupled with the contemporary understanding that femaleness and maleness were located on the same sex/gender continuum, resulted in many tensions in medieval society, surrounding the distinctions between men and women. For example, the appropriate position in which to engage in sexual intercourse was with the man on top, the woman supine below him. This clearly placed men in the superior and active position. Theologians, canonists, and even some medical writers decried the notion of sexual intercourse with the woman on top, since this overthrew the natural order of things. Similarly, there were strict rules governing the appropriate dress for men and women. Cross-dressing in the clothes of the opposite sex was strictly prohibited because it confused gender distinctions and gender roles. While women were not supposed to wear men's clothing, when they did so in order to disguise their sex so that they could travel safely or otherwise escape danger, or so they could render themselves invisible and not pose a sexual temptation to men, they were not punished. Occasionally, they were even praised for trying to reject their weakness and striving to be more like men. Men, on the other hand, were perceived to be rejecting their superior role and the privileges of masculinity if they took on the clothing of inferior women. This rejection of gender paradigms could be harshly punished because it suggested sexual as well as social transgression.

The body itself might also reveal a certain slippage on the sex/gender continuum, as men moved towards the more feminine end or women moved towards the more masculine end. An example of this kind of slippage is revealed in the stories of bearded female saints. In these stories, the women pray to be rescued from some kind of sexual threat such as marriage, rape, or a violent husband. Their prayers were answered by the growth of a heavy beard which so repulsed their pursuers that the women were rescued from them. According to medical theory, hair grew as a result of heat allowing it to push through the skin, which explained why warm men were hairier than cold women. Thus, as the woman moved away from the feminine end of the continuum and became more masculine by rejecting sexual desire, her temperament became warmer and she grew a beard.

Similarly, men who struggled to control desire tried to make their bodies cooler by leaping into vats of cold water or eating food designed to cool their temperament. Physical signs of effeminacy would correlate with a cooler body that was less susceptible to lust. As a result of this matrix of beliefs, medieval people believed that eunuchs did not experience sexual desire, although they were not always considered to be effeminate. The famous castratus, Peter Abelard, did not believe himself to be less of a man because he had been castrated. On the contrary, he extolled what he perceived to be his superior masculine freedom from the demands of the flesh. He was no longer subject to lust, which was characterized as effeminate weakness. It is, therefore, ironic that impotent men, who were genitally intact, were in fact considered less masculine because, even though they had genital organs, they were unable to exercise manly virility. The eunuch did not experience desire because of an external wound, whereas the impotent man was so because he lacked the requisite masculinity to be virile.

The concepts of femininity and masculinity were complicated, interrelated, and ultimately reflexive. In terms of physiology, femininity was a state of being not masculine, and masculinity was a state of being not feminine. While this sex/gender continuum could have allowed for a complementary evaluation of gender, it was in fact seen as putting femininity and masculinity in an hierarchical relationship that mirrored and reinforced the hierarchical relationship of men and women in society.

JACQUELINE MURRAY

References and Further Reading

- Allen, Prudence. The Concept of Woman. Vol. 1. The Aristotelian Revolution 750 BC–AD 1250. Montreal: Eden Press, 1985; Vol. 2. The Early Humanist Reformation 1250–1500. Grand Rapids, Mich.; Cambridge: Eerdmans, 2002.
- Beattie, Cordelia. "Gender and Femininity in Medieval England." In Writing Medieval History, edited by Nancy Partner. London: Hodder Arnold, 2005, pp. 153–170.
- Frantzen, Allen J. "When Women Aren't Enough." In Studying Medieval Women, edited by Nancy F. Partner. Cambridge, Mass., Medieval Academy of America, 1993. pp. 143–169.
- Gender in the Early Medieval World: East and West, 300–900*, edited by Leslie Brubaker and Julia M. H. Smith. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2004.
- Karras, Ruth Mazo. From Boys to Men. Formations of Masculinity in Late Medieval Europe. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2003.
- Karras, Ruth Mazo. Sexuality in Medieval Europe: Doing Unto Others. New York; London: Routledge, 2005.
- Lees, Clare A., and Thelma Fenster, ed. Medieval Masculinities. Regarding Men in the Middle Ages. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1994.
- Murray, Jacqueline, ed. Conflicting Identities and Multiple Masculinities: Men in the Medieval West. New York: Garland Publishing, 1999.
- Partner, Nancy F. "No Sex, No Gender." In Studying Medieval Women, edited by Nancy F. Partner. Cambridge, Mass., Medieval Academy of America, 1993, pp. 117–141.
- Salisbury, Joyce E. "Gendered Sexuality." In Handbook of Medieval Sexuality, edited by Vern L. Bullough and James A. Brundage. New York: Garland Publishing, 1996, pp. 81–102.

See also Aristotelian Concepts of Women and Gender; Asceticism; Chastity and Chaste Marriage; Chivalry; Church; Conduct Literature; Courtly Love; Cross-Dressing; Division of Labor; Eunuchs; Gender Ideologies; Honor and Reputation; Mary, Virgin; Monasticism and Nuns; Noble Women; Procreation and Ideas of Conception; Sexuality: Extramarital Sex; Sexuality: Female Same-Sex Relations; Sexuality: Male Same-Sex Relations; Sexuality, Regulation of; Sexuality: Sex in Marriage; Virginity; Virile Women

FEMINIST THEORIES AND METHODOLOGIES

Feminist study of the European Middle Ages has evolved over the last century or more, along with other areas of feminist scholarship, theory, and politics.

In the process, feminist scholars have opened mainstream medieval studies to interdisciplinary and comparative methods and topics. They have also fought for gender parity in university departments, professional societies, editorial boards, and publishing venues.

The first feminist critic of male-authored medieval history may well have been Geoffrey Chaucer's admirable, if fictional, Wife of Bath, who had already announced in the fourteenth century that if women had composed their own history, they would have "written more of men's wickedness than all the sons of Adam could set right." In her 1803 novel Northanger Abbey, the novelist Jane Austen followed Chaucer with a heroine who declared that medieval history was full of "the quarrels of popes and kings, with wars or pestilences, in every page; the men all so good for nothing, and hardly any women at all—it is very tiresome."

Entering the Academy

English medievalists benefited from this early tradition of womanist consciousness as well as the influence of liberal political philosophers such as Mary Wollstonecraft and John Stuart Mill, who decried women's political invisibility in eighteenth- and nineteenth-century Europe. A small but determined cadre of lady historians emerged in the later nineteenth century to correct the biases of history. They wrote genteel, popular biographies of famous medieval queens and antiquarian treatises about domestic topics, such as medieval gardens or costume. However, as women slowly gained access to professional training in historical and literary studies, among other intellectual pursuits, a few of them began to practice a more professional study of the medieval past. Admitted to university, they earned higher academic degrees and attempted the same sort of scientific studies and textual analyses as men, although they rarely received the same rewards. In most American and European academic institutions, women were educated separately until the early twentieth century and, with a few exceptions, female graduates who wished to become medieval scholars took jobs in women's colleges or lower-status positions as archivists and librarians.

Girton College, Cambridge, the first women's college in England and the alma mater of famous suffragists, produced several pioneering medievalists. Bertha Phillpots was a Scandinavianist whose first published work on medieval kinship appeared in 1913. Eileen Power, who also studied at the Sorbonne in Paris, was a well-respected professor of medieval economics and society, who eventually became a professor of economic history at the London School of Economics. She later became a professor at Cambridge University and founded the Economic History Review. Eleanor Shipley Duckett produced numerous books and articles on early medieval culture and religion, and finished her teaching career at Smith College. As she recounted later in life, when she was a student in Cambridge she had taken her work to a male professor who had asked her, “Do you want me to judge it on its own merits or as the work of a woman?”

Around the time that Duckett received this snub, yet another English observer turned feminist scholarship in a new direction by criticizing the academic segregation of women and the neglect of women’s past by university professionals. In A Room of One’s Own (1929), Virginia Woolf recounted her experience in trying to enter a library at Oxford only to be rebuffed by a doorman anxious to protect the exclusive access of men. “He was a Beadle,” Woolf wrote, “I was a woman. This was the turf; there was the path. Only Fellows and Scholars are allowed here; the gravel is the place for me.” She concluded that men needed to belittle women politically as well as intellectually in order to “enlarge” themselves.

Finding Sources

Perhaps inspired by Woolf or by similar experiences of sexism, a few professional female medievalists decided to focus their academic skills on the subject of women in political and social contexts. Power produced the first synthesis of medieval women’s history in 1926; no comparable survey of women’s past followed until fifty years later. Still, even feminist scholars had difficulty finding appropriate source materials for the study of medieval women. Most medieval documents were written and kept by men, and recounted the actions and thoughts of men. Even when scholars could find female-authored documents, they treated women’s texts—mystical treatises, poetry, romances, letters—as less important than mainstream documents such as chronicles, charters, theology, and formal literature. Art historians, too, dismissed the works of medieval women as domestic crafts or folk art.

A few historians, such as Lina Eckenstein, Emily Putnam, and Power, seized on the relatively plentiful evidence by and about religious women to study nuns and abbesses. This is still a major area of research for medievalist feminists. Although these early historians praised the accomplishments of medieval religious women, they also argued that the medieval convent oppressed women. In keeping with social reformers of the early twentieth century, Putnam believed that society normally limited women’s options to child-bearing and mothering and, further, that only extraordinary medieval women entered nunneries primarily to escape domestic duties and the violent world of men. She did not consider the possibility of nuns’ agency or genuine spiritual vocations. Nonetheless, such work opened the world of female religiosity to historians.

As more scholars began to recover a variety of texts produced by women, and as more women gained access to higher education in modern universities, they expanded their analyses to ordinary women and men of the medieval past. Both politics and the modern study of social sciences propelled these feminist scholars. The suffrage movements in England and the United States pushed intellectuals everywhere to consider women’s disenfranchisement and its origins. Consequently, medievalists delved into the sources of disenfranchisement. Florence Buckstaff examined women’s property and legal rights in Anglo-Saxon England, earning a degree at the University of Wisconsin in the 1890s with her thesis on Anglo-Saxon women’s property rights. Women’s participation in labor movements and leftist political movements also inspired medievalists. Mary Bateson, influenced by the legal historian Frederic William Maitland, began her career with careful studies of medieval English local law but also produced a classic study of mixed-sex religious communities.

Applying the Social Sciences

Meanwhile, the wide-ranging studies of the French medievalist Marc Bloch and colleagues at the Parisian journal Annales: Économies, Sociétés, et Civilisations—known as Annalistes—pushed European historians to consider such new and inclusive topics as peasants, labor, popular religion, cultural change, and mentalities. All of these foci were easier to apply to women than the traditional study of elite politics and intellectual history. The Annalistes drew heavily on social sciences, especially anthropology, which generated scientific and comparative methods for studying “primitive” non-Western or illiterate peoples and non-elites. Other social sciences, such as demography and geography helped too; although medieval documents tended to undercount females, as well as children, non-Christians, and the unfree, population studies necessarily tried to be inclusive. Although these approaches did not yield an immediate feminization of medieval studies, the application of social science methods prepared the way for a great historiographical shift in the 1960s and 1970s, such as the groundbreaking social history of David Herlihy and Christiane Klapisch-Züber. They gathered extensive data from late medieval household censuses in Italy and used this information to analyze family relations, household economics, and other important aspects of daily life.

Feminist Theory

Explicitly feminist approaches to medieval studies proliferated when the women's movement gained momentum in the 1960s. Feminist theorists such as Simone de Beauvoir and Betty Friedan were widely influential among liberal academics who rushed to apply their insights to the medieval past. In The Second Sex (1949), Beauvoir posited her theory of women as the "Other," arguing that intellectuals throughout history have treated men as the human standard by which to judge women as inherently inferior. Betty Friedan in The Feminine Mystique (1963) suggested that modern American housewives colluded in their inferiority by depending financially, socially, and politically on men. Inspired by these and other theorists, some medievalist scholars shifted their focus to issues of power and women's oppression in the past. Marxist theorists such as Friedrich Engels had long ago located the source of women's oppression in the development of the nuclear family, private property, and the nation-state. Medievalists joined the effort to uncover other sources of women's oppression and outline women's strategies for empowerment.

To recover women's past, scholars needed first to expand the parameters of medieval studies to include new topics and different evidence. Liberal feminist scholars attempted to count and include women, make them "visible," and hear their "voices." Beginning in the 1970s, historians such as Suzanne Wemple, Susan Mosher Stuard, Jo Ann McNamara, and their students examined mainstream documents such as charters, chronicles, laws, and saints' lives for incidental evidence about women's experiences and thus calculate their power or lack of it. Wemple investigated the many social roles and economic opportunities of wives, mothers, saints, patronesses, workers, and queens of continental Europe. Other medievalists examined neglected political-sexual issues such as childbearing, rape, and infanticide in both literature and historical situations.

Women's Writings

At the same time, literary scholars also culled the manuscripts for woman-authored texts and published new editions of medieval women's writings. Christine de Pizan, Marie de France, Hildegard of Bingen, and the women troubadours (called trobairitz) all enjoyed a renaissance of popularity during the 1970s and 1980s. Other prominent religious women, such as the abbess Heloise (1101–1164, former lover of Peter Abelard), the mystic and saint Catherine of Siena (1347–1380), and another mystic and author, Margery Kempe (b. c. 1373), earned permanent places in the canon of medieval literature. The twelfth-century writer of medieval French romances, Marie de France, became as famous as her male competition, Chrétien de Troyes. Art historians, meanwhile, began to search for women's contributions to art, especially the creation and patronage of manuscripts and religious objects, for instance, the precious Books of Hours so popular among late medieval noblewomen.

Scholars also employed feminist perspectives on symbols and themes in medieval art and literature. For instance, instead of analyzing the heroes of romance, such as Tristan, they wrote about heroines such as Isolde and secondary female characters such as her serving women; instead of combing epics and poetry to learn about warrior ethics and kingship, they looked at social relations, sex and sexuality, and motherhood. They pointed out instances of women's solidarity and subversion in medieval texts and images. They also examined the sources and effects of misogyny in medieval literature and theology; R. Howard Bloch, for instance, argued that modern romantic ideals of heterosexual love derived from traditions of antifeminism in medieval and classical writings. Drawing on postmodern literary theories, they identified the many competing voices—some female—that existed in single works. They also compared male and female authorship of texts to find out whether medieval women had different concerns and issues or took gender-specific positions. Together, medievalist scholars helped to challenge the traditional canons of Western literature and art and promoted consciousness of issues of gender and race.

Difference

A second analytical trend drew on feminist theories of difference, exemplified by the work of Adrienne Rich and Mary Daly, as well as sociologists such as Carol Gilligan and Nancy Chodorow. Drawing on these theorists and social scientists, some scholars of the medieval past segregated women's history and women's literature from the history and literature of men, based on the assumption that because women were different by both nature and nurture, their historical experiences were inherently distinct. Scholars crafted studies of exclusively woman-authored literature, women's spiritualities, women's communities, and female perspective on matters ranging from sex to scholastic theology. During this period of the 1970s and 1980s, readers of women's literature and history began to proliferate. Caroline Walker Bynum contributed to this trend with her study of women's bodily focused spirituality, Holy Feast and Holy Fast. Bynum demonstrated both a unique, feminine interpretation of Christian doctrine and how that interpretation infiltrated mainstream religiosity. Scholars of religion such as Rosemary Radford Ruether and Barbara Newman similarly posited women's gender-specific religiosity because of their exclusion from mainstream Christian tradition. They applied this position to scriptural texts and works of women mystics. Other scholars sought the pre-patriarchal religions that they believed had preceded both patriarchy and modern world monotheisms such as Christianity and Judaism. In addition, as medievalists have begun to acknowledge the dominance of western European Christian women as subjects of study, they have simultaneously sought to understand the experiences of non-Europeans and non-Christians. Some important studies of Jewish and Muslim women appeared during the last decades of the twentieth century, including the work of Judith Baskin, Cheryl Tallan, Gavin Hambly, and Howard Adelman.

Self-styled radical feminist medievalists expanded on this line of thinking, arguing that not only culture and texts were gendered but language itself was a masculine operation and that, as a result, women needed their own modes of symbolic expression. Julia Kristeva, not a medievalist, examined the medieval cult of the Virgin Mary, arguing that the modern world lacks an adequate discourse for maternity. We have religious ideas, which relegate maternity to the Universal Mother; and we have science, which identifies mothers and mothering with Nature. However, we have no women's language for an essentially womanly experience. More recently, the medievalist Kathleen Biddick has argued that the entire concept of "medieval" is inherently Christian and masculine, thus inapplicable to women's experience in the past. Medievalists have also applied the theoretical work of a number of postmodernist theorists of literature, history, and anthropology—Michel Foucault, Pierre Bourdieu, Teresa de Lauretis, and Judith Butler, among others—to topics ranging from church architecture to medieval theater. Butler's theories of performative gender have been especially influential among scholars of medieval literatures who work on issues of sexuality, masculinity, queer studies, and heterosexism.

The Human Body

In addition to theoretically inclined feminist analyses of the medieval past and its literatures, medievalists—again following Bynum's lead—tackled the human body as a subject for analysis. Bynum's work on the food ways of medieval mystics critiqued the tendency of Western thinkers to identify women and femaleness with the physical body. She argued that Christian theologians of both medieval and modern periods have used the metaphors of Eve and Mary to symbolize, respectively, sinful humanity and the redeemable soul. Bynum showed how the mystics were able to manipulate and subvert this ideological duality with reference to their own fasting bodies. Other medievalists began to consider the sexual bodies of women and men in the Middle Ages and their symbolic ranges, trying to grasp how medieval Europeans understood their bodies and the operations of bodies, and how they used bodies to mean other ideas. Several authors, such as Joan Cadden and Monica Green, have focused specifically on medieval medicine and biological thought in relation to women.

Gender

One more development in feminist approaches to the Middle Ages has been its turn toward the study of gender rather than women per se. Some scholars, such as Allen Franzen, have argued that the work of feminists is finished and that gender studies and queer theory are the next logical step for medievalists. The American historian Joan Scott has famously called for historians to apply "the lens of gender" to analysis of the past, arguing that we should try to understand the operations of all genders within cultural, social, and political systems. The results have been diverse and fruitful: from studies of sexuality and pervasive heterosexism; to books on men and medieval masculinity; to examinations of gender's operations in arenas previously unconsidered. One collection of articles, Gendering the Master Narrative, called for a re-examination of feminist methods and scholarly practice based on the premise that no single analysis can adequately address the many experiences of medieval women. Just as twenty-first-century feminist activists have concluded that there is—and must be—no single dominant feminism but instead many “feminisms,” so medievalists are resisting the kind of reductive surveys that Eileen Power wrote almost a century ago. Rather than trying to articulate the experiences of all medieval women, scholars of gender seek to understand particular operations of gender in the medieval past, an effort that overlaps with feminism but is not identical to it.

Throughout the academic world, scholars continue to employ feminist approaches to the medieval past described here, from the simple inclusion of prominent women in straightforward historical narratives to densely theoretical work on gender. Just as no single work can adequately address women’s experiences during the thousand years of the Middle Ages, no single method or disciplinary approach suffices for feminist study of the past. It would be anachronistic to think that modern feminists can use their politics to explain medieval women. But it would also be rash to discard the long history of feminist and womanist thought and action that we have inherited from earlier thinkers. At the very least, more than a century of feminist scholarship has added more evidence, more subjects of inquiry, and even more (female) scholars to medieval studies.

LISA BITEL

References and Further Reading

- Bateson, Mary. “The Origin and Early History of Double Monasteries.” Royal Historical Society 13 (1899): 137–198.
- Berg, Maxine. A Woman in History: Eileen Power, 1889–1940. Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1996.
- Biddick, Kathleen. “Genders, Bodies, Borders: Technologies of the Visible.” Speculum 68 (1993): 398–413.
- . The Typological Imaginary: Circumcision, Technology, History. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2003.
- Bloch, R. Howard. Medieval Misogyny and the Invention of Western Romantic Love. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1991.
- Bloss, Celestia Angenette. Heroines of the Crusades. Auburn: Alden and Beardsley, 1855.
- Buckstaff, Florence G. “Married Women’s Property in Anglo-Saxon and Anglo-Norman Law.” Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science 4 (1893–1894): 233–264.
- Bynum, Caroline Walker. Holy Feast and Holy Fast: The Religious Significance of Food to Medieval Women. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1987.
- Duckett, Eleanor Shipley. “Women and their Letters in the Early Middle Ages.” Pamphlet, Smith College, Northampton, Mass., 1964; cited in Susan Stuard, Women in Medieval Society (Philadelphia, 1976), 2.
- Eckenstein, Lina. Woman Under Monasticism; Chapters on Saint-lore and Convent Life Between A.D. 500 and A.D. 1500. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1896.
- Erler, Mary C. and Maryanne Kowaleski, eds. Gendering the Master Narrative: Gender and Power in the Middle Ages. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2003.
- Franzen, Allen. “When Women Aren’t Enough.” Speculum 68 (1993): 445–471.
- Herlihy, David. “Life Expectancies for Women.” In The Role of Woman in the Middle Ages, edited by Theresa Morewedge, Albany: State University of New York Press, 1975: 1–22.
- Herlihy, David, and Christiane Klapisch-Züber. Les Toscans et leurs familles: une étude du Catasto florentin de 1427. Paris, 1978.
- Kemp-Welch, Alice. “Medieaeval Gardens.” Monthly Review 19: 3 (1905): 46–57.
- Kristeva, Julia. “Hérétique de l’amour.” Tel quel 74 (Winter 1977): 30–49.
- McNamara, Jo Ann and Suzanne F. Wemple. “The Power of Women Through the Family.” Feminist Studies 1 (1973): 126–141.
- Power, Eileen. Medieval English Nunneries c. 1275 to 1535. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1922.
- . “The Position of Women.” In The Legacy of the Middle Ages, edited by G. C. Crump and E. F. Jacob. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1926, pp. 401–433.
- Putnam, Emily James. The Lady: Studies of Certain Significant Phases of Her History. New York: Sturgist Walton, 1910.
- Scott, Joan Wallach. “Gender: A Useful Category of Analysis.” American Historical Review 91 (1986): 1053–1075.
- Stuard, Susan Mosher. “The Family Confronts the Renaissance Household.” Journal of Interdisciplinary History 11:2 (1981): 495–501.
- Women Medievalists and the Academy*, edited by Jane Chance. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 2005.

See also Annales School of History; Body in Literature and Religion; Body, Visual Reparations of; Demography; Femininity and Masculinity; Gender Ideologies; Gender in Art; Gender in History; History, Medieval Women’s; Monasticism and Nuns; Patronage, Artistic; Patronage, Ecclesiastical; Patronage, Literary; Power, Eileen; Sexuality: Extramarital Sex; Sexuality: Female Same-Sex Relations; Sexuality: Male Same-Sex Relations; Sexuality, Regulation of; Sexuality: Sex in Marriage; Women Authors: German Texts; Women Authors: Italian Texts; Women Authors: Latin Texts; Women Authors: Middle English Texts; Women Authors: Old French Texts; Women Authors: Spanish Texts; Women Medievalists in the Academy

FESTIVALS OF MISRULE

The female image was of the utmost importance in the medieval festivals of Misrule and rituals of reversal that clustered in the “Twelve Days of Christmas” and the pre-Lenten Carnival season, as well as appearing occasionally in Springtide festivals. These representations, however, were almost exclusively in the hands of men. Cross-dressing was ubiquitous but tended to be all in one direction. It was naturally one of the first of the role-reversals to suggest itself to ebullient, usually youthful, male revelers. Clerical prohibitions of such practices go back to the early Middle Ages. By contrast there is little documentation for women's cross-dressing until well into the early modern period. Nevertheless, such activity must certainly have occurred, if perhaps not in great profusion. In the Kirk Sessions records of Presbyterian Elgin in Scotland, for example, we find a prohibition that "nather women to be cled in mens apparel nor men in womens apparel" during the Christmas season, as well as a January 4, 1600, judgment against "Marion Andersone for guysing through the toun in menis claythis" for which she was to be "put in the joiggis" (Cramond, ii, 158 & 77). Such solo performances could not have been entirely unheard of in the earlier medieval period.

Male festival cross-dressing was usually of a grotesque nature. The impersonated woman might be "the Dirty Bride" as in Bruegel's engraving, "The Marriage of Mopsus and Nisa" (also a vignette within his great painting "The Battle of Carnival and Lent") (Klein, 66–67). The character-type might be pregnant and searching for the father of her child among the male spectatorship, or come already burdened with many dolls upon her back as with "Bessy Big Head" in the English Mummers' Play (eighteenth to twentieth centuries). The Virago, whether a peasant or a bourgeois wife, was much in evidence in the drama of the Christmas and Carnival seasons particularly in the Fastnachtspiele (Carnival plays) of Nuremberg (fifteenth to seventeenth centuries). It was a short step then to the Crone who might be paired with a grotesque Old Man for simulated sex in Balkan folk mummeries. In more recent times the Witch became a popular masquerade in many Carnival societies of the Black Forest.

The beautiful female impersonation seems not so prevalent in the medieval period, the noble Amazon and other exotic queens, nymphs, and fairies only becoming popular as male masquerade figures in the Renaissance at the same time that the drama brought female cross-dressing to its peak with such characters as Rosalind, Viola, and Portia, still played by men of course. It is difficult to say if the late medieval/early modern figure of Minne, the love goddess or femme fatale was widely enacted for festival/satirical purposes, with her sewing up and selling foolscaps to the male population, enticing winged fools into birdtraps, shaking young fools out of a tree, etc., or whether she remained largely a creation of the new print medium. The grotesque female impersonation seems to have prevailed in both urban and rural culture.

Female personifications of the festival or principal of Misrule are also known, whether enacted, represented by an effigy, or simply posited as a literary or visual idea. Erasmus's goddess Moria was not simply a spirited intellectual exercise but was embodied in various "mothers" as the chief figures in the urban fool-societies of late medieval France. There was a Mère Follie in Dijon, a Mère Sotte in Paris, a Mère d'Enfance in Bordeaux, and so on (Davis, 139). Capering fools emerged from beneath Mère Follie's voluminous skirts onto the festival streets in a travesty of multiple birth. Since the term Fastnacht (Eve of the Fast) is feminine in the Germanic languages, female personifications naturally presented themselves. The mythographer Fulgentius envisioned Fastnacht as a veiled woman with a crown of willow branches, a scepter in her right hand, and a parti-colored fool's vestment in her left, drawn in a cart by four white horses (Schmeller, 764). Frau Fasnacht or Alti Dante (Old Aunt) remains a traditional mask-type in the Baseler Fasnacht. Such female personifications, however, hardly compete in number with the King Carnivals or Christmas Princes in the performance history of Misrule. Conversely, the personification of the anti-festive Lent might also be female, as in Bruegel's "Battle of Carnival and Lent" where she is a pale, desiccated nun opposing a beefy Sir Carnival.

It is clear that these female representations in the festivals of Misrule reflect the patriarchal hegemony of the Middle Ages with its pervasive and largely unexamined misogyny. They tend to support the "safety valve" theory of carnivalesque performances wherein the topsy-turvy world, after its brief reign, ultimately reinforces the status quo. Natalie Zemon Davis in a still very relevant 1975 article, "Women on Top," argues, however, for a more complex view of the phenomenon. In certain circumstance, she maintains, the topos of the Unruly Woman could afford late medieval/early modern women (as well as men for that matter) with opportunities for social critique and even radical action within the broader festival context. Still we have relatively little in the way of documentation for an autonomous feminine view of early festive culture. Nuns in sixteenth-century Venice managed to maintain their own Carnival despite male oversight: "Sometimes the nuns sing profane songs, and they play the guitar and lute, and they dress up as men in order to put on plays" (Laven, 140). The English "Hocketide" presents a rather complete ritual action of "women on top." On the second Monday after Easter the village women capture any males they might come across, bind them with ropes, and hold them prisoner until they paid a festival ransom (Simpson and Roud, 180–181). It is a practice of some antiquity; attempts to suppress it in London dating from 1406 and 1409, for example. Weiberfastnacht (Women's Carnival) in Cologne, the Thursday before Ash Wednesday is another clear-cut festival of female empowerment in which women take over the city and engage in such transgressive and symbolic acts as clipping off men's neckties (Thompson and Carlson). The festival is a modern invention, a direct response by local women to their exclusion from the Kölner Karneval as it evolved in the early nineteenth century. One can surmise, however, that similar rebellious energies were at work in earlier centuries, as the Hocktide custom demonstrates.

As critical theorist Mary Russo, echoing Natalie Davis, remarks, "The gender asymmetries in masquerade have yet to be fully addressed" (Russo, 7). Some recent Carnival scholarship has begun seriously to address gender issues. Deborah Puccio has examined the present festival in the Pyrenees and the Slovenian Alps; Francesca Cappelletto in the Italian town of Bagolino; and David Gilmore in Spain. While one cannot automatically extrapolate from their finding back to medieval women in their festive mode, this new sensitivity to gender issues and the question of female representation in masquerade can only help to flesh out the rather meager record of women and the practice of misrule in centuries past.

MARTIN W. WALSH

References and Further Reading

- Cappelletto, Francesca. Il Carnevale: Organizzazione sociale e pratiche cerimoniali a Bagolino. Brescia: Grafo, 1995.
- Cramond, William, ed. The Records of Elgin, 1234–1800. 2 vols. Aberdeen: New Spalding Club, 1903.
- Davis, Natalie Zemon. "The Reasons of Misrule" and "Women on Top." In Society and Culture in Early Modern France. Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1975, pp. 97–123; 124–151.
- French, Katherine L. "'To Free Them from Binding': Women in the Late Medieval English Parish." Journal of Interdisciplinary History 27.3 (1997): 387–412.
- Gilmore, David D. Carnival and Culture: Sex, Symbol, and Status in Spain. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1998.
- Klein, H. Arthur. Graphic Worlds of Peter Bruegel the Elder. New York: Dover, 1963.
- Laven, Mary. Virgins of Venice: Broken Vows and Cloistered Lives in Renaissance Venice. New York: Viking, 2002.
- Puccio, Deborah. Masques et dévoilements: Jeux du féminin dans les rituels carnavalesque et nuptiaux. Paris: CNRS Éditions, 2002.
- Russo, Mary. "Female Grotesques: Carnival and Theory." Working Paper No. 1, Center for Twentieth Century Studies, University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee, Fall 1985.
- Schmeller, Johan Andrea. "Die Fasnacht, Fastnacht." In Bayerisches Wörterbuch. Munich: R. Oldenbourg, 1996.
- Simpson, Jacqueline, and Steve Roud. A Dictionary of English Folklore. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- Thompson, Sue Ellen, and Barbara W. Carlson. Holidays, Festivals, and Celebrations of the World Dictionary. Detroit: Omnigraphics, 1994.

See also Cross-Dressing; Gender Ideologies; Misogyny; Patriarchy and Patrilineage; Woman on Top

FINA OF SAN GIMIGNANO

Fina dei Ciardi (1238–1253) was a reclusive, ascetic virgin who died at age fifteen and was soon thereafter named patron saint of her hometown, San Gimignano. Little is known about her actual life apart from the testimonies of witnesses appended to her official vita. She was not affiliated with a religious order, though her vita was composed about 1300 by a local Dominican, Fra Giovanni del Coppo. Her biography conforms to a model of mendicant piety focused on imitation of Christ's Passion while it abounds with other familiar topoi drawn from hagiographic tradition.

According to the vita, Fina was born to an impoverished noble family. As a very young girl she began a life of reclusion at home and practiced extreme asceticism that included fasting, wearing a coarse hair shirt, and self-flagellation. At age ten she was struck with a paralyzing illness that prevented the movement of her body. She chose to lie on a hard board, voluntarily increasing her suffering in imitation of Christ on the Cross. While lying on the board over a period of five years, she endured numerous hardships, including the decay of her body, mice eating away at her rotting flesh, and the death of her mother. Finally, Saint Gregory the Great appeared to her in a vision and announced her imminent death. Thereafter, her pain increased. Following her death eight days later, miracles began to occur. The town erected a shrine and later a chapel in the Collegiata of San Gimignano, where her cult is still celebrated today. Although Fina was never officially canonized, she was considered a bona fide saint locally.

LINDA A. KOCH

References and Further Reading

- Coppo, Fra Giovanni del. The Legend of Holy Fina, Virgin of Santo Gimignano. New York, Duffield, London: Chatto and Windus, 1908. Reprint, New York, 1966.
- Frugoni, Chiara. "The City and the 'New Saints'." In City States in Classical Antiquity and Medieval Italy, edited by Anthony Mohlo, Kurt Raaflaub, and Julia Emlen. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1991, pp. 71–91.
- Koch, Linda A. "The Portrayal of Female Sainthood in Renaissance San Gimignano: Ghirlandajo's Frescoes of Santa Fina's Legend." Artibus et Historiae, 19, 1998, pp. 143–170.
- Vichi Imberciadori, Jole. Fina dei Ciardi: Un simbolo nella realtà storica e sociale di San Gimignano. San Gimignano: Graficalito, 1979.

See also Disabilities; Girls and Boys; Hagiography; Italy; Laywomen, Religious

FLAMENCA

See Romance of Flamenca

FLANDERS

Advantageously located astride a number of trade routes and blessed with many towns and a thriving textile industry, the county of Flanders (western Belgium and northern France) had become the commercial and industrial center of medieval northern Europe by the eleventh century. Economic dynamics were inherently opposed to the maintenance of traditional feudal and religious practices. The buying, manufacture, transportation, and selling of goods did not fit into the military ethos that engendered feudalism, nor was it easily accommodated to the isolated, spiritual context of medieval religion. Preconceptions rooted in feudal and religious order, although by no means without influence in medieval Flanders, took a back seat to economic demands.

Women could be found at all levels of Flemish society. The extent of their public activity repeatedly surprised foreign visitors to the region. Women functioned as castellans, financial receivers, abbesses, and countesses; for most of the thirteenth century, for example, the country was ruled by Countess Joanna (1204–1244) and Countess Margaret (1244–1280). Women tanned hides, ran inns, sold fruit, and butchered meat. They were indispensable to the textile industry as carders, spinners, warpers, dyers, and even as weavers. They were also drapers, employing both men and women in the manufacture of cloth sold as far away as Novgorod, Russia.

Associated with the constancy and breadth of women's economic activities came relative economic autonomy. In 1355, for example, an alderman of Ghent granted a marital separation because both parties could pay their own bills. The routine reference to practitioners of a wide range of trades in both masculine and feminine by the aldermen of Douai moreover suggests that women were commonly regarded as merchants and tradespeople in their own right.

Economic autonomy was made possible in part by a Germanic system of customary law—based more on negotiation among groups than on decisions of constituted authorities—that prevailed in Flanders until the advent of Roman law in the fifteenth century. Both men and women had experience with drawing up wills and contracts as well as with resolving their disputes and paying fees and fines before public audiences comprising aldermen and citizens of both genders. Aldermanic ordinances from Douai, for their part, include very few that solely target men or women. One such ordinance established a hospital exclusively for pregnant citizens; another forbade women from returning to work for at least a month after childbirth. There were, in fact, few social spaces that were peculiarly “male” or “female”; segregation of the sexes became common only much later, at the end of the Ancien Régime.

Distinctive religious factors also reflect women's relative autonomous status. While Flanders was home to numerous monasteries and abbeys, the county had no episcopal see within its borders; it was far less subject to episcopal influence than were many other parts of Europe. In addition, there were a number of convents, such as Flines, Marquette, and Messines, whose powerful abbesses were embroiled in most of the religious and secular affairs of their respective regions. Flanders also saw one of the greatest flowerings of the Beguine movement, a peculiarly female and urban movement made possible by medieval Flemish social and economic conditions. Pious but unprofessed women, Beguines frequently lived collectively in communal institutions called beguinages, located in the towns where most of them worked.

To be sure, the Flemish cultural area was no stranger to patriarchy. There, as elsewhere, women were commonly defined as someone's daughter, wife, or widow. But such practices were not necessarily routine; in accounts, for example, the names of most women appear without any form of associative identification. Nonetheless, single people in the county remained at a disadvantage when compared to married ones. A single person, after all, had at his or her disposal only one income and only one person's labor. And while single women with children were recognized as legitimate social units, they often made up a large percentage of the very poor. Most medieval societies were uneasy with single men and women; both were expected to marry.

The independent public actions undertaken by married women in Flanders nonetheless differed very little from those of their unmarried counterparts. A number of circumstances determined the position of women within marriage. Both men and women married fairly late, at around twenty-five. There appears to have been no shortage of possible marriage partners; both men and women were comfortably enough established that they could afford to be selective. Alternatively, both may have worked until they could bring enough income or property into the relationship to enable the young couple to survive. Any property acquired during the marriage was held jointly. At the dissolution of a marriage, for whatever reason, property reverted to the family to whom it had originally belonged. Because Flemish inheritance customs privileged the spouse over progeny, joint property usually devolved onto the surviving partner. This practice diminished the significance of fathers while simultaneously raising that of wives. Moreover, when one parent died, the other, regardless of sex, usually took over the guardianship of any minor children; a child who lost either parent was considered to be an orphan. Finally, no great educational gap separated the sexes. Both girls and boys in most towns attended schools where they were taught how to read, write, and cipher, often in both Flemish and French.

With the exception of the office of bailiff, the only public offices whose functions women did not exercise were those that were collective in nature. Women functioned as abbesses, as castellans, and as countesses, but never as aldermen. They were thus denied the collective experience of exercising power in public as women. There is no doubt that routine association of collective decision-making with men tended to promote gendered conceptualizations of authority. Correspondingly, women's isolation as single and occasional authorities may well have contributed to a perception that their authoritative status as (and perhaps by extension, their social participation in general) was exceptional. Such perceptions would be consolidated by social, economic, and political changes during the later Burgundian period.

ELLEN E. KITTELL

References and Further Reading

- Godding Philippe. Le droit privé dans les Pays-Bas méridionaux du 12e au 18e siècle. Brussels: Palais des Académies, 1987.
- Kittell, Ellen E. "Guardianship over Women in Medieval Flanders: A Reappraisal." Journal of Social History, 13(4) (Summer, 1998): 897–930.
- . "Women, Audience and Public Acts in Medieval Flanders." Journal of Women's History 10 n. 3 (Fall 1998): 74–96.
- Kittell, Ellen E., and Kurt Queller. "'Whether Man or Women': Gender Inclusivity in the Town Ordinances of Medieval Douai." The Journal of Medieval and Early Modern Studies 30 n. 1 (Winter 2000): 63–100.
- Kittell, Ellen, and Mary Suydam, eds. The Texture of Society: Medieval Women in the Southern Low Countries. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004.
- Simons, Walter. Cities of Ladies. Beguine Communities in the Medieval Low Countries, 1200–1565. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001.

See also Beguines; Burgundian Netherlands; Cities and Towns; Clothwork, Domestic; Education, Lay; Hade-wijch; Landholding and Property Rights; Market and Tradeswomen; Marriage, Christian; Monasticism and Nuns; Singlewomen; Textile Production for the Market; Work

FLOIRE AND BLANCHEFLOR

The story of Floire and Blanchefflor enjoyed great popularity in many parts of Europe throughout the medieval period. Today, manuscripts survive in French, English, High and Low German, Dutch, several Scandinavian languages, Italian, and Spanish. The oldest extant manuscript in any language is a German text fragment (c. 1170–1180), though it is assumed that the oldest European variant of the tale was French (c. 1150–1160). Several literary historians have argued for a Byzantine, Persian, or Arabic origin of the story. Literary historians distinguish between a version aristocratique (aristocratic version) and a version populaire (popular version), the former being less plot-driven and adventure-laden than the latter and presenting instead detailed descriptions of localities and emotions.

Floire, the son of a Muslim king, and Blanchefflor, the daughter of his mother's Christian lady-in-waiting, fell in love while still in their cradles and became inseparable thereafter. The boy's parents objected to the relationship, citing insurmountable differences of religion and class. Pretending that Blanchefflor died, the parents secretly sold the girl to Babylonian merchants. Blanchefflor became the prized possession of a cruel Babylonian ruler who followed a ritual of marrying and then—after the course of one year—killing the women he desires. Floire eventually learned the truth about his beloved. Disguised as a merchant, he traveled east, and by means of wit and deception managed to free Blanchefflor. The two lovers returned to Floire's home country after receiving word that Floire's father has died and that the country is awaiting the return of its new ruler.

The story offers exceedingly rich material to students and scholars interested in pursuing feminist and gender-related inquiry with regard to medieval literature, be it in the realm of masculinity studies, the exploration of the intersections of sex, gender, race, class and religion, or the examination of the overlapping discourses of love, economic exchange, and female commodification present in this text.

KATHARINA ALTPETER-JONES

References and Further Reading

- Grieve, Patricia E. "Floire and Blanchefflor" and the European Romance. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997.
- Kelly, Kathleen Coyne. "The Bartering of Blanchefflor in the Middle English Floris and Blanchefflor." Studies in Philology 91.2 (1994): 101–110.
- McCaffrey, Phillip. "Sexual Identity in 'Floire et Blanchefflor' and 'Ami et Amile.'" In Gender Transgressions: Crossing the Normative Boundary in Old French Literature, edited by Karen J. Taylor. New York: Garland, 1998, pp. 129–152.
- Schäfer, Verena. Flore und Blanchefflor—Epos und Volksbuch: Textversionen und die verschiedenen Illustrationen bis ins 19. Jahrhundert: Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der Illustration. Munich: Tuduv-Verlagsgesellschaft, 1984.

See also Muslim Women: Western Literature; Roman de Silence; Romance, English; French; Romance, German

FORTEVRAULT, ABBEY AND ORDER OF

Founded by the wandering preacher Robert of Arbrissel in 1101 in the Loire valley region of western France, Fontevrault was a unique "double" monastery that included both men and women, but in which the women predominated and ruled. Robert responded to criticism of his unorthodox intimacy with women, which apparently included sleeping with them chastely as part of an ascetic effort to master desire, by regularizing his followers' religious life in a monastic setting. Open to people of all conditions, the twelfth-century monastery included separate complexes for men, lepers, penitent prostitutes, and choir nuns. Double monasteries, in which monks and nuns lived in a single, albeit sexually segregated community, were fairly common during the period of intense religious enthusiasm in the later eleventh and early twelfth centuries. In predominantly female houses, like Fontevrault, a smaller group of monks were assigned to provide the sisters with the religious and worldly services, including priestly duties and the management of landed estates, that were forbidden to or deemed improper for cloistered women. But after the mid-twelfth century a misogynistic reaction set in that made it difficult for mixed communities to survive, as male clerics increasingly complained of economic burdens and the dangers of sexual corruption. What made Fontevrault truly unique was that, from its earliest years (by 1115), its founder drew up rules that institutionalized the relationship between men and women, making it clear that the monks' role was to serve the nuns and to obey the abbess. This formal clarity, together with Fontevrault's early success in attracting noble and even royal patronage, enabled it to withstand misogynistic criticisms and a variety of political and economic crises that did in many similar institutions. It survived as a predominantly female double monastery until its suppression in 1792 during the French Revolution.

Fontevrault's popularity also led to the establishment of many dependent priories, soon making the abbey the head of the largest federation of nunneries in the medieval West. Although some dated to before Robert's death in 1116, most of these affiliated communities were founded under the able leadership of the first two abbesses, Petronilla of Chemillé (1115–1149) and Matilda of Anjou (1149–1155). By about 1200, there were over 70 dependent priories, mostly in western France, but also including a few as far away as Spain and England. The abbey reached the zenith of its fame in the late-twelfth century, when Fontevrault became a favorite of the royal families of France and England. Henry Plantagenet, Count of Anjou and King of England (1154–1189), and his wife Eleanor, duchess of Aquitaine, showered largesse on the nuns. Both of them, along with their son Richard the Lionheart, are buried at Fontevrault. The tombs of Henry and Eleanor, complete with recumbent life-sized sculptures, can still be seen in the nave of the abbey church. Although the monastery has been damaged, it is now a protected historical site that includes several twelfth-century buildings, including the Romanesque abbey church and a curious, octagonal kitchen.

RICHARD KEYSER

References and Further Reading

- Gold, Penny S. The Lady and the Virgin: Image, Attitude, and Experience in Twelfth-Century France. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press, 1985, pp. 93–113.
- Venarde, Bruce L. Women's Monasticism and Medieval Society: Nunneries in France and England, 890–1215. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1997, pp. 57–63, 104–124.
- Wood, Charles, T. "Fontevraud, Dynasticism and Eleanor of Aquitaine." In Eleanor of Aquitaine: Lord and Lady, edited by Bonnie Wheeler and John C. Parsons. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2002, pp. 407–422.

See also Abbesses; Double Monasteries; Eleanor of Aquitaine; Monasticism and Nuns; Spiritual Care

FOSTERAGE

In medieval Iceland, the term fosterage denotes a legal and social contract between two families aimed at adding a network of relations to that of a child's biological kin and similar to, but farther-reaching than, the Christian system of god-parentage. In other words, it does not refer to the care of needy orphaned children, a problem that was handled by Iceland's remarkable poor laws, nor to the aristocratic custom developed during the High Middle Ages in England and on the Continent whereby adolescent children were sent away from home for training. According to the Icelandic law, Grágás lögfóstur (legal fosterage) occurred when a man agreed to bring up another person's child from the age of seven (or younger) to sixteen in return for remuneration that was agreed to and paid beforehand. The relationship did not end when the young person returned home, but a foster-child was considered to be near-equal to the foster-father's own children. If the foster-father was disabled, for example, the fosterling could act on his behalf in the same capacity as the son, stepson, or son-in-law. Furthermore, the man's foster-daughter and foster-mother were included among the six women for whom he was allowed to take instant revenge if they were sexually molested. The sagas of Icelanders confirm these rules and add further details. Fosterage was apparently so common that it was considered highly unusual if "all the children grew up at home." In that case a foster-father or foster-mother, often of slave or recently freed status, would be brought to the family farm. Because of the male focus of the sagas more boys than girls are reported as being sent away for fostering, but it happened to girls as well, as illustrated by Guðríðr Þorbjarnardóttir of Vínland fame, who was fostered with neighbors before both families' immigration to Greenland. The proverb that "a person owes one fourth of his or her personality to fosterage" (Njáls Saga, chap. 42) is evidence of the foster-family's influence on the child's development. The normal assumption was that well-to-do-parents sought fosterage for their children among social groups below them, but such statements invariably occur when parents made contrary decisions that reveal their concern for positive influences on the children (illustration in Laxdæla Saga, chap. 28). The law does not mention inheritance for foster-children, but foster-parents lacking biological offspring often made the charge their heir. Fosterage was not limited to the pagan context of the sagas of Icelanders but continued into the Christian era of the Contemporary sagas. The most famous foster-child is Snorri Sturluson who in 1181 at the age of three was brought by his father from his birthplace in Hvammr in northern Iceland to Oddi in the south to be fostered by Jón Loftsson, the most prominent man in the country. Snorri stayed here until 1202, benefiting from the rich cultural milieu that helped him to establish political contacts. It is not surprising that the strong emotional ties between foster-parents and their charges often competed with or even equaled those with biological kin. Foster-parents' names became embedded in the next generation of the fosterling's own children, and political and economic arrangements continued between the families. Egill's grief and rage when his father killed his foster-mother as she was trying to save him from paternal anger is unforgettable (Egils Saga, chap. 40). Emotional ties were particularly strong between a foster-mother and her female charge. The latter might bring her foster-mother with her when she married, allowing her to raise her own children in turn. The need for additional kinship is particularly clear in cases when a young widow agreed to let her newborn son be fostered by her deceased husband's relatives or friends. Bereft of a father, the child acquired new kinship ties through his foster-family. In the past fosterage was considered to be part of ancient Scandinavian law. Although Norwegian laws used a vocabulary similar to Grágás, the cases involved care of poor people and do not include the Icelandic legal and institutional framework. Since Ireland had laws similar to Iceland's concerning fosterage, it appears likely that visiting Vikings brought the idea home from there, a suggestion supported by a brief episode in Laxdæla Saga (chaps. 20–22); Melkorka, an Irish princess who was brought to Iceland as a slave, eventually sent her son to Ireland with specific instructions to contact her foster-mother.

JENNY JOCHENS

References and Further Reading

- Ancient Laws of Ireland*. Senchus Mor. Dublin, London: 1869.
- The Complete Sagas of Icelanders Including 49 Tales*, edited by Viar Hreinsson. 5 vols. Reykjavík: Leifur Eiriksson Publishing, 1997.
- The Earliest Norwegian Laws*. translated by Laurence M. Larson. New York: Columbia, 1935.
- Jochens, Jenny. "Old Norse Motherhood." In Medieval Mothering, edited by John Carmi Parsons and Bonnie Wheeler. New York: Garland, 1996, pp. 201–222.
- Kreutzer, Gert. Kindheit und Jugend in der altnordischen Literatur. Munster: Kleinheinrich, 1987, pp. 221–234.
- Laws of Early Iceland: Grágás I, II*. translated by Andrew Dennis, Peter Foote, and Richard Perkins. Manitoba: University of Manitoba Press, 1980–2000.
- Lynch, Joseph H. Godparents and Kinship in Early Medieval Europe. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1986.

See also Breastfeeding and Wet-Nursing; Education, Lay; Girls and Boys; Godparents; Infants and Infanticide; Literature, Old Norse; Mothers as Teachers

FOY

According to the earliest account of her life and martyrdom, Sainte Foy (also Faith or Fides) was a well-born young girl martyred by Dacian, the Roman ruler of Agen in southwestern France in the fourth century. Her relics were enshrined in a church built outside the walls of that city. In 866, they were stolen from Agen by the monks of Conques (a Benedictine monastery in the Rouergue) to be the focus of their cult. Approximately a century later, stories of Foy's miracles—especially the healing of blindness and liberation of prisoners—began to circulate in the region. Many of these miracle narratives were assembled into a text that circulated as the Liber miraculorum and spread Foy's fame throughout Europe. Foy's cult reached its apogee in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, with sites established across France, England, the Germanic countries, Italy, and Spain, as well as a popular pilgrimage to her shrine at Conques.

Side view of the Reliquary of Saint Foy, ninth century with Gothic additions. Gilded silver, copper, enamel, rock crystal, and precious stones, cameos, wooden core. Location: France. Credit: Erich Lessing / Art Resource, N.Y.

