SEE ALSO: 1928-1929: Actor Is Suspected of Falsely Claiming to Be an American Indian; June 5, 1944: Australian Poets Claim Responsibility for a Literary Hoax; Jan. 28, 1972: Clifford Irving Admits Faking Howard Hughes Memoirs; Sept. 1, 1976: Former Beatle George Harrison Loses Plagiarism Lawsuit; Dec. 3, 1989: Martin Luther King, Jr.'s, Doctoral-Thesis Plagiarism Is Revealed; Mar. 12, 1997: Prize-Winning Aborigine Novelist Revealed as a Fraud; Apr., 1998: Scottish Historian Is Charged with Plagiarism; June 18, 2001: Historian Joseph J. Ellis Is Accused of Lying; Jan. 4, 2002: Historian Stephen E. Ambrose Is Accused of Plagiarism; Jan. 18, 2002: Historian Doris Kearns Goodwin Is Accused of Plagiarism; Oct. 25, 2002: Historian Michael A. Bellesiles Resigns After Academic Fraud Accusations; July 24, 2007: University of Colorado Fires Professor for Plagiarism and Research Falsification.

February 1, 1978

ROMAN POLANSKI FLEES THE UNITED STATES TO AVOID RAPE TRIAL

Roman Polanski, the director of the hit films Rosemary's Baby and The Pianist, among others, became a central figure in real-life Hollywood drama. First, his pregnant wife, actor Sharon Tate, was murdered by followers of cult figure Charles Manson. Several years later, Polanski was charged with raping a thirteen-year-old girl. After pleading guilty to unlawful sexual intercourse with a minor, he fled to France before he could be tried in court, fearing a long prison sentence.

LOCALES: Los Angeles, California; Paris, France

CATEGORIES: Drugs; families and children;

Hollywood; law and the courts; public morals; sex crimes

KEY FIGURES

Roman Polanski (b. 1933), French filmmaker
Samantha Gailey (b. 1964), American teen model
Sharon Tate (1943-1969), American film actor

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Roman Polanski, director of films such as Rosemary's Baby (1968), Macbeth (1971), Chinatown (1974), and The Pianist (2002), was notorious for his interest in young women and older girls. His first wife, Barbara Lass, was eighteen years old when they met, and his second wife, actor Sharon Tate, was still a teenager when she met Polanski. He was more than thirty years older than his third wife, Emmanuelle Seigner. None of this mattered to most people in the permissive cultures of Hollywood and filmmaking. What did matter was Polanski's flight from the United States to avoid trial and likely imprisonment for statutory rape on February 1, 1978.

Roman Polanski is escorted by deputies with the Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department outside a Santa Monica courtroom in August, 1977. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Polanski was no stranger to Hollywood scandal. Almost a decade before being charged with statutory rape in 1977, Polanski's pregnant wife, Tate, was murdered, along with several others, on August 9, 1969, in a Hollywood Hills home by Manson-family cult members. Polanski was not in the United States at the time of the murders but returned immediately to mourn the loss of his wife and their unborn child.

Eight years later, in March, 1977, Polanski allegedly drugged and sexually assaulted a thirteen-year-old girl, Samantha Gailey (later Samantha Gelmer), whom he had met at a photo shoot for the French edition of Vogue magazine. Before this initial photo shoot, Gailey and her mother had agreed to a second modeling opportunity, an encounter that ended with charges against Polanski for rape. Polanski and Gailey had been alone at this second photo session, which took place at the home of actor Jack Nicholson (who was not home at the time), on March 10. Polanski allegedly provided alcohol and drugs to Gailey, and then reportedly raped her. (Police officers who were searching the home after Polanski was accused of the crime arrested Nicholson's then-girlfriend, actor Angelica Huston, for cocaine possession.)

Polanski was arrested on March 11 at the Beverly Wilshire Hotel and originally charged with six counts, including sodomy, lewd and lascivious acts involving a minor, drug use, and statutory rape. On March 25, he was indicted by a grand jury on six felonious counts but was released on two thousand dollars bail. On August 8, after a plea bargain with prosecutors, he entered a guilty plea to one count of committing an unlawful sexual act with a minor, a less serious charge than rape; the other charges were dropped. He appeared in court on September 19. The court ordered him to undergo ninety days of psychiatric testing and therapy in a federal penitentiary in Chino, California, but he was allowed to delay the start date until December 19 so that he could finish a film.

Lawyers for Polanski first believed that ninety days in the federal penitentiary would mark the end of his sentence. They thought that California Superior Court judge Laurence J. Rittenband would not sentence their client to prison time. However, despite the plea bargain during the initial court appearance and a reduction in charges, and fearing a sentence of up to fifty years, Polanski, a French citizen, fled to London on February 1, 1978, and then to Paris a day later. He remained a fugitive there after leaving the United States, insulated from the risk of extradition because France did not have an extradition agreement with the United States (the French would not extradite one of its own citizens). A return to the United States would lead to his arrest, further charges, and sentencing.

IMPACT

Polanski continued to make films in the years following his flight from the United States. However, very few of them were critically supported. He regained a good deal of renown, though, with his film The Pianist. Not surprisingly, the film emerged under a shroud of scandal and suspicion because of Polanski's continued notoriety. The film, based on the true story of Polish pianist Władysław Szpilman, is set during World War II and touches close to home for Polanski, who survived the Kraków ghettos during the Holocaust years. The film received overwhelming acclaim and received several Academy Award nominations, including Best Picture and Best Director, which he won. The film also received Oscars for Best Actor and best writing (adapted story). Polanski did not return to California to receive his Oscar; actor Harrison Ford accepted on his behalf.

In a July, 2002, article in Vanity Fair, writer A. E. Hotchner discussed Polanski's mood in the days following the sensational 1969 murder of Tate. Hotchner quotes writer Lewis Lapham as remarking that "the only time I ever saw people gasp" was when Polanski approached a Swedish model, attempted to seduce her, and told her "I will make another Sharon Tate out of you." Polanski denied the encounter and sued for libel. He argued that the accusatory account tarnished not only his character but also his memory of Tate. Because of his fugitive status in the United States, and because of Great Britain's cooperation with U.S. extradition law (the case originated in London), Polanski acquired permission to appear via satellite from Paris for the duration of the court proceedings. The British court ruled 3-2 in favor of Polanski.

—Meredith A. Holladay

FURTHER READING

Cronin, Paul, ed. Roman Polanski: Interviews. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 2005.

This book presumes Polanski had a career of dark and brutal films that reflect the filmmaker's troubled life. Contains interviews that cover forty years of his career. Most of the interviews come from foreign film journals, but also included are American television interviews with Dick Cavett and Charlie Rose.

Hotchner, A. E. "Queen of the Night." Vanity Fair, July, 2002. The article that was the subject of Polanski's libel and slander charge against the Conde Nast publication. Polanski sued the publication in a British court in November, 2003.

Morrison, James. Roman Polanski. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2007. Focuses on Polanski's film career. Begins with his earliest films, which were made in Eastern Europe. Includes thorough commentaries on Polanski's films that give a great deal of attention to the greater social, economic, political, and moral contexts of the mid- to late twentieth century.

Polanski, Roman. Roman. New York: William Morrow, 1984. Polanski's autobiography. A candid look inside the life, mind, and work of the notorious filmmaker. Offers a rare glimpse into his upbringing, relationships, and approach to his filmmaking, in addition to addressing the events of 1977 that led to his self-imposed exile.

SEE ALSO: Jan. 20, 1933: Hedy Lamarr Appears Nude in the Czech Film Exstase; Summer, 1936: Film Star Mary Astor's Diary Becomes a Public Sensation; Jan. 14, 1943: Film Star Frances Farmer Is Jailed and Institutionalized; May 27, 1949: Actor Rita Hayworth Marries Aly Khan After Adulterous Affair; Feb. 7, 1950: Swedish Film Star Ingrid Bergman Has a Child Out of Wedlock; May, 1955: Scandal Magazine Reveals Actor Rory Calhoun's Criminal Past; Dec. 12, 1957: Rock Star Jerry Lee Lewis Marries Thirteen-Year-Old Cousin; 1978: Actor Joan Crawford's Daughter Publishes Damning Memoir, Mommie Dearest; Mar. 30, 1991: William Kennedy Smith Is Accused of Rape; Jan. 13, 1992: Woody Allen Has Affair with Lover Mia Farrow's Adopted Daughter; Feb. 26, 1997: Teacher Mary Kay Letourneau Is Arrested for Statutory Rape; Dec. 18, 2003: Pop Star Michael Jackson Is Charged with Child Molestation.

June 27, 1978

EVANGELIST HERBERT W. ARMSTRONG EXCOMMUNICATES HIS OWN SON

Herbert W. Armstrong, founder of the Worldwide Church of God, excommunicated his son, Garner Ted Armstrong, a famous television evangelist and church leader as well, for personal misconduct. Ted, accused by his father several years earlier of being in the “bonds of Satan,” later founded his own church and faced a sexual assault charge in 1995.

LOCALE: Pasadena, California

CATEGORIES: Religion; communications and media; radio and television; families and children

KEY FIGURES

Garner Ted Armstrong (1930-2003), televangelist, Worldwide Church of God leader, and later founder of the Church of God International

Herbert W. Armstrong (1892-1986), founder of the Worldwide Church of God

Stanley Rader (1930-2002), attorney and minister, Worldwide Church of God

Bobby Fischer (1943-2008), chess champion

SUMMARY OF EVENT

In June, 1978, Herbert W. Armstrong publicly excommunicated his son, Garner Ted Armstrong, from the Worldwide Church of God (WCG), which Herbert had founded in 1933. Although long in coming, Ted's removal was a shocking development to the adherents of the church and millions who followed Ted through the media. The event made national news. At the time, Ted was heir apparent to his father. He also was vice president of the church, vice chancellor of the church's Ambassador College, and the telegenic face of the sect, watched by millions of people worldwide.

Herbert founded the WCG with unique doctrines that included the following: God consisted of a family of members to which his followers could aspire, the use of triple tithing, the observance of the Old Testament Sabbath, feasts and regulations, the prohibition of medical assistance, a racially segregated Heaven, and the identification of the British with the ten lost tribes of Israel. The chief engine of the church's remarkable growth was Herbert's Plain Truth magazine and radio and television programs, in which he would describe current events as prophetically ushering in “the world tomorrow,” when God would establish His kingdom on Earth after a violent apocalypse.

The programs provided a natural platform for Herbert's youngest son, Ted. Born in 1930, Ted began his career as his father's office manager in 1952. In 1953, Ted married Shirley Hammer, with whom he would have three sons. In 1955, he was ordained to his father's ministry. Soon appearing on the World Tomorrow broadcasts, Ted's smooth manner and silver voice attracted a wide audience. Like his father, Ted employed the tools of modern advertising to promote his show. By 1957, Ted had taken over World Tomorrow and was the lead voice and face of the ministry, eventually appearing on about 400 radio stations and 165 television stations with an audience of about twenty million people. In 1962, Ted gained for the WCG its best-known enthusiast, chess champion Bobby Fischer, who joined the church after hearing Ted's radio broadcast.

Ted's popularity even led to appearances on the popular television comedy show Hee-Haw. His progress was not slowed, even after his yearly prophecies of imminent doom did not materialize. In 1968, Ted was made executive vice president of the church and vice chancellor of the church's flagship Ambassador College. However, allegations of gambling, drinking, and adultery soon surfaced. They were ignored by Herbert until Ted began a long-term affair with a flight attendant and threatened to leave his wife, despite the church's strict teachings against divorce. In 1971, Ted was relieved of his duties and placed on leave of absence.

In 1972, Herbert removed Ted's ministerial authority, claiming Ted was in the "bonds of Satan." On May 15, 1972, Time magazine published an exposé of Ted's scandalous behavior. Fischer was disturbed by the revelations and eventually spoke out against the WCG.

Missing broadcasts by Ted, the listening audience declined and church income plummeted. After six months, Herbert felt obliged to reinstate Ted, yet, seemingly incorrigible, Ted was again suspended by his father in 1974. Within months, Herbert once more reinstated Ted to his position as heir apparent, announcing that his son was his divinely appointed successor—Solomon to Herbert's King David. By 1978, however, Herbert felt compelled to act. Ted had been participating in a so-called systematic theology project designated to reexamine some of his father's doctrines in the light of mainstream theology and to gain secular accreditation for Ambassador College. There also were reports that Ted was engaged in a power struggle with WCG attorney Stanley Rader for influence over his father.

Time magazine reported in a June 19, 1978, article that Herbert admonished Ted in an open letter to the faithful that stated

I derived my authority from the living Christ. You derived what you had from me, and then used it totally CONTRARY to THE WAY Christ has led me.

Finally, on June 27, Herbert excommunicated Ted for conspiring to seize control of the WCG and Ambassador College. The next day, Herbert wrote to his congregation, saying his letter to them was "the most difficult letter I have ever been compelled to write." He continued, "I would rather have cut off my right arm than having to do this." In this lengthy letter, he revealed a lifetime of difficulties with Ted, leading to his dramatic expulsion from the WCG.

Garner Ted Armstrong at Ambassador College in Pasadena, California, in 1972. (AP/Wide World Photos)

This excommunication represented an irrevocable breach between father and son with dramatic consequences. Without the facile Ted, the success of the World Tomorrow broadcast was imperiled, Herbert was left without a successor, and his public anointing of his miracle son had come to naught.

Ted moved to Tyler, Texas, and formed, with several other former church ministers, the Church of God International, affiliated with his Garner Ted Armstrong Evangelistic Association. Ted launched his own magazine, Twentieth Century Watch, and television broadcasts. He also accused his father of committing financial improprieties, one of the factors that prompted the California attorney general to launch an investigation of the church in early January, 1979, for misappropriation of funds. The attorney general also requested that the California courts place the WCG in receivership for one year.

Although Ted's media charm kept his denomination alive, his scandalous behavior did not die. In 1995, a masseuse, who had secretly videotaped Ted's offensive sexual advances, brought a sexual assault suit against Ted. Ted was soon removed from the Church of God International but launched a new church, the Intercontinental Church of God. Despite several overtures, Herbert and Ted never reconciled, and Herbert died in 1986 at the age of ninety-three. On September 15, 2003, at the age of seventy-three, Ted died of pneumonia.

IMPACT

Herbert's excommunication of his son, Ted, was the most traumatic event in the history of the WCG. In its first forty years, the denomination had experienced explosive growth. Although its membership would reach 150,000, its worldwide reach through its magazine, The Plain Truth, and its radio and television program, The World Tomorrow, reached tens of millions of people. Ted was the star evangelist of this religious empire, Herbert's second-in-command, and his heir apparent. That Ted's transgressions finally compelled his father to excommunicate and disown him damaged the credibility of the church. Only four years earlier, Herbert had claimed that God appointed Ted his successor.

Moreover, Ted's excommunication deprived the church of its most charismatic presence. He began his own splinter denomination, which, in turn, split into the Biblical Church of God (1979), Philadelphia Church of God (1989), Global Church of God (1992), and United Church of God (1995). By 1993, membership in the WCG had begun to drop sharply, and many of Herbert's doctrines were rejected. Within a couple of years, The World Tomorrow program was canceled and Ambassador College closed. In 1997, WCG became a member of the mainstream National Association of Evangelicals, a final rejection of Herbert's teachings.

Herbert and Ted Armstrong were significant figures in the development of Christian evangelism on radio and television. They pioneered religious broadcasting's use of certain advertising techniques—saturation programming, free giveaways, appearances with world figures, and Madison Avenue hyperbole—now staples in televangelism. Ted brought the glib manner of a television anchor to his broadcast delivery. Most of all, he perfected the sales pitch during the show, which accounted for much of the church's revenue.

Ted also was farsighted in urging more tolerance of other denominations, a more scholarly Ambassador College, and the easing of some of the denomination's most onerous restrictions. However, his good deeds were overshadowed by accusations that he used his religious message and appeal to accumulate personal riches and have extramarital affairs. Ted would tell his liaisons that his indiscretions mattered little in the light of the important prophetic messages he was bringing to the world. The troubles he brought to the Worldwide Church of God, and televangelism in general, would seem to say otherwise.

—Howard Bromberg

FURTHER READING

Armstrong, Garner Ted. The Real Jesus. New ed. Tyler, Tex.: Emerald, 1984. In this book, often insightful but at times banal and bizarre, Ted Armstrong revises traditional teachings about Jesus, rejecting, for example, the holidays of Christmas and Easter and claiming that Jesus was the senior partner in a construction business.

Flurry, Stephen. Raising the Ruins: The Fight to Revive the Legacy of Herbert W. Armstrong. Edmond, Okla.: Philadelphia Church of God, 2006. A Herbert Armstrong loyalist argues that Ted Armstrong attempted a coup against his father and the church in 1978.

Gufeld, Eduard. Bobby Fischer: From Chess Genius to Legend. Davenport, Iowa: Thinkers' Press, 2001. Recounts the chess genius's involvement and disaffection with Herbert and Ted Armstrong and their church.

Oliver, Myrna. "Garner Ted Armstrong." Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2003. An obituary of Ted Armstrong that discusses his life, evangelistic career, and his troubles.

Tkach, Joseph. Transformed by Truth. Sisters, Oreg.: Multnomah, 1997. An account by Herbert Armstrong's eventual successor about the movement of WCG into the evangelical mainstream. Includes information on Ted's failed predictions, his 1972 removal for "moral and doctrinal" failures, and his 1978 excommunication for "liberalism" and "modernizing" tendencies.

SEE ALSO: May-June, 1926: Evangelist Aimee Semple McPherson Claims She Was Kidnapped; Oct. 25, 1974: Evangelist Billy James Hargis Resigns College Presidency During Gay-Sex Scandal; Sept. 10, 1981: Chicago Sun-Times Reports That Cardinal Cody Diverted Church Funds; Oct. 23, 1985: Guru Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh Is Indicted for Immigration Fraud; Apr. 22, 1986: Faith Healer Peter Popoff Is Exposed as a Fraud; Mar. 19, 1987: Jim Bakker Resigns as Head of PTL Television Network; Feb. 21, 1988: Evangelist Jimmy Swaggart Tearfully Confesses His Adultery; Nov. 2, 2006: Evangelist Kent Hovind Is Convicted of Federal Tax Violations; Nov. 2, 2006: Male Escort Reveals Sexual Liaisons with Evangelist Ted Haggard.

July 23, 1978

UTAH MILLIONAIRE IS MURDERED BY HIS GRANDSON

Franklin James Bradshaw became a millionaire by building a chain of auto-parts stores and acquiring federal and state oil and gas leases over several decades. Frances Schreuder, his daughter, was a New York socialite who spent her days recklessly spending or installing herself in boardrooms. When her father tired of her lavish lifestyle and threatened to cut her out of his will, Schreuder coerced her own son to murder the Utah magnate.

LOCALE: Salt Lake City, Utah

CATEGORIES: Murder and suicide; families and children; business

KEY FIGURES

Franklin James Bradshaw (1902-1978), Salt Lake City businessman

Berenice Jewett Bradshaw (1902-1996), Franklin Bradshaw's wife

Frances Schreuder (1939-2004), New York socialite and a daughter of the Bradshaws

Marc Schreuder (b. 1961), son of Frances Schreuder and grandson of the Bradshaws

SUMMARY OF EVENT

During the mid-1970's, Frances Schreuder was living the high life in an apartment in the upper East Side of Manhattan in New York and was determined to climb the social ladder. She was aggressively working to make herself an important fixture in such high-profile groups as the New York City Ballet's board by courting administrator Lincoln Kirstein and principal choreographer George Balanchine. To keep up the appearance of having an elite social position and lifestyle, Schreuder also was spending recklessly—reportedly paying out as much as $40,000 at one time for one item, a pair of earrings from Tiffany's.

Evidence points to Schreuder having a greedy side even as a teenager. For example, she was a student at the prestigious Bryn Mawr College but was suspended in 1958 for check theft and forgery. Reports also suggest Schreuder, a mother of three, was less maternal than monstrous: She was described as manipulative and domineering, and she abused her children, Larry and Marc (children by her first marriage to Vittorio Gentile) and Lavinia (daughter of her second marriage with Frederik Schreuder). She would, it turned out, combine her greed and her abusive ways to concoct one of the most sensational murders of the decade.

Schreuder was living to extremes her father, Franklin James Bradshaw, would never indulge in himself. A self-made millionaire who made his fortune with a chain of auto-parts stores and by acquiring federal and state oil and gas leases, Bradshaw nevertheless lived frugally and carefully, even eccentrically, some would say. Despite being worth approximately $10 million, his primary transportation vehicle was a rusty old pickup truck, he wore clothes from thrift stores, and his briefcase was an emptied beer box. In contrast, his daughter's wasteful lifestyle appalled him, and he threatened that if she did not curb the lavish spending, he would cut her from his will.

Incensed and fearful that her father would keep his word, Schreuder began plotting. In the summer of 1977, her sons, Larry and Marc, were working at their grandfather's Utah auto-parts warehouse. Schreuder directed the boys to steal money from the business. Marc later testified that she gave her sons poison and instructed them to put it in her father's oatmeal. Marc claimed he refused to poison his grandfather, but with Larry, he did follow through with the theft: The two teens stole about $200,000 in checks, stock certificates, and cash and handed over a sizable portion of the stash to their mother.

Still not satisfied, Schreuder paid a hit man, Myles Manning, $5,000 to murder her father. Manning took the money but never followed through with the hit. Schreuder became more adamant that Marc do the job. When he resisted, she threatened to kick him out of the house if he did not comply with her wishes. Marc later testified that his mother cajoled with the words "Look Marc, it is not really killing. It is the right thing to do for us." Marc gave in: On July 23, 1978, he entered his seventy-six-year-old grandfather's Salt Lake City auto-parts warehouse and, at point-blank range with a .357 Magnum handgun, shot and killed Bradshaw.

Uninvolved family members believed a robber killed Bradshaw, but Schreuder's sister, Marilyn Bradshaw Reagan, was reportedly less than convinced. Reagan offered a $10,000 reward for information regarding the murder of her father. Despite Marc's petitions for his mother to get rid of the evidence by destroying or dumping the murder weapon, Schreuder had turned the .357 over to a friend to whom she allegedly owed $3,000, offering the firearm as repayment. The less-than-thrilled friend went to Reagan for the reward money instead. When Reagan delivered the weapon to authorities, fingerprints traced back to Marc and Frances Schreuder.

Arrested in 1981, Marc Schreuder went on trial in 1982—represented by Paul Van Dam, the lawyer who later became Utah's attorney general. Implicated as the mastermind, Frances Schreuder went on trial in 1983. Berenice Jewett Bradshaw, Schreuder's mother, reportedly spent up to $2 million to provide legal support for her daughter and grandson. According to Van Dam and others, including biographer Jonathan Coleman, Marc was a tense and guarded young man who was reticent to testify against his controlling mother. Marc, Van Dam said, was "the most psychologically abused kid" he had ever seen. Marc did not decide to testify until the evening before the trial began.

Marc's agreeing to testify was no doubt linked to the work of sympathetic detectives and prosecution, and to Marc's realization that his mother was more than willing to see him take the full blame while she took the majority of her mother's financing of their defense. According to Coleman, Marc knew that he needed to distance himself from his mother's hold, and it is more likely that he decided to testify because he wanted to protect his younger sister, Lavinia, from their mother.

Frances Schreuder consistently denied culpability, but despite her claims to having no involvement in the murder of her father, and despite her fight against extradition to Salt Lake City from New York, she was brought to trial in Salt Lake City, convicted of first-degree murder, and sentenced to life in prison. At Utah State Prison, until her parole in 1996, Schreuder behaved as a model inmate, earning two psychology degrees from Utah State University by way of the inmate-education program sponsored by her own mother.

Marc Schreuder, who at his mother's trial testified he had begged and pleaded with his mother not to force him to kill his grandfather but who acquiesced when she threatened to disown him, was convicted of second-degree murder and sentenced to five to ten years in prison. He actually served thirteen years, earning a degree in construction from Salt Lake Community College while incarcerated at Utah State Prison. He was paroled in 1995 and moved to Provo, Utah, where he began work for a nutritional and personal-care products company.

In 1996, at the age of ninety-four, Berenice Bradshaw died, leaving her daughter $1 million in a trust fund to be dispersed annually. Marc and Frances attended Berenice's funeral, but they did not speak to one another. On April 7, 2004, the sixty-five-year-old Frances Schreuder died of chronic obstructive pulmonary disease at a San Diego, California, hospice house. Lavinia, living in San Diego, and Larry, living in Los Angeles, attended their mother's funeral. Marc Schreuder, who had reconciled with his mother the year before, attended as well. Interviewed that morning, he merely told reporters his mother should be left to rest in peace.

IMPACT

The crime and trial caused a national sensation. The picture of Frances Schreuder's arrest depicted her not as a socialite dripping with the thousands of dollars worth of jewels she was said to indulge in but as a dark and disturbed person—eyes glowering at the camera with a sinister stare. The media offered extended coverage, two journalists published best-selling books, and television hosted two miniseries and a Court TV (now truTV) documentary on the scandal.

The scandal impacted Frances Schreuder's sons as well—particularly Marc, who, after suffering the mental abuse and manipulation by his mother for years, was sentenced to prison for the crime she convinced him to commit. Marc had, he told reporters, done everything he could to please his Svengali-like mother.

—Roxanne McDonald

FURTHER READING

Alexander, Shana. Nutcracker: Money, Madness, Murder—A Family Album. New York: Doubleday, 1985. A veteran journalist offers a narrative of the scandalous murder of Bradshaw with telling detail.

Coleman, Jonathan. At Mother's Request: A True Story of Money, Murder, and Betrayal. New York: Atheneum, 1985. Former editor Coleman brings a massive amount of research to this true-crime retelling of the Bradshaw-Schreuder murder scandal.

Davis, Carol Ann. Couples Who Kill. London: Allison & Busby, 2007. Among the eighteen entries providing a thorough examination of partners in crime is "Mother Knows Best," the study of Frances and Marc Schreuder and the psychodynamics of their collaborative murder.

SEE ALSO: July 27, 1917: Millionaire Socialite Dies Under Suspicious Circumstances; Sept. 5, 1967: Socialite Nancy Wakeman Shoots Her Politician-Husband; Apr. 15, 1974: Kidnapped Heir Patty Hearst Helps Rob a Bank; Mar. 21, 1976: Actor Claudine Longet Kills Ski Champion Vladimir Sabich; Mar. 10, 1980: Scarsdale Diet Doctor Is Killed by His Lover; Mar., 1990: Menendez Brothers Are Arrested for Murdering Their Parents; Aug. 16, 1996: Belgian Media Reveal How Police Bungled Serial Murder Case.

August 4, 1978BRITISH POLITICIAN JEREMY THORPE IS CHARGED WITH ATTEMPTED MURDER

British Liberal Party leader Jeremy Thorpe was accused of hiring an assassin to kill Norman Scott, Thorpe's alleged former lover. Scott later said that Thorpe threatened to kill him if he revealed the affair. After his release from prison, the gunman said he had been hired to kill Scott. Thorpe and three codefendants were acquitted, but the incident ended Thorpe's political career.

ALSO KNOWN AS: RinkagateLOCALS: Exmoor National Park and London, EnglandCATEGORIES: Murder and suicide; government; politics; law and the courtsKEY FIGURES

Jeremy Thorpe (b. 1929), British member of Parliament, 1959-1979, and leader of the Liberal Party, 1967-1976

Norman Scott (fl. 1970's), former British model

Andrew Newton (fl. 1970's), former British airline pilot

David Holmes (fl. 1970's), British deputy treasurer of the Liberal Party

George Deakin (fl. 1970's), British nightclub owner

John Le Mesurier (fl. 1970's), British businessman

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Flashy and opinionated, Jeremy Thorpe was elected to Parliament from Britain's North Devon District in 1959. He became Liberal Party leader in 1967 and remained popular enough to retain his seat when the Conservative Party drove the Liberals from the majority in 1970. However, in 1971, the start of a scandal would affect the rest of Thorpe's political career.

In 1971, former model Norman Scott alleged that he and Thorpe had been lovers between 1961 and 1963. His claim was a shock to the public. Male homosexuality had been decriminalized in England only in 1967. Though the Liberal Party's subsequent investigation cleared Thorpe, Scott maintained the truth of his allegations.

The situation remained at a standstill until 1975, the year Scott began to feel unsafe. He would later claim Thorpe had threatened to kill him for revealing the affair. In one incident, Scott had been walking a friend's dog, a Great Dane named Rinka, in Exmoor National Park (in the south of England) in October. During the walk he encountered former pilot Andrew Newton. Newton shot the dog dead but his gun misfired when he turned it on Scott.

At Newton's trial in 1976, Scott again claimed to have been Thorpe's lover during the 1960's, adding that Thorpe had threatened to kill him if he brought the relationship to light. Scott also sold the press personal letters, allegedly written by Thorpe to Scott, calling Scott by a pet name and discussing a planned trip. This time, Thorpe's political position was threatened, and he resigned his Liberal Party leadership in May of that year. Newton was convicted of the attempted murder and spent one year in prison. Thorpe's name was never mentioned in conjunction with Newton at this time.

However, when Newton was released from prison in 1977, he stirred the scandal back to life, insisting that he had, in fact, been hired to kill Scott. After Thorpe's name was associated with the case, the scandal became known as Rinkagate. Thorpe, who always maintained that his friendship with the former model had been platonic, repeatedly denied the accusations. By this time, Thorpe was married to his second wife, Marion. His first wife had died in a car accident in 1970, before the initial allegations were made. Thorpe firmly insisted on his innocence, refusing to resign his seat in Parliament.

Over a year later, on August 4, 1978, Thorpe and three codefendants, David Holmes, George Deakin, and John Le Mesurier, were formally charged with plotting to murder Scott and dispose of his body. Only Thorpe was accused of hiring Newton to commit the murder. The prosecution listed as a motive the continuing damage Scott's allegations had been having on Thorpe's political career. Thorpe allegedly told fellow liberal Peter Bessell at a meeting of Parliament that Scott had to disappear. Thorpe also allegedly tried to get Liberal Party treasurer Holmes to murder Scott, but when that idea had fallen through, he had begun to plot against his alleged former lover with nightclub owner Deakin and carpet-company tycoon Le Mesurier. Finally, Thorpe was accused of having hired Newton to commit the crime and of paying Newton's £5,000 assassination fee from Liberal Party funds.

Jeremy Thorpe outside a courtroom in London in June, 1979. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

It was nearly a year before the case came before a British jury. At that time, the trial drew enormous public attention, focusing as it did on a government official's alleged sexual peccadilloes and outrageous behavior. Indeed, the case destroyed Thorpe politically. In the election, which preceded the trial by only a week, he lost his seat to a Conservative opponent, as voters had little patience with homosexual love affairs, scandals, and murder plots; furthermore, Thorpe's guilt generally was assumed. In an interesting addendum, the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC) turned up surprising hints that Scott may not have been the only source of accusations against Thorpe.

During the 1979 trial, which lasted just over a month, Thorpe admitted he had discussed the possibility of trying to scare Scott into silence, but he categorically denied the murder-for-hire charges. In fact, he and his codefendants were completely cleared by the jury on June 29.

Over the course of Thorpe's political career, England's prime ministry changed hands several times. Twice, Labour Party candidate Harold Wilson held the seat (1964-1970, 1974-1976). Wilson was something of a character himself, insisting that the Security Service, or MI5 (Britain's equivalent of the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency), plotted to drive him from office during the late 1970's. In 2002, the BBC reported that Wilson had supposedly had a minor clerk, Jack Straw, examine evidence in Scott's social security file to determine the truth of Scott's allegations against Thorpe. Straw, who became much more prominent in British politics, acknowledged reading the file on order of his superiors, but he did not believe he violated anyone's privacy. However, parts of Scott's file disappeared, bringing suspicion that it had been examined to incriminate Thorpe. If so, the motive would have been a purely political effort by Wilson to prevent an anti-Labour Party alliance between Thorpe's Liberals and the Conservative Tory Party. The media made much of the mystery when it came to light in 2002, but no political action was taken.

IMPACT

The impact of Thorpe's trial needs to be considered in the proper context. The gay and lesbian rights movement was fully under way in Britain by the time the scandal broke, but gay and lesbian public figures were unheard of. Thus, news of Thorpe's alleged homosexual trysts came as an enormous shock to the public. His actions were considered to be criminal behavior, even though they came to light several years after male homosexuality was decriminalized in the United Kingdom. Furthermore, the public refused to believe that a political figure such as Thorpe could be involved in something as sordid as a murder-for-hire scheme.

Thus, the popular press covered the event exhaustively, and most people considered Thorpe guilty, even though the jury exonerated him. The event remains part of contemporary popular history in Britain; indeed, the BBC's investigation into the case in 2002 proves its staying power. The scandal was enough to end Thorpe's political career, even as it left several questions unanswered, including, Why did Newton confront Scott if not to murder him?

Jeremy Thorpe Charged with Attempted Murder

—Jessie Bishop Powell

FURTHER READING

Freeman, Simon, and Barrie Penrose. Rinkagate: The Rise and Fall of Jeremy Thorpe. London: Bloomsbury, 1996. Comprehensive rehearsal of the scandal, including its political significance and analysis of Thorpe's career.

Purton, Peter. Sodom, Gomorrah, and the New Jerusalem: Labour and Lesbian and Gay Rights, from Edward Carpenter to Today. London: Labour Campaign for Lesbian and Gay Rights, 2006. Discusses the historical relationship between gay and lesbian rights and politics in Britain, placing the Thorpe scandal in context.

Thorpe, Jeremy. In My Own Time: Reminiscences of a Liberal Leader. London: Politico's, 1999. Thorpe provides perspective on his trial and acquittal but focuses more in this work on his years in office.

Waugh, Auberon. The Last Word: An Eyewitness Account of the Trial of Jeremy Thorpe. Boston: Little, Brown, 1980. Journalist Waugh delivers his own judgments on the Thorpe trial, contesting the judge's claim to the last word. Discussions of the British justice system are interspersed with trial reporting.

SEE ALSO: Dec. 8, 1906: Former U.S. Senator Arthur Brown Is Murdered by Lover; Sept. 4, 1932: Film Star Jean Harlow's Husband Is an Apparent Suicide; July 10, 1934: Sex Scandal Forces Resignation of Alberta Premier Brownlee; Oct. 7, 1964: President Lyndon B. Johnson's Aide Is Arrested in Gay-Sex Sting; Oct. 25, 1974: Evangelist Billy James Hargis Resigns College Presidency During Gay-Sex Scandal; Sept. 3, 1980: Congressman Bauman Is Arrested for Liaison with Teenage Boy; Oct. 14, 1983: British Cabinet Secretary Parkinson Resigns After His

Secretary Becomes Pregnant; Jan. 22, 1987: Pennsylvania Politician Kills Himself at Televised Press Conference; Aug. 19, 2004: Blog “Outs” Antigay Congressman Edward Schrock;

Jan. 21, 2006: British Politician Resigns After Gay-Sex Orgy; Nov. 2, 2006: Male Escort Reveals Sexual Liaisons with Evangelist Ted Haggard.

October 20, 1978

FIRESTONE RECALLS MILLIONS OF DEFECTIVE CAR TIRES

Consumer groups and the federal government received hundreds of complaints about Firestone 500 radial tires being defective. The tires also were directly linked to more than forty deaths and countless vehicle accidents. In the fall of 1978, under pressure from the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration and companies that bought the tire for resale, Firestone recalled the line, leading to one of the largest and most expensive consumer product recalls in American business history.

LOCALE: Washington, D.C.

CATEGORIES: Business; ethics; government

KEY FIGURES

Thomas A. Robertson (fl. 1970's), director of development for Firestone

Mario A. DiFederico (1921-2007), president of Firestone

SUMMARY OF EVENT

The 500 line of radial tires manufactured by Firestone had an increased probability of tread separation from a wheel's steel frame. Documents indicate that Firestone management, including the president of Firestone, Mario A. DiFederico, was aware of the tire's defect. Apparently, Firestone could not adequately test the problem in its manufacturing plants because the tread separation occurred as the tires aged.

Firestone opted to not disclose the defect to consumers, an estimated forty-one of whom died and hundreds of whom were in traffic accidents caused by blowouts. After being less than cooperative with the U.S. National Highway Traffic Safety Administration (NHTSA), Firestone nevertheless decided to recall the tires in 1978, marking one of the largest and most expensive product recalls in the history of American business.

To compete with the radial tire that had been manufactured in Europe for several decades, the tire companies Goodrich and Michelin introduced radial tires to the United States during the late 1960's. Although more expensive and requiring greater technical skill to produce, radial tires were widely regarded to be superior to previous types of tires in the areas of fuel efficiency and longevity.

The Firestone Tire and Rubber Company, founded in 1900, trailed only Goodyear in its control of the domestic tire market at the beginning of the 1970's. Firestone began manufacturing its first radial tires, the 500 steel-belt line, in January, 1972. To deliver the product to the market as quickly as possible so that it could capitalize on the high demand for radial tires, Firestone converted machinery that was originally used to produce other types of tires, such as the biased-ply model. The biased-ply model was the most widely used tire in the United States prior to the introduction of the radial tire.

Firestone's radial tires initially received positive reviews by consumer magazines. The 500 steel belt became one of the most popular tires on the market. Over the course of the 500 line, Firestone produced and sold approximately twenty-four million tires at an estimated cost of about fifty dollars per tire. However, as Firestone soon realized, the tire had a defect. Firestone employees alerted upper management that the tire had a problem involving tread separation. The 500 radial tire was prone to tread separation because moisture seeped into the tire and caused corrosion of the steel frame of the tire. Consequently, the tire was susceptible to blowouts, particularly at high speeds.

As early as 1973, just months after Firestone began selling the tires, dissatisfied customers were returning the product to dealers. Firestone's own director of development, Thomas A. Robertson, wrote in a September, 1973, internal company memorandum to top management expressing concern about the 500 radial. In the memo he wrote, "We are making an inferior quality radial tire which will subject us to belt-edge separation at high mileage." Firestone received negative feedback from other sources. Major tire buyers, such as General Motors, Ford, Atlas Tire, Montgomery Ward, and Shell, threatened to terminate their contracts with Firestone. In 1973, Atlas wrote to Firestone: "In the eyes of Atlas, it appears Firestone is coming apart at the seams and drastic action is required." The safety issue was not disclosed to company stockholders or the public; instead, Firestone tried to correct the problem while still manufacturing the tire with its known defect.

In 1976, the Center for Auto Safety, a lobbying group for consumers founded in 1970, informed the NHTSA of the disproportionate amount of complaints filed about the Firestone 500 radial tire: more than fourteen thousand. The following year, the NHTSA surveyed about ninety thousand tire owners regarding their satisfaction with different types and brands of tires, including the Firestone 500. Survey results revealed consistent dissatisfaction with the Firestone 500, more so than any other tire. Furthermore, the NHTSA presented data that indicated that the 500 radial tire was more than twice as likely to be returned to dealers than other tires.

In May, 1978, bolstered by the research findings, the NHTSA issued a recommendation to Firestone that the company recall all steel-belted radial tire models in the line. Millions of tires would be subject to recall, at an estimated cost of $275 million. The annual net income of the company in 1977 was $110 million; clearly, the recall would be a serious financial burden to Firestone.

Firestone opted to not abide by the recommendations made by the NHTSA. Instead, the company asserted that it had conducted its own testing and then denied any problem with the 500 radial tire. Firestone blamed problems with the tires on consumer misuse, such as speeding, overinflation or underinflation of tires, improper maintenance, and rough use.

Firestone management also appeared before a U.S. House of Representatives subcommittee and initiated a lawsuit against the NHTSA. At the same time, Firestone was listed as the defendant in a substantial number of civil lawsuits stemming from the injuries, fatalities, and damages caused by the faulty performance of the tire. In one case, the company settled for $1.4 million.

U.S. transportation secretary Brock Adams, left, and National Highway Traffic Safety Administration head Joan Claybrook announce the Firestone tire recall. (AP/Wide World Photos)

On October 20, 1978, after Firestone was left with no other options, it voluntarily recalled 500-model tires produced in 1975 and 1976. The recalled tires were replaced with a newer model, the 721 line of radials, which received favorable safety reviews. Firestone also offered a discount to customers who were trading in tires that had been manufactured prior to 1975. The recall led to the replacement of an estimated ten million tires. The cost to Firestone, estimated at $150 million, nearly bankrupted the company.

IMPACT

Firestone was fined $500,000, one of the biggest fines levied against an American company up to that time, for its failure to disclose the safety issue to the public. While other tire makers experienced problems with the manufacturing of radial tires, these problems were not as large or as costly as those of Firestone.

Also in 1978, Firestone ceased production of the 500 steel-belt line; however, this was not the end of radial tires. Instead, radial tires are now the most commonly used tires in the industry. In 1979, Firestone president DiFederico resigned and was replaced by John Nevin, former chief executive officer of Zenith. Forced to make difficult decisions to save the floundering company, Nevin closed plants and laid off workers, eventually cutting the number of Firestone employees to half its total workforce. Firestone headquarters were relocated from Akron, Ohio, to Chicago, Illinois. In 1988, Nevin negotiated a buyout of Firestone by Bridgestone, a Japanese-owned company.

In 2000, after another NHTSA investigation and testimony before the U.S. Congress, a voluntary recall of approximately six million Firestone/Bridgestone tires was implemented. Several similarities exist between the 1978 and 2000 recalls. Tread separation was the defect and impetus behind both. As during the 1970's, Firestone/Bridgestone reportedly had been aware of the defect in 2000 as well. As was the case during the 1970's, Firestone initially denied any tire defect and reiterated that tire failure was caused by consumer misuse. However, whereas the 1978 recall largely centered on passenger vehicles, the foci of the 2000 recall were the sport utility vehicle, especially the Ford Explorer, and lightweight trucks. Defective tires led to rollovers, especially, and caused between sixty-two and two hundred or more deaths. The cost of the 2000 recall was estimated to be $350 million.

—Margaret E. Leigey

FURTHER READING

Healey, James R., and Chris Wayward. "Tire Concerns Go Back 1 1/2 Years Before Recall: Ford Documents from January '99 Refer to Problems." USA Today, September 11, 2000. Provides a summary of events that led to the 2000 tire recall by Firestone/Bridgestone.

Love, Steve, and David Giffels. Wheels of Fortune: The Story of Rubber in Akron. Akron, Ohio: University of Akron Press, 1999. This book provides a comprehensive history of the tire industry and includes discussion of Firestone.

McDonald, Kevin M. Shifting Out of Park: Moving Auto Safety from Recalls to Reason. Tucson, Ariz.: Lawyers & Judges Publishing, 2004. A comparative study of the auto recall process that includes discussion of regulations, the courts and litigation, federal investigations, and consumer awareness.

Stanley, Guy D. D. Managing External Issues: Theory and Practice. Greenwich, Conn.: JAI Press, 1985. One case study in management this text examines the Firestone 500 tire scandal from the perspectives of Firestone and government safety experts.

SEE ALSO: 1930: Liberia Is Accused of Selling Its Own Citizens into Slavery; Sept.-Oct., 1937: Prescription Elixir Causes More than One Hundred Deaths; Sept. 17, 1985: Media Allege Canadian Officials Allowed Sale of Rancid Tuna; Feb. 4, 1996: Whistle-Blower Reveals Tobacco Industry Corruption; Nov. 17, 2005: Liberian Workers Sue Bridgestone Firestone over Slave Labor; Summer, 2006-Mar. 16, 2007: Manufacturer Recalls Pet Food That Killed Thousands of American Pets.

January 26, 1979

FORMER VICE PRESIDENT NELSON ROCKEFELLER DIES MYSTERIOUSLY

Nelson A. Rockefeller, former U.S. vice president and four-term New York State governor, was found dead in his townhouse suite of an apparent heart attack. Present with Rockefeller when emergency medical personnel arrived was Rockefeller's twenty-six-year-old assistant, Megan Marshak, furthering speculation of a romantic affair between the two. The reason for Rockefeller's death remains a mystery.

LOCALE: New York, New York

CATEGORIES: Sex; politics; publishing and journalism

KEY FIGURES

Nelson A. Rockefeller (1908-1979), vice president of the United States, 1974-1977, and governor of New York, 1959-1973

Megan Marshak (b. 1952), Rockefeller's aide and alleged lover

Ponchitta Pierce (b. 1942), television journalist and Marshak's friend

SUMMARY OF EVENT

By the mid-twentieth century, Nelson A. Rockefeller was one of the towering figures in U.S. politics and public life. Born in 1908, he was the grandson of John D. Rockefeller, founder of the vast Standard Oil fortune, and Nelson Aldrich, an influential Republican senator from Rhode Island. These twin heritages of wealth and politics, along with patronage of the arts, were lifelong keynotes of Rockefeller's life. His foremost interest was politics.

When Vice President Gerald R. Ford became the thirty-eighth president of the United States in the wake of Richard Nixon's resignation in 1974, he nominated Rockefeller to be vice president. Ford was focused on healing the country after the Watergate scandal. As a centrist, Rockefeller seemed an obvious choice, but he first had to be confirmed by both the House of Representatives and the Senate. The process took an unexpectedly long four months, with hearings that probed Rockefeller's financial holdings. He was sworn in on December 19, 1974.

Rockefeller had served, in some capacity, every U.S. president from Franklin D. Roosevelt to Gerald R. Ford, except one, and had been an accomplished four-term governor of New York. More than most politicians, however, his ultimate ambitions were focused on the presidency. In addition to his wealth and having a panel of knowledgeable advisers, he was energetic and charismatic and had many contacts on the international scene. From all accounts, he felt he was a “natural” for the office, yet in his three serious tries for the presidency—in 1960, 1964, and 1968—he was unable to win his party’s nomination.

1970's

Nelson A. Rockefeller in 1964. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Megan Marshak, alleged lover of former vice president Nelson A. Rockefeller. (AP/Wide World Photos)

After becoming vice president, Rockefeller found the office’s round of ceremonial duties boring. His protégé, Henry Kissinger, was largely steering foreign policy, and Rockefeller expected to have a similarly large voice in shaping domestic policy. President Ford had his own ideas to the contrary, and so did his chief of staff, an ambitious forty-two-year-old, Donald Rumsfeld. During Rockefeller’s last year as vice president, he added a young journalist, Megan Marshak, to his staff. Marshak was in her early twenties; Rockefeller was sixty-eight years old. After she was on staff, Marshak was promoted rapidly and was often at Rockefeller’s side.

When Rockefeller left office at the end of Ford’s

term in January, 1977, Marshak was one of the few staff members who continued to work for him in private life. Upon leaving politics, Rockefeller announced that his political ambitions were over. He planned to devote his energies to two projects related to his vast collection of original art: marketing good reproductions of his collection and writing a book about the holdings. Marshak worked closely with him on these projects and seemed genuinely interested in the art collection. In public she had a respectful demeanor, but it was inevitable that rumors would arise about a romantic or sexual relationship between her and Rockefeller.

Rockefeller had a private town house apartment on Fifty-fourth Street in Manhattan. It was connected to a suite of offices next door. On the evening of Friday, January 26, 1979, emergency medical technicians were summoned to the town house. Present when they arrived were Rockefeller, unconscious and probably dead from a heart attack, and Marshak. Rockefeller was rushed to Lenox Hill Hospital. His wife, Happy, and his brother, Laurence, were called in. Also called were his physician, Ernest Esakof, and a Rockefeller family spokesperson, Hugh Morrow. Esakof announced Rockefeller’s death at 12:20 A.M. Marshak accompanied Rockefeller in the ambulance and held his oxygen bottle. She, too, was at the hospital but soon got out of the family’s way.

Soon, the press arrived. Morrow issued several different versions of what had happened. First, he had announced that Rockefeller died at his desk, alone except for a bodyguard. This story was soon dismissed after the press found out that Marshak was with Rockefeller when he died. Reports leaked out that she had been wearing a black caftan and Rockefeller had been wearing a suit and tie. The time factors, too, failed to add up. The time of the heart attack was placed at 10:15 P.M., but the emergency call was not made until one hour later. It was later discovered that Marshak did not make the 911 call. By her own account, the call was made by Marshak’s friend and neighbor, journalist Ponchitta Pierce, whom Marshak called to help when Rockefeller collapsed. Pierce made the phone call then left the apartment.

The Rockefeller family abhorred scandal and, after the flurry of conflicting reports by Morrow, said nothing further about the circumstances of Rockefeller's death. No autopsy was performed; thus, it remains unclear what caused his death. It remains unknown as well whether he died while having sex with Marshak, although this scenario, to many, seems likely. Marshak has never spoken publicly about the death of her boss.

The scanty facts available only added to the salacious speculation surrounding Rockefeller's death. Besides the common assumption that he and Marshak were having an affair, others claim that Marshak's presence was a cover for a liaison Rockefeller was conducting with someone else, possibly Pierce.

IMPACT

Rockefeller's death came at the cusp of a sea change in the press's coverage of prominent politicians' sexual behavior. Until this point, unless a public figure did something outrageous in public—such as the 1974 scandal involving Congressman Wilbur D. Mills and a stripper—journalists kept silent. The facts in the death of the former vice president were scanty, but the circumstances could not be ignored, and the press covered them accordingly. Within a decade, the press was relentless in its coverage of political sex scandals.

—Emily Alward

FURTHER READING

Apostolidis, Paul, and Juliet A. Williams, eds. Public Affairs: Politics in the Age of Sex Scandals. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 2004. A study of politics and political culture in the context of sex scandals.

Persico, Joseph E. The Imperial Rockefeller: A Biography of Nelson A. Rockefeller. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1982. A highly readable biography of Rockefeller that is generally sympathetic but not uncritical. Persico's study remains a reliable and relevant source.

Reich, Cary. The Life of Nelson A. Rockefeller. New York: Doubleday, 1996. An excellent biography of Rockefeller. Based on solid research, Reich's interpretation is comprehensive and laudatory but still critical.

Roberts, Sam. "Serving as Ford's No. 2, Rockefeller Never Took His Eye Off Top Job." The New York Times, December 31, 2006. Insights, in the light of later events, into Rockefeller's frustrations as vice president.

Rockefeller, David. David Rockefeller's Memoirs. New York: Random House, 2002. A comprehensive memoir by Nelson Rockefeller's brother, David. Includes valuable insights on Nelson's early years and his impact as governor of New York and vice president of the United States.

SEE ALSO: Mar. 2–Sept. 25, 1963: John Profumo Affair Rocks British Government; July 18, 1969: Senator Edward Kennedy's Driving Accident Kills Mary Jo Kopechne; Oct. 7, 1974: Congressman Wilbur D. Mills's Stripper Affair Leads to His Downfall; May 23, 1976: Washington Post Exposes Congressman Wayne L. Hays's Affair; Sept., 1976: Jimmy Carter Admits Committing Adultery in His Heart; Dec. 7, 1980: Rita Jenrette's "Diary of a Mad Congresswife" Scandalizes Washington; Aug. 10, 1989: Japanese Prime Minister Sosuke Resigns After Affair with a Geisha; Sept. 24, 1992: British Cabinet Member David Mellor Resigns over Romantic Affair; Jan. 17, 1998: President Bill Clinton Denies Sexual Affair with a White House Intern; May 2, 2000: New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani's Extramarital Affair Is Revealed.

April 18, 1979

ACTOR LEE MARVIN IS ORDERED TO PAY PALIMONY TO FORMER LOVER

The term “palimony” was coined during the trial of Michelle Triola against her former lover, actor Lee Marvin. After their breakup, Triola sued Marvin for a property settlement, claiming that she had given up a promising career to live with and care for him. The California Supreme Court ruled that unmarried couples could sue for property settlements even if no express contract exists, as long as some sort of legal agreement was made between partners.

ALSO KNOWN AS: Marvin v. Marvin

LOCALE: Malibu, California

CATEGORIES: Law and the courts; civil rights and liberties; women’s issues; social issues and reform; Hollywood

KEY FIGURES

Lee Marvin (1924-1987), American film star
Michelle Triola (b. 1933), American actor, dancer, and singer

Marvin Mitchelson (1928-2004), Triola’s divorce attorney

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Michelle Triola had lived with actor Lee Marvin for seven years beginning in 1964. He was married at the time. She would claim in her lawsuit against him that she had been his cook, housekeeper, and companion, and had taken care of him after he had been drinking, devoting herself to his welfare. She also claimed that he told her, “What I have is yours and what you have is mine,” and that they agreed to appear as husband and wife in public. During the time of their cohabitation, Triola used the name Michelle Triola Marvin. The court would later rule that because Triola took Marvin’s last name, Marvin is presumed to have implicitly agreed to support her as her husband.

At the time of the lawsuit, California law required that married couples equally divide the assets of their marriages (assets were called community property). Although the couple was not formally married, Triola believed that she was entitled to compensation from Marvin because she fulfilled her obligations under their informal agreement and gave up her career as an entertainer to care for him. He disagreed with her contentions, and the dispute went to court. Celebrity divorce lawyer Marvin Mitchelson insisted that Triola receive her claim of Marvin’s earnings of more than one million dollars. The so-called palimony (from “pal” and “alimony”) suit led to a media scandal.

Even in the first decade of the twenty-first century, cohabitation by unmarried couples was a crime in several states, and adultery was a crime in about half of the states. Such criminal statutes, however, were rarely enforced. As used in criminal statutes, cohabitation includes nonmarital relationships that had been called “meretricious,” or sexual. Illicit relationships were once considered void in the realm of public policy. If an agreement between the partners is supported by a quid pro quo or what the law calls “consideration,” however, courts have become more and more liberal in upholding these agreements. In a nonspousal agreement that one partner will provide services in the home and the other will support the household, for example, the value of the services constitutes the consideration that validates the agreement.

An express agreement is one in which the parties state their understanding either orally or in writing. An implied agreement is inferred from behavior or conduct in which the parties act in such a way that it is reasonable to conclude that they must have reached an understanding. Unjust enrichment is the doctrine holding that one person should not profit inequitably at another’s expense. If one party has received something of value at another’s expense, or benefited unjustly, the nonenriched party may seek the remedy of restitution or reimbursement. To prevent unjust enrichment of one partner at the other's expense, a partner who provides services may recover in quantum meruit or the reasonable value of the services rendered. The reasonable value of the services must exceed the reasonable value of the support received if it can be shown that the services were rendered with the expectation of monetary reward. That may be difficult to demonstrate. Another possible remedy involves a constructive trust, inferred from the behavior of the parties. It is imposed by the courts to do justice and to prevent the unjust enrichment of one party at the other's expense.

Triola's 1976 lawsuit relied, in part, on the legal doctrine of quasi-contract, or an implied-in-law contract imposed by the courts to prevent injustice. It is a special form of contract that lacks all the trappings of a formal written document such as mutual assent of the parties, but it is imposed on the parties by the courts to avoid unjust enrichment. Under this doctrine, courts may infer a legally enforceable agreement from the circumstances surrounding the dealings of the parties, even though the parties have not entered into any formal written agreement. Triola asserted that similar logic should be applied to her relationship with Marvin, and that their conduct should be viewed as an "implied agreement" granting her many of the same rights given by law to a spouse. The court, however, declined to treat unmarried cohabitants like married persons. In her suit, Triola argued that, aside from a marriage license, she and Marvin were essentially married from 1964 until 1970. As such, Triola contended that she was entitled to half of what he had earned during their relationship, or $1.8 million including $100,000 for loss of her own potential earnings. Her attorney, Mitchelson, demanded palimony and had to prove that Marvin breached an oral or implied contract to share his assets.

Initially, Triola lost her 1976 case on legal grounds. On appeal, the California

Supreme Court decided that her case should be heard again in the lower courts, sparking a number of similar cases in other states. On rehearing, the superior court ruled, on April 18, 1979, that Triola had failed to prove her alleged agreement, that there was no express or implied contract, and that there was no unjust enrichment. Judge Arthur K. Marshall denied her community property claim for half of the $3.6 million that Marvin had earned during their seven years of cohabitation. However, Marshall did order Marvin to pay Triola $104,000 for "rehabilitation purposes," that is, job training.

Marvin appealed, and on August 11, 1981, the California Court of Appeal reversed Marshall's decision, declaring that Triola was entitled to no money, including the $104,000 she was awarded in 1979. The appeals court, although upholding the concept of palimony, ruled that a cohabitant (Triola) in a nonspousal relationship has no community property claim. Instead, a cohabitant has a contract claim. Without evidence that there had been a contract between Marvin and Triola stipulating that Marvin would support her should their relationship end, Triola could not recover any money.

Lee Marvin and Michelle Triola in 1966. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

IMPACT

Although Triola lost her 1976 palimony case on technical grounds, Marvin v. Marvin nonetheless created new law when the court decided to address the issue of “property rights of a nonmarital partner in the absence of an express contract.” The court’s ruling, in effect, said that a nonmarital partner can attempt to establish an implied contract in the absence of an express contract. Furthermore, it ruled that the law cannot assume that an unmarried couple intends to keep their properties and earnings separate and, thus, the law must take into account all possible arrangements between an unmarried plaintiff and defendant. The court stated, [W]e conclude that the mere fact that a couple have not participated in a valid marriage ceremony cannot serve as a basis for a court’s inference that the couple intend to keep their earnings and property separate and independent; the parties’ intention can only be ascertained by a more searching inquiry into the nature of their relationship.

In Marvin v. Marvin, the court also spoke of the growth of nonmarital partnerships in contemporary society. The court recognized the diversity among cohabitants and gave the trial courts an opportunity to tailor their remedies to the particular circumstances of the parties. Without specific guidelines for application of quasi-contractual remedies in nonspousal agreements, however, Marvin left uncertain the circumstances and limitations for each type of recovery. The court’s rationale also has been applied to same-gender couples.

The 1979 appeals court ruling, in which Marvin was ordered to pay for Triola more than $104,000, was unique because it determined that Triola’s case had at least some merit. It therefore extended the 1976 ruling that the “nature of” a couple’s relationship should be probed in deciding the contractual intentions, if any, of both the plaintiff and the defendant.

—Marcia J. Weiss

FURTHER READING

Booth, Alan, and Ann C. Crouter, eds. Just Living Together: Implications of Cohabitation on Families, Children, and Social Policy. Mahwah, N.J.: Erlbaum, 2002. A collection of articles exploring the social significance of cohabitation. Articles look at legal policy, child development, and the culture of cohabitation.

Kay, Herma Hill, and Carol Amyx. “Marvin vs. Marvin: Preserving the Options.” California Law Review 65, no. 5 (September, 1977): 937-977. A scholarly guide to statutory and case law prior to the Marvin case.

Moller, Mark K. “Almost Like Being Married.” Legal Times, April 5, 2004. An informally written account of the Marvin case.

Weitzman, Lenore J. The Marriage Contract: Spouses, Lovers, and the Law. New York: Free Press, 1981. A thorough and insightful guide to the law surrounding marriage and the family.

Zec, Donald. Marvin: The Story of Lee Marvin. New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1980. An illustrated biography of Lee Marvin written by a syndicated entertainment columnist. Contains detailed accounts of Marvin as a drunken rebel and overnight successful actor and discusses incidents that occurred during the trial.

SEE ALSO: June 4, 1943: Actor Charles Chaplin Is Sued for Paternity; Mar. 21, 1976: Actor Claudine Longet Kills Ski Champion Vladimir Sabich; Jan. 26, 1979: Former Vice President Nelson Rockefeller Dies Mysteriously; Mar. 10, 1980: Scarsdale Diet Doctor Is Killed by His Lover; July 28, 1980: Magazine Reveals Baseball Star Steve Garvey’s Marital Problems; Apr. 28, 1981: Tennis Star Billie Jean King Is Sued for Palimony; June 12, 1994: Double Murder Leads to Sensational O. J. Simpson Trial.

June 4, 1979

SOUTH AFRICAN PRESIDENT B. J. VORSTER RESIGNS IN MULDERGATE SCANDAL

South African president B. J. Vorster was found to have used government funds to finance a propaganda war to sway local and international opinion in favor of apartheid. Vorster's Afrikaner National Party established The Citizen, an English-language newspaper that supported apartheid. Vorster, along with other government ministers, resigned in disgrace.

ALSO KNOWN AS: Muldergate; Rhodiegate; Infogate

LOCALE: South Africa

CATEGORIES: Corruption; government; politics; publishing and journalism; social issues and reform; colonialism and imperialism

KEY FIGURES

B. J. Vorster (1915-1983), president, 1978-1979, and prime minister, 1966-1978, of South Africa

Connie Mulder (1925-1988), minister of information for South Africa

Eschel Rhodie (1933-1993), secretary to the Department of Information

SUMMARY OF EVENT

With increased international television access, media manipulation is one of the more common types of government corruption. The information scandal in South Africa, nicknamed Muldergate by local newspapers, involved such media manipulation. Coconspirators included officials Connie Mulder, Eschel Rhodie, and President B. J. Vorster. A significant amount of money had been funneled through the Department of Information and placed into outside accounts. The funds were used to finance a government-furnished newspaper to fight a propaganda war in favor of the Afrikaner National Party (NP) and apartheid, or government-sanctioned racial segregation. The secret operation was soon discovered, and investigations unfolded the story before the public eye.

As early as the mid-seventeenth century, English and Dutch colonizers settled in South Africa for the fertile lands, eventually establishing communities and laws that ensured white influence throughout the country. Apartheid laws were enacted in 1948, legalizing racial segregation. This represented an effort by the NP to take control of economic and social systems in South Africa. A strict set of laws was put into place as a means of separation, categorizing citizens based on appearance and acceptance within society. Regulations were placed on employment positions, voting, and marriage. Blacks were forced to carry identity documents—pass books—before they were permitted travel around the region. Land was divided into homelands, which further segregated communities by family origin. Mass disagreement with such policies eventually led to guerrilla warfare tactics from some citizens, with the government refusing to nullify apartheid laws. A civil war was beginning to seem like a possibility.

While South Africans fought for their rights, government officials did what they could to affirm legislation. At this time, Vorster was a supporter of the apartheid government, a member of the NP, and an official in Parliament. In 1966, he was elected prime minister, succeeding Hendrick Frensch Verwoerd, an active supporter of apartheid rule as well.

While an advocate and enforcer of apartheid, Vorster recognized that the white minority would not be able to stay in power indefinitely. He knew that campaigners for the African National Congress (ANC) were fighting to have their voices heard, demanding reform in South African society. It was feared by Vorster and the NP that as the struggle persisted, foreign political opinion could be swayed toward the plight of the people. Determined to get the support of English-speaking whites and black African states, Vorster needed a new platform. Specifically, the government needed a new English-speaking newspaper to counter the Rand Daily Mail, an English-speaking newspaper that reported on racial issues and was against apartheid. The NP believed the Rand Daily Mail was part of what the apartheid government called a “hate South Africa crusade.”

B. J. Vorster. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

Rhodie was the secretary of information working under Vorster. Before working at the Department of Information (DOI), Rhodie helped establish To the Point, a secret government-funded magazine formed to counter foreign-news headlines unfavorable to the pro-apartheid government of South Africa. The newest secret project to create NP propaganda under the direction of Vorster would be called Operation Annemarie (named for Rhodie’s teenage daughter). Rhodie worked closely with the bureau of state security to ensure this illegal operation was kept secret. In addition, he brought in relatives to hold key positions so that secrets would not be leaked. Rhodie, Vorster, and Mulder, the minister of information, met at Cape Town in early 1974 to plan the covert operation. They agreed that typical campaign methods such as films and flyers were no longer effective in the political world. It was then agreed that they would create The Citizen, an English-speaking newspaper that would attempt to sway public and foreign opinion toward the ideas of the NP.

To finance The Citizen, the DOI used budgeted money from the Department of Defense. It also involved millionaire Louis Luyt to handle the business end of the budget transaction. Luyt acted as the newspaper’s owner, and the NP government created ghost organizations to make the transfer of funds look less suspicious. The first issue of the paper came out in September, 1976.

Problems within the framework of the operation existed from the beginning, however, and one significant part of the plan was called into question in 1978. The conspirators were under the impression that the money was coming from the DOI, but the money had never been allocated to the department. In essence, there should have been no money available, and by the time it was realized, the funds, which were stolen, had already been spent.

Rumors of missing funds and a government-furnished newspaper soon reached other government officials, who immediately ordered an audit of the DOI. Mulder was brought before Parliament and claimed innocence in the matter. Supreme court justice Anton Mostert presented details of the information scandal and divulged intentions and identities in his report of November, 1978. Mulder’s claim of innocence was disproved in the report, and all other participants were implicated. Known as the Muldergate scandal, the secret project was labeled as a government-furnished campaign plot. Mostert’s report also exposed illegal activities such as bribes of international news agencies and the use of taxpayer monies to fund personal activities.

Ironically, the first paper to report Operation Annemarie was the Rand Daily Mail, which painted a colorful picture of the information scandal. Media coverage brought Vorster, Mulder, and Rhodie into the spotlight. Vorster resigned on June 4, 1979, and Mulder soon resigned as well. Taking the place of Vorster was his longtime competitor, P. W. Botha. Botha’s first official action as prime minister was to create a commission, led by Judge Roelof Erasmus, to look into the corruption. Anonymous sources began coming forward with additional information on financial discrepancies and other fraudulent activities, making it impossible to argue the innocence of those involved. The final report of the Erasmus Commission was issued in June, 1979.

IMPACT

While Mulder and Vorster were forced out of office, Rhoodie did not admit to the accusations against him. Instead, he fled South Africa and moved first to Ecuador, then Great Britain, where he tried to attain political asylum. The attempt failed and Rhoodie fled once more, this time to France, where he was finally caught and incarcerated. He was soon extradited back to South Africa and tried. Rhoodie was acquitted on all charges and eventually wrote The Real Information Scandal (1983), which detailed his covert projects.

Muldergate caused great disappointment within the NP, which was depending on Vorster and Mulder to continue white domination in South Africa. The party knew that apartheid law would be at serious risk under Botha's leadership and that the future of racial segregation was in jeopardy. The ANC, led by Nelson Mandela, continued advocating against apartheid and eventually influenced the leadership of South African society. Nelson was president of South Africa from 1994 to 1999.

—Lauren Riggi and Brion Sever

FURTHER READING

Barber, James P. South Africa in the Twentieth Century: A Political History—In Search of a Nation

South African President Vorster Resigns

State. Malden, Mass.: Blackwell, 1999. The author traces the history of the politics, international relations, and key trends that help define South Africa's place in the twentieth century.

Guelke, Adrian. Rethinking the Rise and Fall of Apartheid: South Africa and World Politics. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2005. A history of apartheid in South Africa and its influence on global politics. Includes the chapter "From Vorster to Botha: New Departure or Militarized Cul de Sac?," which asks whether Muldergate was a strong anomaly or a political diversion from the movement against apartheid.

O'Meara, Patrick. South Africa's Watergate: The Muldergate Scandals. Hanover, N.H.: American Universities Field Staff, 1979. The author details the events surrounding B. J. Vorster's scandal, as it occurred.

Rees, Mervyn, and Chris Day. Muldergate: The Story of the Info Scandal. Johannesburg: Macmillan South Africa, 1980. This book focuses on the scandal's unfolding and examines its possible causes.

SEE ALSO: Nov. 15, 1908: Belgium Confiscates Congo Free State from King Leopold II; 1930: Liberia Is Accused of Selling Its Own Citizens into Slavery; Mar. 31, 1933: New York Times Reporter Denies Reports of a Soviet Famine; Late 1955: British Atrocities in Kenya's Mau Mau Rebellion Are Revealed; Nov. 17, 2005: Liberian Workers Sue Bridgestone Firestone over Slave Labor.

September 26, 1979LOVE CANAL RESIDENTS SUE CHEMICAL COMPANY

During the 1940's and 1950's, Hooker Chemical buried approximately twenty-two thousand tons of toxic waste at its landfill in Love Canal, a neighborhood in Niagara Falls, New York. By the late 1970's, residents of Love Canal began noticing serious health problems in the neighborhood, including large numbers of miscarriages and birth disorders. In 1983, Hooker Chemical's parent company agreed to an out-of-court settlement with more than one thousand residents who had sued. The dumping scandal led to the creation of the multibillion-dollar federal Superfund program for cleaning up of toxic-waste sites around the United States.

LOCALE: Niagara Falls, New York

CATEGORIES: Law and the courts; environmental issues; business; medicine and health care; families and children

KEY FIGURES

Lois Gibbs (b. 1951), president of the Love Canal Homeowners Association

Robert P. Whalen (b. 1930), New York State health commissioner, 1975-1978

Hugh Leo Carey (b. 1919), governor of New York, 1975-1982

Jimmy Carter (b. 1924), president of the United States, 1977-1981

SUMMARY OF EVENT

In 1892, businessman William T. Love purchased the land that separated the upper and lower parts of the Niagara River, situated near the City of Niagara Falls, to dig a canal that would connect the two river branches. What came to be called Love Canal was never completed, however, and during the 1920's, the City of Niagara Falls purchased the property to use as a landfill. In 1942, Hooker Chemical (HC) in turn bought the sixteen-acre parcel for private use as a chemical disposal site. Between 1947 and 1952, the company buried approximately twenty-two thousand tons of hazardous waste at Love Canal. After the area was completely filled, the company backfilled the site and then encased it with four feet of clay to contain the toxic waste.

In 1953, HC sold the land to the Niagara Falls School District for one dollar. The property deed included a warning about the chemicals buried on the site and also released HC from any future legal responsibilities. Shortly thereafter, the school district built the Ninety-ninth Street Elementary School on the site of the former landfill and, as expected, residential homes began to be built near the school. By the 1970's, the Love Canal neighborhood had about

A sign warns against entering a fenced-off area of the Love Canal neighborhood. (AP/Wide World Photos)

1,800 single-family homes and 240 apartments for low-income residents.

Beginning during the late 1950's, Love Canal residents frequently complained to the city about burns suffered by their children and pets, strange odors, oozing sludge, and the existence of unknown substances on their properties. In cooperation with Niagara County, the city hired Calspan Corporation to investigate the complaints. The company reported that it had found toxic chemicals in the Love Canal area and provided the city with a list of corrective procedures. In response, the city did nothing.

During the mid-1970's, years of abnormally heavy rains caused chemicals to surface. Ominous pools of multicolored liquid appeared following storms. Burns and mysterious rashes became increasingly common, a section of the schoolyard collapsed, gardens and backyard trees died, and strange substances seeped through basement walls. The Niagara Gazette began investigating these problems in October, 1976.

In April, 1978, the Niagara Gazette published several newspaper articles about the buried toxic waste. The articles revived the residents' fight for the chemical cleanup of their neighborhood and also focused national attention on Love Canal. On August 2, Love Canal was declared unsafe by the commissioner of the New York State Department of Health (DOH), Robert P. Whalen. Citing high rates of miscarriages and birth defects, Whalen ordered the school closed and recommended that pregnant women and infants leave Love Canal immediately. However, residents were outraged at his suggestion. They believed the area was unsafe for all residents. That same year, the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) completed its own investigation and determined that serious health risks indeed were endangering the community.

The community began to be more actively involved in the crisis. One community leader was Lois Gibbs, who started a petition to close the Ninety-ninth Street school. She believed her son's

"CHEMICALS LINGER IN THE SOIL"

American biologist Rachel Carson stunned the public when she condemned the widespread use of chemicals, namely pesticides, for causing the slow death of the environment—and the slow death of humans. Her warnings in Silent Spring (1962) presaged the toxic waste disaster at Love Canal.

For the first time in the history of the world, every human being is now subjected to contact with dangerous chemicals, from the moment of conception until death. In the less than two decades of their use, the synthetic pesticides have been so thoroughly distributed throughout the animate and inanimate world that they occur virtually everywhere. They have been recovered from most of the major river systems and even from streams of groundwater flowing unseen through the earth. Residues of these chemicals linger in the soil to which they may have been applied a dozen years before. They have entered and lodged in the bodies of fish, birds, reptiles, and domestic and wild animals so universally that scientists carrying on animal experiments find it almost impossible to locate subjects free from such contamination. They have been found in fish in remote mountain lakes, in earthworms burrowing in soil, in the eggs of birds—and in man himself. For these chemicals are now stored in the bodies of the vast majority of human beings, regardless of age. They occur in the mother's milk, and probably in the tissues of the unborn child.

All this has come about because of the sudden rise and prodigious growth of an industry for the production of man-made or synthetic chemicals with insecticidal properties. This industry is the child of the Second World War.

health problems were directly linked to the school being located on top of the toxic landfill. While going door to door obtaining signatures, she found that many residents also were suffering from similar health problems. In July, 1978, New York governor Hugh Leo Carey granted emergency powers to the DOH to handle the growing crisis at Love Canal, allocating $500,000 for health studies on the residents of the area. On August 2, the DOH declared a medical state of emergency at Love Canal and ordered the temporary evacuation of all pregnant women and children under the age of two. The agency also closed the Ninety-ninth Street school.

CHEMICALS DISPOSED OF IN LOVE CANAL BY HOOKER CHEMICAL, 1942-1953

Type of Waste	Physical State	Total Est. Quantity—Tons	Container
Misc. acid chlorides other than benzoyl— includes acetyl, caprylyl, butyryl, nitro benzoyls	liquid and solid	400	drum
Thionyl chloride and misc. sulfur/chlorine compounds	liquid and solid	500	drum
Misc. chlorination—includes waxes, oils, naphthenes, aniline	liquid and solid	1,000	drum
Dodecyl (Lauryl, Lorol) mercaptans (DDM), chlorides and misc. organic sulfur compounds	liquid and solid	2,400	drum
Trichlorophenol (TCP)	liquid and solid	200	drum
Benzoyl chlorides and benzo-trichlorides	liquid and solid	800	drum
Metal chlorides	solid	400	drum
Liquid disulfides (LDS/LDSN/BDS) and chlorotoluenes	liquid	700	drum
Hexachlorocyclohexane (Lindane/BHC)	solid	6,900	drum and nonmetallic containers
Chlorobenzenes	liquid and solid	2,000	drum and nonmetallic containers
Benzylchlorides—includes benzyl chloride, benzyl alcohol, benzyl thiocyanate	solid	2,400	drum
Sodium sulfide/sulfhydrates	solid	2,000	drum
Misc. 10% of above		2,000

Source: Interagency Task Force on Hazardous Wastes, New York State Department of Health, Draft Report on Hazardous Waste Disposal in Erie and Niagara Counties, New York, March, 1979.

On August 4, Gibbs and her neighbors organized the Love Canal Homeowners Association (LCHA) and began an aggressive campaign to prove that the toxic chemicals buried in Love Canal were directly linked to the unusually high number of health problems in the area. These health problems included epilepsy, asthma, cancers, urinary tract infections, miscarriages, and birth disorders. On August 7, U.S. president Jimmy Carter declared a federal state of emergency at Love Canal and ordered the relocation of all the families living on the first two blocks closest to the landfill. In September, the U.S. House of Representatives allocated four million dollars toward the cleanup of the site. In November, more than two hundred chemicals, including benzene and dioxin, were found buried at Love Canal.

Throughout 1979, while state and federal agencies continued testing for chemical contamination and cleaning up the area, the LCHA continued its fight to have all remaining families relocated from Love Canal. On September 26, the first residents' lawsuits were filed, holding HC liable for the environmental disaster. By October 31, more than eight hundred suits were filed against HC, the city, the county, and the board of education. Combined, these lawsuits sought approximately $800 billion in damages. On December 20, the U.S. Department of Justice, on behalf of the EPA, also filed a $124 million suit against HC's parent company, Occidental Chemical, a subsidiary of Occidental Petroleum.

Several months later, in May, 1980, the EPA announced that after extensive medical examinations of Love Canal residents, the agency found thirty-six individuals with chromosome damage. On May 19, LCHA president Gibbs and other LCHA members held two EPA employees hostage at the association's office and demanded that President Carter do something to help the residents of Love Canal. Two days later, Carter declared another health emergency that temporarily relocated the remaining families. On October 1, Carter signed a bill that made the relocations permanent.

Three years later (October, 1983), a lawsuit filed by 1,328 former residents of Love Canal against Occidental Petroleum was settled out of court for approximately $20 million. In June, 1994, the company agreed to reimburse the state of New York a total of $98 million for Love Canal cleanup expenses, and in December, 1995, the company agreed to pay $129 million in damages to the federal government for costs associated with cleaning the site.

IMPACT

The Love Canal toxic-dumping scandal had far-reaching consequences not only for the residents of Love Canal but also for the country, its industry, and its government. Through hard work and perseverance, Gibbs and the homeowners' association fought to convince local, state, and federal authorities that the toxic chemicals buried underneath their homes were causing serious health problems. They demanded relocation and corporate accountability. As a result of their efforts, the public gained a new understanding of the hidden dangers of chemical exposure and the importance of proper chemical disposal.

Most significantly, the toxic-dumping scandal led to the creation of the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act

Love Canal Residents Sue Chemical Company

(CERCLA) that was passed on December 11, 1980. Commonly known as the Superfund Act, it oversees the cleanup of abandoned hazardous-waste sites in the United States. Love Canal was the first Superfund site. The total cost of the cleanup was approximately $400 million and took twenty-one years to complete.

—Bernadette Zbicki Heiney

FURTHER READING

Collin, Robert W. The Environmental Protection Agency: Cleaning Up America's Act. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2006. This book documents the history of the Environmental Protection Agency and reviews some of its most notable cases, including Love Canal.

Fletcher, Thomas H. From Love Canal to Environmental Justice: The Politics of Hazardous Waste on the Canada-U.S. Border. Orchard Park, N.Y.: Broadview Press, 2003. Beginning with the tragedy at Love Canal, the author traces the history of environmental disasters and the government policies and procedures that have been created to handle them, both in the United States and in Canada.

Freudenberg, Nicholas. Not in Our Backyards! Community Action for Health and the Environment. New York: Monthly Review Press, 1984. Excellent source of information on community action in response to environmental problems. Chapters begin with case studies and then focus on a particular issue such as government regulation, public education, public protest, or legal and legislative action. References, index, and helpful lists of relevant books, manuals for environmental activists, and environmental organizations.

Gibbs, Lois Marie, with Murray Levine. Love Canal: The Story Continues. Stony Creek, Conn.: New Society, 1998. An autobiographical account, first published in 1982, by Gibbs about her struggles as the president of the Love Canal Homeowners Association and getting help for the residents of Love Canal.

Levine, Adeline Gordon. Love Canal: Science, Politics, and People. Lexington, Mass.: D. C. Heath, 1982. The author chronicles the events at Love Canal, focusing primarily on the community's reactions and responses to the chemical disaster and their fight with the U.S. government for help.

SEE ALSO: 1956-1962: Prescription Thalidomide Causes Widespread Birth Disorders; May 29, 1981: Court Finds That Ford Ignored Pinto's Safety Problems; Dec. 16, 1982: Congress Cites Environmental Protection Agency Chief for Contempt; Feb. 4, 1996: Whistle-Blower Reveals Tobacco Industry Corruption; Feb. 17, 2002: Rotting Human Bodies Are Found at Georgia Crematory; July, 2002: Journalist Alleges Release of Genetically Modified Corn Seeds in New Zealand; Beginning Aug. 29, 2005: Government Incompetence Mars Hurricane Katrina Relief Efforts.

October 10, 1979

FRENCH PRESIDENT GISCARD D'ESTAING IS ACCUSED OF TAKING A BRIBE

The investigative, satirical newspaper Le Canard enchaîné reported that French president Valéry Giscard d'Estaing had accepted a bribe in diamonds from the African military ruler Jean-Bédél Bokassa in 1973 while serving as minister of economy and finance of the French government. The scandal led to Giscard d'Estaing's downfall.

LOCALES: Paris, France; Bangui, Central African Republic

CATEGORIES: Corruption; forgery; publishing and journalism; government; international relations

KEY FIGURES

Valéry Giscard d'Estaing (b. 1926), president of France, 1974-1981

Jean-Bédél Bokassa (1921-1996), military ruler of the Central African Republic, 1966-1976, and emperor of the Central African Empire, 1976-1979

Roger Delpey (1926-2007), French writer and journalist

Claude Angeli (b. 1931), French journalist

SUMMARY OF EVENT

On October 10, 1979, the respected French satirical newspaper Le Canard enchaîné published an article accusing President Valéry Giscard d'Estaing of having improperly received diamonds from Jean-Bédél Bokassa, the military ruler of the Central African Republic (CAR), in 1973. To understand the significance of the scandal that developed (rivaling the impact of the Watergate scandal in the United States), one must first understand the relationships then existing between France and the CAR.

The CAR is a former French colony that gained its independence on August 13, 1960. Located north of the Republic of the Congo-Brazzaville and the Democratic Republic of the Congo, east of Cameroon, south of Chad, and west of Sudan, this 240,324-square-mile country is slightly smaller than the state of Texas. From its independence to the first democratic elections of 1993, the country was ruled by a series of presidents who took power by force, often with the support of France. The first was David Dacko, who governed the country until his cousin, Bokassa, overthrew him on December 31, 1965. For the first few years of his rule, Bokassa was supported by many Western countries, particularly the United States, Switzerland, Spain, Belgium, and France, all of which sought access to the CAR's rich natural resources of gold, diamonds, uranium, copper, iron, manganese, cobalt, and nickel. The nation's immense mineral wealth, combined with Bokassa's imperial style of governing, created an environment in which corruption and bribery could flourish.

Giscard d'Estaing's involvement in the scandal began when, as minister of economy and finance under President Georges Pompidou, he discovered the potential of the CAR as a vacation spot. In December, 1970, Giscard d'Estaing, an avid hunter, was invited to spend some time in the northern part of the CAR by his wife's cousin, Henry de la Tour d'Auvergne, who owned a large estate there. Entranced by the experience, he returned in 1971 and again in 1973, when Bokassa invited him to visit him in the capital, Bangui. As he had done for many political guests, including U.S. diplomat Henry Kissinger, Bokassa presented Giscard d'Estaing with two stars made of diamonds. Like most Western nations, France at the time had strict rules concerning gifts made to its public officials. The diamond stars that were given to him should have been registered with the French government, then sold for charity or sent to a museum. Unfortunately, Giscard d'Estaing failed to register the gift, later offering the unsatisfying, though possible, explanation that he had simply put them in a drawer and forgotten them.

The friendly relationship between the two politicians continued through the 1970's. Giscard d'Estaing met with Bokassa in France, again receiving gifts of ivory and diamonds, and returned to vacation at the estate of his wife's cousin in the CAR in 1976 and 1978. Around this time, Bokassa was re-making himself as Bokassa I, grandiose emperor of the Central African Empire, but his increasingly bizarre behavior did not produce a break with Giscard d'Estaing.

Finally, in 1979, civil unrest in Bangui was savagely repressed in a bloodbath that included the murder of more than one hundred schoolchildren, some of whom were further victimized when Bokassa reportedly consumed their flesh in a cannibal feast. Only after these outrages did Giscard d'Estaing's government move to oust the dictator, organizing a September coup that took advantage of Bokassa's absence on a trip to Libya to replace him with Dacko, the cousin whom Bokassa had overthrown in 1965.

Giscard d'Estaing Is Accused of Taking a Bribe

About a month after the coup, on October 10, 1979, the French newspaper Le Canard enchaîné published the story "Pourquoi Giscard a organisé la casse des archives de Bokassa" (why Giscard organized the destruction of Bokassa's archives), written by chief editor Claude Angeli. The article purported to show a copy of an order signed by Bokassa in 1973, directing the Comptoir National du Diamant (the organization producing diamonds in the CAR) to provide him with multiple diamonds for the stars to be presented to Giscard d'Estaing. If these diamonds were of jewelry quality, the two stars would have been worth millions of French francs—certainly enough to buy loyalty and too much to forget in a drawer. Of course, if the diamonds were of lower—industrial—grade, their value would have been far less.

The possibility of a major bribe led to a national media frenzy of speculation on the honesty of the French president. While the newspaper Le Monde virtually accused the president of dishonesty, the newspaper Le Point took a more moderate view, speculating that the value of the diamonds was low and that the signature on the order was forged.

Unfortunately, Giscard d'Estaing fed the fires of speculation and rumor by refusing to answer any questions about the diamonds, later asserting that he saw no point in defending his honor and claiming that anyone who knew him would never believe him capable of behaving in a dishonorable way. It was a gentleman's response to a slur on his character, and it was, of course, totally ineffective in the real world of French politics. Finally, on November 27, 1979, he addressed the issue in a televised interview. Openly contemptuous of those who accused him, he claimed that Bokassa's signature on the document was forged.

Following the president's pronouncement, the Direction de la Surveillance du Territoire (the French equivalent of the Federal Bureau of Investigation) investigated the source of the information published by Le Canard enchaîné. When it was determined that Roger Delpy, a journalist and writer, brought Bokassa's order to the newspaper, Delpy was promptly incarcerated as a dealer in forged documents. However, the president's actions did not convince everyone of his innocence in the matter. He was voted out of office in 1981 and replaced by François Mitterrand.

IMPACT

At the end of his presidency, Giscard d'Estaing had the gifts he had received during his tenure in office examined by experts prior to their legal disposition. Among the items evaluated were the two stars given to the president by Bokassa. The stars were judged to be of inferior quality and sold for a little more than 100,000 French francs. However, were they really Bokassa's stars? Critics of the president believed that they had been altered, with the original high-quality diamonds replaced with lesser stones. His supporters continued to proclaim that the scandal was manufactured by Giscard d'Estaing's political enemies, who forged the document to damage the president's prospects for reelection.

History will probably never know whether or not Giscard d'Estaing used the diamonds for his own profit. However, his experience clearly delineated the emerging nature of modern politics, in which personal honesty and honor are no longer taken for granted and must be forever bolstered by meticulous record keeping and a scrupulous regard for appearances.

—Denyse Lemaire and David Kasserman

FURTHER READING

Abadie, Frederic. Valéry Giscard d'Estaing. Paris: Editions Balland, 1997. This is an excellent resource that traces the life and political career of the French president. In French.

Bell, David S. Presidential Power in Fifth Republic France. New York: Berg, 2000. Highlights the tenures of French presidents between 1958 and 2000, with a particular focus on the presidency of Giscard d'Estaing.

Loughlin, John. Subnational Government: The French Experience. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2007. This book offers an extensive history of the manner in which the French government functions. It gives an overview of the machinations of subnational government in France.

Titley, Brian. Dark Age: The Political Odyssey of Emperor Bokassa. Montreal: McGill-Queen's University Press, 1997. An excellent political biography of Bokassa that details the government of the dictatorial leader of the Central African Republic and, later, Central African Empire.

SEE ALSO: Nov. 15, 1908: Belgium Confiscates Congo Free State from King Leopold II; Nov., 1929: Banque Oustric et Cie Failure Prompts French Inquiry; Jan. 8, 1934-Jan. 17, 1936: Stavisky's Fraudulent Schemes Rock French Government; Dec. 23, 1998: Prominent Belgians Are Sentenced in Agusta-Dassault Corruption Scandal.

October 11, 1979SENATE DENOUNCES HERMAN E. TALMADGE FOR MONEY LAUNDERING

U.S. senator Herman E. Talmadge was denounced by the Senate for his participation in a scheme to launder public money and campaign funds through a secret bank account and then convert the money for personal use. His censure in the form of a denouncement led to his political downfall and made him one of only nine senators to have been censured since 1789.

LOCALE: Washington, D.C.CATEGORIES: Corruption; government; politics; banking and financeKEY FIGURES

Herman E. Talmadge (1913-2002), governor of Georgia, 1948-1955, and U.S. senator, 1957-1981

Betty Talmadge (1923-2005), Herman Talmadge's former wife

Daniel Minchew (fl. 1970's), Herman Talmadge's aide

Robert S. Talmadge (1948-1975), Herman and Betty Talmadge's son

SUMMARY OF EVENT

On October 11, 1979, a six-month investigation of U.S. senator Herman E. Talmadge ended when the full U.S. Senate voted to censure, or denounce, him for his "reprehensible" conduct while in office. By a vote of 81-15, the full Senate chamber supported a punishment that was less than the more severe punishment of expulsion. During the investigation, dozens of witnesses, including Talmadge, his former wife Betty Talmadge, and many of his former and current aides testified not only about the senator's honesty but also about his unusual habits involving money.

The Talmadge investigation was one of the first following congressional reforms passed after the Watergate scandal of 1972-1974. The new ethics rules created the Senate Ethics Committee, which was assigned the duty of investigating violations by senators. With scandal having dominated Washington politics through much of the 1970's, Talmadge became the first example of the U.S. Congress sweeping clean its own house after having forced a president to resign.

In one of the first investigations by the newly created Ethics Committee, six senators heard testimony about a complicated money laundering scheme initiated by Talmadge to hide his misuse of funds. Talmadge, a twenty-two-year veteran of the Senate, was charged with five violations of Senate ethics rules, including filing false expense reports and pocketing excess monies for personal use. The amounts ranged from twenty-eight to thirty-seven thousand dollars, with several thousand more dollars disappearing without a trace.

Talmadge, a conservative Democrat, also was charged with two campaign violations, including filing false disclosure forms in a case in which he failed to list all donations and campaign spending, and laundering campaign money for personal use. Finally, the senator was accused of not reporting gifts given him by supporters, as required by Senate rules, and for filing false tax returns for other gifts, a charge that led to an Internal Revenue Service investigation of his tax returns.

Senator Talmadge's legal troubles came at the tail end of a stormy political career. Son of former Georgia governor Eugene Talmadge, Herman Talmadge grew up in a segregated society with a father who earned political fame by threatening force to maintain segregation. The young Talmadge would follow in his father's racist footsteps during the 1940's, threatening to use a baseball bat against any African American who tried to integrate the state.

Talmadge attempted to seize power after the 1946 election, which his father won (his father died before taking office). The young Talmadge's grab for the governorship provoked a state constitutional crisis involving the lieutenant governor, the state legislature, the Georgia Supreme Court, and the Georgia National Guard, which tried to seat Talmadge with force. Denied power through an attempted political coup, he engineered an electoral coup instead and won the governor's seat in 1948. His move to the U.S. Senate proved easier, as he challenged incumbent Walter George in the 1956 Democratic primary. The ailing George, intimidated by Talmadge's outrageous tactics and reputation, dropped out of the race, opening the way for Talmadge's easy victory. He would win three more elections before his censure in 1979.

Even with all the turmoil in Talmadge's political past, the Senate investigation would be the most difficult test of his career. Talmadge testified before the Ethics Committee and rejected the charges against him. He sought to undermine the credibility of those testifying against him, then provided a series of explanations for his behavior. During the investigation, he admitted to having a drinking problem, delaying the committee hearings as he attended a month-long alcohol treatment program. After leaving the program, Talmadge went before the committee and asked the senators to end the investigation, but they refused to do so. When asked about the large sums of cash he had in his possession, Talmadge explained that the money came from small donations, five to ten dollars, from his Georgia supporters. Talmadge said that he had lived on these small donations for more than five years, not having to rely on his Senate salary to pay for housing and food.

Talmadge's next defense was his hard work on the Senate Agriculture Committee, his past service, and his close relationship with colleagues. The senators on the Ethics Committee were not swayed by his arguments, noting that it was his past conduct that they were investigating. For Talmadge, it would be his personal rather than his professional past that would haunt him throughout the hearings. The bitter divorce from his wife of thirty-seven years included her claim of considerable compensation for their years of married life. The terms of the settlement alerted the media to the senator's financial misdeeds and eventually to the Senate investigation. Betty Talmadge would also strike another blow at her former husband's defense when she testified before the committee.

Although Betty was not expected to have personal knowledge of her husband's money laundering scheme, she was expected to reveal details of his spending and unusual money-collection techniques. Married to the senator for more than three decades, she had little interest in hiding his dirty dealings and described in detail how he kept large sums of money throughout the house.

According to Betty, her husband kept rolls of hundred-dollar bills in his pockets and distributed those bills to her and others. Talmadge also stored envelopes full of money in his dresser drawers, in amounts totaling more than fifteen thousand dollars. According to Betty, her husband transported large sums of cash from Washington, D.C., to his Georgia home, then left the money in his coat pockets. She had seen and used the money, taking several thousand dollars out on one occasion for her personal expenses. Betty then gave the committee more than seven thousand dollars in one-hundred-dollar bills she said she had taken from her husband's coat, providing an element of proof to her accusations.

The most damaging witness, other than his wife, against the senator was one of his top aides, Daniel Minchew, who served in Talmadge's Senate office and his reelection campaign. Minchew had created a secret bank account at the behest of Talmadge, who used the account as a slush fund. Because the account was not in the senator's name, it allowed him to deny knowledge of it or how the money reached the account, denials that came the moment the account was discovered.

According to Minchew, the secret account included monies from false reimbursements and excess campaign funds that the senator then used for personal expenses. Minchew claimed that he had given large sums to Robert S. Talmadge, the senator's son (Robert drowned in 1975). Minchew admitted to withdrawing money from the account for expenses.

Talmadge had his defenders, including several of his then-current and former aides. They disputed Minchew's claims about Talmadge's knowledge of excessive expenditures. These aides claimed that because the senator signed expense reports without reading them, his staff had overcharged without Talmadge being aware. However, another aide testified he had witnessed Talmadge transferring eighty thousand dollars from an office bank account to the senator's personal account, supporting Minchew's testimony that Talmadge was mixing personal and government money.

IMPACT

Given the conflicting testimony, the Ethics Committee, composed of three Democrats and three Republicans, recommended that the full Senate censure Talmadge through denouncement rather than expel him from Congress. His Senate colleagues recognized that he violated ethics rules by improperly signing expense reports.

While it appeared Talmadge had escaped any long-term consequences that normally would have followed expulsion, the Senate vote undermined his influence among his colleagues, forcing him from his chairship of the Senate Agriculture Committee and weakening his hold over the Georgia electorate. In the 1980 general election, Talmadge faced the head of Georgia's Republican Party, Mack Mattingly, who made the senator's legal troubles one of the core issues in the campaign. Mattingly barely defeated Talmadge, winning by a few thousand votes, and became the first Republican senator from Georgia since the 1870's.

—Douglas Cloutre

FURTHER READING

Bernstein, Adam. "Georgia Sen. Herman Talmadge, Integration Opponent, Dies at 88." The Washington Post, March 22, 2002. A Talmadge obituary that examines his early career in state politics and his move into the national limelight at the time of segregation. Also addresses, briefly, his censure by the U.S. Senate.

Cook, James F. The Governors of Georgia, 1754-2004. 3d ed. Macon, Ga.: Mercer University Press, 2005. An encyclopedia covering Georgia governors since the time of the British colonies through 2004. Includes an entry on Herman Talmadge that explores his brief career as governor and his subsequent career in the U.S. Senate.

Long, Kim. The Almanac of Political Corruption, Scandals, and Dirty Politics. New York: Delacorte Press, 2007. A wide-ranging book detailing the various scandals and corrupt practices that have plagued U.S. politics. Includes discussion of the Talmadge hearing and the criminal acts he was accused of perpetrating.

Roberts, Robert North. Ethics in U.S. Government: An Encyclopedia of Investigations, Scandals, Reforms, and Legislation. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2001. A comprehensive encyclopedia documenting American political scandals, ethical controversies, and investigations from 1775 to 2000.

SEE ALSO: Jan. 23, 1904: Senator Joseph R. Burton Is Convicted of Bribery; Nov. 16, 1951: Federal Tax Official Resigns After Accepting Bribes; June 25, 1956: President Truman's Appointments Secretary Is Convicted of Tax Conspiracy; Mar. 1, 1967: Adam Clayton Powell, Jr., Is Excluded from Congress; June 23, 1967: Senator Thomas J. Dodd Is Censured for Misappropriating Funds; May 9, 1969: Supreme Court Justice Abe Fortas Is Accused of Bribery; June 17, 1972-Aug. 9, 1974: Watergate Break-in Leads to President Nixon's Resignation; July 31, 1972: Thomas F. Eagleton Withdraws from Vice Presidential Race; Oct. 10, 1973: Spiro T. Agnew Resigns Vice Presidency in Disgrace; Oct. 7, 1974: Congressman Wilbur D. Mills's Stripper Affair Leads to His Downfall; Sept. 21, 1977: Carter Cabinet Member Resigns over Ethics Violations; Feb. 2, 1980: Media Uncover FBI Sting Implicating Dozens of Lawmakers; Sept. 23, 1987: Plagiarism Charges End Joe Biden's Presidential Campaign.

November 29, 1979, and January 31, 1983BASEBALL COMMISSIONER SUSPENDS MICKEY MANTLE AND WILLIE MAYS FOR CASINO TIES

Motivated by a desire to distance Major League Baseball from any trace of gambling, Commissioner Bowie Kuhn banned retired superstars Willie Mays and Mickey Mantle from working for both major league clubs and gambling casinos at the same time. Mays, in 1979, and Mantle, in 1983, had accepted lucrative public relations positions for Atlantic City, New Jersey, casinos. The sanctions were lifted by Peter Ueberroth, who succeeded Kuhn as commissioner in 1985.

LOCALES: New York, New York; Atlantic City, New Jersey

CATEGORIES: Corruption; gambling; sports

KEY FIGURES

Willie Mays (b. 1931), retired Hall of Fame baseball player

Mickey Mantle (1931-1995), retired Hall of Fame baseball player

Bowie Kuhn (1926-2007), commissioner of Major League Baseball

Peter Ueberroth (b. 1937), commissioner of Major League Baseball

SUMMARY OF EVENT

In 1979, former San Francisco Giants and New York Mets star player Willie Mays accepted a lucrative job offer from the newly opened Bally's Park Place Hotel Casino Resort in Atlantic City, New Jersey. In reaction, baseball commissioner Bowie Kuhn banned Mays from being employed by any baseball club while he worked for a gambling enterprise. Four years later, former New York Yankees star Mickey Mantle took a similar position with Claridge Casino Hotel, also in Atlantic City. He, too, was banned from baseball. In taking these actions to separate baseball and gambling, Kuhn followed in the footsteps of baseball's first commissioner, Kenesaw Mountain Landis, a staunch opponent of corruption in baseball. Kuhn's sanctions provoked controversy because Mays and Mantle were two of the greatest players in baseball history. To remove them from working for baseball in their retirement years seemed to many an overreaction.

Despite their historic accomplishments on the baseball field, both Mantle and Mays entered retirement after the 1968 and 1973 seasons, respectively, with few marketable skills. Both served as goodwill ambassadors for Major League Baseball. Also, Mays was a special instructor for the New York Mets and Mantle for the New York Yankees. Mantle also had a brief and undistinguished career as a sports announcer. Both had done promotional work for various businesses.

Mays was earning $100,000 for a two-year contract with the Mets when Bally's representatives approached him with an offer: one million dollars over ten years for Mays to do public relations and entertain the casino's big spenders. The position did not ask Mays to promote gambling directly, and New Jersey state law forbid him from gambling. It is believed that the casino required about 120 days of work per year from Mays.

From the moment Commissioner Kuhn learned of Bally's interest in Mays, he expressed his deep concern to Bally and the Mets. The office of baseball commissioner had been created after the notorious Black Sox scandal of 1919. Eight members of the Chicago White Sox had been accused of taking money from gamblers to throw the World Series. When the judicial system failed to produce convictions, the new commissioner, Landis, banned the eight players from any connection with baseball. Using his power to protect "the best interests of baseball," Landis restored confidence in the integrity of the sport.

After Landis's death in 1944, gambling was considered not a major problem. Kuhn, however, warned Mays that he could not remain a special hitting instructor for the Mets and work for a casino.

Mays argued that he had been doing public relations work already, that gambling was legal in New Jersey, and that as part-time coach he could not possibly corrupt the outcomes of games. For Kuhn, the mere appearance of a gambling-baseball link was unacceptable, and he encouraged Mays to stay with baseball. Proclaiming the need to provide for his family, Mays began his public relations work for Bally's on November 29, 1979.

When Mantle accepted a similar offer from Claridge on January 31, 1983, Kuhn reminded him of the consequences. Mantle was earning only $20,000 from the Yankees as a spring-training batting instructor in addition to doing public relations work for a Dallas insurance company. Claridge offered Mantle $100,000 per year to attend a wide variety of public and charitable functions and to play golf with good customers. Nevertheless, Kuhn forbid Mantle from working in baseball.

Mantle and Mays put public pressure on Kuhn by avoiding all baseball functions, including Old Timers' games and the yearly Hall of Fame ceremonies. An exasperated Kuhn explained that his decision did not prohibit all association with baseball. The two stars, however, repeatedly referred to being "banned" and "kicked out of baseball." Mantle, Mays, and sympathetic sports-writers accused Kuhn of hypocrisy because team owners in the past had invested in casinos, and George Steinbrenner of the Yankees and John Galbreath of the Pittsburgh Pirates participated in the horse-racing business. Kuhn defended himself by citing his policy of forcing owners to divest of all interests in casinos, and he had recognized that gambling on horses also was unseemly. To that end he had frustrated an attempt by Edward DeBartolo to purchase the Chicago White Sox in 1981 because of his ownership of race-tracks.

The ostracizing of Mantle and Mays did not help Kuhn's increasingly rocky tenure as commissioner, as he also faced labor strife and the advent of free agency. The owners did not reelect Kuhn to a third term and instead chose Peter Ueberroth as his successor. Ueberroth had been recognized as the genius behind the profitable 1984 Los Angeles Summer Olympics. He took over from an embattled Kuhn in October, 1984. On March 18, 1985, Ueberroth welcomed Mantle and Mays back into baseball. The new commissioner asserted he was not soft on gambling but that there was a need for new rules. A grateful Mantle noted that "no one likes to be banned."

IMPACT

Mantle and Mays earned their Hall of Fame credentials during the 1950's and 1960's when players' salaries were shockingly low. Soon after they retired they witnessed far-less-able players earn enormous sums of money because of the introduction of free agency rules. The two stars' acceptance of the casino offers was perfectly understandable. Mays later admitted another benefit of the casino job: It exposed him to the workings of the business world and, thus, compelled him to be better disciplined to survive in that setting.

Mickey Mantle, left, and Willie Mays in 1962. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

Kuhn's puritanical stance on gambling connections and other related issues led to his demise as commissioner, but his fierce resolve is understandable. Gambling has been an ever-present threat to the reputation of baseball. In 1989, allegations surfaced that Pete Rose, the manager of the Cincinnati Reds and baseball's all-time hits leader as a player, had placed bets on baseball games, including those involving his own team. In an age when baseball was wracked by labor disruptions and faced increasing competition for the public's entertainment dollars, it could not afford the Rose scandal, nor any other.

Commissioners and club owners desperately sought to maintain the profitability of the multi-billion-dollar business. At the same time, Kuhn and his successors wrestled with how to preserve baseball's almost mythological status in the United States and the devotion of its fans to its heroes, including Mays and Mantle.

—M. Philip Lucas

FURTHER READING

- Burk, Robert E. Much More than a Game: Players, Owners, and American Baseball Since 1921. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2001. Solid and concise history of baseball as a business that provides an overview of the commissioner's and baseball's role in curtailing gambling.
- Castro, Tony. Mickey Mantle: America's Prodigal Son. Washington, D.C.: Brassey's, 2002. Contains a solid account of Mantle's difficult retirement years.
- Fimrite, Ron. "Mantle and Mays." Sports Illustrated, March 25, 1985. Celebrates the return of both Mantle and Mays to baseball after they were reinstated by Ueberroth, with a focus on the star players' retirement activities.

- Ginsberg, Daniel E. The Fix Is In: A History of Baseball Gambling and Game Fixing Scandals. New York: McFarland, 2004. A valuable overview of a neglected aspect of baseball history.
- Kuhn, Bowie. Hardball: The Education of a Baseball Commissioner. New York: Times Books, 1987. Commissioner Kuhn's perspective on the casino controversy with Mays and Mantle.
- Mantle, Mickey. The Mick. New York: Doubleday, 1985. A straightforward narrative of Mantle's life that includes discussion of his dealings with Kuhn.
- Mays, Willie. Say Hey: The Autobiography of Willie Mays. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1988. Contains Mays's version of his "banishment" from baseball.

SEE ALSO: Apr. 2, 1915: Players Fix Liverpool-Manchester United Soccer Match; Sept. 21, 1919: White Sox Players Conspire to Lose World Series in "Black Sox" Scandal; Dec. 26, 1926: Ty Cobb and Tris Speaker Are Accused of Fixing Baseball Games; Spring, 1947: Baseball Manager Leo Durocher Is Suspended for Gambling Ties; May 3, 1950: U.S. Senate Committee Begins Investigating Organized Crime; Fall, 1969-Winter, 1971: Japanese Baseball Players Are Implicated in Game Fixing; Sept. 23, 1977: Horse-Swapping Fraud Staggers Belmont Park Raceway; Feb. 28, 1986: Baseball Commissioner Peter Ueberroth Suspends Players for Cocaine Use; Aug. 24, 1989: Pete Rose Is Banned from Baseball for Betting on Games; Mar. 17, 2005: Former Baseball Star Mark McGwire Evades Congressional Questions on Steroid Use.

1980

BIOGRAPHER CLAIMS ACTOR ERROL FLYNN WAS A NAZI SPY

While a number of biographies have discredited as untrue writer Charles Higham's claims of film star Errol Flynn's pro-Nazi loyalties, Flynn nevertheless has acquired a posthumous reputation as having been a Nazi spy. Later biographers counter that Flynn supported leftist causes, including the Cuban Revolution, indicating that Flynn was a political leftist and not a fascist.

LOCALE: United States

CATEGORIES: Espionage; publishing and journalism; public morals; military

KEY FIGURES

Errol Flynn (1909-1959), Tasmanian-born film star

Charles Higham (b. 1931), English-born biographer, writer, and poet

Hermann F. Erben (Gerit H. Koets; 1897-1985), Austrian-born medical doctor and photographer

SUMMARY OF EVENT

It is plausible to suggest that British writer Charles Higham's book Errol Flynn: The Untold Story (1980) is not so much a biography as it is an exposé. Whereas biographies, at least in the truest sense, seek to offer an account of the events of a person's life written by someone other than the figure in question, an exposé often aims to uncover revelatory, surprising, or shocking information about a particular person. That Higham's Errol Flynn presents more like an exposé than a biography is substantiated to some degree by Higham himself. He claims in his prologue that the revelation of Tasmanian-born film star Errol Flynn's apparently traitorous activities motivated his own personal sense of grief and shock, as well as his objective to "blow Flynn's cover."

Higham reportedly based his scandalous claims of Flynn's activities as a spy on evidence he obtained under the U.S. Freedom of Information Act of 1966. Higham claims he found evidence of Flynn's political espionage and Fifth Column activities at the National Archives in Washington, D.C., as well as documentation supporting the same from both the U.S. State Department and the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI). Higham's book also includes a list of declassified FBI documents that Higham argues either directly or indirectly implicates Flynn in espionage activities during World War II. Additionally, Higham claims that Hermann F. Erben admitted to him that he indoctrinated Flynn into Nazism, a claim Higham does not substantiate.

While subsequent biographers—perhaps most notably Tony Thomas in Errol Flynn: The Spy Who Never Was (1990)—have since denounced as fabrications Higham's allegations of Nazi collaboration against Flynn, Flynn's political affiliations continue to fascinate biographers and fans alike. In fact, a growing body of evidence supports the claim that Flynn maintained expressly leftist political leanings. Such claims include assertions that Flynn was a supporter of the Spanish Republic during the Spanish Civil War (1936-1939) and of the Cuban Revolution during the late 1950's.

Just as Higham's exposé undoubtedly sustained Flynn's posthumous, though apparently erroneous, reputation as a Nazi collaborator and spy during World War II, the enduring interest in debunking Higham's allegations continues to prolong that reputation. Most of the post-1980 biographical accounts of Flynn's life recapitulate Higham's assertion of Flynn's double life as a Nazi conspirator, accounts that, in turn, contribute to the endurance of this allegation within contemporary popular culture.

The special appendix of Buster Wiles's 1988 autobiography My Days with Errol Flynn, "The Flynn Controversy," written by William Donati, accuses Higham of having falsified his primary-source material to prove his own thesis: that Flynn admired

Adolf Hitler, was both Nazi sympathizer and agent, and was bisexual, anti-Semitic, and a murderer. Moreover, Donati, like Tony Thomas in Errol Flynn: The Spy Who Never Was, argues that the true source of the Flynn controversy was never really Flynn at all but rather his association with photographer Erben. Flynn reportedly met Erben for the first time in Salamaua, New Guinea, on April 14, 1933.

That Flynn narrated and appeared in a documentary produced by Victor Pahlen called The Truth About Fidel Castro [sic] Revolution (1959) is accepted, in part, as evidence of his outward support of the Cuban Revolution against the regime of General Fulgencio Batista y Zaldívar. Flynn and Pahlen reportedly owned a movie theater in Havana when revolutionary Fidel Castro arrived in the city on January 8, 1959, to spearhead plans to install a revolutionary government. Castro himself appears in the film.

Moreover, Flynn himself appears to have substantiated claims that he supported the Cuban Revolution. In My Wicked, Wicked Ways (1959), for instance, he writes that he considered Castro a friend. Furthermore, Flynn also traveled to Cuba to experience the revolution at first hand. Indeed, he scooped the world press by securing the first interview with Castro following the revolution. Other public declarations that seem to indicate Flynn's leftist leanings include his appearance on a Canadian television program called Front Page Challenge, which aired on January 13, 1959. During the program, Flynn stated, among other things, that Castro will rank in history with some of the greatest leaders of all time.

IMPACT

Most post-1980 biographical narratives about Flynn, whether in book form or on film, include the scandal motivated by Higham's biography in their accounts dedicated to the events of Flynn's life. As such, it is possible to argue that such accounts continue to sustain and strengthen the controversy itself because the question of Flynn's anti-British and anti-U.S. political affiliations did not surface publicly during Flynn's life but rather some twenty-one years after his death.

In 2006, director Simon Nasht released the film Tasmanian Devil: The Fast and Furious Life of Errol Flynn. Written by Robert de Young and produced by Sharyn Prentice, the film highlights the lesser known aspects of Flynn's personal life and professional career, including his documentary filmmaking enterprises with Castro (The Truth About Fidel Caestro Revolution). The project received script development funding from Film Victoria (Australia) and ABC TV (Australia). In fact, publicity for the project claimed television presales were brokered with ABC TV (Australia), the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC; Britain), ZDF/Arte (Germany/France), AVRO (the Netherlands), YLE (Finland), DR TV (Denmark), and TV Ontario (Canada). That these projects persist shows a real and continuing international fascination with the private and public life of Flynn.

—Nicole Anae

FURTHER READING

- Flynn, Errol. My Wicked, Wicked Ways. New ed. London: Aurum, 2005. Flynn's telling autobiography, first published in 1959, was cowritten by Earl Conrad, author of Errol Flynn: A Memoir. Flynn writes tellingly of his association with and support of Fidel Castro, even considering him a friend.
- Higham, Charles. Errol Flynn: The Untold Story. New York: Doubleday, 1980. In this scandalous biography, Higham alleges that Flynn was a fascist sympathizer and Nazi spy during World War II.
- McNulty, Thomas. Errol Flynn: The Life and Career. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 2004. McNulty's documentary analysis of Flynn's life and career includes rare and some previously unpublished photographs.
- Thomas, Tony. Errol Flynn: The Spy Who Never Was. New York: Citadel Press, 1990. This account denounces as fabrications Charles Higham's allegations that Flynn was a fascist sympathizer and Nazi spy.
- Wiles, Buster. My Days with Errol Flynn: The Autobiography of a Stuntman. Santa Monica, Calif.: Roundtable, 1988. The appendix written by William Donati, “The Flynn Controversy,” accuses Higham of falsifying his primary-source material to prove his own thesis: that Flynn was both a Nazi sympathizer and an agent for the Nazis.

SEE ALSO: Summer, 1936: Film Star Mary Astor’s Diary Becomes a Public Sensation; Feb. 6, 1942:

Film Star Errol Flynn Is Acquitted of Rape; Mar. 3, 1986: Former U.N. Secretary-General Kurt Waldheim’s Nazi Past Is Revealed; Dec. 1, 1987: Yale Scholar’s Wartime Anti-Semitic Writings Are Revealed; July 28, 2006: Actor Mel Gibson Is Caught Making Anti-Semitic Remarks; Aug. 12, 2006: Novelist Günter Grass Admits to Youthful Nazi Ties.

February 2, 1980

MEDIA UNCOVER FBI STING IMPLICATING DOZENS OF LAWMAKERS

In 1978, the Federal Bureau of Investigation began a sting operation to investigate organized crime and the trafficking of stolen property. The agency set up a fictitious company, Abdul Enterprises Ltd., as a cover and staffed it with federal agents posing as wealthy Arab businessmen. In 1979, the focus of the operation shifted to the investigation of corrupt U.S. politicians taking money for political favors. A number of legislators were caught in the sting, but the scandal led to accusations against the FBI for its investigative techniques and for possible entrapment. The media also were criticized for reporting on the operation before anyone had been criminally indicted.

ALSO KNOWN AS: Abscam

LOCALE: Washington, D.C.

CATEGORIES: Corruption; government; law and the courts; organized crime and racketeering

KEY FIGURES

Melvin Weinberg (b. 1925), convicted con artist employed by the FBI

Angelo Errichetti (b. 1928), New Jersey state senator, 1976-1981, and mayor of Camden, 1973-1981

Harrison A. Williams (1919-2001), U.S. senator from New Jersey, 1959-1982

John W. Jenrette, Jr. (b. 1936), U.S. representative from South Carolina, 1975-1980

Richard Kelly (1924-2005), U.S. representative from Florida, 1975-1981

Raymond Lederer (b. 1938), U.S. representative from Pennsylvania, 1977-1981

Michael Myers (b. 1943), U.S. representative from Pennsylvania, 1976-1980

Frank Thompson (1918-1989), U.S. representative from New Jersey, 1955-1980

SUMMARY OF EVENT

In 1978, the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) authorized a request by the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) to set up a sting operation, code-named Abscam (for Abdul scam), to investigate organized crime and the trafficking of stolen property. The FBI hired Melvin Weinberg, a convicted con artist, to manage the operation from the FBI office in Hauppauge, Long Island. In return for his services, the FBI purportedly paid him $150,000 and voided his three-year prison sentence.

The FBI then set the stage for the sting by setting up a fictitious company, Abdul Enterprises Ltd., as a cover. The business was staffed by undercover agents posing as wealthy Arab businessmen. In the spring of 1979, the focus of the operation shifted to the investigation of government corruption on local, state, and federal levels. This decision was based on a promise made by New Jersey state senator and Camden mayor Angelo Errichetti that he could provide undercover agents with a list of politicians who were willing to provide the services of the federal government in return for cash. These services included granting asylum in the United States, money laundering, obtaining gambling licenses, and investment schemes.

As part of the operation, an undercover agent called Sheikh Kambir Abdul Rahman arranged meetings with thirty-one politicians named by Errichetti. The meetings, which were secretly videotaped by the FBI, took place in several different locations, including a property in Washington, D.C., a yacht in Florida, and hotel rooms in Pennsylvania and New Jersey.

On Saturday, February 2, 1980, the National Broadcasting Company (NBC) broke the story of the FBI's Abscam investigation during its evening news segment. The New York Times and other media outlets reported on the operation the following day. Within a day, the FBI investigation into political corruption turned into a major scandal. In total, six federal lawmakers, three city-level officials, one federal employee, and one state senator-city mayor were convicted on felony bribery and conspiracy charges for their role in the illegal activities. On October 30, the DOJ indicted U.S. senator Harrison A. Williams for bribery and conspiracy. He was convicted on May 1, 1981, received a three-year prison sentence, and finally resigned from the Senate on March 11, 1982. He was the only U.S. senator implicated and was the first senator to be imprisoned in almost eighty years.

Five U.S. representatives also were convicted for bribery and conspiracy in connection with the sting operation. These Congress members included John W. Jenrette, Jr., who was tape-recorded telling a colleague that he had been given fifty thousand dollars in exchange for special favors. He received a two-year prison sentence and resigned on December 10, 1980. Richard Kelly accepted a bribe of twenty-five thousand dollars from federal agents during the sting operation. He was convicted for bribery and served thirteen months in prison. Raymond Lederer was convicted for bribery and sentenced to three years in prison. Michael Myers was videotaped accepting a fifty-thousand-dollar bribe by undercover agents on August 2, 1979. He was convicted for bribery and sentenced to three years in prison. On October 2, 1980, he was expelled from the House, making him the first Congress member to be expelled since 1861. Frank Thompson also was convicted for bribery and conspiracy. He received a three-year prison sentence and resigned from the House on December 29, 1980.

A videotape from a television screen showing Representative Michael Myers, second from left, holding an envelope containing $50,000, which he just accepted from an undercover FBI agent in the Abscam sting operation. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Five other government officials were convicted of bribery and conspiracy. These included Errichetti, three Philadelphia City Council members, and a U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service inspector. It is important to note that on appeal, all of the aforementioned convictions were upheld.

Other notable politicians associated with Abscam include U.S. senator Larry Pressler from South Dakota and Representative John Murtha of Pennsylvania. When approached by undercover agents, Pressler simply refused to take the bribe and then reported the incident to the FBI. Murtha, on the other hand, expressed an interest in the fifty-thousand-dollar bribe because he wanted to use the money to improve the local economy in his congressional district. Because of these extenuating circumstances, Murtha was never indicted on bribery charges.

IMPACT

The Abscam scandal had far-reaching consequences, mostly negative. The operation was much maligned by government critics who accused the FBI of entrapping those thought to be involved in the affair. Entrapment is a significant accusation, given that criminal defendants could win acquittal if they can prove that they had no previous disposition to violate the law but were pressured into such violations by the urging of law enforcement officers. However, in the case of Abscam, various appeals courts ruled repeatedly that the operation did not constitute entrapment. Critics also questioned the hiring of a convicted felon to manage the investigation.

In response to these accusations, on January 5, 1981, Attorney General Benjamin R. Civiletti issued specific guidelines, the Attorney General Guidelines on FBI Undercover Operations, a complete set of guiding standards to direct the FBI in the best way to conduct undercover investigations. Es-

PUBLIC RESPONSE TO ABSCAM

Public opinion regarding the FBI's Abscam investigation ranged from support for the agency's successful probe to scorn for the agency's undercover tactics to catch Congress members taking bribes. In the following letter addressed to President Ronald Reagan, dated March 11, 1983, and made available through the Freedom of Information Act, an anonymous citizen questions the legality of the FBI's tactics:

Dear Mr. Reagan:

I am interested in finding out the methods used by the F.B.I. during their ABSCAM investigations. I am specifically interested in knowing the answers to these questions.

What kind of law allows the F.B.I. to bribe people?

Why was the F.B.I. not indicted for attempted bribery?

Why is this type of procedure not considered entrapment?

Can any other agency in the Justice Department use this type of procedure to catch potential criminals?

I would appreciate you answering these questions. I would also like you to send me any other information concerning this topic. Thank you for your time.

established to protect civil liberties, the guidelines, the first of their kind in U.S. law enforcement, are updated periodically in response to changing types of crime and evolving approaches to law enforcement.

The Senate also held its own probe into the operation and the FBI's investigative techniques. In December, 1982, the Senate's final report supported the FBI but also cautioned the public that the kind of techniques it used in the Abscam affair might infringe on a person's right to privacy.

For Americans who were already disenchanted with government because of the Watergate scandal and U.S. president Richard Nixon's resignation, Abscam led to further disappointment and disgust. Although criminals were brought to justice because of the operation, the case had the ultimate effect of making Americans even more distrustful of their elected officials. Voters began to critically question the integrity of their representatives. Conversely, and more positively, the scandal also exemplified how well the U.S. system of government worked. The politicians who broke the law were charged, convicted, sentenced, imprisoned, removed from office, and publicly shamed, thus showing that no person, even a government official or one elected, is above the law.

—Bernadette Zbicki Heiney

FURTHER READING

Caplan, Gerald M., ed. ABSCAM Ethics: Moral Issues and Deception in Law Enforcement. Cambridge, Mass.: Ballinger, 1983. A compilation of seven essays that examine the moral issues that surround undercover operations by law enforcement agencies. Uses the Abscam affair as a starting point for discussion.

Greene, Robert W. The Sting Man: Inside Abscam. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1981. Based on more than two hundred interviews with Melvin Weinberg, this book provides readers with the inside story of the Abscam sting operation through Weinberg's eyes.

Roberts, Robert North. Ethics in U.S. Government: An Encyclopedia of Investigations, Scandals, Reforms, and Legislation. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2001. A comprehensive encyclopedia documenting political scandals, ethical controversies, and investigations in the United States between 1775 and 2000. Includes discussion of Abscam.

Tolchin, Susan J., and Martin Tolchin. Glass Houses: Congressional Ethics and the Politics of Venom. Boulder, Colo.: Westview Press, 2001. This book examines the ethical pressures routinely confronted by politicians and how politicians handle those pressures. Several case studies are reviewed, including Abscam.

U.S. Congress. Senate. Final Report of the Select Committee to Study Law Enforcement Undercover Activities of Components of the Department of Justice to the U.S. Senate. 97th Congress, 2d session. Senate Report 97-682. Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1981. Contains analysis of ethical issues raised by the Abscam prosecutions. A basic, but important, compendium of primary sources.

SEE ALSO: Jan. 23, 1904: Senator Joseph R. Burton Is Convicted of Bribery; May, 1930: Postmaster's Division of Airmail Routes Creates a Scandal; Mar. 17, 1937: Atherton Report Exposes San Francisco Police Corruption; May 3, 1950: U.S. Senate Committee Begins Investigating Organized Crime; Nov. 16, 1951: Federal Tax Official Resigns After Accepting Bribes; Oct. 7, 1963: Vice President Lyndon B. Johnson Aide Resigns over Crime Connections; May 14, 1974: Washington Post Reveals That the Nixons Received Jewelry Gifts; 1976-1977: U.S. Congress Members Are Implicated in Koreagate Scandal; Oct. 11, 1979: Senate Denounces Herman E. Talmadge for Money Laundering; Oct. 19, 1982: Car Manufacturer John De Lorean Is Arrested in a Drug Sting; June, 1988-June, 1989: Insider-Trading Scandal Rocks Japanese Government; June 1, 1994: Congressman Dan Rostenkowski Is Indicted in House Post Office Scandal; Dec. 23, 1998: Prominent Belgians Are Sentenced in Augusta-Dassault Corruption Scandal; July 1, 2005: Federal Agents Raid Congressman Randall Cunningham's Home.

March 10, 1980

SCARSDALE DIET DOCTOR IS KILLED BY HIS LOVER

Herman Tarnower, the creator of the famous Scarsdale diet, was shot and killed by his lover, Jean Harris, the head of an exclusive Virginia girls' school. Harris became jealous over Tarnower's relationship with a younger woman. The well-publicized trial included scandalous testimony on the doctor's sex life and his fourteen-year relationship with Harris.

LOCALE: Purchase, New York

CATEGORIES: Murder and suicide; law and the courts; sex

KEY FIGURES

Herman Tarnower (1910-1980), cardiologist who created the popular Scarsdale diet

Jean Harris (b. 1923), head of a girls' school in Virginia

Lynne Tryforos (fl. 1980's), Tarnower's secretary

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Herman Tarnower, a cardiologist, practiced medicine in Scarsdale, New York, where he developed his famous diet and best-selling book, The Complete Scarsdale Medical Diet (1979), cowritten with Samm Sinclair Baker. Tarnower did not specialize in weight-reduction programs but believed in good nutrition. His diet derived from concern for his patients' health and from numerous requests for copies of his weight-loss plans.

Jean Harris, an educator and head of the Madeira School for Girls in McLean, Virginia, suspected that Tarnower, her lover of fourteen years, was leaving her for a younger woman. A confrontation between Tarnower and Harris ended with Tarnower being shot and killed. Harris claimed she had intended to commit suicide but instead accidentally shot Tarnower when he attempted to take the gun away from her.

Harris's early career was marked by intense devotion to her work and very little social life. That changed at a party in December, 1966, when a friend introduced her to Tarnower. Harris, divorced and with two children, was attracted to the gregarious doctor and began dating him in March, 1967. The couple continued to see each other for the next fourteen years. Although they considered marrying each other, Harris ultimately rejected the idea because Tarnower clearly enjoyed being unmarried. Also, Harris wanted to remain independent. Tarnower, who was not possessive, encouraged Harris to see other men while he began to date other women. Harris, however, would not date others, creating an imbalance in the relationship. She initially did not seem to mind Tarnower's interest in other women, and he certainly did not attempt to conceal his other sexual affairs. Harris knew as well that Tarnower was seeing his secretary, Lynne Tryforos.

Harris said that she began receiving disturbing phone messages from an anonymous caller around the time Tarnower was beginning to date Tryforos. Harris was told by the caller that she was getting old and needed instruction in sex, messages that were demeaning and humiliating and made her feel powerless and pathetic. Curiously, Harris did not suspect that Tryforos made the calls; she could not even identify the caller's gender. Harris and Tryforos, though, did engage in several angry phone calls at other times.

In 1979, The Complete Scarsdale Medical Diet became a best seller, making Tarnower a millionaire. Harris had provided significant help during the production of the book, and Tarnower thanked her in his acknowledgments. For Harris, however, the acknowledgments meant little at this time: Tarnower had decided to take Tryforos instead of Harris with him on his book tour, leaving her feeling excluded from her lover's life. Depressed and exhausted, she despaired of competing with Tryforos for his attention. She also hated the idea of him choosing a woman who was so poorly educated and who seemed to lack sophistication. Others, however, said Tryforos made a good impression as a modest and impeccably groomed professional woman.

Harris had found her career as head of a girls' school stressful, especially at Madeira, where she spent a good deal of time restoring the school's fading reputation. At such moments, she relied on Tarnower for reassurance, but he seemed unconcerned about her worries, even as she feared she might be fired after receiving a poor performance review in May, 1979.

The following year, on March 10, 1980, Harris's suicidal thoughts intensified after she had run out of the antidepressant medication that Tarnower had prescribed for her. Suffering emotionally, she wanted to take her own life, and to do so at Tarnower's residence in Purchase, New York.

Harris said that she found Tarnower sleeping upon her arrival at his house. When she woke him, he advised her to get some sleep. She then went into his bathroom and noticed hair curlers that were not hers. She threw them at a dresser and broke its mirror. Tarnower, now awake, hit her on the face and told her to leave. She pulled out the gun in her purse, put it to her head, and, as she fired, Tarnower deflected the shot, which hit his hand. The two continued to struggle, leading to a shot to the doctor's torso. Harris admitted to the police who were first on the scene that she shot Tarnower. He died later that night, and Harris was arrested for his murder. She was released on bail and then entered a psychiatric treatment facility. She repeatedly denied that she intended to murder Tarnower and insisted on testifying on her own behalf at her trial, which began on November 21, 1980. She pleaded not guilty by reason of temporary insanity and claimed Tarnower's death was accidental. In the meantime, sales of The Complete Scarsdale Medical Diet soared during public discussion of the case.

While it could not be proven that Harris planned to murder her lover, a jury found her explanation of Tarnower's death unconvincing. Expert testimony for the prosecution suggested that the doctor had been shot in bed and that his wounds were inconsistent with the story of a struggle for the gun. Although an expert for the defense challenged the prosecution's expert, the defense expert admitted he was not completely certain of his analysis of Tarnower's death. The prosecution's experts, however, said they had no doubts about their analyses.

After eight days of deliberation, the jury found Harris guilty of second-degree murder. She was sentenced to fifteen years to life in Bedford Hills Correctional Facility, a maximum-security women's prison in New York. Harris appealed her verdict three times to no avail, and her requests for clemency were denied until December 29, 1992, when New York governor Mario Cuomo commuted her sentence. She had suffered two heart attacks in prison.

Jean Harris en route to sentencing at the Westchester County Courthouse, 1981. (AP/Wide World Photos)

IMPACT

The Harris-Tarnower murder case received enormous press attention. Harris, a high-achieving professional woman, seemed nevertheless in thrall to the arrogant but charismatic Tarnower. Her conflicted nature made her an appealing figure with a complex psychology. Reporters wrote about Tarnower's success with women, a success that seemed built upon his candor. Women had to take him as he was: a man who did not promise fidelity but who nevertheless created a charm that attracted women such as Harris, who sought relationships with powerful men.

Although Harris did not believe she could survive prison, she managed to do so, and she even wrote three books: Stranger in Two Worlds (1986), her autobiography; They Always Call Us Ladies: Stories from Prison (1988), which looks at an inhumane prison system in which guards and administrators abuse their authority; and Marking Time (1991), a collection of letters written to her biographer, also a friend.

A model prisoner, Harris worked with incarcerated mothers and presented parenting and sex-education classes. She founded the prison's Children's Center. Following her release from prison, she lectured and worked to raise funds for educating the children of incarcerated women.

—Carl Rollyson

FURTHER READING

Alexander, Shana. Very Much a Lady: The Untold Story of Jean Harris and Dr. Herman Tarnower. New York: Simon & Schuster, 2006. Originally published in 1983, this work is more of a biographical study than the book by Diana Trilling. Alexander, who became Harris's friend, provides a revealing and intimate look at Harris's life.

David, Jay. The Scarsdale Murder: The Slaying of Dr. Herman Tarnower of "The Complete Scarsdale Medical Diet." New York: Leisure Books, 1980. One of the first books written about the Harris case; this is now chiefly valuable for its use of news items and magazine profiles.

Harris, Jean. Marking Time: Letters from Jean Har-

Scarsdale Diet Doctor Is Killed by His Lover

ris to Shana Alexander. New York: Maxwell Macmillan International, 1991. The story of how Harris's biographer became a friend of her subject.

_____. Stranger in Two Worlds. New York: Macmillan, 1986. Harris's autobiography, including her early life, career, the killing of Tarnower, and her life in prison.

Hendin, Josephine G. Heartbreakers: Women and Violence in Contemporary Culture and Literature. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004. A literary study of cultural representations of women convicted of violent crimes. Brief but pointed discussion of Diana Trilling's book on Jean Harris. Argues that violent women not only challenge ideas of femininity but also present new forms of behavior and self-identity.

Spencer, Duncan. Love Gone Wrong: The Jean Harris-Scarsdale Murder Case. New York: New American Library, 1981. Like Jay David's book, this is chiefly valuable as a collection of contemporary writings about Harris and Tarnower in periodicals.

Trilling, Diana. Mrs. Harris: The Death of the Scarsdale Diet Doctor. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1981. One of the best books on Harris and Tarnower by a distinguished literary and cultural critic.

SEE ALSO: Apr. 4, 1958: Actor Lana Turner's Daughter Kills Turner's Gangster Lover; Sept. 5, 1967: Socialite Nancy Wakeman Shoots Her Politician-Husband; Mar. 21, 1976: Actor Claudine Longet Kills Ski Champion Vladimir Sabich; July 23, 1978: Utah Millionaire Is Murdered by His Grandson; Jan. 26, 1979: Former Vice President Nelson Rockefeller Dies Mysteriously; Apr. 18, 1979: Actor Lee Marvin Is Ordered to Pay Palimony to Former Lover; Apr. 28, 1981: Tennis Star Billie Jean King Is Sued for Palimony; Mar., 1990: Menendez Brothers Are Arrested for Murdering Their Parents; June 23, 1993: Lorena Bobbitt Severs Her Husband's Penis; June 12, 1994: Double Murder Leads to Sensational O. J. Simpson Trial.

April 27, 1980

MOBSTER'S ARREST REVEALS POINT SHAVING BY BOSTON COLLEGE BASKETBALL PLAYERS

Several Boston College basketball players conspired with gamblers and mobsters to engage in an illegal gambling scheme known as point shaving, that is, conspiring to avoid winning by a certain spread, or margin, predicted by gamblers. After the arrest of mobster Henry Hill revealed the shocking conspiracy, Boston center Rick Kuhn was sentenced to ten years imprisonment, reportedly the heaviest penalty ever given to an athlete for point shaving.

LOCALES: Mineola, New York; Boston, Massachusetts

CATEGORIES: Corruption; drugs; gambling; law and the courts; organized crime and racketeering; sports

KEY FIGURES

Henry Hill (b. 1943), member of the Lucchese crime family and an FBI informant

Rick Kuhn (b. 1955), Boston College basketball player

James Burke (1931-1996), member of the Lucchese crime family

Paul Mazzei (b. 1944), gambler, convicted drug dealer, and friend of Henry Hill

Anthony Perla (fl. 1980's), gambler, brother of Rocco Perla

Rocco Perla (fl. 1980's), gambler, brother of Anthony Perla, and a friend of Rick Kuhn

James Sweeney (fl. 1980's), Boston College basketball player and a friend of Rick Kuhn

Ernie Cobb (fl. 1980's), Boston College basketball player

SUMMARY OF EVENT

The arrest of mobster Henry Hill in 1980 led to the discovery of point shaving at Boston College during the 1978-1979 basketball season. Several gamblers and mobsters were involved in the scheme with three Boston basketball players. The athletes would win or lose games within a certain point margin to increase gambling profits. The unearthing of the scandal shocked the sports world and impacted the regulation and enforcement of illegal gambling in athletics.

The point-shaving scheme, devised in the summer of 1978, involved an intricate web of individuals, ranging from low-end gamblers and drug dealers to powerful criminal figures. Hill, a member of New York's Lucchese crime family, became acquainted with gambler and cocaine dealer Paul Mazzei in 1972 while both were incarcerated in Pennsylvania's Lewisburg federal prison for extortion. Hill and Mazzei designed the point-shaving scam while they were in prison.

After being released from prison in July, 1978, Hill met with Mazzei in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, to further plan the gambling scheme. It was at this time that Hill was introduced to Mazzei's drug affiliates, Anthony Perla and his brother, Rocco Perla. Anthony informed Hill and Mazzei that Boston College would be the ideal venue for implementing the point-shaving plot because of Rocco's friendship with Boston College center Rick Kuhn. After Kuhn agreed to participate in the scheme, he coaxed his friend and fellow player James Sweeney to help carry out the plan.

Mazzei and the Perla brothers wanted Hill to involve his Lucchese crime family bosses James Burke and Paul Vario in the scheme as financial backers. Their involvement would help increase profits and, because of their wide influence, ensure control over bookies and nonpaying debtors. After receiving the consent and support of Burke and Vario, Hill further developed the details of the scheme: The Lucchese family would finance the gambling plot, and Mazzei would transfer the funds to the Perlas to pay the Boston College players involved.

Kuhn was given the responsibility of deciding which games to fix and of ensuring that the games' scores would result in the desired point spreads necessary for payout. Common methods that were used for controlling the point spread in basketball games included fouling other players and missing free throws. The scheme was finalized shortly after Hill and the Lucchese crime family conducted a heist of $5.8 million from a vault at New York's John F. Kennedy International Airport.

The point-shaving plan was first put into action during the game between Boston College and Providence College on December 6, 1978. The game ended unfavorably for the gamblers when Boston won outside the wagered point margin. The gamblers considered the Providence game a failure because of their lack of control over players scoring on the court. The gamblers were convinced that more Boston players had to be involved for the scheme to work. Boston's top scorer, Ernie Cobb, and several bookies were coerced into the scam.

Before the start of the next fixed game, the scheming Boston players were threatened by Hill and Burke to adhere to the plan. Kuhn, Sweeney, and Cobb began to realize the growing risks of working with the mob, including violent repercussions, but the players also feared legal authorities and being sanctioned by the National Collegiate Athletic Association.

The Boston players continued to shave points and produce a substantial profit for the gamblers between December, 1978, and the following March, and were instrumental in fixing a total of nine games after the failed game against Providence. To counter any growing suspicions of their point shaving, the gamblers rigged several games to break even in their payouts. A significant upset in gambling profits occurred during a game with Holy Cross, in which a basket by Cobb placed Boston beyond the wagered point margin at the end of the game; this error led to Burke's withdrawal from the scam. Boston ended its season with a 22-9 record, and the gamblers profited from six of the nine games that were fixed. Hill allegedly made close to $100,000, and his associates made up to $250,000. Each Boston player reportedly earned an average of $10,000. The players and gamblers parted ways at the end of the season, but only for a short time.

Point Shaving by Boston College Basketball Players

The point-shaving scandal would bring the players and gamblers together once again during the early 1980's. Hill was arrested on April 27, 1980, in Mineola, New York, for six drug-related felonies and was later charged in connection with the heist at the airport in 1978. Hill agreed to cooperate with authorities for two big reasons: First, the evidence against him was overwhelming, and second, Lucchese family members and others involved in the airport heist were murdered to keep them from revealing details of the crime should they be arrested.

Fearing for his safety, Hill entered the witness protection program and became an informant for the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), providing critical information on the Lucchese family's criminal activities. Under the terms of the contract with the FBI, Hill was required to provide a full and honest account of all his crimes to avoid conviction and imprisonment. He revealed the Boston College point-shaving scandal to shocked authorities.

IMPACT

The scam remained undetected until Hill's testimony to the FBI and became known publicly only after Hill agreed to sell his story to Time magazine for $10,000. After the article was published in Time, the Lucchese family issued a $100,000 hit on Hill. The FBI was forced to increase security measures to protect its informant.

On October 27, 1981, the federal trial began in a Brooklyn court. Burke, Mazzei, Anthony and Rocco Perla, and Kuhn were charged with conspiracy, bribery, and racketeering. Hill's testimony in the case helped the prosecution seal convictions against four of his former associates. In 1982, Burke received a prison sentence of twenty years and Mazzei was sentenced to ten years. Anthony Perla was sentenced to ten years (later reduced to six years), Rocco Perla received a four-year prison term and was fined, and Kuhn was sentenced to ten years, the longest prison term ever given to a college player for point shaving. Kuhn's prison term was later reduced to four years; he was released in 1986. Cobb was not indicted until 1983 and was found not guilty in 1984. Vario also was acquitted of all charges. Sweeney avoided being charged in the scandal because he cooperated with authorities and testified against the others in court.

Although the scandal stunned the sports world and damaged the reputation of Boston College, point shaving continues unabated in college sports. Players still risk being expelled from their respective colleges or universities and face indictment and imprisonment, yet the schemes continue.

One positive outcome of the scandal was the development of several deterrence and detection techniques. These new techniques include monitoring the amount and frequency of wagers and comparing team odds with expected point margins, all in the hope of catching perpetrators in their acts of crime.

—Sheena Garitta

FURTHER READING

Hill, Henry, with Douglas Looney. "Anatomy of a Scandal: The Mastermind's Inside Story of the Boston College Point-Shaving Scheme." Sports Illustrated, February 16, 1981. Offers a detailed firsthand account of the scandal by gangster turned FBI informant Henry Hill.

McCarthy, Michael. "Point-Shaving Remains a Concern in College Athletics." USA Today, May 9, 2007. Discusses the common problem of point shaving and illegal gambling practices in college sports, and details the methods used to prevent and detect such activities.

Porter, David. Fixed: How Goodfellas Bought Boston College Basketball. Dallas, Tex.: Taylor Trade, 2000. Provides a chronological narrative of the people and events involved in the point-shaving scandal. Includes news references, interviews, and details of the investigation and trial.

Staurowsky, Ellen J. "Piercing the Veil of Amateurism: Commercialization, Corruption, and U.S. College Sports." In The Commercialization of Sport, edited by Trevor Slack. New York: Routledge, 2004. Staurowsky discusses how amateur athletics in the United States has moved to commercialized and corrupt spectacle.

Thelin, John R. Games Colleges Play: Scandal and Reform in Intercollegiate Athletics. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1994. Provides a chronicle of college sports from 1910 to 1990. Discusses specific scandalous events and examines how college sports are an integral part of university, and American, life.

SEE ALSO: Apr. 2, 1915: Players Fix Liverpool-Manchester United Soccer Match; May 3, 1950: U.S. Senate Committee Begins Investigating Organized Crime; Jan. 17, 1951: College Basketball Players Begin Shaving Points for Money; Fall, 1969-Winter, 1971: Japanese Baseball Players Are Implicated in Game Fixing; Feb. 25, 1987: NCAA Imposes "Death Penalty" on Southern Methodist University Football; Mar. 27, 2002: Georgia Basketball Coach Jim Harrick, Sr., Resigns over Fraud Allegations; July 14, 2006: New York Times Exposes Grading Scandal at Auburn University; July 29, 2008: NBA Referee Tim Donaghy Is Sentenced to Prison for Betting on Games.

Late July, 1980PRESIDENT'S BROTHER, BILLY CARTER, REGISTERS AS A PAID AGENT FOR LIBYA

Billy Carter, the brother of U.S. president Jimmy Carter, reportedly received $220,000 in loans from the government of Libya between 1978 and 1980. The U.S. Justice Department agreed not to indict the president's brother but required him to register as a Libyan agent. Given that Libya was a suspected terrorist state, Billy's association with the Libyan government damaged his brother's 1980 campaign for reelection.

LOCALE: Washington, D.C.CATEGORIES: Corruption; international relations; politics; government; law and the courtsKEY FIGURES

Billy Carter (1937-1988), brother of U.S. president Jimmy Carter

Jimmy Carter (b. 1924), president of the United States, 1977-1981

Bert Lance (b. 1931), director, U.S. Office of Management and Budget

Benjamin Civiletti (b. 1935), U.S. attorney general, 1979-1981

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Billy Carter, the younger brother of U.S. president Jimmy Carter, was notorious throughout his brother's presidency for his involvement in a variety of scandals. The most serious was his association with Libya, deemed by the United States to be a state sponsor of terrorism.

Billy achieved notoriety immediately after his brother became president. He attracted the media and tourists to his service station in the Carter family's hometown of Plains, Georgia. There, he regaled his audiences with his colorful language, beer drinking, and outrageous commentary. He became a popular entertainer, making up to $500,000 a year appearing on television talk shows and at sports events around the country while his popularity lasted. However, Billy soon became an embarrassment to the president because of his perceived corruption.

A congressional investigation involving Bert Lance, President Carter's director of the Office of Management and Budget (OMB), uncovered evidence of corrupt financial practices during Jimmy Carter's 1976 presidential campaign. Lance, as president of the National Bank of Georgia, had approved loans and a line of credit in the amount of $3.65 million to Billy and Jimmy Carter and the Carter Peanut Warehouse, which Billy managed. On September 23, 1976, Lance increased the line of credit for the Carter Warehouse to $9 million. Despite Lance's resignation as OMB director on September 21, 1977, both he and Billy remained under investigation.

In November, 1978, Billy was called to testify and produce records showing how the loan money was spent. Carter Warehouse records showed much less money spent for the warehouse business than was received in loans approved by Lance. The investigators questioned Billy as to whether the loan money was transferred illegally into his brother's 1976 campaign fund. Five times during his testimony, Billy asserted his Fifth Amendment rights and refused to answer questions on grounds of possible self-incrimination. Lance was acquitted. He then returned to Calhoun, Georgia, and again became chairman of the National Bank of Georgia. He acquired new partners and investors, four of whom were influential Arab businessmen.

Questions about Billy's financial dealings drew more attention when he made several visits to Libya between 1978 and 1980. Billy's first visit in 1978 was an all-expenses-paid trip with Georgia legislators and businessmen seeking investments and business deals with Libya. In addition to his travel expenses, Billy received several gifts valued at about $3,000. In 1978, Libya was providing only 10 percent of United States oil imports, and it wanted to increase that percentage. The U.S. National Security Council briefed Billy and cautioned him against saying or doing anything that would disturb the delicate peace negotiations that were under way in the Middle East. An investigation by the U.S. Justice Department in 1980 revealed that Billy had accepted the Libyans' offer of a commission for using his influence to arrange the sale of additional oil to the United States. The Libyans promised him loans up to $500,000 in advance of any earned commissions. Billy later admitted that he had received $220,000 in loans from Libya.

Billy Carter just prior to his appearance before a session of the special Senate Judiciary subcommittee regarding his dealings with Libya. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Following his 1978 visit to Libya, Billy arranged a reception for Libyan delegates visiting Georgia and organized the Libyan-Arab-Georgia-Friendship Society to promote further business relations.

At that time, Libya was trying to purchase C-130 transport planes from the United States, but President Carter had blocked the sale because of Libyan terrorist activities. Libya wanted Billy to influence his brother to cancel that embargo.

In January, 1979, Congress was pressuring the Justice Department to investigate President Carter's possible involvement with his brother's Libyan dealings. The U.S. attorney general privately tried to persuade Billy to register as an agent for Libya under the Foreign Agents Registration Act, which allows citizens to lobby for the interests of a foreign government. Billy refused, saying that the Libyans were his friends and that he was not a foreign agent.

In March, under increasing pressure from the U.S. Congress, the Justice Department began a formal investigation to determine whether Billy was violating the law in his dealings with Libya and whether the president was participating in the Libyan deals. President Carter denied any knowledge of his brother's financial dealings with Libya.

In August, Billy spent an entire month in Libya, celebrating the tenth anniversary of Muammar al-Qaddafi's successful revolution and takeover of the Libyan government. By June, 1980, the Justice Department was certain that Billy's loans from Libya were compensation for using his influence upon the president to further Libya's interests. By July, daily media reports featured what came to be called "Billygate" and began to compare President Carter's alleged cover-up of his Libyan dealings to President Richard Nixon's Watergate scandal.

On July 22, both the U.S. Senate and the U.S. House of Representatives called for a full investigation and pressed Carter to disclose everything he knew of his brother's Libyan activities. Carter admitted that he had asked Billy to use his influence with his Libyan friends to help arrange the release of American hostages held in Iran. Later, the president released secret cables from Libya concerning oil dealings and the purchase of C-130 transport planes. Carter also acknowledged that Billy had been given access to those cables and other U.S. State Department documents. The Senate investigation further revealed that Billy's connection with Libya may have been linked with Robert Vesco, a fugitive financier who was fighting extradition back to the United States. Vesco told Senate investigators that he had helped arrange the initial contacts between Billy and the Libyans.

The Senate investigation committee, growing impatient with U.S. attorney general Benjamin Civiletti's so-called foot-dragging on the Billy Carter investigation, called for Civiletti's resignation. In late July, Civiletti brought Billy in for questioning. After Billy admitted that he had received $220,000 from Libya, the attorney general informed him that he was facing criminal charges for influence peddling on behalf of Libya. Civiletti recommended again that Billy register as a Libyan agent. Billy then contacted White House counsel Lloyd Cutler, who referred him to two Washington,

Billy Carter Registers as a Paid Agent for Libya

D.C., attorneys. Billy's attorneys met with Justice Department lawyers and worked out an agreement whereby he would register as a Libyan agent and thus avoid criminal prosecution. Under threat of criminal prosecution, Billy finally registered as an agent for the Libyan government.

IMPACT

The Billygate scandal was highly publicized in 1980, the year of President Carter's reelection campaign for the presidency. Comparison of Billygate to Watergate was inevitable because Jimmy Carter had run his 1976 campaign on promises of a corruption-free, honest, and open government that would be completely different from Nixon's. Billygate had a broad impact because Billy's activities brought the president's own integrity into question.

President Carter admitted that he could not control his brother's activities. Billy had no official position from which he could be fired or asked to resign, as had Lance and others in the Carter administration. President Carter's competence was already in question because of his administration's failures to alleviate problems in the economy, such as high interest rates and a high unemployment rate, as well as address the oil and gas crisis, and Carter seemed unable to resolve the Iranian hostage situation. Billygate made the president's integrity as well as his competency an important issue in the 1980 campaign. Consequently, Carter lost his bid for reelection and Republican Ronald Reagan became president.

—Marguerite R. Plummer

FURTHER READING

Brinkley, Douglas G. The Unfinished Presidency: Jimmy Carter's Quest for Global Peace. New York: Viking Press, 1998. Details Jimmy Carter's postpresidency activities, including his intrusions into foreign affairs during succeeding presidencies.

Carter, Jimmy. Keeping Faith: Memoirs of a President. 1982. New ed. New York: Bantam Books, 1995. A collection of memories by Carter that includes commentary on the scandals of his administration.

Carter, William. Billy Carter: A Journey Through the Shadows. Atlanta: Longstreet Press, 1999. A narrative of Billy Carter's life, including the scandals, from his son's point of view.

Jordan, Hamilton. Crisis: The Last Year of the Carter Presidency. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1982. Carter's chief of staff discusses multiple crises that affected Carter's reelection campaign, including Billygate.

Lasky, Victor. Jimmy Carter: The Man and the Myth. New York: Richard Marek, 1979. Provides details of the numerous Carter administration scandals that were never fully investigated, in contrast to the unrelenting pursuit of Nixon in the Watergate scandal.

Mollenhoff, Clark R. The President Who Failed: Carter Out of Control. New York: Macmillan, 1980. An investigative journalist discusses the Carter administration's incompetence and corruption and questions why the national media seemed reluctant to expose the Carter scandals.

Strong, Robert. Working in the World: Jimmy Carter and the Making of U.S. Foreign Policy. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 2000. Describes obstacles and strategies involved in the formation of Carter's approach to global politics.

SEE ALSO: May 14, 1974: Washington Post Reveals That the Nixons Received Jewelry Gifts; 1976-1977: U.S. Congress Members Are Implicated in Koreagate Scandal; Sept., 1976: Jimmy Carter Admits Committing Adultery in His Heart; Sept. 21, 1977: Carter Cabinet Member Resigns over Ethics Violations; Dec. 7, 1980: Rita Jenrette's "Diary of a Mad Congresswife" Scandalizes Washington; May 7, 1985: Banker Jake Butcher Pleads Guilty to Fraud.

July 28, 1980

MAGAZINE REVEALS BASEBALL STAR STEVE GARVEY'S MARITAL PROBLEMS

Steve and Cyndy Garvey were known as a clean-living, conservative couple whose perfect family life mirrored their perfect looks. Freelance journalist Pat Jordan's article about them in Inside Sports magazine includes Cyndy discussing her dissatisfaction with the marriage and wishes for an affair. The Garveys sued the magazine and Jordan for libel, invasion of privacy, and breach of contract but settled out of court. The article was the beginning of the end of the Garveys' marriage and perfect image.

LOCALE: Los Angeles, California

CATEGORIES: Publishing and journalism; popular culture; families and children; women's issues

KEY FIGURES

Steve Garvey (b. 1948), professional baseball player

Cyndy Garvey (b. 1949), television talk-show cohost

Pat Jordan (b. 1941), freelance writer

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Steve and Cyndy Garvey were media darlings during the late 1970's, appearing in various magazine spreads with their two young daughters. The pair, married since 1971, frequently appeared on television together talking about their perfect family and their devotion to one another. Steve, who was a star baseball player with the Los Angeles Dodgers, had political aspirations and was considered the perfect family man, and Cyndy was starting make a name for herself as the cohost, with Regis Philbin, of the Los Angeles morning television show AM Los Angeles.

In the spring of 1980, freelance writer Pat Jordan was contracted by Inside Sports magazine to write a story about the couple, popularly known as Ken and Barbie, a reference to the popular toy dolls with seemingly perfect physiques and lives. The unflattering article, "Trouble in Paradise," which appeared on newsstands on July 28, 1980, in Inside Sports, was based primarily on taped conversations with Cyndy. Jordan depicted the couple as drifting apart, and Cyndy was portrayed as an angry, somewhat empty woman who felt trapped by her image. Cyndy also appeared as a neglected "baseball wife" considering an affair. In her 1989 memoir The Secret Life of Cyndy Garvey, she reveals that she already had an affair before the interview with Jordan in 1980.

Cyndy also claims in her memoir that Jordan told her that his article would be about the struggles of baseball families, so she assumed that other baseball wives would be interviewed for the piece as well. This would not be the case. She also claims that the conversation between herself and Jordan was so relaxed that she did not even realize that he had begun to tape-record their discussion.

The article breaks down the couple's story into sections such as "The House," "The Wife," "The Job," and "The Husband." It notes that they have money, but not taste. Cyndy is quoted as saying, for example, "I'll only go with my husband to talk shows if I have a vehicle of my own. I can sing you know. I can dance, I can talk. I can chew gum." She also shares her feelings of frustration about her husband being withdrawn, even distant, when he is not on the road with the Dodgers, and she shares her anger about having been alone when their first child, a girl, was born; Steve was playing for the Dodgers in the World Series at the time of their daughter's birth. She also is cynical about her husband's political ambitions, noting that in a decade she would be a "senator's wife."

Jordan portrayed Steve more sympathetically, however, casting him as a calculating person, but a person who also loves his wife and who cannot understand why she is upset. Jordan wrote, "Steve Garvey is infatuated with his wife. He has loved her in the same way for 10 years, and now that that is no longer enough for her, he is confused."

Steve and Cyndy Garvey with their daughters, Whitney and Krisha, in 1978. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

Cyndy took most of the blame for the revelations in the damaging article. Many readers felt sympathy for Steve. Cyndy recalls in her memoir a time when she was listening to a radio call-in show on her way home from work. Callers said she was an "ingrate" and a "bimbo." In a letter to the editor in the November 30, 1980, issue of Inside Sports, Dani Torre, married at the time to New York Mets manager Joe Torre, wrote that "Cyndy needs help" and "Bravo to the real good boys who play ball, and their women, who plan babies for the off-season."

The Garveys sued Jordan and Newsweek, Inc. (owners of Inside Sports magazine) for libel, invasion of privacy, and breach of contract, arguing that Jordan broke an oral agreement that his feature would be “favorable” to the couple and would focus on the “special challenges” they faced in their marriage. Cyndy later wrote that she was the one who had insisted on suing, while Steve had been concerned that the suit would interfere with his attempt to maintain his streak of consecutive games played. The Los Angeles Herald-Examiner, also named in the lawsuit, wanted to reprint the Inside Sports article but was blocked from doing so, temporarily. The Garveys sought the court’s help in preventing the newspaper from publishing the piece. Attorneys for Newsweek and the Herald-Examiner appealed, and the paper was cleared to publish the story. (The Los Angeles Times reprinted the story first, though, the day after the Herald-Examiner was given permission to do so by the court.)

In July of 1981, the Garveys announced they had settled the suit out of court. The couple’s lawyer stated publicly that the suit was settled for “a lot of money,” which was not the case. Lawyers for Newsweek struck back. They noted that the Garveys’ attorney violated a written confidentiality agreement between parties in the lawsuit. The Garveys, Newsweek attorneys added, “dropped this $11.2 million suit for about 1 cent on the dollar.” In September of that same year, the Garveys separated; they divorced in 1985.

IMPACT

Steve continued playing baseball until May, 1987, ending his career with the San Diego Padres. Cyndy wrote her memoir. She tells her readers in the book that she had been physically abused by her father and was emotionally abused by Steve, whom she referred to as “a sociopath who doesn’t take responsibility for his actions.” She added, “If Ted Bundy [a serial murderer] is a 10, then Steve’s a 7.” Her memoir brought much-needed attention to domestic violence. Cyndy also claims that Steve did not provide child support (a claim he denied). That same year, two women sued Steve, claiming he was the father of their children. He later admitted that he had fathered children with two other women.

The paternity cases, coupled with Cyndy’s comments about him in the Inside Sports article, made Steve into a national joke of sorts. A popular bumper sticker of the time read, “Honk if you’re carrying Steve Garvey’s baby.” Later that year, Cyndy was sentenced to 130 days in jail for violating a court order that allowed Steve to visit the children. Steve did not run for public office, but he started his own company, Garvey Communications, in 1988 and also works as a motivational speaker.

It was no secret during the height of Garvey’s baseball career that he hoped to enter politics after retiring from baseball. Cyndy says in the article that she had been hoping for a more rewarding broadcasting career. “Trouble in Paradise” was the first crack in the Garveys’ image of perfection, leading to the picture-perfect couple’s separation within a year.

Neither Steve nor Cyndy recovered professionally from the bad press that began to appear after Inside Sports revealed the true couple behind the image. The divorce and the paternity suits ended Steve’s political ambitions, and Cyndy’s television career went nowhere. She had moved to New York in 1983 to host The Morning Show and was joined by Philbin, but she left the show in 1984. Steve and Cyndy’s marriage, seemingly untouchable, became the stuff of tabloids, talk-show television, and one-line jokes.

—Julie Elliott

FURTHER READING

Fleming, Anne Taylor. “Garvey vs. Garvey: The Latest Chapter.” The New York Times, August 2, 1989. Discusses Cyndy Garvey’s thoughts about her former husband and her memoir, and examines Steve Garvey’s comments on the paternity suits against him.

Garvey, Cynthia, with Andy Meisler. The Secret Life of Cyndy Garvey. New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1989. Cyndy Garvey’s memoir details the abuse she suffered at the hands of her father, as well as problems in her marriage to Garvey, who she claimed was emotionally abusive and having affairs for much of their marriage.

Garvey, Steve. My Bat Boy Days: Lessons I Learned from the Boys of Summer. New York: Scribner, 2008. Steve Garvey reminisces about his early years in baseball.

“Going to Bat for a Marriage.” Time, August 25, 1980. Discusses the immediate aftermath of the Inside Sports article as well as the lawsuit against Jordan and attempts to stop the story from being reprinted.

Jordan, Pat. “Trouble in Paradise.” Inside Sports, August 31, 1980. The article revealed that Cyn-dy’s frustrations with being a baseball wife and with being lonely and needing affection. This article was the first to hint of anything negative in the Garvey marriage.

Reilly, Rick. “America’s Sweetheart.” Sports Illustrated, November 27, 1989. Discusses the messy divorce between the Garveys as well as Steve’s numerous affairs and the paternity cases against him.

SEE ALSO: Nov. 23, 1946: Tennis Star Bill Tilden Is Arrested for Lewd Behavior with a Minor; Dec. 7, 1980: Rita Jenrette’s “Diary of a Mad Congresswife” Scandalizes Washington; Apr. 28, 1981: Tennis Star Billie Jean King Is Sued for Palimony; Dec., 1982: Julie Andrews and Blake Edwards Deny Being Gay; Sept. 22, 1997: Sportscaster Marv Albert Is Tried for Sexual Assault; July 1, 2003: Basketball Star Kobe Bryant Is Accused of Rape.

September 3, 1980

CONGRESSMAN BAUMAN IS ARRESTED FOR LIAISON WITH TEENAGE BOY

Republican representative Robert E. Bauman, a board member of the American Conservative Union and an outspoken advocate of traditional values, was arrested and charged for soliciting sex with a sixteen-year-old male prostitute. His arrest shocked his constituents and colleagues and led to the end of his career in politics.

LOCALE: Washington, D.C.

CATEGORIES: Law and the courts; prostitution; sex crimes; public morals; government; politics

KEY FIGURE

Robert E. Bauman (b. 1937), U.S. representative from Maryland, 1973-1981

SUMMARY OF EVENT

In the fall of 1980, the conservative Christian backlash against the gay and lesbian rights movement was in full swing in the United States. November would see Ronald Reagan, backed by the Religious Right, elected president by a landslide. On Capitol Hill, being antigay was the accepted de facto political position, and prominence in conservative groups was a stepping-stone to political advancement.

Robert E. Bauman was riding the tide. A seven-year veteran of the U.S. House of Representatives, Bauman’s political history was staunchly conservative and Christian. He was a founding member of the American Conservative Union in 1964 and was director of the conservative lobbying group Young Americans for Freedom. He and his wife worked together for numerous conservative political causes, and they outwardly presented an ideal picture to conservative voters. Bauman, a Roman Catholic, served in the Maryland state senate from 1971 to 1973 and was elected to the U.S. Congress in 1972, beginning his term in 1973. He was up for reelection in 1980 when scandal derailed his career and life.

The gay and lesbian rights movement was well established in Washington, D.C., by 1980, and it showed no signs of leaving town just because a conservative Republican was about to win election to the White House. One of the most popular gay bars in the city was Chesapeake House, operated by John Rock. When Rock opened the bar, he initially featured female and male strippers, but by 1980 he focused on entertainment for gay men.

Bauman allegedly frequented the bar and picked up lovers there. Around six months before the scandal broke, his wife found his gay porn magazines and confronted him. He began counseling with a priest and believed he was on the road to “recovering” from his sexual orientation. However, the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) had been following him. On September 3, 1980, he was arrested for oral sodomy with a sixteen-year-old male prostitute he had picked up in the District of Columbia. In his autobiography Gentleman from Maryland: The Conscience of a Gay Conservative (1986), Bauman points out that the FBI had been investigating several members of Congress at this time, and that only he was charged. He believes his behavior came under attack for political reasons, even though he admits that his arrest was justified. Bauman was formally charged on October 3.

In his autobiography, Bauman discusses his trysts. He explains that his conservative background caused him to try to repress his homosexuality. Married and with four children, he also drank heavily, then went to confession to purify himself for church. He hoped that if he could control his political career, his personal life would not matter. He marketed himself as pro-family, which meant anti-gay, but eventually his behavior caught up with him.

Conservatives were shocked by Bauman’s arrest. Known as the House watchdog for his ability to stall Democratic measures, he had been a conservative his entire life, starting down his chosen path in military school, where he had vowed to himself that he was not gay. He continued to deny his homosexuality into adulthood and throughout his political career. As a member of the House, he voted for three bills containing antigay legislation, and he co-sponsored the Family Protection Act (1977), anti-gay employment legislation. The few constituent letters he received in support of gay and lesbian rights were answered with a Roman Catholic, anti-gay response: condemnation of homosexual acts though not the individuals practicing them (“love the sinner, not the sin”).

Bauman pleaded no contest to charges of solicitation of a minor and was convicted of a misdemeanor. He made a statement to the press that he was fighting the demons of homosexuality and alcoholism, and he spent the next three years undergoing psychiatric treatment. He remained in the 1980 political race, ultimately losing by only 2 percentage points, one of only four Republican representatives to lose their seats that year. Because the loss was so close, he attempted to return to Congress with a run in the 1981-1982 Republican primary but withdrew from the race after realizing he would always face attacks for his criminal past and his homosexuality. His wife eventually requested an annulment, and it was only after the annulment was granted that Bauman started to admit his homosexuality to himself. That was in 1982.

IMPACT

Bauman was clear about his not choosing to be gay. In fact, he fought against his sexuality for much of his life and came to terms with his sexual orientation only after years of psychotherapy. His case is an argument for those who insist sexual orientation is a matter of biology, rather than choice. He agreed that he was forced out of the closet and hoped his case would draw attention to the roughly 10 percent of the U.S. population that is gay or lesbian and that gays and lesbians can be conservative as well as liberal. In 1985, he attempted to found a gay Republican congressional group that would have been a predecessor to Log Cabin Republicans, but his efforts failed because most gay Republicans at the time were too afraid of exposure to join such a group.

Bauman’s critics believe that his being “forced out” of the closet takes away from the value of his candor in his autobiography, in which he recounts his journey through alcoholism and into accepting his homosexuality. Bauman, however, did not use his arrest and subsequent outing in the media to transform into a liberal or abandon his Catholicism. Some say his autobiography outed liberal gay representative Barney Frank, but Frank had been out to his friends and close associates for some time and came out publicly without losing stature once Bauman's book broadcast the information.

Indeed, in his book, Bauman addresses his own situation uniquely. He began to speak out for gay rights, having experienced some of the prejudice that comes with being gay. His positions were not popular with fellow conservatives, but in spite of this, he refused to change his politics. He could no longer claim to be a traditionalist conservative who supports a hands-off government in most respects except "enforcing" public morality. However, he remained basically conservative, especially in financial issues. After the scandal, he began to write books on financial issues and to work for the group Sovereign Society, which is dedicated to conservative money issues. He remained Catholic as well, in spite of Catholicism's staunch antigay position.