The major attribute of Foy in the visual arts is the grill that represents one of her tortures. When her virgin martyr status is emphasized, she is often portrayed as a slender young woman with long hair. When her intercessory powers are important, as in the Faith chapel at Westminster cathedral, she is portrayed as a majestic female figure who overshadows the tiny monk kneeling in prayer at the bottom of the painting.

In texts, Foy is represented with even more variety depending upon the role she is to play. For Bernard of Angers, the eleventh century compiler of some of her miracles, Foy is a childish female trickster who extorts gifts from pilgrims and plays jokes on her monks. However, for monastic writers in her miracle collection, Sainte Foy is a celestial virgin, one of the most powerful saints in heaven.

KATHLEEN M. ASHLEY

References and Further Reading

- Ashley, Kathleen, and Pamela Sheingorn. Writing Faith: Text, Sign, & History in the Miracles of Sainte Foy. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1999.
- Sheingorn, Pamela, trans. and ed. The Book of Sainte Foy. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1995.

See also Hagiography; Hagiography, Iconographic Aspects of; Pilgrims and Pilgrimage; Relics and Reliquaries; Virgin Martyrs

FRANCE, NORTHERN

The life experience of the women in northern France between 1000 and 1500 BCE plays a pivotal role in the narrative of European women's history. Determining whether their lot in life improved or declined has largely guided investigation of the women living at this time in this region. For medievalists, these centuries have been thought to be the end of a "golden age." Modernists, in contrast, find the roots of repression consonant with the women of recent centuries in the "dark" era of the Middle Ages. Recent research, however, has provided a corrective to both viewpoints and has demonstrated that women of this era did not suffer repression or powerlessness to a greater extent than their counterparts in other periods. Some women were influential and had access to resources, others were clearly on the margin of society with little recourse to power or influence. The profound social, economic, and political transitions of this era shaped women's lives significantly.

Part of the difficulty in recovering the experiences of medieval women in northern France stems from the nature of the extant sources. While documents are plentiful for this era and there are a significant number penned by women, accounts written by men—sometimes directly concerned with women, but more often not—predominate. The history of women is taken from what Marc Bloch termed "witnesses in spite of themselves," in other words, pieced together from sources not written by women nor directly addressing the issue of women's past or experience. Although challenging, medievalists have been successful in teasing out the lives of medieval women from sometimes recalcitrant sources.

Elite Women: Queens, Aristocrats, and Religious Women

Interestingly, the lives of upper-class women, who had the most written about them, are frequently opaque or obscure. In spite of the fact that medieval queens acted as consorts or guardians, they did not share official power with their husbands or sons. But did this mean that such queens were powerless? Indeed not. The royal women of Louis IX's court can serve as examples. Louis' mother, Blanche of Castile, ruled France during her son's minority and his crusade to the Holy Land. Furthermore, Blanche also exerted considerable cultural influence through her patronage of the arts and founding of religious houses. Like her mother, Louis' sister, Isabelle of France, was a pious woman. She embraced the religious life, although she never took the vows of a nun. Her personal piety, however, reflected the religious ethos of the time, and her own practices had an impact on the religious behavior of the royal family and her brother's court. While many royal women did not act as regents, as Blanche did, they exercised significant influence over the royal men in their lives, as well as medieval society in general, through their cultural patronage and religious dedication.

Aristocratic women wielded the same sorts of powers as royal women. Key to noblewomen's influence and status was their control of property. As daughters, they received a portion of the patrimony as both inheritance and dowry, which necessitated their participation in granting land to vassals and making gifts to the church. Marriage was a defining moment in the life of an aristocratic woman as she became the head of her own household. Yet attachment to her natal family was not severed. Upon marriage noble women continued to consent to alienations of property made by their natal family and their fostering of their nephews and nieces ensured continued connection to their blood kin. Many women experienced marriage in positive ways. In many cases marriages lasted decades and affection developed. Because noble men were so often away at war, their wives took over running family estates and lordships. To ensure stability and continuity of policy during such absences wives and husbands acted together in the transfer and management of property and personnel. Widowhood was yet another important life stage for noble women. In some cases, widowhood represented a dramatic increase in women's access to power or property. In others, widows simply continued to enjoy the influence they had as married women.

Because aristocratic women controlled land and other resources, they were important powerbrokers in their society. For example, women were extremely generous patrons and protectors of local ecclesiastical foundations. Clerics realized the influence that such women held and actively cultivated their support, resulting in relationships of respect and even affection between clerics and aristocratic women. Women were also frequently called upon to intercede with the church on behalf of their obstreperous male kin. When noble men violated the church, it was up to their wives, mothers, and sisters, to mend fences with the clergy.

As more systematized and formalized government developed after the twelfth century, noble-born men and women alike found their access to power and autonomy curtailed. But women developed strategies for negotiating within a male-dominated system. Yet the repression historians have associated with the centuries between 1200 and 1500 did not occur to the degree previously assumed. In contrast to their modern counterparts, medieval female elites enjoyed far more respect and possibilities for power.

As was the case with queens and noblewomen, the early medieval centuries also act as a "golden age" standard against which the life experience of religious women of the central medieval period seems to fall short. The reform movements of the late eleventh and twelfth centuries have been interpreted as harmful to, if not downright hostile toward, pious women. A decrease in the number of women saints—as well as a change in the characteristics women needed for canonization—has been suggested as symptomatic of a diminution in women's religious influence. Developments in religion did put some mechanisms in place that disadvantaged women in the religious life. But juxtaposed against the exclusion of women from some of the important monastic movements of the twelfth century, Cistercian monasticism in particular, is the founding of the convent of Fontevrault by Robert of Arbrissel. This abbey became one of the most powerful religious institutions in western France and surpassed many male houses in its wealth and influence.

Women seeking a life dedicated to God, however, were most deeply affected by the development of alternatives to the cloister. As the medieval economy assumed a more commercial form, towns began to grow. The religious needs and interests of urban populations differed from those living in the countryside. As a consequence, new forms of religious expression and experience emerged. Shortly after St. Francis founded the mendicant Franciscans, the order of the Poor Clares was instituted as a new way for women to pursue a life devoted to religion. As some urban women felt the need to dedicate their lives to God without taking vows or being cloistered, communities of Beguines appeared on the urban landscape of northern France. While traditional Benedictine monasticism had offered opportunities for mostly women of the landed elite, the Beguines and Poor Clares provided an avenue of religious expression not previously available to women living in the cities of northern France.

Medieval women also left their mark on the flowering of late medieval mystical Christianity. During this period women from all over western Europe explored new paths to God. Instead of relying on an intercessory clergy, some women mystics connected directly with the divine through their visions and other physical manifestations, including levitation, abstinence from eating, and fits of uncontrollable weeping. Mystics like Marie of Oignies (d. 1213) and Christina the Astonishing (1150–1224), living in northern France or the bordering Low Countries, were sought out by male and female believers alike. Some male clergy supported these female mystics, and in many cases became their hagiographers. The female mystics' advocacy of a personal connection with God laid the groundwork for later reformers and contributed directly to the development of the Modern Devotion. The centuries between 1000 and 1500 BCE presented certain challenges—and restrictions, like stricter monastic enclosure—to religious women. But they also offered opportunities for shaping Christianity that women had perhaps not enjoyed since its early centuries.

Urban Women

Did urbanization and commercialization of the economy work to the benefit or disadvantage of urban women? The answer to this question depends upon individual experience determined largely by social status. Women of the urban elite certainly benefited from the wealth and power accrued by their family. But, like queens, the wives, mothers, daughters, and sisters of the urban elite seldom enjoyed official power. While women may not usually have gained formal power, wives of the urban elite used their resources to patronize religious houses—both the traditional and the newly emerging institutions that were found in urban centers—and to gain support of other patricians. Furthermore, like noble women, they were able to use their influence with husbands and sons to achieve alliances and what might be considered political aims. The dowries that urban women brought to their marriages also played an important role in a family's future and finances. In some cases a generous dowry could help a family to move up several rungs on the social ladder. While their dowries became part of the family patrimony, women maintained control over how they were used.

Women took part in virtually every facet of the commercial economy of northern France: they owned and managed a variety of businesses individually and with their husbands, they sold merchandise, staffed inns and hostelries, and contributed their labor to industry. While women usually were excluded from holding office in the guilds that emerged to regulate production and quality of the items sold or produced, except in rare cases like the silk guild in Paris, in those occupations where women predominated—in the production of cloth, for example—women did play influential roles in those guilds. In the late Middle Ages the loss of population caused by the Black Death created more opportunities for employment and influence within the guild system for urban women. These gains were further reinforced by urban women's ability to inherit their husbands' or fathers' businesses. Widows, in particular, were vital participants in the commercial economy.

For women of the lowest reaches of urban society the commercialization of medieval society, and with it urbanization, was a mixed blessing. The towns of northern France that focused on the cloth industry provided a draw, a place where women might find new opportunities. Sometimes women secured work in shops or industry. Others found husbands. While “town air” could make serfs free, it could also create another form of subjection for women as they ended up in occupations, as servants or prostitutes, resulting in their economic and physical exploitation. But such women did not fall completely through the cracks of society. Urban dwellers' concern for these “fallen” women is evident in the numerous religious foundations dedicated to Mary Magdalen where such women could be reformed. Provision of a dowry for a prostitute who could then marry and make a new life also became a popular expression of piety. Commercialization did benefit some women, but it also worked to the detriment of others.

Rural Women

In spite of the growth of towns that occurred in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, most medieval people continued to reside in the countryside. More than any other sector of medieval society, peasants were the most vulnerable to the capricious forces of nature. Survival depended upon the contributions of both men and women. Peasant women generally were responsible for the home, raising of children, tending the garden, baking bread, and brewing beer. They also contributed their labor in the fields at key points during the year—as is vividly illustrated in medieval illuminated manuscripts. Men, in contrast, spent much of their day in the field. In order for a family to survive, let alone thrive, both husbands and wives had to contribute their labor. Without a wife, a peasant man would be seriously disadvantaged and vice versa. But it is important not to overemphasize the independence or power of peasant women. Like their sisters in the aristocracy and in the city, peasant women were excluded from holding formal offices within their village. Those peasants living between 1100 and 1500 generally saw a decrease in the control that lords had over their lives. Central to this change in their status were two events: the commercial revolution and the Black Death.

The change to a commercial economy held important ramifications for the French peasantry. As lords sought to participate in an increasingly cash-based economy, they became interested in finding ways of converting their landed wealth into cash. Instead of requiring peasant labor in return for land, justice, and protection, lords began to convert such services into cash payments. Moveance, or the creation of new communities, also benefited peasant men and women. In order to attract individuals and families to settle these new and sometimes marginal areas, lords offered incentives such as reductions in the amount or type of labor or dues owed to the lord. Thus for most peasants of 1000 to 1500 their relationship with lords became less onerous, and they became more “free.” Events of the late Middle Ages, catalyzed by the Black Death, would both challenge and reinforce this freedom.

Like most of western Europe, late medieval northern France was dramatically affected by the population deprivations caused by the plague. Many peasants died, and those who survived found themselves facing new challenges. For some, these challenges provided opportunities and an end to serfdom. For others, lords attempted to reinstate the more regressive aspects of lordship. But the post-Black Death world was made up of new realities and expectations, for in 1358, peasant men and women all over France rebelled against their lords by burning their castles, destroying the records of their servitude, and even killing them in the “Jacquerie,” an event tellingly named after the prototypical French peasant “Jacques.” The catastrophes of the late Middle Ages undoubtedly were a source of personal tragedy for many peasant women living in northern France, but they also provided such women with access to advancement perhaps missing from earlier centuries.

Creative Women

The issue of improvement or decline again emerges in the evaluation of Northern French female writers and artists of the period. In the lifetime of Heloise, a cultural revival triggered by an interest in the culture of the classical past took hold, and women contributed to this twelfth-century renaissance. Although Heloise never wrote a theological treatise as her lover-husband Abelard did, her letters embody the philosophical training and interest in the classical past so much a part of the cultural and intellectual accomplishments of the twelfth century. Nor was Heloise the only woman engaged with classical culture and learning. Marie de France, another woman of the twelfth century, was also trained in Latin for she translated The Purgatory of St. Patrick from Latin to French. Marie also contributed to a flowering of vernacular literature. Her lais mark a high point in medieval literature by providing insight into the emotional life and motivations of her characters. The participation of women in the production of secular and religious texts continued into the later medieval period, although some see it as a time of decline. The mystical works of Marguerite Porete were so influential that, although she was eventually condemned as a heretic, they remained in circulation. (Works by other women mystics, in contrast, were accepted and even embraced by the church.) Christine de Pizan was an important and successful author of the time, and her exploration of classical themes heralds the transition from medieval to Renaissance culture.

Women contributed to the flowering of medieval culture in other more anonymous ways. Many medieval nuns wrote, illuminated, and embroidered, creating magnificent expressions of spirituality in literature and art. The cathedrals that rose all over northern France also benefited from the labor, expertise, and expression of medieval women. Like queens, urban women, and peasants, creative women were excluded from the more formal positions associated with intellectual pursuit. Universities were being founded all over France at this time, but they were for men only. Such obstacles did not prevent women from writing and creating; there were other avenues for learning and expression.

Women also shaped culture through their patronage. Marie de Champagne, for instance, sponsored Chrétien de Troyes, whose romances are considered an early prototype of the modern novel. The prevalent image of women with books testifies to their literacy as well as the impact they had on the creation of literature. Several late medieval French queens, for instance, are known to have owned (and read) the works of such authors as Christine de Pizan.

Conclusion

Once characterized as the “male Middle Ages,” it is now recognized that women clearly shaped this important era in European history. The presumed “maleness” of northern France between 1000 and 1500 stemmed from a reliance on theological and religious sources, which tend to paint a rather monochromatic view of women and are often overtly hostile to them. The misogyny of some clerics is indisputably a part of the narrative of the history of medieval women, but it is only one strand, not the complete tapestry or composition. While the centuries between 1000 and 1500 represented a time of challenges for women in northern France, they were also a time of opportunity and influence. But the experience of women was not uniform. Some were valued, influential, and respected members of their society. Others labored in silence and occupied the margins of society. Yet all were indisputably part of the medieval landscape and helped to mold the essential contours of the medieval world.

AMY LIVINGSTONE

References and Further Reading

- Aristocratic Women in Medieval France*, edited by Theodore Evergates. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999.
- Bell, Susan Groag. “Medieval Women Book Owners: Arbiters of Lay Piety and Ambassadors of Culture,” in Signs 7 (1982): 742–768.
- Bynum, Caroline Walker. Holy Feast and Holy Fast: The Religious Significance of Food to Medieval Women. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1987.
- Capetian Women*, edited by Kathleen Nolan. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2003, pp 137–161.
- Facinger, Marion F. “A Study of Medieval Queenship: Capetian France, 987–1237,” Nebraska Studies in Medieval and Renaissance History 5 (1968): 1–48.
- Farmer, Sharon Ann. “Persuasive Voices: Clerical Images of Medieval Wives.” Speculum: A Journal of Medieval Studies 61 (1986): 517–543.
- “Georges Duby et l’histoire des femmes,” edited by Michelle Zancarini-Fournel and Christiane Klapisch-Zuber. Clio 8 (1998).
- Gies, Joseph, and Frances Gies. Life in a Medieval City. London: Barker, 1969.
- The Goodman of Paris (Le ménagier de Paris): A Treatise on Moral and Domestic Economy by a Citizen of Paris (c. 1393)*, translated by Eileen Power. New York: Harcourt, Brace and Company, 1928.
- Johnson, Penelope D. Equal in Monastic Profession: Religious Women in Medieval France. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1991.
- Le Roy Ladurie, Emmanuel. Montaillou: The Promised Land of Error, translated by Barbara Bray. New York: G. Braziller, 1978.
- Listening to Heloise: The Voice of a Twelfth-Century Woman*, edited by Bonnie Wheeler. New York: St. Martin’s Press, 2000.
- LoPrete, Kimberly. Adela of Blois, Countess and Lord. Dublin: Four Courts, 2001.
- The Lost Letters of Abelard and Heloise: Perceptions of Dialogue in Twelfth-Century France*, edited by Constant J. Mews; translated by Neville Chiavaroli and Constant J. Mews. New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1999.
- Medieval Mothering*, edited by John Carmi Parsons, and Bonnie Wheeler. New York: Garland Pub., 1996.
- Medieval Queenship*, edited by John Carmi Parsons. New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1993.
- Pernoud, Régine. Blanche of Castile, translated by Henry Noel. New York: Coward, McCann and Geoghegan, 1975.
- Rossiaud, Jacques. Medieval Prostitution, translated by Lydia G. Cochrane. Oxford; New York: B. Blackwell, 1988.
- Schulenburg, Jane Tibbetts. Forgetful of Their Sex: Female Sanctity and Society, ca. 500–1100. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1998.
- Venarde, Bruce L. Women’s Monasticism and Medieval Society: Nunneries in France and England, 890–1215. Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1997.

See also Beguines; Blanche of Castile; Christina the Astonishing; Christine de Pizan; Cistercian Order; Dowry and Other Marriage Gifts; Fontrevault, Abbey and Order of; Guild Members and Guilds; Isabelle of France; Marie de France; Marie of Oignies; Marriage, Christian; Misogyny; Monastic Enclosure; Monasticism and Nuns; Noble Women; Occitania; Patronage, Ecclesiastical; Patronage, Literary; Peasants; Plague; Poor Clares Order; Prostitutes; Queens and Empresses: The West; Regents and Queen-Lieutenants; Widows; Women Authors: Old French Texts; Work

FRANCES OF ROME

Frances of Rome (1384–1440) remains an exceptional case of an officially canonized medieval saint who was both a wife and a mother. Only Elisabeth of Hungary and Birgitta of Sweden are comparable.

Frances was born to the noble Bussa family of Rome in 1384. She married Lorenzo de’ Ponziani, a wealthy cattle farmer, at twelve, bearing him at least three sons, of whom only Battista survived to adulthood. After her husband’s death in 1436, Frances joined the religious laywomen or oblates at her foundation Tor de’ Specchi, loosely associated with the Benedictine monastery Santa Maria Nuova in Rome. Her charity, moral exhortations, and visions concerning the afterlife made her famous even before her death on March 9, 1440.

Three collections of testimonies concerning Frances’s sainthood (from 1440, 1443, and 1451) and the biography by her last confessor, Giovanni Mattiotti, provide a textured account of a saint who transformed her marital and social occupations into religious opportunities. She used her wealth to assist poor children and women, convinced her husband to live in a chaste companionship, and lived humbly, chastising other women for their frivolous concern for appearance. Her moral messages were peppered by horrid Dantesque visions concerning purgatory and hell. But it was her gentler companionship with other women—fellowship with her sister-in-law Vannoza, miraculous interventions on women's behalf, and founding of the Tor de Specchi in 1425 (approved by Pope Eugene IV in 1433)—that secured her position as a beloved civic icon, especially among the Roman families who were involved in the failed plot against Pope Boniface IX (crushed in 1398) and suffered during Ladislav of Naples's occupation of the town in 1408–1409 and 1413–1414. She was canonized by Paul V, a scion of the Roman Borghese family, on May 29, 1608.

MAIJU LEHMIJOKI-GARDNER

References and Further Reading

- Esposito, Anna. "St. Francesca and the Female Religious Communities of Fifteenth-Century Rome." In Women and Religion in Medieval and Renaissance Italy, edited by Daniel Bornstein and Roberto Rusconi. Translated by Margery J. Schneider. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press, 1996, pp. 197–218.
- Gill, Katherine. "Open Monasteries for Women in Late Medieval and Early Modern Italy: Two Roman Examples." In The Crannied Wall. Women, Religion, and the Arts in Early Modern Europe, edited by Craig A. Monsson. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1992, pp. 15–48.
- Mattiotti, Giovanni. Santa Francesca Romana, edited by Alessandra Bartolomei Romagnoli. Vatican City: Biblioteca Apostolica Vaticana, 1995.
- I processi inediti per Francesca Bussa dei Ponziani, 1440–1453*, edited by Placido Tommaso Lugano. Vatican City: Biblioteca Apostolica Vaticana, 1945.
- Una santa tutta romana: Saggi e ricerche nel VI centenario della nascita di Francesca Bussa dei Ponziani (1384–1984)*, edited by Giorgio Picasso. Monte Oliveto Maggiore: Edizioni "L'Ulivo," 1984.

See also Birgitta of Sweden; Chastity and Chaste Marriage; Hagiography; Italy; Laywomen, Religious

FRANKISH LANDS

During the fifth and early sixth centuries, Frankish rulers conquered Gaul, the Roman province west of the Rhine, including the Rhone valley, and the Mediterranean southern region from Provence as far southwest as the Pyrenees. Frankish settlement was confined to the northeast, and, in Gaul as a whole, the immigrant element was heavily outnumbered by the indigenous provincial population. Unlike some others who settled within the Roman Empire in the fourth and fifth centuries, the Franks are presented in their origin-myth as all-male. Modern historians see the Frankish "people" as an amalgam of smaller groups, usually described as war-bands in the late Roman sources, with warlords and warriors the only recorded individuals. This could suggest a militarized society in which women's social power diminished. But women as marriage-partners could have played key roles in uniting Germanic-speaking groups to form the Frankish people. Variant origin-myths of the Franks' ruling dynasty, the Merovingians, had space for two individual women. The eponymous Merovech was said to have been the offspring of his anonymous mother's encounter with a monster while bathing in the sea. Merovech's son, Childeric, driven out by the Franks whose daughters he had debauched and given refuge by the king of the Thuringians and his wife, Basina, was said to have been sought out later by Basina, who had abandoned her husband, journeyed far to the land of the Franks, and declared her desire for Childeric: "I know that you are a strong man and I can recognise ability when I see it, so I have come to live with you." The product of this coupling was Clovis, depicted by Gregory of Tours (c. 596) as the warrior-king who effectively made the kingdom of the Franks, its heartlands in the northerly region between the rivers Loire and Rhine, in later Merovingian times called Francia. (Thanks to Frankish political success, the name subsequently came to be used for the whole kingdom, and then for fragments of it—hence, modern "France" and the German region of "Franken.")

Before c. 600, Frankish rulers often married non-Frankish women from the indigenous Gallo-Roman population of Gaul, or from further afield. Thus Clovis married the Burgundian princess Clotilda, who, according to Gregory of Tours, persuaded him to convert to Orthodox Christianity. In the northeast, where Frankish settlement was thicker, a large amount of intermarriage with indigenes can be surmised from the fact that, by the eighth century, the population spoke a Romance language, the langue d'oïl (in which oil was the word for "yes"), though the peasantry continued to give their children Germanic names, suggesting they still spoke a Germanic dialect. South of the Loire, where Frankish settlement was extremely limited, the indigenous population's Latin gradually evolved into the langue d'oc (oc meant "yes"), and the peasantry continued to give their children Roman names. In the north, the customary law of the Salian Franks came into use and stuck. King Clovis (c. 511) had an agreed Code (Pactum) issued, but this was a selection, not the whole, of what was customary. A glaring absence was marriage law, which historians have to reconstruct from other sources. Clovis supplemented customary law with a special edict protecting widows and orphans who, as in most periods, were the most vulnerable of the vulnerable. At the same time, Clovis constructed and legitimized his and others' masculine power through claims to protect the weak.

Law

Legal form-documents (formulae) from the sixth century show that in the Loire valley Roman provincial law was in use for marital contracts specifying the bride's dowry. In the next century, a father could assert his right, against earlier custom, to bequeath shares in his patrimony equally to daughters and sons. Seventh-century wills show landowning women bequeathing their own inherited property. Like other early medieval codes, Salic Law prescribed the amount to be paid in compensation for death or injury in the cases of women as well as men, with extra payable if the woman was of childbearing age; but only Salic Law set such extra payments at three times the level for other women. This could be seen as special protection linked with the shortage of Frankish women. Intermarriage, especially among elites, seems to have happened fairly frequently; and, as a bride moved to live in her husband's house, cultural influence passed across to the new location. An aristocratic bishop, Bertram of Le Mans, in his Roman-style will (616) asserted that his mother, Ingtrud (a Frankish name), was an Aquitanian (i.e., used Roman law), his father Frankish, and that a close kinswoman had married Avitus, a Gallo-Roman magnate in the Le Mans region. At this social level, neither non-Frankish women marrying Franks, nor Frankish women marrying "Romans," lost status. The couple was endowed, and their offspring and kin inherited, from both sides and in diverse localities. Aristocratic Frankish women too made wills. Burgundofara (633–634), influenced by the Irish holy man Columbanus, bequeathed her share of familylands to found a monastery, Faremoutiers, near Paris. In c. 700, Ermentrud bequeathed her very substantial property in land and moveables to her grandson, her granddaughter and daughter-in-law, and to several churches in and around Paris.

Letters

In the mid-seventh century, Herchenfreda, the Frankish widow of a Gallo-Roman magnate, and mother of three sons all with Roman names, sent one of them a little series of letters. The son, Desiderius, was born in Aquitaine, indicating that his mother had lived there since her marriage. He had become bishop of Cahors (629–654) by the time his mother wrote these letters offering him moral and social guidance. Here was a woman familiar with Roman traditions of letter-writing, but also deeply touched by Christian ideas of virtue and of maternal responsibility for virtue's inculcation.

Royal Women

A number of royal or aristocratic women founded and/or endowed monasteries, and some were posthumously venerated as saints. Radegund (c. 587), a Thuringian princess brought to Francia as war-booty and bride of King Clothar I (c. 561), eventually persuaded her husband to let her found a monastery at Poitiers and become its abbess. There she distinguished herself with acts of conspicuous self-humiliation, like cleaning the latrines. Yet from the monastery, she continued to influence politics in the Frankish kingdoms, and like her younger contemporary Queen Brunhild, she corresponded with the emperor and empress in Byzantium. Through their mediation, she secured the gift of a relic of the Holy Cross. The relic, still in its sixth-century reliquary, survives at the still-functioning monastery. To visit Radegund's sixth-century sarcophagus in its subterranean shrine is to be put in touch with a millennium and a half of continuous cult. To read Radegund's Life, written by one of the Poitiers nuns, is to sense a life behind the hagiographical conventions.

Yet the Lives of Frankish holy women, impressively other-worldly as are the orientations they depict, can also mislead. Political connections and dynastic pride could propel distinctly worldly activities, as Gregory of Tours reveals in his vivid contemporary, but highly tendentious, account of the revolt of the Merovingian nun-princesses Clotild and Basina at Holy Cross, Poitiers, after Radegund's death. Most foundations were family affairs, which meant protection for the women involved, but could also spell vulnerability amidst aristocratic rivalries. Protection and vulnerability alike call into question some modern historians' claims for the extent of individual women's agency and empowerment. St. Gertrude of Nivelles (c. 653), subject of another impressive Life written within perhaps twenty years of her death, was a daughter of Pippin, ancestor of the Carolingians, and sister of Begga whose offspring actually continued the family line. Gertrude's ascetic vocation, depicted by the hagiographer as her own choice, was more certainly her family's choice (and they had carefully sought the king's approval), as was the founding of the convent of Nivelles on family lands. Nivelles' problems after Gertrude's death resulted from the enmity of her family's rivals in the region of the rivers Sambre and Meuse. From the political historian's standpoint, the Life reveals more of the precariousness of family power than its security and more about enforced intermissions than about continuity. Female agency is there, but it is constrained by family interest and family vicissitudes. The powerful women who emerge as the Life's subtext are in fact Gertrude's heiress-mother Itta, and her married sister Begga, christianissima matrona. Individual women's lives were framed, like men's only more so, by the calculations and interests of families, whether natal or marital.

Gregory of Tours, like many early medieval authors, cast women as extremes of good or evil. Conspicuous in his gallery of wicked queens was Fredegund, a Frank by birth, and a one-time serving woman who attracted a king's attention. Modern historians depict her defending her husband and children by all possible means, including assassination. As presented by Gregory, her agenda was entirely personal, though its consequences were public: when two of her sons were dying, she interpreted this as divine vengeance for her husband's harsh government and persuaded him to burn the new tax registers; when a third son died, she had some Parisian women tortured for allegedly practising witchcraft. Gregory's most admirable queens are Clovis's persuasive wife Clotilda, and the self-humiliated yet influential Radegund. Neither of these two was Frankish-born, but both had long posthumous histories as ambiguous role-models for queens and other Frankish women.

The Carolingian Period (Eighth to Tenth Centuries)

Just as earlier twentieth-century historians drew various thick lines between Merovingian and Carolingian periods, so historians of women have contrasted a Merovingian "golden age" of opportunities with a Carolingian drawing-down of blinds. There are three points to be made against this reading. The first, already indicated, is that the alleged opportunities were severely constrained. The second is that there were substantial continuities running right through the Frankish period. The third is that the Carolingian world demonstrably offered women some benefits that may have been new. The second point can be quickly elaborated: authorial misogyny persisted in Carolingian sources; bad husbands could still literally get away with marital murder; it remained easier for men to abuse and repudiate their wives, and take concubines than it was for women to play fast and loose with the rules of marriage; big men continued to construct their power by presenting themselves as protectors of women, especially widows, the archetypically weak; aside from constructions, widows, even aristocratic ones, really did remain exceptionally vulnerable; families still constrained and channelled the lives of their womenfolk; and pious women were refused access to some monastic shrines in Carolingian as in Merovingian times. The rest of this section concentrates on the third point.

First the assertion that the Carolingian period "demonstrably" benefited some women presupposes new demonstrative evidence. The polyptychs, surveys of the tenants of monastic estates, fall into this category. They show many thousands of peasant households centred on married couples, with wives co-operating in the management and working of hereditary holdings. At the same time, other new types of source-material, expositions of canon law, and prayers over spouses, gave strong ecclesiastical support to the idea of consent between spouses as the foundation of marriage. Ecclesiastical intervention in this area on the whole benefited women, and women more than men.

Charters

From the eighth century onwards, charters become widely, if patchily, available as historical sources. In these it is possible to see individuals and family-groups arranging for the care of single women, for elderly women, and for widows, through agreements with religious institutions. A grant might be made to a monastery, for instance, on condition that a female family-member retained a life-interest. It is true that landlords' power grew in the ninth and tenth centuries too. It's nevertheless arguable that an equilibrium was reached between lords' and peasants' interests, and, further, that for peasants, there was an equilibrium between, on the one hand, opportunities born of generalised labor shortage together with the availability of cultivable land, and on the other, a reasonable level of order and security maintained by Carolingian states in much of the Frankish world. Women benefited, along with men but also in gender-specific ways, from these developments. If a capitulary of 861 prescribes penalties (physical punishment) separately for men and for women who refuse to accept a new, improved issue of the royal coinage "because women too are in the habit of engaging in market transactions," that is a sign of new economic outlets for the textiles, dairy-goods, poultry, and eggs produced by women. Secular custom, newly articulated, assigned widows a share of the proceeds of spouses' labor in common.

Within the family, women are better-documented as recognized co-bearers of responsibility for the upbringing of the young. This is a context in which godmothers appear in the sources for the first time, and at all social levels. Aristocrats "and especially women" are said by a large church council in 845 to have special care for the moral formation and guidance of their households (familiae, that is, including the servants and retainers). These enhanced roles are incorporated into the now more extensive literature on queens and queenship. In charters, noble women increasingly use titles that are the female equivalent of their husbands' offices: comitissa, marchionissa, ductrix. As noble power becomes more explicitly conveyed through lineages, charters affirm more clearly and more often the wife's partnership (consortium) with the husband. Especially in charters, churchmen acknowledge women's special role in the care of family memory and commemoration of the dead. Powerful abbesses are not a distant echo of the past, but, not least thanks to charters and ecclesiastical archives, a much more intensively documented feature of the eighth-, ninth-, and tenth-century present: familial strategies for women's deployment become more visible, but so too, however fitfully, emerging now from the pious haze of hagiography, at Chelles, at Remiremont, at Essen, do the women themselves. Nuns leave their own memorials in the texts they copied.

Laywomen

Women as "spiritual and cultural leaders" (Wemple 1981, 123) were rare in the Merovingian period, in a context where the notion of "leadership" itself is questionable. (Did Radegund, in her time, address more than a coterie?) Women's contribution was certainly more widely diffused on the Carolingian scene, and no longer confined to the cloister. This is the time of the laity, Alcuin wrote to Charlemagne in 797. Women as well as men evoked and would confirm his claim in the next generation. Lay women sometimes demanded, if they did not always get, access to shrines in reformed Carolingian monasteries. One laywoman produced a work that is by any standards a large cultural achievement. Dhuoda's Handbook, offering moral guidance for her son, written between February 841 and March 843, carried on where Herchenfreda left off, but amplified the genre out of all recognition. She advised on how to behave, and how to advance a career, at court; she advised on faithfulness in a variety of social contexts; but above all she advised on a young man's personal spiritual life, through prayer and pious reading. Through her son, she hoped to reach out to his "fellow-warriors" at the royal court. In the end this book was a public as well as a private one. That was one of the extra dimensions the Carolingians had opened up for at least some women, alongside men, in the Frankish world.

JANET NELSON

References and Further Reading

- Devroey, Jean-Pierre. "Men and Women in Early Medieval Serfdom: The Ninth-century North Frankish Evidence." Past and Present 166 (2000): 3–30.
- Effros, Bonnie. Creating Community with Food and Drink in Merovingian Gaul. Basingstoke; New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2002.
- Gender in the Early Medieval World: East and West*, edited by Leslie Brubaker and Julia M.H. Smith. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2004.
- La Rocca, Cristina, and Provero, Luigi. "The Dead and Their Gifts: The Will of Eberhard, Count of Friuli, and His Wife Gisela, Daughter of Louis the Pious (863–864)." In Rituals of Power from Late Antiquity to the Early Middle Ages, edited by F. Theuvs and J.L. Nelson. Leiden: Brill, 2000, pp. 225–280.
- Le Jan, Régine. "Convents, Violence and Competition for Power in Seventh-century Francia." In Topographies of Power in the Earlier Middle Ages, edited by M. de Jong and F. Theuvs with C. van Rhijn. Leiden: Brill, 2001, pp. 243–269.
- McNamara, Jo Anne, and John Halborg. Sainted Women of the Dark Ages. Durham; London: Duke University Press, 1992.
- Nelson, Janet L. The Frankish World, 750–900. London: Hambledon, 1996.
- Nelson, Janet L. Courts, Elites and the Workings of Power in the Earlier Medieval World. Forthcoming.
- Schulenburg, Jane Tibbetts. Forgetful of their Sex: Female Sanctity and Society, ca. 500–1100. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1998.
- Smith, Julia M.H. Europe after Rome: A New Cultural History 500–1000. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2005.
- Toubert, Pierre. "The Carolingian Moment." In A History of the Family, edited by A. Burguière. Cambridge, MA: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1996, pp. 379–406.
- Wemple, Suzanne F. Women in Frankish Society. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1981.

See also Abbesses; Administration of Estates; Barbarian Law Codes; Brunhild and Fredegund; Charters; Clotilda; Dhuoda; Gertrude of Nivelles; Hagiography; Inheritance; Monasticism and Nuns; Mothers as Teachers; Patronage, Ecclesiastical; Peasants; Queens and Empresses: The West; Radegund; Roman Law; Wer-gild; Widows

G

---

GAZE

The word gaze suggests an intense and durational looking, which in the Middle Ages could encompass a range of visual practices; it enters scholarly analyses with strong psychoanalytical and phenomenological connotations, owing to the widespread fascination with Jacques Lacan's interpretation of "le regard," which figures the gaze as central to the self's psychic (mis)recognition through the imagined gaze of the other. This gloss on the word has helped to clarify some aspects of premodern visual culture, but it has also been criticized for overvaluing the analytical primacy of the psychic subject and for concretizing rather than unsettling binary relations between subject and subjected (viewer/viewed, man/woman, master/slave, colonizer/colonized). The fruitfulness of the Lacanian gaze and its deconstruction is evident, for example, in Michael Camille's studies of medieval manuscripts, Sarah Stanbury's examinations of literary visuality, and Patricia Simons' interpretations of fifteenth-century Italian portraits.

Medieval representations of the gaze figure visuality as a particularly physical exchange. The eyes are described repeatedly both as sensitive, penetrable orifices—windows to the soul—and as possessing the ability to launch arrow-like, wounding glances. Such tropes did have practical effects, as registered in conduct literature for women urging downcast eyes, and in the ubiquitous talismans warding off the perilous "evil eye." Augustine influentially divided vision into the "corporeal," "spiritual," and "intellectual," each implying a decreasing degree of visual embeddedness in the material world. Ambivalence about the relative validity of intromission (the passage of visual data into the eye) and extromission (the projection of sensitive visual rays from the eye) speaks both of the variety of ways medieval thinkers discussed the type of vision we would call the gaze, and the manner in which such visuality was perceived as conjoining and interfolding the viewing subject and viewed object, be it worldly or divine.

ADRIAN RANDOLPH

References and Further Reading

- Biernoff, Suzannah. Sight and Embodiment in the Middle Ages. New York: Palgrave, 2002.
- Boyarin, Daniel. "The Eye in the Torah: Ocular Desire in Midrashic Hermeneutic." Critical Inquiry 16 (1990): 532–550.
- Camille, Michael. "The Eye in the Text: Vision in the Illuminated Manuscripts of the Latin Aristotle." Micrologus VI: La Visione e lo Sguardo nel Medioevo. Sismel: Edizioni del Galluzzo, 1998, pp. 129–145.
- . "Before the Gaze: The Internal Senses and Late Medieval Practices of Seeing." In Visuality Before and Beyond the Renaissance: Seeing as Others Saw, edited by Robert Nelson. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000.
- Caviness, Madeline. Visualizing Women in the Middle Ages: Sight, Spectacle, and Scopio Economy. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001.
- Cline, Ruth H. "Heart and Eyes." Romance Philology 25.2 (1971): 263–297.
- Erickson, Carolly. The Medieval Vision: Essays in History and Perception. New York: Oxford University Press, 1976.

- Hahn, Cynthia. "Viso Dei: Changes in Medieval Visuality." In Visuality Before and Beyond the Renaissance: Seeing as Others Saw, edited by Robert Nelson. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000.
- Hamburger, Jeffrey. "The Visual and the Visionary: The Image in Late Medieval Monastic Devotions." Viator 20 (1989): 161–182.
- Kessler, Herbert. "Facies Bibliothecae Revelata: Carolingian Art as Spiritual Seeing." In Testo e Immagine nell'Alto Medioevo. 2 vols. Spoleto: Centro Italiano di Studi sull'Alto Medioevo, 1994.
- Lacan, Jacques. The Four Fundamental Concepts of Psycho-Analysis, edited by Jacques-Alain Miller and translated by Alan Sheridan. New York: Norton, 1978.
- Lindberg, David. Theories of Vision from Al-Kindi to Kepler. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1976.
- Pavlis-Baig, Bonnie. "Vision and Visualization: Optics and Light Metaphysics in the Imagery and Poetic Form of Twelfth and Thirteenth Century Secular Allegory, with Special Attention to the Roman de la Rose." Ph.D. dissertation, University of California, Berkeley, 1982.
- Simons, Patricia. "Women in Frames: The Gaze, the Eye, the Profile in Renaissance Portraiture." In The Expanding Discourse: Feminism and Art History, edited by Norma Broude and Mary Garrard. New York: Icon, 1992.
- Soskice, Janet Martin. "Sight and Vision in Medieval Christian Thought." In Vision in Context: Historical and Contemporary Perspectives on Sight, edited by Teresa Brennan and Martin Jay. New York: Routledge, 1996.
- Stanbury, Sarah. "Feminist Film Theory: Seeing Chrétien's Enide." Literature and Psychology 36.4 (1990): 47–66.
- . "The Virgin's Gaze: Spectacle and Transgression in Middle English Lyrics of the Passion." PMLA 106.5 (1991): 1083–1093.
- . "Regimes of the Visual in Premodern England: Gaze, Body, and Chaucer's Clerk's Tale." New Literary History 28.2 (1997): 261–289.

See also Beauty; Conduct Literature; Courtly Love

GENDER IDEOLOGIES

There is no single hegemonic ideology of gender applicable to the whole of the Middle Ages. Rather we find a multiplicity of overlapping ideologies, some of which are more visible than others. Clerical perceptions are particularly well documented because the clergy tended to monopolize literary production for much of the period. Biographical and hagiographical writings that can be used to illuminate the gender perceptions of the laity are themselves often composed by clerical authors and reflect as much the values of their authors as of their subjects. Thus Einhard's biography of Charlemagne and The Book of Margery Kempe represent problematic windows into the gender ideologies of early medieval rulers or later medieval devout townswomen.

The medieval period inherited a range of ideas about gender from preceding cultures, such as the Roman, the Hellenistic, and those of various European tribes. Where Christians lived alongside other faiths, as in high medieval Spain or in Byzantium, they might be influenced by the Muslim and Jewish faiths (and indeed vice versa). The prevalence of particular gender ideologies was affected by geography and status; thus Roman law was more influential in Mediterranean Europe than in northern Europe, while peasant ideologies may have been different from those of higher status in the same region.

Gender, Body, and Theory

There is still debate about how far the medieval period had a dual gender system, that is, one in which gender was tied to the body, i.e., a masculine and feminine gender that related to male and female bodies. Thomas Laqueur posited a single-gender system where there was one gender, male, which incorporated all the positive values, and to which were opposed their negatives, which were associated with "not-male" and attached to both female and some men. This theory does not specifically address the medieval period, but assumes an inheritance from the classical period to the beginning of the early modern period. It has the effect of partially detaching gender from body: by implication a free woman exercising masculine characteristics such as intellect and self-control would be more masculine than an unfree man without these characteristics. There were also some traditions that did not see male and female bodies as necessarily opposed, for example, the tradition that Eve was created out of Adam's side suggested an identity of substance even while giving precedence to the male. Similarly, the Galenic medical view that the uterus was seven-lobed and that the lobe in which the foetus developed affected both its sex and its "complexion" or psychological makeup suggests a view in which male and female were parts of a spectrum, with females on the left, males on the right, and hermaphrodites in the middle. The farther to the right a female foetus lay, the more "masculine" characteristics it might have, and the farther to the left a male foetus, the more "effeminate."

Some early Christian writers, while acknowledging the existence of sexed bodies, had an ideal of non-gendered souls, or suggested that women might aspire to souls equally masculine to those of men. There has also been discussion as to whether the celibate clergy or Byzantine eunuchs might constitute a third gender. Some archaeologists have speculated whether the presence of gendered grave goods in some graves but not others might indicate that early medieval Germanic peoples conceived of some people having gender and others not, or whether there might be more than two genders. Gender ideologies operated at the level of organising social principles, but could also be used metaphorically, especially in theology, for example in the idea of Jesus as Mother. How far these two spheres interacted is difficult to say, but at least at the intellectual level this provided a good deal of play in conceptions of gender and how they might map onto bodies.

Sources of Ideology: Biblical

The main roots of Christian ideas lie in the Bible, supplemented by post-Biblical traditions. The story of the Fall, i.e., Eve's temptation by the Devil and persuasion of Adam to eat the apple that God had forbidden him, lay behind many of the negative ideas about women. The story was interpreted to mean that women were intellectually weaker than men (more easily deceived), morally weaker (more willing to do the wrong thing), disobedient, and deceitful. It was also understood that Eve deceived Adam by a combination of speech and sexual allure, which led to perceptions of the dangers of women's speech and sexuality. The punishment of God in driving Adam and Eve out of the Garden of Eden and the words of God to Eve, "In pain you shall bear children, yet your desire shall be for your husband and he shall rule over you" (Genesis 3:16), were taken to explain and justify women's secondary status. However, this could also be understood as the felix culpa or "happy fault" that had necessitated Christ and the Redemption, and therefore the birth of the Virgin Mary, who had become Queen of Heaven.

Different understandings of the Creation were also possible; Augustine and Aquinas both saw men and women being created in the image of God, though men were able to be the image of God individually, but women only when conjoined with men, yet Jacques de Vitry (d. 1240) could argue that Eve's birth in Paradise, rather than being introduced into it, and from Adam's body rather than from dust, made her superior to Adam. Mary was often seen as the Second Eve, whose obedience, submission to the will of God, and virginity reversed the faults of Eve.

Sources of Ideology: Medical

Humoural theory taught that women were moister and colder than men, which made them softer, more malleable, more emotional, more passive, and less rational than men. However, these characteristics also made women more compassionate and, in some views, more retentive of memory. Greater heat in the male led to firmer flesh and thus greater strength. The greater moisture led to women menstruating and lactating, where men only produced semen. While lactation was viewed positively, menstruation was viewed more ambiguously. Theologians generally viewed menstruation as pollution, and it was used to justify the banning of women from handling sacramental vessels, but medical writers saw it positively as a purgative, necessary for reproductive health. The lack of heat in women meant they had a greater sexual appetite than men, because they desired the heat of the male.

Sources of Ideology: Legal

Roman law, for the most part, saw women as minors, who did not have an independent legal persona but were represented by father, husband, or other legal guardian. Married women were usually regarded as incorporated into their husband's legal persona. Late medieval northern civil law was often influenced by this and limited the occasions on which a woman could go to law in her own person to cases such as rape and, sometimes, assault. Widows were more likely to be seen as having their own legal personality. Roman law continued to be influential, particularly in southern Europe and on canon law, the legal system of the church. In northern Europe, Barbarian or Germanic law codes were a more important source of law in the early Middle Ages. Some of these appear to give women more rights than Roman law. The wergild (price for killing someone) was often the same for men and women; indeed, in some codes it was greater for a woman than a man, especially if she was of childbearing age. There is disagreement as to whether this indicates that young fertile women had higher status or were simply more valuable than other women or men.

One of the areas in which canon law developed away from Roman law was in relation to marriage. Roman law had seen marriage as a civil contract, usually between the fathers of the spouses, but during the twelfth century the Church came to see marriage as a sacrament. In the process it saw marriage as essentially consisting of consent between the two parties, rather than between the fathers. In theory and sometimes in practice this gave women control over whom they married. However for the majority, particularly of those who had property, family, and especially fathers or guardians, continued to have an important role in deciding on marriage partners, and this applied to daughters and usually to eldest sons too. Here secular ideology about the importance of the father's authority over the family came up against ecclesiastical ideology about the equality of souls.

There were also both national and local systems of law, some of which expressed different ideas of gender. Some late medieval northern towns permitted a feme covert to trade as a feme sole, that is, as an independent legal persona who could make contracts and be sued in the court for debt. Some German towns had the custom of weiblichefreiheit, or "womanly freedom," which allowed a woman to repudiate a contract on the grounds that she had not understood it. This has been seen as evidence of women's ability to manipulate laws that perceived them as of inferior intellectual ability, but equally it would have made women unreliable contractees, as it confirmed ideas of women's changeability and lack of intellectual competence. Legally most women needed the consent of husbands to make contracts, partly because of their lack of legal persona, but another issue was whether an inferior could bind a superior to a contract that he had not initiated.

Aspects of Gender Ideology: Authority

Although women as wives and daughters were subject to the authority of fathers or husbands, this did not mean that they could not exercise authority. Wives in particular were often expected to exercise a delegated authority on behalf of husbands, in their absence, so that a wife could command servants and go to market, both to buy and to sell. In the case of aristocratic wives, this could mean running estates, handling finances, and even defending a castle against attack. It was, however, extremely rare for women to exercise public authority, though women might in some cases be thought to have expert knowledge, which could make them authoritative witnesses, for example, in relation to virginity, pregnancy, and childbirth. The church courts in York even called local prostitutes as witnesses in cases involving petitions for annulment of marriage on the basis of the husband's impotence.

Women rarely ruled in their own right, and usually only when there was no available male heir in the direct line. Even this was not always acceptable, as Matilda, the daughter of Henry I of England, found when she attempted to take the throne her father had left her in 1135. Matilda was only able to transmit a claim to her son, who became Henry II. Transmission of a claim to a son was usually more acceptable, although the French were to invoke Salic Law to prevent Edward III of England from using such descent to take the French crown. It would appear that queens-regnant became more acceptable later in the Middle Ages, though this may reflect the growing importance of blood lineage over the ability to be a personal war leader, rather than changes in gender ideology specifically, as boy kings were also more likely to succeed. When Mary of Burgundy, the only child of Charles the Bold, was left as duchess by the unexpected death of her father in 1477, she was recognised within her own lands, but Louis XI of France seized Burgundy and attempted to marry her to his son. The problem of marriage was one of the reasons women found it difficult to rule. Single women lacked authority, but a husband of equal status would usually be a foreign royal, which usually implied loss of sovereignty for the state; a husband drawn from the domestic nobility was of inferior status, so that different ideological discourses were in conflict. Mary retained most of her lands by marriage to the son of the Holy Roman emperor, who subsequently drew the Burgundian lands within the Habsburg empire.

Queens could be appointed as regents on behalf of kings absent in war and could also act as regents on behalf of minor sons, as Queen Margrethe I of Denmark did. She was married to King Håkon VI of Norway and, after the death of her father, Waldemar IV, in 1375, became regent of Denmark on behalf of her son Olaf, then aged five. Similarly, Blanche of Castile was regent for her son Louis IX of France from his accession in 1226, aged 11, to his majority in 1234, and again while he was on crusade. Here a woman's authority was acceptable because it was temporary and also because, as her power was dependent on her son's, she was more likely to ensure his survival than a potential rival for the crown. The Byzantine empress Irene was regent for her son Constantine VI and became joint ruler in 792 on his majority. She had him deposed and blinded in 797, and then ruled alone as empress but was herself deposed in 802. In this latter case both the "unnatural" attack on her son and the claim to personal power were unacceptable. Nevertheless Byzantium was more willing to see empresses exercising power jointly or as regents than were most other medieval European cultures.

Queen consorts were expected to advise their husbands, but not to meddle in politics, a delicate balancing act. Foreign queens were particularly likely to be resented if they were perceived to be interfering in domestic politics. The queen embodied the female aspects of monarchy, from her primary task of ensuring the birth of a male heir to intercession on behalf of supplicants. This latter tempered the masculine royal justice of the king and allowed him to show mercy without appearing weak.

Aspects of Gender Ideology: Sexuality

Virginity was highly valued in women before marriage, and the life of the virgin was considered to be rewarded more highly in heaven than that of the wife or widow. Greater desire in women meant that some theologians saw the maintenance of virginity by women as more difficult and thus more praiseworthy than in men; however, others saw female sexuality as threatening to the chastity of men, especially monks. Although some lay men, such as King Edward the Confessor of England, were honoured as virgins, virginity in kings conflicted with a secular ideal that they provide a male heir to ensure a stable succession. There has as yet been relatively little study of the extent to which virginity remained an ideal for clergy in the later Middle Ages, as it was for some in the earlier Middle Ages. Chastity was highly valued for women in marriage, and a virtuous reputation was largely based on sexual reputation; nevertheless, women were regarded as morally weaker and more prone to stray. Adultery was, in the earlier Middle Ages, often punished more severely in women than in men, but as canon law developed it came to be treated the same in men and women by the church courts, that is, as grounds for a legal separation; however, in social terms, adultery was usually treated more severely in women than in men. As a result, female sexuality was policed more thoroughly than male sexuality. Widowhood has been treated by modern historians as the most rewarding status for women, with its status as head of the household and (in most cases) recognition as a legal persona, and for women with property this may have been the case. However, medieval people, on biblical grounds, saw widows as economically and sometimes socially and legally vulnerable and in need of protection.

P. H. CULLUM and P. J. P. GOLDBERG

References and Further Reading

- Bennett, Judith M. Women in the Medieval English Countryside: Gender & Household in Brigstock Before the Plague. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1987.
- Bernau, Anke, Ruth Evans, and Sarah Salih, eds. Medieval Virginites. Cardiff: University of Wales Press, 2003.
- Blamires, Alcuin. The Case for Women in Medieval Culture. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1997.
- Brown, Peter. The Body and Society: Men, Women and Sexual Renunciation in Early Christianity. New York: Columbia University Press, 1990.
- Cadden, Joan. Meanings of Sex Difference in the Middle Ages: Medicine, Science and Culture. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- Cullum, P. H. "Clergy, Masculinity and Transgression in Late Medieval England." In Masculinity in Medieval Europe, edited by D. M. Hadley. London: Longman, 1999.

- Erler, Mary C., and Maryanne Kowaleski, eds. Women and Power in the Middle Ages. Athens, Ga.: University of Georgia Press, 1988.
- Goldberg, P. J. P. "Women." In Fifteenth-Century Attitudes: Perceptions of Society in Late Medieval England, edited by Rosemary Horrox. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994, pp. 112–131.
- Goldberg, P. J. P. Women, Work, and Life Cycle in a Medieval Economy: Women in York and Yorkshire, c. 1300–1520. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1992.
- Halsall, Guy. "Female Status and Power in Early Merovingian Central Austrasia." Journal of Medieval and Early Modern Studies 5.1 (1996): 1–24.
- Huneycutt, Lois. "Intercession and the High-Medieval Queen: The Esther Topos." In Power of the Weak: Studies on Medieval Women, edited by Jennifer Carpenter and Sally-Beth MacLean. Urbana, Ill.: University of Illinois Press, 1995, pp. 126–146.
- Kuefler, Mathew. The Manly Eunuch: Masculinity, Gender Ambiguity, and Christian Ideology in Late Antiquity. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2001.
- Laqueur, Thomas. Making Sex: Body and Gender from the Greeks to Freud. Cambridge, Mass., and London: Harvard University Press, 1990.
- Laynesmith, Joanna. The Last Medieval Queens: English Queenship 1445–1503. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2004.
- McLean, Ian. Renaissance Notion of Woman. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1980.
- McNamara, Jo Ann. "The Herrenfrage: The Restructuring of the Gender System, 1050–1150." In Medieval Masculinities: Regarding Men in the Middle Ages, edited by Clare A. Lees. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1994, pp. 3–29.
- O'Faolain, Julia, and Lauro Martines, eds. Not in God's Image: Women in History. London: Virago, 1979.
- Power, Eileen. Medieval Women. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1975.
- Riddy, Felicity. "Mother Knows Best: Reading Social Change in a Courtesy Text." Speculum 71.1 (1996): 66–86.
- Stafford, Pauline. Queen Emma and Queen Edith: Queenship and Women's Power in Eleventh-Century England. Oxford: Blackwell, 2001.
- Swanson, R. N. "Angels Incarnate: Clergy and Masculinity from Gregorian Reform to Reformation." In Masculinity in Medieval Europe, edited by D. M. Hadley. London: Longman, 1999, pp. 160–177.

See also Archaeology; Aristotelian Concepts of Women and Gender; Betrothals; Blanche of Castile; Body in Literature and Religion; Business; Celibacy; Clerical and Priests' Concubines; Chastity and Chaste Marriage; Christine de Pizan; Church; Courtly Love; Crime and Criminals; Defenses of Women; Division of Labor; Dowry and Other Marriage Gifts; Eunuchs; Eve; Feme Covert; Feme Sole; Femininity and Masculinity; Inheritance; Intercession; Irene; Jesus/God as Mother; Landholding and Property Rights; Law; Law, Canon; Law, Customary: French; Law, English Secular Courts of; Law, German; Legal Agency; Market and Tradeswomen; Marriage, Christian; Mary, Virgin; Matilda the Empress; Menstruation; Misogyny; Procreation and Ideas of Conception; Prostitutes; Queens and

Empresses: The West; Rape and Raptus; Regents and Queen-Lieutenants; Sexuality: Extramarital Sex; Succession, Royal and Noble; Theology; Typology and Women; Virginity; Widows

GENDER IN ART

In Undoing Gender, Judith Butler refers to gender as “a practice of improvisation within a scene of constraint.” We might unpack this statement as follows: the system into which a human being is born constrains the range of characteristics that form the constellation of behaviors and attitudes constitutive of any individual’s gender identity; nevertheless, any individual, in performing his or her gender, has some degree of agency, some ability to improvise. During the Middle Ages, the Christian Church promoted a gender system based in biblical texts and exegesis. Medieval Christian art usually visualized the ideological messages of the Church and thus participated in distributing approved models of gender, which gained force through repetition. But gaps and contradictions as well as adaptation to social and cultural change enabled shifts through time and even the creation of new models.

School, French. Madonna with child and St. Anne. Thirteenth century. Museo Nazionale del Bargello, Florence, Italy. Credit: Scala / Art Resource, N.Y.

We might argue that the doctrine of the Incarnation itself forces Christianity to take gender seriously. As an aspect of embodiment, gender had to be assigned to early Christian visualizations of Christ, the god who had taken human form. Roman artists modelled him on the physically perfect, handsome young Apollo and as a result created in representation an intellectualized, emotionally controlled Christ who triumphed but did not suffer. This incarnate god was separate from the first person of the Trinity, who retained the power of invisibility. Early Christian and early medieval images of the Son increasingly imparted an authority to him, especially in the composition known as “Christ in Majesty,” which presents him as ruler of the universe. The spread of Christianity to northern Europe required a shift in the gender of Christ toward the warrior masculinity that was the ideal there, but this shift continued the idea of the triumphant Christ, the victor over the devil and death. By the twelfth century this image had developed into representations of Christ as the rather vengeful and all-powerful judge of the Last Judgment.

A major change in this formula for visual representations of the divine occurred in the High Middle Ages, resulting in increased attention to the vulnerable human body of Jesus, his flesh and its suffering, his Passion. The notion inherited from antiquity that man is identified with mind or spirit and with activity, whereas body or flesh and passivity characterized woman, meant that the masculinity of Jesus was imperiled through increasingly vivid images of his silent suffering. That the human Jesus was no longer securely masculine reveals the unattainability of the masculine ideal. Perhaps to reclaim that masculinity for Jesus, or at least to proclaim physical humanity, artists in the late medieval period began to include explicit male genitalia in representations of him as infant and child.

Exegetes had also identified Christ with the Sponsus of the Song of Songs, the lover and bridegroom whose beloved and bride, the Sponsa, was understood to be the Church, the Virgin Mary, and Anima, the human soul. Drawing on both the triumphant and the suffering Christ, the figure of Christ the Sponsus became Christ the lover-knight, who fights and suffers for the beloved, winning back the soul through his own self-sacrifice, which is a triumph over death. This complex constellation constitutes the ideology of chivalry that represents an ideal of masculinity for the later Middle Ages.

If identification with body condemned women to an inferior status, such that the ideal femininity was submissiveness, assertion of extreme control over that body could redeem women. Asceticism, and above all virginity, gave women access to power, which was claimed by canonesses, nuns, and abbesses (whose power was also a product of social status). Images of women commissioning or receiving manuscript books from monks or clerics use hieratic scale, frontality, and the power of the center to visualize the high status of these women. The Passional of Abbess Kunigunde, for example, also encourages her to adopt the subject position of the beloved human soul congruent with her female sex, and to imagine herself as tempted and fallen, soiled and sinful, captured by the devil and passively suffering until rescued by her lover-knight, Christ. But with two full-page miniatures of the arms of Christ, her book urged her as well to put on spiritual armor and fight as a warrior for her own soul. The lability of gender in this widely distributed narrative disrupts any simple correlation of female and femininity and promotes cross-gender identification.

By the twelfth century, the first person of the Trinity, the Father-God, had begun to be visualized in human form and was thereby gendered as masculine. Represented as aged, the Ancient of Days, rather than as the warrior or lover-knight, this old but powerful male has abundant white hair and a thick beard, signs of virile masculinity. Analogous to the highest positions males attain on earth, the Father-God was represented not only as judge, but also king, emperor, and especially pope, often wearing the papal tiara. But this masculinity of the aged is secured first through the wooing and acquisition of a young wife, the virgin Mary, second through paternity, and finally through exercising the power of life and death over his offspring, the sacrifice of his son.

The figures of the Father-God, the Virgin Mary, and Jesus exemplify a dominant hypertheme in Western visual art, which is the formal scheme in which three human figures form a triad, a configuration of three persons. The position of each element in the triad points to an interweaving of gender and power. According to the pattern of masculine domination deeply imbedded in the Western imaginary, this formal scheme both expresses an ideal relation of gendered power and naturalizes that relation as a family. This is exemplified in a page from the Turin-Milan Hours. This power-gender triad schematizes what we see when we look through the “familial gaze”—a clear demarcation of gender roles, a feminine mother and masculine father, with little or no blurring, blending, or sharing of traits.

Joseph, Jesus’s human stepfather, found no place in the power-gender triad described above until the late Middle Ages, and then only slowly. Although Gregory the Great claimed that there is only one life of the saints, that is, one pattern of life on earth that leads to sainthood in heaven, saints’ lives actually fractured into many gender models. Until the late Middle Ages, however, these models did not include sexually active marriage or parenting. The late medieval cult of Saint Anne, mother of the Virgin Mary, who was often visualized in the grouping known as Anna Selbdritt (Anne, her daughter Mary, and Mary’s child Jesus), participated in the shift that resulted in saintly models for the laity.

PAMELA SHEINGORN

References and Further Reading

- Ashley, Kathleen M., and Pamela Sheingorn. Interpreting Cultural Symbols: Saint Anne in Late Medieval Society. Athens, Ga.: University of Georgia Press, 1990.
- Butler, Judith. Undoing Gender. New York: Routledge, 2004.
- Caviness, Madeline Harrison. Visualizing Women in the Middle Ages: Sight, Spectacle, and Scopic Economy. The Middle Ages Series. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001.
- Desmond, Marilynn, and Pamela Sheingorn. Myth, Montage, & Visuality in Late Medieval Manuscript Culture: Christine de Pizan’s Epistre Othea. Ann Arbor, Mich.: University of Michigan Press, 2003.
- Dressler, Rachel. Of Armor and Men in Medieval England: The Chivalric Rhetoric of Three English Knights’ Effigies. Burlington, Vt.: Ashgate, 2004.
- Jolly, Penny Howell. Made in God’s Image? Eve and Adam in the Genesis Mosaics at San Marco, Venice. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1997.
- Nixon, Virginia. Mary’s Mother: Saint Anne in Late Medieval Europe. University Park, Pa.: Pennsylvania State University Press, 2004.
- Sheingorn, Pamela. “The Bodily Embrace or Embracing the Body: Gesture and Gender in Late Medieval Culture.” In The Stage as Mirror: Civic Theatre in Late Medieval Europe, edited by Alan E. Knight. Woodbridge, Suffolk, England: D. S. Brewer, 1997, pp. 51–89.
- Sheingorn, Pamela. “Constructing the Patriarchal Parent: Fragments of the Biography of Joseph the Carpenter.” In Framing the Family: Narrative and Representation in the Medieval and Early Modern Periods, edited by Rosalynn Voaden and Diane Wolfthal. Tempe, Ariz.: Arizona Center for Medieval and Renaissance Studies, 2004, pp. 163–182.
- Toussaint, Gia. “Das Passional Der Kunigunde von Böhmen: Bildrhetorik und Spiritualität.” Doctoral thesis, Universität Hamburg, 2002, Schöningh, 2003.

See also Art, Representations of Women in; Body in Literature and Religion; Body, Visual Representations of; Bride of Christ: Imagery; Gender Ideologies; Hagiography, Iconographic Aspects of; Joseph, Stepfather of Jesus; Mary, Virgin: in Art

GENDER IN HISTORY

Gender used to be only a categorizing term in some, but not all, languages. More recently, scholars have interpreted gender as the social and cultural construction of sex differences. Since the 1970s, medievalists have employed concepts of gender as a critical tool for understanding the past. Generally, they define gender in two parts: as human relations based on perceived sexual differences, and as a discourse of power that describes and organizes those relations. Often medievalist scholars use gender interchangeably with sex, women, feminism, or sexual orientation.

Modern medievalists assume that gender and sex are related but discrete concepts. A gender system encompasses gender ideology, roles, and identity. Gender ideology is a set of ideas in any given society about how the sexes should be defined and identified. A single society could produce many different gender ideologies. In medieval Europe, for instance, Christian theologians from the same region and generation blamed women for human sin, praised female saints as behavioral models for all Christians, and used feminine metaphors for Jesus. These notions represented overlapping but not necessarily identical gender ideologies.

Gender roles are sets of behavioral guidelines generated by a community or society for its members, based on perceived sexual characteristics. In the castles of twelfth-century continental Europe, for instance, noble families expected their daughters to be willing partners in the project of reproducing aristocratic lineages. Gender identity refers to the way any individual in a society acts out and makes sense of gender roles and ideologies for him or herself. Hence, not all aristocratic women identified themselves as typical childbearers or links in a genealogical chain, nor even as willing wives or lovers of men. Gender identity is related to but not the same as sexuality. Some modern theorists of gender, such as Judith Butler, have argued that to equate the two assumes an inherent hierarchy based on gender-ascribed sexuality. As the medievalist Ruth Mazo Karras has shown, however, some groups of men in medieval Europe—knights, university students, guild members—defined themselves and evaluated masculinity in relation to other men, but not necessarily in terms of sexuality. Some other medieval options for classifying humans were as non-children, non-coreligionists, or non-beasts.

Medievalists have participated in the larger project of gender studies by explaining how gender systems and ideologies change over time. For instance, until the scientific revolution, most Europeans conceived of a single-sex model for human biology based on Aristotelian and Galenic principles. Philosophers such as Thomas Aquinas and Hildegard of Bingen proposed that female bodies were not distinguished by particular sexual characteristics but by their physical underdevelopment. Like children, women were supposedly physically, intellectually, and morally inferior to adult men. Medieval physicians believed that women's bodies were cooler than men's bodies, as a result of which females could not generate the physical heat that would turn internal tubes and gonads—fallopian tubes and ovaries—into external penises and testes. However, this made women's uteruses cool, comfortable spots to house unborn babies. Medieval religious thinkers such as Aquinas were mostly interested in the elaboration of gender traits to help them explain reproduction, sexual pleasure, and natural philosophy, rather than considering gender hierarchies or issues of sexual orientation.

The many meanings of gender for medievalist scholars and their medieval subjects have inspired diverse, sometimes conflicting interpretations of medieval gender systems. The application of gender to the medieval past has produced studies on subjects ranging from the division of labor, infanticide, artistic gaze, and uses of poetic metaphor to the gender implications of landscape and sanctity. How medievalists define and use the concept of gender has had profound implications on their general understanding of the Middle Ages. Jo Ann McNamara has recently argued for reperiodizing European history based on shifts in gender ideologies. During the first Christian millennium, Europeans organized their societies first by class or birth and only secondly by gender; elite women were noble first, female second, and considered more virile than most men. Given this context, a Middle Ages that began in the fifth century and ended in the fifteenth has little meaning. In response, other scholars such as Maryanne Kowaleski and Mary Erler have called for medievalists to revise or “gender” the larger story, or master narrative, of the Middle Ages.

LISA BITEL

References and Further Reading

- Butler, Judith. Gender Trouble: Feminism and the Subversion of Identity. New York and London: Routledge, 1990.
- Cadden, Joan. Meanings of Sex Differences in the Middle Ages: Medicine, Science, and Culture. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- Erler, Mary C., and Maryanne Kowaleski, eds. Gendering the Master Narrative: Women and Power in the Middle Ages. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2003.
- Karras, Ruth Mazo. From Boys to Men: Formations of Masculinity in Late Medieval Europe. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2003.
- Laqueur, Thomas. Making Sex: Body and Gender from the Greeks to Freud. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1990.
- McNamara, Jo Ann. “Women and Power Through the Family Revisited.” In Gendering the Master Narrative: Women and Power in the Middle Ages, edited by Mary C. Erler and Maryanne Kowaleski. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2003.

- Schiebinger, Londa. Has Feminism Changed Science? Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1999.
- Scott, Joan Wallach. "Gender: A Useful Category of Historical Analysis." American Historical Review 91 (1986): 1053–1075.

See also Aristotelian Concepts of Women and Gender; Femininity and Masculinity; Gender Ideologies; Procreation and Ideas of Conception; Scholasticism

GENEALOGY

The medieval interest in genealogy reflects a broader concern with origins, be they of words, families, or institutions. The earliest genealogies, dating from the sixth to the eighth centuries and mostly of Celtic or Germanic origin, were usually those of royal families, often consisting simply of lists of names. Genealogies were more common in northern than in southern Europe. Iceland, in particular, is noted for the age and extent of its genealogical record. The twelfth-century Landnámabók or Book of Settlements, the most famous family saga, provided the histories and genealogies of over four hundred Icelandic settlers.

Genealogies gradually became more widespread and increasingly included nonroyal families. They could take the form of lists, charts, pictorial diagrams, or trees. Due to their brevity they almost never occupy an entire codex, but their placement within a codex and the type of texts they accompany convey their significance.

Genealogies associated a family with certain rights and properties, and genealogical literature was produced to legitimate claims to power and authority. In contrast to universal histories, which began with the Biblical origins of mankind, genealogical literature often created a mythic founder for a family or kingdom. This figure may have discovered or claimed the land, or instituted the rule of law. Both France and England, for example, traced their descent to Trojan heroes, while Anglo-Saxon texts claimed the descent of their kings from the god Wodan. Writers often tried to reconcile pagan ancestors with scriptural genealogies. In the case of lesser nobility, a founding figure may have acquired land or constructed the family castle.

The eleventh century marks a shift in conceptions of kinship, which is manifested in genealogies. In the early Middle Ages kinship was most often construed as a synchronic network comprising one's propinqui (intimates) and consanguinei (blood kin), rather than as a diachronic network that connected individuals through time. Over the course of the tenth and eleventh centuries individuals began to identify themselves in terms of their ancestors. During this period, rank, honors, and wealth began to be passed from father to son, as did bonds of fidelity. Once power and wealth became heritable, it was necessary to document one's ancestry. During the same period primogeniture, the system by which the eldest male heir inherited the majority of a family's goods, largely replaced the practice of dividing an inheritance equally among the heirs. A family's holdings became transmissible from one generation to the next, and land and family were identified with one another. Patronyms, nearly always derived from the name of a land or castle, as well as heraldic emblems, also came into use at this time. Land, name, and identity were thus passed down from father to son.

The eleventh century also witnessed the first appearance of the Tree of Jesse, a visual representation of Christ's descent from David's father, Jesse. The Tree of Jesse was featured in stained glass windows, statuary, manuscript illuminations, and paintings, and remained popular as an artistic motif until the sixteenth century. Christ's genealogy is derived principally from Isaiah 11:1–3 and Matthew 1:1–16. Early representations of the Tree of Jesse, based on Isaiah, focus on Jesse as the root, Mary as the rod, and Christ as the flower, while later representations, following Matthew, emphasize Christ's descent from the kings of Israel. Other common variations on the Tree of Jesse include either prophets or evangelists. Tree of Jesse images can be strikingly phallic, depicting the tree emerging from the loins of the reclining Jesse. Representations of Holy Kinship, which focus on Christ's female ancestors, especially Saint Anne, provide an alternative to the male-oriented genealogy celebrated by the Tree of Jesse.

Women occupy an ambiguous position in genealogical documents. Due to the primacy of male offspring, genealogy came to be construed almost exclusively in agnatic terms, and female ancestors were rarely mentioned. For example, women are largely absent from English genealogical rolls and pictorial representations of royal genealogies, and their presence often signals a rupture in the line of male descent. Though the ideal of agnatic genealogy dictated continuous male descent, in reality women were often required to legitimize territorial acquisitions or dynastic changes by serving as links to established authority.

In the late Middle Ages genealogical literature became more expansive, often including women and cadet lines. Sometimes, indeed, the mythic founding figures invoked by genealogical literature were women, as in the case of the fairy Melusine, founder of the Lusignan family, kings of Cyprus. Women played a more prominent role in the apparently heritable predisposition to saintliness. The thirteenth- and fourteenth-century Arpadian dynasty of Hungary as well as the Capetian–Angevin dynasty of France, Hungary, and Naples boasted a number of royal saints, female as well as male, equally able to intercede on behalf of the living and to transmit their saintly natures to their offspring.

DAISY DELOGU

References and Further Reading

- Bloch, R. Howard. Etymologies and Genealogies: A Literary Anthropology of the French Middle Ages. Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1983.
- Duby, Georges. The Chivalrous Society, translated by Cynthia Postan. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1977.
- Genicot, Léopold. Les Généalogies. Turnhout: Brepols, 1975.
- Vauchez, André. Sainthood in the Later Middle Ages, translated by Jean Birrell. New York and Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997.
- Watson, Arthur. The Early Iconography of the Tree of Jesse. London: Oxford University Press, 1934.

See also Holy Kinship; Inheritance; Kinship; Mélusine; Patriarchy and Patrilineage; Succession, Royal and Noble

GENTRY, WOMEN OF: ENGLAND

The gentry of the late Middle Ages constituted a specifically English social class, more or less equivalent to the continental lower nobility, but with distinctive characteristics of its own. The gentry were members of landholding families without hereditary titles but with pedigrees that demonstrated “good birth.” Gentry families had personal and political connections with the nobility, but, unlike their continental counterparts, also with the wealthier bourgeoisie. The most encompassing designations for members of this class, first used formally in the early fifteenth century, were “gentleman” and “gentlewoman,” from the Latin generosus/a, meaning well-born. This term was to some extent accorded by common consent and rested not only on good birth and the possession of an estate but also on visible wealth and expenditure, on conduct, and on the exercise of community leadership. In all of these areas, the women of the gentry participated along with the men.

In the fundamental area of good birth, which established the gentility of a family, women and men were both of importance, since ancestry was counted on both sides of the family. The family’s social network included maternal as well as paternal connections. The gentry was a continuum, not a clearly defined social order. It extended from the families of knights who were as wealthy as some nobles down to the landless younger children of minor landholders, who served the greater gentry and the nobility, the sons often as lawyers and the daughters as attendants to the ladies. At marriage a gentlewoman would bring a dowry in lands or cash that could be instrumental in maintaining or advancing the family’s status. For his part the husband would provide his bride with a dower, lands, and income that would support her if she were widowed. In many cases parents would also provide the couple with a jointure—property held jointly by both spouses and kept by the survivor of the two. Gentlewomen could thus control considerable property, and gentry heiresses or widows with particularly large estates or valuable connections were often sought in marriage by the nobility. At the lower end of the gentry spectrum, gentlemen could marry daughters of wealthy merchants for the same reasons. Women took on their husband’s rank, however, and so the gentry were reluctant to let their daughters marry below the family’s status and might postpone arranging a daughter’s marriage many years in order to find a husband they considered suitable: Elizabeth Paston only married at age twenty-nine, in 1458, after her family had spent over a decade searching for a husband for her. Her niece Margery outraged her relatives ten years later by secretly marrying their estate manager and seems to have been ostracized for endangering the family’s reputation.

Gentlewomen were not simply conveyors of heredity and wealth. A gentry household required active supervision by its mistress, who was accorded the courtesy title of “dame,” and the family’s standing and prospects required her efforts as well. Like women of every class, gentlewomen were expected to be in charge of the provision of food and clothing and the upbringing of children, which for the gentry meant the supervision of servants. But the mistress of a gentry household also was expected to be competent to act as her husband’s deputy in the running of the estate. Women whose husbands were absent, or widows whose children were minors, were routinely found giving direction to estate officers, studying their accounts, and demanding the payment of rents and debts; these were responsibilities they could take on because they frequently assisted in these tasks even when their husbands were present. In the mid-fifteenth century Thomas Stonor was writing to his wife Jane from London in the expectation that she was familiar with the finances and administration of the estates, while in the absence of her husband John, Margaret Paston was vigorously urging on the family’s lawsuits, advising her husband on advantageous local connections and even directing the family’s forces when a dispute over property turned violent. In the absence of the head of the household she was regarded as the obvious, if temporary, decision-maker.

While a gentlewoman could act as her husband's lieutenant when the need arose, she was also expected to fill the specifically feminine role of peacemaker. Gentry wives were deeply involved in constructing and maintaining the personal networks that formed the social and political bonds that established and displayed a family's position. As mothers they were actively involved in seeking out marriages for their children, and when powerful patrons or angry neighbors had to be appeased, gentlemen often first sent their wives to exercise their diplomacy with the ladies of the other household.

The education of a gentlewoman was generally in the practical areas of household and estate management. A typical gentlewoman could read, and some owned devotional books or romances, usually in English. Writing was a less common skill: Thomas Betson, writing in 1476, expected his fiancée, Katherine Rich, to reply to his letters, but by means of a secretary. In the fourteenth century English gentlewomen were routinely expected to speak French, but by the fifteenth century few of them seem to have had much knowledge of it. One of the most important features of a gentlewoman's education and conduct was appropriate religious observance. Nuns were predominantly drawn from among women of good birth, but most gentlewomen did not enter convents. Lay gentlewomen were expected to be regular attendees at mass, and many joined religious confraternities. The wives of some Lollard knights, such as Dame Perrine Clanvowe, are known to have shared their husbands' religious convictions, and the Bridgetine practice of private devotions was popular, but extreme religious sentiments, whether heretical or orthodox, seem to have been the exception.

Men and women of the gentry shared cultural interests and social attitudes, and shared daily activities and recreations. While women were not considered equal to men, their role in sustaining the family was valued and respected.

RHODA LANGE FRIEDRICH

References and Further Reading

- Acheson, Eric. A Gentry Community: Leicestershire in the Fifteenth Century, c. 1422–c. 1485. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1992.
- Carpenter, Christine. Locality and Polity: A Study of Warwickshire Landed Society, 1401–1499. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1992.
- Coss, Peter. The Lady in Medieval England 1000–1500. Stroud, Gloucestershire: Sutton, 1998.
- Davis, Norman, ed. Paston Letters and Papers of the Fifteenth Century. 2 vols. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1971–1976.

Payling, S. J. Political Society in Lancastrian England: The Greater Gentry of Nottinghamshire. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1991.

Ward, Jennifer, ed. and trans. Women of the English Nobility and Gentry 1066–1500. Manchester and New York: Manchester University Press, 1995.

See also Administration of Estates; Diplomacy and Reconciliation; Dowry and Other Marriage Gifts; England; Literacy and Reading; Vernacular; Noble Women; Paston Letters; Social Status

GERMANIC LANDS

In many ways, the lives of women in Germanic lands were similar to those of women elsewhere in Europe in the Middle Ages. The vast majority of women lived in villages, raising products for their own and their landlords' consumption, and doing agricultural tasks that were somewhat gender-specific. Most women married at least once, usually while in their mid- to late twenties, to a spouse who they hoped would be a good worker, decent father, and tolerable person with whom to live. Most women gave birth to several children, and survived childbirth with the assistance of female relatives and friends. By the fifteenth century, in cities, they might also use the services of a professional midwife. Most women were Christian, and engaged in a number of rituals and activities to demonstrate their faith, improve their likelihood of going to heaven, and ask for divine or saintly assistance with earthly problems; they went on pilgrimages, said prayers, lit candles, and made sure their children were baptized. Jewish women, whose communities suffered increasing persecution beginning in the fourteenth century, also carried out specific rituals and said special prayers, called thkines, for events that had meaning for them, such as menstruation, pregnancy, and childbirth.

Many German-speaking Jews—called Ashkenazic from the Hebrew word for the Rhineland area—migrated eastward, pushed by persecution and pulled by the more welcoming policies of the rulers and nobles of Poland–Lithuania. Whole families and sometimes whole communities migrated, so that Jewish women carried their traditions as far eastward as Ukraine. Persecution of Jews in the Middle Ages was not limited to Germanic lands, however, so this was yet another part of women's experiences that was widely shared across Europe.

The political and economic situation of medieval Germany did create a few distinctive situations, however. While western, northern, and eastern Europe developed into centralized monarchies—France, England, Portugal, Spain, Poland–Lithuania, Denmark, Sweden—central Europe did not. Although in the tenth and eleventh century there were powerful German kings, who revived the title of emperor and had papal coronations, their empire—later called the Holy Roman Empire—remained a loosely united confederation of hundreds of variously sized states. Many of these states were hereditary principalities, duchies, or counties, with women serving regularly as regents for their minor sons and sometimes as rulers in their own right. In this they followed a pattern set by the wives and sisters of earlier German kings. Some of these states were ecclesiastical territories ruled by bishops, abbots, or abbesses; abbesses held jurisdiction not only over an abbey itself, but also over the land and villages that belonged to it. Some of these states were free imperial cities, where women were considered “citizens” for taxation and legal purposes, although they had no official role in governing. Many of these cities were booming economically in the thirteenth century and then again in the fifteenth century, so they provided a variety of work opportunities for women. By the end of the Middle Ages, urban merchants in Germany had invested in mining and manufacturing in the countryside, capitalist enterprises that also provided employment for women.

Royal and Noble Women

The German kings of the tenth and eleventh centuries were ably assisted as they built up their power by a series of capable women. Matilda (895–968), the wife and widow of the first ruler in the Ottonian dynasty, Henry I (r. 919–936), worked with both her husband and her son to gain ecclesiastical backing in battles against lower nobles. She built many churches and founded or supported numerous monasteries, the most important of which were Quedlinburg and Nordhausen, where she lived after her husband’s death; later she was made a saint. Adelheid of Burgundy (927–1000), the wife of Matilda’s son Otto I (r. 936–973) was made official coemperor (consortium imperii) with her husband, and issued charters on her own. She married her son Otto II (ruled 973–983) to a Byzantine princess, Theophano (959–991), and when Otto died, she and Theophano—both of whom held the title coimperatrix, and occasionally signed documents imperator (emperor)—ruled as regents, for the next Ottonian king was only three.

Along with empresses, other Ottonian royal women played important political roles. Matilda, Countess of Tuscany (1046–1115), the cousin of Henry IV (r. 1056–1106), inherited huge territories in Italy, and intervened in the struggle between Henry and Pope Gregory VII over lay investiture. She publicly backed the papacy and donated her lands to the pope, though she invested bishops in her own territories and in her will gave her lands to the German emperor, much to the pope’s dismay. Her earlier donation had reserved her right to do so, but these territories remained a source of conflict between popes and emperors for more than a century.

The female members of the Hohenstaufen, Luxemburg, and Hapsburg families, who held the emperorship from 1138 to the end of the Empire in 1806, pursued independent political policies much less vigorously than had Ottonian women, and by the twelfth century the title coimperatrix disappeared from imperial documents. In the Golden Bull of 1346, which set out the procedures for electing the emperor, the ruler’s wife was clearly subordinate. As long as they had imperial approval, women could inherit the rights of succession in the smaller territorial states of the Holy Roman Empire, however, and most states had prominent female regents from time to time. Loretta, the Countess of Sponheim (1298–1346), widowed at twenty-five with young children, defended her territories from more powerful lay and ecclesiastical neighbors who wanted to annex them. She was excommunicated in the process, and traveled to the papal court at Avignon to get this sentence lifted. Anna of Nassau, duchess of Brunswick–Lüneburg (1441–1514) survived a poisoning attempt right before her second marriage to become a successful regent, developing sound financial policies that her successors continued.

Abbesses

Most of these lay noblewomen were regents who eventually turned their territories over to their sons. Abbesses, by contrast, had a permanent right to rule, granted by appointment or election. Abbesses of certain houses, especially free imperial monasteries or those allied with powerful noble families, were arguably the most powerful women in medieval Germany. (Some of these communities were technically “secular” endowments of canonesses as their residents took no final vows; their head was always referred to as abbess, however.) Though every monastery had to have a priest available to say mass and hear confessions, he was often appointed by the abbess, who also appointed secular officials such as toll collectors, bailiffs, and legal personnel. She had the right to mint money (coins often bear the portrait of powerful abbesses), hear legal cases, and send a representative to the imperial diet. She was a source of artistic patronage, hiring builders, sculptors, painters, and musicians, and of social patronage, supporting hospitals, orphanages, and schools. She generally appointed assistants from among the community's residents, so that women performed all of the other administrative duties and much of the spiritual counseling of novices and residents.

Many free imperial monasteries were founded by Ottonian rulers and their consorts in the ninth and tenth centuries, and granted rights and privileges by both the emperor and the pope. The high point of many houses in terms of intellectual accomplishments and political power was the tenth and eleventh centuries, when the abbess Matilda of Quedlinburg (954–999, the granddaughter of the founder Matilda) corresponded with political leaders and had authority over bishops, and the poet Hrotsvit of Gandersheim (c. 935–1001) wrote the first original dramas since the end of the Roman Empire for the nuns in her convent. Beginning in the late eleventh century, the Gregorian reform movement attempted to reduce the abbesses' power and visibility in the surrounding community, though this was only slowly successful. The abbess Hildegard of Bingen (1098–1179) founded new monasteries, and also wrote music, plays, natural history, and visionary works. Though few abbesses after her were as powerful politically, in her focus on mystical experiences she set a pattern that became increasingly common. In the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, most nuns who wrote were mystics, with many of the most important medieval mystics, male and female, coming from German-speaking areas. The Cistercian convent at the Saxon city of Helfta became particularly known for its visionary residents, including Mechthild of Magdeburg (c. 1212–1282), whose Flowing Light of the Godhead presents a graphic picture of heaven, hell, and purgatory.

By the fifteenth century, it appeared to some church officials and the more rigorous nuns as if some women's monasteries had forgotten their spiritual focus, and many underwent reforms designed to enforce strict rules of conduct and higher standards of spirituality. These reforms often put the convent more closely under the control of a local male bishop and took away some of the abbess's independent power, but they also built up a strong sense of group cohesion and gave nuns a greater sense of the spiritual worth of their lives. These reformed houses later became vigorous opponents of the Protestant Reformation, and some, such as Wienhausen, survive today.

Urban Women and Capitalist Enterprises

No urban woman had the power of a noble regent or abbess, for the free imperial cities and all other towns were governed by male councils and mayors. Many medieval sources are explicitly gender-inclusive when talking about citizens; however, using phrases like “Bürger und Bürgerin” (male or female citizen) or “alle Bürgern, Mann und Frau” (all citizens, man and woman). Women are listed on new citizen rolls in many cities, and were obligated to swear an oath of loyalty, pay taxes, and provide soldiers and arms for the city's defense. Just as they did with men, the new citizens' lists record the occupations of the women accepted—midwife, seamstress, weaver, candle-maker—and the amount they paid for citizenship. Women as well as men were granted citizenship free of charge if they practiced an occupation the city deemed desirable; in the late fifteenth century both Frankfurt and Nuremberg offered free citizenship to midwives.

In the early twentieth century, several German historians argued that the sex ratio in medieval cities was highly skewed in favor of women and that women had full rights in many guilds. The demographic statistics on which this assertion was based are now known to have been misleading—they were taken during times of war, when many men were away fighting—and more recent studies have made clear that only rarely were women full guild members. They were engaged in a range of occupations, however. Women and girls worked in guild shops as unofficial assistants and as domestic servants. They sold merchandise at the city marketplace or peddled it house to house. They worked in taverns and inns, brewed beer, and by the late fifteenth century distilled and sold brandy. In such “public businesses,” which a 1340 Munich law code defined as those who “stand at the public market or buy and sell” or were “tailors, shopkeepers, money changers, or innkeepers,” women were free to do business without their husband's approval, but they were also responsible to pay back all debts. Women worked in municipal and church-run hospitals, infirmaries, orphanages, and pest-houses, or as domestic servants. They worked in the official municipal brothel (Frauenhaus), which many cities opened in the fifteenth century, or combined selling sex for money with other part-time labor, such as laundering.

Most production remained the province of craft guilds throughout the Middle Ages, but in cloth production and mining, capitalist entrepreneurs increasingly hired individuals and families in large-scale operations. Investors hired rural households to produce wool, linen, and later cotton thread and cloth (or cloth that was a mixture of these), paying the household for its labor alone. Spinning and weaving for the market became important by-employments for peasants in many parts of Germany, providing income through the winter months. Husbands, wives, and children all contributed their labor, breaking down the long-standing identification of women with spinning. In cities, spinning largely remained a female task; in certain cities, such as Augsburg, capitalist cloth producers modified guild rules so that they could hire many spinners, usually young women who had come in from the countryside.

By the fifteenth century, demand for metals—largely because of changes in military technology—went up dramatically, and complex machinery was needed to dig and maintain deeper tunnels and speed up production processes. Rulers, nobles, and merchants in Germany invested in copper, iron, and silver mining, hiring male heads of household who were expected to bring their whole families. While men worked underground, women and children sorted and washed ore, and prepared charcoal briquets for use in smelting. Single women and widows also worked independently for wages in mining areas.

Thus, as everywhere in Europe, women's lives in Germanic lands were highly varied, determined as much by their class status as by their gender. The splintered political situation did allow some women, particularly the noble abbesses of free imperial convents, a range of powers that were distinctive, however. Many abbesses retained their right to govern until 1806, and only in the twentieth century would women in Germany regain the political voice that at least a tiny group of women had held much earlier.

MERRY E. WIESNER-HANKS

References and Further Reading

- Beach, Alison I. Women as Scribes: Book Production and Monastic Reform in Twelfth-Century Bavaria. Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 2004.
- Clark, Anne L. Elisabeth of Schönau: A Twelfth-Century Visionary. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1992.
- Dinzelbacher, Peter, and Dieter R. Bauer. Religiöse Frauenbewegung und mystische Frömmigkeit im Mittelalter. Cologne: Böhlau Verlag, 1988.
- Dreyer, Elizabeth. Passionate Spirituality: Hildegard of Bingen and Hadewijch of Brabant. New York: Paulist Press, 2005.
- Ennen, Edith. The Medieval Woman. Cambridge, Mass.: Basil Blackwell, 1989.
- Finnegan, Mary Jeremy. The Women of Helfta: Scholars and Mystics. Athens, Ga.: University of Georgia Press, 1991.
- Föbel, Amalie. Die Königin im mittelalterlichen Reich. Darmstadt: Wissen Schäftliche Buchgesellschaft, 2000.
- Garber, Rebecca L. R. Feminine Figurae: Representations of Gender in Religious Texts by Medieval German Women Writers 1100–1375. New York and London: Routledge, 2003.
- Hergemöller, Hans-Ulrich. Masculus et Femina. Systematische Grundlinien einer mediävistischen Geschlechtergeschichte. Hamburg: HHL-Verlag, 2001.
- Karant-Nunn, Susan. "The Women of the Saxon Silver Mines." In Women in Reformation and Counter-Reformation Europe: Public and Private Worlds, edited by Sherrin Marshall. Bloomington, Ind.: Indiana University Press, 1989.
- Ketsch, Peter. Frauen im Mittelalter. 2 vols. Düsseldorf: Schwann, 1983–1984.
- Lundt, Bea, ed. Auf der Suche nach der Frau im Mittelalter: Fragen, Quellen, Antworten. Munich: W. Fink, 1991.
- Müller, Daniela. Frauen vor der Inquisition. Lebensform, Glaubenszeugnis und Aburteilung der deutschen und französischen Katharerinnen. Mainz: Philipp von Zabern, 1996.
- Wiesner, Merry E. Working Women in Renaissance Germany. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1986.
- Winston-Allen, Anne. Convent Chronicles: Women Writing about Women and Reform in the Late Middle Ages. University Park, Pa.: Pennsylvania State University Press, 2004.

See also Adelheid; Beguines; Canonesses; Clothwork; Domestic; Constance of Sicily, Dolce of Worms; Dorothea of Montau; Ebner, Margaretha; Elisabeth of Schönau; Frankish Lands; Gertrude of Hackeborn; Gertrude of Ortenberg; Gertrude the Great; Herrad of Hohenbourg; Hildegard of Bingen; Hrotsvit of Gandersheim; Jewish Women; Langmann, Adelheid; Law, German; Leoba; Literature, German; Margaret "the Cripple" of Magdeburg; Mathilda and the Monastery at Essen; Matilda of Tuscany; Mechthild of Hackeborn; Mechthild of Magdeburg; Observant Movement; Ottonian Royal Women; Romance, German; Sister-Books and Other Convent Chronicles; Stigel, Elsbeth; Textile Production for the Market; Women Authors: German Texts

GERSON, JEAN

Jean Gerson (1363–1429) is a central medieval figure in terms of a perennial debate on women and the Christian life. He was born as the first child in what became a large family in the hamlet from which he took his name. The place, now disappeared, was northeast of Reims, on the border between Champagne and the Ardennes. His father was a skilled laborer, and his devout and attentive parents made use of their modest means to send their son to the University of Paris. Under the guidance of his teacher Pierre d'Ailly, Gerson became doctor of theology in 1394 and succeeded d'Ailly in 1395 as chancellor of the university.

Gerson was favored by the duke of Burgundy and, thanks to him, was made dean of the richest church in Bruges, Saint Donatian. Here he withdrew in 1399–1400 and considered resigning the university chancellorship, for he was disgusted with what he considered to be hypocrisy and falsity in the academic life. He returned to Paris, however, in the autumn of 1400, after outlining a program of reform to guarantee that the education offered in the faculty of theology would emphasize not only scholastic learning but also affective spirituality. In 1401 Gerson began a series of lectures on mystical theology, which he approached in both speculative and practical terms.

In 1415 Gerson left Paris for the Council of Constance. Its goal was to end the Great Western Schism, with one pope in Rome and another in Avignon, and to reform the Church. He had become a central voice in the conciliar movement, but his role at Constance was limited by his simultaneous concern with condemning a theology that defended the murder in 1407 of the French king's brother, Charles of Orléans. Gerson made himself a prime enemy of the duke of Burgundy, who had arranged the assassination. After Constance it was too dangerous for Gerson to return to Paris. He eventually settled in Lyon, where he lived a secluded life and continued writing theological treatises.

Gerson is the most eloquent voice of the late Middle Ages in terms not only of church reform but also of pastoral theology. He wrote in both French and Latin, for he was determined to reach a lay audience, including women. His primary female audience in the 1390s was made up of his biological sisters, whom he encouraged to avoid marriage by remaining in the home and making an informal religious community. He provided guidelines for their everyday life. Gerson's most ambitious work of lay theology was The Mountain of Contemplation, which he composed especially for his sisters. He explained that he wrote only about matters that he knew they could understand.

Such works show that Gerson was confident about the ability of women to profit from the theological discussions that until then had been limited to university men in Latin. Gerson was fascinated by the spiritual lives of women and especially by their mystical experiences. He wrote three treatises about how to determine whether people who claim to have revelations are genuine, and here he was especially concerned with women. In his first treatise, On Distinguishing True from False Revelations (1401), Gerson was relatively confident that this process, known as discretio spirituum (1 Cor. 12:10), could take place according to rational criteria. The second treatise, On the Discernment of Spirits (1415), reflects Gerson's doubts about the veracity of the revelations of Bridget of Sweden.

In his final treatise on the topic, On the Examination of Teachings (1423), Gerson was basically negative about the contribution that mystics and visionaries had made to the Church, and he blamed some of them for the Great Western Schism. This treatise has formed a foundation for historians who have chosen to see Gerson as basically hostile to women and their religious experiences. It can, however, be read as reflecting the last stage in Gerson's life, when he lived apart from the rest of society and no longer had the contacts with his sisters that earlier had provided him with a much more positive role of women in the Church.

Gerson thought of himself as a champion of women. He joined with Christine de Pizan in 1402 in condemning the Romance of the Rose, a poem popular in learned circles that celebrated the sexual violation of a woman. Gerson remains controversial in medieval studies in terms of his views on women, but his writings are too rich and varied to allow any one-dimensional interpretation.

BRIAN PATRICK MCGUIRE

References and Further Reading

- Brown, D. Catherine. Pastor and Laity in the Theology of Jean Gerson. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1987.
- Caciola, Nancy. Discerning Spirits: Divine and Demonic Possession in the Middle Ages. Ithaca, N.Y. and London: Cornell University Press, 2003.
- Elliott, Dyan. Proving Woman: Female Spirituality and Inquisitional Culture in the Later Middle Ages. Princeton, N.J. and Oxford: Princeton University Press, 2004.
- Gerson, Jean. Early Works, translated and introduced by Brian Patrick McGuire. New York: Paulist Press, 1998.
- McGuire, Brian Patrick. Jean Gerson and the Last Medieval Reformation. Philadelphia: Pennsylvania State University Press, 2005.

See also Christine de Pizan; Mysticism and Mystics; Roman de la Rose and Its Reception; Spirits: Discernment of and Possession by; Spiritual Care; Theology

GERTRUDE OF HACKEBORN

Gertrude of Hackeborn (c. 1232–1291) was the daughter of the baron of Hackeborn. As a child she entered the monastery of Rodarsdorf, technically Benedictine but following the customs of the Cistercians. In 1251, at the age of only nineteen, she was elected abbess for the community, which in 1258 moved to Helfta, southeast of Eisleben in the diocese of Halberstadt, on land her family owned. She died there in 1291.

Abbess Gertrude of Hackeborn did not leave any writings, but according to both her younger sister Mechthild's Liber and Gertrude of Helfta's Legatus she was a patron of learning. Helfta flourished as an intellectual milieu. Given Gertrude's belief that only scientific studies led to true understanding of the Scriptures and hence faith, the cloister school taught the liberal arts, and she required study and insight in the Bible from all nuns, herself included. Gertrude bought or had the nuns copy "all the good books she could get." As abbess she received in 1261 the orphan Gertrude of Helfta, later known as "the Great," and in 1270 the sick and persecuted Beguine Mechthild of Magdeburg.

By creating a learned "school of love" she set the groundwork for the Latin texts (over one thousand pages long) written by Mechthild of Hackeborn, Gertrude the Great, and an anonymous nun. Here the community praises Gertrude of Hackeborn as prophet and gem among prelates, and in a Eucharistic vision it depicts her in the office of a prelate, offering the Lord to each of the sisters under God's guidance.

ELSE MARIE WIBERG PEDERSEN

References and Further Reading

- Bynum, Caroline Walker. "Women Mystics in the Thirteenth Century: The Case of the Nuns of Helfta." In Jesus as Mother: Studies in the Spirituality of the High Middle Ages, edited by Caroline Walker Bynum. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1987, pp. 170–261.
- Finnegan, Mary Jeremy. The Women of Helfta: Scholars and Mystics. Athens, Ga. and London: University of Georgia Press, 1991.
- Gertrude of Helfta. Legatus divinae pietatis, vol. 5. In Sources Chrétiennes 331, edited by Jean-Marie Clément and Bernard de Vregille. Paris: Éditions du Cerf, 1986.
- . Liber Specialis gratiae. In Revelationes Gertrudinae ac Mechtildiana. Vol. 2: S. Mechtildis virginis s. Benedicti Liber specialis gratiae, edited by Solesmenseium O.S.B. monachorum. Paris: H. Oudin, 1877.
- Mechthild of Hackeborn. Livre De La Grace Spéciale. Revelations De Sainte Mechtilde, translated by the Benedictine Fathers of Solesmes and edited by the H. Oudin Brothers. Paris: H. Oudin, 1878.
- Spitzlei, Sabine. Erfahrungsraum Herz. Zur Mystik des Zisterzienserklosters Helfta im 13. Jahrhundert. Mystik in Geschichte und Gegenwart. Texte und Untersuchungen 9. Stuttgart-Bad Cannstatt: Friedrich Frommann Verlag, 1991.

See also Abbesses; Education, Monastic; Gertrude the Great; Mechthild of Hackeborn; Mechthild of Magdeburg; Monasticism and Nuns

GERTRUDE OF NIVELLES

Pippin I of Landen, mayor of the palace of the Austrasian kingdom, and Ita, his wife, gave birth to a daughter Gertrude (626–659). After Pippin's death,

Ita founded a religious house on family lands at Nivelles (now in southern Belgium), where Gertrude became the first abbess in 649. The double monastery, like many foundations of the period, consisted of male and female members living segregated under the abbess's authority. Through the agency of Bishop Amand, the house was influenced by the Columban brand of monasticism (an Irish brand), and a number of Irish clerics resided at Nivelles during its early years.

As commemorated in her Life, composed by one of the brethren soon after her death on St. Patrick's feast day in 659, Gertrude was known for her ascetic lifestyle, including a famous incident in which she angrily rejected a noble suitor, resisting expectations that she marry and produce heirs. She maintained close contacts with Irish missionaries in the region, including Foillan and Ultan, and requested burial dress that included relics and emulated the modest clothing of contemporary holy women in the eastern Mediterranean. Excavations conducted in the 1940s and 1950s at Nivelles revealed that her grave had already become a locus for family burials and was a pilgrimage site in the seventh century.