—Jessie Bishop Powell

FURTHER READING

Bauman, Robert. The Gentleman from Maryland: The Conscience of a Gay Conservative. New York: Arbor House, 1986. Bauman discusses his homosexuality and addresses the conflict between his expressed antigay views and his later coming out, and his change in perspective on gay and lesbian rights.

Danforth, John C. Faith and Politics: How the "Moral Values" Debate Divides America, and How to Move Forward Together. New York: Viking Press, 2006. Argues the Republican Party must move away from fringe issues to unite. Contrasts with the views of the Religious Right-dominated party that brought Bauman into office.

Gunderson, Steve, and Rob Morris, with Bruce Bawer. House and Home. New York: Dutton, 1996. Discusses the outing of Republican representative Gunderson of Wisconsin. Examines his political positions and his political career. Shows that scandal does not necessarily follow revelations of homosexuality.

Marcus, Eric. Making Gay History. New York: HarperCollins, 2002. Includes a three-part interview with Bauman, discussing the scandal and his life as a conservative Republican since coming out of the closet.

Tafel, Richard. Party Crasher: A Gay Republican Challenges Politics as Usual. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1999. Argues that gays and lesbians do not have to be Democrats to remain loyal to both their politics and their sexuality.

SEE ALSO: 1970: Study of Anonymous Gay Sex Leads to Ethics Scandal; Oct. 25, 1974: Evangelist Billy James Hargis Resigns College Presidency During Gay-Sex Scandal; Jan., 1977: Singer Anita Bryant Campaigns Against Lesbian and Gay Rights; July 20, 1982: Conservative Politician John G. Schmitz Is Found to Have Children Out of Wedlock; July 20, 1983: Congress Members Censured in House-Page Sex Scandal; Sept. 19, 2000: Ex-gay Leader John Paulk Is Photographed Leaving a Gay Bar; Aug. 19, 2004: Blog "Outs" Antigay Congressman Edward Schrock; Dec. 6, 2005: Spokane, Washington, Mayor Recalled in Gay-Sex Scandal; Sept. 29, 2006: Congressman Mark Foley Resigns in Sex Scandal Involving a Teenage Page; Nov. 2, 2006: Male Escort Reveals Sexual Liaisons with Evangelist Ted Haggard; July 11, 2007: Florida Politician Is Arrested for Soliciting an Undercover Male Police Officer.

October 9, 1980

BENDIX EXECUTIVE RESIGNS AMID RUMORS OF AN AFFAIR

Mary Cunningham was an executive at Bendix Corporation who advanced from executive assistant to vice president for strategic planning in only fifteen months. She resigned after a series of well-publicized rumors claimed that her rise in the company was a direct result of her romantic relationship with Bendix chairman William Agee. Cunningham and Agee married in 1982.

LOCALE: Southfield, Michigan

CATEGORIES: Business; sex; women's issues

KEY FIGURES

Mary Cunningham (b. 1951), vice president of strategic planning at Bendix Corporation

William Agee (b. 1938), chairman of Bendix Corporation

William Panny (b. 1930), president of Bendix Corporation

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Mary Cunningham had more than two dozen job offers from major financial corporations after she received her master's degree in business administration from the prestigious Harvard Business School in 1979. Cunningham rejected all the offers and instead opted to take what some corporate recruiters and Harvard Business School classmates might consider a less important position within corporate America. In June, 1979, she accepted a position as an executive assistant to William Agee, chairman of Bendix Corporation, a Fortune 500 aerospace manufacturer in Southfield, Michigan.

Cunningham, who had striking good looks and was described by several independent sources as beautiful, brilliant, and ambitious, worked closely with Agee on a series of corporate initiative projects. Agee soon became her mentor at the company. One year later, in June, 1980, Agee promoted Cunningham to vice president of corporate and public affairs. Her corporate responsibilities increased, and her relationship with Agee grew stronger. Some Bendix executives became envious of their relationship, and they considered her an obstacle to their access to Agee (she seemed to consume a good deal of his valuable time, often at their expense). In addition, some managers criticized her work. In particular, they were critical of a report she wrote on work at one of the company's automobile plants. Her detractors believed that her report did little to improve conditions in the plant. Despite their criticisms and concerns, Cunningham's reputation continued to soar with Agee.

Agee increased Cunningham's corporate responsibilities at Bendix. Many people within the organization believed that she had done very little there to deserve the vast amount of power that Agee had given her. She rose too rapidly, they said, through the organization in too short a time period.

The corporate grapevine can be deadly. Quiet rumors began to swirl around the company that Cunningham and Agee were having a relationship outside the workplace. Some executives registered their disapproval with William Panny, the president of Bendix, who reported directly to Agee. Allegedly, Panny was getting ready to inform the board of directors about the relationship, now a scandal, and its organizational impact. In early September, 1980, before Panny was able to talk to the board, he was fired by Agee. In what might appear to be an expression of sympathy over Panny's firing, Jerome Jacobson, the vice president of strategic planning, left Bendix as well. Unsigned letters were sent to Bendix board members about the Agee-Cunningham affair. Agee vehemently denied any romantic link with Cunningham in his conversations with corporate executives and board members.

On September 24, Agee held a meeting with about six hundred Bendix employees. One item on the agenda was his internal reorganization plan to replace Jacobson. Agee announced that he had appointed Cunningham as Jacobson's replacement, an executive decision that would bring their relationship into the limelight. Soon, the story of their personal relationship and news of her executive-level promotions attracted national media attention.

Cunningham quickly began to stem the tide of public opinion against her. She initially entertained the idea of resigning from the company. For her, a leave of absence would be the perfect solution. It would give her some political and public leverage by allowing her to resign if the board wanted to dismiss her. Moreover, a board would be hard-pressed to reverse itself so soon after it voted to promote her earlier in the week. Ever the strategist, Cunningham sent a letter to the board of directors on September 28, asking that board members grant her a leave of absence. A small subcommittee of the board declared it had “full confidence” in her, but the majority of the board determined that her continued employment at Bendix would compromise the company.

Mary Cunningham. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

Bendix Executive Resigns Because of an Affair

On October 9, some fifteen months after being hired at Bendix, Cunningham resigned as a corporate officer. In her resignation letter, she stated that an “unusual convergence of events” prevented her from carrying out the duties of her position and, therefore, she was severing her employment with Bendix in the best interest of all parties.

IMPACT

Despite her resignation, Cunningham had no problem finding another job in the corporate world. In March, 1981, she was hired as vice president of strategic planning for Seagram and Sons. She continued her friendship with Agee, and about fifteen months later, in June, 1982, she and Agee were married.

In September, Agee led Bendix to a $1.5 billion hostile takeover bid of Martin Marietta, another aerospace manufacturer. However, Bendix failed in its attempt for two reasons: Agee seriously miscalculated the situation, which resulted in golden parachutes (for Bendix employees), and Martin Marietta was rescued by United Technologies Corporation by means of the infamous Pac Man defense (a strategy in which a company being bought mounts a defense to purchase the takeover company). Cunningham, now a former Bendix employee, was at Agee’s side during the negotiations. Her presence sent the wrong signal to people in high-level corporate circles and, according to some familiar with the case, even helped break the deal between Bendix and Martin Marietta. In fact, a Martin Marietta board member reportedly stated, “We’ll burn this company to the ground before we let that (woman) have it.” That board member was speaking of Cunningham. In the end, Bendix was sold to Allied Technology, and Agee lost his job at Bendix in February, 1983.

—Joseph C. Santora

FURTHER READING

Cunningham, Mary, with Fran Schumer. Powerplay: What Really Happened at Bendix. New York: Linden Press/Simon & Schuster, 1984. Cunningham gives her side of the story and details her relationship with William Agee.

"Mary Agee." U.S. News & World Report, February 28, 2005. A brief follow-up article on Mary Cunningham (now Agee), twenty-five years after the Bendix scandal.

"Mary Cunningham Redux." Time, March 9, 1981. A newsmagazine article on the scandalous affair, published six months after Cunningham's resignation from Bendix.

Pfeffer, Jeffrey. Managing with Power: Politics and Influence in Organizations. Boston: Harvard Business School Press, 1992. This book is a classic on power in organizations. It devotes a brief section to the conflict between Agee and Cunningham and Bendix president William Panny, and it assesses Agee's ability to gain advantage by "striking first."

Sloan, Allan. Three Plus One Equals Billions: The Bendix-Martin Marietta War. New York: Arbor House, 1983. This book discusses Bendix Corporation's attempt to take over Martin Marietta. Also considers Agee and Cunningham's affair and their conflict with William Panny.

SEE ALSO: Mar. 29, 1962: Billie Sol Estes Is Arrested for Corporate Fraud; Feb. 4, 1976: Lockheed Is Implicated in Bribing Foreign Officials; Apr. 15, 1992: Hotel Tycoon Leona Helmsley Enters Prison for Tax Evasion; Mar. 5, 2004: Martha Stewart Is Convicted in Insider-Trading Scandal; Sept. 18, 2006: Newsweek Reveals That Hewlett-Packard Spied on Its Own Board.

December 7, 1980

RITA JENRETTE'S "DIARY OF A MAD CONGRESSWIFE" SCANDALIZES WASHINGTON

Shortly after her husband, a three-term Democratic representative from South Carolina, resigned his House seat after being convicted as part of the Abscam sting operation, Rita Jenrette provoked a scandal with her account of her time as a "Congresswife" in Washington, D.C. The magazine excerpt and subsequent book, My Capitol Secrets, tell the tale of profligate behavior, alcohol abuse, influence peddling, rampant promiscuity, and wild sex.

LOCALE: Washington, D.C.

CATEGORIES: Publishing and journalism; sex; politics; corruption

KEY FIGURES

Rita Jenrette (Rita Carpenter; b. 1949), former Republican Party operative from Texas

John W. Jenrette, Jr. (b. 1936), U.S. representative from South Carolina, 1975-1980

SUMMARY OF EVENT

After graduating from the University of Texas in 1971, Rita Jenrette made an immediate impact in the Texas Republican Party with her savvy knack for political strategy. She was a lecturer in political science at Trinity University and, by 1975, she headed the Republican National Committee's Opposition Research branch, a division of the party that, in the wake of the post-Watergate turmoil and the downfall of the Richard Nixon White House, investigated Democratic nominees for problematic pasts and designed often incendiary attack ads to promote Republican nominees for office.

In 1976, the strikingly beautiful Jenrette (she was a regional beauty queen and briefly toyed with a singing career) surprised many by marrying not a Republican but a left-leaning Democrat, John W. Jenrette, Jr., a U.S. representative from the well-to-do environs of Myrtle Beach, South Carolina. John had ridden to election in 1974 on the wave of anti-Nixon sentiment and the public's distrust of the Republican Party and was, by 1976, one of the rising stars of the Jimmy Carter-era Dixiecrats. Engaging, savvy, youthful, and vigorous, John advanced quickly within the party power structure and was elected the majority whip of the U.S. House of Representatives by 1978. For a time, the Jenrettes were among the most sought-after power couples in Washington, D.C., as Rita maintained her credentials as a Washington insider working for the Food for Peace Program and other agencies. However, everything would soon change dramatically.

In 1978, the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), reeling from public outrage over revelations of corruption in the Nixon administration that brought down a presidency, initiated a sting operation targeting powerful and influential state and national politicians. The sting had federal agents pose as Middle Eastern business operatives representing a fictitious sheik trying to bribe these corrupt politicians into securing special considerations. The considerations included political asylum and money laundering for a dummy sheik (the operation was code-named Abscam, from the words “Abdul scam”). In hotel rooms under videotaped surveillance, public officials, including state governors, U.S. representatives, and U.S. senators, were offered huge sums of money in return for such assistance. In 1980, John Jenrette was among the more than thirty politicians indicted in connection with the FBI sting. He claimed the operation was entrapment. Nevertheless, he was convicted for accepting $50,000 in bribe money and was sentenced to thirteen months in federal prison. He was defeated for reelection later in the year and resigned from Congress on December 10, just ahead of his term’s expiration.

It was during the subsequent public outcry that Rita Jenrette first gained national attention. At the televised congressional hearings, the charismatic Jenrette, long comfortable in front of cameras, electrified the proceedings by testifying how she had found $25,000 in one of her husband’s shoes. Later, capitalizing on her newfound celebrity, she appeared on The Phil Donahue Show, a popular television talk show of the time. Her husband called in to the show from jail (the format of Donahue’s live show involved such audience participation). The subsequent conversation, charged with emotion, made riveting television.

Representative John W. Jenrette, Jr., and Rita Jenrette outside the capitol in Washington, D.C., in 1976. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Far more scandalous and damaging was Jenrette’s decision to publish her memoir. On December 7, 1980, The Washington Post Magazine ran an excerpt of her as-yet-unpublished manuscript. The excerpt, “Diary of a Mad Congresswife,” was a lengthy exposé about her time in Washington; its publication created a sensation. It revealed the private lives of Beltway insiders, including her own husband’s numerous affairs, in unflinching and uncensored detail. Perhaps most famously, the article offered an account of the time she and her husband made love on the steps of the Capitol Building behind a pillar during a break of a particularly long all-night House session. It was a story that, much later, she said she invented. However, the story of love-making on the Capitol steps secured her instant notoriety and made her husband the target of comedians and political pundits. Indeed, the satiric comedy troupe The Capitol Steps used the alleged incident as the inspiration for its name, seeing in the couple's dalliance a metaphor for reprehensible public behavior among politicians so eccentric that it bordered on the absurdly comic. Far more disturbing than Jenrette's sexual revelations, however, were her reports of how politicians abused alcohol, even during sessions of Congress, and willingly dealt influence using sex. The Jenrettes divorced in 1981.

"Diary of a Mad Congresswife" secured for Jenrette a book deal, and within one year her memoir, My Capitol Secrets, was published. She became an instant celebrity. She posed for Playboy magazine in April, 1981, and Playboy also ran expanded versions of The Washington Post Magazine excerpt. Not surprisingly, the book became an immediate best seller. It depicted politicians as quasi-rock stars who attracted a bevy of groupies, specifically women—among them lobbyists, reporters, and staffers—attracted by the aphrodisiac of power and willing to use sex as a strategy for access to these men. Jenrette spoke of rented apartments, clandestine affairs carried out in rented houses and limousines, quickies, and "nooners." Her book was cited by the emerging conservative political movement during the early Ronald Reagan years as evidence of the sorry moral condition of the Washington, D.C., establishment, meaning the entrenched interests of the liberal wing of the Democratic Party.

Jenrette tried to parlay her notoriety into an acting career—appearing in several low-budget films during the 1980's (with titles like Zombie Island Massacre, 1984, and The Malibu Bikini Shop, 1986). In May, 1984, she appeared again in Playboy, this time on the cover in a racy pictorial with her lover at the time, hunky actor-model Phillip Anderson. Given that she was often dismissed as trying to cash in on her husband's political crimes, she was seldom given much critical respect, although her appearance in Los Angeles in a 1982 revival of the drawing room comedy The Philadelphia Story garnered her plaudits and several regional acting awards. She appeared briefly (in 1989) as a field reporter for the entertainment news show A Current Affair, but by the end of the decade her celebrity appeared to have been exhausted.

IMPACT

Most obviously, Jenrette exemplifies the fifteen-minutes-of-fame principle. Indeed, there is much to suggest that she manipulated the media to secure her celebrity and to cash in on what was one of the more disturbing political scandals of the Carter years. Her turn to nude modeling and then to a string of lamentable B movies did not add much luster to her reputation. Because her tell-all book did not name specific political figures, it was more sensational than legitimate exposé.

Jenrette's notoriety includes being one of the few women at the center of a political scandal to put together a second career, notably, a professional career in business. During the early 1990's, with her broadcasting career at a dead end, Jenrette was still only in her forties. Determined to succeed and to use her considerable education in business and marketing, she completed a rigorous three-year program at the Harvard Business School. By 1994, she began a lucrative career in real estate in the Manhattan area, overseeing more than a decade of high-powered negotiations in excess of a billion dollars in transactions and involving some of New York's best-known business figures. Secure in her position as one of Manhattan's most influential real estate brokers, Jenrette has said her life in Washington represented a different person, and that her strategy of cashing in on her notoriety and playing to the media as a sex object represented poor judgment. She understands she can never entirely erase her past poor judgment, but it is one that she is content to live with.

—Joseph Dewey

FURTHER READING

Jenrette, Rita. My Capitol Secrets. New York: Bantam Books, 1981. Vivid and fascinating account of Jenrette's years in Washington, D.C. Creates a disturbing picture of Washington political opportunism and amorality.

Katzmann, Gary S. Understanding the Criminal Process: The Abscam Case. New York: Pergamon Press, 1985. Clear and lucid detailed look into the scandal that brought Jenrette into the national spotlight. Looks into the impact of Jenrette's testimony without the distractions of her later celebrity and treats Jenrette as a Washington insider who essentially acted as a whistleblower.

Thompson, Hunter S. Generation of Swine: Tales of Shame and Degradation in the '80's. New York: Simon & Schuster, 2003. Classic appraisal of the decade by a distinguished cultural critic and "gonzo" journalist. Provides significant context for understanding politicians' rise and precipitous fall into obscurity by providing a scathing indictment of the political sex scandals of the era.

SEE ALSO: 1927: President Warren G. Harding's Lover Publishes Tell-All Memoir; Sept. 5, 1967: Socialite Nancy Wakeman Shoots Her Politician-Husband; May 23, 1976: Washington Post Exposes Congressman Wayne L. Hays's Affair; Sept., 1976: Jimmy Carter Admits Committing Adultery in His Heart; Feb. 2, 1980: Media Uncover FBI Sting Implicating Dozens of Lawmakers; Late July, 1980: President's Brother, Billy Carter, Registers as a Paid Agent for Libya; Dec., 1982: Julie Andrews and Blake Edwards Deny Being Gay; July 19, 1985: Mayflower Madam Pleads Guilty to Promoting Prostitution; July 9, 2007: Senator David Vitter's Name Is Found in D.C. Madam's Address Book.

April 15, 1981

JANET COOKE ADMITS FABRICATING HER PULITZER PRIZE-WINNING FEATURE

Journalist Janet Cooke's article "Jimmy's World," the story of an eight-year-old heroin addict, earned for her a Pulitzer Prize in 1981. Inconsistencies in her credentials led colleagues to question the veracity of her prize-winning story, which she confessed to having fabricated. The journalistic fraud, one of the first such scandals in the United States, tainted the credibility of journalists but also led to updated truth-in-reporting standards for news media.

LOCALE: Washington, D.C.

CATEGORIES: Communications and media; drugs; hoaxes, frauds, and charlatanism; publishing and journalism

KEY FIGURE

Janet Cooke (b. 1954), reporter for The Washington Post

SUMMARY OF EVENT

In August and September of 1980, The Washington Post published eight articles about the scourge of heroin use. The last article in the series, "Jimmy's World," was written by journalist Janet Cooke and published in the September 28 edition of the newspaper.

"Jimmy's World" focuses on the life of an eight-year-old heroin addict named Jimmy by Cooke. Cooke describes Jimmy's life as one "of hard drugs, fast money and the good life he believes both can bring." Jimmy, Cooke writes, is motivated by the pursuit of material wealth—through illegitimate methods. His only interest in school is to learn enough mathematics so he can buy and sell drugs in his neighborhood.

In 1969, U.S. president Richard Nixon had described drugs as "public enemy number one in the United States." By 1971 he had officially declared a so-called war on drugs. However, the drug war became stagnant after Nixon's resignation following the Watergate scandal. By the presidential election of 1980, drug use, which never subsided, was back on the national agenda.

In the article, Cooke tells readers that Jimmy became a heroin addict at the age of five. He had asked his mother's live-in boyfriend when he would be allowed to "get off." According to the article, his mother's boyfriend "let him snort a little" and was surprised when "the little dude" Jimmy "really did get off." The article asserts that Jimmy was hooked within six months. The article also suggests that Jimmy's mother knew of her son's addiction. Cooke, who is African American, claims that his mother viewed his drug use as an inevitable aspect of the life of a black child growing up in the city.

The article also thoroughly describes specific circumstances in the life of Jimmy's mother that affected her life and the life of her son. According to Cooke, Jimmy's mother never knew her father. She had been sexually abused by her mother's live-in boyfriends (Jimmy was the son of one of these men), and she turned to drugs for escape. Eventually, she turned to prostitution and property crime to support her drug addiction. Cooke ends her article by writing that at the end of a long day in which Jimmy answered her questions about his life, his behavior and demeanor began to change; he became "jittery" and "ill-behaved," clearly suffering with withdrawal symptoms. Cooke describes how the mother's live-in boyfriend calls Jimmy over to him and injects him with his next drug fix.

Citizens and community leaders in the Washington, D.C., area were outraged by the living conditions and drug abuse Cooke featured in her article. District of Columbia mayor Marion Barry and Police Chief Burtell Jefferson ordered a districtwide search for a child who fit Jimmy's description. Social service agencies and schools were told to instruct their employees to look for children with needle marks on their bodies and for children exhibiting behaviors that resembled withdrawal from drugs.

The managing editors of The Washington Post were asked to produce information about where Jimmy could be found, but they refused on the grounds that it would violate the confidentiality of the sources used in the feature. As a goodwill gesture, The Washington Post established a team of eleven reporters who were given the task of finding other children who suffered like Jimmy, reasoning that if there was one Jimmy there had to be others.

Given the reality of the case, it is not surprising, then, that city officials and journalists could not locate Jimmy or any other child like him.

An assistant managing editor at The Washington Post, Bob Woodward, himself a Pulitzer winner for helping to break the Watergate affair, nominated Cooke's article for a Pulitzer Prize. He deflected mounting criticism of Cooke and maintained the story was true. On April 13, 1981, Cooke won a Pulitzer for her story. Upon hearing about her receipt of the prestigious award, editors at the newspaper Toledo Blade (Cooke's former employer) noticed inconsistencies in the biography of her that accompanied the prize-winning article. They contacted Washington Post editors and told them of the errors. Cooke admitted to her editors that she had indeed falsified information on her résumé.

Janet Cooke reacts to news that she won a Pulitzer Prize. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The veracity of “Jimmy’s World” was now in question. Initially, Cooke was adamant that the story was accurate. However, she soon admitted that she had fabricated the story. She resigned from The Washington Post on April 15, and her prize was rescinded by the Pulitzer committee. In a statement made upon resigning, Cooke conceded, “The [article] was a serious misrepresentation which I deeply regret. I apologize to my newspaper, my profession, the Pulitzer board and all seekers of the truth.”

IMPACT

In the aftermath of the discovery that Cooke had fabricated her prize-winning story, The Washington Post conducted a full-scale investigation of the debacle. Its findings and analysis suggested that Cooke’s ambition to succeed and advance at the newspaper had blinded her to her ethical and moral obligations to the newspaper and its readers. The findings of the investigation also suggested that the paper’s editorial staff was partially responsible in that they had become so entrenched in wanting stories that were contextually relevant to the evolving social and political agenda concerning drug use that they, too, had allowed their editorial judgment to be compromised.

Sociologists Craig Reinerman and Ceres Duskin, however, offered another explanation as to how one of the country’s most powerful newspapers published a fake story. In a 1998 journal article, Reinerman and Duskin maintained that a major aspect of the problem was journalistic beliefs and preconceptions about drugs and the nature of drug use. The authors wrote that in covering drug-related stories, the mass media had erred on the side of sensationalism by “rhetorically re-crafting worse cases into typical cases, and profoundly distorting the nature of drug problems in the interest of dramatic stories.”

Reinerman and Duskin supported their position by showing that there were certain key aspects of the case that should have led the editors of the paper to question the validity of the story. The sociologists argued that questions were not raised largely because the specific elements of the story fit rather nicely with dominant social assumptions about drug use and addiction. For instance, they noted that it should have been questionable that a five-year-old child would ask to have a needle stuck into his arms daily for the weeks that it would take the child to become addicted to heroin.

Reinerman and Duskin also stressed that it is unlikely that a journalist would have unlimited access to drug users and sellers and even more unlikely that an addict would allow a journalist to watch him or her shoot heroin into the arm of a young child. It would be unlikely as well that the typical mother, even the typical mother on heroin, would allow someone to shoot heroin into the arm of her child.

On a positive note, the affair led media outlets to revisit their standards for reporters and editors. It also intensified discussion of the rights of reporters to conceal facts about their sources.

—Kevin Buckler

FURTHER READING

Cooke, Janet. “Jimmy’s World.” The Washington Post, September 28, 1980. Cooke’s award-winning, but faked, feature story about Jimmy, an eight-year-old heroin addict living in Washington, D.C.

Iggers, Jeremy. Good News, Bad News: Journalism Ethics and the Public Interest. Boulder, Colo.: Westview Press, 1998. A study of journalistic ethics that also fully examines the Janet Cooke case and its significance for journalism.

Maraniss, David A. “Post Reporter’s Pulitzer Prize Is Withdrawn.” The Washington Post, April 16, 1981. The newspaper article announcing that Cooke’s Pulitzer for best feature story had been withdrawn by the Pulitzer Prize Committee.

Nemeth, Neil. News Ombudsmen in North America: Assessing an Experiment in Social Responsibility. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 2003. Looks at the role of news ombudsmen in monitoring and checking the veracity of news stories. Examines the Janet Cooke case and who was responsible for the story.

Reinarman, Craig, and Ceres Duskin. "Dominant Ideology and Drugs in the Media." International Journal of Drug Policy 2, no. 1 (1992): 6-15. Provides a different explanation of how a fabricated story could be published by The Washington Post. Argues that preconceptions about drugs and drug users held by the news editors were factors that contributed to the decision to publish the story.

Seitz, Don Carlos. Joseph Pulitzer: His Life and Letters. Whitefish, Mont.: Kessinger, 2004. Examines Joseph Pulitzer's efforts to raise the standards of journalism, and his establishment of the Pulitzer Prize. Also looks at his beliefs about journalism and journalists' responsibilities.

SEE ALSO: June 5, 1944: Australian Poets Claim Responsibility for a Literary Hoax; Jan. 28, 1972: Clifford Irving Admits Faking Howard Hughes Memoirs; Jan. 22, 1987: Pennsylvania Politician Kills Himself at Televised Press Conference; Jan. 18, 1990: Washington, D.C., Mayor Marion Barry Is Arrested for Drug Use; Spring, 1996: Physicist Publishes a Deliberately Fraudulent Article; May 11, 1998: Journalist Stephen Glass Is Exposed as a Fraud; June 18, 2001: Historian Joseph J. Ellis Is Accused of Lying; Jan. 18, 2002: Historian Doris Kearns Goodwin Is Accused of Plagiarism; Apr. 29, 2003: New York Times Reporter Jayson Blair Is Exposed as a Fraud; Feb. 18, 2007: Washington Post Exposes Decline of Walter Reed Army Hospital.

April 28, 1981

TENNIS STAR BILLIE JEAN KING IS SUED FOR PALIMONY

Tennis champion Billie Jean King was sued by her former lover Marilyn Barnett, who was seeking financial support from King under California's landmark palimony decision in Marvin v. Marvin (1976). King first denied that she and Barnett had been lovers but admitted a few days later to their relationship. King also said that she never promised to support Barnett financially.

LOCALE: Los Angeles, California

CATEGORIES: Law and the courts; sex; social issues and reform

KEY FIGURES

Billie Jean King (b. 1943), former professional tennis player

Marilyn Barnett (fl. 1980's), secretary and lover of Billie Jean King

Larry King (fl. 1980's), Billie Jean King's husband

SUMMARY OF EVENT

By the time Billie Jean King's tennis career was winding down during the mid-1970s because of her increasing physical problems, she was involved in a romantic relationship with her secretary, former hair stylist Marilyn Barnett. The affair reportedly lasted about two years, and at the end of that time King discontinued Barnett's formal employment. The two remained friends, and Barnett continued to reside in King's Malibu house, which Barnett rented.

Larry King, a lawyer and King's husband since 1965, presumably did not know about the relationship with Barnett. In addition to staying at the Malibu house, Barnett had been using the Kings' credit cards to pay many of her expenses. When the Kings tried to evict her from the Malibu home in 1981, Barnett revealed the love affair and sued Billie Jean King for spousal support, in this case, palimony.

Barnett's suit, filed April 28, was the first major lawsuit involving a same-gender application of the palimony doctrine. This doctrine was reaffirmed by the California Supreme Court in a 1976 decision involving actor Lee Marvin and his former live-in lover, Michelle Triola. Barnett claimed in her own suit that she had been promised lifetime financial support, even though King had already offered to settle with her financially.

Long before the palimony suit, King had transformed tennis by campaigning tirelessly for equal treatment for women players. She had the clout of her championship credentials to back up her crusade. By the age of seventeen in 1961, she had won her first Wimbledon doubles tournament and five years later triumphed to win the first of twelve Grand Slam singles titles. These were great accomplishments for a woman who as a young player had been described as “short, fat, and aggressive” by a tennis coach.

Among the disparities King sought to address was a financial one. Male players earned far more in prize money than female players. To inspire change, King threatened to boycott the U.S. Open in 1973, and in 1974 the open became the first tournament to provide equal prize money to men and women. King’s other accomplishments include being the first female tennis player to win more than $100,000 in prize money in a single year (1971), organizing the Women’s Tennis Association, and founding the magazine womenSports (later Women’s Sports and Fitness). She also coauthored several books on how to play tennis. She also faced considerable negative publicity, however, for her longtime advocacy of cigarette-company sponsorship of women’s tennis, namely the Virginia Slims Tour, which she cofounded.

In 1973, former Wimbledon men’s champion Bobby Riggs had challenged King to a match, hoping to demonstrate that male players of any age were superior to women in the sport. At the age of fifty-five, he was some twenty-five years older than King and had already defeated a former women’s champion, Margaret Court. The media dubbed the match the battle of the sexes, and the game was watched by an estimated forty million people on television. King decisively defeated Riggs in three straight sets.

Billie Jean King with her husband, Larry King, speaks to reporters about Marilyn Barnett’s palimony lawsuit. (AP/Wide World Photos)

In a 1981 press conference, King first denied the romantic affair with Barnett, then she publicly admitted to being bisexual, thus making her one of the first major athletes to acknowledge any kind of gay or lesbian relationship. Prior to the press conference, however, King and her husband had been discrediting Barnett, at one time suggesting that she had been “in and out of institutions” and had attempted to kill herself. One particular accident from October, 1980, was interpreted by some people as a suicide attempt by Barnett. She had been found lying on the sand below the balcony of her Malibu home. She had a broken back, and the incident left her paralyzed below the waist. She began to use a wheelchair for mobility but could not work to support herself.

Marilyn Barnett in court in December, 1981, after being sued by the Kings to vacate their home. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Barnett ultimately lost her palimony lawsuit when it was dismissed on November 19, 1982. The suit failed, in part, because she and King were not cohabitants in the sense outlined in Marvin. The court found no evidence that King and Barnett joined their finances. A related case, Jones v. Daly, was in the courts in 1981. In that case, a California appeals court ruled against gay palimony or, as it came to be known, galimony.

It was not until many years later that King finally admitted that she was lesbian. Many lesbians and gays had been disappointed and angered when she termed her affair with Barnett a “mistake.” They thought she was trying to avoid the question of her sexuality. She then added that the mistake was being unfaithful to her husband, not having an affair with another woman.

IMPACT

Citing high attorney’s fees to defend against the lawsuit, King, who was almost forty years old by this time, returned to the tennis tour. She remained active in the sport as a coach and in other capacities, and she regained the reputation she had prior to the scandal. However, by admitting her bisexuality in 1981, King lost millions of dollars in potential earnings as a product spokesperson and sportscaster, a job at which she already had been working. She estimated that the fallout from the scandal cost her about $1.5 million.

Barnett’s palimony suit initially forced the legal system to address several same-gender palimony cases, but many of the cases were not resolved successfully because no precedent existed for such cases. On a personal and social level, the palimony suit did not harm King’s future impact on lesbian and gay activism. King became something of an icon for many in the gay community, and she supported causes such as the Human Rights Campaign and the fight against AIDS. In 2001 she received an award from the influential media watchdog group GLAAD (Gay and Lesbian Alliance Against Defamation) for “furthering the visibility and inclusion of the [gay] community in her work.”

King has been quoted as saying that one reason she refrained from telling the truth earlier was that her parents were homophobic. Also, she feared disclosure would mean the end of her participation in women’s tennis. Her eventual openness about her own sexuality eased the way for other professional tennis players to come out as lesbian, notably Martina Navratilova and Amélie Mauresmo.

King and her husband divorced in 1987. He had publicly supported her, but their marriage was irretrievably broken by the revelation of her affair. The marriage apparently had been shaky since the early 1970’s.

—Roy Liebman

FURTHER READING

King, Billie Jean, and Frank Deford. Billie Jean. New York: Viking, 1982. A candid autobiography that helped to reestablish King’s reputation following the palimony scandal.

Lipsyte, Robert. "Prophets: Avery Brundage, Muhammad Ali, Billie Jean King." In The Gospel According to ESPN: Saints, Saviors, and Sinners, edited by Jay Lovinger. New York: Hyperion Books, 2002. With an introduction by Hunter S. Thompson, this collection of essays looks at the revered status of sports stars, including Billie Jean King. Lipsyte's chapter examines how King brought gender equity to the sport of tennis.

Schwabacher, Martin. Superstars of Women's Tennis. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 1997. A work that explores the world of women's tennis, with a chapter on King's career and her tennis legacy. Part of Chelsea House's Female Sports Stars series.

SEE ALSO: Jan., 1977: Singer Anita Bryant Campaigns Against Lesbian and Gay Rights; Apr. 18, 1979: Actor Lee Marvin Is Ordered to Pay Palimony to Former Lover; Mar. 10, 1980: Scarsdale Diet Doctor Is Killed by His Lover; July 28, 1980: Magazine Reveals Baseball Star Steve Garvey's Marital Problems.

May 23, 1981

ITALIAN JUSTICE MINISTER RESIGNS BECAUSE OF CRIME CONNECTION

Propaganda Due, a secret Masonic lodge reportedly involved in criminal activities, was found to have nearly one thousand of Italy's political and economic elite as members. The resulting scandal became one of the biggest in Italy and shook the coalition government of Prime Minister Arnaldo Forlani when it became known that Justice Minister Adolfo Sarti had applied for membership.

LOCALE: Italy

CATEGORIES: Organized crime and racketeering; corruption; government; politics

KEY FIGURES

Arnaldo Forlani (b. 1925), prime minister of Italy, 1980-1981

Licio Gelli (b. 1919), businessman and head of Propaganda Due Masonic lodge

Adolfo Sarti (1928-1992), Italian justice minister, 1980-1981

Roberto Calvi (1920-1982), chairman of the Banco Ambrosiano of Milan and Vatican banker

Michele Sindona (1920-1986), Vatican and Mafia banker

Silvio Berlusconi (b. 1936), prime minister of Italy, 1994-1995, 2001-2006, 2008-

SUMMARY OF EVENT

On March 17, 1981, the Italian financial police (one of the four branches of the national police force) raided Licio Gelli's villa in the Tuscan countryside. Ostensibly a mattress manufacturer and owner of a furniture store in the city of Arezzo, the seemingly reformed Gelli, also a fascist, turned out to be the head of a right-wing Masonic lodge known as Propaganda Due, or P-2. Lodge members were intent on preventing a feared takeover of the Italian government by Il Partito Comunista Italiana, or PCI (the Italian Communist Party), the largest communist party outside the Soviet Union.

The financial police had been directed to search Gelli's villa by the Bank of Italy. Investigators had fortuitously come across Gelli's name in connection with Mafia financial dealings with Michele Sindona, a banker. In the course of the raid, the police came upon a list of 964 members of a previously unknown and, as later determined, influential and rogue Masonic lodge. The list was a who's who of right-wing politicians and civic officials and clergy members, including figures from industry, journalism, law, and all branches of the police forces and military.

Gelli had been a convinced and active fascist and remained a supporter of Italian fascist dictator Benito Mussolini. After World War II, Gelli was put on a list of fascists to be kept under observation. He remained there well into the 1950's. After becoming a businessman and giving no cause for alarm, he was removed from the list. As events would prove, however, he was a right-wing organizer who was dedicated, as were virtually all members of P-2, to preventing PCI from coming to power in Italy's government.

In 1965, Gelli decided to join the Grand Lodge of Masons in Rome in 1965. In contrast to the United States, where Masons reveal their membership by wearing rings and insignia, Italian Masons have always taken the greatest care not to reveal their membership in the order. By 1969, the suave and urbane Gelli succeeded in forming the breakaway sub lodge P-2. Gelli held court in a five-star hotel in Rome. Through his Banco Ambrosiano and with the consent of Roman Catholic archbishop Paul Marcinkus, Roberto Calvi was bankrolling Gelli's lifestyle and activities. It was estimated at the time of Banco Ambrosiano's collapse during the early 1980's, Gelli and P-2 owed the bank close to $300 million.

Gelli's lodge exercised significant influence over the various sectors of Italian high society, of which P-2 members were a part. In addition, P-2 had editorial control of Italy's leading newspaper, the Milanese Corriere della Sera, after controlling interest in the newspaper had been purchased by Calvi's Banco Ambrosiano.

By 1970, Gelli had developed membership in P-2 to the point where he could organize an attempted coup d'etat of PCI, the decadent, weak government he perceived ripe for a takeover by the major party in Italy. Scholars of P-2 are convinced that Gelli was employed by the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), which ordered a stop to the coup just after it had begun and just short of the president of the republic becoming a prisoner. After the aborted coup, P-2 went deeper underground.

Throughout the 1970's, Italy was racked by the political violence of the Red Brigades. However, it was P-2 that likely planned and financed the worst act of violence in Italy's postwar history: the 1980 bombing at the Bologna railway station. The widespread outcry forced government agencies to act vigorously against domestic terrorism. Identification of Gelli in conjunction with the investigation into the Sindona and Calvi banking scandals ultimately generated the search of Gelli's villa and the discovery of the P-2 membership list. P-2 was officially declared a criminal organization.

In 1981, a coalition Italian government was cobbled together and headed by the nondescript Christian Democrat prime minister, Arnaldo Forlani. Forlani appointed a likewise unprepossessing party stalwart, Adolfo Sarti, who was a former minister of public education, of defense, and of justice. The seized P-2 membership list had been turned over to Forlani. Despite his attempts to keep the membership from becoming public, word about the raid leaked and the media's response to Forlani's stonewalling was ear splitting.

One journalist, Mino Pecorelli, who clearly had damning insider information and was producing one compromising article after another in 1981, was murdered in Rome in broad daylight. The murder was considered a threat and warning to journalists in general. A high-ranking Mafia figure, arrested well after the fact and revealing inside secrets in exchange for reduction of his sentence, stated that P-2 had commissioned Pecorelli's murder, which was executed by the Mafia.

A primary aim of P-2 was to control the judiciary as well as law enforcement so that P-2 members could count on escaping trial or, failing that, receive lighter than normal sentences. P-2 came close to achieving that particular aim when it was discovered among papers confiscated in the raid on Gelli's villa that Sarti, the recently appointed minister of justice in the short-lived Christian Democratic-coalition government, was an applicant for P-2 membership. When his application became known, demonstrating the high reach of P-2, Sarti was forced to resign from the cabinet.

Gelli was in Argentina at the time of the police raid on his villa. He was likely serving as a mule, that is, delivering money laundered in one or more of Calvi's many off-shore banks in Roman Catholic countries in Central and South America. For this work, Gelli took commissions and siphoned P-2 funds for his own secret Swiss bank account. Now indicted and wanted by the Italian police, Gelli remained incognito and outside Italy until he needed money. He returned to Europe and was arrested by Swiss police while entering Switzerland with a fake passport in an attempt to withdraw three million dollars from his account.

Gelli succeeded in bribing his way out of a Swiss jail and fled to prevent his extradition. He was eventually arrested and extradited to Italy, where he was tried. Although the major charges against him could not be proven and he was not sentenced to prison, Gelli was placed under house arrest for lesser P-2-related charges. He lived under house arrest until 2007 when, because of his age and ill health, was permitted freedom of movement within Italy.

IMPACT

As a consequence of the P-2 scandal, the days of governmental control by the center-right Christian Democratic Party, which had ruled Italy since 1948, became numbered. Following the collapse of the Forlani government in 1981, the reverse of P-2's aims became reality: Sandro Pertini, a Socialist, was elected president of Italy. Given the crisis conditions, Pertini appointed as prime minister the first non-Christian Democrat, Giuseppe Spooling of the Republican Party. When that coalition failed, Pertini appointed as prime minister fellow Socialist Bettino Craxi, in 1983. Craxi's party, it turned out, was financed by Calvi, his fellow Milanese and a P-2 member.

Following the next big scandal, P-2 member and politician Silvio Berlusconi, accused of bribery, formed the Forza Italia Party and was appointed prime minister for the first time in 1994 and then again in 2001 and 2008. Berlusconi's center-right coalition lasted the entire election period and enabled him to enter Italian history as the longest-serving prime minister in postwar Italy.

—Robert B. Youngblood

FURTHER READING

Raw, Charles. The Moneychangers: How the Vatican Bank Enabled Roberto Calvi to Steal Two Hundred Fifty Million for the Heads of the P2 Masonic Lodge. London: Harvill, 1992. A comprehensive study of the Ambrosiano-Calvi scandal that details virtually every known transaction in the case.

Willan, Philip. The Last Supper: The Mafia, the Masons, and the Killing of Roberto Calvi. London: Robinson, 2007. Argues that P-2 was a remnant of Cold War politics, with its dueling fears of democracy and communism and the hunger for power and wealth.

Williams, Paul L. The Vatican Exposed: Money, Murder, and the Mafia. Amherst, N.Y.: Prometheus Books, 2003. An excellent first source for understanding the connections among players in the P-2 and related scandals.

SEE ALSO: Sept. 10, 1981: Chicago Sun-Times Reports That Cardinal Cody Diverted Church Funds; Aug. 6, 1982: Banco Ambrosiano Collapses Amid Criminal Accusations; Nov. 3, 1996: Car Crash Reveals Depth of Government Corruption in Turkey; Oct. 22, 2006: Chilean Politicians Use Community Funds for Personal Campaigns.

May 29, 1981

COURT FINDS THAT FORD IGNORED PINTO'S SAFETY PROBLEMS

The California Courts of Appeal determined that Ford Motor Company was responsible for the death and injuries sustained in an accident involving a Ford Pinto that was rear-ended and caught on fire. The court determined that Ford was aware of the potential fire hazard because of design flaws built into the Pinto but that the company failed to address the safety issue and repair the problem. Critics of the legal case argue that the Pinto was no more prone to catch fire upon a rear-end impact than other similar cars of the time.

ALSO KNOWN AS: Grimshaw v. Ford Motor Co.

LOCALE: San Diego, California

CATEGORIES: Business; law and the courts; trade and commerce

KEY FIGURES

Lily Gray (d. 1972), driver of the stalled Ford Pinto

Richard Grimshaw (b. c. 1959), plaintiff, who was a passenger in the Ford Pinto

Harley Copp (fl. 1980's), head of Ford's crash-testing program

SUMMARY OF EVENT

On May 28, 1972, a Ford Pinto driven by Lily Gray stalled on a Southern California freeway near San Bernardino. Gray's Pinto hatchback was rear-ended by another car on the freeway and immediately caught fire. Testimony at trial indicated that when the car was struck from behind, the gas tank ruptured. Gray died several days later of complications from her burn injuries. Thirteen-year-old Richard Grimshaw, the sole passenger in Gray's Pinto and Gray's neighbor, sustained serious burns to 90 percent of his body, including his face. His nose, an ear, and several fingers were incinerated, and he was permanently disfigured.

Grimshaw as well as Gray's heirs—her husband and two daughters—sued Ford Motor Company in civil court, alleging that the company manufactured the Pinto even though it knew the car was unsafe. In February, 1978, after a six-month trial, a jury awarded Grimshaw more than $2.5 million in compensatory damages and $125 million in punitive damages. The Grays received $559,680 in compensatory damages. Gray's family was statutorily prohibited from seeking punitive damages. Determining that the amount awarded to Grimshaw was excessive, trial judge Leonard Goldstein reduced Grimshaw's punitive damage award to $3.5 million, at the time the largest such award in U.S. legal history. Ford appealed the decision, particularly the punitive damages, and claimed legal mistakes were made during the trial.

On May 29, 1981, the California Courts of Appeal in San Diego affirmed the lower court's decision, including the punitive damages award. Writing for the court was Judge P. J. Tamura. His opinion included a review of the history of the Pinto. The car was initially conceived in 1968 by Lee Iacocca, vice president at Ford, and was sold beginning in September, 1970. The Pinto was hurried into production to rival imported subcompact automobiles. As such, it was designed to weigh less than two tons and was priced at less than $2,000. Because of the haste in readying the car for retail, the product development time frame was shortened. Styling determinations were made prior to engineering decisions, which ultimately meant that the engineering design would need to accommodate the already determined styling design.

Designers had placed the gas tank behind the rear axle instead of above the rear axle, a more common location for gas tanks at the time. Also, the Pinto had an insubstantial bumper, and the area between the bumper and the axle was narrower than in other cars. The structure of the car lacked reinforcement, and several bolts in the differential housing were left exposed. When combined, these design elements increased the likelihood that the Pinto would catch fire in a rear-end collision. The back of the vehicle would crumble and lead to a punctured gas tank and fuel leak.

The appellate judges agreed that Ford was responsible for Grimshaw's injuries and Gray's death. The court noted that Ford's upper management knew that the Pinto performed poorly in crash tests yet approved its manufacture. The automobile was unable to withstand a rear-end impact from a car traveling 20 miles per hour without rupturing its gas tank. Harley Copp, the former head of Ford's crash-testing program, testified in court that Ford executives, including Iacocca, were aware of the Pinto crash-test results but advanced the car's manufacture regardless. Copp said that executives knew of inexpensive modifications that could fix the gas leakage problem. These modifications included reinforcing the car's structure to reduce collapse at impact, adding more space between the axle and bumper, and better protecting the gas tank from puncture. Even though Ford's costs would have been less than $20 per car, no changes were made.

Other damaging evidence suggested that Ford used a cost-benefit analysis to decide whether to correct the gas-leakage concern. A 1973 report indicated that Ford determined it would be less expensive to pay for any lawsuits associated with injuries and deaths in accidents than to correct the design flaws. Ford used estimates provided by the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration, which showed that the monetary value of a burn death was $200,000 and the value of a severe burn injury was $67,000. Ford calculated the expense of potential lawsuits involving 180 burn deaths and 180 burn injuries: approximately $50 million. Ford also found that the cost to correct flaws in

Court Finds Ford Ignored Pinto's Safety Problems

11 million cars and 1.5 million trucks would be about $11 per vehicle, for a total of about $137 million, far more than the estimated $50 million in potential lawsuit awards. As such, Ford decided that the costs of making repairs outweighed the benefit of protecting car occupants from potential injuries or death.

An appellate court found that Ford acted in callous disregard of public safety, yet it upheld the reduced punitive damages award, ruling that the amount was reasonable in relation to Ford's net worth of approximately $8 billion. The court also ruled that the ratio between punitive damages and compensatory damages was fair, and ruled that the amount of the award would deter similar unethical and reckless business practices by Ford or any other automobile manufacturer.

The court also rejected the appeals of Grimshaw and Gray's heirs. It determined that the judge in the lower court did not abuse his authority by reducing the punitive damages to $3.5 million. The court also rejected the claim by the Grays that they, too, should be entitled to seek punitive damages against Ford.

A 1977 model Ford Pinto. (AP/Wide World Photos)

IMPACT

The Ford Pinto has a legacy of being one of the most dangerous cars ever made, but it is a legacy that remains questionable and, some argue, even unfair. At the time the Pinto was first produced, no government safety standards existed to ensure against fuel leakage in rear-end collisions. Also, early estimates of the number of deaths from rear-end collisions in Pintos—estimates that ranged from five hundred to nine hundred—were likely exaggerated. A 1991 law journal article claims that the number of deaths is much lower—even as low as twenty-seven—and that the car was no more prone to fire after an accident than other similar subcompact vehicles of the time.

—Margaret E. Leigey and Madeleine Stelzmler

FURTHER READING

Banham, Russ. The Ford Century: Ford Motor Company and the Innovations That Shaped the World. New York: Artisan, 2002. A comprehensive and lavishly illustrated corporate history of the Ford Motor Company.

Birsch, Douglas, and John H. Fielder, eds. The Ford Pinto Case. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1994. Compilation of newspaper articles, safety reports, and commentary on the ethics and decision making related to the Ford Pinto.

Dowie, Mark. "Pinto Madness." Mother Jones, September-October, 1977. Published during the Grimshaw trial, this often-cited and Pulitzer Prize-winning exposé claims Ford executives were aware of the potential fire hazard in the Pinto but failed to correct the problem.

Lee, Matthew T., and M. David Ermann. "Pinto 'Madness' as a Flawed Landmark Narrative: An Organizational and Network Analysis." Social Problems 46, no. 1 (1999): 30-47. Presents evidence alleging that traditional journalistic accounts of the Ford Pinto are not accurate. For example, the authors claim that the Pinto was about as safe as similar cars produced during the same time.

SEE ALSO: Sept.-Oct., 1937: Prescription Elixir Causes More than One Hundred Deaths; Summer, 1974: Dalkon Shield Contraceptive Is Removed from the Market; Sept. 26, 1979: Love Canal Residents Sue Chemical Company; Oct. 19, 1982: Car Manufacturer John De Lorean Is Arrested in a Drug Sting; 1985-1986: Westland Affair Shakes Prime Minister Thatcher's Government; Feb. 4, 1996: Whistle-Blower Reveals Tobacco Industry Corruption; Summer, 2006-Mar. 16, 2007: Manufacturer Recalls Pet Food That Killed Thousands of American Pets.

September 10, 1981

CHICAGO SUN-TIMES REPORTS THAT CARDINAL CODY DIVERTED CHURCH FUNDS

After almost two turmoil-ridden decades as archbishop of one of the largest Roman Catholic dioceses in the United States, John Patrick Cody was accused in a series of articles in the Chicago Sun-Times of having diverted tax-exempt church funds to the benefit of two family members. U.S. attorneys had been investigating the cardinal since late 1980.

LOCALE: Chicago, Illinois

CATEGORIES: Publishing and journalism; corruption; law and the courts; religion

KEY FIGURES

John Patrick Cody (1907-1982), Roman Catholic archbishop of Chicago

Andrew M. Greeley (b. 1928), Catholic priest, sociologist, novelist, and public critic of Cody

Carlton Sherwood (b. 1946), investigative journalist

Helen Dolan Wilson (b. 1908?), Cody's stepcousin by marriage

David Wilson (fl. 1980's), Helen Dolan Wilson's son

Joseph Louis Bernardin (1928-1996), Catholic archbishop of Cincinnati

SUMMARY OF EVENT

John Patrick Cody was a difficult person. Particularly after the Second Vatican Council decreed that the governance of the Catholic Church should become more democratic, his authoritarian style of leadership had become increasingly out of step with the times. Rumors existed that the priests of the Archdiocese of New Orleans sang a Te Deum (a Catholic hymn of praise) in delight at being rid of him when he was transferred to Chicago. Cody himself regarded this change as key to his ambitions because Chicago was a cardinalatial see, that is, an archdiocese whose incumbent was traditionally made a cardinal by the pope. Some priests even claimed Cody saw Chicago as a stepping-stone to becoming the first pope from the United States.

By 1981, Cody had become an embattled ruler surrounded by angry subjects. His own priests had accused him of deception and dishonesty, and the laity was writing letters of complaint to the Vatican about his high-handed policies. The endless conflicts had made major inroads into Cody's health, and his once rosy cheeks had grown sallow and hollow with the ravages of congestive heart failure. However, he refused to even consider allowing a younger bishop to take over any of his duties and did all he could to conceal his worsening health from both his archdiocese and the Holy See. A stint working in the Vatican as a young priest had taught him the ins and outs of court intrigue, and he had plenty of information that could be used against the Vatican if the congregation of bishops were to attempt to move against him. He even had threatened to reveal some choice secrets in 1979 when Cardinal Sebastiano Baggio, cardinal-prefect of the congregation of bishops, had tried to compel him to resign shortly before the death of Pope Paul VI.

Only the aging Pope Paul's death, followed by the successive elections of the two John Pauls, saved Cody from being replaced, or at least forced to accept a coadjutor (a situation in which Cody would have become a figurehead and his nominal subordinate would have exercised the actual authority of the archdiocese). John Paul I reigned for a mere thirty-three days, not enough time to consolidate his power and move against Cody, and John Paul II did not wish scandal in one of the most important dioceses in the free world to distract from his moral efforts against the Soviet bloc. Thus, any further opposition to Cody would have to come not from the Vatican hierarchy but from the grass roots within his own archdiocese.

How the information about Cody's questionable financial dealings reached the Chicago Sun-Times, one of the city's two leading daily newspapers, is uncertain, but Father Andrew M. Greeley remains suspect. Almost from the beginning of Cody's tenure as archbishop, Greeley had been an outspoken critic of the cardinal's methods of administration. Greeley's novel The Cardinal Sins, which was published in 1981, featured a villain who was a thinly disguised version of Cody and came to an ignominious (shameful) end. Greeley was accused of plotting to "get" Cody on the basis of some private papers he had entrusted to the archives of Notre Dame University in South Bend, Indiana. However, he later claimed the papers were no more than musings about possibilities, not a plan for action.

Carlton Sherwood, an investigative journalist, wrote a series of articles about Cody, and his first consultation was with Greeley. The first of these articles, published by the Chicago Sun-Times on September 10, 1981, announced that a federal grand jury investigation was already under way into Cody's administration of church finances. The U.S. Attorney's Office had been investigating Cody's administration of the archdiocese's treasury since the fall of 1980, one year before the Chicago Sun-Times series appeared.

The federal investigation centered on Cody's relationship with Helen Dolan Wilson, an elderly woman whom he called a cousin but in fact was the stepdaughter of his aunt. They had been raised together, and after Helen had been divorced by her husband, he had seen after her and her young children. When her son, David Wilson, had become older and entered the insurance business, Cody had given him diocesan insurance contracts for the successive dioceses he headed. By the time Cody was transferred to Chicago, David had left the insurance business, and the two entered a real estate partnership that involved selling archdiocesan properties for secular use.

Although there was some effort to portray Helen as Cody's mistress, both of them insisted that their relationship was in the manner of brother and sister. Of far greater interest was the financial nature of their relationship. Although Helen had never held any position more responsible than that of church secretary, and her former husband had left her nothing, she enjoyed a condominium in one of Chicago's Gold Coast high-rises and a vacation home in a tony area of Florida, as well as numerous furs, jewels, and other expensive possessions. Cody's extreme secretiveness about his administration of the archdiocese's finances, combined with his closing of several archdiocesan facilities on the basis of supposed lack of money, lent credence to the conclusion that he had diverted it to Helen and her family.

The question was of interest to the U.S. attorney because of the tax-free status of religious institutions and funds. If Cody had transferred church money to private use, he would have violated U.S. tax code. The newspaper series claimed that up to one million dollars had been diverted by Cody.

Cody's response to the accusations only escalated the situation. He regarded any call for accountability as an affront to his authority as archbishop. Rather than document his handling of the archdiocese's finances, he accused the Chicago Sun-Times of anti-Catholicism. Many Chicago Catholics, even some who had previously been unhappy with Cody's administration, felt obligated to come to the defense of the archbishop against supposed attacks on the Church as a whole. Cody also made himself so inaccessible that a federal marshal could deliver a subpoena to court only by cornering the cardinal in a church sacristy as he was vesting for an important Mass.

Cody's position was saved only by revelations that Greeley had been involved in pointing Sherwood toward the cardinal's financial dealings. Cody's supporters were able to spin it as a supposed plot, and they suggested that Archbishop Bernardin of Cincinnati, a widely popular prelate whose name had been put forth as a possible successor to the see of Chicago, had been a coconspirator with Greeley. By shifting attention to Bernardin, Cody was able to gain just enough of a reprieve that his worsening health would forestall any further investigation.

IMPACT

In the end, Cody never was formally indicted of any crime. He spent the first several months of 1982 convalescing in the archbishop's residence when he was not actually in the hospital. On April 25, he died in his sleep of a heart attack, and many in the archdiocese breathed a collective sigh of relief. Pope John Paul II appointed Bernardin as Cody's successor and subsequently created Bernardin a cardinal at the next consistory. Bernardin made it plain on his first public appearance as archbishop of Chicago that he regarded his mission as that of a conciliator, and he invited all who held grudges against Cody to set their burdens down.

To lay to rest questions of fiscal wrongdoing, Bernardin hired the accounting firm of Arthur Anderson (implicated in the Enron scandal of 2001) to examine the archdiocese's books. It found that while Cody had occasionally mingled funds in ways that were not in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles, there was no evidence of actual fraud or diversion of funds. However, Bernardin would spend the rest of his tenure in Chicago dealing with the long-term damage to relationships within the local church, and the stress may have contributed to his death by pancreatic cancer.

—Leigh Husband Kimmel

FURTHER READING

Greeley, Andrew M. Confessions of a Parish Priest: An Autobiography. New York: Pocket Books, 1987. Written while some of the principals of the scandal were still living, this book by Greeley reads as somewhat evasive because individuals cannot be named.

_____. Furthermore! Memories of a Parish Priest. New York: Forge, 1999. A second volume in the memoirs of Cody's chief public critic in the archdiocese. Names Helen Dolan Wilson in the scandal.

Kennedy, Eugene. My Brother Joseph: The Spirit of a Cardinal and the Story of a Friendship. New

Report That Cardinal Cody Diverted Church Funds

York: St. Martin's Press, 1997. Includes material on Cody's last years and Bernardin's arrival in Chicago.

Larsen, Roy. "In the 1980's, a Chicago Newspaper Investigated Cardinal Cody." Nieman Reports 57, no. 1 (Spring, 2003): 66-68. A look back at the investigation by U.S. attorneys of the diversion of church funds by Cody, with a focus on the scandal's financial aspects.

Thomas, Gordon, and Max Morgan-Witts. Pontiff. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1983. History of the elections of the two John Pauls that also touches on the Cody scandal.

Yallop, David A. In God's Name: An Investigation into the Murder of Pope John Paul I. New York: Bantam Books, 1984. Claims that Cody knew of the circumstances that led to the death of John Paul I.

SEE ALSO: May-June, 1926: Evangelist Aimee Semple McPherson Claims She Was Kidnapped; Feb. 23, 1963: Play Accuses Pope Pius XII of Complicity in the Holocaust; May 20, 1974: French Cardinal Daniélou Dies in a Prostitute's House; June 27, 1978: Evangelist Herbert W. Armstrong Excommunicates His Own Son; May 23, 1981: Italian Justice Minister Resigns Because of Crime Connection; Aug. 6, 1982: Banco Ambrosiano Collapses Amid Criminal Accusations; Apr. 22, 1986: Faith Healer Peter Popoff Is Exposed as a Fraud; Feb. 21, 1988: Evangelist Jimmy Swaggart Tearfully Confesses His Adultery; May 6, 1992: Irish Bishop Eamonn Casey's Romantic Affair Leads to His Resignation; Jan. 6, 2002: Boston Globe Reports on Child Sexual Abuse by Roman Catholic Priests.

May 11, 1982

PHILIPPINE PRESIDENT MARCOS FORCES THE ENTIRE SUPREME COURT TO RESIGN

In the Philippines, the bar examination score needed to practice law was determined by the national supreme court. After allegations that the passing score of a supreme court justice's son had been fixed, President Ferdinand Marcos obtained the resignations of all fourteen members of the court. Although the charges of juridical corruption may have been valid, Marcos's action also helped him further consolidate his dictatorial power in the country.

LOCALE: Manila, Philippines

CATEGORIES: Law and the courts; corruption; hoaxes, frauds, and charlatanism; politics; government; cultural and intellectual history

KEY FIGURES

Ferdinand Marcos (1917-1989), president of the Philippines, 1965-1986

Enrique Fernando (1915-2004), justice of the supreme court of the Philippines, 1967-1985, and chief justice, 1979-1985

Vicente ERICTA (b. 1915), associate justice of the supreme court of the Philippines, 1981-1982

Ameurfina Melencio Herrera (b. 1922), associate justice of the supreme court of the Philippines, 1979-1992

SUMMARY OF EVENT

By 1982, Ferdinand Marcos had been dictatorial president of the Philippines for a decade, having declared martial law on September 22, 1972. Although martial law was lifted in 1981, the wily Marcos consolidated his power and firmly controlled the institutions of government, media, and society. Nevertheless, criticism of his authoritarian regime had increased steadily, on both international and domestic fronts. The Philippine supreme court scandal of 1982 allowed Marcos to further strengthen his grip over the judiciary, while providing his critics with another reason to attack the corruption of his regime.

The Philippine bar examination is of great importance and prestige in Philippine society. It has been continually administered since 1901, the same year the supreme court of the Philippines was established, as a mark of determination to turn the Philippines into a modern and meritocratic nation. The bar is the licensing exam to become a lawyer and enter the highest professional and economic echelons of Philippine society. It is a mark of the prestige and rigor of the exam that it is administered by the fifteen-member supreme court, a unique professional distinction in the Philippines.

The exam is a comprehensive, rigorous test of a law student's knowledge. Passage rates are adjusted annually; a high score on the exam brings great prestige and the promise of success in the legal and political communities. In a manner similar to the civil service exams of imperial China, the Philippine bar exam is considered the highest standard for aspiring professionals. The supreme court traditionally released a list of highest scores on the nationally administered exam; those obtaining the highest scores were known as bar topnotchers.

Bar topnotchers have played a storied role in Philippine society. Manuel Roxas, who placed first in the 1913 bar exam, would become the first president of the Philippines. Sergio Osmeña and Manuel Quezon, who finished second and fourth in the 1903 bar exams, respectively, would also become Philippine presidents. Other Philippine presidents who first came to prominence as bar topnotchers include Jose Laurel (1915), Carlos Garcia (1923), Arturo Tolentino (1934), Diosdado Macapagal (1936), and Emmanuel Pelaez (1938). Marcos himself launched his political career on the basis of his brilliant first-place result on the 1939 exam. Likewise, numerous supreme court justices and senators proudly boasted as their first, and perhaps most important, success a top score on the national exam.

Although there had been previous scandals regarding the exam, the most sensational occurred in 1982. At the time, there were fourteen justices on the court, with one seat vacant. The scandal surfaced in April when Justice Ameurfina Melencio Herrera wrote a confidential letter to the court in which she alleged a serious impropriety. Herrera claimed that the exam score of Gustavo Ericta, the son of Justice Vicente Ericta, had been altered to obtain a passing grade. As a result, Herrera resigned from the bar committee and returned her honorarium fee. The letter was leaked to the press, creating an outcry.

Upon investigation it was revealed that Justice Ramon Fernandez told Justice Ericta that his son failed the exam. Justice Ericta then suggested that his son's grade be changed, which was permitted by Chief Justice Enrique Fernando. Ericta's grade on the commercial law portion of the test was revised from 56 to 58 percent, which resulted in a total score of 73 percent, just above the passing grade of 72.5 percent. Controversy swirled for weeks, with justices blaming each other for the impropriety. In a press conference, Chief Justice Fernando took responsibility for allowing the altering of Ericta's exam results and broke into tears.

After a few weeks of intense publicity, all fourteen justices offered their resignations. On May 7, twelve justices resigned, and a few days later the other two justices, who had been outside the country, followed.

The year 1982 was already proving to be crucial for Marcos. With the 1980 election of U.S. president Ronald Reagan, Marcos was assured of friendship with his most important ally, the United States. In fact, in 1982, Marcos made his first state visit to the United States in sixteen years, entailing two expensive weeks and much pomp and publicity. Feeling emboldened, Marcos was cracking down on his increasingly vocal critics in the Philippines. He repressed church progressives who denounced his government, even insulting Cardinal Jaime Sin, the archbishop of Manila. Marcos arrested two prominent labor leaders and kept close watch on domestic political opponents such as Assemblyman Salvador Laurel and those in exile, most notably Benigno Aquino, Jr.

Marcos was eager to make use of this scandal for political advantage. By acting firmly against the supreme court, he could appear as an opponent of corruption and strengthen his hold over the judiciary. Marcos asked the justices to appear before him on May 8. On May 11, Marcos accepted all fourteen resignations and announced that he would search for a new supreme court. He consulted with retired chief justices Roberto Concepcion, Querube Makalintol, and Cesar Bengzon. Then, on May 15, he reinstated all the resigned justices of the court with the exception of Ericta and Fernandez, who were most directly implicated in the scandal. Two justices were appointed to fill their places, and a third justice was appointed to fill a previously vacant fifteenth spot. Fernando publicly expressed gratitude for his reappointment.

Ferdinand Marcos. (Library of Congress)

IMPACT

This scandal illustrates the adroit and calculating nature of the Marcos regime. By demanding the resignation of all fourteen justices, all of whom he had appointed, Marcos made it appear he was cracking down on personal corruption in his government, even while he was enriching himself through illicit means. Also, reinstating the justices made it appear he was being lenient, even though he was repressing political opponents and dissenters. Moreover, by reappointing the justices, he could claim even greater authority over a supreme court that was already considered subservient to him.

Ironically, Marcos's calculation may have backfired, in at least one respect. In August of 1983, Marcos's chief political opponent, exiled senator Benigno Aquino, Jr., was assassinated upon returning to the Philippines. Marcos's government was widely believed to be behind the murder. To absolve his regime, Marcos appointed a special commission headed by former justice Fernando to investigate the assassination. Many assumed that the compliant Fernando would exonerate Marcos. However, Fernando's own credibility had been shaken to a good degree by the Ericta scandal, and the Fernando-led commission retired after only a few weeks, claiming a lack of credibility. It was to be replaced by the Agrava Fact-Finding Commission, which dismissed the government's version of the killing and blamed a conspiracy of Marcos's military officers for the death of Aquino. In a little more than two years, Marcos would be chased out of power by an outraged populace in the People's Revolution.

—Howard Bromberg

FURTHER READING

Burton, Sandra. Impossible Dream: The Marcoses, the Aquinos, and the Unfinished Revolution. New York: Warner Books, 1984. An account of the assassination of Aquino, the Fernando and Agrava Commissions, and the People's Revolution.

Celoza, Albert F. Ferdinand Marcos and the Philippines: The Political Economy of Authoritarianism. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 1997. Examines the period between 1972 and 1986, the year in which Marcos was ousted from the Philippines.

Cruz, Isagani, and Cynthia Cruz Datu. Res Gestae: A Brief History of the Supreme Court from Arellano to Narvasa. Manila: Rex Book Store, 2000. A history of the supreme court of the Philippines that includes an account of the Ericta scandal.

Paras, Corazon, and Ramon Ricardo Rogue. The Chief Justices of the Supreme Court of the Philippines. Pasig City, Philippines: Anvil, 2000. Short biographies of Philippine chief justices, with information as well on some associate justices of the supreme court.

Sevilla, Victor. Justices of the Supreme Court of the Philippines: Their Lives and Outstanding Decisions. 3 vols. Quezon City, Philippines: New Day, 1985. Much material on the prestigious chief justices of the supreme court, including Enrique Fernando.

SEE ALSO: Jan. 13, 1913: Federal Judge Is Impeached for Profiting from His Office; May 9, 1969: Supreme Court Justice Abe Fortas Is Accused of Bribery; Aug. 21, 1983: Filipino Opposition Leader Aquino Is Assassinated on Return Home.

July 20, 1982

CONSERVATIVE POLITICIAN JOHN G. SCHMITZ IS FOUND TO HAVE CHILDREN OUT OF WEDLOCK

News media reported that ultraconservative California politician John G. Schmitz had fathered two children outside his marriage. His lover, Carla Stuckle, revealed his paternity after she was charged with child neglect. The revelation led to Schmitz's downfall in politics.

LOCALE: Orange County, California

CATEGORIES: Public morals; families and children; government; politics; sex

KEY FIGURES

John G. Schmitz (1930-2001), California state senator, 1964-1970 and 1978-1982, and U.S. representative, 1970-1973

Carla Stuckle (d. 1994), Republican campaign volunteer

SUMMARY OF EVENT

John G. Schmitz was a college instructor, California state senator, U.S. representative, and 1972 Republican presidential candidate who had outspoken views on family values, abortion, immigration, welfare, desegregation, homosexuality, and other controversial topics, branding him an ultraconservative politician. Consequently, the discovery in 1982 of his lengthy extramarital affair with former student and longtime Republican campaign volunteer Carla Stuckle, with whom he had two children, exposed Schmitz as a hypocrite and effectively ended his political career. Stuckle shocked the nation by naming Schmitz as the father of both children. His paternity became headline news on July 20. What ensued was a media frenzy and a political spiral downward for Schmitz.

A devout Roman Catholic of German descent, Schmitz was born in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, and graduated from Marquette University in 1952. He became a second lieutenant and pilot in the U.S. Marine Corps and eventually was stationed in El Toro, California. Schmitz became a local celebrity when he interrupted an assault on a woman with his stern voice and not a weapon. Schmitz's political career was set in motion after his heroics became front-page news.

Schmitz left the Marine Corps in 1960 and settled in Orange County, California—known for its relative wealth and conservative views—with his wife, Mary Suehr Schmitz. The couple raised a family of seven children and emphasized traditional family values. Schmitz joined the Marine Reserves and became a colonel. He also taught philosophy and political science at Santa Ana College, where he met Stuckle, a student who had emigrated from Germany. Eventually, Schmitz and Stuckle would have a secret nine-year affair and two children.

In the meantime, Schmitz became known for his outspoken and fiercely conservative views. While many Orange County residents found his anti-feminist, anti-Semitic, antigay, segregationist overtones offensive, he earned favor with a few wealthy Republicans, who supported his election to the California state senate in 1963 (he served from 1964 to 1970). After receiving several awards as Legislator of the Year from the Republican Assembly, he was elected by his district to replace U.S. Representative James Utt, who died suddenly, close to the end of his term in 1970. A few months later, Schmitz was elected to a full term in the U.S. Congress, where he continued with his critical—and often witty—comments. No one was spared, including the seated Republican president, Richard Nixon, who also was from Orange County. Schmitz accused Nixon of being too liberal. After Nixon left for what would be a monumental trip to communist China, Schmitz quipped, “I have no objection to President Nixon going to China. I just object to his coming back.” Subsequently, Schmitz was abandoned by many of his constituents, and he lost his bid for reelection to Congress in the 1972 Republican primary.

Schmitz immediately bounced back by securing the 1972 presidential candidacy of the American Independent Party, the party to which he switched. An extremely conservative group, its first presidential choice was George Wallace, Alabama's former governor who vehemently opposed desegregation and was shot just weeks before the nominating convention. Schmitz lost the election, returned to California, and resumed teaching at Santa Ana College. Schmitz also had introduced the Human Life Amendment months before the landmark Roe v. Wade (1973) decision by the U.S. Supreme Court, wrote the book Stranger in the Arena: The Anatomy of an Amoral Decade, 1964-1974 (1974), and was a popular speaker at conservative events. Just weeks before his presidential nomination, Schmitz spoke at a God, Family, and Country rally for the Fourth of July. He regained his California senate seat in 1978, where he remained until his sex scandal became front-page news.

In July, 1982, Stuckle took her thirteen-month-old son, John George, to Children's Hospital of Orange County, complaining of an injury to his genitals. Doctors discovered a hair strand so tightly wrapped around the boy's penis that it was nearly severed. Surgery was required to remove the hair. Suspecting abuse, child protective services would not allow Stuckle to take the boy home. Investigators visiting Stuckle later discovered Eugenie, Stuckle's three-week-old infant girl. The boy was placed in protective custody on July 19, despite appeals by Schmitz in court, and Stuckle was arrested and spent one night in jail on felony child-neglect charges. Schmitz had told the court a few days earlier that he was the father of the children.

Although out-of-wedlock births and extramarital affairs were not uncommon during the 1980's, the revelation that Schmitz had two children out of wedlock reached scandalous proportions because of his reputation as a crusader for traditional family values. He was on the national council of the John Birch Society, an ultraconservative political group whose membership at one point included white supremacist Tom Metzger. Schmitz's sharp tongue was too extreme even for this group, and he was relieved of his national council seat in 1982. His expulsion followed an abortion-rights debate in the state senate, after which an aide to Schmitz issued a press release that said Gloria Allred, a feminist attorney, was a "slick butch lawyeress." The press release, titled "Attack of the Bull Dykes," also described Allred's supporters as "a sea of hard, Jewish and (arguably) female faces." Schmitz did not deny his aide's claim that the release was approved by Schmitz himself. Allred sued Schmitz for libel and won.

Following the discovery of this second family, the Schmitz family went into hiding and Schmitz did not reappear until the senate reconvened on August 2 after its summer recess. He refused to comment on his paternity or extramarital affair. However, during the court proceedings against Stuckle for child neglect, Schmitz—through his attorney—confirmed he fathered Stuckle's two children. The charges against Stuckle were dismissed for insufficient evidence on August 24. On the same day as the dismissal, the state senate passed a resolution honoring Schmitz—as he was retiring from the senate and such ceremony was customary. Even so, some senators signed a letter of protest.

In September, Stuckle declared personal bankruptcy, and one month later her attorney confirmed that Schmitz agreed to pay child support. A year later, in a Los Angeles Times interview (October 9, 1983), Stuckle said she still loved Schmitz and had no regrets regarding their relationship, even though the scandal ended their affair. She also indicated Schmitz had limited contact with the children. When she died in 1994 from complications related to diabetes, psychic Jeanne Dixon, a close friend of Mary Schmitz, took custody of the children. Unfortunately, Dixon died three years later, and the children were placed in a group home.

IMPACT

Given his increasingly offensive comments, as well as Orange County redistricting, Schmitz's political future was already questionable in 1982. However, it was the sex scandal that effectively ended his political career. Attempting a revival in 1984, Schmitz ran for reelection to Congress but decisively lost in the primary. Moreover, the repercussions did not stop there. His wife, Mary, was a conservative commentator on the political talk show Speak Out. Not long after she defended family values on air, her husband's indiscretions were revealed, and she left the show. The couple remained married until Schmitz's death in 2001.

After Schmitz left the political arena, he continued to teach at Santa Ana College until he retired in 1990. In 1995, he moved to Virginia and became a vineyard owner. His oldest daughter, Mary Kay Letourneau, was found guilty in 1997 of statutory rape of a thirteen-year-old boy. At the time the sexual relationship began with sixth grader Vili Fualaau, Letourneau was married, had young children, and was a schoolteacher in Washington State. Even though she went to prison, Letourneau and Fualaau eventually had two children of their own and married after she was divorced from her first husband. The media and public quickly compared Letourneau's behavior to that of her father: an extramarital sexual relationship with her student who was an immigrant mirrored her father's earlier behavior. As in his own case, Schmitz refused to comment on his daughter's sex scandal.

Another family scandal occurred in September, 2005, when Schmitz's conservative son, Joseph E. Schmitz, resigned his position as George W. Bush's Defense Department inspector general and accepted a job with Blackwater, a defense contractor with a major security role in Iraq. However, Joseph's departure occurred during accusations of unethical behavior related to his role as inspector general, including expense-account irregularities and interference with investigations of senior Bush officials. While Joseph denied any wrongdoing, the public—once again—compared the “sins of the father” to those of the children.

Response to the Schmitz family scandals suggests the public expects private morals to be consistent with the publicly stated values and behavior of certain public figures, especially politicians but also, as in the case of Letourneau, teachers. As holders of the public trust, credibility and integrity remain paramount values. The public's message seems clear: Do as I say—not as I do—is unacceptable.

—Felicia Friendly Thomas

FURTHER READING

Haldane, D., and J. Pasco. “Fiery O.C. Ultraconservative Schmitz Dies.” Los Angeles Times, January 11, 2001. This obituary of Schmitz is a good summary of his political career and the scandals that rocked his family. Includes infamous quotations by Schmitz.

Koplinski, Brad. Hats in the Ring: Conversations with Presidential Candidates—John Schmitz. North Bethesda, Md.: Presidential Publishing, 2000. Verbatim question-and-answer interview. Schmitz discusses his presidential candidacy and his career. Includes comments about Nixon, Ronald Reagan, Wallace, and the Supreme Court case Roe v. Wade.

Schmitz, John G. Stranger in the Arena: The Anatomy of an Amoral Decade, 1964-1974. Santa Ana, Calif.: Rayline, 1974. Schmitz candidly discusses his political views, especially on the issue of the right to life, or antiabortion.

Steinbacher, J. John Schmitz and the American Party. Fullerton, Calif.: Educator's, 1972. Outlines the history of the American Independent Party and Schmitz's involvement during the height of his political career.

SEE ALSO: Oct. 7, 1974: Congressman Wilbur D. Mills's Stripper Affair Leads to His Downfall; Oct. 25, 1974: Evangelist Billy James Hargis Resigns College Presidency During Gay-Sex Scandal; Sept., 1976: Jimmy Carter Admits Committing Adultery in His Heart; Sept. 3, 1980: Congressman Bauman Is Arrested for Liaison with Teenage Boy; July 20, 1983: Congress Members Censured in House-Page Sex Scandal; Feb. 21, 1988: Evangelist Jimmy Swaggart Tearfully Confesses His Adultery; Feb. 26, 1997: Teacher Mary Kay Letourneau Is Arrested for Statutory Rape; Apr. 30, 2001: Washington Intern Chandra Levy Disappears; Oct. 2, 2003: Newspaper Claims That Arnold Schwarzenegger Groped Women; Dec. 17, 2003: Senator Strom Thurmond's Biracial Daughter Is Revealed; Dec. 6, 2005: Spokane, Washington, Mayor Recalled in Gay-Sex Scandal; July 9, 2007: Senator David Vitter's Name Is Found in D.C. Madam's Address Book.

August 6, 1982BANCO AMBROSIANO COLLAPSES AMID CRIMINAL ACCUSATIONS

The collapse of Banco Ambrosiano was the first large bank failure since World War II. The collapse sent shock waves through world finance and led to a series of international bank crises and collapses. The criminal activities of bank officials, the shootings and suicides of persons involved in the crimes, and the large sums of Vatican and Mafia funds involved in the bank's dealings have kept the scandal alive into the twenty-first century.

LOCALES: Milan and Vatican City, ItalyCATEGORIES: Banking and finance; corruption; business; organized crime and racketeering; law and the courts; murder and suicideKEY FIGURES

Roberto Calvi (1920-1982), Milanese banker, chairman of Banco Ambrosiano

Paul Marcinkus (1922-2006), American Roman Catholic archbishop, president of the Vatican Bank, 1971-1989

Michele Sindona (1920-1986), Sicilian banker for the Vatican and the Mafia

John Paul II (Karol Jozef Wojtyla; 1920-2005), Roman Catholic pope, 1978-2005

Paul VI (Giovanni Battista Montini; 1897-1978), Roman Catholic pope, 1963-1978

John Paul I (Albino Luciani; 1912-1978), Roman Catholic pope, August 26-September 28, 1978

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Pope Paul VI appointed Archbishop Paul Marcinkus, an American, to head the Vatican Bank in 1971—a strange appointment, given Marcinkus's lack of banking experience. Marcinkus had served as a translator in the last months of Pope John XXIII's pontificate and then as translator and de facto bodyguard outside the Vatican for Paul VI. Possibly failing mentally, it seems that Paul VI appointed the tall and imposing archbishop for preventing an assassination attempt on the pope's life during a visit to the Philippines.

Marcinkus accepted Roberto Calvi as the Vatican's Italian banker on the recommendation of Sicilian banker Michele Sindona, who had been a successful moneymaker for the Vatican but was now moving his criminal operations to the United States for financial dealings with the Mafia. Because of Sindona's successful work for Marcinkus, Calvi was appointed chairman of the private Banco Ambrosiano.

Milan remains the financial capital of not only Italy but also Europe. Sindona was a fast, loose, and inventive banker. Partly owing to his knowledge of English and the profiteering he engaged in with American goods and Mafia collusion after the allied invasion of Sicily, he had been able to move his operations north to Milan. It was there that Sindona and Calvi entered into a banking relationship and, over time, found that they were of similar mind about transactions that skirted the edge of legitimacy or were illegal.

Sindona had already established an offshore bank in Panama that laundered Mafia narcotics-trafficking money. On the basis of Sindona's Panama model, Calvi opened at least one dozen of his own overseas banks in the Caribbean and Central and South America. These banks served as postbox banks for the conversion of Italian lira into U.S. dollars. Italian millionaires deposited lira in the Banco Ambrosiano. Calvi, in turn, deposited those funds into the Vatican Bank. From this bank, the Italian currency would be exported to Calvi's offshore banks. Calvi could export the money because the Vatican, as a sovereign state, is not subject to Italian laws that restricted—then outlawed—the export of Italian capital.

After commission payments for the laundering and conversion, the offshore banks would forward the proceeds to haven banks in Luxembourg, Lichtenstein, and Switzerland to finance political and other operations requiring payment in hard currency. Some of these operations included the following: On order of Pope John Paul II, the sole head of the Vatican Bank, millions of lira were funneled into Poland to support that country's anticommunist solidarity movement. Also, Calvi leveraged takeovers of northern Italian private banks by spreading deposits of large amounts coming into Italy and thereby hindering detection of those takeovers. These banks included the legitimate Catholic bank in the Veneto, managed by Cardinal Albino Luciani, patriarch of Venice. Calvi's actions so outraged the cardinal that, after becoming Pope John Paul I, he made no secret that he would discharge Marcinkus—as head of the Vatican Bank—for complicity in Calvi's hostile takeover of "his" bank, among other Calvi sins.

Further operations included Calvi's purchase of 40 percent of the large Rizzoli publishing concern that also owned Corriere della Sera, the Italian equivalent of The New York Times. Corriere della Sera became an organ of propaganda for the secret Masonic lodge Propaganda Due, or P-2. The lodge was eventually unmasked and found to be a virtual state within a state, whose members included Vatican officials, politicians, government officials, military and intelligence officers, and Mafia figures who allegedly had been plotting a right-wing coup d'état to prevent a feared shift of Italian government to the left. Calvi was found to be a P-2 member as well.

Given that Calvi was dispensing enormous sums of money, the director of the Bank of Italy ordered an investigation into his personal and bank activities. Calvi's problems were exacerbated by shootings (by the Mafia, as informers later revealed) of a journalist who continued to expose the Ambrosiano story, of a former Ambrosiano officer who knew secrets, and of a current Ambrosiano officer who had been pressuring Calvi to account for his actions. Calvi's secretary died either after jumping or being pushed—likely by a mafioso—from the top floor of the Ambrosiano bank building.

Calvi was arrested, charged, tried, and sentenced to four-and-one-half years in prison, where he made a feeble attempt at suicide. Provisionally released to appeal his sentence, Calvi vowed that he would never return to prison. Against the conditions of his release (which included turning over his passport and remaining in Italy), Calvi was flown out of Italy by a Mafia consigliere (adviser) on a private jet to a private airport in England. Imprudently, Calvi revealed that he was carrying documents that would incriminate many of his high-standing clients. He was taken to a prearranged London residential hotel. The next day, June 18, 1982, he was found hanging from London's Blackfriars Bridge. Calvi's wife left Milan for Nassau in the Bahamas with her daughter and son. The three remained there for some time as permanent residents, likely living on funds earmarked for them. Calvi's son became a banker in Montreal, Canada.

Banco Ambrosiano chair Roberto Calvi, right, is escorted into a courtroom in Milan, Italy, at the start of his trial for banking-related crimes in May, 1981. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

In the immediate aftermath of Calvi's murder, Banco Ambrosiano collapsed, unable to raise the money to cover the indebtedness Calvi had created. On August 6, the bank was declared insolvent and it went into receivership. More than $1 billion in losses were never accounted for. The Vatican, to repair its deeply damaged image, pledged to repay the millions lost by Ambrosiano's individual stockholders but did so without admitting culpability in the scandal.

One decade after Calvi's murder and after two exhumations, his death was ruled a homicide. It is believed that a mafioso, specialized in strangulation, murdered him before hanging him from Blackfriars Bridge.

IMPACT

In 1989, after the collapse of the Soviet Union, John Paul II removed Marcinkus, who was under subpoena by the Italian police, as director of the Vatican Bank. The directorship was assigned to a committee of two ecclesiastical and two secular members. Marcinkus spent his years waiting to return to the United States within Vatican City. He had been granted Vatican citizenship and thereby avoided arrest. Until his death—having failed to attain the cardinalship he so ardently wanted—Marcinkus served as a country-club priest in Sun City, near Phoenix, Arizona. Banco Ambrosiano, with the help of the Bank of Italy and the Vatican, was reformed and resumed the banking business.

In the wake of Ambrosiano's collapse, which led to the collapse of Franklin National Trust of New York, the Bank of Italy mandated several new rules, including that Italian banks maintain, regularly disclose, and prove the availability of a minimum percentage of capital, based on their respective size. At the international level, the collapse of Ambrosiano moved a number of banks to examine their practices as well and to develop stringent rules of operation.

—Robert B. Youngblood

FURTHER READING

Cornwell, Rupert. God's Banker: The Life and Death of Roberto Calvi. London: Unwin, 1984.

This work remains an excellent, detailed account of the Banco Ambrosiano-Calvi scandal.

Hammer, Richard. The Vatican Connection. New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1982. Forensic investigation of the Sindona years as Mafia and Vatican banker to the collapse of Banco Ambrosiano. Valuable background information.

Jones, Tobias. The Dark Heart of Italy. New York: North Point Press, 2004. The Ambrosiano-Calvi scandal is discussed in a chapter on Catholicism among individuals and the Vatican's mandates on practicing Catholicism.

Raw, Charles. The Moneychangers: How the Vatican Bank Enabled Roberto Calvi to Steal Two Hundred Fifty Million for the Heads of the P2 Masonic Lodge. London: Harvill, 1992. A comprehensive study of the Ambrosiano-Calvi scandal that details virtually every known transaction in the case.

Willan, Philip. The Last Supper: The Mafia, the Masons, and the Killing of Roberto Calvi. London: Robinson, 2007. Argues that Calvi's murder and the Banco Ambrosiano scandal were played out on the stage of the Cold War, with its dueling fears of democracy and communism, and in the context of a hunger for power and wealth.

Williams, Paul L. The Vatican Exposed: Money, Murder, and the Mafia. Amherst, N.Y.: Prometheus Books, 2003. Historical account of the formation of the Vatican Bank, Calvi's selection as its banker, and the resulting scandal.

Youngblood, Robert B. "Roberto Calvi." In Great Lives from History: Notorious Lives, edited by Carl L. Bankston III. Vol. 1. Pasadena, Calif.: Salem Press, 2007. An introductory article on Calvi's life and death.

SEE ALSO: Nov., 1929: Banque Oustric et Cie Failure Prompts French Inquiry; Feb. 3, 1975: Honduras's "Bananagate" Bribery Scandal Leads to Executive's Suicide; May 23, 1981: Italian Justice Minister Resigns Because of Crime Connection; Sept. 10, 1981: Chicago Sun-Times Reports That Cardinal Cody Diverted Church Funds; Nov. 3, 1996: Car Crash Reveals Depth of Government Corruption in Turkey; June 25, 1997: Swiss Banks Admit to Holding Accounts of Holocaust Victims; 2001: Clearstream Financial Clearinghouse Is Accused of Fraud and Money Laundering; Dec. 2, 2001: Enron Bankruptcy Reveals Massive Financial Fraud; Sept. 20, 2008: American Financial Markets Begin to Collapse.

October 19, 1982

CAR MANUFACTURER JOHN DE LOREAN IS ARRESTED IN A DRUG STING

Automobile manufacturer and engineer John De Lorean attempted to save his failing company by conspiring to sell drugs. He was arrested by the FBI in a case that generated widespread publicity and scandal. He was later acquitted on grounds of entrapment but his name is now synonymous with white-collar crime.

LOCALE: Los Angeles, California

CATEGORIES: Law and the courts; business; drugs; organized crime and racketeering

KEY FIGURES

John De Lorean (1925-2005), American automotive engineer and founder of De Lorean Motor Company

James Hoffman (fl. 1980's), former neighbor of De Lorean and FBI informant

Benedict Tisa (fl. 1980's), FBI agent

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Charismatic and well-known automotive manufacturer and engineer John De Lorean was arrested by the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) for conspiracy to distribute cocaine on October 19, 1982. His arrest made international headlines, as the timing coincided with the closing of the Northern Ireland plant for De Lorean Motor Cars Ltd., whose parent company was De Lorean Motor Company (DMC), based in Detroit, Michigan.

Founded in Detroit in 1975, DMC had gained international publicity with the introduction of the DMC-12 sports car, which was manufactured in Northern Ireland, in 1981. However, delays in building the cars, as well as flaws in design and manufacturing, led to sales well below the projections needed to make a profit. The DMC-12 ended its production run in late 1982, with about nine thousand sold. By the time DMC had entered into receivership and bankruptcy, De Lorean was seeking ways to recapitalize his business so that he could continue production and develop more cars.

The story of how and why De Lorean, who also gained fame as the creator of the Pontiac GTO "muscle car" during the early 1960's, became involved in the drug-dealing conspiracy remains a two-version tale. The FBI claimed that De Lorean played an active role in the conspiracy to bring 220 pounds of cocaine (worth tens of millions of U.S. dollars) into the United States. FBI tape transcripts indicate that De Lorean did indeed participate in several meetings, in which he demonstrated a willingness to pay a $1.8 million commission for a transaction.

De Lorean, however, claimed that he never intended to participate in an illicit drug deal. Instead, he was looking for investors in his struggling car company. His willingness to seek creative and unconventional financing methods was a product of his inability to gain more bank financing. After being contacted by James Hoffman, the father of one of his son's friends in Pauma Valley, California, De

John De Lorean and his wife, Cristina Ferrare, outside court in November, 1982. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Lorean listened to a deal that would possibly recapitalize his company.

In reality, Hoffman was a federal law-enforcement informant with a history of drug-trafficking convictions. On July 11, 1982, De Lorean met Hoffman at the Marriot Hotel in Newport Beach, California. Hoffman described a plan in which De Lorean would pay Hoffman a $1.5 million brokerage fee plus $300,000 in expenses to provide financing for De Lorean's company. Soon after the meeting, however, De Lorean realized that his money would be used for the purchase of cocaine and that the proceeds from the sale would be laundered through a bank account that De Lorean was to set up through Eureka Federal Savings and Loan in San Carlos, California. Little evidence indicates that De Lorean came up with the complex plan to buy the drugs and launder the money, but numerous federal law-enforcement tapes indicate that he willingly took part in the discussions to participate in the plan.

Discussions about the deal continued, though De Lorean would later claim that he participated in these later discussions because Hoffman had threatened the lives of his children and not, as was alleged by federal authorities, to commit a crime. Regardless, he had flown to Washington, D.C., on September

4 to meet with Hoffman at the L'Enfant Plaza Hotel.

Through various meetings and contacts, De Lorean was introduced to banker James Benedict, the person who would see that the financing on the deal was handled appropriately. (Benedict was undercover FBI agent Benedict Tisa.) Around this time as well, De Lorean was reacquainted with William Morgan Hetrick, a pilot and aviation company owner with a history of drug-running who also was being set up in the FBI sting. On September 20, De Lorean, Hetrick, and Benedict met at the Bel Air Sands Hotel in Los Angeles. FBI tapes yielded incriminating statements made by De Lorean and Hetrick, showing they clearly knew they were involved in a illegal drug transaction. However, De Lorean could not get the $1.8 million in cash needed to complete the deal.

As his company continued to face significant losses and could not pay creditors and suppliers, De Lorean decided that his only contribution to the deal would be DMC stock. This option was made clear by De Lorean at a September 28 meeting, also in Los Angeles, with drug dealer John Vicenza (undercover Drug Enforcement Agency agent John Valestra). De Lorean later noted in a postarrest interview that the stock he offered was worthless.

De Lorean claimed after his arrest that his participation in the deal continued only through the threats of harm to his family and the constant pushing of Benedict. The sting operation was so complex that a real banker volunteered to play a role in affirming the legitimacy of Benedict as a banker with whom De Lorean should deal.

On October 19, De Lorean entered room 501 of the Sheraton Plaza Hotel near Los Angeles International Airport. He saw the cocaine, said it looked "good as gold," and was arrested by Benedict and Vicenza. The two, along with Hoffman, were with De Lorean in the hotel room.

After putting up as collateral his New York apartment, New Jersey estate, and Pauma Valley home, De Lorean was released on $250,000 bail. His trial, long and complex, began on April 18, 1984. The cross-examination of two witnesses for the prosecution, Benedict and Hoffman, greatly harmed the case against De Lorean, leading to his acquittal on all eight charges on August 16. Benedict testified that he continued with the deal even though he had known at the time that De Lorean did not have the $1.8 million to complete the transaction. This testimony led to charges by the defense that government agents had to put up the money to make De Lorean continue with the deal. Hoffman's admission during trial that he had demanded a share of the money seized in the deal led to suspicion about the truthfulness of his testimony. In the end, the jury determined that De Lorean had been entrapped by federal law enforcement, and he was freed.

IMPACT

De Lorean's arrest bridged high-profile crime such as drug dealing with the "lesser" acts of falsifying reports and bad-faith negotiations for the development of a car company. Although acquitted of criminal charges, he spent years defending himself from numerous lawsuits related to his failed company. He also faced numerous charges of tax evasion and fraud related to his operation of DMC.

De Lorean's name has been immortalized by the DMC-12 sports car that captivated the attention of automobile enthusiasts during the early 1980's. Still, even with the car's continuing legacy, the fact remains that the British government and investors, including celebrities Johnny Carson and Sammy Davis, Jr., lost approximately $250 million when the company failed. The British government had invested in DMC to help with high unemployment in Northern Ireland. Although these monetary losses mostly came from failed attempts to further develop DMC, De Lorean's arrest and trial affected the company as well. De Lorean would ask, even after his acquittal, "Would you buy a used car from me?"

The novelty of the DMC-12 and the public-relations campaign of his daring venture to build a car that challenged the powers of automobile manufacturers in Detroit made him a hero to many. Analysis of the drug deal indicates, however, that he simply wanted to single-handedly save his dream.

—John C. Kilburn, Jr.

FURTHER READING

Fallon, Ivan, and James Srodes. Dream Maker: The Rise and Fall of John Z. De Lorean. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1983. A detailed biography of De Lorean's rise as an automotive executive after founding De Lorean Motor Company. This book, published before De Lorean's criminal trial, contains few details about the cocaine-trafficking case.

Haddad, William. Hard Driving: My Years with John De Lorean. New York: Random House, 1985. Haddad spent fifteen years with De Lorean as a business associate and executive with the De Lorean Motor Company. Displays both admiration and contempt for the complex De Lorean.

Hakim, Danny. "John Z. De Lorean, Father of Glamour Car, Dies at 80." The New York Times, March 21, 2005. De Lorean's obituary. A brief account of his life and career, including some discussion of the scandal.

Latham, Aaron. "Anatomy of a Sting: John De Lorean Tells His Story." Rolling Stone, March 17, 1983. After his arrest but before his trial, De Lorean tells his version of the story in this magazine piece.

Levin, Hillel. Grand Delusions: The Cosmic Career of John De Lorean. New York: Viking Press, 1983. This biography chronicles De Lorean's early life, rapid rise in Detroit's automotive industry, and the development of De Lorean Motor Company. De Lorean is characterized as both brilliant and vain, with a keen sense for public relations and a willingness to do anything to succeed.

SEE ALSO: Mar. 29, 1962: Billie Sol Estes Is Arrested for Corporate Fraud; Feb. 4, 1976: Lockheed Is Implicated in Bribing Foreign Officials; Feb. 2, 1980: Media Uncover FBI Sting Implicating Dozens of Lawmakers; May 29,

1981: Court Finds That Ford Ignored Pinto's Safety Problems; May 2, 1984: E. F. Hutton Executives Plead Guilty to Fraud; Jan. 15, 1988: ZZZZ Best Founder Is Indicted on Federal Fraud Charges; Mar. 29, 1989: Financier Michael Milken Is Indicted for Racketeering and Fraud; Apr. 15, 1992: Hotel Tycoon Leona Helmsley Enters Prison for Tax Evasion; Dec. 23, 1998: Prominent Belgians Are Sentenced in Agusta-Dassault Corruption Scandal.

December, 1982

JULIE ANDREWS AND BLAKE EDWARDS DENY BEING GAY

Singer-actor Julie Andrews, along with her husband, Blake Edwards, denied claims that she was lesbian and that he was gay in an interview with Playboy magazine. Edwards, a filmmaker, was long rumored to be gay or bisexual.

LOCALE: Beverly Hills, California

CATEGORIES: Publishing and journalism; sex

KEY FIGURES

Julie Andrews (b. 1935), British singer and film star

Blake Edwards (b. 1922), American screenwriter and film director and producer

Lawrence Linderman (fl. 1980's), journalist

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Julie Andrews and Blake Edwards married in 1969, when both were well known in the entertainment world. Andrews was best known for her sweet, classic governess roles in films such as Mary Poppins (1964) and The Sound of Music (1965), as well as the spectacular vocal talents that made her a child star in England during the 1940's and a Broadway smash during the 1950's and 1960's. She skyrocketed to fame when she appeared on stage in such shows as My Fair Lady (1956), Camelot (1960), and The Boy Friend (1954), for which she earned critical acclaim.

Edwards was best known for writing and directing The Pink Panther (1963), starring Peter Sellers, and its sequels. Edwards also wrote and directed A Shot in the Dark (1964), This Happy Feeling (1958), and 10 (1979). He directed Operation Petti- coat (1959), starring Cary Grant, and Breakfast at Tiffany's (1961), starring Audrey Hepburn, and created two popular private-eye series for television.

From the mid- to late 1960's, following this period of immense achievement, both Andrews and Edwards experienced a series of professional failures, including their mutual film project Darling Lili (1969). Around the same time, both were having marital troubles. They began to see each other after their marriages ended. The couple's individual successes had made them celebrities in their own right, but together, Andrews and Edwards were subjected to closer scrutiny. They continued doing film projects together, but projects that were very different from those for which they were known.

In particular, Andrews broke out of her wholesome governess image by baring her breasts in the film S.O.B. (1981) and portraying a cross-dresser in Victor/Victoria (1982). The couple's enthusiasm for these projects, which had homosexuality as themes, renewed rumors about their own sexuality. Edwards, long assumed to be gay (and not out about his sexuality), had recently directed several other films with gay themes or subtexts, in addition to the more explicitly gay Victor/Victoria. Andrews, as a Broadway and film star and vocal diva, was already well on her way to becoming an icon of gays and lesbians. The existing rumors about Edwards grew to include Andrews as well.

In 1982, journalist Lawrence Linderman sat down with Andrews and Edwards in Beverly Hills, California, on assignment for Playboy magazine. (Each issue of the magazine includes an interview with a celebrity or a celebrity group or couple.)

Linderman met with the couple several times to prepare for the interview, which was recorded on tape. Linderman began the interview by asking about events surrounding the couple's first meeting. They discussed their mutual film projects and analyzed the challenges of creating an image for Andrews that would go beyond her classic, memorable roles in Mary Poppins and The Sound of Music.

During the interview, the conversation came to Edwards's later films and how the public reacted to their gay-related themes. Linderman asked Edwards to discuss Victor/Victoria and whether Edwards was dealing with his own sexuality through the film's message. Edwards acknowledged both the theme and the idea of dealing with his own sexuality, saying he believed that everyone must go through such examinations. Edwards spoke of dealing with his fears about being gay for his own peace of mind. Linderman then asked Edwards if he thought people who watched the film would assume Edwards was implying that he was gay. Edwards accepted that audiences might make that assumption, adding that he had begun exploring sexuality in more subtle ways in other films, such as 10 and S.O.B., and that part of his goal was to get people to react to the issue.

Andrews suggested that Edwards's style of dealing with serious and complicated issues such as the social acceptance of homosexuality was to use humor and lighthearted moments to capture truth. Linderman pressed the point by asking if Edwards was worried about the rumors that these films meant he was coming out of the closet. Edwards answered that it would not bother him if people thought he was coming out as gay. He talked about undergoing psychoanalysis, which had helped him deal with his sexuality, and about his concerns about being gay. However, he then said he was relieved to learn, through analysis, that he was heterosexual, despite having had homosexual fantasies and engaging in some childhood experimentation with other boys.

Andrews, too, spoke of being relieved after going through a similar process of analysis, asserting that most people have homoerotic feelings and that having them is a normal part of life, even for heterosexuals. She supported Edwards in his desire to use his films to talk about homosexuality and suggested that he wanted to address other social issues as well, such as race. Edwards added that it was important that he champion gay rights and be supportive of gay friends who struggled to come out of the closet. Seemingly satisfied with the couple's explicit responses to the rumors of homosexuality, Linderman redirected the conversation. For the remainder of the interview, topics focused on other projects in which the two were working.

IMPACT

The manner in which Andrews and Edwards denied their homosexuality did more to fan the flames of public rumors than it did to squelch them. Though it was common for celebrities to publicly deny rumors of homosexuality, it was rare for such a denial to include mention of past homosexual experiences, fantasies, and exploration, or to have acknowledged having questioned their own sexuality. The controversy of a straight Hollywood couple speaking so openly about having had homosexual desires and experiences shocked readers of the interview. Playboy's target audience is traditionally heterosexual and male, a demographic that—particularly during the early 1980's, the early days of the HIV-AIDS crisis—tends to openly shun homosexuality.

Blake Edwards and Julie Andrews in 1979. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

Andrews and Edwards openly supported homosexuality and made clear their belief that people should confront their feelings about sexuality. This perspective injected some new life into the public debate. Their support, however, did little to prove to skeptics that they were truly heterosexual, fueling further claims that their attempt to justify homosexual affinity was more of a denial than an acceptance. Despite the ensuing controversy, the Andrews and Edwards interview was a success.

—Kekla Magoon

FURTHER READING

Andrews, Julie. Home: A Memoir of My Early Years. New York: Hyperion Books, 2008. An autobiography in which Andrews discusses intimate life details and memories from the time before she was a star.

Lehman, Peter, and William Luhr. "What Business Does a Critic Have Asking if Blake Edwards Is Gay? Rumor, Scandal, Biography, and Textual Analysis." In Headline Hollywood: A Century of Film Scandal, edited by Adrienne L. McLean and David A. Cook. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 2001. Part of the Communications, Media, and Culture series, Lehman and Luhr analyze the intersection of controversial reportage and biography.

Linderman, Lawrence. "Playboy Interview: Julie Andrews and Blake Edwards." Playboy, December, 1982. The candid interview in which Julie Andrews and Blake Edwards discuss their career, films, and marriage, and publicly deny rumors of their homosexuality.

Stirling, Richard. Julie Andrews: An Intimate Biography. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2008. A biography of Andrews exploring both the well-known and untold aspects of her public and private life. Includes some discussion of sex and sexuality.

Wolf, Stacy. A Problem Like Maria: Gender and Sexuality in the American Musical. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 2002. A unique look at musical theater in the United States and the women, including Andrews, who reinterpreted gender roles and sexuality in their performances. Explores, for example, the "delicious queerness" of Andrews's role as a "troublesome" nun in The Sound of Music.

SEE ALSO: 1927: Mae West's Play About Gays Is Banned on Broadway; Dec. 1, 1952: George Jorgensen Becomes Christine Jorgensen; Oct. 7, 1964: President Lyndon B. Johnson's Aide Is Arrested in Gay-Sex Sting; 1970: Study of Anonymous Gay Sex Leads to Ethics Scandal; Jan., 1977: Singer Anita Bryant Campaigns Against Lesbian and Gay Rights; July 28, 1980: Magazine Reveals Baseball Star Steve Garvey's Marital Problems; Sept. 3, 1980: Congressman Bauman Is Arrested for Liaison with Teenage Boy; Dec. 7, 1980: Rita Jenrette's "Diary of a Mad Congresswife" Scandalizes Washington; July 23, 1984: Vanessa Williams Is the First Miss America to Resign; Apr. 7, 1998: Pop Singer George Michael Is Arrested for Lewd Conduct; Sept. 19, 2000: Ex-gay Leader John Paulk Is Photographed Leaving a Gay Bar; Sept. 17, 2006: New Zealand Prime Minister's Husband Is "Outed" as Gay; Nov. 2, 2006: Male Escort Reveals Sexual Liaisons with Evangelist Ted Haggard.

December 16, 1982

CONGRESS CITES ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION AGENCY CHIEF FOR CONTEMPT

Anne Gorsuch, director of the Environmental Protection Agency, was cited for contempt of Congress after refusing to release documents for an inquiry into the Superfund, the federal toxic-waste cleanup program. She and twenty top aides, including Rita Lavelle, assistant EPA administrator, were either fired or forced to resign from the EPA.

LOCALE: Washington, D.C.

CATEGORIES: Government; corruption; environmental issues; business; politics

KEY FIGURES

Anne Gorsuch (1942-2004), director of the Environmental Protection Agency, 1981-1982
Rita Lavelle (b. 1947), assistant administrator of the EPA

John Dingell (b. 1926), U.S. representative from Michigan, 1955-

William Ruckelshaus (b. 1932), interim director of the EPA, 1983-1985

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Ann Gorsuch was appointed on May 20, 1981, to the position of administrator of the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency (EPA), the first woman to head the agency. She had served in the Colorado legislature for two terms and was a district attorney in Denver, but she had no experience managing large organizations nor any background in environmental work. In the legislature, she had been a member of a group that advocated states' rights and opposed federal environmental and energy policies.

Gorsuch was appointed the head of the EPA by President Ronald Reagan, who directed the new appointee to weaken the EPA's ability to oversee industry. The EPA had been created during the 1970's to consolidate government offices responsible for protecting public health and safeguarding the environment. Many members of the U.S. Congress opposed the agenda set by Gorsuch, and she was soon dogged with charges that she was planning to cut the agency's budget by 40 percent. When she suspended a regulatory ban on the disposal of toxic waste in containers in landfills, Congress members considered the suspension a gross miscalculation. Gorsuch enacted a new ban after eighteen days of strong media scrutiny and discussion. Similarly, she devoted time to trying to phase out federal clean-air regulations, an effort thwarted by Congress.

An advocate of budgetary cuts and regulatory reform, Gorsuch did manage to drop the EPA's budget by $200 million and cut its staff by 23 percent, firing over one thousand people. She scattered the staff responsible for enforcement of EPA regulations among other programs, removing the EPA's ability to keep pollution in check.

While Gorsuch treated other EPA officials with aloofness, industry representatives found her door always open to them. When a proposal surfaced to phase out lead as an additive to gasoline, scientists and representatives from Ethyl Corporation, a company that manufactures fuel additives, met with her to express concerns that requiring a drop in lead levels would result in the closing of refineries and increased wear on automobile engines while not doing much to improve public health. Gorsuch finished the hearing by allegedly winking when asked if she had any plans to actually enforce the regulations.

This type of behavior by Gorsuch, signaling her complicity with industry, led to questions about her use of agency funds. In the summer of 1982, Representative John Dingell, a Democrat from Michigan, began an inquiry into reports that the EPA was being run through "political manipulation . . . interwoven with absurd incompetence." Dingell's inquiry was focused primarily on Rita Lavelle, a political appointee and EPA associate administrator in charge of the program formed by the Comprehensive Environmental Response Compensation and Liability Act of 1980 (better known as Superfund).

Superfund was formed to address chemical poisons in the environment. It was based on an EPA survey that had identified more than 250 hazardous-waste sites involving damages or significant threat of damages, and it was the only EPA program whose budget was untouched by Gorsuch. Under her leadership, the EPA announced national guidelines for cleaning up abandoned hazardous-waste sites and set up a $1.6 billion trust fund over five years, financed by taxes on the manufacture of some toxic chemicals and general revenues appropriated by Congress. The EPA also passed a rule requiring that schools test for asbestos in their buildings.

Lavelle had numerous corporate ties to chemical and aerospace companies. She had failed to cooperate with Dingell's investigation, which was looking into the misuse of Superfund monies for political purposes and irregularities at a major perchlorate toxic waste site, the Stringfellow Acid Pits in Riverside, California. (Perchlorate, an oxidizer used in rocket fuel, affects the human thyroid gland.) Dingell's investigation also uncovered secret meetings with the Monsanto Company and other corporations that dealt with regulatory matters. Monsanto, a leading manufacturer of herbicides and other chemicals, had actively worked to mask the dangers of polychlorinated biphenyls, or PCBs, by funding nonexistent public-interest groups to defend its interests and publicizing statements such as that made by a Monsanto toxicologist. He had declared that "There has never been a single documented case in this country where PCBs have been shown to cause cancer or any other serious human health problems." He went on to compare PCBs to ordinary table salt.

In September, Dingell requested EPA documents on Superfund sites but the agency withheld the documents on the advice of the Justice Department. Dingell then subpoenaed Gorsuch to appear before investigators with the requested documents; she refused. After a second attempt to subpoena her,

President Reagan intervened on November 30 and told her not to comply with the request. On December 16, the U.S. House of Representatives voted 259-105 in favor of a contempt of Congress citation against Gorsuch, but the Justice Department, also led by Reagan appointees, refused to prosecute.

In early 1983, the House voted 413-0 in favor of a contempt of Congress citation against Lavelle for refusing to appear before a House investigatory committee. She was fired by Reagan, was later acquitted of the contempt charge, and was convicted of perjury in a separate trial on December 1. She served three months of a six-month sentence.

On March 9, 1983, Gorsuch resigned as EPA director, adding in her announcement that congressional investigators now had ready access to the documents they had been seeking since the summer of 1982. She later would claim that her time with the EPA had been hampered by the agency's lack of management skills and outdated priorities. At the same time, her colleagues charged that she had in turn delayed energy development decisions by demanding direct control over all decision making processes rather than leaving them to be made at the state and regional level. They went on to say that Gorsuch had made herself inaccessible to the EPA's regular staff and had barricaded herself with a wall of assistants with connections to Secretary of the Interior James Watt, the Adolph Coors Company, and the Reagan campaign, all with limited to no experience with environmental issues.

Lavelle was involved in later criminal investigations and convicted in 2004 of one count of wire fraud and two counts of making misleading statements to FBI investigators. She served time in prison for this conviction as well. Gorsuch was appointed by Reagan to head the National Advisory Committee on Oceans and the Atmosphere, but she turned down the appointment. She wrote Are You Tough Enough? (1986) and then returned to law practice. In 2004, she died from cancer.

IMPACT

Gorsuch was replaced by William Ruckelshaus, who had served as the EPA's first director. The National Resources Defense Council sued the EPA in 1983 for violations related to secret meetings and collusion with industry leaders. The EPA agreed to end the practice of secret negotiations and private deal-making. The new regulations forbid the EPA from allowing industry negotiations to affect its decisions whenever it evaluates or registers high-risk pesticides.

Ruckelshaus, as interim director, established the EPA's so-called fishbowl policy, providing public participation in policy-making activities, and created a recusal policy to avoid conflicts of interest caused by his association with the timber company Weyerhaeuser and with Monsanto, among others. His appointment calendar was made public each week, as were those of other key EPA officials.

In an interview with the EPA History Office, Ruckelshaus observed that the Reagan administration's avowed purpose of lessening the impact of regulation on society really had the opposite effect, at least with respect to the environment. To the extent it acted at all, Congress increased the degree of regulation, imposing new restrictions on flexibility and on the administration of the states.

In the years after Gorsuch's tenure with the EPA, Congress passed prescriptive environmental legislation, believing that loosely worded amendments would be abused by administrations for whom the environment was not a priority. The acts included an amendment to the Hazardous and Solid Waste Act (1984), amendments to the Safe Drinking Water Act (1986), amendments and reauthorization of the Superfund Act (1986), and the Water Quality Act (1987).

—Catherine Rambo

FURTHER READING

Collin, Robert W. The Environmental Protection Agency: Cleaning Up America's Act. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2006. This book documents the history of the Environmental Protection Agency and reviews some of its most notable cases. Includes a detailed biography of Gorsuch and her brief tenure at the EPA.

Davis, Devra Lee. When Smoke Ran Like Water: Tales of Environmental Deception and the Battle Against Pollution. New York: Basic Books, 2004. Includes discussion of Gorsuch's tenure with the EPA and the Reagan administration's approach to pollution in historical context.

Johnson, Haynes. Sleepwalking Through History: America in the Reagan Years. New York: W. W. Norton, 1991. Coverage of the multiple scandals that arose during the Reagan administration. Gorsuch is mentioned in passing.

Nakamura, Robert T., and Thomas W. Church. Taming Regulation: Superfund and the Challenge of Regulatory Reform. Washington, D.C.: Brookings Institution Press, 2003. Discusses administrative reform in the Superfund program and deals primarily with the aftermath of the scandal involving Rita Lavelle.

SEE ALSO: Oct. 4, 1976: Agriculture Secretary Earl Butz Resigns After Making Obscene Joke; Sept. 26, 1979: Love Canal Residents Sue Chemical Company; Dec. 11, 1997: HUD Secretary Henry Cisneros Is Indicted for Lying to Federal Agents; July, 2002: Journalist Alleges Release of Genetically Modified Corn Seeds in New Zealand; Beginning Aug. 29, 2005: Government Incompetence Mars Hurricane Katrina Relief Efforts.

April 25, 1983

GERMAN MAGAZINE PUBLISHES FAKED HITLER DIARIES

The German weekly magazine Stern published excerpts of a manuscript believed to be the diaries of Adolf Hitler. The diaries were found to be forged, however, leading to one of the most notorious publishing and forgery scandals of the twentieth century.

LOCALE: Hamburg, Germany

CATEGORIES: Forgery; hoaxes, frauds, and charlatanism; publishing and journalism

KEY FIGURES

Konrad Kujau (Konrad Fischer; 1938-2000),
German collector

Gerd Heidemann (b. 1931), German journalist Peter Koch (fl. 1980's), editor in chief of Stern magazine

Hugh Trevor-Roper (1914-2003), English historian

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Konrad Kujau, a German collector of memorabilia, claimed to be in possession of sixty-two volumes of the secret "diaries" of Adolf Hitler. The diaries included details from Hitler's life between 1932 and days before his suicide on April 30, 1945. Kujau said he found the diaries in Börnersdorf, near Dresden, in the possession of farmers who discovered them in the wreckage of a Nazi SS plane that had crashed on April 21, 1945.

Kujau, who used the name Konrad Fischer, was an accomplished forger and antiquarian dealer. In addition to selling genuine items from his large memorabilia collection, he sold some of his forgeries with great success, making him a criminal as well. He even sold paintings allegedly created by Hitler. Kujau also forged handwritten copies of Hitler's infamous two-volume book Mein Kampf (1925-1926; My Struggle, 1939, complete translation). He fabricated inscriptions and additions and sold them to unsuspecting collectors. Any authority on the period, however, would know that the original manuscript of Mein Kampf had been typewritten, not handwritten.

In 1979, Gerd Heidemann, a reporter for the popular German weekly magazine Stern (star), obtained some of the diaries (Kujau's forgeries) but would not disclose where he got them. Before making contact with Kujau, he had learned of the 1945 crash of the SS plane and the existence of a mysterious box that contained almost thirty volumes of the diaries; the box, as it turned out, was in Kujau's possession. (Heidemann, who had been in the Hitlerjugend—the Hitler Youth movement—as a boy, was fascinated with the Nazi period and even knew a number of prominent former Nazis.)

Heidemann urged Kujau to sell the diaries to Stern, but Kujau initially was reluctant to sell for fear of being found out as a fraud. The offer, however, was too tempting. Kujau agreed to the sale but requested that his name be left out of the arrangements. He then forged more of the diaries in preparation for their transfer to Stern. He delivered the first "volumes" to Heidemann in January, 1981. Stern editors accepted them without questioning their authenticity. Kujau provided more diaries, and Stern greeted each one with enthusiasm, paying Kujau and Heidemann premiums.

Stern began to offer the diaries to other publications, including the Sunday Times of London for serialization, but for a fee. The Sunday Times, owned by media mogul Rupert Murdoch, purchased the diaries for $400,000, of which it paid half, before the forgery became known.

The editors of Stern, who debated whether to publish the diary excerpts before checking for authenticity, sent several photocopied pages from the diaries to the German Federal Archives (GFA). They also sent page copies to the noted British historian Hugh Trevor-Roper, who had worked as a military historian for the British armed services during World War II and had written several books and articles on Hitler, including the popular and well-received book The Last Days of Hitler. It should be noted, however, that despite his work on the war period and Nazi Germany, Trevor-Roper's main area of expertise was seventeenth century England. After his examination of the handwriting samples, Trevor-Roper assured the editors the diaries were real, stating, "I would stake my reputation" on their authenticity.

Within days, the publishers became skeptical. Stern asked Heidemann to look at the charges more closely. Heidemann, whose own interests depended on the dairies' authenticity, merely asked Kujau if the diaries were real. Naturally, Kujau assured Heidemann they were authentic. Stern held a dramatic press conference, led by editor in chief Peter Koch, on April 22, 1983, to announce its possession of the priceless diaries. Two days later, the Sunday Times announced its own acquisition of copies of the diaries in the news article, "Hitler's Secret Diaries to be Published." The following day, April 25, Stern published excerpts from the diaries, boldly announcing on its cover, "Hitlers Tagebücher entdeckt" (Hitler's diaries discovered).

By not allowing experts to examine the diaries directly before publication, Stern fell into a serious situation. Any reputable Hitler expert could have easily discovered the fraud. Upon publication of the diary excerpts, some experts were taken by their enthusiasm for such a find, but others were skeptical and saw clear inconsistencies. Kujau claimed that the diaries were in Hitler's own hand. Historians of the period argued that this was doubtful because Hitler suffered serious injuries in the attempt on his life in 1944 by a group of army officers, and he could not write legibly because of the injuries. Furthermore, those persons close to Hitler said that he had little time to write and would not do so if he could. In addition, the entries in the diaries were inane. They showed little new information and much of what they did show contradicted other documents and archives. For example, the diaries indicated that Hitler was not personally involved with much of the actions against the Jews and the Holocaust.

David Irving, a well-known and respected scholar on Hitler, first proclaimed that the handwriting and language were not those of Hitler. He would later say the diaries were real. The uproar caused by the skeptics prompted Stern to seek further authentication. However, the effort backfired. A group of experts, including chemists, showed that ink used in the diaries and the bindings on the volumes were of postwar composition and that the diaries could not have been written before 1945. On May 6, the GFA in Koblenz proclaimed the diaries to be a fraud.

The publisher and editors of Stern, embarrassed and shocked by the revelation, fired Heidemann and others responsible for the fraud. The police also sought Kujau, who initially claimed that he had bought the diaries from someone in East Germany,

Journalist Gerd Heidemann holds up the alleged diaries of Adolf Hitler at a Stern magazine news conference in Hamburg, Germany, on April 25, 1983. The diaries later proved to be forgeries. (AP/Wide World Photos)

NOTABLE QUOTATIONS

Adolf Hitler allegedly wrote the following in his diary in June, 1941:

“On Eva’s wishes, I am thoroughly examined by my doctors. Because of the new pills, I have violent flatulence, and—says Eva—bad breath.”

British historian Hugh Trevor-Roper, upon reviewing Hitler’s diaries at the request of Stern magazine editors, said,

“When I turned the pages of those volumes, my doubts gradually dissolved. I am now satisfied they are authentic.”

Stern editor in chief Peter Koch, announcing that the magazine was publishing excerpts from the diaries, said, but his story was filled with inconsistencies. Finally, Kujau admitted his guilt and implicated Heidemann in the plot because the reporter did not give him a full share of money he received from Stern. On May 11, Stern announced that it would release the forgeries to prosecutors. The magazine had initially refused to do so.

“I expected the uproar and expected that many incompetent people would denounce the diaries as fakes. This is because every other publishing house will envy our story and every historian will envy us.”

IMPACT

In August, 1984, Kujau and Heidemann, along with Kujau’s wife, Edith Leibling, were tried. Kurt Groenewald, Kujau’s attorney, tried to lessen Kujau’s guilt by shifting the blame to Stern publishers, claiming that they had the responsibility of checking the authenticity of the diaries before not only publishing them but also buying them. He argued that Stern neglected to check against forgery because it was eager to improve Hitler’s public image and maximize its profits. Heidemann’s lawyers claimed that Kujau alone was the forger, that their client was not involved in the plot. They argued he kept none of the money paid for the diaries and also blamed Stern for the scandal. Leibling’s lawyers simply claimed she was not involved.

During trial, Stern witnesses were inconsistent in their testimony, leading Judge Hans-Ulrich Schroeder to conclude that they deserved much of the blame for the scandal. He said in his sentencing that the magazine “acted with such naivete and negligence that it was virtually an accomplice in the fraud.” The judges found all three of the defendants guilty. Kujau and Heidemann were sentenced to four and a half years (about half the maximum allowable) in prison, and Leibling received eight months probation.

Kujau was released from prison in 1988 because he was suffering from stomach cancer. He continued a life of petty crime until his death in 2000. For Stern, its reputation was severely damaged. Editor Koch resigned, as did other top editors. Many regard the publication of the fake diary excerpts as one of the lowest points in twentieth century journalism and magazine publishing, not only in Germany but also the world.

—Frederick B. Chary

FURTHER READING

Hamilton, Charles. The Hitler Diaries: Fakes That Fooled the World. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1991. A somewhat superficial narrative of the hoax, written by a handwriting expert. Lacks the detail of Robert Harris’s account.

Harris, Robert. Selling Hitler. London: Arrow Books, 2000. Relates the story of the scandal in detail. Includes an account of David Irving’s role in exposing the hoax.

Magnuson, Ed. “Hitler’s Forged Diaries.” Time, May 16, 1983. A comprehensive account of the hoax written in an accessible style. An excellent example of reportage from the time of the scandal. Also available online through Time magazine’s Web site.

Rendell, Kenneth. Forging History: The Detection of Fake Letters and Documents. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1994. Discusses the methods for detecting forgeries through examination of handwriting, paper, and ink. Uses the case of the forged Hitler diaries as an example of detection methods at work.

Rentschler, Eric. “The Fascination of a Fake: The Hitler Diaries.” New German Critique 90 (Fall, 2003): 177-192. A scholarly study of the forgery that argues the hoax was part of the sociological phenomenon of popular curiosity and fascination with Hitler and the Third Reich.

SEE ALSO: Oct. 25, 1924: Forged Communist Letter Brings Down British Government; June 5, 1944: Australian Poets Claim Responsibility for a Literary Hoax; Nov. 21, 1953: Piltdown Man Is Revealed to Be a Hoax; Oct. 26, 1962: West German Police Raid Der Spiegel Magazine Offices; Jan. 28, 1972: Clifford Irving Admits Faking Howard Hughes Memoirs; Nov. 9, 1976: German Generals Must Retire for Supporting a Neo-Nazi Pilot; Apr. 15, 1981: Janet Cooke Admits Fabricating Her Pulitzer Prize-Winning Feature; Spring, 1996: Physicist Publishes a Deliberately Fraudulent Article; Mar. 12, 1997: Prize-Winning Aborigine Novelist Revealed as a Fraud; June 18, 2001: Historian Joseph J. Ellis Is Accused of Lying.

July 20, 1983

CONGRESS MEMBERS CENSURED IN HOUSE-PAGE SEX SCANDAL

The House Ethics Committee began an investigation into accusations that certain members of the U.S. Congress were engaging in sexual relations with teenage House pages. Although the committee found no wrongdoing during the period in question, it did find that two representatives, Gerry Studds in 1973 and Daniel Crane in 1980, had consensual but inappropriate relationships with pages. Both members were censured by Congress.

ALSO KNOWN AS: Congressional page sex scandal

LOCALE: Washington, D.C.

CATEGORIES: Sex crimes; sex; government; drugs; families and children; public morals

KEY FIGURES

Gerry Studds (1937-2006), U.S. representative from Massachusetts, 1973-1997

Daniel Crane (b. 1936), U.S. representative from Illinois, 1979-1985

Tip O'Neill (1912-1994), U.S. representative from Massachusetts, 1953-1987, and Speaker of the House, 1977-1987

Louis Stokes (b. 1925), U.S. representative from Ohio, 1969-1999, and chairman of House Ethics Committee

SUMMARY OF EVENT

The House Page Program, for students in their junior year of high school, is an immersion program that introduces students to the day-to-day workings of the U.S. House of Representatives. Pages, who live in Washington, D.C., during their residency in the program, run errands for House members, assist with telephone calls in the cloakroom, and assist on the House floor as needed. In addition to working on Capitol Hill as paid employees of the House, pages also attend early-morning classes.

The program has been in place for more than two hundred years, though the House as an institution has changed. About seventy-two pages serve in a given year. The program is administered by the clerk of the House, and daily activities are overseen by staff of the residence hall and school and by work staff. At the program's inception, only males were allowed to serve as pages, but females earned a permanent place in the program in 1973.

Until the early 1980's, pages were responsible for finding their own lodging and were largely unsupervised after leaving work. In 1982, however, a page commission recommended creating a residence hall near Capitol Hill for all pages so they could be properly supervised. Concurrently, the commission also recommended the establishment of a page board composed of current members of the House, “to ensure that the Page program is conducted in a manner that is consistent with the efficient functioning of the House and welfare of the Pages.”

Gerry Studds in 1995. (AP/Wide World Photos)

In 1982, a former House page claimed he had sexual relationships with three members of Congress. Speculation soon arose that Congress members also were involved in drug deals with pages. The Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) launched an investigation into the accusations. Several pages who were interviewed said they had feared their jobs would be in jeopardy had they not consented to the relationships.

After learning of the FBI investigation, Speaker of the House Tip O’Neill and Representative Louis Stokes, chairman of the House Ethics Committee, launched a congressional investigation into the accusations. The committee found that the former page’s accusations were ungrounded, and investigators found no inappropriate behavior between members and pages during the 1981-1982 page cycle, the time period on which the investigation centered. Also dismissed were accusations about drug use.

The committee did find, however, that two representatives had been sexually involved with pages prior to the time in question. Neither politician broke the law, however, because sixteen years old is the age of consent in Washington, D.C. In 1973, Gerry Studds had been in a consensual relationship with a seventeen-year-old male page. The youth was invited to Studds’s Georgetown apartment and traveled with him during a two-week vacation to Portugal. When confronted with the charges in 1982, Studds admitted to the affair, stating that he had made a “very serious error in judgment.” He made a public statement, in which he came out as gay and stated that he should not have engaged in a sexual relationship with a subordinate.

Representative Daniel Crane also had an affair with a seventeen-year-old page, a girl, in 1980. She had visited his apartment multiple times and testified that she was “perhaps more responsible for the sexual relationship than he was.” While the relationship was consensual, Crane tearfully apologized for his behavior but said he did not violate his oath of office. The Ethics Committee recommended on July 14, 1983, that the two Congress members be formally reprimanded, but the full House pushed for a more serious punishment: Studds and Crane were censured by the House on July 20.

Studds and Crane ran for reelection in 1984. Crane won the Republican primary for his district but ultimately lost his seat to Terry Bruce in the general election. Studds, the first openly gay member of Congress, won the 1984 Democratic primary and the general election and served in the House until 1997. Crane returned to dentistry after his defeat in 1984. Studds married his long-time partner in 2004, just one week after the state of Massachusetts legalized marriage between persons of the same gender.

Studds died two years later from a pulmonary embolism.

IMPACT

The page scandal led Speaker O'Neill to form a page commission in 1982 to reevaluate the program. Many questioned why the program was still operating and whether it should be retired, and changes were suggested in an effort to protect the pages and better serve the House membership. Pages now live in a residence hall located several blocks from the Capitol Building (pages formerly resided at the Old Congressional Hotel). This provides better supervision of the minors when they are not at work. A page board also was instituted, consisting of two Congress members from the majority party, one member from the minority party, the clerk of the House, and the House sergeant-at-arms. An official Page Program code of conduct also was developed, allowing for the immediate dismissal of any page found in violation of program rules.

The allegations of inappropriate contact between members of Congress and House pages did not cease following the findings of the Ethics Committee in the case of Crane and Studds. In 2006, scandal rocked Capitol Hill as Representative Mark Foley resigned amid allegations of sending sexually explicit electronic communications (e-mail and instant messages) to former House pages. House leadership came under fire for the way it dealt with previous reports of questionable behavior by Foley, leading to the early retirement of Speaker J. Dennis Hastert in November, 2007. The page board had been expanded in early 2007 to address ongoing concerns with the program and attempt to prevent similar sex scandals.

In December, the House Page Program came under scrutiny again when two Republican members of the page board resigned. Both board members stated that the clerk of the House did not notify them immediately of inappropriate page conduct. In this case, four pages—two for shoplifting and two for inappropriate sexual activity—had been expelled from the program during the fall, 2007, semester. House leadership was criticized once again for not disclosing all evidence presented to the page board.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, like others before her, called for an investigation into the charges and for further evaluation of the program.

—Tessa Li Powell

FURTHER READING

Amer, Mildred. "Pages of the United States Congress: History, Background Information, and Proposals for Change." CRS Report for Congress, February 6, 2007. Describes the page program and highlights changes that have been made or proposed since the Mark Foley scandal in 2006.

"Capitol Scandal." Time, July 12, 1982. Documents the reaction of Congress to the FBI investigation into possible scandals involving House pages.

"Housecleaning." Time, July 5, 1983. Reports on the investigation by the House into allegations of inappropriate conduct between pages and House members. Includes apologies from Daniel Crane and Gerry Studds.

Long, Kim. The Almanac of Political Corruption, Scandals, and Dirty Politics. New York: Delacorte Press, 2007. A wide-ranging book detailing the various scandals and corrupt practices that have plagued U.S. politics.

Roberts, Robert North. Ethics in U.S. Government: An Encyclopedia of Investigations, Scandals, Reforms, and Legislation. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2001. A comprehensive encyclopedia documenting political scandals, ethical controversies, and investigations in the U.S. government between 1775 and 2000.

Turley, Jonathan. "A Page Protection Act: The Path to Saving a Historic Program." Roll Call, October 5, 2006. Written by a page alum and legal professor. Addresses the problems with the current page board and steps that should be taken to maintain the program.

SEE ALSO: June 23, 1967: Senator Thomas J. Dodd Is Censured for Misappropriating Funds; Oct. 7, 1974: Congressman Wilbur D. Mills's Stripper Affair Leads to His Downfall; Oct. 25, 1974: Evangelist Billy James Hargis Resigns College Presidency During Gay-Sex Scandal; Sept., 1976:

Jimmy Carter Admits Committing Adultery in His Heart; Sept. 3, 1980: Congressman Bauman Is Arrested for Liaison with Teenage Boy; July 20, 1982: Conservative Politician John G. Schmitz Is Found to Have Children Out of Wedlock; Aug. 5, 1994: Kenneth Starr Is Appointed to the Whitewater Investigation; Jan. 17, 1998: President Bill Clinton Denies Sexual Affair with a White House Intern; Sept. 19, 2000: Ex-gay Leader John Paulk Is Photographed Leaving a Gay Bar; Apr. 30, 2001: Washington Intern Chandra Levy Disappears; Dec. 6, 2005: Spokane, Washington, Mayor Recalled in Gay-Sex Scandal; Sept. 29, 2006: Congressman Mark Foley Resigns in Sex Scandal Involving a Teenage Page.

August 12, 1983-July 27, 1990

McMARTIN PRESCHOOL IS EMBROILED IN CHILD-ABUSE CASE

The McMartin Preschool was at the center of one of the costliest and longest criminal trials in American history after its owners and several teachers were accused of sexually abusing the children in their care. The case, which initiated public hysteria over child sex-abuse, ended with no convictions but altered public views of child-abuse cases and pressured the justice system to modify how it handles such cases.

ALSO KNOWN AS: McMartin Preschool trial

LOCALE: Manhattan Beach, California

CATEGORIES: Law and the courts; hoaxes, frauds, and charlatanism; families and children; education; sex crimes

KEY FIGURES

Judy Johnson (1944-1986), parent of a student at McMartin Preschool

Virginia McMartin (c. 1907-1995), McMartin Preschool founder and owner

Raymond Buckey (b. 1955), preschool teacher

Peggy McMartin Buckey (1926-2001), preschool teacher

Peggy Ann Buckey (b. 1956), preschool teacher

Kee MacFarlane (fl. 1980's), social worker-psychologist

SUMMARY OF EVENT

The child-abuse allegations that emerged against McMartin Preschool owners and teachers in 1983 led to one of the longest and costliest trials in American history and initiated public hysteria over child sex-abuse in schools. Located in Manhattan Beach, near Los Angeles, California, the family-owned and operated preschool was a popular and acclaimed school with a long waiting list. The preschool's strong reputation contributed to the magnitude of the shock and outrage felt by the Manhattan Beach community—and all of Southern California—when the scandal surfaced.

The investigation began on August 12, 1983, when Judy Johnson, the mother of a two-year-old boy who attended the school, filed a complaint with police. Johnson reported that she had taken her son to a pediatrician after he complained of rectal discomfort and pain. She claimed that her son had been sexually abused and sodomized by the preschool's only male teacher, Raymond Buckey, during satanic rituals at the school.

Buckey was arrested on September 7 but soon released because of a lack of evidence. The following day, the Manhattan Beach Police Department issued a letter to two hundred parents whose children had attended the preschool, explaining its investigation into the allegations. The letter informed parents that Buckey was under investigation and that parents should speak with their children to learn whether or not their child had been victimized, had witnessed a classmate being abused, or had any other information about Buckey's activities at the preschool.

Knowledge of the McMartin investigation quickly spread throughout the community, caused mass panic, and led to death threats against the McMartin Preschool owners and teachers. It also led to the collective withdrawal of children by their parents from McMartin and neighboring preschools. The number of abuse reports soared after parents began to interrogate their children.

In October, 1983, McMartin parents were instructed to take their children to the Child Sexual Abuse Center at Children's Institute International (CII) for further evaluation. The review was headed by CII investigator and center director Kee MacFarlane. CII therapists videotaped their interviews with the children and used dolls to help the children articulate the alleged sex acts. Most of the children first denied being abused, but many later recanted and began to tell stories of sex abuse. The children's descriptions gradually transformed into incredible stories of satanic rituals, blood drinking, animal mutilation and sacrifice, corpse desecration, naked games, child pornography, hidden underground tunnels and rooms, and flying witches. From a lineup of photographs, the children named the preschool owners and teachers as their abusers, but they also selected from the photos community leaders, celebrities, and other public figures, such as actor Chuck Norris, as abusers.

The children also were evaluated by medical doctors for physical signs of sex abuse. By November, CII investigators determined that more than three hundred sixty of the four hundred children they interviewed had been sexually abused, a claim that intensified public hysteria and incited violence, including vandalism against the preschool building. The findings also led to a rise in child sex-abuse reports from other preschools. After nearly thirty years in the preschool business, the McCartins closed the school on January 13, 1984, as the scandal began to dominate national headlines.

On March 22, McMartin owners and teachers were arrested and initially charged with one hundred fifteen counts of child molestation, despite weak evidence. The accused included the McMartin family—founder Virginia McMartin, Peggy McMartin Buckey, Raymond Buckey, Peggy Ann Buckey—and three of the preschool's teachers—Betty Raidor, Babette Spitler, and Mary Ann Jackson. By April, the scandal prompted other states to investigate their own growing reports of child sex-abuse. In May, the charges against the McMartin defendants included more than two hundred counts of child molestation and one count of conspiracy involving more than forty children.

During the pretrial from August, 1984, to January, 1986, the court examined the testimony of CII interviewers, doctors, child psychologists, child sex-abuse experts, and child witnesses. The case weakened as witness testimonies conflicted and McMartin parents kept their children from partici-

FALSE ALLEGATIONS OF SEXUAL ABUSE

Approximately 60 percent of all sexual abuse allegations receive dispositions of "unsubstantiated." A significant portion of these cases are false allegations, not harmless errors made by well-meaning persons. While one of the main purposes of the Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act of 1974 was to make reporting of suspected abuse easier, it has had the unintended consequence of creating a climate that encourages false allegations. The act provides immunity from prosecution for persons who report alleged abuse, thereby shielding even those who choose to make false allegations to harm another person's reputation (this is often the case in many divorces).

Once a child is in contact with the legal system and seen as a victim, the system tends to seek confirmation for that victim status. Social workers and those in law enforcement are well meaning but often untrained in interview techniques that are appropriate for alleged child victims of abuse. The investigators often ask leading questions, unintentionally encouraging children to give responses that are consistent with being victimized.

POLICE LETTER TO PARENTS OF McMARTIN STUDENTS

September 8, 1983

Dear Parent:

This Department is conducting a criminal investigation involving child molestation (288 P.C.). Ray Buckey, an employee of Virginia McMartin's Pre-School, was arrested September 7, 1983 by this Department.

The following procedure is obviously an unpleasant one, but to protect the rights of your children as well as the rights of the accused, this inquiry is necessary for a complete investigation.

Records indicate that your child has been or is currently a student at the pre-school. We are asking your assistance in this continuing investigation. Please question your child to see if he or she has been a witness to any crime or if he or she has been a victim. Our investigation indicates that possible criminal acts include: oral sex, fondling of genitals, buttock or chest area, and sodomy, possibly committed under the pretense of "taking the child's temperature." Also photos may have been taken of children without their clothing. Any information from your child regarding having ever observed Ray Buckey to leave a classroom alone with a child during any nap period, or if they have ever observed Ray Buckey tie up a child, is important.

Please complete the enclosed information form and return it to this Department in the enclosed stamped return envelope as soon as possible. We will contact you if circumstances dictate same.

We ask you to please keep this investigation strictly confidential because of the nature of the charges and the highly emotional effect it could have on our community. Please do not discuss this investigation with anyone outside your immediate family. Do not contact or discuss the investigation with Raymond Buckey, any member of the accused defendant's family, or employees connected with the McMartin Pre-School.

[Note: The following paragraph was in all capital letters in original] There is no evidence to indicated [sic] that the management of Virginia McMartin's pre-school had any knowledge of this situation and no detrimental information concerning the operation of the school has been discovered during this investigation. Also, no other employee in the school is under investigation for any criminal act.

Your prompt attention to this matter and reply no late than September 16, 1983 will be appreciated.

Harry L. Kuhlmeier, Jr.
Chief of Police

John Wehner
Captain

pating in the court's interrogations. In March of 1985, enraged parents protested the court's actions by attempting to uncover, as a group, the tunnel at the preschool that had been described by their children. A private archaeological firm contracted by the Los Angeles District Attorney's Office on March 20 continued the excavation, but workers found no evidence of a tunnel or entry-way.

On January 17, the court dropped charges against five of the seven defendants because of insufficient evidence. In preparation for the trial, prosecutors charged Raymond and Peggy Buckey with more than one hundred counts of child molestation. The exoneration of the other five defendants drew public protests, as crowds displaying signs in support of the McMartin children gathered outside the courthouse. On December 19, Judy Johnson, the mother who first alleged the child abuse at McMartin, died of liver disease; she had been an alcoholic. Prior to her death, she also had been diagnosed with paranoid schizophrenia, and although her condition may have been a factor in the abuse allegations, the McMartin trial continued in full force nevertheless.

On July 14, 1987, four years after the investigations began, the trial commenced with opening statements. Witness testimony and videotapes of the children's interviews were once again reviewed, but the evidence against the two defendants—Raymond and Peggy Buckey—remained weak and unclear. The Buckeys continued to proclaim their innocence throughout the trial.

Peggy Buckey was acquitted on January 18, 1990. She had spent two years in jail during the investigation and trial. All but thirteen charges against Raymond Buckey were dropped. Jurors cited the weak evidence and the suggestive and coercive manner in which evaluators obtained child testimonies as reasons for their deadlocking. Following her acquittal, Peggy Buckey filed a defamation lawsuit and Raymond Buckey prepared for his second trial (on the remaining thirteen charges), scheduled for May. For the second trial, the prosecution made a thorough excavation of the preschool grounds. Several collapsed tunnels were found underneath the preschool. However, research into when the tunnels had been built remained inconclusive. On July 27 the jury again deadlocked on the charges against Raymond Buckey, forcing the judge to declare a mistrial. District Attorney Ira Reiner decided not to pursue a third trial.

Raymond Buckey had served five years in jail during the investigation and trial. The McMartin case lasted for seven years, cost taxpayers sixteen million dollars, and ended without a single conviction. In 1991, the preschool was demolished.

IMPACT

The McMartin Preschool scandal—along with its hysteria, panic, and media coverage—convinced the public that child sex-abuse was a significant social problem. Although the case was referred to as a contemporary witch hunt that destroyed the lives of many people and saw death threats, vandalism, and physical attacks, the McMartin trial also inspired changes in the justice system. The courts, first of all, gained a new perspective on child-abuse allegations. The testimonies of children are now viewed with more caution and skepticism. The guidelines for conducting child interviews and utilizing child testimony during trials have been revised to reduce the harmful psychological and emotional effects the process may have upon children. Finally, defendant liberties have been reduced to avoid long trials.

—Sheena Garitta

FURTHER READING

Butler, Edgar, et al. Anatomy of the McMartin Child Molestation Case. Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 2001. A comprehensive overview of the case, from the initial criminal charges to pretrial publicity to the juries to the rights of alleged victims and perpetrators.

Carlson, Margaret. "Six Years Trial by Torture." Time, January 29, 1990. A brief overview of the McMartin case. Argues that the children were victimized by the criminal justice system.

Eberle, Paul, and Shirley Eberle. The Abuse of Innocence: The McMartin Preschool Trial. Buffalo, N.Y.: Prometheus Books, 2003. Provides a scandal time line and presents excerpts from the pre-trial investigations and trial testimony.

Reinhold, Robert. "How Lawyers and the Media Turned the McMartin Case into a Tragic Circus." The New York Times, January 25, 1990. Discusses several mistakes made by prosecutors that led to the exoneration of all seven defendants and how the media shaped the public's views toward child abuse.

Talbot, Margaret. "The Devil in the Nursery." The New York Times Magazine, January 7, 2001. Offers a brief analysis of the effects of mass panic and hysteria on legal proceedings, using the McMartin case as an example of that panic.

Vieth, Victor I., Bette L. Bottoms, and Alison Perona, eds. Ending Child Abuse: New Efforts in Prevention, Investigation, and Training. Binghamton, N.Y.: Haworth Press, 2006. Social scientists and legal scholars examine concepts in the field of child abuse prevention as well as training methods, prosecution strategies, and other issues.

SEE ALSO: Mar. 2, 1906: Psychoanalyst Ernest Jones Is Accused of Molesting Mentally Disabled Children; Mar. 30, 1931: "Scottsboro Boys" Are Railroaded Through Rape Trials; Mar., 1990: Menendez Brothers Are Arrested for Murdering Their Parents; Aug. 16, 1996: Belgian Media Reveal How Police Bungled Serial Murder Case; Jan. 30, 2001: Liverpool Children's Hospital Collects Body Parts Without Authorization; June 30, 2001: Korean Religious Teacher Jung Myung Seok Is Charged with Rape; Jan. 6, 2002: Boston Globe Reports on Child Sexual Abuse by Roman Catholic Priests; Dec. 18, 2003: Pop Star Michael Jackson Is Charged with Child Molestation.

August 21, 1983

FILIPINO OPPOSITION LEADER AQUINO IS ASSASSINATED ON RETURN HOME

Benigno Aquino, Jr., became a focus of the opposition to President Ferdinand Marcos. After years of imprisonment in the Philippines and three years of exile in the United States, he returned to the Philippines only to face the bullets of assassins at Manila airport. His scandalous murder provoked public outrage and led to the overthrow of the dictatorial Marcos, the election of Corazón Aquino as president in 1985, and to his martyrdom.

LOCALE: Manila, Philippines

CATEGORIES: Murder and suicide; government; politics; violence

KEY FIGURES

Benigno Aquino, Jr. (1932-1983), Filipino senator, 1967-1972, and opponent of Ferdinand Marcos

Ferdinand Marcos (1917-1989), president of the Philippines, 1965-1986

Rolando Galman (1950-1983), Filipino gangster and alleged assassin

Fabian Ver (1920-1998), Filipino general and chief of the armed forces

Corazón Aquino (b. 1933), president of the Philippines, 1986-1992

Imelda Marcos (b. 1929), wife of Ferdinand Marcos

SUMMARY OF EVENT

The rivalry between Filipino president Ferdinand Marcos and his chief political opponent, Benigno Aquino, Jr., came to a violent end on August 21, 1983, when Aquino, who had also become a voice for democratic change, was assassinated at Manila International Airport after leaving the airplane that brought him back to the Philippines. He had just returned to his homeland from the United States, where he had been in exile for three years.

Marcos had been elected president of the Philippines in 1965. Limited by the constitution to two terms in office, he was mandated to leave the presidency in 1973. Aquino, a popular senator, was the most likely victor in the forthcoming presidential election. Instead of leaving office, Marcos declared martial law in 1972, assumed dictatorial powers, and imprisoned Aquino for seven years before exiling him to seek medical care in the United States.

Aquino resided in Newton, Massachusetts, and taught at Wellesley College, the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and Harvard University. Aquino also kept in touch with the opposition to the Marcos regime. In August, 1983, Aquino decided to return to his homeland. Marcos had been in ill health, his dictatorship was increasingly unpopular, and Aquino hoped that the opposition would coalesce upon his return. However, both Marcos's flamboyant and powerful wife, Imelda Marcos, and Marcos's loyal supporter, the chief of the armed forces, General Fabian Ver, had publicly warned Aquino against returning to the Philippines.

Because the Filipino government was monitoring Aquino's travels, Aquino began his trip with evasive maneuvers, traveling with a fake Philippines passport under the name Marcial Bonifacio. On August 13, he flew from Boston to Los Angeles. He then flew to Singapore, Malaysia, and Hong Kong, and finally landed in Taipei, Taiwan. Aquino had determined to fly to Manila from Taipei, in part because Taiwan did not have diplomatic relations with the Philippines and, thus, was somewhat immune from Marcos's pressure.

On the morning of August 21, Aquino telephoned his family from the Grand Hotel in Taipei. He spoke with each of his children and listened to his religiously devout wife, Corazón Aquino, read a passage from the Bible. At 11:15 A.M., he left for Manila on China Airlines flight 811, accompanied by his brother-in-law and American Broadcasting Company (ABC) news reporter Ken Kashiwahara, friend Noy Brizuela, about ten other journalists, and two Japanese television crews. Although Aquino believed the presence of the media afforded him some protection, he was also wearing a bulletproof vest.

Aquino's plane landed at 1:03 P.M. The plane was detained on the runway and several soldiers boarded the plane. While the other passengers were ordered to stay in their seats, the soldiers led Aquino out of the plane and onto the tarmac. Passengers on the plane reported hearing a jumble of voices, with shouts of "Shoot him! Shoot him!"

A single gunshot rang out moments later, at 1:15 P.M. Within seconds there was a barrage of shots. Two men lay dead on the tarmac: One was Aquino and the other was an unknown shooter later identified as petty gangster Rolando Galman. Aquino had sustained a fatal gunshot wound to the back of the head. The Marcos government claimed that Aquino had been killed by Galman, who in turn had been killed by an avalanche of bullets from the soldiers. This claim was met by widespread skepticism, if for no other reason than that Galman would have had to penetrate the one-thousand-person security force with which the Filipino army had surrounded the plane to get off his perfect shot. In contrast to the reaction of the Marcos government, Corazón Aquino would gain widespread sympathy for the dignified manner in which she returned to the Philippines for the funeral of her murdered husband.

Suspicion for the assassination fell on Ferdinand and Imelda Marcos and on General Ver. To deflect these suspicions, President Marcos appointed a commission headed by Chief Justice Enrique Fernando to investigate the facts of the assassination. After its hearings were frustrated, the commission was replaced in October 22 by a fact-finding board chaired by Justice Corazón Agrava. After an exhaustive yearlong investigation, the Agrava board dismissed the army's version of the assassination and blamed a conspiracy of military officers for arranging the murder. Particularly incriminating was the autopsy evidence, which indicated that Aquino had been shot from an elevated position behind him, and eyewitness testimony that he was shot by the soldiers leading him down the stairs from the plane. Marcos was compelled to suspend Ver and ordered a trial of several military men before a special court, which acquitted the soldiers. The result outraged Filipinos and alarmed the United States, the most important ally of the Marcos regime.

In November, 1985, Marcos ordered a snap presidential election, convinced he would win. To his surprise Corazón Aquino announced that she would run for president. With the urging of Manila's Roman Catholic cardinal Jaime Sin, the powerful opposition leader Salvador Laurel threw his support behind Aquino as her vice presidential candidate. The election was marred by massive fraud, and no clear winner emerged. Millions of Filipinos took to the streets in protest, with the support of Minister of Defense Juan Ponce Enrile and General Fidel V. Ramos, who broke with Marcos. On February 25,

Philippine presidential candidate Corazón Aquino visiting, in December, 1985, the grave site of her late husband Benigno Aquino, Jr., who was assassinated in 1983. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

1986, Aquino and Laurel were sworn into office. The Marcos family and key supporters, including General Ver and his family, fled to Hawaii.

Aquino would serve as president until 1992. During her administration, fourteen soldiers were tried, convicted, and imprisoned for the murder of her husband, Benigno Aquino, Jr.

IMPACT

World-renowned figures have fallen to assassin's bullets, many of those killed during the twentieth century. Aquino's assassination ranks high on the scale of national and international impact. His murder at the Manila airport on August 21, 1983, was the catalyst for the People's Revolution in the Philippines, which, within two years, overthrew one of the world's richest and most entrenched dictators and brought about a revolution of hope.

The assassination of Aquino was of course a personal tragedy. His death left grieving family, friends, and supporters throughout the world. One can only imagine the pain felt by the intermediaries who assisted his surreptitious return to the Philippines only to learn that he was killed within minutes of his arrival. Although their efforts had tragic consequences, in the long run they must know that they played a precipitating role in bringing democracy to the Philippines.

Although the Marcos regime was able to avoid legal blame for the killing, its efforts proved to be in vain. The quiet dignity of Corazón Aquino, the support of Cardinal Jaime Sin, the last-minute alliance with Laurel, Ramos, and Enrile brought the Philippines its long overdue democracy. Aquino in his death became a national hero. The airport where he was gunned down was named for him, and August 21, the day of his death, was declared a national holiday.

—Howard Bromberg

FURTHER READING

Burton, Sandra. Impossible Dream: The Marcoses, the Aquinos, and the Unfinished Revolution.

New York: Warner Books, 1989. An account of the assassination, investigation, and revolution by an American journalist who interviewed and accompanied Aquino on the flight to Manila. Burton also explains the basis of the adulation of the Aquinos and the hatred of the Marcoses.

Hill, Gerald N., and Kathleen Thompson Hill. Aquino Assassination: The True Story and Analysis of the Assassination of Philippine Senator Benigno S. Aquino, Jr. Sonoma, Calif.: Hilltop, 1983. Account of the assassination by an American lawyer and human rights advocate, with a commentary by the director of the Ninoy Aquino Movement for Freedom, Peace, and Democracy, who places responsibility for the murder directly on Ferdinand Marcos. Includes a time line and photographs of the assassination.

Reid, Robert H., and Eileen Guerrero. Corazón Aquino and the Brushfire Revolution. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1995. A fairly dense scholarly history of Corazón Aquino's rise to power from her husband's assassination through her election to the Philippine presidency and her ineffectual revolution.

Simons, Lewis M. Worth Dying For. New York: William Morrow, 1987. Straightforward account of the assassination and the revolution it sparked. Based on hundreds of interviews and the findings of the Agrava commission.

Umali, Ramoncito F. Who Killed Senator Aquino: The Unsolved Assassination. New York: iUniverse, 2005. A personalized account by the janitorial manager responsible for cleaning the scene of Aquino's assassination on the airport tarmac.

SEE ALSO: Aug. 14, 1963: Madame Nhu Derides Self-Immolation of Vietnamese Buddhists; Oct. 29, 1965: Moroccan Politician Mehdi Ben Barka Disappears in Paris; May 11, 1982: Philippine President Marcos Forces the Entire Supreme Court to Resign; Feb. 28, 1995: Former Mexican President Carlos Salinas's Brother Is Arrested for Murder.

October 14, 1983

BRITISH CABINET SECRETARY PARKINSON RESIGNS AFTER HIS SECRETARY BECOMES PREGNANT

Cecil Parkinson was secretary of state for trade and industry in the Conservative government of Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher. It was revealed that his former secretary, Sara Keays, was pregnant, and he was the father. Parkinson met with public disapproval for his lack of contact with his child in the years after her birth.

LOCALE: London, England

CATEGORIES: Politics; sex; government; public morals; families and children; women's issues

KEY FIGURES

Cecil Parkinson (b. 1931), chairman of the Conservative Party and cabinet member under Margaret Thatcher

Sara Keays (b. 1948), Parkinson's parliamentary secretary and mistress

Margaret Thatcher (b. 1925), British prime minister, 1979-1990

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Cecil Parkinson was a high-flying member of British prime minister Margaret Thatcher's Conservative government from its election in 1979 until the revelation of his affair with his former parliamentary secretary, Sara Keays, in 1983. He resigned his cabinet post on October 14. After four years in relative obscurity in Parliament, he was again promoted to cabinet rank by Thatcher. When she resigned as party leader in 1990, Parkinson resigned with her, bringing an end to his political career.

Parkinson came from humble origins, being the son of a railway worker in Carnforth, Lancashire. In 1942, the young Parkinson won a scholarship to nearby Lancaster Grammar School, a prestigious high school for academically gifted boys. He did well academically and at track and field events. At one point he was thinking of being ordained into the Church of England, and he was offered a place at Emmanuel College, Cambridge University, to read theology. He accepted the offer but then changed his mind and started to read English instead. He majored in law.

After graduation in 1955, Parkinson found employment as a trainee graduate with the Metal Box Company in London. While studying accountancy there he met Ann Jarvis, whom he married in 1957. They had three daughters, the first born in 1959. Politically, Parkinson had been brought up as a Labour Party supporter, a loyalty he maintained throughout his student years. However, after a period of political neutrality, he joined the Conservative Party in 1959 and was soon active as a public speaker.

In 1961, Parkinson began his own business, then bought up a number of small failing engineering firms between 1967 and 1979 to form a small business empire worth several million pounds. He was asked to stand in the 1970 general election for Northampton, but was unsuccessful. At a by-election in north London few months later, he was elected. He was then reelected for a slightly different constituency in Hertfordshire in 1974, and then again in 1979, the year that Thatcher became the new prime minister. Thatcher had led the Conservatives to power over Labour.

Keays, the daughter of an army colonel, became Parkinson's parliamentary secretary in 1971. They soon were lovers. Over the next few years, Parkinson promised Keays marriage on at least two occasions, and she claimed later to have continued the affair with the expectation of eventually marrying him. She left her job as his secretary in 1979, moved for a year to Brussels, Belgium, then returned to Westminster to take a job as secretary to another member of Parliament. The affair with Parkinson continued uninterrupted, however.

Meanwhile, Parkinson had attracted the favor of Thatcher and was being promoted within the government ranks. In 1981, he was made party chairman and was then included in the cabinet in 1982 as chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster. At the 1983 election, held in the summer, Thatcher was again very successful. She wanted to promote Parkinson to one of the top cabinet jobs, but Keays had already told Parkinson that she was pregnant. She later denied allegations that she allowed the pregnancy to go forward to force Parkinson to marry her.

Parkinson had to tell Thatcher what he believed was bad news. She decided to offer him a lower-level post in the cabinet and pressured him to break off the affair. In June, he became the secretary of state for trade and industry, a new department formed out of two previous departments. In the meantime, Parkinson told his wife of the affair and pregnancy. She and his two older daughters decided the marriage should continue and promised to support Parkinson.

On October 5, attorneys for Parkinson and Keays met and issued a statement in which Parkinson admitted the affair, his desire to marry her, his subsequent decision not to, and an expression of regret at the pain he had caused. The attorneys also announced that no questions would be answered from the press. However, one week later, Keays issued her own statement. She claimed the previous statement by her attorney had not been full enough and that she had been placed in an impossible situation.

A tremendous furor emerged in the press. At the time the scandal erupted, the annual Conservative Party conference was being held. Parkinson attended only to make a speech, which was greeted with great enthusiasm. However, it became obvious that a planned trip to the United States by Parkinson to promote British interests would be seriously compromised, and he offered his resignation to Thatcher. She had defended him all the while but accepted his resignation on October 14. Although he remained a backbench member of Parliament, he claimed that he still received thousands of letters of support.

IMPACT

Parkinson's resignation was the fourth one from a Thatcher cabinet, but it did little harm to her government. Norman Tebbit, a hard-hitting politician, took over Parkinson's job as secretary of state for trade and industry. At a personal level, Parkinson's political career was on hold, and he became a regular object of satire as Thatcher's government gradually lost its popularity. However, after four years on the backbenches, he reemerged into front line politics, being appointed secretary of state for energy in 1987. He retained his popularity in the Conservative Party throughout the period.

Parkinson also made sure that a far-reaching gag order was issued against the press to protect his daughter, Flora, who was born to Keays in December, 1983. Flora had been born with some birth disorders and suffered from epilepsy and mental disabilities. The gag order was so strict that even school photographs of Flora were prohibited, and the order was in place until she was eighteen years old.

After their daughter's birth, Keays appeared at party conferences, apparently to embarrass Parkinson. She also wrote the book Question of Judgement (1985) to reveal her side of the affair. Her novel, The Black Book, a thinly disguised account of government corruption, followed in 1987.

The long-term repercussions of the Parkinson-Keays affair did not emerge until the media gag order was lifted in 2001. By this time, Parkinson had left active politics and been made a peer (Lord Parkinson of Carnforth). The affair became a press sensation once more, but this time the media was considerably more sympathetic to Keays. Keays claimed that in those eighteen years in which the gag order was in place, Parkinson never visited his daughter nor did he ever send a birthday card. However, he had made arrangements to pay for her living expenses and education. Keays sued one newspaper for libel, but lost the case and incurred heavy legal costs. She also sold her story several times. Flora appeared on national television in January, 2002, saying she would like to meet her father.

—David Barratt

FURTHER READING

Clark, Alan. Diaries: In Power. London: Weidenfeld & Nicholson, 2003. Clark's diaries recount the Thatcher and Major years of government and give intimate details into the affairs and indiscretions of a number of ministers.

Keays, Sara. Question of Judgement. London: Quintessential Press, 1985. Sara Keays’s version of her affair with Parkinson and its subsequent development. A considerably more robust account than that of Parkinson.

Parkinson, Cecil. Right at the Centre: An Autobiography. London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1992. Parkinson’s autobiography, which covers his life through his retirement from active politics in 1990. Contains remarkably little discussion of the affair with Keays but explores his attempt to keep it a secret.

Thatcher, Margaret. The Downing Street Years. New York: HarperCollins, 1995. Thatcher’s account of her years as British prime minister and her dealings with one of her favorites, Parkinson.

SEE ALSO: Mar. 2–Sept. 25, 1963: John Profumo Affair Rocks British Government; Aug. 4, 1978: British Politician Jeremy Thorpe Is Charged with Attempted Murder; July 25, 1987: Novelist–Politician Jeffrey Archer Wins Libel Trial Against the Daily Star; Sept. 24, 1992: British Cabinet Member David Mellor Resigns over Romantic Affair; Jan. 5, 1994: British Cabinet Member Resigns After Fathering a Child Out of Wedlock; May, 1999: Civil Rights Leader Jesse Jackson Fathers a Child Out of Wedlock; Sept. 28, 2002: British Politician Reveals Her Affair with Prime Minister John Major; Jan. 21, 2006: British Politician Resigns After Gay–Sex Orgy; Apr. 26, 2006: Britain’s Deputy Prime Minister Admits Affair with Secretary.

January 25, 1984

JESSE JACKSON CALLS NEW YORK CITY “HYMIETOWN”

Civil rights leader Jesse Jackson called Jews “Hymie” and New York City “Hymietown” in a casual conversation with a reporter during his campaign for president of the United States. His words were printed in The Washington Post and created a firestorm among Jewish protesters, Black Muslim supporters of Jackson, and much of the press in the United States. The slur did not surprise many, however, because of Jackson’s history of making anti-Semitic comments.

LOCALE: Washington, D.C.

CATEGORIES: Racism; social issues and reform; publishing and journalism; politics; civil rights and liberties

KEY FIGURES

Jesse Jackson (b. 1941), African American civil rights leader and Baptist minister

Milton Coleman (fl. 1980’s), reporter for The Washington Post

Rick Atkinson (b. 1952), reporter for The Washington Post

Louis Farrakhan (b. 1933), leader of the Nation of Islam

SUMMARY OF EVENT

In early 1984, the Reverend Jesse Jackson, a political radical in the Civil Rights movement and a longtime civil rights leader, was campaigning to win the Democratic Party’s nomination for the U.S. presidency. He was considered the first credible African American contender for candidacy, given his strong support among blacks. White voters did not seem to support him en masse. He spurred a large black voter turnout in the primaries and was picking up enough delegates to enable him to make the party concede some of his political demands at the Democratic National Convention. However, in a casual conversation with a black reporter on January 25, in a talk he assumed was off the record, he referred to Jews as “hymie” and to New York City as “hymietown.”

Jackson had been waiting for a flight from National Airport in Washington, D.C., when Milton Coleman, an African American reporter for The

Jesse Jackson. (Library of Congress)

Washington Post, engaged him in a conversation. Jackson warmed up to the chitchat and said they should “talk black talk,” that is, speak in confidence because both were black. The two talked about Jackson’s campaign and its racial ramifications. Coleman also took note of Jackson’s use, in what must have been an unguarded moment, of the terms “hymie” and “hymietown.” Not until later, however, did Coleman decide the utterance was too significant to be kept private. Such comments constituted racial slurs, and he perhaps believed that the electorate should know that a person running for president of the United States had uttered anti-Semitic words to denigrate an entire group of people. Prejudice of any kind in a possible president was too important to keep secret from the voters.

Jackson’s record on racial issues had been controversial and provocative for some time. Jackson had a history of anti-Jewish comments, that is, about Jews in general and Israel in particular. In 1979, he suggested Jews were responsible for the ouster of Andrew Young, an African American, as ambassador to the United Nations. He suggested Jews orchestrated the removal because Young had a private meeting with a Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) agent at the United Nations. (The PLO was the coordinating council for Palestine refugee groups, founded in 1964, which viewed Israel as an illegal country and was committed to establishing a Palestinian state.) On other occasions, Jackson said that Jews had a persecution complex that caused them to overreact to their own suffering. He said he was tired of hearing about the Holocaust, which, he said, was no worse than the suffering of blacks during the period of American slavery. He said that when Richard Nixon was U.S. president, several of his top advisers were German Jews who were more concerned about European and Asian affairs than with the poor and disadvantaged in the United States. He said Jews were false friends to blacks, and he disregarded the many instances in American history when Jews and blacks struggled side by side for civil, political, and human rights.

Jackson’s trip to Israel in 1979 included his figurative embrace of PLO chairman Yasser Arafat as a personal friend and “the friend of justice and humanity.” Jackson attributed negative media coverage of his trip to Jewish reporters’ lack of objectivity about Arab affairs. He reacted to his critics by accusing Jews in the media of perpetuating negative stories about him.