Built strategically upon family land, the monastery of Nivelles was a symbolic center of the power of Pippin's family. Gertrude's brother Grimoald, mayor of the Austrasian palace, used the house as a base from which to plan a briefly successful coup d'état; after Grimoald's execution by Clovis II in 662, the Merovingian royal family attacked Nivelles. Not surprisingly, following these events, the veneration of Gertrude remained an integral part of traditions associated with the Pippinids (later known as the Carolingians) after their overthrow of the Merovingian dynasty in the mid-eighth century.

BONNIE EFFROS

References for Further Reading

- Effros, Bonnie. "Symbolic Expressions of Sanctity: Gertrude of Nivelles in the Context of Merovingian Mortuary Custom." Viator 27 (1996): 1–10.
- McNamara, Jo Ann, and John E. Halborg, eds. "Gertrude, Abbess of Nivelles." In Sainted Women of the Dark Ages. Durham: Duke University Press, 1992, pp. 36–55.
- Peyroux, Catherine. "Gertrude's furor: Reading Anger in an Early Medieval Saint's Life." In Anger's Past: The Social Uses of an Emotion in the Middle Ages, edited by Barbara Rosenwein. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1998.
- Treffort, Cécile. "Sainte Gertrude de Nivelles." In Christianisme et Chrétientés en Occident et en Orient (milieu VII<sup>e</sup> – milieu XI<sup>e</sup> siècle), edited by Jean-Pierre Arrignon, Bernard Merdrignac, and Cécile Treffort. Paris: Ophrys, 1997.

See also Abbesses; Celibacy; Clerical and Priests' Concubines; Double Monasteries; Frankish Lands; Grave Goods; Monasticism and Nuns; Noble Women

GERTRUDE OF ORTENBERG

Gertrude (c. 1275–1335) came from a noble family at the Oberrhein and married the rich knight Rickeldegen of Ulzburg. Widowed with four children, she settled in Offenbourg near Strasbourg to lead a religious life and, after the death of her youngest child, vowed to follow the Third Rule of St. Francis as a religious laywoman. She lived together with Heilke of Staufenberg, her life-long friend, and some other women in houses near a Franciscan convent. According to the German Life by a younger house-mate who, c. 1350, recorded the stories told by the elderly Heilke, she lived in personal deprivation and rigorous asceticism and had long mystical experiences. At the same time, the women agreed together upon all religious and practical matters.

Gertrude was probably well-read and possessed books. She had intensive intellectual contact with Franciscan and Dominican preachers. Some of their sermons by Eckhart and Rudolf of Biberach are compiled in the Life. In 1318 the women moved to Strasbourg, where Gertrude seems to have played a leading role in the circle of lay devout and mendicants. The Life shows how God revealed the sins of fellow citizens to her, whom she converted and reminded of their responsibility. She mediated in feuds and suffered the pains of hell's torments as a substitute for dying sinners. She was an independent agent of salvation, as her holy presence had salvific qualities. The Life concludes: "Gertrude went out into the cities and villages of this world. The words that she spoke struck right to the heart. With her mild admonition and virtuous power she often outdid the mendicants."

ANNEKE MULDER-BAKKER

References and Further Reading

Ringler, S. "Gertrud von Ortenberg." In Die Deutsche Literatur des Mittelalters: Verfasserlexikon, new edition by Kurt Ruh. Berlin and New York: De Gruyter, 1980–2000, vol. II, 522–525.

See also Germanic Lands; Laywomen, Religious; Poor Clares Order; Sermons and Preaching

GERTRUDE THE GREAT

Gertrude the Great (1256–1301/1302) (also known as Gertrude of Helfta), the only woman ever titled "the Great" by the Church, was of unknown parentage.

She came to the Cistercian monastery of Helfta in Saxony in 1261 when she was only five, and died there.

The abbess Gertrude of Hackeborn and the teacher Mechthild of Hackeborn gave her a thorough education in the seven liberal arts and theology, before she worked as second chantress and scribe. In 1281 Gertrude the Great had a vision of Christ which marked her conversion "from a grammarian to a theologian," and in 1289, having received a call to "preach God's gift for the love of neighbour," she began to write her reflections.

She wrote the Spiritual Exercises and book II of the Legatus Divinae Pietatis (Herald of Divine Love). Of the other four books of the Legatus, written by an anonymous nun, Gertrude probably dictated books III–V, whereas book I is a vita of the saint. The Exercises were written for the community and form a liturgical itinerary of seven monastic practices centered, like standard Cistercian teaching, on nuptial union with God. While the Legatus is written for a broader audience, both texts are expressions of an optimistic Trinitarian and Christocentric theology. Thus Gertrude's love theology, in a rich metaphorical language with God's heart as the key metaphor, emphasizes God's love for his creation highlighted in Christ's death on the cross and reaffirmed in daily life.

Gertrude's texts were widely spread during the Counterreformation.

ELSE MARIE WIBERG PEDERSEN

References and Further Reading

Bynum, Caroline Walker. "Women Mystics in the Thirteenth Century: The Case of the Nuns of Helfta." In Jesus as Mother: Studies in the Spirituality of the High Middle Ages, edited by Caroline Walker Bynum. Berkeley, Calif.: University of California Press, 1987, pp. 170–261.

Finnegan, Mary Jeremy. The Women of Helfta: Scholars and Mystics. Athens, Ga. and London: University of Georgia Press, 1991.

Gertrude of Helfta. Legatus divinae pietatis. In Oeuvres Spirituelles, tomes II–V. In Sources Chrétiennes 139, 143, 255, 331, edited by Pierre Doyère, Jean-Marie Clément, and Bernard de Vregille. Paris: Éditions du Cerf, 1968–1986.

———. Exercitia. In Oeuvres Spirituelles, tome I. In Sources Chrétiennes 127, edited by Jacques Hourlier and Albert Schmitt. Paris: Éditions du Cerf, 1967.

Lewis, Gertrud Jaron, and Jack Lewis, eds. and trans. Gertrude the Great of Helfta: Special Exercises. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Cistercian Publications, 1989.

Winkworth, Margaret, ed. and trans. Gertrude of Helfta: The Herald of Divine Love. New York: Paulist Press, 1993.

See also Education, Monastic; Germanic Lands; Gertrude of Hackeborn; Mechthild of Hackeborn; Mechthild of Magdeburg; Monasticism and Nuns; Mysticism and Mystics; Theology

GILBERTINE ORDER

Also known as the Order of Sempringham, the Gilbertine Order was founded in 1131 by Gilbert of Sempringham (c. 1083–1189) in Lincolnshire, England, when seven women in his parish church asked him to guide them in living a strict religious life. The order grew to become the only exclusively English monastic order. At its height it comprised twenty-four houses, ten of which were organized as double monasteries with nuns, lay sisters, regular canons, and lay brothers: Sempringham, Haverholme, Alvingham, Bullington, Catley, Nun Ormsby, Sixhills, Watton (Yorkshire), Chicksands (Bedfordshire), and Shouldham (Norfolk). Fourteen houses were founded for men only.

As women embraced religious life during the twelfth century, the Gilbertine Order provided an important opportunity for them in England. Initially the women may have followed early models for female vocations, such as anchoresses and sisters serving in hospitals. The Cistercians also exerted considerable influence over early Gilbertine history, particularly through William of Rievaulx and Bernard of Clairvaux. Gilbert had wanted the Cistercian Order to assume the management of his earliest foundations, but the Cistercians rejected such incorporation, claiming that they did not want to govern religious women, although by then they had accepted other women's houses. The Gilbertine constitution, possibly developed by the late 1160s but fully recorded only in the thirteenth century, stipulated that the nuns would follow the Rule of Benedict and the regular canons would follow the Rule of Augustine. Ecclesiastical and lay magnates who were supportive of women's religious vocations, particularly in the north of England, provided the Order's initial patronage.

Gilbert's Vita (Life) stressed the pastoral responsibilities given to the canons over the nuns. Administrative and spiritual authority rested with the Master (Gilbert and his successors) and the canons, especially because only priests could administer the sacraments. The nuns could not participate in the election of the Master of the Order. Female officials known as scrutatrices (examiners)—two nuns and a lay sister—could assist him with internal discipline by visiting the female houses, inquiring about breaches of conduct, and attending General Chapter meetings of the Order; all such travel was closely supervised. Parallel officials existed for the male houses. Within each double house, three other officials, speculatrices (spies or observers), also reported to the Master of the Order, even regarding the prioress. The prioress of each female house was elected by its resident nuns; unlike her counterparts in other contemporary orders such as Fontevrault, a Gilbertine prioress only had control over women within the house. She did not rule over the canons or lay brothers. Other offices included the sub-prioress, cellaress, sacrist, and precentrix (choir director). The Gilbertine Rule made special provision for the nuns' financial security, since insufficient endowment was a serious problem in many female monasteries. One-tenth of the Order's sheep were reserved for the nuns; they could control the proceeds from the sale of the wool for their buildings and other necessities.

The Order did not emphasize education and learning; the members were to focus on prayer and contemplation. Composition and manuscript copying were strictly regulated. The Order's constitution prohibited educating either young boys or girls without a monastic vocation, although a letter from Pope Honorius III in 1223 suggests that some girls were being educated who did not become nuns. The Order maintained a house in Cambridge for canons. In the fifteenth century, John Capgrave wrote an English Life of St. Gilbert for nuns who could not read Latin, an indication of a decline in Latin literacy.

Excavations of Gilbertine double houses indicate that there were separate complexes for men and women, connected by a window house where, under supervision, exchanges of food, laundry, and other practical materials could take place. The nuns' churches had a wall that separated the nave pierced by a small window through which the sacraments and the stone of peace could be passed. After the 1160s, when both a sexual scandal and a rebellion of the lay brothers threatened the Order's status, the Gilbertines strictly maintained the separation of the sexes within the Order, and protected the enclosure of the nuns from the outside world. (At Watton Priory, a young nun and a lay brother had enjoyed a secret liaison until the girl became pregnant. When they were discovered, the senior nuns oversaw the punishment of the hapless lay brother; Aelred of Rievaulx's account of the girl's miraculous repentance and delivery helped to redeem the nuns' reputation for piety. The Order, nevertheless, tightened its control over interaction between the sexes.)

The Order enjoyed royal support throughout its history. Henry II vigorously defended Gilbert during the crisis in the 1160s. King John actively supported the Order's petition for Gilbert's canonization. Henry VI visited Sempringham as a patron. After 1300, however, the general wealth of the Gilbertines declined. In the Dissolution of 1538 under Henry VIII, the members had to surrender the Order's houses to the king.

JANET T. SORRENTINO

References and Further Reading

- Constable, Giles. "Aelred of Rievaulx and the Nun of Watton: An Episode in the Early History of the Gilbertine Order." In Medieval Women, edited by D. Baker. Studies in Church History. Subsidia 1. Oxford, 1978, pp. 205–226.
- Elkins, Sharon. Holy Women of Twelfth-Century England. Chapel Hill, N.C.: University of North Carolina Press, 1988.
- Foreville, Raymonde, and Gillian Keir, eds. The Book of St Gilbert. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1987.
- Freeman, Elizabeth. "Nuns in the Public Sphere." Comitatus 27 (1996): 55–80.
- Golding, Brian. Gilbert of Sempringham and the Gilbertine Order: 1131–1300. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1995.
- Graham, Rose S. Gilbert of Sempringham and the Gilbertines. London: Elliot Stock, 1901. Reprint, 1904.
- Knowles, David. "The Revolt of the Lay Brothers of Sempringham." English Historical Review 50 (1935): 465–487.
- McNamara, Jo Ann. "The Nun of Watton." Magistra 1.1 (1995): 122–137.
- Rosof, Patricia. "The Anchoritic Base for the Gilbertine Order." American Benedictine Review 33:2 (1982): 182–194.
- St. John Hope, W. H. "The Gilbertine Priory of Watton, in the East Riding of Yorkshire." Archaeological Journal 58 (1901): 1–34.
- Sorrentino, Janet. "In Houses of Nuns, In Houses of Canons: A Liturgical Dimension to Double Monasteries." The Journal of Medieval History 28:4 (2002): 361–372.
- Thompson, Sally. Women Religious: The Founding of English Nunneries after the Norman Conquest. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1991.

See also Anchoresses; Cistercian Order; Double Monasteries; England; Fontevrault, Abbey and Order of; Monastic Rules; Monasticism and Nuns; Patronage, Ecclesiastical; Spiritual Care

GIRLS AND BOYS

Originally published in French in 1960 and in English translation in 1962, Philippe Ariès' Centuries of Childhood has dominated contemporary thinking about medieval childhood. Ariès held that the medieval period was indifferent to childhood as a concept and a distinct phase of life. He reasoned that medieval parents did not invest emotionally in their children because the children too often died. Looking at evidence like portraiture, Ariès inferred that children were seen simply as miniature adults, valued for what they would become later in life rather than for who they were as children, and for him Western society only began to recognize the distinctiveness of childhood during the Enlightenment, when children were seen as having souls worth saving and a mind worth educating. In other words, Ariès' assumptions about medieval childhood paralleled his ideas about historical development: in the same way the Middle Ages were a backward period whose deficiencies were remedied only by later progressive change, so too medieval children were valued only after they reached adulthood.

Contra Ariès

To be sure, medieval conceptions of childhood were not identical to contemporary beliefs, yet Ariès opened the way for other researchers to consider how different cultures and time periods fashioned their understandings of children and childhood. Subsequent historians of medieval culture have explored a wide variety of evidence to refute Ariès' blanket assertion that the Middle Ages lacked an understanding of the uniqueness of children and childhood. Shulamith Shahar has examined a variety of biblical, theological, devotional, and educational literature to reconstruct medieval attitudes and actions toward the conception, birth, childhood, and education of children based upon medieval understandings of the life cycle. Barbara Hanawalt has investigated coroners' rolls to open the doors to the structure of medieval English peasant life and how medieval children were regarded by looking at how they died. In another study, Hanawalt looked at court records, coroners' rolls, and advice manuals to see how children and adolescents in medieval London experienced complex social and cultural institutions like baptism, service and apprenticeship, and marriage. Sally Crawford has combined archeological data as well as documentary, legal, and literary sources to great effect in her analysis of Anglo-Saxon England's view of childhood from birth through adolescence. Ronald C. Finucane has looked at the registers kept at saints' shrines in both northern and southern Europe that preserve the reasons why pilgrims visited the holy site that detail parents' concern for their children's lives from conception through childhood. In a series of major studies, Nicholas Orme has detailed the wealth of medieval educational practices, and he has synthesized a wide variety of historical evidence, including the material culture of English childhood, to place medieval children in their lived world. These historical studies have been complemented with interdisciplinary and literary studies examining childhood in relationship to other topics, like motherhood; family and kinship structures; the church and theology; courtesy, conduct, and children's literature; and most importantly, gender and family.

The increasing numbers of studies now allow for a more coherent picture of medieval children and childhood. By the later Middle Ages a fairly stable set of terms divided childhood and youth into seven-year segments denoted as infantia (infancy), pueritia (childhood), and adolescentia (adolescence) based upon the child's physical, social, emotional, and mental development. During infantia (from birth to age seven), children were not considered to be rational and responsible agents. The onset of pueritia was marked by the child's growing personal awareness and social accountability. Finally, the change from pueritia to adolescentia was marked by the onset of menarche for girls and the development of secondary sexual characteristics for boys and girls.

Infantia: Baptism and Early Childhood

After birth, when a midwife and often other women attended to the mother and child, an infant's initiation into the wider social world occurred at baptism. During the ceremony, the child was anointed with water or oil and given his or her Christian names, and the godparents vowed to raise the child up in the Christian faith. The relationship between godchildren and godparents was regarded so highly that marriage between the two was prohibited by the laws of marriage impediments, thereby widening kinship networks among the Germanic peoples in the early Middle Ages. Thus, baptism provided children with the names by which they would be known thereafter; ushered them into the beliefs and practices of the Church; and established an extended social network, including godparents, clerics, and parishioners, under whose purview they would be raised and with whom they might later affiliate as adults. These relationships often bore fruit later in guardianship, mentoring, guild sponsorship, or trade apprenticeship for the child. Medieval Judaic and Islamic children, whose lives are just beginning to be revealed, likewise were initiated into their religious and social communities through the rites and practices unique to their traditions.

That medieval children were part of a broader social network also meant that greater care and nurture was provided for boys and girls during the dangerous, difficult early years of childhood. Godparents, along with parents, were enjoined to protect the youngster from the kinds of accidents that claimed many young lives in the medieval period. Infants were swaddled and cradled until they were toddlers, and higher-class infants often had a wet nurse, especially in Italy. Coroners' records indicate that children died of disease and by accident in the course of everyday life by playing in ponds or falling into wells, or being scalded in fires, trampled or attacked by animals, and run over by carts. Solid statistical evidence is hard to ascertain, but an estimated 30% of children did not survive to reach the age of seven, and while there is no evidence of widespread infanticide or systematic abuse, as charged by some commentators, girls seem to have died at a slightly higher rate than boys from illness, while boys died more often by accident than girls. Boys appear to have been treated more quickly and aggressively than girls when sick, and while the exact reasons are elusive, the motive may have been economic: a young man produced wealth by working and by obtaining a marriage dowry, while a young woman's marriage meant the family lost wealth.

Yet there is ample evidence that the lives of medieval boys and girls were as diverse as those of children today, with their time split between work and play. Children are shown in manuscript illuminations helping their parents with domestic tasks like gathering water, firewood, or food; spinning, sewing, and weaving; planting and harvesting; hunting and fishing; and tending to animals and routine chores. By assisting their parents, young boys and girls internalized the gender and social roles appropriate for their lives. A sixteenth-century representation, Breugel the Elder's painting "Children's Games" (1560), realistically depicts more than seventy-five different pastimes that occupied premodern children, many of which survive today: playing with hoops, sticks, balls, tops, and other found items; climbing trees, walls, barrels and other objects; wrestling, swimming, tumbling, and fighting; and playing tag, hide-and-seek, leap-frog, piggy-back, and blind man's bluff. The division between work and play, and the practices constituting each, also undoubtedly varied depending upon whether the boy or girl lived in a rural setting, on a manor, in town, or at court.

Children might be orphaned or abandoned, and many European cultures had well-developed systems of wardship. England, for example, provided separate guardians for the child's body (and the right to marriage) and the child's goods (wealth and chattel). One of the most ancient ways of dealing with a foundling or an unwanted child was the practice of oblation—the permanent donation of a child to a monastery. The first foundling hospitals were established in Italy in the mid-thirteenth century, though other institutions probably accepted abandoned children even earlier, and London established a Court of Orphans to protect the interests of minor children and consider their particular needs.

Pueritia: Education and Training

A child's life options were shaped primarily by gender, class, and social location (rural or urban, city or town, and so on). Apart from the on-the-job training that most medieval young people accumulated as part of their domestic lives, formal medieval education focused primarily upon training boys in basic Latin literacy for ecclesiastical and professional duties, while girls had access chiefly to informal instruction. Boys might go to grammar school (to train in Latin) or song school to learn the antiphon (a brief liturgical text, generally a psalm verse or sentence from Scripture, recited, sung, or chanted before and after a psalm or canticle) before moving on to university studies. Although it was not unknown for girls to attend school (particularly at a nunnery), young women, especially those of the merchant and upper classes, might receive instruction at home from a local ecclesiastic, at a local nunnery, or from a private tutor (nun, nurse, priest, chaplain). The Ave Maria, Pater Noster, and Apostles' Creed formed both the educational foundation of medieval youth and the basis for conventional medieval piety. In addition to the basic literacy forged by these simple prayers and scriptural passages, the later Middle Ages saw the flourishing of "courtesy books" and other manuals of advice that instructed boys and girls in proper manners, especially for middle-class families attempting to move up the social ladder, and poems like "The ABC of Aristotle" used the letters of the alphabet to inculcate moderate and moderating moral virtues. Of course, virginity for both boys and girls remained the ideal, for virginity guaranteed sexual purity, moral rectitude, religious favor, and social approbation.

If their lives did not allow for a formal education in Latin, boys around the age of twelve, especially in the towns and cities, might be taken on as apprentices under a craftsman or as part of a guild, while girls might enter into household service, often with a relative. A contracted relationship, apprenticeship usually lasted seven years, with the master taking responsibility for all of the young man's needs for the duration of the contract. Household service was sometimes less formally structured, with the family tending to the young woman's needs during her tenure. Whether in the city or in the town, apprenticeship and then guild membership allowed the young man legally to become a citizen or burgher, with the legal rights that accrued to that position. Not having the same access to formal sponsorship, girls gained legal, official citizenship through marriage. If young women worked, it was often in the victualling trades or in a household.

Adolescentia: Courtship and Marriage

At adolescentia, generally regarded as twelve for girls and fourteen for boys, young people could be married, according to canon law, or could break a marriage contract set in their childhood by paying a fine equivalent to the value of the marriage. So, although many marriages were arranged and contracted, particularly in the upper classes, young people did have some say about whom they would marry; at the same time, parental, familial, or seigneurial permission was not necessarily required for them to marry. An exchange of vows was all that was required, and sexual intercourse was a de facto mark of marriage. These loose requirements sometimes led to legal disputes, especially when one partner (or the partner's parents or guardians) believed the promise of marriage to be given insincerely to procure wealth or sexual favors alone. The legal records are replete with cases of raptus—a term that could denote both rape and abduction—against young women. However, it would be a mistake to believe that all cases of raptus involved illicit sexual contact or forced abduction; some did, but there is also evidence of young people using the courts to seek their own wishes and to work against a parent or guardian's attempt to force them into an undesired marriage. Because children—boys especially, but also girls—were conduits of family wealth, both boys and girls could become pawns in protracted legal battles over land, wealth, and chattels (moveable goods) between guardians, ward keepers, in-laws, step-family, or extended kin.

Concerning marriage itself, young medieval wives were often several years younger than their mates, for young men married after accumulating or inheriting the necessary wealth, while a young woman conventionally brought her dowry into the marriage. Although remaining unmarried was a possibility for young men and women, girls' life options were generally limited to marriage, to a religious vocation, or to some form of domestic employment or household management. The social ideal, of course, was for young medieval girls to marry and have children. In fact, it could be argued that female childhood is inextricably bound to future childbearing, for the proper course of secular life led a girl directly from her father's house as a child and daughter to her husband's house as a wife and mother, while a boy moved from his parents' home to one of his own creation.

So, contrary to Ariès' insistence that the Middle Ages did not consider the uniqueness of children and childhood, medieval childhood was a sometimes contentious time with its own concerns and whose physical difficulties boys and girls had to survive and whose complexity they had to negotiate—cultural tasks that, though the details differ, contemporary children also face.

DANIEL T. KLINE

References and Further Reading

- Ariès, Philippe. Centuries of Childhood: A Social History of Family Life, translated by Robert Baldick. New York: Vintage, 1962.
- Boswell, John. The Kindness of Strangers: The Abandonment of Children in Western Europe from Late Antiquity to the Renaissance. New York: Pantheon, 1988.
- Burrow, J. A. The Ages of Man: A Study in Medieval Writing and Thought. Oxford: Clarendon, 1986.
- Crawford, Sally. Childhood in Anglo-Saxon England. Stroud, Gloucester: Sutton, 1999.
- Dockray-Miller, Mary. Motherhood and Mothering in Anglo-Saxon England. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2000.
- Finucane, Ronald C. The Rescue of the Innocents: Endangered Children in Medieval Miracles. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1997.
- Gil'adi, Avner. Children of Islam: Concepts of Childhood in Medieval Muslim Society. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1992.
- Goldberg, P. J. P., ed. and trans. Women in England, c. 1275–1525. Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1995.
- Goldberg, P. J. P., and Felicity Riddy, eds. Youth in the Middle Ages. Woodbridge, Suffolk: Boydell and Brewer, 2004.
- Hanawalt, Barbara. The Ties That Bound: Peasant Families in Medieval England. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- . Growing Up in Medieval London: The Experience of Childhood in History. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1993.
- Herlihy, David. "Medieval Children." In The Walter Prescott Webb Memorial Lectures: Essays on Medieval Civilization, edited by Bede Karl Lackner and Kenneth Roy Philip. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1978.
- . Medieval Households. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1985.
- Itynre, Cathy Jorgensen, ed. Medieval Family Roles: A Book of Essays. New York: Garland, 1996.
- Karras, Ruth Mazzo. From Boys to Men: Formations of Masculinity in Late Medieval Europe. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2003.
- Kline, Daniel T., ed. Medieval Literature for Children. New York: Routledge, 2003.
- Lewis, Katherine J., Noël James Menuge, and Kim M. Phillips, eds. Young Medieval Women. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1999.
- Neel, Carol, ed. Medieval Families: Perspectives on Marriage, Household, and Children. Medieval Academy Reports for Teaching, 40. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2004.
- Orme, Nicholas. Medieval Children. New Haven: Yale University Press, 2001.
- Phillips, Kim M. Medieval Maidens: Young Women and Gender in England, 1270–1570. Manchester: Manchester University Press, 2003.
- Schultz, James A. The Knowledge of Childhood in the German Middle Ages, 1100–1350. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1995.
- Sears, Elizabeth. The Ages of Man: Medieval Interpretations of the Life Cycle. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1986.
- Shahar, Shulamith. Childhood in the Middle Ages. London: Routledge, 1992.

See also Abortion; Adolescence; Apprentices; Artisan Families, Women of; Breastfeeding and Wet-Nursing; Children, Betrothal and Marriage of; Conduct Literature; Dowry and Other Marriage Gifts; Education: Lay; Education: Monastic; Fosterage; Gentry, Women of; England; Godparents; Guild Members and Guilds; Heiresses; Household Management; Illegitimacy; Infants and Infanticide; Inheritance; Literacy and Reading: Latin; Literacy and Reading: Vernacular; Merchant Families, Women of; Mothers as Teachers; Naming; Oblates and Oblation; Pregnancy and Childbirth: Christian Women; Pregnancy and Childbirth: Jewish Women; Procreation and Ideas of Conception; Rape and Raptus; Servants; Virginity; Wardship

GODELIEVE OF GISTEL

Godelieve (c. 1052–1070) was born in Flanders, the daughter of a knight of Count Eustace I of Boulogne. About 1067 she was married to Bertulf, a knight in Gistel, near Bruges, who, at the instigation of his mother, maltreated her and, in 1070, had her killed. Soon Godelieve was venerated as a saint and she was canonized on July 30, 1084. Shortly before, Drogo, monk of Saint-Winocsbergen, wrote her Life picturing her as a martyr, obedient and patient in suffering. Another Life, the so-called Legend, presents her as a holy virgin. Usually dated in the fourteenth or fifteenth century, it is considered unreliable. Nip (2002) argues that it was composed in the twelfth century, after the foundation of the nunnery of Saint Godelieve at Gistel. Here the portrayal was adjusted to the special needs of the nuns.

Drogo's Life raises the question of why Godelieve was recognized as a saint. Scholars wonder what it was really about: a conflict between nobility and church concerning different ideas on marriage or their relative power, or a conflict between the lower classes and the elite? In fact, Godelieve's life and canonization must be understood in the light of the rivalry between the Counts of Flanders and their powerful vassals, the Counts of Boulogne.

The Life also provides information on marriage, the position of women within the family, their (lack of) power, and social, political, and juridical hierarchies.

Godelieve's cult was still flourishing in the twentieth century.

RENÉE NIP

References and Further Reading

- Duby, Georges. Mâle moyen âge: De l'amour et autres essais. Paris: Flammarion, 1988.

Huyghebaert, Nikolaas-Norbert, ed. Drogo van Sint-Winoksbergen Vita Godeliph, translated by Stefaan Gyselen. Tielt/Bussum: Lannoo, 1982.

Nip, Renée. "Godelieve of Gistel and Ida of Boulogne." In Sanctity and Motherhood, edited by Anneke B. Mulder-Bakker. New York and London: Garland Publishing, 1995.

———. "The Canonization of Godelieve of Gistel." Hagiographica 2 (1995): 145–156.

———. "Life and Afterlife: Arnulf of Oudenburg, Bishop of Soissons, and Godelieve of Gistel. Their Function as Intercessors in Medieval Flanders." In The Invention of Saintliness, edited by Anneke B. Mulder-Bakker. London and New York: Routledge, 2002.

"Stola S. Godelevae." Sacris Erudiri 20 (1971), special volume.

Vernarde, Bruce L., trans. "Drogo of Sint-Winoksbergen, Life of St. Godelieve." In Medieval Hagiography, edited by Thomas Head. New York and London: Garland Publishing, 2000.

See also Canonization of Saints; Domestic Abuse; Flanders; Hagiography; Marriage, Christian; Sexuality; Sex in Marriage; Virginity

GODPARENTS

The godparent role in baptism has two roots in the early church: sponsorship of adult converts being baptized and having a person or persons speak for an infant receiving baptism. The practice of having outsiders, not close kin, sponsor children grew up in both Greek and Latin rites; it became the norm when infant baptism became the most common rite of Christian initiation. A related practice grew up of giving a child both a godfather and a godmother. Godparents had a post-baptismal responsibility for the spiritual welfare of the baptized. This role also created a spiritual kinship that grew into a legal impediment to marriage between godparent and godchild—and between parent and godparent—known as spiritual affinity, as well as a prohibition of nonmarital sexual relations between them. This rule extended to godparents and godchildren the same degrees of prohibited relationship contracted by sexual intercourse (physical affinity). These taboos were recorded in canon law texts that became normative later in the Middle Ages, and there were enactments by lay powers to the same effect. Outsiders chosen as godparents might be ascetics, whose spiritual patronage was valued; but ecclesiastical authorities eventually discouraged this as a worldly distraction for monks and nuns. More commonly, lay persons (including neighbors, business associates, and even social superiors) were selected. In cities like Dubrovnik, parents' siblings often were selected as godparents to reduce the number of incest prohibitions affecting the child's marital choices.

Furthermore, godparents were expected to be teachers and guides for their godchildren. These practices were adopted in Frankish and Anglo-Saxon lands, and they spread from both to the Germanic regions.

Aside from spiritual elements, there were social and political aspects of godparenting that might benefit the child, creating an extended support network, especially when prominent persons had stood up with the infant at baptism. Among the Franks, in particular, godparents were chosen for children of high birth to provide them with protection against violence. In other cases, social inferiors were asked to serve as baptismal sponsors to bind them more closely to their superiors. Godparenting also created social ties between adults, especially when close friends were selected as baptismal sponsors. Fathers might select godfathers to extend their connections, while mothers might choose godmothers from among their friends to solidify their own networks. This led, in parts of Italy, to inviting large numbers of persons to serve as godparents to a single child. Another social element in godparenting was naming. A godparent in late medieval England and France frequently named the child, sometimes for herself or himself.

Byzantine practice has been less studied, but the prohibition of guardians marrying wards was adopted from Roman law and extended to godparents. Byzantine ideas about spiritual kinship were transmitted to Russia and other Slavic lands, but their impact has not been studied in depth.

THOMAS IZBICKI

References and Further Reading

Haas, Louis. "Il mio buono compare: Choosing Godparents and the Uses of Baptismal Kinship in Renaissance Florence." Journal of Social History 29 (1995): 341–356.

Jussen, Bernhard. Spiritual Kinship as Social Practice: Godparenthood and Adoption in the Early Middle Ages, translated by Pamela Selwyn. Newark, Del.: University of Delaware Press, 2000.

Klapisch-Zuber, Christiane. "Au peril des commères: l'alliance spirituelle par les femmes à Florence." In Femmes, mariages-lignages: XIIIe-XIVe siècles: Mélanges offerts à Georges Duby. Bruxelles: De Boeck Université, 1992.

Lynch, Joseph. Godparents and Kinship in Early Medieval Europe. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1986.

Niles, Phillip. "Baptism and the Naming of Children in Late Medieval England." Medieval Prosopography 3 (1982): 95–107.

See also Frankish Lands; Kinship; Law, Canon; Marriage, Impediments to; Naming

GOLDEN LEGEND

See Jacobus de Voragine's Golden Legend

GOSCELIN OF ST. BERTIN

A monk from the abbey of St. Bertin at Saint-Omer in Flanders (now France), Goscelin (c. 1040–1114) came to England with Herman, Bishop of Sherborne and Ramsbury, in about 1058. He became a noted hagiographer and composer of liturgical music in his adopted country. After a period as chaplain of the royal women's house of Wilton, he was associated with various English monasteries and finally settled at St. Augustine's, Canterbury. His importance to students of medieval women lies in his extensive hagiographical work on female English saints and his Liber Confortatorius, a book of spiritual counsel, theology, and friendship for his student Eve, who had left Wilton to become a recluse at Angers.

The hagiographic works reflect Goscelin's association with various important monastic houses. Apparently he was commissioned to compile full records and liturgical materials for their local saints. These bundled hagiographic texts illustrate post-Conquest views of Anglo-Saxon history and religion, as well as local practices of veneration; thus, we have clusters of vitae connected with Barking Abbey, Ely, and the Kentish royal family.

The Life of St. Edith occupies a special position in Goscelin's work. It is more ambitious in literary style than the other saints' lives; it also reflects close personal association, and it often turns autobiographical. The Life is closely linked in time, place, and theme to the Liber Confortatorius (c. 1082), which allows extraordinary insights into the spirituality and education of a religious woman, and into an intense spiritual and personal friendship across gender lines.

MONIKA C. OTTER

References and Further Reading

- Colker, Marvin. "Texts of Jocelyn of Canterbury Which Relate to the History of Barking Abbey." Studia Monastica 7 (1965): 383–460.
- Hollis, Stephanie, et al. Writing the Wilton Women: Goscelin's Legend of St. Edith and Liber Confortatorius. Turnhout: Brepols, 2004.
- Love, Rosalind, ed. and trans. Goscelin of St. Bertin: The Hagiography of the Female Saints of Ely. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2004.
- Otter, Monika, trans. Goscelin of St. Bertin: The Book of Encouragement and Consolation (Liber confortatorius). Woodbridge, Suffolk, England: D. S. Brewer, 2004.
- Rollason, D. W. The Mildrith Legend: A Study of Early Medieval Hagiography in England. Leicester: Leicester University Press, 1992.

See also Devotional Literature; Hagiography

GOSSIP AND SLANDER

Medieval women were especially associated with the sins of gossip and slander. This was nothing new: Greek and Roman women, too, had been stereotyped as gossipy, and St. Paul's letters expressed particular concern about widows who gossiped and spoke inappropriately. By the late Middle Ages, however, the connection between women and illicit speech was even more entrenched, as evident from literature, art, and legal prosecutions.

Literary and artistic representations emphasized women's association with gossip and slander. A sermon exemplum well known throughout Europe, for instance, told of the demon Tutivillus, who was said to sit at the back of the church and write down the words uttered by those who gossiped rather than paying attention. When Tutivillus eavesdropped on women, he found that they talked so much that he ran out of space on his scroll and had to stretch it. Variations on this exemplum appear from the twelfth century onwards, from as far afield as Iceland, Estonia, and England. The story is also represented in church wall paintings and wood carvings depicting a devil hovering behind gossiping women. Some of the best-preserved examples come from England, France, and Denmark. The gossiping women of the Tutivillus exemplum laid the groundwork for a stock character of an unruly, garrulous woman in literature of the High to late Middle Ages. La Vielle, the old woman of the Roman de la Rose, Noah's wife of the English mystery play cycles, and the Wife of Bath of Chaucer's Canterbury Tales represent variations of this character, giving early modern playwrights a rich tradition from which to create merry widows and shrews in need of taming. At the same time as individual women were ridiculed for verbal disorder, advice literature directed at men warned them to be careful about trusting women's words and to curb their wives' tongues as early as possible. Sermons reinforced this message by comparing the speech of Eve, who had shared God's secrets with the serpent, to that of the more taciturn Virgin Mary, whose speech was reported in the Bible on only four occasions.

The late Middle Ages also saw the emergence of a new crime, known as "scolding," in which people who had loud public arguments would be charged in courts and forced to pay fines or to suffer public humiliation. Discussed and punished especially in England, scolding involved speaking too much, too loudly, or with slanderous words in a public setting. About ninety percent of those charged as scolds in manorial courts, borough courts, and church courts were women. In most places, married women predominated among the accused, although some towns focused their concerns on the speech of single women. Despite literary concerns about the speech of old women, widows were only seldom accused as scolds. Where the words of alleged scolds were recorded, they were remarkably formulaic: in general, when women were scolded they were called some variation on the term whore, whereas men were more likely to be called “thief” or “liar.” If convicted, most scolds were fined, but sometimes they were punished by more dramatic means. One of these involved the “cucking stool” or “ducking stool,” a contraption in which offenders were forced to sit while being dunked in a pond, river, or waterlogged pit. In the early modern era, “scolds’ bridles” or branks were invented. These were small metal cages that fit over the head of the alleged scold and usually involved a spike being inserted in her mouth, making it impossible for her to talk.

Historians once assumed that scolding prosecutions were relatively rare and that scolds were women who were generally disruptive and even mentally disturbed. Investigation of scolding in particular towns and villages, however, has shown that it was less rare than once thought. Historians have also recently acknowledged that women accused of scolding came from a wide range of social, economic, and marital statuses. While a few alleged scolds were regularly in trouble for a wide range of offenses, most were relatively respectable or otherwise ordinary villagers and townspeople. What is more, the significance of scolding spread well beyond the numbers of individuals accused in courts. Prosecution of scolds not only punished those whose speech was thought to be disruptive, it also silenced others who might have been inclined to speak out if they had not been afraid of being accused as scolds themselves.

By the end of the Middle Ages, then, women’s association with gossip and verbal disorder was more ingrained than ever. Women’s voices were seen as both illicit and yet also powerful (hence the repeated efforts to silence them). The witch craze of the early modern era would further underscore the power and danger of women’s words.

SANDRA BARDSLEY

References and Further Reading

- Bardsley, Sandy. Venomous Tongues: Speech and Gender in Late Medieval England. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2006.
- Boose, Lynda E. “Scolding Brides and Bridling Scolds: Taming the Woman’s Unruly Member.” Shakespeare Quarterly 42 (1991): 179–213.
- Dean, Trevor. “Gender and Insults in an Italian City: Bologna in the Later Middle Ages.” Social History 29 (2004): 217–231.

- Ingram, Martin. “‘Scolding Women Cucked or Washed’: A Crisis in Gender Relations in Early Modern England?” In Women, Crime and the Courts, edited by Jenny Kermode and Garthine Walker. London: University College of London Press, 1994.
- Jennings, Margaret. Tutivillius: The Literary Career of the Recording Demon. Studies in Philology, Texts and Studies, 74. Chapel Hill, N.C.: University of North Carolina Press, 1977.
- Jones, Karen, and Michael Zell. “Bad Conversation? Gender and Social Control in a Kentish Borough, c. 1450–c. 1570.” Continuity and Change 13 (1998): 11–31.
- Lindorfer, Bettina. “Peccatum Linguae and the Punishment of Speech Violations in the Middle Ages and Early Modern Times.” In Speaking in the Medieval World, edited by Jean E. Godsall-Myers. Leiden: Brill, 2003.
- Lochrie, Karma. Covert Operations: The Medieval Uses of Secrecy. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999.
- Underdown, David E. “The Taming of the Scold: The Enforcement of Patriarchal Authority in Early Modern England.” In Order and Disorder in Early Modern England, edited by A. Fletcher and J. Stevenson. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1985.

See also Honor and Reputation; Wife of Bath; Witches

GOTTFRIED VON STRASSBURG

Gottfried von Strassburg composed his Tristan, an extended fragment of over 19,000 Middle High German verses, in the early thirteenth century in or around the urban center of Strasbourg. The number of extant Tristan manuscripts attests to its popularity (Gibbs). Loosely drawing upon previous versions of Tristan (Thomas, Béroul, Eilhart), Gottfried created a uniquely complex narrative that tells more than a story of unfortunate lovers doomed by a fateful potion. The expansive first part of Tristan traces the respective development of Tristan and Isolde as they assume their roles in courtly society (v. 1–11874), and the second part of the narrative describes the subversion of those roles through various tensions created by the lovers’ relationship (v. 11875 ff.): the tension between Isolde’s roles as lover and queen and between Tristan’s roles as lover and loyal vassal. Portraying the lovers as the “new man” and the “new woman” of an ideal courtly world, Gottfried’s text advocates a new courtly ethos. The text foregrounds issues of gender, sexuality, masculinity, and femininity, as the lovers resist twelfth-century romance conventions.

This resistance begins in Ireland, where Gottfried’s narrative focuses on Queen Isolde and her daughter of the same name. Well-versed in politics, diplomacy, and the healing arts, Queen Isolde takes great care in the education of her only child. She engages the stranger Tristan as tutor for her daughter after he arrives in Ireland. (v. 7979 ff.) Tristan completes young Isolde's education, molding her into the perfect form that corresponds to her inborn beauty. The queen ultimately leaves her brother Morolt's death unavenged so that her exemplary daughter may make a suitable match with King Marke. She subsequently prepares the love potion to ensure her daughter a happy life with her new husband, thereby securing the younger Isolde's future political position. One could say "like mother, like daughter"; indeed, the knowledge (liste), wisdom, and beauty of the young Isolde and her mother are matched only by that of Tristan himself.

The daughter, however, does not become the mother, defying the symbolism of their shared name. Her education makes Isolde a kind of "new woman," for she is as much a courtier and a practitioner of hövescheit (courtliness) as Tristan. Thus she becomes the perfect partner for the hero who represents daz niuwe wunder (the new marvel, v. 6635). The fateful love potion subsequently impels both Tristan and Isolde into a partnership that releases her from the conventions that the mother embodies as wife and mother. With the power and wealth she gains as Marke's queen, Isolde also enjoys with Tristan the "true" love the troubadours considered possible only outside of marriage.

In Cornwall, the new man and the new woman prove marvelously adept at the art of public secrecy. This new life of "lying truth" (Poag), where that which is seen remains unseen, is characterized by eroticism, adultery, betrayal, and a love that consistently thwarts patriarchal-feudal conventions. The lovers' efforts culminate in the scenes commonly known as the "Assigination by the Brook" (Baumgartenszene) and the "Ordeal" (Gottesurteil). Ultimately, in the Cave of Lovers (Minnegrotte), they remain sufficient unto themselves, though this union proves untenable. The lovers return to court and must eventually separate, where Gottfried's tale ends.

Gottfried's story of Tristan and Isolde offers a distinctly multivalent discussion of early-thirteenth-century masculinity and femininity, particularly in Isolde. More than any other woman in Arthurian literature, Isolde exercises the traditionally masculine prerogative of choice. The love potion may affect Isolde's choice of whom to love, as with Tristan, but Isolde's other attributes remain unaffected. After her arrival in Cornwall, she displays considerable authority and autonomy, skillfully manipulating appearances and reality. Her autonomy, at its most radical, is visually underscored by the female imagery of the lovers' cave, a sheltered womb-like space. Enjoying the roles of queen, wife, and lover, Isolde continually defies any prescribed role. In a sense, she becomes like Tristan: she herzet sich mit manne (takes on the heart of a man, v. 17981) to become a woman who is also ein man mit muote (a man in spirit, v. 17985).

In the end, Isolde's relationships remain essentially sterile; unlike her mother, the younger Isolde does not become a mother. Tristan also finally remains alone, unable to reintegrate into courtly society. Thus, while Gottfried's lovers seem to transcend conventional gender boundaries as they achieve a spiritually exalted relationship, the poet communicates an equivocal message. Knowledge and artistry are integral to Tristan's reciprocal redefinition of the ideal courtly woman and man in the new courtly ethos, as is female agency; nevertheless, that agency continues to threaten any established order, old or new.

ALEXANDRA STERLING-HELLENBRAND

References and Further Reading

- Gibbs, Marion E. "The Medieval Reception of Gottfried's Tristan." In A Companion to Gottfried von Strassburg's Tristan, edited by Will Hasty. Rochester, N.Y.: Camden House, 2003.
- Hasty, Will, ed. A Companion to Gottfried von Strassburg's Tristan. Rochester, N.Y.: Camden House, 2003.
- Jaeger, C. Stephan. Medieval Humanism in Gottfried von Strassburg's Tristan und Isolde. Heidelberg: Winter, 1977.
- McDonald, William C. "Gottfried von Strassburg: Tristan and the Arthurian Tradition." In Tristan and Isolde: A Casebook, edited by Joan Trasker Grimbert. New York: Garland Publishing, 1995.
- McNamara, Jo Ann. "The Herrenfrage: The Restructuring of the Gender System, 1050–1150." In Medieval Masculinities: Regarding Men in the Middle Ages, edited by Clare A. Lees. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1994.
- Poag, James F. "Lying Truth in Gottfried's Tristan." Deutsche Vierteljahrsschrift für Literaturwissenschaft und Geistesgeschichte 61. 2 (1987): 223–237.
- Rasmussen, Ann Marie. Mothers and Daughters in Medieval German Literature. Syracuse: Syracuse University Press, 1997.
- von Strassburg, Gottfried. Tristan, translated by A. T. Hatto. London: Penguin, 1967.
- . Tristan, edited by Friedrich Ranke. Stuttgart: Reclam, 1984.

See also Arthurian Literature; Chivalry; Femininity and Masculinity; Gender Ideologies; Germanic Lands; Isolde; Literature, German; Mothers as Teachers; Romance, German

GRAVE GOODS

In traditions dating to the prehistoric past, late antique and early medieval Europeans frequently prepared their dead by outfitting them with clothing and a range of items of personal adornment, weaponry, tableware and food, coinage, and other materials. With the transition from cremation to inhumation across the Roman Empire in the third century, the custom of depositing goods with the dead persisted with significant regional variations in western Europe as late as the seventh and eighth centuries. The tradition did not cease with Christian conversion, and seventh-century saints like Cuthbert in the north of England were laid to rest with an assortment of artifacts. In fact, the use of grave goods was never entirely abandoned. In the late Middle Ages, for instance, some bishops and monarchs of the Holy Roman Empire were buried with symbols of their office. Both lay and ecclesiastical legislation against grave robbery criminalized the activity with severe penalties, and while the laws were far from effective, their repetition suggests that the theft of grave artifacts and the disturbance of the dead were of great concern to elite Christian lawmakers.

Used in burial rites by both pagans and Christians, grave goods fulfilled a multitude of functions in commemorating, protecting, and drawing attention to the achievements of the dead. Although far from all sepulchers contained such artifacts, they provided surviving family and followers with the opportunity to highlight certain aspects of the identity or the status of the deceased and stake claims with regard to the continuing viability of that group in the face of significant loss. Some early medieval boys, for instance, were buried with full-sized weapons symbolic of the profession they might have someday attained had they lived to adulthood. Hence, grave goods did not directly mirror the life of the now-anonymous remains of the early medieval inhabitants of Europe, but rather reflected the worldly and otherworldly ambitions of those who oversaw funerary arrangements.

Scholars believe that members of the immediate kin group normally chose the assortment of objects that accompanied the dead into the grave, but there were certainly exceptions in monastic communities or among the supporters who surrounded high-status figures like kings and queens. In the case of the seventh-century Merovingian queen Bathilda, who after being deposed lived out her final years in the abbey of Chelles, reliquaries believed to have held her bones and those of the first abbess Bertilla were found, respectively, to contain a red cloak with yellow fringes and a brown silk tunic with yellow stripes ordinarily forbidden by monastic Rules to contemporary nuns. Evidently some unnamed supporters of the deceased decided that these women were deserving of a burial appropriate to their worldly status rather than reflective of the vows they had taken as part of their religious profession. Scholars have thus characterized the composition of grave assemblages as comparable to the process of writing a saint's life, since funerals represented a point in time at which fictive or idealized identities might be constructed on behalf of the deceased.

Close study of the gender aspects of grave goods has only been undertaken since the 1980s. Prior to this time, archaeologists and historians normally assumed that men were accompanied in burial by weaponry (Heergewäte) and women by jewelry (Gerade), since it was believed that these items could not legally pass to heirs. This binary approach to conceptualizing the distribution of possessions to graves has proved unsatisfactory for a number of reasons. First, no legal impediment existed to the inheritance of weaponry, clothing, or jewelry by either sex in early medieval secular or canon law. Second, the development of osteological and DNA techniques for analyzing the biological sex of skeletons suggests that there were, in certain circumstances, discrepancies between the sex of human remains and gendering of archaeological objects buried in early medieval graves. At the cemetery of Sewerby in East Yorkshire, for instance, fully fifteen percent of the graves sexed osteologically as possibly male contained jewelry. Third, the ubiquitous use of grave goods to sex skeletons until recently means that these data cannot contribute to accurate tables of the gender distributions of archaeological artifacts, since they reflect the implicit expectations of researchers more than the preferences of early medieval individuals. While some resistance exists to embracing a more scientific approach toward the identification of biological sex independent of the grave goods found with human remains, since this methodology would necessitate abandoning studies for which the skeletal evidence no longer survives, recent high-quality excavations have adopted less biased standards in the collection, analysis, and interpretation of human remains and archaeological artifacts.

Grave goods represent an important source for understanding gender mores, particularly in the early Middle Ages, when their use was most widespread. Not only is there an increasingly reliable and growing body of materials by which to study these issues, but the data reflect a far wider proportion of the population, including women, than accessible by means of limited written documentation. The archaeological and written evidence for burial practices sheds new light on the function and interplay of gender mores in western Europe. Although many burials received no artifacts (or at least none that have survived a millennium and a half of decay and human and natural disturbances), the statistical identification of particular grave goods in individual cemeteries as articulating strongly masculine, strongly feminine, or gender-neutral symbolism, based on their distribution in the graves of men, women, and children, sheds light on the choices of objects included in burials. Although gender was just one of many interconnected identities, including age, status, ethnicity, religious affiliation, and kinship, that played into decisions made at the time of the burial, the fact that in early medieval Gaul, for instance, women of child-bearing age and men of fighting age often received the most extensive and high-quality grave assemblages, and elderly individuals were typically buried with fewer, suggests the possible extent to which surviving contemporaries valued their respective contributions.

As with any socially constructed aspect of culture, the gender symbolism of grave goods was neither static nor uniform but varied by community and over time. Even the inhabitants of neighboring settlements sometimes chose different means by which to commemorate the loss of men, women, and children. Rather than a passive reflection of the attributes of the deceased, the clothing and accessories deposited in or withheld from burials were specific to the time, place, individual, and audience of the funeral. Unfortunately, however, surviving written and archaeological evidence is biased toward the more elite members of early medieval society, who left the most enduring remains. Nonetheless, we can safely state that not only the male elites highlighted in contemporary histories, but the unnamed women who are described in early medieval hagiographical sources as actively participating in preparing the dead for burial, represented influential negotiators in the process of outfitting the deceased for funeral ceremonies and burials.

BONNIE EFFROS

References and Further Reading

- Effros, Bonnie. Merovingian Mortuary Archaeology and the Making of the Early Middle Ages. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2003.
- Hadley, Dawn. "Negotiating Gender, Family and Status in Anglo-Saxon Burial Practices, c. 600–950." In Gender in the Early Medieval World: East and West, 300–900, edited by Leslie Brubaker and Julia M. H. Smith. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2004.
- Halsall, Guy. Settlement and Social Organization: The Merovingian Region of Metz. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995.
- Lucy, Sam. The Early Anglo-Saxon Cemeteries of East Yorkshire: An Analysis and Reinterpretation. BAR British Series 272. Oxford: British Archaeological Reports, 1998.
- Stoodley, Nick. The Spindle and the Spear: A Critical Enquiry into the Construction and Meaning of Gender in the Early Anglo-Saxon Burial Rite. BAR British Series 288. Oxford: British Archaeological Reports, 1999.
- Swift, Ellen. Regionality in Dress Accessories in the Late Roman West. Monographies Instrumentum 11. Montagnac: M. Mergoïl, 2000.

See also Archaeology; Burials and Tombs; Death, Mourning, and Commemoration; Femininity and Masculinity; Gender Ideologies; Gertrude of Nivelles; Hagiography; Jewelry; Wills

GRISELDA

Griselda, the long-suffering heroine of a story that charmed and fascinated numerous medieval writers, first appeared in the final tale of Boccaccio's Decameron, a collection of 100 tales begun after 1348 and probably completed in 1353. Thanks to Petrarch's Latin translation of the tale (1374), the story spread throughout Europe, each time addressed in slightly different ways to medieval readers. These retellings offered occasions for engaging in the ongoing medieval debate on the nature, status, and conduct of women.

Boccaccio

Thought to be based on a folk version of the Cupid and Psyche legend, Boccaccio's tale recounts how Gualtiero, the Marquis of Saluzzo, constrained by his subjects to take a wife, chooses to wed a peasant woman. Subsequently, the marquis tests his wife's obedience by staging various trials. He pretends first to order his daughter's murder, then to subject his newborn son to the same treatment. Finally, he orders Griselda to yield her place to a younger bride. After stripping his wife of her fine clothes and sending her back to her father's lowly house, Gualtiero summons her a final time and asks her to prepare his house for her youthful replacement. Griselda's suffering ends when her husband reveals that the bride-to-be is in fact her own daughter. Satisfied at last with the repeated proof of his wife's obedience, he takes her back into his house, restoring the children she had thought were dead.

In the Decameron, the story fits into a frame that places as much emphasis on Gualtiero's actions as on Griselda's, a focus that shifts somewhat in subsequent retellings. Fitting the story into the tenth day's theme of liberality or magnificence in matters of love, Boccaccio's fictional narrator, Dineo, describes his tale as an example of how a lord can lack these noble virtues while a humble peasant woman displays them. He ends his performance with a ribald joke, suggesting that Griselda might have found another man to give her a new dress rather than going back to Gualtiero. Boccaccio's framing of the Griselda story brings out its ambivalence, in that he pays tribute both to its moral implications and to its fictional and ludic qualities. Subsequent translators of the tale fitted it into new frames that preserve this ambivalence or that orient it in the direction of either allegory or exemplum.

Petrarch

At about the same time that Petrarch translated the tale of Griselda, Ser Giovanni Sercambi retold it in Italian, entitling it De Muliere Costante and changing the heroine's name to Costantina. But it was Petrarch's Latin translation that ensured the tale's dissemination throughout Europe. The translation is addressed to Boccaccio in one of the letters collected in the Seniles (Seniles, XVIII, 3). Here Petrarch admits that the Decameron is not wholly to his taste. Finding the last tale superior to the rest, he translates it into Latin to send it back to its author for judgment. Petrarch offers it "not so much to urge the matrons of our time to imitate the patience of this wife...as to arouse readers to imitate her womanly constancy, that they might dare to undertake for God what she undertook for her husband...." In Petrarch's hands, the story becomes an allegory of the trials endured by Christians, and Griselda resembles a female Job.

French Versions

Notions of fidelity to the Petrarchan source shaped the subsequent retellings of the story in other European vernaculars; nevertheless, the medieval translators exercised complete liberty in choosing the co-texts introducing, concluding, or accompanying their translations. These co-texts interpret and appropriate the source text for different purposes, guiding the reception of the tale. So Philippe de Mézières, a friend of the Italian laureate Petrarch turns Griselda into a mirror for married women when he inserts his translation of the tale into a four-book treatise whose full title as announced in the Prologue is De la Vertu du sacrement de mariage espirituel et réconfort des dames mariées et de tout bon Crestien par un devot exemple de la Passion de Jesu Crist et du miroir des dames mariée, la noble marquise de Saluce (On the virtue of the sacrament of spiritual marriage and the comfort of married women and of all good Christians by the devout example of the passion of Jesus Christ and the mirror of married women, the noble Marquise de Saluce). Like Petrarch, Philippe separated the tale from its co-texts and set it in an entirely different kind of work, whose genre had acquired some popularity during the fourteenth century in France: a vernacular book of spiritual advice for married women. To reinforce the heroine's credibility as an exemplary spouse, the French translator elevated the tale to the rank of history rather than fiction. Petrarch had concluded in his letter that the story was Boccaccio's invention, but Philippe insists on its literal truth. In the prologue to his translation, he claims that though it might seem to be an invention, its truth is attested to by Griselda's fame in Lombardy and by its source, the devout Catholic doctor Francis Petrarch. In moving to France, Griselda becomes a model for wives to imitate. The story appears in Le Ménagier de Paris, a book of exempla and advice addressed by an old husband to his young bride. There is even a French version for the stage, L'Estoire de Griseldis (1395), thought to be commissioned for a royal wedding. In the early fifteenth century, the French writer Christine de Pizan took up the Griselda story and placed it alongside other exemplary tales of virtuous women in the Livre de la Cité des Dames, offering it as a refutation of misogynistic slander against her sex.

Iberian Versions

The Catalan author Bernat Metge introduced the story to the Iberian Peninsula when in 1388 he addressed a translation of Petrarch's Latin text to Isabel de Guimerà, a married noblewoman. In Spain, Griselda continued to be held up as an example for married women in a version included in a Castilian book of advice for women, purportedly written by a father to his daughters.

Chaucer

The Griselda story crossed from continental Europe to England when Chaucer translated it using Petrarch's Latin text and an anonymous French version, Le Livre de Griseldis, as his source texts. He then inserted it into The Canterbury Tales as the Clerk's Tale. The English writer exploits all the tale's ambivalence in having the Clerk engage (with characteristically Chaucerian irony) first with Petrarch and finally with the Wife of Bath and other "noble" wives. By urging women in the "Envoy" to the Clerk's tale not to follow Griselda's example but to enter into battle against their husbands, Chaucer ensured that the disturbing power of the tale of Griselda and Walter would continue to trouble readers and inspire debate.

WENDY HARDING

References and Further Reading

- Bettridge, William, and Francis Lee Utley. "New Light on the Origin of the Griselda Story." Texas Studies in Literature and Language 13 (1971): 153–208.
- Blumenfeld-Kosinski, Renate. "Christine de Pizan and the Misogynistic Tradition." Romanic Review 81 (1990): 279–292.
- Bourland, C. B. "Boccaccio and the Decameron in Castilian and Catalan Literature." Revue Hispanique 12 (1905): 1–232.
- Bronfman, Judith. Chaucer's Clerk's Tale: The Griselda Story Received, Rewritten, Illustrated. Garland Studies in Medieval Literature, 11. Garland Reference Library of the Humanities, 1831. Reprint, New York and London: Garland, 1994.
- Dinshaw, Carolyn. "Griselda Translated." In Chaucer's Sexual Poetics. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1989, pp. 132–155.
- Filios, Denise. "Rewriting Griselda: From Folktale to Exemplum." Mediaevalia 24 (2003): 45–73.
- Finlayson, John. "Petrarch, Boccaccio, and Chaucer's Clerk's Tale." Studies in Philology 97 (2000): 255–275.
- Hollander, Robert, and Courtney Cahill. "Day Ten of the Decameron: The Myth of Order." In Boccaccio's Dante and the Shaping Force of Satire, edited by Robert Hollander. Ann Arbor, Mich.: University of Michigan Press, 1997, pp. 110–112.
- Kellogg, Alfred L. "The Evolution of the 'Clerk's Tale': A Study in Connotation." Chaucer, Langland, Arthur: Essays in Middle English Literature. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1972, pp. 276–329.
- Kirkpatrick, Robin. "The Griselda Story in Boccaccio, Petrarch and Chaucer." In Chaucer and the Italian Trecento, edited by Piero Boitani and Anna Torti. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1983, pp. 231–248.
- Middleton, Anne. "The Clerk and his Tale: Some Literary Contexts." Studies in the Age of Chaucer 2 (1980): 121–150.
- Morse, Charlotte C. "Critical Approaches to the Clerk's Tale." In Chaucer's Religious Tales, edited by C. David Benson and Elizabeth Robertson. Cambridge: Brewer, 1990, pp. 71–83.
- Rigby, S. H. "Misogynist Versus Feminist Chaucer." In Chaucer in Context: Society, Allegory and Gender. Manchester and New York: Manchester University Press, 1996, pp. 116–166.
- Severs, Burke. The Literary Relationships of Chaucer's "Clerk's Tale". Yale Studies in English, 96. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1942.
- Wallace, David. "'Whan She Translated Was': A Chaucerian Critique of the Petrarchan Academy." In Literary Practice and Social Change in Britain, 1380–1530, edited by Lee Patterson. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1990, pp. 156–215.

See also Boccaccio, Giovanni; Chaucer, Geoffrey; Literature, Italian; Petrarch; Translation

GUIBERT OF NOGENT'S MOTHER

All we know of Abbot Guibert of Nogent's unnamed mother (c. 1030–after 1104) is contained within his memoir (1115). According to Guibert, she was a noble woman, married at a young age to his father, Evrard. Her fear of sin may have contributed to her husband's early impotence, but she eventually gave birth to several children. She was widowed less than a year after Guibert was born. Following the death of her husband, having fulfilled her marital duties, she took control of her own affairs. In defiance of her in-laws, she chose to remain unmarried, lived as a religious laywoman, and eventually became a recluse at a male monastery.

Guibert credits his mother with providing him with a model of Christian behavior and an education. He describes visions that directed her during momentous times in her life. When he was about twelve, she moved her household to the monastery of St. Germer of Fly. Shortly afterwards, she arranged for Guibert and his older brothers to be admitted. At St. Germer, Guibert's mother led an ascetic life in her cell, although people visited her for spiritual guidance. She maintained a devotion to the Virgin Mary and continued to have visions, one of which directed a rebellious Guibert to remain at Fly. Guibert's mother found autonomy in her calling, establishing herself as a visionary and an exemplar. She led a life similar to those of contemporary mystics—her visions recounted by a trusted male chronicler, in this case, her own son. She also serves as important early evidence for the existence of anchoresses. Anchoritic living became increasingly popular in subsequent centuries.

HEATHER E. WARD

References and Further Reading

- Archambault, Paul J., ed. and trans. A Monk's Confession: The Memoirs of Guibert of Nogent. University Park, Pa.: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1996.
- Benton, John F., ed. Self and Society in Medieval France: The Memoirs of Guibert of Nogent (1064?–c.1125), translated by C. C. Swinton Bland. New York: Harper & Row, 1970.
- Mulder-Bakker, Anneke B. The Lives of the Anchoresses: The Rise of the Urban Recluse in Medieval Europe. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2005.
- . "The Prime of their Lives: Women and Age, Wisdom and Religious Careers in Northern Europe." In New Trends in Feminine Spirituality: The Holy Women of Liège and Their Impact, edited by Juliette Dor, Lesley Johnson, and Jecelyn Wogan-Browne. Turnhout: Brepols, 1999, pp. 215–236.
- Partner, Nancy F. "The Family Romance of Guibert of Nogent: His Story/Her Story." In Medieval Mothering, edited by John Carmi Parsons and Bonnie Wheeler. New York: Garland, 1996, p. 359–379.

See also Anchoresses; Impotence; Lay Piety; Monasticism and Nuns; Poverty, Religious; Sexuality: Sex in Marriage; Widows

GUILD MEMBERS AND GUILDS

Various types of guilds (also spelled gilds) developed in medieval Europe, first in cities and then, in a few areas, in the countryside. Merchant guilds organized long-distance trade, especially in cloth and luxury goods; their members sometimes became very wealthy. Professional guilds such as those of apothecaries and notaries organized the provision of services and could be quite well-off when urban economies were flourishing. Craft guilds organized the production and distribution of many products and the training of future workers; masters in craft guilds were generally heads of households and made a solid income.

Women did not carry out long-distance trade themselves and were thus not active members in merchants' guilds. Some did invest in trading companies as what were termed "sleeping partners," however; in about 1500, thirty-nine of the nearly 300 members of the Merchants' Society of Ravensburg, Germany were women. Women were not officially trained as notaries, as apothecaries, or in other professions, so they were not members of professional guilds. By the fifteenth century there were organized systems of apprenticeship for midwives in many cities, but these were run by municipal or church authorities, not midwives themselves, so they were not really guilds.

The earliest craft-guild ordinances date from the thirteenth century, and some mention male and female masters along with male and female apprentices. There were a few all-female guilds, especially in spinning gold thread or producing silk in cities with highly specialized economies, such as Cologne, Paris, and Rouen. Historians looking at these cities, or only at guild ordinances, have sometimes argued that guilds as a whole were initially open to women and that women's participation was significant. Others have pointed out that it is difficult to tell in most cases whether the women referred to as "masters" had been trained independently or were actually masters' wives or widows. They also note that actual lists of guild members, as opposed to ordinances describing the guild in theory, rarely list many female apprentices or women who were not masters' widows.

In general, except for the few all-female guilds, craft guilds were male organizations and followed the male life cycle. One became an apprentice at puberty, became a journeyman four to ten years later, traveled around learning from a number of masters, then settled down, married, opened one's own shop, and worked at the same craft full time until one died or grew too old to work any longer. This process presupposed that one would be free to travel (something that was more difficult for women than men), that upon marriage one would acquire a wife as an assistant, and that pregnancy, childbirth, or child-rearing would never interfere with one's labor. Transitions between these stages were marked by ceremonies, and master craftsmen were formally inscribed in guild registers and took part in governing the guild.

Women fit into guilds much more informally. When urban economies were expanding in the High Middle Ages, the master's wife and daughters worked alongside him and the journeymen and apprentices, and female domestic servants also carried out productive tasks. When the demand for products was especially great, master craftsmen hired female pieceworkers to assist and in some cities girls entered formal apprenticeships; women and girls thus served as a labor reservoir, to be utilized when guild needs required. Masters' widows ran shops after the deaths of their husbands and were expected to pay all guild fees, though they could not participate in running the guild. Other than masters' widows and a small number of female apprentices, however, women's ability to work was not officially recognized and usually depended not on their own training but on their relationship with a guild master. Even members in the all-female guilds were sometimes expected to be related to members of a male guild in a related craft, and men appear to have served as the leaders in some women's guilds.

Even this informal participation began to change in the fifteenth century on the continent, when explicit restrictions on women's work began. First masters' widows were limited in the amount of time they could keep operating a shop or prohibited from hiring journeymen, then female domestic servants were excluded from any productive tasks, then the number of his daughters a master craftsman could employ was limited. The timing of these restrictions varied from craft to craft, town to town, and country to country; they did not begin until the sixteenth century in Scandinavia. Whenever restrictions occurred, because women's participation in guild shops was generally not guaranteed by guild regulations and because widows had no political voice in running the guilds, women as a group were not able to protect their right to work. A few might be allowed to work, but this was on an individual basis and was viewed as a substitute for charity.

Women were excluded from craft guilds for a number of reasons. As the result of urban revolts, guild members in some cities, especially in the Low Countries, became part of city government; this political role was seen as inappropriate for women. Guilds facing competition from cottage industries organized by capitalist investors tightened up their entrance requirements. Guilds increasingly came to view the honor of their work as tied to an all-male workplace. The separate journeymen's guilds that began to be set up—often illegally—in the late fourteenth century by journeymen who had little hope of becoming masters were even more hostile to women's work and never allowed female members.

MERRY E. WIESNER-HANKS

References and Further Reading

- Howell, Martha. Women, Production and Patriarchy in Late Medieval Cities. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1986.
- Kowaleski, Maryanne, and Judith M. Bennett. "Crafts, Gilds, and Women in the Middle Ages: Fifty Years after Marian K. Dale." Signs 14 (1989): 474–488.
- Mackenney, Richard. Tradesmen and Traders: The World of Guilds in Venice and Europe, c. 1250–c. 1650. Totowa, N.J.: Barnes and Noble, 1987.
- Wensky, Margret. Die Stellung der Frau in der stadtkölnischen Wirtschaft im Spätmittelalter. Cologne: Böhlau, 1980.
- Wiesner, Merry E. "Guilds, Male Bonding and Women's Work in Early Modern Germany." Gender and History 1 (1989): 125–137.

See also Apprentices; Artisan Families, Women of; Division of Labor; Home Manufacturing; Textile Production for the Market; Work

GUINEVERE

Guinevere (also Guenevere, Guenièvre, Gwenhwyfar, Gaynour, Guenhumare, Ginevra) is one of the most visible female characters in medieval European literature. She not only appears in works of prose and poetry from c. 1100 up through 1500, but also forms part of "the best-known image in Arthurian art" (Stones, 125). In that image, an illumination from a manuscript in the J. Pierpont Morgan Library, Guinevere kisses her lover Lancelot for the first time. This image circulates widely, appearing in both scholarly books about the Arthurian tradition and promotional materials for the Morgan Library (Stones, 125).

The figure of Guinevere is present in medieval Arthurian literature composed in Dutch, English, French, German, Italian, Latin, Norwegian, Portuguese, Spanish, and Welsh. Guinevere is always Arthur's wife, and her story often includes her kidnapping by Meleagant and her adultery with either Mordred or Lancelot. Her abduction is the subject of what is probably the earliest Arthurian sculpture, the archivolt of the Cathedral of Modena. Her infidelity undermines Arthur's power because it constitutes treason and threatens the line of succession. Guinevere's male partner commits treason by cuckolding the king and destabilizes the realm by initiating (in the case of Mordred) or participating in (in the case of Lancelot) a civil war. Mordred, however, as Arthur's nephew or illegitimate son, also violates medieval laws prohibiting incest.

Guinevere's qualities as wife and woman vary with the cultural context and historical moment of each Arthurian composition. Welsh romances depict a conventional and loyal queen forming part of the Arthurian frame for tales about knights' adventures. In the early Welsh tradition as a whole, Guinevere is innocent of wrongdoing: "She is either the fateful queen causing Arthur's downfall in the battle of Camlann, probably unwillingly (not by betrayal), or the abducted queen who is taken away by a supernatural being against her will" (Korrel, 96). In Geoffrey of Monmouth's History of the Kings of Britain (c. 1136–1138), Guinevere plays a visible role in the main narrative. Despite her great beauty, she possesses ceremonial power as participant in a crown-wearing ceremony with Arthur and political power as coregent with Mordred. Geoffrey's Guinevere contributes to Arthur's downfall by committing adultery with Mordred, but the text does not state that she desired or sought this union and labels Mordred, not the Queen, a perjurer and traitor. In the French romance The Knight of the Cart (Lancelot) by Chrétien de Troyes (c. 1177), Guinevere is Lancelot's partner in courtly love and a secret affair. Later French romances likewise give Guinevere a significant role, but at times condemn this love affair (the vulgate Quest of the Holy Grail and The Death of Arthur and the post-vulgate Cycle), at times do not (the early portion of the vulgate Lancelot and the prose Lancelot), and at other times do not mention it at all (most post-Chrétien verse romances).

In later German romances and many of the French and English ones, Guinevere is a victim of kidnapping and an adulteress whose affair with Lancelot causes Arthur's downfall. It is worth noting, however, that the German tradition before the thirteenth century sometimes presents Guinevere as a noble, good, happily married, and loyal lady who is a mother figure at court. At other times, however, medieval German works portray her as unfaithful to Arthur or as having been unfairly branded an adulteress. It is also worth noting that in a few texts, the alliterative Morte D'Arthur being the best known, Guinevere has children. The alliterative poem's Guinevere is the mother of Mordred's children, but she leaves their fate in Arthur's hands when she flees to a convent following Mordred's defeat. In his fifteenth-century Morte D'Arthur, Sir Thomas Malory draws upon French and English medieval sources to create a Guinevere who combines the traits of her predecessors: she is beautiful, brave, politically significant, emotional, adulterous, and finally achieves salvation as a nun. Malory's version of Guinevere is the one most widely known today because his book is the source of much postmedieval Arthurian literature and many Arthurian films. As a result, contemporary readers tend to know Guinevere primarily as Lancelot's lover.

Guinevere has no generally accepted historical origin in a particular medieval woman, but it is possible that her literary portrayals reflect the lives and reputations of medieval queens. Two likely candidates are Empress Matilda, the only legitimate heir of King Henry I of England, whose throne King Stephen usurped in 1135, and Eleanor of Aquitaine, King Henry II of England's powerful queen, whose colorful life spurred outlandish legends about her. Geoffrey of Monmouth's Guinevere—who participates in a crown-wearing ceremony with Arthur and presides over a celebration even more splendid than Arthur's—could reflect the awkward historical moment in the mid-1130s at which the Anglo-Norman barons chose either to honor or to ignore the oaths of fealty they had sworn to Matilda before her father's death. Similarly, Lawman's translation into English (c. 1200) of Wace's Roman de Brut (1155), through its demonization of Guinevere, reflects the decline in Eleanor of Aquitaine's reputation in annals and chronicle histories at the turn of the thirteenth century. It is, therefore, possible that medieval authors shaped their images of Arthur's queen in response to contemporary attitudes toward Empress Matilda and Queen Eleanor.

Medieval manuscript illuminations, like medieval texts, commonly present Guinevere as an adulteress. These images show her kissing Lancelot—sometimes in a private space, but often in a public one. The frequent reproduction of the Morgan Library image of Guinevere kissing Lancelot is consistent with today's popular depictions of her primarily as Lancelot's lover—despite her varied portraits in medieval literature.

FIONA TOLHURST

References and Further Reading

- Fenster, Thelma S., ed. Arthurian Women: A Casebook. New York: Garland Publishing, 1996.
- Korrel, Peter J. An Arthurian Triangle: A Study of the Origin, Development and Characterization of Arthur, Guinevere, and Mordred. Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1984.
- Malory, Sir Thomas. Works, edited by Eugene Vinaver and revised by P. J. C. Field. Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1990.
- Stones, Alison. "Illustrating Lancelot and Guinevere." In Lancelot and Guinevere: A Casebook, edited by Lori J.

Walters. New York and London: Garland Publishing, 1996.

Tolhurst, Fiona. "What Ever Happened to Eleanor? Reflections of Eleanor of Aquitaine in Wace's Roman de Brut and Lawman's Brut." In Eleanor of Aquitaine: Lord and Lady, edited by Bonnie Wheeler and John Carmi Parsons. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2002, pp. 319–330.

Walters, Lori J., ed. Lancelot and Guinevere: A Casebook. New York and London: Garland Publishing, 1996.

See also Arthurian Literature; Chivalry; Courtly Love; Cuckold; Eleanor of Aquitaine; Incest; Literature, Latin; Literature, Middle English; Literature, Old French; Matilda the Empress; Queens and Empresses: The West; Rape and Raptus; Sexuality; Extramarital Sex

GYNECOLOGY

In 1990, an archeological excavation in Granada, Spain uncovered the remains of a Muslim woman from the late medieval period who suffered from a calcified growth in her uterus. This condition, which in modern biomedicine is ascribed to uterine myomas (benign tumors), could conceivably have afflicted any woman in medieval Europe, whatever her social rank, income, religion, marital status, or sexual activity: all were united by the threat of the common diseases and conditions specific to the female body. Women were also subject to many of the same afflictions as men, from accidental wounds to infectious diseases like tuberculosis, leprosy, or plague, or degenerative conditions like crippling arthritis or cancer. But biology was hardly destiny. All medieval societies made efforts to intervene in cases of illness or injury, and women were not simply "abandoned to their fate." Moreover, since Muslim, Jewish, Byzantine, and Latin societies shared many elements of the Mediterranean system of humoral medicine, the care women received in all four societies would have had certain commonalities. These women were separated from one another by social rank, wealth, and religion and all their attendant material and cultural effects. The focus here will be on gynecological conditions rather than those related to childbirth, though it should be remembered that the nutritional depletion and other strains caused by repeated pregnancies and birth often had long-term consequences.

Disease Incidence and Life Expectancy

Because gynecological diseases primarily affect the soft tissues of the body, they leave little trace in the archeological record. Hence, the evidence of the woman's grave in Spain is a rare case when we can document a gynecological disorder (and in that case, a nonfatal one, since the woman clearly lived for many years with the condition). Paleopathologists (scientists who study the archeological record with many of the same technologies used by modern physicians) are now able to better document the incidence of diseases that leave traces on the bones, such as tuberculosis and rickets; more recently, they have begun to use DNA analysis to assess the prevalence of certain bacterial diseases, like bubonic plague, in historical populations. This work is still in its infancy and breakdowns of data by sex are few. Nevertheless, recent studies confirm that the childbearing years were characterized by higher mortality for women, though thereafter women generally had survival rates that were the same as or slightly better than those of men.

Anatomy

What was known about the human female body was learned inferentially from the study of other mammals, particularly the pig, which was assumed to resemble the human in its internal anatomy. The human uterus was thought to have two cells (as most ungulates do), one on the right and one on the left. The Roman physician and anatomist Galen (d. c. 217 CE) created an elaborate explanation of how the warmer temperature in the right side of the uterus was more conducive to the production of males while the colder left side produced females. In the twelfth century, a theory began to circulate that the uterus had seven cells; the cells closer to the center produced more ambiguously sexed fetuses, hermaphrodites forming in the center.

The female testicles (what we today call the ovaries) had been identified in the third century BCE and were understood to function comparably to the male organs, that is, as producers of a seminal fluid. The uterus, cervix, and vagina were recognized as distinct parts of the internal reproductive tract, though the external genitalia were only rarely described in detail. A term used in Latin and several Romance languages (natura, nature, naissance) saw the vagina as the site of generation, while Germanic languages (English wicket, Dutch gulden poort) saw it as a gate or opening. The clitoris was rarely remarked on except when it grew too large. The hymen was even more rarely mentioned. The female breasts had a special vascular connection that linked them directly to the uterus. The blood that fed the fetus was, after birth, diverted to the breasts and further refined into milk. After menopause, unexpelled, corrupted blood also moved by this channel, thereby causing breast cancer.

Anatomical illustrations of the female body were rare. A highly schematized image of the internal female genitalia is found today in only four copies. Around the end of the fourteenth century in German areas, the more popular iconographic tradition of the diseased woman began. This semi-squatting naked figure, with belly splayed to show the internal organs, including the uterus, was often labeled to show the major conditions that could afflict the female body. This figure appeared most often in manuscripts made for clerics and probably served as a mnemonic to aid them in their understandings of basic illness and the processes of reproduction. When human anatomical dissection became a regularized part of medical training in late medieval northern Italy, the female body, and especially the uterus, became a particular focus of curiosity.

Physiology, Pathology, and Therapy

With only a few exceptions, medieval medical writers and practitioners were quite clear that, anatomically as well as physiologically, men and women were quite distinct. Men were perfect in their heat: they had sufficient vital heat to fully cook all the nutrients they consumed and expel any excess. Women, in contrast, were colder and, as such, unable either to fully consume all their intake or expel their excess through normal channels of elimination. They thus needed a distinct purgative function, menstruation, whose regularity was vital to health.

The uterus could suffer various afflictions, such as being unnaturally hot, having lesions or cancers, or being displaced, tilting laterally or falling into complete prolapse. Equally unique to the female was uterine suffocation. This occurred either when the menses had been retained too long or when the woman did not engage in regular sex and expel her semen. (See above regarding the female testicles.) The collected matter would putrefy in the womb and either cause the uterus itself to rise up toward the organs of respiration or it would emit a noxious vapor that could ascend to the lungs, heart, or brain. Either way, the condition was severe if not fatal. It was treated by a variety of remedies, including suffumigations of sweet-smelling substances to the vagina to lure the uterus back to its proper place. Some authors explicitly recommended sexual intercourse as a cure. In the early Middle Ages, exorcisms of the womb (which derived from pre-Christian models) were still in circulation, and as late as the fourteenth century medical writers reported that women themselves believed that their uteruses moved up to the heart and throat.

Infertility attracted more and more attention from male medical writers beginning in the twelfth century. Initially, it was simply one among several headings in the gynecological sections of medical textbooks. Beginning in the fourteenth century, infertility became the topic of specialized writings and served as the main entry point for an expanded role for male physicians in women's healthcare.

Up through the twelfth century, surgical gynecological interventions were limited to treatment of breast conditions. (Surgeons were rarely optimistic that any effective treatment for breast cancer was possible, though some believed that excision might be efficacious if performed early enough.) In the late thirteenth and early fourteenth centuries, Latin surgical writers tentatively began to discuss conditions of the female genitalia, usually minor procedures to open an obstructed vagina or excise fleshy growths. Arab writers had been more detailed in their descriptions of gynecological surgery, though it is unclear whether such procedures were performed by male physicians or female practitioners assisting them. (The Spanish writer az-Zahrawi suggested that a eunuch could also serve as a medical attendant.) Methods to excise the dead fetus from the womb were described in Arabic texts, but even though these were translated into Latin in the twelfth century, no western Christian surgical writer addressed obstetrical procedures prior to Guy de Chauliac, who, in 1368, instructed the surgeon regarding how to supervise the midwife in cases of difficult birth or excise the fetus if the mother died in labor. By the fifteenth century, surgeons from Italy to England had become much more involved in intervening in difficult births.

Circulation of Medical Knowledge and Provision of Medical Care

In recent years, historians of medicine have turned from privileging the perspective of literate, elite male practitioners who wrote medical books to looking for evidence of the patient's point of view. They now commonly use the notion of the medical marketplace to refer to the multiplicity of options from which the sick person or her family might choose. A woman might employ a phlebotomist to perform a periodic bloodletting (nuns and anchoresses were expected to be bled four times a year), consult an apothecary for a specialized remedy, request an herbal remedy from a local empiric, or journey to a saint's shrine to plead for the recovery of her sick child. Medieval women obtained their gynecological care from a variety of sources, including both male and female practitioners. This was true even of gynecological care, for although there were limits to men's ability to perform hands-on aspects of diagnosis and treatment, male practitioners could use their access to written medical traditions to claim a theoretical understanding of disease, that is, what caused disease and how treatment of the disease (rather than merely its symptoms) might be determined. Learned male practitioners thus believed that their medical theory rivaled and ultimately superseded the empirical expertise of traditional female healers.

Women's access to the same body of written texts would have allowed female practitioners to claim the same expertise as men (or even greater, since they also had hands-on experience treating women's conditions). Or female patients might have read gynecological texts themselves and created lay circles of self-help. It matters very much, therefore, to determine not only who wrote the dozens of gynecological texts that can now be documented, but also who read them.

Aside from an early medieval Greek text attributed to an otherwise unknown woman named Metrodora, the only medieval gynecological text of known female authorship is a work called Treatments for Women (De curis mulierum) by the famous twelfth-century healer Trota of Salerno. Trota's work treats women's medicine not simply as gynecological afflictions—menstrual difficulties, uterine prolapse, etc.—but also in the wider sense of the social functioning of women's bodies. Thus, Trota includes remedies for vaginal lesions caused by forced intercourse, mechanisms to sedate sexual desire in nuns and vowesses who are forbidden sexual relations, and techniques to narrow the size of the vagina or produce a simulated bloodflow of defloration in a sexually experienced woman who might otherwise be unmarriageable. Even cosmetics fit into this expanded definition of women's medicine, since they, too, were among the techniques used by women to modify the functioning or appearance of their bodies. Trota's contemporary Hildegard of Bingen (1087–1179), did not write a specialized treatise on gynecology nor even devote much attention to the topic, but she did articulate some of the most original views of the nature of sex difference ever seen in the Middle Ages.

All other known medieval gynecological texts (more than 150) were of certain or probable male authorship. Moreover, countless general works of medicine (like medical encyclopedias, which covered diseases from head to toe) touched on gynecological topics incidentally. The majority of these works were read and used by men. For example, sixteen Hebrew gynecological texts are known to have circulated in Ashkenazi and Sephardic communities, yet there is no evidence that the works were written for or directly used by women. In Christian Europe, no texts specifically written for midwives were composed until the fifteenth century; when gynecological texts did address female audiences, they addressed laywomen generally.

Cross-sex gynecological practice posed particular problems for the simple reason that the reproductive organs are also the sex organs; prior to the fourteenth century, it was considered inappropriate for a male to inspect or touch a woman's genitalia. Yet this should not be taken to imply that men were never involved with women's conditions. Aside from infirmarians in monasteries, few male practitioners completely excluded women from their clientele. Noblewomen often had personal male physicians in their employ, and communities of nuns occasionally signed contracts with learned male practitioners to ensure regular care. Besides being consulted for general conditions like coughs, fevers, or skin disorders, male practitioners diagnosed and prescribed therapies for menstrual disruptions and infertility. And, as noted above, in the later Middle Ages surgeons expanded their involvement in women's gynecological and even obstetrical conditions. Thus, most male practitioners did practice gynecology at some level, even if it never involved the visual or manual inspection of a woman's genitalia. If such inspection was necessary, female assistants could always be used. A regulation of the Poor Clares from 1297, for example, stipulated that while male physicians could be called in to treat serious conditions, female healers and phlebotomists should tend to the nuns when inspection of "their secret places" was needed.

The prefaces of gynecological texts, including most famously The Conditions of Women (the first of the three texts that made up the so-called Trotula ensemble), often acknowledge women's hesitation to consult male practitioners out of embarrassment. The implications of this sentiment were largely ignored by male practitioners, who readily incorporated the Trotula and other gynecological texts into their medical handbooks. Yet the implicit logic of this critique was that, if put directly into women's hands, gynecological texts could enable women to treat themselves and each other. This is how one of the early French translators of Conditions of Women interpreted the text, and we find several vernacular texts addressed to female audiences in French, English, and Dutch. The irony is that even these texts often made their way back into the hands of men.

The medical writings of Trota or Hildegard, as unique and valuable as they are, do not get us very close to the lived experience of most medieval women. Saints' lives and canonization proceedings are filled with the testimonies of the grievous ills that women endured. Some of the most commonly employed medical compounds for women's ailments, such as trifera magna and athanasia, employed opiate substances that may have helped alleviate the pains of menstrual cramping, uterine fibroids, or breast cancer. We may perhaps never be able to recover the full range of local practices employed by midwives, neighbor women, or more specialized healers. Nevertheless, it is clear that alleviation of physical suffering was both sought out and often provided. Gynecological writers never explicitly mention the curse of Eve. While they acknowledge that women are afflicted more than men by the processes of reproduction, the idea of simply leaving women to suffer their fate seems to have been untenable.

MONICA GREEN

References and Further Reading

- Barkai, Ron, ed. and trans. A History of Jewish Gynaecological Texts in the Middle Ages. Leiden: Brill, 1998.
- Barratt, Alexandra, ed. The Knowing of Woman's Kind in Childing: A Middle English Version of Material Derived from the Trotula and Other Sources. Medieval Women: Texts and Contexts, 4. Turnhout: Brepols, 2001.
- Bos, Gerrit, ed. and trans. Ibn al-Jazzar on Sexual Diseases and Their Treatment. The Sir Henry Wellcome Asian Series. London: Kegan Paul, 1997.
- Faraone, Christopher. "New Light on Ancient Greek Exorcisms of the Wandering Womb." Zeitschrift für Papyrologie und Epigraphik 144 (2003): 189–197.
- Green, Monica H., ed. and trans. The Trotula: A Medieval Compendium of Woman's Medicine. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001.
- . Women's Healthcare in the Medieval West: Texts and Contexts. Aldershot: Ashgate, 2000.
- . "Bodies, Gender, Health, Disease: Recent Work on Medieval Women's Medicine." Studies in Medieval and Renaissance History 1 (2005): 1–46.
- Green, Monica H., and Linne R. Mooney. "The Sickness of Women." In Sex, Aging, and Death in a Medieval Medical Compendium: Trinity College Cambridge R.14.52, Its Text Language, and Scribe, edited by M. Teresa Tavormina. Tempe, Ariz.: Arizona State University Press, 2006, pp. 455–568.
- Hanson, Ann Ellis, and Monica H. Green. "Soranus of Ephesus: Methodicorum princeps." In Aufstieg und Niedergang der römischen Welt, edited by Wolfgang Haase and Hildegard Temporini, Teilband II, Band 37.2. Berlin & New York: Walter de Gruyter, 1994.
- Jimenez Brobeil, Sylvia A. "A Contribution to Medieval Pathological Gynaecology." Journal of Paleopathology 4. 3 (1992): 155–161.
- Kruse, Britta-Juliane. Verborgene Heilkünste: Geschichte der Frauenmedizin im Spätmittelalter. Quellen und Forschungen zur Literatur- und Kulturgeschichte, 5. Berlin: Walter de Gruyter, 1996.
- Park, Katharine. "Dissecting the Female Body: From Women's Secrets to the Secrets of Nature." In Crossing Boundaries: Attending to Early Modern Women, edited by Jane Donawerth and Adele Seeff. Newark, Del.: University of Delaware Press, 2000, pp. 29–47.

———. Visible Women: Gender, Generation, and the Origins of Human Dissection. New York: Zone Books, forthcoming.
Soranus of Ephesus. Soranus's Gynecology, translated by Owsei Temkin. Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins University Press, 1956. Reprint, 1991.

See also Abortion; Contraception; Cosmetics; Demography; Doctors and Healers; Hermaphrodites; Hildegard of Bingen; Hospitals; Infertility; Menstruation; Midwives; Secrets of Women; Trota of Salerno; Virginit

H

---

HADEWIJCH

Hadewijch is the name given to the author of a collection of mystic texts written in the mid-thirteenth century, probably in the environs of Brussels or Antwerp. Nothing is known for certain about her life, but it is thought that she may have been a Beguine and that she could well have been of noble or at least patrician birth. The Beguines were a lay religious movement of women who wished to live close to the apostolic ideal. In 1215, they were given papal dispensation to live together and to exhort one another to good works and a greater love of God. This is the context in which Hadewijch was writing, and her work focuses on the relationship between the soul and God. Her writing is intensely personal, but it was written with didactic rather than cathartic intent. In the early days of the Beguines, women joined a group of Beguines as adults and came mostly from the lower nobility or patrician classes, so Hadewijch and her audience would have enjoyed a reasonable education. The note referring to the author of the manuscripts as Hadewijch is quite late, possibly sixteenth century, but both Ruusbroec and Jan van Leeuwen were familiar with these texts and thought highly of a woman they referred to as Hadewijch. The five Hadewijch manuscripts are very closely related and contain some or all of the following texts: forty-five Poems in Stanzas, thirty-two Letters, fourteen Visions, sixteen Poems in Mixed Forms (or Epistolary Poems), eight other poems, and a short prose text. The authorship of some of these texts has been debated, but as a collection the texts provide us with a vivid picture of a particular form of mystic spirituality whether they are the product of a single author or of several. The manuscript evidence suggests that manuscript B (Brussels Koninklijke Bibliotheek 2877–2878), is the best text, but scholarship has tended to follow the example of Joseph Van Mierlo, one of the early editors of Hadewijch's work, and has taken the texts as they are in manuscript C (Ghent Universiteitsbibliotheek 941) as definitive.

In medieval theological literature, the soul (a feminine noun in Latin requiring feminine pronouns and adjectives) was frequently spoken of as the bride of Christ. In her Poems in Stanzas Hadewijch reverses this convention. Her chosen name for the Divinity is Minne, "Love," which is a feminine noun in Dutch, so that throughout her work God is spoken of using feminine pronouns and adjectives. Writing as a woman, Hadewijch effects a gender reversal comparable to that of her male contemporaries by speaking of herself as the humble lover-knight and God as the powerful, fickle, and demanding lady, using the conventions of courtly love poetry. As in the case of Bernard of Clairvaux, images of gender reversal illustrate the total "otherness" of the relationship being described—the Beguines will have experienced any previous heterosexual relationships as women, not as men. It also represents a loss of power and prestige similar to that implied by Bernard when speaking of the souls of the monks in his charge as women, since within the conventions of courtly love it was the woman who wielded all the power and the lover-knight who had none.

There has been some debate about exactly what aspect of the Divinity Hadewijch refers to as Minne. There are times when Minne is unambiguously God the Son, others when the word refers to God the Father, still others when it is the unity of the Trinity. Furthermore, as the word is rarely capitalised in the manuscripts, it can be hard to distinguish grammatically between the noun, the proper noun, and the verb. The opportunities for creative ambiguity are legion and Hadewijch exploits them to the full. Hadewijch rarely uses a noun to refer to herself or her fellow Beguines, but when she does she chooses the noun sen, a masculine noun referring to reason, understanding, and the rational that recalls Bonaventure's definition of the bride of Christ as the illuminated mind. However, it is noteworthy that by her choice Hadewijch is also claiming for herself and other women an equal part in that which distinguishes humankind—namely, the ability to reason.

When reading medieval texts it is important to remember that in the Middle Ages gender was viewed as far more fluid than it is now. In pre-Aristotelian theology, male and female were understood to be at opposite ends of the same continuum, more united in their creature-hood before God than they are separated by their differences. Hadewijch moves seamlessly from speaking of God as the demanding lady, Minne, to referring to God as an opposing knight who must be bettered in a fight. Similarly, speaking of the woes of the lover-knight, she breaks off to bewail her own fate and speaks of herself as a “poor woman.” She was clearly aware of the paradox inherent in the use of such imagery and she invokes the contrasts quite deliberately in her poems. By her choice of the word Minne to refer to God, her use of imagery of gender reversal, and her exploitation of the ambiguities and paradoxes inherent within it, Hadewijch is able to say things about her experience of God which might otherwise not have been acceptable.

SASKIA MURK-JANSEN

References and Further Reading

- Hadewijch: The Complete Works*, translated by Columba Hart. Classics of Western Spirituality. London: SPCK, 1980.
- McGinn, Bernard, ed. Eckhart and the Beguine Mystics. New York: Continuum, 1995.
- . The Flowering of Mysticism: Men and Women in the New Mysticism—1200–1350, vol. 3 of The Presence of God: A History of Western Christian Mysticism. New York: Crossroads, 1998.
- Murk-Jansen, Saskia. “The Use of Gender and Gender-Related Imagery in Hadewijch.” In Gender and Text in the Later Middle Ages, edited by Jane Chance. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 1996, pp. 52–68.

- . Brides in the Desert: The Spirituality of the Beguines. London: Darton Longman and Todd, 1998.
- Newman, Barbara. From Virile Woman to WomanChrist: Studies in Medieval Religion and Literature. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1995.

See also Beguines; Courtly Love; Flanders; Gender Ideologies; Minnesang; Mysticism and Mystics; Theology

HAGIOGRAPHY

Hagiography, from the Greek hagio (holy) and graph (writing), means the writing of the lives or legends of saints or holy persons. It has also come to mean the studying of saints. As rhetorical constructions, works of propaganda, saints' Lives or vitae and the variety of other writings pertaining to saints, were a combination of historical fact, biographical information, and fiction. Their purpose was to commemorate or glorify the holy person's virtuous life, death, and production of posthumous miracles. Over approximately the past thirty years, hagiography has witnessed a veritable explosion of scholarly and popular interest. During this same period women's history, including the history of women and religion, has developed and flourished as a major field of inquiry. Thus the convergence of these two exciting and highly productive areas has resulted in the proliferation of studies focusing on women saints—mulieres sanctae—especially in the medieval world.

In general, prior to the 1970s, scholars had a rather narrow view of history. Their work focused mainly on political or diplomatic history and the creation of events. They were concerned with ascertainable “facts” and “authenticity.” Many of these early historians were hypercritical in regard to the vitae of saints: they were highly suspicious of saints' Lives as historical sources. They often dismissed these dossiers of the holy dead as worthless, unreliable, embarrassing works of “pious fiction.” Saints' Lives were seen as essentially stereotypic, clichés, entirely “devoid of historical value,” as well as tedious and boring.

However, with the growing interest in social history, women's history, and the history of mentalities, the vitae of saints have been rediscovered and have come to be appreciated as amazingly rich, untapped historical sources; a gold mine for historians. This is particularly true in regard to the study of women and the medieval church and society since this genre is very much concerned with women and has a great deal to say about their saintly and/or “deviant” behavior. Saints' Lives and miracles also contain a wealth of interesting incidental or “unintentional” information about many aspects of everyday life both within the cloister and the outside world that is not available in any other sources of the period.

Male Predominance

The impressive numbers of vitae alone, the thousands of records of female and male saints for this period, allow scholars to study women saints and their roles in the church and society in comparison to those of their male contemporaries across the centuries. Through the collection of rough statistical data, the Lives allow scholars to trace shifts in the typology of sanctity, sex ratios of saints, social and economic status, visibility/charismatic authority, geographic disparities, demographic information, etc. Over the past several decades a number of vast statistical analyses have appeared that have attempted to quantify the saints of the Middle Ages. See for example the works by Sorokin (1950), Deloos (1969), Schulenburg (1978 and 1998), Goodich (1982), and Weinstein and Bell (1982). While the church professed a policy of spiritual egalitarianism in the heavenly kingdom, the statistics of the population of holy men and women reflect a definite gender-based disparity in numbers. Thus, in reality, it was much more difficult for women than for men to enter the ranks of the celestial hierarchy. While certain periods and places seem to have been more conducive to the making of women saints, nevertheless, male saints outnumbered female saints for the years c. 500–1500 by roughly six to one; women made up only approximately seventeen percent of the saints.

In general, saints were social constructs: they were “made,” packaged, promoted, or advertised to the faithful. And although their promoters frequently focused on the otherworldly and intercessory aspects of their invisible patrons, sainthood was, in fact, a very “this worldly” business. Membership in the heavenly kingdom reflected in many ways the hierarchy, power, wealth, and status of medieval society. Reputations for sanctity were negotiated and developed. As Pierre Deloos emphasized in his studies of sainthood, one is only a saint “for others” as well as “by others.” That is, the saintly reputation, situated in the collective memory of the community and recognized by one’s peers, is of primary importance. And it is only through a pressure group that formulates a public cult and secures official approval that one becomes recognized as a saint. Therefore, one needed a public role, a certain visibility, as well as the presence of others as witnesses and supporters, an audience to provide evidence of one’s extraordinary acts and miracles to establish and support a saint’s cult. Although the first papal canonization took place in 993, for much of the Middle Ages those who won recognition of sainthood were the products of local cults; they were popular saints rather than candidates formally canonized by the papacy. Thus for women to become members of the holy elite, or the celestial gynaecium, they required an environment that encouraged, recognized, and valued their participation in the church and society; they needed a certain power, prominence, visibility, a charismatic authority, which would call attention to their extraordinary virtues and saintly lives. They also needed hagiographers to formally record and preserve these memories.

The Composition of Lives

Although a few of the vitae were written by women, the majority of saints’ Lives were composed by male clerics. They were written mainly in Latin and the vernacular languages. Some of the Lives were recorded by contemporaries who had first-hand knowledge of the holy person; others, however, were far removed from the historical saint, as they were written many centuries after the saint’s death. They, therefore, based their sacred biographies on tradition, folklore, or legend; stereotypical events attributed to other saints; and biblical stories, etc. The Lives also reflected the hagiographer’s own concerns and ideals and, in some cases, they tell us more about the author, his agenda and period, than about the female saint. The writing or revisions of saints’ Lives and miracle collections were also often part of a campaign to promote the saint’s cult. They were written in conjunction with the transfer or (translation) of the saint or relics to a new tomb or reliquary, or the building of a new church to accommodate pilgrims who came to the cult site in expectant hope of miraculous cures.

The audience for the Lives and miracle collections included both sexes: churchmen and religious females, especially members of communities who served as guardians of the saint’s tomb/cult; laity who lived in the vicinity of the saint’s church; and pilgrims who visited the shrine. The Lives were to serve as sources of edification for the faithful or models of proper behavior. They provided inspiration as well as exempla that were to be admired and, in some cases (i.e., if not too extreme) imitated. Through these means the Church hoped to inspire a certain modification of behavior, a religious conformity among the faithful, and to specifically mold or reinforce its concepts of ideal female behavior. However, unable to control the message, the vitae provided women with multivalent readings. They therefore used hagiography for their own purposes. Women learned what they wanted or needed to learn from the vitae and frequently took some liberties in creatively adapting these behavioral models to their own specific situations and needs.

The Early Church

Across the centuries there were a variety of types of saints as well as paths that led to recognition of sainthood. Martyrdom was the most highly valued state with the majority of male and female saints of late antiquity or the early Christian period recruited from this category. As witnesses or martyrs of Christ and the new faith, they actively courted death, and in their public acts of heroic defiance, suffering, and shedding of blood, brought about the conversion of many to Christianity. Although many women are found in the passions of the early martyrs, male martyrs were clearly favored. This preference is underscored in Eusebius's Ecclesiastical History (c. 313) in which only fifteen out of 120 martyrs, or 12.5 percent, were women. The image of the martyr was essentially male—he was seen as an athlete or warrior of Christ. Nevertheless, early Christian women saints were praised for denying or transcending the natural weakness of their sex; they became a femina virilis, or “female man of God,” and as such won the crown of martyrdom. The holy martyr Perpetua (third century) had her gender transformed in a dream and was thus empowered to face her tormenter in the arena. Dying in defense of one's virginity was another popular act attributed to many of the early female martyrs. Therefore while defending their virginal purity against forced marriages to pagan rulers or rape, a number of women martyrs faced gruesome tortures and heroic deaths. The need to maintain one's virginity at all costs also drove some of these women to various acts of self-destruction. For example, St. Domnina and her two daughters committed suicide by throwing themselves into a river in order to avoid being raped. (Many of the legends of the early Christian virgin martyrs were written centuries later and became especially popular in the central and late Middle Ages, including stories of Sts. Agnes, Cecilia, Catherine of Alexandria, Margaret of Antioch, and Eugenia.)