Given this well-known background, especially to reporters covering the first African American to run seriously for presidential nomination by a major American political party, Coleman likely did not have much heart-wrenching deliberation about whether to pass along Jackson’s “Hymietown” remarks to a white colleague. That reporter, Rick Atkinson, revealed Jackson’s comments in a February 13 article in The Washington Post about the candidate’s proposed foreign policy. However, the slurs were buried in the article’s thirty-seventh paragraph.

Not unexpectedly, protests erupted in Jewish and other communities. Liberal publications condemned Jackson and argued that his campaign could adversely affect interracial politics and scare voters away from the Democratic Party. With a white backlash fueled by white racism against blacks, critics argued, the United States could see the reelection of Republican president Ronald Reagan.

Attempting to distance himself from the controversy, Jackson initially claimed no recollection of making the remarks and then denied making them. What spurred his memory, however, were the coming primaries and curious voters. He went to Manchester, New Hampshire, two days before the New Hampshire primary, made an emotional speech at a synagogue, admitted his offense, and apologized for the slurs.

The controversy might have receded at this time except for an inflammatory radio sermon by Louis Farrakhan, the leader of the Black Muslim group Nation of Islam. In his sermon, he said that reporter Coleman should be punished for the pain he caused Jackson, whom Farrakhan supported. Farrakhan went on to warn Jews that if they harmed Jackson, it would be the last “black brother” they would harm. Jackson was expected to denounce Farrakhan for the comment and threats, but even though he noted that Farrakhan’s remarks were counterproductive and even wrong, he did not disavow him. Reagan, Jackson countered, had not rejected the endorsement he received from the Ku Klux Klan. Jackson’s failure to denounce Farrakhan weakened the salutary effect of his apology to the Jewish people.

IMPACT

Jackson’s run for the presidency had been considered a long shot by politicians and others, but his campaign was effective for bringing unprecedented numbers of black voters to the polls. In turn, he accumulated enough delegates so that he would have considerable clout in pushing for political concessions at the Democratic convention. However, when the story broke about his racial slurs, his reputation was forever tarnished. Democratic Party leaders feared his comments would adversely affect the party’s platform, which embraces racial and ethnic diversity. To what extent white racism would emerge to influence the election was another concern. Jackson almost single-handedly caused even more white voters to vote Republican in the election and reelect Reagan.

Jesse Jackson Calls New York City “Hymietown”

Black leaders were dismayed by Jackson’s strained relationship with Jews because many African Americans welcomed their generally supportive relationship with American Jews. That Jackson had offended Jews meant that domestic relations between the two groups would be endangered. Jewish leaders, in turn, were even more convinced that Jackson, who had so publicly embraced Arab and Palestinian issues, was anti-Semitic. The long-established affinity between African Americans and Jews became tenuous, and the long-standing suspicions many Jews had about Jackson remained as a result of the 1984 presidential campaign scandal.

—Jane L. Ball

FURTHER READING

Bruns, Roger. Jesse Jackson: A Biography. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2005. Examines Jackson’s life from his early years through his civil rights work, his leadership roles, and his work in international diplomacy. Mostly complimentary but includes some critical views. Photographs.

Landess, Thomas H., and Richard M. Quinn. Jesse Jackson and the Politics of Race. Cheshunt, England: Jameson Books, 1985. A look at Jackson’s political life. Less than approving of his career. Also discusses falsehoods attributed to him about his childhood and other aspects of his life.

Timmerman, Ken. Shakedown: Exposing the Real Jesse Jackson. Washington, D.C.: Regnery, 2002. Critical, candid revelations by so-called inner-circle Jacksonites about Jackson operations and how he manipulates American race relations for personal gain. Presents Jackson as a fraud. An entire chapter covers his association with Yasir Arafat and sheds light on Jackson’s attitude toward Jews.

SEE ALSO: July 2, 1963: Muslim Leader Elijah Muhammad Is Sued for Paternity; Sept. 23, 1987: Plagiarism Charges End Joe Biden’s Presidential Campaign; Dec. 1, 1987: Yale Scholar's War-time Anti-Semitic Writings Are Revealed; Oct. 11-13, 1991: Justice Clarence Thomas's Confirmation Hearings Create a Scandal; May, 1999: Civil Rights Leader Jesse Jackson Fathers a Child Out of Wedlock; Dec. 5, 2002: Senator Trent Lott Praises Strom Thurmond's 1948 Presidential Campaign; Dec. 17, 2003: Senator Strom Thurmond's Biracial Daughter Is Revealed; July 28, 2006: Actor Mel Gibson Is Caught Making Anti-Semitic Remarks.

May 2, 1984

E. F. HUTTON EXECUTIVES PLEAD GUILTY TO FRAUD

One of the oldest, largest, and best-known brokerage firms on Wall Street, E. F. Hutton ran a major check-kiting scheme that allowed it to acquire interest-free loans, which in turn generated millions of dollars of income. Hutton eventually pleaded guilty to mail and wire fraud, the first criminal conviction for a Wall Street investment firm in U.S. history.

LOCALE: New York, New York

CATEGORIES: Law and the courts; banking and finance; business; corruption; hoaxes, frauds, and charlatanism

KEY FIGURES

Robert M. Fomon (d. 2000), E. F. Hutton chief operating officer, 1970-1986, and chairman, 1977-1987

Thomas Morley (fl. 1980's), E. F. Hutton senior vice president

Tom Curnin (fl. 1980's), E. F. Hutton defense attorney

Griffin Bell (1918-2009), former U.S. attorney general, 1977-1979, headed investigation of E. F. Hutton

George L. Ball (fl. 1980's), president of E. F. Hutton, 1977-1982

SUMMARY OF EVENT

On May 2, 1984, the E. F. Hutton Company, the fifth largest investment firm in the United States, pleaded guilty to two thousand counts of wire and mail fraud. Beginning around 1980, Hutton had implemented and executed an elaborate, illegal, check-kiting scheme that would earn the company millions of dollars from interest-free loans. Hutton floated checks that were still in the clearing process, allowing the firm to earn interest during the time banks processed the checks and deposits. This approach worked for Hutton because of the slow rate in which checks cleared the banks, all in the days before electronic banking.

Hutton provided a vast array of services to its clients, including, primarily, stock trading and underwriting bond issues. A major benefit to Hutton was the speed at which it could offer communications and services. It had an aggressive management staff and numerous brokers (more than six thousand) who had direct wire access to the New York Stock Exchange. This success, especially during the 1970's and early 1980's, may arguably have been the starting point of the near collapse of the thriving company, which was founded in 1904 by Edwin Francis Hutton, a New York financier, along with his brother, Franklin Hutton, and Gerald Loeb. Hutton was unique when compared to other firms because it offered services to its customers from coast to coast. Hutton also was the first company to gain access from the West Coast directly to New York. The company eventually opened seasonal branch offices in Florida, California, and New York, allowing it to market to a wide range of customers across the country.

Another technique Hutton used to make money was chaining. Hutton branch employees would simply write checks for amounts that exceeded available funds, and Hutton covered those checks with other checks drawn from company branches (checks written by Hutton to Hutton), mainly among rural bank accounts. This made it appear that the company had funds available in more than one account until all checks cleared. The banks used for the scheme were, primarily, United Penn Bank in Wilkes-Barre, Pennsylvania; American Bank and Trust Company in Reading, Pennsylvania; and Genesee County Bank in Batavia, New York. A number of overdrafts of these local bank accounts triggered the start of the investigations against Hutton. These investigations would be headed by former U.S. attorney general Griffin Bell.

Thomas Morley, a senior vice president who had been hired to better manage the company's cash flow, later reported in a company memo that chaining checks allowed the company to profit as much as thirty thousand dollars per month, per branch, in extra income. George Ball, Hutton's president, was pleased with this report and encouraged these practices throughout the company. Essentially, Hutton was provided the equivalent of interest-free loans. Reports showed that on some days Hutton "earned" $250 million in interest-free loans. Hutton executives were committing white collar crimes, a phrase coined in 1939 by Edwin Sutherland, considered the founder of the study of occupational crime. Sutherland referred to white collar crimes as those committed by individuals (white collar criminals) of higher socioeconomic status, usually within the workplace.

For nearly three years, Hutton continued with the scheme, but the firm's downfall came when officials at the Genesee County Bank questioned the large deposits that were being made by Hutton. The bank in Batavia was a small branch with four employees, and the deposits seemed far too large for the office. Hutton soon came under question by New York examiners, and it retained Thomas F. Curnin for legal services. Even with Curnin helping, company chairman Robert M. Fomon openly defended all senior executives against criminal charges.

In addition to the guilty plea, the company agreed to pay a $2 million fine, $750,000 for the expenses of the investigation, and restitution in the amount of $8 million. This is the estimated amount the company received in illegal income. The plea bargain and guilty plea freed individual executives from culpability, but the company was barred from practicing within the securities industry. Only the company as a whole would face any repercussions for the criminal offenses. Some critics have argued that Hutton received a lenient sentence because of the plea bargain.

E. F. Hutton Executives Plead Guilty to Fraud

IMPACT

The Hutton scandal led many customers to pull their accounts, led star employees within the company to take jobs with other firms, and kept public agencies from conducting business with the firm. Hutton also was harshly scrutinized by the media, and it was given the sort of attention the company would rather not have. Instead, media reports brought irreparable damage to the company's reputation.

On December 3, 1987, Hutton, the first Wall Street investment company to be convicted of a crime, was auctioned off to Shearson Lehman Brothers for $1 billion and was renamed Shearson Lehman Hutton. Hutton later came under the ownership of Citigroup. The investment firm, even with its new owner and name, would never again have the respected reputation it held prior to the scandal.

—Lisa M. Carter

FURTHER READING

Brancato, Carolyn Kay, and Christian A. Plath. Corporate Governance Best Practices: A Blueprint for the Post-Enron Era. New York: Conference Board, 2003. A study that examines corporate leadership, ethics, and responsibility at a time of increased public awareness of corporate fraud and mismanagement.

Carpenter, Donna S., and John Feloni. The Fall of the House of Hutton. New York: Henry Holt, 1989. Corporate biography that includes the history and background of the company, the investigation, and court proceedings surrounding the scandal.

Ermann, M. D., and R. L. Lundman, eds. Corporate and Governmental Deviance: Problems of Organizational Behavior in Contemporary Society. New York: Oxford University Press, 2002. An overview of governmental and corporate deviance, written from the perspective of organizational behavior and practice.

Green, G. S. Occupational Crime. Chicago: Nelson-Hall, 1990. Focuses on occupational crime and deviance. One chapter discusses the early beginnings of white collar crime as an area of study in the fields of criminology and criminal justice.

MacDonald, Scott B., and Jane E. Hughes. Separating Fools from Their Money: A History of American Financial Scandals. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 2007. This book provides readers with a detailed history of American financial scandals. Useful for its analysis of corporate fraud.

SEE ALSO: 1932: Insull Utilities Trusts Collapse Prompts New Federal Regulation; Mar. 29, 1962: Billie Sol Estes Is Arrested for Corporate Fraud; Nov. 28, 1967: Investor Louis Wolfson Is Convicted of Selling Stock Illegally; May 7, 1985: Banker Jake Butcher Pleads Guilty to Fraud; Jan. 15, 1988: ZZZZ Best Founder Is Indicted on Federal Fraud Charges; Mar. 29, 1989: Financier Michael Milken Is Indicted for Racke-teering and Fraud; 2001: Clearstream Financial Clearinghouse Is Accused of Fraud and Money Laundering; Dec. 2, 2001: Enron Bankruptcy Reveals Massive Financial Fraud; June 25, 2002: Internal Corruption Forces Adelphia Communications to Declare Bankruptcy; Sept. 3, 2003: Mutual Fund Companies Are Implicated in Shady Trading Practices; Oct. 14, 2004: Insurance Brokerage Marsh & McLennan Is Charged with Fraud; Sept. 12, 2005: Westar Energy Executives Are Found Guilty of Looting Their Company; Sept. 18, 2006: Newsweek Reveals That Hewlett-Packard Spied on Its Own Board.

July 23, 1984

VANESSA WILLIAMS IS THE FIRST MISS AMERICA TO RESIGN

Vanessa Williams, the first African American to be crowned Miss America, resigned her title after Penthouse magazine announced that it would publish nude photographs of her. A photographer sold the photos to the magazine without her consent. The scandal combined issues of race, sexuality, gender, the ideal of feminine beauty, and the right to privacy.

LOCALE: New York, New York

CATEGORIES: Publishing and journalism; social issues and reform; sex; women's issues; racism

KEY FIGURES

Vanessa Williams (b. 1963), Miss America 1984
Bob Guccione (b. 1930), founder and publisher of Penthouse magazine

Albert A. Marks (1913-1989), executive director of Miss America Organization

Tom Chiapel (b. 1950), photographer

Helene Freeman (fl. 1980's), Williams's attorney

Suzette Charles (b. 1963), Miss America 1984

Ramon Hervey II (b. 1950), publicist and film producer

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Vanessa Williams gained much media exposure as the first African American woman to be crowned Miss America on September 17, 1983. The following summer, Bob Guccione, owner and publisher of the adult magazine Penthouse, announced he would publish photographs of Williams nude. Pageant officials pressured Williams to resign, which she did. The risqué issue of Penthouse, which hit news-stands the weekend before she resigned, sold out within one week and went through a second printing of tens of thousands of copies. Williams subsequently filed a lawsuit against Guccione and the photographer involved but later dropped the charges. To deal with the negative publicity, she hired a publicist, and with his guidance she successfully revived her career, winning awards as a singer and as a stage, film, and television actor.

Vanessa Williams announces her resignation as Miss America. (AP/Wide World Photos)

In 1982, Williams was a student at Syracuse University majoring in theater arts. She spent the summer as a receptionist for modeling photographer Tom Chiapel at his agency in Mount Kisco, New York. He convinced her to pose for some nude photo shoots; on at least one occasion the photo shoots included another woman. Williams later claimed that she was convinced by Chiapel that the shots would be artistic, adding that she did the shoot because she was curious and that she had never agreed to any later duplication or distribution of the images.

Vanessa Williams Is First Miss America to Resign

The next year, after winning Miss Greater Syracuse and then Miss New York, Williams went on to Atlantic City to represent her state in the annual Miss America pageant. She won the preliminary talent and swimsuit competitions and was crowned Miss America. She did a good job of performing her titular functions during her reign as Miss America 1984, though she received hate mail and castigation from two extremes: racist reactionaries who were opposed in principle to any nonwhite woman winning the pageant and Afrocentric radicals who were disappointed that the first black Miss America had light skin.

The media highlighted Williams's breaking of the race barrier in the most revered beauty pageant in the United States, and more than once she was compared to Jackie Robinson, who had broken the color line in professional baseball in 1947. Photographer Chiapel saw an opportunity for profit in Williams's new celebrity. Without consulting Williams, he approached Hugh Hefner, founder and publisher of the adult magazine Playboy, and offered to sell him the photos of Williams nude. Hefner turned him down, later stating on The Today Show that he saw the release of the photos as an inappropriate invasion of the current Miss America's privacy. His publishing rival, Guccione, had no such qualms, however.

Guccione bought the rights to the now-infamous photographs. The September, 1984, issue of Penthouse included several photos of Williams, some depicting simulated lesbian sex. Sales of the magazine increased by more than two million copies over the average issue distribution of 3.4 million. Penthouse published a follow-up photo feature, accompanied by an interview with the photographer, in its November, 1984, issue. Guccione made millions of dollars from the first Miss America exposé alone.

Albert A. Marks, the executive director of Miss America Organization, saw the photographs of Williams before publication and insisted that Williams resign. She did so at a news conference in New York City on July 23; the September issue of Penthouse appeared on newsstands just days before her resignation. Williams said she relinquished her title because she did not want harm to come to the pageant. She was allowed to keep her scholarship money but did lose endorsement deals. She also lost a deal for her autobiography.

The pageant weathered the scandal. Miss New Jersey, Suzette Charles, had been one of three other African American women, the highest number to make it so far in the history of the pageant, competing for Miss America in Atlantic City in 1983. Charles was first runner-up in the overall competition, so she took over as Miss America following Williams's resignation. Her reign was for a short two months. That Charles was a woman of color might have mollified some of the theories circulating that the publication of the nude photos of Williams was racially motivated.

Williams's lawyer, Helene Freeman, filed a $500 million lawsuit against Chiapel and Guccione in early September, 1984, claiming that the development and distribution of the photos had never been authorized or approved. Guccione had answered such assertions earlier by responding that he had in his possession a model release form that Williams herself had signed. He said that two different, respected handwriting-analysis experts had verified the signature as that of Williams. While Williams maintained throughout the controversy that she was a naïve young woman who had been misled by the photographer, she eventually dropped the charges.

Williams's career was salvaged, in no small part, because of the help of her publicist, Ramon Hervey II, who had been hired to do spin control. Hervey was an effective publicist and, later, he became her manager. Hervey helped transform her 1984 notoriety, which started scandalously, into an impressive, award-winning career in music, theater, film, and television. Williams and Hervey married in 1987.

IMPACT

It is clear that the September, 1984, issue of Penthouse was controversial. It also was incredibly lucrative financially for Guccione. Its cultural impact, however, was less clear at the time the scandal broke. The nude-photo feature would soon set the tone for an increasing emphasis on salacious articles and images of celebrities in American popular culture in the closing decades of the twentieth century.

At the time of the controversy, feminist leaders such as Gloria Steinem and influential African American leaders such as Jesse Jackson rallied in defense of Williams, creating enough of a support base to indicate that the risque photos, which, in the past, surely would have destroyed a young Miss America's future, did not—and should not—negate Williams's overall accomplishments as a person.

The scandal also led to discussions about how African American celebrities are held to a different standard of public acceptability than are white celebrities. It also brought to light the different standards of acceptability and beauty among African Americans, standards based on the lightness or darkness of one's skin. The scandal also raised feminist questions about the significance and purpose of how women are treated and represented in both beauty-pageant culture and men's pornography, and ways in which the two categories might intersect. Furthermore, the scandal led to more open and frank discussions about fantasies of lesbian sex.

Subsequent beauty pageant scandals would have less dramatic impact, and the general public would be more willing to forgive beauty queens some tarnish on their crowns, particularly if the women involved publicly apologized and asked for forgiveness. Williams's comeback after the scandal made her a powerhouse star, ultimately suggesting that the notoriety of such a scandal, when handled adroitly by a good publicist, could indeed be used to further one's career.

—Scot M. Guenter

FURTHER READING

Banet-Weiser, Sarah. The Most Beautiful Girl in the World: Beauty Pageants and National Identity. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1999. A cultural history of the Miss America pageant that considers how the pageant process shapes and influences female identity at both the personal and social levels.

Elmer, Jonathan. "The Exciting Conflict: The Rhetoric of Pornography and Anti-Pornography." Cultural Critique no. 8 (Winter, 1987): 45-77. A scholarly evaluation of the Williams scandal in the context of cultural debate over defining the boundaries of pornography.

Jones, Trina. "Shades of Brown: The Law of Skin Color." Duke Law Journal 49, no. 6 (2000): 1487-1557. Historical legal review of "colorism," the issue of varying acceptances and perceptions of light skin versus dark skin, within the larger construct of dealing with African American racism.

Shalit, Willa. Becoming Myself: Reflections on Growing Up Female. New York: Hyperion Books, 2006. Williams and sixty-six other inspiring women celebrities and writers share short, personal essays on significant events in their journeys to becoming women.

Watson, Elwood, and Darcy Martin, eds. There She Is, Miss America. New York: Palgrave, 2004. Interdisciplinary anthology that explores the intersections of race, gender, ethnicity, and consumerism in the Miss America pageant.

SEE ALSO: Jan. 20, 1933: Hedy Lamarr Appears Nude in the Czech Film Exstase; Summer, 1936: Film Star Mary Astor's Diary Becomes a Public Sensation; Dec. 1, 1952: George Jorgensen Becomes Christine Jorgensen; 1978: Actor Joan Crawford's Daughter Publishes Damning Memoir, Mommie Dearest; July 28, 1980: Magazine Reveals Baseball Star Steve Garvey's Marital Problems; Dec. 7, 1980: Rita Jenrette's "Diary of a Mad Congresswife" Scandalizes Washington; Dec., 1982: Julie Andrews and Blake Edwards Deny Being Gay; July 18, 1988: Actor Rob Lowe Videotapes Sexual Tryst with a Minor; June 24, 1994: Time Magazine Cover Uses Altered O. J. Simpson Photo; Early Nov., 2003: Paris Hilton Sex-Tape Appears on the Web.

December 22, 1984

SUBWAY VIGILANTE BERNHARD GOETZ SHOOTS FOUR BLACK YOUTHS

Bernhard Goetz's shooting of four black teenagers on a New York City subway train launched a heated public debate about vigilantism, self-defense, urban crime, and racism. After prolonged criminal and civil trials, Goetz, an electrician, was sentenced to jail for unlicensed gun possession and found liable for paralyzing one of the assailants.

LOCALE: New York, New York

CATEGORIES: Violence; law and the courts; racism; social issues and reform

KEY FIGURES

Bernhard Goetz (b. 1947), self-employed electrician

Darrell Cabey (b. 1965), New York City resident

Barry Slotnick (fl. 1980's), Goetz's attorney
Robert M. Morgenthau (b. 1919), New York district attorney

Stephen G. Crane (b. 1940), New York State judge

SUMMARY OF EVENT

On December 22, 1984, Bernhard Goetz shot four young African American men on a subway car in New York City. This violent incident, lasting no more than six seconds, would have local and national repercussions, as it touched on issues that are central to urban life in the United States.

Goetz seemed an unlikely person to have sparked this public debate. A bespectacled, slender, eccentric, Caucasian, thirty-seven-year-old loner, he operated his own electronics repair business out of his Manhattan apartment. However, he had been traumatized by a violent mugging on the subway in 1981 and by the subsequent denial of his request for a gun permit.

Bernhard Goetz, left. (AP/Wide World Photos)

On Saturday, December 22, at 1 P.M., Goetz boarded a downtown subway car carrying in a waistband holder a .38 caliber Smith & Wesson handgun. He had purchased the gun legally in 1970 but did not have a New York license to carry the weapon. Four black youths—Troy Canty, Barry Allen, James Ramseur, and Darrell Cabey—already on the subway train, had been acting raucously before Goetz boarded. The four young men all were between eighteen and nineteen years old and all had criminal records. Two of them had screwdrivers in their pockets. Their behavior led passengers to move to the other end of the subway car. Two of the youths, Canty and Allen, approached Goetz after he boarded and demanded five dollars from him. A third youth, Ramseur, gestured toward a bulge in his pocket, suggesting that he had a weapon. Goetz pulled out his handgun and fired four shots.

Canty apparently was shot first; the bullet penetrated through his body. Allen was shot in the back; Ramseur was shot through his arm and chest; and another shot missed. Goetz then walked over to Cabey and fired into his side with his fifth and final shot, severing Cabey's spinal cord. After telling a conductor that the youths had tried to rob him, Goetz leaped off the train onto the platform and disappeared into downtown Manhattan. He then rented a car and drove to Vermont, where he disposed of his gun.

Meanwhile, New York City was riveted by news of the shooting. Newspapers acclaimed the shooter as the "subway vigilante." He was likened to actor Charles Bronson's character, Paul Kersey, in the 1974 film Death Wish, in which Kersey avenged terrorized citizens of New York against hoodlums. Goetz, who surrendered to police in Concord, New Hampshire, on December 31, reinforced his vigilante image in his videotaped confessions to New Hampshire and New York police. In language freighted with images of Old West gunfights, Goetz recounted the incident. He talked of quick-draw holsters and laying down a "pattern of fire." He explained that his violent reaction was triggered when he saw that Canty's "eyes were shiny" and he "had a big smile on his face."

Unlike the media, police and government officials were outraged that Goetz took the law into his own hands. U.S. president Ronald Reagan denounced vigilantism, and New York City mayor Edward I. Koch described the shooting as "animal behavior." The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People likened Goetz to a Ku Klux Klan lyncher. New York district attorney Robert M. Morgenthau launched a criminal investigation. Cabey, paralyzed from the waist down from Goetz's shot, was represented by famous civil rights lawyer William Kunstler. Cabey sued Goetz for fifty million dollars. (The other youths recovered from their wounds.)

On January 25, 1985, a grand jury indicted Goetz only on a charge of illegal gun possession. Morgenthau, criticized for the grand jury's tame indictment, convened a second grand jury, appointing his leading assistant district attorney, Gregory Waples, to present the case and granting immunity to Cauty and Ramseur for their testimony. On March 27, the second grand jury indicted Goetz on ten counts that included assault and attempted murder.

One year later, on January 21, 1986, Judge Stephen G. Crane dismissed nine of the counts on technical grounds relating to self-defense, dismissals that would assume great importance in the case. Waples had instructed the grand jury that Goetz would have been justified in acting in self-defense only if a reasonable person would have believed such actions necessary—a so-called objective standard. However, New York courts had evolved a “subjective belief” standard over the previous few years; that is, the defendant would be justified in using force if he or she believed such force necessary for his or her self-defense. Morgenthau appealed Crane's self-defense ruling to New York's appellate division, which affirmed Crane's decision on April 17. The district attorney then appealed this decision to the New York Court of Appeals, the state's highest court. In a July 8 ruling, the appeals court reinstated all the counts against Goetz on the grounds that the decision to use self-defense must be objectively reasonable, although the court emphasized that a determination of reasonableness can be based on the defendant's characteristics and circumstances, including any prior experience. The case of People v. Goetz was sent back to Crane for trial.

Goetz's trial before Judge Crane began on December 12 under intense media scrutiny. Although Goetz asserted his Fifth Amendment right not to testify, his attorney, Barry Slotnick, argued that Goetz shot the youths out of fear that they were about to assault him. Following the guidance from the court of appeals, Crane instructed the jury that Goetz was justified in defending himself if his experiences, including that he had been injured in a 1981 mugging, indicated to him that his actions were necessary. On June 16, 1987, the jury returned a verdict of not guilty on all the charges except criminal possession of a weapon in the third degree. On November 22, 1988, Goetz's appeal of his conviction was denied and he was sentenced to one year in jail as well as community service and was fined $5,075. Goetz served eight months of his sentence.

The civil trial against Goetz had a different outcome. On April 23, 1996, a jury, which had been instructed to assess Goetz's convictions on an objective standard, found that he acted recklessly and without justification when he shot Cabey. The jury awarded Cabey forty-three million dollars for his physical injuries and emotional distress. Goetz filed for bankruptcy soon after the case was decided.

IMPACT

The impact of the case of People v. Goetz was twofold, affecting both the theoretical interpretation of self-defense law and the day-to-day perceptions and lives of New York City residents. As to legal affairs, the microscopic attention paid to New York's justification law during the lengthy litigation process against Goetz represented an elaborate explanation of what it means to employ violence in self-defense. The result was a hybrid standard combining objective and subjective factors. The New York courts ruled that the objective reasonableness of a defendant's actions must be evaluated according to his or her background and subjective life experiences. This was a new and widely commented on standard in the centuries-old law of criminal self-defense.

As to life in the city, Goetz was one of the most important cases in the urban history of New York. Goetz injured four young men, paralyzing one of them. The case laid bare the racial divisions in the city and the legal system, which would only be exacerbated in the years that followed the shooting. The case also exposed the fear of crime that was overtaking cities in the United States and the desperation of urban residents for remedies—even violent ones—that would frustrate urban hoodlums.

Perhaps the greatest impact of the Goetz case was that it brought to light the petty lawlessness that public authorities had allowed to fester and grow in New York. At the time of the shooting, New York City had reached the highest crime rate in its history and was notorious throughout the country for muggings and other urban dangers. Over the next decades, city officials made a determined effort to crack down on petty offenses. It was perhaps no coincidence that crime rates would soon decline dramatically.

—Howard Bromberg

FURTHER READING

Fletcher, George P. A Crime of Self-Defense: Bernhard Goetz and the Law on Trial. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1990. A Columbia Law School professor focuses on legal questions of justification and self-defense raised during the Goetz trials and appeals.

Gladwell, Malcolm. The Tipping Point: How Little Things Can Make a Big Difference. Boston: Little, Brown, 2000. Chapter four explains the Goetz shooting as the result of a decline in living standards and the rise of offenses that affected the quality of life in New York City.

Kennedy, Randall. Race, Crime, and the Law. New York: Pantheon Books, 1997. A Harvard Law School professor briefly analyzes the Goetz prosecution in terms of racial relations.

Lesly, Mark, with Charles Shuttleworth. Subway Gunman: A Juror's Account of the Bernhard Goetz Trial. Latham, N.Y.: British American, 1988. A juror's perspective on the trial that also features trial documents, including the indictment, the prosecution's opening and closing statements, and notes from juror deliberations.

Markovitz, Jonathan. "Bernhard Goetz and the Politics of Fear." In Violence and the Body: Race, Gender, and the State, edited by Arturo J. Aldama. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2003. This chapter on the Goetz shooting is part of a collection that examines the significance of "body politics" in a culture that fears violence. The Goetz case is considered in light of white panic and white rage, politicized responses that justify vigilantism.

Rubin, Lillian B. Quiet Rage: Bernie Goetz in a Time of Madness. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1986. An account of the shooting that probes the psychological states of those involved in the incident, especially Goetz. Claims Goetz was emotionally unstable at the time of the shooting.

SEE ALSO: Mar. 30, 1931: "Scottsboro Boys" Are Railroaded Through Rape Trials; Nov. 28, 1987: Black Teenager Claims to Have Been Gang-Raped by Police Officers; Mar., 1990: Menendez Brothers Are Arrested for Murdering Their Parents; May 19, 1992: Amy Fisher Shoots Mary Jo Buttafuoco; June 23, 1993: Lorena Bobbitt Severs Her Husband's Penis; June 12, 1994: Double Murder Leads to Sensational O. J. Simpson Trial.

1985-1986

WESTLAND AFFAIR SHAKES PRIME MINISTER THATCHER'S GOVERNMENT

The Westland affair was a bitter disagreement within Margaret Thatcher's cabinet over how to support Great Britain's ailing Westland helicopter company. Thatcher and Leon Brittan, minister for trade and industry, wanted to see a takeover by the American company Sikorsky, while Defence Minister Michael Heseltine wanted to pursue a European option. In the tussle, cabinet disunity led to a leak of the conflict, Heseltine's and Brittan's resignations, and an enquiry in which the government had to defend its integrity.

LOCALE: London, England

CATEGORIES: Government; politics; space and aviation; business; trade and commerce

KEY FIGURES

Margaret Thatcher (b. 1925), British prime minister, 1979-1990

Michael Heseltine (b. 1933), minister of defence, 1983-1986

Leon Brittan (b. 1939), minister for the Department of Trade and Industry, 1985-1986

Robert Armstrong (b. 1927), cabinet secretary, 1979-1987

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Westland Aircraft Limited, a helicopter company located in Yeovil, Somerset, England, was a mid-size British manufacturer, with a turnover of some $600 million annually during the 1980's. Unlike the rest of the British aircraft industry, Westland had not been nationalized by a previous Labour government and remained Britain's only maker of helicopters. During the mid-1980's, Westland began to encounter financial difficulties following a lack of orders from the British military. So the company turned to the British government for help in April, 1985, when financier Alan Bristow put in a bid for the manufacturer. He wanted a write-off of government aid due for repayment and assurance of orders, if not from Britain, then from India with British aid.

At the time, the issue was not a major one, commercially or politically. The government of Margaret Thatcher, on the whole, took a hard line on ailing industries, but defense needs suggested the wisdom of keeping a British-based company running. In the end, the bid was unsuccessful but a new board of directors was installed under the chairship of Sir John Cuckney. On October 4, the newly appointed minister for the Department of Trade and Industry, Leon Brittan, reported the need for a new minority shareholder to inject more capital into the company. The American helicopter giant, Sikorsky, was willing to become the minority shareholder, and the Westland board agreed. Sikorsky already had been allowing Westland to build some of its patents.

At this stage, Michael Heseltine, the ambitious and energetic minister of defence, began to make his views known that a European future, rather than an American one, was necessary for Westland. From 1978 there had been an agreement among some European countries that, where possible, helicopter purchases should be kept to European manufacturers. Heseltine gathered the national armament directors of Germany, France, and Italy to get them to say that if Westland moved into American hands, it would not be possible to deal with the company in the future. At the same time, Heseltine was actively trying to put together a rescue package among European companies for Westland. By this time, Westland directors were actively proposing a takeover by Sikorsky.

By December, 1985, the differences between Brittan and Heseltine entered into serious departmental rivalry, and Prime Minister Thatcher had to intervene. She called a series of three meetings, the first two fairly informal, the third, held December 9, a fuller meeting of involved ministers. It was decided to keep the European option open until Friday, December 13. A firm decision would have to be taken at this meeting to maintain confidence in the company because Westland's annual accounts were to be published two days before the ministers met.

Accounts of this last meeting differed between Heseltine and Thatcher. Heseltine was expecting one further meeting; Thatcher was not and did not call one. The deadline passed without an agreed rescue bid from the Europeans. However, Heseltine continued to act as though everything was still negotiable. Thatcher wrote to Cuckney to say that the government would continue to see Westland as a British company and do its best to protect the company.

Though Heseltine seemed to be flouting the rules of collective cabinet decision-making, nothing was done to stop him. It could be that Thatcher feared his wide popularity within the Conservative Party. It was decided in early 1986 to ask one of the leading government lawyers, the solicitor-general Christopher Mayhew, to give a legal opinion as to Heseltine's contention that Westland would lose all European business. Mayhew's carefully worded letter suggested that there were "material inaccuracies" in Heseltine's statements. The letter was almost immediately leaked by Brittan's department, probably with the connivance of the prime minister's office. The national press seized on the scandal, accusing Heseltine of lying.

At the cabinet meeting of January 9, the prime minister told members that great damage was being done to the government by the leak of the letter, and that in the future all communications about Westland must be cleared through her office before being circulated. By now, it seems Heseltine had had enough; he promptly resigned and walked out, issuing a long and carefully worded statement a few hours later.

The matter did not stop there, however. Mayhew's senior in government, Attorney General Michael Havers, demanded an enquiry into the leak, which had the confidentiality of a legal document as well as being a leak of one minister against another. The enquiry was conducted by Robert Armstrong, the senior civil servant in the cabinet office. He concluded that Brittan had indeed authorized the leak. In the parliamentary debates that followed, Thatcher had to defend Brittan and herself. While seeing off the threat to her own position by claiming ignorance on the one hand, and making some apologies on the other, the Conservative backbenchers saw the need for Brittan to resign. Thatcher "reluctantly" accepted his resignation.

IMPACT

The Westland company was taken over by Sikorsky and managed to do well. However, Thatcher lost her reputation for straight and honest dealing as prime minister, and grave fault lines in her cabinet came to light. Her cabinet style also was scrutinized. A further review by the all-party Parliamentary Defence Committee grilled Armstrong, and the integrity of the civil service also came under suspicion. However, it was felt that the Labour opposition had lost a major opportunity in the parliamentary debate, when its leader, Neil Kinnock, made a blustering and ineffective attack on Thatcher, which did no more than reveal the insignificance of the Westland decision. Brittan, though, was unable to return to the cabinet and eventually ended his political career as a commissioner in Brussels, Belgium, for the European Union.

Former British defence secretary Michael Heseltine in London in January, 1986. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

In the long term, Thatcher created an independent and vocal critic of her policies. Heseltine's politics were more akin to Thatcher's predecessor, Edward Heath, in its desire for government intervention. In the end he became a rival for her post. During the 1990 contest for leadership of the party, it was Heseltine who emerged as her chief rival at first, and his support in the first round of voting was the main cause of her resignation as party leader. In fact, Heseltine was unable to increase his support and John Major became the new leader. However, Heseltine did become deputy prime minister during the later stages of the Major ministry.

—David Barratt

FURTHER READING

Her Majesty's Stationery Office. Fourth Report from the Defence Committee, 23 July, 1986. London: Author, 1986. A full account of one of the most revealing enquiries into misconduct produced by an all-party select committee.

Heseltine, Michael. Life in the Jungle: An Autobiography, London: Hodder & Stoughton, 2000. Contains Heseltine's account of the affair in considerable detail.

Linklater, Magnus, and David Leigh. Not with Honour. London: Sphere, 1986. A thorough account of the affair produced shortly after the scandal subsided. Shows some signs of haste.

Thatcher, Margaret. The Downing Street Years, 1979-1990. New York: HarperCollins, 1993.

Westland Affair Shakes Thatcher's Government

Thatcher's account of the affair, which, of course, does no favors to Michael Heseltine.

Uttley, Matthew R. H. Westland and the British Helicopter Industry, 1945-1960: Licensed Production Versus Indigenous Innovation. Portland, Oreg.: Frank Cass, 2001. Argues that Westland succeeded in the postwar years because it focused on the licensed production of helicopter technology developed in the United States, such as that by Sikorsky.

Young, Hugo. The Iron Lady: A Biography of Margaret Thatcher. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1989. Of all the biographies and autobiographies, this perhaps gives the most balanced account of the affair, taken from personal interviews with those involved.

SEE ALSO: Jan., 1913: British Prime Minister's Staff Is Investigated for Insider Trading; May, 1915: British Government Falls Because of Munitions Shortages and Military Setbacks; June 22, 1922: British Prime Minister David Lloyd George Is Accused of Selling Honors; May, 1930: Postmaster's Division of Airmail Routes Creates a Scandal; May 20, 1936: British Cabinet Member Resigns After Budget Information Leak; Mar. 2-Sept. 25, 1963: John Profumo Affair Rocks British Government; June 22, 1972: Police Arrest Architect John Poulson for Bribery and Fraud; Nov. 20, 1974: British Politician John Stonehouse Fakes His Suicide; May 29, 1981: Court Finds That Ford Ignored Pinto's Safety Problems; July 25, 1987: Novelist-Politician Jeffrey Archer Wins Libel Trial Against the Daily Star; Sept. 24, 1992: British Cabinet Member David Mellor Resigns over Romantic Affair; Nov. 18, 1995: Former Canadian Premier Brian Mulroney Is Exposed in Airbus Scandal; Dec. 23, 1998: Prominent Belgians Are Sentenced in Agusta-Dassault Corruption Scandal.

May 7, 1985

BANKER JAKE BUTCHER PLEADS GUILTY TO FRAUD

After building a large banking empire, twice running for governor of Tennessee, and working as the chief planner and backer of a world's fair in Knoxville, Jake Butcher witnessed the collapse of his banking empire in a scandal involving fraudulent loans and other financial crimes that sent him to federal prison. The collapse of his United American Bank in 1983 marked one of the largest bank failures in U.S. history.

LOCALE: Knoxville, TennesseeCATEGORIES: Banking and finance; business; corruption; forgery; law and the courtsKEY FIGURES

Jake Butcher (b. 1936), Tennessee banker
Cecil H. Butcher, Jr. (1939-2002), Tennessee banker

SUMMARY OF EVENT

On November 1, 1982, the banks of the Butcher brothers, Jake and C. H., Jr., were raided by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (FDIC). To prevent transfers of loans and assets between banks, almost two hundred federal investigators descended on the banks simultaneously. Investigators soon discovered that the twenty-nine banks and branches ran a network of forged documents, illegal and unsecured loans, and other forms of bank fraud. The revelations shocked the banking world and investors.

Jake Butcher was born in Union County, Tennessee, in 1936. His father, Cecil H. Butcher, Sr., owned a general store and was the founding partner in 1929 of the Southern Industrial Banking Corporation, which made loans to farmers. Jake's father also organized and presided over Union County Bank in Maynardville during the 1950's. Jake's career in banking began by sweeping bank floors and counting pennies for his father. After some college (he never graduated) and time in the U.S. Marine Corps, Jake founded an Amoco Oil distributorship.

He and his younger brother, C. H. Butcher, Jr., entered the banking industry in 1968 by aggressively borrowing large sums of money to buy stock in a number of banks. Eight Tennessee banks and other business properties were under their control by 1974.

Also in 1974, Jake began his career in politics by running for the Democratic nomination for governor of Tennessee. Although he lost this first nomination bid, he won it in 1978. He was defeated in the general election by Republican Lamar Alexander.

By 1976, the name of Jake Butcher was circulating in the business world. He lent Calhoun, Georgia, banker Bert Lance $443,000 to finance some of Lance's financial endeavors. Lance soon became the director of the U.S. Office of Management and Budget under newly elected president Jimmy Carter, who had already met Jake. Lance was soon accused of mismanaging his Calhoun bank, was forced to resign his position in the Carter administration, and was tried but acquitted of corruption charges. President Carter had actively campaigned for Jake during his 1978 bid for Tennessee governor.

The year 1978 remained a pivotal one for Jake. The family banking empire by the late 1970's included fourteen banks in Tennessee and Kentucky, still supported by heavy borrowing, and Jake claimed assets of more than $8 million. From the Carter administration, he received a $12.5 million grant for his next big project, the 1982 World's Fair in Knoxville. At its peak, the Butcher empire included twenty-seven banks.

The world's fair, which opened on May 1, brought about eleven million visitors to Knoxville in its six-month run. However, the celebration for Jake and his investors would be hampered later that year. Rumors began to circulate about Jake's banking practices, including the use of round-robin loans, in which loans are transferred to affiliate banks prior to auditor visits. One such loan was drafted in 1980, when Milton A. Turner signed a guarantee for a $2 million loan from Jake's United American Bank (UAB), the cornerstone of his banking empire. After the bank collapsed in 1983, the loan defaulted, leading the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (FDIC) to sue Turner for collection. Turner was shocked to find that the name of the loan guarantor had been changed—with correction fluid—from United American to City and County Bank of Knoxville, which was controlled by Jake's brother. In 1989, a federal appeals court ruled that Turner had been defrauded by Jake and UAB, so he was not required to repay the loan.

The collapse of UAB on February 14, 1983, marked the fourth largest bank failure in U.S. history. Other Butcher-controlled banks soon collapsed as well. The collapse of C. H. Butcher's SIBC, an uninsured thrift bank, caused many people to lose their life savings. C. H. pleaded guilty to bank fraud and other charges, served six years in prison, and was paroled in 1993. Other family members and friends of the brothers went to prison for their part in various illegal transactions.

In August, Jake was declared bankrupt with assets of $11.9 million and liabilities of $32.5 million. During bankruptcy proceedings, Jake used his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination so that he would not have to produce potentially damaging real estate documents. The U.S. Court of Appeals, Sixth Circuit, ruled in Jake's favor, partially, in its decision of January 11, 1985.

Because Jake's United American Financial Services Company, a separate entity, had filed for reorganization under bankruptcy laws, his asset auction was in full force during bankruptcy proceedings. His assets included a forty-room mansion with thirteen bathrooms in Knoxville, two condominiums in Lexington, Kentucky, a 1983 Lincoln Mark IV sedan, a private jet, a helicopter, and dozens of houseboats. The houseboats had been equipped as floating motels during the world's fair.

In November, 1984, the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) had charged Jake with violating the antifraud provisions of federal securities laws. The SEC claimed that after the initial raid of Butcher banks, Jake deceived purchasers of UAB's securities prior to its own collapse. On May 7, 1985, Jake pleaded guilty to federal bank fraud and was sentenced to twenty years in prison. In 1992, after serving almost seven years, he was paroled. He moved to a quiet suburb of Atlanta, Georgia.

The Butchers were related in one way or another with several court cases. Jake was named an unindicted coconspirator in the 1987 case against U.S. representative Harold E. Ford, Sr., of Memphis, Tennessee. Butcher banks had made unsecured loans to Ford and his family's funeral-home business several years earlier. Brother C. H., too, was charged in the Ford case but had already pleaded guilty in an agreement involving other cases. Ford was acquitted of all charges in 1993.

Perhaps the most significant court case in which Jake had ties was that involving Karl A. Schledwitz, a Memphis attorney. The Eastern District Court of Tennessee indicted Schledwitz in January, 1992, on eight counts of mail fraud. Schledwitz took out loans from Butcher-controlled banks during the early 1980's, at a time when Schledwitz did not have the income to justify the loans. Some of the loans, which totaled more than $1.5 million, were used to buy UAB stock, a stock purchase that, in turn, would raise the selling price of the bank. Some of the loan proceeds were given to the Butcher brothers for their personal use. In return, Schledwitz received referrals to his law firm. Although Schledwitz owed more than $2 million when the Butcher banks failed, he settled with the government for $120,000. He was convicted on some of the charges and his motions for a new trial were denied by the U.S. Court of Appeals in 1995.

IMPACT

The FDIC led the investigation of the Butcher banks and ultimately inherited most of the empire's debts. The FDIC also received a share of the blame for those enormous debts. In early 1984, the FDIC estimated that its losses in the Butcher bank failures would be about $400 million. By September of that year, that estimate was raised to $1.1 billion.

In November, 1983, the U.S. House Committee on Government Operations had issued a report that criticized the FDIC for not taking stronger action against the Butcher empire prior to 1982. With a 1987 lawsuit, the FDIC passed the blame to the accounting firm of Ernst & Whinney for being lax in its audits of four Butcher banks in 1981.

If the Butcher banking scandal had any positive impact, it was a procedural change within the FDIC. After the Butcher crisis, the federal banking agency strengthened its regulatory capacities, making it more difficult for similar crises to develop among American banks.

—Glenn L. Swygart

FURTHER READING

Adams, James Ring. The Big Fix: Inside the S & L Scandal—How an Unholy Alliance of Politics and Money Destroyed America's Banking System. New York: John Wiley & Sons, 1990. Examines the Butchers' use of round-robin loans, the practice of transferring loans to an affiliate bank just prior to an auditor's visit.

Lea, Sandra. Whirlwind: The Butcher Banking Scandal. Brookline, Mass.: Whirlwind, 2000. Discusses the setting for the Butcher brothers when they moved to Knoxville, Tennessee, and began their rise to power in the banking industry. Includes glimpses of most major figures in the scandal.

Ruble, Drew. "Vestige of Empire." Business Tennessee, July, 2006. Summarizes the life and influence of Jake Butcher, including his activities after prison. Analyzes the impact he had on the community of Knoxville, Tennessee.

"Tapped Out." Time, February 28, 1983. One of the first national stories about the collapse of the Butcher banking empire. Published one week after the failure of UAB.

Walker, John A., Jr. "Whirlwind: The Butcher Banking Scandal." Tennessee Bar Journal 37, no. 5 (May, 2001). A critical review of the 2000 book by Sandra Lea. Recognizes some value in the book but details the work's weaknesses in research and style.

Wheeler, William Bruce. Knoxville, Tennessee: A Mountain City in the New South. 2d ed. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 2005. Extensive coverage of the Butcher family. Discusses the economic impact of the Knoxville world's fair championed by Butcher as well as the collapse of the Butcher banking empire.

SEE ALSO: 1919-1920: Ponzi Schemes Are Revealed as Investment Frauds; Nov., 1929: Banque Oustric et Cie Failure Prompts French Inquiry; Mar. 29, 1962: Billie Sol Estes Is Arrested for Corporate Fraud; Sept. 21, 1977: Carter Cabinet Member Resigns over Ethics Violations; May 2, 1984: E. F. Hutton Executives Plead Guilty to Fraud; Mar. 29, 1989: Financier Michael Milken Is Indicted for Racketeering and Fraud; Jan., 1997: Pyramid Investment Schemes Cause Albanian Government to Fall; 2001: Clearstream Financial Clearinghouse Is Accused of Fraud and Money Laundering; Dec. 2, 2001: Enron Bankruptcy Reveals Massive Financial Fraud; Sept. 3, 2003: Mutual Fund Companies Are Implicated in Shady Trading Practices; Early 2007: Subprime Mortgage Industry Begins to Collapse; Sept. 20, 2008: American Financial Markets Begin to Collapse.

July 10, 1985

FRENCH SECRET SERVICE SINKS THE GREENPEACE SHIP RAINBOW WARRIOR

As part of its summer Pacific Peace Voyage, the Greenpeace ship Rainbow Warrior was scheduled to take part in a protest against French nuclear bomb tests on an island in the Pacific. While the ship was docked in Auckland, New Zealand, two bombs were attached to its hull by French secret service agents. The bombs exploded, leading to the death of a Greenpeace photographer and the ship's sinking.

LOCALE: Auckland, New Zealand

CATEGORIES: Violence; politics; environmental issues; government; murder and suicide

KEY FIGURES

Fernando Pereira (1950-1985), Portuguese-born Dutch photographer and Rainbow Warrior crew member

Steve Sawyer (b. 1956), American director of Greenpeace's Pacific Peace Tour

David McTaggart (1932-2001), Canadian chairman of Greenpeace International

Dominique Prieur (b. 1948), captain in the French secret service

Alain Mafart (b. 1949), major in the French secret service

Christine Huquette Cabon (b. 1951), French army lieutenant

SUMMARY OF EVENT

The environmental organization Greenpeace—which takes political action against whaling, seal hunting, environmental pollution, nuclear testing, and other ecological concerns—was founded by a group of Canadian antinuclear activists who were protesting nuclear testing by the U.S. government in 1969. The tests, conducted on earthquake-prone Amchitka Island in the Aleutian chain in the North Pacific off the coast of Alaska, prompted the group's slogan "Don't make a wave. It's your fault if our fault goes" because of fears that a bomb detonation could trigger earthquakes and tsunamis. In 1971, in Vancouver, British Columbia, Canada, group members selected the name Greenpeace for their fledgling organization and for the ship with which they mounted a protest against another nuclear test at Amchitka. The word "green" reflects the group's concern with ecological problems and the word "peace" reflects the group's commitment to peaceful direct action.

Greenpeace's early strategy involved the Quaker practice of bearing witness. For Greenpeace, this meant being present at the scene of ecological abuse so that perpetrators would know they were being watched and monitored. The strategy was soon expanded to include peaceful interference such as driving small boats between harpooners and the whales they targeted for killing, and placing boats in the region of expected fallout from nuclear tests, thus preventing a bomb's detonation. The group continues to publish and to inform the news media—all in an effort to make public the dangers faced by the environment and, thus, the earth's human population.

Greenpeace groups initially appeared in many countries, with little international unity. However, as the network grew, it coalesced into an international organization during the 1980's. Even after their unification as Greenpeace International, the regional groups continued to operate independently.

Given that protests often involved marine contexts, the ownership and maintenance of ships, boats, and other watercraft have been important parts of Greenpeace history. One of the first seaworthy ships the organization owned was a former research vessel from the British ministry of agriculture, the Sir William Hardy. Greenpeace bought it, cleaned it up, repaired it, and christened it the Rainbow Warrior. It became a symbol of Greenpeace as the organization's flagship. The name was inspired by an American Indian legend that assures that after civilization compromises the earth's ability to sustain life, the warriors of the rainbow would restore that ability to Earth.

The Greenpeace ship Rainbow Warrior begins to sink in Auckland Harbor, New Zealand, after being damaged by two bombs attached to the ship's hull by French government agents. (© Greenpeace)

During the 1980's, Greenpeace was active on several fronts. One goal for the organization was to bring an end to French nuclear-weapons testing on islands in the Pacific. One island, Moruroa, was used repeatedly by the French, and Greenpeace demonstrated at the island nearly as often. Another test was scheduled for Moruroa in the summer of 1985. Greenpeace commissioned the Rainbow Warrior to be part of the demonstration. The protest itself was part of Greenpeace's Pacific Peace Voyage, which also involved moving the inhabitants of the Marshall Island atoll, Rongelap, to another island (Mejato) less contaminated with radioactivity. Rongelap had been contaminated with radioactive fallout from earlier atmospheric nuclear tests. After the Rongelap residents were transferred, the Rainbow Warrior continued its trip to Moruroa. On the way, on July 7, it stopped at Auckland harbor in New Zealand.

On July 10, while the ship was moored at Auckland, Jean-Michel Bartelo and another member of the team from the French secret service placed two bombs with timing devices on the ship's hull. The two bombs exploded in succession just before midnight. Damage was so extensive that the Rainbow Warrior sank. Only a few crew members were present at the time of the blasts. Steve Sawyer, the director of the Pacific protest effort in 1985, and most of the crew were celebrating Sawyer's birthday on board. All but one of the crew members on the ship escaped. Fernando Pereira, a Greenpeace photographer, drowned while attempting to retrieve his cameras. The Moruroa demonstration continued as planned, but without the Rainbow Warrior.

Greenpeace chairman David McTaggart's first thought was that the French government was involved in the blasts. Greenpeace and McTaggart had a long, contentious history with the French. He dismissed the idea, however, unable to believe that they would be so foolish. French government personnel who were at the harbor at the time of the explosions condemned the bombing and swore their innocence, but overwhelming evidence of their involvement in the violent action quickly came to light.

Near where the ship was moored and on the day of the bombing, witnesses had seen two men transfer a package from a small boat to a Toyota van, in which they drove away. The van's registration number was traced to a rental company and to French secret service agents Dominique Prieur and Alain Meaford, who had rented the van using aliases (Sophie Turenge and Alain Turenge, respectively). The agents had dumped, into harbor waters, the oxygen tanks and the outboard motor of the boat used to approach the Rainbow Warrior, and they beached the boat near the scene as well. All items were found, and all indicated a French connection.

One agent, French army lieutenant Christine Huguette Cabon, had volunteered at the Greenpeace Auckland office under the alias Frederique Bonlieu before the Rainbow Warrior's stop, passing information about Greenpeace plans to other members of the sabotage team. Abundant evidence implicated the French, and even included accusations against President François Mitterrand.

Whereas most of the dozen or so perpetrators disappeared, Prieur and Mafart were arrested when they returned the van to the rental agency. Although they were not involved in placing the explosives, they were sentenced to ten years in prison for aiding the saboteurs. They served less than three years of their sentences, however, and continued their careers with the French military. Each wrote a book about the affair.

The Rainbow Warrior was too badly damaged to be repaired. It was moved to Matauri Bay off the Cavalli Islands near New Zealand's North Island. A Maori (native New Zealander) burial ceremony accompanied the ship's scuttling. The sunken ship transformed over the years into a reef, enhancing the structure of the marine environment in the bay.

IMPACT

The Rainbow Warrior burial site became a memorial, and has been visited frequently by divers. Four years after the ship was buried, the Grampian Fame, an old fishing ship, was refurbished by Greenpeace and renamed Rainbow Warrior II. It carries the wheel and bell of the original Rainbow Warrior and has played a critical role in Greenpeace protests.

The French response to the first Rainbow Warrior's attempt to demonstrate at Moruroa suggests that France feared the effects of the protest on their nuclear-testing program. The immediate impact of the bombing was profound. On one hand, Pereira's children lost their father and his wife lost her husband. Greenpeace lost a crew member and photographer, as well as a symbolic ship. On the other hand, membership in the organization increased rapidly, as did public sympathy for Greenpeace.

France was ordered to compensate Pereira's family, Greenpeace, and the government of New Zealand for their losses in the attack. At least one French official lost his position, and the affair was probably a factor in the Socialist Party's loss of positions in the 1986 legislative election. That election reduced Mitterrand's effectiveness for the rest of his first term because he had to deal with a strong opposition majority in Parliament. The bombing also likely played a role in Mitterrand's defeat in the election of 1995 and in the French abandoning their nuclear-testing program in 1996.

Furthermore, the bombing strained France's relationship with New Zealand for several years. It was the first terrorist attack in New Zealand's history and perhaps helped New Zealanders realize that their geographic isolation no longer protected them from such acts.

—Carl W. Hoagstrom

FURTHER READING

Bohlen, Jim. Making Waves: The Origins and Future of Greenpeace. Tonawanda, N.Y.: Black Rose Books, 2001. Memoir by one of Greenpeace's founding members describes the organization's earliest days and its evolution into a worldwide force for environmental activism. Includes an index.

Brown, Michael, and John May. The Greenpeace Story: The Inside Story of the World's Most Dynamic Environmental Pressure Group. New York: Dorling Kindersley, 1991. Gives the bombing context and perspective; two chapters cover the specifics of the Rainbow Warrior and the bombing. Illustrations, maps, index.

Dyson, John. Sink the Rainbow! An Enquiry into the "Greenpeace Affair." London: Gollancz, 1986. Analyzes the actions and motives of the primary participants. Includes illustrations and maps.

Robie, David. Eyes of Fire: The Last Voyage of the Rainbow Warrior. 4th ed. Philadelphia: New Society, 2005. Describes the use of the Rainbow Warrior to transfer the population of an island contaminated with radiation to an island with less contamination, as well as the bombing and its aftermath. Illustrations, maps, index, and further readings section.

Sheehan, Sean. Greenpeace. Chicago: Raintree, 2004. Written for young readers, this book briefly outlines the history of Greenpeace, including the role of the Rainbow Warrior and its destruction in that history. Illustrations, glossary, index.

Wallace-Bruce, Nii Lante. The Settlement of Inter- national Disputes: The Contribution of Australia and New Zealand. Boston: Martinus Nijhoff, 1998. Pages 189 to 197 explore the Rainbow Warrior incident as an example of an international dispute. Includes an index and a bibliography.

Weyler, Rex. Greenpeace: How a Group of Ecologists, Journalists, and Visionaries Changed the World. Emmaus, Pa.: Rodale Press, 2004. Comprehensive biographical account of the founders and evolution of the organization, its political divisions, and its campaigns. Includes photographs and an index.

SEE ALSO: Sept. 26, 1979: Love Canal Residents Sue Chemical Company; Dec. 16, 1982: Congress Cites Environmental Protection Agency Chief for Contempt; Feb. 4, 1996: Whistle-Blower Reveals Tobacco Industry Corruption; July, 2002: Journalist Alleges Release of Genetically Modified Corn Seeds in New Zealand.

July 19, 1985

MAYFLOWER MADAM PLEADS GUILTY TO PROMOTING PROSTITUTION

Sydney Barrows, a descendant of Mayflower pilgrims, drew national attention when she was charged with running a prostitution service that catered to an exclusive clientele. She pleaded guilty to the lesser charge of promoting prostitution. While losing some status as a socialite, Barrows profited from the scandal through the sale of her 1986 book Mayflower Madam and through marketing her life story.

LOCALE: New York, New York

CATEGORIES: Prostitution; law and the courts; sex crimes; sex; business; publishing and journalism

KEY FIGURE

Sydney Barrows (b. 1952), owner of Cachet, an escort service

SUMMARY OF EVENT

On the evening of October 11, 1984, police delivered a search warrant at 307 West Seventy-fourth Street on the upper West Side of New York City, the main office of Cachet, an exclusive escort service that opened for business in 1979. The owner of Cachet was Sydney Barrows, a thirty-two-year-old graduate of the Fashion Institute of Technology, who majored in fashion buying and merchandising.

Barrows, a socialite who could trace her ancestry to Mayflower pilgrim William Brewster, pleaded guilty on July 19, 1985, to promoting prostitution and paid a fine of five thousand dollars. Legal problems at Cachet had begun two years earlier with a seemingly benign conflict with the building's landlord in November of 1983. Wishing to raise the rent in the apartment-restricted Manhattan but hindered by a signed contract, the landlord attempted to evict Barrows for running a business in her apartment. Adding to the controversy with the landlord was Barrows's firing of a call girl, who later sought revenge by going to the police. Shortly thereafter, employees reported that Cachet was under police surveillance.

After arresting a Cachet escort, police obtained a warrant to search Cachet on October 11. They seized documents, business records, and business machines, including an overfilled paper shredder. The following day Barrows learned that police had a warrant for her arrest. With her legal advisers she surrendered to the district attorney. She later explained that she did not surrender to police because she believed the officer in charge was using the action on Cachet to ensure his own promotion. Barrows posted bail and was released from custody.

Media competition in New York is especially fierce. In the first few days after the police bust of Cachet, much of the reportage was speculative. By the third day of reporting, the media had discovered Barrows's identity (she had been using the name Sheila Devin at the time of her arrest). Media reports, which described Cachet as a million-dollar, exclusive escort service, were filled with inaccuracies, especially in conflating the terms "bordello," "escort service," and "brothel." Cachet was an escort service that hired out women to spend time with paying clients. It did not "sell" sex, at least not explicitly. Escorts included university students and professors, women working in semiprofessional jobs, and career women. Each woman was scheduled for three nights of escort work per week. Sex between client and escort was acceptable only if the sex was "straightforward"; that is, it had to be conventional.

Prosecutors pressed Barrows to plead guilty in exchange for a lighter sentence and fine. However, regardless of her plea, the fine would remain substantial—possibly fifty thousand dollars (which Barrows did not have)—and she would receive some jail time or probation. Her defense announced its intention to go to trial in an attempt to force the prosecution to liberalize its plea offer, which it did not do. The case went to the grand jury, which handed down its indictment just before Christmas, 1984, charging Barrows with promoting prostitution in the third degree.

Sydney Barrows, the Mayflower Madam, at a news conference with a television producer. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Barrows's defense had five components: First, it exposed the double standard of a criminal justice system that prosecutes women who provide escorts for hire but seldom prosecutes the men (johns) who pay for the service. Defense attorneys in the Barrows case hinted to the prosecution that they would read the list of prominent men who purchased services from Cachet to the jury in open court. Second, the defense argued that selective prosecution also was applied to the charge of promoting prostitution.

Among those who run escort services and brothels, women tend to be prosecuted while men are seldom prosecuted.

Third, the defense illustrated the illogic of the expense of money, time, and labor devoted by authorities in closing Cachet—an expense that exceeded that of other crackdowns on escort services or bordellos. Even the authorities agreed that Cachet was not implicated in acts of violence or drug use and was not associated with organized crime or police corruption. Why, the defense asked, the expense for Cachet? Fourth, the defense argued that Barrows ran an escort service, which was not in the business of selling sex; rather, Cachet was paid by men for the young women's time.

Fifth, the defense challenged the validity of analyses of Barrows's handwriting. Prosecutors attempted to prove that her handwriting matched the writing on documents seized at Cachet. The defense would support handwriting analyses only if Barrows's handwriting could be picked from ten samples provided to the prosecution experts by the defense. As a result of this demand, the prosecution experts excused themselves from the case.

Fearing the defense would name Cachet's wealthy and powerful clients, the district attorney's office continued to press Barrows for a plea bargain so that the case would not go to trial. Barrows pleaded guilty to the lesser charge of prostitution in the third degree, for which she paid a fine of five thousand dollars.

After her legal troubles, Barrows published her autobiography Mayflower Madam: The Secret Life of Sydney Biddle Barrows (with William Novak), which detailed the organization and operation of Cachet, emphasizing the unique factors that made the escort service so successful. In the book's first few chapters, Barrows discusses her working-class background, childhood, education, and the ethics of running an escort service. The last few chapters explain Barrows's struggles with the criminal justice system and how her defense was successful in trivializing the prosecution's criminal case against her. The core of the book, however, is a detailed description of Barrows's management principles and staff training procedures.

IMPACT

No long-term negative impact came from Barrows's conviction. In fact, she profited from the scandal. Mayflower Madam is now used as a management training manual for commercial escort and sex services, and the value of the book has not been overlooked by trade journals and businesses and organizations selling sex-related products or services. Barrows's life story was featured as a television biography and was the focus of a 1987 film starring Candice Bergen.

The police crackdown on Cachet, if it had any immediate significance, was its potential for revealing the names of the escort service's clientele. Interestingly, Barrows's eight-inch-thick "black book" was lost or stolen in the chaos of the police raid of Cachet. The black book contained the names, descriptions, addresses, and professional affiliations of male clients, many of whom were corporate executives, religious officials, foreign representatives to the United Nations, sheiks, socialites, and celebrities. It is possible, maybe even probable, that the black book was used for the purposes of financial or political blackmail.

In a wave of police actions, other escort agencies, including those of Alex Adams and Heidi Fleiss, were raided shortly after Cachet was shut down. Many have argued that the policing of organized commercial sex establishments is intermittent, and that this policing is based on what Nebraska madam Josie Washburn argued, in 1909, political or professional aggrandizement. Because commercial prostitution is traditionally owned, supported, and served by the community elites (politicians, legal officials, business owners), it is the elites who determine when and if commercial prostitution will be policed.

—Edward J. Schauer

FURTHER READING

Adams, Alex, and William Stadiem. Madam 90210: My Life as Madam to the Rich and Famous. New York: Villard Books, 1993. A discussion of the experiences of Hollywood's foremost madam, Alex Adams, creator of the notorious madam to the stars, Heidi Fleiss.

Barrows, Sydney. Getting a Little Work Done. New York: HarperCollins, 2000. In this self-help-style book, Barrows offers advice on balancing sex and career.

Washburn, Josie. The Underworld Sewer: A Prostitute Reflects on Life in the Trade, 1871-1909. New ed. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1997. Provides historical insight into the life of late nineteenth and early twentieth century madam Josie Washburn. Provides contrast and comparison with modern commercialized sex agencies. Originally published in 1909.

Wiltz, Christine. The Last Madam: A Life in the New Orleans Underworld. New York: Faber & Faber, 2000. Examines how a commercialized sex agency can exist for decades with little police interference and, as Josie Washburn argued a century earlier, how the shutting down of these agencies is used as a successful political campaign tactic.

SEE ALSO: 1907: Elinor Glyn's Novel Three Weeks Shocks Readers; May 13, 1913: Boxer Jack Johnson Is Imprisoned for Abetting Prostitution; July 28, 1980: Magazine Reveals Baseball Star Steve Garvey's Marital Problems; Dec. 7, 1980: Rita Jenrette's "Diary of a Mad Congresswife" Scandalizes Washington; June 27, 1995: Film Star Hugh Grant Is Arrested for Lewd Conduct; Sept. 22, 1997: Sportscaster Marv Albert Is Tried for Sexual Assault; Nov. 2, 2006: Male Escort Reveals Sexual Liaisons with Evangelist Ted Haggard; July 9, 2007: Senator David Vitter's Name Is Found in D.C. Madam's Address Book; Mar. 12, 2008: New York Governor Eliot Spitzer Resigns in Prostitution Scandal.

August 19, 1985

WEST GERMAN COUNTERINTELLIGENCE CHIEF DEFECTS TO EAST GERMANY

After four years as head of West German counterintelligence, Hans-Joachim Tiedge defected to East Germany, beginning the most serious German spy scandal in more than a decade.

LOCALE: Bonn, West Germany (now Germany)

CATEGORIES: Espionage; corruption; international relations; government

KEY FIGURES

Hans-Joachim Tiedge (b. 1937), head of West German counterintelligence

Markus Wolf (1923-2006), head of East German foreign intelligence service

Heribert Hellenbroich (b. 1937), head of the West German Federal Intelligence Service

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Even with a serious drinking problem, a penchant for gambling, and the accumulation of almost a quarter million German marks in personal debt, Hans-Joachim Tiedge had worked sixteen years in West German intelligence without facing any of the background checks that were normally required every five years. He had become despondent over the recent loss of his wife and had even been the subject of a manslaughter investigation following her accidental death. All this notwithstanding, he had managed to hold onto his very sensitive job for four years as head of the Office for the Protection of the Constitution, West Germany's equivalent of the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Feeling that his personal situation had become hopeless, on August 19, 1985, Tiedge approached East German guards at a crossing in the Magdeburg region and asked to speak with a representative of East German intelligence to arrange his defection to the East. Thus began the most serious spy scandal to rock West Germany in a decade.

Because of their common language and cultures,

East and West Germany were ideal places for their spies to work during the Cold War. Both countries' importance to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) and the Warsaw Pact also provided motivation for a very aggressive espionage system between the two states. In the days leading up to Tiedge's defection, the East had definitely held the advantage, having arrested almost two hundred West German agents during Tiedge's tenure while during the same period, Tiedge and his West German agency had enjoyed very little success. In Tiedge's defense, it should be noted that security was very lax for anyone who wanted to come into West Germany from the East, and was very strict for those going in the other direction.

Heribert Hellenbroich, Tiedge's boss until four months prior to Tiedge's defection, was also his good friend. Given Tiedge's behavior since the death of his wife (even his neighbors had called Tiedge's office to complain of his drunkenness), it is perhaps not a surprise that the friendship was a major reason Tiedge continued in his job. Only four months before the defection, Hellenbroich had been promoted to head of the Federal Intelligence Service. The loss of Hellenbroich as his immediate superior probably contributed to Tiedge's despondence. In any case, Hellenbroich was forced to resign his post after the defection as a direct result of his relationship with Tiedge.

Tiedge's principal adversary during this period was Markus Wolf, the head of the General Reconnaissance Administration, East Germany's foreign intelligence service. The opposite of the overweight and alcoholic Tiedge, Wolf was a most effective spy. At the time of the defection, Wolf was suspected of recruiting Tiedge, but it was unclear whether Tiedge had already been working as a mole for Wolf before 1985. Wolf stated in his autobiography Man Without a Face (1997) that his first contact with Tiedge was on the day of his defection.

Whether Wolf was telling the truth or not, it is worth noting that in the weeks just before the Tiedge defection several longtime East German spies disappeared. One of them, Johanna Olbricht, had been living in West Germany under the false identity of Sonja Lüneburg for twenty years. She had served as secretary to the then-leader of the Free Democratic Party, Martin Bangemann. She was last seen in West Germany three weeks before Tiedge's defection. One could speculate that Olbricht and the other fleeing spies might have been under Tiedge's protection and had been warned that he was leaving.

Regardless of whether he was a mole or simply a defector, Tiedge still was a great prize for the East Germans, and they took great care of him. After he was in the hands of the Stasi, the East German secret police, he was placed in a hospital to recover from his alcohol addiction. The overweight spy was also diabetic and was placed on a stringent diet. Wolf commented on Tiedge's appearance at the time of his defection by comparing him to a giant panda, bloated and pale with dark-rimmed eyes. Wolf also described him as very frank, noting that he did not try to justify his actions on idealistic grounds but instead described himself simply as a traitor.

When Tiedge was back on his feet, he was told to write a dissertation for a doctorate. The title would be "The Counterintelligence Task of the Office for the Protection of the Constitution of the Federal Republic of Germany." He would detail in two-hundred-plus pages all the methods employed by his office, including its electronic surveillance techniques. In addition to providing operational details, he also provided names of agents from the West. The East Germans boasted at one point that they had arrested 170 West German agents in an eighteen-month period thanks to information provided by Tiedge.

Tiedge stopped drinking and lost thirty pounds within a month. According to Wolf's autobiography, women who were loyal to the party were made available for Tiedge, and he eventually married one of them. The woman Tiedge married was a Stasi secretary.

In 1989, when the communist government in East Germany began to fall, Tiedge left for Moscow with his new wife and the equivalent of almost $100,000 in so-called severance pay. When interviewed by the magazine Der Spiegel in 1993, he was still in Moscow, living under the name Hans Ottowitsch, on a pension and living well. Asked if he was a traitor, he replied that of course he was. He showed no remorse, choosing to blame his superiors for failing to come to his aid when he was in such need of help. He said that defection and suicide were his only choices but that he did not have the courage for the latter. He reportedly remained in Moscow even after the statute of limitations for treason expired in 2005.

IMPACT

The most obvious and most immediate impact of Tiedge's defection was the complete disarray of West German intelligence. Its methods revealed and their agents compromised, they were faced with the task of reorganizing and restaffing their operations.

The initial bipartisanship among West German politicians in face of the scandal soon gave way to accusations, and there was much talk about how the scandal would or should affect relations between East and West Germany. Cooler heads prevailed, however, and there was little long-lasting or serious impact on the relations between the two countries. Negotiations continued for a cultural treaty, and an invitation for the leader of East Germany, Erich Honecker, to visit West Germany was not hampered by the scandal.

Strengthened by the scandal was NATO's feeling that, because of its cultural and historical ties to East Germany, West Germany was the weak sister in the alliance in terms of espionage. Undoubtedly, the scandal would give the Allies cause to consider even more carefully their intelligence and technological cooperation with the German Republic. Luckily, compartmentalization of intelligence operations for just such an occurrence prevented Tiedge from having very much useful information about NATO and its other members. The Allies had always understood that West Germany was exposed "in a special way" to attacks from East Germany.

West German Counterintelligence Chief Defects

The defection and the resulting confusion were not enough to stave off the collapse of the communist regime in East Germany. Within five years of the Tiedge scandal, the infamous Stasi and the East German communist state were matters of history, as the two German nations became one in 1990.

—Wayne Shirey

FURTHER READING

- Koehler, John O. Stasi: The Untold Story of the East German Secret Police. Boulder, Colo.: Westview Press, 1999. An informative look at the East German Ministry for State Security, better known as Stasi. Includes details about Tiedge.
- Minnick, Wendell L. Spies and Provocateurs: A Worldwide Encyclopedia of Persons Conducting Espionage and Covert Action, 1946-1991. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 1992. An alphabetical who's who of spies from the Cold War era.
- Wolf, Markus, with Anne McElvoy. Man Without a Face: The Autobiography of Communism's Greatest Spymaster. New York: Times Books/Random House, 1997. An autobiography of the East German spy who recruited Tiedge.

SEE ALSO: July 12, 1906: French Court Declares Alfred Dreyfus Innocent of Treason; May 26, 1945: Norwegian Writer Knut Hamsun Is Arrested for Treason; Sept. 12, 1962: British Civil Servant Is Arrested for Spying; Oct. 26, 1962: West German Police Raid Der Spiegel Magazine Offices; Mar. 2-Sept. 25, 1963: John Profumo Affair Rocks British Government; Mar. 4, 1966: Munsinger Sex and Spy Scandal Rocks Canada; Nov. 9, 1976: German Generals Must Retire for Supporting a Neo-Nazi Pilot; 1980: Biographer Claims Actor Errol Flynn Was a Nazi Spy; Feb. 18, 2001: CIA Agent Robert Hanssen Is Arrested for Spying for the Russians; Mar. 2, 2003: U.S. National Security Agency Is Found to Have Spied on U.N. Officials.

September 17, 1985

MEDIA ALLEGE CANADIAN OFFICIALS ALLOWED SALE OF RANCID TUNA

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation television newsmagazine The Fifth Estate reported that large quantities of possibly rancid tuna had been distributed to Canadian consumers. The minister of fisheries and oceans, who approved of the distribution despite warnings, resigned. Prime Minister Brian Mulroney's role in the scandal was questioned as well.

ALSO KNOWN AS: Tunagate

LOCALE: St. Andrews, New Brunswick, Canada

CATEGORIES: Corruption; government; medicine and health care; business; ethics

KEY FIGURES

John Fraser (b. 1931), Canadian minister of fisheries and oceans, 1984-1985

Brian Mulroney (b. 1939), Canadian prime minister, 1984-1993

SUMMARY OF EVENT

On September 17, 1985, the television newsmagazine The Fifth Estate, broadcast by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation (CBC), reported that large quantities of rancid tuna fish had been distributed to Canadian consumers. Despite being aware that inspectors had rejected the tuna as being unfit for human consumption, John Fraser, who was appointed as the federal minister of fisheries and oceans in 1984, overruled the decision and approved the distribution of the tuna.

StarKist Canada, Inc., acquired in 1981 by the American company H. J. Heinz, had the only tuna canning plant in Canada and controlled approximately 40 percent of the Canadian canned-tuna market. The allegedly tainted tuna was manufactured at StarKist's plant in St. Andrews, New Brunswick.

Quality issues with the canned tuna manufactured at the St. Andrews plant began several years before the story broke in the media. Using sight, smell, and taste tests, Department of Fisheries and Oceans inspectors had declared that a total of approximately one million cans of tuna were not suitable for human consumption. The tuna, which was imported from other parts of the world, including Africa and Asia, and canned in Canada, was described as rancid and emitting a strong odor. It was later reported that a type of tuna frequently processed at the plant was of a smaller kind and that it had a greater fat content, which increased the likelihood of oxidation or rotting. Oxidation could have occurred during storage or through thawing of the fish.

The value of the amassed one million cans of rejected tuna was estimated to be between $600,000 and $800,000. As a result of the potential loss of revenue, StarKist was threatening to close the St. Andrews plant, one of the largest employers in the county. StarKist executives, along with the New Brunswick premier, Richard Hatfield, petitioned Fraser and sought his approval to distribute the tuna to consumers anyway. Fraser asked the New Brunswick Research and Productivity Council (RPC), an independent agency that traditionally used a more sophisticated chemical analysis of food than did the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, to examine the tuna. In contrast to the fisheries and oceans inspectors, the RPC found the tuna to be suitable for public consumption.

Conflicting reports exist as to whether Fraser waited for the results of the RPC tests prior to overruling the decision of the fisheries and oceans inspectors and approving the sale of the tuna. RPC representatives claimed that Fraser had approved the distribution of the tuna prior to the completion of testing. The tuna was distributed to supermarkets and other food stores throughout Canada and even purchased by the Department of National Defense. However, the food product was later returned because of its poor appearance and smell. The tuna also was rejected by an African famine-relief organization.

Fraser was interviewed for the broadcast of The Fifth Estate and was thus questioned by the Canadian House of Commons. He defended his decision to approve the otherwise rejected tuna. He claimed that the inspection techniques used by the fisheries and oceans department were subjective. He testified that he had consumed the tuna himself and had no problems for doing so. While some store owners had already voluntarily removed the tuna from store shelves, a formal recall was announced on September 19. In addition to the StarKist brand, the allegedly tainted tuna was sold under the different labels. Less than one week after the scandal was broadcast, Fraser resigned his position.

Fraser was not the only public official who faced increased scrutiny as a result of Tunagate, as the incident was dubbed by the press. While admitting that two staff members were aware of the situation involving the supposedly tainted tuna in July, 1985, Prime Minister Brian Mulroney claimed that he did not learn of the incident until the day the story broke on The Fifth Estate. Initially, Fraser and another public official testified that Mulroney had been aware of the release of the tuna prior to the news report. However, several days later, both recanted their stories and corroborated Mulroney's account. Mulroney defended his actions, claimed he acted appropriately, and then took credit for issuing the recall. He offered to resign as prime minister if it was proven that he was aware of the distribution before the CBC report.

StarKist never recovered from the scandal. The St. Andrews plant closed in October, leaving its four hundred workers unemployed. StarKist's share of the Canadian canned-tuna market was reduced from nearly 40 percent to zero. In 1987, the St. Andrews plant resumed packaging tuna. Two years later, StarKist tuna was reintroduced to Canadian grocery stores. Despite its marketing and advertising efforts, sales of the fish lagged. In 1990, StarKist ceased its operations in Canada.

In the recall, more than twenty million cans of tuna, valued at an estimated $17 million, were confiscated. Although cans of the tuna were later tested and deemed fit for human consumption, the government mandated that the entire lot was not suitable for humans but could be sold in Canada and abroad as pet food.

In 1992, the tainted tuna resurfaced when it was reportedly repackaged as tuna suitable for human consumption and sold in thirteen states in the United States. The tuna could be traced to the St. Andrews plant by a code printed on the can. A recall was subsequently issued in the United States. Not only was the tuna intended to be sold in the United States, but a plan to relabel the cat food as tuna suitable for humans and import it back into Canada from the United States was uncovered when the cans were inspected at the U.S.-Canadian border.

IMPACT

Tunagate was covered heavily by a press that critics contended was biased against the Conservative government. The scandal, despite its widespread press attention, led to nothing but fear. No official reports surfaced of persons becoming ill from eating the fish, and no one died from consuming the questionable tuna. Later reports indicated that although the tuna smelled and looked inedible, it was consumable and had posed no health threats to those who did choose to eat the product. Furthermore, the cans that held the tuna had been sterilized at the plant during manufacturing, thus reducing any threat of food-related illness. Nonetheless, the incident incited widespread fear. It also became a popular source of jokes, even spawning a card game called "Tunagate," in which the cards were packaged in a round tin container.

The scandal weakened the public's faith in the government agencies that approved food for human consumption. Food inspection in Canada was later centralized under the administration of one agency. This centralization limited the conflicting goals of departments in promoting and regulating industries and products.

After resigning from the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, Fraser restarted his career and was elected speaker of the Commons in 1986 and reelected in 1988. Mulroney, despite questions raised about his knowledge of Tunagate, was reelected prime minister in 1988 and served until 1993.

—Margaret E. Leigey

FURTHER READING

Harris, Michael. "PM Is Caught by New Snag in Tuna Affair." Globe & Mail, September 25, 1985. Reviews public statements that contradict Mulroney's statements about his knowledge of the distribution of the rejected tuna to Canadian consumers.

Savoie, Donald J. Breaking the Bargain: Public Servants, Ministers, and Parliament. Toronto, Ont.: University of Toronto Press, 2003. Argues that "Canada's machinery of government is out of joint." Discusses the challenges facing the tradition of deal-making between elected officials and career officials. A good introduction to the workings (and problems) of the Canadian system of government.

"Tuna Casualties Mostly Political." Financial Post (Toronto), September 28, 1985. Provides a thorough summary of the scandal, including details of the resignation of John Fraser.

"Two Hundred Fifty Workers to Lose Jobs as N.B. Tuna Plant Closes." Globe & Mail, May 18, 1990. Reports on the closing of the StarKist Canada tuna canning plant in St. Andrews, New Brunswick.

SEE ALSO: 1956-1962: Prescription Thalidomide Causes Widespread Birth Disorders; Feb. 4, 1996: Whistle-Blower Reveals Tobacco Industry Corruption; Nov. 26, 1997: Canadian Health Commissioner Releases Report on Tainted Blood; May 7, 1999-Mar. 2, 2001: Ethics Counselor Exonerates Canadian Prime Minister Jean Chrétien; Summer, 2006-Mar. 16, 2007: Manufacturer Recalls Pet Food That Killed Thousands of American Pets.

October 23, 1985

GURU BHAGWAN SHREE RAJNEESH IS INDICTED FOR IMMIGRATION FRAUD

In 1981, followers of Indian guru Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh founded an ambitious religious community on a desert ranch in eastern Oregon. Plagued from the outset by local hostility and conflicts with land-use laws, the community, Rajneeshpuram, collapsed in 1985 when its leader was arrested for immigration fraud and several key figures faced criminal charges and convictions.

LOCALE: Portland, Oregon

CATEGORIES: Law and the courts; organized crime and racketeering; government; religion; social issues and reform; civil rights and liberties

KEY FIGURES

Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh (1931-1990), Indian guru and cult leader

Ma Anand Sheela (b. 1950), Rajneesh's personal secretary

David Frohnmayer (b. 1940), Oregon attorney general, 1981-1991

SUMMARY OF EVENT

On October 28, 1985, federal agents in Charlottesville, North Carolina, detained Indian guru Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh when his private airplane stopped for refueling. Alleging that he was attempting to flee the United States, they arrested him and several followers and returned them to Portland, Oregon, to face charges of racketeering and immigration fraud. The charges stemmed from attempts to form a spiritual community eighteen miles from Antelope, Oregon. Rajneesh and some of his followers had been indicted on October 23 by a federal grand jury, just days before his arrest.

The arrests marked the end of a controversial utopian experiment, though not the end of the movement. Rajneeshism, sometimes ironically dubbed the "rich man's path to enlightenment," draws upon Hinduism and other Eastern traditions. The spiritual writings of the founder, together with veneration of his person, form the core of a movement emphasizing meditation, personal spiritual fulfillment, a relaxed and fun-filled attitude toward life, and for some devotees, investment in a communal lifestyle. During the 1970's, the movement established a large study and residential center near Pune (Poona) in India and a network of study centers in the West, mainly in Europe.

In contrast to other cults spawned by the unrest of the 1960's, the Rajneesh movement attracted an older, well-educated population that brought with them considerable skills and capital. Adherents shunned high-pressure proselytizing, relying on more conventional marketing to spread the message. By 1980, Rajneeshism could claim thirty thousand adherents, most of them concentrated in Europe.

The movement outgrew the center in Pune. Other Indian sects mistrusted an ostensibly religious movement that sanctioned extramarital sex and seemed to cater to the needs and appetites of affluent foreigners. There were tax issues as well. In the light of these pressures, Ma Anand Sheela, Rajneesh's personal secretary and effectively the administrative head of the cult, decided in 1981 to purchase land and begin building a utopian community that would serve as a permanent residence for Rajneesh and a core of dedicated followers, termed "sannyasins," and a place of study and pilgrimage for the movement as a whole. To this end they bought a 64,000-acre cattle ranch near the desert town of Antelope (population less than 50).

From the outset, the project met with open hostility at local and state levels. Longtime residents of Wasco County, who were conservative and mainly fundamentalist Christian, strongly opposed any development that would shift the population balance and voter base in favor of outsiders with alien philosophies and lifestyles. People in sleepy eastern Oregon towns reacted, sometimes violently, after their streets were inundated with hundreds of enthusiastic young people wearing the red and orange garb of Rajneeshism and a portrait of the charismatic leader dangling from a string of prayer beads.

Support from the more liberal and populated western half of Oregon was minimal. After the 1978 mass suicide of hundreds of members of a religious cult in Jonestown, Guyana, South America, the public was extra-suspicious of cults in general. Although the Rajneeshism development incorporated many innovations designed to reduce environmental impact, its size triggered objections that were capitalized upon by the political action group 1000 Friends of Oregon.

Attempts to incorporate the new town of Rajneeshpuram were challenged by Oregon's attorney general, David Frohnmayer, on the grounds that a town government and infrastructure tied to a specific religious sect violated the United States Constitution's strictures on separation of church and state. The Rajneeshis challenged this claim in court. Unable to incorporate, the new town could not comply with state land-use laws. Attempts to purchase property and swing elections in Antelope itself backfired. At one point the cult began soliciting homeless people, busing them to Oregon, and registering them to vote in an effort to replace the county commissioners of Wasco County with a more favorable board.

During the years 1981 to 1985, against a background of growing hostility, outside investment and the labor of the inhabitants turned Rajneeshpuram into a thriving community, though increasingly resembling an armed camp. Rajneesh was silent, interacting with his adoring followers by touring the town in one of his many Rolls-Royce cars and leaving the governing to Sheela and a tight circle of mostly female devotees. Members of the town's security forces paraded around with assault rifles, giving rise to rumors that weapons were being stockpiled in anticipation of a military assault on the citizens of Oregon. In July of 1985, Rajneesh resumed communicating directly with his community and began taking steps to regain control from Sheela.

In September, Sheela and her close associates abruptly left for Germany. Rajneesh, aware of being investigated for immigration fraud, attempted through lawyers to surrender at a remote location rather than provoke an assault by armed federal agents on Rajneeshpuram. The immigration fraud charges were based on Rajneesh having arranged sham marriages between U.S. citizens and foreign sannyasins. He was charged by federal prosecutors in Portland on October 28 with criminal conspiracy and making false statements to officials of the U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service. He accepted a plea bargain, pleaded guilty to two counts of immigration fraud, and paid a $400,000 fine. He also paid $4 million in investigative costs to the state of Oregon, $5 million to the state's victims' fund, and $500,000 to the restaurants involved in a salmonella outbreak. He also agreed to leave the United States for ten years.

Investigations following Rajneesh's arrest, and Sheela's flight to Germany, had uncovered a web of illegal activity instigated by Sheela, including wiretapping and surveillance, misappropriation of funds, and cultivating pathogens for possible biological terrorism. Sheela was subsequently convicted of causing a salmonella outbreak in The Dalles, Oregon, by ordering deliberate contamination of salad bars frequented by Wasco County commissioners, and of attempting to murder Rajneesh's personal physician by jabbing him with a hypodermic needle containing an unidentified toxin. She served three years in a federal penitentiary before being deported.

Rajneeshpuram closed and was subsequently sold to pay off the judgments against Rajneesh, Sheela, and others. Rajneesh returned to the community outside Pune in India, after failing to gain entry into several other countries around the world. He changed his name to Osho, founded a new movement, and kept a very low profile. He died of natural causes in 1990.

IMPACT

At its height, the Rajneesh movement attracted roughly 200,000 members worldwide, of whom a maximum of 7,000 lived at Rajneeshpuram in Oregon and perhaps 20,000 visited the ranch for festivals and retreats. For most, the movement represented an interlude, disappointing in that it failed to deliver the hoped-for spiritual utopia but not entirely without value. Few thought that they had been brainwashed or traumatized. Since the commune attracted mainly single adults and discouraged starting families, none of the accusations of child abuse and corruption of minors that plagued so many alternative communities accompanied this movement.

On July 13, 1986, a monument was dedicated outside the Wasco County Court House. Beneath the statue of a stately antelope read the inscription "Dedicated to all who steadfastly and unwaveringly opposed the attempts of the Rajneesh followers to take political control of Wasco County: 1981-1985." The ranch, having fallen into disrepair, soon housed a Christian youth camp. The local sense of having heroically staved off the “red tide” of alien cultists, strong during the 1980’s, faded with time.

Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh is escorted by federal officers in North Carolina after he fled Oregon. He had been indicted one week earlier for immigration fraud and racketeering. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The episode helped channel mainstream liberal opinion in Oregon into an emphatically secular direction. Opposition to an intentional religious community, originally fueled by Christian fundamentalism and xenophobia, became transformed into a civil rights issue. State attorney general Frohn-mayer became president of the University of Oregon system, seeming assurance that the prevailing intellectual view will consider the judicial destruction of Rajneeshpuram and seizure of its assets by the state of Oregon to be a triumph for American freedom of religion.

Voices of dissent spoke as well. Apologists for the sect, which still has a worldwide following, maintain that they consistently tried to work within the law, that the objectionable acts were the responsibility of a small group of people surrounding Sheela, and that the federal government was trying to provoke an armed confrontation such as occurred at the Branch Davidian compound in Waco, Texas, several years later, in 1993.

The various claims and counterclaims concerning incorporation of Rajneeshpuram leave unresolved the question of whether a nonmainstream religious sect with a nontraditional life philosophy can even operate in the United States. Some people argued that if a religiously mandated lifestyle violates existing community zoning ordinances, and the U.S. Constitution prohibits incorporating communities based on a religious beliefs and practices, religious freedom is seriously compromised.

—Martha A. Sherwood

FURTHER READING

Braun, Kirk. Rajneeshpuram, the Unwelcome Society: Cultures Collide in a Quest for Utopia. West

Linn, Oreg.: Scout Creek Press, 1984. A counter-cultural view of the land-use battles between Rajneeshpuram representatives and the locals of Antelope, Oregon.

Davisson, Sven. “The Rise and Fall of Rajneeshpuram.” Ashe Journal 2, no. 2 (2003): 1-21. Explores repressive state actions and treats Sheela’s offenses as a reaction to outside pressure. From an alternative spirituality publication.

Goldman, Marion. Passionate Journeys: Why Successful Women Joined a Cult. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1999. Tells the story of the Rajneeshpuram commune through composite portraits. Places emphasis on the motives of sannyasins.

Richardson, James T. Regulating Religion: Case Studies from Around the Globe. New York: Kluwer Academic/Plenum, 2004. This general study includes analysis of court challenges to Rajneeshpuram.

Strelley, Kate, with Robert D. San Souci. The Ultimate Game: The Rise and Fall of Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh. San Francisco, Calif.: Harper & Row, 1987. Personal story of an English woman who was a follower of Rajneesh in Pune and Oregon.

SEE ALSO: May-June, 1926: Evangelist Aimee Semple McPherson Claims She Was Kidnapped; Oct. 31, 1975: Buddhist Teacher Orders His Students to Remove Their Clothes; June 27, 1978: Evangelist Herbert W. Armstrong Excommunicates His Own Son; Apr. 22, 1986: Faith Healer Peter Popoff Is Exposed as a Fraud; June 30, 2001: Korean Religious Teacher Jung Myung Seok Is Charged with Rape; Nov. 2, 2006: Evangelist Kent Hovind Is Convicted of Federal Tax Violations.

February 28, 1986BASEBALL COMMISSIONER PETER UEBERROTH SUSPENDS PLAYERS FOR COCAINE USE

Major League Baseball commissioner Peter Ueberroth suspended several players with the Pittsburgh Pirates, including the team's mascot, and other players from around the league in a drug scandal that marked the first major dark cloud for baseball since the 1919 Black Sox game-fixing scandal. Baseball then faced the Pete Rose gambling affair, labor-union strikes, game cancellations, declining ticket sales, and the steroids scandal.

ALSO KNOWN AS: Baseball drug trialsLOCALES: Pittsburgh and Philadelphia, PennsylvaniaCATEGORIES: Sports; corruption; drugs; law and the courts; medicine and health care; organized crime and racketeering; popular culture; social issues and reformKEY FIGURES

Peter Ueberroth (b. 1937), baseball commissioner
Dave Parker (b. 1951), Pittsburgh Pirates outfielder

Dale Berra (b. 1956), Pittsburgh Pirates infielder
Keith Hernandez (b. 1953), New York Mets infielder

Lonnie Smith (b. 1955), Philadelphia Phillies outfielder

Kevin Koch (b. 1953), Pittsburgh Pirates mascot

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Following a successful decade during the 1970's that brought six divisional championships and one World Series victory to the city of Pittsburgh, Pirates fans were caught off guard during the 1980's. Following the firing of general manager Pete Peterson and clubhouse manager Chuck Tanner, as well as dwindling attendance, talks of dismantling the team, and potential buyouts, the 1986 season brought the baseball drug trials. In February of 1986, in the first major drug scandal for Major League Baseball, baseball commissioner Peter Ueberroth, harsh but fair in his punishments of players of all skills, was forced to suspend several players with the Pittsburgh Pirates, including star Dave Parker, and other players for using cocaine in their respective clubhouses.

The testimony of dozens of players resulted in the arrest and conviction of seven Philadelphia and Pittsburgh area drug dealers, including Curtis Strong, who was convicted on eleven counts of selling cocaine. Pittsburgh area dealer Shelby Greer pleaded guilty to seven counts associated with drug dealing, and five other men would serve time for the largest drug scandal in baseball history.

During the late 1970's and 1980's, cocaine became a regular fixture in Major League clubhouses. Players were purchasing drugs in stadium restrooms and locker rooms. Rumors began to circulate that players were playing games while high and were even carrying drugs in vials in their uniforms. In a May 14, 1985, memorandum to the Major and Minor League teams, Ueberroth outlined the league's updated drug policy.

In late 1985, a Philadelphia grand jury called Parker, along with Pirates teammates Lee Mazzilli, John Milner, Lee Lacy, Rod Scurry, and Dale Berra, son of New York Yankees great Yogi Berra, to testify. Other major leaguers called before the grand jury were Willie Aikens, Vida Blue, Jeffrey Leonard, Tim Lincecum, Enos Cabell, Keith Hernandez, and Lonnie Smith, who all testified to the rampant use of cocaine and amphetamines. Their testimony led many to believe that drug use affected as many as 40 percent of major league baseball players (a claim that is often challenged).

Prosecutors in the case stated that baseball was not on trial; drug use in society was the problem at hand, and the goal was to eradicate the drug pushers and dealers and to keep drugs from tarnishing the game of baseball. For their testimony, major league players were granted full immunity by law, meaning they would receive no jail or prison time. This immunity from prosecution allowed for open discussion of clubhouse secrets, including the secret of drug use. Testimony confirmed drug use during games and the existence of locker-room drug deals on game days.

Kevin Koch, the Pirates' Parrot mascot, was eventually implicated in the scandal for introducing players—both local and visiting—to area drug dealers. Seven local drug dealers, most notably Strong, were convicted and sentenced to prison. Strong's lawyer maintained that the baseball players were highly paid junkies, and not heroes. Player Milner admitted to buying cocaine during a game in which he participated. Hernandez, a future All-Star with the New York Mets, admitted to using drugs for more than three years while playing. Although the players who testified in return for immunity avoided jail or prison sentences, the organization of professional baseball, which had been harshly criticized by judicial officials throughout the trials for ignoring the drug problem for decades, would have free rein to punish the guilty.

Major League Baseball meted out punishments to twenty-one players on February 28, 1986. In his press conference announcing the sanctions, Ueberroth said that ten players who were mentioned during the drug trials were forced to submit to random drug testing for the remainder of their respective careers. Eleven players were given stricter punishments. Of the eleven, the four who admitted to using cocaine—Al Holland, Lee Lacy, Larry Sorensen, and Claudell Washington—received sixty-day suspensions and monetary fines of up to 5 percent of their salaries. They also were mandated to perform drug-education-related community service in their communities and had to submit to drug tests. Holland's career ended only one year after the league sanctions. Lacy also ended his career in 1987 as a member of the Baltimore Orioles. Sorensen continued to battle his substance abuse, ended his career in 1988 with the San Francisco Giants, and served time for multiple driving-under-the-influence offenses after his playing days. Washington was traded many times and finished his career in 1990 with the Yankees.

The remaining seven players—Berra, Smith, Parker, Hernandez, Cabell, Leonard, and Joaquin Andujar—received even harsher penalties. One-year suspensions would be waived in return for 10 percent of the player's salary, two years of community service, and mandatory drug testing for the life of their careers. Berra, a top prospect in 1977, never had a productive season, and following the drug trials he played in 1987 for the Houston Astros, where he ended his career. Leonard received the 1987 National League Championship Series MVP award for his play for the Giants and ended his career in 1990 with the Seattle Mariners. Andujar, a former All-Star pitcher, was traded many times following the drug trials and sustained several injuries; his career ended in 1988. Cabell played one more season

Peter Ueberroth announces Major League Baseball's drug-testing plan at a news conference in New York. (AP/Wide World Photos)

MAINTAINING BASEBALL'S INTEGRITY

In his Memorandum from Commissioner Peter V. Ueberroth to All Clubs Re: Baseball's Drug Education & Prevention Program (May 14, 1986), the baseball commissioner outlined the long-term effect of drugs and drug use on the sport of baseball.

Our other principal concern is the maintenance of the integrity of the game. It is most important that all of us in Baseball and our fans have the fullest confidence in our game. Drug involvement or the suspicion of drug involvement is inconsistent with maintaining that essential goal.

following the drug trials with the Los Angeles Dodgers. Smith won the MLB Comeback Player of the Year Award in 1989 and had a productive career following the scandal. He is most remembered, however, for his base-running error during the 1991 World Series, in which his team, the Atlanta Braves, lost the game. He finished his career in 1994.

Parker, a favorite in Pittsburgh, was traded around the league during the 1980's and found his niche as a designated hitter in the American League. He was an All-Star in 1986 and 1990. He finished his career with the Toronto Blue Jays in 1991. Hernandez, probably the most famous player of the drug scandals, was best known for his defensive skills with the Mets at first base and for the team's 1986 World Series victory over the Boston Red Sox. Hernandez won more Gold Glove Awards in 1986, 1987, and 1988 (he won eleven in his career) and was an All-Star in 1986 and 1987. He finished his career in 1990 with the Cleveland Indians and was inducted into the Mets Hall of Fame in 1987.

IMPACT

Ueberroth was chastised by the players' union for unfairly levying penalties against the players involved in the drug scandal, but his sanctions would hold. His belief in mandatory drug testing as a collective bargaining issue may have been his most famous attempt at making baseball a legitimate organization. He was a strong proponent of removing drugs, especially stimulants such as cocaine, from the game in an effort to minimize inflated performance statistics.

Ueberroth is considered a visionary by some, as the mid-1990's saw the beginnings of the steroid-use scandal, brought about, in part, by the league's failure to instill mandatory drug testing. As the legal community once again criticized Major League officials for ignoring drug use in the sport, many began to wonder if Ueberroth also should have been ignored.

The baseball drug trials of 1985-1986 cleaned the game of illegal street drugs such as cocaine, but the trials did very little to quell the coming storm of synthetic drugs, such as steroids, and their abuse by some of the biggest names in professional baseball. Synthetic drugs, the new drug of choice for many players, poisoned the game and the record books during the 1990's and into the twenty-first century.

—Keith J. Bell

FURTHER READING

Bryant, Howard. Juicing the Game: Drugs, Power, and the Fight for the Soul of Major League Baseball. Monrovia, Md.: Paw Prints, 2008. Examines the effect of drugs on professional baseball and discusses what the Major League has done to address the problem. A questioning work about the iconic status of baseball in the United States.

Conner, Floyd, and John Snyder. Baseball's Most Wanted. 3 vols. Dulles, Va.: Brassey's, 2004. A discussion of the "national pastime's outrageous offenders, lucky bounces, and other oddities." Brings into one boxed set past volumes that explored the top scandals in professional baseball.

Mottram, David R., ed. Drugs in Sport. 4th ed. New York: Routledge, 2005. A comprehensive reference work on the use and abuse of drugs by athletes in sports around the world. Also includes detailed analyses of cocaine use.

Rader, Benjamin G. Baseball: A History of America's Game. 3d ed. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2008. A detailed history of baseball in the United States that also examines the scandals that have affected the game.

SEE ALSO: Sept. 21, 1919: White Sox Players Conspire to Lose World Series in "Black Sox" Scandal; Dec. 26, 1926: Ty Cobb and Tris Speaker Are Accused of Fixing Baseball Games; Spring, 1947: Baseball Manager Leo Durocher Is Suspended for Gambling Ties; Fall, 1969-Winter, 1971: Japanese Baseball Players Are Implicated in Game Fixing; Nov. 29, 1979, and Jan. 31, 1983: Baseball Commissioner Suspends Mickey Mantle and Willie Mays for Casino Ties; Oct. 19, 1982: Car Manufacturer John De Lorean Is Arrested in a Drug Sting; Aug. 24, 1989: Pete Rose Is Banned from Baseball for Betting on Games; Jan. 18, 1990: Washington, D.C., Mayor Marion Barry Is Arrested for Drug Use; July 1, 1994: Soccer Star Diego Maradona Is Expelled from World Cup; Mar. 17, 2005: Former Baseball Star Mark McGwire Evades Congressional Questions on Steroid Use; July 26, 2006: Tour de France Is Hit with a Doping Scandal; Aug. 20, 2007: Football Star Michael Vick Pleads Guilty to Financing a Dogfighting Ring.

March 3, 1986

FORMER U.N. SECRETARY-GENERAL KURT WALDHEIM'S NAZI PAST IS REVEALED

Kurt Waldheim faced accusations during his campaign for the Austrian presidency that he had concealed his membership in Nazi organizations and a substantial portion of his service in the Wehrmacht during World War II. The scandal raised questions about guilt for crimes committed during the war and about how much was known of his past before he was elected United Nations secretary-general.

ALSO KNOWN AS: Waldheim affair

LOCALE: Vienna, Austria

CATEGORIES: Publishing and journalism; atrocities and war crimes; international relations; government; politics; military

KEY FIGURES

Kurt Waldheim (1918-2007), United Nations secretary-general, 1972-1981, and president of Austria, 1986-1992

Simon Wiesenthal (1908-2005), Nazi hunter

Edwin Meese III (b. 1931), U.S. attorney general, 1985-1988

SUMMARY OF EVENT

The Waldheim affair broke when the Austrian magazine Profil and the World Jewish Congress (WJC) and The New York Times alleged in early March of 1986 that Waldheim's 1985 autobiography, In the Eye of the Storm, concealed several key facts. These omissions included his membership in a Nazi student organization, the National Socialist German Students League; membership in a Sturm Abteilung, or storm trooper, mounted regiment; and that units to which he was attached committed atrocities in the Balkans in World War II.

The Balkan atrocities included General Friedrich Stahl's massacre of civilians at Kozara, West Bosnia, in Yugoslavia (June-August, 1942), operations against partisans in Yugoslavia (May-June, 1943) known as Operation Black, and transportation of 42,000 Jews from Salonika, Greece, to concentration camps by German general Alexander Löhr's Army Group E (May-August, 1943). Löhr was subsequently executed in 1947 by Yugoslavia for war crimes. Waldheim had served as a Wehrmacht intelligence officer under Stahl and Löhr, and the implication was that Waldheim would have at least been aware of these incidents.

After these charges were raised, it came to light that questions about Waldheim's past already had been asked in 1979. An inquiry by the Israeli government led to questions for so-called Nazi hunter Simon Wiesenthal. He was asked whether Waldheim had served in the SS, the German Nazi police, or otherwise had been a Nazi. Wiesenthal answered no to both questions. In 1980, U.S. Congress member Stephen Solarz, a New York Democrat, wrote to Waldheim to ask him about his war record and his alleged membership in a Nazi student organization. Waldheim denied membership in the student organization and stated that he was incapacitated after being wounded on the Russian front in December, 1941. He said that he left the German army after his recovery and completed his law degree in 1944. The U.S. Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) backed Waldheim's assertions in a written statement to Solarz.

Kurt Waldheim, center, is shown in this 1943 photograph with other German Nazi officers in Yugoslavia. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The timing of the allegations seemed suspect, given that the Austrian presidential elections were two months away. Waldheim, who was running for president, denied membership in any Nazi organizations but offered that he did serve in the Balkans in World War II as an interpreter. His supporters condemned the allegations as unfounded and claimed that they were merely an attempt to discredit Waldheim.

On March 22, 1986, the WJC released a bombshell document listing Waldheim in the Central Registry of War Criminals and Security Suspects, developed by the U.S. Army, which listed suspected war criminals. It also had been revealed that the Yugoslav government had prepared a file accusing Waldheim of murder and presented this to the United Nations War Crimes Commission in 1948. This formal accusation became the basis for Waldheim's name being added to the registry. Subsequent research by historians revealed that this 1948 file was prepared to attempt to derail Austria's position in diplomatic negotiations with Yugoslavia over financial and territorial issues because Waldheim was part of Austria's diplomatic delegation. This information was not used against Waldheim at that time, nor did Yugoslavia raise it in the future.

Waldheim had advanced through the Austrian foreign service and served as Austria's delegate to the United Nations in the postwar years. He ran unsuccessfully for president of Austria in 1971. If he had been elected, Waldheim would have served until 1977. Because he lost the election, Waldheim was able to stand for the position of U.N. secretary-general when U Thant did not seek another term. Waldheim served two terms from 1972 to 1982.

Throughout the spring and summer of 1986, the WJC, international media, and various researchers released additional documents pertaining to Waldheim's concealed past. Many Austrians believed that the charges were part of a Jewish conspiracy to embarrass Waldheim and Austria, and even Wiesenthal defended Waldheim, which surprised many Jews. The vote in Austria on May 4 for president resulted in a run-off because no candidate received a majority—Waldheim received 49.6 percent and Socialist challenger Kurt Steyrer received 43.7 percent; minor candidates split the remaining 6.7 percent. In the June 8 election, Waldheim triumphed with 53.9 percent of the vote.

At the time of the release of its initial allegations, the WJC had requested that the U.S. Justice Department add Waldheim's name to the U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service's so-called watch list. The watch list bars certain persons from entering the United States, including suspected war criminals who persecuted people based on political, religious, racial, or national factors during the Nazi era. After more than one year of consideration, during which time Waldheim and his lawyers were given the opportunity to present written responses to material in the Justice Department's file, Attorney General Edwin Meese placed Waldheim's name on the watch list on April 27, 1987, which prevented the Austrian president and former U.N. secretary-general from entering the United States. There was shock in Austria, and although some Austrians urged Waldheim to resign the presidency, he did not. He called Meese's decision "grotesque."

Following the watch-list debacle, the Austrian government, under Waldheim's direction, prepared the report Kurt Waldheim's Wartime Years: A Documentation, also known as the White Book, to rebut the charges that led to Waldheim's placement on the watch list. A flawed document, the October, 1987, report it did not examine all relevant material and offered exculpatory explanations for Waldheim's actions. Earlier, however, at the behest of Waldheim himself in the spring of 1987, the Austrian government formed an international commission of military historians to investigate Waldheim's World War II service. The commission began its study in August and issued The Waldheim Report on February 8, 1988. The report stated that although Waldheim knew of war crimes committed in Yugoslavia and Greece, he did not participate in them and was not in a position to oppose them or protest against them. Some have questioned the report's thoroughness. A June, 1988, television production by Thames Television/HBO called Kurt Waldheim: A Case to Answer, concluded that Waldheim's activities in the Balkans did not involve criminal behavior.

IMPACT

The Waldheim affair damaged Austria's international standing and curtailed his effectiveness as president. He was banned from the United States, and many other countries refused his entry for state visits. The United States never removed his name from its watch list. No major leaders visited Austria during his presidency, and his contacts were limited to the Middle East and some communist bloc nations. Critics have noted that Waldheim never explained why he had concealed the controversial portions of his past, but he did apologize for "mistakes" in a statement released after his death.

Questions subsequently arose concerning which governments knew of his concealed wartime activities when he was nominated as U.N. secretary-general and whether they had used such knowledge to gain favorable treatment during his United Nations tenure. Some have speculated that because Yugoslavia knew, it is likely that the Soviet Union knew as well, and that the Soviets took advantage of this knowledge to increase their espionage activities under United Nations cover. Another theory is that the United States knew of his activities and protected him because he was a source of intelligence. No evidence has been put forth to substantiate these claims.

The reactions of many Austrians and the media to the controversy raised the specter of lingering anti-Semitism in Austria. Waldheim's supporters claimed that the accusations against Waldheim were part of an attempt by Jews to smear his reputation.

—Mark C. Herman

FURTHER READING

Hazzard, Shirley. Countenance of Truth: The United Nations and the Waldheim Case. New York: Viking Press, 1990. A somewhat polemical treatment of the United Nations' role in the

- Waldheim investigation by a former United Nations employee.
- Herzstein, Robert Edwin. Waldheim: The Missing Years. New York: William Morrow, 1988. An objective treatment by the historian hired by the World Jewish Congress to investigate Waldheim's military career. The book is based on archival research and extensive interviews.
- International Commission of Historians. The Waldheim Report. Copenhagen: University of Copenhagen and Museum Tusculanum Press, 1993. This report, submitted to the Austrian federal chancellor on February 8, 1988, came without a final answer to the question of Waldheim's wartime guilt.
- Mitten, Richard. "Bitburg, Waldheim, and the Politics of Remembering and Forgetting." In From World War to Waldheim: Culture and Politics in Austria and the United States, edited by David F. Good and Ruth Wodak. New York: Berghahn, 1999. A concise summary of the basic facts of the controversy and an interpretation of its symbolic importance in public memory.
- Rosenbaum, Eli, with William Hoffer. Betrayal: The Untold Story of the Kurt Waldheim Investigation and Cover-up. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1993. A detailed, passionate account by the general counsel of the World Jewish Congress, which helped launch the 1986 investigation of Waldheim.
- Tittmann, Harold H., III. The Waldheim Affair: Democracy Subverted. Dunkirk, N.Y.: Olin Frederick, 2000. Weighs the evidence for allegations of

- Waldheim's participation in Nazi atrocities. Especially examines the role of the media in presenting the evidence. Finding the accusations groundless, he considers the affair as an example of how false perceptions can dupe a free society.
- Waldheim, Kurt. In the Eye of the Storm: A Memoir. London: Weidenfeld & Nicholson, 1985. Waldheim attempts to explain his objectives and his actions in the course of the various conflicts he experienced during his ten years as secretary-general of the United Nations. The controversial work that neglects the facts of his military career.
- SEE ALSO: July 12, 1906: French Court Declares Alfred Dreyfus Innocent of Treason; Apr. 22, 1942: French Prime Minister Pierre Laval Wants Germany to Win World War II; Dec. 5, 1942: Industrialist Charles Bedaux Is Arrested for Nazi Collaboration; May 9, 1945: Norwegian Politician Quisling Is Arrested for Nazi Collaboration; May 26, 1945: Norwegian Writer Knut Hamsun Is Arrested for Treason; Aug. 14, 1945: French War Hero Pétain Is Convicted of Nazi Collaboration; Dec. 14, 1945: Poet Ezra Pound Is Charged with Treason and Institutionalized; Oct. 26, 1962: West German Police Raid Der Spiegel Magazine Offices; Nov. 9, 1976: German Generals Must Retire for Supporting a Neo-Nazi Pilot; 1980: Biographer Claims Actor Errol Flynn Was a Nazi Spy; Dec. 1, 1987: Yale Scholar's Wartime Anti-Semitic Writings Are Revealed; Aug. 12, 2006: Novelist Günter Grass Admits to Youthful Nazi Ties.

April 22, 1986

FAITH HEALER PETER POPOFF IS EXPOSED AS A FRAUD

Pentecostal evangelist Peter Popoff built a financially successful empire from donations given by the desperate, sick, and elderly. He based his empire on his claim that God spoke to him. In 1986, professional skeptics James Randi and Steven Shaw investigated Popoff and discovered that the voice he heard came not from God but from a radio transmitter operated by his wife, Elizabeth Popoff. Randi exposed Popoff's fraud on The Tonight Show. Within a year, Popoff was bankrupt, but he did return to televangelism.

LOCALE: Burbank, California

CATEGORIES: Hoaxes, frauds, and charlatanism; religion; communications and media; radio and television; public morals; business

KEY FIGURES

Peter Popoff (b. 1946), Pentecostal faith healer and televangelist

Elizabeth Popoff (fl. 1980's), Popoff's wife and a major player in the scam

James Randi (b. 1928), professional skeptic

Steven Shaw (b. 1960), professional skeptic

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Pentecostal evangelist and faith healer Peter Popoff built a financially successful empire from donations given by the desperate, sick, and elderly after he conducted a strategically targeted direct-mail campaign offering the faithful items that included anointed healing oil. It was his televised healing ministries, however, in which he claimed to hear the voice of God "call out the sick" that brought him success and fortune.

In 1986, professional magician and skeptic James Randi and magician and mentalist Steven Shaw, better known as Banachek, began investigating the Reverend Popoff. It did not take long for Randi and his team to discover that the voice Popoff heard came not from God but from a radio transmitter. Randi first turned to the authorities with his evidence of fraud, but when they showed little interest in pursuing Popoff, he took his evidence to national television. He exposed Popoff on one of the most popular network television shows of the day, The Tonight Show, hosted by Johnny Carson, on April 22, 1986. Within a year, Popoff was bankrupt. However, he returned to televangelism and sending miracle healing oil through the mail.

Popoff was born in 1946, reportedly behind the Iron Curtain in Berlin, East Germany. He stated that the Soviet Union's official antireligious stance forced him and his family to flee to the United States. In his new homeland, he began preaching from the age of nine. A Pentecostal evangelist, Popoff claims to have been granted the nine gifts of the Holy Spirit, which, as explained in 1 Corinthians 12:8-10, include knowledge and healing. This claim of being spiritually gifted lifted Popoff from the rank-and-file televangelists and made him a budding superstar.

Prior to 1985, Popoff's ministries in Upland, California, made its money from the evangelist's slick direct-mail ministry campaign and crusades. Radio and television ministries added to the coffers initially by adding names to Popoff's mailing lists. Popoff would send the faithful computer-generated letters that, at first glance, appeared to be personalized. The mailings would include novelties ranging from miracle-healing water to handkerchief swatches "soaked in Popoff's sweat." The letters also included a pathos-laden appeal for money to help Popoff's ministries overcome some purported crisis.

In September of 1985, Popoff's office ordered radio-broadcasting equipment from Audio Specialties in Los Angeles. Soon after this purchase, Popoff's use of the "gifts of the spirit" became much more pronounced during his crusades.

Popoff began displaying an incredible ability to use the gift of knowledge, meaning that God was speaking directly to him during his sermons, telling him who to heal. He would stand before assemblies and call out names, street addresses, names of physicians, and describe a selected person's illness. Then, in a flashy display, he would "heal" a chosen person before a camera through the "laying on of hands." The newly healed person would rise from his or her wheelchair, or let go of his or her aides, and walk from the stage, all the while shouting "hallelujah!" with Popoff and the other congregants in the assembly hall. These crusades made wonderful theater that played even better on television. Popoff's ministry was soon raking in millions of dollars. The spectacle caught the eye of Randi and Banachek, both of whom were specialists in investigating and exposing pseudoscientific and other frauds.

As a young man, Randi (born Randall James Hamilton Zwinge) was isolated, in many ways, by his startling intelligence. He read books on magic and fell in love with the craft after spending more than one year in a body cast from a bicycle accident. The constant practice required to master the art of sleight-of-hand and misdirection offered solace for the isolation that Randi felt in his youth. He recognized early that magicians are "honest charlatans" because audiences expect to be deceived. When Randi saw others utilizing the tricks and apparatus of magic to pose as spiritualists, psychics, mediums, healers, and the like, he felt that an important role that he was to play was to use his skills and knowledge to debunk these frauds.

Randi's stage career as a so-called escapologist began in 1946. His popularity grew as host of his own radio show, The Amazing Randi Show, during the 1960's, and a television show, Wonderama, during the 1970's. He also made frequent appearances on one of the most popular network television shows of the era, The Tonight Show. He appeared often enough to become Carson's friend and a household name across much of the United States. However, it was Israeli spoon-bender, Uri Geller, who made Randi world famous in 1972. Carson invited Geller to appear on The Tonight Show to display his ability to bend spoons using the power of his mind. However, Carson had Randi secretly set up tests for the show to make certain that Geller could not bend the spoons using sleight-of-hand. Geller was unable to bend anything during the show. Carson later explained why, leading to Randi's new fame.

In 1986, Randi was awarded the MacArthur Foundation's genius award for educating the public about magic fraud and other forms of pseudoscience. He used this money to pursue the wave of televangelist faith healers who were incredibly popular during the late 1980's. The leader of this Pentecostal group was Popoff. Randi, Banachek, and their team began investigating Popoff by attending his revival meetings in Houston, Texas, and other U.S. cities.

The team soon uncovered the method to Popoff's fraud. His wife, Elizabeth Popoff, and other members of his team would meet with those who arrived at the revival early and would ask the audience members questions and give them prayer cards to fill out. The cards were then collected. How was the information getting to Popoff on stage?

From those cards, Elizabeth was able to transfer facts about certain audience members through radio transmission to an earphone used by her husband. One of Randi's confederates, Alec Jason, an expert in electronics, brought a sophisticated radio scanner, hooked up to a tape recorder, to the parking lot of the San Francisco Civic Auditorium, where Popoff was preparing for his next crusade. Just before showtime, Jason recorded the voice of God on 39.17 megahertz. Unfortunately for Popoff, God's voice was a feminine one; in fact, it was Elizabeth's voice. She was backstage feeding information from those same prayer cards to a tiny receiver in the evangelist's ear.

Randi's team was inside the auditorium videotaping the event as well. When the video- and audiotapes were paired, the evidence was damning. To effect their magic, the Popoffs collaborated as God and faith healer: Through radio transmission, Elizabeth told her husband certain facts (obtained from the prayer cards) about his audience. Claiming he was receiving messages from God, he then healed those whom God instructed him to heal. Randi and Banachek first tried to get legal authorities interested in pursuing Popoff based on this evidence, which was obtained over a period of six months in several cities around the United States. When the law showed no interest, Randi turned to his friend, Carson.

Popoff was exposed on The Tonight Show. Although it took some time for the news of the truth to reach the world of the faithful, donations to Popoff's ministries eventually fell to such a low level that he was forced to declare bankruptcy in 1987. Despite this fall from grace, by 2005, Popoff was once again leading a multimillion-dollar ministry, based in Upland, in no small part because of the ease of direct mail and the power and reach of infomercials.

IMPACT

Randi's and Banachek's public expose of Popoff's deception helped to dismantle what was an enormous upswing in Pentecostal televangelist faith healers during the late 1980's. The two investigators exposed other similar fraudulent healers as well and forced many of the faithful to take, for the first time, a skeptical look at practices they had always accepted on faith. The unveiling of the scam also led to a revival in skepticism. Randi's million-dollar "psychic challenge" brought all manner of fraud into the harsh light of skepticism and scientific analysis.

—B. Keith Murphy

FURTHER READING

Blackmore, Susan. The Meme Machine. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999. In this well-researched work on social psychology, sociobiology, and the evolution of human behavior, Blackmore explores, among other issues, how

Faith Healer Peter Popoff Is Exposed as Fraud

Peter Popoff's ministries used fake miracles to convert nonbelievers.

Huston, Peter. More Scams from the Great Beyond! How to Make Even More Money Off Creationism, Evolution, Environmentalism, Fringe Politics, Weird Science, the Occult, and Other Strange Beliefs. Boulder, Colo.: Paladin Press, 2002. An astonishing collection of scams based on strange religious and other fringe beliefs. Huston includes analysis of Randi's investigation and exposure of Popoff's fraudulent actions.

Randi, James. The Faith Healers. Rev. ed. Buffalo, N.Y.: Prometheus Books, 1989. Randi traces the history of faith healing, misplaced faith, and unquestioned trust. An indictment of televangelist fraud. The book, originally published in 1987, includes a chapter on his investigation and exposure of Popoff and his fraudulent "healings." Also includes a foreword by astronomer Carl Sagan.

SEE ALSO: May-June, 1926: Evangelist Aimee Semple McPherson Claims She Was Kidnapped; June 27, 1978: Evangelist Herbert W. Armstrong Excommunicates His Own Son; Sept. 10, 1981: Chicago Sun-Times Reports That Cardinal Cody Diverted Church Funds; Oct. 23, 1985: Guru Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh Is Indicted for Immigration Fraud; Mar. 19, 1987: Jim Bakker Resigns as Head of PTL Television Network; Feb. 21, 1988: Evangelist Jimmy Swaggart Tearfully Confesses His Adultery; June 30, 2001: Korean Religious Teacher Jung Myung Seok Is Charged with Rape; Nov. 2, 2006: Evangelist Kent Hovind Is Convicted of Federal Tax Violations; Nov. 2, 2006: Male Escort Reveals Sexual Liaisons with Evangelist Ted Haggard.

November 13, 1986-May 4, 1989

IRAN-CONTRA WEAPONS SCANDAL TAINTS REAGAN'S ADMINISTRATION

U.S. weapons were sold to Iran and funds from the sale were secretly provided to the Contras, the anticommunist rebels seeking to overthrow the government of Nicaragua. A series of federal investigations raised questions of balance of power between the executive and legislative branches of government in the United States. Several top government officials were implicated in the scandal and more faced indictments.

ALSO KNOWN AS: Iran-Contra affair

LOCALE: Washington, D.C.

CATEGORIES: Drugs; government; politics; military; corruption; international relations

KEY FIGURES

Oliver North (b. 1943), National Security Council military aide, 1981-1986, and former lieutenant colonel, U.S. Marine Corps

Richard V. Secord (b. 1932), retired U.S. Air Force general

Ronald Reagan (1911-2004), president of the United States, 1981-1989

Bud McFarlane (b. 1937), national security adviser, 1983-1985

John M. Poindexter (b. 1936), national security adviser, 1985-1986

William J. Casey (1913-1987), director of the Central Intelligence Agency, 1981-1987

Caspar Weinberger (1917-2006), U.S. secretary of defense, 1981-1987

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Two secret, interrelated U.S. government operations, both conducted by staff of the U.S. National Security Council (NSC) and both of which violated U.S. law and stated policy, were exposed in November, 1986. One operation encompassed the sale of arms to Iran to attempt to secure the release of U.S. hostages in the Middle East while the other operation used profits from the sale of these arms to fund the Contras, the anticommunist rebels in Nicaragua. The Iran-Contra affair, as the operations collectively came to be known, represented the most serious scandal involving a U.S. president since that of Watergate in 1972-1974.

During Ronald Reagan's first term as U.S. president, several events set the stage for the Iran-Contra affair. First, Iran and Iraq were engaged in a bitter civil war that began in 1980. Second, Hezbollah and other Middle East terrorist groups began taking more and more Western hostages, including U.S. citizens. Third, the Marxist Sandinistas, who took control of Nicaragua in 1979, were supporting leftist movements in other parts of Central America, particularly El Salvador. Reagan believed the Sandinistas were communists.

U.S. laws forbade trading arms with Iran following the events of 1979-1981, when Iranian students backed by their government seized and held American embassy staff hostage for 444 days. President Reagan had publicly pressured other nations to refrain from selling weapons to Iran. He reemphasized U.S. policy that mandated against negotiating with terrorists or making concessions to them.

At the same time, the Reagan administration, which took a hard line against communism around the world, also offered training and funds to anti-communist governments and movements through the Reagan Doctrine. In 1981, Reagan had approved covert support for the anti-Sandinista guerrilla groups that came to be known as the Contras, the anticommunist rebels in Nicaragua. However, in 1982, the U.S. Congress passed the Boland Amendments, which restricted U.S. Department of Defense and U.S. Central Intelligence Agency anti-communist military actions in Nicaragua. Reagan, seemingly emboldened by the attempt to curtail his support of the Contras, then instructed his national security adviser, Bud McFarlane, to keep the Contras together, "body and soul."

After Reagan's overwhelming reelection as president in 1984, certain representatives of the Iranian government contacted the United States about the possibility of buying weapons for its use against Iraq. U.S. policymakers debated the move. While Secretary of State George Shultz and Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinberger opposed the transaction, it was supported by CIA director William J. Casey and McFarlane. Casey and McFarlane reasoned that the sale not only would improve relations with Iran but also could hasten the release of American hostages held in Lebanon and other locations.

Reagan, who was adamant about freeing the hostages, one of whom was a CIA agent being brutally tortured, approved the sale of weapons on July 18, 1985. At first, the arms were funneled through Israel to Iran, with the United States promising to reimburse Israel with the same weapons. However, the resignation of McFarlane as national security adviser in December changed the nature of the operation. On the same day that John C. Poindexter replaced McFarlane, a military aide working at the NSC came up with two new ideas pertaining to the sale of missiles and other arms to Iran. That aide, U.S. Marine lieutenant colonel Oliver North, proposed selling weapons to Iran directly. In a move that brought the two operations together, North also suggested using the profits from the sale of arms to Iran to fund the Contras. Poindexter asked North to manage the operation, and North turned for assistance to retired U.S. Air Force general Richard V. Secord.

For the arms-sale ruse to work, the price of U.S. arms was inflated by as much as fifteen million dollars. Additionally, an Iranian arms broker who facilitated the transactions placed his own markup on the purchases. The overcharge for the weapons angered Iran and almost ruined the deal. However, by the time the sales and diversion were discovered, Iran had paid about thirty million dollars for several shipments of TOW missiles and assorted spare parts for HAWK anti-aircraft missiles. One shipment of eighteen HAWK missiles was rejected by Iran.

While the Iranian initiative unfolded, Poindexter struggled to carry out Reagan's directive to hold the Contras together. North, who handled operational details, brought Secord in to help in the Contra operation. North and Secord set up an organization they called the Enterprise to help carry out their activities. As Congress cut off funds for Contra military operations, North headed a campaign to raise money from private donors, and he secretly funneled millions of dollars from Saudi Arabia to the Contras through a network of nonprofit organizations and Swiss bank accounts. The Enterprise had aircraft, warehouses, arms and other supplies, ships, and boats, and even had a hidden runway located in Costa Rica. North, with McFarlane's and Poindexter's knowledge, had created a secret government organization operating outside the authority of Congress. In his search for funds, North intermingled the Iran and Contra operations. He diverted profits from Iranian arms sales to the Marine lieutenant colonel Oliver North testifies in July, 1987, before a joint congressional committee investigating the Iran-Contra affair. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Contras. This diversion of funds became the focal point of the investigations that began when news of the operations surfaced in November, 1986.

Following the downing of an Enterprise cargo plane that was supplying the Contras in Nicaragua on October 6, 1986, the combined operations began to unravel. The lone survivor of the crash initially stated that the two persons killed in the plane crash were CIA agents. A book of telephone numbers found in the wreckage traced the plane to an airbase in Central America.

On November 3, a Lebanese newspaper, Al-Shiraa, broke the story of the weapons-for-hostages deal between Iran and the United States. On November 13, after ten days of White House denials over the story, Reagan admitted that there had been some sort of a deal, but he insisted that it was a deal to provide to Iran "small amounts of defensive weapons and spare parts for defensive systems" in an attempt to lessen the "animosity" between the United States and Iran. He added that about one thousand TOW missiles were involved and that the sale included only the United States and Iran as participants. Reagan misstated the facts, however.

Over the next few days, the Justice Department continued to investigate the matter, and on November 22 it found what would become a critical April, 1986, memo from North to the president that outlined how the "residual funds" from the arms sales would be diverted to aiding the Contras. Simultaneously, Attorney General Edward Meese III discovered that only twelve million of the thirty million dollars paid by Iran for the U.S. arms had been deposited in the U.S. treasury. Meese briefed Reagan about the diverted funds on November 24 and announced it publicly the next day before Congress and the full Reagan cabinet. They also announced that Poindexter resigned and North was removed from his job with the NSC and reassigned with the Marine Corps. It was later divulged that North had destroyed pertinent evidence about the operations over a five-day period in late November.

On December 1, Reagan appointed former Texas senator John Tower to chair a commission to investigate the matter. Not to be left out, the U.S. Senate and House of Representatives set up investigative committees in early January, 1987. The Tower Commission released its report on the scandal on February 26. A special prosecutor, independent counsel Lawrence E. Walsh, was appointed to investigate as well, and his report was released over a five-month period beginning on August 4, 1993.

The Tower Commission Report was the product of ten weeks of research that included the testimony of fifty-six witnesses. Though placing primary responsibility for the operations on the president's staff, the report chided Reagan for being out of touch and for failing to oversee the implementation of his own administration's policies. Televised congressional committee hearings into the scandal started on May 5 and lasted three months. They included 250 hours of testimony from twenty-eight witnesses, and they riveted television viewers. The congressional Iran-Contra committees issued their reports on November 18.

Congress largely agreed with the Tower Commission that Reagan's detached management style was to blame for the scandal, though it found that Reagan was unaware of the diversion of funds to the Contras. The congressional report identified several violations of law, including failure to notify Congress of covert U.S. operations, diversion of federal funds for purposes prohibited by Congress, tampering with and destroying official documents, and lying to or misleading Congress.

On March 16, 1988, North, Poindexter, Secord, and several others were indicted on conspiracy to defraud the United States, theft of government property, and wire fraud. North's charges included obstruction of congressional investigations, making false statements to a congressional committee and the attorney general, shredding and altering official documents, acceptance of an illegal gratuity from Secord in the form of a home-security system, conversion of traveler's checks, and tax-fraud conspiracy. Eleven persons were convicted. The convictions of Poindexter and North were overturned on appeal. Most of the public's attention to the Iran-Contra scandal diminished after May 4, 1989, with the end of North's trial.

On December 24, 1992, U.S. president George H. W. Bush—who had been vice president during

PRESIDENT REAGAN DENIES ARMS DEAL WITH IRAN

In a televised speech on November 13, 1986, U.S. president Ronald Reagan firmly denied that his administration was involved in any arms-for-hostages deal with Iran, a claim later proven false.

The charge has been made that the United States has shipped weapons to Iran as ransom payment for the release of American hostages in Lebanon, that the United States undercut its allies and secretly violated American policy against trafficking with terrorists. Those charges are utterly false. The United States has not made concessions to those who hold our people captive in Lebanon. And we will not. The United States has not swapped boatloads or planeloads of American weapons for the return of American hostages. And we will not. Other reports have surfaced alleging U.S. involvement: reports of a sealift to Iran using Danish ships to carry American arms; of vessels in Spanish ports being employed in secret U.S. arms shipments; of Italian ports being used; of the U.S. sending spare parts and weapons for combat aircraft. All these reports are quite exciting, but as far as we're concerned, not one of them is true.

During the course of our secret discussions, I authorized the transfer of small amounts of defensive weapons and spare parts for defensive systems to Iran. My purpose was to convince Tehran that our negotiators were acting with my authority, to send a signal that the United States was prepared to replace the animosity between us with a new relationship. These modest deliveries, taken together, could easily fit into a single cargo plane. They could not, taken together, affect the outcome of the 6-year war between Iran and Iraq nor could they affect in any way the military balance between the two countries. Those with whom we were in contact took considerable risks and needed a signal of our serious intent if they were to carry on and broaden the dialog. At the same time we undertook this initiative, we made clear that Iran must oppose all forms of international terrorism as a condition of progress in our relationship. The most significant step which Iran could take, we indicated, would be to use its influence in Lebanon to secure the release of all hostages held there. . . .

To summarize: Our government has a firm policy not to capitulate to terrorist demands. That no concessions policy remains in force, in spite of the wildly speculative and false stories about arms for hostages and alleged ransom payments. We did not—repeat—did not trade weapons or anything else for hostages, nor will we. Those who think that we have gone soft on terrorism should take up the question with Colonel Qadhafi. We have not, nor will we, capitulate to terrorists. We will, however, get on with advancing the vital interests of our great nation—in spite of terrorists and radicals who seek to sabotage our efforts and immobilize the United States. Our goals have been, and remain, to restore a relationship with Iran; to bring an honorable end to the war in the Gulf; to bring a halt to state-supported terror in the Middle East; and finally, to effect the safe return of all hostages from Lebanon.

1980's

Reagan's presidency—pardoned six persons associated with the Iran-Contra scandal. The pardon of Weinberger kept him from being tried on charges of perjury and making false statements. The pardon of McFarlane occurred after he pleaded guilty and was sentenced to probation and community service. The seven-year investigation by the independent counsel cost $48.5 million, which accounted for almost one-fourth of total funds spent by twenty-two special prosecutors on unrelated cases from 1978 to 1999.

After the 1986 discovery of the Iran-Contra operations, several investigations by think tanks, congressional committees, and journalists focused on the question of whether the CIA had engaged in criminal activity by financing the purchase of arms with the proceeds from illegal drug sales. Though the results of previous probes were inconsistent, a 1998 report by the CIA inspector general confirmed that the Contras were involved in drug trafficking and that their activities had been protected from law enforcement by the Reagan administration. The report stated that North and the NSC were aware of drug transactions by the Contras.

IMPACT

The Iran-Contra scandal had consequences on several levels. First, President Reagan suffered a twenty-one-point decline in his approval rating after the dual operations were discovered in November, 1986. This represented the largest drop of presidential popularity within a month's time ever recorded. The revelations put the Reagan White House on the defensive, where it remained for almost all of the ensuing year. In March, 1987, Reagan admitted in a press conference that his previous assertions that the United States had not traded arms for hostages were incorrect.

Throughout the summer months, the televised congressional hearings into the scandal kept the public's attention. The deep decline in the stock market in the fall of 1987 only compounded the image problem for the White House. However, time seemed to heal the public's view of the president's performance. By the end of 1988, Reagan's popularity rating was close to where it had been before the scandal broke.

A second result of the Iran-Contra scandal was increased acrimony between the executive and legislative branches of federal government. That Reagan was the first of four chief executives in succession to experience split or opposition party control of Congress meant that the Reagan administration would have challenges in dealing with the legislature. Still, the Reagan team had an extremely successful initial year in 1981, enjoyed a forty-nine-state victory in the 1984 presidential election, and even had some notable second-term achievements, such as tax reform. However, the discovery that the president and his staff carried out the Iran-Contra operations in secret and violated several laws did not sit well with Congress. In like fashion to the post-Watergate period, Congress sought to curtail unilateral executive authority to restore a balance of power. For example, the Senate rejected the nomination of Robert Bork for the U.S. Supreme Court in October, 1987, and Congress overrode three of President Reagan's vetoes after the Iran-Contra operations became public.

A third consequence of the Iran-Contra affair was the scandal's international ramifications. Unquestionably, the sale of arms to Iran adversely affected the U.S.-led campaign against international terrorism. Not only did the operation contradict the policy of no negotiations with terrorists, it also likewise gave enemies of the United States the impression that the United States was prepared to offer concessions to hostage-takers.

The immediate result of America's effort to gain release of its citizens held in Lebanon and elsewhere was nil: while three American hostages were released, others were subsequently taken and held for ransom. The expressed goal for the Iran operation—for the United States to improve relations with that nation—was similarly a failure. In 1987, the two nations traded attacks in the Persian Gulf after Iranian forces launched a missile at a tanker under U.S. escort. In 1988, a U.S. warship shot down an Iranian passenger jet after mistaking it for an F-14 fighter, killing all 290 persons aboard.

A final legacy of the Iran-Contra scandal involves its impact on the principal participants other than President Reagan. It was assumed that Vice President Bush was aware of the activities related to the Iran-Contra operations. However, he was not directly linked with the day-to-day running of the operations. The political damage suffered by Bush was minor. He was able to secure the 1988 Republican nomination and win the presidential election that year. Other participants in the operations went on to work in the administrations of Bush and, later, his son, George W. Bush.

Perhaps the person most responsible for the scandal, North, fared best. North retired from active military duty and became a television commentator, syndicated columnist, and speaker for various conservative causes.

—Samuel B. Hoff

FURTHER READING

Carter, John J. Covert Action as a Tool of Presidential Foreign Policy: From the Bay of Pigs to Iran-Contra. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 2006. Focuses on the ongoing tensions between an executive branch that tries to subordinate the intelligence community and that community's desire to play a major role in policy-making. Includes a chapter on Reagan and the Iran-Contra scandal.

DeGregorio, William. The Complete Book of Amer- ican Presidents. New York: Gramercy Books, 2001. Chapter on the Reagan presidency includes an extensive description of the Iran-Contra affair.

Draper, Theodore. A Very Thin Line: The Iran-Contra Affairs. New York: Hill and Wang, 1991. A definitive account of the Iran-Contra scandal from a source not associated with the U.S. government.

Kitts, Kenneth. "The Politics of Scandal: The Tower Commission and Iran-Contra." In Presidential Commissions and National Security: The Politics of Damage Control. Boulder, Colo.: Lynne Rienner, 2005. An account of "the highly political, behind-closed-doors world of blue-ribbon investigative commissions convened in the aftermath of national security crises," including the Iran-Contra affair.

Martin, Al. The Conspirators: Secrets of an Iran-Contra Insider. Pray, Mont.: National Liberty Press, 2002. Every scandal has its conspiracy theories. This book explores the idea of an untold Iran-Contra conspiracy.

Mayer, Jane, and Doyle McManus. Landslide: The Unmaking of the President, 1984-1988. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1989. A substantial part of this book about Ronald Reagan's second term as president is dedicated to the Iran-Contra scandal.

North, Oliver L., with William Novak. Under Fire: An American Story. New York: HarperCollins, 1991. North's own telling of the Iran-Contra story is controversial, as many of its key claims have been disputed by others.

Walsh, Lawrence E. Firewall: The Iran-Contra Conspiracy and Cover-Up. New York: W. W. Norton, 1997. Detailed account of events by the independent counsel for the Iran-Contra investigation from 1986 to 1993.

SEE ALSO: Oct. 22, 1923: U.S. Senate Begins Hearings on Teapot Dome Oil Leases; May 28, 1970: Irish Politicians Are Tried for Conspiring to Import Weapons; June 17, 1972-Aug. 9, 1974: Watergate Break-in Leads to President Nixon's Resignation; Oct. 10, 1973: Spiro T. Agnew Resigns Vice Presidency in Disgrace; Feb. 3, 1975: Honduras's "Bananagate" Bribery Scandal Leads to Executive's Suicide; 1976-1977: U.S. Congress Members Are Implicated in Koreagate Scandal; Apr. 5, 1991: George W. Bush Is Investigated for Insider Trading; Aug. 5, 1994: Kenneth Starr Is Appointed to the Whitewater Investigation; Jan. 17, 1998: President Bill Clinton Denies Sexual Affair with a White House Intern; Sept. 8, 2004: 60 Minutes II Reports on George W. Bush's Evasion of Wartime Duty.

January 12 and May 11, 1987

MEDIA REPORTS SPARK INVESTIGATION OF AUSTRALIAN POLICE CORRUPTION

Investigative media reports prompted the formation of a royal inquiry into high-level police corruption in Australia. The Fitzgerald inquiry, which spanned two years, broadened to include a much larger investigation into all levels of government. The inquiry resulted in fundamental changes to Parliament, party politics, law, police work, and the practices of commissions of inquiry. Furthermore, many officials were forced to resign, including the premier of Queensland and the state's police commissioner.

ALSO KNOWN AS: Fitzgerald inquiry

LOCALE: Brisbane, Queensland, Australia

CATEGORIES: Corruption; government; radio and television; publishing and journalism; law and the courts; politics; social issues and reform

KEY FIGURES

Phil Dickie (fl. 1980's), investigative journalist
Christopher Masters (b. 1948), broadcast journalist
Tony Fitzgerald (b. 1941), chairman of the Fitzgerald inquiry

Sir Johannes Bjelke-Petersen (1911-2005), premier of Queensland, 1968-1987

Terence Lewis (b. 1928), Queensland police commissioner, 1978-1987

SUMMARY OF EVENT

The Australian media had hinted that there was a major problem in the state of Queensland, and especially in the city of Brisbane, with illegal gambling, drugs, prostitution and brothels, bribery of officials at all levels of government, and police corruption during the 1980's. Two reports proved to be the end for the corrupt politicians and other civil servants. Journalist Phil Dickie wrote an investigative report that was published in the Courier-Mail (Brisbane) on January 12, 1987, and a follow-up report was aired on the television program Four Corners by Christopher Masters. The revealing television episode, "Moonlight State," aired on May 11 and provided further substantial evidence of government corruption. Both Dickie and Masters are award-winning journalists.

Soon after the television show aired its report, government officials formed the Commission of Inquiry into Possible Illegal Activities and Associated Police Misconduct in Queensland, which came to be known as the Fitzgerald inquiry. The commission confirmed the existence of systematic government corruption, confirmation that ultimately led to the resignation of Queensland's premier, Sir Johannes Bjelke-Petersen, as well as the state's police commissioner, Terence Lewis, and many others.

Premier Bjelke-Petersen was out of the country when Four Corners aired its May 14 episode. Four Corners, which first appeared on television in 1961, continued as the longest-running investigative television program in Australia into the twenty-first century. The program, which focuses on a single current-affairs issue with each episode, has received many awards and was one of the first such programs to expose questionable actions by public officials.

After the Four Corners broadcast, Bjelke-Petersen's deputy, Bill Gunn, ordered the inquiry in the premier's absence. Justice Tony Fitzgerald was appointed to conduct the inquiry. Fitzgerald, who was well respected in government and known for his upstanding character, twice extended the probe from police activities to include higher levels of government. The inquiry continued for two years and led to the creation of an independent oversight entity named the Criminal Justice Commission (CRC), now the Crime and Misconduct Commission.

The Fitzgerald inquiry began on May 26 as an initial examination of police corruption and included allegations against specific persons. On June 24, the terms of reference were expanded and a number of handpicked Queensland Police Service (QPS) officers assisted with the investigation. On July 27, Commissioner Lewis was brought forth as the first witness. The inquiry's focus of reference expanded once again on August 25. Three days later, police detective Harry Burgess admitted to corrupt activities and resigned his position. He was followed in resignation by the assistant police commissioner, Graham Parker, who also admitted to corrupt activities. In the next few months, two retired inspectors admitted to corruption as well.

In August, Fitzgerald, for the first time in an inquiry, granted an indemnity, a legal exemption from penalties or liabilities, to Jack Herbert—who was alleged to be a bagman, or collector-distributor of illicit funds—to persuade him to testify. Herbert was the bagman for Lewis and collected his bribes. In April of 1989, Lewis was removed as the police commissioner.

The Fitzgerald Report was submitted to parliament July 3, nearly two years after the inquiry began. Without the extension of the terms of reference, the inquiry would not have had the same long-ranging effects. One motivation that Fitzgerald had for extending the inquiry was the desire to go beyond specific allegations against single persons and explore the system that allowed such corruption to develop and exist. As a result of the Fitzgerald inquiry, the thirty-year reign of the National Party government came to an end. The rule of law in Queensland was drastically changed and a new standard for commissions of inquiry had been put into place by the efforts and practices of the inquiry.

Many of the prosecutions that resulted from the inquiry, including that of Lewis and Bjelke-

Petersen, were heard by Douglas Drummond of the Office of the Special Prosecutor, which had been appointed in December, 1988. Lewis was convicted of corruption and subsequently stripped of his knighthood and confined. Bjelke-Petersen was charged with perjury but was found not guilty because he supplied evidence for investigators.

The corruption extended to many others across the political and nonpolitical spectrum. Also revealed as participants in corrupt practices were celebrities, judges, businesspeople, bankers, lawyers, and real estate agents.

IMPACT

The inquiry included 339 witnesses and 21,504 pages of testimony transcript, received 2,304 exhibits, and approved 10 indemnities (immunities) against prosecution. The Fitzgerald Report contained 630 pages and more than 100 recommendations that fell into three categories: the establishment of the Electoral and Administrative Review Commission (EARC), the establishment of the CRC, and the reform of the Queensland police force.

One of the most important reforms to result from the Fitzgerald inquiry was the establishment of the CRC, an independent oversight body that was given the power to investigate any public servant, including police officers, and the power to investigate any politician. Another important reform was the implementation of whistle-blower legislation, which increased sanctions attached to serious misconduct, including questionable recruitment and promotions. Also, the Fitzgerald inquiry was the first such inquiry in Australia to implement the use of indemnities in exchange for testimony.

—Judy L. Porter

FURTHER READING

Brereton, David, and Andrew Ede. "The Police Code of Silence in Queensland: The Impact of the Fitzgerald Inquiry Reforms." Current Issues in Criminal Justice 8, no. 2 (1996): 107-129. This article examines the impact of the Fitzgerald inquiry on the code of silence among Queensland police officers and their supervisors.

Dickie, Phil. "Fateful Trail Had Dramatic End." Courier Mail (Brisbane), May 15, 2007. Award-winning journalist Dickie, who broke the story of police corruption in Queensland in January, 1987, provides a brief, twenty-year retrospective on the exposé and the start of the Fitzgerald inquiry.

_____. The Road to Fitzgerald. St. Lucia: University of Queensland Press, 1988. Written as the story unfolded. Dickie discusses the events that led to the formation of the Fitzgerald inquiry, still in session when this book was published.

Finnane, Mark. "Police Corruption and Police Reform: The Fitzgerald Inquiry in Queensland, Australia." Policing and Society 1, no. 1 (1990): 159-171. Examines the Fitzgerald inquiry's findings and places it in the context of the history of Australian police organization.

Herbert, Jack, and Tom Gilling. The Bagman: Final Confessions of Jack Herbert. Sydney: ABC Books, 2004. Jack Herbert, the so-called bagman who collected bribes for the police commissioner, Terence Lewis.

Prasser, Scott, Rae Wear, and John Nethercote. Corruption and Reform: The Fitzgerald Vision. St. Lucia: University of Queensland Press, 1990. A collection of papers presented at a conference on the Fitzgerald inquiry that address police, government, and electoral system reform, among other topics.

Queensland, Australia, Criminal Justice Commission. Integrity in the Queensland Police Service: Implementation and Impact of the Fitzgerald Inquiry Reforms. Brisbane: Author, 1997. A detailed assessment of the efforts to address police integrity in Queensland after the release of the Fitzgerald Report in 1989.

SEE ALSO: Mar. 17, 1937: Atherton Report Exposes San Francisco Police Corruption; May 3, 1950: U.S. Senate Committee Begins Investigating Organized Crime; Aug. 16, 1996: Belgian Media Reveal How Police Bungled Serial Murder Case; May, 1998: Police Corruption Is Revealed in Los Angeles's Rampart Division; Dec. 23, 1998: Prominent Belgians Are Sentenced in Augusta-Dassault Corruption Scandal.

January 22, 1987PENNSYLVANIA POLITICIAN KILLS HIMSELF AT TELEVISED PRESS CONFERENCE

Pennsylvania state treasurer Budd Dwyer was convicted of taking a bribe after he obtained a state contract for a computer company. On the day before his sentencing, he called a press conference to proclaim his innocence and criticize the media for the scandal. He then put a loaded gun in his mouth and pulled the trigger. Several news outlets aired the graphic footage of his death, leading to public outrage and debate about journalistic ethics, broadcast television, newsworthiness, and sensationalism.

LOCALE: Harrisburg, PennsylvaniaCATEGORIES: Murder and suicide; radio and television; communications and media; publishing and journalism; politics; corruption; governmentKEY FIGURES

Budd Dwyer (1939-1987), Pennsylvania state treasurer, 1980-1987

Dick Thornburgh (b. 1932), governor of Pennsylvania, 1979-1987

Robert P. Casey (1932-2000), governor of Pennsylvania, 1987-1995

SUMMARY OF EVENT

During the early 1980's, Pennsylvania officials discovered that all public employees in the state had been overpaying their Federal Insurance Contributions Act taxes. By 1984, the Pennsylvania Treasury Department was looking to hire a technology firm to determine how much to reimburse each taxpayer. On May 14, Pennsylvania governor Dick Thornburgh received an anonymous memo, alerting him to bribes that had been paid to secure a no-bid, $4.6 million contract for Computer Technology Associates (CTA), a California-based company.

Thornburgh opened an investigation into the allegations. The investigation uncovered evidence that John Torquato, Jr., of CTA had approached several state officials with monetary offers to guarantee his company the contract. In particular, Torquato had allegedly promised to pay Pennsylvania state treasurer Budd Dwyer $300,000.

Dwyer was indicted two years later, on May 14, 1986, on charges of conspiracy to commit bribery, mail fraud, interstate transportation in aid of racketeering, and perjury. Acting U.S. attorney James West offered Dwyer a deal that would have reduced his maximum jail time from fifty-five to five years, but Dwyer refused to plead guilty to gain a lighter sentence. Torquato accepted a plea bargain and agreed to testify against Dwyer. Dwyer was convicted in the fall of 1986 and scheduled for sentencing in early 1987.

On January 22, 1987, one day before his sentencing, Dwyer convened a press conference at his office in Harrisburg, Pennsylvania. Given that upon sentencing he would lose his job, the public expected he was going to announce his resignation. Instead, Dwyer addressed the crowd of reporters, again declaring his innocence. He criticized the judge, the U.S. attorney, Governor Thornburgh, and even the media that had reported on his conviction for its part in painting him as a criminal. He compared himself to Job (the biblical character who faced many unjust hardships) and suggested that his imprisonment would be an act of political persecution. His rambling remarks lasted nearly half an hour, by which point the press was ready to leave. Dwyer urged the reporters to stay.

As he concluded his remarks, Dwyer handed envelopes to three of his staff members. He then pulled a .357 Magnum revolver from a fourth envelope. He then said that anyone who might be offended should leave the room. Members of the press began to urge Dwyer to lower the weapon. However, he ordered those who approached him to stand back, waving his arm and telling them that the gun could hurt someone. Dwyer then lifted the gun toward his face. He put the barrel into his mouth and pulled the trigger.

The fatal moment was captured on film. Several cameramen had kept their tapes rolling throughout the incident. They took the footage back to their news directors, who were faced with the sudden dilemma of whether or not to broadcast Dwyer's suicide on television. The event was certainly newsworthy, but the graphic nature of the film caused concern. Several local stations, including WPVI-TV in Philadelphia and WPXI-TV in Pittsburgh, chose to air at least part of the suicide tape.

Viewers in the region were shocked by the media's decision to air the footage. Further complicating matters, many children had stayed home from school due to snow cancellations and saw the suicide as it was aired midday by WPXI. When those stations rebroadcast the film later in the day, it was edited to end just before Dwyer pulled the trigger. WCAU-TV in Philadelphia showed similarly edited footage, stopping as Dwyer put the gun in his mouth. Other stations, such as KYW-TV in Philadelphia, chose not to air the shooting at all.

The report was broadcast nationally, but not in its graphic entirety. NBC Nightly News edited the footage, including Dwyer with the gun and Dwyer's fatally wounded body. ABC and CBS displayed still photos of Dwyer with their report of his death. The Associated Press also distributed still photos of Dwyer before and after the shooting, but included an alert about the graphic content.

The envelopes Dwyer handed to his aides turned out to contain various items. One envelope had a letter to his wife, Joanne; another envelope contained a letter to the new Pennsylvania governor, Robert P. Casey; and a third envelope had Dwyer's organ-donor card and other items. The letter to his wife contained his request for funeral arrangements. The letter to the governor complimented Casey, and stressed that Dwyer had not resigned his post but had been treasurer to the end. He likely emphasized this point so that his wife and children could continue to collect benefits from the state after his death. Dwyer took the additional step of suggesting his wife as his successor in the job, though she was not hired. It is possible the suicide was at least partly motivated by Dwyer's desire to protect his family financially.

IMPACT

The graphic television broadcasts of Dwyer's final moments shocked the public, and it soon turned into a media scandal. Dwyer's suicide would have been newsworthy even if conducted in private, but the public manner in which he chose to end his life was enough to shake the nation. People were disturbed by not only Dwyer's plan but also the media's handling of the incident, which seemingly magnified the act. Parents and teachers began to discuss and question the advisability of letting children watch live television broadcasts, whether in school or at home. Dwyer's death was not broadcast live, but it highlighted the potential unpredictability of live television. Overall, viewers were most disturbed by the decision to rebroadcast the taped footage, especially unedited or underedited.

Budd Dwyer, moments before he shoots himself to death in front of colleagues and media. (AP/Wide World Photos)

In academic circles, Dwyer's suicide continues to fascinate as a case study in journalistic ethics. The question of whether such graphic footage should be broadcast requires journalists to weigh the responsibility of reporting incidents thoroughly and with accuracy against public pressure to keep news broadcast images acceptable for all viewers. It also sparks debate about the changing perceptions of what is acceptable for television broadcast.

Decades after Dwyer's death, the footage of his final press conference is readily available on the World Wide Web. It is no longer current news, but the video's continued presence speaks to a cultural fascination with violence and death. Pop culture references to the suicide include several tribute songs and appearances in film and advertising.

Dwyer's suicide led the Associated Press (AP) to change its film protocols. Prior to 1987, AP photographers carried black-and-white film for everyday use and switched to color film only in anticipation of special events. Thus, the photographers present at Dwyer's final press conference had cameras loaded with black-and-white film only. As the story broke nationwide, however, hungry news outlets requested color pictures. AP did not have color photos. From that point on, AP photographers shot with color film.

—Kekla Magoon

FURTHER READING

Associated Press. "Facing Prison, Dwyer Kills Himself." Philadelphia Daily News, January 22, 1987. A wire-service news report of Dwyer's public suicide.

Friedman, David. "TV's Dilemma: How Much to Show." Philadelphia Daily News, January 23, 1987. Discusses the behind-the-scenes controversy among media professionals, spotlighting news directors from three local stations who had to decide whether or not to show the taped footage of Dwyer's suicide.

Gould, Madelyn S. "Suicide and the Media." Annals of the New York Academy of Sciences 932 (April, 2001): 200-221. A focused scholarly article on the consequences of media reportage of suicides.

"Pictures Raise News Issue." The New York Times, January 24, 1987. Identifies the television stations that aired Dwyer's suicide and describes the footage shown by each station.

Stevens, William K. "Official Calls in Press and Kills Himself." The New York Times, January 23, 1987. Provides concise details about the whole Dwyer scandal from the time of the bribe to Dwyer's conviction to his suicide and its immediate aftermath.

SEE ALSO: May 30, 1923: U.S. Attorney General Harry M. Daugherty's Aide Commits Suicide; Nov. 20, 1974: British Politician John Stonehouse Fakes His Suicide; Feb. 3, 1975: Honduras's "Bananagate" Bribery Scandal Leads to Executive's Suicide; May 28, 2007: Japanese Politician Charged with Corruption Hangs Himself.

February 25, 1987

NCAA IMPOSES “DEATH PENALTY” ON SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY FOOTBALL

For rules violations that included alumni payments to college football players, the Southern Methodist University (SMU) football team was suspended from competition during the 1987 season and then voluntarily remained out of the 1988 season because of NCAA restrictions. The NCAA sanction against competition is known as the death penalty for its severity and seriousness.

LOCALE: Dallas, Texas

CATEGORIES: Corruption; sports; education

KEY FIGURES

Bill Clements (b. 1917), two-term governor of Texas, chairman of SMU’s board of governors

Ron Meyer (b. 1941), SMU football coach

David Stanley (b. 1965), high school football star paid to attend SMU

SUMMARY OF EVENT

During the early to mid-1980’s, Southern Methodist University (SMU) fielded one of the best college football programs in the United States. According to author David Whitford, from 1980 to 1985 no major college football program won as many games as SMU, few went to as many postseason bowl games, and few were ranked among the nation’s elite as regularly. SMU was also one of the most corrupt college football programs in the country. It already had been penalized six times by the National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA) prior to its receiving the so-called NCAA death penalty in 1987.

Southern Methodist is a private, liberal arts university in Dallas, Texas, with an enrollment averaging about eleven thousand students. Founded in 1911, it is affiliated with the United Methodist Church. The university is governed by a board of trustees, which until 1987 was led by an executive committee called the board of governors. The board of governors during the 1980’s consisted of elite Dallas businessmen and politicians, including Bill Clements, a Dallas politician who would be elected to serve a second term as governor of Texas in 1986.

In 1987, the SMU Mustangs competed in the Southwest Conference (SWC), an intercollegiate conference consisting of five large state universities (Texas, Texas A&M, Arkansas, Texas Tech, and Houston), as well as four smaller private universities (SMU, Baylor, Rice, and Texas Christian). Although SMU had experienced some success during the 1930’s and 1960’s, its football team was not competitive during most of the 1970’s. Between 1973 and 1975, SMU won just sixteen of thirty-three games.

In 1976, however, the university made an enhanced commitment to football, hiring a brash young coach named Ron Meyer who had previously built a successful football program at the University of Nevada, Las Vegas (UNLV). Whitford suggested that Meyer’s success at UNLV came from bending, if not breaking, the rules governing intercollegiate athletics.

Whatever he did at UNLV, at SMU, Meyer reinvigorated the Mustang football program by creating a system of boosters and rich alumni who were able to get elite high school athletes to enroll at SMU; the alumni-boosters also paid the athletes monthly cash stipends to stay at SMU. More than twenty athletes (or their families) were given thousands of dollars in cash, cars, and other valuables. Meyer’s program reeked of hypocrisy. In addition to SMU, other schools in the SWC bribed high school athletes; paying players was rationalized as a necessary evil for a small private school without a glowing athletics reputation.

Within a few years, SMU’s football program was riding high. By 1981, its record was 10-1 and it earned a SWC championship and a postseason bowl game. Its record in 1982 was even better (11-0-1) and the program ranked second in the nation. However, with the victory came NCAA probation in 1982, 1985, and 1987.

During the 1970's and 1980's, most universities in the United States competed against each other under the auspices of the NCAA, which is a voluntary association of more than one thousand schools that sets rules for intercollegiate athletics. The most sacrosanct rules concern the amateur status of student athletes. Although student athletes are given a host of benefits—room and board, tuition, books, health care, and apparel—they cannot be given money to play. For example, athletes cannot use their "star" status to generate personal income, nor can they sell tickets allotted to them, be reimbursed for expenses, or borrow money from coaches. Also, parents of student athletes are prohibited from receiving complimentary tickets to a sporting event.

SMU demonstrated considerable contempt for the rules and was repeatedly penalized by the NCAA. In 1985, the program was placed on three years' probation for paying players, a virtual "slap on the wrist" for promises that it would stop making illicit payments and that boosters who had paid players would be banned from contact with the football program. Clements, the head of the board of governors, knew about the payments yet ordered the athletics director to continue making them. Clements made the order even though he promised to comply with NCAA sanctions and rules.

Clements believed that the university had to honor its promises to the athletes until they graduated. He hoped that by 1987 those athletes who had been receiving money would have graduated or otherwise left the school. Moreover, he feared that if SMU stopped paying, disgruntled athletes would document for the NCAA and for the media the extent of the corruption. That is exactly what happened. After his monthly stipend was ended, David Stanley, a former football player who had been unhappy at SMU and had gotten into trouble with cocaine, revealed he had been paid twenty-five thousand dollars to enroll at SMU and received seven hundred fifty dollars per month until he left school. The news led to a yearlong investigation by the NCAA. Expecting another slap on the wrist, SMU was stunned by the penalty it received.

On February 25, 1987, as a result of sustained, repeated violations, the NCAA imposed its so-called death penalty on SMU. The infractions committee meted out severe punishments, including a ban on televised games and on postseason bowl games, limitations on scholarships for four years, and a one-year ban on competition (which, subsequently, was extended to two years). In announcing the penalty, the NCAA observed that the severity was justified because of the program's brazenness in flouting the sanctions and rules, even in the face of multiple investigations.

IMPACT

New York Times reporter Peter Appleborne noted that 1986 was to be a year of celebration for SMU. It was the school's seventy-fifth anniversary and the university community had been looking forward to celebrating SMU's development into a major regional university with hope for national prominence. In contrast, the year was marked by disgrace. As Appleborne noted, "What hurt most was not that a bunch of football-mad alumni had put together a $400,000-a-year slush fund for athletes, but that the university's response for years had reflected skewed priorities and an absence of leadership."

In short, the athletics director and the board of governors were willing to continue a corrupt system because football wins led to enhanced prestige, increased donations, and a larger student enrollment. They were willing to bet the university's reputation that the depth of the corruption would never be exposed and that any NCAA penalties would be minor. Resignations included senior university trustees, the university president, the athletics director, and the football coach. Some even called for the impeachment of Texas governor Clements because of his complicity in the scandal as a university official.

In the wake of the scandal, the SMU board of trustees voted to replace the select board of governors and to make the board of trustees smaller, more inclusive, and with shorter terms in office. There also were sweeping changes made to the football program. As SMU athletics directors realized, fielding a competitive team, let alone rebuilding the program, would be impossible in the short term. The two-year hiatus gutted the program, and virtually every SMU football player on scholarship in 1986 was gone by 1989. Many had transferred to other schools; others had graduated. Scholarship limitations imposed by the NCAA made it more difficult to attract topnotch athletes to SMU. In retrospect, the NCAA death penalty did not keep other university programs from cheating. Ironically, the severity of the penalty has kept it from being used by the NCAA.

The impact of the scandal extended beyond SMU. During the mid-1980's, four of the nine football programs in the SWC were on probation, including SMU. The reputation of the conference plummeted, and by 1994 most of the major universities in the SWC joined other conferences. Two years later, the SWC disbanded.

—Michael R. Meyers

FURTHER READING

Appleborne, Peter. "Is There Life After Football?" The New York Times, October 4, 1987. Appleborne details the changes made at SMU in the year after the imposition of the NCAA death penalty on the school's football program.

Bowen, Ezra. "Revolt In a Football Palace." Time, December 22, 1986. Bowen explores the NCAA's investigation into the SMU football program and the result of that inquiry on the university community.

Eitzen, D. Stanley. Fair and Foul: Beyond the Myths and Paradoxes of Sport. Lanham, Md.: Rowman & Littlefield, 1999. Argues that college athletics, and athletics in general, is inherently corrupt and that it breeds hypocrisy.

Goodwin, Michael. "NCAA Bans Football at SMU for '87 Season." The New York Times, February

NCAA Imposes "Death Penalty" on SMU Football

26, 1987. A major newspaper's breaking news story of the scandal at SMU.

Padilla, Arthur. "The Message in the Morass at SMU." The New York Times, March 8, 1987. Provides an overview of the NCAA penalties against SMU and why those penalties were imposed.

Staurowsky, Ellen J. "Piercing the Veil of Amateurism: Commercialization, Corruption, and U.S. College Sports." In The Commercialization of Sport, edited by Trevor Slack. New York: Routledge, 2004. Part of the Sport in Global Society series. Staurowsky discusses how amateur athletics in the United States has moved to commercialized and corrupt spectacle.

Whitford, David. A Payroll to Meet: Greed, Scandal, and Football at Southern Methodist University. New York: Macmillan, 1989. Presents a narrative overview of the scandal, with a focus on the actual funding of the SMU athletes as well as the NCAA death penalty.