With the Edict of Milan (313) and the end of official persecution of the Christians and the reign of Emperor Theodosius (395) and recognition of Christianity as the official state religion, there appeared a second major category of saints, that of confessors. This group included members of the church hierarchy, namely bishops and priests, and ascetics. Many of the bishops of the early Church were automatically designated as saints. Women, however, were excluded from the clerical hierarchy; thus this major area of recruitment to sainthood was closed to them. A few women, who were mothers of these early bishops and holy men, were rewarded for their “golden wombs” and beneficial influence: they served as models of Christian motherhood, for example, St. Monica (d. 387), the mother of St. Augustine. St. Helena (d. c. 330) has often been credited with the conversion of her son, the Emperor Constantine, to Christianity, as well as remembered for her major role in the discovery of Christ's cross, early involvement in the cult of relics, and the building of numerous churches—including the Holy Sepulcher in Jerusalem. During this early period empresses and aristocratic women who controlled huge fortunes were rewarded with sainthood for their primary roles as supporters of holy men; generous patrons of the church; and as builders of churches, monasteries, hospitals, and charitable institutions, including Melania the Younger, Paula, and Olympias of Constantinople.

At the same time, many male and female saints of the fourth and fifth centuries were recognized for their rigorous ascetic lives. In attempting to escape from the fleshy temptations of the world, the desert fathers and mothers of Egypt, Syria, and Palestine became famous for their heroic behavior. Their ascetic lives included harsh bodily mortification, regimens of fasting, vigils, sleep deprivation, and the wearing of hair shirts, chains, and other instruments of penance. Sts. Marana and Cyriaca (fifth century) lived as anchorites in Syria and, for the sake of penance, wore chains for forty-two years as heavy as any human could bear. Some holy women lived heroically ascetic lives among the monks of the desert disguised as men with their sex only discovered on their death. Hearing of the amazing feats of these holy men and women, female pilgrims flocked to the deserts to visit them. St. Jerome wrote in regard to St. Paula's visit to the desert fathers, “Forgetful of her sex and of her weaknesses she even desired to make her abode, together with the young women who accompanied her, among these thousands of monks.” (A number of apocryphal female saints—holy harlots or repentant prostitutes—whose Lives would become especially popular in later centuries were also said to have lived at this time in the desert, such as Mary of Egypt, Pelagia, etc.)

Early Middle Ages

From the sixth to the twelfth century, with the conversion of the north of Europe and the establishment of monasticism, there were many new opportunities and roles for women that could lead to sainthood. For this period the majority of saints were recruited from cathedrals—archbishops, bishops, and priests; and from cloisters—abbots, monks, abbesses, and nuns. They were almost invariably drawn from royal or aristocratic families. Also a number of queens, kings, and members of the nobility were found among the ranks of the holy elite. For it was through the family that one often achieved sainthood during this period. Royal women, beginning with Clotilda, queen of the Franks and wife of Clovis (d. 544), followed by a series of queen-saints, for example, Clotsinda, Theodolinda, Bertha, Ethelberga, Ludmilla, Dubrawa, Olga, Anna, Sarloth, Gisela, and others, won recognition of sainthood for their primary roles as domestic proselytizers, or “royal conduits” in the Christianization of their countries. As supporters of the new faith, these women took the initiative in converting their husbands and children, along with their people to Christianity.

However, it is especially with the development of monasticism and its great popularity among royal and noble families that women were provided with a visibility that led to fama sanctitatis. As founding abbesses and generous patrons of the new foundations, these women played major public roles in the church and society. Theirs was a practical kind of sanctity: as administrators they were involved in missionary activities, recruitment, building campaigns, education, hospitality, charity, healing, collecting relics, politics, peacemaking efforts, church reform, etc. Virginity and chastity, living as brides of Christ, were also important in the promotion of these women saints. It is then within the monastery with its collective memory of the community that cults of saints were established and vitae were written. Radegund (d. 587) is one of the best known Frankish queen/saints from this early period due mainly to the two extant vitae by contemporaries Fortunatus and the nun Baudonivia (the earliest identified female hagiographer). Gertrude founder of Nivelles (d. 659) and the queen/saint Balthilda (d. 680) were recognized for their early patronage, charitable activities, and involvement in monasticism.

At this time Ireland was especially well known for its large number of holy men and women and it came to be called “the isle of the saints.” Despite the fact that there are some 119 women saints entered in the Irish Martyrology of Tallaght, the Lives of only four of these women are still extant. Brigid (d. 525), was the famous founding abbess of the double monastery of Cell Dara or Kildare (a mixed community for men and women) that contributed greatly to the spread of Christianity. The sources of the period note her public quasi-episcopal power as abbess as well as her alleged or “accidental” ordination as bishop.

During this period the culture of Anglo-Saxon England seems to have been especially conducive to the making of women saints. Between the years 650 and 750 roughly forty percent of the new saints recognized in Britain were women. Again royal and noble women founded and governed new monasteries and were subsequently recognized as saints. Their monasteries, many of which were double foundations, served as centers of conversion, parish churches, and burial sites for royal and noble families. They became major centers of education and intellectual activity. Abbesses attended councils and synods; their advice was sought by churchmen and princes alike. Included among these early abbess saints were: Ethelburga of Barking (d. 675), Etheldreda of Ely (d. 679), Hilda of Whitby (d. 680), Ebba of Coldingham (d. 683), Sexburga of Ely (d. c. 700), and Elflæda of Whitby (d. 714). During the Viking invasions, a number of abbesses and nuns of these monasteries became a new generation of virgin martyrs. The abbess/saint Ebba of Coldingham (d. 870) and her nuns were especially famous for adopting a strategy of virginal defense: disfiguring themselves (virginitas deformitate defensa) by cutting off their noses and lips to avoid being raped by the pagan invaders. By destroying their beauty they were able to successfully preserve their virginity and died as virgin martyrs at the hands of the Vikings.

It was then from these flourishing Anglo-Saxon monasteries that Willibrord and Boniface recruited missionaries to help in the conversion of Germany. This provided women with religious leanings with further opportunities for rewards of sainthood. Included among these women were St. Leoba (d. 782), a relative of Boniface, who established the important monastery of Bischofsheim, and St. Walburga (d. 779), sister of Sts. Winnibald and Willibald, who became abbess of the double monastery of Heidenheim.

The Central Middle Ages

However, in general, it was during the Carolingian period, followed by the Cluniac and Gregorian reforms, that there occurred a decline in the number and percentage of new women saints. Few new vitae focused on contemporary holy women. This period also witnessed an increasing emphasis on strict enclosure for women under monasticism that worked to limit their public roles and opportunities that could lead to promotion of sainthood. Moreover, while the Merovingian and Anglo-Saxon writers in general stressed the perfection of virginity over the state of marriage and motherhood, beginning with the Carolingian period in the ninth century, there occurred a new appreciation and praise for married women and motherhood. In Ottonian Saxony of the tenth century, royal/imperial women such as Matilda (d. 968) and Adelheid (d. 999) were singled out as saints. Matilda was the mother of five children and Adelheid, called the “mother of kingdoms,” was the mother of four. As strong supporters of the church, they used their influence and extensive wealth to endow monasteries for men and women and build churches. In this same tradition the queen/saint Margaret of Scotland (d. 1093) was the mother of eight children. She assumed a prominent role in the foundation of monasteries, churches, hostels for pilgrims, and was known for her piety and charity.

The queen was also renowned for her ecclesiastical embroideries.

Another path to sainthood for women of the central Middle Ages, which was closely associated with monasticism, was that of the ascetic hermit or recluse who chose to pursue a life of religious austerity in a cell or anchorhold often attached to a church or chapel. St. Wiborada (d. 926) lived her later years in a cell attached to her brother Hitto’s church of St. Magnus. She died a martyr at the hands of the Hungarian invaders after warning her brother and other churchmen to take refuge inside the walls of St. Gall.

Defying family pressures for marriage, Christina of Markyate (d. 1161) successfully maintained her celibacy and lived for over forty-five years as an anchoress. Her holy lifestyle at Markyate attracted a following of women with similar religious leanings: ultimately a house for nuns was established there. Like Christina of Markyate, the Blessed Jutta of Sponheim or Disibodenberg (d. 1136), acting against the wishes of her family in her refusal to marry, founded a women’s anchorhold attached to the male house of Disibodenberg. Here she followed a life of rigorous asceticism and was spiritual mother to the monks of Disibodenberg and the people of the area. She was also the magistra and foster mother of Hildegard of Bingen (d. 1179).

As a product of the eremitic and monastic life, the highly accomplished Hildegard of Bingen has become one of the best known women saints of the Middle Ages. However her visibility, her charismatic authority came essentially from her role as mystic, visionary, and prophet—as vessel or messenger of the divine light, as amplifier of the word of God, “a small sound of the trumpet.” Her contemporary, St. Elisabeth of Schönau (d. 1165) was also a Benedictine and mystic. Along with Hildegard, her prophecies argued for reform of the moral corruption of the Church and society. Illness, suffering, and martyrdom were also central to their spiritual lives and their visionary experiences. It is this tradition of mysticism, along with debilitating illness, that became especially important for the visibility and recognition of female sainthood in the late Middle Ages.

With the late Middle Ages one finds some continuity in the making of women saints. A few of the saints from this period remained in the earlier tradition of sanctity and came from royal families, such as Elisabeth of Hungary (d. 1231) and Margaret of Hungary (d. 1270). Like Radegund and others before them, they practiced lives of asceticism, and were especially invested in patronage and charitable works. They were also closely supervised or influenced by their mendicant confessors. It is also with the twelfth and thirteenth centuries that the veneration of the very special female saint, the Virgin Mary, along with the development of her cult and proliferation of her miracles, became a major force in the religiosity of Europe.

Late Middle Ages

It is, however, with the thirteenth through fifteenth centuries that major shifts occur in styles of feminine piety and spirituality. These changes are reflected in new patterns of sanctity and an increased number of women saints. While rough statistics for the twelfth century note that only approximately thirteen percent of the new saints were women, the percentage for the thirteenth century was roughly twenty percent, and that of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries was approximately twenty-five percent. In general, with the growing importance of towns and the middle class, the ranks of sainthood seemed to open up and allow perhaps a type of “democratization of sanctity.” Many of the women saints of this period were recruited from the new urban middle classes, rather than the nobility; many were also married with children, or married but living a celibate life. In response to an increasing materialism and urban wealth, lay groups practicing the vita apostolica became especially popular.

Women were thus attracted in great numbers to the new lay poverty groups—that of the Beguines, Poor Clares, and Dominicans. They were especially noted for their adoption of lives of voluntary poverty; charitable acts with the poor and sick of the cities, and work in hospitals; as well as studying and teaching. For some, their charismatic authority rested on their special visionary powers/gifts. Many followed extreme penitential practices, ascetic regimens of excessive fasting (in some cases leading to death), vigils, and intense Eucharistic devotion. These women were often closely supervised or controlled by their confessors—male clerics who also authenticated their lives and recorded their visions. These new saints were especially recruited from the most urbanized areas of Europe—the Low Countries and the north of Italy. Their number included among others: Marie of Oignies (d. 1213), Christina the Astonishing of St. Trond (d. 1224), Yvette of Huy (d. 1228), Juliana of Mont Cornillon (d. 1258), Clare of Assisi (d. 1253), Margaret of Cortona (d. 1297), Gertrude the Great (d. 1302), Angela of Foligno (d. 1309), St. Humility of Faenza (d. 1310), Catherine of Siena (d. 1380) (declared Doctor of the Church in 1970), Dorothea of Montau (d. 1394), Birgitta of Sweden (d. 1373), Julian of Norwich (d. 1416), and Caterina Vigri (d. 1463). Yvette of Huy, for example, was a widow, recluse, and mother of three who left her children behind to retire to a leper colony. Dorothea of Montau was the mother of nine children and a mystic who developed wounds similar to stigmata. Catherine of Siena and Birgitta of Sweden played active roles in public life including lecturing popes on their need to return to Rome during the Babylonian Captivity. In addition, Birgitta was the mother of eight children, undertook a number of pilgrimages, and was the founder of a new religious order for women. These saints have left an impressive number of mystical writings including, for example, Catherine of Siena's collection of 383 letters and her Dialogue; Dorothea of Montau's Book of Holy Feasts and The Seven Graces; St. Gertrude the Great's The Revelations of St. Gertrude; St. Birgitta's Revelations and Rule of the Holy Savior; the anchoress Julian of Norwich's Showings; and Caterina Vigri's The Seven Spiritual Weapons.

Clerical Suspicions

It is then through their visionary gifts, their mystical raptures, that these women were able to transcend the limitations of their gender, education, and social status and win the rewards of sainthood. However, these very same gifts that provided them with a public visibility also made them appear dangerous and won them the distrust and animosity of the Church and its theologians, especially when they threatened male authority. They questioned their orthodoxy—as to whether they were truly mouthpieces of God or handmaids of the devil. For some of these visionary women their mystical visions and prophecies, along with their self-confidence and audacity for public speaking and teaching in their own voice (instead of safely claiming that they were vessels of God), led them to accusations of heresy or witchcraft and ultimately to death at the stake. Here the line between sanctity and deviancy/heresy was in fact very fine. Such, for example, was the case of Marguerite Porete whose book The Mirror of Simple Souls was condemned and burned by the Inquisition, followed by the burning of the author as a heretic in Paris in 1310. Domina Prous Boneta, a Spiritual Franciscan, apocalyptic visionary and leader of a heretical lay group, was also burned at the stake in 1325 in Montpellier. In this tradition Joan of Arc was accused of heresy and burned alive at Rouen in 1431 for failing to renounce the voices of her “false and diabolical visions,” her special protector saints Michael, Margaret, and Catherine, and her insistence on wearing male clothing. (Although venerated as a popular virgin saint in the Middle Ages, only in 1920 was Joan of Arc officially canonized.) These public executions no doubt were meant to serve as frightening warnings, further deterrents, to other outspoken, audacious visionary women who dared to speak or prophesy in their own voice; who publicly chastised the church and its hierarchy for its spiritual and moral corruption; or refused to show the proper deference required of their sex and submit to the institutionalized church and its hierarchy.

The study of the making of saints provides a wonderful indirect index of attitudes toward women and their roles and opportunities in medieval society and the Church. The rather low percentage of women saints for the period reflects in part the misogynist culture of the time. Women were excluded from a number of the major paths or opportunities within the Church that led to sainthood, such as leadership roles within the ecclesiastical hierarchy. Also, the selection processes for recognizing popular saints, authenticating cults and miracles, and canonization were dominated/controlled by churchmen. Nevertheless, certain periods and regions were more favorable than others in the making of women saints. For example, the beginnings of movements, when the Church needed the assistance of women and before institutional structures had hardened, were especially promising for the promotion of women saints. Wealth, status, and patronage were important in providing women with a visibility that led to sanctity. The majority of female saints were recruited from monasticism, the anchoritic life, and lay movements of apostolic poverty. Throughout the period, with the identification of women with their bodies, virginity and celibacy were especially necessary virtues for female sainthood: they allowed women to transcend the limitations and temptations of their sex and gender.

Martyrdom and mysticism similarly offered important opportunities to subvert misogynist ideals and provided a public prominence and visibility for fama sanctitatis.

JANE TIBBETTS SCHULENBURG

References and Further Reading

- Ashley, Kathleen, and Pamela Sheingorn, eds. Interpreting Cultural Symbols: Saint Anne in Late Medieval Society. Athens, Ga.: University of Georgia Press, 1990.
- . Writing Faith: Text, Sign, and History in the Miracles of Sainte Foy. Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1999.
- Aspegren, Kerstin. The Male Woman: A Feminine Ideal in the Early Church. Uppsala: Acta Universitatis Upsaliensis, 1990.
- Atkinson, Clarissa. The Oldest Vocation: Christian Motherhood in the Middle Ages. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1991.
- Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis*. 3 vols. Subsidia hagiographica, 6, 70. Brussels: Société des Bollandistes, 1898/1986.
- Bibliotheca Sanctorum*. 13 vols. Rome: Istituto Giovanni XXIII della Pontificia Università lateranense, 1961–1969.
- Bitel, Lisa. Land of Women: Tales of Sex and Gender from Early Ireland. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1996.
- . “St. Brigit of Ireland: From Virgin Saint to Fertility Goddess.” Paper presented at Fordham University, February, 2001. Available online—Matrix, Commentaria.
- Bokenham, Osbern. A Legend of Holy Women: Osbern Bokenham, Legends of Holy Women, translated by Sheila Delany. Notre Dame, Ind.: University of Notre Dame Press, 1992.
- Bornstein, Daniel and Roberto Rusconi, eds. Women and Religion in Medieval and Renaissance Italy, translated by Margery J. Schneider. Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1996.
- Brown, Peter. The Cult of the Saints: Its Rise and Function in Latin Christianity. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1981.
- . Society and the Holy in Late Antiquity. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1982.
- . The Body and Society: Men, Women, and Sexual Renunciation. New York, 1988: Columbia University Press.
- Butler, Alan. Butler's Lives of the Saints, edited by Herbert Thurston and Donald Attwater, 4 vols. New York: Westminster, Md.: Christian Classics, 1956.
- Bynum, Caroline Walker. Holy Feast and Holy Fast: The Religious Significance of Food to Medieval Women. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1987.
- Cazelles, Brigitte, trans. The Lady as Saint: A Collection of French Hagiographic Romances of the Thirteenth Century. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1991.
- Clark, Gilian. Women in Late Antiquity: Pagan and Christian Lifestyles. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1993.
- . “This Female Man of God”: Women and Spiritual Power in the Patristic Age, A.D. 350–450. New York: Routledge, 1995.
- Corbet, Patrick. Les saints ottoniens. Sainteté dynastique, sainteté royale et sainteté féminine autour de l'an Mil. Sigmaringen: Thorbecke, 1986.
- Delooz, Pierre. Sociologie et canonisations. Collection scientifique de la faculté de droit de l'Université de Liège, n. 30. Liège and The Hague: Liège: Faculté de droit, 1969.
- Donovan, Leslie A., trans. Women Saints' Lives in Old English Prose. Woodbridge, Suffolk: D. S. Brewer, 1999.
- Dor, Juliette, Lesley Johnson, and Jocelyn Wogan-Browne, eds. New Trends in Feminine Spirituality: The Holy Women of Liège and Their Impact. Medieval Women: Texts and Contexts 2. Turnhout: Brepolis, 1999.
- Dunbar, Agnes B. C. A Dictionary of Sainly Women. 2 vols. London: Bell, 1904–1905.
- Elkins, Sharon. Holy Women of Twelfth-Century England. Chapel Hill, N.C. and London: University of North Carolina Press, 1988.
- Elliot, Dyan. Spiritual Marriage: Sexual Abstinence in Medieval Wedlock. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1993.
- Elm, Susanna. Virgins of God: The Making of Asceticism in Late Antiquity. Oxford Classical Monographs. Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1994.
- Farmer, David Hugh, ed. The Oxford Dictionary of Saints. Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1982.
- Folz, Robert. Les saintes reines du moyen âge en occident (VIe–XIIIe siècles). Subsidia hagiographica 76, Brussels: Société des Bollandistes, 1992.
- Foot, Sarah. Veiled Women. 2 vols. Burlington, Vt.: Ashgate, 2000.
- Fouracre, Paul and Richard A. Gerberding, eds. and trans. Late Merovingian France: History and Hagiography 640–720. Manchester Medieval Sources. Manchester and New York: Manchester University Press, 1996.
- Gilsdorf, Sean, trans. Queenship and Sanctity: The Lives of Mathilda and the Epitaph of Adelheid. Washington D.C.: Catholic University of America Press, 2004.
- Goodich, Michael. “The Contours of Female Piety in Later Medieval Hagiography.” Church History 50 (1981): 20–32.
- . Vita Perfecta: The Ideal of Sainthood in the Thirteenth Century. Monographien zur Geschichte des Mittelalters 25. Stuttgart: Hiersemann, 1982.
- Harrington, Christina. Women in the Celtic Church: Ireland c. 450–1150. Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 2002.
- Head, Thomas, ed. Medieval Hagiography: An Anthology. New York and London: Garland, 2000.
- Hollis, Stephanie. Anglo-Saxon Women and the Church: Sharing a Common Fate. Anglo-Saxon – Rochester, N.Y.: Boydell Press, 1992.
- . et al., eds. and trans. Writing the Wilton Women: Goscelin's Legend of Edith and Liber Confortatorius. Medieval Women: Texts and Contexts, 9. Turnhout: Brepolis, 2004.
- Horner, Shari. The Discourse of Enclosure: Representing Women in Old English Literature. Albany, N.Y.: State University of New York Press, 2001.
- Jenkins, Jacqueline, and Katherine Lewis, eds. St. Katherine of Alexandria: Texts and Contexts in Western Medieval Europe. Turnhout: Brepolis, 2003.
- Kieckhefer, Richard. Unquiet Souls: Fourteenth-Century Saints and Their Religious Milieu. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1984.
- Kitchen, John. Saints' Lives and the Rhetoric of Gender: Male and Female in Merovingian Hagiography. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Klaniczay, Gábor. Holy Rulers and Blessed Princesses: Dynastic Cults in Medieval Central Europe, translated by

- Éva Pálmai. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002.
- Lees, Clare A. and Gillian R. Overing. Double Agents: Women and Clerical Culture in Anglo-Saxon England. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001.
- Matrologia Latina*, Peregrina Translations Series. Toronto: Peregrine Press.
- Matter, E. Ann and John Coakley, eds. Creative Women in Medieval and Early Modern Italy: A Religious and Artistic Renaissance. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1994.
- McNamara, Jo Ann. Sisters in Arms: Catholic Nuns through Two Millennia. Cambridge, Mass.: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1996.
- McNamara, Jo Ann, and John E. Halborg, with E. Gordon Whatley, eds. and trans. Sainted Women of the Dark Ages. Durham, N.C., and London: Duke University Press, 1992.
- Mooney, Catherine, ed. Gendered Voices: Medieval Saints and Their Interpreters. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999.
- Mulder-Bakker, Anneke B. ed. Sanctity and Motherhood: Essays on Holy Mothers in the Middle Ages. New York and London: Garland, 1995.
- , ed. Invention of Saintliness. London and New York: Routledge, 2002.
- . Lives of the Anchoresses: The Rise of the Urban Recluse in Medieval Europe, translated by Myra Heerspink Scholz. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2005.
- Musurillo, Herbert, trans. The Acts of the Christian Martyrs. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1972.
- Newman, Barbara. From Virile Woman to WomanChrist: Studies in Medieval Religion and Literature. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1995.
- , ed. Voice of the Living Light: Hildegard of Bingen and Her World. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998.
- Petersen, Joan, ed. and trans. Handmaids of the Lord: Contemporary Descriptions of Feminine Asceticism in the First Six Christian Centuries. Cistercian Studies Series, 143. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Cistercian Publications, 1996.
- Petroff, Elizabeth Alvilda, ed. Consolation of the Blessed. New York: Alta Gaia Society, 1979.
- , ed. Medieval Women's Visionary Literature. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- . Body and Soul: Essays on Medieval Women and Mysticism. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1994.
- Reames, Sherry, with Martha G. Blalock and Wendy R. Larson, trans. Middle English Legends of Women Saints. The Consortium for the Teaching of the Middle Ages. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Medieval Institute Publications, 2003. www.lib.rechester.edu/camelot/teams/reames.htm (2 May 2006).
- Riches, Samantha J. E., and Sarah Salih, eds. Gender and Holiness: Men, Women, and Saints in Late Medieval Europe. New York: Routledge, 2002.
- Ridyard, Susan. Royal Saints of Anglo-Saxon England. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988.
- Roisin, Simone. L'Hagiographie Cistercienne dans le diocèse de Liège au XIIIe siècle. Louvain: Bibliothèque de l'Université, 1947.
- Salih, Sarah. Versions of Virginity in Late Medieval England. Cambridge: Woodbridge, Suffolk: D. S. Brewer, 2001.
- Salisbury, Joyce E. Church Fathers, Independent Virgins. New York: Verso, 1991.
- . Perpetua's Passion: The Death and Memory of a Young Roman Woman. New York and London: Routledge, 1997.
- Schulenburg, Jane Tibbetts. "Sexism and the Celestial Gynaeceum: from 500–1200." Journal of Medieval History 4 (1978): 117–133.
- . Forgetful of Their Sex: Female Sanctity and Society, ca. 500–1100. Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1998.
- Smith, Julia M. H. "The Problem of Female Sanctity in Carolingian Europe, c. 780–920." Past and Present, 146 (1995): 3–37.
- Sorokin, Pitrim. Altruistic Love: A Study of American 'Good Neighbors' and Christian Saints. Boston: Beacon Press, 1950.
- Stouck, Mary-Ann, ed. Medieval Saints: A Reader. Peterborough, Ontario: Broadview Press, 1999.
- Szarmach, Paul E. ed. Holy Men and Holy Women: Old English Prose Saints' Lives and Their Contexts. Albany, N.Y.: State University of New York Press, 1996.
- Talbot, Alice-Mary. Holy Women of Byzantium: Ten Saints' Lives in English Translation. Washington, D.C.: Dumbarton Oaks Research Library and Collection, 1996. Available online.
- Talbot, C. H., ed. and trans. The Anglo-Saxon Missionaries in Germany. New York: Sheed and Ward, 1954.
- Van Houts, Elisabeth. Memory and Gender in Medieval Europe 900–1200. Toronto and Buffalo: University of Toronto Press, 1999.
- Vauchez, André. The Laity in the Middle Ages: Religious Beliefs and Devotional Practices. trans. Margery Schneider. French original, 1987, South Bend, Ind.: University of Notre Dame Press, 1993.
- . Sainthood in the Later Middle Ages, translated by Jean Birrell. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997.
- Vies des saints et des bienheureux. Les RR. PP. Bénédictins de Paris*, edited by Jules Baudot, Paul Antin and Jacques Dubois. 13 vols. Paris: Librairie Letouzey et Ané, 1935–1959.
- de Voragine, Jacobus. The Golden Legend: Readings on the Saints. translated by William Granger Ryan. 2 vols. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1993.
- Ward, Benedicta. Harlots of the Desert: A Study of Repentance in Early Monastic Sources. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Cistercian Publications, 1987.
- Weinstein, Donald and Rudolf M. Bell. Saints and Society: The Two Worlds of Western Christendom, 1000–1700. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1982.
- Winstead, Karen A., ed. and trans. Chaste Passions: Medieval English Virgin Martyr Legends. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2000.
- Wogan-Browne, Jocelyn. Saints' Lives and Women's Literary Culture: Virginity and Its Authorizations. Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Wogan-Browne, Jocelyn, and Gyn S. Burgess, trans. Virgin Lives and Holy Deaths: Two Exemplary Biographies for Anglo-Norman Women. London: Dent, 1996.

See also Adelheid; Aethelthryth of Ely; Anchoresses; Angela of Foligno; Asceticism; Beguines; Birgitta of Sweden; Brigit; Canonization of Saints; Caterina Vigri; Catherine of Siena; Christina of Markyate; Christina

the Astonishing; Church; Clare of Assisi; Clotilda; Conversion, Religious; Dorothea of Montau; Elisabeth of Hungary; Elisabeth of Schönau; Gertrude of Nivelles; Gertrude the Great; Hagiography, Iconographic Aspects of; Helena; Heretics and Heresy; Hild of Whitby; Hildegard of Bingen; Humility of Faenza; Joan of Arc; Julian of Norwich; Leoba; Margaret of Cortona; Margaret of Scotland; Marguerite Porete; Marie of Oignies; Miracles and Miracle Collections; Misogyny; Monasticism and Nuns; Olga; Pilgrims and Pilgrimage; Poor Clares Order; Poverty, Religious; Radegund; Relics and Reliquaries; Virgin Martyrs; Virginity; Virile Women; Yvette of Huy

HAGIOGRAPHY, ICONOGRAPHIC ASPECTS OF

The iconography of saints incorporates the church's classification of the person and the social customs and attitudes of the time in which the imagery was fashioned. Medieval hagiographers drew on Martyrologies and local legends, as well as Acts of Canonization, in the later Middle Ages to compose biographies—at times wholly apocryphal—that detailed the noble births, charitable and miraculous deeds, stoic resistance under torture, and brutal deaths of saints. They devised attributes (plants, animals, and objects) to identify individuals. By the end of the thirteenth century, popular anthologies like the Golden Legend furnished colorful vitae of the saints that served as sources of inspiration for preachers and artists alike. These texts largely categorized women as martyrs and virgins, in contrast to a range of options for men, who could be martyrs, patriarchs, apostles, confessors, hermits, and monastics, among others. Over time, the church expanded the dimensions of female sainthood, characterizing the saints in terms of the sexual, marital, and spiritual circumstances of medieval women. The virtue of chastity, deemed more precious than gold by theologians, became synonymous with female sanctity and affected the iconography of all holy women regardless of the era in which they lived or the actual events of their lives.

Virgin Martyrs

Medieval art glorifies the courage and chastity of the first female saints recognized by the church, the virgin martyrs of the Roman Empire. These aristocratic and beautiful young women remained true to Christian beliefs by refusing to marry pagans or to worship idols, for which they braved harsh persecution and painful death. Wearing gold crowns of virginity and carrying palms of martyrdom, Agatha holds a plate with her breasts, which had been severed by the emperor's men; Apollonia extends pincers; and Lucy grasps a dish containing a pair of eyes. Duccio conformed to tradition when he depicted Agnes with a lamb, a visual play on agnus and hence the sacrificed "Lamb of God," on the Maestà for Siena Cathedral (1308–1311), while Andrea Orcagna painted Catherine of Alexandria next to a wheel with broken spokes on the Strozzi Altarpiece (Florence, S. Maria Novella, c. 1354–1356). Cecilia's crown of roses and lilies, blossoms associated with the Virgin Mary, accentuates her chastity, for she had convinced her bridegroom to abstain from marital sex as portrayed on an early fourteenth-century Florentine panel (Florence, Galleria degli Uffizi). Grasping an arrow, Ursula shelters a crowd of kneeling maidens under her outstretched cloak to commemorate the martyrdom that she and the 11,000 virgins who accompanied her on a pilgrimage suffered at the hands of the Huns, which is vividly described in the Golden Legend and on an exquisite reliquary painted by Hans Memling (Bruges, Hans Memling Museum, 1489).

Matrons and Widows

The medieval iconography of wives and widows highlights their conversions of husbands and children, their constancy to marital vows, and their great charity and mercy. Monica (c. 330–387), a widow clad in black with a book, effected the conversion of her son Augustine, while Helena (c. 255–330), whose cross refers to the True Cross she discovered in Jerusalem, strove to convert her son, the Emperor Constantine. When falsely accused of adultery, Queen Cunegunda of Germany (d. 1033) proved her innocence in a trial by fire—walking across the scalding ploughshares which became her attribute. The flowers enfolded in the Franciscan habit of the crowned Elisabeth of Hungary (d. 1231) exemplify her munificent charity on a fourteenth-century panel by Lippo Memmi (Florence, Loeser Collection): the bread she intended for the poor miraculously turned into flowers when she was confronted by her husband, who had proscribed her almsgiving.

Nuns and Abbesses

Clothed in the robes of their monastic orders, holy nuns and abbesses customarily clasp a lily and a crucifix to manifest their profession as consecrated virgins and brides of Christ. Auxiliary attributes refer to the miracles, visions, and prophecies with which saintly nuns were blessed. Scholastica (c. 480–543), the legendary founder of the Benedictine nuns, carries the lily and crucifix, and a dove flies from her mouth (or over her head) in reference to her brother Saint Benedict's vision of the soul departing her dead body as a bird. Clare of Assisi (c. 1194–1253), the founder of the Franciscan nuns, modestly displays a white lily in Simone Martini's fresco in the Chapel of St. Martin (San Francesco, Assisi, 1328), though her image may be enhanced by a cross signaling her devotion to Christ's Passion or pyx recalling her expulsion of Saracen invaders with the Eucharist. The iconography of well-educated, mystical nuns such as Hildegard of Bingen (1098–1179) and Gertrude the Great (d. 1302) attests their visions and authorship. For instance, the bright flames that dance above Hildegard in her Scivias (c. 1142–1152) verify the divine origins of her writings. Famed for a vision of the Nativity recorded in her Revelations, Birgitta of Sweden (d. 1373) brandishes a pastoral staff as the founder of the Birgittine nuns. Such attributes of leadership were rare for female monastics; more often, founder-abbesses are paired with their masculine counterparts—Scholastica with Benedict and Clare with Francis of Assisi—to convey the active and contemplative forms of monasticism.

Penitents, Ascetics, and Mystics

Just as the Virgin Mary was the paradigm of chastity, Mary Magdalen set the standard for female penitents, ascetics, and mystics. With the exception of her chief attribute, the oil jar, signifying her anointment of Christ's feet at her conversion, the Magdalen's rich iconography varies depending on which aspect of her legend is emphasized. Simone Martini painted the repentant prostitute veiled in striking red on the Pisa Polyptych in the fourteenth-century (Pisa, Museo di San Matteo), while Hugo van der Goes depicts her fashionably attired on the Portinari Altarpiece in the fifteenth (Florence, Galleria degli Uffizi). However, Donatello followed the lead of an anonymous thirteenth-century painter (Magdalen Dossal, Florence, Galleria dell' Accademia), portraying the ascetic recluse with long, tangled hair that conceals her wasted body (Florence, Museo Opera dell' Duomo, c. 1430s–1450s). Attributes and dress denote the transformation from sinfulness to grace of subsequent penitents and mystics. Mary of Egypt, a fifth-century reformed prostitute and hermit, whose matted hair also covers her nakedness, carries the three loaves of bread that she took to the desert. After the murder of her lover, Margaret of Cortona (d. 1297) embarked on a life of repentance, living in a secluded cell, ministering to the poor, and finding social acceptance as a Franciscan tertiary. The checkered pattern of her gown in the fourteenth-century decoration of her shrine represents the asceticism and self-mortification of her atonement.

The iconographies invented for early medieval saints endured, serving as prototypes for those canonized later. When Catherine of Siena (1347–1380), renowned as an ascetic, mystic, author, and reformer, was proclaimed a virgin saint in 1461, artists fashioned her imagery accordingly. They borrowed from the existing iconography for nuns (she was a Dominican tertiary) and from the legend of her name saint, Catherine of Alexandria. Vecchietta's impressive altarpiece in the Cathedral of Pienza and his fresco in the Palazzo Pubblico of Siena (both date 1461–1462) show her attired in the distinctive white and black Dominican habit and carrying large white lilies. Even before Catherine's canonization process concluded, visual narratives cast her as a second Catherine of Alexandria. On Giovanni di Paolo's altarpiece for S. Maria della Scala, Siena, of 1447–1449 (now dismantled) Catherine experiences mystical marriage with Christ like the early Christian virgin martyr (New York, Private Collection); she dictates her Dialogues and corresponds with popes (Detroit, Art Institute), as her predecessor had disputed with philosophers; and though not a martyr, she received the stigmata (New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art).

Despite strict adherence to tradition, the iconography of saints evolved over the centuries to reflect changes or additions to cults. Female saints with strong local followings became patrons of cities and towns, others protected guilds and professions, and universally esteemed saints personified virtues or spirituality. For example, Catherine of Siena sometimes carries a model of her native town, Cecilia displays a small organ as the patron of musicians, and the sisters Mary of Bethany and Martha evoke the active and contemplative lives. Even so, chastity, as the fundamental virtue of female sainthood, always features in the women's iconography.

JERYLDENE M. WOOD

References and Further Reading

- Christiansen, Keith, Laurence B. Kanter, and Carl Brandon Strehlke. Painting in Renaissance Siena, 1420–1500. New York: Metropolitan Museum of Art, 1988.
- Farmer, David Hugh. The Oxford Dictionary of Saints. Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1982.

- Frugoni, Chiara, "The Imagined Woman," trans. C. Botsford in A History of Women: Silences of the Middle Ages. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1992, pp. 336–422.
- Hall, James. Dictionary of Signs and Symbols in Art. New York: Icon Editions, 1974.
- Haskins, Susan. Mary Magdalene, Myth and Metaphor. London and New York: Harcourt Brace & Company, 1993.
- Kaftal, George. Iconography of Saints in Tuscan Painting. Florence: Sansoni, 1952.
- Mâle, Emile. Religious Art in France of the Late Middle Ages: A Study of Medieval Iconography and its Sources. translated by M. Mathews. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1986.
- Objects, Images, and the Word: Art in the Service of the Liturgy*, edited by Colum Hourihane. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 2003.
- Vauchez, André. Sainthood in the Later Middle Ages, translated by J. Birrell. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997.
- Voragine, Jacopo de. The Golden Legend: Readings on the Saints. translated by William Granger Ryan. 2 vols. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1993.
- Weinstein, Donald, and Bell, Rudolph M. Saints & Society: The Two Worlds of Western Christendom, 1000–1700. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1982.
- Wood, Jeryldene M. "Perceptions of Holiness in Thirteenth-Century Italian Painting: Clare of Assisi," Art History 14 (1991): 301–328.

See also Abbesses; Birgitta of Sweden; Catherine of Alexandria; Catherine of Siena; Clare of Assisi; Elisabeth of Hungary; Gertrude the Great; Hagiography; Helena; Hildegard of Bingen; Jacobus de Voragine's Golden Legend; Margaret of Cortona; Mary Magdalen; Mary the Egyptian; Monasticism and Nuns; Mysticism and Mystics; Tertiaries; Ursula and Her Companions; Virgin Martyrs

HEIRESSSES

Medieval custom had a strong preference for male heirs, but not an exclusive one. In the early Middle Ages all siblings were regarded as each other's equals by nature and all of them, female as well as male, had a right to share in the family inheritance. Custom held property to be ultimately vested in the lineage, and the strong inclination to divide a deceased parent's property among all his or her children persisted until the twelfth century in areas influenced by Germanic tradition. A daughter's share of the parental inheritance often took the form of her dowry, but if the male line died out a family was still represented by its female members, so daughters could become their families' heiresses. As long as the principle of dividing a family inheritance remained dominant, however, it offered a choice among members of a lineage, and this meant that women were only rarely substantial heiresses.

By the eleventh century primogeniture was on the rise, and with it a clear order of priority among heirs.

This was especially true for kingdoms, which were increasingly seen as indivisible. Once females of a nearer degree of relationship were preferred to males of a further degree, more major heiresses appeared. Countess Matilda of Tuscany (1046–1115) became the unquestioned heiress of extensive territories in northern Italy, even though she was still a child at the time of her father's death. Similarly, Eleanor of Aquitaine (c. 1122–1204) succeeded to that duchy without being challenged by her male relatives, and Queen Melisende succeeded her father in the Kingdom of Jerusalem in 1131. Not all heiresses succeeded smoothly: in 1135, Henry I of England's daughter Matilda was challenged by her cousin Stephen of Blois on the grounds of gender, and ultimately lost control of the kingdom to him. Even when an heiress was accepted, it was still expected that her husband would share her power. Matilda of Tuscany was unusual in making policy without reference to her husband, but Eleanor of Aquitaine's first and second husbands both intervened in the duchy, while Melisende shared the throne with her husband; when he died her son replaced him as co-ruler, though Melisende insisted on being crowned again along with her son to emphasize her own hereditary right.

By the thirteenth century in England and France it was established for all landholders that when the eldest surviving heir was male he would inherit the entire estate, but if only daughters were left the heritage would be divided among them. By the fourteenth century women could be excluded from heritages that were specifically entailed in the male line, most notably the Crown of France, but this remained the less common option. Heiresses were objects of competition from several sides. Their families expected to arrange their marriages, and often did so very early: in the 1460s, Sir William Plumpton betrothed the two granddaughters who were his heiresses before they reached the age of six. If one of the king's tenants-in-chief died leaving an unbetrothed heiress, however, the king had the right to her wardship and marriage, and kings often used the marriages of heiresses to reward their followers at no cost to themselves. Edward III of England gave the heiress Juliana Leyburn to William Clinton and Sibyl Patshull to Roger Beauchamp, founding the fortunes of both their families and putting men loyal to the king in prominent positions in gentry society. In the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries the greatest heiresses were married to royal cadets to provide for them in the same way: four of the five sons of Edward III were endowed through marriages to peerage heiresses, while in Spain Ferdinand of Antequera was able to launch his claim to the throne of Aragon based on the vast estates of his wife Leonor de Albuquerque.

Occasionally an ambitious man would try to make his fortune by abducting and marrying an heiress, as Theobald de Verdon did with Elizabeth de Burgh in 1316, or by persuading a young girl to make binding vows, as Thomas Holland did in the case of Joan of Kent in 1340. For the most part, however, the fathers and guardians of heiresses had their pick of suitors, from Duke Charles of Burgundy, who betrothed his daughter seven times, to serfs who married their daughters to free men seeking land.

An inheritance could give a woman enhanced status within a marriage, as in the case of Sybille Baille (c. 1300). She inherited the house in Ax-les-Thermes, which became her husband's home as well, and their children were known by her surname. Nonetheless, when an heiress married, control of her property rested with her husband, and he would do homage on her behalf. However, he could not alienate it without her assent, and if she died without children her property passed to her heirs, not to her husband. If she were widowed, control of the property returned to her. A great heiress like Elizabeth de Burgh (d. 1360) could live a long and independent life without remarriage, but widowhood could also make an heiress's position vulnerable. This was particularly true if she had no children, and if her inheritance was large enough to attract the attention of powerful men: in 1489, Venice sent its fleet to pressure the widowed Caterina Cornaro into making her kingdom of Cyprus over to the Republic, while at the same time in England the Crown was willing to collaborate with favored magnates in stripping a widowed heiress like Maud lady Willoughby of the bulk of her estates. For most heiresses, widowed or not, the central aim of their property was to promote the success and standing of their family.

RHODA LANGE FRIEDRICHS

References and Further Reading

- Courtemanche, Andr ee. La richesse des femmes. Montreal: Bellarmin and Paris: Vrin, 1993.
- Given-Wilson, Chris. The English Nobility in the Late Middle Ages. London and New York: Routledge, 1996.
- Spring, Eileen. Law, Land and Family: Aristocratic Inheritance in England 1300–1800. Chapel Hill and London: University of North Carolina Press, 1993.
- Waugh, Scott L. "Women's Inheritance and the Growth of Bureaucratic Monarchy in Twelfth- and Thirteenth-Century England," Nottingham Medieval Studies 34 (1990): 71–92.

See also Cornaro, Caterina; Eleanor of Aquitaine; Inheritance; Landholding and Property Rights; Matilda of Tuscany; Matilda the Empress; Noble Women; Succession, Royal and Noble

HELENA

Helena (c. 248/249–328/329 CE) was the mother of Constantine the Great, the first Christian emperor. She acted politically in his stead on several occasions, thus demonstrating women's access to political power through the family. Helena is best known for an act that she probably never performed: finding the True Cross, the central symbol of Christianity. After becoming sole ruler of the Roman empire in 324, Constantine sent his aged mother on a mission to Palestine and his other newly claimed eastern provinces. Helena's stay in the Holy Land and her efforts to propagate Christianity in the East became the foundation for the legend that she had recovered the True Cross. By the late fourth/early fifth century, three versions of the legend had come into existence. The earliest and most elaborate English account of Helena's finding (Inventio) of the Holy Cross is Cynewulf's late eighth- or early ninth-century verse Elene, in which Helena is depicted as a triumphant warrior-queen who figures both the rightful authority of the Christian State and the triumph of Church over Synagogue.

Little is known about Helena's early life, and she most likely came from a family of low social status. Some time after 306, Constantine brought Helena into his court and honored her with the title Nobilissima Femina, "most noble woman." Numerous coins were struck in her name, and, in 324, after his defeat of Licinius, Constantine gave Helena the official title of Augusta, an act intended not only to increase Helena's prestige but also to mark her son's newfound power. Helena was viewed as a kind of founding mother of the Constantinian dynasty, and as a symbol of traditional Roman social codes, family continuity, and dynastic stability. She was also associated with the security of the Republic and was one of the most powerful figures at the imperial court. Eusebius believed that she had authority over the imperial treasury, while Paulinus of Nola and Sulpicius Severus claim that she served as Constantine's co-ruler.

Helena was one of the best known female figures in the medieval West. Celebrated twice a year at the annual Invention (May 3) and Exaltation of the Cross (September 14) festivals, she was lauded for her piety, church patronage, and above all, for her alleged recovery of the Cross. Helena offers an example of piety based on the exercise of secular power rather than on virginity or asceticism. She became representative of elite female piety and was often held out as an example of how secular women with access to great wealth might use their resources to further church interests. Because of her alleged success in converting the Jews, Helena was invoked by numerous churchmen, including Pope Gregory the Great and Gregory of Tours, who sought to convince queens of their duty to convert their husbands and peoples. She offers a powerful example for medieval women's later involvement in converting non-Christians and for the idea of queens as agents of Christian conversion. Some time in the early Middle Ages, a legend arose that Helena was of British origins, and her name was thus also invoked for secular purposes by such writers as William of Malmesbury and Geoffrey of Monmouth, seeking to further national pride by creating a link between England and imperial Rome.

Helena is considered a saint by the Eastern Orthodox and Roman Catholic churches. Her feast day in the eastern church is May 21, and in the western church, August 18.

STACY KLEIN

References and Further Reading

- Brubaker, Leslie. "Memories of Helena: Patterns in Imperial Female Matronage in the Fourth and Fifth Centuries." In Women, Men and Eunuchs: Gender in Byzantium, edited by Liz James. London: Routledge, 1997, pp. 52–75.
- Cynewulf. Cynewulf's "Elene," edited by P. O. E. Gradon. Rev. ed. London: University of Exeter Press, 1977.
- Drijvers, Jan Willem. Helena Augusta: The Mother of Constantine the Great and the Legend of Her Finding of the True Cross. Leiden: Brill, 1992.
- Harbus, Antonina. Helena of Britain in Medieval Legend. Woodbridge, Suffolk: D. S. Brewer, 2002.
- Holum, Kenneth G. Theodosian Empresses: Women and Imperial Dominion in Late Antiquity. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1982.
- Hunt, E. D. Holy Land Pilgrimage in the Later Roman Empire, AD 312–460. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1982.
- Inventio Sanctae Crucis*, edited and translated by Stephan Borgehammar. In How the Holy Cross Was Found: From Event to Medieval Legend, With an Appendix of Texts. Bibliotheca Theologiae Practicae, Kyrkovetenskapliga studier 47. Stockholm: Almqvist and Wiksell International, 1991, pp. 154–61, 201–302.
- Inventio Sanctae Crucis* (Rufinus of Aquileia's account and also one contained in a tenth-century Spanish legendary), edited and translated by E. Gordon Whatley, "Constantine the Great, the Empress Helena, and the Relics of the Holy Cross." In Medieval Hagiography: An Anthology, edited by Thomas Head. New York: Garland, 2000, pp. 77–95.
- Klein, Stacy S. "Reading Queenship in Cynewulf's Elene." Journal of Medieval and Early Modern Studies 33 (2003): 47–89.
- . "Centralizing Feminism in Anglo-Saxon Literary Studies: Elene, Motherhood, and History." In Readings in Medieval Texts: Interpreting Old and Middle English Literature, edited by David Johnson and Elaine Treharne. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2005, pp. 149–165.
- The Old English Finding of the True Cross*, edited and translated by Mary-Catherine Bodden. Cambridge: D. S. Brewer, 1987.
- Pohlsander, Hans A. Helena: Empress and Saint. Chicago: Ares Publisher, 1995.
- See also Conversion, Religious; Hagiography; Old English; Patriarchy and Patrilineage; Patronage, Ecclesiastical; Personifications Visualized as Women; Pilgrims and Pilgrimage; Queens and Empresses, Consorts of; Queens and Empresses: the West; Regents and Queen-Lieutenants*

HELOISE

Heloise's main correspondent, Peter Abelard—or as she calls him in a famous letter, her "master, father, husband, and brother"—has sometimes been called the first modern individual because of the way his autobiographical History of My Calamities seems to construct a "self," and his emphasis on the interior intention of the sinner in his Ethics. If this is true, then perhaps Heloise is the first postmodern figure for the way her own written texts have seemed to resist a unified interpretation, or rather, have seemed to invite a multiplicity of interpretations such that any possibility of uncovering a real, historical Heloise has seemed impossible. Each century since Jean de Meun first translated the letters of the pair and immortalized them in his Roman de la Rose has seemed to find the Heloise it has needed, be it the youthful and naïve virgin seduced by her older teacher and betrayed by clerics, who was the darling of the Enlightenment, to the figment of Abelard's imagination of the last century; and in our age, the feminist heroine who puts Abelard in his place and gives him his best ideas. This quest for a relevant Heloise has affected even such a simple thing as her birth date. Those who wished to see her as a naïve maiden wronged by her professor suggested that when she met Abelard for the first time around 1117 when he was almost forty, she was still only in her teens, giving her a birth date around 1100, while more recent views that emphasize her authority and autonomy argue she was in her twenties when they first met.

The Life of Heloise

Our knowledge of most of the known events of Heloise's life comes from Abelard's History of My Calamities, which is hardly a disinterested source. Still, it tells us more than we usually can hope to learn of the education and formation of a young medieval woman. We know her mother's name was Hersinde from the necrology of the Paraclete; her father is not mentioned, and it has been conjectured that she was illegitimate or that her uncle, Fulbert, a canon of Notre Dame in Paris with whom she lived, was actually her father. By the time Abelard first met her she had come to live in her uncle's house, leaving the convent of Argenteuil in which she had been educated and where she had already won a reputation for secular learning that is mentioned both by Abelard and by Peter the Venerable, abbot of Cluny. Abelard tells us that under the pretext of needing to reduce his expenses, he arranged to move into the house with Fulbert and Heloise and to continue her education with the real purpose of seducing the young woman. He describes in detail how they deceived Fulbert, and how Heloise was just as engaged with their lovemaking as he was.