SEE ALSO: Jan. 17, 1951: College Basketball Players Begin Shaving Points for Money; Fall, 1969-Winter, 1971: Japanese Baseball Players Are Implicated in Game Fixing; Apr. 27, 1980: Mobster's Arrest Reveals Point Shaving by Boston College Basketball Players; Aug. 24, 1989: Pete Rose Is Banned from Baseball for Betting on Games; Mar. 27, 2002: Georgia Basketball Coach Jim Harrick, Sr., Resigns over Fraud Allegations; May 3, 2003: University of Alabama Fires New Football Coach in Sex Scandal; July 14, 2006: New York Times Exposes Grading Scandal at Auburn University; Aug. 20, 2007: Football Star Michael Vick Pleads Guilty to Financing a Dogfighting Ring; Sept. 13, 2007: New England Patriots Football Team Is Fined for Spying on Other Teams.

March 19, 1987

JIM BAKKER RESIGNS AS HEAD OF PTL TELEVISION NETWORK

Jim and Tammy Faye Bakker, evangelists who ran an empire that centered around the PTL television network, were enmeshed in personal problems that led to their fall from grace. Tammy Faye admitted to an addiction to painkillers and Jim admitted to having an affair with a church secretary and paying for her silence. This latter incident led to Jim's resignation and eventually a financial investigation of the ministry. Jim was imprisoned and the couple divorced.

LOCALE: Charlotte, North Carolina

CATEGORIES: Public morals; religion; radio and television; sex; law and the courts

KEY FIGURES

Jim Bakker (b. 1940), American televangelist and author

Tammy Faye Bakker (1942-2007), American televangelist, author, singer, and actor

Jessica Hahn (b. 1959), American model, actor, and church secretary

Jerry Falwell (1933-2007), American pastor and televangelist

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Married evangelists Jim and Tammy Faye Bakker began their television career in 1966 when working with evangelist Pat Robertson at his Christian Broadcasting Network. The burgeoning ministers first found fame via The 700 Club, a variety show focused on various conservative Christian topics. After spearheading the program through 1973, the couple joined Christian broadcasters Paul and Jan Crouch and founded Trinity Broadcasting Systems (now Trinity Broadcasting Network, or TBN) in Costa Mesa, California, beginning their on-air ministry with the show Praise the Lord on a local television station with rented airtime.

Even though the partnership with TBN lasted only one year, the Bakkers' success would continue. They moved from Southern California to Charlotte, North Carolina, and after securing the rights to the acronym PTL, formed Praise the Lord Network (also known as the PTL Network) and began their flagship show The PTL Club. Between the pair's surging popularity and ability to reach nearly one hundred stations around the globe, the program, in a talk-show format, earned tremendous traction throughout the late 1970's into the 1980's.

In addition to television outreach (which welcomed a diversity of people from all denominations), the couple unveiled Heritage USA, a 2,300-acre theme park (complete with a resort atmosphere and residences) in Fort Mill, South Carolina, in 1978. The park drew more visitors than any other park in the United States except Disneyland and Disney World. Though all appeared well at face value and PTL finances were strong (backed by over one million dollars per week in viewer donations), the cracks started to surface during the mid-1980's. The media became particularly suspicious of what skeptics claimed was an excessive empire (including reports that Jim and Tammy Faye's home included an air-conditioned doghouse and gold-plated bathroom fixtures, which the couple later denied).

Additional fuel was added to the fire in 1987, a year that included Tammy Faye's public admission of being addicted to prescription painkillers (and subsequent treatment at the Betty Ford Center) and Jim's looming sex scandal. Jim had sexual relations with one-time church secretary Jessica Hahn, and his staff paid her a reported $279,000 to keep the secret hidden from the media. On March 19, Bakker personally broke the silence, tearfully admitting of the affair (which happened in 1980) but denying allegations of rape. With this admission, Jim also resigned from PTL and turned over the organization to fellow televangelist (and longtime rival) Jerry Falwell in hopes of rebuilding trust within the religious community.

Initially, the plan was for Falwell to maintain the ministry until Jim could be restored to a position of leadership following a time steeped in personal prayer. However, Falwell quickly turned against the couple, calling Jim a hypocrite, accusing him of homosexual leanings (which were never substantiated), and scorned him for the shame surrounding the ministry's downfall. With the change in command at PTL, Falwell now had control of the station's satellite and Heritage USA, but the negative publicity surrounding the circumstances led to a sharp decline in viewership and park attendance. To make matters worse for the Bakker legacy and for Falwell's attempt to regenerate the brand name, the Internal Revenue Service revoked Heritage USA's tax-exempt status, leading to the organization's filing for bankruptcy protection.

Additional turmoil set in when The Charlotte Observer published reports of potential financial wrongdoings during the Bakker reign of PTL. The paper claimed that, most notably, the organization sold lifetime memberships that gave donors of one thousand dollars or more an extended weekend vacation at Heritage USA every year. Approximately 165,000 people contributed to the program, but at the time of Jim's descent, only one five-hundred-room hotel had been constructed to accommodate the tens of thousands of donors.

As a result of subsequent book-keeping discrepancies, Jim was tried in a well-publicized case that continued as tabloid fodder into 1988. In December of that year, he was indicted for fraud and conspiracy to defraud, resulting in a conviction on twenty-four counts and a forty-five-year prison sentence. The Bakkers would never return as a couple to television nor to Heritage USA, which officially closed its doors in 1989 (lifetime donors each received $6.54 in legal compensation).

The Bakkers continued to make headlines even during the prison term, as Jim appealed his case and was sentenced to eighteen years in 1991 (though he would serve only five). The next year, Tammy Faye filed for divorce and married Roe Messner, the builder of Heritage USA, in 1993. In prison, Jim wrote in his autobiography I Was Wrong (1996) about his theological and sexual mistakes, though he maintained his innocence when it came to issues of financial fraud. (An epilogue written after he finished the text reveals a 1996 federal jury ruling that Bakker was not selling securities through his partnership offers at Heritage USA.)

Though much less publicity was granted to the epilogue and Jim's subsequent career moves, he regained some exposure by marrying Lori Graham in 1998. The pair sought to recapture his original tele-

Jim Bakker is escorted from his lawyer's office by U.S. marshals on August 31, 1989, in Charlotte, North Carolina. Bakker was ordered to undergo psychiatric evaluation to determine if he was competent to continue standing trial. (AP/Wide World Photos)

A JIM BAKKER CONFESSION

In prison for fraud, televangelist Jim Bakker wrote his autobiography I Was Wrong, published in 1996. In the following excerpt from the book, Bakker shows remorse for practicing a negative form of prosperity theology, that is, he admits to teaching a false theology of materialism and abundance and leading people astray in the process.

I may not always have been so blatant about it, but I often preached a prosperity message at Heritage USA and on our PTL television programs. But when I began to study the Scriptures in depth while in prison, something I am embarrassed and ashamed to admit that I rarely took time to do during the hectic years of constant building and ministering at PTL, I was very distressed at what I discovered. I realized that for years I helped propagate an impostor, not a true gospel, but another gospel—a gospel that stated “God wants you to be rich!” Christians should have the best because we are children of God, “King’s Kids,” as I often put it. And shouldn’t the King’s kids have the best this world had to offer?

The more I studied the Bible, however, I had to admit that the prosperity message did not line up with the tenor of Scripture. My heart was crushed to think that I led so many people astray. I was appalled that I could have been so wrong, and I was deeply grateful that God had not struck me dead as a false prophet!

through their television shows and their amusement park (perhaps more than anyone else within the Christian ministry at the time). Even with throngs of supporters, however, a more secular-minded public considered their lifestyles lavish, their methods deceptive, and their intentions deceitful. The entire episode leaves many lingering questions, ranging from Falwell’s motives in his takeover of PTL and Heritage USA to whether or not the media focus on Jim’s trial affected the outcome of the case, to Jim’s detriment. It is clear from the Bakkers-PTL scandal that the public holds religious figures of any affiliation to high moral standards.

Even though triumph was followed by a fall from grace, the Bakkers proved they still had faithful followers. Jim and Tammy Faye both returned separately to television—albeit with a fraction of their previous viewers—but nonetheless resumed their careers. For admitting to some past mistakes they were greeted with some forgiveness.

—Andy Argyrakis

vision audience in 2003 with the variety-styled Jim Bakker Show (also broadcast throughout various satellite networks). Tammy Faye turned to secular television in 1996 with The Jim J. and Tammy Faye Show (a talk show with costar Jim J. Bullock, a gay comic), followed by VH1’s reality show The Surreal Life in 2004. Despite Jim and Tammy Faye’s split, they remained friends until Tammy Faye’s death from cancer in 2007.

IMPACT

Though televangelists were sometimes viewed with skepticism prior to this scandal (either because of sexual or financial indiscretions), Jim’s resignation marked the pinnacle of poor publicity for the television genre. The consequences of the resignation were particularly heavy because of Jim’s and Tammy Faye’s larger than life personalities, plus the massive amount of fame they accumulated

FURTHER READING

Albert, James A. Jim Bakker: Miscarriage of Justice? Chicago: Open Court, 1998. A legal analyst presents all sides to the story, while suggesting Jim’s financial trial could have been hindered by endless media sensationalism.

Bakker, Jay, with Linden Gross. Son of a Preacher Man: My Search for Grace in the Shadows. San Francisco, Calif.: HarperSanFrancisco, 2001. Jim and Tammy Faye’s son, Jay, discusses his father in this telling memoir of living “in the shadows” of scandal and controversy.

Bakker, Jim, with Ken Abraham. I Was Wrong: The Untold Story of the Shocking Journey from PTL Power to Prison and Beyond. Nashville, Tenn.: Thomas Nelson, 1996. Jim’s personal account of his rise to fame and his downfall. Includes candid details about his time in prison and his declaration of innocence regarding financial wrongdoings.

Messner, Tammy Faye. Telling It My Way. New York: Villard, 1996. Tammy Faye tells her side of the story and supports Jim's accounts of innocence in the case of financial improprieties.

Miller, Brett A. Divine Apology: The Discourse of Religious Image Restoration. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 2002. Analyzes religious figures accused of sexual misconduct. Includes some discussion of Jim Bakker in the chapter on fundamentalist preacher Jimmy Swaggart, whose scandalous dalliance with a prostitute was covered closely by the national media.

Richardson, Michael. The Edge of Disaster. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1987. A book with a tabloid tone that exposes the couple's wrongdoings. Richardson was Jim's personal bodyguard during the televangelist's peak professional period.

Shepard, Charles E. Forgiven: The Rise and Fall of

Jim Bakker and the PTL Ministry. New York: Atlantic Monthly Press, 1989. A reporter from The Charlotte Observer analyzes the ascent and collapse of Jim and Tammy Faye's empire.

SEE ALSO: Oct. 25, 1974: Evangelist Billy James Hargis Resigns College Presidency During Gay-Sex Scandal; Jan., 1977: Singer Anita Bryant Campaigns Against Lesbian and Gay Rights; June 27, 1978: Evangelist Herbert W. Armstrong Excommunicates His Own Son; Apr. 22, 1986: Faith Healer Peter Popoff Is Exposed as a Fraud; Feb. 21, 1988: Evangelist Jimmy Swaggart Tearfully Confesses His Adultery; May 6, 1992: Irish Bishop Eamonn Casey's Romantic Affair Leads to His Resignation; Nov. 2, 2006: Evangelist Kent Hovind Is Convicted of Federal Tax Violations; Nov. 2, 2006: Male Escort Reveals Sexual Liaisons with Evangelist Ted Haggard.

April 9, 1987

BESS MYERSON RESIGNS AS NEW YORK COMMISSIONER OF CULTURAL AFFAIRS

Bess Myerson, a former Miss America, television personality, columnist, and consumer advocate, was appointed New York City's commissioner of cultural affairs by Mayor Edward I. Koch. She was indicted, then acquitted on charges of bribery, conspiracy, and mail fraud in a case involving her lover, contractor Carl Capasso. Capasso had bribed the judge, Hortense W. Gabel, by helping her daughter get a job in Myerson's city department.

ALSO KNOWN AS: Bess mess

LOCALE: New York, New York

CATEGORIES: Corruption; government; politics; law and the courts

KEY FIGURES

Bess Myerson (b. 1924), New York City commissioner of cultural affairs, 1983-1987

Carl Capasso (1945-2001), business contractor
Hortense W. Gabel (1912-1990), New York State Supreme Court justice
Edward I. Koch (b. 1924), mayor of New York City, 1978-1989

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Born in the Bronx to Russian immigrant parents, Bess Myerson was the first Jewish woman to win the Miss America title. She entered the contest because she wanted a new piano for her graduate studies in music. In the following decades, she made numerous television appearances on shows such as The Big Payoff, The Jackie Gleason Show, The Name's the Same, and I've Got a Secret.

Myerson became an icon for civil rights during her beauty pageant days when she refused to change her name to the pseudonym Beth Merrick to make it sound less Jewish. In response, numerous sponsors, including the Ford Motor Company, and events associated with the pageant refused to deal with her. A country club denied her admission to its facilities. She traveled around the United States for the Anti-Defamation League, speaking against anti-Semitism. She became involved in New York politics during the 1960's and 1970's, serving as New York City's first commissioner of consumer affairs.

In 1977, Myerson was a frequent companion to Edward I. Koch during his campaign for mayor of New York City, dispelling rumors that Koch was gay. In 1980, Myerson ran for the Democratic nomination to the U.S. Senate and lost by a slim margin. Her presidential appointments included sitting on committees for Lyndon B. Johnson, Gerald R. Ford, and Jimmy Carter. In 1983, Koch appointed Myerson commissioner of New York City's Department of Cultural Affairs, after the position had been turned down by former first lady Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis and opera star Beverly Sills. The department's principal function is to care for the city's cultural institutions, such as its museums, theaters, art centers, and gardens, although it fulfills other functions, such as facilitating and funding free public performances and concerts as well as small arts groups.

Myerson's tenure was marred by political and personal scandal. In a 1983 divorce case, a Bronx sewer contractor, Carl Capasso, was accused of bribing New York State Supreme Court justice Hortense W. Gabel to cut his alimony payments by inducing Myerson to give the judge's daughter, Suhkreet Gabel, a job as a special assistant in her department in 1983. (Gabel, who resigned in 1987, was indicted, then acquitted in late 1988 for her role in the case against Capasso.) Capasso was Myerson's lover.

Myerson had been summoned before a federal grand jury investigating Capasso's alleged bribery, but she invoked her Fifth Amendment rights to not testify against him. She did this despite Mayor Koch's earlier assertion that he would consider a refusal to appear before a grand jury grounds for dismissing any high-ranking city employee, including Myerson. In a report commissioned by the mayor and written by Harold Tyler, a former federal judge, there were numerous infractions and other ethical issues to be concerned about.

Further investigations, led by U.S. attorney Rudy Giuliani, revealed that Suhkreet Gabel had been unfit for the government position she was given by Myerson. Gabel's former employers included a massage parlor, and she had a history of mental instability. At the time she was hired, the mayor's assistant, Herbert Rickman, raised questions about her qualifications, but the mayor was reassured by Myerson that Gabel was the most qualified candidate. She failed to mention, however, that no other candidates had been interviewed. Rickman, who was not the most reliable witness, told federal investigators that he was in the early stages of Alzheimer's disease. It was later revealed that an assistant commissioner, Richard Bruno, helped create a false story to justify Gabel's hire. The post had been eliminated and then re-created specifically to make the hire possible.

In the meantime, during the last months of the grand jury investigations, Capasso was convicted in a separate criminal case for tax evasion. He was sentenced to four years in prison and fined $500,000. A federal grand jury then indicted Myerson, Capasso, and Judge Gabel for their roles in hiring Gabel's daughter in exchange for reducing Capasso's alimony payments.

The scandal proved stressful for Myerson. Just before her trial opened, she was arrested and fined for shoplifting forty-four dollars worth of merchandise from a shop in a small Pennsylvania town. Her spoils included six bottles of nail polish, five pairs of earrings, a pair of shoes, and flashlight batteries. She was in the area to visit Capasso at the Allenwood Federal Prison Camp. Other past indiscretions were uncovered by the media, including a London shoplifting charge from decades earlier as well as later police reports of dozens of anonymous phone calls and abusive letters to people involved in personal relationships that affected Myerson's romantic involvements. Myerson's Cultural Affairs Commission staff described her as effective but not personable. A former deputy commissioner went so far as to call her "the meanest manager I ever saw."

The trial exposed details of Myerson's unethical behavior, including having city employees run personal errands for her—such as grocery shopping and picking up dry cleaning—and she failed to disclose lavish gifts such as jewelry and a Mercedes sedan from Capasso, who had been a city contractor. Other erratic behavior included attending a morning meeting in hair curlers and talking through the first act of an opera before leaving at intermission.

Midway through the trial, Judge Kevin Thomas Duffy withdrew after U.S. attorney Giuliani submitted a motion to disqualify him on the basis that he had failed to disclose the extent of his relationship with one of Gabel's lawyers as well as with Gabel herself. Duffy, who said he was withdrawing because he resented the prosecution's tactics so much that he could no longer remain impartial, charged that Giuliani's motion had been driven by the judge's strict orders regarding publicity. Duffy had rebuked Giuliani for leaks of grand jury information that the judge believed could only have come from him. Duffy had an established contentious relationship with prosecutors. He accused them of delaying their response to defense motions in order to delay the trial, although he did not specify their motivation in doing so.

Duffy was replaced by Judge John F. Keenan, who was selected at random from the pool of active judges in federal district court. Myerson was indicted, then resigned on April 9, 1987. She was ultimately acquitted, as were Capasso and Judge Gabel.

IMPACT

Myerson was not the only city official accused of corruption during the administration of Mayor Koch. Other officials whose actions were examined in court during the Koch years included transportation commissioner Anthony R. Ameruso and comptroller Alan G. Hevesi. Despite the scandals, Koch's work led to an overall improvement in city services and the lowest unemployment rate in twelve years. Nonetheless, the Myerson scandal led to the end of the Koch era.

Even Myerson's detractors admitted that, in general, the Department of Cultural Affairs had been handled well during her tenure as its commissioner. She was a conscientious and thorough advocate for the department, whose budget doubled from $60 million to $123.5 million, making it second in the nation only to the federal National Endowment for the Arts in the amount of government funding it administered.

After her resignation, Myerson remained a frequent philanthropist. She helped found the Museum of Jewish Heritage, where she established the Bess Myerson Film and Video Collection, and she endowed the Bess Myerson Campus Journalism Awards given out by the Anti-Defamation League each year.

—Catherine Rambo

FURTHER READING

Alexander, Shana. When She Was Bad. New York: Random House, 1990. Focuses on the Myerson scandal and the circumstances behind Myerson's employment of Judge Gabel's daughter.

Mollenkopf, John H. A Phoenix in the Ashes: The Rise and Fall of the Koch Coalition in New York. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1994. Lays out and explicates the major events of the Koch administration, including the Myerson scandal, and discusses the relationship between Koch and Myerson.

Preston, Jennifer. Queen Bess: The Unauthorized Biography of Bess Myerson. New York: Contemporary Books, 1990. An unauthorized biography of Myerson that explores the scandal and its aftermath on her life.

Seidemann, Joel. In the Interest of Justice: Great Opening and Closing Arguments of the Last One Hundred Years. New York: HarperCollins, 2005. Includes arguments from the Myerson legal case from both the defense and the prosecution.

SEE ALSO: May 2, 2000: New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani's Extramarital Affair Is Revealed; Mar. 4, 2004: Former United Way Charity Chief Pleads Guilty to Embezzlement.

July 25, 1987

NOVELIST-POLITICIAN JEFFREY ARCHER WINS LIBEL TRIAL AGAINST THE DAILY STAR

Jeffrey Archer was a best-selling British novelist and rising Conservative Party politician in 1986 when London's Daily Star revealed that he had paid for sex, an accusation that led Archer to sue the newspaper successfully for libel. After two former associates came forward in 1999 to say that Archer lied during his testimony and manufactured evidence in the libel case, he was arrested, convicted of perjury, and imprisoned.

LOCALE: London, England

CATEGORIES: Law and the courts; publishing and journalism; government; politics; sex

KEY FIGURES

Jeffrey Archer (b. 1940), novelist and politician

Monica Coghlan (1951-2001), prostitute

Michael Stacpoole (b. 1938), friend and business associate of Archer

Ted Francis (b. 1934), friend of Archer and freelance television producer

Angela Peppiatt (b. 1945), personal assistant of Archer

Terence Baker (1939-1991), Archer's film and television agent

Adam Raphael (1937-1999), journalist

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Jeffrey Archer became the United Kingdom's fourth youngest member of Parliament in 1969 when he won a seat as a Conservative representing Louth, Lincolnshire. However, he had to step down in 1974 after he was victimized in a stock swindle and was close to bankruptcy. He then turned to writing to make a living. He based his first novel, Not a Penny More, Not a Penny Less (1976), on his experience with the swindler, and the book became a best seller. After writing more best sellers, including the Kane and Abel trilogy (1979, 1982, 1987), Archer reentered politics in 1985 when he was appointed deputy chairman of the Conservative Party by Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher, who chose to ignore warnings about his character.

Unfortunately for the Conservatives, those warnings turned out to be accurate. Archer resigned his position in October, 1986, when the newspaper The News of the World ran a story alleging that Archer had paid Monica Coghlan, a prostitute, £2,000 to leave England. She was allegedly paid through a go-between, Michael Stacpoole, a friend and business associate of Archer. However, the newspaper stopped short of saying that Archer actually had sex with Coghlan. It was another newspaper, the Daily Star, that reported Archer paid £70 for sex with Coghlan at the Albion Hotel in the Mayfair district of London. Archer sued the Daily Star for libel.

The civil trial began in early July, 1987. Archer testified that he had never met Coghlan, but journalist Adam Raphael testified under subpoena that Archer told him that he had met Coghlan about six months before the events in dispute. Archer explained the payment as the act of a kindhearted person rather than that of a guilty party trying to buy silence, and his wife, Mary Archer, a scientist, testified on his behalf. The reporters for the Daily Star and The News of the World testified that they had recorded telephone conversations between Archer and Coghlan without Archer's knowledge, had paid Coghlan £6,000, and had arranged to have Coghlan wear a microphone for a meeting she had with Stacpoole at Victoria Station. Their conversation was recorded.

Some confusion arose, however, regarding the exact date of the alleged sexual encounter. In any case, Archer had alibis from friends Ted Francis and Terence Baker for both nights in question, and Baker ultimately testified on Archer's behalf. Archer also provided an appointment book for the period that challenged the chronology of the Daily Star article. Observers at the trial felt that the judge was biased in Archer's favor, especially when he strongly argued for the support of Mary Archer in his instructions to the jury. (Judges in Britain are given more leeway in expressing their opinions before the jury than are judges in the United States.) On July 25, Archer won his lawsuit against the Daily Star, which had to pay him £500,000 in damages.

Archer then resumed his career as an author, writing plays, short stories, and novels. In 1992, he became Baron Archer of Weston-super-Mare at the recommendation of Prime Minister John Major for his fund-raising efforts for displaced Iraqi Kurds. In 1999, he was selected by the Conservative Party as its candidate for the London mayoral election of 2000.

After Archer's nomination, Francis, by then a former friend who claimed Archer owed him money, along with Archer's former personal assistant, Angela Peppiatt, whom Archer had fired in a dispute over expense reports, asserted that he had made up an alibi for the 1987 trial. They claimed it was their civic duty to report the fabricated alibi. It was later revealed, however, that Francis had accepted £19,000 from The News of the World. Francis claimed that Archer had asked him to lie under oath by testifying that they had dinner together on the night mentioned in the original Daily Star article. The newspaper later changed the date of the encounter in its story, so Francis never actually testified.

Peppiatt claimed that Archer had ordered her to forge an appointment book to back up his alibi, but that she had secretly kept the original book, photocopies of the false entries, and Archer's written instructions. Journalists also found Stacpoole, the intermediary who had given the money to Coghlan, in Thailand, where he was managing a brothel. Stacpoole revealed that Archer had given him £40,000 to live in Paris until after the 1987 trial was finished. Reportedly, Stacpoole had knowledge about Archer's business and marital affairs that would have damaged Archer's case. Finally, two friends of Archer's agent Baker, who had died in 1991, revealed that he had told them that he lied under oath to provide Archer with an alibi in return for the television and film rights to Archer's books.

The News of the World printed its investigative story in November, 1999, and Archer promptly withdrew from the election. In February, 2000, he was banned from the Conservative Party for five years; he was arrested in April and, in September, was charged with perjury and perverting the course of justice during the 1987 trial. The new trial took place from May through July, 2001. Archer was found guilty of both charges and was sentenced to four years in prison, of which he served two.

Archer was initially sent to Belmarsh Prison, a maximum-security facility, then moved to Wayland Prison (medium security) in August and finally to North Sea Camp (minimum security) in October. Media reports allege that he had been abusing his privileges, so in September, 2002, he was transferred to Lincoln Prison, a medium-security facility, for one month. In July, 2003, he was released on parole.

IMPACT

Archer's receipt of £500,000 in damages from the Daily Star in 1987 marked the highest award ever given in a libel case in the United Kingdom. Lloyd Turner, the newspaper's editor, was fired six weeks after the trial. In October, 2002, Archer repaid the monies he had received in 1987, plus £1 million for the newspaper's legal expenses. However, vindication came too late for Turner, who died in 1996.

Shortly after his release, Archer announced that he would never again enter politics, although he eventually joined a local branch of the Conservative Party. Instead, he concentrated on his writing career. He wrote the nonfiction trilogy A Prison Diary (2002, 2003, 2004) while in prison. After prison, he wrote the novels False Impression (2006) and The Gospel According to Judas (2007; cowritten with Francis J. Moloney) and the short-story collection Cat O'Nine Tales (2006). Nine of the stories in Cat O'Nine Tales were based on stories told to Archer by other prisoners during his incarceration.

—Thomas R. Feller

FURTHER READING

Archer, Jeffrey. A Prison Diary. New York: St. Martin's Griffin, 2003. The first volume of three, written as a form of therapy while in prison. This volume covers Belmarsh Prison. Volume 2, Purgatory (2005), describes his incarceration at Wayland Prison and volume 3, Heaven (2005), describes his incarceration at North Sea Camp.

Crick, Michael. Jeffrey Archer: Stranger than Fiction. 4th ed. London: Hamish Hamilton, 2000. An updated biography of Archer that includes discussion of the charges of perjury that surfaced in 1999. Both editions devote several chapters to the 1987 trial.

Mantle, Jonathan. In for a Penny: Unauthorized Biography of Jeffrey Archer. London: Hamish Hamilton, 1988. This was the first book-length biography of Archer and was favorably reviewed at the time. Unfortunately, the author did not have the benefit of the information revealed in 1999 and 2001, the year of Archer's new trial.

SEE ALSO: July 10, 1934: Sex Scandal Forces Resignation of Alberta Premier Brownlee; Dec. 10, 1936: King Edward VIII Abdicates to Marry an American Divorcée; Mar. 2–Sept. 25, 1963: John Profumo Affair Rocks British Government; Oct. 14, 1983: British Cabinet Secretary Parkinson Resigns After His Secretary Becomes Pregnant; 1985–1986: Westland Affair Shakes Prime Minister Thatcher's Government; Aug. 10, 1989: Japanese Prime Minister Sosuke Resigns After Affair with a Geisha; Sept. 24, 1992: British Cabinet Member David Mellor Resigns over Romantic Affair; Jan. 5, 1994: British Cabinet Member Resigns After Fathering a Child Out of Wedlock; Sept. 28, 2002: British Politician Reveals Her Affair with Prime Minister John Major; Jan. 21, 2006: British Politician Resigns After Gay-Sex Orgy; Apr. 26, 2006: Britain's Deputy Prime Minister Admits Affair with Secretary.

September 23, 1987

PLAGIARISM CHARGES END JOE BIDEN'S PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN

Joe Biden, a three-term U.S. senator from Delaware whose populist style marked him as a rising star in the Democratic Party, was forced to abandon his presidential campaign after he was accused of using the words of a British politician as his own in a campaign speech that was videotaped. The media also revealed his academic difficulties in law school. Biden's career in politics flourished, despite the accusations of plagiarism and misappropriation.

LOCALES: Iowa; Washington, D.C.

CATEGORIES: Politics; government; plagiarism; publishing and journalism

KEY FIGURES

Joe Biden (b. 1942), U.S. senator from Delaware, 1973–2009, and vice president, 2009–

Michael Dukakis (b. 1933), governor of Massachusetts, 1975–1979 and 1983–1991
Neil Kinnock (b. 1942), member of the British parliament, 1970–1995, and leader of the opposition Labour Party, 1983–1992

SUMMARY OF EVENT

In November, 1965, Joe Biden, a struggling first-year student at Syracuse University College of Law, plagiarized five pages from a May, 1965, Fordham Law Review article for a fifteen-page paper in a legal methodology seminar. When the plagiarism was detected, Biden, a graduate of the University of Delaware whose undergraduate record was itself undistinguished, claimed the borrowing was inadvertent and that he misunderstood the importance of source citation (he provided only one footnote in the paper). The law school, however, citing its code of integrity, maintained zero tolerance for material theft, and Biden was given a reprimand and a grade of F in the class.

Biden retook the class and earned a low B. He graduated three years later, seventy-sixth in a class of eighty-five. He returned to Delaware and moved from law into politics. Charismatic, good looking, and with a reputation for eloquence, Biden became the fifth youngest senator in U.S. history in 1972.

In 1987, Republican Ronald Reagan's presidency was coming to a close. Biden, by this time a popular three-term senator and chairman of the powerful Senate Judiciary Committee and considered a moderate liberal (important given the legacy of the conservative revolution over which Reagan had presided), launched what appeared to be a promising presidential campaign. He quickly became one of the front-runners as he carried his campaign into Iowa, the first of the caucus states and, hence, critically important. The Democratic field was wide open and already quite contentious. Although the field of candidates included the Reverend Jesse Jackson, U.S. Representative Richard Gephardt, and U.S. Senator Al Gore, Biden's most significant challenge was Michael Dukakis, in his third term as governor of Massachusetts, whose reputation as a cool economics-driven technocrat and a reserved campaigner was juxtaposed against Biden's affable personality. Biden also was passionate and eloquent in his stump speeches and embraced a populist style that drew massive crowds and generated tremendous excitement despite his reputation for lengthy speeches.

In early September, Biden was delivering his stump speech at the Iowa state fairgrounds. As he closed the speech, he appeared to move off his prepared script and talk candidly and passionately about how, on his way to the fairgrounds, he had thought back over his own difficult childhood, about how his family had come from humble origins and had worked long hours in the forbidding conditions of the mines of northeastern Pennsylvania (he was born in Scranton). He spoke of how his family had never been able to attend college and yet managed to endure despite never having a voice in politics. He added that he was proud to now run as a candidate to be that voice. The closing surprised his staffers and was quite moving; indeed, it was vintage Biden.

Presidential hopeful Joe Biden denies charges of plagiarism in 1987.
(AP/Wide World Photos)

Several days later a video, quietly (and anonymously) distributed to the media in Iowa, showed populist British Labour Party leader Neil Kinnock delivering virtually the same remarks weeks earlier at a rally in northern England. The video juxtaposed Biden and Kinnock in vivid split screen. Biden, however, had used the same words in speeches before the speech in Iowa and always acknowledged Kinnock as the source. On the one occasion that he failed to attribute the passage to Kinnock, Biden was videotaped. Reporters jumped on the story and quickly discovered that no relative in the Biden family had ever worked in the mines, that his father was in fact fairly successful in car sales, and that most of his mother's family had graduated from college.

The juxtaposition of Biden's apparent earnestness against his obvious pilfering of the sentiments of the British politician was particularly embarrassing because it raised questions of Biden's credibility and his sincerity. Accusations quickly surfaced that opposition campaigns had manipulated the media to create the controversy. Although responsibility was never established, it was held that the Dukakis campaign, then under the direction of veteran campaign coordinator John Sasso, had prepared the video. Dukakis, who maintained he knew nothing of the video, quickly acted to distance himself from what was considered a vicious attack campaign. He dismissed both Sasso and junior campaign political director Paul Tully, even as his staff repeatedly claimed the Kinnock video had been leaked to the Dukakis campaign by the staff of a struggling Gephardt eager to thwart Biden. Indeed, during the two weeks leading up to his withdrawal from the race, Biden dismissed the accusations of pilfering from Kinnock as ludicrous. Nevertheless, the damage to Biden's campaign was done.

In a series of investigative reports, The New York Times detailed Biden's problems in law school at Syracuse and, more damaging, found other instances in which Biden had used phrases and passages from other speeches earlier on the campaign trail in New Hampshire and New Jersey. The newspaper reported how he had used the words of others, including those of Democratic Party icon Robert F. Kennedy, to exaggerate his own public record, most notably his involvement in the Civil Rights movement of the 1960's.

The news coverage was devastating to the Biden campaign. In an emotional conference on September 18, he acknowledged that he had lifted the Kinnock passage and then admitted to his own mediocre academic record but attempted to defuse the implications of using Kinnock's words by insisting that politicians often echoed each other as a tribute and that the other occasions of borrowing reflected carelessness rather than deceit. He went on to describe himself as just an average Joe, hoping to draw on Reagan's winning legacy of charm. He vowed to stay in the presidential race.

Biden never recovered from the scandal, though, and he faced a continual barrage of questions about his intelligence and trustworthiness. Although the passages cited by reporters accounted for a small percentage of Biden's voluminous public record of speeches, and although the media acknowledged that plagiarism was hardly a criminal offense, questions persisted. Biden's consistently high ratings as a senator plummeted even as he continued to fend off questions of his integrity and ethics. Although dismissing the firestorm as politically motivated and trivial, Biden suspended his presidential run on September 23, only five days after he admitted to using Kinnock's words without attribution.

IMPACT

Biden certainly was not the first politician or student to plagiarize, and many supporters believe he was unfairly—or overly—targeted for an action that pales in comparison to the gravity of other offenses that ruin politicians with much thinner records of public service. Even so, once the revelations of his academic record came to light, and once the media found the pattern of misappropriation, Biden was considered a politician without core values or integrity. Because of this character assessment, his initial claims of innocence reaffirmed the belief by many that he was a moral relativist and an intellectual flyweight.

Furthermore, because Biden was a promising Democratic Party visionary and one of the party's most eloquent and articulate speakers, his downfall for plagiarism made him a point of reference for a generation of teachers and professors who, confronting the insidious opportunities for plagiarism brought by the Web, tirelessly remind students that academic and personal honesty matter.

Biden, however, survived the scandal politically. Several years after his 1987 campaign imploded, he jokingly presented Kinnock with a bound volume of his own speeches and invited the British politician to borrow what he wanted from that volume. Biden remained in the Senate and emerged in the post-September 11, 2001, era as a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, working as one of the most passionate and articulate voices on international law and U.S. military deployment. When his presidential run in 2008 ended early, little notice was paid to the 1987 scandal, which indicated that his reputation and the perception of his integrity and intelligence had not been irrevocably defined by the scandal. Indeed, he was chosen as Barack Obama's vice presidential running mate during the presidential campaign of 2008, becoming vice president of the United States in January, 2009.

—Joseph Dewey

FURTHER READING

Biden, Joseph. Promises to Keep: On Life and Politics. New York: Random House, 2007. Provides important context for appreciating the magnitude of Biden's public record and his own frank assessment of the lessons learned from his failed presidential campaign.

Black, Christine, and Thomas Oliphant. All by Myself: The Unmaking of a Presidential Campaign. Guilford, Conn.: Globe/Pequot, 1989. Definitive account of the 1988 campaign that places the Biden collapse (and the staff chicanery behind its well-timed revelation) within the larger picture of how the scandal impacted the election. Valuable summary of the promise of Biden's presence and the precipitous nature of his collapse.

Mallon, Thomas. Stolen Words: Forays Into the Origins and Ravages of Plagiarism. 1989. New ed.

Plagiarism Charges End Biden's Presidential Bid

San Diego, Calif.: Harvest Books, 2001. References the Biden controversy as well as other prominent cases of misappropriation of published work. Presents the definitive case for why plagiarism matters, and discusses its implications as a revelation of character, integrity, and work ethic.

Patterson, Thomas E. Out of Order: An Incisive and Boldly Original Critique of the News Media's Domination of America's Political Process. New York: Vintage Books, 1994. Written after the 1987 campaign, this work offers a clear assessment of how the media mishandled the Biden controversy and the disturbing implications of media influence in deciding presidential nominees, especially in the United States.

SEE ALSO: Mar. 1, 1967: Adam Clayton Powell, Jr., Is Excluded from Congress; June 23, 1967: Senator Thomas J. Dodd Is Censured for Misappropriating Funds; Oct. 11, 1979: Senate Denounces Herman E. Talmadge for Money Laundering; May 31, 1989: Speaker of the House Jim Wright Resigns in Ethics Scandal; June 1, 1994: Congressman Dan Rostenkowski Is Indicted in House Post Office Scandal; Jan. 17, 1998: President Bill Clinton Denies Sexual Affair with a White House Intern; Dec. 5, 2002: Senator Trent Lott Praises Strom Thurmond's 1948 Presidential Campaign.

November 28, 1987

BLACK TEENAGER CLAIMS TO HAVE BEEN GANG-RAPED BY POLICE OFFICERS

Tawana Brawley, an African American teenager living in upstate New York, alleged that she was abducted and gang-raped by several white men, including police officers. Her claim, which turned out to be a hoax, nevertheless focused public attention on racial inequalities within the U.S. legal system. Critics following the case accused local police of covering up the charges and the justice system of ignoring, or downplaying, crimes against African Americans.

LOCALE: Wappingers Falls, New York

CATEGORIES: Hoaxes, frauds, and charlatanism; racism; law and the courts; social issues and reform; women's issues; families and children

KEY FIGURES

Tawana Brawley (b. 1972), fifteen-year-old student who made a false claim of rape and abduction

Al Sharpton (b. 1954), Pentecostal minister and civil rights activist

C. Vernon Mason (b. 1946), politician, lawyer, and civil rights activist

Alton H. Maddox, Jr. (b. 1945), lawyer and civil rights activist

Steven Pagones (b. 1962), assistant district attorney, Dutchess County, New York

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Tawana Brawley, a fifteen-year-old African American girl living in Wappingers Falls, New York, failed to return home on November 24, 1987, prompting a neighborhood search by her parents, Glenda Brawley and Ralph King. Brawley was discovered by a neighbor several days later, on November 28, outside the Brawley family's previous residence, the Pavilion apartments complex.

A disheveled Brawley was found lying on the ground inside a garbage bag up to her neck, appearing weak and partially conscious. Her clothes were ripped, her hair was matted, and feces covered her arms, legs, chest, and hair. She was taken to St. Francis Hospital in Poughkeepsie, New York, where medical staff discovered burn marks in the crotch area of her pants, a grayish cottonlike material in her nose and ears, and several racial slurs written on her chest and stomach in a charcoal-like substance. Brawley exhibited no major injuries aside from a small bruise behind her ear, which surprised medical staff. The Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) joined the investigation because of the racial slurs on Brawley's body. The slurs would make the case a hate crime as well.

On November 29, Brawley remained silent during most of her first interview with a local white police officer, but she began to disclose details about the alleged rape after a black police officer was assigned to the interview upon her request. Brawley revealed that her assailants had been three white men, including police officers, and in a later interview she alleged that they had kidnapped, sodomized, and repeatedly raped her in the woods behind her old apartment building during the four days she was missing. Brawley did not name any of her attackers during the interviews, and many of the details concerning her abduction and assault remained unclear. On January 13, 1988, Brawley and her mother, Glenda, were due to testify in front of a grand jury at the Dutchess County Courthouse in Poughkeepsie, but neither Brawley nor her mother appeared. By this time, Brawley was telling her friends that she was attacked by six white men instead of three. The media began to discuss the grisly details, and the mysteries, of the alleged abduction and sexual assault.

With growing public interest in the Brawley case, two black civil rights activists, lawyers Alton Maddox and C. Vernon Mason, began to rally behind Brawley and claim that local government officials were attempting to cover up the case to protect the white police officers who allegedly raped her. Support for this claim grew because of suspicious behavior and unexplained appointment changes in legal counsel in the criminal case. Three different prosecutors had been assigned to the case by New York governor Mario Cuomo; the first two prosecutors left after citing a conflict of interest in the case. Also, a local police officer committed suicide around this time, stirring further public distrust. In Maddox's and Mason's view, these events validated their accusations of a police cover-up. The Brawley media frenzy reached its height when Pentecostal minister and social activist the Reverend Al Sharpton began organizing rallies, holding conferences, and appearing on talk shows to demand that justice be served in the Brawley case.

Suspects in the Brawley case were left unnamed until March 13, 1988, when Brawley, Maddox, Mason, and Sharpton accused Steven Pagones, a white Dutchess County assistant district attorney, of being involved in the gang rape. Pagones, who had once lived near the Brawley family, received death threats, and the media and Brawley's supporters demanded his arrest. Protest marches that demanded racial equality and justice in the case became more widespread and drew the attention of celebrity supporters, including comedian Bill Cosby, boxing promoter Don King, and professional boxer Mike Tyson. Public donations for the Brawley family began to pour in as well.

By the end of June, the numerous discrepancies and a lack of concrete facts in the case led to increased public frustration and outrage. Most damning were the results of Brawley's medical examination, conducted the day she was found in the woods outside the apartment complex. The exam revealed that she had no bodily injuries consistent with sexual assault, and the only DNA found on her body was that of Brawley herself. Experts on rape testified that Brawley's story mimicked the testimony of those found to have falsely alleged rape.

Despite the burn marks on Brawley's pants, medical personnel found no sign of a burn to her body. Also, Brawley had been discovered outdoors during the cold month of November, but she showed no signs of exposure; indeed, the exam showed that she was well nourished, a finding that contradicted her claim that she had been abducted four days earlier. Prosecutors claimed that the cottonlike substance found in her nose and ears had been used to diminish the smell of feces that covered most of her body, except her face, and that the use of cotton was simply uncharacteristic of a hate crime. Prosecutors also claimed that the racial slurs found on her body were written by Brawley herself with burned wet cotton, identical to a substance found under her fingernails at the hospital.

The investigation also identified witnesses who said they saw Brawley at parties during the four-day-period she claimed she was abducted. The neighbor who first discovered Brawley on November 28 testified that she saw the girl climb into the garbage bag herself. Witness testimony also disclosed that Glenda Brawley's alibi the day her daughter was found was not concrete. The anomalies in the case pointed to a hoax.

Tawana Brawley, left, with Al Sharpton at a rally protesting Brawley's mistreatment in her case alleging that she was raped. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Further details emerged as the case moved forward. Brawley had a history of running away from home, and her parents, particularly her stepfather, Ralph King, were known to be physically violent. The Brawleys also had financial problems at the time of the alleged rape, so they benefitted from the monies they received from sympathetic supporters.

The media began to report on the court testimony and the evidence that suggested Brawley's allegations were a farce. In response, her advisers scheduled a news conference so that she could counter the hoax claim. She never got the chance. On October 6, New York Supreme Court justice Angelo J. Ingrassia concluded from the grand jury's 170-page report that the gang-rape was fabricated, that Brawley's injuries had been self-inflicted, and that the accusations against Pagones were unfounded. Brawley never testified.

On May 21, 1990, attorney Maddox was disbarred from practicing law by the New York Supreme Court. In November, 1997, Pagones filed defamation lawsuits against Mason, Maddox, Sharpton, and Brawley, seeking $395 million in damages; he was awarded $345,000 from Brawley's advisers and $185,000 from Brawley on July 13, 1998.

In the meantime, Brawley maintained that she was raped. She also continued to receive support from Maddox and Mason, as well as from others who believed that justice was not served. Sharpton declined to pursue the case further. In November, 2007, Brawley's parents requested that their daughter's case be reopened and that Brawley receive not only justice but also monetary compensation.

IMPACT

Brawley's gang-rape allegations and their revelation as a hoax became a catalyst for intense discussion and debate about racism and racial inequalities in the United States. Despite suspicions that the Brawley family, as well as Maddox, Mason, and Sharpton, had used the case to further their own personal agendas, whether financial or political, the hoax focused attention on a broken legal system, a racist America, and a sensationalist media. Polls conducted during the investigations revealed a wide gap between blacks and whites on the question of whether Brawley was telling the truth.

The case also reveals the extent to which a person may go in seeking financial or political gain. The Brawleys concocted a hoax so real that it captured a legal system during months of grand-jury investigations, which included interviews of close to two hundred witnesses. In his opinion in Pagones's defamation suits in 1998, New York Supreme Court justice S. Barrett Hickman wrote,

It is probable that in the history of this state [New York], never has a teenager turned the prosecutorial and judicial systems literally upside down with such false claims. The cost of the lengthy, thorough and complete grand jury investigation was reportedly estimated at one-half million dollars.

—Sheena Garitta

FURTHER READING

Chancer, Lynn S. High-profile Crimes: When Legal Cases Become Social Causes. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2005. An account of the "polarizing" criminal cases of the 1980's and 1990's, including the Brawley hoax.

Glaberson, William. "Plaintiff Is Awarded $345,000 in Brawley Defamation Suit." The New York Times, July 30, 1998. Details the defamation lawsuit filed by Steven Pagones following his exoneration in the Brawley gang-rape case.

McFadden, Robert D., et al. Outrage: The Story Behind the Tawana Brawley Hoax. New York: Bantam Books, 1990. Provides a narrative of the Brawley case from the point of view of several New York Times reporters.

Nadel, Adam. "Parents Want 'Hoax' Rape Reopened—Accusations in Brawley Case Ignited Racial Tensions Decades Ago." Times Union (Albany, New York), November 19, 2007. Gives a brief report of the continued support and pursuit of justice for Brawley by her family.

SEE ALSO: Mar. 30, 1931: "Scottsboro Boys" Are Railroaded Through Rape Trials; Mar. 13, 1964: Kitty Genovese Dies as Her Cries for Help Are Ignored; Aug. 12, 1983-July 27, 1990: McMartin Preschool Is Embroiled in Child-Abuse Case; Dec. 22, 1984: Subway Vigilante Bernhard Goetz Shoots Four Black Youths; Jan. 22, 1987: Pennsylvania Politician Kills Himself at Televised Press Conference; Mar. 30, 1991: William Kennedy Smith Is Accused of Rape; July 1, 2003: Basketball Star Kobe Bryant Is Accused of Rape; Mar. 14, 2006: Duke Lacrosse Players Are Accused of Gang Rape; Apr. 11, 2007: Shock Jock Don Imus Loses His Radio Show Over Sexist and Racist Remarks.

December 1, 1987

YALE SCHOLAR'S WARTIME ANTI-SEMITIC WRITINGS ARE REVEALED

The New York Times revealed that Paul de Man, noted for his work in deconstruction, had written a number of newspaper articles during World War II, at least one of which contained anti-Semitic views. Critics of deconstruction, a method of literary criticism, argued that this bigotry discredited deconstruction because it exposed its morally neutral inability to condemn bigotry. Among the most serious charges against de Man was his long-time silence about these early writings.

LOCALE: New York, New York

CATEGORIES: Racism; publishing and journalism; education

KEY FIGURES

Paul de Man (1919-1983), Belgian-born

American literary critic and philosopher

Ortwin de Graef (b. 1963), Belgian graduate student

Jacques Derrida (1930-2004), French philosopher and literary critic

SUMMARY OF EVENT

In August, 1987, a Belgian doctoral student, Ortwin de Graef, made a disturbing discovery while researching his dissertation on Belgian-born literary critic and philosopher Paul de Man. Early in World War II, when de Man was in his early twenties, he had over a three-year period written seventy articles as chief literary critic for the Belgian collaborationist newspaper Le Soir. Belgium was then under German occupation, which involved close Nazi editorial control of major newspapers such as Le Soir. Most of de Man's articles were standard reviews of books, music, and plays. However, a number of these articles had clear political implications. Some articles expressed both anti-Semitic and profascist opinions consonant with the Nazi Party line.

After the war, de Man had gone on to a very distinguished career as a literary critic and philosopher in the United States. His wartime journalism became public four years after his death in 1983. De Graef had sent photocopies of the most controversial articles to American scholars in de Man's field of deconstructionist criticism, most especially to scholars at Yale University, where he had held an endowed chair in the humanities.

The news from Belgium shocked de Man's colleagues and students. None could recall him expressing anti-Semitic or profascist sympathies. Nonetheless, the de Man scandal came to national and international attention when, on December 1, 1987, The New York Times published the article "Yale Scholar Wrote for Pro-Nazi Newspaper" on its front page. Accounts followed in other influential media, and an angry debate erupted among Western academics.

What exactly had the young de Man written between 1940 and 1942 that would provoke such heated disputes nearly fifty years later? On March 4, 1941, Le Soir had published a special edition devoted to "The Jews and Us." Among the articles was one by de Man. Next to his article, "The Jews in Contemporary Literature," was a caricature of two bearded, elderly Jews praying to God to "confound the gentiles." De Man's article appraised the quality of Jewish literature at the time and argued that it had "polluted" modern literature in unspecified ways. He thought it best for European society if Jews were isolated somewhere outside Europe.

By this time, Belgian legislation under Nazi guidance had excluded Jews from the professions of law, teaching, journalism, and government service. De Man later published a piece in Le Soir to counter the claim that the German occupiers of Belgium were barbarians. Their conduct, he wrote, had been impeccable and they were both disciplined and civilized. On other occasions de Man praised Italian dictator Benito Mussolini for his strong authoritarian rule as a possible model for Belgium. De Man also admired the place fascism gave to literature and art in society, and he praised the first generation of Italian poets under fascism.

After the war, in 1948, de Man emigrated to the United States and completed a doctorate in comparative literature at Harvard University. He taught at several American universities, until his appointment in 1970 as a humanities professor at Yale. Then he began to teach what was then a new mode of literary criticism: deconstruction. Deconstruction had not originated with de Man but with his close friend, French philosopher and literary critic Jacques Derrida. In 1967, Derrida published a book that elaborated a new strategy for analyzing philosophic and literary texts. For Derrida, there was no objective reality, no ultimate truth, and no absolutes. He insisted on the uncompromising questioning, or "deconstructing," of everything thinkable.

Deconstruction was a special kind of literary analysis that focused primarily on language and meaning in literature and in philosophy texts. The actual literary text conferred no meaning, as such, but only what each reader was able to "construct" from reading a given text and then creating a virtual text for oneself. In this sense, no real world existed—only a construct of it existed in the minds of readers. For Derrida, nothing exists "outside the text." That is, meaning is derived from the mind's interaction with words to form a temporary virtual text.

Sharing Derrida's radical skepticism and interest in literary criticism, de Man published two books during the 1970's that brought him to the unchallenged leadership of the deconstructionist movement in the United States. Like Derrida, de Man made literary language his main focus. He insisted that language could never describe any objective reality because an author's words, and a reader's perception, were always shifting in meaning. For de Man, language was incapable of communicating what it intended because the author of a text had motives or "intentions" that could never be known in any permanent sense, even by the author. Basically, things are what one says they are. Truth cannot be defined. Every text, whether a novel, a history, a document of any kind, had to be deconstructed or "decoded" before it could be profitably approached.

The disclosure of de Man's articles in 1987 was greeted with vehement denunciations by academics and the general public. De Man's defenders were quick to accuse detractors of using the scandal to undermine deconstruction itself. What many critics found most objectionable and dangerous in deconstruction was its uncompromising relativism. For example, de Man's deconstructionist approach, they claimed, involved the rejection of any moral standards whatsoever, which rendered the approach incapable of confronting, for example, fascism and racial prejudice.

De Man's supporters and advocates of deconstruction countered that deconstruction was badly misunderstood by its critics. Deconstruction offered, rather, an exhilarating liberation from all stereotypes and stale certainties. Everything must be thought and experienced anew, always. Deconstruction was a subtle, complex, and ambivalent process that could not be generalized.

Most critics found inexcusable de Man's article of 1941. Supporters contend that the anti-Semitic article was a form of cultural anti-Semitism. It pertained only to the realms of literature and art, which distinguished it from the vulgar, or commonplace, racial and religious anti-Semitism so prevalent in occupied Belgium and the rest of Europe.

Among the most serious charges leveled against de Man, however, was that in his thirty-five years in the United States, he failed to mention publicly his early anti-Semitic, profascist writings. His great silence was considered a cowardly failure to come to terms with his secret. Defenders responded that his later writings showed a clear rejection of authoritarianism and, in other respects, could be seen as atonement for his questionable, though hidden, past.

IMPACT

Deconstruction reached its peak of influence and popularity during the 1970's and 1980's, especially at Yale, whose leading scholar was de Man. However, the deaths of the primary formulators of deconstruction (de Man in 1983 and Derrida in 2004) seemed, in retrospect, to be benchmark events in the diminishing profile of the movement. De Man's wartime articles clearly contributed to the waning popularity, but in ways difficult to measure.

Meanwhile, new varieties of literary criticism and philosophy appeared with other agendas. De Man's primary focus on literature was supplemented by a fresh emphasis on neglected issues of politics and ethics, and it came to include post-colonial, gender, and cultural studies. However, de Man's influence would remain, even though the Yale School of deconstruction lost prestige in the field of literary theory. Dozens of his students, and their students as well, would become professors at universities in the United States and Canada. Many testified to the vivid, inspirational quality of de Man's teaching.

As for the de Man scandal, many found his collaborationist conduct indefensible. Others were less condemning. Either way, it seemed essential to examine his later writings in the light of his early articles. De Man, it seemed, had carefully avoided racial and political topics, except for a firm rejection of authoritarian government. He also made occasional oblique references to the burden of guilt and remorse carried by his generation after World War II.

Yale Scholar's Anti-Semitic Writings Are Revealed

De Man's reputation for integrity certainly suffered following the posthumous discovery of the Le Soir articles. For some, his subsequent public silence on the matter only compounded his moral offense. The question remained whether de Man would be remembered more as the dynamic and influential leader of deconstruction in literature or as the youthful wartime collaborator with Nazi politics. His legacy, overall, remains mixed.

—Donald Sullivan

FURTHER READING

Hamacher, Werner, Neil Hertz, and Thomas Keran, eds. Responses: On Paul de Man's Wartime Journalism. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1989. Essays evaluating the charges of anti-Semitism against de Man and the impact of those claims on his scholarly reputation and character.

Julius, Anthony. T. S. Elliot, Anti-Semitism, and Literary Fascism. New York: Thames & Hudson, 2003. Makes a detailed case for convicting de Man of anti-Semitic and profascist sympathies as a young writer during World War II.

Kaplan, Alice. French Lessons: A Memoir. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1993. Kaplan, a literary scholar, discusses her work on French fascist intellectuals and reexamines her discovery that de Man, who had been one of her graduate-school professors at Yale, had written for the pro-Nazi Belgian press.

McQuillan, Martin. Paul de Man. New York: Routledge, 2001. Contains a sympathetic assessment of de Man's early articles. Concludes that de Man was not personally anti-Semitic and that his wartime writings should be considered in historical context. Includes a translation of de Man's controversial newspaper article of March 4, 1941.

SEE ALSO: July 12, 1906: French Court Declares Alfred Dreyfus Innocent of Treason; Apr. 22, 1942: French Prime Minister Pierre Laval Wants

Germany to Win World War II; Dec. 5, 1942: Industrialist Charles Bedaux Is Arrested for Nazi Collaboration; May 9, 1945: Norwegian Politician Quisling Is Arrested for Nazi Collaboration; May 26, 1945: Norwegian Writer Knut Hamsun Is Arrested for Treason; Aug. 14, 1945: French War Hero Pétain Is Convicted of Nazi Collaboration; Dec. 14, 1945: Poet Ezra Pound Is Charged with Treason and Institutionalized; Oct.

26, 1962: West German Police Raid Der Spiegel Magazine Offices; Feb. 23, 1963: Play Accuses Pope Pius XII of Complicity in the Holocaust; 1980: Biographer Claims Actor Errol Flynn Was a Nazi Spy; Mar. 3, 1986: Former U.N. Secretary-General Kurt Waldheim's Nazi Past Is Revealed; Aug. 12, 2006: Novelist Günter Grass Admits to Youthful Nazi Ties.

January 15, 1988

ZZZZ BEST FOUNDER IS INDICTED ON FEDERAL FRAUD CHARGES

ZZZZ Best, founded by Barry Minkow, was a carpet-cleaning and, later, insurance restoration company. It also had ties to organized crime and was essentially run as a Ponzi scheme. Auditors, investment bankers, attorneys, and federal investigators were badly fooled by Minkow and his associates, and stockholders lost more than $240 million when the fraud was uncovered.

LOCALE: Los Angeles, California

CATEGORIES: Law and the courts; hoaxes, frauds, and charlatanism; corruption; banking and finance; business; organized crime and racketeering

KEY FIGURES

Barry Minkow (b. 1967), founder and president of ZZZZ Best Company

Tom Padgett (b. 1950), insurance claims adjuster and coconspirator in the fraud scheme

Mark Morze (b. 1955), Minkow's financial consultant and coconspirator in the fraud scheme

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Barry Minkow started his own carpet-cleaning business, ZZZZ Best Company, when he was just sixteen years old, and within two years he was the president of his own corporate empire. However, that empire, which expanded to include insurance restoration, was mostly nonexistent. Minkow had been perpetrating a gigantic fraud—one of the largest of the twentieth century. His real business was to create an attractive company that induced investors to hand over their money to ZZZZ Best.

Minkow's carpet-cleaning business never was profitable, so he had to borrow money to buy equipment and pay off debts. When it came time to repay his loans, Minkow began creating phony financial statements to fool the bankers. To make it look like he had more business than he really had, Minkow created the phony insurance restoration business, claiming to clean and remodel buildings that had suffered fire and other damage losses. Although this part of his business was fabricated, it nevertheless produced 90 percent of the company's revenues. Critical to Minkow's success was convincing the large international auditing firm of Ernst & Whinney (now Ernst & Young) that his restoration business was real.

The ultimate fraud would be to make ZZZZ Best a public company and thereby open the doors to investors around the United States. ZZZZ Best's chief financial officer, Mark Morze, had convinced Minkow that going public would enable the company to grow, and grow it did. Investors quickly pushed the company's market price up to eighteen dollars per share. Minkow's share of the company (52 percent after the public offering) was worth well over $100 million, making him the so-called boy-wonder of Wall Street. He appeared on many television shows, including Oprah, and was the subject of numerous magazine articles.

Minkow used many tricks to convince auditors that his nonexistent clients really existed: One of those tricks was check kiting, that is, he wrote checks to his own company using an account without funds. His financial statements would show an account receivable, or payment, from a nonexistent customer. If an auditor tried to determine the validity of that receivable, Minkow would be able to show that the customer had indeed paid the account on the due date. However, it was Minkow himself who would pay the ZZZZ Best account with a check written on a ghost account—an account of a “customer.”

In another instance, Minkow bribed a security guard to allow him to take auditors into a building in Sacramento, California, purportedly restored by Minkow’s company after a fire. The auditors had no reason to doubt Minkow. Many critics would later argue that auditors failed to do their jobs, which made the scheme even more successful.

Minkow was aided in his fraud scheme by Morze and Tom Padgett, an insurance claims adjuster whom he had earlier befriended. Minkow, Padgett, and Morze, through their fictitious business Interstate Appraisal Services, prepared phony documents to support the scheme, so documentation was always available for auditors. The fraud involved the use of a copy machine for invoices and stationery for customers and suppliers—neither of which existed. Minkow, Padgett, and Morze worked hard to make the fraud look real, spending several million dollars to convince auditors that the company’s restoration jobs were authentic.

Minkow’s lifestyle also exuded success. He lived in a large mansion and drove one of the world’s highest-priced cars, a Ferrari Testarossa. He lectured at business schools, and the mayor of Los Angeles even declared a Barry Minkow Day for the city. The glitz apparently blinded the auditors, lawyers, and underwriters. Minkow later stated that he tried to become friends with the auditors and their spouses so they would not be suspicious of him. He also manipulated the auditors by asking for their business advice; the result was that they spent their time as consultants rather than investigators. It would take the curiosity of a homemaker in Los Angeles to bring down Minkow’s fraud scheme.

One of Minkow’s minor schemes was overcharging customers who paid their carpet-cleaning bills with a credit card. If they complained about the overcharge, he would eventually refund their money. However, one woman whom he had cheated told her story to a reporter with the Los Angeles Times, which ran a damning story about ZZZZ Best and Minkow on May 22, 1987. At the time, Minkow also was trying to buy a rival carpet-cleaning company, KeyServe, for eighty million dollars. The price of ZZZZ Best stock dropped and subsequent investigations found that many of the ZZZZ Best customers did not exist. Another story alerted the Federal Bureau of Investigation that Minkow had done some work for the Genovese crime family. Essentially, a combination of media sources, initiated by one woman’s anger at being overcharged for carpet cleaning, uncovered the full extent of the fraud.

Minkow and nine others associated with the fraud scheme were indicted on January 15, 1988, by a Los Angeles federal grand jury. Charges included racketeering, securities fraud, and tax fraud. Minkow was found guilty on December 15 and was sentenced to twenty-five years in prison but served just over seven years before being paroled in 1995. At the time of his indictment, he was twenty years old. While in prison, Minkow said that he found religion, and he also enrolled in a college program through Liberty University, founded by Christian conservative Jerry Falwell. In prison he earned a bachelor’s degree, and he earned a master’s degree in 1996.

Following his parole in 1995, Minkow became the associate pastor of a church near his hometown in the San Fernando Valley of Los Angeles, and in 1997 he became the pastor of Community Bible Church in San Diego. He speaks as an expert on corporate fraud and is associated with the Fraud Discovery Institute, which he cofounded, in San Diego. He also works undercover, on occasion, to expose fraud.

IMPACT

The bankruptcy of ZZZZ Best came at a time when other companies, including ESM Government Securities and a host of banks and savings and loan associations, were facing similar fraud charges. The ZZZZ Best fraud, which bilked $240 million from duped investors and others, led the U.S. Congress to begin its own investigation of the auditing industry. Partners from large accounting firms were called to testify to a congressional committee about how such blatant frauds were missed by auditors. An Ernst & Whinney partner said that the ZZZZ Best fraud, for example, was too complex for any single auditor. The committee members then asked why, then, did it take Los Angeles police a fraction of the time to solve the case against Minkow, Padgett, Morze, and others, once the scheme was brought to the attention of law enforcement. The auditor responded, "The police were tipped off."

Auditing and accounting firms would suffer the consequences of the scandal, mostly in the form of professional embarrassment. The American Institute of Certified Public Accountants soon changed the auditing standards of the accounting profession in the United States, leading auditors to be more proactive in combating fraud.

—Dale L. Flesher

FURTHER READING

Akst, Daniel. Wonder Boy: Barry Minkow, the Kid Who Swindled Wall Street. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1990. The Los Angeles Times reporter who broke the story on Minkow describes the details behind the ZZZZ Best multi-million-dollar fraud.

Domanick, Joe. Faking It in America: Barry Minkow and the Great ZZZZ Best Scam. Chicago: Contemporary Books, 1989. An analysis of the fraud by an independent, somewhat cynical author. Domanick questions whether the auditors, lawyers, and underwriters really wanted to find anything wrong at ZZZZ Best. He claims they were all making too much money as consultants for the company.

Minkow, Barry. Clean Sweep. Nashville, Tenn.: Thomas Nelson, 1995. Minkow's autobiography, in which he discusses his leadership of one of the largest corporate frauds of the late twentieth century.

_____. Cleaning Up: One Man's Redemptive Journey Through the Seductive World of Corporate Crime. New York: Thomas Nelson, 2005. Minkow's come-back story. Discusses his work with the Fraud Discovery Institute. Analyzes fraud as a crime and the reasons why people commit fraud. Also discusses his relationships with principals in the fraud and fellow inmates in prison.

Podgor, Ellen S., and Jerold H. Israel. White Collar Crime in a Nutshell. 3d ed. St. Paul, Minn.: West, 2004. Chapters on white collar crime and corporate fraud, written in a concise and accessible format. Includes a breakdown of securities fraud, tax fraud, corporate criminal liability, conspiracy, and bribery.

SEE ALSO: 1919-1920: Ponzi Schemes Are Revealed as Investment Frauds; Mar. 29, 1962: Billie Sol Estes Is Arrested for Corporate Fraud; Nov. 28, 1967: Investor Louis Wolfson Is Convicted of Selling Stock Illegally; Oct. 19, 1982: Car Manufacturer John De Lorean Is Arrested in a Drug Sting; May 2, 1984: E. F. Hutton Executives Plead Guilty to Fraud; Mar. 29, 1989: Financier Michael Milken Is Indicted for Racke-teering and Fraud; Aug. 27, 1990: Guinness Four Are Found Guilty of Share-Trading Fraud; Apr. 15, 1992: Hotel Tycoon Leona Helmsley Enters Prison for Tax Evasion; Jan. 28, 2000: John Spano Is Sentenced for Fraudulent Purchase of Ice Hockey Team; Sept. 3, 2003: Mutual Fund Companies Are Implicated in Shady Trading Practices; Sept. 12, 2005: Westar Energy Executives Are Found Guilty of Looting Their Company.

February 21, 1988

EVANGELIST JIMMY SWAGGART TEARFULLY CONFESSES HIS ADULTERY

Jimmy Swaggart was an internationally known Pentecostal preacher ordained through the Assemblies of God when church officials received photographs from a rival televangelist, Marvin Gorman, showing Swaggart entering and leaving a motel with a prostitute. After Swaggart made a vague confession to his congregation and begged forgiveness, the prostitute went public and described Swaggart's unconventional sexual tastes. Despite this and a later public debacle involving a prostitute, Swaggart continued to preach.

LOCALE: Baton Rouge, Louisiana

CATEGORIES: Prostitution; sex; religion; public morals; radio and television

KEY FIGURES

Jimmy Swaggart (b. 1935), American televangelist

Marvin Gorman (b. 1934), American televangelist

Debra Murphree (b. 1960), prostitute

SUMMARY OF EVENT

During the middle of the so-called holy wars between the multimillion dollar televangelists of the 1980's, Jimmy Swaggart seemed to be the one, straight-shooting preacher who was above the fray. He was the one televangelist who was respected by the media, as he seemed to practice the strict Pentecostal dogma that he preached on The Jimmy Swaggart Telecast. Swaggart's blend of old-fashioned Pentecostal revival-meeting and rock-star pathos was netting his ministry millions of dollars in donations. Television made him a multimillionaire. The entire time, too, Swaggart was busy tearing down those televangelists whom he felt were not worthy of being anointed by God.

In 1986, Swaggart crushed up-and-coming rival televangelist Marvin Gorman by revealing that Gorman was having an extramarital affair with another pastor's wife. In 1987, Swaggart turned on one of his main competitors, Jim Bakker, exposing Bakker's infidelities to the Assemblies of God's executive presbytery and then calling him a "cancer in the body of Christ" on CNN's Larry King Live. Swaggart's exposé of both Gorman and Bakker effectively destroyed their ministries. Gorman, not Bakker, would be the architect of Swaggart's downfall.

Gorman hired a private detective to follow Swaggart, tracking him and a local prostitute, Debra Murphree, to a seedy motel in Jefferson Parish, Louisiana. The private detective took photos of the couple entering and leaving the motel, providing Gorman with the proof he needed to crucify Swaggart. Gorman first attempted to blackmail Swaggart with the photos, but after he failed to do so, he took the photos to the leadership of the Assemblies of God. Swaggart was forced to apologize to his flock and family, and to God, after his tryst became known to church leadership.

Swaggart, first cousin to Jerry Lee Lewis and Mickey Gilley, was born to Pentecostal evangelists in Ferriday, Louisiana, in 1935. As a child, Swaggart brought attention to himself by uttering prophecy and speaking in tongues at a local Pentecostal church. In 1958, he began a successful traveling revival ministry, which he followed with a successful gospel music recording career and, by 1969, a syndicated radio program, The Camp Meeting Hour, which had made him a household name in much of the Bible Belt.

After receiving his ordination from the Assemblies of God Church, Swaggart made the move to televangelism. By 1980, The Jimmy Swaggart Telecast was a staple on two hundred stations and seen in two million homes. Jimmy Swaggart Ministries grew to a $100-million-per-year business and built its headquarters and a Bible college in Baton Rouge, Louisiana. Swaggart took a simple message: the average person is miserable and distracted by desire, and Swaggart could offer a means of escaping that misery. Naturally, that escape begins with a small monetary offering. Swaggart paired this with the dominant media of the day and became a media juggernaut. However, he was not content with the niche he had created; he took it upon himself to attack those whom he saw as rivals.

The Swaggart sex scandal erupted on February 18, 1988, three days before Swaggart made his public confession. He flew to the Assemblies of God international headquarters in Springfield, Missouri, to meet with the members of the executive presbytery, before whom he was supposed to confess his moral failures and receive his punishment. Instead, he was reportedly argumentative and said that he, rather than the church, spoke for God.

Three days later, on February 21, without providing details of the “sins” he had committed, Swaggart took the stage in front of about seven thousand of his flock at his Family Worship Center in Baton Rouge to deliver his sermon of apology. With tears streaming down his face, Swaggart apologized to his wife and family but still condemned the Assemblies of God when he said, “Yes, the ministry will continue. . . . I step out of the pulpit at the moment for an indeterminate period of time and we will leave that in the hands of the Lord.”

Following Swaggart’s televised apology, the representative of the Louisiana district of the Assemblies of God explained that Swaggart showed true humility in blaming only himself for his actions after confessing to specific incidents of moral failure. The Louisiana district recommended that Swaggart be barred from the pulpit for a period of three months after this public confession and display of humility. It was somewhat of a surprise, however, when the executive presbytery accepted the sanctions suggested by the Louisiana regional leadership body that Swaggart not be allowed to preach for three months.

Just four days later, Murphree came forward on a New Orleans television news program and provided more details regarding Swaggart’s unusual predilections. She said that while Swaggart was a regular customer, the two never had intercourse; rather, he paid her to pose in the nude.

Swaggart found he could not wait three months to preach again. After claiming that millions would go to Hell otherwise, he returned to the pulpit. On March 30, the executive presbytery defrocked Swaggart, banned him from the pulpit for a year, and demanded he seek two years of rehabilitation and counseling. Swaggart also was to be banned from distributing videotapes of his evangelical services, a practice that had enabled him to build both an enormous amount of wealth and an enormous worldwide audience. The church also removed Swaggart’s ministerial license; yet, they consistently refused to make the details of Swaggart’s confessions public.

In 1991, a highway patrol officer stopped Swaggart’s car in Southern California. The preacher had yet another prostitute, Rosemary Garcia,

Jimmy Swaggart breaks down crying while confessing his sins to his congregation. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

SWAGGART'S APOLOGY

Jimmy Swaggart apologized for his "sin" in a sermon, excerpted here, delivered February 21, 1988, in Baton Rouge, Louisiana, but he did so without discussing his actual sin: adultery.

I do not plan in any way to whitewash my sin. I do not call it a mistake, a mendacity; I call it sin. I would much rather, if possible—and in my estimation it would not be possible—to make it worse than [instead of] less than it actually is. I have no one but myself to blame. I do not lay the fault or the blame of the charge at anyone else's feet. For no one is to blame but Jimmy Swaggart. I take the responsibility. I take the blame. I take the fault. . . .

Swaggart included in his apology a lengthy quotation from Psalm 51, "with the words of another man that lived 3,000 years ago."

Have mercy upon me, O God. According to thy lovingkindness; according unto the multitude of thy tender mercies, blot out my transgressions. Wash me thoroughly from mine iniquity, and cleanse me from my sin. For I acknowledge my transgressions; and my sin is ever before me. Against thee, thee only, have I sinned and done this evil in thy sight, that thou mightest be justified when thou speakest, and be clear when thou judgest. Behold, I was shapen in iniquity; and in sin did my mother conceive me. Behold, thou desirest truth in the inward parts; and in the hidden parts thou shalt make me to know wisdom. Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean; wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow.

Source: Quoted in Michael J. Giuliano, Thrice Born: The Rhetorical Comeback of Jimmy Swaggart (Macon, Ga.: Mercer University Press, 1999).

in his vehicle. In 2004, Swaggart said during a broadcast sermon on gay marriage, "if one [a gay man] ever looks at me like that I'm gonna kill him and tell God he died." Nevertheless, Swaggart continued to preach. By 1995, after the legal battles had ended, Jimmy Swaggart Ministries had been reduced to approximately 85 percent of its size before the scandal, when broadcasts brought in an estimated $140 million from viewer donations.

IMPACT

Swaggart's fall from grace marked the beginning of the end of the glory days of the so-called holy-roller television evangelists and their multimillion dollar crusades. Despite Swaggart, Bakker, Gorman, and the others returning to the pulpit following their well-publicized sins, Swaggart's fall seemed to be the one that broke the public's mass desire to send in their money to keep this message on the air.

At the time of the Swaggart scandal, Pat Robertson, another televangelist, ran an unsuccessful presidential campaign. After the Swaggart scandal, audience size and generosity shrank to the point that televangelist Oral Roberts could not convince his viewers to donate enough money to keep God from taking his life. This new skeptical view of televangelists reduced a major media market to a tiny trickle that struggled to purchase air time on a handful of local stations, turning instead mostly to late-night television, the World Wide Web, and direct mail to solicit donations.

Swaggart's defrocking also played a major role in the deflation of the political power of the Moral Majority and similar evangelical Christian political action groups. His actions tarred the credibility of all evangelical Christian leaders.

—B. Keith Murphy

FURTHER READING

Balmer, Randall. "Still Wrestling with the Devil: A Visit with Jimmy Swaggart Ten Years After His Fall." Christianity Today, March 2, 1998. A retrospective look at Swaggart's life, one decade after his tearful confession and downfall.

Lundy, Hunter. Let Us Prey: The Public Trial of Jimmy Swaggart. Columbus, Miss.: Genesis Press, 1999. Lundy, Gorman's attorney, recounts "Swaggart versus Gorman" from an insider's vantage point.

Miller, Brett A. Divine Apology: The Discourse of Religious Image Restoration. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 2002. Analyzes religious figures accused of sexual misconduct. Includes a section on Swaggart, whose scandalous dalliance with prostitute Debra Murphree was covered closely by the national media.

“Reviewing the Fundamentals.” Christianity Today, January, 2007. Focuses on the biblical teachings of the New Testament on sex and sexuality. Cites the book of James, which states that Christian leaders are placed under strict moral standards.

Seaman, Ann Rowe. Swaggart: The Unauthorized Biography of an American Evangelist. New York: Continuum, 2001. An excellent unauthorized biography of Swaggart that covers many details following his tearful fall from grace.

Swaggart, Jimmy, with Robert Paul Lamb. To Cross A River. Baton Rouge, La.: Jimmy Swaggart Ministries, 1984. Swaggart’s authorized biography, which tells of, among other things, his “healing” an automobile. Also provides a unique look at Swaggart’s self-perception.

SEE ALSO: May-June, 1926: Evangelist Aimee Semple McPherson Claims She Was Kidnapped; Oct. 25, 1974: Evangelist Billy James Hargis Resigns College Presidency During Gay-Sex Scandal; June 27, 1978: Evangelist Herbert W. Armstrong Excommunicates His Own Son; Sept. 10, 1981: Chicago Sun-Times Reports That Cardinal Cody Diverted Church Funds; Apr. 22, 1986: Faith Healer Peter Popoff Is Exposed as a Fraud; Mar. 19, 1987: Jim Bakker Resigns as Head of PTL Television Network; Nov. 2, 2006: Evangelist Kent Hovind Is Convicted of Federal Tax Violations; Nov. 2, 2006: Male Escort Reveals Sexual Liaisons with Evangelist Ted Haggard; July 9, 2007: Senator David Vitter’s Name Is Found in D.C. Madam’s Address Book.

June, 1988-June, 1989

INSIDER-TRADING SCANDAL ROCKS JAPANESE GOVERNMENT

Japan was scandalized when it learned that an upstart Tokyo company, Recruit, had offered, in exchange for political favors, inexpensive stock to seventeen members of parliament, civil servants, businessmen, a publisher, and two university professors. Because many beneficiaries were tied to the ruling Liberal Democratic Party, the scandal contributed to the party’s temporary loss of power in 1993.

ALSO KNOWN AS: Recruit scandal

LOCALE: Tokyo, Japan

CATEGORIES: Corruption; business; government; politics; banking and finance

KEY FIGURES

Hiromasa Ezoe (b. 1936), chairman of the Recruit Company

Noboru Takeshita (1924-2000), prime minister of Japan, 1987-1989

Kiichi Miyazawa (1919-2007), finance minister of Japan, 1987-1989, and prime minister, 1991-1993

Hisashi Shinto (b. 1922), chairman of Nippon Telephone and Telegraph Company

Yusuke Yoshinaga (b. 1932), chief prosecutor, Tokyo district

SUMMARY OF EVENT

In postwar Japan, the relationship between politicians and business has been cozy, but the extent to which the Recruit Company tried to develop this relationship shocked the Japanese public. To most, it looked like Recruit’s chairman, Hiromasa Ezoe, overstepped the boundaries of public decency.

In Japan, it is legal to make offers as gifts to select people, such as politicians, to buy shares before a company goes public. It is against the law, however, to give gifts in direct exchange for political favors. Thus, when the scandal broke, a big issue, apart from the moral outrage at a company making cleverly disguised gifts to public leaders, including two university professors, was the question of whether the law had been broken—whether politicians and civil servants had been bribed.

Hiromasa Ezoe. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

Ezoe founded Recruit, a communications and publishing company, in 1960. His business idea was to help the government place college graduates in their first jobs. His annual Recruit Book listed employment opportunities and his Recruit Shingaku Book provided high school graduates with information about choosing the right college. As his company grew, Ezoe branched out into real estate and founded Recruit Cosmos Company in 1964. Later, he developed his own telecommunications business. During the mid-1980's, legal changes threatened Recruit's publishing business. At the same time, Recruit bought two American Cray supercomputers from Nippon Telephone and Telegraph Company (NTT) and profitably used them for high-speed computing.

The Recruit scandal broke in June, 1988. Later investigations revealed that, beginning in October, 1984, and culminating on September 30, 1986, Recruit had offered 159 influential Japanese politicians, civil servants, businessmen, newspaper publishers, and academics the opportunity to buy shares in its subsidiary, Recruit Cosmos. This offer was made before the company would go public on the stock exchange. The price per share was three thousand yen, about twenty dollars in 1986. In order for the beneficiaries to buy the shares, another subsidiary of Recruit, First Finance Company, gave them advantageous credit, financing with two billion yen (about thirteen million dollars) the purchase of about 666,666 shares. After Recruit Cosmos went public during the hot phase of Japan's bubble economy in late 1986, the value of the shares doubled. The scandal fully erupted in July, 1988, when seventy-six beneficiaries sold their shares.

In August and September, 1988, Recruit secretly offered five million yen ($32,500) to Yanosuke Narazaki, a member of the Diet, Japan's parliament, to stop his investigation of the scandal. Instead of accepting the bribe of Recruit's front man, Hiroshi Matsubara, Narazaki videotaped the bribery attempts. On September 8, Yusuke Yoshinaga, chief prosecutor of the Tokyo district, launched his investigation.

With a police investigation and a special committee of the Diet looking for culprits, the Recruit scandal made headlines in Japan in the fall of 1988. Ezoe resigned as chairman of Recruit and checked into a hospital in October. He was soon questioned by a Diet delegation.

Bowing to public pressure, and with the scandal at full force in November, Recruit provided to the Diet a list of all who had bought company shares early. The results shocked the public, because it was confirmed that seventeen members of the Diet as well had bought and sold Recruit shares. Even though five of them were members of opposition parties, the majority belonged to the ruling Liberal Democratic Party (LDP). Public pressure mounted, and the LDP government was faced with a crisis of public confidence.

Finance Minister Kiichi Miyazawa, a rising star of the LDP, resigned when it was confirmed that he had bought ten thousand shares of Recruit Cosmos stock. The justice minister and his immediate replacement resigned as well. Also in December, Hisashi Shinto, chairman of NTT, resigned over the buying and selling to Recruit of two Cray supercomputers. Because the government held a stake in NTT, Shinto was considered a public servant. The Japanese found it especially distasteful that esteemed civil servants such as Shinto were part of the Recruit scandal.

As prosecutor Yoshinaga's investigation into Recruit continued, Ezoe, along with three Recruit executives, was arrested while still in the hospital on February 13, 1989. The four were put in a bleak jail to break their silence. In another stunning move, the public witnessed the scandalous spectacle of Yoshinaga's officers arresting a top businessman and civil servant, former NTT chairman Shinto, and his secretary, Kozo Murata, on March 6. The public was outraged by the time the scandal included Prime Minister Takeshita. In March, Takeshita admitted to gifts of 151 million yen ($1.4 million) from Recruit. Because he gave no special favors, Takeshita insisted, this acceptance of gifts was not criminal. However, on April 22, his office admitted that his secretary, Ihei Aoki, had received a loan of fifty million yen ($460,000) from Recruit that he later repaid in small installments, and that Aoki had been entrusted with twenty million yen from an unreported (which was illegal) thirty million yen fund-raiser for Takeshita. One day after Takeshita announced that he would resign, Aoki committed suicide.

On June 12, a few days after the resignation of Takeshita, prosecutor Yoshinaga issued his final report on the scandal. Ezoe and four other Recruit executives were indicted for bribery. Three officials were indicted for accepting bribes, and three executives of NTT, including former chairman Shinto, were charged with violating the NTT Public Corporation Law by accepting bribes. Two other high-level public servants were indicted for taking bribes in relation to their official duties. NTT's Murata was charged with violating the Securities Exchange Law. Three high-ranking secretaries of LDP politicians were indicted for transgressing the Political Funds Control Law. The person who tried to bribe Diet member Narazaki, Hiroshi Matsubara, already had been sentenced for attempted bribery. Significantly, while all those indicted would be found guilty and given suspended jail sentences, all leading politicians escaped legal punishment.

Ezoe's trial began in December, 1989, required 322 sessions, and lasted fifteen years. On March 4, 2003, the Tokyo district court found Ezoe guilty of bribing politicians and civil servants, based on the sale of 53,000 Recruit Cosmos shares that could be traced to illegal actions. Ezoe received a sentence of three years, suspended for five years. At his sentencing, he apologized to the Japanese people for having caused moral outrage.

IMPACT

Immediately after the Recruit scandal reached its height with Prime Minister Takeshita's resignation, the LDP was punished by scandalized voters. In Niigata Prefecture in June, 1989, a Socialist housewife decidedly beat the LDP candidate for by-elections to the Upper House, and the LDP lost seats in the July 2 Tokyo municipal elections. On July 23, for the first time after World War II, the LDP lost its majority in the Upper House.

Despite these initial setbacks, however, the LDP maintained its crucial control of the Lower House of parliament, and pushed through the election of its prime ministers throughout the early 1990's. When Miyazawa, whom the Recruit scandal had forced out as finance minister, became prime minister on November 5, 1991, it looked as if the LDP had weathered the storm. However, the combined forces of the Recruit scandal, an unpopular new sales tax, Japan's economic crisis of 1990, and two further scandals tainting the LDP, finally caused the party to lose power in the 1993 elections. For the first time since it was founded in 1955, the stunned LDP did not rule Japan, punished by voters alienated by its scandalous affairs.

Intimations of political change proved premature. By 1994, the LDP joined the government again, and on January 11, 1996, Ryutaro Hashimoto became LDP prime minister. To some observers it looked like the Japanese electorate did not mind the connection of business and politics revealed by the Recruit scandal. After all, the system that made politicians and others accept Recruit shares also included a politician's customary requirement to make gifts for weddings and funerals of the constituents, and to push through public projects benefiting a home district. In the end, the LDP survived the scandal.

—R. C. Lutz

FURTHER READING

Bowen, Roger. Japan's Dysfunctional Democracy.

Armonk, N.Y.: M. E. Sharpe, 2003. Argues that the postwar Japanese system is scandal-prone by Western standards because cash-strapped politicians need means to bestow favors on constituents. Also argues that the Recruit scandal did little to change the ruling party's power in the long run.

Christensen, Ray. Ending the LDP Hegemony. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 2000. Chapter two credits the Recruit scandal with helping to make the ruling party lose power temporarily because of its unwillingness to enact real reform.

Herzog, Peter. Japan's Pseudo-Democracy. Sandgate, England: Japan Library, 1993. Detailed discussion of the Recruit scandal. Places event in the context of the dark side of Japanese postwar politics. Critical of Takeshita's government's ties to Recruit.

Taro, Yayama. "The Recruit Scandal: Learning from the Causes of Corruption." Journal of Japanese Studies 16, no. 1 (1990): 93-114. Surprisingly sympathetic account that blames the foundation of the Japanese political system rather than individuals caught up in the scandal. Warns that media hype and prosecutorial zeal may do more harm than good.

SEE ALSO: 1904: Theodore Roosevelt Is Accused of Accepting Corporate Funds; Jan. 23, 1904: Senator Joseph R. Burton Is Convicted of Bribery; Jan., 1913: British Prime Minister's Staff Is Investigated for Insider Trading; Feb. 4, 1976: Lockheed Is Implicated in Bribing Foreign Officials; Aug. 10, 1989: Japanese Prime Minister Sosuke Resigns After Affair with a Geisha; Aug. 27, 1990: Guinness Four Are Found Guilty of Share-Trading Fraud; Apr. 5, 1991: George W. Bush Is Investigated for Insider Trading; Mar. 5, 2004: Martha Stewart Is Convicted in Insider-Trading Scandal; May 28, 2007: Japanese Politician Charged with Corruption Hangs Himself.

July 18, 1988

ACTOR ROB LOWE VIDEOTAPES HIS SEXUAL ENCOUNTER WITH A MINOR

At the height of his career, actor Rob Lowe made a videotape of himself having sex with a teenage girl and a young woman he met at the Democratic National Convention in Atlanta. Lowe's career suffered, but only temporarily, after the tape was made public.

LOCALE: Atlanta, Georgia

CATEGORIES: Sex crimes; communications and media; drugs; public morals; popular culture; Hollywood

KEY FIGURES

Rob Lowe (b. 1964), American actor
Jan Parsons (b. 1972), hair salon employee
Tara Siebert (b. 1963), hair salon employee
Lewis Slaton (1922-2002), district attorney, Fulton County, Georgia

SUMMARY OF EVENT

On Saturday, July 16, 1988, Rob Lowe, a successful and popular motion-picture actor, arrived in Atlanta, Georgia, to attend the Democratic National Convention. He was part of a delegation of three dozen people from the entertainment industry invited by California assemblyman Tom Hayden to help the Michael Dukakis presidential campaign. While most of the delegates were producers and directors, the most visible were actors Lowe, Judd Nelson, Alec Baldwin, Charlie Sheen, and Ally Sheedy.

Then at the height of his acting career, Lowe was a member of the so-called brat pack—a group of young actors including Emilio Estevez, Judd Nelson, and Demi Moore—who appeared together in films. He was best known for his roles in St. Elmo's Fire, The Outsiders, and About Last Night, among others. Off camera, Lowe also was involved with drugs, alcohol, and heavy partying.

On Sunday, July 17, Lowe went to Club Rio, a hip rock club that catered to a diverse crowd. Part of Atlanta's underground scene, the club brought well-known underground rock acts to its stage. Also in attendance that evening were sixteen-year-old Jan Parsons and twenty-five-year-old Tara Siebert, coworkers at SuperHair, a salon that catered to the cutting edge and the underground scene. In addition to being coworkers, the two were lovers. Even though Club Rio was a twenty-one-and-over club, Parsons nevertheless was admitted.

The club was packed that evening. Lowe was in attendance with friends, including actors Justine Bateman and Baldwin. Drinking and drugs were prevalent, not uncommon at Club Rio. The actors were congregated in the VIP room. Susan Sullivan, the club's publicity director, informed Parsons and Siebert that Lowe was among the celebrity guests partying in the VIP room. Parsons was excited to meet him, so Sullivan arranged for them to gain entry into the VIP room.

Parsons and Siebert were introduced to an intoxicated Lowe. They three left the club in a taxicab during the early morning hours of July 18 and went to Lowe's room at the Atlanta Hilton and Towers. It was in his hotel room that Lowe filmed himself having sex with the two young women. After Lowe passed out, Parsons and Siebert took two hundred dollars from his wallet, grabbed a bottle of pills, and then left with the videotape. In the days that followed they told their friends about the sexual encounter and played the videotape at private parties. Within a day, copies of the tape were circulated and its content was the subject of conversation at parties in the underground scene.

Consequently, Parsons's brother, Ashley Parsons, found a copy of the tape in his sister's bedroom, watched it, and promptly told their mother, Lena Parsons. News of the tape reached the media after Lena Parsons filed a personal-injury lawsuit against Lowe in August, 1989. In the lawsuit, Lena Parsons's alleged that she suffered emotional stress upon seeing Lowe seduce her daughter, a minor. A brief excerpt of the tape aired on WAGA-TV shortly after the lawsuit was made public. One day later, WAGA was offered ten thousand dollars for the tape by a nationally syndicated television show. The airing of the tape on WAGA brought print and broadcast media to Atlanta, and stories were carried in a wide range of publications. Lowe became the punch line for several late-night talk-show hosts. In Atlanta, reporters staked out Club Rio and Jan Parsons's home and school.

Rob Lowe in 1988. (AP/Wide World Photos)

In no time the tryst became public. However, the taped scene with Parsons and Siebert was not included on some circulated copies. Instead, many of the copies had a scene recorded earlier in Paris, France, and was on Lowe's original tape. This scene showed Lowe and a male friend having sex with a woman. Many viewers had the impression that this scene was the one made in Atlanta with Parsons and Siebert. In truth, few people actually saw that portion of the tape.

In July, 1989, Judge G. Ernest Tidwell, dismissed portions of Lena Parsons's personal-injury civil lawsuit, claiming that under Georgia law, the plaintiff did not demonstrate that the defendant intentionally inflicted emotional distress on a minor. Lowe eventually arranged a plea deal with the Fulton County district attorney on the sexual misconduct charge and performed twenty hours of community service. He also made an out-of-court settlement with Lena Parsons. Shortly thereafter, he entered rehabilitation for alcohol, drug, and sex addiction in Phoenix, Arizona.

IMPACT

A twenty-minute segment of the first portion of the videotape that became commercially available (the scene filmed in Paris) transformed into the first so-called celebrity sex tape. Other actors and musicians have since been caught up in their own sex-tape controversies.

Lewis Slaton, Fulton County district attorney, investigated the circumstances of the making of the tape and indicated that if charges were filed against Lowe (for the sexual exploitation of a minor), the young actor could receive a maximum of twenty years in prison and a $100,000 fine. Lewis faced severe criticism when it was revealed he was given a copy of the videotape as early as August, 1988, but had taken no action. He had made several conflicting statements about the day his office received the tape and finally admitted that he indeed received the tape in August, 1988, but decided to hold it; he declined to say why. Media reports alleged that Lewis, a Democrat, had a political reason for holding the tape: to prevent a criminal investigation into behavior by a Democratic National Convention delegate—Lowe—prior to the national election, which would have hurt the Dukakis campaign.

Lowe refused to be interviewed after the incident. His publicists worked hard to mend the damage, but his public image was tarnished, for a time. The actor continued to have problems with alcohol and drugs. While he continued to work as well, he was no longer an A-list star. He was dropped as a subject in several teenage film magazines, on whose covers he had regularly appeared. In 1991, he married makeup artist Sheryl Berkoff. The 1992 film Wayne's World is considered his comeback as an actor. In 1994 he landed a significant role in the Stephen King film The Stand. He also appeared in the film Austin Powers: The Spy Who Shagged Me and in the television series The West Wing and Brothers and Sisters. As part of his addiction recovery, and in an attempt to confront the scandal, he addressed his behaviors during two appearances on Saturday Night Live, where he mocked himself.

—Jesus F. Gonzalez

FURTHER READING

Carter, Bill. Details, May, 2004. A thorough, detailed biographical magazine article on Rob Lowe's life from childhood, to his early years of acting, to later accomplishments as an actor.

DePaulo, Lisa. "Lowe Down and Dirty." George, September, 1999. Magazine article about Rob Lowe. The sex-tape scandal is mentioned prominently.

Parish, James Robert. Hollywood Bad Boys: Loud, Fast, and Out of Control. Chicago: Contemporary Books, 2002. A revealing collection of biographies of Hollywood male celebrities, including Rob Lowe, who are known for extremes of behavior.

_____. The Hollywood Book of Scandals: The Shocking, Often Disgraceful Deeds and Affairs of More than One Hundred American Movie and TV Idols. New York: McGraw-Hill, 2004. Includes the chapter "Rob Lowe: Surviving His Candid Camera Escapade,” which explores the sex-tape scandal and the scandal’s aftermath.

Sager, Mike. “Rob Lowe’s Girl Trouble.” Rolling Stone, August 24, 1989. A popular-magazine article that covers the sex-tape case. Gives background on Parsons and Siebert and provides an overview of the case as it was happening at the time.

SEE ALSO: Feb. 6, 1942: Film Star Errol Flynn Is Acquitted of Rape; Aug. 31, 1948: Film Star Robert Mitchum Is Arrested for Drug Possession; July 23, 1984: Vanessa Williams Is the First Miss America to Resign; Dec. 18, 1989:

Prince Charles’s Intimate Phone Conversation with Camilla Parker Bowles Is Taped; July 26, 1991: Comedian Pee-wee Herman Is Arrested for Public Indecency; June 27, 1995: Film Star Hugh Grant Is Arrested for Lewd Conduct; Sept. 22, 1997: Sportscaster Marv Albert Is Tried for Sexual Assault; Apr. 7, 1998: Pop Singer George Michael Is Arrested for Lewd Conduct; Early Nov., 2003: Paris Hilton Sex-Tape Appears on the Web; Dec. 18, 2003: Pop Star Michael Jackson Is Charged with Child Molestation; July 28, 2006: Actor Mel Gibson Is Caught Making Anti-Semitic Remarks; June 13, 2008: Singer R. Kelly Is Acquitted on Child Pornography Charges.

September 19, 1988

STEPHEN BREUNING PLEADS GUILTY TO MEDICAL RESEARCH FRAUD

Stephen Breuning, a University of Pittsburgh medical researcher, studied the long-term effects of tranquilizers on the mentally disabled, especially adolescents. His findings caught the eye of his long-term mentor, who became suspicious of Breuning’s work and blew the whistle on him. After a federal investigation, Breuning was indicted and pleaded guilty to fraud. The case was particularly significant because it not only harmed vulnerable patients but also marked the first time an American scientist was prosecuted for falsifying research.

LOCALES: Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania; Coldwater, Michigan

CATEGORIES: Drugs; hoaxes, frauds, and charlatanism; medicine and health care; psychology and psychiatry; education; science and technology

KEY FIGURES

Stephen Breuning (b. 1952), University of Pittsburgh research psychologist
Robert Sprague (fl. 1980’s), director of the Institute for Child Behavior and Development, University of Illinois Breckenridge Wilcox (fl. 1980’s), U.S. attorney

SUMMARY OF EVENT

On November 10, 1988, Stephen Breuning, one the nation’s leading researchers on the use of psychoactive drugs for the treatment of the mentally disabled, became the first academic in American history to be sentenced to prison for scientific research fraud. In addition, it was later determined by both federal investigators and academic researchers in the field that most of Breuning’s research starting from the mid-1970’s through the late 1980’s may have been fraudulent.

The major portion of Breuning’s work concerned studies of drug-treatment therapies for mentally disabled persons who were institutionalized. In particular, most of his research participants suffered from extreme emotional, behavioral, and neurological disorders that were treated with various psychoactive drugs to control hyperactivity and violent behavior. In fact, it was quite common to see half of all residents at mental institutions throughout the United States prescribed certain types of drugs, mainly powerful tranquilizers to reduce any aggressive outbursts. The most commonly prescribed drugs for these patients had traditionally been antipsychotic drugs known as tranquilizers.

Breuning, along with a small group of his fellow clinicians, argued against the use of major tranquilizers for the mentally disabled, especially for adolescent patients. The main argument against the drug's use centered on the numerous and unpleasant side effects from using large doses over a long period of time. One major side effect was a neurological disorder known as tardive dyskinesia. This disorder causes abnormal and sometimes extreme, involuntary muscle movements of the body. Breuning and his colleagues believed that tranquilizers could be substituted with certain types of stimulant drugs, thus lowering the risk of disorders such as tardive dyskinesia.

After receiving his doctorate from the Illinois Institute of Technology in 1977, Breuning worked for one year as a research psychologist at the Oakdale Regional Center for Developmental Disabilities in Lapeer, Michigan. In 1978, he transferred to the Coldwater Regional Center for Developmental Disabilities (now the Coldwater Regional Mental Health Center), also in Michigan, and established himself as a researcher deeply dedicated to working with the mentally disabled. One year later, in 1979, Robert Sprague, director of the Institute for Child Behavior and Development at the University of Illinois, noticed the work of a team of young scholars at the Coldwater facility, especially the work of Breuning. Sprague had recently received a $200,000 grant from the National Institute of Mental Health (NIMH) and was looking to move his research laboratory to a place such as Coldwater, where he could enlist the services of hardworking researchers. He also wanted to continue his extremely valuable research on disorders such as tardive dyskinesia.

Sprague received approval from the Coldwater Center and invited Breuning to take the lead as one of the primary researchers. Over a two year period, Breuning wrote many manuscripts summarizing the work of his team at Coldwater. His findings not only were astounding but also likely to revolutionize the way the medical world treated mentally disabled patients: if those findings were genuine. In January, 1981, Breuning was employed as an assistant professor of child psychiatry at the prestigious Western Psychiatric Institute at the University of Pittsburgh in Pennsylvania. During this time, he continued to collaborate with Sprague on various projects, including many funded by Sprague's original NIMH grant.

Sprague's suspicions of Breuning began in 1983. Breuning was a prolific author and coauthor, and his research produced near-perfect results. Indeed, his publications were making him a rising star in psychology. Between 1980 and 1984, he was part of nearly one-third of all the psycho-pharmaceutical, peer-reviewed studies regarding the effect of certain psychotropic drugs on the mentally disabled, especially adolescents. His findings had a considerable effect on the drug-treatment therapies used to manage these patients' behaviors in institutions throughout the United States, which makes his research fraud so significant.

In September, 1983, Sprague traveled to Pittsburgh to meet with Breuning to discuss research projects and the NIMH grant. It was during this trip that Sprague discovered that Breuning was obtaining far-fetched results in a study involving nurse ratings of patients with tardive dyskinesia. This realization led him to launch his own investigation of Breuning. In December, he confronted Breuning with his evidence, questioning him about his supposed follow-up study at Coldwater after taking the research position at Pittsburgh. Breuning claimed that he examined patients for two years after his departure. Sprague knew that Breuning had never returned to Coldwater, nor did he leave assistants to conduct the alleged examinations. After Breuning failed to produce evidence to counter the allegations, Sprague notified the NIMH in late December with a six-page letter. In January, 1984, the NIMH notified the University of Pittsburgh and then began its own independent investigation. In April, Breuning resigned from Pittsburgh to take a position at Polk Center, the largest state institution for the mentally disabled in Pennsylvania.

In 1985, the NIMH selected a council of five well-known scholars to investigate Breuning's work. After a lengthy investigation, the council concluded that on numerous occasions, while employed both at Coldwater and at Pittsburgh and while using federal grant monies, Breuning had committed "serious scientific misconduct." The council, which also questioned the veracity of Breuning's entire corpus of research, recommended that he be banned for ten years from receiving federal research grants. The council also recommended that the U.S. Department of Justice look into prosecuting Breuning because his research may have impacted the health and well-being of hundreds of people, many of whom were children at the time they were studied.

Breckenridge Wilcox, U.S. attorney for the state of Maryland, where Breuning's grant money originated, agreed with the NIMH council's recommendation and commenced a federal investigation. On April 16, 1988, a federal grand jury indicted Breuning on three criminal counts related to submitting fraudulent research results to a federal agency, marking the first time in American history that an independent research scientist was indicted for scientific fraud. On September 19, in a plea bargain with prosecutors, Breuning pleaded guilty and was convicted on two charges of filing false reports; the third, more serious, charge was dropped as part of the deal.

On November 10, Breuning was sentenced to five years probation and six days in a halfway house and was ordered to perform 250 hours of community service. He also was ordered to repay $11,352 to the NIMH and prohibited from conducting psychological research while on probation. The University of Pittsburgh was ordered to pay back about $163,000 in funds that Breuning had unlawfully used.

IMPACT

Breuning's empirical studies were outright deceptions. If not for the vigilance of his mentor, the deception likely would have continued and countless people with disabilities would have been further harmed. So wide-ranging was his fraudulent research that he became the first American academic to go to prison because of the untruthfulness of his work. His studies, fraudulent as they were, nevertheless had a major impact on the scientific disciplines of psychology and psychiatry and influenced health care policies for treating the mentally disabled. Some states even modified their health care guidelines for drug-treatment therapies for the mentally disabled based specifically on Breuning's research.

It should also be noted that the results of Breuning's fraudulent research during the 1980's played a primary role in increasing the rate of prescriptions for stimulant drugs such as Ritalin for treating children with hyperactivity disorders. Thousands of medical doctors throughout the United States still prescribe these stimulants at alarming rates for the treatment of conditions such as attention deficit hyperactivity disorder (ADHD) in children. The stimulants are still used for treatment even in the face of many clinical trials that debunked Breuning's research claims.

—Paul M. Klenowski

FURTHER READING

- Shamoo, Adil, and David Resnik. Responsible Conduct of Research. New York: Oxford University Press, 2003. A comprehensive study of the various ethical issues in biomedical research. Includes a time line of Breuning's falsifications.
- Sprague, Robert L. "Whistleblowing: A Very Unpleasant Avocation." Ethics and Behavior 3, no. 1 (March, 1993): 103-133. First-person account of the scandal by Breuning's mentor and former boss. Sprague writes that the article has a particular "focus on the great reluctance of universities and federal agencies to investigate vigorously an alleged case of scientific misconduct when it involves members of their own faculties or grant recipients."
- Wible, James. The Economics of Science: Methodology and Epistemology as if Economics Really Mattered. New York: Routledge, 1998. This book offers a unique look at science from an economic perspective. In particular, it examines in detail various cases of scientific fraud.

SEE ALSO: Mar. 21, 1928: Alberta Government Sterilizes Thousands Deemed Genetically and Mentally Unfit; Sept.-Oct., 1937: Prescription Elixir Causes More than One Hundred Deaths; 1956-1962: Prescription Thalidomide Causes Widespread Birth Disorders; July 25, 1972: Newspaper Breaks Story of Abuses in Tuskegee Syphilis Study; Nov. 26, 1997: Canadian Health Commissioner Releases Report on Tainted Blood; Jan. 30, 2001: Liverpool Children’s Hospital Collects Body Parts Without Authorization; Aug., 2002: Immunologist Resigns After Being Accused of Falsifying Research; Sept. 25, 2002: Inquiry Reveals That Physicist Jan Hendrik Schön Faked His Research; May 12, 2006: Scientist Is Indicted for Faking His Research on Creating Stem Cells; July 24, 2007: University of Colorado Fires Professor for Plagiarism and Research Falsification.

March 23, 1989

SCIENTISTS’ “COLD FUSION” CLAIMS CANNOT BE VERIFIED

While working at the University of Utah in 1989, electrochemists Martin Fleischmann and Stanley Pons announced their experimental achievement of cold fusion, a phenomenon believed to be unachievable. Although their announcement was initially received with some acclaim, the inability of other scientists to duplicate their results, standard practice in the sciences, led to the term “cold fusion” being associated with scientific scandal.

ALSO KNOWN AS: Fleischmann-Pons experiment

LOCALE: Salt Lake City, Utah

CATEGORIES: Cultural and intellectual history; education; science and technology

KEY FIGURES

Martin Fleischmann (b. 1927), British electrochemist

Stanley Pons (b. 1943), British electrochemist

Steven E. Jones (b. 1943), American physicist

SUMMARY OF EVENT

During the 1960’s, electrochemical professor Martin Fleischmann and colleagues at the University of Southampton in England began investigating possible connections between chemical reactions and nuclear processes. In 1979, Stanley Pons earned his doctorate in chemistry at Southampton under the tutelage of Fleischmann. After Pons was appointed chairman of the Department of Chemistry at the University of Utah during the early 1980’s, Fleischmann frequently visited Pons in Utah and collaborated with him about joint research ventures. The two were particularly interested in the possibility that nuclear fusion might occur at or near room temperature, a phenomenon known as cold fusion.

Between 1983 and 1988, Fleischmann and Pons invested more than $100,000 of their own money in cold-fusion experimentation. Their resulting experiment was quite simple. It consisted of an insulated glass jar containing a solution of lithium deuterium oxide salts and 99.5 percent heavy water (deuterium oxide) into which two electrodes were immersed. One electrode was a coil of platinum wire and the other was a ten-centimeter-long rod of palladium. A small voltage between the electrodes decomposed the deuterium oxide into deuterium (an isotope of hydrogen) and oxygen. Some of the deuterium was absorbed into the palladium, a result that was previously discovered by Thomas Graham in the nineteenth century. Fleischmann and Pons reported that their experiment generated excessive amounts of heat energy.

In 1988, Fleischmann and Pons submitted a grant proposal to the U.S. Department of Energy for funding that was needed to support their cold-fusion research. The proposal was reviewed by Steven E. Jones, a physicist at Brigham Young University (BYU), who also was working on cold fusion. Jones and colleagues at BYU were doing experiments very similar to those being conducted by Fleischmann and Pons. In January, 1989, Jones reported some positive results from his team's cold-fusion research. They were seeing neutrons and a small amount of heat being generated from their electrolytic cell. Jones concluded that their experiment showed no potential as a possible commercial energy source, but that it had considerable scientific interest.

During the same period of time, Fleischmann, Pons, and their graduate student, Marvin Hawkins, identified excess heat energy from their experiment that could not be explained by only chemical reactions. They concluded that the energy must be generated by nuclear processes involving the fusion of tightly packed deuterium nuclei in the palladium. If their results were correct, their experimental device would have considerable commercial value. Evidently, Fleischmann and Pons met with Jones on March 6, 1989, to discuss the publication of their individual results simultaneously in Nature. However, Fleischmann and Pons nixed that apparent agreement by submitting their paper for publication in the Journal of Electroanalytical Chemistry on March 11.

By mid-March, 1989, University of Utah president Chase N. Peterson believed it was best to release the results of Pons and Fleischmann's work due to the possible economic windfall from cold fusion as an inexhaustible source of energy. Peterson scheduled a press conference for March 23, breaking a promise of cooperation with Jones and BYU. At the press conference, Pons and Fleischmann reported that their room-temperature experiment was producing heat energy at a rate more than four times greater than the input power. The initial puzzle to their experiment was their report that neutrons and tritium (an isotope of hydrogen) were being released at rates that were a billion times slower than the fusion rate expected from the heat that was being generated. Pons and Fleischmann knew that their claims were theoretically problematic, but they were convinced that their experimental results were basically correct. As a result of the uncertainties, The New York Times initially refused to print the story. On the other hand, Wall Street Journal reporter Jerry Bishop presented the scientists' claims as a major breakthrough. Cold fusion soon became a major media event.

Several research groups immediately tried to duplicate Pons and Fleischmann's results. On April 10, researchers at Texas A&M University published results of excess heat from their experiment. The next day, a group from the Georgia Institute of Technology reported the production of neutrons. For a lack of concrete evidence, both groups withdrew their claims within a few days. On May 1, the American Physical Society (APS) conducted a session on cold fusion in which a number of failed experiments were reported. At a second APS session on the following day, eight of nine prominent speakers concluded that the claims of Pons and Fleischmann were irrelevant and should be dropped.

Stanley Pons and Martin Fleischmann testify about their cold fusion experiments before a House committee on April 1, 1989. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

Over the next several weeks, many competing claims, counterclaims, and possible explanations for the cold-fusion experiment ran rampant. By not properly verifying their results prior to divulging them, Pons and Fleischmann had created their own scandal. They would now suffer the consequences. They broke all the rules of the scientific community with their premature announcement of having successfully achieved cold fusion in their laboratory. Instead of first seeking peer review by submitting their findings to a reputable journal, they chose to announce their results at a press conference. They also exaggerated some of their results. In addition, because of pending patent rights, they did not disclose the details of their experiment to other scientists. Amid accusations of fraud, incompetence, and deception, the euphoria about cold fusion eventually began to die down. Many journalists referred to cold fusion as a hoax that only generated “confusion.”

As the fiasco played out, Pons and Fleischmann, humiliated by the scientific community, retreated to France to do further work on cold-fusion experiments in a lab in Provence. Although their reputations were ruined, their continued research was funded by multimillionaire Minoru Toyoda from 1992 until 1996. Because of conflict over the direction of the research and unproductive results, Fleischmann left in 1995 and returned to England. Pons left in 1996 to pursue other research opportunities in Europe.

IMPACT

The quick, widespread media dissemination of the claims of Pons and Fleischmann, the perceived simplicity of their cold-fusion experiment and the potential scientific, social, and economic significance of cold fusion, led to replication efforts being conducted in hundreds of laboratories worldwide. If the conclusions of Pons and Fleischmann proved to be correct, alterations would have to be made in the basic theoretical understanding of the physics of nuclear fusion. Since most laboratories could not replicate the reported cold-fusion results of Fleischmann and Pons, most scientists concluded that cold fusion was not possible. The few positive results that were reported were dismissed as experimental error or even manipulation of the data to show positive results. For the most part, cold-fusion research was ridiculed and denounced.

Despite the scandal and low level of acceptance by the scientific establishment, laboratories in several countries continued to pursue cold-fusion research. Some positive evidence for cold fusion continued to be reported, but most prominent academic journals did not publish those findings. Even though cold fusion may represent a colossal conspiracy of denial, millions of dollars continue to be spent on the concept because of the potential economic windfalls. Consequently, some researchers continue their hope of explaining and developing cold-fusion technology. As a result, some publications are devoted to publishing papers about cold fusion. A Web-based cold-fusion library has been established, and an international conference on cold fusion is held twice a year.

The cold-fusion debacle also led the scientific community to scrutinize reported scientific breakthroughs much more thoroughly and to make sure that proper protocol is followed prior to the release of any results. Experimental and theoretical work must be reviewed and replicated by peers and deemed publishable before it is released to the media. The bar for ethical standards associated with scientific research and the reporting of the results has been raised to a new level.

—Alvin K. Benson

FURTHER READING

Beaudette, Charles G. Excess Heat: Cold Fusion Research Prevailed. 2d ed. Brampton, Ont.: Oak Grove Press, 2002. Excellent review of the Pons-Fleischmann experiment, the cold-fusion controversy, and what has been done in cold-fusion research from 1989 until 2002. A good overview for general readers.

Kozima, Hideo. The Science of Cold Fusion Phenomena. New York: Springer, 2002. A comprehensive review of the scientific and technical aspects of cold fusion research.

nomenon. Boston: Elsevier, 2006. Scientific examination of the possibility of cold fusion that investigates the work of Fleischmann, Pons, and Jones and proposes possible mechanisms for cold fusion and how it might be experimentally achieved.

Simon, Bart. Undead Science: Science Studies and the Afterlife of Cold Fusion. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 2002. Examines the Fleischmann-Pons debacle and traces some of the experimental and theoretical work involving cold fusion during the 1990's.

Taubes, Gary. Bad Science: The Short Life and Weird Times of Cold Fusion. New York: Random

House, 1993. Critical appraisal of the mishandling of science demonstrated by Fleischmann and Pons in prematurely announcing success with cold fusion.

SEE ALSO: Nov. 21, 1953: Piltdown Man Is Revealed to Be a Hoax; Spring, 1996: Physicist Publishes a Deliberately Fraudulent Article; Aug., 2002: Immunologist Resigns After Being Accused of Falsifying Research; Sept. 25, 2002: Inquiry Reveals That Physicist Jan Hendrik Schön Faked His Research; May 12, 2006: Scientist Is Indicted for Faking His Research on Creating Stem Cells.

March 29, 1989

FINANCIER MICHAEL MILKEN IS INDICTED FOR RACKETEERING AND FRAUD

Michael Milken, known as the junk-bond king of Wall Street during the 1980's, was indicted for insider trading and other illegal activities under the RICO Act, making him the first person not tied to organized crime to be charged under this act. He was sentenced to ten years in prison but served less than two years. He also paid $600 million in fines to the U.S. government and more than $1 billion to the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation.

LOCALE: New York, New York

CATEGORIES: Corruption; organized crime and racketeering; banking and finance; law and the courts; business

KEY FIGURES

Michael Milken (b. 1946), Wall Street investment banker

Ivan Boesky (b. 1937), Wall Street arbitrageur

Rudy Giuliani (b. 1944), U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York, 1983-1989, and mayor of New York, 1994-2001

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Michael Milken was born into a Jewish, middle-class family and was raised by his parents in the San Fernando Valley of Los Angeles. An exceptionally bright child, Milken discovered at an early age that he had both a photographic memory and an interest in mathematics and finances. In 1968, he graduated from the University of California, Berkeley, with a degree in business administration. That same year, he also married his high school sweetheart, Lori Hackel. They relocated to Philadelphia so that Milken could attend the Wharton School of Business at the University of Pennsylvania. After earning his master's degree in business administration, he was hired by the Drexel Corporation.

In 1973, Drexel had merged with Burnham and Company to become the Wall Street investment firm Drexel Burnham Lambert. Following the merger, Milken became the head of a bond-trading department. It was in this position that he began using his junk-bond theory, which he originally developed as an undergraduate student at Berkeley to make money.

Michael Milken. (AP/Wide World Photos)

In the financial world, a conventional bond was a certificate of debt that was usually sold by a government to a company that wanted to raise capital by borrowing money. Most often, these bonds were then repaid by the borrowing company with interest. Conventional bonds also were rated according to the value of the business minus its current liabilities. In contrast to these practices, Milken believed that junk bonds, which would be unrated, could be sold to small companies that lacked a credit history and were heavily in debt. By targeting these kinds of companies, he could potentially make a lot of money because junk bonds would be issued at a higher interest rate than conventional bonds. These higher interest rates would, in turn, earn higher profits for Milken. The junk-bond strategy was so successful that by 1976, Milken was earning more than five million dollars a year.

In 1977, Milken relocated his family and the company's noninvestment-grade bond-trading department to Los Angeles. By 1978, Drexel Burnham Lambert had issued approximately $439 million in junk bonds, and Milken was soon known as the junk-bond king of Wall Street. During the early 1980's, investors also began using junk bonds to finance leveraged buyouts (LBOs). By definition, a leveraged buyout was the purchase of a company using a significant amount of borrowed money, in the form of bonds and loans, to meet the cost of acquisition. By 1985, the junk-bond market on Wall Street was worth more than $100 billion.

Throughout the 1980's, the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) closely watched Milken's business dealings on Wall Street. In 1986, Ivan Boesky, a successful Wall Street arbitrageur, plea bargained with the SEC and implicated Milken and Drexel Burnham Lambert in several illegal financial transactions. These included insider trading, illegal takeovers, fraud, and stock manipulation. Milken also was charged with stock parking, a financial activity in which an investor conceals the real owner of a stock to bypass a tax liability or financial regulation. Simultaneously, Rudy Giuliani, the U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York, began a criminal investigation of the embattled investor. Milken claimed his innocence on all charges.

In 1987, James B. Stewart, a reporter for The Wall Street Journal, began investigating that year's stock market crash and the scandal that implicated Milken and others in insider trading and other crimes. Stewart was awarded a Pulitzer Prize in 1988 for his investigative reporting, and his book, Den of Thieves, which details the crimes of Wall Street, was published in 1991. The book remains highly controversial and has been targeted by supporters of Milken.

On March 29, 1989, under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations (RICO) Act, Milken was indicted by a federal grand jury on ninety-eight counts of racketeering and fraud as well as insider trading, stock parking, and tax evasion. The indictment was especially significant because it was the first time in American legal history that the RICO Act was used against an individual with no connection to organized crime. In June, at the company's request, Milken resigned from Drexel Burnham Lambert and formed his own company, International Capital Access Group.

Milken had maintained his innocence throughout the affair, but on April 24, 1990, he pleaded guilty to six counts of violating federal securities and tax laws. The charges included insider trading, tax evasion, stock parking, filing false SEC reports, mail fraud, and the evasion of regulatory capital requirements. Interestingly, at his trial, Milken not only apologized for his crimes but also admitted to the court that he willingly conspired with Boesky to defraud financial clients. As part of his plea agreement, Milken was sentenced to a ten-year prison term by Judge Kimba Wood. He was fined $200 million, agreed to pay $400 million into a special fund set up by the SEC to reimburse his victims, and accepted a lifetime ban from the securities industry.

On January 2, 1993, Milken was released from a federal penitentiary in Pleasanton, California, after serving only twenty-two months of his ten-year sentence. He was relocated to a halfway house but was released from there on February 4. The court also required him to perform eighteen hundred hours of community service each year for three years. In addition, he settled a lawsuit with the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (FDIC) by agreeing to pay the agency more than $1 billion. Following his release from prison, Milken's net worth was estimated to be more than $125 million.

PROHIBITED ACTIVITIES UNDER THE RICO ACT

Michael Milken was indicted for various crimes under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations (RICO) Act of 1970. In part, "racketeering" is defined in the act as Any act or threat involving murder, kidnapping, gambling, arson, robbery, bribery, extortion, dealing in obscene matter, or dealing in a controlled substance or listed chemical . . . which is chargeable under state law and punishable by imprisonment for more than one year.

RICO also includes a section, excerpted here, outlining prohibited criminal activities covered by the act.

It shall be unlawful for any person who has received any income derived, directly or indirectly, from a pattern of racketeering activity or through collection of an unlawful debt in which such person has participated as a principal within the meaning of section 2, title 18, United States Code, to use or invest, directly or indirectly, any part of such income, or the proceeds of such income, in acquisition of any interest in, or the establishment or operation of, any enterprise which is engaged in, or the activities of which affect, interstate or foreign commerce. A purchase of securities on the open market for purposes of investment, and without the intention of controlling or participating in the control of the issuer, or of assisting another to do so, shall not be unlawful under this subsection if the securities of the issuer held by the purchaser, the members of his immediate family, and his or their accomplices in any pattern or racketeering activity or the collection of an unlawful debt after such purchase do not amount in the aggregate to one percent of the outstanding securities of any one class, and do not confer, either in law or in fact, the power to elect one or more directors of the issuer.

IMPACT

Milken not only epitomized the Wall Street investor of the 1980's but also symbolized American capitalism and greed during the 1980's. The highly intelligent financier went to Wall Street as an outsider during the 1970's, and through diligence, hard work, and an obsession with making money, he redefined the stereotypical Ivy League image of the Wall Street careerist. Milken's reign on Wall Street, however, came to an abrupt end in 1989 when he was indicted, but in the end, his symbolic reign continues—as the junk-bond king who defined an era in American financial history.

—Bernadette Zbicki Heiney

FURTHER READING

Bailey, Fenton. Fall from Grace: The Untold Story of Michael Milken. Secaucus, N.J.: Carol, 1992.

This book explores the power of the American media and its role in the downfall of Michael Milken.

Bruck, Connie. The Predators' Ball: The Inside Story of Drexel Burnham and the Rise of the Junk Bond Raiders. New York: Penguin Books, 1989.

Bruck provides a detailed history of the junk-bond industry during the 1980's, with a look at Drexel Burnham Lambert and its hired junk-bond brokers.

Chancellor, Edward. Devil Take the Hindmost: A History of Financial Speculation. New York: Plume, 2000. A detailed history of financial speculation—the quest for money and assets—in the United States.

Grant, James. Money of the Mind: Borrowing and Lending in America from the Civil War to Michael Milken. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 1992. A history of the credit and lending systems in the United States and their profound effect on the American marketplace and consumerism.

MacDonald, Scott B., and Jane E. Hughes. Separating Fools from Their Money: A History of American Financial Scandals. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 2007. This book provides readers with an easy-to-read, detailed history of finance-related scandals in the United States, scandals that target those least able to afford it: ordinary consumers.

Sobel, Robert. Dangerous Dreamers: The Financial Innovators from Charles Merrill to Michael Milken. Washington, D.C.: Beardbooks, 2000.

This book explores the history of America's most notable financiers and their impact on the American economy.

SEE ALSO: 1919-1920: Ponzi Schemes Are Revealed as Investment Frauds; Mar. 29, 1962: Billie Sol Estes Is Arrested for Corporate Fraud; Nov. 28, 1967: Investor Louis Wolfson Is Convicted of Selling Stock Illegally; May 2, 1984: E. F. Hutton Executives Plead Guilty to Fraud; May 7, 1985: Banker Jake Butcher Pleads Guilty to Fraud; Jan. 15, 1988: ZZZZ Best Founder Is Indicted on Federal Fraud Charges; Aug. 27, 1990: Guinness Four Are Found Guilty of Share-Trading Fraud; Dec. 2, 2001: Enron Bankruptcy Reveals Massive Financial Fraud; June 25, 2002: Internal Corruption Forces Adelphia Communications to Declare Bankruptcy; Sept. 3, 2003: Mutual Fund Companies Are Implicated in Shady Trading Practices; Mar. 5, 2004: Martha Stewart Is Convicted in Insider-Trading Scandal; Sept. 12, 2005: Westar Energy Executives Are Found Guilty of Looting Their Company; Sept. 18, 2006: Newsweek Reveals That Hewlett-Packard Spied on Its Own Board; Sept. 20, 2008: American Financial Markets Begin to Collapse.

May 31, 1989

SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE JIM WRIGHT RESIGNS IN ETHICS SCANDAL

Jim Wright served thirty-four years in the U.S. Congress before being forced to resign for ethical violations. A ten-month investigation into his finances showed that he violated his position of power dozens of times by securing various financial deals for himself, his immediate family members, and his friends, in violation of House ethics. His corrupt activities brought an immediate end to his congressional career but did not result in further legal action. Wright was the first Speaker of the House to resign from office because of a political scandal.

LOCALE: Washington, D.C.

CATEGORIES: Corruption; politics; ethics; government

KEY FIGURES

Jim Wright (b. 1922), U.S. representative from Texas, 1955-1989, and Speaker of the House, 1987-1989

Bill Mallick (fl. 1980's), Texas real-estate developer and friend of Jim Wright

Betty Wright (fl. 1980's), Jim Wright's wife

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Eleven years after becoming one of the most powerful Democrats in the U.S. Congress, Representative Jim Wright was at the center of an ethics scandal concerning his financial activities in 1988. Because of the severity of the allegations, the House of Representatives was forced to convene a bipartisan committee in early June of that year to conduct an official inquiry and, later, a full-fledged investigation of the numerous claims of financial misconduct.

Wright had been raised in the greater Dallas-Fort Worth area and attended Weatherford College from 1939 to 1940 and the University of Texas from 1940 to 1941. After the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor in 1941, Wright joined the U.S. Army Air Force and was stationed in the South Pacific. During his World War II military service, he flew countless combat missions and was awarded the Distinguished Flying Cross. After the war, he returned home and entered politics in his home state of Texas.

In 1946, Wright was elected to the Texas house of representatives but was defeated after serving a single term. He then moved to Weatherford, Texas, home of his alma mater, and was elected mayor for a four-year term (1950-1954). In 1954, he ran unopposed for a seat in Congress, representing the Twelfth District, which included Fort Worth and Weatherford. He would be reelected to the House more than one dozen times. In 1977, Wright was named the new majority leader after Tip O'Neill was elected Speaker of the House. He served as majority leader from 1977 through 1987. After O'Neill retired from the speakership in 1987, Wright was elected to replace him. He served until his resignation on May 31, 1989.

At the center of the Wright investigation were four major areas of concern. First, real-estate developer George Mallick gave him the use of a luxury condominium in Fort Worth and, for his wife, Betty Wright, the use of a Cadillac and an annual salary of eighteen thousand dollars for a ghost job with her husband. Mallick's gifts, however, violated a congressional ban on members receiving gifts valued at more than one hundred dollars from any one person.

The committee also discovered that Mallick had a direct interest in legislation pertaining to savings and loan companies, especially in Texas, that were failing. Wright intervened with federal regulators on behalf of Mallick and two other Texas executives from a Fort Worth savings and loan and successfully lobbied on their behalf in their dealings with the Federal Home Loan Banks board. His efforts ultimately protected their financial interests.

The third concern was Mallick and Wright's questionable business relationship. In one case, Wright had secured $7.5 million for the restoration of Fort Worth's historic stockyards, and Mallick was given the contract to oversee the renovation. This relationship opened the door for Wright to receive financial kickbacks and gifts for securing the contract.

Finally, Wright's book Reflections of a Public Man (1984) was at the center of another ethics violation. The 117-page work was published by longtime friend Carlos Moore, whose printing firm had worked for Wright's campaigns for several years. Ethical concerns arose because of the money Wright made from sales of the book. He was earning 60 percent in royalties, far more than the common 10 to 15 percent in royalties for most authors. The book was purchased in bulk by various supporters of Wright, including business and labor groups. The money he earned from the sales allowed him to avoid the earnings limit placed on Congress members; with book sales, he was able to earn extra income while avoiding that limitation.

In May, 1988, the public citizens' action group Common Cause called upon Congress to inquire into the allegations against Wright. In a matter of days, leading House Republican Newt Gingrich sent a formal letter, cosigned by seventy-two of his Republican colleagues, to the House Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, the panel that oversees the ethical conduct of House members. The letter called for a complete investigation into Wright's conduct. On February 22, 1989, the chief investigator issued his preliminary 279-page report to the committee. The report alleged that on sixty-nine separate occasions, Wright had broken congressional rules of conduct.

At the conclusion of the full fifty-one-week investigation, the committee, comprising six Democrats and six Republicans, was ready to render its decision. In an 8-4 vote, the committee found that there was "reason to believe" that Wright violated House ethics rules. After dropping more than half of the original charges, the committee was ready to act on four issues of misconduct. Based on the insurmountable evidence, Wright was now set to face an ethics hearing with the power to exact three penalties: a letter of reproach, a formal reprimand, or censure.

Although Democrats dominated the House in numbers, Wright failed to gain his party's support to retain his position as House Speaker. Facing almost certain criminal indictment and conviction, Wright, now sixty-six years old, opted to resign as speaker on May 31. Less than one month later, on June 30, he resigned from the House altogether, ending a thirty-four-year congressional career.

IMPACT

Only the fourth House Speaker in U.S. history to step down from office, Wright was the first to leave office because of allegations of unethical conduct. During his resignation speech before members of Congress, he said that his stepping down from his position was a sacrifice for his country because he spared the House and its members further political hardship and negative publicity. He added that he was a victim of an ethical battle between warring political parties. In his final words, he urged both Democrats and Republicans to resolve their differences and hostilities so that they could refocus on more pressing and urgent matters for the American people.

Jim Wright, right, one month before his resignation as Speaker of the House. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

At the same time Wright was leaving office, his own top aide was resigning amid a scandal related to an interview in The Washington Post. In the interview, a woman claimed she had been brutally assaulted by Wright's aide in the early 1970's. Another scandal erupted during the time of Wright's resignation when House Democratic whip Tony Coelho was forced from office because of his own alleged financial misconduct.

—Paul M. Klenowski

FURTHER READING

Barry, John. The Ambition and the Power: Jim Wright and the Will of the House. New York: Viking Press, 1989. A detailed look at the rise and fall of Representative and Speaker Wright, with specific attention to his misconduct and resignation.

Long, Kim. The Almanac of Political Corruption, Scandals, and Dirty Politics. New York: Delacorte Press, 2007. A wide-ranging book detailing the various scandals and corrupt practices that have plagued U.S. politics. A good general study of political scandals.

Thompson, Denis. Ethics in Congress: From Individual to Institutional Corruption. Washington, D.C.: Brookings Institute, 1995. This report chronicles corruption in the institution of Congress and by individual Congress members, including Wright.

U.S. Congress. House of Representatives. Committee on Standards of Official Conduct. Report of the Special Outside Counsel in the Matter of Speaker James C. Wright, Jr. Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1989. The official report of the findings against Wright, highlighting the numerous charges of unethical conduct found by the investigative congressional subcommittee.

SEE ALSO: Aug. 4, 1948: Columnist Drew Pearson Exposes Congressman's Corruption; June 23, 1967: Senator Thomas J. Dodd Is Censured for Misappropriating Funds; Dec. 7, 1980: Rita Jenrette's "Diary of a Mad Congresswife" Scandalizes Washington; Sept. 23, 1987: Plagiarism Charges End Joe Biden's Presidential Campaign; Dec. 5, 2002: Senator Trent Lott Praises Strom Thurmond's 1948 Presidential Campaign; July 1, 2005: Federal Agents Raid Congressman Randall Cunningham's Home; June 4, 2007: Congressman William J. Jefferson Is Indicted for Corruption.

August 10, 1989

JAPANESE PRIME MINISTER SOSUKE RESIGNS AFTER AFFAIR WITH A GEISHA

Following his appointment as Japan's prime minister in June, 1989, Sosuke Uno resigned his office after only sixty-nine days when the press revealed he had paid a geisha a monthly salary for sexual favors prior to being prime minister. The scandal inspired a newly active women's movement and led the media in Japan to rethink the significance of sex, gossip, and other scandal as relevant and newsworthy.

LOCALE: Tokyo, Japan

CATEGORIES: Government; politics; publishing and journalism; sex

KEY FIGURES

Sosuke Uno (1922-1998), prime minister of Japan, June 3-August 10, 1989

Noboru Takeshita (1924-2000), prime minister of Japan, 1987-1989

SUMMARY OF EVENT

In the summer of 1989, a woman describing herself as a geisha approached the Mainichi Shinbun, one of the largest newspapers in Japan, claiming that the married prime minister Sosuke Uno had paid her to have a sexual relationship in the months before he assumed office. The prestigious newspaper balked because the story was considered beneath its dignity, and she was referred to an affiliated magazine. That magazine, the Sunday Mainichi, broke the story, but it caused little stir among a public that expected sexual dalliance among its politicians. When, however, a socialist politician accused Uno in parliament of bringing shame to the nation, the public's interest deepened and Uno found himself at the center of a major scandal.

The son of a merchant family in western Japan, Uno had attended Kobe University of Commerce and served in the Japanese imperial army during World War II. During the war he spent two years as a prisoner of war in Siberia and later wrote a book about that experience, one of several books he wrote over his career. He was elected to the Japanese diet, the legislative arm of the Japanese government, in 1960 and served without great distinction in various areas of government, including defense, the ministry of international trade and industry (MITI), and foreign affairs.

Uno's predecessor as prime minister, Noboru Takeshita, had been ruined by a corruption and bribery scandal. During Takeshita's term, it was revealed that at least thirty members of his Liberal Democratic Party, the LDP, had been receiving favors from Recruit, an upstart publishing and telecommunications company. In the face of this scandal, Takeshita was forced to resign his office on June 3, 1989. After a month-long search by the LDP, Uno was named as his successor.

The LDP, wanting Takeshita's replacement to be untouched by the Recruit corruption scandal, took its time to make a decision. The party settled on Uno only after Masayoshi Ito, its first choice, had demanded as a condition of his acceptance of the office that all LDP leaders who had received favors from Recruit resign from politics. Finding that demand unacceptable, the LDP settled on the bland Uno as the prudent choice. They were certainly unaware that for several months before his appointment, Uno had been paying a woman a salary for sexual favors.

The woman, whose name was never revealed, had lost patience with Uno because she received only a small amount of the payment she was due and because she did not receive a parting gift from him when the affair was terminated. She described Uno in her statement to the press as vain, rude, and self-centered. The article that broke the story, published by Sunday Mainichi magazine, on August 10, was sensationally titled "Accusation of an Office Lady: 'I Was Bought for 300,000 Yen per Month.'"

The scandal turned international after The Washington Post followed with its own story of the affair.

Despite Uno initially denying the story and later trying to mitigate the damage caused by it, the woman's accusation soon turned from being a subject of gossip and humor to one with serious political consequences for Uno's already troubled party.

In spite of a statement by the editor of Sunday Mainichi that the central part of the scandal was that Uno paid for a woman's companionship and that the moral standard for a prime minister was higher than the norm, to consider the Uno scandal simply a sex scandal would be a mistake. The Japanese public at that time would not have batted an eye at the disclosure of sexual infidelity of a married politician. That sort of behavior among powerful politicians was taken for granted. What seemed to bother many Japanese more than the moral issue was the payment. For some, particularly the women, the amount was far less than it should have been. For others it was taken as a sign of political incompetence that a man in his position did not deal quietly with the geisha and pay her the amount required to keep her quiet.

Uno's disrespect aroused the anger of Japanese women. Traditionally reticent, they campaigned vigorously to remove him from office. Over fifty women's groups joined in an effective anti-Uno movement. In fact, the campaign against Uno is considered by many the coming of age of women's activist politics in Japan and the first real flexing of women's political muscle.

The international coverage the scandal was receiving also irked the Japanese. As a member of an opposition party put it to Uno, the prime minister was making Japan look foolish in the eyes of the world. This was an unforgivable sin, especially for a Japanese prime minister.

On still another level, the breaking of the cherished geisha code of silence was another scandal in itself. Whatever is said to a geisha is privileged information, and a geisha is bound by honor never to reveal anything that passes between her and her client. The revelation of her affair with Uno was convincing evidence for geishas all over Japan that this woman was no true geisha.

The ill feeling caused by Uno's miserly dealings with the geisha was not the sole cause of the serious problems faced by Uno and his party in the polls. Also in the limelight at the time was the Recruit scandal. In addition, immediately upon assuming the job of prime minister, Uno had to implement an unpopular consumer tax.

For his part, Uno never admitted fault for his part in the affair and stubbornly refused to deal with it at all. He never apologized to the nation or to his wife or to the woman with whom he had the affair. In an odd twist, his wife apologized to the nation on his behalf during an interview in which she also stated that Uno had never talked with her about the matter. Uno resigned his office in disgrace on August 10, 1989, after sixty-nine days in as prime minister, one of the shortest terms of office on record in Japan. He died of cancer almost ten years later the age of seventy-five in the western Japanese city of Moriyama.

IMPACT

Uno's resignation was immediately preceded by the Japanese Socialist Party handing the LDP its worse defeat in over three decades. The sex scandal no doubt contributed to the party's defeat and Uno's resignation, but there were many other causes as well. Uno resigned not because of the scandal but because of his party's losses in the election, losses that ended the LDP's thirty-eight-year political rule within four years.

Also, the media coverage of the Uno scandal changed the way the Japanese press came to deal with such matters. After the Japanese public learned that the press knew about the Recruit and Uno scandals and did not report them until after the stories broke elsewhere, public confidence in the press fell drastically. No longer would even the "serious" newspapers consider sex and gossip irrelevant.

Furthermore, many consider that the Japanese women's movement came of age during the anti-Uno campaign of 1989. Before the scandal, women's political organizations were relegated to consumer and health matters. Their campaign to unseat Uno showed another, more public, side to their activism.

—Wayne Shirey

FURTHER READING

Downer, Lesley. Geisha: The Secret History of a Vanishing World. London: Headline, 2000. A good overview on the rich history of the geisha in Japan. Includes an eye-opening discussion of how geisha are both created and trained as “art persons” who do much more than act as companions to paying men.

Pharr, Susan J. Media and Politics in Japan. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1996. A scholarly look at the Japanese news media, including an examination of how it handled the Sosuke Uno sex scandal.

West, Mark D. Secrets, Sex, and Spectacle: The Rules of Scandal in Japan and the United States. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2006. A comparative study of how scandals come to be and are dealt with in Japan and the United States. Includes discussion of the Sosuke Uno sex scandal.

Pete Rose Is Banned from Baseball for Betting

SEE ALSO: Mar. 2-Sept. 25, 1963: John Profumo Affair Rocks British Government; Feb. 4, 1976: Lockheed Is Implicated in Bribing Foreign Officials; July 25, 1987: Novelist-Politician Jeffrey Archer Wins Libel Trial Against the Daily Star; June, 1988-June, 1989: Insider-Trading Scandal Rocks Japanese Government; Sept. 24, 1992: British Cabinet Member David Mellor Resigns over Romantic Affair; Jan. 17, 1998: President Bill Clinton Denies Sexual Affair with a White House Intern; Sept. 28, 2002: British Politician Reveals Her Affair with Prime Minister John Major; May 28, 2007: Japanese Politician Charged with Corruption Hangs Himself.

August 24, 1989

PETE ROSE IS BANNED FROM BASEBALL FOR BETTING ON GAMES

After a Major League Baseball investigation into star player Pete Rose's gambling habits, Commissioner A. Bartlett Giamatti banned Rose from baseball for life. Rose was accused of, and later admitted to, betting on baseball.

LOCALE: New York, New York

CATEGORIES: Corruption; gambling; law and the courts; sports

KEY FIGURES

Pete Rose (b. 1941), professional baseball player and manager

A. Bartlett Giamatti (1938-1989), commissioner of Major League Baseball

John M. Dowd (b. 1941), lawyer and lead investigator

Fay Vincent (b. 1938), assistant commissioner of Major League Baseball

Paul Janszen (fl. 1980's), Rose's long-time friend and owner of Gold's Gym in Cincinnati

SUMMARY OF EVENT

On August 24, 1989, Major League Baseball (MLB) commissioner A. Bartlett Giamatti announced Pete Rose's lifetime suspension from baseball. Rose, the subject of a six-month investigation led by Washington, D.C., attorney John M. Dowd, had been accused of gambling on baseball games, including those played by the Cincinnati Reds, for whom Rose served as a player-manager. Rose was not banned from the sport under the rule prohibiting gambling, which carries an automatic lifetime suspension. Instead, he was declared ineligible under a rule that governs other forms of misconduct. That rule carried a penalty decided at the commissioner's discretion, and Giamatti determined that a lifetime ban was appropriate.

Rose was one of baseball's biggest stars over the course of his twenty-four-year playing career. From 1963 to 1986, his awards included National League (NL) Rookie of the Year and NL Most Valuable Player, and he was a seventeen-time All Star. As a member of the Cincinnati Reds' teams commonly known as the Big Red Machine, and later as a player with the Philadelphia Phillies, Rose was known for his hard playing and competitive drive. Although he rarely hit for power, Rose consistently hit for a high average, winning three NL batting titles. He finished his career with 4,256 hits, a major league record. For the last two years of his playing career, Rose returned to the Reds as a player-manager. He continued to manage the club for three seasons after his retirement as a player in 1986.

Throughout much of his career, Rose was an avid gambler as well. Betting on horse races, football, basketball, and other sports, he had begun to gamble uncontrollably by 1985. Through his gambling, he became involved with bookies and others engaged in criminal activities. In 1988, the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) began a probe into the activities of cocaine dealers based out of a Gold's Gym in Cincinnati. Paul Janszen, one of the owners of the gym, had been a long-time friend of Rose and often placed bets for him at the horse track and with bookies. When the FBI interrogated Janszen, he offered extensive information about Rose's gambling. The FBI, investigating drug cases, showed little interest in pursuing Rose on gambling charges, and Janszen offered to sell his story to Sports Illustrated. Although the magazine refused the offer, rumors began to circulate about Rose's problem with gambling.

Near the end of his term as MLB commissioner,

Pete Rose is escorted outside federal court in Cincinnati, Ohio, in July, 1990, after he was sentenced to prison for tax evasion. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Peter Ueberroth had heard about Janszen's testimony and informed Giamatti. Ueberroth and Giamatti took the allegations against Rose very seriously. Major League Baseball had long considered gambling on the sport to be the most egregious offense a player or manager could commit. In 1919, members of the Chicago White Sox were paid by gamblers to throw the World Series in favor of the underdog Cincinnati Reds. When the plot was discovered the next year, major league owners, seeking to clean up the game, selected a federal judge, Kenesaw Mountain Landis, to become the first commissioner of MLB. Landis permanently banned all eight members of the Black Sox, as they came to be known, from baseball.

Since the time of the Black Sox scandal, MLB has had zero tolerance for gambling on baseball, and any player or manager who bets on the sport could receive a permanent expulsion. MLB's fear of gambling-related corruption runs so deep that even retired star players such as Mickey Mantle and Willie Mays were suspended for serving as greeters in casinos (Mantle and Mays later had their bans overturned). With such a history of opposition to gambling, MLB could not let the accusations against Rose go without inquiry.

Although Giamatti was not yet the commissioner, Ueberroth, as a lame duck, turned the Rose matter over to him. In office for only six months, Giamatti devoted his entire time as commissioner to investigating Rose's gambling. Following a private meeting with Rose and his attorneys, a meeting in which Rose proclaimed his innocence, Giamatti opened an investigation into allegations against the player. The commissioner appointed Dowd to head the investigation as special counsel to the commissioner. During the inquiry, Dowd interviewed Janszen and others through whom Rose had placed bets. Janszen, in particular, provided damaging testimony and damning evidence: Rose's betting slips from April, 1987, which listed bets on baseball games. A handwriting analyst confirmed that Rose had written the slips. At the end of the investigation, in August, 1989, Dowd reported that the evidence indicated that Rose had bet on baseball, including the Reds, from 1985 to 1987.

Pete Rose Is Banned from Baseball for Betting

Giamatti, however, created difficulties for himself during the investigation. In June, 1989, after Giamatti revealed in an April letter that he had begun to think that Rose was guilty, Rose and his lawyers filed suit against the commissioner. Rose decried Giamatti as prejudiced against him and stated that the Dowd investigation was unfairly damaging his reputation. Rose asked that Giamatti be replaced by an unbiased party and requested that the Cincinnati Reds be forbidden from taking action against him for any information revealed in the investigation. For two months, the case bounced between state and federal courts, and no action had been taken when the investigation ended in August.

With his credibility tainted, Giamatti had Fay Vincent, deputy MLB commissioner, handle much of the negotiation between the MLB and Rose. On August 23 the two parties decided that Rose would accept a ban from baseball but would not admit to any wrongdoing, nor would he deny wrongdoing. It was understood that after one year, Rose could apply for reinstatement. The following morning, Giamatti revealed the findings of the Dowd Report and announced that Rose would be placed on baseball's ineligible list. Under the ban, Rose could not play or manage in the major or minor leagues and could not attend any official MLB function.

IMPACT

In September, 1989, Vincent became the new commissioner of baseball following Giamatti's death, leaving Rose to doubt that his appeal would be approved. Animosity separated him from Vincent because the two were in conflict during settlement negotiations before Rose's ban was official. However, another serious legal issue stood in the way: In 1990, an Internal Revenue Service investigation led to Rose's conviction for tax evasion, and he was sentenced to a brief prison term and a period of community service. Although Rose could have applied for reinstatement after one year on the ineligible list, he waited until 1997 to do so, after Vincent's term ended and upon Bud Selig's becoming the new MLB commissioner.

For more than a decade after being banned, Rose maintained his innocence. In 2002, however, Rose admitted to Selig in a private meeting that he had bet on baseball during the 1980's. Two years later, Rose confessed publicly in his autobiography, My Prison Without Bars (2004). Although Rose hoped to be reinstated by baseball after his confession, MLB did not act on his application. Selig stated that Rose did little to indicate that he has changed since Giamatti banned him.

Unlike the 1919 Black Sox scandal, Rose's banishment from baseball had little effect on the game of baseball itself. However, Rose became a lightning rod among baseball fans. In 1991, the board of the National Baseball Hall of Fame adopted a rule stating that any person on MLB's permanent ineligibility list could not be considered for election into the Hall of Fame. Despite having career statistics that warrant his induction, Rose remains ineligible. Like the case of Shoeless Joe Jackson, who was banned from baseball for his suspected role in fixing the 1919 World Series, Rose's banishment and his ineligibility for the Hall of Fame are topics of extensive debate among baseball fans and professionals.

—Jacob F. Lee

FURTHER READING

Jordan, David. Pete Rose: A Biography. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2004. An updated biography of Rose, especially useful for its coverage of Rose's life after his suspension.

Reston, James, Jr. Collision at Home Plate: The Lives of Pete Rose and Bart Giamatti. New York: Edward Burlingame Books, 1991. Dual biography of Rose and Giamatti, focusing on Rose's gambling, Giamatti's time as MLB commissioner, and how the two figures clashed.

Rose, Pete, with Rick Hill. My Prison Without Bars. Emmaus, Pa.: Rodale Press, 2004. Autobiography in which Rose finally admits to having bet on baseball. Discusses his family life, early days in baseball, and why he gambled on the game.

Rose, Pete, with Roger Kahn. Pete Rose: My Story. New York: Macmillan, 1989. An early Rose autobiography, perhaps the best of his memoirs, published the year Rose was banned, which offers a defense against allegations of betting on baseball.

Sokolove, Michael Y. Hustle: The Myth, Life, and Lies of Pete Rose. New ed. New York: Simon & Schuster, 2005. Critical biography of Rose, first published in 1990 and updated here, detailing his gambling problems. Attempts to answer the question, who is Rose—the All-American over-achiever or a symbol of corruption?

Vincent, Fay. The Last Commissioner: A Baseball Valentine. New York: Simon & Schuster, 2002. Autobiography by Vincent, the commissioner of MLB and Rose's postprofessional nemesis.

SEE ALSO: Sept. 21, 1919: White Sox Players Conspire to Lose World Series in "Black Sox" Scandal; Dec. 26, 1926: Ty Cobb and Tris Speaker Are Accused of Fixing Baseball Games; Spring, 1947: Baseball Manager Leo Durocher Is Suspended for Gambling Ties; Jan. 17, 1951: College Basketball Players Begin Shaving Points for Money; Fall, 1969-Winter, 1971: Japanese Baseball Players Are Implicated in Game Fixing; Nov. 29, 1979, and Jan. 31, 1983: Baseball Commissioner Suspends Mickey Mantle and Willie Mays for Casino Ties; Feb. 28, 1986: Baseball Commissioner Peter Ueberroth Suspends Players for Cocaine Use; Mar. 17, 2005: Former Baseball Star Mark McGwire Evades Congressional Questions on Steroid Use; Aug. 20, 2007: Football Star Michael Vick Pleads Guilty to Financing a Dogfighting Ring.

December 3, 1989

MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR.'S, DOCTORAL-THESIS PLAGIARISM IS REVEALED

In 1988, the editors of the Martin Luther King, Jr., papers made the unsettling discovery that King's doctoral dissertation as well as many of his academic papers had been substantially plagiarized. The editors were slow in reporting their discovery, but British journalist Frank Robert Johnson learned of it and broke the story in 1989.

LOCALE: London, England

CATEGORIES: Cultural and intellectual history; education; hoaxes, frauds, and charlatanism; plagiarism; publishing and journalism

KEY FIGURES

Martin Luther King, Jr. (1929-1968), Baptist minister and civil rights leader
Clayborne Carson (b. 1944), Stanford University historian and senior editor of the King papers
Frank Johnson (1943-2006), British political journalist
L. Harold DeWolf (1905-1986), King's dissertation adviser at Boston University
Coretta Scott King (1927-2006), civil rights activist, who was married to Reverend King

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Civil rights activist Coretta Scott King, the wife of slain civil rights leader Martin Luther King, Jr., initiated a project in 1984 to gather King's papers and publish them in a multivolume collection. She chose a prominent African American historian, Clayborne Carson, to direct the King Papers Project at Stanford University. In 1988, Carson and his assistants were shocked to discover instances of serious plagiarism in King's 1955 doctoral dissertation in theology for Boston University. The dissertation, "A Comparison of the Conception of God in the Thinking of Paul Tillich and Henry Nelson Wieman," included lengthy passages that were taken nearly word-for-word from various texts, especially from Boston University doctoral student Jack Boozer's thesis of 1952, without quotations, footnotes, or other attribution.

The King papers' editors soon discovered a pattern: King had placed extensive portions of other persons' writings in his graduate-school papers without documentation (citing one's sources is standard scholarly practice). Failing to check for accuracy, he replicated mistakes from those copied texts, errors that included footnotes with erroneous page numbers. Editors believed that disclosing the plagiarism would lead to public misunderstanding and do harm to the editorial project. Following discussions with the project's board of directors, the editors decided to first do exhaustive research to determine the extent of the plagiarism, after which Carson would announce the plagiarism in a scholarly article to appear just before publication of the first volume of King's papers.

Apparently the editors did not anticipate that putting off the announcement of their discovery would be interpreted as an attempt to conceal a scandal about a national hero. A few editors and board members, even after agreeing to not discuss the matter with outsiders, could not resist the temptation to inform friends and associates. American journalists began to hear rumors about problems with the project, but they apparently considered the matter too controversial to pursue, perhaps fearing their actions would be denounced as racist. However, when British journalist Frank Johnson heard the rumors, he telephoned Carson and assistant editor Ralph Luker to inquire about the matter. Although the two editors were noncommittal and vague, they did not entirely deny that King had probably engaged in plagiarism, at least to some extent. In a column appearing in the Sunday Telegraph (London) on December 3, 1989, Johnson reported his conversations. He wrote, in "Martin Luther King—Was He a Plagiarist?" that even if King were a plagiarist, "In my view this does not detract from his greatness, no more than did the revelations about his extramarital sex life.”

Although other historians and journalists were aware of Johnson’s scoop, they chose not to publicize the scandal further. Carson hoped to be the first to release the story more widely, and to do so in a scholarly article in the Journal of American History. Unexpectedly, his paper was rejected, reportedly because he had not taken a firm stand on the plagiarism issue. Meanwhile, while Carson was in the process of revising his paper (which was published in June, 1991), reporter Peter Waldman wrote a detailed story that appeared as “To Their Dismay, King Scholars Find a Troubling Pattern—Civil Rights Leader Was Lax in Attributing Some Parts of His Academic Papers” on the front page of The Wall Street Journal on November 9, 1990. Time magazine presented a similar account ten days later. A large percentage of the reading public in the United States now knew about the scandal, and it was widely assumed, especially by conservatives, that the editors of the King papers were covering up the plagiarism.

The scandal occurred at a time when a revisionist portrait of King’s human flaws was emerging from several books and academic articles. Several accounts, particularly Ralph Abernathy’s autobiography, told of his philandering, claiming that King had spent time with three different women during the last night of his life. Scholars also discovered that Keith Miller, a professor of rhetoric at Arizona State University, had already published articles demonstrating that King had borrowed extensively from others. Some scholars tried to defend King’s methods. Miller, for instance, argued that African American preachers looked upon concepts and words as resources to be shared for the benefit of the community, not private property to be selfishly guarded for individual advantage.

Other scholars, however, noted that King’s academic writings showed that he understood the standard rules of documentation, and that at least one of his graduate courses covered the issue of academic honesty explicitly. In addition, King had been careful to copyright his speeches and published works, even bringing suit for the unauthorized use of his famous “I Have a Dream” speech in the case of King v. Mister Maestro, Inc. (1963).

Many scholars remain puzzled about King’s plagiarism. He was an able writer, and the large original portions of his writings were competent, coherent, and clearly expressed. Carson suggested that King probably did not think he had done anything improper. As evidence, he showed that King did not destroy his papers but donated them to the Boston University archives. Perhaps King simply got in the habit of copying texts, and none of his teachers ever took the time and trouble to investigate. While writing his dissertation, he was working as pastor at the Dexter Avenue Baptist Church in Montgomery, Alabama. Perhaps his many duties caused him to be careless. It is also possible that he had instructed typists to paraphrase material and then neglected, or simply forgot, to check the final drafts.

It is particularly difficult to understand why King’s thesis adviser, L. Harold DeWolf, was not more critical and vigilant in checking King’s work. He was one of King’s closest personal friends—a coworker who marched with him during the Civil Rights movement. In his funeral tribute to King in 1968, DeWolf declared that he had spent many hours reading King’s papers. Because he also served as adviser for Boozer’s thesis, much of which was appropriated by King, it appears strange that he failed to recognize the obvious similarities.

IMPACT

In 1991, authorities at Boston University appointed a panel of professors to investigate the allegations that King had plagiarized his doctoral thesis. The panel concluded that about one third of the thesis was clearly plagiarized. After considerable debate, nevertheless, university officials decided not to revoke the doctorate. While conceding that King had acted improperly, they announced that the thesis contained original ideas and made “an intelligent contribution to scholarship.” Because he was no longer alive, moreover, the revoking of the degree would serve no valid purpose. Critics of the panel’s decision argued that the officials were likely motivated by political correctness and the desire to maintain a connection between Boston University and King's great mystique.

Within a decade of the announcement, most had forgotten about the scandal. Those who did remember believed it to be a relatively minor flaw that did not significantly detract from the courage and high morality that King manifested in his long struggle on behalf of human rights and racial equality. Scholars commonly describe plagiarism as a form of academic dishonesty, even fraud. Students who are found guilty of such behavior are usually punished with a failing grade, sometimes even expulsion from a course or program. For academics who are familiar with the scandal, the use of the title of doctor as part of King's name will always sound inappropriate.

—Thomas Tandy Lewis

FURTHER READING

Carson, Clayborne, et al. "Martin Luther King, Jr., as Scholar: A Reexamination of His Theological Writings." Journal of American History 78 (June, 1991): 23-31. This journal issue contains several articles about King's work by David Levering Lewis, David Garrow, David Thelen, and John Highham.

_____, eds. The Papers of Martin Luther King, Jr. Vol. 2. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1994. This volume of King's collected papers includes an annotated edition of his doctoral thesis as well as other papers of the period.

Mawdsley, Ralph. Academic Misconduct: Cheating and Plagiarism. Topeka, Kans.: NOLPE,

Martin Luther King, Jr.'s, Plagiarism Is Revealed

1994. A useful guide for research into academic standards regarding plagiarism and the excessive borrowing of others' works.

Miller, Keith D. Voice of Deliverance: The Language of Martin Luther King, Jr., and Its Sources. Toronto, Ont.: Free Press, 1992. Denying that King was a plagiarist, Miller argues that he practiced "voice merging" and other longstanding rhetorical devices of African American ministers.

Pappas, Theodore. Plagiarism and the Culture War: The Writings of Martin Luther King, Jr., and Other Prominent Americans. Rev. ed. Tampa, Fla.: Hallberg, 1998. Thirteen early sources and essays about the scandal, including Johnson's Sunday Telegraph column of 1989 and Pappas's strong denunciation of King's plagiarism. Accuses King's apologists of ethical relativism and political correctness.

SEE ALSO: Jan. 28, 1972: Clifford Irving Admits Faking Howard Hughes Memoirs; 1978: Roots Author Alex Haley Is Sued for Plagiarism; Apr., 1998: Scottish Historian Is Charged with Plagiarism; June 18, 2001: Historian Joseph J. Ellis Is Accused of Lying; Jan. 4, 2002: Historian Stephen E. Ambrose Is Accused of Plagiarism; Jan. 18, 2002: Historian Doris Kearns Goodwin Is Accused of Plagiarism; Oct. 25, 2002: Historian Michael A. Bellesiles Resigns After Academic Fraud Accusations; July 24, 2007: University of Colorado Fires Professor for Plagiarism and Research Falsification.

December 15-25, 1989

HARASSMENT OF A CHRISTIAN MINISTER SPARKS THE ROMANIAN REVOLUTION

By late 1989, Romanian dictator Nicolae Ceaușescu was pressured by neighboring countries to change Romania's deplorable economic and social conditions. He responded by shifting the blame to the Communist Party and calling for improvements in living standards but not changes to the political system. A Protestant minister condemned the discrimination against Hungarians living in Romania, and authorities began harassing him and ordered his eviction from his church apartment. The minister was physically attacked, sparking protests that led to the downfall of Ceaușescu and his regime.

LOCALE: Timisoara, Romania

CATEGORIES: Atrocities and war crimes; social issues and reform; violence; politics; government; military

KEY FIGURES

Nicolae Ceaușescu (1918-1989), dictator of Romania, 1965-1989

Laszlo Tokes (b. 1952), pastor of the Hungarian Reformed Church in Timisoara, Romania

Vasile Milea (1927-1989), Romanian defense minister

Ion Iliescu (b. 1930), interim president, 1989-1990, and president of Romania, 1990-1992, 1992-1996, 2000-2004

SUMMARY OF EVENT

In December, 1989, Romanian leader Nicolae Ceaușescu's actions against Protestant minister Laszlo Tokes led to the dictator's own downfall and to the end of his repressive communist regime. Speaking out from his pulpit in Timisoara, Tokes had long criticized the Romanian government for its discriminatory practices, especially against his fellow Hungarians living in Romania. Ceaușescu's government, to silence the pastor, harassed him and ordered his eviction from his church apartment. On November 2, armed attackers (some claim from the Romanian Securitate, or security police), had beat him in his home. Tokes's congregation and others from Timisoara assembled around his home and church for a vigil to protest his treatment and prevent his arrest, set for December 15. What followed was mass resistance, heretofore unheard of in Romania, which caught the imagination of Romanians in other towns, and protests began all over the country.

Romanian Protestant minister Laszlo Tokes speaks to his congregation in January, 1990, after being freed from house arrest. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

Romania, a small Central European country surrounded by Hungary, Serbia, Bulgaria, and the Black Sea, was ruled beginning in 1965 by Ceaușescu, the leader of the country's Communist Party. In his zeal to improve Romania's economy, Ceaușescu borrowed billions of dollars from Western countries to finance economic development programs. However, his programs backfired, and he started austerity programs to correct the situation. By the 1980's, Romania was exporting so much of its agricultural and industrial production that its own people were left without enough food and other basic resources. Ceaușescu instituted rationing and other programs, determined not to let the country's indebtedness reduce Romania to the condition of needing to rely on the largess of the West and the Soviet Union.

The shortages of food, fuel, and other basic necessities, along with the forced relocation of many rural residents, took their toll on the people. Many began to speak out against the government's insensitivity to their increasingly low standard of living and to inequitable treatment. The ruling class lived well, even luxuriously and decadently, while the general population lived in conditions similar to those during wartime, facing extreme rationing and shortages. Some reports claim the government's policies led to the death of fifteen thousand Romanians each year from starvation, cold, and various shortages of medical care and other necessities.

Minister Tokes, a young, handsome, ethnic Hungarian in Timisoara, a town in the Romanian region of Transylvania, preached a message about fairness and equality that appealed to many. His congregation started small but soon grew to more than four thousand members from all walks of life—the elderly, middle-age adults, and university students—all eager to hear his message of fairness for those not part of the ruling elite. His popularity soon caught the attention of the communist government's authorities.

Ceaușescu lived by the Marxist dictum that religion “is the opiate of the masses,” and that Christians in general, and Tokes in particular, were not to be tolerated in a communist society. The dictator's initial reaction to Tokes's popularity was to have his security police harass and threaten the members of his congregation. When none of those actions deterred either Tokes or his congregants, Ceaușescu arranged to have Tokes suspended from his ministry and then denied him ration books that were needed to obtain food for himself and his family. Still resisting the efforts to be scared away from his mission, Tokes was attacked by masked men, who were rumored to be security police, and beaten and stabbed.

Romanian dictator Nicolae Ceaușescu around 1965, the year he took power in Romania. (Library of Congress)

1980's

The townspeople of Timisoara began their protests after hearing of the brutal attack on Tokes. Crowds of unarmed men and women gathered about Tokes's church apartment on December 15, 1989, to prevent the authorities from taking the minister from his home. At this time Ceaușescu was out of the country on a state visit to Iran, but his security police, under the direction of his wife, Elena, tried to disperse the protesters, who quickly formed massive demonstrations. The police moved against the protesters with tanks and helicopter gun ships. A state of emergency was declared after the Timisoara protests spread to several other Romanian cities: The population was fed up with life under Ceaușescu.

By December 22, with Romania in the middle of widespread revolt, Ceaușescu, who was back in the country, ordered his army to break up the protests and to fire on the protesters, most of whom were unarmed, if necessary. Defense Minister Vasile Milea, however, refused to order his soldiers to shoot civilians. Milea soon was found dead. His official cause of death was listed as a suicide. Another version of how he died claims that Milea had tried to incapacitate himself to relieve himself of having to follow orders with which he disagreed, and that he had botched the attempt and died accidentally. Most Romanians, though, believe that a security police officer had murdered him in retaliation for his refusal to lead the army against the protesters.

Fighting continued throughout the country, as demonstrators organized themselves into the Frontul Salvării Naționale, or the National Salvation Front (NSF). Tokes was a part of the organization, as was the army chief of staff, Stefan Gusa. The army threw its support behind the protesters.

The Securitate remained loyal to Ceaușescu, and it used force and terrorism to try to quell the increasingly widespread insurrection. However, on December 25, the protesters and the army subdued the Securitate and took control of the government. The Ceaușescus tried to flee but were captured. They were tried in a secret trial on Christmas Day and summarily executed by a firing squad for crimes against the state and for genocide, the illegal gathering of wealth, and “undermining” the Romanian economy.

IMPACT

The NSF took power immediately and abolished the one-party system of the previous decades. However, the NSF also proclaimed that though Ceaușescu and the Communist Party brought disaster to the country, communism in and of itself was not to be abandoned. Some of the Communist Party members who held power during the Ceaușescu regime kept their leadership positions after his fall. The interim president, Ion Iliescu, who had been mentored by Ceaușescu, became disaffected with the way his mentor was ruling the country, so Ceaușescu stripped him of all his party positions. During the elections of 1990, the NSF won a large majority in the legislature. Iliescu was reelected to the presidency in 1992.

Tokes eventually became a bishop of the Hungarian-speaking Reformed Church district of Oradea in Transylvania. In 2007, he was speaking out on issues relating to religion and ecumenical cooperation.

Though the economy lagged and civil unrest continued because of food shortages and price increases, Romania slowly pulled itself out of the depths of repression. By 2007, the constitution had been changed to protect the rights of ethnic minorities, and the country had joined the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and the European Union. Also, after having been deprived of the right by Ceaușescu beginning during the 1960's, Romanians could once again celebrate Christmas.

—Jane L. Ball

FURTHER READING

Campeanu, Pavel. Ceaușescu: From the End to the Beginning. New York: Columbia University Press, 2003. A prison cellmate and fellow communist, Campeanu bases his account of Ceaușescu's rise to power on previously unavailable documents and personal recollections.

Deletant, Dennis. Ceaușescu and the Securitate: Coercion and Dissent in Romania, 1965-1989. Armonk, N.Y.: M. E. Sharpe, 1996. An authoritative account of the Ceaușescu years, providing a history of the oppressors and the oppressed. It is the first major work to use the archives of the Romanian secret police.

Pacepa, Ion Mihai. Red Horizons: The True Story of Nicolae and Elena Ceaușescu's Crimes, Lifestyle, and Corruption. Washington, D.C.: Regnery Gateway, 1990. Pacepa was a high-ranking officer who defected from Romania. A first-person exposé of the Ceaușescu regime.

Siani-Davis, Peter. The Romanian Revolution of December, 1989. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2005. The causes of the revolution and way Ceaușescu was overthrown are discussed in a straightforward, journalistic style. A detailed account of how various leaders and ordinary people became involved in the chaos.

SEE ALSO: Oct. 25, 1924: Forged Communist Letter Brings Down British Government; Feb. 23, 1963: Play Accuses Pope Pius XII of Complicity in the Holocaust; Jan., 1997: Pyramid Investment Schemes Cause Albanian Government to Fall.