Both Heloise and Abelard refer later to the many letters they wrote to each other during this period of their lives. One of the most provocative suggestions in recent years has been the assertion that this correspondence can be identified with a hitherto anonymous collection of letters between a male teacher and his female student and lover in a fifteenth-century manuscript copied by the Cistercian Johannes de Vepria. If this identification is correct, it substantially adds to the amount of written material issuing from Heloise that we have in our possession. The author of the woman's side of this correspondence betrays the same kind of educational influences as Heloise, such as her penchant for creating neologisms, her use of rhyming prose, and her allusions to Jerome. Some of the notions expressed in the letters are those we know are shared by Heloise, like the woman's idealistic views on love and her concern with inner intention. Most scholars now agree that Abelard's concern with the inner intention of the sinner, over and above his or her actions, is a product of Heloise's influence. We can see this perspective in her later letters, when she writes of their liaison, "Wholly guilty though I am, I am also, as you know, wholly innocent. It is not the deed but the intention of the doer which makes the crime, and justice should weigh not what was done but the spirit in which it is done" (Radice, 115).

Their liaison continued for several months, according to Abelard, until they were discovered by her uncle and separated. They still found occasions to meet and were eventually found in flagrante delicto. Moreover, Heloise discovered she was pregnant. Abelard smuggled Heloise out of her home disguised as a nun and sent her to his sister in Brittany where their son, Astralabe, was born. There, Heloise was a hostage for Abelard's safety from her uncle, to whom Abelard eventually proposed a secret marriage to Heloise. Heloise was against this idea, Abelard writes, because, quoting Jerome and the classics, she felt marriage and domesticity would hinder their philosophic study. Heloise assents to Abelard's depiction of her arguments against marriage in one of her later letters but complains that he did not mention her main reason, namely her equation of love with freedom but marriage with chains. Nevertheless the pair was married in a secret ceremony, probably in 1118.

Fulbert broke his promise to keep the marriage secret, so Abelard removed Heloise from her uncle's house to the convent of Argenteuil and dressed her in the garb of a novice. This enraged Fulbert, who arranged for Abelard's forcible castration. In response, Abelard and Heloise both took up the religious life of the Benedictines, Abelard as a monk in the abbey of St. Denis, and Heloise in Argenteuil. Neither was to remain in these houses. Abelard moved on to found the house of the Paraclete around 1122 and then left that foundation to be the abbot of St. Gildas in Brittany between 1125 and 1127. Abbot Suger of St. Denis, with his eyes on the property of Argenteuil, expelled its nuns, including Heloise, then its prioress, for immorality in 1129. Abelard gave Heloise and a group of her nuns who wished to live a more austere life than their sisters his foundation of the Paraclete, where she remained as its abbess, overseeing its considerable expansion through the foundation of daughter houses until her death in about 1164, some twenty-two years after Abelard's own.

The Letters of Heloise

Heloise is best known for the letters she wrote to Abelard, inspired by her reading of his History of My Calamities. By turns she is passionate and plaintive in such memorable passages as, "God is my witness that if Augustus, Emperor of the whole world, thought fit to honour me with marriage and conferred all the earth on me to possess forever, it would be dearer and more honourable to me to be called not his Empress but your whore" (Radice, 114). It is often conjectured that Abelard's History, which details his crimes, punishments, and his current state of mortal danger at the hands of the monks of St. Gildas, was intended to smooth his return to a teaching position in Paris. Its concluding pages, which are divided between evocations of his peril, and discussions of the needs of the sisters of the Paraclete for a male advisor, and his own suitability above all other men for that position, given his castration, suggest however that the aim of the text was to demonstrate to a suspicious world that he should be allowed to take a supervisory and advisory role at the Paraclete itself, on the model of Jerome's guidance over Paula and Eustochium, a precedent cited by both Abelard and Heloise.

Read in this light, Heloise's own letters can be interpreted as supporting this proposal and contributing to a public performance of Abelard's suitability for the task. She shows herself in her letters to be needful of Abelard's personal pastoral care, and she argues that it is his responsibility to care for her and her sisters, over and above all the other demands on his time. Her confession of the still-sinful state of her intentions toward him offers him an opportunity to turn her to the correct path and to show the world that he is now immune to her charms.

In his later life, Abelard did remain close to the Paraclete, writing a Rule for the house, which supported the exceptionally high educational standards Heloise wanted for her nuns, as well as a hymnal and a set of collected sermons for their use and the Problemata, answers to tricky scriptural questions posed by Heloise. Like the letters, these works should be seen as the product of collaborative effort.

After his death, Abelard's body was returned to the Paraclete, and many years later, Heloise was buried by his side. Their bodies were moved to the Père Lachaise cemetery in Paris in the nineteenth century, where they attract visitors to this day.

LUCY PICK

References and Further Reading

- Clanchy, M. T. Abelard: A Medieval Life. Oxford: Blackwell, 1997, 1999.
- Dronke, Peter. "Heloise's Problemata and Letters: Some Questions of Form and Content." In Petrus Abaelardus (1079–1142): Person, Werke, und Wirkung, edited by Thomas, Jolivet, Luscombe, and de Rijk. Trier: Paulines-Verlag, 1980, pp. 53–73.
- Gilson, Étienne. Heloise and Abelard. translated by Laurence K. Shook. London: Hollis & Carter, 1953.
- The Letters of Abelard and Heloise*. translated by Betty Radice. London: Penguin Books, 1974.
- Listening to Heloise: The Voice of a Twelfth-Century Woman*, edited by Bonnie Wheeler. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2000.
- Mews, Constant T. The Lost Love Letters of Heloise and Abelard: Perceptions of Dialogue in Twelfth-Century France. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1999.
- . Abelard and Heloise. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2005.
- Muckle, J. T. "The Personal Letters Between Abelard and Heloise." Mediaeval Studies 15 (1953): 47–94.
- . "The Letter of Heloise on the Religious Life and Abelard's First Reply." Mediaeval Studies 17 (1955): 240–281.
- Newman, Barbara. "Authority, Authenticity, and the Repression of Heloise." Journal of Medieval and Renaissance Studies 22 (1992): 121–157.

See also Celibacy; Clerical and Priests' Concubines; Education, Monastic; Letter Writing; Monastic Rules;

Monasticism and Nuns; Roman de la Rose and Its Reception; Sexuality, Regulation of; Theology

HERALDRY

Western heraldry was born on the battlefield during the eleventh century, when the development of military equipment, in particular of the helmet, rendered noble equestrian warriors unrecognizable. The devices that initially appeared on shields were thus personal military insignia. From the 1100s onward, however, such insignia came to indicate a particular lineage and were transmitted and inherited as part of the primogenital patrimony. By the mid-thirteenth century, a formal grammar of heraldic signs (blazon) was in place whereby ordinaries, that is, simple charges (such as bar, bend, chevron, chief, fess, lozenge), tinctures, and identifying objects composed coats of arms that were unique to and the property of specific families. From military banners and shields, the use of coats of arms first spread to seals, thereafter also appearing on clothing, architectural elements, and decorative objects. Sealing was likely responsible for the adoption of heraldic devices by such nonwarrior classes as women, churchmen, burghers, Jews, and peasants who found it relevant to incorporate a familial emblem on such personal device as their seals.

Given heraldry's military origins and patriarchal developments, the representation of women's heraldic identity and the pattern of heraldic bearings needed to express it were particularly intricate. While women displayed heraldic emblems on their seals from the mid-twelfth century onward, this practice remained confined to high-ranking aristocratic women well into the 1230s. Design presented a challenge. On the equestrian seals of male potentates, heraldry appeared realistically on the shield and trappings; this was the way noblemen wore their coats of arms in actual battles and tournaments. On aristocratic women's seals, however, heraldry could not be displayed in such a realistic fashion since the seals' owners did not wear military accoutrement; heraldry, therefore, was somewhat artificially overlain on clothing or shown on shields either held by the female figure or flanking her on both sides. Ultimately, heraldic emblems came to constitute the seal's central iconographic device and were thus displayed by women from all social strata. An even greater challenge than display was the selection of a coat of arms. Within any given family, an internal system of heraldic differentiation indicated its inner relationships. Thus, only the eldest son inherited the entire coat of arms whereas his cadet male siblings used a coat into which had been introduced variations called marks of cadency. No such marks entered women's heraldic devices; at that symbolic level, a woman had no specific place within the heraldic grammar of her patrilineage. Women adopted the arms of their husbands and/or of their fathers. Thus, in 1290, Jeanne de Toucy, wife of Thibaud II, count of Bar-le-Duc, shows on her seal's obverse the elegant effigy of a woman standing before a background decorated with her husband's heraldic emblems of sea-perch (Fr. Bar) and small crosses (crusily); her counterseal on the other side displays the coat of the Toucy family into which Countess Jeanne was born. Yolande de Flandre, as the widow of Count Henry IV of Bar and the wife of Philip of Navarre, count of Longueville (which made her sister-in-law of Charles, king of Navarre), wished to trace emblematically the importance of her birth and alliances. Her seal (of 1359) presents a drapery bearing the arms of Flanders and Bar before which stands the delicate figure of an exquisitely dressed woman resting her hands on two coats of arms. One is quarterly with the arms of Navarre and Longueville, and the other is party with the arms of Navarre and Flanders. Some heiresses chose to display only their fathers' shield, thus emphasizing the distinction of their personal status. Joan of Stuteville (1265–1275), who was twice married, used but a single seal showing a woman riding a horse sidesaddle and presenting a shield bearing the arms of Nicholas de Stuteville of Liddell, whose daughter and heiress Joan was. Whatever the heraldic strategy deployed by women on their seals, this strategy was often sensitive to rank, politics, and patterns of alliances, and might be dramatically complicated. Margaret de Quincy, countess of Winchester, used a remarkable seal (c. 1220) on which enclosed within a round-arched doorway two shields accompany a female effigy cloaked in a fur coat. On the upper shield are the arms of Margaret's husband, Saher of Quincy; these arms (lozenges) are also embroidered on the effigy's dress; on the lower shield appear the arms of the FitzWalters, who were the cousins and allies of Saher of Quincy; on top of the doorway, a cinquefoil alludes to the arms of Margaret's father, Robert III of Beaumont, earl of Leicester.

Both male and female armorial bearings might indicate matrilineal descent, indeed the number of lineages endowed with emblems borrowed from a matrilineal heraldic device is remarkable. For instance, the sea-perches (Fr. bars) of the comital family of Bar in Lorraine were transmitted matrilineally to the counts of Chiny, Clermont, Salm, and to the lords of Nesles. Even more impressive is the identification of certain noble families with a single heraldic crest, such as the swan, which reflected a horizontal and extensive structure of kinship resting upon the strong genealogical, but not gender-specific, consciousness of a shared common and mythic ancestor. In the case of the swan, the ancestor was the swan knight, believed to be the grandfather of Godfrey of Bouillon, count of Boulogne and hero of the first crusade. All families displaying the swan crest can be traced back to the family of Boulogne. The principal link in such totemic affiliation was often one of several remote female ancestors.

BRIGITTE MIRIAM BEDOS-REZAK

References and Further Reading

- Bedos-Rezak, Brigitte. "Medieval Women in French Sigillographic Sources." In Joel T. Rosenthal, ed. Women and Sources of Medieval History. Athens, Ga.: University of Georgia Press, 1990, pp. 1–36. Reprinted in Bedos-Rezak. Form and Order in the Middle Ages. No X.
- . "Women, Seals and Power in Medieval France, 1150–1350." In Mary Eler and Maryanne Kowaleski, ed. Women and Power in the Middle Ages. Athens, Ga.: University of Georgia Press, 1988, pp. 61–82. Reprinted in Bedos-Rezak. Form and Order in the Middle Ages. Studies in Social and Quantitative Sigillography. Aldershot: Ashgate, 1993. No IX.
- Wagner, Anthony R. "Heraldry." In Medieval England, edited by Austin Lane Poole. New ed. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1958, pp. 338–381.

See also Burials and Tombs; Castles and Palaces; Chivalry; Genealogy; Heiresses; Patriarchy and Patrilineage; Seals and Sigillography

HERETICS AND HERESY

Accusations of heresy, deviation from orthodox doctrine, were leveled against various groups and individuals in the West during the Middle Ages. Some groups of women, including the Beguines, frequently fell under suspicion. Individual women, including Marguerite Porete and Na Prouz Boneta, were condemned. Suspect sects, especially the Cathars, were accused of attacking marriage and otherwise undermining the established gender norms of society. Some modern scholars have thought that other groups, especially the Waldensians and Lollards, gave women stronger leadership roles than the Church found acceptable. Orthodox writers also accused some heretics of hiding sexual vice behind a mask of virtue. At least one group, the Guglielmites, thought the Holy Spirit had been manifested in the form of a thirteenth-century holy woman.

Church authorities, bishops, and inquisitors, occasionally tried women; and others fell under suspicion. Most were not notable personalities like Porete, Boneta, Joan of Arc, or Esclarmonde of Foix, a woman of the high nobility who was a supporter of the Cathars. The majority were of the lesser nobility, town populations, or the peasantry. Some were executed; some punished; others cleared. A group of women who converted from Catharism were settled at Prouille, outside Toulouse, becoming the first Dominican nuns. In the late medieval and early modern periods, suspicion fell on women thought to be witches; and they were treated as if heretics, some being turned over to the lay authorities for execution.

THOMAS IZBICKI

References and Further Reading

- Alcuin, Blamires. "Women and Preaching in Medieval Orthodoxy, Heresy, and Saints' Lives." Viator: 26 (1995): 135–152.
- Billier, Peter. "Cathars and Material Women." In Medieval Theology and the Natural Body, edited by Peter Billier and A. J. Minnis. Rochester, N.Y.: York Medieval Press, 1997, pp. 61–107.
- McSheffrey, Shannon. Gender and Heresy: Women and Men in Lollard Communities, 1420–1530. Middle Ages Series. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1995.
- Peterson, Janine Larmon. "Social Roles, Gender Inversion, and the Heretical Sect: The Case of the Guglielmites." Viator 35 (2004): 203–219.

See also Cathars; Dominican Order; Lollards; Marguerite Porete; Pope Joan; Waldensians; Witches

HERMAPHRODITES

Discourse about hermaphroditism (that is, being of an anatomically intermediate sex, now usually termed "intersexuality") is often seen by historians as especially revealing of contemporary ideas about sex due to the hermaphrodite's challenge to dichotomous notions of sex difference. The term hermaphrodite originates in Ovid's Metamorphoses (8 BCE), which describes the nymph Salmacis and her attempted seduction of Hermaphroditus, the son of Hermes and Aphrodite. When Hermaphroditus rejects Salmacis's advances, she petitions the gods to join them forever, and they do so—literally. The result is a hybrid creature of both male and female anatomical parts; hence, the word hermaphrodite came to denote a person of doubled or intermediate sex. Mentions of hermaphrodites in the Middle Ages often figure in medical discussions of sex difference, sexuality, and morality, but the hermaphrodite also appears in other genres of literature as a symbol of hybridity or transgression.

The problem of hermaphroditism occurs regularly in medieval medical and surgical treatises, particularly in discussions of "monsters" (usually meaning humans with birth defects), which authors attempt to explain according to various theories of generation. These explanations rely upon two distinct, and often contradictory, theoretical models: the Hippocratic/Galenic system and the Aristotelian system, which differed in many ways in their approach to intersexuality. According to the Hippocratic-Galenic tradition, hermaphrodites were neither male nor female, but an intermediary sex that combined male and female characteristics in perfect equilibrium. During the process of conception and gestation, a number of factors—such as the child's position in a left, right, or central chamber of the uterus, or the relative strength of the mother's and father's "sperm"—determined the sex of an offspring, which might be male, female, or something in between. The competing Aristotelian model argued that hermaphrodites were not so much an intermediate sex as the product of doubled or superfluous genitalia. According to this theory, a hermaphrodite occurred when matter contributed by the mother (in the form of menstrual blood) exceeded the amount needed to produce one fetus, but was not enough for two. The extra matter could form a second set of genitals, but the sex of the child was only superficially ambiguous: the "complexion" of the body (that is, the combination of heat, cold, dryness, and moisture within it) always indicated either male or female sex. The Aristotelian approach led some medieval thinkers to classify hermaphroditism as primarily a surgical problem that could be corrected by the amputation of the offending member.

A few anecdotes concerning hermaphrodites survive in legal and theological sources, suggesting how intersexed individuals may have been treated in Christian and Muslim societies during the Middle Ages. Legal texts in both the East and West generally attempted to fix the hermaphrodite firmly within binary biological or social structures. Islamic jurists assigned intersexed persons (khuntha mushkil) either male or female gender roles for the purposes of ritual, marriage, and inheritance. Latin canon and civil law allowed the hermaphrodite to participate fully in legal proceedings as long as his/her "sexual development" was sufficiently masculine to warrant his/her juridical status to be labeled male. Latin theological treatises indicate similar impulses. Peter the Chanter's (d. 1197) De vitio sodomitico warns that a hermaphrodite should be compelled to use only one of his/her sex organs in order to avoid the sin of sodomy. Although Islamic sources gave instructions for the determination of a hermaphrodite's sex by examination, Latin legal and theological sources tend to omit description of how the hermaphrodite's juridical or sexual status was to be decided.

Hermaphrodites also functioned as a symbol in medieval literature, particularly in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. John of Salisbury's Policraticus (1159) borrows the tale of Hermaphroditus and Salmacis to criticize the bifurcated life of the courtier who serves both patron and philosophical truth. Alan of Lille's De planctu naturae (c. 1160–1170) rails against grammatical and sexual deviance by invoking hermaphrodites (by which he may have meant effeminate men), who transgress gender boundaries in language and life. Beginning in the thirteenth century, hermaphrodites also appear in alchemical texts as a symbol for the “philosopher’s stone,” which supposedly transmuted base metals into gold and silver, and which united both cold and wet (female) and hot and dry (male) principles into one substance. These medieval literary images make use of the hermaphrodite in order to indicate a combination of different or contradictory parts within a whole, and they also suggest the hermaphrodite’s potential as a disruptor of medieval societal or natural norms.

LEAH DEVUN

References and Further Reading

- Cadden, Joan. Meanings of Sex Difference in the Middle Ages. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- Jacquart, Danielle, and Claude Thomasset. Sexuality and Medicine in the Middle Ages, translated by Matthew Adamson. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1988.
- Nederman, Cary J., and Jacqui True. “The Third Sex: The Idea of the Hermaphrodite in Twelfth-Century Europe.” Journal of the History of Sexuality 6 (1996): 497–517.
- Rubin, Miri. “The Person in the Form: Medieval Challenges to Bodily ‘Order.’” In Framing Medieval Bodies, edited by Sarah Kay and Miri Rubin. Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1994, pp. 100–122.
- Sanders, Paula. “Gendering the Ungendered Body: Hermaphrodites in Medieval Islamic Law.” In Women in Middle Eastern History: Shifting Boundaries in Sex and Gender, edited by Nikki R. Keddie and Beth Baron. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1991, pp. 74–95.

See also Aristotelian Concepts of Women and Gender; Body in Literature and Religion; Femininity and Masculinity

HERRAD OF HOHENBOURG

Herrad (c. 1176–after 1196), abbess of the Augustinian monastery of Hohenbourg (Ste. Odile) in Alsace, is best known as the author of the Hortus deliciarum (Garden of Delights), a lavish illuminated manuscript that she designed for the education of the women of her monastery. Although the manuscript was lost in the destruction of the Strasbourg library in 1870, notes and tracings from the original reflect the vibrant intellectual and spiritual culture that flourished at Hohenbourg under Herrad’s care and demonstrate the high level of education available within female communities at this time. In the Hortus, Herrad presented a wide range of contemporary Latin texts within the framework of salvation history. Her major textual sources were the German Benedictine authors Honorius Augustodunensis and Rupert of Deutz, and the Parisian scholars Peter Lombard and Peter Comestor, authors whose presence in the manuscript confirms the breadth and currency of the education available at Hohenbourg. The manuscript’s texts, including poems, hymns, sermons, biblical commentary, and history, are structured around an ambitious visual cycle consisting of some 346 images, many of which present dense theological and allegorical arguments. These images reveal Herrad’s participation in the visual thinking of the twelfth century and are a witness to the sophisticated visual culture of a women’s community. In addition to her work on the Hortus, Herrad was a capable administrator, who managed Hohenbourg’s properties, encouraged donations, and founded two houses for canons who provided spiritual services for the women of her community.

FIONA J. GRIFFITHS

References and Further Reading

- Collard, Judith. “Herrad of Hohenbourg’s Hortus Deliciarum (The Garden of Delights) and the Creation of Images for Medieval Nuns.” In Communities of Women: Historical Perspectives, edited by Barbara Brookes and Dorothy Page. Dunedin, N.Z.: University of Otago Press, 2002, pp. 39–57.
- Gibson, Joan. “Herrad of Hohenbourg.” In Medieval, Renaissance and Enlightenment Women Philosophers A.D. 500–1600. A History of Women Philosophers. Vol. 2, edited by Mary Ellen Waithe. Boston: Kluwer Academic Publishers, 1989, pp. 85–98.
- Griffiths, Fiona. “Herrad of Hohenbourg: A Synthesis of Learning in the Garden of Delights,” in Listen, Daughter: The Speculum Virginum and the Formation of Religious Women in the Middle Ages, edited by Constant J. Mews. The New Middle Ages Series. New York: Palgrave, 2001, pp. 221–243.
- . “Nuns’ Memories or Missing History in Alsace (c. 1200): Herrad of Hohenbourg’s Garden of Delights,” in Medieval Memories: Men, Women and the Past, 700–1300, edited by Elisabeth van Houts. Women and Men in History Series. New York: Longman, 2001, pp. 132–149.
- . The Garden of Delights: Reform and Renaissance for Women in the Twelfth Century. Forthcoming.
- Herrad of Hohenbourg. Hortus Deliciarum, edited by Rosalie Green, Michael Evans, Christine Bischoff, and Michael Curschmann. 2 vols. Studies of the Warburg Institute, 36. London: The Warburg Institute, 1979.

See also Abbesses; Art, Representations of Women in; Book Ownership; Education, Monastic; Germanic

Lands; Literacy and Reading; Latin; Monasticism and Nuns; Women Authors; Latin Texts

HILD OF WHITBY

Most of our evidence for the life of Hild (Hilda) of Whitby (614–680) comes from the Venerable Bede (d. c. 735). We know little of her early years. During her infancy, her mother had a dream that foretold Hild's future vocation. In 627, Hild converted to Christianity along with her great uncle, King Edwin, and other members of her family.

At the age of thirty-three, possibly having been widowed, Hild entered the religious life and was made abbess at Hartlepool two years later. Her noble heritage probably played a role in her appointment. Bede, however, emphasizes her motherly nature, her administrative skills, and her wisdom and devotion to serving God.

Hild eventually became the abbess of the double monastery at Whitby where she wielded much influence in the region. Bede notes that even kings and princes sought her advice. On one occasion, she hosted a council on the dispute between Irish and Roman practices (like the dating of Easter) in the Northumbrian church. It is significant that Bede not only recounts this event, but also explicitly mentions Hild's personal stance in the matter.

Further evidence of her influence is the fact that Hild prepared at least five bishops and many priests for the church. She emphasized good works and education, but also provided an example of fortitude to her followers as she endured long illness in the last seven years of her life. Bede reaffirms her sanctity writing that, at the very hour of her death, two nuns had visions of angels accompanying her soul to heaven.

HEATHER E. WARD

References and Further Reading

- Bede. The Ecclesiastical History of the English People, The Greater Chronicle, Bede's Letter to Egbert, edited by Judith McClure and Roger Collins. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1994.
- Fell, Christine E. "Hild, Abbess of Streonæshalch." In Hagiography and Medieval Literature: A Symposium, edited by Hans Bekker-Nielsen, Peter Foote, Jørgen Højgaard Jørgensen, and Tore Nyberg. Odense: Odense University Press, 1981, pp. 76–99.
- Foot, Sarah. "Religious Women in England Before the First Viking Age." In Veiled Women I: The Disappearance of Nuns from Anglo-Saxon England. Aldershot: Ashgate, 2000, pp. 35–60.
- Overing, Gillian Rose and Clare A. Lees. "Birthing Bishops and Fathering Poets: Bede, Hild, and the Relations of Cultural Production." Exemplaria 6:1 (1994): 35–65.

Smith, Robin D. "Glimpses of Some Anglo-Saxon Women." In A Wyf Ther Was: Essays in Honour of Paule Mertens-Fonck, edited by Juliette Dor. Liège: U. de Liège, 1992, pp. 256–263.

See also Abbesses; Church; Double Monasteries; England; Monasticism and Nuns

HILDEGARD OF BINGEN

Hildegard of Bingen (1098–1179), one of the greatest figures of the Middle Ages, founded two monasteries and authored numerous works, the foremost being a trilogy of visionary treatises: Scivias, Liber vitae meritorum, and Liber divinorum operum. For the first and third of those she designed illuminations. Hildegard also composed commentaries on the Rule of Benedict and the Athanasian Creed, exegetical homilies on the gospels, the lives of saints Disibod and Rupert, the first extant morality play, medical works, liturgical songs, and over 300 letters.

Life

The daughter of a noble family, Hildegard was born in 1098 at Bermersheim near Mainz. Her parents, Hildebert and Mechthild, entrusted her to the care of the holy woman Jutta, daughter of the count of Sponheim. Jutta and Hildegard were immured at the Benedictine monastery of Disibodenberg on All Saints' Day, November 1, 1112. Jutta taught Hildegard the Psalms and showed her how to play the ten-stringed psaltery. From their enclosure the two could hear the monks' recitation of the Divine Office, a continuing lesson in the Scriptures and other sacred texts. Jutta's renown resulted in the expansion of her enclosure into a schola; she served as superior to a small women's Benedictine community in dependence on the abbot of Disibodenberg. Hildegard remained under Jutta's tutelage until her teacher's death in 1136, whereupon Hildegard became the superior (magistra).

In 1141, Hildegard experienced a crucial turning point when a powerful vision, received when she was fully awake, instructed her to make known the revelations of divine light that she had begun receiving as a child. She suddenly understood the spiritual meaning of the Scriptures, without possessing a command of scriptural interpretation or grammar. As she later explained to Guibert of Gembloux, the shadow of the "Living Light" illuminated her, with the result that the Scriptures, virtues, and other inspired writings shone forth with clarity (Letters II, 103r. p. 23).

When Hildegard refused the divine command, she was struck by illness and sought the counsel of Volmar, her first secretary, and a sister, Richardis, who later left Hildegard's community, to her great sorrow. Hildegard received permission from Abbot Kuno of Disibodenberg (1136–1155) to accept the divine order to “speak and write,” and she began to compose Scivias (Know the Ways).

Pope Eugene III spent the winter of 1147–1148 (November 30–February 13) in Trier, where Hildegard sent him a letter with part of the Scivias. Eugene III reportedly sent a delegation to Disibodenberg to investigate Hildegard's writings and bring her work back to him. The pope issued a charter of protection for Disibodenberg but made no reference to Hildegard or the women's community. Hildegard in turn wrote Eugene again to seek his approval and protection, but he sent no written reply (Letters I, 2). Hildegard had also written Bernard of Clairvaux in early 1147 to affirm that she was shown in a vision the inner meaning of the exposition of “the Psalter, the Gospels, and other volumes” (Letters I, 1, p. 28). The abbot sent a brief reply, hailing Hildegard's inner enlightenment by the Spirit, using words from 1 John 2:27 on the anointing that teaches about all things (unctio docens de omnibus), a scriptural allusion that he often employed in praise of the Spirit's gifts (Letters I, 1r, p. 31).

Volmar, when editing Hildegard's letter collection around 1170, drafted a letter in the pope's name and also revised the letter from Bernard of Clairvaux. The original correspondence from Eugene III and Bernard contains no written authorization for Hildegard to write, but the magistra clearly felt empowered to do so. Significantly, neither Bernard nor Eugene forbade her writing or speaking during a period when ecclesiastical intervention against unauthorized preaching was escalating. (In the 1140s, Bernard denounced heretics in the Rhineland, traveled to Occitania in pursuit of heresy, and targeted unauthorized preaching by a renegade Cistercian who was stirring up anti-Jewish hatred in the Rhineland.)

Whatever the precise understanding that resulted from Hildegard's contact with Bernard and Eugene III in 1147–1148, the magistra felt empowered to express her voice publicly in writing. Her vita reports that Eugene III sent letters to Hildegard, granting her “permission to make known whatever she had learned through the Holy Spirit” and urging her to write. Hildegard repeats the story in her autobiographical account, stating that Pope Eugene wrote her and “commanded” her to write what she saw and heard (Life, pp. 30, 46).

Four people contributed to the vita: Hildegard herself; Gottfried of Disibodenberg (d. 1176), provost of Rupertsberg after Volmar's death in 1173; Guibert of Gembloux (1124/1125–1213), secretary to Hildegard; and Theodoric of Echternach (d. post-1192), who compiled the vita from various sources. Hildegard began organizing the writing of her vita herself with Gottfried, author of Book One. Guibert of Gembloux gathered materials and worked on the vita from 1177–1180, but was summoned back to Gembloux before he could finish. He took with him an incomplete vita, published in a letter, and he left a dossier of materials at the Rupertsberg. Theodoric, author of Books Two and Three, compiled the vita from the sources available, including the texts of Hildegard's visions and a narrative of her life, used throughout the work, but especially in Book Two.

Scivias

The completion of Scivias, Hildegard's first visionary work, occupied ten years. Its three books contain six, seven, and thirteen visions respectively, whose content encompasses salvation history from the sin of Adam to the coming of Antichrist. Statements emphasizing Hildegard's visionary and prophetic authority punctuate the beginning and conclusion of the books and their visions. The image of the edifice of salvation holds a central place in many of the visions; Christ is the cornerstone and humans reconstruct the edifice with the help of the virtues. Hildegard instructs all orders of society on a wide variety of topics and admonishes them on appropriate conduct in view of the approaching end times. The final evocations of the last days include a horrific vision of Antichrist taking birth from Ecclesia herself, a powerful indictment of corruption in the church, a recurrent theme in Hildegard's works.

Thirty-five illuminations accompany the text, and as far as we know, Hildegard herself designed them. Recent scholarship argues that Hildegard likely received her visual images first, sketched them, and then commented upon them with words. Whatever the order of the process, Hildegard intended the visual representation and text of her visions to be food for meditation. The commentary often differs from the illuminations, but together they constitute a core text. Further commentary follows the explanation of the visions and adds more conventional teaching of a moral nature. The original manuscript of Scivias, probably produced by the nuns at Rupertsberg during Hildegard's lifetime, has been lost since the bombing of Dresden in 1945. Fortunately, a photographic copy was made in 1927, and the nuns at Eibingen also prepared a color facsimile by hand (1927–1933).

After Scivias, Hildegard undertook the Liber vitae meritorum (Book of Life's Merits), a work comprising six visions that comment on human behavior and pair off vices and virtues, punishment and penance. Regarding its completion, Hildegard remarks that she had been "frequently worn down by tribulations" (p. 61). For each vision in the book, a human figure superimposed on the world that stretches from the heavens to the depths, turns from point to point and reports what he observes. The virtues play a less prominent role than in Scivias, as the emphasis in this work lies on the negative aspects of human behavior and salvation history. Thirty-five vices are enumerated with their corresponding punishment and penance. The admonitory lessons provided refectory readings at the monastery of Villers and could have filled a similar function at Rupertsberg.

Rupertsberg

After disputes with Disibodenberg, Hildegard had obtained permission to found Rupertsberg near the town of Bingen, where she and her nuns journeyed around 1150; in 1165, she founded Eibingen, a daughterhouse, across the Rhine from Bingen. The nuns established the right to choose their own provost, but technically they remained subordinate to the abbot of Disibodenberg with Hildegard serving as prioress (priorissa). Guibert of Gembloux describes the activities of Hildegard and her nuns at Rupertsberg, where he served as her secretary and stayed from June 1177 until after her death. He testifies to the intellectual and spiritual work of the community and his relationship to Hildegard, reading and discussing her works.

Hildegard's autobiographical narrative informs us about the third work of her trilogy. The vision of John the Evangelist compelled her to "explain every statement and word of this gospel regarding the beginning of the work of God" (Life, p. 67), a reference to the exegetical synthesis of the Liber divinarum operum (Book of Divine Works) or De operatione Dei, which occupied Hildegard from 1163 to 1174 and which brings together her understanding of Genesis 1 and John 1. Volmar died before Hildegard had completed the Book of Divine Works, but she was assisted by Ludwig, abbot of St. Eucharius in Trier. In a letter that Hildegard sent to Ludwig (Letters II, 217) with the manuscript of the book, she urges him to consider her work as a unicorn in his lap, to protect it, and correct it with care.

The Book of Divine Works elaborates the spiritual significance of creation in all its dimensions, the connectedness of the human microcosm, body and soul, and the macrocosm, the universe. The ten visions, contained in three books of varying length, move from the creation of the human and the cosmos, with exegesis of John 1, to the history of salvation, which Hildegard connects to the days of creation, providing detailed commentary on Genesis 1. As in Scivias, the visions are followed by explanations; likewise, prophetic markers that assert the reception of the divine voice occur frequently. The Lucca manuscript (Biblioteca Governativa MS 1942), probably produced in the 1220s as part of an effort to canonize Hildegard, contains striking illuminations of the cosmos, divine figures, and the heavenly Jerusalem.

Hildegard's extensive correspondence and her preaching tours demonstrate the wide audience for her advice. Her correspondents included popes, the emperor Frederick Barbarossa, Henry II and Eleanor of Aquitaine, bishops and other churchmen, noble men and women, and other lay people. Letters to abbots and abbesses advise them in the face of burdensome monastic responsibilities, while other letters range from difficult exegetical questions to practical advice on medical problems such as nightmares and infertility. The magistra explains the workings of the humors, which she discusses in her medical work, Causae et curae (Causes and Cures) and suggests specific prayers and herbal remedies.

Hildegard stands out as the only medieval woman author of systematic works of exegesis. Volmar wrote to express that at her death, the community would miss her new interpretation of the Scriptures (Letters, II, 195). Hildegard composed fifty-eight Expositiones evangeliorum (Commentaries on the Gospels), homilies on twenty-seven gospel pericopes, which were recorded by the nuns at Rupertsberg. Moreover, Guibert of Gembloux wrote the magistra on behalf of the monks at Villers, requesting her advice to thirty-eight problems of scriptural interpretation. Her reply constitutes the treatise, Solutiones triginta octo quaestionum (Solutions for Thirty-Eight Questions).

From Rupertsberg, Hildegard undertook four preaching tours from approximately 1158 to 1170. Hildegard's audiences were primarily monastic communities whom she admonished about monastic and clerical reform. The fourth preaching tour aimed, at least in part, at combating Catharism. In the vita, Theodoric notes that Hildegard preached in twenty-one places, including five cathedral cities: Cologne, Trier, Metz, Würzburg, and Bamberg, omitting a sermon at Kirchheim in 1170. The Cologne (1163), Trier (1160), and Kirchheim sermons have been transmitted in epistolary form. Hildegard preached at Disibodenberg also, and upon request of Abbot Helenger around 1170, composed the Life of St. Disibod. She also wrote the Life of St. Rupert, patron of Rupertsberg.

Last Years

During the last year of her life, 1178–1179, Hildegard faced problems with Archbishop Christian of Mainz concerning a deceased man to whom she had granted burial at Rupertsberg, although the Mainz prelates claimed that he was still excommunicated at the time of his death. Hildegard refused to have the body exhumed, and the archbishop imposed an interdict, denying the nuns reception of the Eucharist and the singing of the Office. The interdict was lifted not long before her death.

Hildegard suffered gravely from the denial of the sacrament and of music. She considered her musical ability a divine gift and composed works for the Office, collected in the Symphonia. As religious superior of her community, Hildegard would have intoned her own elaborate responsories as leader of daily liturgy. In defense of her community and in protest against the interdict, Hildegard composed a powerful letter in 1178 on the salvific role of participating in music. For Hildegard, musical harmony represented celestial harmony. Liturgical music brought together body and soul, mirroring the dual nature of Christ, and aiding humankind to regain the divine voice that Adam lost at the Fall. In her morality play, Ordo virtutum (Play of the Virtues), the Devil is the one character who does not sing, because evil cannot be beautiful or harmonious.

In the first third of the thirteenth century, the nuns at Rupertsberg made attempts to have Hildegard canonized. A commission of Mainz clergy was appointed to investigate Hildegard's life and miracles. Their first report (1233) was rejected, then amended, and a 1243 letter from Innocent IV requested that the claim be resubmitted. No other known thirteenth-century records pertain to the process, but Hildegard's name and feast day appear in martyrologies from the fourteenth century onward, a 1324 indulgence from John XXII recognizes her public cult, and the sixteenth-century Roman martyrology by Baronius includes her name. Hildegard also retained a reputation for prophecy down to the fifteenth century and later.

Since the late twentieth century, scholarship on Hildegard has flourished, musical groups have performed her evocative music, and admirers have claimed her authority for spiritual practices, the ecological movement, healthful cooking, and even brewing.

BEVERLY MAYNE KIENZLE

References and Further Reading

- Bartlett, Anne Clark. "Commentary, Polemic, and Prophecy in Hildegard of Bingen's Solutiones triginta octo quaestionum." Viator 23 (1992): 153–165.
- Beate Hildegardis Causae et Curae*, edited by Laurence Moulinier. Berlin: Akademie Verlag, 2003.
- Berndt, Rainer, ed. "Im Angesicht Gottes suche der Mensch sich selbst" Hildegard von Bingen (1098–1179). Berlin: Akademie Verlag, 2001.
- Burnett, Charles and Peter Dronke, edited by Hildegard of Bingen: The Context of Her Thought and Art. London: Warburg Institute, 1998.
- Dronke, Peter. "Problemata Hildegardiana." Mittelalterliches Jahrbuch 16 (1981): 97–131.
- . Women Writers of the Middle Ages: A Critical Study of Texts from Perpetua (+203) to Marguerite Porete (+1310). Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984.
- . "Platonic-Christian Allegories in the Homilies of Hildegard of Bingen." In From Athens to Chartres. Neoplatonism and Medieval Thought. Studies in Honour of Edouard Jaumeau, edited by Haijo Jan Westra. Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1992, pp. 381–396.
- Emmerson, Richard. "The Representation of Antichrist in Hildegard of Bingen's Scivias." Gesta 41: 2 (2002): 95–110.
- Flanagan, Sabina. Hildegard of Bingen, 1098–1179. A Visionary Life. 2nd. ed. London and New York: Routledge, 1998.
- Gottfried of Disibodenberg and Theodoric of Echternach. The Life of the Saintly Hildegard, translated by Hugh Feiss. Toronto: Peregrina Press, 1996.
- Haverkamp, A, ed. Hildegard von Bingen in ihrem historischen Umfeld. Internationaler wissenschaftlicher Kongress zum 900jährigen Jubiläum, 13.–19. September 1998. Bingen am Rhein. Mainz: Verlag Philipp von Zabern, 2000.
- Hildegard of Bingen. Expositiones evangeliorum, edited by J.-B. Pitra. In Analecta S. Hildegardis, in Analecta sacra, vol. 8. Rome, 1882, pp. 245–327.
- . Scivias, translated by Columba Hart and Jane Bishop; Intro. Barbara J. Newman; Preface, Caroline Walker Bynum. New York: Paulist Press, 1990.
- . Letters, translated by J. L. Baird and R. K. Ehrman. 3 vols. Oxford, New York: Oxford University Press, 1994, 1998, 2004.
- . Symphonia, translated by Barbara Newman. 2nd ed. Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1998.
- . An Explanation of the Athanasian Creed, translated by T. M. Izbicki. Toronto: Peregrina, 2001.
- . Expositiones evangeliorum, edited by B. Kienzle and C. A. Muessig. In Hildegardis Bingensis Opera homiletica et liturgica. Turnhout; Brepols, 2006.
- Kienzle, Beverly Mayne "Hildegard of Bingen's Teaching in Her Expositiones evangeliorum and Ordo virtutum." In Medieval Monastic Education, edited by George P. Fozzoco and Carolyn A. Muessig. Leicester: University of Leicester Press, 2001, pp. 72–86.
- . "Hildegard of Bingen's Exegesis of Luke." In Early Christian Writings Inside and Out: A Festschrift

- in Honor of François Bovon, edited by D. Warren, A. Brock, and D. Pao. Leiden: Brill, 2003, pp. 227–238.
- . Fortifications of the Word: Hildegard of Bingen as Preacher ad Exegete. Turnhout: Brepols, 2006.
- Newman, Barbara. Sister of Wisdom. St. Hildegard's Theology of the Feminine, with a new Preface, Bibliography, and Discography. Berkeley: University of California Press: 1998.
- . Voice of the Living Light: Hildegard of Bingen and Her World. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998.
- . "Hildegard and Her Hagiographers: The Remaking of Female Sainthood." In Gendered Voices: Medieval Saints and Their Interpreters, edited by Catherine M. Mooney. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999, pp. 1–15.
- Pernoud, Régine. "The Preaching Peregrinations of a Twelfth-Century Nun, ca. 1158–70." In Wisdom Which Encircles Circles, edited by A. E. Davidson. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Medieval Institute Publications, 1996, pp. 15–26.
- Silvas, Anna. trans. Jutta and Hildegard: The Biographical Sources. University Park, Pa.: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1999.

See also Abbesses; Artists, Women; Education, Monastic; Hagiography; History, Medieval Women's; Letter Writing; Literacy and Reading; Latin; Medicine; Monastic Rules; Monasticism and Nuns; Mysticism and Mystics; Nuns as Illuminators; Prophets; Sermons and Preaching; Women Authors: Latin Texts

HISTORY, MEDIEVAL WOMEN'S

Women did compose history in the Middle Ages, like the famous Alexiad of the Byzantine princess Anna Comnena; contrary to modern expectations medieval women did receive attention from historians in their own day and age. Giovanni Boccaccio's (1313–1375) On Famous Women provided brief biographies of women worthies, recent and ancient, intended to inspire readers, much like stories about heroic male figures. This encouraged other authors, who sometimes wrote in a positive vein like Boccaccio. Still others remained in the tradition of chronicle accounts, where women were condemned when their acts rose to the level of historical notice through wielding power and influence. Evil queens were an enduring theme among royal and dynastic chroniclers; these authors exonerated powerful rulers from error by blaming the influence of royal wives and mothers. Women's unchaste acts, debauchery, and "unnatural acts," such as waging war, were enduring themes in this tradition, indeed their very frequency casts doubt on their veracity.

Vitae (Lives) of medieval women saints like Hildegard of Bingen, the Helfta mystics, and Catherine of Siena were popular historical reading matter as well. Christine de Pizan (1364–1430) wrote a biographical poem about Joan of Arc as savior of France, while her City of Women presented an imagined history of virtuous women's rule, so the tradition of medieval women worthy of celebration flourished and endured, especially among women readers. Mystics, abbesses, royal women, and a few women authors like the famed abbess of the Paraclete, Heloise, who wrote love letters to the scholar Abelard, were featured as romantic archetypes of an earlier age, or as exemplars of piety, literacy, or devotion to family.

Yet historians doubted the authenticity of some visionary women's writings, and on occasion their spiritual vocations. At times medieval women mystics were viewed as neurotic or diseased, and their piety as inferior to that of their male counterparts, who were regarded as more rational in their religious devotion.

In other instances women's texts that were admired by historians were reascribed to male figures—a confessor perhaps—on the grounds that a woman could not have composed such texts—in Latin, no less. In 1888, William Henry Hudson reviewed the sixteenth century Conrad Celtis edition of Hrotsvit of Gandersheim's dramas and exonerated Celtis of charges that his edition was a forgery and fraud. Critics had argued that a woman of the tenth century could not have been an accomplished Latinist as Hrotsvit certainly was. With remarkable foresight the twelfth century author Marie de France avoided this predicament by signing her texts. No one could gainsay her bold "Me numerai pur remembrance/Marie ai num, si sui de France" (I shall name myself in order to be remembered/My name is Marie and I come from France). While a tradition of historical writing by and about medieval women survived, it was challenged, or on occasion dismissed as a negligible topic.

Impact of Positioning

The Enlightenment and the later drive for suffrage widened the scope of the investigation of medieval women, and most of the resulting studies involved inquiries into the condition of women in earlier ages. New World feminism, which began before the Civil War, recognized the importance of medieval women. Matilda Gage (1826–1898) proposed to write a comprehensive history of women through the ages, but her research convinced her that the sources were simply inadequate, so she abandoned the project. Writing in The Una, a women's rights magazine, in 1853, Paulina Wright Davis argued that women's journey back to the Middle Ages was, paradoxically, a journey of progress (Davis, 1376–1377). In those earlier times women had been physicians and notaries and held positions of authority.

This sounded a theme that would persist in medieval women's history. Instances of medieval women enjoying legal rights and opportunities denied them in modern times cast some doubt on the progressive nature of change over the centuries in the West. During World War I Annie Abram wrote "Women Traders in Medieval London" for an Economic Journal issue devoted to working women's new roles in wartime. She claimed medieval antecedents for women's skilled work in the economy and a larger role for working women than in more recent years. Alice Clark made a similar argument in 1919 about working women of the seventeenth century, introducing the possibility of a past Golden Age for women. Doris Mary Stenton also struck that note, in her long-term study The English Woman in History, which she published in 1957.

The tools of positivism favored by nineteenth-century historians and literary scholars could be used for uncovering medieval women's history in some instances. Positivism may be briefly defined as a system concerned with positive facts and phenomena, excluding speculation upon ultimate causes or origins. In history positivism has favored a narrative style of presentation and assumed a shared sense of what is significant between author and reader. In France Marie-Joseph-Raymond Thomassy wrote an essay on the important political writings of Christine de Pizan as early as 1838, despite the fact that those texts would wait well over a century for translation and critical editions. Women who wielded influence, such as the Carolingian empress Engelberge (wife of Louis II) or the Byzantine court historian Anna Komnene, who had made contributions comparable to those of prominent men, could be presented to a scholarly audience because their roles fit the accepted canons of narrative history. But it took new interpretive tools—and to an extent, a new twentieth century audience of college-educated women—to solve the problem of neglect for other medieval women.

Outside the Academy

"Amateur" historians, who sometimes lacked advanced degrees and were not above writing for a popular audience, began to appear near the turn of the twentieth century. Among these Lina Eckenstein, who published Women under Monasticism, Saint-Lore and Convent Life between AD 500 and 1500 in 1896, stands out. An ingenious scholar, largely self-trained in medieval studies, Eckenstein produced path-breaking analyses of religious women. Her twin interests in unlocking folklore and the origin of nursery verses served her well in taking on a topic for which the contemporary narrative tools of positivist history were inadequate.

A few years later Mary Bateson faced her own interpretive challenge when she wrote "Origin and Early History of Double Monasteries" for the 1899 Transactions of the Royal Historical Society. A rather traditional legal historian, Bateson nonetheless created a theoretical strategy for disentangling the issue of double monasteries from questions about national origins. She ignored genealogical descent for double houses and defined double monasteries generically, opening investigation to all known examples that fit the definition. "Regular" priests ministering to the spiritual needs of women under vows created these institutions, she asserted. This left the problem of leadership open to a variety of answers adopted over time and place. The double monastery was not an instance of cultural transmission but rather a response to women's devotional needs. Bateson dared her readers to confront religious devotion among women as a serious matter. At least her educated women readers were willing to do just that.

This was an audience who would also appreciate E. Dixon writing on craftswomen in the Parisian Livre des Métiers. The blend of a new audience for medieval women and enterprising interpretive strategies to uncover their history succeeded, albeit outside the academy rather than within it, at least initially. Eleanor Shipley Duckett developed a successful career as a Latinist writing on the Early Middle Ages for a popular audience in the 1930s. She frequently featured saintly women in her works. Marion Dale wrote about "London Silkwomen of the Fifteenth Century" in 1933. Muriel Joy Hughes published Women Healers in Medieval Life and Literature in 1938, capturing an audience of educated women, especially in the field of health care. Emily Hope Allen and Sanford Brown edited and introduced The Book of Margery Kempe to an enthusiastic reading audience in 1940. Readers were intrigued by this account of a strong-minded and devout laywoman's tribulations. As recently as the 1960s, Régine Pernoud, who generally wrote for a popular audience, produced Joan of Arc, by Herself and Her Witnesses. This study restored life to the figure of Joan, whose very humanity had been placed in peril by the conflicting claims of church and state over her inspired leadership. In that same decade the "amateur" scholar Iris Origo produced the well-researched Merchant of Prato, which gave a major role to the correspondence of Monna Margherita Datini in creating a portrait of a family business set in a broad context of fourteenth-century politics and trade. The works mentioned here are well regarded and have been absorbed into the scholarly literature on medieval women, but it is useful to remember that they began life as popular writings, and were sometimes dismissed as inconsequential by contemporary academic scholars.

Within the Academy

Meanwhile critical editions and comments on early texts that satirized or condemned medieval women appeared in scholarly venues. George Keidel edited Evangile aux femmes—An Old-French Satire on Women in 1895, and tracts on witchcraft received scholarly editions. Thus misogynous texts were at hand in the academy, while little was known then about medieval women's actual lives. Karl Bücher complicated this picture when in 1910 he published Die Frauenfrage im Mittelalter, which drew on a tradition of writing about women, although it was inadequately grounded in women's experience. He argued that single women presented a social problem when they moved to towns in the later Middle Ages. Many of these women did not wed, which encouraged a tendency toward banding together and following a religious vocation through performing charitable work. These Beguines and pinzochere often did without the dowries necessary to enter a monastery, yet managed to live together and made their own livings. Heresy, Bücher believed, flourished among these women, who had escaped paternal authority and were only marginally supervised by the church, since they lived in secular society.