December 18, 1989

PRINCE CHARLES'S INTIMATE PHONE CONVERSATION WITH CAMILLA PARKER BOWLES IS TAPED

In 1993, an Australian magazine published a transcript of a private phone conversation in December, 1989, between lovers Prince Charles and Camilla Parker Bowles, leading to an international scandal. The scandal also led to the divorces of both parties and, for a time, threatened the stability of the House of Windsor. Also, the revelation of the tapes heightened fears that the British security service was monitoring the royal family—primarily Princess Diana—through bugging and wiretapping.

ALSO KNOWN AS: Camillagate

LOCALES: Chester and Wiltshire, England

CATEGORIES: Communications and media; politics; public morals; royalty; sex

KEY FIGURES

Charles, Prince of Wales (b. 1948), eldest son of Queen Elizabeth II and heir to the British throne

Camilla Parker Bowles (b. 1947), mistress and later wife of Prince Charles

Diana, Princess of Wales (1961-1997), first wife of Prince Charles

Andrew Parker Bowles (b. 1939), first husband of Camilla Parker Bowles

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Late in the evening of December 18, 1989, Prince Charles had a mobile-phone conversation with Camilla Parker Bowles, his friend of many years. The two had a long history together. Bowles often boasted that her great-grandmother had been the favorite mistress of King Edward VII, Charles's own ancestor. Charles had met Bowles when he was a young man. He was immediately attracted to her. While he was at sea with the Royal Navy, Bowles had married Andrew Parker Bowles. Eventually, they had two children.

Several years later, at the age of thirty-one and at the urging of his family, Charles was married as well. His bride, Diana Spencer, who had been approved by Bowles, had just turned twenty years old. Princess Diana would give birth to two sons, assuring the continuation of the House of Windsor. Later, according to Charles's report, after both their marriages had cooled, he and Bowles became lovers. Older friends of the prince observed that a mature Bowles resembled the most beloved nanny of his childhood. Whatever their deeper needs, the two were now committed lovers, meeting at the homes of friends and indulging themselves in long, ardent telephone conversations. To their misfortune, one was overheard and would eventually be reported to the entire world.

To the parties involved, the conversation was intimate and loving; to a prurient international audience, which later read transcripts of the call, the conversation was ludicrous and salacious. Charles and Bowles expressed their desire to be together and their feelings that Sunday nights were unbearable without each other. Yearning for another meeting before the family holiday festivities intervened, they arranged an assignation. An ambulance strike was keeping Bowles's husband away on official duties, and the lovers expressed their hope that the strike would continue indefinitely. Surprisingly, to a world that regards princes as privileged, Charles revealed feelings of inferiority, speaking of his bad luck and his low estimate of himself. Bowles reassured him, confessing that she would willingly endure the world's "indignities, tortures, and calumnies" for him and asking for a copy of a speech he was preparing. He replied to her own expressions of inadequacy that her greatest achievement was her ability to love him. He told Bowles of his desire to be "all over you, and up and down you, and in and out." Near the end of their conversation they played with the word "tit," referring both to her anatomy and a button on the telephone.

Destined to be ruler of a land that has produced great bards, Charles attempted his own poetic conceits. Lovelorn English poets of the past have expressed the desire to be a glove upon their lady's hand, the falcon that lights upon her shoulder, or even a flea within her garments. However, Charles outdid them all, telling Bowles that he would like to live inside her trousers, but that it would be his luck to be reincarnated as a tampon to be flushed down her lavatory. They then agreed that to come back as an entire box of tampons would be a better fate for him.

The prince's slightly hesitant but well-enunciated speech was known throughout England, and the more voluptuous low register of Bowles's voice also was easily identified by a listening eavesdropper. Considerable mystery still surrounds the origin of the tape, which would later become a major embarrassment to the British monarchy. Amateur scanners during the decade of the 1980's found it relatively easy to listen in on personal conversations, and when the identity of these special parties became clear, one unseen listener realized his or her rare fortune. The tapes were later carefully analyzed by the journals that would publish the transcripts, and their authenticity was never denied even by the principals themselves.

The scandal, however, did not break until January 13, 1993, when New Idea, an Australian women's magazine, revealed the existence of the tapes. The scoop was soon picked up by avid media around the world, to the extreme embarrassment of the lovers, their families, and the entire British government. Meanwhile, the general public savored the melodrama. Jokers started referring to the heir to the British throne as "the royal tampon," and London shop girls began asking their pharmacists for a "box of Prince Charlies."

Bowles already was an object of disdain to the millions of admirers of Princess Diana, who had earlier revealed her husband's adulterous relationship to journalists. Diana's designation of Bowles as "the Rottweiler" was repeated in the press, along with bewilderment that the prince would reject his beautiful wife, a beloved woman the world over, in favor of one they described as "plain and middle aged." Even Charles's father, Prince Phillip, is said to have told Diana that nobody in his right mind would prefer Bowles to her.

Bowles knew that loyalty to the prince had its price. She already had been deluged with hate mail, forced to change her telephone numbers, and been pelted with bread rolls when she attempted to do her grocery shopping. With the publication of the telephone conversation, matters came to a head. Andrew Parker Bowles, a tolerant husband who had his own long-time mistress, soon concluded it was time for a divorce. Princess Diana, whose personal life by this time was not above reproach and who had to endure the embarrassing revelation of some of her own telephone conversations with a lover, realized that her marriage was effectively over as well.

IMPACT

Celebrity journalism flourished in the last decades of the twentieth century. Accounts of the deeds and misdeeds of popular entertainers, royalty, and even U.S. presidents sold magazines and newspapers. Respect for privacy, previously enjoyed by royalty, disappeared. While Queen Elizabeth II had always behaved with decorum and dignity, the escapades of her children provided a national melodrama for the entire world. Servants were paid for inside stories, and royal vacations were plagued by paparazzi. Though divorce had been verboten in the established Church of England since the traumatic times of King Henry VIII, it was now deemed preferable to the continuing scandal.

After their divorces, Bowles and Charles started living openly at Highgrove House, one of Charles's favorite residences. Gradually the two started appearing together at social and charitable events, preparing the British people for eventual acceptance of their relationship. After the death of Queen Elizabeth, the Queen Mother, Clarence House became the prince's choice residence in London, and Bowles made herself at home there. Though she had never shown much interest in fashion, being more comfortable in a riding habit, she acquired a new polish and an expensive wardrobe of designer dresses.

The untimely death of Princess Diana in 1997 in a Paris car crash, one year after her divorce was final, sparked nationwide, indeed international, mourning. During this time, Bowles stayed out of public view. Charles was now free to remarry in the Church of England, though not to Bowles, who earlier had been divorced. This placed the prince, destined to be the head of the church upon assuming the throne, in an awkward position. With the help of his family and church dignitaries, a compromise was finally reached. On April 9, 2005, the couple were legally married in the town hall at Windsor, followed by a lavish blessing in Windsor Chapel conducted by the archbishop of Canterbury before families and friends. For romantics not still enthralled by the glamorous Princess Diana, this was a satisfying resolution for a man and woman who had been devoted to each other for thirty years, though separated in youth by status and circumstance.

Now designated the duchess of Cornwall, Bowles continued to support her husband in state visits and other royal engagements. She received his future subjects graciously, though never upstaging him as Diana had frequently done. It seemed only a matter of time before Bowles would be fully accepted as Charles's "proper" spouse and eventually, perhaps when they were both advanced in years, as queen of England on a throne by his side.

—Allene Phy-Olsen

FURTHER READING

- Brown, Tina. The Diana Chronicles. New York: Doubleday, 2007. Even while focusing on Princess Diana, Brown provides unique information about the Parker Bowles family and the love triangle in Prince Charles's first marriage.
- Graham, Caroline. Camilla and Charles: The Love Story. London: John Blake, 2006. A favorable portrait of Bowles, by her leading biographer. A gossipy read that seems to be well supported by facts.
- Paxman, Jeremy. On Royalty: A Very Polite Inquiry into Some Strangely Related Families. New York: PublicAffairs, 2006. A serious exploration of the institution of royalty, with some insightful attention to the late twentieth century problems plaguing the House of Windsor.
- Wilson, Christopher. Charles, Camilla, and the Legacy of Diana. New York: Citadel Press, 2002. Explores the coupling of Charles and Bowles through almost thirty years and the relationship's impact on the tragedy of Princess Diana's life and untimely death.

SEE ALSO: Dec. 10, 1936: King Edward VIII Abdicates to Marry an American Divorcée; Mar. 2–Sept. 25, 1963: John Profumo Affair Rocks British Government; Oct. 14, 1983: British Cabinet Secretary Parkinson Resigns After His Secretary Becomes Pregnant; July 25, 1987: Novelist-Politician Jeffrey Archer Wins Libel Trial Against the Daily Star; Aug. 23, 1992: Princess Diana's Phone Conversation with Her Lover Is Made Public; Sept. 24, 1992: British Cabinet Member David Mellor Resigns over Romantic Affair; Jan. 5, 1994: British Cabinet Member Resigns After Fathering a Child Out of Wedlock; Aug. 31, 1997: Princess Diana Dies in a Car Crash; Sept. 28, 2002: British Politician Reveals Her Affair with Prime Minister John Major; Jan. 21, 2006: British Politician Resigns After Gay-Sex Orgy; Apr. 26, 2006: Britain's Deputy Prime Minister Admits Affair with Secretary.

January 18, 1990WASHINGTON, D.C., MAYOR MARION BARRY IS ARRESTED FOR DRUG USE

Marion Barry was a controversial Washington, D.C., mayor. During his first term, he was arrested in an FBI sting operation after he was captured on a surveillance camera smoking crack cocaine with a former girlfriend. After serving a six-month jail term, Barry was reelected to political office. The videotape of Barry smoking crack and yelling obscenities caused a sensation when it was repeatedly broadcast on television.

LOCALE: Washington, D.C.CATEGORIES: Law and the courts; corruption; drugs; government; politics; public moralsKEY FIGURES

Marion Barry (b. 1936), mayor of Washington, D.C., 1979-1991, 1995-1999

Rasheeda Moore (fl. 1990's), Barry's former girlfriend

Wanda King (fl. 1990's), FBI special agent

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Marion Barry, the mayor of Washington, D.C., had been suspected of possessing and using drugs since the early 1980's. Previous efforts by law enforcement to indict him had failed, but his luck eventually ran out. On January 18, 1990, the mayor was caught smoking crack cocaine with former girlfriend Rasheeda Moore in a sting operation conducted by the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI). He was arrested, convicted of possession and use of narcotics, and sentenced to six months in federal prison. Upon his release from prison, he was elected to a second term as mayor in 1994.

On the day of the arrest, Moore had telephoned Barry's office several times between 6:00 and 6:25 P.M. His secretary picked up the phone on Moore's last attempt to reach him and informed her that the mayor had already left the office but had taken Moore's phone number with him. Soon after Moore's final call, Barry telephoned Moore, who invited him to her room at the Vista International Hotel. She told Barry that she was in town visiting from Los Angeles with a friend and that they wanted to see him. That "friend" was FBI special agent Wanda King, undercover for this assignment as Wanda Moore.

Barry agreed to stop by the hotel after taking care of some city business (a drawing for a housing lottery program). He insisted on meeting Moore in the hotel lobby instead of in her room. This change of plans required quick thinking on the part of the agents running the sting operation. Three video cameras and microphones had been placed in room 727, where Moore was waiting for Barry. For the sting to work, Barry had to be coaxed to the room. Moore was instructed to ask Barry once again to meet her in her room and to tell him that she had ordered room service. Barry called Moore after he was finished with his mayoral duties. Although Barry first protested her request to meet in her room, he finally agreed to do so.

At 7:35, Barry entered room 727, greeted Moore's friend Wanda (Agent King) with a handshake, and then hugged Moore. Wanda left the room so that the former lovers could reconnect. Barry and Moore drank cognac, watched television, and talked. Barry then tried to talk Moore into having sex, and he groped her several times. She refused his advances and steered the conversation to drug use. They both agreed that they wanted some cocaine, but neither had the drug on hand. The banter about sex and drugs continued for some time, until Wanda telephoned to let them know she was returning to the room. Upon her return she pulled Moore into the bathroom, telling her she had drugs for them to buy. Barry offered to buy the drugs for $100 and Moore returned to the bathroom with the money, "bought" the cocaine, and returned to the bedroom with two $30 packets of crack cocaine. Barry told Moore that he no longer smoked crack and asked if Wanda had some powder cocaine.

Moore went back into the bathroom to discuss the situation with Wanda.

Believing the operation was now a failure, Wanda left the room, leaving Moore and Barry. Moore suggested to Barry that they leave the hotel. She, too, thought the setup had failed. Barry then asked what drugs Moore had purchased. When she indicated that she did not buy anything, Barry told her to “go get some.” Moore found Wanda in the hallway and asked her if she could get some powder cocaine. Wanda said that she could, but that it would take about an hour to find some.

After Wanda left, Barry asked Moore for a crack pipe. Even though he had used crack before, he appeared to fumble with the pipe. He asked Moore to get it ready and then insisted she take the first hit, possibly to try to determine if she was setting him up. Moore refused, saying that crack made her nervous and hyperactive and that she was going to wait for the powder cocaine. In the meantime, Barry prepared the pipe and took two successive hits. He then drank the rest of his cognac and suggested they go downstairs to the lobby. In an attempt to stall their departure, Moore began cleaning up the evidence. Barry called his bodyguards, who had been notified (and quieted) by the FBI of the sting operation, to alert them that he was departing for the lobby. At that point, agents and officers from the FBI and Metropolitan Police Department of Washington, D.C., entered room 727 from an adjacent room and arrested Barry for possession and use of illegal drugs. Barry insisted that he did not have any drugs on his person and that he had not been using drugs. He began to verbalize his dismay about his decision to visit Moore in her hotel room, saying that he had been set up. “I’ll be goddamn. Bitch set me up” is an oft-quoted line, attributed to Barry, from the sting operation transcript.

Barry was escorted from the hotel room discretely by service elevator, taken to FBI headquarters, fingerprinted, and photographed. As a courtesy, Mayor Barry was booked there instead of the central booking office in Washington, D.C. He also provided a urine sample (which later tested positive for marijuana, cocaine, and alcohol). Barry resigned as mayor and served six months in federal prison.

IMPACT

Barry’s arrest and conviction were not as scandalous as his reelection to city office after serving time in prison. The sting operation leading to Barry’s arrest interrupted but did not end his political career. He was elected to the Washington, D.C., city council in 1992 and elected to a second term as mayor in 1994. His success, after such public display of his shortcomings, may be due in part to where he served as mayor and councilman. Most residents of Washington, D.C. are African Americans. Barry, who is also African American, was well liked by those he represented.

As a councilman, Barry represented ward 8, an area that comprises mostly lower-income residents and is riddled with crime and violence. The residents of ward 8 perhaps felt connected to him because they believed he shared their struggles as racial minorities. Barry was well-educated (he had a master's degree in organic chemistry from Fisk University), but he lived in the jurisdiction he represented, a working-class area whose residents were not well-educated. These factors gave him immense credibility and ultimately led to his ability to turn a scandalous situation, a career-ending situation in most cases, into a positive to further his political career.

Washington, D.C., mayor Marion Barry in 1996. (AP/Wide World Photos)

—Eileen M. Ahlin

FURTHER READING

Agronsky, Jonathan I. Z. Marion Barry: The Politics of Race. Latham, N.Y.: British American, 1991. An overview of Marion Barry's life in the context of racial politics. Also examines the FBI sting and the minimal public scandal.

Barras, Jonetta Rose. The Last of the Black Emperors: The Hollow Comeback of Marion Barry in the New Age of Black Leaders. Baltimore: Bancroft Press, 1998. Journalist Barras examines Marion Barry's political comeback and his adoration by constituents and other supporters, and attempts to answer questions about his paradoxical life.

Gillette, Howard, Jr. "Protest of Power in Washington, D.C.: The Troubled Legacy of Marion Barry." In African-American Mayors: Race, Politics, and the American City, edited by David R. Colburn and Jeffrey S. Adler. Chicago: University of Illinois Press, 2001. Examines Marion Barry's political career. Provides an overview of various scandals occurring during his terms in office.

Kellerman, Barbara. Bad Leadership: What It Is, How It Happens, Why It Matters. Boston: Harvard Business School Press, 2004. A study of the scandals involving several leaders from throughout the world. Considers Marion Barry "intemperate" and lacking in self-control.

SEE ALSO: Dec., 1904: Boston Alderman Is Re-elected While in Jail for Fraud; June 13, 1907: San Francisco Mayor Schmitz Is Found Guilty of Extortion; Apr. 15, 1981: Janet Cooke Admits Fabricating Her Pulitzer Prize-Winning Feature; Dec. 6, 2005: Spokane, Washington, Mayor Recalled in Gay-Sex Scandal.

March, 1990

MENENDEZ BROTHERS ARE ARRESTED FOR MURDERING THEIR PARENTS

Erik and Lyle Menendez murdered their parents with the blasts of two shotguns. The media went into a frenzy, first believing the murders were part of a mob hit, but after the brothers used battered child syndrome as their defense, the media could not be stopped in its incessant coverage. The transformation of a murder trial into media spectacle and entertainment raised questions about the impact of increasing media coverage on the justice system in the United States. The brothers were finally convicted in a second trial, but this time without cameras inside the courtroom.

LOCALE: Van Nuys, California

CATEGORIES: Communications and media; publishing and journalism; law and the courts; murder and suicide; public morals

KEY FIGURES

Lyle Menendez (b. 1968), son of Jose and Kitty Menendez

Erik Menendez (b. 1971), son of Jose and Kitty Menendez

Jose Menendez (1944-1989), father of Erik and Lyle Menendez

Kitty Menendez (Mary Louise Anderson; 1941-1989), mother of Erik and Lyle Menendez

SUMMARY OF EVENT

On the evening of August 20, 1989, Kitty and Jose Menendez were relaxing in their Beverly Hills home. Kitty was reviewing her son Erik's application to the University of California, Los Angeles, and Jose was having a snack while watching television. Later in the evening, Erik, age eighteen, and his brother Lyle, age twenty-one, each carrying a shotgun, entered the room where both parents were sitting and shot them to death. Before they called police to report the murders, the brothers concocted an elaborate cover-up. They told police that they had been out for the evening and found their parents' bodies when they got home.

Officials might never have discovered the truth if Lyle Menendez had not confessed the killings to his therapist, Jerome Oziel, in October, 1989. Oziel said that the brothers threatened to kill him and his family if he ever told of the confession. Out of fear, he taped their sessions. California law permits therapists to report to officials confidential material obtained from patients if that patient threatens violence against him- or herself or another person. Oziel felt justified in reporting the confession and providing the tapes to law enforcement. In March of 1990, the brothers were arrested and charged with the murders of their parents. Lyle was arrested close to his home on March 8 and Erik, arriving from a trip to Israel, was arrested at Los Angeles International Airport on March 11. They were indicted on December 8, 1992.

A Cuban refugee, Jose Menendez arrived in the United States at the age of sixteen and stayed with friends of his family until he married Kitty at the age of nineteen. After earning a degree in accounting from Queens College in Flushing, New York, he worked as an accountant in Manhattan and as a controller for a shipping company in Chicago before taking a position with Live Entertainment in California. He was a driven person, a hard worker who expected excellence from himself and his family. The police, believing his murder could have been a mob hit, did not immediately consider the brothers as suspects, even though the two had gone on a spending spree after the death of their parents and did not exhibit normal signs of mourning.

Lyle Menendez, left, and brother Erik Menendez in a Santa Monica, California, court on August 6, 1990. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Several circumstances, however, soon pointed to the brothers as suspects: Lyle and Erik were the sole beneficiaries of the family's fourteen-million-dollar estate and had been using the money after the deaths of their mother and father to buy expensive items. Also, Erik had written a screenplay with a plot that was similar to the murders, and a shotgun shell was found in a pocket of a jacket owned by Lyle. The brothers remained in jail for almost three years before their trial began, while the courts debated, among other things, the admissibility of the testimony of the brothers' therapist and the therapist's taped sessions. The media covered every possible angle of the case to keep the trial in the public view, interviewing anyone even remotely involved with the Menendez family.

The trial itself was unusual. To save money for the state, the brothers were tried together but each had his own jury. Each time testimony or evidence was presented regarding one brother only, the jury of the brother not under discussion had to leave the courtroom. At trial, the Menendez brothers did not deny murdering their parents, but they alleged they shot them because they feared for their lives. The basis for their defense was battered child syndrome. Erik and Lyle told horror stories of emotional and sexual abuse that included forced oral sex, sodomy with a toothbrush, and even rape by both parents. Their parents were overly demanding, impossible to please, and forceful, even to the point that Lyle was ordered to wear a wig to hide his appearing baldness. The brothers said that they thought their parents had planned to kill them on the day before the murders, when the family had gone shark fishing.

IMPACT

The Menendez brothers' murder trials were two in a long line of high-profile cases that saw an increase in sensational media coverage, especially coverage using video cameras. What became scandalous in this case were not the murders but the behavior of the media and those working to transform the trials into entertainment.

The press obsessively followed the case from beginning to end, making it one of the most media-saturated trials in American history. Court TV, a new cable network series, covered the trial live. Attorneys and witnesses made dramatic statements outside the courtroom, knowing they would appear on national television. News reports and tabloid stories ranged from slightly factual to outright fantastical. Because of the widespread coverage, the court had to screen more than eleven hundred prospective jurors before the case opened. Most of the prospective jurors had heard at least something about the murders, and some even admitted they had formed an opinion about the guilt or innocence of the brothers.

The scandalous behavior of the media included physical disagreements over the twelve seats in the courtroom allotted for the press. Fights broke out over who would be sitting in those seats. Outside the courtroom the media gathered in a circus-like atmosphere, focusing on everyone even remotely associated with the proceedings. Even vendors pitched their products outside the court building. Agents made book deals and spoke about possible films. As the trial progressed, media pundits discussed the case in the hope of making their own book deals.

The chaos continued through the trial, which ended with hung juries and a declared mistrial. The brothers were tried again beginning in October, 1995, but this time, with one jury and in a courtroom without cameras; they were found guilty of first-degree murder on March 20, 1996. Each was sentenced to two consecutive life terms without parole. Partly because of the Menendez case, the courts began to increasingly enforce a ban on cameras and limit the number of reporters authorized to cover cases from the courtroom.

—Elizabeth Gaydou-Miller

FURTHER READING

Cleahane, Diane, and Nancy Grace. Objection! How High-Priced Defense Attorneys, Celebrity Defendants, and a 24/7 Media Have Hijacked Our Criminal Justice System. New York: Hyperion Books, 2005. Examines the effect of media sensationalism and instant celebrity—of defendants, attorneys, and others—on the American justice system.

Fox, Richard L., Robert W. van Sickel, and Thomas L. Steiger. Tabloid Justice: Criminal Justice in an Age of Media Frenzy. 2d ed. Boulder, Colo.: Lynne Rienner, 2007. Compares public opinion with several high-profile trials. Contains tables outlining changes in media coverage over time. Includes results of an extensive survey on media practices.

Runyon, William. "Bad Press." Los Angeles Maga- zine, November, 1993. The author discusses the offensive and scandalous behavior of the media covering the Menendez brothers trials.

Scott, Gini Graham. "When Rich Kids Kill." In Homicide by the Rich and Famous: A Century of Prominent Killers. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 2005. A look at acts of murder by the children of the rich and famous. Rich kids are an understudied demographic, especially in crime literature.

Thornton, Hazel. Hung Jury. The Diary of a Menendez Juror. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1995. A juror from the first trial discusses the case. Includes a time line. A unique look at the case from a person not affiliated with the media.

SEE ALSO: Mar. 21, 1976: Actor Claudine Longet Kills Ski Champion Vladimir Sabich; July 23, 1978: Utah Millionaire Is Murdered by His Grandson; Mar. 10, 1980: Scarsdale Diet Doctor Is Killed by His Lover; Dec. 22, 1984: Subway Vigilante Bernhard Goetz Shoots Four Black Youths; May 19, 1992: Amy Fisher Shoots Mary Jo Buttafuoco; June 12, 1994: Double Murder Leads to Sensational O. J. Simpson Trial; Aug. 16, 1996: Belgian Media Reveal How Police Bungled Serial Murder Case; Dec., 2000: Sexual Abuse of Children in France Leads to the Outreau Affair; Apr. 30, 2001: Washington Intern Chandra Levy Disappears.

August 27, 1990

GUINNESS FOUR ARE FOUND GUILTY OF SHARE-TRADING FRAUD

In 1990, the chief executive officer of Guinness and three other officials in the British brewery company were found guilty of accounting fraud and theft for inflating the price of company shares as part of a strategy to defeat a hostile takeover bid of Distillers Co., which Guinness wanted to obtain itself. The so-called Guinness Four supplied millions of pounds to buy Guinness stock, thus driving up the price of company shares and making Guinness appear as a more attractive bidder for Distillers.

LOCALE: London, England

CATEGORIES: Law and the courts; corruption; banking and finance; business, trade and commerce

KEY FIGURES

Ernest Saunders (b. 1935), British businessman and chief executive officer of Guinness
Jack Lyons (1916-2008), British financier, department-store owner, and philanthropist
Gerald Ronson (b. 1939), British businessman and real-estate developer

Anthony Parnes (fl. 1980's), British millionaire stock broker

Ivan Boesky (b. 1937), American stock trader

SUMMARY OF EVENT

The Guinness Four trading-fraud scheme was scandalous on two counts. One, three wealthy businessmen conspired with the chief executive officer of Guinness brewery to buy a large number of shares of Guinness stock and thus boost the value of all company stock. Two, government authorities gathered and presented evidence at the trial of the four men in a manner that was later condemned by a higher court. The authorities had made several legal and procedural mistakes even before bringing the four to trial.

The Guinness-Distillers takeover story broke in 1986 during the insider-trading trial of American stock trader Ivan Boesky in an unrelated case. Many in London financial circles considered the behavior to be noncriminal; even more believed it was not even scandalous. Share-price manipulation was a common practice in the mid-1980's in both London and Wall Street financial circles.

The scheme involved the hostile takeover bid of Distillers Co., of Edinburgh, Scotland, a company that Guinness had plans to acquire itself. To ensure that Guinness would be the company that acquired Distillers, Chief Executive Officer Ernest Saunders contacted Jack Lyons, Gerald Ronson, and Anthony Parnes, all self-made wealthy businessmen, and asked for their help. The four conspirators supplied millions of pounds to buy Guinness stock, thus driving up the share price. This made Guinness appear as a more attractive bidder for Distillers. No evidence exists, however, to show that Saunders or the other three sought to benefit immediately by manipulating the share price of Guinness stock, but all four stood to make considerable profits at a later date if the multibillion-pound takeover came through. Guinness did manage to acquire Distillers, renamed United Distillers in 1987.

The Guinness Four, as they came to be called, included millionaire stock broker Parnes, who began his career in finance as an office boy. Lyons, a financier, department-store owner, and philanthropist, left school at the age of sixteen to work in his father's garment factory. Saunders's parents fled from the Nazis in Austria when Saunders was a baby and had to start life over again in England. Ronson, a real-estate developer, quit school at the age of fifteen to begin earning his own money. By dint of hard work, street smarts, and well-considered risk taking, the four independently acquired considerable personal wealth and social standing, both of which would increase if they could pull off the Guinness takeover of Distillers on their own terms.

Little, if any, evidence exists to suggest that Saunders and colleagues did anything out of the ordinary in the takeover. In the mid-1980's, stock ownership was still largely confined to institutions and wealthier individuals. The lifestyles of these individuals as well as their investment decisions were unfamiliar to ordinary people, many of whom envied the rich their successes and delighted more in their mistakes and downfalls.

Stock trading began to be computerized as well in the 1980's, but it was still quite possible to move around large amounts of money without leaving a trail of evidence or arousing suspicion. In the 1980's era of Reaganomics, under U.S. president Ronald Reagan and British prime minister Margaret Thatcher, making lots of money was celebrated, and no one closely examined the moneymaking process. Saunders, however, used company funds without the knowledge or permission of the Guinness board of directors, which caught the attention of company officials. It should be noted, though, that Guinness directors did not initiate the investigation into the actions of Saunders and his colleagues. Nor did the board call for charges to be brought against the four men.

Bringing the stock-trading scandal to the international stage, Saunders also had provided Boesky with millions of dollars to manipulate Guinness stock prices on the New York Stock Exchange. Boesky was the undisputed "king of greed" on Wall Street during the 1980's. He was the leader in insider trading, that is, using private information to make very lucrative, illegal investments. Like the Guinness Four, Boesky was not the only person on Wall Street using insider information for personal or client profit. He was, however, much more flamboyant and his trades much larger and more public than other traders. His obvious delight in flaunting stock-trading procedures attracted the attention of U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) investigators.

The SEC began investigating Boesky on charges of stock fraud. Boesky told the investigators that Saunders had been a business associate. This information was turned over to inspectors with the British Department of Trade and Industry (DTI), who opened an informal investigation into Saunders's activities. The Guinness Four cooperated with the DTI investigation.

On August 27, 1990, the Guinness Four were found guilty of false accounting and theft (and, for Saunders, conspiracy), fined millions of pounds, and sentenced to prison for up to four years. The defendants did not dispute their actions, but they argued that what they did was business as usual in the world of hostile takeovers. Many in financial circles agreed. The Guinness Four argued that takeovers often involved share-price manipulation, but to DTI investigators, this “business-as-usual” argument was irrelevant.

Shortly after the Guinness Four were convicted, suggestions began to surface in the media that the authorities investigated and prosecuted the four because Boesky, Saunders, and Lyons were Jewish and were first-generation wealthy businessmen. The Guinness Four immediately appealed their respective convictions and prison sentences. Parnes’s sentence was reduced to twenty-one months. Lyons was fined four million pounds in lieu of serving any prison time due to ill health. Ronson was fined five million pounds, but his sentence was reduced to six months. Saunders, the person in charge of the share-price manipulation, was originally sentenced to five years in prison, but his term was later reduced to thirty months and then to ten months. His attorney argued that Saunders suffered from dementia associated with Alzheimer’s disease. Saunders later claimed to have recovered from the disease, which, if true, would have been a modern medical miracle.

British prime minister John Major also seemed to side with the Guinness Four. Only reluctantly did he strip Lyons of his knighthood, while assuring him that his services to the United Kingdom, including his many charitable activities, were still deeply appreciated. Many of those charitable organizations continued to proudly display Lyons’s name as a major benefactor.

IMPACT

In 2001, the European Court of Human Rights (ECHR) ruled that the initial Guinness Four trial was unfair. The court found that information gathered in the course of the informal DTI investigation, in which defendants cooperated, should not have been used to bring criminal charges against the four. The four had essentially been forced to testify against themselves, a violation of the legal right to silence. The ECHR did not rule that the Guinness Four were innocent, only that their trial had been marked by legal and procedural mistakes.

The European parliament has since amended the law to make evidence obtained under any type of compulsion or in a civil investigation inadmissible in criminal proceedings. The Guinness Four were not acquitted, but the procedures for gathering evidence in possible stock-fraud cases changed. Despite repeated attempts, the convictions of the four were not formally overturned. Furthermore, the court refused their appeal for financial compensation on the grounds of procedural miscarriage of justice.

Guinness Four Guilty of Share-Trading Fraud

—Victoria Erhart

FURTHER READING

- Coenen, Tracy. Essentials of Corporate Fraud. Hoboken, N.J.: John Wiley & Sons, 2008. An introductory guide to the white-collar crime of corporate fraud, written by a forensic, or investigative, accountant.
- Davies, Peter. Current Issues in Business Ethics. New York: Routledge, 1997. Several case studies examine the relationship between individuals and businesses as well as the making of ethical and unethical decisions.
- Podgor, Ellen S., and Jerold H. Israel. White Collar Crime in a Nutshell. 3d ed. St. Paul, Minn.: West, 2004. Chapters on white collar crime and corporate fraud, written in a concise and accessible format. Includes a breakdown of securities fraud, tax fraud, corporate criminal liability, conspiracy, and bribery.
- Steger, Ulrich, and Wolfgang Amann. Corporate Governance. Hoboken, N.J.: Wiley, 2008. Using case studies, this text examines patterns of ethical and legal problems in corporate governance in both the United States and internationally. Governance concerns arise especially as companies try to boost the bottom line. Brief discussion of the Guinness Four share scandal.

SEE ALSO: Jan., 1913: British Prime Minister’s Staff Is Investigated for Insider Trading; Nov. 28, 1967: Investor Louis Wolfson Is Convicted of Selling Stock Illegally; May 2, 1984: E. F. Hutton Executives Plead Guilty to Fraud; 1985-1986: Westland Affair Shakes Prime Minister Thatcher’s Government; Jan. 15, 1988: ZZZZ Best Founder Is Indicted on Federal Fraud Charges; June, 1988-June, 1989: Insider-Trading Scandal Rocks Japanese Government; Mar. 29, 1989: Financier Michael Milken Is Indicted for Racketeering and Fraud; Dec. 2, 2001: Enron Bankruptcy Reveals Massive Financial Fraud; Sept. 3, 2003: Mutual Fund Companies Are Implicated in Shady Trading Practices; Mar.

5, 2004: Martha Stewart Is Convicted in Insider-Trading Scandal; Sept. 12, 2005: Westar Energy Executives Are Found Guilty of Looting Their Company.

November 19, 1990

LIP-SYNCHING DUO MILLI VANILLI LOSE GRAMMY AWARD

One of the most promising pop-music acts of the late 1980's, Milli Vanilli blended pop, soul, and rap into a unique and successful hybrid. However, the duo, Fab Morvan and Rob Pilatus, did not actually sing, causing a widespread scandal in the recording industry. The revelation not only caused sales of their album to plummet but also led to the revocation of the group's coveted 1990 Grammy Award for Best New Artist. A series of consumer lawsuits emerged from the scandal as well. The name "Milli Vanilli" remains associated with lip-synching and fraud in the music industry.

LOCALE: Los Angeles, California

CATEGORIES: Hoaxes, frauds, and charlatanism; music and performing arts; popular culture; radio and television

KEY FIGURES

Fab Morvan (b. 1966), French African model, dancer, singer, and songwriter

Rob Pilatus (1965-1998), German African model, dancer, and singer

Frank Farian (b. 1941), German music producer, singer, and songwriter

SUMMARY OF EVENT

The origins of pop group Milli Vanilli date back to an early 1988 studio project in Germany under the helm of producer Frank Farian. The initial recordings were cut by a team of professional vocalists and studio musicians, including Charles Shaw, John Davis, Brad Howell, Jodie Rocco, and Linda Rocco. In addition to lacking fame as singers, Farian's group lacked a marketable appeal, leading him to look for a pair of models capable of dancing and lip-synching to the songs on stage. After meeting Fab Morvan and Rob Pilatus at a Berlin dance club, he quickly handed them the keys to the musical project and christened the two Milli Vanilli.

During the middle of 1988, the group's debut disc All or Nothing (with Morvan and Pilatus on the cover) was released in Europe, inciting a craze on the dance circuit for the project's blending of pop, soul, and rap. The attention soon carried over into the United States, resulting in a deal with Arista Records and that album's new release in 1989 as Girl You Know It's True. The title track raced up the Billboard Hot 100 (to number 2) and was followed by singles "Baby Don't Forget My Number," "Girl I'm Gonna Miss You," and "Blame It on the Rain."

Despite the astounding sales figures (which eventually hit the seven-million sales mark in the United States), the group began to face growing skepticism. During a taping of an MTV special in the summer of 1989 in Connecticut, Morvan and Pilatus were "singing" the smash single "Girl You Know It's True" in concert when their backing track skipped repeatedly, much to the dismay of the performers. Critics picked apart the botched attempt at lip-synching. Another controversy came at the end of 1989, when Shaw claimed the pair did not actually sing on the album. He quickly retracted the claim after allegedly being bribed by Farian.

In either instance, fans did not seem to mind. They continued to purchase Girl You Know It's True (and all its corresponding singles releases) at a feverish pace, while voting in droves in polls for the American Music Awards (AMA). Milli Vanilli, in 1990, took home awards for Favorite Pop-Rock New Artist, Favorite Soul-R&B New Artist, and Favorite Pop-Rock Single (for “Girl You Know It’s True”). The music industry also took notice of the escalating adoration of the group, giving the duo a Grammy Award in 1990 in the Best New Artist category (beating out the Indigo Girls, Tone-Loc, Soul II Soul, and Neneh Cherry).

Given all the additional attention and lightning-fast ride to international fame, Morvan and Pilatus began developing excessive behaviors, including inflated egos and a party-hard mentality, often associated with musicians and other celebrities. Pilatus in particular received scorn for suggesting in an interview with Time magazine that Milli Vanilli was in the same elite category of musical innovators as Elvis Presley and Bob Dylan. Also, the duo tried to convince Farian that they should sing lead vocals in the studio on the next Milli Vanilli album.

The entertainers’ growing egos, coupled with media speculation, fueled Farian’s increasing frustrations and led to his November 12, 1990, admission that Milli Vanilli consisted of an act of two models who did not sing on the hit album. As expected, reporters jumped on the fraud story and turned the disgraced pop group into international tabloid material. Milli Vanilli faced an even bigger disappointment one week later, on November 19, when the National Academy of Recording Arts and Sciences, which presents the annual Grammy Awards, revoked the duo’s coveted Best New Artist Award, exposing all involved to even more public humiliation. Michael Greene, the academy’s president, said that academy trustees, who voted to revoke the award, “were just livid about the situation.”

Critics came out in full force to condemn the band with insults, also suggesting the prefabrication and subsequent cover-up served as the ultimate mockery of the music industry. Fans also responded negatively to the revelation, immediately ceasing their radio station requests and sending the Girl You Know It’s True album into a sales stall. Arista Records also acted adversely, voiding its recording contract with Milli Vanilli, deleting the CD from its catalog, and forcing the title to go out of production. The album then ranked as the top former-best-selling album to be taken from store shelves.

A flurry of lawsuits, more than two dozen, followed. One of the more famous lawsuits was a class-action suit representing more than one thousand people seeking refunds after purchasing Milli Vanilli albums and singles. The following year, a similar suit was filed in Chicago, followed by several others seeking compensation. On August 28, 1991 (after intense legal wrangling), a settlement allowed those who purchased a record or a concert ticket to be eligible for refunds, as long as claims were filed before March 8, 1992.

Even with the negative publicity, Farian attempted to redeem himself, releasing 1991’s follow-up album The Moment of Truth (recorded before the scandal) by the newly minted The Real Milli Vanilli. Fans in the United States were still indignant at the previous deceit, so the album was released in Europe only. Morvan and Pilatus attempted to clean up their part of the scandal recording as Rob & Fab. They released an album in 1993, but it was a commercial and critical failure.

Rob Pilatus, left, and Fab Morvan, best-known as the pop duo Milli Vanilli, show off their Grammy Awards in February, 1990. The awards were taken from them after it was revealed Pilatus and Morvan had lip-synched their work. (AP/Wide World Photos)

In early 1998, Morvan and Pilatus tried using the Milli Vanilli name one more time, recording Back and in Attack, but the pair never had the chance to prove itself. On April 2, Pilatus was found dead in a Frankfurt, Germany, hotel room after consuming pills and alcohol. Morvan pursued a solo career, released a solo album, Love Revolution, in 2003, and even had production talks with Universal Pictures for a film about the group's rocky history. Milli Vanilli: Greatest Hits was released in 2007.

IMPACT

The ultimate music industry disgrace is being stripped of a Grammy Award. Widely cited as one of the most shocking and embarrassing moments in music history is Milli Vanilli's loss of its Grammy for fraud. Also, the scandal has been analyzed as an instance of greed at the expense of originality and artistry, and is cited as an example of the significance of marketing to commercial success for a singer or band; some claim that marketability and appeal are more critical than actual musical talent.

Though lip-synching is not new to the music industry, the Milli Vanilli scandal marked the first time the deception was employed on such a massive scale. Lip-synching is generally accepted during televised performances, but the duo crossed an ethical line because "singers" Morvan and Pilatus were not simply lip-synching their own recorded vocals; rather, they claimed to be original singing artists—which they were not—who were lip-synching their own work.

—Andy Argyrakis

FURTHER READING

Brackett, Nathan, and Christian Hoar, eds. The New Rolling Stone Album Guide. New York: Simon & Schuster, 2004. Includes brief reviews and ratings of Milli Vanilli's music. Also includes a short biographical synopsis of the duo.

Romanowski, Patricia, and Holly George-Warren, eds. The New Rolling Stone Encyclopedia of Rock & Roll. New York: Fireside, 1995. A factual summary and critical assessment of the Milli Vanilli scandal, starting with the group's rise to fame to its demise.

Torassa, Ulysses. "Suit Seeks Refunds for Ohioans Who Bought Milli Vanilli Album." Plain Dealer, November 22, 1990. Reports on the initial class-action lawsuit by fans in Ohio who sought refunds for buying a fraudulent album.

SEE ALSO: Feb. 8, 1960: U.S. Congress Investigates Payola in Pop Music Industry; Sept. 1, 1976: Former Beatle George Harrison Loses Plagiarism Lawsuit; Apr. 22, 1986: Faith Healer Peter Popoff Is Exposed as a Fraud.

March 30, 1991WILLIAM KENNEDY SMITH IS ACCUSED OF RAPE

A nephew of U.S. president John F. Kennedy and Senators Robert F. and Ted Kennedy, William Kennedy Smith was accused of raping a woman he had met at a bar in Palm Beach, Florida. After a sensational criminal trial, Smith was acquitted of the charge. The case led to debate over the anonymity given to Patricia Bowman by news stations televising the trial and whether that anonymity, in general, perpetuates the idea that being raped is shameful.

LOCALE: Palm Beach, FloridaCATEGORIES: Law and the courts; publishing and journalism; sex crimes; women's issuesKEY FIGURES

William Kennedy Smith (b. 1960), physician
Patricia Bowman (b. 1961), Smith's accuser
Michelle Cassone (b. 1964), Bowman's friend, and a waitress and bartender

SUMMARY OF EVENT

William Kennedy Smith, part of a prominent family in American politics, joined a long line of other Kennedy men involved in scandals including promiscuity, extramarital affairs, and even death by drowning. In March, 1991, Smith was accused of raping Patricia Bowman in Palm Beach, Florida, at the nearby Kennedy family compound. After a heavily publicized and sensational trial, he was acquitted of the charge.

Over Easter weekend, the thirty-year-old Smith was in Palm Beach with his uncle, U.S. senator Ted Kennedy, and his cousin, Patrick Kennedy (Ted's son). On the evening of March 30, the three went to the local bar, Au Bar, where Smith met twenty-nine year old Patricia Bowman, a single mother. Patrick began talking with another woman, Michelle Cassone. After consuming drinks, the two cousins and Bowman and Cassone left the bar for the nearby oceanfront beach house owned by the Kennedy family.

At the Kennedy property, Patrick and Cassone drank wine and talked while Smith and Bowman walked along the beach. Bowman later told authorities that Smith took off his clothes and ran into the water, upsetting Bowman, who headed back to the house. As she began walking, Smith got out of the water and returned to the beach. Bowman said that Smith tackled her to the sand, called her a "bitch," and raped her. Bowman insisted that she tried to fight off Smith's attack and that she screamed "no." She told police that despite her pleas, Smith raped her.

After the incident on the beach, Bowman placed a call from the Kennedy compound to a friend, Anne Mercer, whom she asked to pick her up. Bowman and Mercer then drove to the Palm Beach police station, where Bowman reported the rape. Bowman was then taken to Humana Hospital for treatment. Police later indicated that they were "99 percent" certain that the evidence obtained at the hospital that night supported Bowman's claim of rape. She had bruises on her midsection that were consistent with a forceful attack. Furthermore, Bowman passed two separate polygraph tests. Based on Bowman's claim, the hospital report, and polygraph results, Smith was charged with second-degree sexual battery and misdemeanor battery.

The criminal trial began later that year, and both Bowman and Smith testified before a jury of four women and two men. Testimony began on December 2, and the trial was nationally televised. Judge Mary E. Lupo heard the case. Bowman testified that she and Smith had been walking on the beach, that Smith had been forceful, and that he had called her "bitch" when she protested his sexual advances. She said that Smith then raped her, even though she clearly told him no and told him to stop. Bowman also testified that after she told him he had raped her, his response was that no one would believe she was raped while at the Kennedy home, let alone that she was at the home in the first place. Thinking ahead about the consequences of her accusations, Bowman took a family urn and notepad from the mansion as evidence that she was at the Kennedy estate. The defense attorneys later tried to use this against Bowman, portraying her as a common criminal who could not be trusted.

Prosecutors tried to present testimony from three women who said they were assaulted by Smith—one was assaulted in 1983, a second in 1988, and a third in 1991, the same year Smith allegedly raped Bowman. These attacks, however, had not been reported to the police. Furthermore, Florida law prohibits revealing a defendant's criminal history in a sex-related case as evidence in another case if the modus operandi in that prior case differed from the alleged crime in question. The defense, therefore, filed a motion to prevent the women's testimony. The court ruled that the prosecution in the Smith-Bowman trial failed to show how the previous three alleged attacks were relevant to the current case.

Smith recounted his version of the incident to the judge and jury, but it was a version very different from that of Bowman. The defense presented its case as consensual sex: Smith acknowledged that the couple engaged in sexual intercourse but he insisted that it was consensual. He testified that after they had sex, Bowman began to shake and cry. He did not dispute Bowman's testimony that she told Smith on the beach that he had just raped her. Smith said that during their rendezvous on the beach, he called Bowman by the wrong first name—Cathy, his former girlfriend's name. (Interestingly, during the trial, Bowman had mistakenly referred to Smith as Michael.) Smith said that his mistake infuriated Bowman. At this point, he said, she told him to get off of her and then slapped him. Smith contended that this slip of the tongue, calling Bowman by the name Cathy, led to Bowman's accusation of rape against Smith.

The jury agreed with the defense and believed Smith's version of what happened March 30. On December 23, after eighty minutes of deliberation, the jury returned a verdict of not guilty.

IMPACT

Had Smith's family not been famous, it is unlikely the media would have paid close attention to the case. However, it was the manner in which the trial was covered by the media that defines the scandal's impact and legacy. What led to heightened intrigue with this case was the anonymity given to Bowman by news stations. Bowman was never fully seen on television during the trial. The image of her face was concealed with a blurred, blue or grayish dot on the screen. The dot—and its effect on not only the case but also the issue of keeping alleged victims anonymous in rape cases—remains part of the trial's legacy.

William Kennedy Smith leaves court after his arraignment on May 31, 1991. He pleaded not guilty to charges of sexual battery. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Camera operators, photographers, and reporters gather outside the Palm Beach County courthouse during William Kennedy Smith's trial for sexual battery in December, 1991. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

Commentators questioned whether keeping Bowman anonymous to viewers really helped her in the public eye or made her into an object for sensational reportage. Some critics of media coverage of rape cases and trials argue that keeping rape victims—or alleged victims—anonymous adds a veil of shame to their victimization, that to keep that person's identity secret reinforces the idea that a raped woman (or man) is a shameful woman (or man). After the trial, however, Bowman appeared on ABC's Prime Time Live with Diane Sawyer so that she could speak about her experience without concealing her identity. She said she wanted to help other rape victims feel less afraid when confronting their attackers.

Rape cases are often difficult for prosecutors. An accuser's credibility and sexual history are often weighed more heavily than any material evidence presented at trial. Rape cases are difficult to prosecute also because the case most often depends on differing versions of the same event. Even when solid rape-kit evidence points to an alleged perpetrator, the testimony of the alleged victim and the alleged rapist often overrides this evidence. This he said-she said aspect to rape cases clearly played a part in the outcome of Smith's trial: the jury believed Smith but not Bowman. Smith's resources and his family's notoriety may have influenced the jury's verdict as well.

—Eileen M. Ahlin

FURTHER READING

Chancer, Lynn S. High-profile Crimes: When Legal Cases Become Social Causes. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2005. An account of the “polarizing” criminal cases of the 1980's and 1990's, including the Kennedy Smith trial. Examines “how these cases became conflated with larger social causes on a collective level” as well as “how this phenomenon has affected the law, the media, and social movements.”

Leamer, Laurence. Sons of Camelot: The Fate of an American Dynasty. New York: HarperCollins, 2004. Discusses the William Kennedy Smith rape trial, placing it in the context of numerous scandals and hardships faced by the Kennedy clan.

Matlock, Jann. “Scandals of Naming: The Blue Blob, Identity, and Gender in the William Kennedy Smith Case.” In Media Spectacles, edited by Marjorie Garber, Jann Matlock, and Rebecca L. Walkowitz. New York: Routledge, 1993. Discusses the media portrayal of Patricia Bowman in William Kennedy Smith’s criminal trial. Examines the effects of gender and class assumptions on the media’s coverage of the trial. Focuses mainly on Bowman’s anonymity.

Matoesian, Gregory M. Law and the Language of Identity: Discourse in the William Kennedy

Smith Rape Trial. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001. Examines the use of targeted language by the defense and prosecution in rape trials. Ties linguistics to law, gender, sexual identity, and power.

SEE ALSO: Early 1928: Joseph P. Kennedy Begins an Affair with Gloria Swanson; Feb. 7, 1960: President Kennedy’s Romantic Affair Links Him to Organized Crime; May 19, 1962: Marilyn Monroe Sings “Happy Birthday, Mr. President”; July 18, 1969: Senator Edward Kennedy’s Driving Accident Kills Mary Jo Kopechne; Oct. 7, 1974: Congressman Wilbur D. Mills’s Stripper Affair Leads to His Downfall; Feb. 1, 1978: Roman Polanski Flees the United States to Avoid Rape Trial; Nov. 28, 1987: Black Teenager Claims to Have Been Gang-Raped by Police Officers; July 1, 2003: Basketball Star Kobe Bryant Is Accused of Rape; Mar. 14, 2006: Duke Lacrosse Players Are Accused of Gang Rape.

April 5, 1991

GEORGE W. BUSH IS INVESTIGATED FOR INSIDER TRADING

George W. Bush, elected U.S. president in 2000, sold more than 200,000 shares of Harken Energy two months before the company announced a huge loss. This led to claims of insider trading against Bush, but a U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission investigation, which began in April, 1991, cleared him of wrongdoing.

LOCALE: Dallas, Texas

CATEGORIES: Law and the courts; business; corruption; banking and finance; government

KEY FIGURE

George W. Bush (b. 1946), oil-industry businessman and later governor of Texas, 1995-2000, and president of the United States, 2001-2009

SUMMARY OF EVENT

The large sums of money George W. Bush collected from his involvement with Harken Energy Corporation was one of the more controversial aspects of his life before his election as Texas governor in 1994. In 1986, Bush was the forty-year-old son of U.S. vice president George H. W. Bush (later president) and had little success of his own. His ventures in the oil industry were struggling. He had lost the election for a Texas congressional seat in 1978. His luck seemed to change, however, when he became involved with Harken Energy Corporation.

Harken, based at the time in Dallas, Texas, engaged in exploratory drilling at sites throughout the world. Like many speculative resource companies, it seemed better at self-promotion than at finding oil. Its oil wells were dry, it was loaded with debt, and it lost money most years. Its accounting practices were byzantine, which made it difficult to correlate its assets with its stock price. However, in 1986, it added a famous name to its roster—the younger Bush. Harken purchased Bush’s partly owned and failing Spectrum 7 oil company for $2.25 million. The buyout provided Bush with 212,000 Harken shares and additional stock options worth about $600,000, a position as a consultant to Harken paying between $80,000 to $120,000 a year from 1986 to 1993, and a membership on the Harken board of directors (with additional directors’ fees).

In 1986 and 1988, Bush borrowed $180,000 from Harken to purchase an additional 105,000 shares at favorable terms available to directors. However, Harken’s losses would continue. In 1989 the company lost over $12 million, and in 1990 it lost $40 million. Nevertheless, Harken was granted prime business opportunities, such as exclusive drilling rights in Bahrain along the Persian Gulf in 1990. Although deals such as this helped keep Harken in the financial news, the company was losing so much money its future was in jeopardy.

In the spring of 1990, Bush was considering selling some of his Harken stock to raise cash to participate in the purchase of the Texas Rangers baseball team. However, as he knew, he was required to obey federal laws that prohibit company insiders from profiting from private knowledge of a company. On May 17, Bush attended a special meeting of the Harken board of directors, in which the board was warned of Harken’s looming crisis. On June 6, Bush, as a member of Harken’s audit committee, received the company’s so-called flash report, which predicted a $4 million loss. It is important to note, however, that Bush was not a member of the executive committee that had access to most of Harken’s financial information.

WHAT IS “INSIDER TRADING”?

The U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission defines “insider trading” as follows:

“Insider trading” is a term that most investors have heard and usually associate with illegal conduct. But the term actually includes both legal and illegal conduct. The legal version is when corporate insiders—officers, directors, and employees—buy and sell stock in their own companies. When corporate insiders trade in their own securities, they must report their trades to the SEC. . . .

Illegal insider trading refers generally to buying or selling a security, in breach of a fiduciary duty or other relationship of trust and confidence, while in possession of material, nonpublic information about the security. Insider trading violations may also include “tipping” such information, securities trading by the person “tipped,” and securities trading by those who misappropriate such information. . . .

Because insider trading undermines investor confidence in the fairness and integrity of the securities markets, the SEC has treated the detection and prosecution of insider trading violations as one of its enforcement priorities. The SEC adopted new Rules 10b5-1 and 10b5-2 to resolve two insider trading issues where the courts have disagreed.

- Rule 10b5-1 provides that a person trades on the basis of material nonpublic information if a trader is “aware” of the material nonpublic information when making the purchase or sale. The rule also sets forth several affirmative defenses or exceptions to liability. The rule permits persons to trade in certain specified circumstances where it is clear that the information they are aware of is not a factor in the decision to trade, such as pursuant to a pre-existing plan, contract, or instruction that was made in good faith.
- Rule 10b5-2 clarifies how the misappropriation theory applies to certain non-business relationships. This rule provides that a person receiving confidential information under circumstances specified in the rule would owe a duty of trust or confidence and thus could be liable under the misappropriation theory.

On June 8, Sutro & Company stockbroker Ralph Smith offered to purchase Bush’s Harken shares on behalf of one of his clients. Bush promptly inquired of Harken’s general counsel about the suitability of his selling Harken stock and was given a memorandum, “Liability for Insider Trading and Short-Term Swing Profits,” which warned against any selling by insiders that could be in violation of insider-trading laws. On June 22, Bush sold 212,140 of his 317,152 shares of stock for $848,560—about $4.25 a share. Two months later on August 20, Harken announced an astronomical loss of $23 million for its second quarter. The price of its stock would soon fall to $1.25, a 75 percent decrease, although the stock would eventually rebound to the price at which it was sold at by Bush.

On April 5, 1991, the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) started an insider-trading investigation into the transaction, requesting several documents from Bush. Documents that were made public indicate that the SEC found that Bush was not well informed about the poor financial condition of Harken and, thus, did not sell his shares in anticipation of its pending losses. In addition, Bush had been approached first by Smith to sell his shares and he made no effort to conceal the transaction. Although Harken's price did fall 20 percent the day of the sale, it rebounded over the following days. Finally, Bush's failure to file certain SEC forms was found to be a minor violation. Thus, the SEC decided that it would not charge Bush with insider trading; and it would seem difficult in the light of the SEC investigation to claim that Bush violated the law. (The stock price of Harken would continue to fall over the following decade, and it lost hundreds of millions of dollars, eventually reaching penny stock status.)

IMPACT

Bush's sale of his Harken shares was perhaps the most important transaction of his business career to potentially threaten his political future. If the sale constituted insider trading, it could have resulted in criminal charges and would certainly have obstructed his presidential aspirations. The issue was raised again in the 2000 presidential campaign and during the early years of his presidency. The Enron scandal of 2001 raised issues of corporate greed and wrongdoing, and the Center for Public Integrity obtained numerous Harken and SEC documents relating to Bush's sale through the Freedom of Information Act of 1966. Bush's call for a new era of corporate integrity in the United States subjected his dealings to even closer scrutiny. With no official finding of wrongdoing, however, White House press secretary Ari Fleischer was able to defend the sale in a July 5, 2002, press briefing, and the issue faded from public view.

Although it seems clear that Bush did not violate the law, his involvement with Harken Oil does raise questions in this age of corporate scandals in which public corporations are often accused of being run for the benefit of their executives, directors, and insiders at the expense of workers and shareholders. The SEC conclusion that Bush did not fully understand the financial condition of Harken does excuse him from criminal liability but also raises questions about the lavish consulting and directing fees that he received for his services. Even if Harken were paying Bush for his name and business contacts and not for his expertise, such an arrangement is legal if no improper influence is exerted.

Although Harken's loan of $180,000 to Bush is reminiscent of the loans Bernard Ebbers received from WorldCom and the Rigas family from Adelphia Communications Corporation in later corporate scandals, it is clear that Bush broke no law in borrowing from Harken. Although the SEC in January, 1991, compelled Harken to restate its losses for 1989 from $3.3 million as reported to the $12.6 million it actually suffered, this accounting irregularity reflects poorly on Harken management, not on Bush. Certainly, with Harken's stock price in long-term decline, Bush seems to have been one of the few shareholders to have profited from association with that relentlessly unsuccessful company. Whether the profits Bush accrued constitutes unscrupulous corporate conduct or shrewd business trading depends in the end on one's view of America's corporate culture of the last two decades.

—Howard Bromberg

FURTHER READING

Fleischer, Ari. Taking Heat: The President, the Press, and My Years in the White House. New York: William Morrow, 2005. President Bush's first press secretary defends the president's commitment to fighting corporate fraud and criticizes reporters trying to turn Bush's Harken sale into a scandal.

Evins, Molly, and Lou Dubose. Bushwhacked: Life in

George W. Bush's America. New York: Random House, 2003. A chapter in this collection critical of Bush likens Harken to a miniature Enron scandal.

Kessler, Ronald. A Matter of Character: Inside the White House of George W. Bush. New York: Sentinel, 2004. In praising the strength of President Bush's character, Kessler defends Bush's relationship with Harken.

Minutaglio, Bill. First Son: George W. Bush and the Bush Family Dynasty. New York: Times Books, 1999. Includes the story of the Harken stock sale in the context of the business transactions of George H. W. Bush and George W. Bush.

Serwer, Andy. "W., President, Harken 38 [cents]." Fortune, August 12, 2002. An update on the dismal fortunes of Harken Oil from a leading financial magazine.

Unger, Craig. House of Bush, House of Saud: The Secret Relationship Between the World's Two Most Powerful Dynasties. New York: Scribner, 2004. An aggressive exposé by an investigative journalist of the financial relations between the Bush family and the Saudi oil princes. Unger finds shadowy links between Saudi Arabian interests and Harken business ventures.

SEE ALSO: Oct. 22, 1923: U.S. Senate Begins Hearings on Teapot Dome Oil Leases; Feb. 4, 1976: Lockheed Is Implicated in Bribing Foreign Officials; Nov. 13, 1986-May 4, 1989: Iran-Contra Weapons Scandal Taints Reagan's Administration; May 9, 2000: Former Louisiana Governor Edwin Edwards Is Convicted on Corruption Charges; Dec. 2, 2001: Enron Bankruptcy Reveals Massive Financial Fraud; Mar. 5, 2004: Martha Stewart Is Convicted in Insider-Trading Scandal; Sept. 8, 2004: 60 Minutes II Reports on George W. Bush's Evasion of Wartime Duty.

July 26, 1991

COMEDIAN PEE-WEE HERMAN IS ARRESTED FOR PUBLIC INDECENCY

Actor Paul Reubens achieved fame as the comedian Pee-wee Herman and had been ending his run as the popular host of his own children's television show, Pee-wee's Playhouse, when he was arrested for masturbating in an adult-movie theater in Sarasota, Florida. The incident attracted a great deal of media attention and condemnation of Reubens, which continued for more than a decade, but he later continued acting.

LOCALE: Sarasota, Florida

CATEGORIES: Sex crimes; public morals; radio and television

KEY FIGURES

Paul Reubens (Paul Rubenfeld; b. 1952), television and film entertainer best known as "Pee-wee Herman"

Judy Goldman (fl. 1990's), Sarasota County judge
Ronald Dresnick (fl. 1990's), defense attorney
Don Hartery (fl. 1990's), Sarasota County prosecutor

Larry Goldman (fl. 1990), publicity agent

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Paul Reubens, born Paul Rubenfeld, grew up in Sarasota, Florida, where at the age of eleven he began acting in local plays. While attending college, he continued to act and eventually joined the Groundlings, an improvisation troupe. Reubens created the Pee-wee Herman character in 1978 as part of his Groundlings night club act. In 1986, he became the host of the CBS Saturday morning children's show Pee-wee's Playhouse, which subsequently won numerous Emmy Awards. By the summer of 1991, the same time Reubens was arrested, however, the show had run its course, and CBS was airing the last of its reruns.

On the evening of July 26, 1991, Reubens, who was on a summer vacation visiting his parents in Sarasota, Florida, was suffering from boredom and decided to attend the screening of an X-rated movie at Sarasota's XXX-rated South Trail Cinema. During 1991, the Sarasota police had initiated a crack-down on "adult obscenity" intending to rid Sarasota of morality offenses. Detectives had been periodically visiting local adult movie theaters hoping to catch patrons indulging in indecent acts. While Reubens watched a porno film the Sarasota detectives were working undercover at the theater. As Reubens was exiting the Cinema at the conclusion of the movie the detectives arrested him for exposing his sexual organs in public.

Pee-wee Herman (Paul Reubens) in 1984. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

The indecent-exposure law allegedly violated by Reubens prohibited the exposure of sexual organs, except in places set aside for that purpose. Adult-movie theaters had not been designated as locations where sexual organs could be exposed. Local police claimed that Reubens had been caught masturbating during the porno film screening at the South Trail Cinema.

Reubens's mug shot depicts a scowling, long-haired, goateed figure wearing a tee shirt and shorts, the antithesis of the childlike and "nerdy" Pee-wee Herman character who was always nattily dressed in a too-small gray suit with a red bow tie, white socks, and slicked back hair. Reubens was released on $219 bail. Although local police may not at first have connected Reubens to Pee-wee Herman, Reubens told them who he was. The local media also figured out Reubens's identity through the police blotter. Soon, the national news media was in a frenzy over the star's arrest.

Media attention to the Reubens case created a chain reaction. Parents were concerned that their children had been exposed to immoral behavior watching Pee-wee's Playhouse. Moreover, adults did not know how to answer children's questions concerning the arrest of their beloved Pee-wee character. Many in the media and several celebrities supported Reubens and argued that the government had targeted Reubens because of his children's show. Several citizens in Sarasota publicly questioned whether prosecuting Reubens was the best use of taxpayers' money.

Despite claims by Reubens's publicity agent, Larry Goldman, that a videotape from a security camera in the theater would prove Reubens's innocence, no videotape evidence was ever produced. Reubens's defense attorney, Ronald Dresnick, also argued that the indecent exposure statute should not apply in adult-movie theaters, as exposure of sexual organs should be expected in such venues. Judy Goldman, the judge in the case, rejected the defense and ordered Reubens to face the charges.

Three and half months after Reubens's arrest, the actor entered a no contest plea on the charge of indecent exposure. (A no contest plea means that the person charged is neither admitting nor denying guilt.) Reubens also entered into a plea agreement with Sarasota County, which Judge Goldman reluctantly approved. Goldman decided that given the national media attention, which would increase with a trial, the wisest choice was to accept the plea and avoid further cost to the county. Had Reubens been found guilty of the misdemeanor charges, he could have been sentenced to one year in jail and received a one thousand dollar fine.

Reubens agreed to pay a $50 fine, $85.75 in court costs, and participate in community service by writing, producing, and paying for public service messages for the Partnership for a Drug-Free America. Judge Goldman believed that Reubens was receiving minor punishment and vowed to impose much harsher penalties if he failed to comply with the plea agreement. Reubens fulfilled the terms of the plea agreement, retired from the public stage, and maintained a low profile, but only for a time.

Sarasota County prosecutor Don Hartery also agreed to seal the legal documents in the case, which left Reubens with a clean criminal record, despite at least two previous arrests. During his younger years, Reubens had been arrested and charged with loitering near an adult theater and possessing marijuana. The loitering charge was later dropped, and a judge entered no finding of guilt in the marijuana possession case in exchange for two years' probation.

Reubens's legal troubles were not over, however. In 2002, he was charged in Los Angeles with a misdemeanor count for possession of material depicting children engaged in sex. Reubens was once again arrested—this time for a crime the prosecution claimed involved sexual exploitation of children. The material at issue included old magazines and photographs, some of nude persons, seized from Reubens's home in 2001. Reubens, who was out as gay, claimed the items seized were part of his vintage art collection and that he had legally purchased the nude pictures and magazine depictions that were now being labeled as child pornography.

Reubens's bail was set at twenty thousand dollars. He once again bargained to avoid a public trial and agreed to plead guilty to a misdemeanor obscenity charge. In 2004, the child pornography charges were dropped. He paid a fine of one hundred dollars and registered as a sex offender for three years.

IMPACT

The arrest of a children's show star for indecent exposure was big news in 1991. However, the media helped speed the demise of cult figure Pee-wee Herman, whose popularity had already begun to wane by the time of Reubens's 1991 arrest. After the arrest, CBS canceled the remaining reruns of Pee-wee's Playhouse, Disney canceled a short video of Pee-wee as part of its studio tours, and merchandisers discontinued the sale of Pee-wee Herman products. Reubens played the Pee-wee Herman character one more time at an MTV Music Video Awards show, and in 1988 he received a star on Hollywood's Walk of Fame.

Pee-wee Herman may have become the alter ego of Reubens, and Reubens may have been held to a higher standard because Pee-wee became the host of a children's show. Pee-wee, however, started out as an unusual, childlike character in a night club act, and Reubens never attempted to disguise Pee-wee's bad behavior, such as looking up women's dresses with mirrors glued to his shoes. In addition, as host of a children's show, Reubens, as Pee-wee, was never shy about poking fun at society's sexist and racial stereotypes.

Perhaps Reubens was singled out because of what he did—turn a childlike, adult entertainer into a beloved children's icon and use a children's show as a political platform. Supporters of Reubens believe that law enforcement targeted him to support its crackdown on adult obscenity through prosecutions and censorship. Reubens, however, may have the last word with the planned Pee-wee's Playhouse: The Movie.

—Carol A. Rolf

FURTHER READING

Buhle, Paul. From the Lower East Side to Hollywood: Jews in American Popular Culture. New York: Verso, 2004. Explores the contributions of Jewish entertainers to American film and television, including the work of Paul Reubens.

Ingraham, Laura. Power to the People. Washington, D.C.: Regnery, 2007. Examines Paul Reubens as one of America's bad boys who has been treated unfairly by law enforcement in its attempt to control obscenity.

Jenkins, Henry. The Wow Climax: Tracing the Emotional Impact of Popular Culture. New York: New York University Press, 2006. Considers the impact of vaudevillike personae such as Pee-wee Herman, despite their deemed-vulgar behavior, on modern pop-culture audiences.

Woods, Paul A. Tim Burton: A Child's Garden of Nightmares, Medford, N.J.: Plexus, 2007. Discusses how the early collaboration between Reubens and director Tim Burton on the film Pee-wee's Big Adventure (1985) affected Burton's career.

SEE ALSO: Feb. 6, 1942: Film Star Errol Flynn Is Acquitted of Rape; Nov. 23, 1946: Tennis Star Bill Tilden Is Arrested for Lewd Behavior with a Minor; July 18, 1988: Actor Rob Lowe Video-tapes Sexual Tryst with a Minor; June 27, 1995: Film Star Hugh Grant Is Arrested for Lewd Conduct; Sept. 22, 1997: Sports caster Marv Albert Is Tried for Sexual Assault; Apr. 7, 1998: Pop Singer George Michael Is Arrested for Lewd Conduct; Dec. 18, 2003: Pop Star Michael Jackson Is Charged with Child Molestation; July 28, 2006: Actor Mel Gibson Is Caught Making Anti-Semitic Remarks; June 13, 2008: Singer R. Kelly Is Acquitted on Child Pornography Charges.

October 11-13, 1991

JUSTICE CLARENCE THOMAS'S CONFIRMATION HEARINGS CREATE A SCANDAL

The confirmation hearings of U.S. Supreme Court nominee Clarence Thomas took a dramatic turn when a law professor Anita Hill accused Thomas of sexual harassment. The nation was riveted by the sensational allegations, which became the focus of a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing broadcast to the nation on network television.

ALSO KNOWN AS: Hill-Thomas scandal

LOCALE: Washington, D.C.

CATEGORIES: Law and the courts; women's issues; racism; government; politics; sex; radio and television; social issues and reform; communications and media

KEY FIGURES

Clarence Thomas (b. 1948), associate justice of the United States, 1991-

Anita Hill (b. 1956), American attorney and law professor

George H. W. Bush (b. 1924), president of the United States, 1989-1993

SUMMARY OF EVENT

In 1967, Thurgood Marshall, the famed former civil rights lawyer for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), became the first African American appointed to the position of justice of the United States. Marshall retired in 1991, leading Republican president George H. W. Bush to face a difficult political situation. While some within the Republican Party pressured him to continue Ronald Reagan's judicial legacy by nominating a conservative, the president did not want to be perceived as racist in denying the so-called black seat on the Court to an African American. As an opponent of racial quotas, however, Bush could not select someone solely on the basis of his or her race. However, Clarence Thomas, a jurist with solid conservative credentials, proved an ideal candidate; and he was black.

Bush believed Thomas's race would keep powerful civil rights groups from opposing the nomination. Furthermore, Thomas's ideology would satisfy the president's core constituency. On July 1,

Anita Hill testifies before the Senate Judiciary Committee on October 11, 1991. (AP/Wide World Photos)

1991, Bush nominated Thomas, indicating that race had “nothing to do” with his selection of Thomas.

Thomas was born into poverty, raised by his grandparents, and educated by Roman Catholic nuns in rural Pin Point, Georgia. He graduated with honors from Holy Cross College in 1971 and earned a law degree from Yale University in 1974. After a series of jobs with the federal government—including the Department of Education (DOE) and the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC), where Thomas, as chairman, often found himself at odds with civil rights groups—he was appointed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit in 1990.

The confirmation hearings began rather uneventfully before the Senate Judiciary Committee on September 10, 1991. The hearings, however, would not conclude that way. Thomas’s supporters emphasized his rags-to-riches story, his career as a governmental employee, and most important, his belief that a judge’s role was not to make decisions based upon personal opinions or interests, but rather to interpret and apply the choices made by the legislative and executive branches. Thomas’s opponents decried his perceived lack of qualifications: a limited career in law practice—only five years—and even less judicial experience—a mere eighteen months. Twelve members of the American Bar Association (ABA) Standing Committee on the Federal Judiciary declared Thomas to be “qualified,” two deemed him “not qualified,” and one member abstained. No one on the committee believed him to be “well qualified.” This was the lowest rating the committee had ever given a U.S. Supreme Court nominee.

Prominent interest groups criticized Thomas for failing to comprehend and appreciate the history and vestiges of racism. The NAACP, by a vote of 49-1, along with most civil rights organizations, formally opposed his nomination. Numerous senators disparaged him for his conservative judicial philosophy and affinity for natural law, to which, they believed, Thomas might subordinate constitutional principles. That philosophy, opponents feared, could result in a narrowing of abortion rights, affirmative action programs, and the constitutional role of the judiciary in relation to the elected branches of government.

During the hearings, Thomas ran from his record, playing down or disavowing previous statements on privacy rights, affirmative action, and other controversial topics. Though pressed repeatedly on abortion, Thomas claimed that he had “never” debated the 1973 case Roe v. Wade, one of the most controversial legal decisions of the twentieth century. For the most part, the administration’s confirmation strategy—to keep the focus on his race and his rags-to-riches story—shielded the nominee from a more searching criticism of his judicial philosophy.

The Senate Judiciary Committee vote was divided 7-7 on the nomination, which was then forwarded to the full Senate without a recommendation. Nevertheless, Thomas appeared on his way to confirmation until October 6, when a lurid and explosive allegation surfaced—that the nominee had sexually harassed Anita Hill, an attorney, law professor, and former subordinate of Thomas at the DOE and the EEOC. (A Senate Judiciary Committee staff member had leaked to the press Hill's affidavit to the Department of Justice accusing Thomas of sexual harassment.) After Thomas requested a delay so that the committee could investigate the allegations fully, the hearings reopened on October 11. This time, the Senate and the public paid serious attention to the hearings, which were broadcast nationally on network television.

Thomas testified first, categorically denying the allegations. Additionally, Thomas said that Hill had, after the alleged harassment, followed him from the DOE to the EEOC, asked him repeatedly for letters of recommendation, and contacted him by telephone on numerous occasions. Hill's testimony followed. She accused Thomas of pressuring her to accept his invitations to go out with him, and testified that while at work, Thomas would describe to her in detail acts he had seen in pornographic films, including women having sex with animals, group sex, rape scenes, and individuals with large penises and large breasts having sex. She testified that Thomas, in graphic detail, often would inform her of his "sexual prowess," which included a larger than average penis and a willingness to engage in oral sex.

Thomas responded the following day, once again denying the allegations. He characterized the accusations as resting on racial stereotypes, and described the committee hearings as a "circus," a "national disgrace," and a "high-tech lynching for uppity blacks."

A limited number of witnesses testified for both sides. Some supported Hill's testimony and others spoke in defense of Thomas, emphasizing his professionalism and integrity. In the end, the committee concluded the hearings without a determination as to the allegations. Regardless, the Senate confirmed Thomas by a vote of 52-48 on October 15, the closest vote ever for a successful Supreme Court nominee. Eleven Democrats joined forty-one Republicans in support of the nomination; two Republicans joined forty-six Democrats voting in opposition. On October 23,

THOMAS RESPONDS

At the evening session of the Senate Judiciary Committee hearing on the nomination of Clarence Thomas to the U.S. Supreme Court on October 11, 1991, Thomas responded to testimony that was presented against him by Anita Hill.

Senator, I would like to start by saying unequivocally, uncategorically, that I deny each and every single allegation against me today that suggested in any way that I had conversations of a sexual nature or about pornographic material with Anita Hill, that I ever attempted to date her, that I ever had any personal sexual interest in her, or that I in any way ever harassed her.

A second, and I think more important point, I think that this today is a travesty. I think that it is disgusting. I think that this hearing should never occur in America. This is a case in which this sleaze, this dirt, was searched for by staffers of members of this committee, was then leaked to the media, and this committee and this body validated it and displayed it at prime time over our entire nation. How would any member on this committee, any person in this room, or any person in this country, would like sleaze said about him or her in this fashion? Or this dirt dredged up and this gossip and these lies displayed in this manner? How would any person like it?

The Supreme Court is not worth it. No job is worth it. I'm not here for that. I'm here for my name, my family, my life, and my integrity. I think something is dreadfully wrong with this country when any person, any person in this free country would be subjected to this.

This is not a closed room. There was an FBI investigation. This is not an opportunity to talk about difficult matters privately or in a closed environment. This is a circus. It's a national disgrace. And from my standpoint as a black American, as far as I'm concerned, it is a high-tech lynching for uppity blacks who in any way deign to think for themselves, to do for themselves, to have different ideas, and it is a message that unless you kowtow to an old order, this is what will happen to you. You will be lynched, destroyed, caricatured by a committee of the U.S. Senate rather than hung from a tree.

Clarence Thomas, center, is sworn in as associate justice of the United States by Justice Byron White on October 23, 1991. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Thomas was sworn in as the 106th associate justice of the United States.

IMPACT

Public opinion on Thomas was closely divided even before Hill made her claims of sexual harassment. Nevertheless, it was widely believed that Thomas would be confirmed. Commentators speculated that some undecided senators, especially Democrats, would be reluctant to cast a vote against an African American who had lived a Horatio Alger-type life, achieving the American dream through hard work, determination, and education.

The allegations exacerbated an already existing division within the country and in the Senate. Supporters of Thomas were outraged at the media's stereotypical portrayal of him as a black man incapable of controlling his sexual appetite. Some depicted Hill as a vindictive, perhaps spurned, woman bent on destroying Thomas's career for personal, and perhaps even political, reasons. To Thomas's opponents, the allegations supported their claim that the nominee was unqualified, both professionally and personally, for the position. Many applauded Hill for her strong stand against sexual harassment, a stand that increased the nation's consciousness of harassment in the workplace. Linguist Robin T. Lakoff, in an article analyzing the discourse of the hearings, wrote that Hill's testimony forced the nation to define sexual harassment, to face sexual harassment as a serious legal issue, and to acknowledge that women have every right to define and discuss male behavior before a public audience.

The hearings were among the most extraordinary in the history of nominations to the Court. No previous hearings had included so much lurid and personally explosive accusations; nor had any past hearing garnered such media attention. As a result of the scandal, senatorial access to Federal Bureau of Investigation reports of judicial nominees is now limited.

Additionally, the hearings turned out to be the opening salvo for a number of sexual exposés during the 1990's, including that of President Bill Clinton in the Monica Lewinsky scandal, with both parties utilizing personal accusations to harm political opponents.

Thomas became one of the most widely recognized justices on the Supreme Court. This is true not because of his conservative judicial philosophy or decisions on the bench but rather for the accusations of sexual harassment that surfaced during his confirmation hearings.

—Richard A. Glenn

FURTHER READING

Brock, David. The Real Anita Hill. New York: Free Press, 1993. Unsympathetic portrait of Thomas's accuser, concluding that she was not truthful in her testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee. Author later recanted his research and thesis in this book, asserting that it was partially fabricated and meant to disgrace Hill.

Comiskey, Michael. Seeking Justices: The Judging of Supreme Court Nominees. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2004. Comprehensive account of the nomination and confirmation process of presidential appointees to the Supreme Court. An entire chapter is devoted to Thomas's confirmation battle.

Forrell, Caroline A., and Donna M. Matthews. A Law of Her Own: The Reasonable Woman as a Measure of Man. New York: New York University Press, 2000. Study suggesting reforms that would take better account of women's experiences in defining sexual harassment and other such legal terms.

Lakoff, Robin Tolmach. "Sexual Harassment on Trial: The Anita Hill/Clarence Thomas Narrative(s)." In Women's America: Refocusing the Past, edited by Linda K. Kerber and Jane Sherron De Hart. 6th ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2004. Lakoff, a linguistics professor, examines the wordplay of the Hill/Thomas hearing. A richly detailed analysis of the politics of language and the language of politics that helped define the hearing.

Mayer, Jane, and Jill Abramson. Strange Justice: The Selling of Clarence Thomas. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1994. Written by investigative reporters, an account of the distortions surrounding Thomas's nomination to the Supreme Court and the Bush administration's smear campaign to discredit Anita Hill. Concludes that Thomas lied when he denied Hill's accusations.

Thomas, Clarence. My Grandfather's Son: A Memoir. New York: Harper, 2007. Autobiography covering Thomas's life from his early days in poverty in rural Georgia to his investiture on the Supreme Court. Roughly one-third of the book is devoted to his nomination and confirmation.

SEE ALSO: Jan. 13, 1913: Federal Judge Is Impeached for Profiting from His Office; May 9, 1969: Supreme Court Justice Abe Fortas Is Accused of Bribery; Jan. 25, 1984: Jesse Jackson Calls New York City "Hymietown"; June 26, 1992: U.S. Navy Secretary Resigns in the Wake of Tailhook Sexual Assault Scandal; Aug. 21, 1994: Sex Scandal Forces Dismissal of NAACP Chief Benjamin Chavis; Dec. 11, 1997: HUD Secretary Henry Cisneros Is Indicted for Lying to Federal Agents; Jan. 17, 1998: President Bill Clinton Denies Sexual Affair with a White House Intern; Oct. 2, 2003: Newspaper Claims That Arnold Schwarzenegger Groped Women; June 2, 2004: U.N. Report Reveals That Secretary-General Kofi Annan Dismissed Sexual Harassment Charges; Oct. 13, 2004: Television Producer Files Sex Harassment Suit Against Bill O'Reilly.

January 13, 1992

WOODY ALLEN HAS AFFAIR WITH LOVER MIA FARROW'S ADOPTED DAUGHTER

For more than a decade, filmmaker Woody Allen was a romantic partner and artistic collaborator with actor Mia Farrow. In early 1992, Farrow learned that Allen had been having a romantic relationship with Soon-Yi Previn, her adopted daughter from a previous marriage. In the ensuing controversy, which led to a very public custody case, Farrow charged Allen, also, with molesting Dylan, Allen and Farrow's adopted daughter.

ALSO KNOWN AS: Allen-Farrow scandal

LOCALE: New York, New York

CATEGORIES: Sex; families and children; public morals; law and the courts; publishing and journalism

KEY FIGURES

Woody Allen (b. 1935), American filmmaker and actor

Mia Farrow (b. 1945), American film star

Soon-Yi Previn (b. 1970), Farrow's Korean-born adopted daughter

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Woody Allen and Mia Farrow were celebrated as a leading power couple throughout the 1980's. Though they never legally wed, they were so tightly linked together in the mind of the public, both on screen and off, that when their alliance ended in 1992, scandal was inevitable. Public shock was intensified by the degree of acrimony that the split-up engendered, and by its surprising cause.

By the time the scandal erupted, Woody Allen had been a household name for thirty years. He began his career as a gag writer for other humorists before embarking on a successful career of his own as a stand-up comedian. He began writing and appearing in various cinematic spoofs during the early 1960's and, by the end of the decade, had written and directed his first feature film: Take the Money and Run (1969). A number of critical and popular successes followed, culminating in the bittersweet romantic comedy Annie Hall (1977), which garnered a number of Oscar nominations and is considered by many critics to be one of the best American comedic films. Early in his directorial career, Allen showed a tendency to emulate the renowned European directors whom he idolized, including Federico Fellini and Ingmar Bergman, by employing a repertory stable of actors film after film. He especially wanted a recurring female lead, and that lead often was his romantic partner. From 1980 through 1992, Farrow filled that dual role.

Farrow was a product of Hollywood—the daughter of actor Maureen O'Sullivan and agent John Farrow. She became a star as a teenager playing Allison McKenzie on the night-time soap opera Peyton Place, which led to an Oscar-nominated role as the protagonist in Roman Polanski's horror masterpiece Rosemary's Baby in 1968. Her love life drew attention throughout the 1960's and 1970's, when she wed singer Frank Sinatra and then, later, musician and conductor André Previn, both of whom were old enough to be her father. The marriage to Sinatra lasted only two years, but the marriage to Previn lasted a decade, during which the couple had three sons and adopted three daughters. Daughter Soon-Yi Previn had been abandoned in Korea as a child to a birth mother who might have been abusive to her.

Soon after Farrow and Previn divorced, Farrow met Allen, and they became inseparable. The two lovers had apartments near each other in New York, and Allen was frequently in the company of Farrow's children, whose number had by the end of the 1980's increased to include a child—Satchel—born to Allen and Farrow, and two children the couple had adopted: a boy named Moses and a girl named Dylan. (Farrow later changed the names of all three children.)

At some point around 1990, Allen and Previn,

Woody Allen kisses Soon-Yi Previn two days after the couple wed in Venice. (AP/Wide World Photos) who by this time was twenty years old, became romantically involved. Farrow found out about the affair on the morning of January 13, 1992, when she let herself into Allen's apartment and discovered on his mantelpiece some nude photographs of her daughter. Farrow soon confronted Allen, who apparently tried to placate her by playing down what had happened as a brief lapse in propriety, but soon after the release of their last film together, Husbands and Wives (1992), the couple parted company. The cause of their separation made headlines around the world, as they began to feud publicly. Most of the initial sniping between the two amounted to little more than acidic remarks made to reporters until the question of the custody of their three children arose.

As the custody issue was going to court, Farrow made the stunning allegation that Allen, while visiting the children at her country home in Connecticut, had sexually abused Dylan, causing the little girl to be terrified of her adoptive father. Allen responded that this claim was an untruth concocted by Farrow to punish him for his relationship with Previn. After listening to much debate between Allen's and Farrow's attorneys, a judge in Connecticut announced that the evidence was too inconclusive to charge Allen with molestation, but she sharply criticized him for his conduct with both Previn and Dylan. The judge awarded Farrow primary custody, with Allen getting rights to supervised visitation with the children.

During and after the court case in Connecticut, friends and family of Farrow and Allen took sides publicly, as did critics and commentators in the news and entertainment media. Those in Allen's camp argued that child molestation tends to be compulsive, repetitive, and patterned behavior, yet Allen had never before been suspected of such conduct, including during the decade in which he was frequently in the company of Farrow's numerous children. Farrow's supporters pointed to a common motif in a number of Allen's films, in which older men are attracted to young girls. These films include Manhattan (1979) and Husbands and Wives.

For years after the custody battle, Allen and Farrow continued to make caustic remarks about each other, but both resumed their respective careers. Allen and Previn began to appear in public frequently as a couple, and within five years they married, on Christmas Eve, 1997, in Venice, Italy. They later adopted two daughters of their own. Farrow and Previn have been estranged from each other since Previn's marriage to Allen.

IMPACT

The Farrow-Allen-Previn triangle is a textbook example of a public scandal from which no one emerged unscathed. Although much sympathy accrued to Farrow as the wronged lover and mother, questions arose about choices she had made in adopting numerous children, some with special needs, and then trying to bring them up in seemingly unorthodox, unstructured circumstances and with a partner who maintained a separate residence and adopted some but not all of the children. Also, some agreed with Allen's supporters that Farrow's sudden denunciation of Allen as a molester seemed ideally and theatrically timed, coming as it did after the discovery of his involvement with Previn and just before the custody hearings. Although Previn remained relatively quiet during and after the scandal, many saw her as a cruel, faithless, and ungrateful daughter.

It was Allen, though, whose reputation suffered the most. Apart from the wry humor, the most appealing aspect of his films had long been their compassionate portrayal of characters experiencing the disappointments, insecurities, and contradictions of everyday life. As soon as the news of his relationship with Previn hit the media, though, the public saw another facet of Allen, a cold and haughty one. He seemed insensitive and uncaring, wholly unconcerned with the pain he had caused a woman with whom he had shared twelve years of intimacy and fruitful artistic collaboration. Also, for a person who had spent most of his adult life in psychoanalysis, his take on his relationship with Farrow's children seemed simultaneously unsophisticated and naïve. He continued to stress that he had never really been a father figure to the children, meaning that there was nothing improper about his falling in love with Previn. While he might not have been a father figure to the Previn siblings, he was one to the younger children; Allen would have been the only stable male authority figure and role model in their young lives. If he truly refused to play such a role in their lives, he appears irresponsible at best; if he was simply denying his role as a father to excuse his affair with Previn, he appears selfish.

—Thomas Du Bose

FURTHER READING

Bailey, Peter J. The Reluctant Film Art of Woody Allen. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 2001. Comprehensive overview and analysis of all aspects of Allen's creative work, including articles, fiction, and his many films.

Ewing, Charles Patrick, and Joseph T. McCann. Minds on Trial: Great Cases in Law and Psychology. New York: Oxford University Press, 2006. An examination of some of the most historically significant legal cases involving a clear psychological element. Includes a chapter on the Allen-Farrow custody battle and charges of molestation against Allen.

Farrow, Mia. What Falls Away: A Memoir. New York: Doubleday, 1997. A detailed account of the scandal, including the day Farrow found out about Allen's affair with her daughter. Also includes fascinating recollections of Farrow's childhood in Hollywood and her experience during the 1950's with polio, which gave her special insight into the needs of children around the world.

Skoble, Aeon J., and Mark T. Conrad, eds. Woody Allen and Philosophy. Peru, Ill.: Open Court, 2004. Philosophical analyses of the ethos of Allen's work, interesting especially in light of the scandal, as it contains essays on integrity and morality as defined in his films.

SEE ALSO: Jan. 20, 1933: Hedy Lamarr Appears Nude in the Czech Film Exstase; Feb. 6, 1942: Film Star Errol Flynn Is Acquitted of Rape; May 27, 1949: Actor Rita Hayworth Marries Aly Khan After Adulterous Affair; Feb. 7, 1950: Swedish Film Star Ingrid Bergman Has a Child Out of Wedlock; Dec. 12, 1957: Rock Star Jerry Lee Lewis Marries Thirteen-Year-Old Cousin; Apr. 4, 1958: Actor Lana Turner's Daughter Kills Turner's Gangster Lover; 1978: Actor Joan Crawford's Daughter Publishes Damning Memoir, Mommie Dearest; Feb. 1, 1978: Roman Polanski Flees the United States to Avoid Rape Trial; Dec. 18, 2003: Pop Star Michael Jackson Is Charged with Child Molestation.

April 15, 1992

HOTEL TYCOON LEONA HELMSLEY ENTERS PRISON FOR TAX EVASION

Hotel tycoon Leona Helmsley once declared, “only the little people pay taxes,” words that set off a scandal during her trial for federal tax evasion and other charges in 1989. She was convicted of underpaying taxes and, after losing her appeal, began her eighteen-month prison term in 1992. She died in 2007 and left the bulk of her multibillion-dollar estate to the care and welfare of dogs.

LOCALE: New York, New York

CATEGORIES: Law and the courts; corruption; business

KEY FIGURES

Leona Helmsley (1920-2007), hotel operator and real-estate investor

Harry Helmsley (1909-1997), real-estate and hotel investor

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Leona Helmsley came from immigrant roots. She was born to a Polish-Jewish hatmaker in Marbletown, New York. After she had experienced several unsuccessful marriages, she was courted in 1968 by millionaire real estate investor Harry Helmsley, who was married at the time. In 1970, she joined one of his brokerage firms, Brown, Harris & Stevens, and her troubles soon began. In late 1971, she was sued by several clients for forcing apartment tenants to buy condominiums, threatening eviction if they did not buy quickly. She lost the lawsuit and was ordered to pay the tenants and grant them three-year leases. Her real estate license was suspended as well.

In April, 1972, Helmsley married Harry and focused on running his empire of hotels. Together, the two expanded their real estate holdings, building the opulent Helmsley Palace Hotel with more than eleven hundred rooms and standing fifty-one stories on Madison Avenue in Manhattan, New York. The Helmsleys also acquired 230 Park Avenue, the Empire State Building, and the building that became the New York Helmsley Hotel, as well as holdings in other states. Helmsley was featured in advertisements that portrayed her as a demanding manager who worked to achieve only the best for her guests, although rumor maintained that in reality she was even meaner, firing employees over the slightest of infractions.

The Helmsleys also had a habit of disputing payments to contractors and vendors. In 1983, they had bought an eleven-million-dollar Greenwich, Connecticut, mansion to use as a weekend retreat. The mansion, Dunnellen Hall, was located on a twenty-six-acre estate. They disputed a portion of an eight-million-dollar remodeling bill, claiming that the work was inadequate and that they were overbilled by contractors. With the dispute over the overbilling came the question of having to pay taxes on the services as well. The Helmsleys balked. In the course of the resulting legal action in 1985, it was discovered that the remodeling work had been billed to Helmsley Hotels as a business expense. While this was not an uncommon business practice, it was an illegal one. Angry contractors sent overdue invoices to the New York Post, and the resulting story set off a federal investigation. U.S. agents discovered that more than four million dollars in personal expenses had been illegally billed to Helmsley subsidiaries.

In late 1988, the Helmsleys and two associates, Frank Turco and Joseph Licarci, were indicted on 188 counts of tax fraud as well as extortion and mail fraud. The trial was delayed by Helmsley's attorneys, who made the most of Harry's health issues, until midway through 1989. Harry had suffered a stroke and mental deterioration a few months before the trial and was ruled mentally and physically unfit to stand trial, leaving Leona Helmsley in the courtroom to face the charges. The trial finally began on June 26 in the court of Federal District judge John M. Walker, Jr.

Helmsley's reputation as a demanding ruler would end up working against her. The case was followed closely by the media, which dubbed Helmsley the Queen of Mean. Reporters interviewed her employees, uncovering hundreds of accounts of incidents where they had been threatened and verbally abused before being fired, often for slight infractions. Helmsley's staffers said that she extorted money and services from suppliers and employees and threatened to withdraw the income she provided them.

Her employees appeared in court as well. Elizabeth Baum, a former housekeeper, testified that Helmsley told her in 1983, "We [the rich] don't pay taxes. Only the little people pay taxes." Another staff member recalled being fired while Helmsley was being fitted for a dress. One executive was chased down a hallway after telling Helmsley he was quitting. Maids were screamed at and fired over leaving lint on a floor or leaving a lampshade out of alignment.

Helmsley's team of lawyers was led by Gerald A. Feffer, who was an expert in tax-fraud litigation. Assistant U.S. attorney James DeVita headed the prosecuting team. DeVita pointed to years of false invoices, tax fraud, extortion, and kickbacks on the part of the Helmsleys. Feffer claimed that Leona Helmsley had no knowledge of the falsified invoices, which had been created by Turco and Licarci because they wanted to pay the house-remodeling contractors without her knowledge. Turco's and Licarci's lawyers insisted at trial that Helmsley was indeed aware of the falsified invoices.

On August 30, 1989, Helmsley was acquitted of extortion. She was, however, convicted on one count to defraud the United States, three counts of tax evasion, three counts of filing false personal tax returns, sixteen counts of assisting in filing false corporate and partnership tax returns, and ten counts of mail fraud for sending fraudulent invoices via the U.S. postal service. Overall, the convictions could have added up to more than one century in prison. Helmsley initially received a sentence of sixteen years but, eventually, all but eight charges were dropped. She was fined more than seven million dollars. Licarci received a sentence of thirty months in prison, three years probation, and a seventy-five million dollar fine, while Turco was sentenced to twenty-four months in prison and three years of probation and was fined fifty thousand dollars.

Leona Helmsley Enters Prison for Tax Evasion

Helmsley collapsed outside the courthouse on the day the verdicts were read and was subsequently diagnosed with hypertension and a heart problem. She appealed to the New York State Supreme Court and succeeded in having her sentence minimized. She served eighteen months in a federal prison beginning on April 15 (tax day), 1992.

Helmsley died of congestive heart failure on August 20, 2007, at the age of eighty-seven and nearly forgotten by the media and public. Former New York City mayor Edward I. Koch reportedly referred to her as the “wicked witch of the West,” while entrepreneur Donald Trump said she was “the meanest woman in history.” She was buried in Sleepy Hollow Cemetery in Westchester County, New York, near other public figures, such as Washington Irving and Andrew Carnegie, in a Greek-style mausoleum of thirteen-hundred square feet that features custom stained-glass windows of the New York skyline.

Leona Helmsley leaving court in New York City on February 8, 1990. (AP/Wide World Photos)

IMPACT

After her time in federal prison, Helmsley spent most of the rest of her life in isolation. Harry died in 1997, leaving to her his fortune of more than five billion dollars. In 2002, she was sued by a former employee, Charles Bell, who alleged that she had fired him because he is gay. A jury found in his favor and ordered Helmsley to pay him more than ten million dollars in damages, an amount later reduced by a judge to just over one-half million dollars.

In her later years, Helmsley was generous to charities, including the Red Cross in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina in 2005, to African American churches that had been the victims of arsonists, and to numerous hospitals and medical centers. She donated twenty-five million dollars to New York’s Presbyterian Hospital for medical research and contributed five million dollars to a fund for the families of firefighters killed following the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001. Upon her death, the majority of her estate was left to a charitable trust, although twelve million dollars was reserved as a trust fund for her Maltese dog, Trouble. (This amount was later reduced to two million by the court.) In July, 2008, the Helmsley estate executors announced that Helmsley willed the bulk of her fortune, between five and eight billion dollars, to the care and welfare of dogs. She was far less generous with the majority of her family, with whom she had a long tumultuous relationship. She left fifteen million for her brother and left nothing for two of her four grandchildren. The two left out subsequently received a few million by order of the courts.

—Catherine Rambo

FURTHER READING

Hammer, Richard. The Helmsleys: The Rise and Fall of Harry and Leona. New York: Signet, 1991. Describes the careers of the Helmsleys, the federal trial, and the trial’s tribulations.

Moss, Michael. Palace Coup: The Inside Story of Harry and Leona Helmsley. New York: Doubleday, 1989. Written by a former employee of Leona Helmsley, this book describes events before and up to the time of the trial.

Pierson, Randall. The Queen of Mean: Leona Helmsley. New York: Bantam Books, 1989. Focuses on the people who had worked with Helmsley.

Randall, Stephen, ed. The “Playboy” Interviews: Movers and Shakers. Milwaukie, Ore.: M Press, 2007. Includes a November, 1990, interview of Leona Helmsley by Glenn Plaskin. Revealing in its content. Part of the Playboy Interviews series.

Strom, Stephanie. “Helmsley Left Dogs Billions in Her Will.” The New York Times, July 2, 2008. The news story about Helmsley leaving the majority of her estate to the care and welfare of dogs.

SEE ALSO: Sept. 10, 1981: Chicago Sun-Times Reports That Cardinal Cody Diverted Church Funds; Oct. 19, 1982: Car Manufacturer John De Lorean Is Arrested in a Drug Sting; May 2, 1984: E. F. Hutton Executives Plead Guilty to Fraud; Jan. 15, 1988: ZZZZ Best Founder Is Indicted on Federal Fraud Charges; Mar. 29, 1989: Financier Michael Milken Is Indicted for Racketeering and Fraud; Mar. 5, 2004: Martha Stewart Is Convicted in Insider-Trading Scandal.

May 6, 1992

IRISH BISHOP EAMONN CASEY'S ROMANTIC AFFAIR LEADS TO HIS RESIGNATION

Bishop Eamonn Casey was an outspoken social and political reformist. In 1992, he admitted to having engaged in a romantic affair with a distant cousin in 1973 and that they had a child together. This revelation forced Casey's resignation from his see and led to his exile. Years later, an Irish woman alleged that Casey had sexually abused her. However, police determined the charges were groundless.

LOCALE: Ireland

CATEGORIES: Public morals; religion; sex; families and children

KEY FIGURES

Eamonn Casey (b. 1927), bishop of Kerry, 1969–1976, and of Galway and Kilmacduagh, 1976–1992

Annie Murphy (b. 1949), Casey's former lover
Peter Murphy (b. 1974), Casey and Murphy's son

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Bishop Eamonn Casey, by all appearances a fairly typical Irish Roman Catholic Church administrator—though one who had more liberal views than most—was born in 1927 in the village of Firies in County Kerry, Ireland. He was the sixth child in a family of ten children. Choosing a religious vocation, he was ordained as a Catholic priest in 1951. After some eighteen years in the priesthood, Casey was consecrated bishop of Kerry, serving from 1969 through 1976. He was then translated to the diocese of Galway and Kilmacduagh and held the position of bishop until May 5, 1992.

Annie Murphy was an American who was related to Bishop Casey. Her mother was the bishop's distant cousin and her father, John Murphy, was a physician who practiced in New York. She had nearly been raped at the age of sixteen, had been sexually abused during a relationship, and was abused by her husband. She had suffered a miscarriage and was divorced at the age of twenty-three. Troubled and depressed, she traveled, at the behest of her immediate family, to Ireland in April, 1973, to stay at her cousin Casey's residence in Inch, County Kerry. Shortly thereafter, Murphy and Casey embarked upon an intense love affair.

In November, Murphy discovered that she was pregnant. She and Casey disagreed about whether she should keep the child or put it up for adoption. Casey wanted her to have the baby at Coombe Maternity Hospital in Dublin, where unwed mothers routinely arranged for their children to be adopted. Instead, Murphy opted to stay at the Rotunda Hospital, also in Dublin, and to maintain custody. Their child, a boy who was christened Peter, was born on July 31, 1974. Continued disagreements over Peter's welfare culminated in Murphy's return to the United States with her son. It was agreed that the affair and their child would be kept secret and that the bishop would send monthly payments of $175 to Murphy and Peter—an amount that would eventually increase to $300 per month. Ultimately, Casey agreed to send a lump sum payment for Peter's education through their attorneys. The total was about $115,000 and was paid in 1990, from diocesan funds.

Casey had gained notoriety for his pronouncedly anticonservative stance on many issues. From an international point of view, he took a prominent role in the 1979 visit of Pope John Paul II to Ireland and in opposing the role of the United States in Central America. He had been a friend and ardent admirer of the reform-minded archbishop Oscar Romero of El Salvador and, after Romero's assassination in 1980, represented the Irish episcopate and clergy at Romero's funeral. He witnessed and reported on an ensuing riot, during which military forces loyal to the El Salvadoran government killed some fifty individuals.

In 1984, Casey pointedly refused to participate in the visit to Ireland of U.S. president Ronald Reagan because of his support of rightist regimes and of the counterrevolutionary guerrilla forces (the Contras) in Nicaragua. During the 1980's, Casey's opposition to apartheid in South Africa led him to openly support the strike and boycott campaign waged against the giant retailing chain Dunne's Stores by some of its own employees. He is credited as a cofounder of two major charitable organizations—Trocaire, an Irish-based charity dedicated to developing world relief projects, which he chaired from 1973 to 1992, and Shelter, established in England to assist the homeless, particularly among the Irish immigrant community.

In the years that followed Murphy's return to the United States, she continued to lead an unsettled life, becoming involved in two serious relationships. At one time she attempted suicide. The secret of her connection with Bishop Casey was suppressed for eighteen years. The situation began unraveling as Peter approached adulthood and expressed his desire for his father to publicly acknowledge him. Legal wrangling over a paternity declaration and a monetary settlement led to a breakdown in negotiations between Casey on one hand and Murphy, Peter, and Murphy's boyfriend, Arthur Pennell on the other. Murphy, urged on by her son and Pennell, leaked the story of her liaison with Casey to the Irish Times, which, after conducting investigations, discovered evidence for the large monetary payment made from diocesan funds in 1990 and confronted Casey with its findings. Casey, who was in Malta at the time, arranged to meet with reporters upon his return. Instead, however, the bishop flew to Rome, where he tendered his resignation as bishop, directly to the pope. Casey never met with the reporters.

On May 6, 1992, Casey announced his resignation. The Irish Times reported the resignation on May 7, adding financial details to the story. Shortly thereafter, Casey issued a statement admitting to the affair, acknowledged his son, and mentioned the misappropriation of funds that had, he added, been repaid by anonymous donors.

Immediately after his resignation, Casey, soon to be given the title bishop emeritus, flew to the United States and then Latin America. He spent the next six years as a missionary in Ecuador under the auspices of the Society of St. James the Apostle. In 1998, he left for southern England and served as pastor for St. Paul's Church in the village of Hayward's Heath, which was part of the diocese of Arundel and Brighton.

In November of 2005, a former female parishioner accused him of sexually molesting her during the mid-1970's while she was living in the Irish city of Limerick. The Irish woman's identity was never revealed. In December, Casey suspended his ministry at St. Paul's (he was never to return), while the Irish Gardai (police) investigated. By August of 2006, he was cleared of all charges. It was later revealed that the woman who made the accusations was a habitual accuser.

IMPACT

Rather than return to his parochial duties in England, Casey decided to retire. On February 5, 2006, before he was exonerated, he had returned to Ireland and taken up residence at the village of Shanaglish, County Galway. The bishop emeritus was granted permission to conduct his own private mass at his residence but, even though exonerated by civil authorities, he was denied authorization to celebrate mass at church pending completion of the Vatican's own investigation. Also in 2006, Casey, Murphy, and Peter reconciled.

The shock waves that emanated from the disgrace and sudden removal of the person who had been regarded as the most visible face of the Catholic hierarchy in Ireland signaled the first of a series of scandals involving the sexual abuse of minors by Catholic clerics around the Western world. Though these sex-abuse scandals have since made the Casey-Murphy affair (which was between consenting adults) seem mild in comparison, the revelations that led to Casey's resignation initiated a decline in the Catholic Church's prestige and political influence in the Republic of Ireland.

—Raymond Pierre Hylton

FURTHER READING

Brady, Conor. Up with the Times. Dublin: Gill & Macmillan, 2005. Provides background to Irish Times coverage of the Casey-Murphy scandal and its aftermath. Brady was editor of the Irish Times from 1986 to 2002.

Broderick, Joe. Fall from Grace: The Life of Eamonn Casey. Dingle, Ireland: Brandon House Press, 1992. Somewhat one-sided in that the author derived much from Annie Murphy's account of the affair, though lacking the florid detail of Murphy's own later work.

Murphy, Annie, with Peter de Rosa. Forbidden Fruit: The True Story of My Secret Love Affair with Ireland's Most Powerful Bishop. Boston: Little, Brown, 1993. A graphic and personalized account of the turbulent relationship. Murphy cites the controversy about whether or not to have Peter adopted as the major factor in her estrangement from Casey.

SEE ALSO: May 20, 1974: French Cardinal Daniélou Dies in a Prostitute's House; Oct. 31, 1975: Buddhist Teacher Orders His Students to Remove Their Clothes; Sept. 10, 1981: Chicago Sun-Times Reports That Cardinal Cody Diverted Church Funds; Mar. 19, 1987: Jim Bakker Resigns as Head of PTL Television Network; May, 1999: Civil Rights Leader Jesse Jackson Fathers a Child Out of Wedlock; Jan. 6, 2002: Boston Globe Reports on Child Sexual Abuse by Roman Catholic Priests.

May 19, 1992

AMY FISHER SHOOTS MARY JO BUTTAFUOCO

Later known as the Long Island Lolita, teenager Amy Fisher became infatuated with Joey Buttafuoco, a married auto-body shop owner. Fisher, wanting to marry Buttafuoco, with whom she was having an affair, shot and attempted to kill his wife, Mary Jo. The story became a sensation in the American media.

LOCALE: Massapequa, Long Island, New York

CATEGORIES: Communications and media; law and the courts; violence; families and children; psychology and psychiatry

KEY FIGURES

Amy Fisher (b. 1974), teenager who was having an affair with Joey Buttafuoco

Mary Jo Buttafuoco (Mary Jo Connery; b. 1955), wife of Joey Buttafuoco

Joey Buttafuoco (b. 1956), automobile shop owner

Peter Guaganti (b. c. 1972), Fisher's accomplice

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Amy Fisher apparently was a shy and insecure child who craved attention while growing up. She claimed that her father beat her as well as her mother. She also alleged that she was sexually abused by a family member while growing up as a young child in Long Island, New York, and that she was raped at the age of thirteen by a man working at her home.

In May, 1991, sixteen-year-old Fisher met thirty-five-year-old Joey Buttafuoco upon taking her car to Buttafuoco's auto-body shop for repair. At the time, Buttafuoco was married to Mary Jo Buttafuoco and had two children. Fisher quickly became infatuated with the auto mechanic and began hanging around his repair shop. By July, Fisher and Buttafuoco were sexually involved and carrying out their secret affair in Long Island hotels. By August, Fisher was still involved with Buttafuoco, and her attraction was becoming obsessive. Fisher finally told Buttafuoco he had to choose between her and his wife. He chose to stay with Mary Jo, leading Fisher to break up with him.

Fisher became quite despondent. First, she made superficial cuts on her wrists, which may have been an attempt at suicide. She began dating other men, but she always wanted to get back together with Buttafuoco. By January, 1992, the two were once again together. Fisher came to believe that to keep Buttafuoco she would have to get rid of Mary Jo. Fisher later alleged that she and Buttafuoco discussed where to obtain a gun and how to shoot Mary Jo. Buttafuoco denied these claims.

On May 17, Fisher met the person who would supply her with a semiautomatic Titan .25 handgun: Peter Guagenti. Two days later, May 19, Fisher and Guagenti drove to the Buttafuoco home in Massapequa, New York. Before leaving, however, Fisher had replaced the license plates on Guagenti's car with stolen plates to ensure their car would not link them to the murder. Around 11:30 A.M., Fisher confronted Mary Jo on the front porch of the Buttafuoco home, gun in hand, and told her that Buttafuoco was having an affair with her (Fisher's) sister. Mary Jo told Fisher to get off her property, then turned away from her to reenter the house. Fisher then hit her on the head with the gun, and she fell to the ground. Fisher then shot her in the head.

Neighbors who heard the shots called 9-1-1 and tried to help Mary Jo, who was rushed to the local hospital and spent hours in surgery. By May 20 she was sufficiently conscious to speak with police. She told the officers that her attacker had held up a T-shirt she recognized from her husband's auto shop. Police immediately began to question Buttafuoco, who suggested that the shooter might have been Fisher. He said that she was obsessed with him. The police showed a photograph of Fisher to Mary Jo, and she identified Fisher as the person who shot her. The following day, with help from Buttafuoco, the police located and arrested Fisher for attempted murder in the second degree. Fisher also was charged with armed felony assault and criminal use of a firearm.

As the story began to unfold, it became clear that Buttafuoco also had some responsibility for the attempted murder of his wife, despite his repeated public denials of any relationship with Fisher. The media, which dubbed Fisher the Long Island Lolita, quickly picked up on the sex-charged and scandalous story. She became a cultural phenomenon, and her life story was broadcast on television and in the print media. Three television films documented her life.

Fisher's criminal case was docketed in the Nassau County, Long Island, court, where she initially pleaded not guilty. Her bail was set at $2 million, the highest bail ever set by the Nassau County court. Fisher was unable to pay the bail. She remained in jail until she sold the rights to her story to KLM Productions, using the money to post bail. Although New York state's Son of Sam law prevents criminals from making money based on the stories of their crimes, the law was not invoked in the Fisher case.

Fisher eventually agreed to a plea bargain in which she would plead guilty to aggravated assault and testify against Buttafuoco for statutory rape. In September, 1992, she was sentenced to five to fifteen years. In 1999, after serving seven years at New York's Albion Correctional Facility, she was paroled and released from prison after entering into a new plea bargain that carried a sentence of three to ten years. Mary Jo was behind the new plea-bargain agreement.

Amy Fisher. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Buttafuoco was indicted on charges of statutory rape, endangering the welfare of a minor, and sodomy, based largely on the testimony of Fisher and evidence from one hotel receipt dated before Fisher's seventeenth birthday. In October, 1993, Buttafuoco pleaded guilty to statutory rape and entered a plea bargain that netted him four months in jail. Guaganti served a six-month sentence for supplying Fisher with the gun.

In 2003, Fisher married Louis Bellara, whom she had met online while she was in prison; he was twenty-four years older than Fisher. The couple had two children. Fisher also became a columnist for the Long Island Press and won a media award for her column in 2004. She left the newspaper in 2005. She also became an activist for prisoners' rights and prison reform, inspired in part by her experiences in prison, including an alleged rape by a correctional officer.

The Buttafuocos moved to California after the shooting and were divorced in 2003. He remarried in 2006. Buttafuoco's legal troubles continued, as he faced charges for soliciting a prostitute in 1995 and was fined and given probation; was convicted of auto insurance fraud in 2004, for which he pleaded guilty and served one year in jail; and pleaded no contest for illegal possession of ammunition in 2005, for which he served a few months in jail. Mary Jo changed her last name to Connery, her birth name, and founded a company that designs posters. Her injuries from the shooting, including permanent nerve damage and paralysis, blurred vision in her right eye, and hearing loss, have affected her life since.

IMPACT

The Amy Fisher story became an instant money-maker. Sex and scandal sells, and as long as the public is willing to pay, entrepreneurs will continue to make money from this and similar stories.

Mary Jo and Joey Buttafuoco. (AP/Wide World Photos)

In addition to earning money from the television films about her life, Fisher wrote and published two tell-all books. A sex tape of Fisher appeared on the World Wide Web in the fall of 2007, leading her to sue Red Light District, a hard-core-sex film distribution company, for releasing the tape, which allegedly was sold to the company by her husband at the time. In 2008, Red Light District also began selling a video of Buttafuoco having sex with his wife, Evanka, at a party in 2004. Mary Jo Buttafuoco made money from the scandal as well, but she used the funds she earned to help defray her tremendous medical bills. Moreover, rumors persisted that Fisher and Buttafuoco were planning to launch a reality show.

Fisher and Buttafuoco were reunited at a coin toss for the so-called "Lingerie Bowl"—a heavily criticized pay-per-view alternative halftime show broadcast from Los Angeles on another station during Super Bowl Sunday. In May, 2007, the two reportedly were seen together in Long Island. Also in 2007, their spouses filed for divorce, but Evanka Buttafuoco soon withdrew her petition.

—Carol A. Rolf

FURTHER READING

Dominguez, Pier. Amy Fisher, Anatomy of a Scandal: The Myth, the Media, and the Truth Behind the Long Island Lolita Story. Lincoln, Nebr.: Writers Club Press, 2001. Based on interviews, court documents, and archival research, this biography looks beyond the media accounts in presenting Amy Fisher's life story.

Eftimiades, Maria. Lethal Lolita: A True Story of Sex, Scandal, and Deadly Obsession. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1992. True-crime author Eftimiades presents a biographical account of Fisher before the scandal, outlines the details leading up to Fisher's shooting of Mary Jo Buttafuoco, and examines the criminal trial.

Fisher, Amy, with Sheila Weller. Amy Fisher: My Story. Reprint. New York: Pocket Books, 1994. Written soon after Fisher's conviction for attempted murder of Mary Jo Buttafuoco, Fisher and her mother attempt to explain and justify Fisher's criminal behavior.

Fisher, Amy, with Robbie Woliver. If I Knew Then. Lincoln, Nebr.: iUniverse, 2004. Fisher, now married with children, tells her own life story, including taking responsibility for her criminal actions.

Hornberger, Francine. Mistresses of Mayhem: The Book of Women Criminals. Indianapolis, Ind.: Alpha, 2002. A collection for general readers that includes a discussion of the Amy Fisher scandal.

SEE ALSO: June 25, 1906: Millionaire Heir Murders Architect Stanford White; Dec. 8, 1906: Former U.S. Senator Arthur Brown Is Murdered by Lover; July 27, 1917: Millionaire Socialite Dies Under Suspicious Circumstances; Apr. 4, 1958: Actor Lana Turner's Daughter Kills Turner's Gangster Lover; Sept. 5, 1967: Socialite Nancy Wakeman Shoots Her Politician-Husband; Mar. 21, 1976: Actor Claudine Longet Kills Ski Champion Vladimir Sabich; Mar. 10, 1980: Scarsdale Diet Doctor Is Killed by His Lover; Mar., 1990: Menendez Brothers Are Arrested for Murdering Their Parents; June 23, 1993: Lorena Bobbitt Severs Her Husband's Penis; June 12, 1994: Double Murder Leads to Sensational O. J. Simpson Trial.

June 26, 1992

U.S. NAVY SECRETARY RESIGNS IN THE WAKE OF TAILHOOK SEXUAL ASSAULT SCANDAL

H. Lawrence Garrett III, secretary of the U.S. Navy, was forced to resign after investigators looking into sexual assault charges at the 1991 Tailhook convention of naval aviators revealed that he was in attendance but did nothing to stop the assaults, harassment, and abuse of mostly female aviators and other women. As a result of the scandal, the Navy severed all ties to the Tailhook Association until 1999.

LOCALES: Las Vegas, Nevada; Washington, D.C.

CATEGORIES: Politics; military; government; women's issues; space and aviation; sex crimes

KEY FIGURES

H. Lawrence Garrett III (b. 1939), secretary of the U.S. Navy, 1989-1992

Frank B. Kelso, Jr. (b. 1933), Navy admiral, chief of naval operations, 1990-1994

Richard M. Dunleavy (b. 1933), Navy vice admiral and assistant chief of naval operations, 1989-1992

Paula Coughlin (b. 1963), Navy lieutenant and aviator

Derek Vander Schaaf (b. 1939), deputy inspector general, U.S. Department of Defense 1982-1996

John W. Snyder, Jr. (fl. 1990's), Navy rear admiral, commander of the Naval Air Test Center

Barbara S. Pope (b. 1951), assistant secretary of the Navy for Manpower and Reserve Affairs, 1989-1993

J. Daniel Howard (b. 1944), undersecretary of the Navy, 1989-1992

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Sponsors of the 1991 Tailhook Association Conference of naval aviators at the Las Vegas Hilton Hotel in Nevada promised that year's gathering would be special. The Tailhook Association, named for the hook that aids an aviator in landing a jet or other aircraft on the deck of an aircraft carrier, had been organizing an annual event for more than thirty years; for two decades Las Vegas had been the conference's home. Many U.S. Navy and U.S. Marine Corps aviators from around the world converged on the city for three days in September, ostensibly to attend professional seminars and examine the latest aviation and war-fighting equipment displayed by vendors who helped underwrite the conference.

Most aviators in attendance at Tailhook over the years were men. Women had been excluded from careers in naval aviation until the mid-1970's and excluded as fighter pilots until 1993, thereby reducing the number of female aviators who would have attended Tailhook. In practice, the convention had become a place for attendees to let inhibitions run wild—in other words, to party. While few wives or female aviators attended Tailhook, women from the Las Vegas area and other communities were lured to the convention on the promise of being able to spend time with the aviators. The junior officers routinely engaged in inappropriate behavior that included sexual misconduct and vandalism. Senior officers seemed to tacitly approve the behavior, as many did the same as junior officers, participating in the annual series of pranks. Among attendees in 1991 were nearly three dozen senior officers, including the chief of Naval Operations, Admiral Frank B. Kelso, Jr.; his assistant for air operations, Vice Admiral Richard M. Dunleavy; and the secretary of the Navy, H. Lawrence Garrett III.

Former Navy lieutenant Paula Coughlin, right, in Las Vegas, Nevada, in September, 1991. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Among the more flamboyant rites at Tailhook was the gauntlet, a cordon of aviators who made it a practice of fondling, groping, or otherwise hassling any woman who wandered down the hotel corridor where they gathered. On September 7, Navy lieutenant Paula Coughlin, an aviator then working as an aide to Rear Admiral John Snyder, commander of the Naval Test Center in Patuxent, Maryland,

SEVERING TIES WITH TAILHOOK

On October 29, 1991, Secretary of the Navy H. Lawrence Garrett III wrote the following letter to Captain F. G. Ludwig, Jr., the president of the Tailhook Association, to sever the Navy's ties to the organization. Although Garrett claimed to be angered by the events that took place at the 1991 Tailhook convention, it was later revealed that he had attended the conference, and he was forced to resign as Navy secretary. The Navy reestablished ties with Tailhook in 1999.

Dear Captain Ludwig,

I am writing to you, and through you to your organization, to express my absolute outrage over the conduct reported to have taken place at the Tailhook Association symposium in September. . . .

Besides my anger, I am more than personally disappointed. The Tailhook Association has been, in the past, a source of great professionalism and esprit, an organization where productive dialogues and seminars have had a home. In particular, Tailhook '91 provided me with a superb forum to air some of the most serious issues that Naval Aviation has ever faced. But none of those attributes can make up for the personal abuses, behavioral excesses, and quite possibly criminal conduct that took place at Tailhook '91 and have now been reported to me.

There are certain categories of behavior and attitudes that I unequivocally will not tolerate. You know the phrase: "Not in my Navy, not on my watch." Tailhook '91 is a gross example of exactly what cannot be permitted by the civilian or uniformed leadership of the Navy, at any level. No man who holds a commission in this Navy will ever subject a woman to the kind of abuse in evidence at Tailhook '91 with impunity. And no organization which makes possible this behavior is in any way worthy of a naval leadership or advisory role.

Admiral Frank Kelso, our Chief of Naval Operations, and I have discussed this matter and, based upon his recommendation and with his full support, I am terminating, effective immediately, all Navy support in any manner whatsoever, direct or indirect, for the Tailhook Association.

Last April I sent a message to every command in the Navy about the progress of our women officers and sailors. I said then that I would reinforce a position of zero tolerance of sexual harassment, and I meant it. That policy was not new in April, nor when I became Secretary—but obviously it was as necessary then as it is now to reiterate just how strongly I feel about this matter. Also in April, with my strong concurrence, Admiral Kelso made specifically clear in a parallel message that a Navy free from sexual harassment or intimidation is a leadership issue. Together we made certain that the whole Navy knew: "Each of you, from the most junior sailor to the most senior officer, has a responsibility to build working and living spaces free from unprofessional conduct, fear, and prejudice." The Tailhook Association most certainly did not live up to that responsibility.

was forced to pass through the gauntlet and was assaulted by dozens of her male colleagues, despite her efforts to fight them off. Rather than ignore the incident, as many other women had done, Coughlin determined to see the perpetrators punished for what was nothing less than sexual assault.

The response to Coughlin's complaint by naval leadership was far from satisfactory. Although she reported the incident to Snyder the day after it occurred, he did nothing initially, telling her she should have expected such behavior under the circumstances. Coughlin pressed her case, going directly to the chief of Naval Operations for some resolution. Not until late October, however, did Secretary Garrett become aware of Coughlin's allegations. He decided some action was necessary. Within weeks, Snyder was relieved of his command, and separate investigations were launched by the Naval Investigative Service (NIS) and the Navy's Inspector General (IG).

During the months these investigations were underway, stories of Tailhook misdeeds began surfacing within the Navy and in the press, further escalating the gravity of the situation for Navy officials. There were calls from Congress members for the Navy to take this matter seriously, and legislators threatened to hold up all naval officer promotions until there were assurances that those nominated for promotion had not participated in illegal activities at Tailhook. These pressures notwithstanding, when the NIS and IG submitted their reports to Garrett, about two dozen possible victims were identified and only two officers were named as possible perpetrators. Furthermore, the reports recommended only mild reforms.

Assistant Secretary of the Navy Barbara S. Pope, the first woman to serve as assistant secretary in the Navy's history, urged Garrett to delve deeper into the matter, and he in turn asked the U.S. Department of Defense to launch a new investigation. Derek Vander Schaaf, a deputy inspector general at the Pentagon, headed up the new investigative team. The team would also look into the environment that allowed such behavior to occur with seeming impunity. Initially, Vander Schaaf's investigators met with a wall of silence, as most aviators refused to reveal any details of what they might have seen or done. Senior leaders were no more helpful. Nevertheless, as reports of junior officers' behavior continued to surface, people outside the Navy began arguing that high-ranking officers and others within the service—and not simply junior officers—should be held accountable for their behavior.

Meanwhile, an appendix to one of the Navy's investigations revealed that despite Garrett's assurances that he had not been near any inappropriate or illegal activities at Tailhook 1991, evidence shows that he was seen at a party adjacent to the location of the infamous gauntlet. This information was made public in June, 1992, the same month Coughlin told her story on national television. It was becoming apparent to members of the George H. W. Bush administration that Garrett was a liability. At the encouragement of officials in the White House, he submitted his resignation on June 26. Undersecretary of the Navy J. Daniel Howard was named acting secretary. He immediately issued a series of orders directing the Navy and Marine Corps to take more serious measures to address issues of sexual harassment and more fully integrate women into all positions within the services.

The release of Vander Schaaf's report later in the year made apparent the extent of the scandal. More than seventy women had been assaulted at Tailhook 1991, and more than one hundred male officers—and not only two, as the NIS and IG reports claimed—were suspected of participating in the assaults or other inappropriate activities. Moreover, the report was highly critical of senior Navy and Marine Corps leadership for condoning these activities—and in some cases encouraging them.

Secretary of the Navy H. Lawrence Garrett III. (U.S. Department of Defense)

Vander Schaaf also faulted the Navy for conducting what was essentially a whitewash of Coughlin's claims and for inhibiting his investigation out of a misguided sense of loyalty within the aviation community and the Navy and Marine Corps as a whole. Furthermore, his report made it clear that a hostile climate existed in both services for women wishing to pursue careers that could lead them to positions of responsibility equal to their male counterparts.

IMPACT

The Bush administration moved quickly to restore stability at the top of the Department of the Navy, naming Garrett's permanent replacement within a month of his departure. In the next eighteen months, Dunleavy, charged with having personal knowledge of the gauntlet and failing to do anything to halt it, was forced to retire at a reduced rank. Other officers were similarly pressured into retirement or reassigned from key positions into less prestigious ones. Although these changes at the top of the military chain of command had some immediate impact on the management of the service, the more significant impact of the Tailhook scandal on the Navy occurred through the next decade.

New regulations required full integration of women into the service, the establishment of an office to focus on women in the Navy, and the development of a series of programs to educate officers, sailors, and Marines in matters regarding appropriate treatment of women in uniform. All of these changes had some positive effect on working conditions for women in the Navy. Nevertheless, subsequent incidents of inappropriate behavior, including sexual assault, within the fleet and at the U.S. Naval Academy proved that the disrespect for and resistance to women in the Navy were far from being eliminated.

—Laurence W. Mazzeno

FURTHER READING

Donovan, Aine, et al., eds. Ethics for Military Leaders. Needham Heights, Mass.: Simon & Schuster Educational, 1998. Explores the ethical implications of the Tailhook scandal. Includes a chronology, excerpts from the Department of Defense investigative report on the scandal, and essays presenting opposing viewpoints regarding the Navy's conduct in handling the matter.

Ebbert, Jean, and Marie-Beth Hall. Crossed Currents: Navy Women from World War I to Tailhook. Washington, D.C.: Brassey, 1993. Describes the Tailhook scandal and the impact of the Navy's initial attempts to downplay the serious nature of the sexual harassment and assault charges.

Godson, Susan H. Serving Proudly: A History of Women in the U.S. Navy. Annapolis, Md.: Naval Institute Press, 2001. Comments on the Tailhook scandal in the context of women's struggle to be accepted as naval aviators and colleagues.

McMichael, William H. The Mother of All Hooks: The Story of the U.S. Navy's Tailhook Scandal. New Brunswick, N.J.: Transaction, 1997. Detailed analysis of the 1991 convention and its aftermath. Explores the impact of the various investigations of the Navy and the military in general. Provides mitigating evidence that exonerates some who were not directly involved in incidences of sexual harassment and assault.

Zimmerman, Jean. Tailspin: Women at War in the Wake of Tailhook. New York: Doubleday, 1995. Examines the implications of the Tailhook scandal for women in the military, focusing specifically on its impact on the potential for women to serve in combat alongside their male colleagues.

SEE ALSO: July 19, 1921: U.S. Senate Rebukes Navy in Homosexuality Investigation; Oct. 4, 1976: Agriculture Secretary Earl Butz Resigns After Making Obscene Joke; Apr. 28, 1994: U.S. Naval Academy Expels Midshipmen for Cheating; May 20, 1997: Air Force Prosecution of Female Officer for Adultery Reveals Double Standard; Jan. 2, 2003: E-mail Message Prompts Inquiry into Air Force Academy Sexual Assaults; June 2, 2004: U.N. Report Reveals That Secretary-General Kofi Annan Dismissed Sexual Harassment Charges; Oct. 13, 2004: Television Producer Files Sex Harassment Suit Against Bill O'Reilly; June 22, 2005: U.S. Air Force Investigates Religious Intolerance at Its Academy; Mar. 14, 2006: Duke Lacrosse Players Are Accused of Gang Rape.

August 23, 1992

PRINCESS DIANA'S PHONE CONVERSATION WITH HER LOVER IS MADE PUBLIC

Princess Diana's taped conversation with her lover marked the first of two significant and embarrassing instances of the press getting a hold of tape-recorded talks between senior members of the British royal family and their lovers. The adultery scandal soon was overshadowed by allegations that members of British intelligence agencies had been involved in monitoring the princess's calls and that they leaked the tapes for her husband, Prince Charles. The royal couple was in the middle of a divorce battle.

ALSO KNOWN AS: Squidgygate; Dianagate

LOCALES: Sandringham, Norfolk, and Oxfordshire area, England

CATEGORIES: Communications and media; public morals; publishing and journalism; royalty; sex

KEY FIGURES

Diana, Princess of Wales (1961-1997), princess of Wales, married to Prince Charles

James Gilbey (b. 1956), Diana's lover and heir to the Gilbey's gin fortune

Charles, Prince of Wales (b. 1948), Diana's husband, heir to the British throne

Cyril Reenan (1922-2004), amateur radio enthusiast

Jane Norgrove (fl. 1990's), amateur radio enthusiast

SUMMARY OF EVENT

The August 23, 1992, headline on the front page of The Sun revealed the existence of tape recordings of a telephone conversation between Princess Diana and James Gilbey—apparently from New Year's Eve, 1989. The story was sensational in three respects. First, it represented a significant escalation of the willingness of the British media to publish material embarrassing to the royal family, even when a clear breach of privacy was involved. Second, the story left no possible doubt that Diana and Gilbey were involved in a sexual relationship that was, technically, treasonous. Third, the story called attention to the apparent vulnerability to eavesdroppers of conversations on cell phones. (Diana was apparently speaking from Sandringham House on a regular phone, while Gilbey was using a mobile phone in his car.)

The revelation that Diana was an adulterer, although titillating, caused little surprise, and its shock value was brief. The continued erosion of the traditional diplomacy maintained by the British press in respect of royalty caused no surprise at all, and only vain protest. The third element of the scandal, cell phone breaches, kept the story going, maintained its newsworthiness for weeks, and continued to generate speculation and discussion for years.

The Sun reportedly received the tape from amateur radio enthusiast Cyril Reenan, a former manager of the Trustee Savings Bank. Reenan apparently constructed an elaborate listening post at his home in Abingdon, Oxfordshire, so that he could spend his time in retirement eavesdropping on non-commercial radio broadcasts. He claimed that he had recorded the conversation between Diana and Gilbey "at hazard," that is, he came across it by pure chance on January 4, 1990. This date was later shown to be false, however. The published story was subjected to extreme skepticism by other commentators, who immediately began searching for a motive to account for the tape's release.

In late 1989, Prince Charles and Princess Diana were involved in divorce negotiations, which were becoming increasing acrimonious. The public appetite for details was immense; Charles's younger brother, Prince Andrew, duke of York, and Diana's close friend, the duchess of York (the former Sarah Ferguson), had also separated a few months earlier. The tribulations of Queen Elizabeth II's children were beginning to resemble a soap opera.

For the first time, because of Diana's complex relationship with the press—who followed her everywhere—the media were willingly being employed as so-called heavy artillery in the developing battle between the prince and princess. Although not public knowledge at the time, Diana had been supplying journalist Andrew Morton with material for a book that would tell her side of the case. In the absence of this knowledge about Diana and Morton, the public soon pointed to Charles, and cooperating government security services—who had been monitoring Diana's calls—as the person who leaked the tape in an attempt to fight back on the same battleground.

On September 5, The Sun announced that the conversation had been recorded by a second eavesdropper, Jane Norgrove (also a resident of Oxfordshire), who claimed that she came forward to clear up allegations regarding conspiracy theories and the possible involvement of the security services in the initial leak—a protestation that only served to add further fuel to such rumors. The rumors were boosted by an assertion made by a surveillance expert, William Parsons, that recording both sides of an intercepted telephone conversation with equal clarity would be almost impossible and that the tape must have been subject to sophisticated technical adjustment. The Sunday Times (London) commissioned security firm Audiotel International to analyze the tape. The subsequent report claimed that the tape contained pips (data bursts) that would normally have been edited out during transmission, and that there was a “background hum” that Reenan's equipment could not have recorded, suggestive of a tap on a land line. Two further tapes, of unknown origin, later surfaced in the offices of other newspapers.

The tape held by The Sun began during the middle of the Diana-Gilbey conversation, with Diana complaining about her depression and ill-treatment by the royal family, especially by Prince Charles, who was said to be making her life “torture.” The discussion also touched on the television soap opera EastEnders and Diana's fascination with her own alleged clairvoyance and spiritual beliefs. The conversation's shock value, however, came from its intimate tone, enhanced by the fear expressed by Diana that she might be pregnant. At the time of the conversation, Gilbey was working as a car salesperson, but he was the heir to a family fortune made in the manufacture of Gilbey's gin. He had known Diana since childhood and dated her before she was selected as Charles's bride, so the intimate tone was not particularly unusual; nor was Gilbey's use, following common practice among the English upper classes, of the term “darling” fourteen times and by the use of a nickname, Squidgy, fifty-three times. The latter appellation, however, caught the public's attention. The Sun initially dubbed the affair Dianagate but soon renamed it Squidgygate. A special public phone line was set up by the newspaper for the entire thirty-minute conversation.

James Gilbey. (AP/Wide World Photos)

IMPACT

Speculation regarding the origins of the Squidgygate tape reached such a pitch that the British home secretary, Kenneth Clarke, issued a formal denial that the British security service MI5 (the equivalent of the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency) had been involved in the affair in any way, but his denial did not reduce popular suspicion. The affair inevitably added considerably to Diana's own suspicions, casting a dark shadow of paranoia over her subsequent conduct, including her behavior on the night of her death in a car crash in Paris in 1997.

In 2002, Diana's former protection officer, Ken Wharfe, claimed that his own investigation covered all the parties involved but that he was unable to reveal the details for legal reasons—although he did hint that Diana's suspicions that she was being spied on had merit—thus further fueling the elaborate conspiracy theories surrounding the sequence of events. The most striking consequence of the first tape's release, however, was the tit-for-tat release of another tape to The Sun's rival tabloid, the Daily Mirror. This tape apparently was recorded on December 18, 1989, and included an intimate long-distance phone conversation between Prince Charles and his lover, and future wife, Camilla Parker Bowles. An Australian magazine, New Idea, published a transcript of the Charles-Bowles tape on January 13, 1993, and an international scandal was born.

Charles and Diana became increasingly desperate to manage media coverage after the release of the two tapes. Both gave high-profile television interviews to tell their sides of the story, but neither interview could be anything more than a futile exercise in damage limitation; the harm done to the image of the royal family was irreparable, and Diana's subsequent life was similarly blighted. Insofar as the private war between the two individuals, the photogenic Diana was always bound to win, in spite of the embarrassment caused by the first tape's release, but that she had to die to seal her victory completed the lesson delivered by Squidgygate regarding the deleterious effects of media scandal.

—Brian Stableford

FURTHER READING

- Brown, Tina. The Diana Chronicles. New York: Doubleday, 2007. An attempt to definitively summarize Diana's life, by a high-profile journalist-editor and personal acquaintance of Diana who employs a sensationalistic tone throughout the book.
- Jephson, Patrick. Shadow of a Princess. New York: HarperCollins, 2000. A glaring exception to the general run of hagiographic-style studies, written by Diana's one-time private secretary.
- Levine, Michael. The Princess and the Package: Exploring the Love-Hate Relationship Between Diana and the Media. Los Angeles: Renaissance, 1998. A more cerebral account than the journalistic biographies, attempting to put Diana's dealings with the press into the context of a more general account of the contemporary production and negotiation of celebrity.
- Morton, Andrew. Diana: Her True Story, in Her Own Words. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1997. The second, expanded version of a text initially published in 1992 as Diana: Her True Story, which had caused a scandal in its own right. This new version includes direct transcripts of Morton's own conversations with Diana, which prove that she indeed had given him the information contained in the 1992 version of the book.
- Paxman, Jeremy. On Royalty: A Very Polite Inquiry into Some Strangely Related Families. New York: PublicAffairs, 2006. A serious exploration of the institution of royalty, with insightful attention to the late twentieth century problems plaguing the House of Windsor.
- Smith, Sally Bedell. Diana in Search of Herself: Portrait of a Troubled Princess. New York: Times Books, 1999. A journalistic account with slightly more pretension to analytical acuity than most of its rivals.
- Wharfe, Ken. Diana: Closely Guarded Secret. London: Michael O'Mara, 2002. The book in which Diana's former protection officer vaguely endorsed Diana's suspicions regarding her surveillance by British security and the source of the tape.

SEE ALSO: Dec. 10, 1936: King Edward VIII Abdicates to Marry an American Divorcée; Mar. 2–Sept. 25, 1963: John Profumo Affair Rocks British Government; Oct. 14, 1983: British Cabinet Secretary Parkinson Resigns After His Secretary Becomes Pregnant; July 25, 1987: Novelist–Politician Jeffrey Archer Wins Libel Trial Against the Daily Star; Dec. 18, 1989: Prince Charles’s Intimate Phone Conversation with Camilla Parker Bowles Is Taped; Sept. 24, 1992: British Cabinet Member David Mellor Resigns over Romantic Affair; Jan. 5, 1994: British Cabinet Member Resigns After Fathering a Child Out of Wedlock; Aug. 31, 1997: Princess Diana Dies in a Car Crash; Sept. 28, 2002: British Politician Reveals Her Affair with Prime Minister John Major; Jan. 21, 2006: British Politician Resigns After Gay–Sex Orgy; Apr. 26, 2006: Britain’s Deputy Prime Minister Admits Affair with Secretary.

September 24, 1992

BRITISH CABINET MEMBER DAVID MELLOR RESIGNS OVER ROMANTIC AFFAIR

David Mellor, a member of British prime minister John Major’s cabinet, became embroiled in scandal when actor Antonia de Sancha detailed her affair with Mellor in the popular tabloid newspaper The People. Mellor’s problems worsened when the press reported he received two free vacations, one from a daughter of an official of the Palestine Liberation Organization. Mellor resigned soon after the story broke.

LOCALE: London, England

CATEGORIES: Sex; publishing and journalism; government; politics

KEY FIGURES

David Mellor (b. 1949), British politician and heritage minister

John Major (b. 1943), British prime minister, 1990–1997

Antonia de Sancha (b. 1961), British film actor

SUMMARY OF EVENT

When conservative politician John Major succeeded the equally conservative Margaret Thatcher as Great Britain’s prime minister in 1990, he promoted arts minister David Mellor to a cabinet post, first as chief secretary to the treasury (1990–1992)

then to the newly created National Heritage Department as its secretary in April, 1992. The British public was not sure of this new department’s function, and when it became clear its responsibilities included sports and the leisure industry, Mellor was dubbed “minister for fun.” One of his first actions was to try to curb press invasions of privacy. The popular press, therefore, became increasingly hostile toward him.

Mellor had graduated from Cambridge University and trained as a lawyer until 1972. He became a member of Parliament (MP) for Putney, London, in 1979, the same year Thatcher became Britain’s first woman prime minister. He served in a number of junior ministerial posts under Thatcher, beginning in 1981, although unlike his friend and contemporary, Major, he never attained cabinet status in his appointments. Mellor’s most important office was as arts minister in 1990.

The popular press around this time was beginning to sense an increasing hostility by the public toward politicians in power. Major, too, seemed above reproach, though events showed later that he was not. So the press began private investigations of many of the Conservative Party MPs, especially those with some office. During the next two years, more than twenty Conservative politicians were forced to resign over press allegations. A number of libel cases were contested, and several inquiries were set up to investigate various allegations, such as illegal arms sales to Iraq. Although some of the allegations were disproved, the period became known for “government sleaze,” as it was termed.

Mellor was the first politician exposed in this series of scandals that, many have argued, erupted for several reasons. Some believed the prime minister was too lenient in cases of marital unfaithfulness. Others said the press was out of control in its intrusiveness. Still others said the public believed the Conservatives had been in power too long and were growing corrupt and out of touch with the people. Each argument had some merit. Certainly, though, the scandals showed that no longer could MPs expect their private lives to remain private.

In July, 1992, the prime minister was warned that the Sunday tabloid newspaper The People was about to unleash a well-documented account of Mellor having a romantic affair with a little-known film actor, Antonia de Sancha. The story ran on July 19. A reporter from the paper had convinced Sancha’s landlord to bug her apartment, and the reporter was able to listen in on her telephone calls, which included calls with Mellor. The People’s editor Bill Hagerty defended the legality of the paper’s action in the name of public interest, a defense Mellor had been working to limit. In fact, it proved to be perfectly legal to bug one’s own property (as the landlord did). The actor reportedly was paid sixty thousand dollars for her story, and the details she supplied were sometimes quite lurid. Hagerty, following attacks on his professional integrity, would later say that Mellor’s resignation was the first “decent thing” Mellor had accomplished for some time.

Prime Minister Major took the advice of his cabinet secretary, Robin Butler, who assured Major that no national security had been breached through the affair, and that the people most hurt were Mellor’s own wife, Judith, and his children. Major, therefore, rejected all calls for firing Mellor. However, during the summer recess of Parliament, with little other interesting news, the popular press kept digging up Mellor’s private life, and by September it had unearthed a few more details.

The first of these discoveries was that Mellor had received a Spanish holiday from Mona Bauwens, the daughter of Jaweed al-Ghusein, the treasurer of the Palestine Liberation Organization. The second discovery was Mellor’s receipt of a similar holiday, paid for by the ruler of the United Arab Emirates state of Abu Dhabi. These gifts clearly were of national interest. Major again consulted Butler, but the 1922 committee, comprising Conservative backbench MPs and chaired by Sir Marcus Fox, already had met on the issue and insisted on Mellor’s resignation. On September 24, Mellor handed in his resignation, which Major accepted with reluctance. Mellor’s resignation letter avoided any mention of personal shame for past actions.

IMPACT

Mellor’s reputation had been tarnished and his career ended because of not only his affair but also his acceptance of the travel gifts. Major’s government was tarnished as well. The press, having sensed its own power along with Major’s vulnerability, pursued a number of other government ministers. Despite Major’s protestations that his administration, and his party, had a policy of decency, the press considered his administration hypocritical. Efforts to suppress the freedom of the press withered away because of this assumption of hypocrisy. It could be argued that the stunning defeat of the Conservative government five years later at the hands of Tony Blair’s Labour Party took some of its origins from this seemingly insignificant incident involving Mellor.

Mellor himself failed to hold government office again and was finally defeated in the 1997 election, though he was asked to be part of the new Labour government’s Football Task Force from 1997 to 1999. However, his legal career continued, as he had been named a Queen’s Counsel in 1987. After Mellor left office, his interest in the arts and in sport led to radio jobs with the British Broadcasting Corporation and to journalistic work. Ironically, one of his jobs would be as a columnist with The People, the very newspaper that had discredited him five years before. The public was then quite forgiving of him. However, his marriage came to an end in 1995.

The sexual improprieties of office-holding politicians remained under the unforgiving scrutiny of the popular press and the British general public from the time Mellor's affair came to light in 1992. Even Major could not resist commenting on the affairs of officeholders when he wryly quoted Jack Lang, a French minister of culture, who had said, "An affair with an actress! Why else does one become minister of culture?"

When Labour came to power, press interest shifted to Labour politicians. Psychologists also began to study the effect of overexposure to publicity, an effect that was found to lead to a sort of moral numbness. More cogently, perhaps, the separation of MPs from their families, their sense of power, and the attraction of alcohol and sex under these conditions have been described as likely reasons for the continuing improprieties of public officials. The scandals, in turn, led the media to expose private lives that, in the modern world of instant communication, are no longer private.

—David Barratt

FURTHER READING

Clark, Alan. Diaries: In Power. London: Weidenfeld & Nicholson, 2003. Clark's diaries recount the Thatcher and Major years of government and give intimate details into the affairs and indiscretions of a number of ministers.

Major, John. The Autobiography. New York: HarperCollins, 2000. Prime Minister Major's autobiography, which includes an account of Mellor's resignation. Also includes Major's opinion of the scandal and subsequent attacks on the Conservative Party.

Woodhouse, Diana. Ministers and Parliament: Accountability in Theory and Practice. New York: Oxford University Press, 1994. Woodhouse examines the resignation scandals of modern British politics, seeing patterns of responsibility and accountability. Mellor's case is studied in some detail.

SEE ALSO: July 10, 1934: Sex Scandal Forces Resignation of Alberta Premier Brownlee; Mar. 2–Sept. 25, 1963: John Profumo Affair Rocks British Government; Jan. 26, 1979: Former Vice President Nelson Rockefeller Dies Mysteriously; Oct. 14, 1983: British Cabinet Secretary Parkinson Resigns After His Secretary Becomes Pregnant; July 25, 1987: Novelist-Politician Jeffrey Archer Wins Libel Trial Against the Daily Star; Aug. 10, 1989: Japanese Prime Minister Sosuke Resigns After Affair with a Geisha; Dec. 18, 1989: Prince Charles's Intimate Phone Conversation with Camilla Parker Bowles Is Taped; Jan. 5, 1994: British Cabinet Member Resigns After Fathering a Child Out of Wedlock; Jan. 17, 1998: President Bill Clinton Denies Sexual Affair with a White House Intern; Sept. 28, 2002: British Politician Reveals Her Affair with Prime Minister John Major; Apr. 26, 2006: Britain's Deputy Prime Minister Admits Affair with Secretary.

June 23, 1993LORENA BOBBITT SEVERS HER HUSBAND'S PENIS

Lorena Bobbitt cut off half of her abusive husband's penis while he was sleeping, then threw the penis into a field from her car window after she left their apartment. She was found not guilty of malicious wounding and was ordered to a psychiatric hospital for several weeks. John, whose penis was reattached by surgeons soon after the attack, was found not guilty of marital sexual assault. The case brought national attention to spousal rape and abuse, forced abortion, and battered woman, or person, syndrome.

LOCALE: Manassas, VirginiaCATEGORIES: Violence; psychology and psychiatry; women's issues; law and the courtsKEY FIGURES

Lorena Bobbitt (b. 1970), married to John Bobbitt
John Wayne Bobbitt (b. 1967), married to Lorena Bobbitt

David C. Reardon (b. 1956), expert witness for Lorena Bobbitt at her criminal trial

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Lorena Bobbitt, born in Bucay, Ecuador, married a U.S. Marine, John Wayne Bobbitt, on June 18, 1989. The marriage was the first for both, but it was not a happy one. On the evening of June 23, 1993, Bobbitt, at this time out of the Marine Corps, had been partying and returned home drunk to the couple's apartment in Manassas, Virginia. John demanded that Lorena have sex with him; she declined and he raped her. After John fell asleep, Lorena left the bedroom for some water in the kitchen. She testified that she saw an eight-inch carving knife on a counter and, wanting retribution against John for his continued abuse during the marriage, snapped, grabbed the knife, returned to the bedroom, and cut off half of John's penis while he was sleeping. According to media reports, she had requested a restraining order against John just two days before her attack.

After severing John's penis, Lorena immediately left the apartment while clutching the organ in her hand. She drove a short distance before rolling down the car window and throwing the penis into a neighboring field. She then returned home and called 911 to report the incident. The police conducted an extensive search for the severed organ. Upon finding it in the field, they packed it in ice and brought it to the hospital, where John had been taken after the attack. After more than nine hours of surgery, two surgeons were able to reattach John's severed penis.

Lorena was charged with felony malicious wounding and could have been sentenced to twenty years in prison. Because the attack allegedly was in response to years of abuse by John, he, too, was charged with a crime—marital sexual assault. John was acquitted of the sexual assault in September, 1993, and Lorena entered a plea of not guilty by reason of insanity. During trial, she testified that her husband abused her physically and mentally, raped her, and was unfaithful. She also said that John forced her to have an abortion one year into their marriage, which left her emotionally scarred. Several witnesses testified on Lorena's behalf and confirmed her claims of abuse. She became one of the first to argue insanity as a defense in a case of battered woman syndrome (or battered person syndrome), whereby a battered person becomes unable to take action to stop repeated physical or psychological abuse, or both.

Despite its seeming popularity, the insanity defense is rarely used in criminal cases and is not likely to be successful. Meeting the legal definition of insanity is difficult in most states. Lorena, however, was successful in her case. A jury found her not guilty by reason of insanity based on the state of Virginia's irresistible impulse test. Irresistible impulse is a test of a person's volition (movement or action) and loss of control rather than his or her knowledge of right and wrong. Many state statutes provide that insanity is not a defense if the person committing the crime knows and understands the difference between right and wrong at the time the crime is committed. Lorena knew that what she did was wrong, and her insanity defense would have failed in most states. However, under Virginia's irresistible impulse test, Lorena only needed to show that she was unable to control her behavior because of a mental "defect."

Lorena Bobbitt and John Wayne Bobbitt. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Lorena's attorneys argued that at the time of the crime she was suffering from depression and post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD), and that she believed she had to escape from her husband—and his penis—because of past abuse. Lorena's condition was supported by experts who claimed that her impulse to sever her husband's penis became irresistible after the rape that same evening.

One defense expert, David C. Reardon, testified that Lorena may have snapped because of her forced abortion from years earlier. Lorena told Reardon that she continued to have flashbacks about the abortion, and Reardon suggested that she was suffering from a mental condition known as postabortion trauma. Lorena also claimed that she had been having anxiety attacks and abdominal cramps days before the attack on her husband, symptoms Reardon interpreted as characteristic of PTSD and likely caused by the forced abortion. Finally, he suggested that Lorena's fear that she would not be able to have children in the future because of the abortion also contributed to her temporary insanity and inability to control her behavior. He compared Lorena's forced abortion to sexual mutilation and testified that Lorena was seeking retribution against her husband by castrating him.

On January 21, 1994, Lorena was found not guilty by reason of insanity. Virginia law required that she be sent to a mental hospital for observation and diagnosis to determine if she should remain institutionalized or be released. She spent forty-five days in a state mental facility and, based on reports from the psychiatric hospital, was ordered released because she no longer posed a danger to herself or others. Lorena, however, was required to have weekly outpatient therapy and was forbidden to leave the state.

IMPACT

Lorena and John Bobbitt were divorced in 1995 and Lorena resumed her birth name, Gallo. Although Lorena became a symbol for women's self-defense against domestic abuse, she continued to have legal problems. In 1997, she was charged with assaulting her mother with a punch while her mother was watching television. Four months after the incident, Lorena was found guilty of the assault.

About a year after having surgery to reattach his penis, John was declared fully recovered. Needing money to pay for his medical costs, he formed a musical band called the Severed Parts. The band was not successful, however, so he turned to making pornographic films, including John Wayne Bobbitt Uncut (1994) and Frankenpenis (1996). This venture failed as well. John has had various jobs since the attack, including bartender, mover, tow-truck operator, brothel employee, and chapel minister, and also had more legal problems. He was convicted of several crimes, including domestic abuse, assault and battery, and larceny, and he violated his parole.

The media sensationalized the Bobbitt case, and it became a humorist's treasure trove. New words were coined from the case, and the Bobbitt name, which became synonymous with male castration, has been mentioned in musical lyrics, books of fiction, and on television shows. One common motto following the scandal was "Lorena Bobbitt for Surgeon General." Even though Lorena used a violent method to defend herself against her husband, feminist and women's groups defended her, and she became a sort of hero.

The media's attention to the Bobbitt case brought to light domestic violence, the psychological impact of forced abortions, marital rape, and battered woman syndrome. All became topics of national debate and discussion. For many, Lorena's attack was an understandable act of self-defense, and it has since come to symbolize the anger, rage, and resentment felt by abused women and has come to justify their fighting back against their abusers.

—Carol A. Rolf

FURTHER READING

Davoli, Joanmarie. "Reconsidering the Consequences of an Insanity Acquittal." New England Journal on Criminal and Civil Confinement 31, no. 1 (Winter, 2005): 3-14. A journal article that examines the use of the insanity defense in light of studies of the effects of acquittals based on a person's claim of insanity.

Pershing, Linda. "His Wife Seized His Prize and Cut It to Size: Folk and Popular Commentary on Lorena Bobbitt." National Women's Studies Association Journal 8, no. 3 (Fall, 1996): 1-35. Contrary to this article's fun-and-games title, the discussion focuses on the academic topic of language use in popular culture in the aftermath of the Bobbitt scandal.

Ragle, Larry. Crime Scene. New York: Avon Books, 2002. Explores the collection of crime-scene evidence and the role of forensic science and medical technology in solving unusual crimes, including the Bobbitt case.

Walker, Lenore E. A. The Battered Woman Syndrome. 2d ed. New York: Springer, 2000. Walker explains the characteristics of battered woman syndrome, its relation to post-traumatic stress disorder, and its use in insanity-defense cases.

Westervelt, Sandra Davis. Shifting the Blame: How Victimization Became a Criminal Defense. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1998. Discussion of the insanity defense, as employed by abuse victims, including Lorena Bobbitt. Also discusses verdicts of not guilty by reason of insanity in cases of spousal abuse.

SEE ALSO: Apr. 4, 1958: Actor Lana Turner's Daughter Kills Turner's Gangster Lover; Mar. 13, 1964: Kitty Genovese Dies as Her Cries for Help Are Ignored; Mar. 10, 1980: Scarsdale Diet Doctor Is Killed by His Lover; Dec. 22, 1984: Subway Vigilante Bernhard Goetz Shoots Four Black Youths; Mar., 1990: Menendez Brothers Are Arrested for Murdering Their Parents; May 19, 1992: Amy Fisher Shoots Mary Jo Buttafuoco; June 12, 1994: Double Murder Leads to Sensational O. J. Simpson Trial.

January 5, 1994

BRITISH CABINET MEMBER RESIGNS AFTER FATHERING A CHILD OUT OF WEDLOCK

Tim Yeo, a Conservative member of the British parliament who publicly espoused traditional family values, fathered a child out of wedlock. The child's mother was a local Conservative politician and attorney, Julia Stent, who told the media that Yeo was the father of her child. The scandal led to Yeo's resignation as a government minister, but he remained a member of Parliament. The scandal was a major blow to Prime Minister John Major's conservative agenda.

LOCALES: London and Suffolk, England

CATEGORIES: Politics; sex; government; public morals; families and children

KEY FIGURES

Tim Yeo (b. 1945), Conservative member of British parliament from Sudbury South, 1983-

Julia Stent (b. 1960), attorney and council member for Hackney, London

Aldine Horrigan (b. 1936), mayor of Haverhill, Suffolk, and local Conservative Party branch chair

John Major (b. 1943), British prime minister, 1990-1997

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Tim Yeo was a popular member of John Major's Conservative government in Great Britain, fully backing Major's so-called Back to Basics agenda. News of his affair with a London attorney and politician, and the subsequent birth of their child, brought his government career to a temporary halt. For the Conservative government, the revelation was a major embarrassment because it had been stressing traditional values, responsibility, and fidelity, especially in family life. Yeo also was a vocal proponent of this agenda.

Yeo was born in Lewisham, a suburb in southeastern London, in 1945. He was educated at the prestigious private school Charterhouse in Godalming, Surrey, and then went on to Emmanuel College, Cambridge, where he was active in student politics and earned a master's degree in history in 1968. He gained a position with the Bankers Trust Company in London, and from 1970 to 1973 was an assistant treasurer there. In 1970, he married Diane Helen Pickard, with whom he had a son and a daughter. In 1975, he became a director of the Worcester Engineering Company, a position he retained until 1986. In 1980, he was appointed chief executive of a major British charity, the Spastics Society, or Scope. He held the post until his parliamentary career began in 1983.

Yeo had tried unsuccessfully to enter Parliament in 1974 as a Conservative Party candidate for the constituency of Bedwelty, Wales, a safe Labour Party seat. He was looking for a more winnable seat when Aldine Horrigan, chairman of the Sudbury South local Conservative Party, backed him to run as the candidate in her constituency, even though a sitting Conservative member of Parliament already was seated. A redrawing of boundaries gave Horrigan the excuse to push for a new candidate in what was technically a new constituency. Yeo was their candidate, and he ran for office in the 1983 election. The Conservative government of Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher was then at the height of its influence and power, and Yeo was easily elected.

Yeo's first experience in government office came in 1988, when he was appointed private parliamentary secretary to Foreign Secretary Douglas Hurd. After Major defeated Thatcher to become prime minister, subsequently winning the next election, Yeo got his first major appointment, as minister of the environment and countryside, in 1992. Major was launching a new Conservative Party manifesto, called Back to Basics, which emphasized traditional values and public morality, among other things. Yeo committed to this manifesto and even spoke out against increases in benefits for single-parent families.

However, while working in London away from his family in 1992 and 1993, Yeo had struck up a sexual liaison with Julia Stent, a young attorney in her early thirties, through her involvement with Hackney Borough Council as a Conservative councillor. Stent became pregnant, and she had a child in July, 1993. The affair and child were hushed up at the time, but finally came to the attention of Horrigan on the day after Christmas, 1993. Horrigan believed Yeo had betrayed the Back to Basics campaign and called a meeting of the constituency committee to discuss the matter, hoping to censure Yeo.

Inevitably, the story broke, and in a short time made sensational national headlines, especially with the popular, tabloid press. Yeo admitted he had been “foolish” over the affair, but at first stated he saw no reason to resign. He did not feel his stand on family values was compromised. Although his fellow government ministers uttered general support for him, there was a feeling that if the local party did not back him, he would need to leave office. Several previous ministers, including David Mellor and Michael Mates, were forced to resign in similar circumstances, even though Prime Minister Major had supported them.

Debate was confused at this point. Major insisted his Back to Basics program was not about private morality but rather about methods of delivery. Stent refused to comment on what she considered a private matter. On the other hand, the archbishop of York had weighed in, accusing political leaders of moral and spiritual bankruptcy, and Labour Party leader John Smith accused the government of being in retreat on its own manifesto. Plenty of earlier statements by Conservative leaders showed that they did indeed include private morality and family responsibility in their campaign. Sir Norman Fowler, the party leader, was accused of letting the affair drift out of control.

Above all, the deafening silence of the local constituency party and its failure to publicly support Yeo at its meeting on January 4 forced Yeo's resignation from his government position the following day. However, the call to deselect him altogether as a local MP failed at a branch meeting held on January 14, and he retained his seat in Parliament.

IMPACT

For Major's government, the Yeo-Stent affair and Yeo's subsequent resignation were major blows to its Conservative agenda. The prime minister had to enter into a damage-limitation exercise, redefining what the term Back to Basics meant. In the end, however, this attempt only trivialized the campaign, and it was scrapped.

The Yeo affair became one of a long list of resignations forced on government ministers because of sexual affairs and other indiscretions. When this later became compounded by internal divisions over the European Union, Major's government was considered ineffective and weak. In the 1997 elections, the Conservatives suffered a landslide defeat, as a victorious Labour Party swept in under the youthful new prime minister, Tony Blair.

Yeo suffered much less than he might have. He retained his seat in the safe Suffolk constituency and was appointed by the new Conservative Party leader, William Hague, as spokesperson on environment, transport, and the regions. Under the next party leader, Iain Duncan Smith, Yeo was made a member of the shadow cabinet, as shadow secretary of state for trade and industry. In 2001, as shadow minister of agriculture, he played a leading role in exposing the Labour government's mishandling of the foot-and-mouth disease epidemic. In 2003, under new leader Michael Howard, he became shadow education and health secretary. In the leadership contest following the party's defeat in the general election, Yeo was briefly considered as a possible candidate. In fact, in the new Parliament he became chairman of the House of Commons environmental audit select committee. His career diversified as well as he became a writer on agricultural topics and a business speaker.

—David Barratt

FURTHER READING

Clark, Alan. Diaries: In Power. London: Weidenfeld & Nicholson, 2003. Clark's diaries recount the Thatcher and Major years of government and give intimate details into the affairs and indiscretions of a number of ministers.

Major, John. The Autobiography. New York: HarperCollins, 2000. Contains Major's perspectives on Yeo's resignation, putting it in context of the wider Back to Basics campaign.

The Times, London, January 5-6, 1994. Gives a restrained view of the breaking scandal of Yeo's affair.

Woodhouse, Diana. Ministers and Parliament: Accountability in Theory and Practice. New York: Oxford University Press, 1994. Woodhouse examines the resignation scandals of modern British politics, seeing patterns of responsibility and accountability.

SEE ALSO: Dec. 10, 1936: King Edward VIII Abdicates to Marry an American Divorcée; Mar. 2-Sept. 25, 1963: John Profumo Affair Rocks British Government; Aug. 4, 1978: British Politician Jeremy Thorpe Is Charged with Attempted Murder; Oct. 14, 1983: British Cabinet Secretary Parkinson Resigns After His Secretary Becomes Pregnant; July 25, 1987: Novelist-Politician Jeffrey Archer Wins Libel Trial Against the Daily Star; Dec. 18, 1989: Prince Charles's Intimate Phone Conversation with Camilla Parker Bowles Is Taped; Aug. 23, 1992: Princess Diana's Phone Conversation with Her Lover Is Made Public; Sept. 24, 1992: British Cabinet Member David Mellor Resigns over Romantic Affair; May, 1999: Civil Rights Leader Jesse Jackson Fathers a Child Out of Wedlock; Sept. 28, 2002: British Politician Reveals Her Affair with Prime Minister John Major; Jan. 21, 2006: British Politician Resigns After Gay-Sex Orgy; Apr. 26, 2006: Britain's Deputy Prime Minister Admits Affair with Secretary.

April 28, 1994

U.S. NAVAL ACADEMY EXPELS MIDSHIPMEN FOR CHEATING

A number of cadets at the U.S. Naval Academy had been expelled from the institution in the wake of a widespread cheating scandal. A backlash to the sanctions, believed to have been unequally doled out, led to further investigations by outside agencies, who looked into the cheating, the integrity of the Naval Academy, and the integrity of U.S. service academies as a whole. The scandal also affected the academy's tradition of policing its own based on its honor code.

LOCALE: Annapolis, Maryland

CATEGORIES: Education; corruption; military; government; ethics

KEY FIGURES

Thomas C. Lynch (b. 1942), U.S. Navy rear admiral and Naval Academy superintendent, 1991-1994

John H. Dalton (b. 1941), secretary of the U.S. Navy, 1993-1998

Frank B. Kelso, Jr. (b. 1933), U.S. Navy admiral, chief of Naval Operations, 1990-1994

Charles R. Larson (b. 1936), U.S. Navy admiral, commander in chief of the Pacific Command, 1991-1994

SUMMARY OF EVENT

On April 28, 1994, twenty-four midshipmen were expelled from the United States Naval Academy for cheating on an electrical engineering examination more than one year earlier, marking the culmination of a series of investigations that had demoralized students and brought to light serious problems at the military institution. In the fall of 1992 a number of midshipmen, students at the college, obtained information about the contents of a test being administered in an electrical engineering course. Some of

THE U.S. NAVAL ACADEMY'S HONOR CONCEPT

Midshipmen are persons of integrity: They stand for that which is right.

They tell the truth and ensure that the full truth is known. They do not lie.

They embrace fairness in all actions. They ensure that work submitted as their own is their own, and that assistance received from any source is authorized and properly documented. They do not cheat.

They respect the property of others and ensure that others are able to benefit from the use of their own property. They do not steal.

these students shared the information with others enrolled in the course. Shortly thereafter, news of the cheating ring was brought to the attention of academy officials. Several dozen midshipmen were identified for cheating, among them at least eight members of the academy's football team.

While the punishment for cheating varies widely among colleges and universities in the United States, any form of cheating at a military service academy is considered a serious breach of that institution's honor code. Normally, determination of guilt or innocence is made by an honor board consisting of fellow students, who either exonerate their fellow midshipman or recommend to the superintendent that a violator be immediately expelled. Hence, when word of this new cheating scandal spread among members of the brigade of midshipmen, most expected that all who had cheated would be dismissed. Rear Admiral Thomas C. Lynch, the academy superintendent, did not see the situation in such simple terms. It became apparent quickly that quite a few students were involved in the case and subject to expulsion. The media would be eager to publicize such a story, given that just two years had passed since the academy was embroiled in a sexual harassment scandal. The new cheating incident threatened to further damage the institution's already tarnished reputation with the American public.

Nevertheless, in December, 1992, Admiral Lynch launched an investigation, enlisting the assistance of the Navy's Criminal Investigative Service, or

CIS. Its involvement suggested to many academy students that the theft of the examination was being treated as a criminal offense. The effect of the inquiry on campus was chilling. At the same time, rumors began circulating that the superintendent was unwilling to dismiss certain offending students, especially members of the football team. The initial investigation was completed in the spring of 1993. Twenty-eight midshipmen were implicated. Only six, however, stood before honor boards and were recommended for expulsion, which were upheld by Admiral Lynch. The expelled students then appealed his decision to the secretary of the Navy.

Admiral Frank B. Kelso, Jr., a graduate of the Naval Academy, was serving as acting secretary of the Navy at the time the investigation was completed. He was concerned by the allegations of mismanagement and of favoritism within the investigation, so he directed a new inquiry to be headed by the Navy's inspector general. More than one dozen investigators spent months interviewing the students who had taken the electrical engineering examination. The scope of the cheating became apparent as the inquiry progressed, and investigators learned that some midshipmen even sold classmates copies of the examination in advance of testing. Also of concern was the widespread disregard for the honor code on which the institution had relied for years as a means of self-policing among midshipmen.

Meanwhile, newspapers such as The Washington Post, Baltimore Sun, and The New York Times carried detailed accounts of the proceedings during the sixteen months between the initial discovery of the cheating and outcome of the investigations. The media also paid special attention to the fate of the former Navy football players whose involvement as ringleaders in the cheating scandal allegedly sparked the controversy.

By the time the lengthy inquiry was completed in the spring of 1994, 134 midshipmen, by this time all seniors, had been implicated. A special honor panel consisting of three Navy admirals reviewed the inspector general's findings and made recommendations to the new secretary of the Navy, John H. Dalton, regarding each case. Dalton, also a Naval Academy graduate, understood the gravity of the situation and wanted to be certain he dealt evenhandedly with each of the accused. After reviewing the evidence, he ordered the expulsion of twenty-four midshipmen and retained forty-two. Because the decisions were handed down just weeks before the implicated midshipmen were scheduled to graduate, the press zeroed in on the incident. Reporters were concerned that a considerable amount of taxpayers' money had been spent on the investigation. They also focused on the fate of expelled midshipmen, who under current regulations could have been forced to pay back the cost of their education or enter the Navy not as commissioned officers but as enlisted personnel. Dalton waived both requirements.

The U.S. Department of Defense took immediate steps to restore integrity and trust in academy leadership. Admiral Charles R. Larson, a former academy superintendent who in 1994 was commander in chief of the Pacific Command, was asked to return to the academy to lead the institution. Given that Larson was under consideration at the time for appointment as chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and as chief of naval operations, it was obvious that he was held in high esteem. The designation of a senior admiral to a position normally held by an officer of lower rank was an immediate signal that Defense Department officials considered the situation at the academy a top priority.

IMPACT

The cheating scandal at the Naval Academy was devastating to the institution as a whole. The cheating was demoralizing in itself, but the generally held belief that the superintendent had shown favoritism in dealing with alleged offenders and had tried to minimize the incident and cover up details was especially harmful to students who had rightly assumed that their leaders were persons of fairness and integrity. The incident ended the career of Admiral Lynch, who decided to retire.

The academy's honor code was affected as well. Because outsiders such as Navy CIS and the Navy's Office of the Inspector General entered the investigation, the time-honored tradition of allowing midshipmen to enforce the honor code themselves was violated. Also, the cheating scandal—coupled with reports of continuing sexual harassment at Annapolis and the Army academy at West Point, New York, and the U.S. Air Force Academy at Colorado Springs, Colorado—led the U.S. Congress to initiate hearings on the state of operations at all the service academies. Congress wanted to ensure that appropriate steps were taken to protect the rights of all individuals involved. Outside review and direction, even from Congress, altered the Naval Academy's freedom to establish its own rules for dealing with internal matters, that is, for taking care of its own.

—Laurence W. Mazzeno

FURTHER READING

Fleming, Bruce. Annapolis Autumn: Life, Death, and Literature at the U.S. Naval Academy. New York: New Press, 2005. Examines the cheating scandal from the perspective of a academy faculty member. Discusses the personal reactions of a number of midshipmen involved in the incident.

Gantar, Jeffrey, and Tom Patten. A Question of Honor. Grand Rapids, Mich.: Zondervan, 1996. Personal account of the scandal by a midshipman accused of cheating. Provides details of actions taken by officials at the Naval Academy and the reaction of midshipmen to the charges and subsequent investigations.

Gelfland, H. Michael. Sea Change at Annapolis: The United States Naval Academy, 1949-2000. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2006. Brief assessment of the cheating scandal in light of the many changes and challenges facing both the students and faculty at the Naval Academy in the second half of the twentieth century.

Valentine, Paul. "Two Dozen Expelled in Naval Academy Cheating Scandal." The Washington Post, April 28, 1994. Describes the outcome of the Naval Academy's probe of the scandal, de-tailoring facts uncovered during the sixteen-month investigation.

SEE ALSO: Apr. 4, 1976: West Point Cadets Are Caught Cheating on Exams; June 26, 1992: U.S. Navy Secretary Resigns in the Wake of Tailhook Sexual Assault Scandal; May 20, 1997: Air Force Prosecution of Female Officer for Adultery Reveals Double Standard; Jan. 2, 2003: E-mail Message Prompts Inquiry into Air Force Academy Sexual Assaults; June 22, 2005: U.S. Air Force Investigates Religious Intolerance at Its Academy; Feb. 18, 2007: Washington Post Exposes Decline of Walter Reed Army Hospital.

June 1, 1994

CONGRESSMAN DAN ROSTENKOWSKI IS INDICTED IN HOUSE POST OFFICE SCANDAL

As part of the House post office scandal, long-time U.S. representative Dan Rostenkowski, a Washington, D.C., power player, was indicted on charges that included exchanging postal stamps purchased for official House business for cash, buying expensive gifts for friends and family with government funds, and witness tampering. He was found guilty on some charges, served fifteen months in a federal white-collar-crime prison camp, and saw the end of an otherwise illustrious, influential career.

LOCALE: Washington, D.C.

CATEGORIES: Corruption; government; politics; hoaxes, frauds, and charlatanism; law and the courts

KEY FIGURES

Dan Rostenkowski (b. 1928), U.S. representative from Illinois, 1959-1995, and chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee

Robert V. Rota (fl. 1990's), former House postmaster

Carl Rauh (b. 1940), Rostenkowski's attorney

Robert S. Bennett (b. 1939), Rostenkowski's attorney

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Dan Rostenkowski was born in Chicago, Illinois, in 1928 and elected to the U.S. House of Representatives in 1958. In 1964 he became a member of the House Ways and Means Committee, which writes most tax legislation, and served as the committee's chairman from 1981 to 1994.

During this thirteen-year-period as chairman, Rostenkowski controlled the tax-writing committee with an iron fist. He played a significant part in the tax and trade policy formation during the Ronald Reagan administration of the 1980's. In particular, he helped push through the 1986 Tax Reform Act, which lowered taxes and simplified the rather complex and confusing tax code. He had established himself as one of the most dominant members of the House of Representatives and was expected to play a crucial role in numerous legislative battles for the Bill Clinton administration of the 1990's, battles that would include health care, tax reform, trade provisions, and welfare policy. However, Rostenkowski's reputation and political career quickly collapsed in the spring of 1994 when he was charged with more than one dozen counts of fraud and political corruption involving the House post office.

Rostenkowski had attended the prestigious St. John's Military Academy in Delafield, Wisconsin, for high school from 1942 to 1946. After graduation, he entered the U.S. Army's 7th Infantry Division and served in Korea from 1946 to 1948. After his military service he opted to continue his education at Loyola University in Chicago, where he attended from 1948 to 1951. After college, Rostenkowski began his political career as an Illinois state senator at the young age of twenty-four.

Rostenkowski's political roots date back to the early 1930's, when his father, Joseph P. Rostenkowski, served as a ward alderman and committee member for more than two decades between 1936 and 1961. His father's years of service to the Democratic Party provided his son with a strong political foundation on which to begin and, essentially, flourish. Eventually, the young Rostenkowski would follow in his father's footsteps. During his early years as a state senator, Rostenkowski cultivated a strong political friendship with Chicago mayor Richard Daley. Daley became Rostenkowski's mentor and helped him get elected to the U.S. House of Representatives in 1958. Thirty-five years after becoming a Congress member, his lengthy, successful career would come to an end.

On June 1, 1994, a federal grand jury indicted Rostenkowski on seventeen criminal corruption charges, including misuse of public and government funds, fraud, conspiracy, and concealing material facts. U.S. attorney Eric H. Holder, Jr., said at a news conference following the indictment,

The allegations contained in today's indictment represent a betrayal of the public trust for personal gain. In essence, this indictment alleges that Congressman Rostenkowski used his elective office to perpetuate an extensive fraud on the American people.

Rostenkowski's schemes allegedly cost taxpayers more than $500,000. Charges included witness tampering, mail fraud, and wire fraud. Between January, 1978, and April, 1991, he allegedly took at least $50,000 in cash disguised as purchases of stamps from the House post office. His coconspirator, former House postmaster Robert V. Rota, who also pleaded guilty to embezzlement, said that during a six-year period, Rostenkowski traded in postal vouchers for over $20,000, had taken stamps, and then sold those for cash. The investigation into Rostenkowski's illegal activities began in 1991, after Rota and his employees were being monitored for criminal activities in the House post office as well. Those investigations began in what came to be called the House post office scandal.

Rostenkowski also was accused of a kickback scam dating back to 1971. He had hired fourteen individuals to work for him, yet their work amounted to menial tasks such as mowing his lawn at his summer home and taking wedding photographs for his daughters. Some of his hires did no work. Those who did no work allegedly collected a substantial monthly paycheck and kicked back a portion of their salaries to Rostenkowski as a sign of gratitude for being hired. These employees would submit their government paychecks to Rostenkowski's Chicago office manager, who would then distribute the cash to the "ghost" employees for less than the actual value of their original paychecks.

From April, 1988, to January, 1992, Rostenkowski also allegedly used approximately $40,000 in office funds to buy expensive gifts for family and friends. Furthermore, he used more than $100,000 in House funds and over $70,000 in political-campaign funds to buy and rent automobiles for the personal use of his family members and his friends. Additionally, the most serious of the charges—witness tampering—occurred in September, 1993. After learning of the federal investigation into his past illicit activities, Rostenkowski also attempted to discourage a federal prosecution witness, an engraver who had inscribed plaques for crystal sculptures that he was giving as gifts to friends. Rostenkowski had billed these engravings to his government expense account at the House stationery shop but neglected to pay for them. This charge of witness tampering was by far the most severe allegation, bringing with it a possible criminal sentence of ten years in federal prison.

As the corruption unfolded and the federal investigation continued, Rostenkowski lost his leadership roles and lost his bid for reelection to the House. The first deal offered to Rostenkowski by the U.S. attorney, one that the Congress member publicly rejected, would have sent him to jail for six months and required him to pay a fine of roughly $38,000. Based on the advice of his high-profile defense attorneys, Carl Rauh and Robert S. Bennett, Rostenkowski accepted a plea agreement the following year that reduced the total number of criminal charges from seventeen to two—for mail fraud only. Finally, in April, 1996, he was sentenced to seventeen months in a federal white-collar-crime prison camp and was fined $100,000.

In May, before entering prison, Rostenkowski had successful prostate cancer surgery. On July 22, he began serving his sentence at the Federal Medical Center Rochester (in Minnesota) for white-collar prisoners. Following a full recovery from his cancer treatment, he was transferred to a federal minimum-security prison camp in Oxford, Wisconsin, which was near Chicago. The camp is known as a recreational house of reform for former crooked politicians and elderly mobsters. After serving fifteen months, Rostenkowski was given the chance to serve his last two months at a Salvation Army halfway house in Chicago until his formal release on October 15, 1997.

Rostenkowski was granted a full federal pardon in 2000 by President Bill Clinton, who pardoned more than seventy white-collar offenders in his last days in office. In the years following his release from prison, Rostenkowski worked as a political commentator, adjunct college professor, and chief executive officer of Danross Associates, Inc., a legislative consulting firm specializing in governmental affairs.

IMPACT

After more than three decades in Congress and as one of the nation's most powerful Democratic Party leaders, Rostenkowski saw his political career collapse almost instantaneously. The extent of his known illegal activities cost the American public close to half a million dollars and inadvertently brought attention to the many misuses of authority and power carried out by those persons who are elected to serve their constituents and represent them in Congress.

The U.S. Department of Justice's response to the myriad illicit activities carried out by Rostenkowski offered some hope that criminal and unethical acts carried out by politicians will not be tolerated. Although he was granted a full presidential pardon, the fact remains that Rostenkowski was caught, indicted, convicted, and imprisoned for his crimes. However, the public witnessed once again how political power, greed, and success breed crime and corruption. Politicians continue to cross moral and legal boundaries. Ultimately, Rostenkowski's greed destroyed his career, but it also further strained the public's fragile trust and faith in their elected officials.

Dan Rostenkowski outside the federal courthouse in Washington, D.C., following his arraignment on corruption charges on June 10, 1994. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

—Paul M. Klenowski

FURTHER READING

Cohen, Richard. Rostenkowski: The Pursuit of Power and the End of the Old Politics. Chicago: Ivan R. Dee, 2000. This work provides a detailed look at the rise and fall of one of Washington's most powerful members of Congress.

Merriner, James. Mr. Chairman: Power in Dan Rostenkowski's America. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 2002. An unauthorized biography of Rostenkowski, highlighting both the positive and negative aspects of his career as a politician.

Roberts, Robert North. Ethics in U.S. Government: An Encyclopedia of Investigations, Scandals, Reforms, and Legislation. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2001. A comprehensive encyclopedia documenting political scandals, ethical controversies, and investigations in the United States between 1775 and 2000.

Williams, Robert. Political Scandals in the United States: America in the Twentieth Century. New York: Routledge, 1998. This book gives a detailed history of American political scandal during the twentieth century, making special note of Rostenkowski's illicit crimes as a member of Congress.

SEE ALSO: Jan. 23, 1904: Senator Joseph R. Burton Is Convicted of Bribery; Jan. 13, 1913: Federal Judge Is Impeached for Profiting from His Office; May 12, 1924: Kentucky Congressman John W. Langley Is Convicted of Violating the Volstead Act; Nov. 16, 1951: Federal Tax Official Resigns After Accepting Bribes; Mar. 1, 1967: Adam Clayton Powell, Jr., Is Excluded from Congress; June 23, 1967: Senator Thomas J. Dodd Is Censured for Misappropriating Funds; Oct. 7, 1974: Congressman Wilbur D. Mills's Stripper Affair Leads to His Downfall; Oct. 11, 1979: Senate Denounces Herman E. Talmadge for Money Laundering; Feb. 2, 1980: Media Uncover FBI Sting Implicating Dozens of Lawmakers; Sept. 23, 1987: Plagiarism Charges End Joe Biden's Presidential Campaign; Aug. 5, 1994: Kenneth Starr Is Appointed to the Whitewater Investigation; Dec. 11, 1997: HUD Secretary Henry Cisneros Is Indicted for Lying to Federal Agents.

June 12, 1994

DOUBLE MURDER LEADS TO SENSATIONAL O. J. SIMPSON TRIAL

The discovery of the bodies of Nicole Brown Simpson and Ronald Goldman marked the beginning of one of the most notorious scandals and criminal trials in American history. Brown Simpson's former husband, O. J. Simpson, was charged with the crime and found not guilty, but he was found responsible for the murders in a civil trial. Simpson moved to Florida to avoid payments to the Brown and Goldman families on the civil judgment of $33.5 million.

LOCALE: Los Angeles, California

CATEGORIES: Murder and suicide; publishing and journalism; radio and television; law and the courts; racism

KEY FIGURES

Nicole Brown Simpson (1959-1994), former wife of O. J. Simpson

Ronald Goldman (1968-1994), waiter, who was a friend of Nicole Brown Simpson
O. J. Simpson (b. 1947), retired professional football player

SUMMARY OF EVENT

On the night of June 12, 1994, a couple walking their dogs came upon the dog of their neighbor, Nicole Brown Simpson. The Akita, wandering the streets, had what appeared to be blood stains on its fur. The neighbors, knowing that Brown Simpson's dog was not allowed to run loose, brought the dog to her condominium on Bundy Drive. Upon reaching the entry gate to the complex, they saw a ghastly, macabre scene and immediately notified police.

The police found the bodies of thirty-five-year-old Brown Simpson and her acquaintance, twenty-six-year-old Ronald Goldman. The two had been stabbed and slashed to death. The bruising on Brown Simpson's face and head showed that she was punched and bludgeoned into unconsciousness and was stabbed several times in her neck. She was nearly decapitated from a deep cut across her throat. Her body lay at the foot of a short flight of steps, and her blood ran down the tiles of the walkway. It appeared that she was unable to fight her attacker.

Goldman appeared to have struggled with his attacker. He received several defensive wounds and several shallow stab wounds and deep knife wounds to a thigh and to his aorta and neck. He also caused his murderer to lose a large leather glove, which would play a part in the criminal trial of the suspect in his and Brown Simpson's murder. Goldman was a waiter at a nearby restaurant, where Brown Simpson and her family had dined earlier that evening. After his shift, he returned Brown Simpson's mother's eyeglasses, which she had forgotten at the restaurant, to Brown Simpson.

The exact circumstances of the murder remains unknown, but the forensic reconstruction of the crime scene suggests the following: Brown Simpson was the primary target and Goldman was a secondary, or even situational, target. Evidence on their bodies and at the crime scene suggests that Brown Simpson was bludgeoned and stabbed into unconsciousness before Goldman was attacked and killed. The attacker returned to Brown Simpson, grabbed her hair, pulled her head back to expose her throat, and made a fatal knife slash.

The murders, for the most part, were unremarkable as common domestic homicides. They were, however, exceptionally violent and brutal, suggesting a crime of passion. The sole suspect in the case, O. J. Simpson, the former husband of Brown Simpson and a former star professional football player, made this case remarkable. Although he was retired from football, Simpson kept himself in the public eye by limited acting and by promoting products on television. He also was noted by the media for his golf games with the rich and famous. His celebrity status made this domestic homicide case a different case altogether. The criminal evidence made him the only suspect.

O. J. Simpson, in an infamous court scene, is unable to put on the leather gloves the prosecution claimed he wore as he allegedly murdered Nicole Brown Simpson and Ronald Goldman. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Although the police investigation and interrogation were less than illustrious, the evidence against Simpson was overwhelming. His blood (from a deep finger cut) was found at the crime scene. Blood from both victims and from the suspect was found in or near Simpson's Ford Bronco and on a glove found near the crime scene. Hair from Goldman and fibers from the Bronco were found on that same glove, and the matching glove was found on Simpson's property. The glove type was uncommon, yet Simpson owned a pair. Furthermore, Simpson had received promotional knives from a manufacturer, any number of which could have been used in the murders.

Most usually, brutal murders are precipitated by an emotionally significant event in the life of the perpetrator. On the day of the murders, Simpson had been embarrassed in public after Brown Simpson failed to save a seat for him at his daughter's recital. In a packed auditorium, he was forced to wander up and down the aisles to find a seat. Also, his girlfriend at the time testified that she had broken up with him the day of the murders.

Simpson's murder trial was a media sensation. Every aspect of the trial was filmed, reported upon, discussed in print and on the air, and remarked upon by media-appointed experts. Major debate about race, racism, and domestic violence surfaced not only among commentators but also a divided public, and Simpson's defense relied heavily upon issues of race and racism as factors in the investigation and trial. The prosecution focused heavily on domestic violence and violence against women during the trial.

On October 3, 1995, Simpson was found not guilty of murdering Brown Simpson and Goldman. Jury members, who had deliberated only four hours, later stated that prosecutors failed to prove Simpson's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.

It is commonly believed that the incompetence of key professionals in the murder investigation and trial compounded the injustice against the victims, their families, and the people of the state of California. Prosecutors, a criminal-trial court judge, and police investigators performed their professional duties with incredible incompetence, and Simpson was freed as a result.

IMPACT

Finding little closure for their losses in the verdict in the criminal case, the Brown and Goldman families responded by suing Simpson for wrongful death. On February 5, 1997, a civil court awarded $33.5 million to the Brown and Goldman families. Publicly vowing never to pay the victims' families anything, Simpson sought refuge against the civil judgment by moving to Florida, where his earnings, house, and pension would be protected to some degree from seizure.

The Simpson trial and media coverage had far-reaching social impact. The outcome of the criminal trial led to further public distrust of the criminal justice and legal systems, concluding that justice is differentially investigated and distributed based upon a defendant's race, socioeconomic status, and fame. The murder trial also solidified the belief that hero-worship stymies justice. A large percentage of those persons involved in the murder investigation and trial appeared star struck in Simpson's presence. The jury, along with onlookers, seemingly ignored the overwhelming evidence against Simpson and determined in favor of the celebrity. Also, the principals in the case, including key witnesses, prosecutors, defense attorneys, and the judge, were made into celebrities as well.

In hindsight, it became clear that the media invented and repeated "facts" that first

"IF IT DOESN'T FIT, YOU MUST ACQUIT"

In his closing statement at the criminal trial of O. J. Simpson, lead defense attorney Johnnie Cochran, with folksy rhetoric, appealed to the jury's sense of obligation to acquit Simpson if the evidence does not make sense.

The Defendant, Mr. Orenthal James Simpson, is now afforded an opportunity to argue the case, if you will, but I'm not going to argue with you, ladies and gentlemen. What I'm going to do is to try and discuss the reasonable inferences which I feel can be drawn from this evidence. . . .

From the very first orders issued by the LAPD so-called brass, they were more concerned with their own images, the publicity that might be generated from this case than they were in doing professional police work. . . . Because of their bungling, they ignored the obvious clues. . . . We think if they had done their job as we have done, Mr. Simpson would have been eliminated early on. . . .

And so as we look then at the time line and the importance of this time line, I want you to remember these words. Like the defining moment in this trial, the day [assistant prosecutor Christopher] Darden asked Mr. Simpson to try on those gloves and the gloves didn't fit, remember these words; if it doesn't fit, you must acquit. . . .

And when you are back there deliberating on this case, you're never going to be ever able to reconcile this time line and the fact there's no blood back there. . . . They don't have any mountain or ocean of evidence. It's not so because they say so. That's just rhetoric. We this afternoon are talking about the facts. And so it doesn't make any sense. It just doesn't fit. If it doesn't fit, you must acquit. . . .

were embraced by a public obsessed by the case. For example, in every major city, the news media, also obsessed with the case, found experts (most of whom had dubious credentials) to speak on the case and predict the outcome of the trial. These so-called talking heads became the mainstay of trial coverage for many, if not most, media outlets. As the trial progressed, however, many viewers began to question the veracity of these news reports and commentaries, casting doubt on news reporting as a whole.

Perhaps most significant, though, was the not-guilty verdict in the murder trial, which polarized the public along racial lines on a scale not seen since the 1950's and 1960's, the height of the Civil Rights movement in the United States. The trial was interpreted by both blacks and whites as having been overwhelmingly about race.

—Edward J. Schauer

FURTHER READING

Bugliosi, Vincent T. Outrage: The Five Reasons Why O. J. Simpson Got Away with Murder. New York: W. W. Norton, 1996. A study of the Nicole Brown Simpson and Ronald Goldman murders by a successful felony prosecutor, and an explanation as to how the abundant and quality evidence points solely to Simpson as the murderer. Examines in detail how the murder trial went wrong.

Clark, Marcia, and Teresa Carpenter. Without a Doubt. New York: Viking Press, 1997. Critical appraisal of all major actors and happenings in the Simpson trial by the deputy district attorney who led the prosecution.

The Family of Ron Goldman, with William Hoffer and Marilyn Hoffer. His Name Is Ron: Our Search for Justice. New York: William Morrow, 1997. Discusses the impact of the murder of Ronald Goldman on his family. Also looks at Goldman's life, little discussed by the media.

Fuhrman, Mark. Murder in Brentwood. Washington, D.C.: Regnery, 1997. Foreword by Vincent Bugliosi. Fuhrman, one of the heavily criticized police investigators in the case, presents a careful analysis and critique of the crime-scene investigation, the follow-up investigation, the weight of the evidence, and the murder trial itself.

Goldman Family. If I Did It: Confessions of the Killer. New York: Beaufort Books, 2007. Contains the original manuscript of Simpson's fictional tell-all book If I Did It, which was never published. This edition, which includes the chapter "He Did It"—pointed commentary by the Goldman family—also includes an afterword by murder-victims advocate Dominick Dunne.

Hunt, Darnell. O. J. Simpson, Facts, and Fictions: News Rituals in the Construction of Reality. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1999. A scholarly study of the differences across racial lines in the public perception of the Simpson trial, including the way the media used these perceptions to shape its coverage of the trial.

Newton, Michael, and John L. French. Celebrities and Crime. New York: Chelsea House, 2008. Written especially for younger readers, this book examines the intersection of celebrity and crime. Discusses how law enforcement handles celebrities accused of criminal acts, and celebrities victimized by crime. Includes a chapter on the Simpson case.

Toobin, Jeffrey. The Run of His Life: The People v. O. J. Simpson. New York: Random House, 1996. An excellent account of the Simpson trial by a knowledgeable criminal attorney and accomplished journalist. Toobin, a former prosecutor, covered the trial for The New Yorker.

SEE ALSO: June 25, 1906: Millionaire Heir Murders Architect Stanford White; Mar. 10, 1980: Scarsdale Diet Doctor Is Killed by His Lover; Mar., 1990: Menendez Brothers Are Arrested for Murdering Their Parents; May 19, 1992: Amy Fisher Shoots Mary Jo Buttafuoco; June 23, 1993: Lorena Bobbitt Severs Her Husband's Penis; June 24, 1994: Time Magazine Cover Uses Altered O. J. Simpson Photo; Nov. 20, 2006: News Corp Abandons Plan to Publish O. J. Simpson's Book.

June 24, 1994

TIME MAGAZINE COVER USES ALTERED O. J. SIMPSON PHOTO

In 1994, retired football star O. J. Simpson was charged with the murder of his former wife, Nicole Brown Simpson, and her friend, Ronald Goldman. In its coverage of the story, Time magazine used an altered version of the Los Angeles Police Department booking photograph of Simpson on its cover. The altered photo made Simpson appear “blacker” than in the original photo and caused an uproar amid accusations that Time engaged in editorial manipulation and encouraged racist stereotypes.

LOCALE: New York, New York

CATEGORIES: Forgery; publishing and journalism; communications and media; racism; ethics; social issues and reform

KEY FIGURES

O. J. Simpson (b. 1947), former football star and actor

Matt Mahurin (b. 1959), freelance illustrator, artist, and film director

James R. Gaines (b. 1947), journalist, Time magazine editor, and author

Nancy Kearney (fl. 1990’s), spokesperson for Time magazine

SUMMARY OF EVENT

On June 12, 1994, Nicole Brown Simpson, the former wife of O. J. Simpson, and her friend, Ronald Goldman, were found murdered outside her condominium. Simpson was arrested and charged with their murders. On June 17, a Los Angeles Police Department photographer produced a mug shot of Simpson; this photo was released to the media. Both Time and Newsweek magazines used this mug shot on the cover of their respective issues of June 24. Newsweek published the photo in its original form but Time altered the photo in ways that made Simpson appear “blacker” and, therefore, more guilty.

As was reported widely in the media, Matt

Mahurin, the freelance artist who worked on the photo for Time, altered the original picture so that Simpson appeared unshaven and with a darker complexion. Also, Mahurin made the mug shot identification number smaller and added the caption “An American Tragedy” to the photo. The alterations might not have been noticed had Time and Newsweek not published the photo on their covers on the same day, which allowed readers to see the two issues side by side and, thereby, compare the photos.

Critics strongly objected to the photo alterations. The controversy was discussed in newspapers, on television, and in the electronic media. Critics argued that Time, in making Simpson appear more black, was perpetuating racist stereotypes that black men are dangerous by nature, and that the magazine manipulated these fears to influence readers’ perceptions of Simpson’s guilt or innocence prior to trial. Sheila Stainback, vice president of the National Association of Black Journalists, asked, rhetorically, “Why did [Simpson] have to be darker? I think that it plays into the whole menacing black-male portrayal.”

Nancy Kearney, a spokesperson for Time, responded to the criticism by denying that Time intended to manipulate or mislead readers. She added that it was insulting to the magazine and to the artist to cast the photo as sinister or racist and that the artist’s intent was to create a “visually compelling” image for the magazine’s cover.

As the outcry continued and amid charges of poor editorial judgment, Time magazine’s managing editor, James R. Gaines, was forced to respond to critics. First, he posted a message on a computer bulletin board stating that “no racial implication was intended, by Time or by the artist.” Ultimately, in a letter in the July 4 issue of Time, Gaines apologized to readers who were offended by the altered Simpson cover and reiterated that it was not his or the artist’s intent to offend readers or to influence their perceptions of Simpson’s guilt or innocence.

In the published apology, he reiterated that there were “no racial implications” in the reworking of the photo but that Time should have been more sensitive to the racial issues implied by the cover.

IMPACT

The controversy did not end with the public apologies. The issue of the negative portrayal of ethnic and racial minorities, as well as women, by the media continues as a topic in academic and political circles. For example, Greg Dickinson and Karrin Vasby Anderson (2004) compared the altered Time cover photo of Simpson with an altered photo of Hillary Rodham Clinton that the magazine used during its coverage of the Whitewater controversy during the early 1990's.

The Time cover scandal also revealed the ethical dilemmas of altering photographs that are part of the documentary record. Indeed, Simpson's celebrity, along with the racial dimensions of the scandal, added public interest to the problem of photo manipulation, and it is true that photographs have been altered since the beginning of photography during the early nineteenth century. One of the more infamous cases of photo manipulation was Joseph Stalin's “disappearing” of people from official photos. This practice is well documented in a 1997 book by David King. However, what is different now is the digital retouching of images—also called “photo-shopping” in reference to the popular software editing program Adobe Photoshop. The alteration of Simpson's photo was a mere precursor to what was soon to come.

The Time photo scandal prompted early calls for new rules and frameworks to guide editors deciding on whether a photo or other image should be altered or enhanced. John Long, as ethics cochairman and past president of the National Press Photographers Association (NPPA) in the United States, created the resource “Ethics in the Age of Digital Photography” in 1999. In this ethical guide for journalists, he uses as an example the 1994 Time cover of Simpson. Long and, by association the NPPA, takes the position that all photo manipulation is lying if it changes the content of a photo; that is, if it transforms a photo from a document or direct account of reality into an editorial statement. The NPPA's position is that this kind of manipulation undermines the credibility of the press. The Time magazine cover of Simpson continues to stand as one of the most significant and negative examples of editorialized photo manipulation.

Time Magazine Cover Uses Altered Simpson Photo

—Carmen James Schifellite

FURTHER READING

Barak, Gregg, ed. Media, Criminal Justice, and Mass Culture. Monsey, N.Y.: Criminal Justice Press, 1999. Nineteen essays that explore the O. J. Simpson murder trial and its verdict. Focuses on media representations of crime and justice in the United States.

Dickinson, Greg, and Karrin Vasby Anderson. “Fallen: O. J. Simpson, Hillary Rodham Clinton, and the Re-centering of White Patriarchy.” Communication and Critical/Cultural Studies 1, no. 3 (September, 2004): 271-296. Analysis of two Time magazine cover images: Simpson after his arrest for murder and Clinton during the Whitewater controversy.

Hawkins, Billy. “The Dominant Images of Black Men in America: The Representation of O. J. Simpson.” In African Americans in Sport: Contemporary Themes, edited by Gary A. Sailes. New Brunswick, N.J.: Transaction, 1998. Analyzes negative images of black men, including Simpson, that predominate in the American mass media.

King, David. The Commissar Vanishes: The Falsification of Photographs and Art in Stalin's Russia. New York: Metropolitan Books, 1997. Chronicles the removal of political undesirables from the photo record in Stalin's Soviet Union by juxtaposing the original and altered photos.

Morrison, Toni, and Claudia Brodsky Lacour, eds. Birth of a Nation'hood: Gaze, Script, and Spectacle in the O. J. Simpson Case. New York: Pantheon Books, 1997. Eleven articles that focus on the significance of the O. J. Simpson case as a media spectacle.

Reaves, Sheila. “The Unintended Effects of New Technology (And Why We Can Expect More).” News Photographer 50, no. 7 (1995): 11-24. Argues that new digital technologies and an increasing focus on pseudo-events and celebrity news encourage more photo manipulation. Encourages editors to guard against the unintended affects of photo alteration.

SEE ALSO: July 23, 1984: Vanessa Williams Is the First Miss America to Resign; June 12, 1994: Double Murder Leads to Sensational O. J. Simpson Trial; Nov. 20, 2006: News Corp Abandons Plan to Publish O. J. Simpson's Book.

June 30, 1994

TONYA HARDING IS BANNED FROM SKATING AFTER ATTACK ON RIVAL

At the 1994 U.S. Figure Skating Championships, an unknown assailant clubbed skater Nancy Kerrigan on her knee after a practice session. Although Kerrigan had to withdraw from the event, she was still named to the U.S. Olympic team. The former husband of 1994 champion Tonya Harding claimed that he had hired Kerrigan's assailant, touching off a heavily publicized scandal. Harding competed in the Olympics but was later stripped of her national title and banned from sanctioned skating events.

LOCALE: Detroit, Michigan

CATEGORIES: Sports; corruption; violence; law and the courts

KEY FIGURES

Tonya Harding (b. 1970), professional figure skater

Nancy Kerrigan (b. 1969), professional figure skater

Jeff Gillooly (fl. 1990's), Harding's former husband

Shane Stant (b. 1971), bounty hunter and former convict

Shawn Eckardt (1967-2007), Harding's bodyguard

SUMMARY OF EVENT

The 1994 U.S. Figure Skating Championships, held at the Joe Louis Arena in Detroit, Michigan, was a qualifying event for the coming Winter Olympics in Lillehammer, Norway. The United States had qualified to send two skaters for the ladies skating event, so the top two finishers at the championships would receive automatic spots on the U.S. Olympic team. Nancy Kerrigan, a bronze medalist at the 1992 Olympics in Albertville, France, and the reigning U.S. national champion, was the favorite to win the event for the second year in a row. Tonya Harding, the 1991 U.S. national champion and second-place finisher in the 1991 World Championships, was her main rival.

At approximately 2:35 P.M. on January 6, 1994, Kerrigan stepped behind a curtain separating the ice rink from a back hallway leading to the locker rooms after a practice session at nearby Cobo Arena. She stopped briefly to speak with a reporter when a then-unknown assailant rushed by and struck her on the right knee with a blunt baton similar to those used by police officers. Kerrigan fell to the ground crying, as reporters and skating personnel gathered around. Her attacker disappeared in the confusion. Kerrigan was taken to nearby Hutzel Hospital, where she was diagnosed with severe muscle and tissue bruising. She was forced to withdraw from the competition. Harding won the event and Michelle Kwan won second place. The U.S. Figure Skating Association (USFSA) named Kerrigan to the team, along with Harding, and named Kwan the alternate. The attack on Kerrigan received widespread publicity, and speculation began immediately as to who was behind the attack.

Harding's bodyguard, Shawn Eckardt, was arrested in Portland, Oregon, on January 13. He informed the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) that Harding's former husband, Jeff Gillooly, had orchestrated the attack. Also arrested in the conspiracy was Derrick B. Smith. Shane Stant, a bounty hunter and former convict, was charged with the actual attack on Kerrigan and surrendered to police in Phoenix, Arizona, on January 14. Gillooly surrendered to Portland police on January 19.

Questions about Harding's role in the attack grew with every passing day. She held a press conference in Portland on January 27, admitting that she learned of the conspiracy to attack Kerrigan after the fact and failed to report what she knew to investigators. She maintained that she had no prior knowledge of the attack and did not help in its planning. On February 1, Gillooly pleaded guilty to his role in the conspiracy and reached a plea bargain. He confessed to racketeering charges only. In exchange, he promised authorities that he would implicate Harding.

The negative publicity and allegations against Harding led the U.S. Olympic Committee (USOC) to seek a way to keep her from participating in the Olympics. She appeared before the USOC's administrative board to respond to charges that she violated its athletic code, but the board ultimately voted to let her skate because she had not been formally charged with a crime. She also threatened to sue the committee if it prohibited her participation.

The Olympics began in mid-February, and both Harding and Kerrigan stayed in the Olympic Village during their time away from the ice arena. Both skaters were hounded by the media as they skated at the same practice sessions. Further drama erupted on February 17, when Kerrigan arrived at practice wearing the same white lace practice dress she had been wearing when she was attacked. On February 25, she had a nearly flawless performance and won the silver medal behind Ukrainian skater Oksana Baiul in a controversial 5-4 split of the nine-judge panel. Harding finished a disappointing eighth after tearfully requesting that the judges let her restart her program when one of the laces on her skate broke.

Tonya Harding, left, and Nancy Kerrigan at a training session at the 1994 Winter Olympics in Norway. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

After the Olympics, Harding pleaded guilty in Portland to conspiracy to hinder prosecution for her role in covering up the attack. She was not charged with helping to plan the attack and has always maintained her innocence. She received a fine, probation, and orders to perform community service, but no jail sentence. On June 30, the USFSA stripped Harding of her 1994 national title and banned her for life from USFSA-sanctioned events. She could still skate in professional events, but many of the top professional skaters would not skate with her. She would later take up the sport of professional boxing. Gillooly, Eckardt, and Stant would all serve prison sentences for their roles in the attack. Kerrigan became a professional skater, married, and had two sons.

IMPACT

The scandal tarnished figure skating's image, but at the same time it greatly increased its popularity. Television ratings for skating events soared, resulting in new skating shows, competitions, and television specials. Increased advertising revenue and ticket sales brought new money into the sport that could be invested in its development. Rising skating stars such as Kwan built on the popularity brought by the scandal. Sports reporter Christine Brennan once joked that all skaters should send a thank-you card to Harding for the benefits they have reaped in the scandal's aftermath. The publicity also exposed the inner, competitive world of figure skating and led many to question the treatment of Harding as a skater before the attack; she did not fit the traditional stereotype of the female skater as an "ice princess."

The attack on Kerrigan came less than one year after tennis star Monica Seles was stabbed in the back by an obsessed "fan" during a break in an April, 1993, match in Germany. Although Seles recovered physically, the stabbing was a tragedy that, like the Harding-Kerrigan case, helped to raise awareness about the need for heightened security at all athletic events.

—Marcella Bush Trevino

FURTHER READING

Baughman, Cynthia, ed. Women on Ice: Feminist Essays on the Tonya Harding/Nancy Kerrigan Spectacle. New York: Routledge, 1995. Examines the scandal from the perspective of gender politics. Discusses how mass media stereotypes of female ice skaters affected how the media covered the scandal and the public's image of Tonya Harding, who did not fit the stereotype of the traditional, ultrafeminine figure skater.

Brennan, Christine. Inside Edge: A Revealing Journey into the Secret World of Figure Skating. New York: Scribner, 1996. A longtime sports reporter's detailed account of backstage politics during the 1994 and 1995 skating seasons. Includes discussion of the Kerrigan attack and its aftermath.

Kerrigan, Nancy. Nancy Kerrigan: In My Own Words. New York: Hyperion Books, 1996. A work written especially for young readers. Provides the skater's firsthand account of the attack and surrounding media scandal as well as a retelling of her life and career.

Prouse, Linda D. The Tonya Tapes: The Tonya Harding Story In Her Own Words. New York: World Audience, 2008. Based on several interviews with Harding, this tell-all book explores Harding's life from her younger years through her life following professional figure skating. An authorized biography.

Rowe, David. "Apollo Undone: The Sports Scandal." In Media Scandals, edited by James Lull and Stephen Hinerman. New York: Columbia University Press, 1998. Examines the social impact of sports scandals, such as the Kerrigan attack, which receive much media attention.

SEE ALSO: Sept. 26, 2000: Gymnast Andreea Răducan Loses Her Olympic Gold Medal Because of Drugs; Feb. 11, 2002: French Judge Admits Favoring Russian Figure Skaters in Winter Olympics; Mar. 17, 2005: Former Baseball Star Mark McGwire Evades Congressional Questions on Steroid Use; July 26, 2006: Tour de France Is Hit with a Doping Scandal; Aug. 20, 2007: Football Star Michael Vick Pleads Guilty to Financing a Dogfighting Ring.

July 1, 1994

SOCCKER STAR DIEGO MARADONA IS EXPELLED FROM WORLD CUP

Diego Maradona, generally regarded as one of the greatest soccer players of the modern era, was a national hero in his native Argentina, for which he helped win the 1986 World Cup. In later years, he developed a drug dependency. At the 1994 World Cup competition in the United States, he tested positive for ephedrine doping and was sent home. He claimed that the International Federation of Association Football had expelled him for innocently using a weight-loss drug that contained traces of ephedrine.

LOCALE: Dallas, Texas

CATEGORIES: Drugs; medicine and health care; sports

KEY FIGURES

Diego Maradona (b. 1960), Argentine soccer star
Daniel Cerrini (b. 1968), Argentine body builder and weight-loss trainer

Carlos Menem (b. 1930), president of Argentina, 1989-1999

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Even among the greatest of modern soccer players—Pelé, Franz Beckenbauer, Johann Cruiff, Roberto Baggio, Alfredo Di Stéfano, Zico—Diego Maradona was a unique presence. His skill at the world's most popular sport was unrivaled. Like these other great offensive players, he rose to his best in the World Cup final matches, held every four years and watched by hundreds of millions of fans.

Likewise, Maradona's play so dominated his national team that he became inextricably associated with Argentina's image and was the most famous Argentine in the world. However, unlike his peers, who felt a certain obligation thereby to represent their nations in a dignified manner, Maradona at times gave the appearance that he believed that international soccer existed for his benefit. Off the field—and sometimes on as well—he was often embroiled in controversy and seemed but one step from scandal.

Maradona was born on October 30, 1960, in a shanty town outside Buenos Aires. He began playing soccer at the age of three. By the age of twelve he was already well known for his soccer skills and tricks. Starring for several professional soccer clubs, Maradona played in his first World Cup competition in 1982. In 1986, as team captain, he led Argentina to victory at the Mexico World Cup with a brilliant tournament.

The most memorable game of the 1986 cup was the June 22 quarterfinal match between Argentina and England, two countries that had been at war over the Falkland Islands off the coast of Argentina. The two goals that Maradona scored in Argentina's 2-1 victory are among the most famous in World Cup history. The first goal was the infamous hand of God goal, in which Maradona was accused of illegally knocking the ball into the English net with his hand (the "hand of God," Maradona claimed). The second goal is considered by many fans to be the greatest in soccer history and has been dubbed the goal of the century. Maradona dribbled the ball 55 yards past five of England's fabled defenders before shooting it past the superb goalkeeper Peter Shilton. In 1990, Argentina lost the final-round World Cup match to the champion Italian team.

By the 1990's, however, Maradona was struggling with both a cocaine addiction and a tendency to gain weight. Playing for a Naples, Italy, soccer club, he was under the spotlight of European tabloids for his unruly personal life and under investigation by the Italian police for drug use and Mafia connections. On March 17, 1991, a random drug test revealed the presence of cocaine in his body. He was banned from professional soccer for fifteen months. When Maradona returned to professional soccer in 1992, he was overweight, depressed, and a diminished presence on the soccer field. His fans—and he himself—saw the 1994 World Cup, to be played over the summer in the United States, as an opportunity for Maradona to restore his tarnished reputation, both on and off field.

Diego Maradona is mobbed by reporters one day before being expelled from World Cup competition for failing a drug test. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

In the summer of 1993, Maradona had begun training with Argentine personal trainer and body builder Daniel Cerrini, who prescribed a regimen of intense exercise, rigorous dieting, supplements of vitamins and minerals, and energy-boosting drugs. Soon, Maradona had lost fifteen kilograms (thirty-three pounds) and felt ready for the World Cup. He arrived in the United States during the summer of 1994. Cerrini joined Maradona's long-time fitness trainer, Fernando Signorini, for the trip as well. During the first two qualifying games, Maradona performed well. He led his team to a 4-0 victory over Greece on June 21 and a well-played 2-1 win against Nigeria four days later. One of the few players of international renown, he was cheered by the American fans in Boston.

Cerrini and Signorini were still disputing Maradona's ideal weight. Maradona weighed 76.8 kilograms (169 pounds) at the start of the tournament, which was acceptable to Signorini, but Cerrini wanted him at 70 kilograms (154 pounds) and continued to prescribe him diet supplements. Apparently, the team physician, Ernesto Ubalde, was not involved in the diet regimen.

On June 25, during half-time in the Argentina-Nigeria match, two urine samples were collected from Maradona, pursuant to the new random drug-testing policy of the Fédération Internationale de Football Association (FIFA), which called for testing players during the qualifying rounds. On July 1, the World Cup organizing committee announced that Maradona's urine test revealed the presence of the stimulant ephedrine and four other substances prohibited by FIFA doping control regulations. Maradona, waiting in Dallas for Argentina's game against Bulgaria, was immediately suspended from further play. In addition, an investigation was launched into his use of drugs. After his suspension he took a lucrative position as commentator on the games for Argentine television.

On August 24, the organizing committee announced the results of the investigation. Although Maradona was found not to have taken drugs to enhance his performance, and was in fact not even aware of the contents of the drug, he nevertheless was in breach of FIFA regulations. Ultimate responsibility for the infraction was assigned to Cerrini, but FIFA did take into account Maradona's previous history of drug abuse in holding him partly responsible. Both Maradona and Cerrini were banned from participation in all soccer events for fifteen months and fined twenty thousand Swiss francs. With Maradona off the team, Argentina was soon eliminated from the 1994 World Cup tournament.

The outcry in response to Maradona's suspension was worldwide. In Dhaka, more than twenty thousand Bangladeshis demonstrated in protest. American newspapers, many of which were sympathetic to Maradona, compared the scandal to the one seared in the consciousness of American sports fans—the Black Sox baseball scandal of 1919. In Argentina, fans were devastated. Argentine president Carlos Menem wrote FIFA a five-page letter pleading for clemency for Maradona. Nevertheless, the committee affirmed its decision, recommending that in the future all players' medical treatments should be under the exclusive supervision of the team physician.

IMPACT

Maradona garnered much sympathy because of his heroic training regimen for the World Cup. By all accounts, his conditioning level was the best it had been in years and he recovered playing skills. When told of his suspension, he said, "They have sawed off my legs."

Moreover, there is little reason to doubt Maradona's contention—confirmed by the organizing committee—that the drug infraction was the byproduct of his attempt to stabilize his weight, not to enhance his performance. In his 2000 autobiography, published in English in 2007, Maradona claimed that Cerrini had made an innocent mistake. Maradona had run out of his usual supplement, Ripped Fast. Cerrini had substituted the over-the-counter product Ripped Fuel, not knowing that it contained a small amount of ephedrine.

FIFA was required to act on the matter. By expelling Maradona, FIFA took overdue measures against the proliferation of stimulants in soccer, a problem that was increasingly plaguing all sports.

Diego Maradona Is Expelled from World Cup

While Maradona's explanation for the accidental presence of ephedrine was plausible, there is no denying its potential for stimulating athletic energy.

The 1994 games would be tragically marred as well by the combination of illegal drug money and the importance of soccer in Latin American culture. When the Colombian defender Andres Escobar returned home after making a well-publicized mistake in the game with the United States, he was gunned down on the crime- and drug-plagued streets of Medellín, Colombia.

Maradona retired from soccer a few years after the doping affair. His drug addiction continued and he eventually had a heart attack in 2004 following a cocaine overdose. Maradona appeared to change after this, becoming free of weight concerns and cocaine addiction.

—Howard Bromberg

FURTHER READING

Burns, Jimmy. Hand of God: The Life of Diego Maradona. Guilford, Conn.: Lyons Press, 2003. A harsh look at Maradona that discusses the 1994 scandal as an example of Maradona's indulgence, narcissism, and rebelliousness.

Lisi, Clemente Angelo. A History of the World Cup: 1930-2006. Lanham, Md.: Scarecrow Press, 2007. A journalistic history of the world's most popular sports event. Chapter 6, "The Hand of God," explores the career of Maradona.

Maradona, Diego, with Daniel Arcucci and Ernesto Bialo. Maradona: The Autobiography of Soccer's Greatest and Most Controversial Star. New York: Skyhorse, 2007. Maradona's candid recollection of his life and career in international soccer, first published in 2000, displays his legendary egotism.

Radnage, Keir. The Complete Encyclopedia of Soccer. Rev. ed. London: Carlton Books, 2007. Photo-rich survey of modern soccer. Ranks Maradona as the greatest soccer player of the 1980's and early 1990's.

SEE ALSO: Apr. 2, 1915: Players Fix Liverpool-Manchester United Soccer Match; Sept. 26, 2000: Gymnast Andreea Răducan Loses Her

Olympic Gold Medal Because of Drugs; Jan. 27, 2005: German Soccer Referee Admits to Fixing Games for Money; Mar. 17, 2005: Former Baseball Star Mark McGwire Evades Congressional Questions on Steroid Use; May 4, 2006: Media Uncover Match-Fixing in Italian Soccer; July 26, 2006: Tour de France Is Hit with a Doping Scandal; Oct. 5, 2007: Olympic Champion Marion Jones Admits Steroid Use.

August 5, 1994

KENNETH STARR IS APPOINTED TO THE WHITEWATER INVESTIGATION

A three-judge panel appointed Kenneth Starr as independent counsel to investigate whether U.S. president Bill Clinton broke any laws in a real estate project in Whitewater, Arkansas. For the next five years, Starr aggressively directed an investigation that moved well beyond Whitewater and into allegations that the president lied under oath about his sexual relationship with former White House intern Monica Lewinsky.

LOCALE: Washington, D.C.

CATEGORIES: Law and the courts; politics; government; sex; corruption

KEY FIGURES

Kenneth Starr (b. 1946), White House independent counsel

Bill Clinton (b. 1946), governor of Arkansas, 1979-1981 and 1983-1992, and president of the United States, 1993-2001

Hillary Rodham Clinton (b. 1947), First Lady, 1993-2001, U.S. senator from New York, 2001-2009, and Secretary of State, 2009-

Robert B. Fiske (b. 1930), special prosecutor

David B. Sentelle (b. 1943), Court of Appeals justice in Washington, D.C.

Jim McDougal (1940-1998), co-owner of Whitewater Development Corporation and Madison Guaranty Savings & Loan

Susan McDougal (b. 1955), co-owner of Whitewater Development Corporation and Madison Guaranty Savings & Loan

SUMMARY OF EVENT

From 1979 to 1989, Bill and Hillary Rodham Clinton were business associates with Jim and Susan McDougal in the Whitewater Development Corporation, a failed real estate venture in Arkansas that resulted in the 1989 bankruptcy of the McDougal's financial firm Madison Guaranty Savings & Loan and a federal government bailout of sixty million dollars. The Clintons claimed to have done nothing improper in the matter, suffering personal losses of more than forty thousand dollars.

In late 1993, David Hale, a banker who was under indictment for fraud, claimed that U.S. president Bill Clinton, while governor of Arkansas, pressured him into making an illegal $300,000 loan to Susan McDougal. Hearing of Hale's claim, The Washington Post called for an investigation, but one without the U.S. Department of Justice, to establish whether Clinton had been a part of the Whitewater venture.

In January, 1994, Clinton's advisers convinced him to ask U.S. attorney general Janet Reno to appoint a special prosecutor. For the task, Reno appointed Robert B. Fiske, a moderate Republican lawyer. On the last day in June, Fiske issued two reports: The first report concluded that the 1993 suicide of White House counsel Vincent Foster, a former law partner of Hillary Clinton, was not related to Whitewater, and the second report concluded that the evidence for Hale's allegations was insufficient to bring criminal charges against anyone in the White House. Some Republicans criticized Fiske for not being sufficiently aggressive in the investigations.

As the Fiske reports were being issued, the U.S. Congress passed a bill reestablishing the Office of Independent Counsel (OIC). President Clinton reluctantly signed the bill into law. (Hillary Clinton had recommended that he veto the legislation.) Like the earlier law that had been in effect from 1978 to 1992, the new statute conferred the OIC with almost unlimited powers to investigate, subpoena, and prosecute persons having a relationship to any matter under investigation. The statute further provided that the independent counsel would be appointed by a panel of three U.S. Court of Appeals judges, and the panel was to be selected by the chief justice of the United States, at this time William H. Rehnquist. To lead the three-judge panel, Rehnquist selected Judge David B. Sentelle, who had close connections to U.S. senator Jesse Helms of North Carolina and other conservative politicians highly critical of the president.

The panel dismissed Fiske and replaced him with Kenneth Starr on August 5. Sentelle explained that a change was desirable because Fiske's appointment by the attorney general gave the appearance of a conflict of interest. Starr, the new appointee, was a former U.S. Court of Appeals judge who had left the bench to serve as the solicitor general. His appointment initially received favorable comment from most journalists and informed observers. The Clintons, who were familiar with his past work, were suspicious that Starr would be extremely assertive and probably motivated by partisan zeal. Hillary Clinton and Democratic adviser James Carville even recommended a campaign against the appointment. White House Counsel Lloyd Cutler, however, argued that Starr was highly professional and would conduct a fair investigation.

Starr assembled a large OIC staff of aggressive, experienced lawyers. The OIC expanded the Whitewater investigation to target any person having had any direct or indirect relationship to the venture. Upon finding evidence of illegal acts, Starr offered the person in question a reduced penalty in exchange for testimony against one of the Clintons. In December, Webster Hubbell, a former Arkansas associate attorney general who had worked with Hillary Clinton on Whitewater matters, pleaded guilty to tax evasion and mail fraud in connection with his billing practices. In 1996, Starr obtained convictions of Jim McDougal and Arkansas governor Jim Guy Tucker for fraud. Susan McDougal, claiming that Starr was pressuring her to lie about the president, refused to answer questions before a federal grand jury and was sentenced to eighteen months in prison for contempt of court.

Despite their best efforts, Starr and his OIC team were unable to obtain sufficient proof to indict the Clintons. However, the OIC did discover items that turned out to be embarrassing to the Clintons. Hillary Clinton's lost billing records were finally located, revealing that she had done sixty hours of legal work on Whitewater-related business, even though she had earlier told investigators she could not recall working on the project. Furthermore, Starr requested and received approval to investigate allegations that she had given false testimony to a U.S. Senate committee about her role in the firing of employees at the White House Travel Office. After 125 subpoenas, the OIC concluded that there was insufficient evidence to establish beyond a reasonable doubt that she perjured herself before the committee.

Kenneth Starr at a news conference in 1997 in Washington, D.C., announcing that he will remain lead counsel with the Whitewater investigation. (AP/Wide World Photos)

By January, 1998, the OIC had been investigating claims of improprieties well beyond its initial Whitewater mandate. It also discovered credible allegations that President Clinton, in a lawsuit filed by Paula Jones against Clinton for sexual harassment, had lied under oath when he denied having had a sexual encounter with former White House intern Monica Lewinsky. Starr also found evidence that Clinton had encouraged Lewinsky to lie under oath. After the three-judge panel granted Starr permission to pursue the matter, Starr discovered that the allegations against Clinton were true. Starr's report of September, 1998, which dealt primarily with the Lewinsky scandal, resulted in Clinton's impeachment by the U.S. House of Representatives. The majority of the Senate, however, voted to acquit him on February 12, 1999, and he continued his term in office. Starr officially resigned from the OIC in October and was replaced by Robert W. Ray.

IMPACT

By the time of Starr's resignation, the majority of Democratic and Republican leaders had serious questions about the fairness and efficacy of the OIC. With the June, 1999, demise of the bill that created the office came a reluctance by many members of Congress to okay its reauthorization. Although five in-process investigations continued, the OIC, without reauthorization, would not get a new independent counsel. Acting under statutory authority, Attorney General Reno drew up new regulations for conducting independent investigations of misconduct by public officials under the supervision of the Justice Department.

Many Americans, especially Democratic supporters of the president, have been highly critical of Starr for his zeal in pursuing the Lewinsky scandal. His detractors tend to describe him as a scandal-obsessed fanatic with a disdain for liberal politicians. Many argue that the president's sexual behavior, as detailed in the Starr Report, is a matter of private morality, not public policy. Other critics point to the large amount of money—more than fifty million dollars—spent during the five years that Starr directed OIC investigations. Only one other independent counsel—Lawrence E. Welsh—had spent more money on an investigation. His mandate had been to look into the Iran-Contra scandal of the 1980's.

Others, however, defended Starr's direction of OIC investigations. His supporters argued that he was a serious prosecutor seeking truth according to the law, and that he successfully prosecuted several individuals who had committed criminal acts in the Whitewater project. They also emphasized that the Starr Report proved that President Clinton had given false testimony, a crime, in a civil suit. In January, 2000, Starr's successor, Ray, reached an agreement with the president. To avoid prosecution, Clinton had to acknowledge that he lied under oath, agree to a suspension of his law license for five years, and pay a fine of $25,000.

—Thomas Tandy Lewis

FURTHER READING

Carville, James. And the Horse He Rode in On: The People v. Kenneth Starr. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1998. A partisan, one-sided polemic against Starr as well as those who accused the president of wrongdoing.

Clinton, William Jefferson. My Life. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2004. The former president denounces Starr and accuses his opponents of falsehoods, but he also neglects to mention certain historical facts.

Johnson, Charles, and Danette Brickman. Independent Counsel: The Law and the Investigations. Washington, D.C.: CQ Press, 2001. A well-written summary of the twenty investigations by independent counsels starting with Watergate during the early 1970's through Whitewater and Kenneth Starr in 1999.

Schmidt, Susan, and Michael Weisskopf. Truth at Any Cost: Ken Starr and the Unmaking of Bill Clinton. New York: HarperCollins, 2000. A detailed account by two journalists who sympathize with Starr and are critical of Clinton.

Starr, Kenneth W. The Starr Report: The Findings of Independent Counsel Kenneth W. Starr on President Clinton and the Lewinsky Affair. New York: PublicAffairs, 1998. The controversial document by Starr that was the basis for Clinton's impeachment.

Toobin, Jeffrey. A Vast Conspiracy: The Real Story of the Sex Scandal That Nearly Brought Down a President. New York: Simon & Schuster, 2000. A lively account of the Lewinsky scandal that is highly critical of Starr's investigation.

Wittes, Benjamin. Starr: A Reassessment. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 2002. Argues that Clinton is a pathological liar and Starr is a person of integrity who, nonetheless, was the "wrong man" for the investigation into Whitewater because of his moralistic theories of prosecution.

Sex Scandal Forces Dismissal of NAACP Chief

SEE ALSO: Mar. 1, 1967: Adam Clayton Powell, Jr., Is Excluded from Congress; June 13, 1971: New York Times Publishes the Pentagon Papers; June 17, 1972-Aug. 9, 1974: Watergate Break-in Leads to President Nixon's Resignation; Oct. 10, 1973: Spiro T. Agnew Resigns Vice Presidency in Disgrace; June 1, 1994: Congressman Dan Rostenkowski Is Indicted in House Post Office Scandal; Dec. 11, 1997: HUD Secretary Henry Cisneros Is Indicted for Lying to Federal Agents; Jan. 17, 1998: President Bill Clinton Denies Sexual Affair with a White House Intern; Dec. 5, 2002: Senator Trent Lott Praises Strom Thurmond's 1948 Presidential Campaign; Sept. 8, 2004: 60 Minutes II Reports on George W. Bush's Evasion of Wartime Duty.

August 21, 1994

SEX SCANDAL FORCES DISMISSAL OF NAACP CHIEF BENJAMIN CHAVIS

Benjamin Chavis, executive director of the NAACP, lost his job for agreeing to an out-of-court monetary settlement to be paid to his assistant, Mary E. Stansel, to forestall a sexual harassment and sex discrimination lawsuit against him and the NAACP. He had paid Stansel using NAACP funds without the permission or the knowledge of the organization. A court later ruled that the NAACP would not have to pay any part of the original settlement, and it ordered Stansel to return the funds she already received.

LOCALE: Baltimore, Maryland

CATEGORIES: Law and the courts; sex crimes; women's issues

KEY FIGURES

Benjamin Chavis (b. 1948), director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People

Mary E. Stansel (fl. 1990's), Chavis's executive secretary

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Benjamin Chavis was appointed executive director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) in April, 1993. Seventeen months later he was dismissed as director when it was discovered that he had agreed to an out-of-court settlement with his former executive assistant, Mary E. Stansel, to keep her from suing both Chavis and the NAACP for sexual harassment, sex discrimination, and violating her civil rights. Chavis agreed to pay Stansel more than $80,000 from NAACP funds without the knowledge of its board or general counsel. On August 21, 1994, the NAACP board overwhelmingly voted to dismiss Chavis, concluding that his actions were inimical to the best interests of the organization. In turn, Chavis called his ouster a "lynching."

While Chavis may have been within his powers as executive director to settle a suit against the NAACP, it remains questionable whether he should have used the organization's funds to settle the accusations against himself. The settlement between Chavis and Stansel, signed on November 12, 1993, consisted of cash and an agreement that Chavis would find her another job outside the NAACP. In late July, 1994, the NAACP found out about the agreement. Stansel, who had been Chavis's executive assistant for less than two months, filed suit against Chavis and the NAACP on June 30 for breach of contract. In court papers, she indicated that she already had received around $77,000, most of that from NAACP coffers, of an agreed-upon $80,000. Furthermore, Chavis had agreed to pay her an additional $250,000 were he to fail in finding her another job paying a salary of at least $80,000 within six months. Stansel sued when the deal fell through.

Chavis, an African American civil rights and religious leader, was born to educators and civil rights activists and was an activist from an early age. He was involved with the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC) and school desegregation in North Carolina. In 1976, he was convicted, with nine other desegregationists known collectively as the Wilmington Ten, for arson, firebombing, and conspiracy to commit assault. Chavis was sentenced to thirty-four years in prison and the others to ten years. After a lengthy battle that made international headlines, all ten were exonerated and released in 1980.

Chavis attended college while in prison and wrote the books An American Political Prisoner Appeals for Human Rights in the United States of America (1978) and Psalms from Prison (1983). He earned a bachelor of arts degree in chemistry from the University of North Carolina, a master of divinity degree from Duke University, and a doctor of ministry degree from Howard University. He also completed the course requirements for a doctor of philosophy degree from Union Theological Seminary. He was a youth coordinator in North Carolina for the Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr., and the SCLC and then returned to Oxford, North Carolina, and taught at the all-black Mary Potter High School. He was a minister in the United Church of Christ during the 1980's and led the church's Commission for Racial Justice. Chavis is credited with coining the term "environmental racism," a form of discrimination whereby, to take one example, a disproportionate number of toxic and hazardous materials waste sites and facilities are located within neighborhoods with many ethnic and racial minorities. His influential study Toxic Waste and Race in the United States of America was published in 1986.

According to his lawyer, Chavis agreed to the settlement with Stansel under duress. He wanted to avoid bad publicity and questions about his credibility. Other concerns about Chavis's tenure at the NAACP might have contributed to his dismissal. He was already under fire from some board members for his unorthodox practices, including reaching out to the Nation of Islam and to gang members. There was concern about how he handled NAACP finances. The organization was facing mounting debt and declining membership, and many within the NAACP believed Chavis's legal troubles had been affecting donations. Chavis, however, maintained that membership was growing, despite all the evidence to the contrary. Some of the larger contributors and supporters, such as the Ford Foundation, began to question the effectiveness of the NAACP. Some also believed that Chavis's unorthodox methods were leading the organization away from its original goals.

As the board was meeting to determine Chavis's future with the NAACP, Susan Tisdale, who had worked as a secretary for Chavis's wife, Martha, sent a memo to the board, indicating that she was initiating a sexual harassment suit against Chavis. However, Tisdale dropped the matter, saying the accusation of sexual harassment was a misunderstanding. Nevertheless, Chavis was dismissed by the board on August 21, 1994.

IMPACT

Being dismissed as head of the NAACP did not affect Chavis's career. He became the executive director of the National African American Leadership Summit in 1995 and was appointed national director of the Million Man March on Washington, D.C., in October, 1995. Two years later, in 1997, he became a member and a minister of the Nation of Islam, changed his surname to Muhammad, and soon was named the organization's East Coast regional minister. He organized the Million Family March in 2000. In 2001, he became the cochairman and chief executive officer of the Hip-Hop Summit Action Network (HHSAN) in collaboration with entrepreneur Russell Simmons. The HHSAN is a coalition of community members and activists and hip-hop artists dedicated to fighting for justice and against poverty among African Americans.

Stansel had sued both Chavis and the NAACP as responsible parties, but a Washington, D.C., court ruled that the NAACP was not financially liable for any part of the settlement between Stansel and Chavis. The court ordered Stansel to return the money she had already received from the organization.

The NAACP sought to recover from the Chavis scandal and its own mounting debt. Organization leaders pledged to restore the NAACP's reputation. Myrlie Evers-Williams, a civil rights activist and the wife of slain NAACP field secretary Medgar Evers, was elected chair, thereby becoming the first woman to head the organization. Kweisi Mfume, a U.S. representative from Maryland, was appointed the new executive director. A Democrat, Mfume gave up his congressional seat in 1996 to take the position at the NAACP, which was on the verge of bankruptcy. With Evers-Williams and Mfume at the helm, the NAACP managed to pull itself out of debt but still suffered some image problems.

—Judy L. Porter

FURTHER READING

Jonas, Gilbert. Freedom's Sword: The NAACP and the Struggle Against Racism in America, 1909-1969. New York: Routledge, 2005. A comprehensive history of the beginnings of the NAACP up to 1969. The author, a member of the NAACP for more than fifty years, is a journalist and civil rights activist. Includes a foreword by civil rights leader Julian Bond.

Marshall, Anna-Maria. Confronting Sexual Harassment: The Law and Politics of Everyday Life. Burlington, Vt.: Ashgate, 2005. Examines law, social change, and the politics of workers' everyday lives. Also provides a framework for studying issues of everyday life, especially in the workplace.

Russell-Brown, Katheryn. Protecting Our Own: Race, Crime, and African Americans. Lanham, Md.: Rowman & Littlefield, 2006. Law professor Russell-Brown explores ideas of "black protectionism" and "linked fate" among African Americans during times of scandal involving black public figures, including Benjamin Chavis, and media focus on crimes committed by blacks. Argues that protectionism extends to all races.

SEE ALSO: Jan. 13, 1913: Federal Judge Is Impeached for Profiting from His Office; May 9, 1969: Supreme Court Justice Abe Fortas Is Accused of Bribery; Oct. 11-13, 1991: Justice Clarence Thomas's Confirmation Hearings Create a Scandal; Dec. 11, 1997: HUD Secretary Henry Cisneros Is Indicted for Lying to Federal Agents; Jan. 17, 1998: President Bill Clinton Denies Sexual Affair with a White House Intern; Jan. 2, 2003: E-mail Message Prompts Inquiry into Air Force Academy Sexual Assaults; June 2, 2004: U.N. Report Reveals That Secretary-General Kofi Annan Dismissed Sexual Harassment Charges; Oct. 13, 2004: Television Producer Files Sex Harassment Suit Against Bill O'Reilly.

February 28, 1995FORMER MEXICAN PRESIDENT CARLOS SALINAS'S BROTHER IS ARRESTED FOR MURDER

In an unprecedented action, Mexican president Ernesto Zedillo ordered the arrest of Raúl Salinas, the brother of his predecessor and political ally Carlos Salinas, for murdering the Salinas's brother-in-law. Raúl Salinas was convicted and sentenced but was later acquitted of the murder and released. The ensuing scandal led to breaks in tradition, the exposure of widespread government corruption, political reform, and a shift toward democracy in Mexico.

LOCALE: Mexico City, MexicoCATEGORIES: Corruption; drugs; government; politics; law and the courts; murder and suicideKEY FIGURES

Raúl Salinas de Gortari (b. 1946), brother of former Mexican president Carlos Salinas de Gortari
Ernesto Zedillo Ponce de León (b. 1951), president of Mexico, 1994-2000

José Francisco Ruiz Massieu (1946-1994), Mexican politician, member of the Institutional Revolutionary Party

Carlos Salinas de Gortari (b. 1948), president of Mexico, 1988-1994

Luis Donaldo Colosio (1950-1994), politician and presidential candidate in 1994

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Carlos Salinas de Gortari served as president of Mexico from 1988 to 1994, as Mexico's constitution limits the number of terms for a president to one. However, because the Partido Revolucionario Institucional (Institutional Revolutionary Party), or PRI, had won all of the presidential elections since its founding in 1929, each president traditionally picked the candidate who would succeed him. Luis Donaldo Colosio, who had been Salinas's campaign manager in 1988 and served as social development secretary in Salinas's cabinet since 1992, appeared to be the chosen successor.

Colosio, however, was not having a successful campaign, and there were rumors that he would be replaced by Manuel Camacho, who had attracted public attention for his negotiations with the guerrillas of the Ejército Zapatista de Liberación Nacional (Zapatista Army of National Liberation). Salinas publicly stated his support for Colosio, and Camacho declared he would not be a candidate. Then, on March 23, 1994, Colosio was killed at a campaign rally in Tijuana. Camacho was first blamed for the murder; others were then accused, including members of organized crime and, finally, Salinas. Apparently, Colosio had given a speech in which he had angered Salinas by speaking of the leader's hope for justice and a good future.

The PRI almost was left without a candidate. Any person who had held a public office six months before an election was not eligible to run for the presidency. This requirement eliminated most of the potential replacements. Salinas chose Ernesto Zedillo Ponce de León, who had some time earlier resigned his office to serve as campaign manager for Colosio, as the candidate.

On September 28, Salinas's brother-in-law, José Francisco Ruiz Massieu, was shot and killed in downtown Mexico City, about one block from the Paseo de la Reforma. Massieu was slated to become the PRI majority leader in the chamber of deputies at the time he was assassinated. The assassin, Daniel Aguilar, a farmworker hired to kill Ruiz Massieu, was quickly arrested and revealed the names of a number of coconspirators.

The assassination caused pandemonium in Mexico. President Salinas immediately ordered an investigation. Ruiz Massieu's brother, Mario Ruiz Massieu, was the head prosecutor. On November 15, Ruiz Massieu accused the PRI of hindering the investigation. This caused distrust within Mexico and led major foreign investors to withdraw from the country. On November 23, Ruiz Massieu resigned and left Mexico. It was later discovered that he had seven million dollars deposited in a Texas bank, arousing suspicions that he was hiding the identity of the person responsible for his brother's death.

Pablo Chapa Bezanilla replaced Ruiz Massieu as head prosecutor. He initiated a series of interviews with José's family members. He discovered that a bitter feud existed between José and Raúl Salinas de Gortari, President Salinas's brother, since the time José had divorced Adriana Salinas, their sister, in 1978. Further investigations revealed that all references to Raúl Salinas had been removed from the testimony given by the conspirators.

The investigation continued through the end of Salinas's term as president and into the term of Zedillo. All of the evidence pointed to Raúl Salinas as the architect of the murder. Zedillo was stunned. He regarded Carlos Salinas as his friend and mentor. Moreover, the Mexican president was protective of his predecessor. However, the law demanded that Raúl Salinas be brought to trial. Zedillo had to make a choice: remain loyal to Carlos Salinas and his family or uphold the law. He chose to obey the law and arrest Raúl Salinas.

On February 28, 1995, Raúl Salinas was arrested for ordering the murder of his former brother-in-law. The investigation further corroborated Raúl Salinas's involvement. Carlos Salinas strongly objected to the proceedings and insisted that it was a slander campaign against his family. In November, as Raúl Salinas's trial continued, his wife, Paulina Castañón, and her brother, Antonio, attempted to withdraw about $84 million from an account in a Swiss bank. The account was under a fictitious name. They were arrested. Investigations began in Switzerland and implicated Raúl Salinas in money laundering and drug trafficking. The Swiss accounts were frozen. Meanwhile, Raúl Salinas remained in the maximum-security prison he had been in since his arrest.

In 1998, the prosecution rested its case. On October 16, 1998, the Mexican attorney-general asked that Raúl Salinas receive a maximum sentence of fifty years in prison for the murder of Ruiz Massieu. On January 22, 1999, he received that sentence. He had insisted that he was innocent during the long trial and appealed the sentence. The Mexican appeals court reduced the sentence to twenty-seven and one-half years.

Carlos Salinas's Brother Arrested for Murder

On June 14, 2005, Raúl Salinas was released from prison after being acquitted of the murder. His release, however, also cost him financially. He had to pay a three-million-dollar bond because he was under investigation for corruption, money laundering, and drug trafficking. He was exonerated of all these charges, however. The only misdeed he admitted to was obtaining a false passport, which he used in Switzerland.

IMPACT

The Salinas scandal was far-reaching—involving murder, corruption, and unethical political practices—and had serious consequences for Mexico

A police mug shot of Raúl Salinas de Gortari after his arrest for murder. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images) and Mexican politics. Political crisis ensued, and even tradition was tarnished when President Zedillo arrested Raúl Salinas.

The arrest and trial of Raúl Salinas fully exposed the opportunities for corruption that were inherent in Mexico's political system, a strong one-party system that controlled the elections and the government. The power of tradition afforded to an outgoing president—allowed to choose his successor—provided a safe, unquestioned atmosphere for unethical political practices. The public notoriety given to Raúl Salinas for masterminding a murder and for his roles in money laundering and drug trafficking played a significant part in bringing about political reform and a shift toward democracy in Mexico.

Furthermore, because the Salinas brothers were known to share a close relationship—Raúl had been part of Carlos's government, serving as his aide and as a government food distribution officer—Raúl's arrest for murder threw suspicion on Carlos as well. Rumors already existed that Carlos Salinas was involved in the murder of Colosio. The family scandal, coupled with blame for economic problems in Mexico, led to Carlos Salinas's self-imposed exile from Mexico. He moved to Ireland, where he remained for several years.

The PRI also lost its hold on the presidency in the next election. Vicente Fox, an opposition party candidate, defeated the PRI candidate, Francisco Labastida, in the 2000 election. For the first time since its founding in 1929, the PRI could not elect its candidate to the presidency.

—Shawncey Webb

FURTHER READING

Camp, Roderic Ai. Politics in Mexico: The Democratic Transformation. New York: Oxford University Press, 2002. Examines the significance of the leadership of Carlos Salinas and Ernesto Zedillo, and the arrest of Raúl Salinas, in pushing Mexico toward democratic government. Also looks at the administration of Zedillo's successor, Vicente Fox, who received business training in the United States.

Fabre, Guilhem. Criminal Prosperity: Drug Trafficking, Money Laundering, and Financial Crises After the Cold War. New York: Routledge-Curzon, 2003. A study of international crime as a means to a nation's prosperity following the Cold War era. Chapter 5 examines the problem of drug trafficking in Mexico and the possible involvement of Raúl Salinas in that trafficking.

Oppenheimer, Andres. Bordering on Chaos: Mexico's Roller Coaster Journey Toward Prosperity. Boston: Back Bay Press, 1998. Discusses Carlos Salinas's presidency, Zedillo's election, and the unrest caused by the arrest of Raúl Salinas in the context of Mexico's attempts to become a capitalist democracy.

SEE ALSO: Oct. 29, 1965: Moroccan Politician Mehdi Ben Barka Disappears in Paris; Feb. 3, 1975: Honduras's "Bananagate" Bribery Scandal Leads to Executive's Suicide; Aug. 21, 1983: Filipino Opposition Leader Aquino Is Assassinated on Return Home; Jan. 12 and May 11, 1987: Media Reports Spark Investigation of Australian Police Corruption; Jan., 1997: Pyramid Investment Schemes Cause Albanian Government to Fall; Dec. 23, 1998: Prominent Belgians Are Sentenced in Agusta-Dassault Corruption Scandal; Oct. 22, 2006: Chilean Politicians Use Community Funds for Personal Campaigns.

June 27, 1995

FILM STAR HUGH GRANT IS ARRESTED FOR LEWD CONDUCT

Los Angeles police officers arrested film star Hugh Grant for lewd conduct in public and also arrested Divine Brown for prostitution after the two were caught having oral sex in a parked car in Hollywood. The incident generated much gossip and attention in the media but did not harm Grant's career. The publicity also earned for Brown more than one million dollars for telling her story to British tabloids and television and radio shows in the United States and for posing for the adult magazine Penthouse.

LOCALE: Los Angeles, California

CATEGORIES: Prostitution; sex crimes; public morals; law and the courts; publishing and journalism; Hollywood

KEY FIGURES

Hugh Grant (b. 1960), British film star
Divine Brown (b. 1969), American prostitute
Elizabeth Hurley (b. 1965), British model and actor

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Hugh Grant's brush with scandal came at a time in his career that could have meant disaster for him. However, if anything, the incident in which police caught the debonair English actor with a prostitute in Los Angeles left him relatively unscathed and gave the prostitute he paid fifty dollars for fellatio a chance for fame and fortune.

Grant had begun acting in films just before graduating from Oxford University during the early 1980's. Of his early films, the two that drew the most attention from press and public both had sexuality as a major theme. In Maurice (1987), a prestigious adaptation of E. M. Forster's novel about a young gay man's coming of age in early twentieth century England, Grant played the title character's first lover. In the Australian production Sirens (1994), Grant played an Anglican priest who learns to let go of his inhibitions while frolicking in the Outback with an artist's gorgeous and often naked models. However, it was the film he made directly after Sirens, the wildly popular comedy Four Weddings and a Funeral (1994), which put him on the edge of superstardom.

One of the biggest hits of the 1990's and also one of the highest-grossing films ever produced in the United Kingdom, Four Weddings and a Funeral focused on a handsome young Englishman who has had dozens of girlfriends but cannot commit for long to any of them and who becomes obsessed with a somewhat promiscuous American woman even as she prepares to marry another man. Critics praised Grant's comic flair for both verbal and physical humor, and audiences were impressed with his good looks and abundant charm. He had just arrived in the United States to begin work on his first big-budget Hollywood film, Nine Months (1995), when he solicited Divine Brown on a street corner on Sunset Boulevard in Hollywood.

Divine Brown's background could not have contrasted more markedly from that of Grant. Whereas Grant had grown up amid upper-middle-class affluence in London, Brown had come of age in one of the poorest, most crime-ridden neighborhoods of Oakland, California. Following in the footsteps of her friends, she turned to prostitution in her late teen years as a way to pay the bills. She acquired a pimp, who called himself Gangster Brown, and with whom she had two daughters. Under his guidance she began to work regularly on the streets of San Francisco and Oakland. On June 27, 1995, the night that she was solicited by Grant, she was a new arrival to Los Angeles, just as Grant had only recently come to California to try his luck in Hollywood. Grant agreed to pay Brown fifty dollars for oral sex. Before the sex act could be completed, however, two police officers interrupted the pair and arrested them. Brown was booked for prostitution and Grant for lewd conduct in public. Within twenty-four hours, their mug shots were in newspapers around the United States, with accompanying copy detailing their encounter.

However brief their time together, the names Hugh Grant and Divine Brown were inextricable in print, on television, and in the minds of the public. Comedians found the incident irresistible, as did newspaper cartoonists. Brown and Grant were repeatedly featured on late-night television news and were the topic of many talk-show jokes. Grant's longtime companion Elizabeth Hurley made a public statement about the hurt and humiliation she was experiencing because of her lover's infidelity and the surrounding media circus, and the media covered her statement with the sort of deadpan seriousness usually afforded presidents or the chairs of important committees.

Just as the frenzy began to die down, Grant's attorneys appeared in a Los Angeles court on July 11 to answer to the charges leveled against their client, rekindling media and public interest in the affair even though Grant did not attend the hearing personally. Through his lawyers, he pleaded no contest to the charge of lewd conduct in public. The judge ordered Grant to pay a fine of $1,180 and to take a course in HIV-AIDS awareness. He also placed Grant on two years' probation.

Even after the settling of Grant's court case, the public—and the principals—did not stop talking about the events of June 27. While his attorneys represented him in court, Grant appeared on one of the most widely watched television programs in the United States, The Tonight Show with Jay Leno. If the audience expected to hear far-fetched rationalizations, contempt for the police, disparaging remarks about Brown, or expressions of self-pity, they were surprised. Grant simply, clearly, even somewhat humbly admitted that he had done what he had been accused of, that it had been wrong, and that he was sorry. Both the studio audience and host Jay Leno were obviously impressed with his straightforward mea culpa, and Grant went on to make more or less the same statements again and again on other programs, including Larry King Live and Live with Regis and Kathie Lee. Though the names of Grant, Brown, and Hurley continued to be bandied about in the media for months to come, the scandal was effectively diffused by Grant's appearance on The Tonight Show.

IMPACT

Because of Grant's ready openness about the incident, the scandal had little effect on his career. Nine Months proved to be a modest hit and Grant's career proceeded without a hitch. His work has included popular and critical favorites such as Notting Hill (1999), Bridget Jones's Diary (2001), and About a Boy (2002). His relationship with Hurley did not fare as well. Though they managed to stay together for some time, they announced their split in May, 2000.

The effect the scandal had on Brown was perhaps more startling. She is rumored to have made more than one million dollars from her few minutes with Grant. Much of the money came from British tabloids, such as News of the World, which paid lavishly for her recollections of that night in June. Brown also appeared on a wide array of American television programs, including the two most notorious talk shows of the decade, The Jerry Springer Show and The Howard Stern Show. She also posed for adult magazines such as Penthouse and even starred in a pornographic video re-creating her and Grant's encounter. At some point, she also recorded a music album.

An ethicist might suggest that Grant survived the Brown scandal purely because of his honesty and openness. Certainly it could be argued that if the incident had any impact at all on the public as a whole, it provided an exemplar for how to deal with one's own wrongdoing: Admit the mistake openly and apologize. However, as admirable as Grant was in taking responsibility for his actions, the scandal did not harm his career mostly because of changing times.

By the final years of the twentieth century, a young actor's consorting with a prostitute simply was not as shocking or damaging to his public image as it would have been in previous decades. The sexual encounter between Grant and Brown, albeit involving an exchange of money, was consensual and between adults. Furthermore, Grant was an actor who played in films geared toward adults. His actions would have fared differently had he been a celebrity such as Paul Reubens (Pee-wee Herman), who was charged with public indecency in 1991 and whose work was geared toward children.

—Thomas Du Bose

FURTHER READING

Bowyer, Alison. Liz Hurley Uncovered. London: Andre Deutsch, 2003. In its coverage of the scandal, this work favors the viewpoint of Elizabeth Hurley over Hugh Grant and traces the couple's long relationship until its end in the wake of the Divine Brown scandal.

Bracewell, Michael. The Nineties: When Surface Was Substance. London: Flamingo, 2002. Insightful examination of the decade in which the scandal occurred. Hugh Grant is mentioned as a prototypical celebrity of the period.

Neal, Sarah. "Populist Configurations of Race and Gender: The Case of Hugh Grant, Liz Hurley, and Divine Brown." In Thinking Identities: Ethnicity, Racism, and Culture, edited by Avtar Brah, Mary J. Hickman, and Máirtín Mac an Ghaill. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1999. A sociological look at the intersections of ethnicity, race, and culture in the case of the Hugh Grant-Divine Brown sex scandal.

Hugh Grant Is Arrested for Lewd Conduct

Parish, James Robert. Hollywood Bad Boys: Loud, Fast, and Out of Control. Chicago: Contemporary Books, 2002. A revealing collection of biographies of Hollywood male celebrities, including Hugh Grant, who are known for extremes of behavior.

Tresidder, Jody. Hugh Grant: The Unauthorized Biography. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1996. Published soon after the sex scandal. Offers insights and observations fresh from the time.

SEE ALSO: Jan. 20, 1933: Hedy Lamarr Appears Nude in the Czech Film Exstase; Summer, 1936: Film Star Mary Astor's Diary Becomes a Public Sensation; Feb. 6, 1942: Film Star Errol Flynn Is Acquitted of Rape; Aug. 31, 1948: Film Star Robert Mitchum Is Arrested for Drug Possession; Feb. 1, 1978: Roman Polanski Flees the United States to Avoid Rape Trial; July 19, 1985: Mayflower Madam Pleads Guilty to Promoting Prostitution; July 18, 1988: Actor Rob Lowe Videotapes Sexual Tryst with a Minor; July 26, 1991: Comedian Pee-wee Herman Is Arrested for Public Indecency; Sept. 22, 1997: Sports-caster Marv Albert Is Tried for Sexual Assault; Apr. 7, 1998: Pop Singer George Michael Is Arrested for Lewd Conduct; Dec. 18, 2003: Pop Star Michael Jackson Is Charged with Child Molestation; July 28, 2006: Actor Mel Gibson Is Caught Making Anti-Semitic Remarks.

November 18, 1995

FORMER CANADIAN PREMIER BRIAN MULRONEY IS EXPOSED IN AIRBUS SCANDAL

In 1995, Canadian police began investigating former prime minister Brian Mulroney and his adviser, Frank Moores, for taking kickbacks in the sale of Airbus Industrie planes to government-owned Air Canada in 1988. The news media had been reporting on the Airbus investigation for more than one year until finally connecting Mulroney to the scandal in November, 1995. Mulroney eventually was exonerated, but not without controversy.

ALSO KNOWN AS: Schreiber affair; Air Canada scandal; Airbus affair

LOCALE: Canada

CATEGORIES: Publishing and journalism; corruption; government; trade and commerce; business; space and aviation

KEY FIGURES

Philip Mathias (fl. 1990's), reporter with the Financial Post

Brian Mulroney (b. 1939), prime minister of Canada, 1984-1993

Frank Moores (1933-2005), adviser for Mulroney, lobbyist, and premier of Newfoundland, 1972-1979

Karlheinz Schreiber (b. 1934), German-Canadian businessman, lobbyist, and consultant for Airbus Industrie

Giorgio Pelossi (b. 1938), Swiss accountant and Schreiber's former partner at International Airline Leasing

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Air Canada, owned by the Canadian government, signed a $1.8 billion contract in 1988 to purchase thirty-four A-320 medium-range passenger airliners from the European business consortium Airbus Industrie, comprising four companies: Aérospatiale of France; British Aerospace; Messerschmitt-Bölkow-Blohm of West Germany; and CASA of Spain. American aerospace giant Boeing lost out in the bidding. Speculation circulated that there were improprieties in awarding the contract to Airbus, but early investigations by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP) and the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) did not find any wrongdoing.

Years later, on September 29, 1995, the senior counsel of the Canadian Department of Justice (DOJ), on behalf of the RCMP, sent Swiss government officials a letter of request asking for help in obtaining access to banking records that might implicate former Canadian prime minister Brian Mulroney and Ottawa lobbyist and former Newfoundland premier Frank Moores in accepting kickbacks from German-Canadian businessman Karlheinz Schreiber. Schreiber had been a fund-raiser for Mulroney, was an associate of Moores, and was a Canadian representative for Airbus. Moores was chairman of the lobbying firm Government Consultants International (GCI) and a board member of Air Canada.

The DOJ was investigating Mulroney, Moores, and Schreiber on charges of defrauding the Canadian government. One of the bad deals involved Messerschmitt-Bölkow-Blohm's sale of helicopters to the Canadian coast guard and the other deal involved a failed attempt to launch a German armored-vehicle factory in Canada. All of the deals involved Schreiber. The letter to the Swiss authorities also requested that the alleged bank accounts of Moores and Mulroney be frozen and that the RCMP be given the right to access account information.

Later that fall, someone leaked the letter's existence to the media; many claim it was Schreiber. On November 18, Financial Post reporter Philip Mathias broke the story that Mulroney, Moores, and Schreiber were being investigated. Even though the media had been reporting on the Airbus contract controversy for some time, the article by Mathias was the first to connect Mulroney's name with the scandal. Mathias's article included portions of the letter of request as well. The media indicated that the letter acknowledged possible schemes to receive illegal payments involving the sale of the thirty-four A-320 aircraft to Air Canada. The reports claimed that money was likely transferred from Airbus to Schreiber's company, International Aircraft Leasing (IAL), and then transferred into two Swiss bank accounts set up for Moores and Mulroney.

Mulroney responded to the investigations and news reports by filing a $50 million libel suit—$25 million in damages and an additional $25 million in punitive damages—against the DOJ and the RCMP. The DOJ insisted that it had followed normal investigative procedures in writing the letter and that details of the investigation had to be included to ensure Swiss authorization of the request. Mulroney denied claims of misconduct, rejected ownership of bank accounts outside Canada, and refuted claims of having close ties with Moores during the time in question. Moores also denied claims that he lobbied Airbus for the contract and that he had any direct contact with GCI or any of the partners of the consortium. Mulroney and his lawyers argued that the disclosure and publication of excerpts from the letter from the DOJ was defamatory, based on false allegations, and that the excerpts led to worldwide criticism of Mulroney.

In July, 1996, Schreiber filed his own lawsuit, contending that the letter of request was tantamount to undue search and seizure. A Canadian federal court ruled that prior judicial approval of the letter to Swiss authorities was needed and, therefore, any evidence gathered as a result of the letter's requests was unusable in court. In May, 1998, Canada's supreme court overruled the lower court's finding.

The key informant against Schreiber was Giorgio Pelossi, Schreiber's former accountant-bookkeeper at IAL. Pelossi worked with both the RCMP and Swiss authorities to provide evidence against Schreiber. Pelossi told investigators that he had attended a meeting in which Schreiber and Moores opened bank accounts in Switzerland. He claimed Schreiber said that one of the accounts was for Mulroney, but Pelossi also acknowledged he had no evidence that Mulroney was aware of the account or that it had been used.

Brian Mulroney Exposed in Airbus Scandal

Mulroney's lawsuit against the Canadian government was scheduled to start in Quebec superior court on January 6, 1997. Shortly before the appointed date, Mulroney agreed to settle the case in exchange for an apology for the letter of request and for payment of his legal fees. Mulroney received his apology, which noted that officials had not found evidence of "wrongdoings." Moores and Schreiber also received letters of apology, but their letters did not mention a lack of conclusive evidence against them. The settlement, however, did not preclude the RCMP from conducting further investigations.

Brian Mulroney. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

1990's

New information about Schreiber's and Mulroney's questionable relationship was revealed after the settlement between Mulroney and the Canadian agencies, furthering the Airbus scandal. In 1993, after resigning as prime minister but while still a member of the House of Commons—as well as on two succeeding dates during the next eighteen months—Mulroney had met with Schreiber and received three separate $100,000 cash payments. Mulroney allegedly received these payments to help Schreiber promote other businesses, but the former prime minister failed to report these funds on his tax forms at that time. Years later, in 1999, he voluntarily filed a tax disclosure of $225,000.

In September, 1997, German investigators issued an arrest warrant for Schreiber, seeking details from him about several allegations, including tax evasion, fraud, and the Airbus affair. Canadian officers arrested Schreiber in Toronto two years later, on August 27, 1999. He was ordered to be extradited to Germany, but he was released on bail while he appealed the order.

IMPACT

On April 22, 2003, after nine years of costly investigations and a lack of evidence, the RCMP announced an end to the Airbus inquiry. In May, 2004, the Ontario superior court concurred with a lower court's decision to extradite Schreiber, and the Ontario court of appeals followed suit in March, 2006. Early in 2007, Schreiber's bail bond expired, and he was taken back into custody. Two months later, Schreiber sued Mulroney for failure to deliver services after he paid the former prime minister $300,000 in 1993 and 1994.

In June, 2007, the federal court of Canada agreed with the lower courts regarding Schreiber's extradition. Schreiber once more appealed the extradition order, but he failed in the Ontario court of appeals in November and remained in jail in Toronto. Schreiber still feared extradition to Germany, where he was wanted for several corruption charges, including his connection to a fraud investigation involving Helmut Kohl, the former German chancellor. In March, 2008, he lost his last chance to be tried in Canada when the supreme court ruled that he should be extradited, but only after the completion of a public inquiry into his business dealings with Mulroney.

The Airbus affair ranks as one of the worst political scandals in Canadian history. The time-consuming investigation consumed money as well: Canadian citizens had to pay millions of dollars over the course of the inquiry, creating much cynicism about politics when the investigation became widely known by the public.

The vague and uncorroborated aspects of the Airbus affair and the subsequent scandalous business dealings between Mulroney and Schreiber still mystify many people, and there remains much speculation about whether or not Mulroney deserved exoneration. Some believe he should return the settlement monies he received for the cost of his legal fees. Mulroney has vacillated between publicly welcoming further inquiry in hopes of improving his reputation to arguing that there is no sense in wasting even more taxpayer money on further investigations.

—Cynthia J. W. Svoboda

FURTHER READING

Cameron, Stevie. On the Take: Crime, Corruption, and Greed in the Mulroney Years. Toronto, Ont.: Macfarlane Walter & Ross, 1994. A scathing examination of the corruption and crime that plagued Mulroney's term as prime minister of Canada.

Cameron, Stevie, and Harvey Cashore. The Last Amigo: Karlheinz Schreiber and the Anatomy of a Scandal. Toronto, Ont.: Macfarlane Walter & Ross, 2001. A detailed analysis of the Airbus scandal, mostly focusing on the workings of businessman Karlheinz Schreiber.

Kaplan, William. Presumed Guilty: Brian Mulroney, the Airbus Affair, and the Government of Canada. Toronto, Ont.: McClelland & Stewart, 1999. Kaplan investigates the widespread presumptions that defined the Airbus affair and Mulroney's role in the scandal. Also examines how Mulroney worked to gain his own exoneration.

_____. A Secret Trial: Brian Mulroney, Stevie

Cameron, and the Public Trust. Ithaca, N.Y.: McGill-Queen's University Press, 2004. A comprehensive account of the Airbus scandal with much attention paid to the role of journalist Stevie Cameron in revealing the affair to the public.

SEE ALSO: Mar. 4, 1966: Munsinger Sex and Spy Scandal Rocks Canada; Sept. 17, 1985: Media Allege Canadian Officials Allowed Sale of Rancid Tuna; May 7, 1999-Mar. 2, 2001: Ethics Counselor Exonerates Canadian Prime Minister Jean Chrétien.

February 4, 1996

WHISTLE-BLOWER REVEALS TOBACCO INDUSTRY CORRUPTION

Former Brown & Williamson researcher Jeffrey Wigand revealed on the CBS news program 60 Minutes that his former employer added chemicals such as ammonia to cigarettes to increase nicotine's addictiveness. The scandal and its fallout created an ethical and legal earthquake that shook the underpinnings of the tobacco industry, led to a new consumer awareness of the dangers of tobacco products, and rattled investigative journalism.

LOCALE: New York, New York

CATEGORIES: Radio and television; corruption; medicine and health care; environmental issues; business; publishing and journalism

KEY FIGURES

Jeffrey Wigand (b. 1942), former vice president for research, development, and environmental affairs at Brown & Williamson

Mike Wallace (b. 1918), CBS television correspondent

Lowell Bergman (b. 1945), CBS television producer and investigative reporter

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Jeffrey Wigand, a biochemist and former vice president for research, development, and environmental affairs at Brown & Williamson (B&W) in Louisville, Kentucky, became a big-tobacco whistle-blower after confronting his former employer by claiming on national television that the company was guilty of illegal and unethical activities. Wigand, who as a B&W employee also was deeply involved in the corrupt practices, alleged that B&W attempted to systematically conceal the adverse health risks of smoking and consciously introduced injurious toxins (a practice he referred to as "impact boosting") into cigarettes to enhance their appeal and addictive qualities. The revelation also evolved into a major journalistic scandal when 60 Minutes, a prime-time CBS news program, initially chose to delay airing its interview with Wigand before finally opting to air a heavily edited version of his confession.

Wigand was born in Pleasant Valley, New York, on December 17, 1942. After a brief stint in the military, he received a doctorate from State University of New York, Buffalo, and subsequently worked as a marketer and manager at several pharmaceutical companies, including Pfizer and Johnson & Johnson, before going to work for B&W in January, 1989. Although his formal title at B&W was researcher and developer, his job more specifically involved investigative processes including fire safety, ignition propensity, and tobacco additives. He later disclosed that he thought he would have the opportunity to make a difference at B&W by working on a safer cigarette, or cigarettes that would be less harmful. According to Wigand, however, the company blocked most of his proposed studies. He was fired on March 24, 1993.

Former Brown & Williamson researcher Jeffrey Wigand, accompanied by attorneys, arrives for a deposition in Pascagoula, Mississippi, in November, 1995. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Upon his termination, Wigand initially honored his confidentiality agreement with B&W, denying any illegal practices on the part of his former employer. In the spring of 1994, however, Wigand was approached by and cooperated with CBS producer Lowell Bergman, who was seeking advice (mostly involving Wigand's work in developing the self-extinguishing cigarette) about a Philip Morris cigarette-safety program 60 Minutes was preparing to air. At the same time, Wigand, along with former Philip Morris chemist William Farone, became the lead informant in a U.S. Food and Drug Administration investigation into the tobacco industry's use of genetically altered plants to increase nicotine levels in cigarettes.

Lowell understood that Wigand's insider knowledge was important, but Wigand himself remained concerned about the legal and personal consequences of going public. After expressing such doubts, CBS, in exchange for Wigand's complete forthrightness as their informant, agreed to help him legally if he were sued by B&W for violating his confidentiality agreement with the company. Attorney Richard Scruggs agreed to represent Wigand pro bono. Wigand agreed to the deal, and CBS set up his interview with 60 Minutes correspondent Mike Wallace.

In the August 3, 1995, interview, Wigand explained the practice of impact boosting, a harmful chemical process that ensures nicotine is absorbed more quickly by the lungs, which, in turn, affects the brain and central nervous system. He also discussed B&W's target market—youths—and the company's refusal to develop a safer cigarette. He further claimed that additives in tobacco were known carcinogens, and he referred to cigarettes as mere delivery devices for highly addictive nicotine. Wigand also claimed that B&W legal counsel edited the results of some of his studies to exclude references to the hazardous effects of cigarettes.

Following the 60 Minutes interview, which had yet to be broadcast, Wigand began to receive death threats, which he naturally attributed to his conflict with B&W. He confessed to writer Marie Brenner in a 1996 Vanity Fair magazine interview that his children had received death threats and his reputation was under systematic attack through a B&W smear campaign. Someone broke into his Louisville apartment on at least one occasion.

Meanwhile, as the Wigand interview moved forward at CBS, a legal settlement between ABC and the companies Philip Morris and R. J. Reynolds developed out of fear that ABC's airing of its own program about big tobacco would prove damaging to all parties. CBS took note of the case, and although Lowell, Wallace, and 60 Minutes executive producer Don Hewitt understood the significance of the Wigand interview, other CBS executives, fearing that a potential lawsuit would cost billions of dollars, opted to shelve the broadcast. Producers also feared CBS could be charged with tortious interference for persuading Wigand to break his confidentiality agreement with B&W. On November 12, CBS agreed to air a redacted version of the interview and the allegations against B&W, but the network did so without naming Wigand as its source. Almost immediately, The New York Times, media critics, and others condemned the decision as journalistic cowardice. Wallace, too, went on record condemning the executive decision. Only after someone at CBS leaked a transcript of the interview to the New York Daily News and after the threat of a lawsuit passed did the network decide to broadcast a revised version of the interview that included Wigand. The program aired on February 4, 1996.

As expected, B&W sent a message to future whistle-blowers by suing Wigand for breach of contract. By this time, however, the damage had been done. B&W's lawsuit against Wigand garnered little public or media sympathy. Now, few could trust the word of a big tobacco company, or support its claims. The Wall Street Journal and other publications expressed popular sentiment when they concluded that most of the serious allegations against Wigand were unfounded. Though he escaped a possible prison sentence, economic ruin, and attacks on his personal integrity, Wigand emerged from the incident with his credibility and positive public image largely intact.

Wigand's story was adapted for film. The Insider (1999), directed by acclaimed filmmaker Michael Mann, was adapted by Mann and screenwriter Eric Roth from Brenner's Vanity Fair article "The Man Who Knew Too Much" (1996). The celebrated cast includes Russell Crowe as Wigand, Al Pacino as Bergman, and Christopher Plummer as Wallace. Ultimately, The Insider not only popularized the Wigand-B&W scandal but also garnered popular appeal and critical praise. The film received seven Academy Award nominations in 2000, including Best Picture, Best Director, and Best Actor for Crowe, and five Golden Globe nominations.

The film, however, was not without controversy. Mann was accused of using excessive dramatic license. Several persons at CBS (including Wallace) claimed that Bergman attempted to negotiate the film deal while the real-life events were still unfolding. Some also alleged that Bergman was on the phone with Mann during a number of CBS meetings. Wallace was alarmed as well, arguing that Mann's film portrayed him in an unflattering way.

B&W also claimed Mann had distorted the facts. The company primarily was concerned about scenes in the film in which Wigand receives death threats and is being followed by menacing figures. However, according to Brenner's article (on which the film is based), additional death threats had been made against Wigand, most of which were not addressed in the film. As a public-relations safety measure, the company sent representatives to screenings of the film to answer questions. B&W also purchased a full-page advertisement in The Wall Street Journal to respond to the film's promotional campaign (particularly the public appearances of Wigand) and to maintain its innocence.

IMPACT

In the months following Wigand's 60 Minutes interview, a succession of big tobacco whistle-blowers came forward, including three from industry giant Philip Morris.

Wigand became a standard-bearer for a grassroots crusade against big tobacco, and his name is now synonymous with corporate whistle-blowing, the tobacco wars, and the government's attempt to regulate the fifty billion dollar tobacco industry.

More generally, the Wigand scandal led to a broad shift in protocol for investigative media. It also led to changes in the public-relations strategies of tobacco companies but also to a more cynical public. The case also represents a critical moral transformation in the battle against cigarette manufacturers. With the public disclosure of what was previously internal knowledge, tobacco companies began to face new ethical impediments, and the industry's earsplitting denials of the dangers of tobacco went unheard in the wake of overwhelming evidence to the contrary. Likewise, whistle-blowing and investigative journalism proved to be exceptional partners for an informed consumer society.

The whistle-blowing scandal also affected Wigand personally: After moving to Mt. Pleasant, Michigan, he began working as a lecturer and consultant on various tobacco issues. Perhaps most important, he also became deeply involved in teaching adolescents about the dangers of using tobacco, forming Smoke-Free Kids, Inc., his own nonprofit organization.

—Matthew E. Stanley

FURTHER READING

Brandt, Allan M. The Cigarette Century: The Rise, Fall, and Deadly Persistence of the Product That Defined America. New York: Basic Books, 2007. An authoritative and superbly researched history of cigarettes, smokers, and the tobacco industry in the twentieth century.

Brenner, Marie. "The Man Who Knew Too Much." Vanity Fair, May, 1996. Brenner's illuminating article broke much of the Wigand story and was the basis for the screenplay to Michael Mann's film The Insider.

Kessler, David. A Question of Intent: A Great American Battle with a Deadly Industry. New York: PublicAffairs, 2001. Kessler, former head of the FDA, was faced with a simple question upon starting his job with the agency in 1990: "Why doesn't the FDA regulate the consumer product that is the nation's number-one killer?" This book looks at the FDA's role in regulating the giant tobacco industry.

Tate, Cassandra. Cigarette Wars: The Triumph of the "Little White Slaver." New York: Oxford University Press, 2000. Provides an all-purpose overview of the history of cigarettes and their use. Pays particular attention to the trajectory of various movements against tobacco use and successfully ties the movements into the broader historical and social context of reform history.

SEE ALSO: Sept.-Oct., 1937: Prescription Elixir Causes More than One Hundred Deaths; Summer, 1974: Dalkon Shield Contraceptive Is Removed from the Market; Oct. 20, 1978: Firestone Recalls Millions of Defective Car Tires; Sept. 26, 1979: Love Canal Residents Sue Chemical Company; May 29, 1981: Court Finds That Ford Ignored Pinto's Safety Problems; Sept. 17, 1985: Media Allege Canadian Officials Allowed Sale of Rancid Tuna; Nov. 26, 1997: Canadian Health Commissioner Releases Report on Tainted Blood; July, 2002: Journalist Alleges Release of Genetically Modified Corn Seeds in New Zealand; Aug., 2002: Immunologist Resigns After Being Accused of Falsifying Research; Summer, 2006-Mar. 16, 2007: Manufacturer Recalls Pet Food That Killed Thousands of American Pets; Sept. 18, 2006: Newsweek Reveals That Hewlett-Packard Spied on Its Own Board.

Spring, 1996

PHYSICIST PUBLISHES A DELIBERATELY FRAUDULENT ARTICLE

Concerned about a perceived misuse of scientific vocabularies and theories by postmodernist critics, American physicist Alan Sokal parodied postmodern criticism in a journal article he later acknowledged was a hoax. The incident provoked widespread debate about intellectual integrity, academic publishing, postmodern criticism, and cultural studies.

ALSO KNOWN AS: Sokal hoax; Sokal affair

LOCALE: United States

CATEGORIES: Hoaxes, frauds, and charlatanism; publishing and journalism; education

KEY FIGURES

Alan Sokal (b. 1955), American physicist

Andrew Ross (b. 1956), Scottish cultural theorist and editor

Bruce Robbins (b. 1949), American historian, literary theorist, and editor

Stanley Aronowitz (b. 1933), American sociologist and editor

Jean Bricmont (b. 1953?), Belgian theoretical physicist

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Physicist Alan Sokal, distressed by what he considered was a retreat from a responsible concern with evidence in both academics and leftist politics influenced by postmodernism, conducted an experiment that would ignite a firestorm of controversy in academia and the press. “Transgressing the Boundaries: Toward a Transformative Hermeneutics of Quantum Gravity,” a brilliant parody of the jargon and attitudes of faddish leftist academic scholarship, was the outcome of that experiment. The essay, which Sokal submitted to the respected critical and cultural studies journal Social Text, was filled with what Sokal considered characteristically ill-defined claims having little but their fashionable-ness to recommend them. Those with knowledge of mathematical set theory, for example, could only chuckle at the following Sokal line, taken from a footnote in the controversial work.

[L]iberal (and even some socialist) mathematicians are often content to work within the hegemonic Zermelo-Fraenkel framework (which, reflecting its nineteenth century liberal origins, already incorporates the axiom of equality) supplemented only by the axiom of choice. But this framework is grossly insufficient for a liberatory mathematics, as was proven long ago.

Journal editors published Sokal’s essay in the Spring/Summer, 1996, “Science Wars” issue of Social Text.

Sokal acknowledged his deception in “A Physicist Experiments with Cultural Studies,” published in the May/June, 1996, issue of the popular academic magazine Lingua Franca. He then submitted a second essay to Social Text to explain his motives for the deception, but the journal declined to publish the piece. That second essay, “Transgressing the Boundaries: An Afterword,” was published in the fall, 1996, issue of the political journal Dissent and in slightly different form in the October, 1996, issue of the journal Philosophy and Literature.

Intense debate ensued. Sokal’s “Transgressing the Boundaries” was full of exaggerated and absurd science, nonsensical claims, ungrounded assertions, and vocabulary considered politically correct and fashionably flattering. Two editors of Social Text, Andrew Ross and Bruce Robbins—and various sympathizers—explained how the article came to be accepted, but the reasons they offered cast an even less flattering light on the viewpoints they represented.

Social Text founding editor Stanley Aronowitz defended the journal’s decision to publish the essay. He took issue with Sokal’s belief that, as

ACADEMIC PARODY

Physicist Alan Sokal parodied the appropriation of scientific theory by cultural theorists in an admittedly fraudulent journal article he had published in a leading cultural studies journal. An excerpt from his article appears here.

Can the boundary be transgressed (crossed), and if so, what happens then? Technically this is known as the problem of “boundary conditions.” At a purely mathematical level, the most salient aspect of boundary conditions is the great diversity of possibilities: for example, “free b.c.” (no obstacle to crossing), “reflecting b.c.” (specular reflection as in a mirror), “periodic b.c.” (re-entrance in another part of the manifold), and “antiperiodic b.c.” (re-entrance with 180° twist). The question posed by physicists is: Of all these conceivable boundary conditions, which ones actually occur in the representation of quantum gravity? Or perhaps, do all of them occur simultaneously and on an equal footing, as suggested by the complementarity principle?

Source: Social Text, nos. 46/47 (Spring/Summer, 1996).

Aronowitz put it, “proper scientific method filters out social and cultural influences in the process of discovery.” Others also questioned the belief that scientific method is clear and that only error can be explained in terms of cultural factors. Literary theorist Stanley Fish argued, in an op-ed piece in The New York Times (“Professor Sokal’s Bad Joke,” May 21, 1996), that Sokal’s deception undermined the basic trust and collegiality relied on by scientific investigation.

To many others, however, Sokal’s experiment demonstrated the incompetence (at best) or dishonesty (at worst) of those who had been deceived. More generally, the hoax seemed a decisive demonstration of the intellectual bankruptcy of trendy postmodernism in its various guises.

Some of those sympathetic to postmodernism’s virtues embraced dismissive explanations or changed the subject to Sokal’s own motivations, and a few misunderstood the hoax as a right-wing entry in the debate over political correctness (either to revile or salute it). Indeed, Sokal did not conceal his own leftist political sympathies. Others argued that Sokal had caricatured postmodernist philosophy and oversimplified the history of science. Mathe-matician Gabriel Stolzenberg, for example, critiqued Sokal’s work in a series of articles emphasizing “the failure of my professional colleagues, the science warriors, to recognize the limits of their competence to read and reason intelligently about certain texts that are outside their professional domains.” Philosopher and historian of science Mara Beller argued that “astonishing statements, hardly distinguishable from those satirized by Sokal, abound in the writings of [famous physicists such as] Bohr, Heisenberg, Pauli, Born and Jordan.”

With many additional examples on hand of the (apparent) misuse of science by nonscientists, mostly collected during the preparation of the parody, Sokal wrote a book, in French (Impostures intellectuelles, 1997), with his Belgian colleague, Jean Bricmont. Published later in the United States as Fashionable Nonsense: Postmodern Intellectuals’ Abuse of Science (1999), the work offers detailed criticism of the scientific faux pas of a number of French intellectuals who had influenced American academics. A new firestorm was ignited.

Undeterred, Sokal continued what he considered was his second career: defender of an evidence-based, scientific approach to social issues. In later work, he explored the ways in which pseudoscience shares intellectual weaknesses with postmodernism. Sokal argues that pseudoscience and postmodernism encourage a self-serving scientific gullibility. He also turned his attention to the ways in which the political left’s postmodernist vices facilitated the conservative distortion of science during the administration of U.S. president George W. Bush, a distortion based on the vested interests of big corporations and religious fundamentalists. Sokal’s criticism culminated in the book Beyond the Hoax: Science, Philosophy, and Culture (2008).

IMPACT

The Sokal hoax provoked international debate, especially in the United States and France, about the meanings of science, rationality, and intellectualism, and about the academy in general. According to scholar Patricia Clough, the hoax and ensuing debate help to explain why the so-called culture wars became the so-called science wars. In assessing the long-term effects of the hoax, Clough laments that “cultural studies of science have been turned over to disciplinary studies,” meaning that the social sciences and humanities have themselves formed their own science-studies specializations (within their respective fields), “as if to assure the disciplinary and methodological rigor of those engaged in science studies.” That shift, she suggests, had the effect of limiting or restricting criticism: Questions about the legitimacy of science and reason had been “quieted,” Clough argues, and the relationship of such questions to various differences (of race, gender, and class) has “ceased to be central to social criticism.” Sokal himself rejoiced that among the academic left, “pronouncements of extreme relativism have subsided significantly in recent years.”

Even assuming that such changes in scholarship and focus were made, their connection to the hoax remains uncertain. Nonetheless, there can be little doubt that Sokal’s engaging criticism of the abuse of science played a major role in focusing attention on these issues. Some even would contend that because postmodernist attitudes are so impervious to reasoned criticism, effective refutation ironically had to employ more than merely argumentative means. Arguably, it was scandal alone—the scandal of appearing (and, in fact, being) gullible—that affected the selective skepticism and convenient relativism of academics at the end of the twentieth century.

—Edward Johnson

FURTHER READING

Bell, Mara. “The Sokal Hoax: At Whom are We Laughing?” Physics Today 51, no. 9 (September, 1998). Bell argues that it was “the great quantum physicists,” and not modern cultural critics, “in whose writings we find roots of the postmodernist excesses of today.”

Clough, Patricia Ticineto. “Technoscience, Global Politics, and Cultural Criticism.” Social Text 22,

Physicist Publishes Deliberately Fraudulent Article

no. 3 (Fall, 2004): 1-23. Introduction to an issue examining the impact of Sokal’s parody. The authors “think about technoscience not only as an object of social criticism” but also “as a resource of thought for social criticism.”

Mooney, Chris, and Alan Sokal. “Can Washington Get Smart About Science?” Los Angeles Times, February 4, 2007. A brief discussion of the ways in which right-wing corporate and fundamentalist science abuse in Washington, D.C., has supplanted leftist postmodernist science abuse in the academy.

Sokal, Alan D. Beyond the Hoax: Science, Philosophy, and Culture. New York: Oxford University Press, 2008. A reconsideration of his own 1996 hoax and an extension of its lessons to right-wing abuses of science. Includes a reprint of the parody, with explanatory footnotes.

Sokal, Alan D., and Jean Bricmont. Fashionable Nonsense: Postmodern Intellectuals’ Abuse of Science. New York: Picador, 1999. Originally published in French in 1997, this detailed criticism of the postmodernist thought of French intellectuals examines a broad range of texts discovered in the course of Sokal’s preparation of his parody. Includes a reprint of the parody and its later-published afterword.

The Sokal Hoax: The Sham that Shook the Academy. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 2000. An anthology by the editors of Lingua Franca. Surveys the impact of the hoax (the original parody, Sokal’s “confession,” and numerous commentaries).

Stolzenberg, Gabriel. “Reading and Relativism: An Introduction to the Science Wars.” In After the Science Wars, edited by Keith Ashman and Philip Baringer. New York: Routledge, 2001. One of several essays in which Stolzenberg makes his case that the Sokal-style criticism of postmodernist and other philosophical thought frequently misreads texts, argues simplistically, and generally overreaches its limits of competence.

SEE ALSO: 1928-1929: Actor Is Suspected of Falsely Claiming to Be an American Indian;

June 5, 1944: Australian Poets Claim Responsibility for a Literary Hoax; Nov. 21, 1953: Piltown Man Is Revealed to Be a Hoax; Apr. 25, 1983: German Magazine Publishes Faked Hitler Diaries; Mar. 23, 1989: Scientists' "Cold Fusion" Claims Cannot Be Verified; June 18, 2001: Historian Joseph J. Ellis Is Accused of Lying; Jan. 4, 2002: Historian Stephen E. Ambrose Is Accused of Plagiarism; Jan. 18, 2002: Historian

Doris Kearns Goodwin Is Accused of Plagiarism; Aug., 2002: Immunologist Resigns After Being Accused of Falsifying Research; Sept. 25, 2002: Inquiry Reveals That Physicist Jan Hendrik Schön Faked His Research; Oct. 25, 2002: Historian Michael A. Bellesiles Resigns After Academic Fraud Accusations; July 24, 2007: University of Colorado Fires Professor for Plagiarism and Research Falsification.

August 16, 1996

BELGIAN MEDIA REVEAL HOW POLICE BUNGLED SERIAL MURDER CASE

Belgian police investigating an alleged kidnaper and serial killer named Marc Dutroux missed evidence of a basement dungeon containing two kidnapped teenagers. Charges of police corruption and incompetence soon followed, leading to a major reorganization of Belgian law enforcement.

LOCALE: Brussels, Belgium

CATEGORIES: Murder and suicide; violence; corruption; law and the courts; families and children

KEY FIGURES

Marc Dutroux (b. 1956), Belgian serial killer
Michel Nihoul (b. 1941), Dutroux's accomplice
Bernard Weinstein (1955-1995), Dutroux's accomplice

Sabine Dardenne (b. 1983), one of Dutroux's last two victims

Laetitia Delhez (b. 1981), one of Dutroux's last two victims

SUMMARY OF EVENT

A Belgian parliamentary committee investigating the Marc Dutroux serial killing case determined that the abductions, torture, rape, and murders of at least two girls could have been prevented had police not made numerous mistakes during its investigation of Dutroux prior to his arrest in August, 1996. Police had neglected to follow a tip about missing teenage girls, leading to a public scandal that began when the news media reported on the investigation the day after police raided Dutroux's home. Two days later, he confessed to the killings and abductions.

On August 15, after deciding to act on the tip about missing girls, police found two teenage girls locked in a soundproof concrete dungeon inside Dutroux's house. The youngest girl, twelve-year-old Sabine Dardenne, was kidnapped on May 28 and kept in the basement by Dutroux for more than two months. Fourteen-year-old Laetitia Delhez was abducted on August 9. Both girls reported being sexually assaulted by Dutroux.

A few days later police exhumed the bodies of Julie Lejeune and Mélissa Russo, two eight-year-old girls who disappeared in June, 1995. They were found in the backyard of one of Dutroux's seven homes. Also found were the remains of an accomplice—Bernard Weinstein—who Dutroux insisted was at fault for the girl's deaths. Dutroux said Weinstein kidnapped the children and failed to feed them while Dutroux was jailed for several months for vehicle theft. Dutroux admitted to drugging Weinstein and burying him alive next to the girls.

Police had searched Dutroux's home in Charle-roi during a separate investigation into stolen cars before his arrest, but they failed to notice a dungeon in the basement of the house; Dardenne and Delhez were in that dungeon. Further investigations revealed rampant government and police corruption and incompetence in the months before the arrest. In 1993, police ignored a tip from an informant who told them that Dutroux offered him the equivalent of about five thousand U.S. dollars to kidnap young girls and that Dutroux was selling girls into prostitution. Police also ignored a tip that came from Dutroux's mother. She had contacted prosecutors to report that her son was keeping young girls in the basements of his unoccupied houses. Despite these disturbing, detailed tips, the police did nothing, and more girls disappeared.

The scandal would bring more surprises. Additional accomplices, including Dutroux's second wife, Michelle Martin, were arrested, and the media revealed that Dutroux had been convicted in 1989 for the rape and abuse of five young girls. He received a thirteen-year prison sentence but was released for good behavior after serving only three years. Shortly after his release, young girls began to disappear around the neighborhoods where Dutroux's homes were located.

The public was outraged at the news that the girls were murdered at the hands of a convicted rapist and child abuser who had been released early from prison. The public also condemned police for not acting on the tips from informants about Dutroux's activities after his release from prison.

Investigators also uncovered evidence of a related child-sex ring and arrested a number of people connected with Dutroux, including Michel Nihoul, Michel Lelièvre, and nine police officers. Nihoul was a businessman who admitted to arranging orgies at a Belgian château that catered to government and police officials. Lelièvre was identified as an accomplice in the kidnapping of two girls.

In October, 1996, Jean-Marc Connerotte, the investigative judge in the Dutroux case, was dismissed. The supreme court of Belgium removed him because he was involved in fund-raising for programs that helped search for missing children, particularly children who had been kidnapped by Dutroux. The court ruled that Connerotte lacked objectivity.

Connerotte's dismissal, and the incompetence of the police and government in handling the case, led to the largest peacetime marches in Belgium since World War II. About 300,000 people marched throughout the city of Brussels, demanding serious reforms of the political and judicial system. Suspicion of a government cover-up was high. The protests and heightened scrutiny led to a parliamentary committee investigation into how law enforcement and the courts handled—and mishandled—the case. The committee's final report was clear: The young girls who were murdered might have lived had police properly investigated the tips they received. The official inquiry demanded a change in laws, including a reinstatement of the death penalty in Belgium.

To further complicate matters, the case dragged on in the legal system, reinforcing suspicions of a cover-up. Dutroux and his accomplices were scheduled for trial in 2000, but the trial did not begin until 2004. On the third day of the proceedings, Dutroux testified that two Belgian police officers helped him kidnap two of his victims. He also blamed his accomplices in the deaths of some of the victims and hinted that he was merely one part of a large pedophile network led by codefendant Nihoul. Dutroux also claimed the case involved other prominent Belgians, including bankers, members of the royal family, and high-ranking government officials. Investigations into these claims did not go far, however, because the accusations lacked accompanying evidence.

Accused serial murderer Marc Dutroux being led into a Belgian court in 1998. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

Dismissed judge Connerotte testified that he received death threats during his investigation of the case, and that the inquiry was severely hampered by the government's protection of suspects. Finally, on June 17, 2004, the jury reached a verdict. Dutroux was found guilty of six counts of kidnapping and rape and three counts of murder. His accomplices were found guilty on offenses that included kidnapping and murder. Dutroux received a sentence of life in prison and his codefendants received sentences ranging from five to thirty years.

IMPACT

The notoriety of the Dutroux abduction and murder case brought worldwide attention to Belgium, and Dutroux became the most despised person in that small nation. The incompetence of the police force and its bungled investigations brought scorn from around the world.

The Belgian parliament's inquiry into the bungled case led to court hearings, which then led to discussions of critical government and police reform. However, it was not until after Dutroux escaped for three hours in April, 1998, after overpowering a police officer that the government finally agreed to take action and restructure the justice system. The 1998 escape also prompted the resignation of three officials, including the justice and interior ministers.

—Jesus F. Gonzalez

FURTHER READING

Bisin, Sandra. "Belgium: The Pedophilia Files." In Abuse Your Illusions: The Disinformation Guide to Media Mirages and Establishment Lies, edited by Russ Kick. New York: Disinformation, 2003. Collection of essays on cover-ups and conspiracies. Bisin's essay on the Marc Dutroux case provides a general overview and coverage of police incompetence.

Dardenne, Sabine, with Marie-Therese Cuny and Penelope Dening. I Choose to Live. London: Virago Press, 2005. Excellent memoir by Dutroux abductee Sabine Dardenne, who describes her eight-day ordeal in the dungeon.

Sarre, Rick. "The Belgian Disease: Dutroux, Scandal, and System Failure in Belgium." In Policing Corruption: International Perspectives, edited by Rick Sarre, Dilip K. Das, and H. J. Albrecht. Lanham, Md.: Lexington Books, 2005. In this collection of essays on criminal investigations, the chapter by Sarre focuses on investigative failures and government and police misconduct and incompetence in the Dutroux case.

SEE ALSO: Mar. 2, 1906: Psychoanalyst Ernest Jones Is Accused of Molesting Mentally Disabled Children; May 20, 1974: French Cardinal Daniélou Dies in a Prostitute's House; July 23, 1978: Utah Millionaire Is Murdered by His Grandson; Aug. 12, 1983-July 27, 1990: McMartin Preschool Is Embroiled in Child-Abuse Case; Jan. 12 and May 11, 1987: Media Reports Spark Investigation of Australian Police Corruption; Mar., 1990: Menendez Brothers Are Arrested for Murdering Their Parents; Dec. 23, 1998: Prominent Belgians Are Sentenced in Agusta-Dassault Corruption Scandal; Dec., 2000: Sexual Abuse of Children in France Leads to the Outreau Affair; Jan. 30, 2001: Liverpool Children's Hospital Collects Body Parts Without Authorization; Dec. 18, 2003: Pop Star Michael Jackson Is Charged with Child Molestation.

November 3, 1996

CAR CRASH REVEALS DEPTH OF GOVERNMENT CORRUPTION IN TURKEY

A former chief of the Istanbul police, a leader of the Grey Wolves right-wing terrorist group, and a model turned assassin were killed in a car crash that marked the start of the Susurluk scandal in Turkey. Documents in the car revealed connections between Turkish politicians and military forces and organized crime groups, a revelation that came as no surprise to many who already suspected deep government corruption.

LOCALE: Susurluk, near Istanbul, Turkey

CATEGORIES: Corruption; drugs; organized crime and racketeering; politics; violence

KEY FIGURES

Hüseyin Kocadağ (d. 1996), former deputy chief of the Istanbul police special operations department

Sedat Bucak (b. 1960), True Path Party deputy, leader of the Kurdistan Workers' Party

Abdullah Çatli (1956-1996), leader of the Grey Wolves terrorist group and a convicted fugitive
Gonca Us (d. 1996), former model who became a hired assassin

Mehmet Ağar (b. 1951), former government interior minister, True Path Party member, 2002-2007

Tansu Ciller (b. 1946), former prime minister of Turkey, 1993-1996

SUMMARY OF EVENT

The Susurluk scandal was born from the remains of a traffic accident in Susurluk, Turkey, on November 3, 1996. The identities of the passengers in one of the crashed vehicles revealed a connection between criminal organizations and Turkish politicians, police, and military officials and confirmed suspicions of what was known as the deep state in Turkey. The deep state is an alleged coalition of antidemocratic officials and organized criminals believed to be enmeshed within the Turkish state (a state within a state). The scandal led to the resignation of a major political figure, numerous arrests of police and government officials, several convictions, and increased tensions and distrust between Turkish citizens and the national government.

Three of four passengers in an automobile were killed after a truck driver, later charged with reckless driving, hit the car, a Mercedes. Inside the car at the accident scene, police discovered fake passports and gun licenses, pistols, sniper rifles, submachine guns, silencers, ammunition, explosives, narcotics, and cash. The discovery of this arsenal was not as shocking and frightening to the public as was the identities of the four passengers riding in the car.

The only survivor from the car was Sedat Bucak, a True Path Party deputy of the Turkish parliament and leader of the Kurdistan Workers' Party (a militant Kurdish organization seeking independence from Turkey). Bucak was taken from the vehicle with serious injuries. Hüseyin Kocadağ, a former deputy chief of the special operations department with the Istanbul police, was killed in the crash. The other two passengers killed in the crash were Mehmet Özbay and his girlfriend, Gonca Us, a Turkish former model who turned hired assassin. During the police investigation of the accident, it was discovered that Özbay was an alias for a convicted international fugitive named Abdullah Çatli, the leader of a right-wing terrorist organization called the Grey Wolves (also known as the Commandos or the Nationalist Action Party). The Grey Wolves were known for torturing, bombing, massacring, and assassinating left-wing political figures and supporters and had been held responsible for many of the unexplained bombings and deaths throughout Turkey's civil war between the Turkish military and Kurdish separatists. The group was responsible, particularly, for many of the killings during the war's peak during the 1970's. Çatli was an international fugitive sought after by Interpol (the International Criminal Police Organization) for his 1982 escape from a prison where he was serving time for drug trafficking and murder.

Former interior minister Mehmet Ağar in November, 1996. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The tragedy of the crash muted Turkish citizens' fear and anger as many questioned why these four people of varying backgrounds were in the same car. For many, the connection solidified fears that Turkey was a deep state in which government officials collaborated with criminal organizations to secure political interests through terrorism and murder while overlooking the organizations' own illicit activities, such as drug trafficking. The police weapons and false passports—particularly those signed by Mehmet Ağar, Turkey's interior minister and a member of the True Path Party—found inside the Mercedes fueled speculation that the deep-state government was protecting wanted criminals.

After details of the crash surfaced, Ağar insisted that Kocadağ and Çatli were in the same car because Kocadağ had captured Çatli. However, evidence that the four passengers had been staying at the same hotel for several days contradicted Ağar's claims. Ağar resigned from his position as interior minister, citing that the government was involved in confidential security operations in connection with the accident and that he could not provide further details.

On November 12, a parliamentary commission was created to investigate the possible connection between government and security officials and criminal organizations. Bucak and several special-police officers were suspended for their possible involvement in illegal operations. The commission hearings began on December 24 and both Bucak and Ağar declared their innocence and used parliamentary immunity to exempt them from testifying—or being convicted. In February, 1997, nonviolent protests that included blackouts, flashing lights, and honking car horns poured out across Turkey because of the diplomatic immunity of Ağar and Bucak and the lack of information given to citizens regarding the incident. The protests eased at the end of March in anticipation of the commission's Susurluk Report, which was released in early April.

Instead of assuaging the public's distrust and anger, the report produced more questions, infuriated those who demanded that Bucak's and Ağar's immunity be removed, and disappointed many who expected a purge of Turkey's government, police, and military to sever criminal connections. The suspected government cover-up led to further protests.

The Susurluk investigation was hampered by the commission's inability to access government documents and by the numerous refusals by officials to testify, including former prime minister Tansu Ciller, who also was suspected of being involved with the deep state. The report called for the removal of Bucak's and Ağar's immunities and that they be tried; it also cited how such diplomatic protection had exacerbated the corruption of politicians. The report speculated that the passengers of the Mercedes had been planning or were about to perform an illegal act prior to the crash. The report concluded that politicians such as Ciller and Ağar had organized a criminal network in conjunction with Turkish security forces to protect the nation's interests against separatists, and that the security operations grew out of control when terrorists such as Çatli executed political opponents, distributed drugs, and committed other crimes. The report blamed individual politicians and not the state for dealing with criminal organizations.

The Susurluk trial concluded on September 19 and was met with a mix of protests from Turks and praise from Kurdish separatists. A majority of the defendants were released because of insufficient evidence. Only a few defendants, mainly special police, who confessed to their involvement were convicted and sentenced. Following the defendants' release, Ciller demanded an official apology from the state. In response to public protests, the commission annulled Bucak's and Aġar's immunities in December and charged them with organizing and participating in criminal enterprises.

The commission's final report was released in January, 1998, which reiterated previous findings, urged the immediate removal of politicians found to be involved in criminal activities, and suggested an immediate crackdown on drug trafficking. The commission's investigation of Bucak's and Aġar's involvement in Susurluk was deferred when they were reelected to Parliament in February, 1999.

In 2001, the convictions of security officials previously found guilty in Susurluk were overturned because of an inadequate investigation; a retrial was ordered. On November 3, 2002, Bucak's trial resumed after he failed to be reelected. Bucak was found innocent on June 26, 2003; however, the Turkish supreme court annulled the verdict on February 28, 2004, demanded that Bucak be charged as the head of a criminal organization, and ordered a retrial (which began on January 17, 2006). Bucak was found guilty on November 14 and sentenced to one year and fifteen days in prison. Aġar's trial resumed on February 14, 2008, after he also lost his bid for reelection.

IMPACT

The Susurluk scandal rocked the political and social foundations of Turkey but offered the chance for the formation of a movement against government corruption. However, many citizens believe that Turkey remains a deep state and that the government was able to bury much of its involvement in Susurluk and avoid accountability. The open wound left in Turkey's political system by the scandal forced many to question the state's legitimacy and its ability to rid the country of corruption and terrorism and to protect its citizens. On March 21, 2008, scandal again struck the country as several politicians, legal officials, and military personnel were apprehended for their involvement with a criminal group known as the Ergenekon network.

—Sheena Garitta

FURTHER READING

Gunter, Michael M. "Susurluk: The Connection Between Turkey's Intelligence Community and Organized Crime." International Journal of Intelligence and Counter Intelligence 11, no. 2 (June, 1998). An examination of the individuals and events involved in the Susurluk scandal, the contents of the parliamentary commission report on Susurluk, and the history of Turkey's internal corruption, deep state, and civil war.

Meyer, James H. "Politics as Usual: Ciller, Refah, and Susurluk: Turkey's Troubled Democracy." East European Quarterly 32, no. 4 (January, 1999): 489-502. Examines corruption in Turkey's political system, especially the corruption that helped define the Susurluk scandal.

Yoruk, Zafer. "Gangs of Ankara: A 'Deep History.'" Kurdish Globe, May 29, 2008. Provides a detailed historical narrative of how the deep state has for generations embedded itself within the political structure of Turkey.

SEE ALSO: May 3, 1950: U.S. Senate Committee Begins Investigating Organized Crime; Feb. 2, 1980: Media Uncover FBI Sting Implicating Dozens of Lawmakers; May 23, 1981: Italian Justice Minister Resigns Because of Crime Connection; Aug. 6, 1982: Banco Ambrosiano Collapses Amid Criminal Accusations; Dec. 23, 1998: Prominent Belgians Are Sentenced in Agusta-Dassault Corruption Scandal; Oct. 22, 2006: Chilean Politicians Use Community Funds for Personal Campaigns.

January, 1997

PYRAMID INVESTMENT SCHEMES CAUSE ALBANIAN GOVERNMENT TO FALL

After the fall of communism in Albania, numerous investment companies with little capital backing began to appear in the country. Some of these companies were actually pyramid schemes that took advantage of desperate times. The schemes collapsed, however, leading to riots approaching civil war and the fall of the corrupt government.

LOCALE: AlbaniaCATEGORIES: Hoaxes, frauds, and charlatanism; government; corruption; violence; businessKEY FIGURES

Sali Berisha (b. 1944), president of Albania, 1992-1997

Aleksander Meksi (b. 1939), prime minister of Albania, 1992-1997

Fatos Lubonja (b. 1951), cofounder of the Albanian Forum for Democracy

SUMMARY OF EVENT

When the communist regimes of Eastern Europe began falling between 1989 and 1991, Albania smoothly introduced democratic rule into the country. However, Albania was still the poorest country in Europe. With the economy in dismal shape, Albanians looked for a quick fix. They thought they found it in what ultimately turned into a series of pyramid schemes. The plans, given the low level of the Albanian economy, were unprecedented in their scope and audacity, and their eventual collapse was monumental as well. At its height the nominal value of the investments reached almost half the country's gross national product. Almost 70 percent of the population had stock in the fraudulent companies.

The schemes were fed by the lack of stable and historic Albanian financial institutions and markets and the failure of the government to regulate the economy, much of which was handled through informal markets. Albania lacked private banks, and the three state banks that existed established strict credit policies after bad loans mounted in their portfolios. Private loans from family members and unregulated lenders filled the gaps. Some of these private lending companies invested depositors' funds in the pyramids.

A banking act of February, 1996, put the lending institutions under the authority of the Bank of Albania, but the bank was unable to exercise control because the government continued to support the pyramid companies and prevented closure of the rogue banks. Some of the highest government leaders, including prime minister Aleksander Meksi, were closely associated with these banks, which gave large contributions to the ruling Democratic Party.

Some of the companies involved were pure pyramids, attracting investors by promising huge returns from the investments of later depositors. The companies themselves had no intrinsic value nor did they engage in any enterprise to raise profits, except seeking more investors. As more investors became involved, it was impossible to keep up with the promised returns, and when investors wanted to pull their monies, they discovered that the companies were in fact frauds.

Some of the companies fell into a more gray area: investing in enterprises. Three of the largest of these companies—VEFA, Gjallica, and Kamberi—had investments in illegal activities that included smuggling contraband into Bosnia. These companies, too, dissolved into pyramids in 1996, when their liabilities far outstripped their assets.

The road to ruin began in late 1995. United Nations sanctions against Yugoslavia ended the lucrative smuggling activities of the companies, but the corruption continued. At the beginning of 1996, the companies increased their promised interest rates to attract more investors. Taking into account that Albania's runaway inflation rate was 17 percent at the time—triple what it had been the previous year—the promised annual rate of return amounted to almost 100 percent and, during the year, that rate continued to rise. Two new pyramid companies, Xhafferi and Populii, joined in with even greater promises. One of the pure pyramid companies, Sude, offered rates that were double those of the others.

More investors entered the pyramids. VEFA had the largest number of liabilities, with eighty-five thousand depositors. Xhafferi and Populii attracted two million depositors between them. (Albania had a population of only 3.5 million.) A war of inflated promises began. Kamberi promised 10 percent per month; Populii promised 30 percent. In November, Xhafferi promised a 300 percent increase after a three-month period. Sude countered with a promise of doubling the depositor's investment in two months. Pyramid liabilities rose to $1.2 billion. Albanians sold their homes and farmers sold their cattle.

The population, initially, paid little attention to the rumors of fraudulent dealings. There was an expectation that the government would take care of things, a feeling perhaps stemming from the decades under communist rule. If the money was the fruit of some shady dealing, the investors did not care. They happily put all their expendable income, and some income they could not afford, into the investments.

Meanwhile, the government remained idle. Only in October did it warn the public against the risky investments, but it attacked only the pure pyramid companies. Albanian president Sali Berisha defended the companies, but the International Monetary Fund (IMF) warned the government of the danger of the schemes. Berisha responded by accusing the IMF of interfering in Albania's internal affairs. Under external pressure, he established a commission to investigate the companies, but that commission never met.

On November 19, Sude defaulted, and like a house of cards the pyramids began to tumble. Sude's failure led to a lack of confidence in the rest of the companies. Some tried to restore confidence by offering more reasonable rates on deposits, but the public would reject the attempts. In January, 1997, Sude and Gjallica declared bankruptcy. Soon, the other companies stopped making their payments as well. The government refused to compensate the investors for their losses, which made possible national economic recovery but did not appease the investors.

The government moved against the pure pyramids, freezing the assets of Xhafferi and Populii, but it still took no action against those that had investments, especially the largest ones, even after the parliament enacted a law against pyramids in February. The Bank of Albania, on its own, limited the amount of money that could be withdrawn at any one time to prevent the depletion of resources.

Greek soldiers patrol Durrës, Albania, in the spring of 1997. The soldiers were part of a United Nations peace-keeping force in Albania to restore order and distribute humanitarian aid following rioting and other violence. (AP/Wide World Photos)

By the spring of 1997 the government lost control of the country. Soldiers and police officers deserted, allowing many people to loot the national armories for rifles. Foreigners were evacuated by their home countries and Albanians fled the country. The government resigned, and a caretaker government faced a hopeless situation. Rioting led to the deaths of two thousand people, and the economy collapsed. Anarchy ruled through most of the nation. The rioters burned customs and tax offices, and state revenues dwindled. Industries closed, trade stopped, and prices rose close to 30 percent in the first six months of the year. The lek (the national currency) fell 40 percent in value. Still, the largest pyramid companies claimed to be solvent and clung to their existing assets.

In Vlora, angry crowds threw stones at police trying to restore order. The mob beat some police and stripped off their uniforms, burning them with their weapons and equipment in bonfires. The police fired in the air and retaliated with stones from rooftops. In Tirana, thirty-five thousand rioters attacked the police and forced them to retreat. The police returned with water cannons and police dogs to quell the mob, but the rioters continued, setting government buildings afire. Berisha called a state of emergency on March 2, and on March 28, thousands of U.N. peacekeeping troops entered the country.

IMPACT

With international assistance the caretaker government began to restore order. The economic effects of the schemes affected the economy in the short term only. The political and social effects were more damaging, however. Much of the population lost its meager savings, and confidence in the new democracy was severely shaken. Some of the pyramid leaders were tried and convicted.

Fatos Lubonja, cofounder of the Albanian Forum for Democracy, told an American political scientist after the crisis that the government corruption destroyed Albania's infrastructure and, far worse, destroyed the people's faith in the new Albania. Lubonja hoped that those who fled would return and rebuild the country.

The development of a new Albanian constitution led to reform in politics and the economy, but although democracy and the rule of law took hold, government corruption persisted. In 2005, Berisha, who had defended the pyramid companies, returned to public office as prime minister of Albania.

—Frederick B. Chary

FURTHER READING

Bezemer, Dirk J., ed. On Eagle's Wings: The Albanian Economy in Transition. New York: Nova Science, 2006. A collection of articles by authors with academic, business, and policy backgrounds. Includes a chapter on the pyramid schemes. Bibliography.

Jarvis, Christopher. "The Rise and Fall of Albania's Pyramid Schemes." Finance and Development 37, no. 1 (March, 2000). Jarvis, an economist, examines the Albanian financial and economic crisis in detail. Offers solutions to prevent such economic collapse.

Prifti, Peter R. Unfinished Portrait of a Country. Boulder, Colo.: East European Monographs, 2005. A survey of Albania by a leading expert. Examines the pyramid companies and the aftermath of the scheme. Includes bibliography.

Vaughan-Whitehead, Daniel. Albania in Crisis: The Predictable Fall of the Shining Star. Northampton, Mass.: Edward Elgar, 1999. One of the best studies of the pyramid schemes by an academic expert. Contains a bibliography.

Vickers, Miranda, and James Pettifer. Albania: From Anarchy to a Balkan Identity. Rev. ed. New York: New York University Press, 2000. An excellent study by two specialists focusing on the postcommunist period in Albania. Examines the pyramid schemes but does not include discussion of the rioting and violence.

SEE ALSO: 1919-1920: Ponzi Schemes Are Revealed as Investment Frauds; Oct. 22, 1923: U.S. Senate Begins Hearings on Teapot Dome Oil Leases; Jan. 8, 1934-Jan. 17, 1936: Stavisky's Fraudulent Schemes Rock French Government; Mar. 29, 1962: Billie Sol Estes Is Arrested for Corporate Fraud; May 2, 1984: E. F. Hutton Executives Plead Guilty to Fraud; May 7, 1985: Banker Jake Butcher Pleads Guilty to Fraud; Nov. 13, 1986-May 4, 1989: Iran-Contra Weapons Scandal Taints Reagan's Administration; Jan. 15, 1988: ZZZZ Best Founder Is Indicted on Federal Fraud Charges; Mar. 29, 1989: Financier Michael Milken Is Indicted for Racke-teering and Fraud; Dec. 23, 1998: Prominent Belgians Are Sentenced in Agusta-Dassault Cor-ruption Scandal.

February 26, 1997

TEACHER MARY KAY LETOURNEAU IS ARRESTED FOR STATUTORY RAPE

In 1996, a thirty-four-year-old married schoolteacher named Mary Kay Letourneau became sexually involved with a thirteen-year-old student named Vili Fualaau. Initially released on a suspended sentence, she violated the terms of her parole by seeing the boy again and was sentenced to more than seven years in prison. She had two children with Fualaau and married him in 2005.

LOCALE: Seattle, Washington

CATEGORIES: Law and the courts; families and children; sex crimes; public morals

KEY FIGURES

Mary Kay Letourneau (b. 1962), teacher at Shorewood Elementary School in Burien, Washington

Vili Fualaau (b. 1983), student at Shorewood Elementary School

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Mary Kay Letourneau, who was thirty-four years old, a wife, and a mother of four children, became the source of tabloid fodder and instant scandal when it became known that she had been having an affair with a thirteen-year-old student. She was sent to prison in 1997 for statutory rape.

Letourneau grew up in Southern California and was one of seven children of John and Mary Schmitz. John G. Schmitz was a member of the conservative John Birch Society and had political aspirations. He served in the California state senate and was a U.S. representative. After an unsuccessful bid to run for president on the American Independent Party ticket in 1972, Schmitz moved his family to Corona del Mar, California. Two years later, Letourneau's three-year-old brother, Philip, drowned in the family pool. Letourneau insists that this tragic event in her family's life did not have any long-term effects on her.

In 1982, Schmitz's political career was cut short by revelations that he was having an affair with Carla Stuckle, a former college student and Republican campaign volunteer, and had fathered two of her children. During the scandal, Letourneau sided with her father. In November, 1983, Letourneau met Steve Letourneau, a baggage handler for Alaska Airlines. Four months into their relationship, Letourneau became pregnant. While Letourneau was not in love with her husband, her strict Roman Catholic parents insisted that she and Steve marry; they did so on June 30, 1984. The couple moved to Anchorage, Alaska, then Seattle, Wash-ington.

Letourneau finished her teaching degree at Seattle University in 1989 and got a job at the Shorewood Elementary School located in Burien, Wash-ington, a suburb of Seattle. Initially assigned to second-grade classes, she first encountered Vili Fualaau when he was eight years old and in the second grade. By all accounts a talented artist, Fualaau made an impression on his teachers and was among Letourneau's circle of favorite students. Fualaau was raised in a large, extended Samoan family. His father was in prison for armed robbery and his mother worked in a bakery. Letourneau, in spite of her own increasing money worries, helped nurture his abilities by buying him art supplies.

Mary Kay Letourneau. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The year 1995 was a particularly stressful time for Letourneau. She was a busy mother of four and was now teaching fifth and sixth graders. Her marriage woes were compounded by her and Steve's financial situation. Letourneau's father was diagnosed with cancer and she miscarried a fifth child just a few months later. The Letourneaus were forced to declare bankruptcy. At this time, the relationship between Letourneau and Fualaau grew closer. He was a constant presence in the home and even accompanied the Letourneaus on their family vacation. The unusual relationship between teacher and student did not go unnoticed among Steve's family members.

During the summer of 1996, Letourneau and Fualaau had sexual relations for the first time.

Fualaau would boast to friends that he and his teacher had sex more than four hundred times that summer, and had done so in every room of the Letourneau home. While making last-minute preparations for the fall semester, Letourneau discovered she was pregnant. As she and Steve had stopped having sex, she had no doubt whose child it was. Steve, who suspected Letourneau was having an affair with Fualaau, found a shoe box of letters in the linen closet of their home. Steve moved out of the house and started divorce proceedings.

Steve's cousin made an anonymous call to Letourneau's employer to reveal the affair. On February 26, 1997, she was arrested for statutory rape of an unnamed minor. She was released later that night and told not to go near Fualaau. Letourneau's mother took charge of the children. When counseled by her attorney, David Gehrke, Letourneau admitted that she was carrying the child of the boy she was accused of raping. As the trial approached, Letourneau underwent a series of court-ordered exams. Psychiatrist Julia Moore noted Letourneau's rapid mood swings during her interview and diagnosed her as having bipolar disorder. At her trial in November, Letourneau pleaded guilty to two counts of rape of a child in the second degree.

At her hearing, a seemingly repentant Letourneau told the judge, "I give you my word . . . it will not happen again." Judge Linda Lau of the King County Superior Court accepted Letourneau's plea. The judge took into consideration that Letourneau had no criminal record and sentenced her to three months in jail and ordered her to enroll in a sexual deviancy treatment program. Letourneau and Fualaau's child, Audrey, who had been born in May, would be placed in the care of Fualaau's mother, Soona Vili. Under the terms of her release, Letourneau was forbidden to have contact with Fualaau.

The court-ordered restriction did not stop Letourneau from seeing Fualaau again. Upon her release in January, 1998, the two resumed their relationship. On February 3, during a routine late-night neighborhood patrol, a police officer noticed a parked car with two people inside. When he ran the car's license plates he discovered that the owner was Letourneau, now a registered sex offender. Inside the car was sixty-five hundred dollars in cash, baby clothes, and a passport. The officer recognized Letourneau immediately and arrested her for violating the terms of her parole. Fualaau's name was publicly linked to Letourneau's after his mother, Soona, agreed to a series of interviews with the tabloids.

Judge Lau harshly admonished Letourneau, saying, "This case is not about a flawed system . . . it is about an opportunity that you foolishly squandered." Letourneau's original maximum sentence of 7.5 years was reinstated, and she entered the Washington Correction Center for Women in Gig Harbor, forty miles south of Seattle. Upon her incarceration, a medical exam revealed that she was pregnant. In October, 1998, she gave birth to another daughter, Alexis, who would be placed in the care of Fualaau's mother.

Defiant even behind bars, Letourneau attempted to smuggle notes to Fualaau in violation of court orders and was placed in solitary confinement for six months for doing so. In January, 2001, Letourneau's father died of cancer. Her request to attend his funeral was denied. Letourneau served her full sentence and was released on August 2, 2004. Two days later, Fualaau filed a motion to vacate a court order that barred Letourneau from contacting him upon her release. Letourneau, never wavering from her belief that she and Fualaau from the beginning were deeply in love and meant to be together, married her twenty-one-year-old former student on May 20, 2005. Letourneau, now Mary Fualaau, would remain a registered sex offender for the rest of her life, regardless of the couples' legal status as husband and wife, unless a court order allows her to unregister.

IMPACT

The Letourneau-Fualaau affair unleashed a media frenzy that inspired a made-for-television film and at least two privately published accounts of the scandal. More important, it prompted discussion about gender bias in statutory rape cases. In 2004, a U.S. Department of Education study found that 40 percent of educators who had been reported for sexual misconduct were women. The well-publicized incidents of female teachers having sex with their underage students led to renewed interest in the controversy surrounding age of consent and teacher-student sexual relations. These cases reflect a decline in the double standard of treating male authority figures more harshly than female authority figures in cases involving the abuse of a minor.

—Robin Imhof

FURTHER READING

Denove, Myriam S. "The Myth of Innocence: Sexual Scripts and the Recognition of Child Sexual Abuse by Female Perpetrators." Journal of Sex Research 40, no. 3 (August, 2003): 303-314. Reviews existing data regarding the prevalence of sex offending by women, placing specific emphasis on the ways in which conventional sexual scripts preclude official recognition of female sexual offending as a problem.

Dress, Christina, Tama-Lisa Johnson, and Mary Kay Letourneau. Mass with Mary: The Prison Years. Victoria, B.C.: Trafford, 2004. Dress, a close friend and former cell mate of Letourneau, chronicles Letourneau's experiences behind bars.

Letourneau, Mary, and Vili Fualaau, with Bob Graham. Une Seule Crime: L'amour (Only One Crime: Love). Paris: Robert Laffront, 1998. This collection of interviews with Letourneau, Fualaau, and Soona Vili was ghost-written by Bob Graham. Capitalizes on the sympathetic belief held by many Europeans that Letourneau and Fualaau were victims of puritanical and outdated U.S. laws.

Olsen, Gregg. If Loving You Is Wrong: The Shocking True Story of Mary Kay Letourneau. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1999. True-crime writer Olsen's investigative account of the Letourneau-Fualaau affair includes testimonies from friends of the family and belated interview material from Letourneau herself.

SEE ALSO: Nov. 23, 1946: Tennis Star Bill Tilden Is Arrested for Lewd Behavior with a Minor; Dec. 12, 1957: Rock Star Jerry Lee Lewis

Marries Thirteen-Year-Old Cousin; Feb. 1, 1978: Roman Polanski Flees the United States to Avoid Rape Trial; July 20, 1982: Conservative Politician John G. Schmitz Is Found to Have Children Out of Wedlock; July 20, 1983: Congress Members Censured in House-Page Sex Scandal; May 19, 1992: Amy Fisher Shoots Mary Jo Buttafuoco; Sept. 29, 2006: Congressman Mark Foley Resigns in Sex Scandal Involving a Teenage Page.

March 12, 1997

PRIZE-WINNING ABORIGINE NOVELIST REVEALED AS A FRAUD

*In 1997, the Australian literary establishment was rocked by the revelation that a critically acclaimed prize-winning female author of the aboriginal autobiographical novel My Own Sweet Time was actually a white man. The scandal led to questions of literary and cultural authenticity, gender and race, sexism and racism, national identity, publishing practices, and the intellectual property rights of indigenous peoples.*

ALSO KNOWN AS: Wanda Koolmatrie hoax

LOCALES: Sydney and Adelaide, Australia

CATEGORIES: Hoaxes, frauds, and charlatanism; literature; racism; publishing and journalism; social issues and reform; cultural and intellectual history

KEY FIGURES

Leon Carmen (b. 1949?), Australian writer

John Bayley (b. 1949), Australian literary agent

Ava Hubble (fl. 1990's), reporter for the Sydney Daily Telegraph

Andrew Stevenson (fl. 1990's), reporter for the Sydney Daily Telegraph

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Wanda Koolmatrie's first novel, My Own Sweet Time (1994), was hailed by noted Australian playwright, author, and critic Dorothy Hewett as the start of a new genre. In 1996, Koolmatrie's autobiographical novel was short-listed for the New South Wales Premier's Award and it won the Nita May Dobbie National Award for the best first novel written by a woman. My Own Sweet Time became required reading for high school students sitting for their exit exams (and to obtain their higher school certificates) in New South Wales in 1996.

My Own Sweet Time depicts the life of an aboriginal woman born in 1949 who was raised by white foster parents in the suburbs. The novel's author, Koolmatrie, it turned out, was a pseudonym for Leon Carmen, a white man. Carmen later claimed in an interview that he believed he could get published only if he were nonwhite and female. He claimed that the Australian literary establishment discriminated against white men when considering who to publish.

A former school friend of Carmen, John Bayley, agreed to be his literary agent. (Some believe that Bayley, and not Carmen, wrote the book.) Bayley submitted Carmen's manuscript to three publishers: the University of Queensland Press, Reed Books, and Magabala Books. Magabala Books, a government-subsidized publisher specializing in works written by aboriginal authors, agreed to publish the work, and it was launched in Sydney, Australia, during the Sydney Writers Festival on January 25, 1995. Neither Koolmatrie (Carmen) nor Bayley attended the launch. Indigenous author and poet Roberta Sykes launched the book on behalf of the "absent" Koolmatrie.

The defense of using an assumed identity in literature is not new. Carmen argued that he would not have been published without the symbolic currency of his chosen identity. Other writers, especially women, have chosen an assumed identity (most often another gender). These writers include George Eliot (Mary Anne Evans), Henry Handel Richardson (Ethel Richardson), and Miles Franklin (Stella Maria Sarah Miles Franklin), women whom Carmen claimed presented “only a short step to Wanda, our mythical female author.” (Bayley was a fan of writer Thomas Chatterton, who created a fifteenth century priest-poet called Thomas Rowley.)

For many writers, the motivation behind adopting a gender-bending nom de plume is twofold. First, as Carmen himself argued, the motivation is purely artistic (“bookish,” as he called it); that is, to compromise one’s real identity to garner readers of their work of literature. Second, as confirmed by the first argument, the motivation is implicitly commercial: One compromises his or her true identity to exploit the book market—to sell books.

Carmen claimed that he and Bayley had to accept Magabala’s advance against royalties to avoid potentially awkward questions arising about the book’s (fictional) author. The pair accepted the five thousand dollars prize money for the Nita Dobbie Award. Soon, Bayley sent Magabala a copy of Carmen’s sequel to My Own Sweet Time, the book Door to Door, which Magabala published in 1998. Before this, however, Magabala representatives became suspicious when they could not speak with Koolmatrie personally. It was not long before Carmen admitted to the hoax, and the scandal broke.

Reporters Ava Hubble and Andrew Stevenson of Sydney’s Daily Telegraph newspaper broke the story, “My Sweet Hoax,” on March 12, 1997. The news report came within weeks of two other newsworthy hoaxes: those of Ukrainian writer Helen Demidenko (Helen Darville) and aboriginal painter Eddie Burrup (Irish-born Elizabeth Durack). Bayley, though, claims in his book Daylight Corroboree (2004) that he confessed his part in the Koolmatrie hoax to Adelaide Advertiser columnist Tony Baker months before the hoax came to light in the Daily Telegraph.

The New South Wales Fraud Enforcement Agency targeted Bayley for arrest and prosecution because he made “a false and misleading statement involving the author Wanda Koolmatrie who was a fictitious person invented by Leon Carmen and Mr. Bayley.” It appears that criminal charges materialized only because Bayley had accepted the Nita Dobbie Award cash prize on behalf of Koolmatrie. Consequently, his house was raided on May 8. Officers entered the premises, but Bayley was not home; he was en route from Melbourne. They seized the contents of his computer hard drive and his working journals. Interestingly, Bayley’s appearance at Sydney’s Downing Centre magistrates court on March 12, 1998, came one year to the day after the Daily Telegraph broke the story of the Koolmatrie hoax. Magistrate Geoff Brad presided over the case.

To many observers, Bayley was the one who defrauded Magabala Books, and he was the one charged with a crime. Critics were bewildered when the magistrate dismissed the fraud charge against Bayley because there was no prima facie case to substantiate the allegations of fraud. However, evidence seems to prove a prima facie case did exist. First, Bayley falsely claimed that he accepted the Nita Dobbie Award on Koolmatrie’s behalf because Koolmatrie was in England. Also, in Daylight Corroboree, Bayley admits to indicating “yes” on a declaration sent to him by Magabala Books before

YOUNG WANDA REFLECTS

Leon Carmen, better known by the pseudonym Wanda Koolmatrie, opens his controversial autobiographical novel My Own Sweet Time (1994) with his protagonist, Wanda, reflecting on her days as a black child growing up with white parents in a white neighborhood.

By six years old I’d picked up a handful of stunts—bawling out for milk and porridge, recognizing animals and visitors, responding to my parents with coyness, indifference, enthusiasm, whatever. Cause and effect were tumbling into a pattern. One thing puzzled me though. Mum and Dad and the few people who came to the house were all white. I knew no other children. I was certainly growing, but I stayed black. Would I fade, or what?

publication of My Own Sweet Time that included the question “Is the author of aboriginal or Torres Strait Islander descent?”

IMPACT

One of the most significant aspects of the Koolmatrie hoax was the extent to which it mobilized a range of critical opinion. For instance, while the hoax still inspires much debate about the politics of nonindigenous writers assuming a nonwhite racial identity, according to some critics the incident highlights the existence of antiwhite bias within the Australian culture industry. Such critics argue that the hoax gave credibility to the opinion that white men experience prejudice within a culture defined by a prevailing fascination with minority culture, namely indigenaity, or indigenouness. Critics also argue the hoax legitimated claims of the existence of special privileges for indigenous Australians. Others argue that because the 1990’s saw a series of identity poachers exposed in Australian literary and artistic circles as frauds, the trend is symptomatic of a cultural downturn in white-Anglo privilege. Others claim the fraud was artfully contrived in that Carmen and Bayley specifically approached Magabala Books, a government-financed publisher of works written by aboriginal authors especially.

By extension, some critics claim the hoax exposed the urgent need for the Australian government to recognize, formalize, and protect aboriginal intellectual property rights. Even more critics claim the incident exposed the inherent tensions in post-modern approaches to written works. These critics argue that while postmodern understandings of written works created the very space in which Koolmatrie was heard—as a culturally marginalized voice—the hoax itself raised important post-modern questions regarding authorial intent, authenticity in writing, and the blurring lines between factual and fictional Australian national identity.

—Nicole Anae

FURTHER READING

Bayley, John. Daylight Corroboree: A First-hand Account of the Wanda Koolmatrie Hoax. Sydney: Eidolon Press, 2004. Bayley’s personal account of his and Carmen’s motivation behind the hoax. Includes reflections on the hoax’s cultural consequences.

Hosking, Sue. “The Wanda Koolmatrie Hoax: Who Cares? Does It Matter? Of Course It Does!” Adelaidean (University of Adelaide), April 21, 1997. Hosking’s article asks many questions about the hoax and concludes that Carmen’s assumption of an aboriginal identity was purely in self-interest.

Morrissey, Philip. “Stalking Aboriginal Culture: The Wanda Koolmatrie Affair.” Australian Feminist Studies 18, no. 42 (2003): 299–307. Morrissey, who wrote a reader’s report of the book My Own Sweet Time before the Koolmatrie hoax was exposed, offers his personal account of the hoax in this informative journal article.

Nolan, Maggie, and Carrie Dawson, eds. Who’s Who? Hoaxes, Imposture, and Identity Crises in Australian Literature. St. Lucia: University of Queensland Press, 2004. A wide-ranging examination of literary hoaxes and scandals specific to Australian literature. Includes discussion of the Koolmatrie hoax.

SEE ALSO: 1928-1929: Actor Is Suspected of Falsely Claiming to Be an American Indian; June 5, 1944: Australian Poets Claim Responsibility for a Literary Hoax; Jan. 28, 1972: Clifford Irving Admits Faking Howard Hughes Memoirs; 1978: Roots Author Alex Haley Is Sued for Plagiarism; Apr. 25, 1983: German Magazine Publishes Faked Hitler Diaries; Apr., 1998: Scottish Historian Is Charged with Plagiarism; July 24, 2007: University of Colorado Fires Professor for Plagiarism and Research Falsification.

May 20, 1997

AIR FORCE PROSECUTION OF FEMALE OFFICER FOR ADULTERY REVEALS DOUBLE STANDARD

The first woman in the U.S. Air Force qualified to fly the B-52 bomber, Kelly Flinn was charged with adultery for having sex with an enlisted woman's husband and then lying to superiors about it and ignoring direct orders to desist. The threat that Flinn, an accomplished and respected pilot, would face imprisonment for consensual sex suggested a double standard for female service members, outraging many, including members of Congress. Instead of being court-martialed, Flinn received a general discharge from the Air Force.

LOCALE: Minot, North Dakota

CATEGORIES: Military; women's issues; sex crimes; law and the courts; space and aviation; politics

KEY FIGURES

Kelly Flinn (b. 1970), U.S. Air Force pilot, first lieutenant

Marc Zigo (b. 1972?), Flinn's civilian lover

Sheila Widnall (b. 1938), secretary of the U.S. Air Force

Ronald R. Fogelman (fl. 1990's), Air Force chief of staff

SUMMARY OF EVENT

First Lieutenant Kelly Flinn was no stranger to publicity or U.S. Air Force regulations when she became the focus of a military sex scandal in 1996-1997. The youngest of five children, Flinn grew up in Missouri and Georgia as an exemplar of the so-called all-American tomboy. At the age of sixteen, after attending Space Camp in Huntsville, Alabama, she decided on an aviation career. Following high school, she won appointment to the U.S. Air Force Academy in Colorado Springs, Colorado, in 1989. The rigorous training, discipline, and male-oriented ethos at the academy came as a shock to her, yet she persisted and became a top-ranking cadet. She also won two coveted overseas training assignments before graduating. During postacademy flight training, her first choice of aircraft for permanent assignment was the B-52 bomber, a massive plane equipped to carry nuclear payloads.

During the 1990's, the U.S. armed forces was under intense pressure to incorporate women into combat support roles. Flinn's assignment to fly B-52s was widely publicized as part of this new direction for the military. Flinn reported for duty at Minot Air Force Base in North Dakota, the B-52 fleet's home base, in October, 1995. The base is on a remote, desolate prairie, and there were few amenities either on base or in the nearby town. According to Flinn's autobiography Proud to Be (1997), she arrived in Minot with the hope of making a life for herself there, and to meet a special man with whom to develop a serious relationship. Even though she had spent the prior few years studying and working in a mostly male environment, Flinn had tried to be "one of the guys," developing only a few buddy-type friendships. She probably was less prepared than most twenty-four-year-old single women for the hazards and duplicities of the dating scene.

Unfortunately, social life at Minot seemed to revolve around drinking and sexual games. At least that was the impression that Flinn received. There were certainly few other recreations available for single, action-oriented young adults. Flinn fell into one dubious situation when she threw a wine-cellar party. At the party she had a sexual encounter with Colin Thompson, a senior enlisted airman. Both were apparently drunk at the time. The Uniform Code of Military Justice prohibits fraternization, that is, relations between an officer and an enlisted person, even if the persons in question come from different commands. Afterward, Flinn mostly shrugged off her encounter with Thompson (an encounter that would be included as part of the charges against her).

Most of Flinn's leisure time, however, was devoted to soccer. An avid soccer player since childhood, she joined the base soccer team, which was coached by a civilian named Marc Zigo. (He had claimed college and professional soccer experience, which later proved false.) Zigo was charming and smooth and Flinn fell for him. He seemed to be equally smitten. Zigo was at Minot with his wife, Gayla, who was an enlisted airman at the base. Zigo told Kelly that the two were now legally separated. Although that remark was not true, the marriage was stormy. Gayla threw her husband out of their house after she found some of Flinn's letters to him. Zigo threatened suicide, and he pleaded with Flinn to let him stay with her, as he had nowhere else to go.

Meanwhile, base security police began investigating both Flinn and Zigo, based on reports of their relationship from a lieutenant against whom Flinn had testified in an unrelated case. Flinn and Zigo were called in separately and questioned. Flinn denied any sexual component to their relationship.

Air Force first lieutenant Kelly Flinn before a pretrial hearing at Minot Air Force Base, North Dakota, in May, 1997. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Shortly afterward she regretted this denial. Following protocol, she told Lieutenant Colonel Ted LaPlante, her commanding officer, that she wanted to revise her statement to police. LaPlante knew nothing about the charges but refused to listen to Flinn, saying he might eventually be called on to adjudicate the case. Flinn would remain on record as having lied in an official investigation. Two days after Zigo moved into her place, Flinn was handed a written order forbidding her from any contact with Zigo, even if through a third party. Disobeying the order would have left her homeless.