The demographic and spiritual dimensions of Bücher's thesis demanded a more thorough analysis of women's lives; subsequent scholarship engaged his thesis on both sides in a debate. In a series of talks from the 1920s, published posthumously, Eileen Power argued that at best, medieval opinion of women was contradictory. In 1971, David Herlihy argued in Women in Medieval Society that Bücher's demographics told only a small part of the story. Both Power and Herlihy insisted that unless the social history of women was reconstructed, it was impossible to answer the question about women's place or status in medieval society. More recent scholarship has engaged Bücher's thesis on the issues of women's spiritual needs and the orthodoxy of their religious beliefs.

Women's History

It is worthwhile, then, to reconstruct what was at hand when the feminism of the 1960s and early 1970s made medieval women's history a compelling topic of broad interest. A tradition of historical writing on medieval religious women, on saints, and on queens existed. Women's work, crafts, and guilds had been explored to an extent, and texts had been recovered for some women writers, but certainly not all. Yvonne Rokseth had written on women musicians from the twelfth through the fourteenth centuries in 1935. Marion Facinger composed an institutional study of medieval queenship in Capetian France, 987–1237, in 1968. Isidore Epstein wrote Jewish Women in the "Responsa" 900 CE to 1500 CE in 1934. Some of these studies argued in the singular, creating a generic medieval woman or an essential medieval womanhood. Eckenstein wrote of woman under monasticism, Stenton about the English woman in history, Isidore Epstein about the Jewish woman in the Responsa; Eileen Power, intriguingly, spoke in the singular about the lady, and the working woman, but also about the education of women and medieval ideas about women. For all of its value in uncovering women's history, the singular address presented the historical subject as acted upon and largely unmoving, as a constant within an evolving society. The new feminist agenda would challenge that presumption.

The initial task to which feminist historians turned their analysis was that of fleshing out the picture of medieval women's lives. Issues of power and authority drew attention, with Jo Ann McNamara and Suzanne Wemple arguing that by the ninth, tenth, and eleventh centuries aristocratic women encountered few structural barriers to the acquisition of power in almost every capacity except the priesthood. Class was a decisive factor in this argument, allowing women who were ambitious or ruthless to play central political roles. They were chatelaines, mistresses of landed property and castles with attendant rights of justice and military command, proprietors of churches, and participants in both secular and ecclesiastical assemblies. Enthusiasm greeted this interpretation because the very possibility of women encountering such opportunities inspired feminists bent on their own quest for more opportunities and rights.

Medieval women became a focus of historical research. In 1976, Women in Medieval Society reiterated the need for a history of women that contextualized their lives on many levels of society. This volume of essays was compiled to prove to the academy that there was information to be gleaned about women's lives in medieval archives, since women historians had heard so often that there was not. One question repeated over the decade centered on long-term change in women's conditions. In 1977 in Becoming Visible, a textbook devoted to the history of women, Joan Kelly-Gadol asked "Did Women Have a Renaissance?" in which she traced the courtly love tradition, which she attributed to powerful feudal women in the twelfth century, but then reattributed to powerful male princes and their courtiers by the Renaissance.

Diane Owen Hughes explored the idea of transition in an article about medieval dowry and other marital gifts, published in the Journal of Family History in 1978. While men paid to marry and their brides owned and managed their wedding gifts in Mediterranean Europe, women enjoyed significant legal and property rights. When, after the twelfth century, brides' fathers paid dowry to grooms (who then controlled the gift even if they did not own it), women lost control of property and faced more restricted legal rights. Many new interpretations like this groundbreaking analysis appeared in article form rather than book-length monographs. Another characteristic of this new literature was a propensity for studies to appear in multiauthored thematic volumes. The latter ploy ensured publication and helped to create an audience for a number of women scholars who were unemployed or only marginally employed in academia.

Some have argued that feminist history was an American endeavor, but that is not entirely the case. German scholars stepped up their studies of medieval women visionaries in a response to renewed interest. Derek Baker compiled a series of essays by English scholars with a feminist bent in Medieval Women (1978). Christiane Klapische-Zuber had begun publishing in French the studies of Florentine women and family that would become Women, Family and Ritual in Renaissance Italy (1985) and with David Herlihy produced the major census (catasto) study of 1427 Florence, Les Toscans et leurs familles, in 1978. This would become a foundation for future analysis of women and family in Italy. The project of understanding women in different walks of life resulted in monographs and scholarly articles, although the latter were more likely to appear in new journals devoted to women's studies like Feminist Studies or SIGNS: A Journal of Women in Culture and Society than in more traditional professional journals.

Acceptance by the Academy

Yet acceptance within the academy had begun, encouraged by the respect that these initial forays into medieval women's history garnered through careful research and interpretive innovation. Contemporaneously, students in colleges and universities clamored for courses on medieval women. No sooner did these articles, volumes and textbooks appear than they became assigned reading in the classroom. Susan Groag Bell produced a sourcebook for the classroom, Women: From the Greeks to the French Revolution in 1973 that became a best-seller in textbook publishing. Textbooks in women's history like Becoming Visible were treated to scholarly reviews, whereas general textbooks seldom received this attention from scholarly journals. The avid interest in women's history encouraged institutions of higher learning to appoint women to their history faculties. Thus began the movement of women's history from the margins to a central place in curricula and in the interpretation of earlier centuries.

As a result the 1980s offered an entirely different venue to the project of women's history. Most regions of Europe received attention from scholars attempting to uncover medieval women's history. Suzanne Wemple wrote Women in Frankish Society: Marriage and the Cloister, 500 to 900 in 1981. Heath Dillard published Daughters of the Reconquest: Women in Castilian Town Society, 1100–1300, in 1984. An expanding audience had begun to demand women's histories for all regions and all walks of life. Leah Lydia Otis wrote Prostitution in Medieval Society in 1985, adding to the known variety of medieval women's work experience.

History of Gender

Perhaps the most significant development in the field in that decade was the emergence of a history of gender alongside women's history. Two initiatives are worth comment here. In 1980, Ian Maclean published a monograph on the history of medicine, Renaissance Notion of Woman: A Study in the Fortunes of Scholasticism and Medical Science in European Intellectual Life. He posed the following as his central question: why did the medieval Thomist formulation (in which woman was defined as passive, material, and deprived in duality with man, who was defined as active, formative, and perfected) persist even while the discrepancy between the social realities of women's lives and this formulation continued to widen? The way in which the question was posed encouraged notional thinking about women as a distinct field of inquiry, to be considered apart from the task of reconstructing women's lives. In this decade as well, Caroline Walker Bynum published Jesus as Mother (1982), displaying the rich variety of feminine gender associations available to medieval people when imagining Jesus's loving care. In 1987, she followed this with Holy Feast and Holy Fast, a study of women's appropriation of metaphor that expressed their own unique vein of religiosity.

Gender was a lens that could be turned on both imposed perceptions and self-perceptions of the feminine, or turned back onto masculinity, treating perceptions of men as gendered notions, rather than as generic norms for the human condition. These initiatives opened the floodgates to histories on medieval women and related topics of family, production, and growing up male or female. Martha Howell's Women, Production and Patriarchy in Late Medieval Cities appeared in 1986. Barbara Hanawalt wrote on the structure of medieval peasant life in The Ties That Bound in 1986, employing insights from women's history and the study of gender to develop a new thesis on family in northern Europe. Barbara Newman examined St. Hildegard's theology of the feminine in a monograph in 1987. Penny Schine Gold wrote The Lady and the Virgin in 1985, a study of love and religion. The analysis of the gender systems in which both medieval women and men lived out their lives inspired an explosion of literature in the field.

Scholarly Editions and Journals

Scholars called for a more systematic recovering of women's texts. At long last a critical edition and modern translation of Christine de Pizan's City of Ladies appeared in 1982, followed by a biography and critical study of her writings by Charity Cannon Willard in 1984. The Medieval Feminist Forum, formerly the Medieval Feminist Newsletter, began publishing in 1986. A critical edition of Hildegard of Bingen's Scivias, edited and translated by Mother Columba Hart and Jane Bishop, finally appeared from Paulist Press by the end of the decade (1990). Margot King edited the Peregrina Translations Series of the Matrologia Latina, including among its earlier publications the lives of Christina Mirabilis (1986), Marie d'Oignies (1987), and Saint Macrina (1987). In 2001, Monica Green produced a side-by-side translation of The Trotula: A Medieval Compendium of Women's Medicine.

Articles about medieval women and gender became fare for mainstream scholarly journals. Speculum: the Journal of the Medieval Academy of America published an issue devoted to medieval women, sex, gender, and feminism in 1993. Authorities on the topic trained graduate students in the field, and controversies arose. At history meetings from the American Historical Association winter meeting to the spring meeting of the Medieval Academy of America, sessions on medieval women and gender became commonplace. Neither matched in enthusiastic response the annual International Congress on Medieval Studies at Western Michigan University in Kalamazoo, Michigan, or its English counterpart, the International Medieval Congress at Leeds University in Leeds, England.

Diversity

Diversity became a theme in the 1990s, with many feminist scholars arguing for a complex view of medieval women's lives and many roles played out in religion, community, family, society at large, and the economy. Women's ethnicity and sexuality became topics of interest. Anglo-American dominance in recent publishing on the topic was challenged by the emergence of new journals devoted to women in other European languages. In France Clio: Histoire, Femme et Sociétés began publishing in 1995. Homme: Zeitschrift für feministische Geschichtswissenschaft began in Germany in 1990 followed by Feministische Studien in 1994. Arenal: Revista de Historia de las Mujeres Universidad de Granada also began in 1994 as did Nora: Nordic Journal of Women's Studies. Memoria, Revista di Storia delle Donne had begun much earlier in Italy (1981) but ceased publication in 1991. This was prompted in part by the inclusion of many articles on medieval Italian women in long-established journals. New emphasis on a plural view of medieval women profited from the sheer number of new studies published about them.

With its religious and economic dimensions, the frauenfrage continued to offer matter for debate. Likewise the "golden age" for working women figured as a controversy among scholars writing on medieval England, with P. J. P. Goldberg offering a more positive view of women's opportunities in Women Work and Life-Cycle in a Medieval Economy: Women in York and Yorkshire, c. 1300–1520 in 1992, while Barbara Hanawalt studying London women, Judith Bennett studying peasant women in Brigstock, and Maryanne Kowaleski studying market women in Exeter came to less optimistic conclusions. Judith Bennett in Medieval Women in Modern Perspective, published in 2000, challenged the idea of transition for women and offered instead a formulation on "patriarchal bargains," contracted by medieval women in all centuries, albeit in highly diverse ways. Bennett has questioned as well whether a sharp demarcation is feasible between Medieval and Early Modern Europe. Since then, in Gendering the Master Narrative (2003), Jo Ann McNamara has questioned our formulation of a "Middle Ages" given what had been learned about women. She suggests instead that the first millennium of the Christian era formed a coherent time period, followed by a more recent millennium that introduced a sequence of changes for women and men.

Perhaps the most contested question in current historical scholarship on medieval women centers on a debate over constancy or change in both perceptions of, and the experience of, medieval women. R. Howard Bloch wrote in "Medieval Misogyny" in 1987 (subsequently published in a book length monograph in 1991) that woman-hating, especially wife-hating, largely a hermeneutical rather than a political device, was such a dominant literary theme in the Middle Ages that it is best understood as a constant across time, from Jerome and John Chrysostom to the Renaissance. This raised anew the old discourse about women's nature and the corresponding problem of how misogyny affected women's lives. Helen Solterer's response to Bloch read: "However exactly Bloch attempts to define medieval misogyny as a sophisticated game of literature, it inevitably escapes these bounds, inflicting its text on women's and men's lives" (Medieval Feminist Newsletter 6 [1988]: 15). Bloch answered with a materialist argument introducing a further duality into the debate: "To put the thesis crudely: as long as woman was merely a possession to be disposed of between men, she was vilified in the terms of misogyny; as soon as she became capable of disposing in her own right, she was idealized in the terms of courtly love" (Medieval Feminist Newsletter 7 [1989] 9). Concerns with change and stability, and the interplay of what was said about women with women's own experience, had not been resolved in two decades of debate.

In the 2000s, Matrix, an online resource listing medieval women's monastic houses, was established, originally with National Endowment for the Humanities funding. This would help rectify the imbalance where extensive documentation existed on men's monastic houses yet very little was known about women's houses and orders. Feminae, formerly Medieval Feminist Index, began publishing on the Web in 1996 and now covers articles about medieval women and gender in five languages, in 496 journals, and in volumes of collected essays as well. The sheer amount of accrued information on medieval women tells its own story, indeed this encyclopedia chose to highlight the vast increase in historical knowledge about medieval women. The study of women is no longer marginal but central to the endeavor of recovering the medieval past. It is a field of study that has come of age and promises more to come.

SUSAN MOSHER STUARD

Note: The books and articles mentioned in this entry may be found in the Appendix, Milestones in Women's History.

References and Further Reading

- Bennett, Judith M. "Confronting Continuity." Journal of Women's History 9:3 (Autumn, 1997): 73–94.
- . Medieval Women in Modern Perspective. Washington, D.C.: American Historical Association, 2000.
- Clark, Elizabeth A. "Women, Gender, and the Study of Christian History." Church History 70:3 (September 2001): 395–426.
- Clark, Elizabeth A., et al. "Commentary," Medieval Feminist Newsletter, 6 (1988): 2–15, and R. Howard Bloch, "Commentary," Medieval Feminist Newsletter 7 (1987): 9–12.
- Davis, Paulina Wright, "Remarks at the Conventions," The Una (September 1953): 1376–1377.
- Ferrante, Joan M. To the Glory of Her Sex: Women's Roles in the Composition of Medieval Texts. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1997.
- Gendering Scottish History*, edited by Terry Brotherstone, Deborah Simonton, and Oonagh Walsh Mackie. Occasional Colloquia Series, No. 1. Glasgow: Crithne Press, 1999–2000.
- Green, Monica H. "Documenting Medieval Women's Medical Practice." In Women's Healthcare in the Medieval West, edited by Monica H. Green. Great Yarmouth, Norfolk: Ashgate, 2000, pp. 322–352.
- Karras, Ruth Mazo. "Sexuality in the Medieval World." In The Medieval World, edited by Peter Linehan and Janet L. Nelson. London and New York: Routledge, 2001, pp. 279–293.
- Kelly-Gadol, Joan. "Did Women Have a Renaissance?" in Becoming Visible, edited by Claudia Koonz and Renate Bridenthal. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1977, pp. 137–164.
- McNamara, Jo Ann. "The Herrenfrage: The Restructuring of the Gender System, 1050–1150." In Medieval Masculinities, edited by Clare A. Lees. Medieval Cultures, Volume 7. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1994, pp. 3–29.
- Medieval Women and the Sources of Medieval History*, edited by Joel Rosenthal. Athens, Ga.: University of Georgia Press, 1990.
- Rubin, Miri. "A Decade of Studying Medieval Women, 1078–1997." History Workshop Journal 46 (Autumn 1998): 213–239.
- Schaus, Margaret, and Susan Mosher Stuard. "'Citizens of No Mean City'" Journal of Women's History 6:3 (Fall, 1994): 170–198.
- Sharpe, Pamela. "Continuity and Change: Women's History and Economic History in Britain." Economic History Review 48:2 (May 1995): 353–369.
- Studying Medieval Women: Sex, Gender, Feminism*, edited by Nancy F. Partner. Speculum 68:2 (April 1993).
- van Houts, Elisabeth. "The State of Research: Women in Medieval History and Literature." Journal of Medieval History 30 (September 1994): 277–292.
- Women in Medieval History and Historiography*, edited by Susan Mosher Stuard. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1987.
- Women Medievalists and the Academy*, edited by Jane Chance. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 2005.

See also Boccaccio, Giovanni; Christine de Pizan; Feminist Theories and Methodologies; Gender in History; Komnene, Anna; Power, Eileen; Women Medievalists in the Academy

HOLY KINSHIP

The Holy Kinship included the maternal blood relations of Jesus. Its relational concept developed gradually in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, derived partly from the twelfth-century doctrine of the Immaculate Conception. The argument that Mary's conception lacked original sin conferred an aura of sanctity on her mother, Anne, who appears only in the apocryphal Protoevangelium of James and Gospel of Pseudo-Matthew, and came to be seen, especially in Northern Europe, as matriarch of mostly female Kinship consisting of her daughters and grandchildren. Anne's long-barren marriage to Joachim eventually produced Mary, mother of Jesus. Widowhood and two subsequent marriages allowed Anne to bear Mary Cleophas and Mary Salome. The next generation of the three stepsisters' children included Jesus; the Apostles James the Less, James the Greater, Simon, and Jude; and John the Evangelist. The Kinship could comprise nearly thirty members, depending on inclusion of relatives such as Anne's cousin Elizabeth and her son, John the Baptist.

Awareness of the Kinship spread via the Golden Legend and artistic representations. The Kinship's thirteenth-century rise in literature and art perhaps responded to the contemporaneous dominance of patrilineal relationships in Jesus's genealogy and medieval genealogy generally. The Kinship reached its height in popularity around 1500, not coincidentally a time when numbers of female saints had increased, married women could acquire saintly reputations, and saints demonstrated maternal, nurturing behavior. Images of the Kinship communicated the sanctity possible for wives and mothers, cultural approval of marriage as a pious vocation, and medieval respect for familial connections. The Kinship also provided an alternative to the more masculine Trinity, and highlighted Christ's closeness with, and bodily origin from, women.

CHARA ARMON

References and Further Reading

- Ashley, Kathleen and Pamela Sheingorn, eds. Interpreting Cultural Symbols: Saint Anne in Late Medieval Society. Athens, Ga.: The University of Georgia Press, 1990.
- Brandenburg, Ton. "St. Anne and Her Family: The Veneration of St. Anne in Connection with Concepts of Marriage and the Family in the Early Modern Period."

In Saints and She-Devils: Images of Women in the Fifteenth and Sixteenth Centuries, edited by Lène Dresen-Coenders, translated by C. Sion. London: Rubicon Press, 1987, pp. 101–127.

- . "Saint Anne: A Holy Grandmother and Her Children." In Sanctity and Motherhood: Essays on Holy Mothers in the Middle Ages, edited by Anneke B. Mulder-Bakker. New York: Garland, 1995, pp. 31–65.
- Sheingorn, Pamela. "The Holy Kinship: The Ascendency of Matriliney in Sacred Genealogy of the Fifteenth Century." Thought 64 (1989): 268–286.

See also Anne, Saint; Genealogy; Immaculate Conception, Doctrine of; Jacobus de Voragine's Golden Legend; Kinship; Mary, Virgin

HOME MANUFACTURING

There were two kinds of economic production in the Middle Ages: production for consumption and production for the market. Both were done primarily in the home, and they were usually intertwined. Production for the market was found mainly in towns and cities; agricultural families grew or made most of what they consumed. But even in agricultural families, there is evidence that the wife, while brewing ale for her family, made extra and sold it to her neighbors. In the winter, when there was less work to do on the land, farmers and their families might spin or weave to bring in the cash needed to pay rents or to provide the food and other items that they did not grow or make for themselves.

In towns, most production for the market was done in family workshops. While the husband was the legal and titular head of both the family and the workshop, it was presumed, at least in many crafts, that the wife would work alongside him in something approximating the "rough-and-ready" equality posited by Eileen Power in her 1926 essay. The work force/household typically consisted of parents and children, one or two apprentices, and household servants. The occasional journeyman employee lived elsewhere. Most urban houses had at least two rooms—a workroom in front and a room for cooking and sleeping behind. Some had a second story, with more beds and perhaps storage.

Most studies of medieval women's work—or of work of any kind—focus on the period from about 1300–1500, because of the dearth of evidence for the earlier Middle Ages. There is a consensus that a significant portion of an urban married woman's time was spent assisting her husband with his trade. Guild regulations allowed many masters to teach their trades to their wives. In many trades, a widow could continue to run the workshop, teach apprentices, and sell the goods previously made under the supervision of her husband. Tax rolls for Paris for the late thirteenth century strongly suggest that, pragmatically if not legally, the shop, tools, and inventory of a craftsman belonged to the family as a whole, not to the individual. The father/husband was the titular head of the intact family, but after either the mother or the father died, if there were adult children, the remaining parent and children were taxed as a company—a group of persons owning property together and jointly operating a business.

Some married women had separate businesses of their own. The 1297 Parisian tax roll lists Geoffrey the weaver; his wife sells candles and Roger the carter; his wife is a baker. This separate business might be small, carried on in addition to helping in the family workshop, or the wife might have her own workshop, with her own apprentices.

Martha Howell and Natalie Davis argue that some married women enjoyed a relatively high labor-status (that is, their work was both valued and well-compensated) because, through their husbands, they had access to raw materials and to markets. In Cologne, women monopolized the trades of yarn making, gold spinning, and silk making. Many silk mistresses were married to, or widows of, silk merchants; gold spinners were married to gold beaters or goldsmiths. The yarn business was run jointly by merchant-husbands and their artisan-wives. Thus in Cologne, according to Howell, the main trades were dominated by family production units, which controlled the industry from importing raw materials to selling the finished goods. Women's high labor-status, she argues, was possible only in such a system.

Many unmarried women also worked at home to produce goods for the market. If Howell and Davis are correct, most of them lacked capital to acquire the tools and raw materials needed to produce high-end goods. They also lacked the access to raw materials and to the long-distance market enjoyed by merchants' wives. Most of them, thus, were relegated to low-status, low-income work such as spinning, carding, and combing, often as part of the "putting-out" system, the earliest form of capitalism. Importers, especially of silk, instead of selling their raw materials to artisans, would supply the materials to spinners and weavers, paying them by the piece for their work, and then would sell the finished cloth. While weaving required a loom, spinning, carding, and combing required virtually no investment for the worker who worked on materials supplied by the nascent merchant-capitalist.

Most current research assumes that women's roles in economic life contracted after 1500. Howell and Davis argue that this contraction ties directly to the decline of the family workshop that accompanied early modern capitalism. Much work remains to be done, for both the medieval and the early modern periods, before a true synthesis can be constructed.

JANICE ARCHER

References and Further Reading

- Barthélemy, Dominique and Philippe Contamine. "The Use of Private Space," In A History of Private Life: Revelations of the Medieval World, edited by Georges Duby, translated by Arthur Goldhammer. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988, pp. 460–470.
- Bennett, Judith M. Ale, Beer, and Brewsters in England: Women's Work in a Changing World, 1300–1600. Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.
- Dale, Marian K. "The London Silkwomen of the Fifteenth Century," Economic History Review, 1st ser., 4 (1933): 324–335. Reprinted in Sisters and Workers in the Middle Ages, edited by Judith M. Bennett, et al. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1976, pp. 26–38.
- Hanawalt, Barbara A., ed. Women and Work in Preindustrial Europe. Bloomington, Ind.: Indiana University Press, 1986.
- Howell, Martha C. Women, Production, and Patriarchy in Late Medieval Cities. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1986.
- MS. KK283, Archives Nationales, Paris, which contains the rôles de la taille de cent mille livres tournois (book of the levy for Paris) for 1296, 1297, 1298, 1299, and 1300.
- Power, Eileen. "The Position of Women," in The Legacy of the Middle Ages, edited by C. G. Crump and E. F. Jacob. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1926, pp. 401–433.

See also Alewives and Brewing; Apprentices; Artisans' Families, Women of; Clothwork, Domestic; Division of Labor; Economy; Family (Later Middle Ages); Feme Sole; Guild Members and Guilds; Servants; Textile Production for the Market; Widows; Work

HOMOSEXUALITY

See Sexuality: Female Same-Sex Relations; Sexuality: Male Same-Sex Relations

HONOR AND REPUTATION

Honor constituted a complex and key organizing principle of many medieval societies. It could be understood as a "right to respect," as social prestige or as good reputation. Only toward the later Middle Ages did honor come in many places to resemble the more modern notion of an internal quality connected to moral integrity. Honor could be both personal and collective: one's honor affected one's family and even one's ancestral lineage. Not only the elites possessed a concept of honor. Lower-status men and women also claimed honor for themselves.

Honor was inextricably linked to reputation (Latin, fama). Talk and gossip—often considered the special purview of women—formed a powerful medium for conferring or diminishing status and enforcing social norms. Reputation also possessed a legal dimension. In many societies, certain conditions could legally deprive a person of honorable status: criminal conviction, illegitimacy, or engaging in certain professions (for instance, prostitution). Lack of honorable standing (infamia or infamy) caused one to forfeit legal privileges, such as the right to inherit, to hold office, to testify, or to serve as a legal guardian.

Historians have drawn extensively upon anthropology to reconstruct the functioning of honor in medieval cultures. They frequently describe it in economic terms or as a “zero-sum game.” A scarce commodity, honor could be taken from others to increase one’s own. Honor had to be actively defended and regained if lost. Insults and injuries to self and kin were perceived as “debts” that required repayment.

Scholars frequently couple honor with “shame,” “guilt,” and “humiliation.” The most well-known schema contrasts honor-based “shame cultures” with “guilt cultures.” In shame cultures, external factors such as public opinion regulate acceptable behavior and social interactions. Shame results when individuals do not conform to the honor standards of their group. Failure to take steps to restore honor leads to public humiliation. In guilt cultures, a person’s internal sense of right and wrong determines acceptable conduct. Often early medieval warrior societies are cast as shame cultures and the centralized states of the later Middle Ages as en route to becoming more “modern” guilt cultures. However, the contours of honor, shame, guilt, and humiliation varied greatly throughout the medieval world.

Honor was socially constructed and determined by the judgment of others, particularly social equals. People displayed honor publicly by following the norms of unwritten “honor codes.” Entire communities could shame those who behaved dishonorably, through public rituals such as shunning, defacing of houses, and charivari. Medieval societies were also highly image-conscious. Insignia and opulent dress conveyed the honorable status of elites. Conversely, sumptuary laws marked dishonorable and lower-status persons (such as Jews, servants, and prostitutes) by forbidding them to wear certain items or by mandating distinctive garments or signs that set them apart.

Honor was often gendered. Typically, men proved their honor by providing for those under their protection and by aggressively responding to injuries and challenges. Since women’s social value, particularly in Mediterranean and Islamic societies, often centered upon their reproductive capacity as perpetuators of male lineages, their honor was linked primarily to chastity. To preserve their honor, women ideally had to be sequestered in the private realm of the household. In medieval Italian city-states, communities of honorable women (such as nunneries) were perceived to increase the civic honor of the entire citizenry. Loss of female chastity gravely damaged both the woman’s and her male kin’s honor. Men were often permitted to harshly discipline unchaste women under their protection and might even be excused for murder.

The conceptualization of women’s honor, however, varied considerably throughout medieval Europe. In Iceland, for instance, it depended less on chastity. In both the Mediterranean and the European north, women could play an active role in inciting vendetta and urging reluctant male kin to take revenge. And although women did not normally participate directly in blood feuds, legal records reveal that they did retaliate personally, both verbally and physically, against men and other women for insult and injury.

If honor could be lost, it could also be regained. Males could pursue violent revenge. Women accused of unchastity who married their rapist or seducer could also restore their honor. By the twelfth century, the influence of the Church, chivalric codes, and the judicial systems of proliferating centralized states prompted changes in conceptualizations of honor. As refined, courtly manners and speech became important indicators of honorableness, even for non-aristocrats, the law courts increasingly augmented vendetta to supply an alternative arena for men and women to challenge and regain honor and reputation.

LYNN MARIE LAUFENBERG

References and Further Reading

- Fenster, Thelma and Daniel Lord Smail, eds. Fama: The Politics of Talk and Reputation in Medieval Europe. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2003.
- Gordon, Stewart. Robes and Honor: The Medieval World of Investiture. New York: Palgrave, 2001.
- Hanawalt, Barbara. “Of Good and Ill Repute”: Gender and Social Control in Medieval England. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Migliorino, Francesco. Fama e infamia: Problemi della società medievale nel pensiero giuridico nei secoli XII e XIII. Catania: Giannotta, 1985.
- Miller, William Ian. Bloodtaking and Peacemaking: Feud, Law, and Society in Saga Iceland. Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1990.
- . Humiliation and Other Essays on Honor, Social Discomfort, and Violence. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1993.
- Peristiany, Joan G., ed. Honour and Shame: The Values of Mediterranean Society. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1966.

——— and Julian Pitt-Rivers, eds. Honour and Grace in Mediterranean Society. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991.

Peters, Edward. "Wounded Names: The Medieval Doctrine of Infamy." In Law in Medieval Life and Thought, edited by Edward B. King and Susan J. Ridyard. Sewanee, Tenn.: Press of the University of the South, 1990, pp. 43–89.

Stewart, Frank Henderson. Honor. Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1994.

See also Charivari; Chastity and Chaste Marriage; Chivalry; Clothing; Cuckold; Gender Ideologies; Gossip and Slander; Illegitimacy; Law; Private and Public Spheres; Prostitutes; Rape and Raptus; Sexuality: Extramarital Sex; Sumptuary Law

HOSPITALS

Depending on the needs of the community and patrons' wishes and resources, medieval hospitals offered food, shelter, and other assistance to a range of temporarily or perennially disadvantaged individuals, including travelers and pilgrims, abandoned or orphaned children, prostitutes, the poor, the aged, the crippled, and the chronically infirm. These institutions often combined functions typically divided between more specialized modern hostels, hospices, and hospitals. Supporters of medieval hospitals could be motivated by compassion, penance, familial or individual prestige and security, local need, civic pride and, as hospitals were often associated with a religious house or possessed a chapel, a desire to benefit from the intercessions of institutions' grateful staff and patients. In Europe, many contributed to wandering preachers sent out by hospitals on fundraising tours, their generosity often rewarded by partial indulgences. Others sought out local hospitals to access spiritual services and relics and give alms. As an extension of the charity they provided within their own households and networks of relations and friends, married and widowed women often bequeathed items available to them as part of their household goods, dowry, or inheritance (including small sums of money, bedding, or food) to local hospitals, either independently or as members of a confraternity or guild. As heiresses or widows or in conjunction with their spouses, burger and noble women also founded hospitals and occasionally exercised patronage rights. Some Jewish communities also maintained hospitals, while wealthy aristocratic or imperial women established or endowed hospitals and hostels both in Byzantium and in Islamic cities and religious shrines, particularly along routes to Mecca.

Because European hospitals ranged from institutions attached to episcopal chapters or monastic houses to shelters founded by lay patrons, confraternities, guilds, municipal governments, or religious orders, the nature of their staff and inmates varied widely. In some hospitals, such as the long-lived Hôtel-Dieu in Paris, individuals who had taken religious vows devoted themselves to prayer and spiritual services and the care of the sick, abandoned, and poor. They were often joined—or in lay-run hospitals replaced—by hired servants and/or lay brothers and sisters, that is, individuals who took vows of celibacy and devoted themselves to manual tasks, charitable work, and abbreviated prayers.

Many independent religious women, including anchoresses, recluses, and Beguines, attached themselves to hospitals, while as widows or part of a married couple, confraternity, or tertiary order, other women founded or served in hospitals as an alternative or precursor to entering a traditional religious house devoted to contemplation. The social and religious security of working for a hospital tended to attract unmarried and widowed women, providing for the lower social orders an opportunity for a religious life unavailable to the majority barred from relatively exclusive nunneries. Some individuals, called donats, donated their property to a hospital and promised to serve it in return for life-long room, board, and nursing. Pensioners (known also as corrodians) sometimes purchased permanent accommodation in various institutions as a form of social security, making distinctions between these individuals and fully professed hospital staff, hired servants, and lay brothers and lay sisters problematic. For founders, resources, and affiliations influenced hospitals' functions and their personnel; all hospitals were faced with balancing charitable expenditures with self-perpetuation as an institution that benefited its donors. In the impoverished leper houses where devout laywomen such as Yvette of Huy and Marie of Oignies served, the struggle for subsistence left little time for formal prayer, yet in other hospitals, donats, pensioners, and members of confraternities or guilds attached conditions to their donations and eventually transformed hospitals into exclusive rest homes or religious houses dedicated to interceding for their donors' souls.

In Europe, both caregivers and the afflicted were encouraged to view the hardships they endured as a salvific imitation of Christ's suffering comparable to the contemplative life. Hospitals sought to prepare inmates for reconciliation with God on earth and in the afterlife through a regimen of spiritual healing: confession, reception of the sacraments, and participation in religious services. Many hospitals possessed their own chapels and clergymen who performed masses and liturgical prayers for the spiritual benefit of patients, staff, and benefactors. In long-term care facilities specializing in the care of lepers, the aged, mentally ill, or handicapped, patients might join the staff in taking vows of poverty, chastity and/or obedience, adopting a religious habit, and participating in religious services and general duties.

HOSPITALS

For religious and disciplinary reasons, hospitals sought to prevent sexual relations between male and female caregivers, servants, patients, and boarders. If funds permitted, separate refectories, dormitories, chapels, and kitchens were provided for male and female staff, while patients were segregated by ward and sometimes nursed by their own sex. Hospital statutes often forbade young or attractive women from being hired as servants or sisters, and severely punished those caught in flagrante delicto. Some hospitals required women hired as nurses, cooks, and laundresses to possess honest reputations, while others barred the admission of married couples or specifically prohibited sisters and female servants from bathing, (un)dressing, or making the beds of male coworkers. However, women continued to attach themselves as servants, lay sisters, donats, recluses, and pensioners even to hospitals dominated by male staff, while scarce resources often meant that it was difficult to maintain segregated living spaces for staff and inmates. In hospitals with mixed staff, women were sometimes granted their own mistress or prioress, although they ultimately answered to male leadership. Rarely, hospitals with an entirely female staff were headed by independent prioresses.

In many hospitals, women shouldered the brunt of round-the-clock nursing, food preparation, and laundering of clothing and bedding, while male staff administered hospital property, raised funds, and performed spiritual services or heavy manual tasks. Wards devoted to the care of women, infants, and abandoned children particularly tended to be entrusted to female staff, some of whom may have possessed medical knowledge. Hospitals which admitted women often retained midwives, and in rare instances, female physicians. Some institutions, such as the Filles-Dieu in Paris, were founded entirely for the sake of rehabilitating fallen women and repentant prostitutes; others offered temporary room and board to prevent prostitutes from working during holy seasons. Many hospitals, including the famous institution maintained in Jerusalem by the Hospitaler order, admitted pregnant women close to childbirth; some guaranteed exhausted mothers a bed until their full recovery and provided cradles for their infants. Others accepted abandoned infants and children, including Muslim and Jewish children who were raised as Christians. These services prevented infanticide and aided local and traveling women unable to care for their children out of poverty, sickness, or sudden widowhood, as well as single women, female slaves, and servants who became pregnant out of wedlock. Female staff, hired wet-nurses, and foster homes cared for these foundlings and for orphans, including those whose parents had died at the hospital. Those who survived to adulthood were often given the choice of joining the hospital as staff or servants or entering the world. Typically, boys were apprenticed to a trade, while girls entered domestic service or were given dowry money to enable an honorable marriage. Some hospitals also joined almshouses and monasteries in seeking out the sick and poor at home or doling out food or money to the destitute, thus providing crucial social, financial, and religious resources for both men and women.

JESSALYNN BIRD

References and Further Reading

- Barber, Malcolm and Helen J. Nicholson, eds. The Military Orders. 2 vols. Aldershot: Ashgate, 1994.
- Bird, Jessalynn. "Medicine for Body and Soul: Jacques de Vitry's Sermons to Hospitallers and their Charges." In Religion and Medicine in the Middle Ages, edited by Peter Biller and Joseph Ziegler. York: York University Press, 2001, pp. 91–108.
- . "Texts on Hospitals: Translation of Jacques de Vitry, Historia Occidentalis 29 and Edition of Jacques de Vitry's Sermons to Hospitallers." In Religion and Medicine in the Middle Ages, edited by Peter Biller and Joseph Ziegler. York: York University Press, 2001, pp. 109–134.
- Brodman, James W. Charity and Welfare: Hospitals and the Poor in Medieval Catalonia. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1998.
- Orme, Nicholas and Margaret Webster. The English Hospital, 1070–1570. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1995.
- Risse, Guenter B. Mending Bodies, Saving Souls: A History of Hospitals. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- Tolmacheva, Marina. "Female Piety and Patronage in the medieval 'Hajj'." In Women in the Medieval Islamic World: Power, Patronage and Piety, edited by Gavin R. G. Hambly. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1998, pp. 161–180.

See also Almsgiving and Charity; Breastfeeding and Wet-Nurses; Confraternities; Disabilities; Doctors and Healers; Laywomen, Religious; Lepers; Medicine; Midwives; Pregnancy and Childbirth, Christian; Prostitutes

HOUSEHOLD ACCOUNTS

The medieval household comprised servants and retainers who formed a community around an individual or married couple where an ordered mode of life made it possible to nurture the immediate family and receive visitors. The small and simple household is certainly very ancient, but few records survive from before 1200, and it is from these complex accounts that historians draw most of the information on how this vital institution functioned. In England by 1500, there were probably up to 2,000 households which would have produced annual accounts, yet only some 500 have survived. While these have some common features, each household adopted its particular method of accounting. At the top of society was the royal household, but even here the survival of accounts is disappointing. Among the most extensive sets of household accounts to survive are those for Elizabeth de Burgh, lady of Clare (d. 1360), covering the years from 1325–1360. In some cases women were involved in the running of two households, in which case two whole sets of accounts may be missing for a large number of families. The account book of Elizabeth Berkeley, countess of Warwick, 1420–1421, refers to an inner household (Hospicium intrinsecum) and a foreign household (Forinsecum). The surviving accounts are for the inner establishment. Accounts were essential because maintenance of the household often was the largest expenditure made by a landed family. The accounts of Joan de Valence, countess of Pembroke, show that she was spending £1,000 per annum on her household between 1295 and 1297. Giles de Wenlock, keeper of the household of Margaret of Brotherton, duchess of Norfolk, accounted for over £1,000 spent on her household in 1385–1386. Good management demanded proper budgeting, and, therefore, record keeping and the accounts helped prevent corruption and mismanagement.

The most comprehensive of these accounts are the household books. The 1412–1413 account for Alice de Bryene, a Suffolk widow of gentry status, comprises the daily record of who consumed what at her house in Acton. Each entry begins with a record of the number of meals served and the date, followed by a list of the guests. Next is a pantry account recording the number of loaves sent to the table, a note, but no details, of wine and ale consumed, lists of fish and meat that had been taken from the manor's store, and the daily purchases made to supplement these provisions. The record concludes with the cost of fodder for horses stabled that day and, finally, the day's total costs. An entry was made at the end of each month for the aggregate. Elizabeth Berkeley's account book fills 140 folios, and after preliminaries, recording the receipts of the keeper, a record of provisions left over from the previous year and a list of the fifty-five household members, it follows much the same pattern. The entries do, however, reflect this more complex household in the practice of entering the expenses of some six household departments—pantry, buttery, kitchen, poultry, wardrobe, and marshalsea (that which dealt with the horses, fodder, and traveling). One delightful feature is the use of a pen drawing of casks and barrels each time a new one was broached. Complexity also resulted from the keeping of separate departmental accounts. The details of wine and ale consumed in the de Bryene household were probably contained in a butler's or cellarer's account. These together with brewing, kitchen, wardrobe, chamber and chapel accounts, diet accounts, chequerrolls (lists of servants), travel, and building records are among the more common household accounts.

Perhaps one of the most interesting features of household accounts is the record of the visitors who came daily to dine, for this reveals the social and political contacts of the individual. Many were administrators and farm workers but these records confirm the importance of hospitality in the Middle Ages. Alice de Bryene fed more than 300 people at the New Year's feast in 1412; and in the household of Eleanor de Montford, countess of Leicester, which averaged 207 members in 1265, provision was made on April 14 to feed 800 poor. Elizabeth Berkeley liked to entertain the clergy, but, in 1421, her most distinguished guest was the king's brother, John, duke of Bedford. £1.15s 2d was spent on his meal, exclusive of a tip to the duke's own cook. Elizabeth Burgh entertained the duke of Lancaster and the Black Prince in 1355 and 1358, respectively, and had the mayor and sheriffs of London to dine in 1358. Household accounts are vital sources for determining the social and economic lives of wealthier women, giving insights into their lifestyles, interests, networks, and friendships.

ROWENA E. ARCHER

References and Further Reading

- The Goodman of Paris (Le Ménagier de Paris): A Treatise on Moral and Domestic Economy by a Citizen of Paris (c. 1393)*, edited by Eileen Power. London: Routledge, 1928.
- Household Accounts from Medieval England*, edited by C. M. Woolgar. British Academy, Records of Social and Economic History, new series, 17–18. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1992–1993.
- The Household Books of John Howard, Duke of Norfolk, 1462–1471, 1481–1483*, introduced by Anne Crawford. Far Thrupp: Alan Sutton Publishing, 1992.
- Mertes, Kate. The English Noble Household, 1250–1600. Oxford: Basil Blackwell 1983.
- Myers, A. R. "The Captivity of a Royal Witch: the Household Accounts of Queen Joan of Navarre, 1419–21." Bulletin of the John Rylands Library 24: (1940): 263–284, 26(1941): 82–1000.
- . "The Household Accounts of Queen Margaret of Anjou, 1452–3." Bulletin of the John Rylands Library 40: (1957–1958): 40–113, 391–431.

HOUSEHOLD ACCOUNTS

Swabey, F. Medieval Gentlewoman: Life in a Widow's Household in the Later Middle Ages. Stroud: Sutton Publishing, 1999.

The Treasure of the City of Ladies or the Book of the Three Virtues, edited by Sarah Lawson. Harmondsworth: Penguin Publishing, 1985.

Woolgar, C. M. The Great Household in Late Medieval England. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1999.

See also Administration of Estates; Gentry, Women of; England; Household Management; Noble Women

HOUSEHOLD MANAGEMENT

Medieval households ranged in size from the great estates of the high nobility to the poor cottages of peasants. Despite vast differences in scale and political significance, all of these households shared a conceptual place in the medieval mind and social structure. The household represented a unit within which a family and its resources were organized, sheltered, maintained, and nurtured for the sake of future generations. Household management, therefore, whether on the grand scale of landed estates, in the urban milieu of the artisan or merchant family, or on the small plots allotted for the dwellings of rural tenants, was a task of critical importance. At all levels of medieval society, the bulk of that task fell on the female head of the household.

At the core of the medieval household was the family, whether based on the nuclear model, as was common in England, or the more complex extended family that prevailed in Italy, especially among the nobility. Even where the nuclear family was the norm, the household often included servants and others, such as young kinsfolk being fostered and educated by the lady of the house. The idea of the household also extended beyond the house itself, to include the lands, outbuildings, and animals that comprised the resources of the domestic economy. Household management was at its core an economic responsibility that demanded careful accounting of material and human resources.

Noble Households

Account books and advice books for the ladies of great estates offer considerable insight into the complexity of household management for the nobility. From such sources as the thirteenth-century account book of Eleanor de Montfort, the Countess of Leicester, and Christine de Pizan's The Treasure of the City of Ladies, we know that the responsibility for overseeing servants, lands, and animals was a complex task usually assigned to the noble wife. The frequent absence of noble men, due to Crusades, wars, or attendance at court, meant that noble women were called upon to run the daily affairs of the estate, including full accounting for the expenditures and profits of its extensive lands and related enterprises. Moreover, noble women were expected to use their household resources to entertain the large traveling retinues that accompanied their husbands and other noble men and, at times, to defend their estates with a full array of diplomatic and warlike strategies. As Christine de Pizan explains, the practical management skills exhibited by the noble wife, like the less tangible virtues of obedience and respectability, were considered to be a public reflection of the husband's honor. The noble home was no mere private realm, and effective household management could influence the political as well as the economic success of the family as a social entity.

As the manager of that noble household, the lady worked closely with the steward, or chief agent, of the estate and oversaw his collection of profits and disbursement of expenses. Among the various enterprises to be supervised were the products of the fields, the by-products of such animals as sheep and cattle, the maintenance of agricultural equipment, and the profits of mills and wine presses. As manager of the human resources attached to the household, the lady was responsible for hiring and training servants for her various domestic and agricultural enterprises and for the discipline and good governance of those in her employ. As manager of the domestic aspects of the family in her household, the lady played a dominant role in the rearing of children. She was responsible for their early introduction to literacy, to religious instruction, and to the gendered roles they would fill within the feudal hierarchy. Often, she provided this education to the children of other noble families placed in her care for the sake of social advancement. As the manager of her family's reputation, she used her skills and social networks to negotiate marriage alliances, gain the favor of the church, and place members of her family in desirable positions within other households of greater political influence.

Urban Households

The noble household may have been more complex than the smaller households of townspeople and peasants, but the success of these smaller enterprises was no less dependent on careful management. The urban households of artisans and merchants similarly fulfilled private and public functions as they sheltered and nurtured a family, trained apprentices in the various crafts, produced goods for the market, and upheld economic, civic, and religious responsibilities as members of guilds. Here, too, the woman, whether wife or widow, usually took on the tasks of hiring and training servants, and in the case of the artisan household was especially responsible for apprentices. These duties bound her to the rules of the craft guild as well as to the expectations of her husband and thus exemplify the marketable value of her skills. The master of a craft would have had difficulty maintaining his business or his guild membership without the managerial skills that his wife contributed to their joint economic enterprise. Urban household management also required the acquisition and preparation of food for the family members, servants, apprentices, and craft workers in the home, the maintenance of shelter and clothing for this extended household, and the discipline of all its members.

Peasant Households

The rural households of peasant producers similarly required the vigilant management of limited resources, both human and material. While some peasant households could afford to hire extra labor, most were dependent on the combined efforts of wife, husband, and children in order to satisfy the demands of the landlord and the necessities of survival. Thus the overwhelming challenge faced by the peasant woman as household manager was the management of her own time as she tended to children and animals, grew and prepared food, produced such marketable goods as ale and cheese, and helped her husband in the fields. Home management without servants included such daily tasks as lighting fires, drawing water from wells, gardening, collecting eggs, milking cows, and the all important task of training children for the roles they would assume as adults.

At each of these levels of medieval society, effective household management was critical to the success of the household as an economic unit.

MADONNA J. HETTINGER

References and Further Reading

- Barber, Richard, Ed. The Pastons: The Letters of a Family in the Wars of the Roses. Harmondsworth, England: Penguin Books, 1981.
- de Pizan, Christine. The Treasure of the City of Ladies, or the Book of the Three Virtues, translated by Sarah Lawson. London: Penguin Publishing, 1985.

Hanawalt, Barbara A. The Ties that Bound: Peasant Families in Medieval England. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.

Herlihy, David. Medieval Households. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1985.

LaBarge, Margaret Wade. A Baronial Household of the Thirteenth Century. New York: Barnes and Noble, 1965.

Power, Eileen. Medieval People. London: Methuen, 1924.

See also Administration of Estates; Apprentices; Artisans' Families, Women of; Christine de Pizan; Conduct Literature; Consumption; Division of Labor; Education, Lay; Family (Earlier Middle Ages); Family (Later Middle Ages); Fosterage; Girls and Boys; Guild Members and Guilds; Household Accounts; Kinship; Market and Tradeswomen; Merchant Families, Women of; Mothers as Teachers; Noble Women; Paston Letters; Peasants; Private and Public Spheres; Servants; Wardship

HROTSVIT OF GANDERSHEIM

Not much is known about the family and life of Hrotsvit of Gandersheim except that she was a nun (sanctimonialis) in the community of canonesses at Gandersheim (Germany). Occasional remarks in her writings give evidence of her Saxon origin and suggest a date of birth between 930 and 940. She was educated in Gandersheim and was a special protégé of the Abbess Gerberga II, niece of emperor Otto I. Some time after finishing her last work in the 970s, she likely died. Her expressions of gratitude towards Abbess Gerberga II suggest that her superior's support and active concern encouraged her to write in the first place and provided her with important books, as well as contacts with important centers of education. Hrotsvit began her oeuvre with a poetic adaptation of eight holy legends, which she arranged in two groups of five and three dedicated to her abbess with a modest request for corrections. To rearrange saints' lives from prose to poetry was a very popular exercise to demonstrate the level achieved in Latin scholarship.

Around 965, she wrote—also divided into two books—six dramas arranged in rhymed prose, which in her time was still exceptional (Gallicanus, Dulcitus, Calimachus, Abraham, Pafnutius, and Sapientia). These were created in order to replace the very popular but “impious” comedies of Terence. Hrotsvit presented the first four comedies to some educated but unknown readers for corrections. Writing her third book, Hrotsvit chose a different literary genre, although lacking a model or special experience: Being ordered by her abbess, she composed a poem of praise about the deeds of Otto the Great in hexameters. The intention of the Gesta Ottonis, as well as the date of writing, is still under discussion—after all, three different prefaces with dedications to Abbess Gerberga, Otto I, and Otto II are known. Most likely the larger part of the Gesta were written between 965–966 and 967, whereas the second prologue, as well as the last parts of the Gesta, could have been finished only after Christmas 967. The most recent of the extant works of Hrotsvit, written probably before 973, is the Primordia coenobii Gandeshemensis, a history of the beginnings of Gandersheim that establishes a connection between this foundation and the Ottonians' political success. It was thus intended to secure further political and economical assistance and not as a historical report. At least two rhymed lives of the patrons of Gandersheim, Saints Anastasius I and Innocent I, are lost, as well as some titles in hexameter for a cycle illustrating the Apocalypse of John.

Hrotsvit possessed an extraordinary dramatic talent and a linguistic gift to analyze and modify the language patterns of her models. She was the first author to render passions and saints' lives in dialogue; thus, she revived the dramatic genre in contemporary rhymed fashion. Her superior education was by no means unusual for nuns of the Ottonian century, and her motives as an author testify to her deeply rooted religious convictions. Hrotsvit wanted to use her talents in praise of God and described her "poetic and religious mission" by the interpretation of her name as clamor validus, a powerful calling. Her central subject next to the miracles accomplished by God was virginity. Her stories develop around powerful young women who evade the sexualization of their female bodies as well as social domination in marriage by choosing a life as a virgin bride of Christ. They are written as examples for the young nuns living in Hrotsvit's community who had to choose between taking up the veil or getting married. Furthermore, she weaves allusions to the quadrivium into her storylines; obviously her works were used for teaching. Only Hrotsvit's historical writings had a broader audience in mind, but their reception cannot be proved. Hrotsvit's social values fit into the feudal society of the early Middle Ages. The existence of a normative female view in her writings on the other hand is still being debated.