Flinn followed LaPlante's advice to seek legal counsel, but both Air Force attorneys who took her case were stationed elsewhere and unable to devote time to the issue. Meanwhile, Flinn was slowly realizing that Zigo was moody, dishonest, and manipulative—the classic profile of an abusive man. She was still partly in love with him, and he played on her sympathies, keeping her from making a clean break from him. The fall of 1996 started out full of promise for Flinn, with her piloting achievements drawing additional plaudits from superiors and the public. Now things were changing drastically, moving faster than she realized. Despite the mounting charges against her, Flinn assumed that she would be able to negotiate for an Article 15 administrative punishment. Adultery cases usually led to Article 15 reprimands. This would stall her career but allow her to remain flying.

In a shocking twist of events, the St. Louis Post Dispatch, on February 21, 1997, published a news story about Flinn facing court-martial. Flinn knew nothing of the pending action, nor did her commanding officer and most others on base. Flinn now realized she was facing a lengthy prison sentence. She hired a civilian attorney to work with her military lawyers, who released Flinn's side of the story to the press. Congressional hearings were called, and several lawmakers expressed the opinion that the Pentagon needed, in U.S. senator Trent Lott's words, to "get real" about fraternization. Zigo had long since moved out of Flinn's home, and the explosive case was working its way up to the secretary of the Air Force, Sheila Widnall. Flinn asked her superiors for an honorable discharge instead of going through a court-martial. The court-martial convened on May 20.

The prosecution came prepared with copious documentation, but Flinn's lawyers obtained a delay in the proceedings until Widnall decided on Flinn's discharge request. In testimony to the U.S. Congress, Air Force chief of staff Ronald R. Fogelman argued forcefully that the case was not about sex but rather about lying, disobeying orders, and conduct unbecoming an officer. Widnall denied the honorable discharge request. Flinn wanted to fight her case in the court-martial, convinced that with the overdrawn charges and Zigo's many lies, she would be exonerated. The consensus of her family and attorneys was that the cards would be stacked against her in a trial. After a tearful vigil, she took their advice and requested a general discharge, which was granted. Flinn's ordeal was over, but so was her career in the Air Force.

IMPACT

The U.S. military did not emerge unscathed from the controversy. The most immediate effect was upon the fortunes of General Joseph Ralston, who had been up for appointment as chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff at the time of Flinn's court-martial. On June 5, 1997, stories appeared in major newspapers about Ralston's reported affair with a civilian woman about thirteen years earlier. Ralston was separated from his wife prior to divorce at the time of the affair, and his lover was a civilian. The House of Representatives' Women's Caucus argued that confirming Ralston would confirm a double standard in the military. General Ralston withdrew his nomination and retired.

The case also called attention to military standards for personal behavior that were increasingly at odds with sociocultural attitudes outside the service. Adultery seldom is prosecuted, even in states

FLINN RESIGNS HER COMMISSION

U.S. Air Force pilot Kelly Flinn sent a letter of resignation to Air Force secretary Sheila Widnall just days before her court-martial was to begin on May 20, 1997. That letter, made public by Flinn, is excerpted here.

It is extremely difficult, if not impossible to put into words my love for the Air Force and devotion to the Air Force. It is with heartfelt agony and the deepest sadness I have ever felt that I submit my resignation from the Air Force. . . .

I did not turn to anyone for help when I should have. Instead, I decided to handle the threats of a detestable man, and live in fear of him and his possible actions. . . .

I have dedicated my life to becoming an Air Force pilot. I have endured comments, videos ridiculing my arrival at Minot AFB [Air Force Base], sexual molestation, and harassing comments, just to fly. I never wanted to be treated as something special, I just wanted the chance, as my counterparts have, to fly for the Air Force as a trained combat pilot. If there was anyway to undo all the wrongs, I would. Unfortunately, at this point, I can only learn from my mistakes and move forward with my life.

I would never wish my ordeal upon my worst enemy. Deep in my heart, I believe that no punishment the Air Force renders will every compare to the public humiliation I have suffered, the loss of my trust, and the loss of my innocence. Before this happened, I never dreamed that people like Marc Zigo existed. Perhaps that was my first mistake. Secondly, I myself, should have researched the legalities of the situation, instead of trusting his word. However, hindsight is 20/20. Looking back, I should have done many things differently. Lying was the worst possible action, yet I did not have the courage then to admit my faults and shortcomings. I now recognize them. I just wanted a chance to reconcile this situation and perhaps have the opportunity to redeem myself in the eyes of the Air Force. . . .

where it remains a crime. Widespread acceptance of marital separation and divorce also has blurred definitions of adultery by putting those waiting for a final divorce decree into a sort of limbo of marital status. Efforts like General Fogelman's to convince the public that the case was really about "good order and discipline" went awry. The phrase meant little to civilians. While command status—actual or potential—does impose certain responsibilities, the Air Force failed to make the case that Flinn's behavior posed a danger to the nation. The military did not change its rules afterward, but its inept handling of the case resulted in a public relations fiasco. The gap between military and civilian views of sex and sexuality thus persisted, to surface again in the future over related issues.

—Emily Alward

FURTHER READING

Bumiller, Elisabeth. "Flying Solo." Good Housekeeping, January, 1998. Based on an interview with Flinn, who is depicted as wary and unsettled after her ordeal but also as a person trying to build a new life.

Burke, Carol. Camp All-American, Hanoi Jane, and the High-and-Tight: Gender, Folklore, and Changing Military Culture. Boston: Beacon Press, 2004. Study of how conflict arises from the integration of women into previously all-male military units.

"Double Standards, Double Talk." The New York Times, June 6, 1997. An editorial denouncing the Air Force's plan to court-martial Kelly Flinn as a double standard against female service members charged with adultery.

Flinn, Kelly. Proud to Be: My Life, the Air Force, the Controversy. New York: Random House, 1997. Flinn's own life story and apologia that includes a focus on her career with the Air Force.

Fogelman, Ron. "A Question of Trust, Not Sex." Newsweek, November 24, 1997. The Air Force's position on Flinn's case is presented by the Air Force chief of staff in this magazine article.

SEE ALSO: July 19, 1921: U.S. Senate Rebukes Navy in Homosexuality Investigation; June 26, 1992: U.S. Navy Secretary Resigns in the Wake of Tailhook Sexual Assault Scandal; Apr. 28, 1994: U.S. Naval Academy Expels Midshipmen for Cheating; Jan. 2, 2003: E-mail Message Prompts Inquiry into Air Force Academy Sexual Assaults; June 22, 2005: U.S. Air Force Investigates Religious Intolerance at Its Academy.

June 25, 1997

SWISS BANKS ADMIT TO HOLDING ACCOUNTS OF HOLOCAUST VICTIMS

Investigations revealed that Swiss banks contained hundreds of millions of dollars in cash and valuables of Holocaust victims who had hidden their assets from the Nazis. Swiss banks admitted to holding the accounts, which led to shock, outrage, and an international scandal that forced the banks and the Swiss government into reparations.

LOCALE: Switzerland

CATEGORIES: Banking and finance; atrocities and war crimes; international relations; corruption; public morals; social issues and reform; government

KEY FIGURES

Paul Volcker (b. 1927), chairman of the Federal Reserve System, 1979-1987, and chairman of Volcker Commission, 1996-2000

Christophe Meili (b. 1968), Swiss security guard at Union Banque Suisse

Stuart Eizenstat (b. 1943), U.S. undersecretary of commerce for international trade, 1993-2001

Arnold Koller (b. 1933), federal councilor, 1986-1999, and president of Switzerland, 1990, 1997

Thomas Borer (b. 1957), Swiss ambassador at large

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Switzerland was a neutral nation during World War II, so it was common practice for European Jews to open accounts with Swiss banks. In 1994, Elan Steinberg, the executive director of the World Jewish Congress (WJC), charged that Swiss banks still held between ten and twenty thousand dormant accounts containing the assets of Jewish victims of the Nazi Holocaust. Twenty thousand far exceeded the number of accounts the banks had admitted to in the past.

On May 2, 1996, a memorandum of understanding announced by the World Jewish Restitution Organization, the WJC, and the Swiss Bankers Association (SBA) led to the formation of the Independent Committee of Eminent Persons (ICEP). Paul Volcker, the former chairman of the Federal Reserve System, was asked to form the commission to audit wartime accounts. The ICEP was instrumental in leading the banks finally to admit that thousands of accounts lay dormant in their vaults. On June 25, 1997, a claims resolution process was announced jointly by the SBA, the Swiss Federal Banking Commission, and the ICEP.

Thomas Borer, a Swiss diplomat and chairman of Switzerland's own investigating commission, established in December, 1996, announced that the Swiss government would release all information it had on unclaimed bank accounts belonging to Holocaust victims. The revelation brought Switzerland great embarrassment, and the United States issued swift condemnation. The U.S. Senate introduced a bill requiring the U.S. government to divest its $300 million in investments in Swiss companies and to cease doing business with Switzerland until reparations were made. A commission headed by Stuart Eizenstat, the U.S. undersecretary of commerce for international trade, castigated Switzerland for not taking action in the case and also blamed the U.S. government for not insisting the Swiss take action.

The Eizenstat commission's May, 1997, report noted that the Swiss received $400 million in gold (worth ten times as much by 1997 standards) from Germany during the war, gold that was deposited with Union Banque Suisse (Union Bank of Switzerland, or UBS) or sent to other countries to pay for war materials. The report denounced the Swiss for their complicity with Germany, denounced their attitudes toward victims of Nazi oppression during the war, and claimed that Switzerland's dealings in German gold prolonged the conflict. The Swiss argued, in turn, that they should be judged on their present actions in trying to compensate the victims and not for what they did or did not do before and during World War II.

Further information on the banking scandal had come to light on January 8, 1997, when Christophe Meili, working as a security guard at UBS, came across during his rounds two carts filled with "very old documents and books" that were scheduled for shredding, including two thick books, with "1945-1965" marked on their covers. Meili testified at a later hearing (May 6) before the U.S. Senate that he returned to the room because he remembered press reports concerning bank documents and records from World War II. He believed the items set for the shredder belonged in the national archives and that it would have been illegal had they been destroyed. As he found out the following day when he returned to the shredding room, most already had been destroyed. He also testified that he did not want harm to come to either the Jews or the Swiss, who certainly would be blamed for the illegal shredding. Meili brought what he could of the remaining documents to the Israeli Cultural Association, who handed them over to the police.

Meili was treated as a pariah in Switzerland. He was fired from his job and unable to find new employment. He was threatened by an anonymous caller who said he would kidnap his children and that he could collect the ransom money "from the Jews." Meili complained that the Swiss police would not investigate the case and asked for political asylum in the United States. The WJC offered him employment. Meili also has received awards from Jewish organizations as well as aid to help with his legal fees.

The ICEP, in its final report of December 6, 1999, found no proof that the banks were acting together to destroy account records nor was there proof of a concerted effort to use the funds from these dormant accounts for illicit purposes. The commission did conclude, however, that some individual banks were unethical in handling the dormant accounts.

A plan to give billions of Swiss francs to victims of the Holocaust as a humanitarian measure was presented before the Swiss parliament, but Borer stated that the continued public accusations against Switzerland hindered passage of the measure because many Swiss believed the country was being treated unfairly. Switzerland cherished its strict neutrality during World War II, and allegations that it abetted Nazi dictator Adolf Hitler remained a critical concern for the country. The Swiss eventually agreed to some reparations from the government.

On February 26, the SBA announced the establishment of a $67 million humanitarian fund by the banks, and on March 5, Switzerland's president, Arnold Koller, announced the government's Swiss Foundation for Solidarity (SFS) to help victims of poverty, disasters, and human tragedy, such as genocide. He proposed that Swiss banks contribute $4.7 billion from their gold reserves, and the interest, several hundred million dollars per year, be used for aid, including for those persons (and their families) who survived the Holocaust. Koller's announcement marked an official acknowledgment that the banks held deposits of gold owned by Jewish account holders. The conservative opposition in the Swiss parliament opposed the plan, claiming that it acknowledged Swiss guilt. The government proposed raising the money by the sale of gold over a ten-year period so that the sale would not affect the price of the precious metal or harm the Swiss economy by undermining its currency. Furthermore, tax money would not be used.

Moshe Fogel of the Israeli Press Office said Jerusalem welcomed the funds. Avraham Burg, the head of the Jewish Agency for Israel, said it marked a victory for the moral stand the agency had taken in championing the reparations.

IMPACT

The Union Bank of Switzerland, Swiss Bank Corp., and Credit Suisse admitted to having thousands of dormant accounts from the time before and during World War II, accounts that totaled $200 million. The Central Bank of Switzerland, which received most of the Nazi gold, did not participate in the banks' humanitarian fund. The humanitarian fund and SFS, the Swiss government foundation, helped repair some of the damage Switzerland incurred for denying its role in keeping the dormant accounts secret.

At the end of 1998, more than 100,000 Holocaust survivors in Eastern Europe received from five hundred to twelve hundred dollars each. Payments were then made to survivors in Western Europe in February, 1999. An agreement was reached in March to reimburse $1.25 billion to American and Israeli victims for their economic losses. The banks, however, refused to admit liability.

German companies also charged with exploiting Holocaust victims looked at the Swiss model to settle their own lawsuits. In July, 1998, Volkswagen, which had used slave labor during the war, agreed to a reparations plan. In 1999, the German government agreed to set up a fund similar to that of Switzerland to compensate victims exploited by German companies in the Nazi era.

—Frederick B. Chary

FURTHER READING

Braillard, Philippe. Switzerland and the Crisis of Dormant Assets and Nazi Gold. New York: Kegan Paul International, 2000. An analysis of the dormant accounts scandal by an economist, with emphasis on the scandal's effect on Switzerland as a nation.

Eizenstat, Stuart. Imperfect Justice: Looted Assets, Slave Labor, and the Unfinished Business of World War II. New York: PublicAffairs, 2003. An account by an American official and diplomat about efforts to raise funds for reparations from various governments, including Switzerland.

Vincent, Isabel. Hitler's Silent Partners: Swiss Banks and Nazi Gold and the Pursuit of Justice. New York: William Morrow, 1997. An award-winning Canadian journalist examines the Swiss accounts scandal, starting with the case of a Holocaust survivor in Canada and her efforts for reparations.

Ziegler, Jean. The Swiss, the Gold, and the Dead. New York: Harcourt Brace, 1998. An account by a Swiss sociologist, who lays much blame on the greed of the Swiss banks for cooperating with the Nazis and covering up the story.

SEE ALSO: Nov., 1929: Banque Oustric et Cie Failure Prompts French Inquiry; Apr. 22, 1942: French Prime Minister Pierre Laval Wants Germany to Win World War II; Aug. 14, 1945: French War Hero Pétain Is Convicted of Nazi Collaboration; Feb. 23, 1963: Play Accuses Pope Pius XII of Complicity in the Holocaust; May 23, 1981: Italian Justice Minister Resigns Because of Crime Connection; Aug. 6, 1982: Banco Ambrosiano Collapses Amid Criminal Accusations.

August 31, 1997

PRINCESS DIANA DIES IN A CAR CRASH

The death of Diana, princess of Wales, in a car crash in Paris led to international mourning, controversy, and scandal. The British royal family, especially Queen Elizabeth II, was severely criticized for its seemingly cold response to Diana's death. The crash also raised several questions, including the following: What circumstances placed Diana in the car with Dodi al-Fayed, the son of an Egyptian billionaire? Was the driver of Diana's and Fayed's car drunk? Was Diana's death an assassination? Did a cover-up hamper later investigations of the accident? What role did the paparazzi play in the crash?

LOCALE: Paris, France

CATEGORIES: Communications and media; law and the courts; publishing and journalism; royalty

KEY FIGURES

Diana, Princess of Wales (1961-1997), British princess and former wife of Prince Charles, heir to the British throne

Dodi al-Fayed (1955-1997), son of an Egyptian billionaire and Princess Diana's companion

Henri Paul (1956-1997), driver for Diana and Fayed, who crashed the car in which they were riding

Trevor Rees-Jones (b. 1968), Fayed's bodyguard

Mohamed al-Fayed (b. 1929), Dodi al-Fayed's father

Scott Baker (b. 1937), British coroner

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Diana, the princess of Wales, was an extremely popular international figure, beloved around the world for her philanthropy, and for her beauty. Many believe that she was the world's most photographed woman. This public fascination often put her at odds with the British royal family, which tried to observe royal protocol and procedures when in public, and with the press and paparazzi, who followed her incessantly.

Diana and her husband, Charles, prince of Wales, had divorced in 1996. The media followed Diana everywhere after the divorce. Being a humanitarian, she often was in the public spotlight, working on issues such as HIV-AIDS and unexploded land mines. The media was following her as well when she died in a car crash in Paris on August 31, 1997. The accident fueled a number of conspiracy theories, as many unusual circumstances and facts in the case remain unclear and unresolved.

In mid-1997, Diana was romantically linked to Dodi al-Fayed, who also died in the Paris crash. They had been seen together in public a number of times, and they even bought a ring together in Paris on the afternoon before the crash. Their relationship fueled rumors that they would become engaged the following day, September 1. Another rumor, later proven untrue, was that Diana was pregnant at the time of the crash and that Fayed was the father. Paparazzi followed Diana and Fayed everywhere, and reportedly harassed them to get photos of the famous couple.

Fayed's father, Mohamed al-Fayed, owned the Ritz Hotel in Place Vendôme Paris, where Diana and Fayed had stopped after having spent nine days on the elder Fayed's yacht. The Fayed family also owned an apartment on rue Arsène Houssaye, which is located near the Ritz Hotel and close to the Champs-Élysées. Diana and Fayed were planning to return to the apartment from the hotel. Henri Paul, the acting head of security for the hotel, was concerned about the number of paparazzi in front of the hotel, waiting for the couple to emerge. To elude the media, Paul planned for a decoy vehicle to leave from the front of the hotel. Diana and Fayed would leave the hotel from the rear entrance, with Paul serving as the chauffeur for their car, a Mercedes-Benz S280. Evidence would later show that Paul had been drinking alcohol at the hotel before the crash.

Diana, Fayed, Paul, and Trevor Rees-Jones, Fayed's bodyguard, departed the Ritz Hotel at 12:20 A.M. Fayed and Diana were seated in the rear of the Mercedes, while Paul and Rees-Jones were seated in the front. Upon leaving the hotel, Paul drove to an embankment road that runs beside the Seine River to enter the Pont d'Alma tunnel. The posted speed limit for the tunnel was 50 kph (31 mph). The Mercedes then entered the tunnel about 12:23 A.M., at high speed. Paul lost control of the vehicle, causing it to veer left and strike the thirteenth pillar, which was not protected by a metal rail guard. The car was traveling at an estimated speed of about 118 kph (73 mph) before it struck the pillar.

Fayed and Paul died at the scene of the crash. Diana was critically injured but conscious. Photographers, who had followed the Mercedes into the underpass, were looming over the destroyed car. Pictures taken at the scene remain controversial, especially because Diana was alive after the crash. One of the photographers tried to help her out of the car but was unable to remove her. She reportedly uttered the words "oh my God" and later said "leave me alone" to the paparazzi when the emergency crew arrived at 12:32 A.M. A number of paparazzi were arrested when the police arrived; some of the photographers had been standing on the car taking pictures. Rees-Jones also was conscious and had suffered numerous facial wounds. He was the only survivor of the crash.

Diana was taken away from the scene by ambulance. To administer emergency treatment, the ambulance stopped for about one hour, only a few hundred meters from the Pitié-Salpêtrière Hospital in Paris. The emergency vehicle did not arrive at the hospital until 2:06 A.M., with the princess still alive. She died two hours later from fatal heart and lung injuries.

Conspiracy theories emerged quickly after the death of Princess Diana. Investigations into the driver's background showed that he had many bank accounts and had quietly accumulated extensive savings. He also was deemed negligent for driving drunk—his blood alcohol level was three times the legal limit—and he was

Officials at the scene of the car crash that killed Princess Diana and two others in Paris on August 31, 1997. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The coffin bearing the body of Princess Diana is taken into Westminster Abbey in London for funeral services. Standing watch are, from left and with backs turned, Prince Charles, Prince Harry, Earl Charles Spencer, Prince William, and Prince Philip. (AP/Wide World Photos)

1990's

speeding. Other theories alleged that Diana and Fayed were targeted for assassination because the British royal family did not want Fayed, a Muslim, to marry Diana. Even Fayed's father alleged that the husband of Queen Elizabeth II, Prince Philip, orchestrated his son's murder. Others contend that the British secret services and intelligence had Diana murdered to protect the royal family. Still others believe that Fayed was the target because his father had crossed others in failed business deals. All of these theories, along with many others, have been dismissed through subsequent investigations. Although conspiracy theories continue to surround the crash, none yet have been supported by the facts of the case.

A number of detailed investigations, the first of which was conducted by French authorities, determined that the crash was an accident. A second investigation was initiated in 2004 by the coroner of the queen's household, Michael Burgess. The inquest was continued by London's Metropolitan Police and headed by Commissioner Lord Stevens, who looked into several conspiracy theories about the crash. London police published the results of its investigation as the Paget Report on December 14, 2006. The report said there was no evidence of a conspiracy.

It is clear, however, that driver Paul had an excessive amount of alcohol in his system and was speeding at the time of the crash. Furthermore, investigations determined that none of the passengers in the car were wearing seatbelts when the Mercedes hit the pillar. According to investigation documents, all could have survived the crash had they been wearing their seatbelts.

Another inquest began on January 8, 2007, with discovery and continued in London's High Court on October 2. It was led by Coroner Scott Baker. On April 7, 2008, the inquest jury returned its verdict: Princess Diana and Fayed were "unlawfully killed" due to the gross negligence—and drunk driving—of driver Paul as well as the actions of the paparazzi. The jury of six women and five men also confirmed that the failure of Diana, Fayed, and Paul to wear seatbelts contributed to their deaths.

IMPACT

Princess Diana's death had immediate significance. Millions around the world mourned her death, watched her funeral on television, and witnessed an outpouring of donations. Bouquets of flowers by the hundreds of thousands were placed in front of Kensington Palace, Diana's home in London. Tens of thousands more bouquets were taken to her family's estate in Althorp.

The public clamored for Queen Elizabeth to comment on the loss of Diana, but the royal response was not fast enough. Many believed the queen was not expressing compassion. Elizabeth finally spoke about Diana on September 5, when she expressed the nation's shock at the loss and gave her personal tribute to the princess. The public mourning continued at her funeral on September 6, when an estimated crowd of more than three million gathered in the area around Westminster Abbey, and hundreds of millions of people around the world watched the funeral on television.

Princess Diana touched people near and far with her personal charm and humanitarianism. Many of her efforts continue through the Diana, Princess of Wales Memorial Fund, which was initially started with money left by mourners at Kensington Palace and other locations. Diana's sons, Princes William and Harry, have assisted in this memorial effort, and they sponsored a concert on July 1, 2007, to mark the tenth anniversary of Diana's death. Some of the funds raised went to the memorial fund.

—Douglas A. Phillips

FURTHER READING

Andersen, Christopher. After Diana: William, Harry, Charles, and the Royal House of Windsor. New York: Hyperion, 2007. Provides details on the Scotland Yard-Metropolitan Police probe called Operation Paget, which investigated Diana's death in Paris.

Botham, Noel. The Murder of Princess Diana. London: Metro Books, 2007. Written by an investigative reporter who believes that Diana was murdered by a hit squad. Examines circumstances that were covered up during the investigations.

Brown, Tina. The Diana Chronicles. New York: Doubleday, 2007. This book reveals the complex life and personality of Diana and includes a chapter on the tunnel crash in Paris.

Davies, Nicholas. Diana: The Killing of a Princess. Brighton, England: Pen Press, 2006. Provides interesting questions about circumstances before Diana's death that may have contributed to her demise.

King, Jon, and John Beveridge. Princess Diana: The Hidden Evidence. New York: S. P. I. Books, 2001. Examines the surveillance of Diana by the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency and British secret service. Claims the two security agencies were involved in her murder. Discusses other suspicious circumstances surrounding her death.

Levine, Michael. The Princess and the Package. Los Angeles: Renaissance Books, 1998. Explores the love-hate relationship that existed between Princess Diana and the media, primarily the paparazzi.

Rees-Jones, Trevor, with Moira Johnston. The Bodyguard's Story: Diana, the Crash, and the Sole Survivor. New York: Warner Books, 2000. A detailed account of the night of the crash by the only survivor of the accident, Fayed's bodyguard, Trevor Rees-Jones.

SEE ALSO: Dec. 10, 1936: King Edward VIII Abdicates to Marry an American Divorcée; Dec. 18, 1989: Prince Charles's Intimate Phone Conversation with Camilla Parker Bowles Is Taped; Aug. 23, 1992: Princess Diana's Phone Conversation with Her Lover Is Made Public; Jan. 21, 2006: British Politician Resigns After Gay-Sex Orgy; Apr. 26, 2006: Britain's Deputy Prime Minister Admits Affair with Secretary.

September 22, 1997

SPORTSCASTER MARV ALBERT IS TRIED FOR SEXUAL ASSAULT

Veteran sportscaster Marv Albert was tried for assault and battery, including violent biting, and forcible sodomy against a woman with whom he had a long-term sexual relationship. His criminal trial turned into a scandal as intimate details of his unconventional sexual life, including rough sex and threesomes, became public knowledge.

LOCALE: Arlington, Virginia

CATEGORIES: Law and the courts; sex crimes; radio and television; popular culture

KEY FIGURES

Marv Albert (Marvin Philip Aufrichtig; b. 1941), television sportscaster

Vanessa Perhach (b. 1955), former hotel telephone operator

Roy Black (b. 1945), Albert's defense attorney

SUMMARY OF EVENT

In 1997, Marv Albert was the voice of New York sports, a role established over a period of more than three decades. His energetic and informed play-by-play calls, first in radio and later on television, as the voice of Madison Square Garden—most prominently in basketball (for the New York Knicks) and hockey (for the New York Rangers)—had defined him as one of the most influential sports announcers in the United States. He is especially known for his signature (and often imitated) catch-phrase “yessss.”

It was a peripatetic lifestyle that may have contributed to the allegations against Albert in the spring of 1997. Vanessa Perhach, a forty-two-year-old former hotel telephone operator from Miami, Florida, had maintained an on-again, off-again sexual relationship with Albert for more than ten years (much of it through phone sex), during which Albert was married and then, after his 1992 divorce, engaged. According to Perhach's later testimony, she and Albert regularly met in different cities to engage in his preference for kinky sex, including threesomes (with a second man), rough sex, and his wearing of women's lingerie.

Albert, born Marvin Philip Aufrichtig, grew up in poverty in Brooklyn, New York, the son of a grocer. The young Albert had a passion for both New York and its sports franchises, called games in his bedroom for an imagined radio station, and got his humble start as a ball boy at the storied Madison Square Garden in Manhattan. As his career blossomed, he maintained close to a year-round commitment to sports broadcasting and established himself as something of a hip celebrity, appearing more than one hundred times on The David Letterman Show with his trademark sports-bloopers videos.

The specific charges against Albert involved a sexual liaison on February 12 at the Ritz-Carlton Hotel near Washington, D.C., after Albert had called a Knicks game in Landover, Maryland. According to Perhach, Albert had expected a third participant for sex that night at the hotel. After finding out that Perhach did not make the arrangements, he became extremely agitated and threw Perhach face down on the bed. In a frenzy, he then began to bite her back (eighteen to twenty times, according to medical reports, one sufficiently deep enough to draw blood). Despite her repeated requests to stop, Albert insisted that rough sex was what she liked, and so continued. He allegedly sodomized her as well. Forcible sodomy and assault and battery are crimes punishable by life imprisonment.

DNA tests in August showed that the bite marks on Perhach's back were indeed made by Albert. At the criminal trial in northern Virginia, which began on September 22, 1997, Albert's attorney, Roy Black, a high-profile defense lawyer notable for securing the acquittal in 1991 of William Kennedy Smith, who had been tried for rape, argued that Perhach was a troubled woman who could not bear the idea of Albert ending their relationship (he was engaged to marry Heather Falkiner, a producer for the sports network ESPN).

Marv Albert's booking photograph from May 27, 1997. Albert was arrested by Arlington County (Virginia) police on assault and forcible sodomy charges. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Citing the film Fatal Attraction, Black portrayed Perhach as vindictive and desperate to destroy Albert. Virginia state shield laws prevented Black from introducing testimony that would have discussed Perhach's previous relationships (including with an abusive former husband) and evidence that Perhach had pursued sexual relationships with other celebrities. Black was able to suggest in court that Perhach had a six-week stay in a mental hospital in late 1996 after she attempted suicide. Also, Black argued that the sodomy between Albert and Perhach not only was consensual but also at her suggestion because she was not on birth control at the time.

After Perhach's emotional testimony on September 23 (during which Albert maintained a stoic demeanor, supported in court by his fiancée, his father, and his children), Black played an audiotape in which Perhach appeared to coach a Washington, D.C., taxi driver who had picked up Albert the night of the alleged attack to testify that Albert had been agitated and had vehemently requested the third participant. Although this damaged Perhach's credibility, the prosecution then introduced a surprise witness, another woman who testified that between 1993 and 1994, Albert had made similar requests for rough sex, had bitten her twice, and tried to forcibly sodomize her. The surprise witness's testimony proved devastating, as it established a pattern of behavior.

Black moved quickly in response. First, he petitioned (successfully) to have the more serious charge, forcible sodomy, dismissed (it was impossible to determine consent legally) and then advised Albert to plead guilty to the misdemeanor charge of assault and battery, thus ending what had become a carnival atmosphere in the media.

Albert was given a relatively light twelve-month suspended sentence, extensive counseling, and a guarantee that his record would be expunged if he refrained from similar sexual activities in that time. He also received no fine.

Albert, fifty-six years old and with his career and reputation in shambles, apologized during a brief posttrial statement, saying he never imagined Perhach was not a willing participant. Within hours, Albert was fired by NBC, even after the network had stood by its broadcaster throughout the long summer after the grand jury brought the initial charges against him. He then resigned from his announcer position at Madison Square Garden.

Women's rights activists vehemently denounced Albert's light sentence, arguing that the lack of jail or prison time sent the wrong message: that once again, the American legal system sided with a male perpetrator, turning him into a victim, and instead allowed the female victim to be portrayed as the victimizer. However, the reality was far less dramatic. Although Perhach's relationship history was not permitted in court (Black later would say that decision had cost his defense nearly 90 percent of its material), the decision to move to a plea agreement was made because Black recognized the only way to counter the second woman's testimony would have been to put Albert on the stand. Doing so would have cleared the way for potentially damaging (and humiliating) questions by the prosecution. The plea agreement was Black's only legal option to avoid jail or prison time for his client.

IMPACT

It is difficult to shape Albert into a conventional cautionary figure. The same year he could have been imprisoned for life, he also was elected to the Basketball Hall of Fame for outstanding media contribution to the sport. Less than one year after his plea agreement—and with an expunged record—a contrite Albert was rehired by Madison Square Garden to call Knicks games on radio, where he remained until a dispute over the direction of the team led to his termination. When Madison Square Garden management initially rehired Albert, it cited not only his stellar credentials and loyal fan base but also his successful year of therapy. After the Garden, he joined the prestigious sports division of cable television network TNT. His sportscasting career continued unabated.

Feminist groups were outraged at the lack of condemnation against Albert after his conviction, citing a system that destroys the lives and careers of women but allows male perpetrators to return to their careers unscathed. Albert quickly reestablished himself as one of basketball's most informed and charismatic broadcasters (indeed, media critics argued the notoriety only increased his value in a market driven by celebrity). In June, 2008, he was a television commentator for the postseason games of the National Basketball Association, calling the finals' series between the Los Angeles Lakers and Boston Celtics.

Little is known of what happened to Perhach after the trial. She intimated, through her attorney, that she might pursue a civil lawsuit against Albert, but none was ever filed.

In the long term, the Albert sex scandal reveals that such scandals in a media age do not, in fact, have long runs. Whatever impact the case had on Albert's career was a short one, and it was soon forgotten, or simply disregarded. For the tawdry celebrity trials that followed, the Albert trial became a template with the following characteristics: extravagant media scrutiny, the blurring of the line between tabloid news and respectable press coverage, a focus on a marginal celebrity whose eccentric private life was deemed suitable for public investigation, a clash of high-profile attorneys, and a lurid mix of sex and power. In the aftermath, the beloved scandals that are celebrity trials offer irrefutable evidence of a contemporary culture's inability to sustain either its curiosity or its outrage.

—Joseph Dewey

FURTHER READING

Langer, John. Tabloid Television: Popular Journalism and the "Other News." New York: Routledge, 1997. Examines the definitions of "news" and how tabloids and celebrity trials have altered that definition. Also looks at how pretrial coverage trivializes the justice system by creating heroes and villains before the system renders its verdict.

Orth, Maureen. The Importance of Being Famous: Behind the Scenes of the Celebrity-Industrial Complex. Farmingdale, N.Y.: Owl Books, 2005. A journalist's analysis of the celebrity-driven tabloid era that includes the Albert trial. Argues the trial was part of a growing public fascination with the salacious details of the private lives of celebrities.

Schickel, Richard. Intimate Strangers: The Culture of Celebrity. Chicago: Ivan R. Dee, 2000. A scathing indictment of tabloid journalism by a respected media critic. Argues that media renderings of the distinctions between public and private make those distinctions virtually meaningless and in turn trivializes disturbing behavior.

Turner, Graeme. Understanding Celebrity. Thousand Oaks, Calif.: Sage, 2004. A theoretical investigation with numerous examples of how the treatment of contemporary celebrities, particularly in entertainment and sports, inevitably creates consumer boredom and the forgetting of scandalous behavior.

SEE ALSO: Feb. 6, 1942: Film Star Errol Flynn Is Acquitted of Rape; Feb. 1, 1978: Roman Polanski Flees the United States to Avoid Rape Trial; July 28, 1980: Magazine Reveals Baseball Star Steve Garvey's Marital Problems; July 26, 1991: Comedian Pee-wee Herman Is Arrested for Public Indecency; June 27, 1995: Film Star Hugh Grant Is Arrested for Lewd Conduct; Apr. 7, 1998: Pop Singer George Michael Is Arrested for Lewd Conduct; July 1, 2003: Basketball Star Kobe Bryant Is Accused of Rape; Early Nov., 2003: Paris Hilton Sex-Tape Appears on the Web; Dec. 18, 2003: Pop Star Michael Jackson Is Charged with Child Molestation; June 13, 2008: Singer R. Kelly Is Acquitted on Child Pornography Charges.

November 26, 1997

CANADIAN HEALTH COMMISSIONER RELEASES REPORT ON TAINTED BLOOD

During the 1980's, blood tainted with the human immunodeficiency virus, or HIV, and hepatitis C entered the Canadian blood supply. Justice Horace Krever led a commission in 1993 that began an inquiry into the tainted blood and the Canadian government's response to the emergency. The resulting document, the Krever Report, was released in 1997.

ALSO KNOWN AS: Health Management Associates scandal

LOCALE: Canada

CATEGORIES: Drugs; medicine and health care; government; law and the courts; business

KEY FIGURES

Horace Krever (fl. 1990's), Ontario Court of Appeals justice, 1986-1999, and chairman of the Krever Commission, 1993-1997

Roger Perrault (b. 1937), national director of the Canadian Red Cross Society, 1974-1991

John Furesz (fl. 1990's), director of Canada's Bureau of Biologics, 1974-1992, and member of the Canadian Blood Committee

SUMMARY OF EVENT

During the late 1970's and throughout the 1980's, Canada faced a massive outbreak of human immunodeficiency virus, or HIV, and hepatitis C cases among hemophiliacs and blood-transfusion recipients. In response, a Canadian House of Commons committee authorized an inquiry into the possible contamination of the blood supply and requested recommendations for policies to maintain a safe and efficient supply of blood.

Ontario Court of Appeals justice Horace Krever, one of the country's foremost experts on the confidentiality of health records, was appointed to lead the Royal Commission of Inquiry on the Blood System in Canada, or the Krever Commission. Public hearings began on November 22, 1993. The commission heard testimony from those infected and from doctors, officials of the Canadian Red Cross Society (CRCS), and organizations responsible for blood collection and distribution. The hearings ended in December, 1995, after testimony from close to five hundred persons and a cost of millions of dollars.

The CRCS, founded in 1896, was responsible for the majority of blood and blood-components coordination, collection, and distribution. The Canadian government did not regulate the CRCS because of the organization's excellent reputation. The Canadian Blood Committee (CBC) was established in 1981 to financially manage the blood supply system throughout Canada. The blood system as a whole was uncoordinated and inefficient, with no clear line of authority, so that the agencies involved could not respond quickly to a widespread emergency. Until 1989, the federal Canadian government had no legal control over whole blood and its components.

During the 1970's, more than 200,000 Canadians received blood or blood products annually, including approximately twenty-three hundred hemophiliacs, those who have a blood-clotting disorder. By 1971, testing was available to detect hepatitis B, and the CRCS no longer collected blood from prisons, where the hepatitis rate was higher than in the general population. By 1974, the first cases of hepatitis C (originally called non-A and non-B hepatitis) were identified and found to be transmitted through blood transfusions. Hepatitis C can lie dormant for up to twenty-five years and cause liver cancer and cirrhosis. Effective tests were available by 1986, but the CRCS did not begin testing until 1990, and unscreened plasma was given to patients through 1992.

By March, 1983, the United States was screening all persons considered part of a higher-risk group for acquired immunodeficiency syndrome (AIDS), an autoimmune disease that develops from HIV. Persons no longer allowed to donate blood included gay men, Haitians, intravenous-drug users, and their sexual partners. The U.S. Food and Drug Administration (FDA), however, allowed the export of tainted plasma from prisons in Arkansas and Louisiana to Canada during the 1980's. By this time, the FDA already had ruled that prisoners' plasma was too unsafe for the manufacture of blood products in the United States. Health Management Associates (HMA), the company that ran the Arkansas prisoners' plasma program from 1978 to 1994 and bought prisoners' plasma from Louisiana, purchased most of the tainted plasma from the Cummins Unit, a correctional facility in Arkansas. The Arkansas Department of Corrections sold the inmates' blood to HMA, which then sold it to North American Biologics, a subsidiary of Continental Pharma Cryosan, a blood broker in Montreal. Cummins was known to have used dirty needles and for failing to test donors for AIDS and hepatitis C. The FDA accused the prison of numerous violations during the early 1980's and ordered its closure, but HMA continued to sell inmates' blood to Connaught Laboratories, a Canadian company.

Even though potential donors were being screened in the United States in early 1983, Roger Perrault, national director of the CRCS, implemented a policy of asking members of higher-risk groups to not donate, but to refrain voluntarily. Especially in the face of a severe shortage of blood, it would be poor policy to question potential donors, who were being generous by donating. To question them showed distrust. In August, 1982, John Furesz, director of Canada's Bureau of Biologics, which was responsible for regulating blood products, asked the CRCS to report new cases of HIV and AIDS. The request was rejected because the CRCS believed that hemophiliacs were not at risk of HIV infection and that such risk was exaggerated and inconclusive.

The CRCS began screening Canadian blood donations for the HIV antibody in November, 1985. Potential donors were given health-related information and asked if they were in good health, but they were not asked about sexual activities or drug use until 1986. The Bureau of Biologics did not insist that blood donors be informed about AIDS symptoms or asked if they had symptoms of AIDS, nor were they asked if they were in a higher-risk group. The bureau also did not require that higher-risk groups be excluded from donating blood.

The Krever Commission released an interim report on February 15, 1995, containing forty-three recommendations. The report called for a comprehensive, effective program to provide transfusion recipients with information about the risks of HIV. Other major recommendations included that hospitals notify all patients who had transfusions between 1978 and 1985 about the risk of developing AIDS, and to notify all patients who received blood or blood products between 1978 and 1990 about the risk of hepatitis C.

By the time the final report was released on November 26, 1997, many of the recommendations from the interim report had been enacted. The Krever Report found misconduct at every level. Among the findings were that the CBC failed to create a national blood policy and regulate donations; it also failed to provide quality blood products to hemophiliacs. The report found that the CRCS failed to oversee and provide resources for the blood system, to recognize HIV transmission by blood, and to implement donor screening, and that the CRCS underestimated the risk of HIV transmission.

IMPACT

The tainted blood scandal was the worst preventable public health disaster in Canadian history. The Krever Report of 1997 highlighted numerous problems with Canada's blood system, and Canadian governmental bodies began working to establish a new blood system to improve safety.

In September, 1998, the blood-related tasks of the CRCS were taken over by the newly formed Canadian Blood Services (CBS). CBS had the authority to oversee and integrate services and provide accountability. In addition, the federal government tightened regulations for improving manufacturing standards, reporting adverse drug reactions, and sharing information on transfusion risks. CBS also would provide national control over the blood system. Also in 1998, provincial and federal governments began authorizing compensation for those infected by tainted blood and blood products.

THE KREVER REPORT

The Krever Commission, which was formed to investigate the tainted Canadian blood supply, released its report on November 26, 1997. In that report, Chairman Horace Krever includes a statement he made on the first day of hearings in 1993, ensuring people that the purpose of the hearings was to find facts, and not to condemn.

On 22 November 1993, the first day of public hearings, in the course of my introductory comments about the Inquiry, I made the following statement about its purpose: It is not and it will not be a witch hunt. It is not concerned with criminal or civil liability. I shall make findings of fact. It will be for others, not for the commission, to decide what actions if any are warranted by those findings.

I shall not make recommendations about prosecution or civil liability. I shall not permit the hearings to be used for ulterior purposes, such as a preliminary inquiry, or Examination for Discovery, or in aid of existing or future criminal or civil litigation.

As I interpret the terms of reference, the focus of the Inquiry is to determine whether Canada's blood supply is as safe as it could be and whether the blood system is sound enough that no future tragedy will occur. For those purposes it is essential to determine what caused or contributed to the contamination of the blood system in Canada in the early 1980's.

We intend to get to the bottom of that issue, let there be no mistake about that.

Source: Library and Archives Canada, July, 2008.

In April, 2001, the Supreme Court of Canada ruled that the CRCS was negligent in managing the blood system. In November, 2002, the CRCS and four physicians, including Perrault and Furesz, were charged with criminal negligence. In May, 2005, the CRCS was fined five thousand dollars for its role in the tainted blood scandal, a small amount, but the maximum amount allowed for the charge of distributing a contaminated product. Six other criminal charges were dropped. In October, 2007, after an eighteen-month trial, all the physicians were acquitted of criminal negligence charges.

The cost in terms of human suffering and death was substantial. By 1985, about eight hundred hemophiliacs were infected with HIV. Approximately 1,148 cases of AIDS were attributed to transfusions received between 1978 and 1985, and 627 of these persons were dead by 1993. Since infected recipients and donors were not identified, located, and treated, the number of people actually infected was higher because it included family members infected through sexual and maternal transmission. Between 1986 and 1990, 28,600 people were infected with hepatitis C by blood transfusion, even though heat-treated products and AIDS screening tests were available. Eighty-six percent of the infections could have been prevented had adequate screening techniques been introduced in 1986, the year they first became available. Approximately 95 percent of the hemophiliacs who received blood products before 1990 contracted hepatitis C. The Krever Report estimated that as many as twenty thousand Canadians contracted AIDS and more than sixty thousand had been infected with hepatitis C.

With multiple layers of testing and screening, the blood supply by 2007 was considered safe. More funding boosted safeguards at laboratories and other health facilities and helped to increase the monitoring of international trends and other related health concerns.

—Virginia L. Salmon

FURTHER READING

DeMont, John. "A Harsh Rebuke: The Krever Report Dissects the Tainted Blood Scandal." Maclean's, December 8, 1997. Magazine article that lists examples of negligence and error, describes the current state of blood donation, and discusses changes made with new blood system.

Gilmore, Norbert, and Margaret A. Somerville. "From Trust to Tragedy: HIV/AIDS and the Canadian Blood System." In Blood Feuds: AIDS, Blood, and the Politics of Medical Disaster, edited by Eric A. Feldman and Ronald Bayer. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999. Overview and discussion of Canada's blood system and the tainted blood scandal. Points out numerous failures to act that resulted in tragedy.

Sillars, Les. "Bureaucratic Serial Killers: (Horace) Krever's Tainted-Blood Inquiry Lays Bare in Meticulous Detail the Death Toll from Political Correctness." Alberta Report, December 15, 1997. Highlights results of the Krever Report and examines the inaction of the Canadian health system to protect the blood supply. Provides statistics and some personal accounts.

Starr, Douglas. Blood: An Epic History of Medicine and Commerce. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1998. An exposé of the global business of human blood, namely the "blood-services complex." Discussion includes the distribution of blood in the context of the rise of HIV and AIDS during the early 1980's.

"Tainted Blood: Poison from the Prisons." The Economist, March 13, 1999. Brief magazine article discussing the sale to Canada of contaminated prisoners' plasma from the United States during the 1980's.

SEE ALSO: Mar. 21, 1928: Alberta Government Sterilizes Thousands Deemed Genetically and Mentally Unfit; Sept.-Oct., 1937: Prescription Elixir Causes More than One Hundred Deaths; 1956-1962: Prescription Thalidomide Causes Widespread Birth Disorders; July 25, 1972: Newspaper Breaks Story of Abuses in Tuskegee Syphilis Study; Sept. 17, 1985: Media Allege Canadian Officials Allowed Sale of Rancid Tuna; Feb. 4, 1996: Whistle-Blower Reveals Tobacco Industry Corruption; Mar. 4, 1999: Quebec Offers Support for Abused Duplessis Orphans; Sept., 2000: American Scientists Are Accused of Starting a Measles Epidemic in the Amazon; Jan. 30, 2001: Liverpool Children's Hospital Collects Body Parts Without Authorization; Aug., 2002: Immunologist Resigns After Being Accused of Falsifying Research; Summer, 2006-Mar. 16, 2007: Manufacturer Recalls Pet Food That Killed Thousands of American Pets; Feb. 18, 2007: Washington Post Exposes Decline of Walter Reed Army Hospital.

December 11, 1997

HUD SECRETARY HENRY CISNEROS IS INDICTED FOR LYING TO FEDERAL AGENTS

U.S. Housing and Urban Development secretary Henry Cisneros, a rising star in the Democratic Party and a successful businessman and respected community leader, broke the public trust when he was indicted for conspiracy, lying, and obstructing justice by trying to hide facts regarding money he provided to a former mistress. He was convicted but served no prison time. The scandal ended his political career but not his business career.

LOCALE: Washington, D.C.

CATEGORIES: Law and the courts; politics; corruption; government; sex

KEY FIGURES

Henry Cisneros (b. 1947), mayor of San Antonio, Texas, 1981-1989, and head of the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development, 1993-1996

Linda Jones Medlar (b. 1948), Cisneros's former campaign aide and former mistress

David M. Barrett (b. 1936 or 1937), White House independent counsel

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Henry Cisneros, the nominee for U.S. secretary of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) in late 1992, was under scrutiny by the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) for misrepresenting facts about payments he made to his former campaign aide and mistress, Linda Jones Medlar. Cisneros never denied paying Medlar, and he even met with representatives of the transition team for president-elect Bill Clinton to discuss both his relationship with Medlar and his payments. However, what remained unclear to investigators was how much he paid her and for how long. What led to scandal was his failure to tell the truth to the FBI.

Cisneros, who was the first Latino mayor of a major U.S. city, had ended the affair with Medlar near the end of 1989 and reconciled with his wife, who had filed for divorce. He made a verbal agreement with Medlar to pay her $4,000 per month until she could find a job or until her daughter completed college. Cisneros admitted his payments were inconsistent and that he could no longer afford them once he became HUD secretary in January, 1993; he did continue to pay her some money for about one more year. In July, 1994, Medlar sued Cisneros for $256,000 for breach of contract. She maintained in the suit that he promised to pay her for emotional distress and loss of livelihood following their affair and that he publicly disclosed private information about her without her knowledge and consent.

On September 12, Medlar appeared on the television show Inside Edition and claimed that Cisneros had lied to the FBI during its background check of the nominee. Inside Edition also broadcast excerpts from audiotapes Medlar recorded without Cisneros's knowledge. The tapes included statements made by Cisneros that contradicted what he told the FBI about the payments to Medlar. The U.S. Justice Department began its investigation in March, 1995, as U.S. attorney general Janet Reno requested an independent counsel to investigate the matter. David M. Barrett was appointed for that job in May. Soon after Barrett's appointment, Cisneros settled Medlar's 1994 lawsuit for $49,000. Barrett then granted Medlar immunity from prosecution in exchange for her cooperation in building a case against Cisneros. In January, 1997, Cisneros resigned as HUD secretary, stating that he needed to be with his family.

Close to one year later, on December 11, Cisneros was indicted by a federal grand jury on eighteen counts of conspiracy, making false statements to the FBI, and obstructing justice. The indictment charged that Cisneros made frantic efforts prior to, during, and after his confirmation as HUD secretary to ensure that Medlar did not reveal the true nature of the love affair, which began in 1987, and the actual amount of money she received from him.

Cisneros denied the grand jury's allegation that his payments to Medlar amounted to hush money. He said the payments were humanitarian in nature. The grand jury also maintained that Medlar had threatened to publicly expose the affair and payoff.

In June, 1999, Cisneros's lawyers attacked Medlar's credibility. One of Medlar's former attorneys testified that Medlar had been lying, especially about more than thirty conversations with Cisneros that she had secretly taped between 1990 and 1994. Medlar claimed that she taped her conversations so that she would have a record of Cisneros's promises of financial assistance. When payments ceased, Medlar took the tapes to her lawyers. She also claimed her lawyers told her to edit the tapes to remove any portions that could suggest she was threatening Cisneros. In September, 1996, an analysis of the tapes verified that they were altered.

Medlar would soon be charged in a case involving bank fraud in Texas and was sentenced to three and a half years in prison. Nevertheless, prosecutors agreed to seek a reduced sentence for the bank fraud conviction in return for her full cooperation in the Cisneros case. The subsequent hearings focused on the admissibility of the tapes after Medlar reaffirmed that she edited several of them. Prosecutors argued that the tapes, which contained discussions by Cisneros of ways to mislead investigators, were critical to the case, and the court agreed. Had the tapes not been allowed as evidence, the prosecution would have had to rely on Medlar's testimony alone and on a complicated trail of financial records.

Cisneros pleaded guilty in September, 1999, to a single misdemeanor charge of lying to the FBI about the money. He had pleaded not guilty in January, 1998, to a felony charge of lying to the FBI about the payments. As part of a plea agreement, Cisneros admitted to lying to federal agents and paid a $10,000 fine. However, he was spared a prison sentence or probation and thus was free to seek elected office if he so desired.

Difficult issues affected both sides of the case. Barrett had to convince a jury that Cisneros committed a crime. Doing so was complicated because Cisneros had earlier acknowledged both the affair and the payments; his crime was understating the amount of money involved by lying to the FBI. Cisneros risked the embarrassment of having his private life made public. Both sides concluded that the plea agreement was the appropriate way to handle the case.

IMPACT

The payments controversy affected not only Cisneros's personal life but also his professional life, and his prosecution confirmed the consequences of lying to the FBI. First, the Cisneros scandal was one in a line of controversies involving President Clinton's cabinet. Others who were investigated by independent counsels include former agriculture secretary Mike Espy, commerce secretary Ronald H. Brown, interior secretary Bruce Babbitt, and labor secretary Alexis M. Herman.

Barrett would continue his investigation for several years after Cisneros was convicted, believing the Internal Revenue Service and the Department of Justice were blocking his inquiries. This investigation ended in early 2006 at a cost to taxpayers of about $22 million.

Second, the aggressive nature of the FBI's investigation of Cisneros for lying to agents reflects the bureau's insistence on maintaining its integrity and on investigating perjurers, even those in high government office. Third, the indictment and conviction changed Cisneros's career plans. He had been a rising star in politics, but after the scandal, his plans did not include politics. He moved from San Antonio, severing deep family roots there, to Los Angeles to engage in new business ventures, but he reportedly returned to San Antonio. He was pardoned by President Clinton in 2001.

—Victoria Price

FURTHER READING

Henry, Christopher E. Henry Cisneros. Langhorne, Pa.: Chelsea House, 1994. One of a series of books on Latinos of achievement. Extols the qualities that made Cisneros an outstanding success in local politics.

Locy, Toni. "Ex-Housing Chief Cisneros Indicted." The Washington Post, December 12, 1997. The leading newspaper of record in Washington, D.C., reports on Cisneros's indictment for perjury, conspiracy, and obstructing justice.

Miller, Bill. "Cisneros Pleads Guilty to Lying to FBI Agents." The Washington Post, September 8, 1999. The local news report on Cisneros's plea in the federal case against him.

Roberts, Robert North. Ethics in U.S. Government: An Encyclopedia of Investigations, Scandals, Reforms, and Legislation. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2001. A comprehensive encyclopedia documenting political scandals, ethical controversies, and investigations in the United States between 1775 and 2000.

Romero, Maritza. Henry Cisneros: A Man of the People. New York: PowerKids Press, 2001. A brief biography of Cisneros, written to inspire young readers.

SEE ALSO: Mar. 2, 1923: U.S. Senate Investigates Veterans Bureau Chief for Fraud; Sept. 22, 1958:

President Eisenhower's Chief of Staff Resigns for Influence Selling; Feb. 7, 1960: President Kennedy's Romantic Affair Links Him to Organized Crime; May 9, 1969: Supreme Court Justice Abe Fortas Is Accused of Bribery; Oct. 7, 1974: Congressman Wilbur D. Mills's Stripper Affair Leads to His Downfall; May 23, 1976: Washington Post Exposes Congressman Wayne L. Hays's Affair; Oct. 4, 1976: Agriculture Secretary Earl Butz Resigns After Making Obscene Joke; Sept. 21, 1977: Carter Cabinet Member Resigns over Ethics Violations; Sept. 24, 1992: British Cabinet Member David Mellor Resigns over Romantic Affair; June 1, 1994: Congressman Dan Rostenkowski Is Indicted in House Post Office Scandal; Aug. 5, 1994: Kenneth Starr Is Appointed to the Whitewater Investigation; Aug. 21, 1994: Sex Scandal Forces Dismissal of NAACP Chief Benjamin Chavis.

January 17, 1998

PRESIDENT BILL CLINTON DENIES SEXUAL AFFAIR WITH A WHITE HOUSE INTERN

Allegations of having lied under oath about an inappropriate sexual relationship with White House intern Monica Lewinsky led to the impeachment of U.S. president Bill Clinton by the House of Representatives but his exoneration by the Senate.

ALSO KNOWN AS: Lewinsky affair; Zippergate; Monicagate

LOCALE: Washington, D.C.

CATEGORIES: Sex; government; politics; publishing and journalism

KEY FIGURES

Bill Clinton (b. 1946), president of the United States, 1993-2001

Monica Lewinsky (b. 1973), former White House intern

Kenneth Starr (b. 1946), White House independent counsel

Linda Tripp (b. 1949), long-time federal employee

Hillary Rodham Clinton (b. 1947), First Lady, 1993-2001, U.S. senator from New York, 2001-2009, and Secretary of State, 2009-

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Even before Bill Clinton was elected U.S. president in November, 1992, his campaign was troubled by rumors of improprieties. Opponents questioned his role in the failure of the Whitewater Development Corporation, a real estate firm, while he was governor of Arkansas, and he was accused of at least one extramarital affair, all claims that brought his character into question. First Lady Hillary Rodham Clinton, later U.S. senator from New York and a Democratic presidential candidate, made it clear that she had forgiven her husband for the affair and considered the matter closed.

Clinton's administration progressed, but rumors continued to emerge, claiming repeated infidelities by the president. Arkansas state police officers reportedly had procured women for Clinton while he was governor and allegedly were fired if considered a political liability. Such rumors gained a certain believability in 1993 when news of the firing of several employees at the White House Travel Office was leaked to the press. Questions of financial improprieties also arose during this time, but White House independent counsel Kenneth Starr could not find evidence of wrongdoing by the president or First Lady.

However, the image of an administration riddled with scandal persisted, and it became an issue in the 1996 presidential election. Campaign contributions from persons connected with the People's Republic of China raised serious questions about foreign influence upon elections in the United States and led to reconsideration of the laws governing campaign contributions. Still, Clinton was reelected for a second term as president.

During Clinton's second term, questions of sexual misconduct came to the fore. Two women alleged that Clinton had made inappropriate sexual advances toward them while he was governor of Arkansas. However, neither allegation had been proven in court, and in the case of one woman, the statute of limitations had long since expired, making it impossible to bring the case to trial. All the same, Starr would come to consider the allegations reason to look more deeply into Clinton's sexual conduct.

Starr's investigations led him to Paula Jones, a former Arkansas state employee who had sued Clinton for sexual harassment in connection with an encounter in a hotel room in Little Rock, Arkansas. Her story was a textbook case of sexual harassment: She had been summoned to the room on the pretext that she needed to take care of some job-related business. However, when she arrived, Clinton (then governor) allegedly propositioned her and suggested that things could go badly for her if she did not acquiesce. She subsequently claimed that she was as surprised by the crudity of his advance as by the act itself and had expected a man as handsome and intelligent as Clinton to have better pick-up lines. Jones's suit was ultimately dismissed because she was unable to prove damages for refusing Clinton's request for sexual favors.

Monica Lewinsky. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Linda Tripp, a staff member in the Pentagon's public affairs office and a former White House administrative assistant, was the next person to enter the developing scandal. In September, 1997, Tripp began to secretly record telephone conversations she had with Pentagon coworker Monica Lewinsky, a former White House intern. According to Tripp, Lewinsky (before being taped) told her about having had sex with the president. In the secretly recorded conversations, in which Lewinsky elaborates on her relations with the president, Lewinsky tells Tripp that she kept as a memento a blue dress with evidence (semen stains) that the relationship with Clinton had been a physical one. On January 7, 1998, Lewinsky declared in a signed affidavit for the Jones case that she had never had sex with the president. Tripp learned of the affidavit and, believing Lewinsky lied, gave the tapes to Starr on January 12.

On January 17, Clinton was deposed in the Jones case and swore that he never had “sexual relations” with Lewinsky. Four days later, the Los Angeles Times, The Washington Post, and ABC News reported that Starr was investigating the president’s sexual ties to Lewinsky. In interviews with the press later that day, Clinton further denied extramarital relations. Months later, when confronted with evidence from the Federal Bureau of Investigation that his DNA (deoxyribonucleic acid) matched the sample taken from Lewinsky’s dress, Clinton admitted to having had “inappropriate intimate contact” with Lewinsky but also equivocated about the precise meaning of the term “sexual relations.” Although technically his attempt to restrict the term to vaginal intercourse had some grounds, it did not match with the intuitive definition held by many people. He insisted as well that he did not lie in his January deposition.

BILL CLINTON’S CONFESSION

On August 17, 1998, following his grand jury testimony, U.S. president Bill Clinton spoke to the American people and admitted to his affair with White House intern Monica Lewinsky. He urged the nation to focus its attention on urgent matters of public concern.

This afternoon in this room, from this chair, I testified before the Office of Independent Counsel and the grand jury. I answered their questions truthfully, including questions about my private life, questions no American citizen would ever want to answer. Still, I must take complete responsibility for all my actions, both public and private. And that is why I am speaking to you tonight.

As you know, in a deposition in January, I was asked questions about my relationship with Monica Lewinsky. While my answers were legally accurate, I did not volunteer information. Indeed, I did have a relationship with Ms. Lewinsky that was not appropriate. In fact, it was wrong. It constituted a critical lapse in judgment and a personal failure on my part for which I am solely and completely responsible.

But I told the grand jury today and I say to you now that at no time did I ask anyone to lie, to hide or destroy evidence or to take any other unlawful action. I know that my public comments and my silence about this matter gave a false impression. I misled people, including even my wife. I deeply regret that. . . .

It is time to stop the pursuit of personal destruction and the prying into private lives and get on with our national life. Our country has been distracted by this matter for too long, and I take my responsibility for my part in all of this. That is all I can do. Now it is time—in fact, it is past time—to move on. We have important work to do—real opportunities to seize, real problems to solve, real security matters to face.

And so tonight, I ask you to turn away from the spectacle of the past seven months, to repair the fabric of our national discourse, and to return our attention to all the challenges and all the promise of the next American century.

Some considered the media’s continual focus on the precise nature of Clinton’s extramarital activities, rather than upon whether his denial of them in a sworn deposition constituted perjury and obstruction of justice, to be far more inappropriate than the acts themselves. By focusing so intensely upon sexual details, critics argued, the media was appealing to the prurient interest of its readership rather than to the very serious questions about rule of law.

On September 10, Starr delivered his report to the House of Representatives. The report was released to the public the following day. By December 19, the House passed articles of impeachment against President Clinton, making him only the second U.S. president to be impeached (Andrew Johnson was impeached over his conduct of Reconstruction; Richard Nixon resigned before articles of impeachment could be passed against him for his role in Watergate). Because this act followed a congressional election that had significantly shifted the composition of the House in favor of the Democrats, some commentators felt that it was a last-ditch effort by outgoing Republicans to attack a president they despised. Thus, it was in a heavily partisan atmosphere that the U.S. Senate’s impeachment trial began on January 7, 1999.

As provided by the U.S. Constitution, the trial was presided over by U.S. Supreme Court chief justice William H. Rehnquist. Thirteen members of Congress served as managers of the trial, the functional equivalent of prosecutors. They were led by Senator Henry Hyde of Illinois, who was notable for his insistence that the focus must be kept upon the questions of perjury and obstruction of justice and not on Clinton's extramarital affairs per se, which were better left a private matter between the president and First Lady. After nearly a month of testimony, on February 12, the Senate returned verdicts of not guilty on both counts.

Bill Clinton speaks after his impeachment by the House of Representatives on December 19, 1998. From left is Representative Richard Gephardt, Clinton, Vice President Al Gore, and First Lady Hillary Rodham Clinton. (AP/Wide World Photos)

IMPACT

Although Clinton was formally acquitted of the charges against him by the Senate and, thus, continued in office until the end of his term on January 20, 2001, he was subsequently cited for contempt of court by a federal district judge for his refusal to fully cooperate in the Paula Jones case. As a result of his citation and fine, he was disbarred (stripped of his license to practice law) by the Arkansas Supreme Court, which led to his suspension from the bar of the U.S. Supreme Court.

Although many people believe the media had discredited itself by its excessive focus on the president's sexual conduct, even comparing reputable news outlets to supermarket tabloids, the question of honesty and moral character weighed heavily in the 2000 presidential election. Vice President Al Gore's personal connection to Clinton was a strike against him, while Texas governor George W. Bush's squeaky-clean image of prosaic devotion to his wife, Laura Bush, promised an administration that would not be riddled with sexual scandals.

Years later, as Hillary Clinton began her campaign for the 2008 presidential election, the shadow of the Lewinsky scandal hung over her candidacy.

More than a few people feared that having Hillary Clinton in the White House would mean four years of a womanizing Bill Clinton in the White House as well.

—Leigh Husband Kimmel

FURTHER READING

Apostolidis, Paul, and Juliet A. Williams, eds. Public Affairs: Politics in the Age of Sex Scandals. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 2004. A study of politics and political culture in the context of sex scandals. Includes three chapters on Clinton and the Lewinsky affair and scandal.

Bennett, William J. The Death of Outrage: Bill Clinton and the Assault on American Ideals. Thorndike, Maine: G. K. Hall, 1998. Bennett, a conservative, considers the lack of moral outrage about Clinton's behavior.

Berlant, Lauren, and Lisa Duggan, eds. Our Monica, Ourselves: The Clinton Affair and the National Interest. New York: New York University Press, 2001. Collection of articles by mostly liberal academics and intellectuals examining the sociopolitical assumptions, implications, and consequences of the Clinton-Lewinsky affair.

Clinton, Bill. My Life. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2004. Memoir includes discussion of Clinton's perspective on the events surrounding his impeachment.

Dershowitz, Alan M. Sexual McCarthyism: Clinton, Starr, and the Emerging Constitutional Crisis. New York: Basic Books, 1998. Famed Harvard law professor Dershowitz discusses the issues at the height of the scandal.

Kalb, Marvin. One Scandalous Story: Clinton, Lewinsky, and Thirteen Days That Tarnished American Journalism. New York: Free Press, 2001. Focuses on the role of the media in the scandal, particularly its focus on sex rather than law.

Morton, Andrew. Monica's Story. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1999. Authorized biography that explores not only Lewinsky's time in the White House but also how the impeachment trial affected her and her family. Based on interviews with Lewinsky.

Posner, Richard A. An Affair of State: The Investigation, Impeachment, and Trial of President Clinton. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1999. Presents a definitive assessment of the Clinton impeachment process, from its beginning to the acquittal.

Toobin, Jeffrey. A Vast Conspiracy: The Real Story of the Sex Scandal That Nearly Brought Down a President. New York: Random House, 1999. General, popular account of the scandal and the subsequent impeachment of Clinton.

SEE ALSO: 1927: President Warren G. Harding's Lover Publishes Tell-All Memoir; Feb. 7, 1960: President Kennedy's Romantic Affair Links Him to Organized Crime; May 19, 1962: Marilyn Monroe Sings "Happy Birthday, Mr. President"; July 18, 1969: Senator Edward Kennedy's Driving Accident Kills Mary Jo Kopechne; Oct. 7, 1974: Congressman Wilbur D. Mills's Stripper Affair Leads to His Downfall; May 23, 1976: Washington Post Exposes Congressman Wayne L. Hays's Affair; Sept., 1976: Jimmy Carter Admits Committing Adultery in His Heart; Jan. 26, 1979: Former Vice President Nelson Rockefeller Dies Mysteriously; Aug. 10, 1989: Japanese Prime Minister Sosuke Resigns After Affair with a Geisha; Aug. 5, 1994: Kenneth Starr Is Appointed to the Whitewater Investigation; Apr. 30, 2001: Washington Intern Chandra Levy Disappears; Oct. 2, 2003: Newspaper Claims That Arnold Schwarzenegger Groped Women; Apr. 26, 2006: Britain's Deputy Prime Minister Admits Affair with Secretary; Sept. 29, 2006: Congressman Mark Foley Resigns in Sex Scandal Involving a Teenage Page; Mar. 12, 2008: New York Governor Eliot Spitzer Resigns in Prostitution Scandal.

Great Events from History

Modern Scandals

1904-2008

Great Events from History

Modern Scandals

1904-2008

Volume 3

1998-2008

Appendixes

Indexes

Editor

Carl L. Bankston III

Tulane University

SALEM PRESS

Pasadena, California

Hackensack, New Jersey

Editor in Chief: Dawn P. Dawson

Editorial Director: Christina J. Moose

Development Editor: R. Kent Rasmussen

Project Editor: Desiree Dreeuws

Acquisitions Editor: Mark Rehn

Production Editor: Andrea E. Miller

Photo Editor: Cynthia Breslin Beres

Research Supervisor: Jeffry Jensen

Design and Graphics: James Hutson

Layout: William Zimmerman

Research Assistant: Keli Trousdale

Editorial Assistant: Dana Garey

Cover photos (pictured clockwise, from top left): (The Granger Collection, New York); Duke and Duchess of Windsor. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images); (The Granger Collection, New York); Jean-Bédél Bokassa. (AP/Wide World Photos); (AP/Wide World Photos); (©iStockphoto.com/Mark Sauerwein)

Copyright © 2009, by SALEM PRESS

All rights in this book are reserved. No part of this work may be used or reproduced in any manner whatsoever or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopy, recording, or any information storage and retrieval system, without written permission from the copyright owner except in the case of brief quotations embodied in critical articles and reviews or in the copying of images deemed to be freely licensed or in the public domain. For information address the publisher, Salem Press, P.O. Box 50062, Pasadena, California 91115.

∞ The paper used in these volumes conforms to the American National Standard for Permanence of Paper for Printed Library Materials, Z39.48-1992 (R1997).

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Great events from history. Modern scandals / editor, Carl L. Bankston III.

v. cm. — (Great events from history)

Includes bibliographical references and indexes.

ISBN 978-1-58765-468-8 (set : alk. paper) — ISBN 978-1-58765-469-5 (v. 1: alk. paper) —

ISBN 978-1-58765-470-1 (v. 2 : alk. paper) — ISBN 978-1-58765-471-8 (v. 3 : alk. paper)

1. Scandals—History—20th century. 2. Scandals—History—21st century. 3. Scandals—United States—History—20th century. 4. Scandals—United States—History—21st century. 5. History, Modern—20th century—Anecdotes. 6. History, Modern—21st century—Anecdotes. 7. United States—History—20th century—Anecdotes. 8. United States—History—21st century—Anecdotes. I. Bankston, Carl L. (Carl Leon), 1952- II. Title: Modern scandals.

D422.G74 2009

909.82—dc22

2008054757

First Printing

PRINTED IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

CONTENTS

Keyword List of Contents	lxxi

1990's (continued)

April, 1998, Scottish Historian Is Charged with Plagiarism	879
April 7, 1998, Pop Singer George Michael Is Arrested for Lewd Conduct	881
May, 1998, Police Corruption Is Revealed in Los Angeles's Rampart Division.	884
May 11, 1998, Journalist Stephen Glass Is Exposed as a Fraud	887
December 23, 1998, Prominent Belgians Are Sentenced in Agusta-Dassault Corruption Scandal	889
March 4, 1999, Quebec Offers Support for Abused Duplessis Orphans	892
May, 1999, Civil Rights Leader Jesse Jackson Fathers a Child Out of Wedlock	895
May 7, 1999-March 2, 2001, Ethics Counselor Exonerates Canadian Prime Minister Jean Chrétien	898

2000's

January 28, 2000, John Spano Is Sentenced for Fraudulent Purchase of Ice Hockey Team.	901
May 2, 2000, New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani's Extramarital Affair Is Revealed	904
May 9, 2000, Former Louisiana Governor Edwin Edwards Is Convicted on Corruption Charges	907
September, 2000, American Scientists Are Accused of Starting a Measles Epidemic in the Amazon	910
September 19, 2000, Ex-gay Leader John Paulk Is Photographed Leaving a Gay Bar	913
September 26, 2000, Gymnast Andreea Răducan Loses Her Olympic Gold Medal Because of Drugs	916
November 5, 2000, Japanese Amateur Archaeologist's "Discoveries" Are Proven Fakes	919
December, 2000, Sexual Abuse of Children in France Leads to the Outreau Affair.	922
2001, Clearstream Financial Clearinghouse Is Accused of Fraud and Money Laundering	925
January 30, 2001, Liverpool Children's Hospital Collects Body Parts Without Authorization	927
February 18, 2001, CIA Agent Robert Hanssen Is Arrested for Spying for the Russians	931
April 30, 2001, Washington Intern Chandra Levy Disappears.	933
June 18, 2001, Award-Winning Historian Joseph J. Ellis Is Accused of Lying	936
June 30, 2001, Korean Religious Teacher Jung Myung Seok Is Charged with Rape	939
August 27, 2001, Little League Baseball Star Danny Almonte Is Found to Be Overage	942
December 2, 2001, Enron Bankruptcy Reveals Massive Financial Fraud	945
December 14, 2001, Notre Dame Football Coach Resigns for Falsifying His Résumé	948
January 4, 2002, Historian Stephen E. Ambrose Is Accused of Plagiarism	951
January 6, 2002, Boston Globe Reports on Child Sexual Abuse by Roman Catholic Priests	954

MODERN SCANDALS

January 18, 2002, Historian Doris Kearns Goodwin Is Accused of Plagiarism	959
February 11, 2002, French Judge Admits Favoring Russian Figure Skaters in Winter Olympics	962
February 17, 2002, Rotting Human Bodies Are Found at Georgia Crematory	964
March 27, 2002, Georgia Basketball Coach Jim Harrick, Sr., Resigns over Fraud Allegations	968
June 25, 2002, Internal Corruption Forces Adelphia Communications to Declare Bankruptcy	971
July, 2002, Journalist Alleges Release of Genetically Modified Corn Seeds in New Zealand	974
August, 2002, Immunologist Resigns After Being Accused of Falsifying Research	977
September 25, 2002, Inquiry Reveals That Physicist Jan Hendrik Schön Faked His Research.	980
September 28, 2002, British Politician Reveals Her Affair with Prime Minister John Major.	983
October 25, 2002, Historian Michael A. Bellesiles Resigns After Academic Fraud Accusations.	985
December 5, 2002, Senator Trent Lott Praises Strom Thurmond's 1948 Presidential Campaign	988
January 2, 2003, E-mail Message Prompts Inquiry into Air Force Academy Sexual Assaults	991
March 2, 2003, U.S. National Security Agency Is Found to Have Spied on U.N. Officials.	995
April 29, 2003, New York Times Reporter Jayson Blair Is Exposed as a Fraud	998
May 3, 2003, University of Alabama Fires New Football Coach in Sex Scandal	1002
May 21, 2003, Sexually Provocative Film The Brown Bunny Premieres at Cannes Film Festival.	1004
July 1, 2003, Basketball Star Kobe Bryant Is Accused of Rape	1008
July 14, 2003, Columnist Robert Novak Leaks the Name of CIA Operative Valerie Plame.	1010
September 3, 2003, Mutual Fund Companies Are Implicated in Shady Trading Practices	1013
October 2, 2003, Newspaper Claims That Arnold Schwarzenegger Groped Women	1016
Early November, 2003, Paris Hilton Sex-Tape Appears on the Web.	1019
December 17, 2003, Senator Strom Thurmond's Biracial Daughter Is Revealed	1022
December 18, 2003, Pop Star Michael Jackson Is Charged with Child Molestation.	1025
March 4, 2004, Former United Way Charity Chief Pleads Guilty to Embezzlement.	1028
March 5, 2004, Martha Stewart Is Convicted in Insider-Trading Scandal	1031
April 28, 2004, CBS Broadcasts Photos of Abused and Tortured Prisoners at Abu Ghraib	1034
June 2, 2004, U.N. Report Reveals That Secretary-General Kofi Annan Dismissed Sexual Harassment Charges	1039
August 19, 2004, Blog "Outs" Antigay Congressman Edward Schrock	1041
September 8, 2004, 60 Minutes II Reports on George W. Bush's Evasion of Wartime Duty	1044
October 13, 2004, Television Producer Files Sex Harassment Suit Against Bill O'Reilly.	1047
October 14, 2004, Insurance Brokerage Marsh & McLennan Is Charged with Fraud	1050
January 15, 2005, Iqbal Riza Resigns from the United Nations in Oil-for-Food Scandal	1053
January 27, 2005, German Soccer Referee Admits to Fixing Games for Money.	1055
March 17, 2005, Former Baseball Star Mark McGwire Evades Congressional Questions on Steroid Use	1058
June 22, 2005, U.S. Air Force Investigates Religious Intolerance at Its Academy.	1062
July 1, 2005, Federal Agents Raid Congressman Randall Cunningham's Home.	1064

CONTENTS

Beginning August 29, 2005, Government Incompetence Mars Hurricane Katrina Relief Efforts	1068
September 12, 2005, Westar Energy Executives Are Found Guilty of Looting Their Company.	1072
September 30, 2005, Danish Newspaper's Prophet Muhammad Cartoons Stir Violent Protests	1075
November 17, 2005, Liberian Workers Sue Bridgestone Firestone over Slave Labor	1078
December 6, 2005, Spokane, Washington, Mayor Recalled in Gay-Sex Scandal	1081
January 21, 2006, British Politician Resigns After Gay-Sex Orgy	1084
March 14, 2006, Duke Lacrosse Players Are Accused of Gang Rape	1086
April 26, 2006, Britain's Deputy Prime Minister Admits Affair with Secretary	1089
May 4, 2006, Media Uncover Match-Fixing in Italian Soccer	1092
May 12, 2006, Scientist Is Indicted for Faking His Research on Creating Stem Cells	1094
Summer, 2006-March 16, 2007, Manufacturer Recalls Pet Food That Killed Thousands of American Pets	1097
July 14, 2006, New York Times Exposes Grading Scandal at Auburn University	1101
July 26, 2006, Tour de France Is Hit with a Doping Scandal	1103
July 28, 2006, Actor Mel Gibson Is Caught Making Anti-Semitic Remarks	1106
August 12, 2006, Novelist Günter Grass Admits to Youthful Nazi Ties	1109
September 17, 2006, New Zealand Prime Minister's Husband Is "Outed" as Gay.	1112
September 18, 2006, Newsweek Reveals That Hewlett-Packard Spied on Its Own Board	1114
September 29, 2006, Congressman Mark Foley Resigns in Sex Scandal Involving a Teenage Page.	1118
October 22, 2006, Chilean Politicians Use Community Funds for Personal Campaigns.	1121
November 2, 2006, Evangelist Kent Hovind Is Convicted of Federal Tax Violations	1123
November 2, 2006, Male Escort Reveals Sexual Liaisons with Evangelist Ted Haggard	1126
November 20, 2006, News Corp Abandons Plan to Publish O. J. Simpson's Book	1129
November 23, 2006, Former Russian Security Service Officer Dies from Radiation Poisoning.	1132
Early 2007, Subprime Mortgage Industry Begins to Collapse	1134
February 18, 2007, Washington Post Exposes Decline of Walter Reed Army Hospital	1138
April 11, 2007, Shock Jock Don Imus Loses His Radio Show over Sexist and Racist Remarks.	1142
May 28, 2007, Japanese Politician Charged with Corruption Hangs Himself	1145
June 4, 2007, Congressman William J. Jefferson Is Indicted for Corruption	1147
July 9, 2007, Senator David Vitter's Name Is Found in D.C. Madam's Address Book	1150
July 11, 2007, Florida Politician Is Arrested for Soliciting an Undercover Male Police Officer.	1153
July 24, 2007, University of Colorado Fires Professor for Plagiarism and Research Falsification	1155
August 20, 2007, Football Star Michael Vick Pleads Guilty to Financing a Dogfighting Ring	1158
September 13, 2007, New England Patriots Football Team Is Fined for Spying on Other Teams	1161
October 5, 2007, Olympic Champion Marion Jones Admits Steroid Use	1164
March 12, 2008, New York Governor Eliot Spitzer Resigns in Prostitution Scandal	1167
June 13, 2008, Singer R. Kelly Is Acquitted on Child Pornography Charges	1170
July 29, 2008, NBA Referee Tim Donaghy Is Sentenced to Prison for Betting on Games.	1172
September 7, 2008, Financial Institutions and Markets Begin to Collapse	1175

MODERN SCANDALS

Appendixes

Bibliography	1183
Chronological List of Entries	1189
Geographical Index	1200
Category Index	1216

Indexes

Personages Index.	III
Subject Index	XVII

KEYWORD LIST OF CONTENTS

Abdicates, Belgium's Disgraced King Leopold III (July 16, 1951).	276	Agusta-Dassault Corruption Scandal, Prominent Belgians Are Sentenced in (Dec. 23, 1998).	889
Abdicates to Marry an American Divorcée, King Edward VIII (Dec. 10, 1936).	187	Air Force Academy Sexual Assaults, E-mail Message Prompts Inquiry into (Jan. 2, 2003).	991
Abu Ghraib, CBS Broadcasts Photos of Abused and Tortured Prisoners at (Apr. 28, 2004).	1034	Air Force Investigates Religious Intolerance at Its Academy, U.S. (June 22, 2005).	1062
Acting Career, Director Taylor's Murder Ruins Mabel Normand's (Feb. 1, 1922).	73	Air Force Prosecution of Female Officer for Adultery Reveals Double Standard (May 20, 1997).	855
Actor Carole Landis Commits Suicide During Affair with Rex Harrison (July 5, 1948).	245	Airbus Scandal, Former Canadian Premier Brian Mulroney Is Exposed in (Nov. 18, 1995).	830
Actor Charles Chaplin Cannot Reenter the United States (Sept. 19, 1952).	283	Airmail Routes Creates a Scandal, Postmaster's Division of (May, 1930).	144
Actor Charles Chaplin Is Sued for Paternity (June 4, 1943).	220	Albanian Government to Fall, Pyramid Investment Schemes Cause (Jan., 1997).	846
Actor Claudine Longet Kills Ski Champion Vladimir Sabich (Mar. 21, 1976).	485	Albert Is Tried for Sexual Assault, Sportscaster Marv (Sept. 22, 1997).	865
Actor Errol Flynn Was a Nazi Spy, Biographer Claims (1980).	559	Allen Has Affair with Lover Mia Farrow's Adopted Daughter, Woody (Jan. 13, 1992).	773
Actor Is Suspected of Falsely Claiming to Be an American Indian (1928-1929).	130	Almonte Is Found to Be Overage, Little League Baseball Star Danny (Aug. 27, 2001).	942
Actor Joan Crawford's Daughter Publishes Damning Memoir, Mommie Dearest (1978).	517	Amazon, American Scientists Are Accused of Starting a Measles Epidemic in the (Sept., 2000).	910
Actor Lana Turner's Daughter Kills Turner's Gangster Lover (Apr. 4, 1958).	317	Ambrose Is Accused of Plagiarism, Historian Stephen E. (Jan. 4, 2002).	951
Actor Lee Marvin Is Ordered to Pay Palimony to Former Lover (Apr. 18, 1979).	540	Andrews and Blake Edwards Deny Being Gay, Julie (Dec., 1982).	612
Actor Mel Gibson Is Caught Making Anti- Semitic Remarks (July 28, 2006).	1106	Annan Dismissed Sexual Harassment Charges, U.N. Report Reveals That Secretary-General Kofi (June 2, 2004).	1039
Actor Rita Hayworth Marries Aly Khan After Adulterous Affair (May 27, 1949).	254	Anti-Semitic Remarks, Actor Mel Gibson Is Caught Making (July 28, 2006).	1106
Actor Rob Lowe Videotapes His Sexual Encounter with a Minor (July 18, 1988).	717	Anti-Semitic Writings Are Revealed, Yale Scholar's Wartime (Dec. 1, 1987).	705
Actor Rory Calhoun's Criminal Past, Scandal Magazine Reveals (May, 1955).	295	Aquino Is Assassinated on Return Home, Filipino Opposition Leader (Aug. 21, 1983).	628
Actor Wallace Reid's Death in Drug Rehab Shakes Film Industry (Jan. 18, 1923).	86	Arbuckle Is Acquitted of Manslaughter, Film Star Fatty (Apr. 12, 1922).	79
Adelphia Communications to Declare Bankruptcy, Internal Corruption Forces (June 25, 2002).	971	Archaeologist's "Discoveries" Are Proven Fakes, Japanese Amateur (Nov. 5, 2000).	919
Âge d'or Provokes French Rioting, Surrealist Film L' (Dec. 3, 1930).	147
Agnew Resigns Vice Presidency in Disgrace, Spiro T. (Oct. 10, 1973).	447

MODERN SCANDALS

Archer Wins Libel Trial Against the Daily Star , Novelist-Politician Jeffrey (July 25, 1987) . . .	696	Baseball Star Steve Garvey's Marital Problems, Magazine Reveals (July 28, 1980)	574
Armory Modern Art Show Scandalizes the Public (Feb. 17-Mar. 15, 1913)	49	Basketball Coach Jim Harrick, Sr., Resigns over Fraud Allegations, Georgia (Mar. 27, 2002)	968
Armstrong Excommunicates His Own Son, Evangelist Herbert W. (June 27, 1978).	525	Basketball Players, Mobster's Arrest Reveals Point Shaving by Boston College (Apr. 27, 1980)	568
Art Show Scandalizes the Public, Armory Modern (Feb. 17-Mar. 15, 1913)	49	Basketball Players Begin Shaving Points for Money, College (Jan. 17, 1951)	274
Assassinated on Return Home, Filipino Opposition Leader Aquino Is (Aug. 21, 1983)	628	Basketball Star Kobe Bryant Is Accused of Rape (July 1, 2003)	1008
Astor's Diary Becomes a Public Sensation, Film Star Mary (Summer, 1936).	184	Bauman Is Arrested for Liaison with Teenage Boy, Congressman (Sept. 3, 1980)	577
Atherton Report Exposes San Francisco Police Corruption (Mar. 17, 1937).	191	Beck Is Convicted of Tax Fraud, Teamsters Leader Dave (May, 1959)	323
Bakker Resigns as Head of PTL Television Network, Jim (Mar. 19, 1987)	690	Bedaux Is Arrested for Nazi Collaboration, Industrialist Charles (Dec. 5, 1942)	212
"Bananagate" Bribery Scandal Leads to Executive's Suicide, Honduras's (Feb. 3, 1975)	471	Begelman Is Found to Have Forged Checks, Film Producer David (Feb. 25, 1977)	509
Banco Ambrosiano Collapses Amid Criminal Accusations (Aug. 6, 1982).	606	Bellesiles Resigns After Academic Fraud Accusations, Historian Michael A. (Oct. 25, 2002)	985
Banks Admit to Holding Accounts of Holocaust Victims, Swiss (June 25, 1997).	858	Ben Barka Disappears in Paris, Moroccan Politician Mehdi (Oct. 29, 1965)	374
Banque Oustric et Cie Failure Prompts French Inquiry (Nov., 1929)	139	Bendix Executive Resigns Amid Rumors of an Affair (Oct. 9, 1980)	580
Barry Is Arrested for Drug Use, Washington, D.C., Mayor Marion (Jan. 18, 1990)	748	Bergman Has a Child Out of Wedlock, Swedish Film Star Ingrid (Feb. 7, 1950).	263
Baseball Commissioner Peter Ueberroth Suspends Players for Cocaine Use (Feb. 28, 1986)	666	Biden's Presidential Campaign, Plagiarism Charges End Joe (Sept. 23, 1987)	698
Baseball Commissioner Suspends Mickey Mantle and Willie Mays for Casino Ties (Nov. 29, 1979, and Jan. 31, 1983).	556	"Black Sox" Scandal, White Sox Players Conspire to Lose World Series in (Sept. 21, 1919).	66
Baseball for Betting on Games, Pete Rose Is Banned from (Aug. 24, 1989)	735	Blair Is Exposed as a Fraud, New York Times Reporter Jayson (Apr. 29, 2003)	998
Baseball Games, Ty Cobb and Tris Speaker Are Accused of Fixing (Dec. 26, 1926).	118	Bobbitt Severs Her Husband's Penis, Lorena (June 23, 1993)	795
Baseball Manager Leo Durocher Is Suspended for Gambling Ties (Spring, 1947)	242	Boston Globe Reports on Child Sexual Abuse by Roman Catholic Priests (Jan. 6, 2002) . . .	954
Baseball Players Are Implicated in Game Fixing, Japanese (Fall, 1969-Winter, 1971)	398	Bowles Is Taped, Prince Charles's Intimate Phone Conversation with Camilla Parker (Dec. 18, 1989).	745
Baseball Star Danny Almonte Is Found to Be Overage, Little League (Aug. 27, 2001)	942	Boxer Jack Johnson Is Imprisoned for Abetting Prostitution (May 13, 1913)	52
Baseball Star Mark McGwire Evades Congressional Questions on Steroid Use, Former (Mar. 17, 2005)	1058	Breuning Pleads Guilty to Medical Research Fraud, Stephen (Sept. 19, 1988)	720
		Bribe, French President Giscard d'Estaing Is Accused of Taking a (Oct. 10, 1979).	550

KEYWORD LIST OF CONTENTS

Bribery, Senator Joseph R. Burton Is Convicted of (Jan. 23, 1904)	4	Carter, Registers as a Paid Agent for Libya, President's Brother, Billy (Late July, 1980) . .	571
Bribery, Supreme Court Justice Abe Fortas Is Accused of (May 9, 1969)	391	Carter Admits Committing Adultery in His Heart, Jimmy (Sept., 1976)	497
Bribery and Fraud, Police Arrest Architect John Poulson for (June 22, 1972)	431	Carter Cabinet Member Resigns over Ethics Violations (Sept. 21, 1977)	511
Bribery Scandal Leads to Executive's Suicide, Honduras's "Bananagate" (Feb. 3, 1975). . . .	471	Cartoons Stir Violent Protests, Danish Newspaper's Prophet Muhammad (Sept. 30, 2005)	1075
Bribes, Federal Tax Official Resigns After Accepting (Nov. 16, 1951)	279	Casey's Romantic Affair Leads to His Resignation, Irish Bishop Eamonn (May 6, 1992)	779
Bribing Foreign Officials, Lockheed Is Implicated in (Feb. 4, 1976)	482	Catholic Priests, Boston Globe Reports on Child Sexual Abuse by Roman (Jan. 6, 2002)	954
Bridgestone Firestone over Slave Labor, Liberian Workers Sue (Nov. 17, 2005)	1078	Chaplin Cannot Reenter the United States, Actor Charles (Sept. 19, 1952)	283
British Cabinet Member Resigns After Fathering a Child Out of Wedlock (Jan. 5, 1994)	798	Chaplin Is Sued for Paternity, Actor Charles (June 4, 1943).	220
Brown Bunny Premieres at Cannes Film Festival, Sexually Provocative Film The (May 21, 2003)	1004	Charles's Intimate Phone Conversation with Camilla Parker Bowles Is Taped, Prince (Dec. 18, 1989)	745
Brown Is Murdered by Lover, Former U.S. Senator Arthur (Dec. 8, 1906)	22	Chavis, Sex Scandal Forces Dismissal of NAACP Chief Benjamin (Aug. 21, 1994)	821
Brownlee, Sex Scandal Forces Resignation of Alberta Premier (July 10, 1934)	176	Cheating, U.S. Naval Academy Expels Midshipmen for (Apr. 28, 1994)	800
Bryant Campaigns Against Lesbian and Gay Rights, Singer Anita (Jan., 1977).	506	Cheating on Exams, West Point Cadets Are Caught (Apr. 4, 1976)	488
Bryant Is Accused of Rape, Basketball Star Kobe (July 1, 2003)	1008	Cheating Scandal Shocks Soap Box Derby (Aug. 19, 1973).	444
Buddhist Teacher Orders His Students to Remove Their Clothes (Oct. 31, 1975).	474	Chicago Sun-Times Reports That Cardinal Cody Diverted Church Funds (Sept. 10, 1981)	597
Buddhists, Madame Nhu Derides Self-Immolation of (Aug. 14, 1963)	362	Chien Andalou Shocks Parisian Audience, Luis Buñuel's Un (June 6, 1929)	136
Buñuel's Un Chien Andalou Shocks Parisian Audience, Luis (June 6, 1929)	136	Child-Abuse Case, McMartin Preschool Is Embroiled in (Aug. 12, 1983-July 27, 1990)	624
Burton Is Convicted of Bribery, Senator Joseph R. (Jan. 23, 1904).	4	Child Molestation, Pop Star Michael Jackson Is Charged with (Dec. 18, 2003)	1025
Bush Is Investigated for Insider Trading, George W. (Apr. 5, 1991)	762	Child Sexual Abuse by Roman Catholic Priests, Boston Globe Reports on (Jan. 6, 2002)	954
Bush's Evasion of Wartime Duty, 60 Minutes II Reports on George W. (Sept. 8, 2004)	1044	Children, Psychoanalyst Ernest Jones Is Accused of Molesting Mentally Disabled (Mar. 2, 1906)	12
Butcher Pleads Guilty to Fraud, Banker Jake (May 7, 1985).	648	Children in France Leads to the Outreau Affair, Sexual Abuse of (Dec., 2000)	922
Buttafuoco, Amy Fisher Shoots Mary Jo (May 19, 1992)	781
Butz Resigns After Making Obscene Joke, Agriculture Secretary Earl (Oct. 4, 1976) . . .	500
Calhoun's Criminal Past, Scandal Magazine Reveals Actor Rory (May, 1955).	295

MODERN SCANDALS

Chilean Politicians Use Community Funds for Personal Campaigns (Oct. 22, 2006)	1121	Crime Connection, Italian Justice Minister Resigns Because of (May 23, 1981)	591
Chrétien, Ethics Counselor Exonerates Canadian Prime Minister Jean (May 7, 1999-Mar. 2, 2001)	898	Crime Connections, Vice President Lyndon B. Johnson Aide Resigns over (Oct. 7, 1963) . . .	365
CIA Operative Valerie Plame, Columnist Robert Novak Leaks the Name of (July 14, 2003)	1010	Curie Has Affair with Physicist Paul Langevin, Nobelist Marie (1910)	37
Cisneros Is Indicted for Lying to Federal Agents, HUD Secretary Henry (Dec. 11, 1997).	872	Dalkon Shield Contraceptive Is Removed from the Market (Summer, 1974)	459
Clearstream Financial Clearinghouse Is Accused of Fraud and Money Laundering (2001)	925	Daniélou Dies in a Prostitute's House, French Cardinal (May 20, 1974)	456
Clinton Denies Sexual Affair with a White House Intern, President Bill (Jan. 17, 1998).	874	Daugherty's Aide Commits Suicide, U.S. Attorney General Harry M. (May 30, 1923). . .	92
Cobb and Tris Speaker Are Accused of Fixing Baseball Games, Ty (Dec. 26, 1926)	118	Defects to East Germany, West German Counterintelligence Chief (Aug. 19, 1985). . .	657
Cocaine Use, Baseball Commissioner Peter Ueberroth Suspends Players for (Feb. 28, 1986)	666	De Lorean Is Arrested in a Drug Sting, Car Manufacturer John (Oct. 19, 1982).	609
Cody Diverted Church Funds, Chicago Sun-Times Reports That Cardinal (Sept. 10, 1981)	597	Diana Dies in a Car Crash, Princess (Aug. 31, 1997)	861
"Cold Fusion" Claims Cannot Be Verified, Scientists' (Mar. 23, 1989)	723	Diana's Phone Conversation with Her Lover Is Made Public, Princess (Aug. 23, 1992)	789
College Basketball Players, Mobster's Arrest Reveals Point Shaving by Boston (Apr. 27, 1980)	568	"Diary of a Mad Congresswife" Scandalizes Washington, Rita Jenrette's (Dec. 7, 1980)	582
College Basketball Players Begin Shaving Points for Money (Jan. 17, 1951)	274	Dines, Film Star Mabel Normand's Chauffeur Shoots Millionaire Courtland S. (Jan. 1, 1924)	100
Communist Letter Brings Down British Government, Forged (Oct. 25, 1924).	105	Dodd Is Censured for Misappropriating Funds, Senator Thomas J. (June 23, 1967).	384
Communist Witch Hunt, U.S. Senator Joseph McCarthy Launches (Feb. 9, 1950)	266	Doerfer Resigns for Accepting Gifts from Networks, FCC Chairman John C. (Mar. 14, 1960)	335
Congo Free State from King Leopold II, Belgium Confiscates (Nov. 15, 1908)	31	Dogfighting Ring, Football Star Michael Vick Pleads Guilty to Financing a (Aug. 20, 2007).	1158
Cooke Admits Fabricating Her Pulitzer Prize- Winning Feature, Janet (Apr. 15, 1981)	585	Donaghy Is Sentenced to Prison for Betting on Games, NBA Referee Tim (July 29, 2008).	1172
Corruption Charges, Former Louisiana Governor Edwin Edwards Is Convicted on (May 9, 2000)	907	Doping Scandal, Tour de France Is Hit with a (July 26, 2006).	1103
Corruption in Turkey, Car Crash Reveals Depth of Government (Nov. 3, 1996)	843	Dracula Copyright, Nosferatu Is Found to Have Violated (July, 1925)	111
Corruption Scandal, Prominent Belgians Are Sentenced in Agusta-Dassault (Dec. 23, 1998)	889	Dreyfus Innocent of Treason, French Court Declares Alfred (July 12, 1906)	19
Crawford's Daughter Publishes Damning Memoir, Mommie Dearest , Actor Joan (1978).	517	Drug Possession, Film Star Robert Mitchum Is Arrested for (Aug. 31, 1948)	251
Crematory, Rotting Human Bodies Are Found at Georgia (Feb. 17, 2002)	964	Drug Sting, Car Manufacturer John De Lorean Is Arrested in a (Oct. 19, 1982)	609

KEYWORD LIST OF CONTENTS

Drug Use, Washington, D.C., Mayor Marion Barry Is Arrested for (Jan. 18, 1990)	748	Faking His Research on Creating Stem Cells, Scientist Is Indicted for (May 12, 2006)	1094
Drugs, Gymnast Andreea Răducan Loses Her Olympic Gold Medal Because of (Sept. 26, 2000).	916	Faking Howard Hughes Memoirs, Clifford Irving Admits (Jan. 28, 1972)	422
Duke and Duchess of Windsor Visit Nazi Germany (Oct. 11-22, 1937)	196	Falsifying Research, Immunologist Resigns After Being Accused of (Aug., 2002)	977
Duke Lacrosse Players Are Accused of Gang Rape (Mar. 14, 2006)	1086	Farmer Is Jailed and Institutionalized, Film Star Frances (Jan. 14, 1943)	214
Duncan Begins Affair with Millionaire Heir, Dancer Isadora (1909-1916)	34	Farrow's Adopted Daughter, Woody Allen Has Affair with Lover Mia (Jan. 13, 1992)	773
Duplessis Orphans, Quebec Offers Support for Abused (Mar. 4, 1999)	892	FBI Sting Implicating Dozens of Lawmakers, Media Uncover (Feb. 2, 1980)	561
Durocher Is Suspended for Gambling Ties, Baseball Manager Leo (Spring, 1947)	242	Figure Skaters in Winter Olympics, French Judge Admits Favoring Russian (Feb. 11, 2002)	962
E. F. Hutton Executives Plead Guilty to Fraud (May 2, 1984).	636	Film Producer Thomas H. Ince Dies After Weekend on Hearst's Yacht (Nov. 19, 1924)	108
Eagleton Withdraws from Vice Presidential Race, Thomas F. (July 31, 1972)	440	Film Star Errol Flynn Is Acquitted of Rape (Feb. 6, 1942).	202
Edward VIII Abdicates to Marry an American Divorcée, King (Dec. 10, 1936)	187	Film Star Fatty Arbuckle Is Acquitted of Manslaughter (Apr. 12, 1922)	79
Edwards Deny Being Gay, Julie Andrews and Blake (Dec., 1982)	612	Film Star Frances Farmer Is Jailed and Institutionalized (Jan. 14, 1943)	214
Edwards Is Convicted on Corruption Charges, Former Louisiana Governor Edwin (May 9, 2000)	907	Film Star Hugh Grant Is Arrested for Lewd Conduct (June 27, 1995)	827
Eisenhower's Chief of Staff Resigns for Influence Selling, President (Sept. 22, 1958)	320	Film Star Ingrid Bergman Has a Child Out of Wedlock, Swedish (Feb. 7, 1950)	263
Ellis Is Accused of Lying, Award-Winning Historian Joseph J. (June 18, 2001)	936	Film Star Jean Harlow's Husband Is an Apparent Suicide (Sept. 4, 1932)	160
Embezzlement, Former United Way Charity Chief Pleads Guilty to (Mar. 4, 2004).	1028	Film Star Mabel Normand's Chauffeur Shoots Millionaire Courtland S. Dines (Jan. 1, 1924)	100
Enron Bankruptcy Reveals Massive Financial Fraud (Dec. 2, 2001)	945	Film Star Mary Astor's Diary Becomes a Public Sensation (Summer, 1936)	184
Environmental Protection Agency Chief for Contempt, Congress Cites (Dec. 16, 1982).	615	Film Star Robert Mitchum Is Arrested for Drug Possession (Aug. 31, 1948).	251
Estes Is Arrested for Corporate Fraud, Billie Sol (Mar. 29, 1962).	341	Film Star Thelma Todd's Death Cannot Be Explained (Dec. 16, 1935)	178
Exstase, Hedy Lamarr Appears Nude in the Czech Film (Jan. 20, 1933).	163	Film The Brown Bunny Premieres at Cannes Film Festival, Sexually Provocative (May 21, 2003)	1004
Extortion, San Francisco Mayor Schmitz Is Found Guilty of (June 13, 1907).	28	Financial Institutions and Markets Begin to Collapse (Sept. 7, 2008).	1175
Faked Hitler Diaries, German Magazine Publishes (Apr. 25, 1983)	618	Financier Michael Milken Is Indicted for Racketeering and Fraud (Mar. 29, 1989)	726
Fakes, Japanese Amateur Archaeologist's "Discoveries" Are Proven (Nov. 5, 2000)	919	Fire, Nearly 150 Workers Die in Triangle Shirtwaist Factory (Mar. 25, 1911)	40

MODERN SCANDALS

Fire Kills Thirty-five Girls, Irish Orphan School (Feb. 23, 1943)	217	Fraud, Faith Healer Peter Popoff Is Exposed as a (Apr. 22, 1986)	673
Firestone Recalls Millions of Defective Car Tires (Oct. 20, 1978)	534	Fraud, Financier Michael Milken Is Indicted for Racketeering and (Mar. 29, 1989)	726
Fisher Shoots Mary Jo Buttafuoco, Amy (May 19, 1992)	781	Fraud, Guinness Four Are Found Guilty of Share-Trading (Aug. 27, 1990)	753
Florida Politician Is Arrested for Soliciting an Undercover Male Police Officer (July 11, 2007).	1153	Fraud, Guru Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh Is Indicted for Immigration (Oct. 23, 1985)	662
Flynn Is Acquitted of Rape, Film Star Errol (Feb. 6, 1942).	202	Fraud, Insurance Brokerage Marsh & McLennan Is Charged with (Oct. 14, 2004).	1050
Flynn Was a Nazi Spy, Biographer Claims Actor Errol (1980).	559	Fraud, Journalist Stephen Glass Is Exposed as a (May 11, 1998)	887
Foley Resigns in Sex Scandal Involving a Teenage Page, Congressman Mark (Sept. 29, 2006)	1118	Fraud, New York Times Reporter Jayson Blair Is Exposed as a (Apr. 29, 2003).	998
Fonda's Visit to North Vietnam Outrages Many Americans, Jane (July 8-22, 1972)	434	Fraud, Police Arrest Architect John Poulson for Bribery and (June 22, 1972)	431
Football, NCAA Imposes "Death Penalty" on Southern Methodist University (Feb. 25, 1987)	687	Fraud, Prize-Winning Aborigine Novelist Revealed as a (Mar. 12, 1997)	852
Football Coach in Sex Scandal, University of Alabama Fires New (May 3, 2003)	1002	Fraud, Stephen Breuning Pleads Guilty to Medical Research (Sept. 19, 1988).	720
Football Coach Resigns for Falsifying His Résumé, Notre Dame (Dec. 14, 2001)	948	Fraud, U.S. Senate Investigates Veterans Bureau Chief for (Mar. 2, 1923)	89
Football Star Michael Vick Pleads Guilty to Financing a Dogfighting Ring (Aug. 20, 2007).	1158	Fraud Accusations, Historian Michael A. Bellesiles Resigns After Academic (Oct. 25, 2002)	985
Football Team Is Fined for Spying on Other Teams, New England Patriots (Sept. 13, 2007).	1161	Fraud Allegations, Georgia Basketball Coach Jim Harrick, Sr., Resigns over (Mar. 27, 2002)	968
Ford Ignored Pinto's Safety Problems, Court Finds That (May 29, 1981)	594	Fraud and Money Laundering, Clearstream Financial Clearinghouse Is Accused of (2001).	925
Forged Checks, Film Producer David Begelman Is Found to Have (Feb. 25, 1977)	509	Fraud Charges, ZZZZ Best Founder Is Indicted on Federal (Jan. 15, 1988)	708
Forged Communist Letter Brings Down British Government (Oct. 25, 1924)	105	Fraud Upsets Belmont Park Raceway, Horse- Swapping (Sept. 23, 1977)	514
Fortas Is Accused of Bribery, Supreme Court Justice Abe (May 9, 1969)	391	Frauds, Ponzi Schemes Are Revealed as Investment (1919-1920)	63
Fraud, Banker Jake Butcher Pleads Guilty to (May 7, 1985).	648	Fraudulent Article, Physicist Publishes a Deliberately (Spring, 1996).	837
Fraud, Billie Sol Estes Is Arrested for Corporate (Mar. 29, 1962).	341	Fraudulent Purchase of Ice Hockey Team, John Spano Is Sentenced for (Jan. 28, 2000).	901
Fraud, Boston Alderman Is Reelected While in Jail for (Dec., 1904).	6	Fraudulent Schemes Rock French Government, Stavisky's (Jan. 8, 1934-Jan. 17, 1936)	170
Fraud, E. F. Hutton Executives Plead Guilty to (May 2, 1984).	636	Garvey's Marital Problems, Magazine Reveals Baseball Star Steve (July 28, 1980)	574
Fraud, Enron Bankruptcy Reveals Massive Financial (Dec. 2, 2001)	945	Gay, Julie Andrews and Blake Edwards Deny Being (Dec., 1982)	612

KEYWORD LIST OF CONTENTS

Gay Bar, Ex-gay Leader John Paulk Is Photographed Leaving a (Sept. 19, 2000) . . .	913	Greenpeace Ship Rainbow Warrior , French Secret Service Sinks the (July 10, 1985) . . .	651
Gay Congressman Edward Schrock, Blog “Outs” Anti- (Aug. 19, 2004)	1041	Guinness Four Are Found Guilty of Share- Trading Fraud (Aug. 27, 1990)	753
Gay Rights, Singer Anita Bryant Campaigns Against Lesbian and (Jan., 1977)	506	Haggard, Male Escort Reveals Sexual Liaisons with Evangelist Ted (Nov. 2, 2006)	1126
Gay Sex Leads to Ethics Scandal, Study of Anonymous (1970)	407	Haley Is Sued for Plagiarism, Roots Author Alex (1978)	520
Gay-Sex Orgy, British Politician Resigns After (Jan. 21, 2006)	1084	Hamsun Is Arrested for Treason, Norwegian Writer Knut (May 26, 1945)	229
Gay-Sex Scandal, Evangelist Billy James Hargis Resigns College Presidency During (Oct. 25, 1974)	465	Hanssen Is Arrested for Spying for the Russians, CIA Agent Robert (Feb. 18, 2001)	931
Gay-Sex Scandal, Spokane, Washington, Mayor Recalled in (Dec. 6, 2005)	1081	Harding Is Banned from Skating After Attack on Rival, Tonya (June 30, 1994)	812
Gay-Sex Sting, President Lyndon Johnson’s Aide Is Arrested in (Oct. 7, 1964)	371	Harding’s Lover Publishes Tell-All Memoir, President Warren G. (1927)	124
Gays Is Banned on Broadway, Mae West’s Play About (1927)	122	Hargis Resigns College Presidency During Gay- Sex Scandal, Evangelist Billy James (Oct. 25, 1974)	465
Geisha, Japanese Prime Minister Sosuke Resigns After Affair with a (Aug. 10, 1989)	733	Harlow’s Husband Is an Apparent Suicide, Film Star Jean (Sept. 4, 1932)	160
Genetically Modified Corn Seeds in New Zealand, Journalist Alleges Release of (July, 2002)	974	Harrick, Sr., Resigns over Fraud Allegations, Georgia Basketball Coach Jim (Mar. 27, 2002)	968
Genovese Dies as Her Cries for Help Are Ignored, Kitty (Mar. 13, 1964)	369	Harrison Loses Plagiarism Lawsuit, Former Beatle George (Sept. 1, 1976)	494
Georgia Crematory, Rotting Human Bodies Are Found at (Feb. 17, 2002)	964	Hays’s Affair, Washington Post Exposes Congressman Wayne L. (May 23, 1976)	491
Gibson Is Caught Making Anti-Semitic Remarks, Actor Mel (July 28, 2006)	1106	Hayworth Marries Aly Khan After Adulterous Affair, Actor Rita (May 27, 1949)	254
Giscard d’Estaing Is Accused of Taking a Bribe, French President (Oct. 10, 1979)	550	Hearst Helps Rob a Bank, Kidnapped Heir Patty (Apr. 15, 1974)	450
Giuliani’s Extramarital Affair Is Revealed, New York Mayor Rudy (May 2, 2000)	904	Hearst’s Yacht, Film Producer Thomas H. Ince Dies After Weekend on (Nov. 19, 1924)	108
Glass Is Exposed as a Fraud, Journalist Stephen (May 11, 1998)	887	Helmsley Enters Prison for Tax Evasion, Hotel Tycoon Leona (Apr. 15, 1992)	776
Glyn’s Novel Three Weeks Shocks Readers, Elinor (1907)	25	Herman Is Arrested for Public Indecency, Comedian Pee-wee (July 26, 1991)	765
Goetz Shoots Four Black Youths, Subway Vigilante Bernhard (Dec. 22, 1984)	641	Hewlett-Packard Spied on Its Own Board, Newsweek Reveals That (Sept. 18, 2006) . . .	1114
Goodwin Is Accused of Plagiarism, Historian Doris Kearns (Jan. 18, 2002)	959	Hilton Sex-Tape Appears on the Web, Paris (Early Nov., 2003)	1019
Grading Scandal at Auburn University, New York Times Exposes (July 14, 2006)	1101	Hindemith’s Opera Sancta Susanna Depicts a Nun’s Sexual Desires (Mar. 26, 1922)	76
Grant Is Arrested for Lewd Conduct, Film Star Hugh (June 27, 1995)	827	Hiss Is Convicted of Perjury, Alger (Jan. 21, 1950)	259
Grass Admits to Youthful Nazi Ties, Novelist Günter (Aug. 12, 2006)	1109	Hitler Diaries, German Magazine Publishes Faked (Apr. 25, 1983)	618

MODERN SCANDALS

Hoax, Piltdown Man Is Revealed to Be a (Nov. 21, 1953)	292	Irving Admits Faking Howard Hughes Memoirs, Clifford (Jan. 28, 1972)	422
Holocaust, Play Accuses Pope Pius XII of Complicity in the (Feb. 23, 1963)	353	Italian Justice Minister Resigns Because of Crime Connection (May 23, 1981)	591
Holocaust Victims, Swiss Banks Admit to Holding Accounts of (June 25, 1997)	858	Jackson Calls New York City "Hymietown," Jesse (Jan. 25, 1984)	633
Homosexual "Circle" Scandalizes Germany, Emperor William II's (1906-1909)	9	Jackson Fathers a Child Out of Wedlock, Civil Rights Leader Jesse (May, 1999)	895
Homosexuality Investigation, U.S. Senate Rebukes Navy in (July 19, 1921)	70	Jackson Is Charged with Child Molestation, Pop Star Michael (Dec. 18, 2003)	1025
Horse-Swapping Fraud Upsets Belmont Park Raceway (Sept. 23, 1977)	514	Japanese Americans, President Roosevelt Orders Internment of (Feb. 19, 1942)	205
House Post Office Scandal, Congressman Dan Rostenkowski Is Indicted in (June 1, 1994)	803	Japanese Politician Charged with Corruption Hangs Himself (May 28, 2007)	1145
Hovind Is Convicted of Federal Tax Violations, Evangelist Kent (Nov. 2, 2006)	1123	Jefferson Is Indicted for Corruption, Congressman William J. (June 4, 2007)	1147
Hughes Memoirs, Clifford Irving Admits Faking Howard (Jan. 28, 1972)	422	Jenrette's "Diary of a Mad Congresswife" Scandalizes Washington, Rita (Dec. 7, 1980)	582
Hurricane Katrina Relief Efforts, Government Incompetence Mars (Beginning August 29, 2005)	1068	Johnson Aide Resigns over Crime Connections, Vice President Lyndon B. (Oct. 7, 1963)	365
Husband Is "Outed" as Gay, New Zealand Prime Minister's (Sept. 17, 2006)	1112	Johnson Is Imprisoned for Abetting Prostitution, Boxer Jack (May 13, 1913)	52
"Hymietown," Jesse Jackson Calls New York City (Jan. 25, 1984)	633	Johnson's Aide Is Arrested in Gay-Sex Sting, President Lyndon (Oct. 7, 1964)	371
Ice Hockey Team, John Spano Is Sentenced for Fraudulent Purchase of (Jan. 28, 2000)	901	Jones Admits Steroid Use, Olympic Champion Marion (Oct. 5, 2007)	1164
Imus Loses His Radio Show over Sexist and Racist Remarks, Shock Jock Don (Apr. 11, 2007)	1142	Jones Is Accused of Molesting Mentally Disabled Children, Psychoanalyst Ernest (Mar. 2, 1906)	12
Ince Dies After Weekend on Hearst's Yacht, Film Producer Thomas H. (Nov. 19, 1924)	108	Jorgensen Becomes Christine Jorgensen, George (Dec. 1, 1952)	289
Insider Trading, British Prime Minister's Staff Is Investigated for (Jan., 1913)	43	Jung Myung Seok Is Charged with Rape, Korean Religious Teacher (June 30, 2001)	939
Insider Trading, George W. Bush Is Investigated for (Apr. 5, 1991)	762	Katrina Relief Efforts, Government Incompetence Mars Hurricane (Beginning August 29, 2005)	1068
Insider-Trading Scandal, Martha Stewart Is Convicted in (Mar. 5, 2004)	1031	Kelly Is Acquitted on Child Pornography Charges, Singer R. (June 13, 2008)	1170
Insider-Trading Scandal Rocks Japanese Government (June, 1988-June, 1989)	714	Kennan Proves Russian Sisson Documents Are Fakes, George F. (June, 1956)	307
Insull Utilities Trusts Collapse Prompts New Federal Regulation (1932)	154	Kennedy Begins an Affair with Gloria Swanson, Joseph P. (Early 1928)	127
Internment of Japanese Americans, President Roosevelt Orders (Feb. 19, 1942)	205	Kennedy's Driving Accident Kills Mary Jo Kopechne, Senator Edward (July 18, 1969)	394
Iran-Contra Weapons Scandal Taints Reagan's Administration (Nov. 13, 1986-May 4, 1989)	676

KEYWORD LIST OF CONTENTS

Kennedy's Romantic Affair Links Him to Organized Crime, President (Feb. 7, 1960)	329	Literary Hoax, Australian Poets Claim Responsibility for a (June 5, 1944).	223
Kent State Students, National Guardsmen Kill Protesting (May 4, 1970)	410	Liverpool Children's Hospital Collects Body Parts Without Authorization (Jan. 30, 2001)	927
Kidnapped Heir Patty Hearst Helps Rob a Bank (Apr. 15, 1974)	450	Lloyd George Is Accused of Selling Honors, British Prime Minister David (June 22, 1922).	83
King Is Sued for Palimony, Tennis Star Billie Jean (Apr. 28, 1981)	588	Lockheed Is Implicated in Bribing Foreign Officials (Feb. 4, 1976).	482
King, Jr.'s, Doctoral-Thesis Plagiarism Is Revealed, Martin Luther (Dec. 3, 1989)	739	Longet Kills Ski Champion Vladimir Sabich, Actor Claudine (Mar. 21, 1976)	485
Kopechne, Senator Edward Kennedy's Driving Accident Kills Mary Jo (July 18, 1969)	394	Lott Praises Strom Thurmond's 1948 Presidential Campaign, Senator Trent (Dec. 5, 2002).	988
Koreagate Scandal, U.S. Congress Members Are Implicated in (1976-1977)	479	Love Canal Residents Sue Chemical Company (Sept. 26, 1979).	546
Lacrosse Players Are Accused of Gang Rape, Duke (Mar. 14, 2006)	1086	Lowe Videotapes His Sexual Encounter with a Minor, Actor Rob (July 18, 1988)	717
Lamarr Appears Nude in the Czech Film Exstase , Hedy (Jan. 20, 1933)	163	Lying, Award-Winning Historian Joseph J. Ellis Is Accused of (June 18, 2001)	936
Landis Commits Suicide During Affair with Rex Harrison, Actor Carole (July 5, 1948)	245	Lying to Federal Agents, HUD Secretary Henry Cisneros Is Indicted for (Dec. 11, 1997)	872
Langevin, Nobelist Marie Curie Has Affair with Physicist Paul (1910)	37	MacArthur Sues Newspaper Columnist for Libel, General Douglas (May 16, 1934)	173
Langley Is Convicted of Violating the Volstead Act, Kentucky Congressman John W. (May 12, 1924)	103	McCarthy Launches Communist Witch Hunt, U.S. Senator Joseph (Feb. 9, 1950).	266
Laval Wants Germany to Win World War II, French Prime Minister Pierre (Apr. 22, 1942)	209	McGwire Evades Congressional Questions on Steroid Use, Former Baseball Star Mark (Mar. 17, 2005)	1058
Leak, British Cabinet Member Resigns After Budget Information (May 20, 1936)	181	McMartin Preschool Is Embroiled in Child- Abuse Case (Aug. 12, 1983-July 27, 1990)	624
Leopold II, Belgium Confiscates Congo Free State from King (Nov. 15, 1908)	31	McPherson Claims She Was Kidnapped, Evangelist Aimee Semple (May-June, 1926)	115
Leopold III Abdicates, Belgium's Disgraced King (July 16, 1951)	276	Major, British Politician Reveals Her Affair with Prime Minister John (Sept. 28, 2002). . .	983
Lesbian and Gay Rights, Singer Anita Bryant Campaigns Against (Jan., 1977)	506	Mantle and Willie Mays for Casino Ties, Baseball Commissioner Suspends Mickey (Nov. 29, 1979, and Jan. 31, 1983).	556
Letourneau Is Arrested for Statutory Rape, Teacher Mary Kay (Feb. 26, 1997).	849	Maradona Is Expelled from World Cup, Soccer Star Diego (July 1, 1994).	815
Levy Disappears, Washington Intern Chandra (Apr. 30, 2001)	933	Marcos Forces the Entire Supreme Court to Resign, Philippine President (May 11, 1982)	600
Lewis Marries Thirteen-Year-Old Cousin, Rock Star Jerry Lee (Dec. 12, 1957)	313	Marsh & McLennan Is Charged with Fraud, Insurance Brokerage (Oct. 14, 2004)	1050
Libel, General Douglas MacArthur Sues Newspaper Columnist for (May 16, 1934). . .	173
Libel Trial Against the Daily Star , Novelist- Politician Jeffrey Archer Wins (July 25, 1987)	696

MODERN SCANDALS

Marvin Is Ordered to Pay Palimony to Former Lover, Actor Lee (Apr. 18, 1979)	540	Muhammad Cartoons Stir Violent Protests, Danish Newspaper's Prophet (Sept. 30, 2005)	1075
Mau Mau Rebellion Are Revealed, British Atrocities in Kenya's (Late 1955)	298	Muhammad Is Sued for Paternity, Muslim Leader Elijah (July 2, 1963)	359
Mayflower Madam Pleads Guilty to Promoting Prostitution (July 19, 1985).	654	Muldergate Scandal, South African President B. J. Vorster Resigns in (June 4, 1979).	543
Mays for Casino Ties, Baseball Commissioner Suspends Mickey Mantle and Willie (Nov. 29, 1979, and Jan. 31, 1983).	556	Mulroney Is Exposed in Airbus Scandal, Former Canadian Premier Brian (Nov. 18, 1995)	830
Measles Epidemic in the Amazon, American Scientists Are Accused of Starting a (Sept., 2000)	910	Munsinger Sex and Spy Scandal Rocks Canada (Mar. 4, 1966)	377
Media Allege Canadian Officials Allowed Sale of Rancid Tuna (Sept. 17, 1985)	660	Murder, British Politician Jeremy Thorpe Is Charged with Attempted (Aug. 4, 1978)	531
Mellor Resigns over Romantic Affair, British Cabinet Member David (Sept. 24, 1992). . . .	792	Murder, Former Mexican President Carlos Salinas's Brother Is Arrested for (Feb. 28, 1995)	824
Menendez Brothers Are Arrested for Murdering Their Parents (Mar., 1990)	750	Murder Case, Belgian Media Reveal How Police Bungled Serial (Aug. 16, 1996)	840
Michael Is Arrested for Lewd Conduct, Pop Singer George (Apr. 7, 1998).	881	Murder Leads to Sensational O. J. Simpson Trial, Double (June 12, 1994).	806
Michael Milken Is Indicted for Racketeering and Fraud, Financier (Mar. 29, 1989)	726	Murder of Volunteer in Tonga, Peace Corps Conceals (1976)	476
Milgram Begins Obedience-to-Authority Experiments, Psychologist Stanley (July, 1961)	338	Murder Ruins Mabel Normand's Acting Career, Director Taylor's (Feb. 1, 1922).	73
Military Setbacks, British Government Falls Because of Munitions Shortages and (May, 1915)	58	Murdered, United Mine Workers Leader Joseph Yablonski Is (Dec. 30, 1969).	404
Milken Is Indicted for Racketeering and Fraud, Financier Michael (Mar. 29, 1989).	726	Murdered by His Grandson, Utah Millionaire Is (July 23, 1978)	528
Milli Vanilli Lose Grammy Award, Lip-Synching Duo (Nov. 19, 1990)	756	Murdered by Lover, Former U.S. Senator Arthur Brown Is (Dec. 8, 1906)	22
Mills's Stripper Affair Leads to His Downfall, Congressman Wilbur D. (Oct. 7, 1974)	462	Murdering Their Parents, Menendez Brothers Are Arrested for (Mar., 1990)	750
Miss America to Resign, Vanessa Williams Is the First (July 23, 1984)	638	Murders Architect Stanford White, Millionaire Heir (June 25, 1906)	16
Mitchum Is Arrested for Drug Possession, Film Star Robert (Aug. 31, 1948)	251	Music Industry, U.S. Congress Investigates Payola in Pop (Feb. 8, 1960)	332
Mommie Dearest , Actor Joan Crawford's Daughter Publishes Damning Memoir (1978).	517	Mutual Fund Companies Are Implicated in Shady Trading Practices (Sept. 3, 2003)	1013
Money Laundering, Clearstream Financial Clearinghouse Is Accused of Fraud and (2001).	925	My Lai Is Revealed, American Massacre of Vietnamese Civilians at (Nov. 13, 1969). . . .	401
Money Laundering, Senate Denounces Herman E. Talmadge for (Oct. 11, 1979) . . .	553	Myerson Resigns as New York Commissioner of Cultural Affairs, Bess (Apr. 9, 1987).	693
Monroe Sings "Happy Birthday, Mr. President," Marilyn (May 19, 1962)	344	NAACP Chief Benjamin Chavis, Sex Scandal Forces Dismissal of (Aug. 21, 1994)	821
		Naval Academy Expels Midshipmen for Cheating, U.S. (Apr. 28, 1994).	800
		Navy in Homosexuality Investigation, U.S. Senate Rebukes (July 19, 1921)	70

KEYWORD LIST OF CONTENTS

Nazi Collaboration, French War Hero Pétain Is Convicted of (Aug. 14, 1945)	232	Olympic Gold Medal Because of Drugs, Gymnast Andreea Răducan Loses Her (Sept. 26, 2000)	916
Nazi Collaboration, Industrialist Charles Bedaux Is Arrested for (Dec. 5, 1942)	212	Olympics, French Judge Admits Favoring Russian Figure Skaters in Winter (Feb. 11, 2002).	962
Nazi Collaboration, Norwegian Politician Quisling Is Arrested for (May 9, 1945)	226	O'Reilly, Television Producer Files Sex Harassment Suit Against Bill (Oct. 13, 2004)	1047
Nazi Germany, Duke and Duchess of Windsor Visit (Oct. 11-22, 1937)	196	Organized Crime, President Kennedy's Romantic Affair Links Him to (Feb. 7, 1960).	329
Nazi Past Is Revealed, Former U.N. Secretary- General Kurt Waldheim's (Mar. 3, 1986)	669	Organized Crime, U.S. Senate Committee Begins Investigating (May 3, 1950)	270
Nazi Pilot, German Generals Must Retire for Supporting a Neo- (Nov. 9, 1976)	503	Outreau Affair, Sexual Abuse of Children in France Leads to the (Dec., 2000).	922
Nazi Spy, Biographer Claims Actor Errol Flynn Was a (1980)	559	Palimony, Tennis Star Billie Jean King Is Sued for (Apr. 28, 1981)	588
Nazi Ties, Novelist Günter Grass Admits to Youthful (Aug. 12, 2006)	1109	Palimony to Former Lover, Actor Lee Marvin Is Ordered to Pay (Apr. 18, 1979).	540
NBA Referee Tim Donaghy Is Sentenced to Prison for Betting on Games (July 29, 2008).	1172	Parkinson Resigns After His Secretary Becomes Pregnant, British Cabinet Secretary (Oct. 14, 1983)	631
New York Times Exposes Grading Scandal at Auburn University (July 14, 2006)	1101	Paternity, Actor Charles Chaplin Is Sued for (June 4, 1943).	220
New York Times Publishes the Pentagon Papers (June 13, 1971)	416	Paternity, Muslim Leader Elijah Is Sued for (July 2, 1963)	359
New York Times Reporter Denies Reports of a Soviet Famine (Mar. 31, 1933).	167	Paulk Is Photographed Leaving a Gay Bar, Ex-gay Leader John (Sept. 19, 2000).	913
New York Times Reporter Jayson Blair Is Exposed as a Fraud (Apr. 29, 2003)	998	Payola in Pop Music Industry, U.S. Congress Investigates (Feb. 8, 1960)	332
Nhu Derides Self-Immolation of Vietnamese Buddhists, Madame (Aug. 14, 1963).	362	Peace Corps Conceals Murder of Volunteer in Tonga (1976)	476
Nixon Denies Taking Illegal Campaign Contributions, Richard (Sept. 23, 1952)	286	Pearson Exposes Congressman's Corruption, Columnist Drew (Aug. 4, 1948)	248
Nixons Received Jewelry Gifts, Washington Post Reveals That the (May 14, 1974).	453	Pee-wee Herman Is Arrested for Public Indecency, Comedian (July 26, 1991)	765
Nixon's Resignation, Watergate Break-in Leads to President (June 17, 1972-Aug. 9, 1974)	425	Pendergast Pleads Guilty to Income Tax Evasion, Kansas City's Boss (May 22, 1939)	199
Normand's Acting Career, Director Taylor's Murder Ruins Mabel (Feb. 1, 1922)	73	Pentagon Papers, New York Times Publishes the (June 13, 1971)	416
Normand's Chauffeur Shoots Millionaire Courtland S. Dines, Film Star Mabel (Jan. 1, 1924)	100	Perjury, Alger Hiss Is Convicted of (Jan. 21, 1950)	259
Nosferatu Is Found to Have Violated Dracula Copyright (July, 1925)	111	Pet Food That Killed Thousands of American Pets, Manufacturer Recalls (Summer, 2006- Mar. 16, 2007).	1097
Novak Leaks the Name of CIA Operative Valerie Plame, Columnist Robert (July 14, 2003). . .	1010	Pétain Is Convicted of Nazi Collaboration, French War Hero (Aug. 14, 1945)	232
Oil-for-Food Scandal, Iqbal Riza Resigns from the United Nations in (Jan. 15, 2005).	1053	Physicist Publishes a Deliberately Fraudulent Article (Spring, 1996)	837
Olympic Champion Marion Jones Admits Steroid Use (Oct. 5, 2007).	1164

MODERN SCANDALS

Pitldown Man Is Revealed to Be a Hoax (Nov. 21, 1953)	292
Pinto's Safety Problems, Court Finds That Ford Ignored (May 29, 1981)	594
Pius XII of Complicity in the Holocaust, Play Accuses Pope (Feb. 23, 1963)	353
Plagiarism, Historian Doris Kearns Goodwin Is Accused of (Jan. 18, 2002)	959
Plagiarism, Historian Stephen E. Ambrose Is Accused of (Jan. 4, 2002).	951
Plagiarism, Roots Author Alex Haley Is Sued for (1978).	520
Plagiarism, Scottish Historian Is Charged with (Apr., 1998).	879
Plagiarism Charges End Joe Biden's Presidential Campaign (Sept. 23, 1987)	698
Plagiarism Is Revealed, Martin Luther King, Jr.'s, Doctoral-Thesis (Dec. 3, 1989).	739
Plagiarism Lawsuit, Former Beatle George Harrison Loses (Sept. 1, 1976)	494
Plame, Columnist Robert Novak Leaks the Name of CIA Operative Valerie (July 14, 2003). . .	1010
Poisoning, Former Russian Security Service Officer Dies from Radiation (Nov. 23, 2006).	1132
Polanski Flees the United States to Avoid Rape Trial, Roman (Feb. 1, 1978)	522
Police Bungled Serial Murder Case, Belgian Media Reveal How (Aug. 16, 1996)	840
Police Corruption, Atherton Report Exposes San Francisco (Mar. 17, 1937)	191
Police Corruption, Media Reports Spark Investigation of Australian (Jan. 12 and May 11, 1987)	681
Police Corruption Is Revealed in Los Angeles's Rampart Division (May, 1998).	884
Ponzi Schemes Are Revealed as Investment Frauds (1919-1920)	63
Popoff Is Exposed as a Fraud, Faith Healer Peter (Apr. 22, 1986)	673
Pornography, British Conductor-Composer Is Arrested for Possessing (Mar. 9, 1956).	304
Pornography Charges, Singer R. Kelly Is Acquitted on Child (June 13, 2008).	1170
Postmaster's Division of Airmail Routes Creates a Scandal (May, 1930)	144
Poulson for Bribery and Fraud, Police Arrest Architect John (June 22, 1972).	431

Pound Is Charged with Treason and Institutionalized, Poet Ezra (Dec. 14, 1945)	236
Powell, Jr., Is Excluded from Congress, Adam Clayton (Mar. 1, 1967)	380
Prescription Elixir Causes More than One Hundred Deaths (Sept.-Oct., 1937).	193
Profumo Affair Rocks British Government, John (Mar. 2-Sept. 25, 1963).	355
Prostitute's House, French Cardinal Daniélou Dies in a (May 20, 1974)	456
Prostitution, Boxer Jack Johnson Is Imprisoned for Abetting (May 13, 1913).	52
Prostitution, Mayflower Madam Pleads Guilty to Promoting (July 19, 1985).	654
Prostitution Scandal, New York Governor Eliot Spitzer Resigns in (Mar. 12, 2008)	1167
PTL Television Network, Jim Bakker Resigns as Head of (Mar. 19, 1987)	690
Pulitzer Prize-Winning Feature, Janet Cooke Admits Fabricating Her (Apr. 15, 1981)	585
Pyramid Investment Schemes Cause Albanian Government to Fall (Jan., 1997)	846
Quisling Is Arrested for Nazi Collaboration, Norwegian Politician (May 9, 1945)	226
Quiz Show, Charles Van Doren Admits to Being Fed Answers on Television (Nov. 2, 1959)	326
Racketeering and Fraud, Financier Michael Milken Is Indicted for (Mar. 29, 1989).	726
Radiation Poisoning, Former Russian Security Service Officer Dies from (Nov. 23, 2006) . .	1132
Răducan Loses Her Olympic Gold Medal Because of Drugs, Gymnast Andreea (Sept. 26, 2000).	916
Rainbow Warrior , French Secret Service Sinks the Greenpeace Ship (July 10, 1985).	651
Rajneesh Is Indicted for Immigration Fraud, Guru Bhagwan Shree (Oct. 23, 1985)	662
Randall Cunningham's Home, Federal Agents Raid Congressman (July 1, 2005).	1064
Rape, Basketball Star Kobe Bryant Is Accused of (July 1, 2003).	1008
Rape, Duke Lacrosse Players Are Accused of Gang (Mar. 14, 2006)	1086
Rape, Film Star Errol Flynn Is Acquitted of (Feb. 6, 1942).	202

KEYWORD LIST OF CONTENTS

Rape, Korean Religious Teacher Jung Myung Seok Is Charged with (June 30, 2001)	939	Sex and Spy Scandal Rocks Canada, Munsinger (Mar. 4, 1966)	377
Rape, Teacher Mary Kay Letourneau Is Arrested for Statutory (Feb. 26, 1997)	849	Sex Harassment Suit Against Bill O'Reilly, Television Producer Files (Oct. 13, 2004)	1047
Rape, William Kennedy Smith Is Accused of (Mar. 30, 1991)	759	Sex Scandal, Congress Members Censured in House-Page (July 20, 1983)	621
Rape Trials, "Scottsboro Boys" Are Railroaded Through (Mar. 30, 1931)	150	Sex Scandal, University of Alabama Fires New Football Coach in (May 3, 2003)	1002
Raped by Police Officers, Black Teenager Claims to Have Been Gang- (Nov. 28, 1987)	702	Sex Scandal Forces Dismissal of NAACP Chief Benjamin Chavis (Aug. 21, 1994)	821
Reagan's Administration, Iran-Contra Weapons Scandal Taints (Nov. 13, 1986-May 4, 1989)	676	Sex Scandal Forces Resignation of Alberta Premier Brownlee (July 10, 1934)	176
Reid's Death in Drug Rehab Shakes Film Industry, Actor Wallace (Jan. 18, 1923)	86	Sex Scandal Involving a Teenage Page, Congressman Mark Foley Resigns in (Sept. 29, 2006)	1118
Riza Resigns from the United Nations in Oil-for- Food Scandal, Iqbal (Jan. 15, 2005)	1053	Sex-Tape Appears on the Web, Paris Hilton (Early Nov., 2003)	1019
Rockefeller Dies Mysteriously, Former Vice President Nelson (Jan. 26, 1979)	537	Sexual Abuse by Roman Catholic Priests, Boston Globe Reports on Child (Jan. 6, 2002)	954
Romanian Revolution, Harassment of a Christian Minister Sparks the (Dec. 15-25, 1989)	742	Sexual Abuse of Children in France Leads to the Outreau Affair (Dec., 2000)	922
Roosevelt Is Accused of Accepting Corporate Funds, Theodore (1904)	1	Sexual Affair with a White House Intern, President Bill Clinton Denies (Jan. 17, 1998)	874
Roosevelt Orders Internment of Japanese Americans, President (Feb. 19, 1942)	205	Sexual Assault, Sportscaster Marv Albert Is Tried for (Sept. 22, 1997)	865
Rose Is Banned from Baseball for Betting on Games, Pete (Aug. 24, 1989)	735	Sexual Assaults, E-mail Message Prompts Inquiry into Air Force Academy (Jan. 2, 2003)	991
Rostenkowski Is Indicted in House Post Office Scandal, Congressman Dan (June 1, 1994)	803	Sexual Encounter with a Minor, Actor Rob Lowe Videotapes His (July 18, 1988)	717
Sabich, Actor Claudine Longet Kills Ski Champion Vladimir (Mar. 21, 1976)	485	Sexual Liaisons with Evangelist Ted Haggard, Male Escort Reveals (Nov. 2, 2006)	1126
Salinas's Brother Is Arrested for Murder, Former Mexican President Carlos (Feb. 28, 1995)	824	Simpson Photo, Time Magazine Cover Uses Altered O. J. (June 24, 1994)	810
Sancta Susanna Depicts a Nun's Sexual Desires, Hindemith's Opera (Mar. 26, 1922)	76	Simpson Trial, Double Murder Leads to Sensational O. J. (June 12, 1994)	806
Scarsdale Diet Doctor Is Killed by His Lover (Mar. 10, 1980)	565	Simpson's Book, News Corp Abandons Plan to Publish O. J. (Nov. 20, 2006)	1129
Schmitz Is Found Guilty of Extortion, San Francisco Mayor (June 13, 1907)	28	Sisson Documents Are Fakes, George F. Kennan Proves Russian (June, 1956)	307
Schmitz Is Found to Have Children Out of Wedlock, Conservative Politician John G. (July 20, 1982)	603	Skating After Attack on Rival, Tonya Harding Is Banned from (June 30, 1994)	812
Schön Faked His Research, Inquiry Reveals That Physicist Jan Hendrik (Sept. 25, 2002)	980	Slave Labor, Liberian Workers Sue Bridgestone Firestone over (Nov. 17, 2005)	1078
Schwarzenegger Groped Women, Newspaper Claims That Arnold (Oct. 2, 2003)	1016	Slavery, Liberia Is Accused of Selling Its Own Citizens into (1930)	142
"Scottsboro Boys" Are Railroaded Through Rape Trials (Mar. 30, 1931)	150	Smith Is Accused of Rape, William Kennedy (Mar. 30, 1991)	759

MODERN SCANDALS

Soap Box Derby, Cheating Scandal Shocks (Aug. 19, 1973)	444	Stewart Is Convicted in Insider-Trading Scandal, Martha (Mar. 5, 2004)	1031
Soccer, Media Uncover Match-Fixing in Italian (May 4, 2006)	1092	Stonehouse Fakes His Suicide, British Politician John (Nov. 20, 1974)	468
Soccer Match, Players Fix Liverpool-Manchester United (Apr. 2, 1915)	55	Subprime Mortgage Industry Begins to Collapse (Early 2007)	1134
Soccer Referee Admits to Fixing Games for Money, German (Jan. 27, 2005)	1055	Suicide, British Politician John Stonehouse Fakes His (Nov. 20, 1974)	468
Soccer Star Diego Maradona Is Expelled from World Cup (July 1, 1994)	815	Suicide, Film Star Jean Harlow's Husband Is an Apparent (Sept. 4, 1932)	160
Sosuke Resigns After Affair with a Geisha, Japanese Prime Minister (Aug. 10, 1989)	733	Suicide, U.S. Attorney General Harry M. Daugherty's Aide Commits (May 30, 1923)	92
Soviet Famine, New York Times Reporter Denies Reports of a (Mar. 31, 1933)	167	Suicide During Affair with Rex Harrison, Actor Carole Landis Commits (July 5, 1948)	245
Spano Is Sentenced for Fraudulent Purchase of Ice Hockey Team, John (Jan. 28, 2000)	901	Swaggart Tearfully Confesses His Adultery, Evangelist Jimmy (Feb. 21, 1988)	711
Speaker Are Accused of Fixing Baseball Games, Ty Cobb and Tris (Dec. 26, 1926)	118	Swanson, Joseph P. Kennedy Begins an Affair with Gloria (Early 1928)	127
Spiegel Magazine Offices, West German Police Raid Der (Oct. 26, 1962)	349	Syphilis Study, Newspaper Breaks Story of Abuses in Tuskegee (July 25, 1972)	437
Spitzer Resigns in Prostitution Scandal, New York Governor Eliot (Mar. 12, 2008)	1167
Spy, Biographer Claims Actor Errol Flynn Was a Nazi (1980)	559	Tailhook Sexual Assault Scandal, U.S. Navy Secretary Resigns in the Wake of (June 26, 1992)	784
Spy Scandal Rocks Canada, Munsinger Sex and (Mar. 4, 1966)	377	Tainted Blood, Canadian Health Commissioner Releases Report on (Nov. 26, 1997)	868
Spying, British Civil Servant Is Arrested for (Sept. 12, 1962)	347	Talmadge for Money Laundering, Senate Denounces Herman E. (Oct. 11, 1979)	553
Spying for the Russians, CIA Agent Robert Hanssen Is Arrested for (Feb. 18, 2001)	931	Tax Conspiracy, President Truman's Appointments Secretary Is Convicted of (June 25, 1956)	310
Spying on Other Teams, New England Patriots Football Team Is Fined for (Sept. 13, 2007)	1161	Tax Evasion, Hotel Tycoon Leona Helmsley Enters Prison for (Apr. 15, 1992)	776
Stanford Prison Experiment, Abusive Role- Playing Ends (Aug. 20, 1971)	420	Tax Evasion, Kansas City's Boss Pendergast Pleads Guilty to Income (May 22, 1939)	199
Starr Is Appointed to the Whitewater Investigation, Kenneth (Aug. 5, 1994)	818	Tax Fraud, Teamsters Leader Dave Beck Is Convicted of (May, 1959)	323
Stavisky's Fraudulent Schemes Rock French Government (Jan. 8, 1934-Jan. 17, 1936)	170	Tax Official Resigns After Accepting Bribes, Federal (Nov. 16, 1951)	279
Stem Cells, Scientist Is Indicted for Faking His Research on Creating (May 12, 2006)	1094	Tax Violations, Evangelist Kent Hovind Is Convicted of Federal (Nov. 2, 2006)	1123
Sterilizes Thousands Deemed Genetically and Mentally Unfit, Alberta Government (Mar. 21, 1928)	133	Taylor's Murder Ruins Mabel Normand's Acting Career, Director (Feb. 1, 1922)	73
Steroid Use, Former Baseball Star Mark McGwire Evades Congressional Questions on (Mar. 17, 2005)	1058	Teamsters Leader Dave Beck Is Convicted of Tax Fraud (May, 1959)	323
Steroid Use, Olympic Champion Marion Jones Admits (Oct. 5, 2007)	1164	Teapot Dome Oil Leases, U.S. Senate Begins Hearings on (Oct. 22, 1923)	95

KEYWORD LIST OF CONTENTS

Television Quiz Show, Charles Van Doren Admits to Being Fed Answers on (Nov. 2, 1959) . . .	326	Turner's Daughter Kills Turner's Gangster Lover, Actor Lana (Apr. 4, 1958)	317
Tennis Star Bill Tilden Is Arrested for Lewd Behavior with a Minor (Nov. 23, 1946)	239	Tuskegee Syphilis Study, Newspaper Breaks Story of Abuses in (July 25, 1972)	437
Tennis Star Billie Jean King Is Sued for Palimony (Apr. 28, 1981)	588	Ueberroth Suspends Players for Cocaine Use, Baseball Commissioner Peter (Feb. 28, 1986)	666
Thalidomide Causes Widespread Birth Disorders, Prescription (1956-1962)	301	U.N. Officials, U.S. National Security Agency Is Found to Have Spied on (Mar. 2, 2003)	995
Thatcher's Government, Westland Affair Shakes Prime Minister (1985-1986)	645	U.N. Report Reveals That Secretary-General Kofi Annan Dismissed Sexual Harassment Charges (June 2, 2004)	1039
Thomas's Confirmation Hearings Create a Scandal, Justice Clarence (Oct. 11-13, 1991)	768	United Way Charity Chief Pleads Guilty to Embezzlement, Former (Mar. 4, 2004)	1028
Thorpe Is Charged with Attempted Murder, British Politician Jeremy (Aug. 4, 1978)	531	U.S. National Security Agency Is Found to Have Spied on U.N. Officials (Mar. 2, 2003).	995
Three Weeks Shocks Readers, Elinor Glyn's Novel (1907)	25	Van Doren Admits to Being Fed Answers on Television Quiz Show, Charles (Nov. 2, 1959)	326
Thurmond's Biracial Daughter Is Revealed, Senator Strom (Dec. 17, 2003)	1022	Vick Pleads Guilty to Financing a Dogfighting Ring, Football Star Michael (Aug. 20, 2007).	1158
Thurmond's 1948 Presidential Campaign, Senator Trent Lott Praises Strom (Dec. 5, 2002)	988	Viet Minh Broadcasts French General's Damaging Report (Aug. 26, 1949)	257
Tilden Is Arrested for Lewd Behavior with a Minor, Tennis Star Bill (Nov. 23, 1946)	239	Vietnamese Buddhists, Madame Nhu Derides Self-Immolation of (Aug. 14, 1963)	362
Time Magazine Cover Uses Altered O. J. Simpson Photo (June 24, 1994)	810	Vigilante Bernhard Goetz Shoots Four Black Youths, Subway (Dec. 22, 1984)	641
Tires, Firestone Recalls Millions of Defective Car (Oct. 20, 1978)	534	Vitter's Name Is Found in D.C. Madam's Address Book, Senator David (July 9, 2007).	1150
Tobacco Industry Corruption, Whistle-Blower Reveals (Feb. 4, 1996)	833	Volstead Act, Kentucky Congressman John W. Langley Is Convicted of Violating the (May 12, 1924)	103
Todd's Death Cannot Be Explained, Film Star Thelma (Dec. 16, 1935)	178	Vorster Resigns in Muldergate Scandal, South African President B. J. (June 4, 1979)	543
Tour de France Is Hit with a Doping Scandal (July 26, 2006).	1103	Wakeman Shoots Her Politician-Husband, Socialite Nancy (Sept. 5, 1967)	386
Trading Practices, Mutual Fund Companies Are Implicated in Shady (Sept. 3, 2003).	1013	Waldheim's Nazi Past Is Revealed, Former U.N. Secretary-General Kurt (Mar. 3, 1986).	669
Treason, French Court Declares Alfred Dreyfus Innocent of (July 12, 1906)	19	Walter Reed Army Hospital, Washington Post Exposes Decline of (Feb. 18, 2007).	1138
Treason, Norwegian Writer Knut Hamsun Is Arrested for (May 26, 1945)	229	Washington Post Exposes Congressman Wayne L. Hays's Affair (May 23, 1976)	491
Treason and Institutionalized, Poet Ezra Pound Is Charged with (Dec. 14, 1945)	236	Washington Post Reveals That the Nixons Received Jewelry Gifts (May 14, 1974)	453
Triangle Shirtwaist Factory Fire, Nearly 150 Workers Die in (Mar. 25, 1911)	40
Truman's Appointments Secretary Is Convicted of Tax Conspiracy, President (June 25, 1956)	310
Tuna, Media Allege Canadian Officials Allowed Sale of Rancid (Sept. 17, 1985)	660
Turkey, Car Crash Reveals Depth of Government Corruption in (Nov. 3, 1996)	843

MODERN SCANDALS

Watergate Break-in Leads to President Nixon's Resignation (June 17, 1972-Aug. 9, 1974) . . .	425	Whitewater Investigation, Kenneth Starr Is Appointed to the (Aug. 5, 1994)	818
Weapons, Irish Politicians Are Tried for Conspiring to Import (May 28, 1970)	413	William II's Homosexual "Circle" Scandalizes Germany, Emperor (1906-1909)	9
Wedlock, British Cabinet Member Resigns After Fathering a Child Out of (Jan. 5, 1994)	798	Williams Is the First Miss America to Resign, Vanessa (July 23, 1984)	638
Wedlock, Civil Rights Leader Jesse Jackson Fathers a Child Out of (May, 1999)	895	Windsor Visit Nazi Germany, Duke and Duchess of (Oct. 11-22, 1937)	196
Wedlock, Conservative Politician John G. Schmitz Is Found to Have Children Out of (July 20, 1982)	603	Wolfson Is Convicted of Selling Stock Illegally, Investor Louis (Nov. 28, 1967).	389
Wedlock, Swedish Film Star Ingrid Bergman Has a Child Out of (Feb. 7, 1950).	263	World Series in "Black Sox" Scandal, White Sox Players Conspire to Lose (Sept. 21, 1919).	66
West Point Cadets Are Caught Cheating on Exams (Apr. 4, 1976).	488	World War I Veterans from Washington, U.S. Troops Drive (July 28, 1932).	156
Westar Energy Executives Are Found Guilty of Looting Their Company (Sept. 12, 2005).	1072	World War II, French Prime Minister Pierre Laval Wants Germany to Win (Apr. 22, 1942)	209
West's Play About Gays Is Banned on Broadway, Mae (1927)	122	Wright Resigns in Ethics Scandal, Speaker of the House Jim (May 31, 1989)	730
Westland Affair Shakes Prime Minister Thatcher's Government (1985-1986).	645	Yablonski Is Murdered, United Mine Workers Leader Joseph (Dec. 30, 1969)	404
Whistle-Blower Reveals Tobacco Industry Corruption (Feb. 4, 1996)	833	ZZZZ Best Founder Is Indicted on Federal Fraud Charges (Jan. 15, 1988).	708
White, Millionaire Heir Murders Architect Stanford (June 25, 1906).	16
White Sox Players Conspire to Lose World Series in "Black Sox" Scandal (Sept. 21, 1919)	66

Great Events from History

Modern Scandals

1904-2008

April, 1998

SCOTTISH HISTORIAN IS CHARGED WITH PLAGIARISM

Scottish historian and biographer James A. Mackay was first accused of plagiarizing the works of others for his noted biography Alexander Graham Bell (1997). Further plagiarism charges were leveled against other works, including his biographies of John Paul Jones, Andrew Carnegie, William Wallace, and Mary, Queen of Scots. The long string of fraud allegations marred his reputation as a scholar and, in effect, ended his career as a writer.

LOCALE: Glasgow, Scotland

CATEGORIES: Cultural and intellectual history; hoaxes, frauds, and charlatanism; publishing and journalism; plagiarism; public morals; ethics

KEY FIGURES

James A. Mackay (1936-2007), Scottish historian and biographer

Robert V. Bruce (b. 1923), professor emeritus, Boston University

SUMMARY OF EVENT

James A. Mackay became a renowned historian and biographer through his studies of stamps and coins, his scholarship on poet Robert Burns, and his 1996 biography Michael Collins: A Life. In 1997, he published the biography Alexander Graham Bell: A Life, which had marketable success. Mackay then faced a stunning accusation from Robert V. Bruce, a professor emeritus at Boston University. In April, 1998, Bruce accused Mackay of plagiarizing his work and the work of others in writing the Bell biography.

Bruce detailed the questionable passages, some of which were multiple pages in length, which were taken from his biography Bell: Alexander Graham Bell and the Conquest of Solitude (1973). The passages in Mackay's book retained a remarkable similarity—some even identical. Bruce found 285 pages (of Mackay's 297) with lifted material. Furthermore, he noted that Mackay, in the biography, acknowledged and thanked the Bell Collection archives of the National Geographic Society (NGS), archives that had been relocated to the Library of Congress during the mid-1970's. Mackay published his book more than twenty years after the Bell archives at the NGS was moved. More charges of plagiarism were leveled against Mackay, charges related to his other biographies.

While Bruce's accusation against Mackay was the opening salvo, another scholar, Graeme Morton, a lecturer in economic and social history at the University of Edinburgh in Scotland, wrote in a journal article that Mackay's biography William Wallace: Brave Heart (1995) was strikingly reminiscent of Sir James Fergusson's 1938 biography of the thirteenth century Scottish patriot William Wallace. Morton found lifted arguments, structure, and even entire paragraphs. Mackay's William Wallace was reprinted nonetheless.

Mackay's career began as an assistant keeper at the British Museum, and he also worked as a columnist for the Financial Times. He went on to research stamps and coins and produced History of Scottish Postmarks, 1693-1978 (1978), a landmark work on Scottish stamps. He received the distinguished Saltire Award in 1992 for his work on Burns and had been a well-respected historian and scholar of Scottish history. He had received an honorary doctorate in literature from Glasgow University in 1993. His name accompanies more than two hundred books and ten thousand articles, and he edited The Burns Chronicle for several years. He published six biographies in three years and had plans for more. Prior to his notorious work on Bell, Mackay was known for his histories of Scottish figures, including Allan Pinkerton, Andrew Carnegie, and Sir Thomas Lipton.

In 1998, Mackay's biography on Bell was published in an American edition, and The New Yorker magazine and The New York Times praised the work in reviews. It was about this time that Bruce, whose biography of Bell was a runner up for a Pulitzer Prize in 1974, first began to pay attention to Mackay's book, finding that Mackay had duplicated letters between Bell and his wife that were included in his 1973 biography, and that Mackay did so without attribution. This revelation was the main trigger in the scandal, leading Bruce to inspect more of Mackay's biography. What he found led him to contact Mackay's American publisher, John Wiley & Sons, to alert them to the plagiarism. To avoid being sued by Bruce, Wiley agreed to destroy all American editions of the book that were still with distributors and booksellers.

Another Mackay work is the formidable biography of Mary, Queen of Scots. That book, In My End Is My Beginning (1998), was found to be reminiscent—or, in some places, more like a carbon copy—of Antonia Fraser's monumental and best-selling work Mary, Queen of Scots (1969). Mackay's biography of John Paul Jones, I Have Not Yet Begun to Fight: A Life of John Paul Jones, was dissected upon its publication in 1999. Journalists and scholars investigated the book carefully, even comparing it to John Paul Jones: A Sailor's Biography (1959) by Samuel Eliot Morison. Once again, a pattern emerged. Entire passages matched Morison's words, and in those instances in which the words did not match, Mackay used similar sentence structure and made comparable use of sources.

Mackay was adamant throughout the string of accusations that he had not plagiarized. Instead, he argued, he had used similar sources but never consciously copied material from previous biographers. The only charge to which he acquiesced was his use of the letters between Bell and his wife, which Mackay had assumed were in the public domain. He later apologized to Bruce for using the letters.

IMPACT

Following the accusations of plagiarism, Mackay's British publisher, Mainstream, terminated all pending contracts with the author and did not seek any further work from him. His books on Bell and Jones, and on Mary, Queen of Scots, were removed from circulation in the United States by his American publishers. His work on Carnegie was removed from the shelves of British booksellers in 1999 after he was accused of plagiarizing parts of that work as well.

Also receiving greater scrutiny after the 1998 scandal was the work for which Mackay received great accolades and was awarded the Saltire Prize in 1993: the biography of Burns. Andrew Noble, a senior lecturer at the University of Strathclyde and coeditor of The Canongate Burns (2001), revealed that Mackay's biography of Burns contained similar passages from a little-known nineteenth century work, The Life and Works of Robert Burns (1852), edited by Robert Chambers. Given this new round of accusations, it seemed that Mackay would never write again, or get published. His name and reputation had been permanently marred. However, he still maintained some degree of credibility because of his earlier work on Burns and still was accepted as a foremost authority on the early Scottish poet.

—Meredith A. Holladay

FURTHER READING

Hauptman, Robert. Documentation: A History and Critique of Attribution, Commentary, Glosses, Marginalia, Notes, Bibliographies, Works-cited Lists, and Citation Indexing and Analysis. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 2008. A study of scholarly documentation. This unique work "examines and critiques the history, use, and abuse of various literary documentation systems" including those systems used in the humanities and sciences.

Hoffer, Peter Charles. Past Imperfect: Facts, Fictions, and Fraud—American History from Bancroft and Parkman to Ambrose, Bellesiles, Ellis, and Goodwin. New York: PublicAffairs, 2007. Examination of the key controversies in the historical profession as the culmination of the tensions between New Left scholars and traditional historians.

Mackay, James A. Alexander Graham Bell: A Life. New York: John Wiley & Sons, 1998. The controversial biography of Bell, which initiated the series of plagiarism allegations against Mackay. First published in Great Britain in 1997.

Wiener, Jon. Historians in Trouble: Plagiarism, Fraud, and Politics in the Ivory Tower. New York: New Press, 2005. A detailed analysis of the fraud and plagiarism scandals of historians and other scholars. Good for background material on the subject of academic fraud.

SEE ALSO: June 5, 1944: Australian Poets Claim Responsibility for a Literary Hoax; Jan. 28, 1972: Clifford Irving Admits Faking Howard Hughes Memoirs; 1978: Roots Author Alex Haley Is Sued for Plagiarism; Dec. 3, 1989: Martin Luther King, Jr.'s, Doctoral-Thesis Plagiarism Is Revealed; May 11, 1998: Journalist Stephen Glass Is Exposed as a Fraud; June 18, 2001: Historian Joseph J. Ellis Is Accused of Lying; Jan. 4, 2002: Historian Stephen E. Ambrose Is Accused of Plagiarism; Jan. 18, 2002: Historian Doris Kearns Goodwin Is Accused of Plagiarism; Oct. 25, 2002: Historian Michael A. Bellesiles Resigns After Academic Fraud Accusations; July 24, 2007: University of Colorado Fires Professor for Plagiarism and Research Falsification.

April 7, 1998

POP SINGER GEORGE MICHAEL IS ARRESTED FOR LEWD CONDUCT

In 1998, pop singer George Michael was arrested by an undercover Beverly Hills police officer for engaging in a lewd act in a public restroom. Michael, who paid a fine and did community service, incorporated the incident into a song and music video. His arresting officer sued him for slander because of the song and video, but lost his case. After the arrest, Michael also came out as gay.

LOCALE: Beverly Hills, California

CATEGORIES: Drugs; law and the courts; music and performing arts; popular culture; public morals; publishing and journalism; sex crimes

KEY FIGURES

George Michael (Georgios Kyriacos Panayiotou; b. 1963), British pop singer
Marcelo Rodriguez (fl. 1990's), Beverly Hills police officer

SUMMARY OF EVENT

The 1980's brought the British pop duo Wham! out of its native Great Britain and into the forefront of the American music scene. Singing peppy tunes such as "Wake Me Up Before You Go Go" and sad ballads such as "Careless Whisper," the duo, made up of George Michael and Andrew Ridgeley, attracted a fairly broad audience. Flashy singer Michael drew much press attention for his alleged relationships with a variety of celebrities, ranging from Whoopi Goldberg to Brooke Shields. However, Michael knew he was gay from a relatively young age and had been out to much of his family, including one sister, by the time he was nineteen years old.

By the end of 1986, Wham! disbanded, and Michael launched his own career. He had a number of hits, including "Faith" and "I Want Your Sex," and a hit duet with R&B singer Aretha Franklin called "I Knew You Were Waiting for Me." While he was touring in 1991, he met and fell in love with Anselmo Feleppa, a Brazilian fashion designer, who died in 1993 from AIDS-related complications. Michael's 1996 single "Jesus to a Child" and his album Older, from the same year, are both dedicated to Feleppa. Michael wrote Older under the influence of marijuana and developed a habit for the drug. In 1998, he claimed he was outing himself to his fans with Older and with "Jesus to a Child," and he had already been out to his family and friends for several years. One family member he was not out to was his mother, who died in 1997.

George Michael, left, with Wham! partner Andrew Ridgeley in 1984. (PA Photos/Landov)

Michael's career by this point had moved almost entirely to Britain, and he had little popularity with American fans. However, while in California in 1998, his sexuality became tabloid fodder. On April 7, he was followed into a park's public restroom by undercover Beverly Hills police officer Marcelo Rodriguez. Michael exposed himself and was arrested as he left the restroom for his car. The arrest was not a surprise to the media, and it failed as a major news story in either the United States or Great Britain.

The arrest did trigger some publicity, however, and Michael took quick steps to address the matter. He came out as gay while interviewed by Jim Moret on CNN's NewsNight. Michael had not intended to discuss his sexual orientation with the press, but he wanted to discuss the circumstances that led up to his arrest. In an MTV interview in November, Michael said that being oversexed was the issue, not his homosexuality. In later interviews, he said he thought he had been set up by the Beverly Hills Police Department with help from the London paparazzi, but he could not prove his accusations. In 2005, he said that gay celebrities did what they could to desexualize themselves so as to appear nonthreatening to their fans. Michael said he felt no need to maintain such a low profile, and he admitted to enjoying public gay sex.

During his NewsNight interview, Michael said he had been embarrassed by his arrest, suggesting he had behaved in the same manner before. He was, in fact, involved in a monogamous relationship with Kenny Goss, an American clothing executive, at the time of his arrest. Michael told MTV the relationship was not open, but that Goss had forgiven him. However, he told other news sources that the relationship indeed was open. Years later, in 2007, he admitted that the actions that led to his arrest were unconsciously deliberate, that he wanted to get caught. He said it was difficult for him to be closeted publicly but out privately. He had kept his sexuality secret before 1998, largely for the sake of his mother, whom, he believed, would have suffered from worrying about his chances of HIV infection or of developing AIDS.

Michael pleaded no contest at his criminal trial for lewd conduct. He received a light fine (approximately eight hundred dollars) and was ordered to perform community service.

Michael pleaded no contest at his criminal trial for lewd conduct. He received a light fine (approximately eight hundred dollars) and was ordered to perform community service.

IMPACT

The consummate entertainer, Michael immediately capitalized on his arrest and conviction with his next single, "Outside," which mocked and condemned police persecution of public sex between men. The video for the single, released in November, 1998, depicts dancers in police uniforms kissing in a men's restroom transformed into a dance club.

In 1999, the scandal reemerged when the arresting police officer, Rodriguez, sued Michael, claiming he was maligned by his video, song, and interviews with the media. Rodriguez said the video was intended to mock him specifically and that Michael had slandered him in interviews. He filed a ten-million-dollar civil suit in a California court, demanding compensation for emotional distress. The case was dismissed but reinstated on appeal. The court determined that because Rodriguez was a public servant, he was ineligible to recover monies for emotional damages. The media suggested, indirectly, that the suit was nothing more than an attempt to get a chunk of Michael's roughly $100 million estate.

Michael's career was unaffected by the scandal. His greatest hits album Twentyfive debuted at the top of the British charts in November, 1998, just months after his arrest. Scandal is often an intrinsic part of celebrity life, and Michael's arrest was accepted in stride by his fans. Furthermore, his coming out as gay had no apparent negative effect on his career.

—Jessie Bishop Powell

FURTHER READING

Gill, John. Queer Noises: Male and Female Homosexuality in Twentieth Century Music. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1995. Analyzes the music industry's shift from repression to general acceptance of homosexuality beginning during the early part of the twentieth century with the blues and through the age of rock during the 1990's.

Jovanovic, Rob. George Michael: The Biography. London: Portrait, 2007. Critical biography of Michael, incorporating much discussion of his sexuality and his pop-music career.

Leap, William L., ed. Public Sex/Gay Space. New York: Columbia University Press, 1999. A collection of studies that explore the intersections of gay sex and public sex and how these acts coalesce to form a type of gay space. Good background material.

George Michael Is Arrested for Lewd Conduct

Michael, George. George Michael: In His Own Words. London: Omnibus, 1999. Michael discusses his homosexuality and his admittedly oversexed personality.

Newton, Michael, and John L. French. Celebrities and Crime. New York: Chelsea House, 2008. Written especially for younger readers, this book examines the intersection of celebrity and crime. Discusses how law enforcement handles celebrities accused of criminal acts and celebrities victimized by crime.

Wapshott, Nicholas, and Tim Wapshott. Older: The Unauthorized Biography of George Michael. London: Sidgwick & Jackson, 1998. Published in the same year as the scandal. A critical examination of Michael's life and career.

SEE ALSO: July 19, 1921: U.S. Senate Rebukes Navy in Homosexuality Investigation; Jan. 14, 1943: Film Star Frances Farmer Is Jailed and Institutionalized; Nov. 23, 1946: Tennis Star Bill Tilden Is Arrested for Lewd Behavior with a Minor; 1970: Study of Anonymous Gay Sex Leads to Ethics Scandal; Dec., 1982: Julie Andrews and Blake Edwards Deny Being Gay; July 18, 1988: Actor Rob Lowe Videotapes Sexual Tryst with a Minor; July 26, 1991: Comedian Pee-wee Herman Is Arrested for Public Indecency; June 27, 1995: Film Star Hugh Grant Is Arrested for Lewd Conduct; Sept. 22, 1997: Sportscaster Marv Albert Is Tried for Sexual Assault; Early Nov., 2003: Paris Hilton Sex-Tape Appears on the Web; Dec. 18, 2003: Pop Star Michael Jackson Is Charged with Child Molestation; June 13, 2008: Singer R. Kelly Is Acquitted on Child Pornography Charges.

May, 1998

POLICE CORRUPTION IS REVEALED IN LOS ANGELES'S RAMPART DIVISION

The Los Angeles Police Department was rocked by scandal when the investigation into the road-rage murder of black police officer Kevin Gaines by white officer Frank Lyga revealed a web of corrupt officers in an antigang unit called CRASH, many of whom were affiliated with a notorious street gang. The name of the LAPD division where the officers had worked, Rampart, is now synonymous with police corruption.

ALSO KNOWN AS: Rampart scandal

LOCALE: Los Angeles, California

CATEGORIES: Corruption; racism; murder and suicide; law and the courts; government; violence

KEY FIGURES

Kevin Gaines (1966-1997), LAPD officer
Frank Lyga (fl. 1990's), LAPD officer
David Anthony Mack (b. 1960), LAPD officer
Rafael Antonio Perez (b. 1967), LAPD officer
Bernard Parks (b. 1943), LAPD chief, 1997-2002
Suge Knight (b. 1965), owner of Death Row Records

SUMMARY OF EVENT

According to witness testimony, at approximately 4:00 P.M. on March 18, 1997, off-duty Los Angeles Police Department (LAPD) officer Kevin Gaines pulled his green sport utility vehicle (SUV) next to a Buick at a stop light. Behind the wheel of the Buick was off-duty LAPD officer Frank Lyga, who was dressed casually in jeans and a Hawaiian shirt, his long black hair pulled back in a pony tail. Gaines looked at Lyga in a threatening way; Lyga asked if Gaines needed assistance. Lyga sped away when the light turned green. Gaines sped after him and pulled out his handgun.

Pulling up to a stop light, Gaines threatened Lyga once again. Witnesses reported seeing Gaines extend his arm toward the window of his vehicle, as if he was about to brandish a gun. Fearing for his life, Lyga fired two shots into the SUV and mortally wounded Gaines. A gunshot entered Gaines's armpit, but he managed to make a U-turn and pull into a convenience store parking lot. Lyga followed moments later.

Two California Highway Patrol (CHP) officers had been on a coffee break behind the store when they heard the gunshots. They drove their patrol cars around the building and saw Lyga pointing his handgun at Gaines, who was slumped forward in the front seat of his SUV. The officers ordered Lyga to drop his weapon. He shouted back that he was a police officer and showed his badge. Lyga revealed that he was an undercover narcotics officer who was just returning home from duty when the road-rage incident began.

Gaines died at the scene. By the time detectives from the LAPD's robbery-homicide division arrived, Gaines's identity was established. The shooting of a black police officer by a white police officer became a media sensation and brought cries of racism from the residents of Los Angeles, a metropolis that was recovering from the Rodney King beating and uprising of 1992. The shooting also caused a deep divide between black and white officers of the Rampart division, where Gaines was stationed.

Detective Russell Poole was assigned to the case. In the days following the shooting, he learned that two dozen off-duty black police officers canvassed the neighborhood around the shooting to look for witnesses to counter Lyga's testimony. Lyga's version of events, however, was supported by the evidence. In addition, witness statements corroborated Lyga's account. The LAPD discovered that Gaines had been involved in similar road-rage incidents prior to his fatal encounter with Lyga. It was also revealed that he was associated with the record label Death Row Records and its owner, convicted felon Suge Knight. Knight was a controversial figure, claiming ties to a Los Angeles street gang, the Bloods, and hiring off-duty police officers, including Gaines, for his security detail. Also, at the time of his death, Gaines had been living with Knight's estranged wife.

By the spring of 1998, LAPD leadership began to question these associations with Death Row Records and Knight. To investigate, it established the Rampart Corruption Task Force in May. The task force confirmed that several Rampart officers, including Gaines, David Mack, and Rafael Perez, were on the payroll of Death Row Records. All three, among others, were soon implicated in a wide range of crimes. (In November, 1997, Mack had participated in one of the largest bank robberies in Los Angeles history. He was convicted and sentenced to fourteen years in prison.) With the creation of the task force, the scandal came to light.

Rampart officer Perez, who would turn out to be the major figure uncovering the widespread CRASH unit corruption, was arrested on August 25 for stealing six pounds of cocaine a few months earlier from the Rampart division property room. The cocaine had been booked into evidence following an arrest made by Lyga. In September, 1999, Perez, who admitted that he stole the cocaine in retaliation for Gaines's shooting, agreed to cooperate with investigators in exchange for leniency and provided extensive details into the misdeeds of the elite Community Resources Against Street Hoodlums unit, or CRASH.

The goal of the antigang CRASH unit was to arrest as many gang members as possible, to do so by any means necessary, and to gain convictions. Its corruption included unprovoked shootings by officers on unarmed civilians, planting evidence, false arrests, beatings, and false testimony. Perez claimed that 90 percent of CRASH officers framed innocent people and perjured themselves on the witness stand to gain convictions. He also claimed that his superiors, including at least one police lieutenant at Rampart, actively supported and even encouraged the misconduct.

The investigation by the task force revealed widespread corruption within the rank and file of the Rampart division. More than seventy officers from CRASH were implicated in the scandal, making Rampart one of the most widespread cases of police misconduct in American history.

IMPACT

The Rampart scandal forced the city of Los Angeles to answer to more than 140 lawsuits against the LAPD and the city itself. One case involved an unarmed gang member named Javier Ovando who had been shot by Rampart division officers Nino Durden and Perez and then framed for a crime he did not commit. Ovando, who had been paralyzed by the shooting, was awarded the largest Rampart-related judgment against the LAPD: more than fifteen million dollars. Also, more than one hundred cases in which persons were convicted with evidence obtained illegally by implicated Rampart officers or because of the testimony of these same officers were overturned by the courts.

Bernard Parks, who was in charge of the department's Internal Affairs division during the years of Former LAPD officer Rafael Perez in court in 2001. Perez, a key informant in the Rampart corruption scandal, was released from prison after serving nearly three years of a five-year sentence for stealing cocaine from the Rampart division's evidence room in 1998. (AP/Wide World Photos) misconduct and corruption at Rampart, was alleged to have obstructed justice in the investigation. Many claimed that Parks, who would become chief of police in August, 1997, had protected Gaines and other officers by suppressing reports and instructing investigators not to pursue their inquiries. In September, 1999, Parks formed a board of inquiry to look into the corruption. The board focused not only on corrupt officers but also the failures of management in handling the crisis. In March, 2000, Parks disbanded the CRASH unit, just days after the board released its final report.

On September, 19, 2000, the Los Angeles City Council voted 10-2 to accept a federal consent decree allowing the U.S. Department of Justice to oversee and monitor recommended reforms within the LAPD for a five-year period. On September 26, Detective Poole filed a federal civil rights lawsuit against the city of Los Angeles and Parks. Poole claimed in his suit that Parks shut down his efforts to fully investigate the corruption within the department and suppressed critical information. Parks was not rehired by Los Angeles mayor James Hahn. As a result, Hahn lost support with the African American community in Los Angeles.

In 2005, a wrongful death lawsuit was filed against several former LAPD officers for the March 9, 1997, murder of rap-music star Christopher Wallace, also known as Notorious B.I.G. Among the many acts of criminal misconduct uncovered by Detective Poole was a link between Wallace's murder and corrupt Rampart officers, most notably Perez and Mack. Poole learned that Perez and Mack arranged for the hit on Wallace at Knight's order. Furthermore, Poole found links between Death Row Records, CRASH-unit officers on Death Row Records' payroll, and the killing of another rap star—Tupac Shakur—six months prior to Wallace's murder.

—Jesus F. Gonzalez

FURTHER READING

Boyer, Peter J. "Bad Cops." The New Yorker, May 21, 2001. A thorough report on the Rampart scandal and its aftermath. This article was used as the basis for a special Public Broadcasting Service Frontline news feature at pbs.org/frontline.

Juarez, Juan Antonio. Brotherhood of Corruption: A Cop Breaks the Silence on Police Abuse, Brutality and Racial Profiling. Chicago: Chicago Review Press, 2004. Written by a former Chicago police officer, this work provides an insider's view into the behind-the-scenes actions of some police officers and how a "wall of silence" can perpetuate problems and hide police corruption and misconduct.

Katz, Charles M. The Police in America: An Introduction. 5th ed. New York: McGraw-Hill, 2005. General textbook on police work that covers the history of American police forces, their organization and functions, and issues such as corruption.

Scott, Cathy. The Murder of Biggie Smalls. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2000. Examines the Christopher Wallace killing and covers the corruption at LAPD's Rampart station.

Sullivan, Randall. Labyrinth: A Detective Investigates the Murders of Tupac Shakur and Notorious B.I.G., the Implication of Death Row Records' Suge Knight, and the Origins of the Los Angeles Police Scandal. New York: Atlantic Monthly Press, 2002. A fascinating account of the Rampart scandal, tying the murders of Tupac Shakur and Christopher Wallace with Suge Knight and the Rampart CRASH division of the LAPD.

_____. "The Unsolved Mystery of the Notorious B.I.G." Rolling Stone, December 4, 2005. A follow-up to his 2002 book Labyrinth, Sullivan examines the aftermath of an FBI investigation into the Rampart scandal and cover-up.

SEE ALSO: Mar. 17, 1937: Atherton Report Exposes San Francisco Police Corruption; May 3, 1950: U.S. Senate Committee Begins Investigating Organized Crime; Jan. 12 and May 11, 1987: Media Reports Spark Investigation of Australian Police Corruption; Feb. 18, 2001: CIA Agent Robert Hanssen Is Arrested for Spying for the Russians.

May 11, 1998

JOURNALIST STEPHEN GLASS IS EXPOSED AS A FRAUD

Stephen Glass, an up-and-coming reporter and associate editor with The New Republic magazine, was fired after Adam Penenberg, a Forbes.com reporter, found inconsistencies and factual errors in Glass's 1998 article "Hack Heaven." The story, about a large company that hired a teenage computer hacker as an information security consultant after being extorted by the hacker, turned out to be fabricated. After investigating the accusations, The New Republic editors found that Glass had partly or wholly fabricated many of his other published stories as well.

LOCALE: Washington, D.C.

CATEGORIES: Hoaxes, frauds, and charlatanism; publishing and journalism; communications and media; corruption

KEY FIGURES

Stephen Glass (b. 1972), reporter and associate editor of The New Republic

Charles Lane (fl. 1990's), executive editor of The New Republic

Adam Penenberg (b. 1962), reporter for Forbes.com

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Stephen Glass was born and raised in the Chicago suburb of Highland Park. He began his journalism career as the editor of his college newspaper, The Daily Pennsylvanian, at the University of Pennsylvania. After his graduation in 1995, he was hired as an editorial assistant at The New Republic, a well-known and respected national magazine of social and political commentary. He quickly rose through the ranks, eventually achieving the position of associate editor.

Glass was writing his own articles for the prestigious publication by the age of twenty-three. He became known for his eagerness to please and his industrious research habits. His stories, which were characterized by their intriguing characters and colorful anecdotes and quotations, began attracting widespread attention. While he wrote mainly for The New Republic, his work also appeared in other magazines, including Rolling Stone, George, and Harper's.

Glass's career quickly came to an end in 1998. His article "Hack Heaven," which was published in the May 18 edition of The New Republic, centered on a fifteen-year-old computer hacker named Ian Restil who had hacked into the computer system of a California software firm called Jukt Micronics. Glass wrote that Restil, who "looks like an even more adolescent version of Bill Gates," then extorted the company executives at a meeting at a Hyatt Hotel in Bethesda, Maryland. The company then hired the hacker as a computer security consultant. The article also detailed a convention of computer whizzes from the National Assembly of Hackers being held near the hotel where Restil and Jukt representatives met. Glass's article gained reader interest as another intriguing tale of a larger-than-life character.

Intrigued by Glass's story, which includes the names of official-sounding organizations such as the "Center for Interstate Online Investigations" and the "Computer Security Center" and mentions federal legislation called the "Uniform Computer Security Act," a reporter for Forbes Digital Tool (now Forbes.com) began researching "Hacker Heaven" for a follow-up article. The reporter, Adam Penenberg, could not verify any fact from Glass's article, leading him to question its truthfulness and prompting him to notify his editors about the matter. Forbes magazine editors then contacted Charles Lane, executive editor of The New Republic, and told him about Penenberg's findings. Penenberg's brief exposé, "Lies, Damn Lies and Fiction" (Forbes.com, May 11, 1998), an account of his findings, accused Glass of perpetrating a hoax, and the scandal was born.

Glass had faced earlier accusations of misrepresentation or fabrication, claims not uncommon in journalism, by various organizations, including the College Republican National Committee, the American Conservative Union, the Drug Abuse Resistance Education (D.A.R.E.) program, the Center for Science in the Public Interest, and Hofstra University. With each accusation The New Republic supported its reporter. The questions from Forbes, however, elicited a different response from Glass's editors.

Lane began investigating the accusations, and he ultimately revealed that Glass had fabricated the entire article and fabricated evidence, such as voice mail, e-mails from Restil, a Web site for Jukt Micronics, and a newsletter for the fictitious National Assembly of Hackers, in an attempt to thwart the investigation. Glass even had his brother pose as Jukt executive George Sims in a phone call. The New Republic then expanded its investigation to include all of the forty-one articles Glass had written for them since December, 1995, articles published under three different editors—Andrew Sullivan, Michael Kelly, and Lane.

The fabrications ranged from inserted quotations in legitimate stories to entire articles. Most articles proved to be a blend of fact and fiction. Some of the more colorful fabrications included a political memorabilia convention in which Monica Lewinsky items were available and a church dedicated to the worship of George H. W. Bush. Glass was able to escape the magazine's fact-checking process through the creation of elaborate notes, voice mails, e-mails, faxes, business cards, and other evidence. Glass's dishonesty also led many to question the truthfulness of his other work.

Glass was fired, bringing an end to a promising journalism career. He later published an article, "Canada's Pot Revolution," in the September, 2003, edition of Rolling Stone. D.A.R.E. sued Glass for libel for one of his articles on the organization, a case in which Glass settled. At the time the scandal broke, he was enrolled as a law student at Georgetown University, where he continued his studies. He earned his law degree, passed the New York State bar exam, but was not admitted to the bar. He became a national figure, arousing public curiosity about his motives and how he had been able to get away with the lies for so long.

GLASS'S FABRICATION

Writer Stephen Glass presented as fact the story of a fifteen-year-old computer whiz named Ian Restil, but the story was a fabrication. The New Republic magazine had published the article, "Hacker Heaven," in its May 18, 1998, issue, not knowing the story was a fake. The article's first paragraph includes the following:

Over and over again, the boy, who is wearing a frayed Cal Ripken Jr. T-shirt, is shouting his demands. Across the table, executives from a California software firm called Jukt Micronics are listening.

In 2003, Steve Kroft interviewed Glass for the CBS News program 60 Minutes, and Glass was the subject of a major motion picture, Shattered Glass (2003), starring Hayden Christensen as Glass and Peter Sarsgaard as Lane. Glass also wrote a fictional account of his story, The Fabulist (2003), featuring a protagonist sharing his name.

IMPACT

In the immediate aftermath of the Glass scandal, many publications began to reevaluate their fact-checking policies and procedures. Until this time, fact checking worked well to catch honest mistakes but had not been equipped to deal with deliberate fabrications on such a large scale. The closer scrutiny led to the uncovering of similar scandals, most notoriously the 2003 case of New York Times reporter Jayson Blair, who was found to have plagiarized quotations and fabricated material in more than thirty-five articles he wrote for the paper. Journalists feared that these scandals could further distance editors and reporters, who already shared some professional animosity, and the profession feared that the scandal could further erode relations with a public already distrustful of journalists.

—Marcella Bush Trevino

FURTHER READING

Cowan, Coleman, and Melissa Castro. "After the Falls (Currents): Unethical Practices of Some Journalists, and Their Repercussions." Columbia Journalism Review 46, no. 1 (May-June, 2007). Examines the details of Glass's fabricated article and the consequences of his actions. Also discusses other well-known episodes of unethical reporting in journalism.

Dowd, Ann Reilly. "The Great Pretender: How a Writer Fooled His Readers (Writer Stephen Glass)." Columbia Journalism Review 37, no. 2 (July-August, 1998). Discusses the key question of how Glass was able to pass off as true not only fictional quotations but also entire events.

Glass, Stephen. The Fabulist: A Novel. New York: Simon & Schuster, 2003. Although this version of Glass's story about his hoax is fictional, it provides a valuable perspective into the writer's point of view.

Iggers, Jeremy. Good News, Bad News: Journalism Ethics and the Public Interest. Boulder, Colo.: Westview Press, 1998. A study of journalistic ethics and the media's responsibility to get the story right in the interest of its audience and readership. Mnookin, Seth. "Total Fiction." Newsweek, May 19, 2003. Provides Glass's account of the scandal five years later. Includes discussion of how he came to write a fictional tale—The Fabulist—of his experience with the scandal.

Belgians Are Sentenced in Corruption Scandal

SEE ALSO: Apr. 15, 1981: Janet Cooke Admits Fabricating Her Pulitzer Prize-Winning Feature; Apr., 1998: Scottish Historian Is Charged with Plagiarism; June 18, 2001: Historian Joseph J. Ellis Is Accused of Lying; Jan. 4, 2002: Historian Stephen E. Ambrose Is Accused of Plagiarism; Jan. 18, 2002: Historian Doris Kearns Goodwin Is Accused of Plagiarism; Apr. 29, 2003: New York Times Reporter Jayson Blair Is Exposed as a Fraud; July 24, 2007: University of Colorado Fires Professor for Plagiarism and Research Falsification.

December 23, 1998

PROMINENT BELGIANS ARE SENTENCED IN AGUSTA-DASSAULT CORRUPTION SCANDAL

An inquiry into the 1991 assassination of Belgian Socialist Party politician André Cools showed that Cools had knowledge of suspicious dealings in the purchases of helicopters and fighter planes for the Belgian military. The Agusta and Dassault manufacturing companies had bribed a number of politicians and other ranking officials to get the contracts.

ALSO KNOWN AS: Agusta scandal

LOCALE: Liège, Belgium

CATEGORIES: Law and the courts; corruption; government; murder and suicide; organized crime and racketeering; business; politics

KEY FIGURES

André Cools (1927-1991), Belgian Socialist Party politician and former government minister, 1968-1985, 1988-1990

Willy Claes (b. 1938), Belgian foreign minister, 1992-1994, and secretary-general of NATO, 1994-1995

Serge Dassault (b. 1925), French businessman and politician

Raffaello Teti (fl. 1990's), Italian business executive

Véronique Ancia (fl. 1990's), Belgian magistrate

SUMMARY OF EVENT

On December 23, 1998, the Belgian court of cassation, Belgium's highest court, issued verdicts in the Agusta and Dassault case against several prominent Belgians. The verdicts were the result of the largest scandal in Belgium in modern times. The criminal activity originated in bribes paid by the Italian company Agusta and the French company Dassault to numerous Belgian politicians to obtain lucrative military manufacturing contracts. Over the course of the scandal, one government minister had been assassinated, another committed suicide, others were forced to resign, and Belgian political parties were disgraced.

Despite its formidable international reputation as the headquarters of the European Union (EU) and the North American Treaty Organization (NATO), Belgium has had a tempestuous domestic history. Belgium is a single country made up of two distinct nationalities. The Dutch-speaking Flemish live largely in the north and the French-speaking Walloons live largely in the south. Rivalries between these two populations have often made for unstable, contentious domestic politics. Political parties, such as the Socialist Party, are divided along Dutch- and French-speaking lines. Over the course of the 1970's and 1980's, Belgian life had been marked by political corruption and organized crime.

On July 18, 1991, the prominent Walloon politician André Cools was assassinated in the industrial city of Liège, which had been tarred by a climate of crime and corruption. The killing of its leading politician, however, could not be overlooked. The sixty-four-year-old Cools had served as a minister in several governments, as head of the Walloon Socialist Party, and as one of the more powerful and controversial Liège politicians. Cools was shot in a parking lot near the apartment of his alleged mistress. Pursuant to article 56 of the Belgian constitution, the federal Parliament exercised its right of inquiry and launched an investigation into the murder. The inquiry was headed by Magistrate Véronique Ancia. In her investigation, Ancia uncovered widespread corruption of Belgian officials.

Of particular significance during the 1980's was the competition among the manufacturing firms Agusta (based in Milan, Italy), Aerospatiale (based in France), and MBK (of Germany). The three companies were vying for lucrative military helicopter contracts with the Belgian government. Likewise, the Dassault Electronique Aviation company of France was competing with an American company, Litton Industries, for contracts involving Belgian air-force fighter planes. The Belgian army had recommended purchase of Aerospatiale's helicopter, but on December 8, 1988, Defense Minister Guy Coëme announced that the government would purchase forty-six military helicopters (eighteen for reconnaissance and twenty-eight antitank) from Agusta for 11.97 billion Belgian francs. Similarly, Dassault was awarded a 6.5-billion-franc contract to re-equip Belgian air force F-16 fighter planes with new electronic warfare systems. Cools was killed a few years after these contracts were awarded.

The first big break in the investigation into Cools's killing came with the February, 1993, arrest of Agusta trade representative Georges Cywie. With the statements of Cywie and other witnesses, Magistrate Ancia was able to put together a ten-thousand-page report detailing extensive bribes and kickbacks the Agusta and the Dassault companies had paid to several Socialist parties of Belgium and to Belgian politicians. It was alleged that Cools had been assassinated in connection with these kickbacks.

In July, 1994, three Belgian politicians under investigation in the scandal—Coëme, Guy Mathot, and Guy Spitaels—were compelled to resign from their government posts. The minister of foreign affairs and another government official resigned soon after. On March 5, 1995, a Belgian air force general who was being questioned about the Agusta and Dassault bribes committed suicide. On April 7, the Belgian parliament voted to suspend diplomatic immunity from criminal investigation and prosecution of the highest level suspect, Willy Claes, who had been minister of economic affairs during the 1980's and became general-secretary of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) in 1994. Agusta's former chief executive, Raffaello Teti, who had met with Claes several times to discuss the military contracts, was arrested on October 18 on charges of fraud and corruption. Claes resigned as NATO general-secretary two days later.

The trial of the twelve suspects began in August, 1998, in the court of cassation in Brussels with a fifteen-judge panel. Chief prosecutor Eliane Lienkedael presented evidence that Claes had received payments of $60,000 in 1988 and $125,000 in 1992 directly to his personal bank accounts, although Claes alleged the payments had been received from his wife's savings. On December 23, 1998, the court handed down its verdict, convicting all twelve defendants. The court affirmed that Agusta and Dassault had paid a total of 110 million Belgian francs ($3.188 million U.S.) to the Socialist parties to acquire military contracts.

Claes was given a three-year suspended sentence for passive corruption and fined 60,000 Belgian francs and barred from politics for five years. Coëme and Spitaels both received two-year suspended sentences for passive corruption, were fined 60,000 francs, and also were barred from politics for five years. Serge Dassault, head of Dassault, was convicted of active criminal corruption and sentenced to two years (suspended) and fined 60,000 francs. The eight other defendants, who had been aides to the above-named politicians and Socialist Party officials, also were convicted of passive corruption and received similar sentences. The Socialist parties were fined millions of francs. In 2005, the European Convention on Human Rights affirmed the verdicts against the defendants.

In June, 1998, two Tunisian gangsters were convicted by a Tunisian court for the murder of Cools and sentenced to twenty years in prison. Investigators found that the hit men had been hired by a Liège mafioso for $12,000 to assassinate Cools. In January, 2004, a Liège court sentenced two persons linked to Socialist minister Alain van der Biest to twenty years' imprisonment for complicity in the murder of Cools. Van der Biest had committed suicide while under investigation. Other defendants who were found to have assisted in the assassination plan received prison sentences ranging from five to twenty years.

IMPACT

The 1980's was a troubled decade for Belgian politics. The nation was plagued by corruption and organized crime, while internal rivalries between Walloon and Flemish parties prevented the efficient administration of justice. Charges against Belgian politicians quickly deteriorated into squabbles over bias based on nationality and over allegations that set one group against another. The Nivelles gang atrocities of the early 1980's, in which twenty-eight people were killed in a string of armed robberies by a well-organized gang with political associations, represented an escalating viciousness in Belgian public life.

Belgians Are Sentenced in Corruption Scandal

The Agusta-Dassault scandal epitomized both the corruption of Belgian politics and a determination to restore order to the country. The cold-blooded assassination of Cools was too much for the country to ignore. In her closing summary of the prosecution case at trial, chief prosecutor Lienkedael condemned the pervasive corruption. Because private contributions to Belgian political parties had been legal until 1989, the case against the twelve defendants had not been an easy one. Only with evidence of money wired to Swiss bank accounts and payments for villas on the Riviera was the prosecution able to show that the payments were bribes, not gifts, and secure convictions for passive corruption. The resolve of the prosecution was echoed by Belgian voters who punished the Socialist Party at the polls and threatened its position in the ruling coalition.

—Howard Bromberg

FURTHER READING

- Braembussche, Antoon van den. "The Silence of Belgium: Taboo and Trauma in Belgian Memory." In Belgian Memories, edited by Catherine Labio. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 2002. In this work, van den Braembussche argues that Belgians suppress memories of their nation's history of corruption, including the Agusta-Dassault scandal.
- Cook, Bernard A. Belgium: A History. New York: Peter Lang, 2002. A short survey of Belgian history, emphasizing its tensions as a country with two major nationalities, Dutch and French.
- Judt, Tony. Postwar: A History of Europe. New York: Penguin, 2005. In surveying corruption in modern Europe, Judt blames the Agusta-Dassault scandal on divisions in Belgian society, leading to a weakening of constitutional authority and the justice system.
- Schmidt, Oliver. The Intelligence Files: Today's Secrets, Tomorrow's Scandals. Atlanta: Clarity Press, 2005. A publication of the French organization ADI (Association for the Right to Information), with a chapter on the Augusta-Dassault scandal by Michael Quilligan.

SEE ALSO: Feb. 4, 1976: Lockheed Is Implicated in Bribing Foreign Officials; Oct. 10, 1979: French President Giscard d'Estaing Is Accused of Taking a Bribe; Feb. 2, 1980: Media Uncover FBI Sting Implicating Dozens of Lawmakers; 1985-1986: Westland Affair Shakes Prime Minister Thatcher's Government; Jan. 12 and May 11, 1987: Media Reports Spark Investigation of Australian Police Corruption; Feb. 28, 1995: Former Mexican President Carlos Salinas's Brother Is Arrested for Murder; Aug. 16, 1996: Belgian Media Reveal How Police Bungled Serial Murder Case; Nov. 3, 1996: Car Crash Reveals Depth of Government Corruption in Turkey; Jan., 1997: Pyramid Investment Schemes Cause Albanian Government to Fall; 2001: Clearstream Financial Clearinghouse Is Accused of Fraud and Money Laundering.

March 4, 1999

QUEBEC OFFERS SUPPORT FOR ABUSED DUPLESSIS ORPHANS

Beginning during the mid-1930's, thousands of children in the care of Roman Catholic orphanages were labeled mentally deficient and sent to psychiatric hospitals, where they suffered years of abuse and neglect. Adult survivors organized as the Duplessis Orphans' Committee and demanded an official investigation, apology, and compensation. In 1999, the Quebec government and Church officials separately created funds to support the orphans' efforts at rehabilitation, but both institutions refused to compensate the orphans individually for their suffering.

LOCALE: Quebec, Canada

CATEGORIES: Government; families and children; psychology and psychiatry; human rights; corruption; religion

KEY FIGURES

Lucien Bouchard (b. 1938), premier of Quebec, 1996-2001

Maurice Duplessis (1890-1959), premier of Quebec, 1936-1939 and 1944-1959

Jean-Claude Turcotte (b. 1936), Roman Catholic cardinal, archbishop of Montreal

Pierre Morissette (b. 1944), Roman Catholic bishop and president of the Assembly of Quebec Catholic Bishops

SUMMARY OF EVENT

In 1999, the premier of the Canadian province of Quebec, Lucien Bouchard, announced that his administration would establish a fund to provide social services to the surviving children of Duplessis, also known as the Duplessis orphans. Thousands of children in Quebec, in the state's care because they had been born out of wedlock or into poverty, were wrongly diagnosed and institutionalized in Catholic hospitals, raised in Church-run orphanages, and educated in Church schools.

The children were victims of a scheme devised under the administration of Premier Maurice Duplessis beginning during the mid-1930's to label the children as mentally disabled so that they could be moved into psychiatric hospitals. Duplessis's administration saved millions of dollars by shifting the cost of the children's care to the Church, and the Church, in turn, received twice as much federal funding for institutionalizing children who were classified as mental patients rather than as orphans. The children were released from care by 1964.

Religious orders received subsidies from the Canadian government for the care and education of children in need. Given that the subsidy for mental patients was more than double that for healthy children, the Duplessis government persuaded Catholic organizations to declare children mentally deficient or psychotic and move them to psychiatric institutions. Some orphanages and schools were converted suddenly to psychiatric hospitals, and the children were classed as mental patients literally overnight. The Church received more federal funds for running hospitals than for orphanages and schools, while Quebec province saved millions of dollars that would have gone toward childcare and education.

Investigations beginning during the early 1960's revealed that thousands of children had been diagnosed improperly and that the orphans were unprepared for life outside institutional settings. The orphans reported they were used as slave labor in hospitals and on local farms. Nuns and other hospital employees routinely placed them in straitjackets and subjected them to beatings and sexual abuse. They were not educated and many remained illiterate, and some had become unstable after years of living among true mental patients. They had no families or support systems outside the institutions, lacked basic skills for living in society, and received no job training. They did not have their original birth certificates and struggled to establish legal identities, and their medical records indicated they were mentally deficient or ill.

During the late 1990's, approximately three thousand survivors organized the group Duplessis Orphans' Committee, calling for an official investigation and compensation from the government of Quebec and the Church. The orphans also were seeking formal apologies. In March, 1997, Premier Bouchard said his government would examine the orphans' claims and respond within a month to their demands. A year passed without further word from Bouchard. His representatives later said Quebec might apologize, but there would be no compensation and the government could do nothing to correct the orphans' medical records.

On March 4, 1999, the Quebec government announced the establishment of a three-million-dollar fund—about one thousand dollars per surviving orphan—to support survivors' efforts to correct their medical records, obtain their original birth certificates, and seek job training. Bouchard apologized for how they were treated but said Quebec would not conduct a public inquiry nor compensate individuals for their suffering. Also, the government did not intend to hold anyone legally responsible. Bouchard indicated Catholic nuns and others had taken on a thankless task in raising large numbers of unwanted children, and they should not be blamed if the results were not always ideal.

Maurice Duplessis in 1937. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

Unsurprisingly, the Duplessis Orphans rejected Bouchard's offer. They had not been informed in advance of his announcement, found his comments insulting, and took the limited plan for financial assistance as a further attempt to dismiss their claims. Speaking for Quebec's Liberal Party opposition, Madeline Boulanger suggested the Duplessis Orphans should instead be known as “the orphans of Lucien Bouchard.”

In September, 1999, Cardinal Jean-Claude Turcotte and Bishop Pierre Morissette, president of the Assembly of Quebec Catholic Bishops, publicly refused to apologize to the orphans or to compensate them. The Church, they said, would provide counseling and social support to the orphans. Turcotte indicated the Duplessis orphans should be thankful to have been housed during their childhoods, as they would have been homeless without the Church. Morissette added that the Church “has already given a lot” to the orphans “and continues to give generally.” In response to the official Church statement, the orphans called upon Catholics to stop tithing at church and instead give their money to Centraide, a charity serving the Montreal area.

In 2004, the Duplessis orphans came forward with new allegations that they had been given experimental drugs and shock treatments and were subjected to lobotomies. They called for the exhumation of orphans who had died in psychiatric institutions and were still buried in unmarked graves. Surviving orphans believed autopsies and forensic testing on these bodies would confirm many deaths resulted from medical experimentation.

IMPACT

Bouchard’s refusal to compensate individual orphans and his qualified apology made headlines in the United States, tarnishing Canada’s image in the national press. Bouchard’s response was considered inadequate and lacking in compassion, considering the Duplessis administration’s horrifying and deliberate mistreatment of thousands of children for its financial gain.

Following Bouchard’s resignation, Quebec premier Bernard Landry and his Parti Québécois established the National Program of Reconciliation with the Duplessis Orphans. On June 30, 2001, the Duplessis Orphans’ Committee, on behalf of the approximately fifteen hundred orphans who qualified for compensation, accepted the government’s newest apology and agreed to individual “fault-free” payments of ten thousand dollars plus one thousand dollars for each year spent in institutions. The totals averaged twenty-five thousand dollars per person. On December 21, 2006, under Premier Jean Charest, the government announced it would increase the orphans’ compensation to twenty-six million dollars, provided the orphans waive any legal action against the Catholic Church. The Church, in turn, refused once again to apologize to the orphans.

Also in 2006, an estimated seventeen hundred people received twenty-five thousand dollars each in compensation under the National Reconciliation Program for Duplessis Orphans Who Were Residents of Certain Institutions. These survivors, called forgotten orphans, had not been declared mentally disabled but had suffered abuses similar to that of the Duplessis Orphans in nonpsychiatric institutions. In return for compensation, they agreed to make no further claims against Quebec or the Church.

The indifference of the Church to the suffering of children further damaged its already tarnished public image. The Church’s once-pervasive influence over life in Quebec had been fading for years. The shocking alliance of the government with Church authorities and the medical profession to use children as a means of revenue forever linked Bouchard with the memory of Duplessis’s administration, nicknamed La Grande Noirceur, or Great Darkness.

—Maureen Puffer-Rothenberg

FURTHER READING

Black, Conrad. Render unto Caesar: The Life and Legacy of Maurice Duplessis. Toronto, Ont.: Key Porter Books, 1998. Considered the definitive biography of Duplessis. Balances his controversial political style with the long-term positive impact of his policies in Quebec.

DePalma, Anthony. “Orphans Who Weren’t Recall Care That Wasn’t.” The New York Times, March 5, 1999. Looks at the role of the Roman Catholic Church in the Duplessis orphans’ scandal in the context of the Church’s waning influence throughout Quebec.

Pearlstein, Steven. “Abandoned and Abused: Children Locked Up in Quebec Mental Wards Now Seek Redress for Suffering, Decades Lost.” The Washington Post, April 7, 2000. Two surviving Duplessis orphans recount the abuse they suffered while institutionalized. Physician Denis Lazure explains the hospital conditions that may have led to abuse. Includes photographs.

Perry, J. Christopher et al. "Seven Institutionalized Children and Their Adaptation in Late Adulthood: The Children of Duplessis (Les Enfants de Duplessis)." Psychiatry 69, no. 4 (Winter, 2006): 283-301. A study of several Duplessis orphans that examined their ability or inability to adapt to society as adults, primarily older adults. Presents seven life studies. For advanced readers.

SEE ALSO: Mar. 2, 1906: Psychoanalyst Ernest Jones Is Accused of Molesting Mentally Disabled Children; Mar. 21, 1928: Alberta Government Sterilizes Thousands Deemed Genetically and Mentally Unfit; Feb. 23, 1943: Irish Orphan School Fire Kills Thirty-five Girls; 1956-1962: Prescription Thalidomide Causes Widespread Birth Disorders; Nov. 26, 1997: Canadian Health Commissioner Releases Report on Tainted Blood; Dec., 2000: Sexual Abuse of Children in France Leads to the Outreau Affair; Jan. 30, 2001: Liverpool Children's Hospital Collects Body Parts Without Authorization; Jan. 6, 2002: Boston Globe Reports on Child Sexual Abuse by Roman Catholic Priests; Aug., 2002: Immunologist Resigns After Being Accused of Falsifying Research.

May, 1999

CIVIL RIGHTS LEADER JESSE JACKSON FATHERS A CHILD OUT OF WEDLOCK

Ashley Jackson was born to Jesse Jackson's staff assistant, Karin Stanford. Financial records show that Jesse Jackson had paid Stanford substantial amounts of money from his nonprofit Rainbow/PUSH Coalition prior to his admitting publicly in January, 2001, that he was Ashley's father. This news was particularly significant as Jesse Jackson had been a spiritual adviser to President Bill Clinton during the Monica Lewinsky scandal.

LOCALE: United States

CATEGORIES: Families and children; politics; sex; public morals; ethics

KEY FIGURES

Jesse Jackson (b. 1941), civil rights leader, Baptist minister, and Democratic candidate for U.S. president, 1984 and 1988

Karin Stanford (b. 1962), former director of the Rainbow/PUSH bureau in Washington, D.C., writer, and university professor

Ashley Jackson (b. 1999), Stanford and Jackson's daughter

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Jesse Jackson has been an important figure in the American Civil Rights movement and in American politics since the late 1960's. He was born in 1941 in segregated Greenville, South Carolina, to a seventeen-year-old single mother. His father was at the time married to another woman and had almost no involvement in his life. He was later adopted by his stepfather, Charles Henry Jackson, who adopted the young Jackson, and Jackson adopted his surname.

On January 18, 2001, Jackson, who at the time was fifty-nine years old, issued a statement in anticipation of a story by the tabloid the National Enquirer that he had fathered a child out of wedlock with Karin Stanford, who was twenty years younger. Their child, Ashley Jackson, was born in May, 1999.

Jackson had been a successful athlete and student at a segregated high school and received a football scholarship to the University of Illinois. He left Illinois after one year and transferred to North Carolina A&T. While completing his undergraduate degree, he married Jacqueline Lavinia Davis, and they had five children.

Jackson attended seminary from 1964 to 1966 but left before completing a degree to pursue civil rights activism. He led the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC) project in Chicago known as Operation Breadbasket in 1966-1967. He was with Martin Luther King, Jr., on April 4, 1968, in Memphis, Tennessee, when King was assassinated. He remained with SCLC until 1971, at which time he formed Operation PUSH (People United to Save Humanity). King ran for the Democratic nomination for president in 1984 and 1988. He also founded, in 1984, the National Rainbow Coalition, which merged with Operation PUSH in 1996. He has also been engaged in diplomatic efforts.

During Bill Clinton's presidency, Jackson served as a political adviser and as a special envoy to Africa for the promotion of democracy. In 1998, when it was revealed that President Clinton had an inappropriate sexual relationship with former White House intern Monica Lewinsky, Jackson became publicly identified as a moral and spiritual adviser to Clinton.

Mainstream news organizations had heard rumors about Jackson having had an illegitimate child but either did not pursue the story or did not pursue the story with the intensity of the National Enquirer. Patricia Shipp of the National Enquirer defended the story, in a television interview on CNN, stating that "it's a legitimate news story, not only because he's head of Rainbow" Coalition but also because of "the woman [sic] of his child [who] worked under him." Moreover, Shipp said that Jackson "was at one time the spiritual adviser to the president of the United States." The National Enquirer, which also claimed that the story was not given to them by political opponents of Jackson, published a photograph of Jackson with Stanford, appearing with President Clinton on December 3, 1998—which was approximately five months before the child was born.

In his public statement, Jackson said that "this is no time for evasions, denials or alibis." He continued,

I fully accept responsibility, and I am truly sorry for my actions. As her mother does, I love this child very much and have assumed responsibility for her emotional and financial support since she was born. I was born of these circumstances, and I know the importance of growing up in a nurturing, supportive and protected environment, so I am determined to give my daughter and her mother the privacy they both deserve.

Jackson also said that he would be "taking some time off to revive my spirit and reconnect with my family." At the time, a spokesperson for Jackson said that the reverend would keep immediate commitments but would scale back on his activities.

The New York Times reported on January 20, 2001, that Jackson had been paying Stanford three thousand dollars per month to support Ashley and that Stanford had been given about thirty-five thousand dollars to help with expenses in moving from Washington, D.C., to Los Angeles. The news story said the Rainbow/PUSH Coalition had called the funds a "severance package." The National Enquirer first reported that the money had been paid through accounts of the Rainbow/PUSH Coalition, and that this information had been confirmed by staff members of Rainbow/PUSH. A Washington Post report on February 1, 2001, told of a source that said Jackson's Citizenship Education Fund approved a "draw" of forty thousand dollars against future consulting fees and also indicated that the money would be used to help purchase real estate. On February 2, 2001, a copy of the source's statement (in letter form) appeared in the National Enquirer.

Jackson had first met Stanford when she was an assistant professor of political science and African American studies at the University of Georgia. Jackson offered Stanford the job as the director of the Washington bureau of the Rainbow/PUSH Coalition. Stanford, who had degrees from California State University, Chico, the University of Southern California, and Howard University, published a book on Jackson's foreign policy impact, Beyond the Boundaries: Reverend Jesse Jackson and International Affairs (1997), which won the National Conference of Black Political Scientists' Outstanding Book Award in 1998.

Stanford gave no interviews in January, 2001, but she did have a lengthy interview with Connie Chung, which was televised on ABC's 20/20 in August. In the interview, Stanford stated that her relationship with Jackson had become strained in the last year and that the frequency of his visits to see his child had decreased. In the first year of Ashley's life, Stanford said that Jackson saw Ashley frequently, but he only saw her once in the first seven months of 2001.

Stanford also confirmed that Jackson had been paying her several thousand dollars per month in child support and that she had taken Jackson to court to formalize the agreement. Stanford also stated in the interview that she did not immediately inform him that he was the father of her child, but after she did inform him, he decided not to run for U.S. president in 2000.

Stanford also stated that lawyers representing Jackson had asked her to sign a confidentiality agreement, but she did not sign the agreement. Stanford added that she did not regret having Ashley, even though her birth caused pain for others. The story faded from public attention after 2001.

IMPACT

Jackson's credibility as a political figure was undermined in the short term. Even if he had not fathered a child with Stanford, it is likely he would not have run for the presidency of the United States. He had limited visibility in 2001, but soon regained public prominence. Jackson spoke in London in 2003 to nearly one million people at an antiwar rally. He also continued to join protests and make public appearances at racially charged events.

Stanford worked with the Los Angeles bureau of Rainbow/PUSH, then as a consultant for a super-market chain with stores located mostly in city neighborhoods. She returned to college teaching and also wrote the book Breaking the Silence: Inspirational Stories of Black Cancer Survivors (2005).

—Michael Coulter

FURTHER READING

Bruns, Roger. Jesse Jackson: A Biography. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2005. A balanced and short biography of Jackson that also provides an excellent description of the Civil Rights movement. Written especially for high school students.

Fradly, Marshall. Jesse: The Life and Pilgrimage of Jesse Jackson. 1996. New ed. New York: Simon & Schuster, 2006. A balanced biography of Jackson that shows his penchant for egomania and discusses his moral leadership abilities.

Stanford, Karin. Breaking the Silence: Inspirational Stories of Black Cancer Survivors. Chicago: Hilton, 2005. Stanford explores the words of African Americans who have lived through cancer. Stanford is a breast cancer survivor.

Timmerman, Kenneth R. Shakedown: Exposing the Real Jesse Jackson. Washington, D.C.: Regnery, 2004. A critical biography of Jackson that seeks to show that he has not measured up to his own ideals.

SEE ALSO: June 4, 1943: Actor Charles Chaplin Is Sued for Paternity; Feb. 7, 1950: Swedish Film Star Ingrid Bergman Has a Child Out of Wedlock; July 2, 1963: Muslim Leader Elijah Muhammad Is Sued for Paternity; July 28, 1980: Magazine Reveals Baseball Star Steve Garvey's Marital Problems; July 20, 1982: Conservative Politician John G. Schmitz Is Found to Have Children Out of Wedlock; Oct. 14, 1983: British Cabinet Secretary Parkinson Resigns After His Secretary Becomes Pregnant; Jan. 25, 1984: Jesse Jackson Calls New York City "Hymietown"; May 6, 1992: Irish Bishop Eamonn Casey's Romantic Affair Leads to His Resignation; Jan. 5, 1994: British Cabinet Member Resigns After Fathering a Child Out of Wedlock; Aug. 21, 1994: Sex Scandal Forces Dismissal of NAACP Chief Benjamin Chavis; Dec. 17, 2003: Senator Strom Thurmond's Biracial Daughter Is Revealed.

May 7, 1999–March 2, 2001

ETHICS COUNSELOR EXONERATES CANADIAN PRIME MINISTER JEAN CHRÉTIEN

Despite three exonerations by the federal ethics counselor, Canadian prime minister Jean Chrétien continued to face allegations that he had improperly used his influence on behalf of a government-backed loan involving a potential conflict of interest. The issue of illicit gain was often overshadowed by credible evidence that he made misleading statements about his efforts on behalf of the loan.

ALSO KNOWN AS: Auberge Grand-Mère scandal; Shawinigate

LOCALE: Canada

CATEGORIES: Government; politics; ethics; corruption; banking and finance

KEY FIGURES

Jean Chrétien (b. 1934), prime minister of Canada, 1993–2003

Yvon Duhaime (fl. late twentieth century), member of the Liberal Party and Chrétien's close friend

Howard Wilson (fl. late twentieth century), Canadian government ethics counselor

Joe Clark (b. 1939), leader of the Conservative Party

François Beaudoin (fl. late twentieth century), president of the Business Development Bank of Canada

SUMMARY OF EVENT

In 1988, Jean Chrétien and two business associates purchased the Auberge Grand-Mère, a large hotel near Chrétien's hometown of Shawinigan, Quebec, Canada. The group also purchased the golf course adjacent to the hotel. In the elections of 1993, the Liberal Party, with Chrétien as its candidate for prime minister, issued a campaign platform that promised to "govern with integrity" and overcome "cynicism about public institutions."

After winning the election, Chrétien attempted to reorganize his private business affairs to avoid a possible conflict of interest. He and his associates sold their shares in the hotel to his longtime friend and fellow Liberal, Yvon Duhaime. Shortly thereafter, the associates entered into an agreement to sell the golf course to Jonas Prince, a Toronto businessman. Unknown to Chrétien, however, Prince backed out of the deal, claiming that he had only agreed to a nonbinding option to purchase the property.

In deciding what to do with his various investments, Chrétien sought the advice of Howard Wilson, the federal ethics counselor responsible for upholding the code of conduct among federal officials in Canada. In accordance with Wilson's recommendations, Chrétien put all of his investments into a blind trust. Because the golf course had not been sold, his share of the property, which had an estimated value of $275,000, was included as part of the trust. In 1996, Chrétien finally learned that he continued to be part owner of the golf club, and he informed Wilson about the matter.

About this time, Duhaime, the new owner of the Auberge Grand-Mère, wanted to expand and improve the building. He attempted to borrow $2 million, but private institutions refused the loan, saying that it was too risky. Duhaime then asked his friend Chrétien for assistance to obtain a loan from the Business Development Bank of Canada (BDC), a federal government enterprise. Chrétien agreed, and on April, 1996, he telephoned BDC president François Beaudoin on behalf of Duhaime. Even after a second appeal by the prime minister, however, the BDC rejected the loan application as too risky. In early 1997, Duhaime applied to the BDC for a smaller loan of $616,000, and he also applied for a grant of $164,000 from the Canadian Human Resources Department (HRD). This time, after additional encouragement from Chrétien, both the loan and the grant were approved.

In early 1999, an investigative journalist working for the National Post learned that Duhaime had obtained the BDC loan and the HRD grant. Many observers suspected that the federally supported aid was a conflict of interest. Because the expansion of the hotel increased the monetary value of the golf course shares, the loan indirectly, and to a minor extent, advanced the net worth of the prime minister. Leaders of rival political parties, including Reform leader Preston Manning and Progressive Conservative leader Joe Clark, called for a full investigation into the affair.

Ethics counselor Wilson conducted a relatively superficial inquiry. On May 7, he ruled that Chrétien had not violated any conflict-of-interest rules in regard to the Duhaime loan, although at this time Wilson did not know that Chrétien had personally intervened to help secure the loan. Chrétien's critics pointed out that Wilson reported to the prime minister alone. The next month, Reform leader Manning and another member of Parliament alleged that Chrétien had benefited from deals with businessman Claude Gauthier, who had purchased land next to the golf course. Chrétien threatened to sue the two men, but then dropped the threat, saying that he did not want to stifle debate. A few months later, Chrétien's shares in the golf course were finally sold to a prosperous Montreal investor.

Meanwhile, the financial situation of the Auberge Grand-Mère deteriorated significantly, and in April, 1999, BDC president Beaudoin recommended that the loan be recalled. Within a few weeks, Beaudoin's responsibilities were sharply reduced, and he resigned in September with an annual pension plus a severance payment of $245,000. In December, however, the BDC repealed both the severance agreement and pension. Beaudoin initiated a wrongful-discharge lawsuit, alleging that he had been forced to resign and had lost his severance package because he had dared to question the Grand-Mère loan. BDC officials claimed that Beaudoin had been incompetent and violated bank policies.

Beaudoin's suit revealed the details of Chrétien's personal appeals to the BDC. While Chrétien admitted that he had helped Duhaime secure the mortgage, he argued that it was appropriate for a member of Parliament to help promote the economie growth of his or her parliamentary riding. Wilson conducted a second inquiry into the matter, and on November 21, 2000, he ruled that Chrétien's telephone calls did not violate the federal ethics code.

Because federal elections were about to take place, however, the revelations were very embarrassing to both Chrétien and the Liberal Party. The leaders of the four major political parties insisted that there was a need for an independent inquiry, perhaps even a criminal investigation by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP). The leaders suggested that Wilson, who had been appointed by the prime minister, might have a conflict of interest himself. The leader of the Canadian Alliance went so far as to call Chrétien a criminal. The New Democratic Party leader called Chrétien "morally bankrupt." The leader of the Bloc Québécois Party remarked that the bank loan “still smells like something.” Conservative leader Clark declared that Chrétien should apologize to Canadian citizens for his abuse of power.

Jean Chrétien casting his ballot in a 1995 election. (AP/Wide World Photos)

In the parliamentary elections of November 27, despite the bad publicity about the Grand-Mère loan, the Liberal Party won the majority of seats, thereby making Chrétien the first prime minister in half a century to win three consecutive majorities. On February 19, 2001, the RCMP announced that there was no basis for a criminal investigation into the loan. Clark, nevertheless, vowed to continue asking questions about the loan, and the next day he accused Chrétien of making false statements in the House of Commons. As evidence, he produced a 1999 memo indicating that Chrétien’s former assistant had recommended the loan to the BDC, which appeared to contradict Chrétien’s earlier claim that his assistants had not played any role in the affair. The prime minister’s office explained that Chrétien had meant that his assistants had nothing to do with the approval of the loan. Accusing Clark of conducting a witch hunt, Chrétien declared, “He started as Joe Who and now he’s perhaps Joe McCarthy.”

On March 2, Wilson’s office cleared Chrétien for the third time. However, because Chrétien announced Wilson’s ruling in the House of Commons ninety minutes before Wilson released the report, the opposition asserted that the relationship between the prime minister and the ethics counselor was too cozy. Meanwhile, news reports about Beaudoin’s lawsuit kept the Shawinigate affair, as the scandal came to be called, in the news media. On March 23, Clark insisted on an independent investigation into the controversy and that Chrétien should step down as prime minister until the investigation’s conclusion. On March 26, Chrétien tried to limit criticism by agreeing to release all documents relating to the Grand-Mère affair, pending the consent of those persons involved in the loan.

IMPACT

In early 2002, Chrétien finally endorsed a bill that included an independent ethics commissioner who would report directly to the House of Commons rather than to the prime minister. Although the House quickly passed the bill, it was stalled in the Senate.

The Shawinigate scandal continued to have a negative impact on Chrétien’s popularity, and it contributed to the Liberal Party leaders’ decision to replace him with his rival, Paul Martin. In Chrétien’s farewell address of November, 2003, the integrity agenda was not on his list of achievements. On December 12, the same day that Martin was sworn in as prime minister, Martin announced that one of his priorities was to obtain passage of the ethics bill, and he achieved this goal within a few months. If such legislation had been in place at the beginning of the Chrétien era, it is entirely possible that Shawinigate as well as other scandals might have been avoided.

Even after Chrétien left office, stories relating to the Shawinigate scandal continued to appear in Canadian newspapers. On February 6, 2004, Beaudoin won his lawsuit against the BDC and the judge ordered the restoration of his annual pension and severance payment. In addition, the financial situation of the Auberge Grand-Mère continued to deteriorate, forcing taxpayers to absorb a significant loss. The complex was badly damaged by fire in February, and Duhaime was charged with the crime.

—Thomas Tandy Lewis

FURTHER READING

Chrétien, Jean. My Years as Prime Minister. Toronto, Ont.: Knopf Canada, 2007. Describes Shawinigate as a politically motivated witch hunt and puts much of the blame for the scandal on Conrad Black, owner of the National Post.

Glor, Eleanor, and Ian Greene. “The Government of Canada’s Approach to Ethics: The Evolution of Ethical Government.” Public Integrity 5 (2002): 41-67. A useful summary of the state of Canadian standards at the end of Chrétien’s term as prime minister.

Greene, Ian. “The Chrétien Ethics Legacy.” In The Chrétien Legacy, edited by Louis Harder and Steve Patten. Montreal: McGill-Queen’s University Press, 2006. Summarizing Shawinigate and ten other scandals during Chrétien’s premiership, Greene concludes that his record was “mediocre” but better than that of predecessor Brian Mulroney.

Martin, Lawrence. Iron Man: The Defiant Reign of Jean Chrétien. Toronto, Ont.: Penguin Canada, 2003. A critical biography of Chrétien written by one of Canada’s most outstanding journalists.

Tuns, Paul. Jean Chrétien: A Legacy of Scandal. London: Freedom Press, 2004. A rather extreme and one-sided attack on Chrétien’s ethical record as prime minister, written by a conservative journalist.

SEE ALSO: July 10, 1934: Sex Scandal Forces Resignation of Alberta Premier Brownlee; Mar. 4, 1966: Munsinger Sex and Spy Scandal Rocks Canada; Sept. 17, 1985: Media Allege Canadian Officials Allowed Sale of Rancid Tuna; Nov. 18, 1995: Former Canadian Premier Brian Mulroney Is Exposed in Airbus Scandal.

January 28, 2000

JOHN SPANO IS SENTENCED FOR FRAUDULENT PURCHASE OF ICE HOCKEY TEAM

Businessman John A. Spano began negotiations in 1996 to purchase the New York Islanders ice hockey team. He represented himself as the owner of a large company and as an inheritor of substantial wealth. When Spano failed to pay for the club he just bought, investigators found that his company was much smaller than claimed to be and that he had no inherited wealth. Spano was convicted of fraud and forgery.

LOCALE: Long Island, New York

CATEGORIES: Banking and finance; corruption; forgery; hoaxes, frauds, and charlatanism; law and the courts; sports

KEY FIGURES

John A. Spano, Jr. (b. 1964), owner of a Dallas equipment-leasing company

Gary Bettman (b. 1952), commissioner of the National Hockey League

John O. Pickett (fl. twenty-first century), owner of the New York Islanders

SUMMARY OF EVENT

The New York Islanders, one of the newest teams in the National Hockey League (NHL), served as a standout franchise in its first decade-plus. The team originated in 1972 and soon surpassed its fabled neighbors, the New York Rangers, by winning a Stanley Cup in 1979. Unfortunately, the team’s on-ice success did not bring enough money into the coffers of owner Roy Boe. Suffering from financial woes associated with the startup of his hockey team and the expenses of his National Basketball Association team, Boe sold the Islanders to John O. Pickett, one of the team’s limited partners, in 1979.

By 1983, the Islanders had won three more Stanley Cups and seemed on the verge of establishing a dynasty. The team remained competitive for the rest of the decade, but Pickett kept the money from the team’s cable television contract rather than reinvest it in the club. The lack of money reduced the competitiveness of the Islanders as departing stars were replaced by less expensive players. The Islanders had their first losing season in 1988-1989. After the season, Pickett retired to Florida and turned over operation of the team to four people who had purchased minor stakes in the club. Chaos in the front office resulted in losses on the ice and a poor showing at the box office. Pickett put the team up for sale amid talk that the club would leave Long Island, New York.

At this point, John A. Spano appeared on the scene. The owner of the Bison Group, a Dallas equipment-leasing company, Spano had tried to purchase the hockey teams the Dallas Stars in 1995

John Spano holds up a team jersey after purchasing the New York Islanders hockey club in 1997. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images) and the Florida Panthers in 1996. The deals collapsed partly due to financing difficulties. Nevertheless, NHL commissioner Gary Bettman called Spano, who bought the Islanders in February, 1997, a savior. Spano promised to keep the Islanders in Long Island and end Pickett's penny-pinching ways. Spano claimed to be worth $230 million. A person later described by stunned colleagues as very engaging and likable, Spano charmed the public. Islanders fans began to dream of a winning season, or even another Stanley Cup. Pickett sold the team and its cable television rights to Spano for $165 million.

Spano defaulted on his first payment for $16.8 million to Pickett on April 7, 1997, when a wire transfer of the money failed to deposit the funds into Pickett's account. Spano then stopped payment on one check for $16.8 million, bounced another for $17 million, wired $5,000 instead of $5 million, and then wired $1,700 instead of $17 million. Pickett's attorneys asked the NHL to take the team back from Spano on grounds of fraud. The media had a field day with the affair.

As his name was increasingly muddled, Spano vehemently denied that he lied, cheated, or stole anything. He continued to claim that he had the money to purchase the Islanders. Spano accused Pickett of undermining him in an attempt to get the team back and sell it at a higher price. Bettman forced Spano to return control of the team to Pickett on April 11, and the NHL voided Spano's purchase.

Bettman came under heavy attack for approving the sale of the Islanders to Spano. He claimed due diligence, arguing that six banks had checked on Spano's finances. The NHL hired the firm of Ernst & Young as well as Arnold Burns, a former deputy U.S. attorney general, to review bank procedures. Amid rumors of pending charges, Spano traveled to the Cayman Islands to meet with bank officials. He returned to the United States after three days. On July 23, he surrendered to U.S. authorities in Uniondale, Long Island, to face bank and wire fraud charges.

A U.S. Postal Service investigation revealed that Spano was accused of making fraudulent claims to obtain an $80 million loan from Fleet Bank, a loan he used to buy the Islanders. He misrepresented his net worth. He only had about $1.2 million in assets yet claimed in a statement of financial worth that he had $107 million in a trust, $52 million in a bank account, and $39 million in a certificate of deposit. A trustee hired by Spano could not verify the existence of the trust, nor could he verify the existence of any money. The trustee said that Spano failed to provide him with information about the trust that would allow him to perform his duties with due diligence.

Furthermore, Spano forged signatures and letters to imply that he had the money to buy the Islanders. The prosecutor described the documents that Spano mailed to Pickett, the NHL, and Fleet Bank as nothing more than faxed "cut-and-paste jobs," which also included the misspelled names of foreign bank officials. The postal investigators looked at the letter to Pickett from Comerica Bank in Dallas that attested to Spano's net worth. They discovered that a bank executive admitted that the sum was based upon unverified documents from Spano and that the banker had no personal knowledge of Spano's net worth. Spano forged another letter from Comerica Bank, certifying that the bank held enough funds in his account to cover the bounced $17 million check. The bank executive who purportedly signed the letter denied any knowledge of that letter. The postal investigators described the letter as an obvious forgery. It had a fax machine mark virtually identical to the one used by Spano's Bison Group. A fax sent to Pickett from the brokerage firm of Donaldson, Lufkin & Jenrette that claimed Spano had U.S. Treasury bill holdings of $27 million also had the Bison Group fax mark.

Spano also was accused of spending $220,000 of the Islanders's money in undocumented expenses after fraudulently assuming ownership. Additionally, his equipment-leasing firm in Dallas was virtually bankrupt. He bounced a July 10, 1997, check for more than $85,000 to pay property taxes on a $2.5 million home in the University Park section of Dallas. When his attorney claimed in court that all of Spano's taxes and mortgage payments were current, the prosecutor produced the bounced check. The bad check showed that Spano's promises were empty, leading the judge to set the bail amount high at $3 million.

On October 7, 1999, Spano pleaded guilty to federal charges of mail and wire fraud in Long Island and bank and wire fraud in Texas. He subsequently pleaded guilty to one count of bank fraud in Boston. All other charges and potential charges were dropped. His wife divorced him and sold their Dallas home. Spano moved into a condominium in Philadelphia and developed a drug addiction. When he tried to pay his rent with a bad credit card, bad checks, and bad wire transfers, his $3 million bail was revoked for continued criminal conduct. Spano was sentenced on January 28, 2000, to six years and $11.9 million in restitution. He left prison in 2004.

IMPACT

Pickett did not lose any money from the Spano affair. Indeed, in July, 1997, he regained control of the Islanders. He then sold the team and its cable television rights to Howard Milstein for $195 million. Milstein initially poured money into the franchise but, without victories, essentially gave up on the team by adopting an austere budget. In 2000, he sold the team to Charles Wang. The Fleet Bank executive who approved the $80 million loan to Spano resigned in August, 1997. Pickett repaid the loan after it was restructured.

Wang, the newest majority owner of the Islanders, reinvigorated the team with an infusion of money. The Islanders won more points in the 2001-2002 season than they had earned in any of the previous eighteen seasons. The victories sent ticket sales and fan interest skyrocketing, and the Islanders became one of the premier clubs in professional hockey in the United States.

—Caryn E. Neumann

FURTHER READING

Botte, Peter, and Alan Hahn. Fish Sticks: The Fall and Rise of the New York Islanders. Champaign, Ill.: Sports Publishing, 2005. A good general history of the New York Islanders hockey club. Includes some discussion of the Spano scandal.

Fried, Gil, Steven Shapiro, and Timothy D. Deschriver. Sport Finance. Champaign, Ill.: Human Kinetics, 2007. Explains the complex financing involved in modern professional sports. Useful as a primer for understanding Spano's dealings with the NHL.

Wolf, Alexander. "Busted: John Spano's Giddy Run as an NHL Owner Ended Quickly Amid Charges of Fraud and Deceit." Sports Illustrated, August 4, 1997. An account of Spano's fraudulent dealings with the NHL, his purchase and loss of the Islanders, and the scandal's fallout.

SEE ALSO: Mar. 29, 1962: Billie Sol Estes Is Arrested for Corporate Fraud; Jan. 15, 1988: ZZZZ Best Founder Is Indicted on Federal Fraud Charges; Mar. 29, 1989: Financier Michael Milken Is Indicted for Racketeering and Fraud; May 9, 2000: Former Louisiana Governor Edwin Edwards Is Convicted on Corruption Charges; Mar. 27, 2002: Georgia Basketball Coach Jim Harrick, Sr., Resigns over Fraud Allegations.

May 2, 2000

NEW YORK MAYOR RUDY GIULIANI'S EXTRAMARITAL AFFAIR IS REVEALED

Rudy Giuliani was married to Donna Hanover when he began an extramarital affair with Judith Nathan. The media's exposure of the affair set off a firestorm of coverage by New York City's tabloid press and television stations. After a public and very contentious divorce, Giuliani married Nathan.

LOCALE: New York, New York

CATEGORIES: Politics; public morals; sex; families and children

KEY FIGURES

Rudy Giuliani (b. 1944), mayor of New York, 1994-2001

Judith Nathan Giuliani (b. 1954), pharmaceutical sales manager and Giuliani's third wife

Donna Hanover Giuliani (b. 1950), actor and television news anchor-reporter, who was Giuliani's second wife

Cristyne Lategano (fl. twenty-first century), Giuliani's press secretary

SUMMARY OF EVENT

During four weeks in early 2000, New York mayor Rudy Giuliani experienced a stunning reversal of fortune. In mid-April, he was the Republican candidate for a vacant U.S. Senate seat; was promised financial help from people across the country who disliked his opponent, Hillary Rodham Clinton; and was supported by many New Yorkers. Less than one month later, he was fighting cancer, his marital difficulties were headline news, his reputation for morality was shattered, and he abandoned any hope of election to the Senate.

Giuliani's announcement on April 27 that he was suffering from prostate cancer brought forth an outpouring of get-well wishes. The public was unaware of, and newspapers chose not to comment on, his most recent sexual adventure until a New York

Daily News gossip columnist on May 2 noted that Giuliani and a friend (not identified) frequently dined together. The next day the New York Post published three pictures of the mayor and his friend that it had been holding back, identifying the woman as Judith Nathan. When questioned, Giuliani said Nathan was "a very good friend," stimulating the two tabloids, New York City television stations, and national scandal magazines to tell their readers how good a friend.

Giuliani had been so open about the relationship it seemed as though he wanted to be caught. Newspapers now reported how frequently the two had dined together in posh New York restaurants, noted how often Giuliani was accompanied by Nathan rather than his wife at public events, and described his practice of arriving, escorted by two carloads of New York City police officers, for summer weekends at Nathan's condominium in the Hamptons. Reporters had known about his behavior, but never mentioned it until the Daily News gossip columnist broke the silence.

Follow-up stories disclosed an extensive pattern of womanizing that did not fit Giuliani's carefully cultivated reputation as defender of public morality, including condemning profane or licentious museum exhibits. When living alone in Washington, D.C., and estranged from his first wife, Giuliani had been actively dating other women. Even before his 1982 divorce, Giuliani and television reporter Donna Hanover began living together.

Giuliani and Hanover married in 1984. The two had an openly warm and mutually supportive relationship, and Hanover played a major role in Giuliani's mayoral campaigns in 1989 and 1993. The closeness ended in 1995 when Giuliani began to spend most of his time with his press secretary, Cristyne Lategano. In its August, 1997, issue, Vanity Fair magazine asserted the two were intimate, but both denied the accusation. Hanover concentrated on her increasingly successful career as an actor, anchor on television news, and host of television cooking programs. She rarely accompanied Giuliani at public or social occasions and asked to be addressed by her professional name, Donna Hanover, rather than Mrs. Giuliani or Donna Giuliani.

On May 10, 2000, Giuliani called a morning press conference that was covered live by New York City television news stations. He announced his decision to separate from Hanover and hoped to reach a formal agreement with her. He praised Nathan, a registered nurse and sales representative for a drug company, for the support she had given him, which he expected would be even more valuable as he fought his own cancer.

Giuliani had not told his wife he intended to publicly call for a separation. Hanover learned of his plans when a friend phoned and told her to turn on her television. She was furious and arranged a press conference of her own for that afternoon. Standing in front of Gracie Mansion, the official mayoral residence, with tears in her eyes, she stated that she had tried to keep the marriage together but that Giuliani had not cooperated. Hanover asserted she had been unable to take part in his political life for years because of his relationship with one of his staff members—a reference to Lategano that newspapers gleefully explained to their readers. Now, she would reluctantly discuss a legal separation with her husband.

Defiantly, Giuliani issued a press release on May 12 that informed the media where he and Nathan planned to dine that evening. After dinner, Giuliani escorted her back to her apartment, ten blocks from the restaurant. They were followed by photojournalists and television camera operators.

New York State's Republican leaders grew increasing concerned and impatient as the media circus over Giuliani's sex life continued. They expected the contest between Giuliani, who cleaned up New York City, and the controversial former first lady of the United States, Hillary Rodham Clinton, to generate voter excitement that would help their candidates for state office. Republican leaders urged Giuliani to end his garish behavior and concentrate on preparing for the U.S. Senate election less than six months away.

Giuliani vacillated. Doctors assured him he would recover sufficiently in a month or two to return to active campaigning. However, he could not be sure how badly his chances of election had been damaged by his public reputation as an immoral adulterer. On May 19, less than four weeks after his shocking announcement that he had cancer, Giuliani withdrew his Senate candidacy, claiming he needed to concentrate on his health in the coming months.

Giuliani filed for divorce in October. Acrimonious public battles broke out between spokespersons for both parties. Hanover continued to live in Gracie Mansion and secured a court order barring her estranged husband from entering the house or meeting his children before the divorce became final. The case dragged on until June, 2002, six months after the end of Giuliani's term as mayor. The court awarded Hanover full custody of their two children and $6.8 million.

Donna Hanover Giuliani and Rudy Giuliani in 1994. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

Giuliani and Nathan were married in Gracie Mansion by Mayor Michael Bloomberg on May 24, 2003. This was the third marriage for both Giuliani and Nathan. Hanover, after her divorce from Giuliani, reunited with her high school sweetheart, whom she had not seen for twenty years. The two were married in 2003, her third marriage as well.

IMPACT

After the nasty public breakup of his marriage and the venomous rancor of the divorce proceedings, pundits predicted that Giuliani's political career was over because of the divorce scandal. However, everything changed on September 11, 2001. Giuliani's calm demeanor in response to the destruction of the World Trade Center and the murder of close to three thousand people turned him into a hero whose peccadilloes were forgiven. However, term limits set by the city charter prevented him from running for reelection. After leaving office, Giuliani opened a security consulting firm whose profits, along with hefty speaking fees, made him a multimillionaire.

In 2006, Giuliani began exploring the possibility of running for president of the United States. He formally announced his candidacy for the Republican nomination in February, 2007. September polls indicated he was the front runner, but by the time Florida voted on January 29, 2008, the competition had narrowed to an exciting two-person contest between John McCain and Mitt Romney. Giuliani withdrew from the race the next day.

—Milton Berman

FURTHER READING

Apostolidis, Paul, and Juliet A. Williams, eds. Public Affairs: Politics in the Age of Sex Scandals. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 2004. A study of politics and political culture in the context of sex scandals.

Barrett, Wayne, with Adam Fifield. RUDY! An Investigative Biography of Rudolph Giuliani. New York: Basic Books, 2000. A biography of Giuliani that attacks his character and treats him as a trickster and fraud.

Kirtzman, Andrew. Rudy Giuliani: Emperor of the City. New York: William Morrow, 2000. Praises what Giuliani accomplished for New York City but regrets the effect of his abrasiveness and egoism on his reputation.

Polner, Robert, ed. America's Mayor, America's President? The Strange Career of Rudy Giuliani. Brooklyn, N.Y.: Soft Skull Press, 2007. Nineteen essays by New York journalists and academics that negatively assess Giuliani's behavior and character, arguing that he is unfit to be president of the United States.

Siegal, Frederick, with Harry Siegal. The Prince of the City: Giuliani, New York, and the Genius of American Life. San Francisco, Calif.: Encounter Books, 2005. An admirer of Giuliani praises his achievements as mayor of New York and suggests he would make a good president.

Strober, Deborah Hart, and Gerald S. Strober. Giuliani, Flawed or Flawless? The Oral Biography. Hoboken, N.J.: John Wiley & Sons, 2007. Presents a generally favorable portrait of Giuliani, based on more than forty superficial interviews with the former mayor's friends and critics.

SEE ALSO: Jan. 26, 1979: Former Vice President Nelson Rockefeller Dies Mysteriously; July 20, 1982: Conservative Politician John G. Schmitz Is Found to Have Children Out of Wedlock; Apr. 9, 1987: Bess Myerson Resigns as New York Commissioner of Cultural Affairs; Jan. 17, 1998: President Bill Clinton Denies Sexual Affair with a White House Intern; Oct. 2, 2003: Newspaper Claims That Arnold Schwarzenegger Groped Women; Dec. 6, 2005: Spokane, Washington, Mayor Recalled in Gay-Sex Scandal; Mar. 12, 2008: New York Governor Eliot Spitzer Resigns in Prostitution Scandal.

May 9, 2000

FORMER LOUISIANA GOVERNOR EDWIN EDWARDS IS CONVICTED ON CORRUPTION CHARGES

The administration of Edwin Edwards, the three-term governor of Louisiana, was marred by allegations of corruption for decades. In 2001, Edwards was sentenced to ten years in federal prison for corrupt practices, including extortion and money laundering, related to the issuance of contracts and licenses for riverboat casino gambling.

LOCALE: Baton Rouge, Louisiana

CATEGORIES: Corruption; law and the courts; politics; government

KEY FIGURES

Edwin Edwards (b. 1927), former governor of Louisiana, 1972-1980, 1984-1988, 1992-1996

Edward J. DeBartolo, Jr. (b. 1946), owner of the San Francisco 49ers football team and bidder for a Louisiana riverboat casino development project

Frank Polozola (b. 1942), U.S. District Court judge

SUMMARY OF EVENT

On May 9, 2000, former Louisiana governor Edwin Edwards was found guilty of racketeering, extortion, conspiracy to commit extortion, wire and mail fraud, and money laundering, among other crimes. On January 8, 2001, U.S. District Court judge Frank Polozola sentenced him to 120 months in prison, fined him $250,000, and ordered him to forfeit $1.8 million.

Five others were charged as coconspirators: Edwards's son and law partner, Stephen; Andrew Martin, Edwards's executive assistant during his fourth term as governor; Cecil Brown, a longtime friend and courier of information and cash for Edwards; Bobby Johnson, a Baton Rouge, Louisiana, contractor with ties to Edwards; Louisiana state senator Greg Tarver; and Ecotry Fuller, a member of the casino license board for Louisiana. While Tarver and Fuller were found not guilty, the others received sentences of between five and seven years and fines between $50,000 and $60,000.

Edwards was first elected to the Crowley City Council, then as a state representative and a member of the U.S. Congress. He was a popular governor who first served from 1972 to 1980. He was constitutionally banned from seeking a third consecutive term, so he waited four years before handily winning an election to serve a third term beginning in 1984. In his third term as governor, the state had faced high unemployment and ran a significant operating deficit. The state fell further into debt and was seeking much-needed revenue.

From the early days of his political career, Edwards was accused of corruption and taking payoffs from those doing business with the state. He rarely took on the accusations directly, responding instead to his critics with sharp one-liners. For example, a gift of close to $20,000 in value from a South Korean lobbyist was simply dismissed by him as a gift to his wife.

Edwards proposed legalized-gambling options while in office, but those options did not develop until his successor, Charles "Buddy" Roemer, took office and worked with the state legislature for the approval of riverboat-casino gambling. In no time, Edwards was back as governor for a fourth term, surprising many. He, too, would play a major part in the development of gambling in the state. Louisiana would soon approve the licensing of fifteen riverboat casinos that would create jobs and generate revenue. As the contracts and licenses were being awarded, it became clear to many that those contracts were going to bidders who had some sort of business relationship with Edwards, whose final term as governor ended in early 1996.

Among those riverboat bidders was Edward DeBartolo, Jr., part owner of the San Francisco 49ers football team and son of the successful shopping-mall developer Edward DeBartolo, Sr. In 1996, DeBartolo Entertainment was in the process of bidding for the fifteenth, and final, riverboat casino license. Though Edwards was out of office at the end of 1996, he still had many powerful friends in government. The former governor used his connections to give DeBartolo confidential information from the meetings of the Louisiana Gaming Control Board.

In early March, 1997, the night before DeBartolo made his presentation for a riverboat casino and shopping-mall complex on the Red River in Bossier City, Edwards and DeBartolo met at the Baton Rouge Radisson Hotel bar. Edwards requested 1 percent of DeBartolo's casino profits and $400,000 for assisting in procuring the license. Edwards also implied that DeBartolo would have trouble getting the contract unless he complied with his request. DeBartolo agreed to Edwards's terms in that meeting.

Soon after that meeting at the Radisson, a Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) wiretap caught Edwards on the phone with Ralph Perlman, a member of the Gaming Control Board. Edwards asked Perlman if the vote regarding DeBartolo's contract would be encouraging. Perlman replied in the affirmative. In mid-March, Edwards again met with DeBartolo, this time to retrieve a briefcase containing $400,000 in $100 bills. The next day, the partnership of DeBartolo Entertainment and Hollywood Casino Corporation was awarded the final riverboat-casino license on a 6-0 vote. In the end, however, DeBartolo would never receive the license.

The FBI began wiretapping Edwards's phones and placing microphones in his law office to gather substantial evidence related to other possible pay-offs. While Edwards was somewhat cryptic and careful with comments he made over the phone, microphones revealed he was more carefree when discussing business dealings in his law office.

On October 6, 1998, DeBartolo pleaded guilty to the charge of failing to report that Edwards had extorted him for the casino license. DeBartolo cooperated with authorities and received two years probation and agreed to pay $1 million in penalties. However, DeBartolo lost considerably more than cash: He lost the casino license and controlling ownership of the San Francisco 49ers, which went to his sister.

Edwards, his son Stephen, and four associates were indicted on November 7 by a federal grand jury for a racketeering conspiracy to extort money from prospective businesses seeking to open riverboat casinos in Louisiana. The licenses were lucrative, and Edwards knew those interested would go to extremes to get one.

Robert Guidry, a former riverboat casino owner, testified at the former governor's trial that he paid $100,000 per month to Edwards, his son, Stephen, and an Edwards aide. During the trial, Edwards questioned the legality of the deal by claiming he was not in office as governor when he allegedly received those payments. The cornerstone of Edwards's defense in the case was that all payments were legal payments made for his lobbying and consultation expertise. However, Guidry testified that Edwards's work, while governor, in reassigning key members of the state police gaming division was essential to Guidry receiving his renewed gambling license. Without the gambling license, Guidry's riverboat contract was worthless. Guidry admitted to making payments to Edwards totaling $1.5 million by dropping amounts as much as $100,000 in cash in clandestine areas, including trash bins, in Baton Rouge from March, 1996, through April, 1997.

Multiple permits were needed to successfully operate a riverboat casino, adding to the temptation to subvert the law to get those lucrative permits. To set up a riverboat casino, a company would have to win one of the available permits to build and dock its boat. Additionally, a company would have to receive an operating license from the state police. In one instance, Edwards suggested to one company, Players Casino in Lake Charles, that they would need his help in getting approval from the state police. In turn, the company purchased $200,000 worth of goods from an Edwards-owned company.

Because the U.S. attorney had failed to convict Edwards on corruption charges during the mid-1980's, few people were absolutely confident of getting a conviction in this case, even though some of his coconspirators cooperated with prosecutors by testifying. All three had accepted plea bargain deals with federal authorities and were forthcoming with details when they took the witness stand at trial. Edwards and his son and associates were found guilty on May 9, 2000. Edwin Edwards unsuccessfully appealed his conviction, an appeal based largely on his claim that the testimony of key trial witnesses was questionable.

While still attempting to appeal his case, Edwards began serving his term at the Federal Medical Center in Fort Worth, Texas, on October 21, 2002. He later transferred to Oakdale Federal Prison in Oakdale, Louisiana. This low-security prison houses other high-profile inmates, including Enron's Andrew Fastow, Worldcom's Bernard Ebbers, and former Alabama governor Don Siegelman.

IMPACT

For a state with significant wealth in terms of natural resources, many critics lament the political corruption that has impeded the state's progress. Louisiana remains a poor state with an inadequate educational system and unstable revenue. Concern about corrupt politics has kept many businesses from establishing themselves in the state, businesses that would provide jobs, income to the state from sales taxes, and a hint of stability in a politically unstable state. Edwards's unethical and illegal dealings only made matters worse, and they did nothing more for the state than reinforce its reputation as a haven for corrupt politicians and government officials.

—John C. Kilburn, Jr.

FURTHER READING

Bridges, Tyler. Bad Bet on the Bayou: The Rise of Gambling in Louisiana and the Fall of Governor Edwin Edwards. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 2001. A comprehensive report on Edwin Edwards's role in the development of gaming and the corruption related to gaming in Louisiana.

Brotherton, John. A Fistful of Kings. Humble, Tex.: Shears Group, 2000. A story of casino gambling in Russia and Louisiana as told by a Players Casino vice president and witness for the prosecution in the Edwards case.

Parent, Wayne. Inside the Carnival: Unmasking Louisiana Politics. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 2004. A comprehensive review of Louisiana politics, with substantial focus on political corruption in the state.

SEE ALSO: Oct. 22, 1923: U.S. Senate Begins Hearings on Teapot Dome Oil Leases; May 12, 1924: Kentucky Congressman John W. Langley Is Convicted of Violating the Volstead Act; Dec. 11, 1997: HUD Secretary Henry Cisneros Is Indicted for Lying to Federal Agents; Jan. 28, 2000: John Spano Is Sentenced for Fraudulent Purchase of Ice Hockey Team; Oct. 2, 2003: Newspaper Claims That Arnold Schwarzenegger Groped Women; Sept. 12, 2005: Westar Energy Executives Are Found Guilty of Looting Their Company; June 4, 2007: Congressman William J. Jefferson Is Indicted for Corruption; Mar. 12, 2008: New York Governor Eliot Spitzer Resigns in Prostitution Scandal.

September, 2000

AMERICAN SCIENTISTS ARE ACCUSED OF STARTING A MEASLES EPIDEMIC IN THE AMAZON

Patrick Tierney claimed that two renowned researchers, anthropologist Napoleon A. Chagnon and geneticist James V. Neel, started or exacerbated a measles epidemic among the indigenous Yanomami people of the Amazon in 1968. Conflicting accounts of what actually happened call into question some of Tierney's accusations, which were made in his book Darkness in El Dorado (2000).

LOCALE: Southern Venezuela

CATEGORIES: Publishing and journalism; medicine and health care; science and technology

KEY FIGURES

Napoleon A. Chagnon (b. 1938), American anthropologist and professor emeritus, University of California, Santa Barbara
James V. Neel (1915-2000), American geneticist
Patrick Tierney (fl. early twenty-first century), visiting scholar at the Center for Latin American Studies, University of Pittsburgh

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Patrick Tierney claims in his book Darkness in El Dorado (2000) that American scientists Napoleon A. Chagnon and James V. Neel administered a measles vaccine to the Yanomami people of South America in 1968, leading to or exacerbating a measles outbreak among the population and causing thousands of deaths. Others believe, however, that the vaccine actually prevented the spread of measles. Confusion exists about whether such an outbreak of measles even occurred. Estimates of the dead range from zero to thousands. Questions also remain about whether measles had been present among the Yanomami prior to the vaccination efforts.

The Yanomami, a remote tribe of indigenous, or Indian, peoples, inhabit areas of Brazil and Venezuela. They make up the largest indigenous group in South America, with an estimated population of twenty-two to twenty-seven thousand. They live in about three hundred villages that are spread out over a vast 70,000 square miles. The Yanomami are primarily hunters and farmers who live in relatively isolated areas and practice their traditional lifestyle. They comprise four Indian subdivisions, each with its own language: the Sanema of the northern sector, the Ninam of the southeastern sector, the Yanomam of the southeastern part of the Yanomami area, and the Yanomamo of the southwestern part of Yanomami area.

Chagnon and Neel spent many years working among the Yanomami. They filmed rituals and everyday life, collected genealogies, and took blood samples from the mid-1960's until the late 1990's. The government of Venezuela had banned (or revoked) Chagnon's visa to travel to the lands of the Yanomami but Chagnon managed to travel into the country by listing himself as part of a group that was traveling under Neel.

The measles vaccine scandal was initiated when Tierney accused Chagnon and Neel of questionable ethical practices in administering to the Yanomami a dangerous measles vaccine that contained a live virus—the Edmonston B. Neel used the vaccine without the permission of Venezuelan medical authorities. Neel was interested in discovering how the previously unexposed Yanomami would react to the measles vaccine. Even though a better vaccine was available, the older version, Edmonston B, was used. Edmonston B was more onerous to administer, as it was necessary (as advised by the World Health Organization, the WHO, in 1965) to give a gamma globulin shot prior to the vaccine to help control side effects.

Tierney maintains that hundreds if not thousands of Yanomami died as a result of the use of the Edmonston B vaccine. A group of researchers from the University of Michigan and University of California, Santa Barbara, found that Edmonston B was safe and had been approved by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration and the WHO. Furthermore, this same research contends that the measles outbreak had already been in evidence for one year prior to the vaccine being administered. The former director of the U.S. Centers for Disease Control, William H. Foege, said that Edmonston B, while strong and sometimes causing severe reactions that mimicked a light case of measles, would not cause the large number of deaths claimed by Tierney.

Furthermore, Tierney claimed that Neel and Chagnon did not have proper consent to use the vaccine. However, researchers from Michigan and Santa Barbara argue that the Venezuelan medical officials had approved the use. Keith Wardlaw, a visiting Christian missionary present at the time in question, maintains that while Neel had nothing to do with the outbreak and was attempting to provide vaccines to the Yanomami to prevent the spread of measles, he nevertheless was refused permission to administer the vaccine by the Society for the Protection of Indians, a Venezuelan government agency. Furthermore, Wardlaw, who with his family had been with the Yanomami Indians during the measles outbreak, actually believed his young daughter had unknowingly introduced measles to the Yanomami.

In addition, evidence shows that the 1968 outbreak was not the first among the Yanomami. Thomas Headland, a noted anthropologist, asserted that at least four measles outbreaks occurred among the Yanomami prior to the time that Chagnon and Neel arrived in the area in 1968.

Another of Tierney's assertions was that Neel did nothing to assist the Yanomami during the measles epidemic. Susan Lindee, a historian at the University of Pennsylvania who had access to Neel's field notes, found that Neel provided antibiotics to the inhabitants of the Yanomami villages he visited. The researchers from Michigan and Santa Barbara also found that Neel provided medical assistance to the Yanomami and may have saved lives through his efforts. Wardlaw supports these claims.

The alleged misconduct reported by Tierney was first brought to light by two professors of anthropology in September, 2000. Terence Turner and Leslie Sponsel, after reading the manuscript of Tierney's soon-to-be-published Darkness in El Dorado, sent an e-mail message to the American Anthropological Association (AAA) to warn the organization about possible repercussions if the allegations in the book indeed were true. They also urged the AAA to conduct a formal investigation into the work. Their e-mail was leaked to the press within days. In a subsequent letter, Turner and Sponsel stated that they had not taken a position on whether the book's assertions about Neel or Chagnon were true or false. They claimed that the sole purpose of their original e-mail was to warn the AAA. Neither had done work on the Yanomami, nor had they ever written about Chagnon or Neel. Tierney, to his credit, had done field research with an indigenous population, the Kayapo of central Brazil, but not with the Yanomami. Furthermore, he has written about the ethics of working with indigenous populations.

In defense of Neel and Chagnon and countering the claims of Turner and Sponsel, the codeveloper of the Edmonston B vaccine, Samuel L. Katz, said that the same vaccine administered to the Yanomami was given to close to nineteen million children and infants around the world, including the United States, South America, Nigeria, and Burkina Faso, between 1963 and 1975 without major health problems. He insisted that the use of the Edmonston B vaccine could not have started or even exacerbated a measles epidemic.

IMPACT

Most of Tierney's allegations, and certainly the allegation that Chagnon and Neel were responsible for a massive measles epidemic that caused thousands of deaths among the Yanomami, were refuted by various groups that included the AAA, by witnesses who were present at the time in question, and by other researchers. On November 13, 2000, the provost's office at the University of Michigan, after spending hundreds of hours investigating the matter, issued a statement in support of Chagnon and Neel and against the claims made by Tierney in Darkness in El Dorado. Also, the office claimed that Turner and Sponsel had known about Tierney's work on the book years before sending their e-mail message to the AAA. In turn, Sponsel and Turner denied the claims made by the provost's office.

In February of 2001, the AAA convened a task force of professionals and academics who had direct knowledge of the activities in question. In its three-hundred-page report of May 18, 2002, the task force found that although Chagnon often was unethical in his research—including not obtaining proper consent from the government of Venezuela and the Yanomami for his studies—most of the allegations made against him and Neel by Tierney could not be corroborated. However, the report was rescinded by the AAA in June, 2005, for being unfair, flawed, and neglectful of Tierney's rights to due process.

The Yanomami people have changed in many ways as a result of contact with the modern world. One Yanomami tradition that has not changed, however, is the belief that bodily matter should not be kept after an individual dies. Now advocating for their rights, the Yanomami, through their representatives, have requested the return of the blood samples taken by Chagnon and Neel. (The donors had not been told that their blood would be kept indefinitely.) While researchers have promised to return the samples (or destroy them—an alternate request), the Yanomami still wait and wonder. In the meantime, the scandal led to further academic debate on the ethics of research with indigenous peoples.

—Judy L. Porter

FURTHER READING

Borofsky, Robert, with Bruce Albert et al. Yanomami: The Fierce Controversy and What We Might Learn from It. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2004. This introductory work for students provides an overview of the Yanomami vaccine scandal and discusses the ethics of the case.

Early, John D., and John F. Peters. The Xilixana Yanomami of the Amazon: History, Social Structure, and Population Dynamics. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 2000. A study of the Yanomami before and after their contact with the modern world. Includes maps.

Peters, John F. Life Among the Yanomami: The Story of Change Among the Xilixana on the Mucajai River in Brazil. Peterborough, Ont.: Broadview Press, 1998. A study of the effects of modern world contact on the Yanomami, based on the author's experience of living with the Mucajai Yanomami of northern Brazil.

Tierney, Patrick. Darkness in El Dorado: How Scientists and Journalists Devastated the Amazon. New ed. New York: Norton, 2001. The 2000 book that brought widespread attention to the research methods and ethics of Chagnon and Neel. This edition includes a new afterword.

SEE ALSO: Mar. 21, 1928: Alberta Government Sterilizes Thousands Deemed Genetically and Mentally Unfit; Sept.-Oct., 1937: Prescription Elixir Causes More than One Hundred Deaths; 1956-1962: Prescription Thalidomide Causes Widespread Birth Disorders; July 25, 1972: Newspaper Breaks Story of Abuses in Tuskegee Syphilis Study; Nov. 26, 1997: Canadian Health Commissioner Releases Report on Tainted Blood.

September 19, 2000

EX-GAY LEADER JOHN PAULK IS PHOTOGRAPHED LEAVING A GAY BAR

John Paulk, chairman of the board for the conservative, Christian, “ex-gay” movement group Exodus International, was photographed leaving a Washington, D.C., gay bar in the fall of 2000. A former drag queen, Paulk married a woman after his experiences with Exodus and became its spokesperson. He also was a spokesperson for the conservative group Focus on the Family. Paulk claimed to have stopped at the bar to use the restroom, but not many believed him. He lost his position as Exodus board chairman.

LOCALE: Washington, D.C.

CATEGORIES: Publishing and journalism; public morals; sex; politics; social issues and reform

KEY FIGURES

John Paulk (b. 1963), Exodus International board chairman, 1995-2000, and author

Daryl Herrschaft (fl. early twenty-first century), bar patron who first spotted Paulk inside Mr. P’s, a gay bar

Wayne Besen (b. c. 1971), journalist and gay activist

James Dobson (b. 1936), chairman of Focus on the Family

Anne Paulk (fl. early twenty-first century), Exodus member, author, and spouse of John Paulk

SUMMARY OF EVENT

In the year 2000, gay rights campaigning had reached into the legislatures of many U.S. states. For example, Vermont legalized gay civil unions that year, setting a favorable climate for gays and lesbians. Much of the controversy over gay rights had settled into debates about the morality of gay marriage. Conservative backlash against the movement remained strong, with right wing fundamentalist Christians leading the groups opposed to homosexuality.

Vermont’s civil unions earned nationwide backlash, as voters in other states initiated constitutional amendments against same-gender marriage. Other groups, in particular, the Evangelical group Focus on the Family, hoped to “end” the practice of homosexuality altogether. With its claimed Christian focus on condemning the perceived sin, rather than the perceived sinner, the group hoped to convert gays and lesbians to heterosexuality. Focus on the Family’s subgroup, Exodus International (Exodus), carried particular weight in what was called homosexual “conversions.”

To that end, Exodus had two real stars. Board chairman and spokesperson John Paulk and his wife, Anne Paulk, claimed to be former gays who were now married with three children. John Paulk went on regular speaking tours to promote Exodus, with the hope of drawing other gays and lesbians to conversion. The couple wrote a book, Love Won Out (1998), and were featured on the cover of Newsweek magazine in 1998.

The “ex-gay” movement, as it is best known, became a source of much controversy. Opponents claimed it was a discriminatory farce. Gay rights activists argued that conversion groups produced more same-gender partnerships than traditional heterosexual ones, and that the groups caused irreversible emotional trauma. It came as no surprise then, that after Paulk went into a well-known gay bar in Washington, D.C., in 2000 and was exposed for doing so, the stage would be set for a noisy showdown between gay rights supporters and the activists of the ex-gay movement.

On September 19, Paulk was in Washington, D.C., participating in one of his many speaking tours for Exodus. While on his own time, he paid a visit to Mr. P’s, a gay bar. Mr. P’s, named for its location on P Street, existed in stark contrast to the other buildings on the block. Where those other buildings were brightly lit and modern looking, Mr. P’s was stubbornly dark and concealing. The bar had a policy against photographs being taken indoors, presumably to protect its clientele. While Paulk sat and chatted for forty minutes in the bar, he was recognized by another customer, Daryl Herrschaft, who also was a member of the gay rights lobbying organization Human Rights Campaign (HRC).

Anne and John Paulk in 1998. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

Cannily aware of what Paulk's presence in the bar could do to Exodus's reputation, Herrschaft contacted another HRC member, Wayne Besen, a journalist and gay activist. Besen rushed to the bar, camera in hand. In the dramatic showdown that followed, Besen was ejected from the bar for violating its policy against photography, but not before he had captured a fleeing Paulk on film outside the bar. From other customers, Besen learned Paulk had been flirting and using an alias.

Besen later published an exposé on Paulk that focused on his hypocrisy and the dangers of the ex-gay movement. Initially, Paulk claimed he had only stepped into the bar to use the restroom, but began chatting and stayed inside. To his credit, Paulk never pretended to have been on a conversion mission. However, given the length of his stay, the restroom excuse was quickly dismissed in both the popular press and among Paulk's colleagues who knew better.

James Dobson, chairman of Focus on the Family, confronted Paulk after the published exposé and demanded a full explanation for his apparently aberrant behavior. Paulk initially denied any homosexual inclinations, insisting he had both the support of Focus on the Family and his own wife. However, his explanation still did not hold up to scrutiny. Too many witnesses in the bar had seen him buy drinks for other men, heard him claim to be gay, and heard him use an alias from his own drag queen days. Finally, Paulk confessed that the pressures of the limelight made him want to escape, so he had been toying with the idea of again having sex with men. He quickly added that he was grateful to have been caught, feeling that God was protecting him from his own aberrant desires.

Focus on the Family removed him as Exodus's chairman of the board and sent a chaperone with him to speaking engagements. Although it was committed to supporting him, the group expressed its disappointment in what it considered a lapse in judgment, particularly as he lied about his motives until the truth was extracted from him. The group tried to downplay the incident, claiming that thousands had "escaped" homosexuality and that these successes should be considered more important than Paulk's aberrant behavior.

IMPACT

Paulk's lapse, however, effectively derailed the antigay and ex-gay movements at the height of their popularity. Although gay conversion groups, ex-gay ministries, and Exodus continued to exist, they no longer flourished. The scandal was used by gay rights supporters as an example that the ex-gay movement was harmful, and ultimately ineffective.

Exodus's choice in leadership came under heavy criticism from both sides, and the media gleefully picked apart Paulk and his hypocrisy.

For his part, Paulk continued in a lower leadership role with Focus on the Family, acting as the manager of homosexuality and gender issues until his resignation in 2003. He went on to become a chef and moved, with Anne, to Oregon, far from Washington, D.C.

Besen, in contrast, made a career out of Paulk's downfall. Always concerned with gay rights and already a vocal opponent of ex-gay ministries, Besen escalated the case against the ex-gay movement even after the hubbub over Paulk's lapse died down. Besen became executive director of the group Truth Wins OUT, which exposes hypocrisy within the ex-gay and antigay movements, started a weekly column on his own Web site, and published a book, Anything but Straight, in 2003. Furthermore, Besen educates parents thinking of sending their gay and lesbian children into conversion programs by demonstrating the psychological harm done by such programs.

—Jessie Bishop Powell

FURTHER READING

Besen, Wayne R. Anything but Straight: Unmasking the Scandals and Lies Behind the Ex-Gay Myth. New York: Harrington Park Press, 2003. Focuses on the hypocrisy of the gay conversion movement. Discusses "converts" who have suffered psychological harm and those who eventually affirmed a positive homosexual orientation after their participation in conversion programs.

Kirby, David. "After the Fall: Man Allegedly Cured of His Homosexuality Visits Gay Bar." Advocate, November 21, 2000. Examines the consequences of Paulk's being photographed at Mr.

P's bar, including the loss of his position as board chairman of Exodus International.

Leland, John, et al. "Can Gays Convert?" Newsweek, August 17, 1998. Interviews with John and Anne Paulk discuss their support for the ex-gay movement. Also includes the words of those who oppose the movement, including gay rights activists and the American Psychological Association.

Muzzy, Frank. Gay and Lesbian Washington, D.C. Charleston, S.C.: Arcadia Press, 2005. Double focus on the presence of gays and lesbians in the U.S. capital and their impact on politics.

Paulk, John, and Anne Paulk. Love Won Out: How God's Love Helped Two People Leave Homosexuality and Find Each Other. Wheaton, Ill.: Tyndale House, 1999. Summarizes the couple's journey to heterosexuality with the help of ex-gay ministries and Christianity in general, as well as their own meeting and marriage. Generally argues that heterosexual love is stronger than homosexual love.

SEE ALSO: July 19, 1921: U.S. Senate Rebukes Navy in Homosexuality Investigation; Oct. 7, 1964: President Lyndon B. Johnson's Aide Is Arrested in Gay-Sex Sting; 1970: Study of Anonymous Gay Sex Leads to Ethics Scandal; Oct. 25, 1974: Evangelist Billy James Hargis Resigns College Presidency During Gay-Sex Scandal; Jan., 1977: Singer Anita Bryant Campaigns Against Lesbian and Gay Rights; Sept. 3, 1980: Congressman Bauman Is Arrested for Liaison with Teenage Boy; Dec., 1982: Julie Andrews and Blake Edwards Deny Being Gay; July 20, 1983: Congress Members Censured in House-Page Sex Scandal; Aug. 19, 2004: Blog "Outs" Antigay Congressman Edward Schrock; Nov. 2, 2006: Male Escort Reveals Sexual Liaisons with Evangelist Ted Haggard.

September 26, 2000

GYMNAST ANDREEA RĂDUCAN LOSES HER OLYMPIC GOLD MEDAL BECAUSE OF DRUGS

Sixteen-year-old Romanian gymnast Andreea Răducan was stripped of her gold medal in the women's individual all-around competition at the 2000 Summer Olympics in Sydney, Australia, after testing positive for the banned stimulant pseudoephedrine. The substance is a common ingredient in cold medicines, which she had been given by a team physician the night before her competition.

LOCALE: Sydney, New South Wales, Australia
CATEGORIES: Drugs; medicine and health care; sports

KEY FIGURES

Andreea Răducan (b. 1983), Romanian gymnast
Ioachim Oană (fl. early twenty-first century),
Romanian Olympic team physician
Ion Tiriac (b. 1939), president of the Romanian Olympic Committee

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Andreea Răducan was born in Barlad, Romania, in 1983. She showed promise in gymnastics from an early age and was a top gymnast on the Romanian national team by the late 1990's. She lived and trained at the national training center in Deva. She became known for her high energy, skills, dance ability, and artistry, receiving comparisons to legendary Romanian gymnast Nadia Comaneci.

Răducan's specialties were the floor exercise, vault, and balance beam. She won the gold medal for the floor exercise finals and placed fifth in the individual all-around finals at the 1999 World Championships, and she was one of the top gymnasts in the world leading up to the 2000 Summer Olympic Games in Sydney, Australia.

At the 2000 Games, Răducan helped the Romanian women's gymnastics team earn the gold medal in the team competition, the first gold medal for Romania since the 1984 Summer Olympics in Los Angeles. Her scores in the team competition also qualified her for the individual all-around, floor exercise, and vault finals. She finished the preliminary round of the all-around finals with the second highest total score, just behind gold-medal favorite Svetlana Khorkina of Russia. Răducan went on to win the individual all-around gold medal in the controversial final round of the competition.

Halfway through the event, the vaulting apparatus was found to have been set to an incorrect height, a mistake that led a number of competitors to "crash"; however, there were few injuries. Khorkina had been among those who vaulted at the incorrect height and crashed. Răducan also vaulted at the incorrect height, but she completed the vault without serious error. Those who had competed at the incorrect height had the option of vaulting again, but Răducan chose not to do so. She became the first Romanian gymnast to win the Olympic individual all-around title since Comaneci at the 1976 Olympics. Romanian teammates Simona Amanar and Maria Olaru took the silver and bronze medals, respectively.

On September 26, a few days after the all-around competition, the Romanian team was notified that Răducan had tested positive for the stimulant pseudoephedrine, which was on the International Olympic Committee's (IOC) list of banned substances. She was stripped of her gold medal in the individual all-around event but was allowed to compete in the event finals, where she won the silver medal on the vault but faltered on her usually solid floor exercise to finish seventh of eight competitors. Răducan, her coaches, and Romanian Olympic Committee president Ion Tiriac protested the IOC's withdrawal of her gold medal, claiming that the pseudoephedrine had been in two tablets of Nurofen, a commonly available, over-the-counter cold medicine given to her by Romanian team physician Ioachim Oană to treat her fever and cough. The IOC rejected the protests, stating that although they believed Răducan did not knowingly ingest the substance and did not receive a performance benefit, they must enforce rules violations regardless of the circumstances.

As a result of the IOC decision, the individual all-around gold medal was awarded to second-place finisher Simona Amanar, who accepted it on behalf of Romania but qualified her acceptance by stating that Răducan was the rightful winner. Third-place finisher Olaru received the silver medal and fourth-place finisher Liu Xuan of China received the bronze medal. Răducan was allowed to keep her gold medal from the team competition and her silver medal from the vault competition because she had not been tested for drugs after the team event and had passed a drug test after the event finals.

Andreea Răducan at a 2000 Summer Olympics news conference in Sydney, two days after losing her gold medal in the women's all-around gymnastics competition. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Gymnast Răducan Loses Her Olympic Gold Medal

The decision to strip Răducan's medal created a wave of public sympathy for the young, petite Răducan, who did not meet the profile of an intentional doping violator. The same day her medal was stripped, Răducan and the Romanian Gymnastics Federation appealed the IOC's decision to the Court of Arbitration for Sport (CAS), the sporting world's highest court of appeal, based in Lausanne, Switzerland. An ad hoc CAS group, meeting in Sydney, ruled on September 28 that Răducan was innocent of any wrongdoing and that she had not gained a competitive advantage from the pseudoephedrine. However, it rejected her appeal to reinstate her gold medal for the individual all-around event. The court agreed with the IOC's rationale that regardless of the emotions or circumstances of the case, the Olympic antidoping code must be upheld in fairness to all athletes. Romanian team physician Oană was expelled from his job for the remainder of the Sydney Games and also was banned from the 2002 Winter Games in Salt Lake City and the 2004 Summer Games in Athens.

Răducan remained a popular figure to many both inside and outside gymnastics. The International Gymnastics Federation (IGF) also exonerated her of any wrongdoing and imposed no further sanctions, stating that the loss of her medal was punishment enough. She continued to train with and compete for the Romanian team and won five medals at the 2001 World Championships before retiring from the sport in 2002. After her retirement, she became a sports announcer, television-show host, and model and studied for a master's degree in journalism at the University of Bucharest. Oană kept his medical license but, in addition to his Olympic sanctions, received a four-year ban from the European championships and all IGF-sponsored events.

IMPACT

The withdrawal of Răducan's gold medal attracted worldwide media attention and highlighted the tougher IOC position on violations of its antidoping code. Despite the public's sympathy for Răducan, many people believed nonetheless that preserving the fairness and integrity of the Games is more important for the integrity of the Olympics than any individual case.

At the time Răducan lost her medal, the IOC had been facing increasing public pressure to crack down on doping violators and uphold the Olympic movement's commitment to drug-free sport, a commitment that led to the more stringent antidoping policies. The uniqueness of Răducan's case, her proclaimed innocence, and her sympathetic nature would test the IOC's determination to enforce those policies. Its decision to follow its own rule and automatically disqualify an athlete regardless of the circumstances of the charges sent a message that accidental violations would not be tolerated, or defensible.

Oană's suspension also sent the message that team physicians and other medical personnel working with athletes must know the ingredients of any and all medications they prescribe or otherwise supply, and that all persons affiliated with a team, not just athletes, could face sanctions for their carelessness.

—Marcella Bush Trevino

FURTHER READING

Begley, Sharon, and Devin Gordon. "Under the Shadow of Drugs: Doping—Tainted by Scandals, the IOC Starts to Crack Down." Newsweek, October 9, 2000. Places the Răducan scandal in the perspective of other doping violations at the 2000 Sydney Olympics and the public pressures that led to a stricter IOC antidoping policy.

Birchard, Karen. "Olympic Committee Bans Doctor After Doping Case." The Lancet, September 30, 2000. This article, in a respected medical journal, examines the case against the team physician who gave Răducan the medication containing the banned stimulant. Addresses the issue of physician responsibility.

Mihailovici, Sorin. "Recovery for Răducan: Losing the Olympic All-around Gold Has Made Andreea Răducan More Popular than Ever." International Gymnast 43, no. 1 (2001). Examines the impact of the scandal on Răducan's athletic career and discusses her future in gymnastics.

Pound, Richard W. Inside the Olympics: A Behind-the-Scenes Look at the Politics, the Scandals, and the Glory of the Games. Etobicoke, Ont.: John Wiley & Sons Canada, 2004. An inside view of the history of Olympic doping violations and scandals by a longtime member of the IOC and the founding chairman of the World Anti-Doping Agency.

Wilson, Wayne, and Ed Derse. Doping in Elite Sport: The Politics of Drugs in the Olympic Movement. Champaign, Ill.: Human Kinetics, 2001. Examines the movement for controlling drug use by Olympic athletes from the perspectives of science, history, social science, and politics.

SEE ALSO: June 30, 1994: Tonya Harding Is Banned from Skating After Attack on Rival; July 1, 1994: Soccer Star Diego Maradona Is Expelled from World Cup; Feb. 11, 2002: French Judge Admits Favoring Russian Figure Skaters in Winter Olympics; Mar. 17, 2005: Former Baseball Star Mark McGwire Evades Congressional Questions on Steroid Use; July 26, 2006: Tour de France Is Hit with a Doping Scandal; Oct. 5, 2007: Olympic Champion Marion Jones Admits Steroid Use.

November 5, 2000

JAPANESE AMATEUR ARCHAEOLOGIST'S "DISCOVERIES" ARE PROVEN FAKES

Amateur archaeologist Shinichi Fujimura, who had been credited with numerous major finds, was exposed as a fraud when the Japanese newspaper Mainichi Shimbun published photographs of him burying finds he claimed to have discovered. This incident called into question the validity of his earlier work and caused a major scandal in Japan. Fujimura later admitted to fabricating all of his findings.

ALSO KNOWN AS: Japanese paleolithic hoax

LOCALE: Tokyo, Japan

CATEGORIES: Forgery; hoaxes, frauds, and charlatanism; publishing and journalism; education; public morals; cultural and intellectual history

KEY FIGURES

Shinichi Fujimura (b. 1950), amateur archaeologist
Toshiki Takeoka (fl. early twenty-first century), archaeologist at Kyoritsu Women's University,
 Tokyo

Charles Keally (fl. early twenty-first century),
 American archaeologist at Sophia University,
 Tokyo

Toshiaki Kamata (fl. early twenty-first century), chairman of the Tohoku Paleolithic Institute

SUMMARY OF EVENT

On November 5, 2000, the Japanese were stunned by accusations of fraud involving one of Japan's most trusted and admired amateur archaeologists, Shinichi Fujimura. By the age of fifty, Fujimura was a leading amateur archaeologist, even though he had only a high school diploma and no formal training. He was nicknamed the Hand of God and God's Hand for his uncanny ability to find ancient artifacts.

The shy, humble father of two was working at an electronic-gadget manufacturing company in 1972 when he became interested in Japan's prehistory. Fujimura taught himself archaeology and, in 1981, had a major discovery when he found stoneware dating back 40 millennia. This discovery pushed Japan's ancient history back by 10 millennia. Fujimura's career and reputation took off, and he consistently found older artifacts as he worked on more than 180 other sites nationwide over a period of twenty years. He studied objects from the oldest of Japan's Paleolithic, or Stone Age, which dates back 600 to 1,200 millennia. The stone implements, or tools, Fujimura discovered date back 500, 600, and 700 millennia. Each discovery broke archaeological records and seemed to prove that the earliest habitation of Japan occurred 600 millennia ago and not 30 to 35 millennia ago as previously determined by the archaeological evidence.

In 1992, Fujimura made a major discovery in the Zazaragi ruins in the Miyagi Prefecture, which was the first unanimously confirmed early-middle Paleolithic site in Japan. Fujimura's finds at this site led to new avenues of research and were considered spectacular. Also in 1992, Fujimura and two trained archaeologists established the Tohoku Paleolithic Institute, a nonprofit organization in Tagajo, near Sendai, northeast of Tokyo. The institute supported the excavations of Paleolithic sites in Japan. Fujimura served as deputy director, or vice chairman. Toshiaki Kamata, an established archaeologist, served as the director.

Fujimura's findings were supported by many well-respected scientists, including anthropologists and archaeologists. Privately, some professionals expressed doubt about the age of the discoveries, but only a few expressed their doubts publicly. As early as 1985, two prominent archaeologists, the American Charles Keally from Sophia University in Tokyo and Toshiki Takeoka, a lecturer at Kyoritsu Women's University, also in Tokyo, claimed that the artifacts from one site were incorrectly dated. Their criticisms were ignored and Keally was essentially told by other archaeologists to remain quiet about his doubts. Takeoka was forced to tone down a paper in 1997 by the editors of Paleolithic Archaeology when he questioned Fujimura's professionalism. Takeoka's paper was edited so that the most critical sections were removed. The editors believed these sections alluded to rumors of planted artifacts.

Because of his concerns, Takeoka encouraged journalists to watch Fujimura. Reporters had been tracking Fujimura for six months when they caught him planting artifacts, first in September, 2000, at the Soshinfudozaka ruins in Shintotsukawa, Hokkaido. The photographs, however, were not clear enough to present as evidence.

At the Kamitakamori ruins in Tsukidate, Miyagi Prefecture—about 186 miles northeast of Tokyo—Fujimura and his team announced the discovery of holes that may have held pillars or columns supporting dwellings, as well as stones believed to be more than 600 millennia old—one of the oldest indications of human habitation in Japan. On October 22, local journalists with hidden video cameras filmed Fujimura at one of the sites at dawn burying something that he had removed from his pocket. Hours later he "discovered" an artifact at the same place.

On November 5, the newspaper Mainichi Shimbun published three still images from the video that showed Fujimura burying the artifacts he later dug up and claimed as authentic and newly discovered. The paper published the images only after confirming the facts with Fujimura himself. In a press conference that same day, Fujimura admitted to planting many Stone Age artifacts but insisted that he had only done so at the Soshinfudozaka and Kamitakamori ruins and that all of his other finds were legitimate. He claimed that he had been tempted by the devil and by the need for the continued admiration of the archaeological community.

News of the scandal spread quickly and shocked the archaeologists who worked with Fujimura. Many defended the validity of his earlier finds, especially those who had excavated with him.

Kamata admitted that Fujimura's actions were foolish, but he also insisted that the deception involved only the two most recent sites. Fujimura resigned from Tohoku Paleolithic Institute and Kamata, as his boss, accepted full blame on behalf of the institute. Fujimura, who had been admitted to the Japanese Archaeology Association (JAA) in 1984, was expelled in 2000 after the scandal was revealed.

Shortly after the November 5 revelation, Fujimura was hospitalized after suffering an emotional breakdown. He spent the next several years in a psychiatric hospital, and all of his communication with the outside world was mediated by his doctor and lawyer. Because of his initial unavailability, it was not until May, 2001, that JAA representatives could begin five sessions of interrogation with Fujimura. Meanwhile, local governments were reexcavating the sites of his major finds. By October, with proof by others that he had faked the excavations at more than thirty sites, Fujimura admitted that all of his work was fabricated. The forgeries included sites that accounted for most of the archaeological record in Japan for the earliest period of the Paleolithic era. Fujimura wanted fame and felt pressured to continue making spectacular finds. The archaeological community was stunned and dismayed, as many of the sites were thought to be among the world's oldest human habitations.

In its report issued in May, 2002, the JAA's special investigative committee announced that none of the stone tools Fujimura identified as belonging to the Paleolithic period had academic value. Former chairman Kamata resigned from the Tohoku Paleolithic Institute, indicating that the reputation of the institute was irreparably damaged. The institute was dissolved in 2004. Fujimura eventually left the psychiatric institute, changed his name, and remarried. In 2007, he was reportedly living in a small town on the Pacific coast of Japan.

For more than twenty years, Fujimura's work was taught to children and featured in textbooks. He was a hero because his discoveries helped prove Japan's cultural uniqueness. Because archaeology is extremely popular in Japan and has been a source of great pride, the people not only felt betrayed by his fraud but also embarrassed.

IMPACT

Fujimura's method of deception was very effective, and it was difficult to detect a planted artifact unless someone was specifically looking for that item. No obvious signs of forgery existed because the planted tools were ancient, locations were favorable, and because the stone implements were dated by the stratum (layer of rock or soil) in which they were found, it was extremely difficult to differentiate between planted and real finds. Also, unusual archaeological discoveries were common, so archaeologists accepted Fujimura's sensational findings.

Fujimura also was very good at planting forgeries, often during the early morning hours but even with other people, including professionals and the press, watching him excavate. Because he was trusted and respected, any inconsistencies were explained away, ignored, or simply not noticed.

After the scandal, Fujimura critic Keally highlighted flaws in Japanese archaeology. He argued that findings were revealed at press conferences and circulated among the public and profession quickly but with little critical review or scholarly debate. Critic Takeoka said that the study of archaeology in Japan was not scholarly but rather based on the desire for incredible discoveries. Senior scholars, he said, are not challenged in Japan; to directly criticize another's work is considered a personal and professional insult.

The Fujimura scandal led the Japanese scientific community to call for major changes in how findings are announced to colleagues and the general public. Scientists also called for more time on analysis before claims were made, and for greater collaboration with foreign scientists, which would encourage more debate and raise the standards of scientific scholarship in Japan.

Japanese archaeologists and other prominent scientists, many of whom had based years of research on Fujimura's findings, found all of their work questioned, and the field itself was forced to reconsider how discoveries were verified. Trust eroded between the public and academia, as well as between colleagues, and the international reputation of Japanese archaeology suffered because of the scandal.

Archaeologist's "Discoveries" Are Proven Fakes

—Virginia L. Salmon

FURTHER READING

Keally, Charles T. "Dirt and Japan's Early Paleolithic Hoax." Sophia International Review no. 24 (2002). A look at the practice of archaeology in light of the Fujimura scandal. Written by one of Fujimura's major critics.

Normile, Dennis. "Japanese Fraud Highlights Media-Driven Research Ethic." Science, January 5, 2001. Discusses the impact of the revelation of Fujimura's fraud. Notes the major changes to the field of archaeology in Japan.

Romey, Kristin M. "'God's Hands' Did the Devil's Work." Archaeology 54, no. 1 (January-February, 2001). A brief journal article about the aftermath of Fujimura's hoax.

Wehrfritz, George, and Hideko Takayama. "With a Wave of God's Hand." Newsweek International, October 22, 2001. Examines the effects of Fujimura's hoax, and asks how the structure of the scientific community allowed it to happen.

Yamada, Shoh. "Politics and Personality: Japan's Worst Archaeology Scandal." Asia Quarterly 6, no. 3 (Summer, 2002). Detailed, well-balanced overview of the scandal and its far-reaching affect on Japanese archaeology and national pride. Includes discussion of the importance of archaeology in Japanese society.

SEE ALSO: Nov. 21, 1953: Piltdown Man Is Revealed to Be a Hoax; Mar. 23, 1989: Scientists' "Cold Fusion" Claims Cannot Be Verified; Spring, 1996: Physicist Publishes a Deliberately Fraudulent Article; Aug., 2002: Immunologist Resigns After Being Accused of Falsifying Research; Sept. 25, 2002: Inquiry Reveals That Physicist Jan Hendrik Schön Faked His Research; May 12, 2006: Scientist Is Indicted for Faking His Research on Creating Stem Cells.

December, 2000

SEXUAL ABUSE OF CHILDREN IN FRANCE LEADS TO THE OUTREAU AFFAIR

The Outreau affair was a child sex-abuse scandal that became a legal scandal. After social services alerted French prosecutors to suspected child sexual abuse, Thierry and Myriam Delay were tried for abusing their four children. The Delays admitted guilt and also implicated neighbors, creating fears of a pedophile network. Years later, cases against most of the accused, who had been incarcerated for up to thirty months while awaiting trial, were dismissed on appeal. The scandal led to major legal reform in France.

LOCALE: Outreau, FranceCATEGORIES: Law and the courts; families and children; social issues and reform; sex crimes; public moralsKEY FIGURES

Myriam Delay (Myriam Badaoui; b. 1967), defendant

Thierry Delay (b. 1964), defendant

David Delplanque (b. 1973), defendant

Aurelie Grenon (b. 1980), defendant

Fabrice Burgaud (b. 1971), magistrate

SUMMARY OF EVENT

The discovery and investigation of a suspected pedophile and sex-abuse ring by authorities in Outreau, France, in December, 2000, filled the French public with horror and rage over allegations of the sexual abuse of children. Public condemnation soon shifted from the accused to the French justice system itself, in which many of the defendants were imprisoned for long stretches of time and tried based on little evidence and admittedly false accusations. The child sex-abuse scandal and the reported injustices that occurred during the investigation and trial came to be known as the Outreau affair and brought France's long-standing judicial system under scrutiny.

The Outreau child sex-abuse case began when social-service workers and teachers became concerned over the sexualized behaviors of Thierry and Myriam Delay's four children. Suspecting sexual abuse, social services staff contacted law enforcement about their observations. The Delay children were taken from their parents, placed in foster care, and questioned. The children told investigators that they were forced to perform sexual acts and watch pornographic films, and that they were molested and raped by their parents as well as some of their neighbors. Between 2001 and 2003, the children's testimonies as well as Myriam Delay's own allegations against others in the Outreau community led to an increase in the number of accused.

As the investigations came to a close, eighteen people had been charged with rape, torture, and the perpetration of barbaric acts against eighteen children, ages three to twelve, in a period of five years. Although pornographic material and sex toys had been confiscated from the Delay residence, the presence of physical evidence of child sex-abuse remained scarce. The majority of evidence gathered for the trial included, primarily, the psychological evaluations and testimonies of the children allegedly involved. The children were once again removed from the custody of their parents during the investigation and trial, and the accused were ordered to pretrial detention. One of the accused committed suicide by drug overdose after enduring over one year of pretrial incarceration. A total of seventeen adults were scheduled to go to trial over the sex-abuse allegations.

Under a firestorm of media coverage, the Outreau trial began in May, 2004, under the direction of a young magistrate, Fabrice Burgaud. In addition to the shocking stories of abuse detailed by the children, more evidence against the seventeen accused surfaced during Myriam Delay's testimony. She confessed that she and her husband, Thierry Delay, sexually abused their children from 1995 to 2000. She also implicated her neighbors as participants in the abuse, and she explained that her own sexual victimization as a child influenced her decision to abuse her own children. The Delay's neighbors, David Delplanque and Aurelie Grenon, also confessed that they had sexually abused the Delay children.

Three critical developments changed the mood of the trial in November, 2004. First, Myriam Delay and Grenon retracted their statements about the criminal involvement of the other defendants. Second, Myriam Delay and Grenon were found to have fabricated parts of their testimonies. Third, the children's stories began to conflict with their own prior statements. Furthermore, the Delay children's stories were viewed with even more uncertainty because they also showed signs of psychological and emotional distress. Skepticism over the entire trial followed these revelations.

Nevertheless, Thierry and Myriam Delay were convicted of child abuse and rape and were sentenced to twenty and fifteen years, respectively, in prison. Delplanque and Grenon also were convicted of child abuse and rape and were sentenced to six and four years, respectively. Of the remaining thirteen defendants, seven were acquitted and released from pretrial detention while the remaining six were found guilty of child abuse. Great uncertainty over their guilt circulated until the accused appealed their convictions.

The Outreau appeals trial began on December 1, 2005, and lasted one day only. All six defendants were cleared of the charges against them. One leading reason the charges were dismissed was Myriam Delay's confession of falsely implicating her neighbors. Another reason was the weak physical and psychological evidence of sexual abuse coupled with the contradictory accounts of the children.

IMPACT

In the short term, the closure of the Outreau appeals trial marked the end of the five-year-long Outreau affair. However, in addition to affecting the children emotionally and physically, the scandal left a lasting scar on the acquitted, the public, and the French judicial system, which lost the public's confidence. Demands for legal reform followed the appeals trial.

Through detailed news coverage, the public soon learned about the pretrial mistreatment of the defendants, including coerced confessions and personal losses. The media also revealed that the accused had been detained for long periods of time, some up to thirty months, before trial, were denied access to their children, and lost their jobs, marriages, and reputations. One of the defendants committed suicide prior to the trial. Outrage flared over France's pretrial detention procedures, which mandated that accused persons can remain in pretrial incarceration for up to five years. Magistrate Burgaud's inexperience as a trial judge was cited as a factor in why the case was poorly handled. Other factors were the contradictory roles and limitations placed on magistrates by the French justice system.

Defendants Thierry and Myriam Delay in court in June, 2004, in Saint-Omer, France. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

After the appeals ruling, French president Jacques Chirac, Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin, and Justice Minister Pascal Clément made an unprecedented apology to the wrongfully accused and promised judicial reform. In January, 2006, the French parliament ordered an investigation into the ineffective, embarrassing, and damaging legal proceedings of the case, considered a "judicial disaster" by Chirac and a "judiciary shipwreck" by others.

—Sheena Garitta

FURTHER READING

Bremner, Charles. "Outrage over Innocent Thirteen Jailed in Sex Abuse Scandal." The Times (London), January 20, 2006. Examines how the controversial events of the Outreau affair and the treatment of the accused during the investigations and trial prompted a government inquiry into law enforcement practices and the operations of the French judicial system.

"Exit Napoleon: The French Judicial System (The Outreau Affair)." The Economist, February 11, 2006. Offers a detailed account of the Outreau affair, pretrial events, the results of the trial and appeals, and the public's demand for change in France's justice system.

Hodgson, Jacqueline. "The Detention and Interrogation of Suspects in Police Custody in France: A Comparative Account." European Journal of Criminology 1, no. 2 (April, 2004): 163-199. An empirical study of the treatment of criminal suspects by French police before trial. A good source for any study of the French criminal justice system in the context of legal and judicial reform, especially reform demanded following the Outreau scandal.

_____. French Criminal Justice: A Comparative Account of the Investigation and Prosecution of Crime in France. Portland, Oreg.: Hart, 2005. A study of the French criminal justice system that includes discussion of the scandalous Outreau affair in the context of French law. Like Hodgson's 2004 study, this work is based on empirical research.

SEE ALSO: Mar. 2, 1906: Psychoanalyst Ernest Jones Is Accused of Molesting Mentally Disabled Children; Aug. 12, 1983-July 27, 1990: McMartin Preschool Is Embroiled in Child-Abuse Case; Mar., 1990: Menendez Brothers Are Arrested for Murdering Their Parents; Aug. 16, 1996: Belgian Media Reveal How Police Bungled Serial Murder Case; Mar. 4, 1999: Quebec Offers Support for Abused Duplessis Orphans; Jan. 30, 2001: Liverpool Children's Hospital Collects Body Parts Without Authorization; Dec. 18, 2003: Pop Star Michael Jackson Is Charged with Child Molestation.

2001

CLEARSTREAM FINANCIAL CLEARINGHOUSE IS ACCUSED OF FRAUD AND MONEY LAUNDERING

*The Luxembourg-based financial clearinghouse Clearstream International faced public scrutiny for suspicious financial practices after the publication of the muckraking book Révélation by Denis Robert and Ernest Backes. The authors accused the company of money laundering, tax evasion, managing unpublished bank accounts, and dealings with organized crime. The scandal revealed the lack of regulation and policing of financial institutions and their practices.*

LOCALE: Luxembourg

CATEGORIES: Corruption; banking and finance; business; publishing and journalism; hoaxes, frauds, and charlatanism

KEY FIGURES

Denis Robert (b. 1958), French investigative reporter

Ernest Backes (b. 1946), German author and former computer engineer and executive at Cedel

Régis Hempel (fl. early twenty-first century), former computer programmer at Clearstream

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Clearstream International was established in Luxembourg in January, 2000, through a merger of Cedel International and Deutsche Börse Clearing (DBC). Cedel was founded in 1971 to arrange transfers of U.S. dollars, or Eurodollars, deposited in banks outside the United States. DBC also performed money transfers but was not limited to Eurodollars. The founding of Clearstream combined the two companies into a single financial clearinghouse owned by the Deutsche Börse Group, based in Frankfurt, Germany.

Financial clearing is a banking industry service that facilitates the transfer of funds from one bank to another. This procedure is a matter of recording credits and debits. When bank A transfers a sum of money to bank B, the following occurs: Bank A instructs a clearinghouse, such as Clearstream, to debit its account for the sum of money agreed upon by the two banks and to credit bank B's account with the agreed-upon sum of money. This system is considered secure and quick and is used throughout the world. It is an essential element of financial transactions involving large sums of money and especially for transactions between banks operating in different currencies.

In addition to recording transfers of money, Clearstream and other financial clearinghouses maintain information on the financial position of banks in relation to other banks. This information is calculated each time a clearinghouse credits and debits accounts in the transfer of monies from one bank to another.

As early as March, 2000, the French government had issued a parliamentary report that addressed the difficulties of regulating financial activities and of preventing money laundering and other criminal activity in the realm of money transfers within Europe. The third section of the report dealt exclusively with Clearstream. On February 21, 2001, the tribunal of Luxembourg opened an investigation into possible financial manipulation by Clearstream. The tribunal found no evidence of systematic manipulation, although it did find evidence of accounting manipulation and tax evasion. No action was taken and the case was dropped on November 30, 2004, because a statute of limitations prevented prosecution.

In 2001, Denis Robert, an investigative reporter, and Ernest Backes, a former Cedel executive until he was fired in May, 1983, published Révélation. The book reveals Clearstream's alleged role in the underground economy and claims the company's practices were unethical, even illegal. According to Robert and Backes, Clearstream was one of the major institutions that laundered money for banks and shell companies and for organized-crime groups.

Robert and Backes also claim that Clearstream played an important role in tax-evasion practices.

Furthermore, the book presents a detailed account of Clearstream's development of an automated system to provide unpublished accounts to banks and other clients. These claims were corroborated by Régis Hempel, a Clearstream computer programmer at the time the accounts were created. This system permitted the transfer of money without any public record or knowledge. The secret transfer of money facilitated both money laundering and tax evasion. Cedel had opened hundreds of unpublished accounts during the 1980's and 1990's.

Backes had been fired from Cedel allegedly because of an argument he had with an English banker who was a friend of the chief executive officer of Cedel. However, once the Banco Ambrosiano scandal broke during the early 1980's, Backes was convinced that he had been fired because of his knowledge of transactions between Cedel and Banco Ambrosiano. (Banco Ambrosiano, one of the major Italian banks, was implicated for money laundering funds obtained from drug and arms trafficking for organized crime and in channeling Vatican funds to revolutionary groups. The bank collapsed in 1982.)

Backes had worked with Gérard Soisson, who was the manager of Cedel and had the authority to open unpublished or secret accounts or decline them. Soisson was found dead on the island of Corsica while on vacation in July of 1983, just a few months after Backes's dismissal from Cedel.

After being fired from Cedel, Backes remained in Luxembourg to work in the stock market and eventually as manager of a butcher's cooperative. During this time, he still had friends at Cedel and began collecting the information that he and Robert would include in their book. They found that Soisson had used some discretion in granting unpublished accounts, and Backes discovered that after Soisson's death, the number of unpublished accounts at Cedel increased dramatically. Backes further discovered that Cedel had opened unpublished accounts for private companies. Backes and Robert claimed that Cedel/Clearstream had violated acceptable practices by opening secret accounts not only for banks but also for commercial and industrial companies. Robert later published a second book La Boîte Noire (2002), which explored issue of the unpublished accounts, or "black boxes," in greater detail.

*Révélation*⁵ brought to light other corrupt activities of Cedel and Cedel/Clearstream. One case involved the sale of six frigates to Taiwan by the French company Thomson-CSF. Joël Bûcher, an employee of the bank Société Générale, who said he left the bank after twenty years because of the money laundering that was a common practice, revealed the firm used Clearstream to launder money and keep bribes secret in the transaction.

Robert and Backes's book also led to an enormous number of lawsuits and investigations. Clearstream, and other financial institutions and individuals mentioned in the book, filed ten lawsuits for libel and defamation against Backes and Robert and the book's publisher, Arènes, in Luxembourg, France, Belgium, and Switzerland. In total, more than fifty lawsuits were filed against Robert alone. In 2003, a French court refused to award Clearstream 500,000 euros for claimed damages in its defamation case against Robert.

On June 10, 2008, a tribunal found against Robert and imposed a fine of 12,500 euros for defamation. The same day, Clearstream filed a lawsuit demanding 100,000 euros from Robert in a Luxembourg court, and the Paris bourse (stock market) recommended that he be sentenced for unlawful receipt of bank documents and dishonest reporting. Robert filed an appeal but refused to speak publicly about Clearstream or speak to the media.

IMPACT

The Clearstream scandal resulted in no major reforms in the regulation of clearinghouses and their practices, but the scandal had a significant impact on the public's awareness of clearinghouses and their function in the world of international finance. The transfer of large sums of money between countries and companies using different currencies would be almost impossible if not for the recording of transactions rather than the physical transfer of funds.

The scandal also revealed the lack of regulation and policing of financial institutions and their practices and the reluctance of courts around the world to interfere with the activities of these institutions. Also, the vast number of parliamentary commissions, judicial investigations, and trials convened as part of the Clearstream scandal show the complexity of the problem, given that the financial institutions involved do not operate in a single country nor under any one jurisdiction.

—Shawncey Webb

FURTHER READING

Coenen, Tracy. Essentials of Corporate Fraud. Hoboken, N.J.: John Wiley & Sons, 2008. An introductory guide to the white-collar crime of corporate fraud, written by a forensic, or investigative, accountant.

Loader, David. Clearing, Settlement, and Custody. Woburn, Mass.: Butterworth-Heinemann, 2002. A good explanation of how the finance-clearing industry functions and its critical importance to the global financial market.

Norman, Peter. Plumbers and Visionaries: Securi- ties Settlement and Europe's Financial Market. New York: John Wiley & Sons, 2008. Discusses the Clearstream scandal and the work of Denis Robert. A comprehensive history of European finance clearing, how it started, and how it has changed.

SEE ALSO: Nov., 1929: Banque Oustric et Cie Failure Prompts French Inquiry; Jan. 8, 1934-Jan. 17, 1936: Stavisky's Fraudulent Schemes Rock French Government; May 28, 1970: Irish Politicians Are Tried for Conspiring to Import Weapons; Aug. 6, 1982: Banco Ambrosiano Collapses Amid Criminal Accusations; May 2, 1984: E. F. Hutton Executives Plead Guilty to Fraud; May 7, 1985: Banker Jake Butcher Pleads Guilty to Fraud; June 25, 1997: Swiss Banks Admit to Holding Accounts of Holocaust Victims; Dec. 23, 1998: Prominent Belgians Are Sentenced in Agusta-Dassault Corruption Scandal; Dec. 2, 2001: Enron Bankruptcy Reveals Massive Financial Fraud; Sept. 3, 2003: Mutual Fund Companies Are Implicated in Shady Trading Practices.

January 30, 2001

LIVERPOOL CHILDREN'S HOSPITAL COLLECTS BODY PARTS WITHOUT AUTHORIZATION

In 1992, following the death of a child at Alder Hey, a children's hospital in Liverpool, England, investigators looked into child mortality at the facility. This led to revelations about the treatment of dead children's bodies at Alder Hey and other National Health Service hospitals. In early 2001, investigators submitted their report on the matter, showing that hospitals were taking and keeping the organs and other body parts of thousands of dead children, and fetuses, without parental consent.

ALSO KNOWN AS: Alder Hey inquiry

LOCALE: Liverpool, England

CATEGORIES: Medicine and health care; government; families and children; public morals; corruption

KEY FIGURES

Dick van Velzen (b. 1950), Dutch professor of pathology at Alder Hey, 1988-1995

Alan Milburn (b. 1958), British secretary of state for health, 1999-2003

Michael Redfern (b. 1949), queen's counsel and medical law expert

Liam Donaldson (b. 1949), chief medical officer, British Department of Health

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Alder Hey children's hospital, near Liverpool, is one of the most respected children's hospitals in England and one of the largest children's hospitals in Western Europe. With two other leading children's hospitals, Great Ormond Street Hospital for Children in London and the Birmingham Children's Hospital, Alder Hey was caught up in a scandal that developed through the 1990's and was finally exposed to the public on January 30, 2001, with the publication of The Report of the Royal Liverpool Children's Inquiry, best known as the Redfern Report. The hospitals had been keeping the organs and body parts of deceased children, and fetuses, without the full consent of the parents of the deceased.

The scandal came to light indirectly. In 1996, Helen Rickard, the mother of Samantha Rickard, an infant who had died while undergoing open heart surgery at Bristol Royal Infirmary (BRI) in 1991, asked for the medical records of her daughter. She had heard of the unusually high number of deaths of children at BRI while undergoing heart surgery. These figures became known through new audit procedures instituted by the British National Health Service (NHS). Upon receiving the records, Rickard discovered a letter from the pathologist who had carried out Samantha's postmortem, stating that he had retained her heart. Shocked, she asked for its return.

Concern about BRI's poor performance and the news of the retention of the infant's heart led to the formation of a parents' action group. In February, 1999, group members called a press conference to inform the public about the retained heart. With other medical concerns about BRI, the press conference led the British government to form a public inquiry into the matter. In September, one of the witnesses at the inquiry testified under oath that Alder Hey routinely kept a large number of stored hearts of children who had undergone postmortems, and that it had been doing so since about 1948.

This fairly sensational news led to a public uproar, and the Labour government, under Health Minister Alan Milburn, promptly set up another inquiry to be chaired by Michael Redfern, a leading medical barrister (attorney) and the queen's counsel in the north of England. He was to be assisted by Jean Keeling, a consultant pediatric pathologist at the Royal Hospital for Sick Children in Edinburgh, Scotland, and a noted medical author, and Elizabeth

THE REDFERN REPORT

The Redfern Report on the organs scandal at Alder Hey children's hospital was released on January 30, 2001. It included the following section, "Handling the News of Organ Retention from September, 1999," which condemns all involved in the scandal.

Alder Hey and the University [of Liverpool] should have retained a paediatric pathologist to head a team to catalogue the retained organs and fragments in September 1999. This exercise would have revealed the impossibility of accounting accurately for all the organs retained because of poor record keeping and unrecorded research access to the organs. Neither Alder Hey nor the University will ever be able accurately to tell parents what happened to every organ of every child who died between 1988 and 1995. The University has never accepted its responsibility in the matter and has left Alder Hey to make a sequence of mistakes. These include four or five attempts to provide parents with accurate information relating to organ retention, not learning from and compounding mistakes made in each previous attempt. The cerebellum collection and the eye collection should have been identified and revealed earlier by both Alder Hey and the University.

Alder Hey failed to make sufficient provision for face to face communication of the news of organ retention to parents. They failed to provide suitable advice, counselling and support necessary to affected families. Even though Alder Hey were [sic] faced with a unique situation in terms of the amount and condition of organs at Myrtle Street, there was a lack of proper management which resulted in the dripfeeding of information to parents and the provision of information which was frequently inaccurate. No proper attempt at cataloguing was carried out until June 2000. The result was that each piece of news given to parents had the cumulative effect of exacerbating their reaction. From the outset they should have retained a Consultant Psychologist to assist in devising the best method for approaching parents affected.

Powell, chief officer of the Liverpool Community Health Council. They were given broad terms of reference and were instructed to one, inquire into the extent of the organ retention of children who had undergone postmortem examination and to what extent this had been done legally, and two, inquire into the roles of supervisory agents and any “such other issue relating to the above matters.” In particular, the panel was to look into illegalities relating to the Human Tissue Act of 1961.

The panel was asked to report back by March, 2000, but the evidence was so extensive that the due date was extended to the end of the year. The panel’s Redfern Report totaled six hundred pages. The health minister was shown a copy on January 26, 2001, and it was released to the public on January 30. Government officials expected such a furor after the report’s release that police surrounded Alder Hey hospital. Relatives of the deceased children gathered at the Adelphi Hotel in central Liverpool.

The report was incredibly damning, and its chief focus was a former professor of pathology at Alder Hey who had worked under a contract from the University of Liverpool. The pathologist was Dutchman Dick van Velzen, who had worked at the hospital from 1988 to 1995. The inquiry found that from his initial interview he had lied about his credentials and his activities. The report cited twenty areas of malpractice during his seven years at Alder Hey. The hospital had retained some body parts before he arrived, but the practice mushroomed after his arrival, and, in some cases, it involved retention even without parental consent (or contrary to parental refusal).

The report criticized others as well, especially the management teams of Alder Hey and the University of Liverpool. Independent assessors had told management teams at the hospitals about inadequate staffing of the pathology departments, but they were ignored. However, it was primarily the sheer lack of supervision that accounted for the growth of the malpractice cases, plus the failure of professional colleagues to raise the alarm. A particular coroner, Roy Barter, was singled out for his poor record-keeping. The report also attacked the management’s paternalism: Parents found they had very little say as to what happened to their dead children. It was assumed the medical team knew best, and that there existed a general policy of “assumed consent.” Even when the scandal was breaking, management responded slowly to parents’ concerns, and management was late in informing families and in returning body parts to those who requested them.

The inquiry also looked at the wider practice within the National Health Service and found evidence of some 104,000 children’s body parts, organs, and fetuses being stored at more than two hundred facilities. The problem was thus much more extensive than the actions of one pathologist at one hospital. Furthermore, nearly one-half million tissue samples were also being held by hospitals. At Alder Hey, storage space had run out, and a nearby hospital was being used to store the overflow. Alder Hey and the Birmingham Children’s Hospital also gave thymus glands to a pharmaceutical company in return for research funds.

Concurrent with the inquiry was the investigation of Liam Donaldson, the government’s chief medical officer, who was instructed to report on organ retention at the national level, to look at the consent procedures in place, and to make recommendations for their improvement. Donaldson’s findings were published as Human Bodies, Human Choices: The Law on Human Organs and Tissue in England and Wales—A Consultation Report, on July 1, 2002. The report found that the system of “assumed consent” should be replaced by a much more fully explicit statement of consent. He also found that more than fifty thousand organs, body parts, and fetuses were held by pathology services throughout Great Britain, a figure that reinforced the numbers in the Redfern Report.

After the inquiry, four members of the hospital staff, including the chief executive, were immediately suspended. The inquiry turned over its evidence to both the General Medical Council (GMC) for England and Wales and police. The GMC eventually banned van Velzen from practicing in Great Britain, but local police and the Crown Prosecution Service could not put together a strong enough case to warrant a criminal action against the pathologist, leading to further public outrage.

IMPACT

Health secretary Milburn accepted the report in full when it was debated in an emergency session of the British parliament. He promised a special commission to oversee the return of all organs and tissues to the families involved, if so requested. He would begin a review of the coroner's system and also of the accountability and management systems where universities and National Health Trusts worked together. Finally, he promised full support for all families at the time of their bereavement.

Early in 2003, the Alder Hey families received just over five thousand pounds (about ten thousand U.S. dollars) each in an out-of-court settlement totaling five million pounds (about twenty million U.S. dollars). By 2004, about two thousand families had filed suit against the National Health Service in the British High Court. That same year, all unidentified bodies were buried, over a short time, at Allerton Cemetery in Liverpool.

The greatest impact of the scandal was the re-vamping of the whole system of obtaining consent for the retention of body parts. Initially, health and medical officials feared that parental refusal would drastically reduce the needed supply of parts for medical research, but this has proven not to be the case. The procedures for aborted and miscarried fetuses also have been regularized to some extent, though many critics say that insufficient regard for human dignity still exists. Institutional mentalities tend always to be paternalistic, even indifferent, in such cases.

—David Barratt

FURTHER READING

Cowley, Christopher. Medical Ethics, Ordinary Concepts, and Ordinary Lives. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2008. Argues that the best starting point for discussions of medical ethics is "the actual words and deeds of ordinary people in ordinary disagreements." Includes a chapter on the Alder Hey scandal and inquiry and another on the postmortem.

The Times (London), January 30-31, 2001. A full investigative report of the inquiry's findings and subsequent Parliamentary debate on the matter.

Weir, Robert F., Robert Olick, and Jeffrey Murray. The Stored Tissue Issue: Biomedical Research, Ethics, and Law in the Era of Genomic Medicine. New York: Oxford University Press, 2004. Examines the Alder Hey inquiry in the context of concurrent developments in genetic science, law, and medical ethics. Argues that the inquiry had a major role in these developments.

SEE ALSO: Mar. 2, 1906: Psychoanalyst Ernest Jones Is Accused of Molesting Mentally Disabled Children; Feb. 23, 1943: Irish Orphan School Fire Kills Thirty-five Girls; 1956-1962: Prescription Thalidomide Causes Widespread Birth Disorders; July 25, 1972: Newspaper Breaks Story of Abuses in Tuskegee Syphilis Study; Aug. 12, 1983-July 27, 1990: McMartin Preschool Is Embroiled in Child-Abuse Case; Sept. 19, 1988: Stephen Breuning Pleads Guilty to Medical Research Fraud; Aug. 16, 1996: Belgian Media Reveal How Police Bungled Serial Murder Case; Nov. 26, 1997: Canadian Health Commissioner Releases Report on Tainted Blood; Mar. 4, 1999: Quebec Offers Support for Abused Duplessis Orphans; Dec., 2000: Sexual Abuse of Children in France Leads to the Outreau Affair; Feb. 17, 2002: Rotting Human Bodies Are Found at Georgia Crematory.

February 18, 2001

CIA AGENT ROBERT HANSSEN IS ARRESTED FOR SPYING FOR THE RUSSIANS

As one of the most effective spies in U.S. history, FBI agent Robert Hanssen sold secrets to the Soviet Union and Russia for more than twenty years. His espionage led to one of the most damaging cases of the breaching of national security in the history of the United States. Hanssen was sentenced to life imprisonment, avoiding the death penalty for treason, by pleading guilty to fifteen counts of espionage and conspiracy.

LOCALE: Vienna, Virginia

CATEGORIES: Espionage; government; organized crime and racketeering; corruption; law and the courts

KEY FIGURES

Robert Hanssen (b. 1944), FBI counterintelligence agent and spy for the Soviet Union and Russia
Louis Freeh (b. 1950), FBI director, 1993-2001
Victor Cherkashin (b. 1932), Soviet KGB intelligence officer, 1952-1991

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Robert Hanssen, a counterintelligence officer with the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) stationed in Washington, D.C., had access to large amounts of secret federal government information that he willingly sold to the Soviets and Russians. Hanssen approached the Soviets with the offer to give them U.S. secrets by writing a note and dropping it into the vehicle of a member of the Soviet embassy in Washington, D.C.

Victor Cherkashin became the Soviet case officer and handled communications with Hanssen until he retired. Hanssen, whose job with the FBI was to track spies working in the United States under diplomatic cover, kept his identity a secret from the Soviets to lessen his chances of being caught. He also asked for very little money and did not spend in an extravagant manner. He dictated all of his tradecraft to the Soviets and was extremely careful.

In November, 2000, an unknown person clandestinely smuggled a file to FBI headquarters in Washington, D.C., from Moscow. The file contained information regarding the suspected mole, or embedded double agent, within U.S. intelligence. Included in the file was a list of the six thousand pages that this mole had turned over to the Russians. FBI investigators began to collect all documents that had been passed to the Russians and then searched for clues that would lead them to a suspect. The actual name of the mole was never used in the file, though there was some discussion regarding the mole's promotions and assignments, with dates. There also was a tape recording of a telephone conversation between the mole and a KGB officer. The FBI counterintelligence agents listened to the tape and recognized the voice as that of Hanssen.

A former KGB agent who turned defector also turned over another critical piece of evidence to the FBI: a plastic bag. Hanssen had used plastic trash bags to cover up the documents he passed to Russian intelligence. The FBI was able to pull two usable fingerprints from the bag, both of which matched Hanssen's fingerprints. Agent Hanssen was then placed under surveillance.

The FBI stationed Hanssen at its headquarters to work in the new Information Resources Division. His office was bugged and his telephones were tapped. He was being followed when he drove by Foxstone Park, his dead-drop site in nearby Vienna, Virginia, looking for a signal from his Russian handlers. By the end of January, 2001, the FBI had searched through Hanssen's Ford Taurus. They discovered chalk used for signaling, tape, garbage bags, and classified documents, which were related to ongoing FBI counterintelligence operations. A few days later, agents searched Hanssen's office, where they found communications between Hanssen and Soviet-Russian intelligence.

Robert Hanssen. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Hanssen began to suspect that his new position was useless and that he was under surveillance. He claimed his car was bugged and that he could hear burst transmissions in his vehicle. He also wrote his final letter to Russian intelligence. In the letter he stated that he was breaking off contact for now but would contact the Russians again in one year.

On Sunday, February 18, 2001, the FBI arrest team was assembled and ready. They followed Hanssen as he drove a friend to Dulles Airport and then headed for Foxstone Park. On the way, he pulled into the parking lot of a shopping plaza and added a few more documents to his package for the drop. The FBI team relayed details of its surveillance to headquarters. Hanssen then drove to Foxstone Park, parked his car, entered the woods, and slipped the package underneath a bridge. He headed back to his car and was confronted by the FBI team, which arrested him.

FBI agents informed Hanssen's wife, Bonnie, that her husband had been arrested for espionage. Upon being questioned, she revealed that Hanssen first sold secrets to the Soviets as early as 1979. The FBI believed 1985 was the year he first contacted the Soviets.

Hanssen's arrest was announced on February 20 by FBI director Louis Freeh. Reporters discovered that Hanssen was arrested while making another document drop. Freeh briefly discussed the file the FBI received from the Russians. He added that Hanssen's espionage was a severe breach of national security. However, Freeh did not reveal the extent of the case, including that Hanssen had spied for the Soviets—and later the Russians—over a period of more than twenty years.

IMPACT

Hanssen's exploits had extremely grave consequences for U.S. security, but it is unlikely that the extent of his espionage will ever be known. What is known is that he had given the Soviets and Russians close to six thousand pages of documents and more than twenty computer disks of highly sensitive, classified information from the FBI, the CIA, the Pentagon, and perhaps most damaging, the National Security Agency. He compromised numerous intelligence sources who were embedded in Russia and U.S. intelligence efforts as a whole. He revealed the names of Russians who were working as double agents for the United States (many of whom were executed upon returning home to the Soviet Union). He informed the Russians of attempts by the United States to recruit double agents and disclosed U.S. counterintelligence techniques, which may have allowed the Russians to operate more effectively in the United States and evade surveillance or capture.

Hanssen's arrest was particularly damaging to the U.S. intelligence community as well because it revealed that even a trusted FBI agent could deceive superiors and continue spying without being detected. The FBI was now faced with damage control and a public relations nightmare. The Hanssen case came just a few years after that of agent Aldrich Ames of the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency, who was arrested for selling secrets, also to the Soviet Union. FBI director Freeh resigned because of the fallout from the Hanssen case, and the FBI also faced independent investigations about the breach of security.

—Michael W. Cheek

FURTHER READING

Cherkashin, Victor, with Gregory Feifer. Spy Handler: Memoir of a KGB Officer. New York: Basic Books, 2005. An account of Hanssen's espionage by the Soviet agent who was a main contact for Hanssen.

Havill, Adrian. The Spy Who Stayed Out in the Cold: The Secret Life of FBI Double Agent Robert Hanssen. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2001. A psychological study of Hanssen that also provides some background on his life before the FBI. Includes a bibliography.

Vise, David A. The Bureau and the Mole: The Unmasking of Robert Philip Hanssen, the Most Dangerous Double Agent in FBI History. New York: Atlantic Monthly Press, 2002. An account by a reporter for The Washington Post. Includes copies of e-mails and notes written by Hanssen and an appendix that summarizes the secrets he sold.

Washington Intern Chandra Levy Disappears

West, Nigel. Historical Dictionary of Cold War Counterintelligence. Lanham, Md.: Scarecrow Press, 2007. Provides a detailed history of not only the Hanssen espionage case but also Cold War-era spy cases in general. Focuses on the compromised security of the CIA.

Wise, David. Spy: The Inside Story of How the FBI's Robert Hanssen Betrayed America. New York: Random House, 2002. Study by a noted expert on intelligence services, written with the help of a psychiatrist who interviewed Hanssen following his arrest.

SEE ALSO: Jan. 21, 1950: Alger Hiss Is Convicted of Perjury; Sept. 12, 1962: British Civil Servant Is Arrested for Spying; Mar. 4, 1966: Munsinger Sex and Spy Scandal Rocks Canada; Aug. 19, 1985: West German Counterintelligence Chief Defects to East Germany; Mar. 2, 2003: U.S. National Security Agency Is Found to Have Spied on U.N. Officials.

April 30, 2001

WASHINGTON INTERN CHANDRA LEVY DISAPPEARS

Chandra Levy, an intern with the Federal Bureau of Prisons, disappeared just days before she was to return home to California. U.S. Congress member Gary Condit later admitted to having had a sexual relationship with Levy while she was in Washington, D.C., but he was never officially named a suspect in her disappearance. Levy's body was found in a park close to her D.C. apartment, one year after she disappeared. Condit's political career was ruined by the scandal.

LOCALE: Washington, D.C.

CATEGORIES: Murder and suicide; politics; law and the courts; public morals; sex

KEY FIGURES

Chandra Levy (1977-2001), Federal Bureau of Prisons intern and graduate student Gary Condit (b. 1948), U.S. representative from California, 1989-2003
Susan Levy (fl. early twenty-first century), Chandra Levy's mother
Linda Zamsky (fl. early twenty-first century), Chandra Levy's aunt

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Chandra Levy had been nearing the end of her time as an intern with the Federal Bureau of Prisons in Washington, D.C. Levy, a University of Southern California graduate student in public administration, was last seen alive on April 30, 2001, doing errands, and her last e-mail correspondence with her family was made the next day. She was scheduled to return home to her family in Modesto, California, but she never made it there.

Levy's family soon reported her missing, and investigators began a search of her Washington, D.C., apartment. In addition to finding her identification there, they found that she had been packed to permanently leave the apartment. They also discovered that she, or someone in her apartment, had used her computer to search the Web for Rock Creek Park, located four miles from her apartment. (This park would play a part in the scandal as the case evolved.) Investigators immediately searched the park but found no body.

Investigators continued to search for Levy through the next several weeks. Levy's aunt, Linda Zamsky, told investigators in July that her niece had confided in her and told her that she had been having an affair with U.S. representative Gary Condit, who represented Levy's hometown of Modesto. Within a day and more than two months after the former intern's disappearance, Condit finally admitted to having an affair with Levy. Condit, who was married and had two children, was twenty-nine years older than Levy. Although Condit never was officially considered a suspect in Levy's disappearance and murder, the media focused on him nonetheless. Levy's parents, Susan and Robert Levy, also remained suspicious of Condit throughout the investigation. They also hired a public relations company to handle press inquiries, and they made several appearances on television to appeal for help in finding their daughter.

One person of interest to authorities had been Ingmar Guandique, a young Salvadoran immigrant who was convicted of assaulting two women at

The Modesto Bee outside the home of the parents of Chandra Levy on July 11, 2001. The local newspaper had extensive coverage of Levy's disappearance and the ensuing scandal involving Modesto-area Congress member Gary Condit. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Rock Creek Park in Washington, D.C. He was questioned by police but never charged in the disappearance of Levy. However, Guandique's victims, who survived their attacks, noted that he had approached them from behind while they were jogging and listening to their portable miniature radios, a method of attack that would later resonate in the Levy case.

Just over one year later, on May 22, 2002, parts of Levy's decomposed body were found in Rock Creek Park. A man walking his dog came upon a human skull that was later determined to be Levy's through matching dental records. Her remains were scattered, and investigators concluded she had been murdered at the park on May 1, 2001. Even though the area had been searched one year earlier, experts argued that they missed the body the first time because it was located in a desolate spot. The park, at more than 1,700 acres, is large. Unfortunately, her remains were so decomposed that medical examiners found it difficult to determine exactly how she died. They named her death a homicide in the weeks following the discovery of her remains.

Condit lost credibility during the scandal and was not reelected. He left Congress in January, 2003, and with his family bought several Baskin-Robbins ice-cream franchise stores after relocating to Arizona. Even that venture ended in controversy, as the Condit's were sued over management issues and their franchise license was revoked. Condit was interviewed in January, 2008, and expressed sadness about Levy's death, but he also appeared to have moved on from the scandal.

IMPACT

The Levy-Condit scandal resonated for several reasons, including the following: Levy was having an affair with a U.S. politician, and that politician represented her hometown. She disappeared without a trace of foul play. Her body was found in a park not far from her apartment—and Condit's apartment. Condit was secretive about the affair until finally admitting the relationship two months after Levy's disappearance, but he did so only after being pressured to come forward. The affair reminded the public of the affair between President Bill Clinton and another former intern, Monica Lewinsky, from a few years earlier.

The Levy-Condit scandal resonated for another reason: its sensationalism and the intense media attention it received. The story riveted the nation for months and subsided only after another story became the number-one news item: the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001. After this date, media coverage of Levy's disappearance rapidly declined, but it resurfaced somewhat when her body was found a few months later.

Levy's murder remains unsolved. Her family established a Web site in her memory, hoping as well that someone might come forward with information on how Levy was killed, and by whom. In addition, Susan Levy continued her work as an advocate for victim's rights, assisting other parents who have lost their children, and has received awards for her efforts. In particular, she has lobbied for the rights of victims in cases that remain cold, or unsolved. She remained steadfast in her criticism of Condit, claiming the congressman had something to do with her daughter's disappearance and murder.

—Gina Robertiello

FURTHER READING

Daugherty, Ralph. Murder on a Horse Trail: The Disappearance of Chandra Levy. New York: iUniverse, 2004. A computer programmer drawn to the case of Chandra Levy's disappearance and murder examines the facts and attempts to explain what happened. Written in an easy-to-read style. Recommended for general readers.

Murphy, Dean E. "Hope, and a Frenzy, Fade in a Missing-Person Case." The New York Times, March 4, 2003. Article discusses the link between the Chandra Levy case and Laci Peterson case. Both young women were from Modesto, California.

Seelye, Katherine Q. "Police Say Intern was Slain, but They Do Not Know How." The New York Times, May 29, 2002. Article explains the circumstances surrounding the discovery of Chandra Levy's skeletal remains at Rock Creek Park. Because of the condition of the remains, experts were not able to confirm how she was killed, or how she died.

Sowell, Thomas. Controversial Essays. Stanford, Calif.: Hoover Institution Press, 2002. In a brief chapter, the author examines clues that he believes may have been overlooked in the investigation of Chandra Levy's disappearance.

Wecht, Cyril H., Mark Curriden, and Angela Powell. Tales from the Morgue: Forensic Answers to Nine Famous Cases. Amherst, N.Y.: Prometheus Books, 2005. Several high-profile cases, including that of Chandra Levy, are examined by a forensic pathologist. Demonstrates the methods, evidence, and the pathology techniques used to analyze a case. Hypothesizes that Levy was strangled.

Weiss, Mike. "Still No Answers." San Francisco Chronicle, May 22, 2007. Updated review of the Levy case, determining that there are still no answers regarding who committed the crime. Susan Levy was interviewed for the article, which notes that she meets every year with the Washington, D.C., police chief.

SEE ALSO: Oct. 7, 1974: Congressman Wilbur D. Mills's Stripper Affair Leads to His Downfall;

July 20, 1982: Conservative Politician John G. Schmitz Is Found to Have Children Out of Wedlock; July 20, 1983: Congress Members Censured in House-Page Sex Scandal; Mar., 1990: Menendez Brothers Are Arrested for Murdering Their Parents; Jan. 17, 1998: President Bill Clinton Denies Sexual Affair with a White House Intern; Dec. 5, 2002: Senator Trent Lott Praises Strom Thurmond's 1948 Presidential Campaign; Sept. 29, 2006: Congressman Mark Foley Resigns in Sex Scandal Involving a Teenage Page.

June 18, 2001

AWARD-WINNING HISTORIAN JOSEPH J. ELLIS IS ACCUSED OF LYING

The Boston Globe reported that American historian Joseph J. Ellis had frequently lied to his students and others about serving in the Vietnam War. Ellis also lied about, or greatly exaggerated, his participation in other major events of the 1960's, including the peace and Civil Rights movements. The Ellis scandal sparked a heated debate about ethical issues of personal and professional integrity for academics.

LOCALE: South Hadley, Massachusetts

CATEGORIES: Hoaxes, frauds, and charlatanism; publishing and journalism; cultural and intellectual history; education; ethics

KEY FIGURES

Joseph J. Ellis (b. 1943), American historian
Walter V. Robinson (b. 1949), Boston Globe reporter

Joanne V. Creighton (b. 1942), president of Mount Holyoke College

SUMMARY OF EVENT

By mid-2001, Joseph J. Ellis must have felt a quiet satisfaction after twenty-nine years as a respected historian, teaching at Mount Holyoke College. A fifty-seven-year-old Yale University-educated professor of history at a prestigious women's college in central Massachusetts, Ellis was among the best-known and most respected faculty members on campus. He had risen rapidly at Mount Holyoke. By 1978, within six years of his arrival, he was chairman of the history department, and by 1980 he was dean of the college faculty. For eight months in 1984, he was the interim college president.

Ellis's scholarship and teaching credentials also were outstanding. His biography of Thomas Jefferson, the latest of his eight books on early American history, had just won the Pulitzer Prize. His teaching, as measured by course evaluations, ranked consistently among the finest in the college. However, his claim to have seen combat in the Vietnam War apparently aroused suspicion. Alerted by an anonymous tip, Boston Globe investigative reporter Walter V. Robinson began to check the authenticity of some of Ellis's stories, recounted not only in class but also in interviews with reporters. The award of a Pulitzer Prize to Ellis convinced Robinson to complete and publish the results of his investigation on the celebrated scholar.

Robinson's article, "Professor's Past in Doubt: Discrepancies Surface in Claim of Vietnam Duty," broke on page one of the Boston Globe on June 18, 2001. The article stated that over a period of close to twenty years, Ellis had persistently lied about his wartime experiences to his classes at Mount Holyoke. The charges stunned Ellis's students and colleagues. Most agreed that he was a gifted storyteller. His lecture style was dynamic and was enriched by humor and personal anecdotes. He seemed to empathize with the people and topics he was discussing. Course evaluations described him as displaying a close personal relationship with his subject, leaving a kind of “you-are-there” impression with his audience. However, at some point Ellis crossed the line. In his Vietnam in American Society course, he began to claim by the early 1980’s that he had taken part in combat operations and top-level planning in Vietnam.

As detailed in the Boston Globe article, Ellis claimed that he had parachuted into Vietnam in 1965 as a young platoon leader with the fabled 101st Airborne Division. He claimed also to have led a mop-up operation in the vicinity of My Lai in March, 1968, shortly before the massacre in that Vietnamese village. Finally, he claimed that he had served in Saigon (later Ho Chi Minh City) on the headquarters staff of General William Westmoreland, commander of U.S. forces in Vietnam. The Boston Globe reporter found no evidence to support these assertions but much to contradict them. Records show that in 1965, the year Ellis said he was a paratrooper in Vietnam, he was a graduate student at Yale University, where he remained until 1969.

Ellis had graduated from the College of William and Mary in 1965 with a Reserve Officers’ Training Corps (ROTC) commission but had deferred active military duty until the completion of a doctorate in history from Yale. He did serve in the military from August, 1969, until June, 1972, but within the United States, teaching military history at the U.S. Military Academy at West Point, New York, his entire tour of duty. Following his honorable discharge in 1972, Ellis began his teaching career at Mount Holyoke College.

Ellis told other tall tales over the years. He claimed, for example, that in 1964, prior to his military service and while still an undergraduate at William and Mary, he had trained activists in the Civil Rights movement. Once again, the Boston Globe could find nothing to corroborate Ellis’s claim. In addition, Ellis said that he had returned deeply disillusioned from Vietnam, and after his honorable discharge he had led antiwar protests. No one who knew him at the time could remember any active interest by him in the peace movement.

The revelations of the Boston Globe stunned Ellis’s students and colleagues, as well as many others elsewhere who knew Ellis as a brilliant scholar. He admitted his guilt and asked for forgiveness. He later called his actions “stupid and wrong” but referred only to “personal shortcomings” as an explanation of his conduct.

Initially, the president of Mount Holyoke College, Joanne V. Creighton, defended Ellis as honorable and questioned whether the Boston Globe’s exposé had served the public interest. However, as criticism intensified from media editorials and national professional groups, Creighton appointed a faculty committee to examine the issue. The verdict did not favor Ellis. In announcing the decision, Creighton cited Ellis’s repeated serious breaches of faculty responsibility to the truth. She then suspended him without pay for one academic year, ordered that he no longer teach the Vietnam course, and stripped him of his endowed chair, which was a special badge of distinction for a professor. Ellis accepted the punishment.

IMPACT

Reaction to the Ellis scandal was mixed. While many students and faculty at Mount Holyoke objected to the severity of the penalties, others, mainly off campus, believed that he had been treated too leniently. A few regarded Ellis’s offenses as so severe as to bar him from teaching. An official of the American Historical Association (AHA) argued that Ellis’s behavior was a flagrant violation of the AHA code of ethics. He stated that the intellectual integrity of the classroom must never be compromised, just as historical scholarship must never be distorted or falsified. An exhaustive search of Ellis’s voluminous publications found no evidence that his scholarship had been tainted by his delinquencies in the classroom. There the matter rested.

In looking at why Ellis lied to his students, it is possible to infer that he intended to make the sad lessons of Vietnam more urgent and memorable. There was general agreement that his “first-person” descriptions gave a vivid immediacy to his lectures. Perhaps Ellis was guilt-ridden because he had remained safely at home while others were serving and dying in Vietnam.

A more complex explanation was that Ellis had come to half-believe the lies he had so often repeated. According to this view he had sought to reinvent himself by fashioning an alternate identity in a fantasy world. Ellis may have developed the illusion that he had personally participated in what were arguably the three central events of American society during the 1960's: the Vietnam War, the peace movement, and the Civil Rights movement.

Finally, Ellis himself weighed in as to why he had lied so blatantly. He confided to an interviewer in 2004 that he had grown up in a dysfunctional home with an alcoholic father. He said that this was probably why he had been plagued all his life by a sense of insecurity and self-doubt. He attributed much of his compulsion to overachieve to a lack of self-confidence combined with a constant craving for approval. Ellis's self-assessment is intriguing although it did not fully explain why he so casually risked self-destruction over fabrications so easily disproved.

While the Ellis scandal did, for a time, engender serious discussion about intellectual honesty and dishonesty in college classrooms, it soon became clear that many academics made a practical distinction between dishonesty or deception in the classroom and the much more stringent standards that applied to academic publications. Ellis's defenders argued that despite his classroom tales, he did not break any law.

In 2002, Ellis resumed teaching at Mount Holyoke, and in 2005 he regained the endowed chair he had lost in 2001. His biography of George Washington, written during his year under suspension, secured his reputation as among the most talented biographers and historians of his generation.

—Donald Sullivan

FURTHER READING

Burkett, B. G., and Glenna Whitley. Stolen Valor: How the Vietnam Generation Was Robbed of Its Honor and Its History. Dallas, Tex.: Veritas Press, 1998. Published prior to the Ellis scandal, this work exposes dozens of bogus claims to combat action in Vietnam. Also examines various motives of those who falsified their Vietnam service.

Hoffer, Peter C. Past Imperfect: Facts, Fictions, Fraud—American History from Bancroft and Parkman to Ambrose, Bellesiles, Ellis, and Goodwin. New York: PublicAffairs, 2004. In the wake of the Ellis scandal, Hoffer checked Ellis's publications for evidence of plagiarism or serious distortions but found no evidence that Ellis went beyond his sources.

Maslin, Mark. "Biographical Fraud and Traumatic Nationalism: Joseph Ellis' Vietnam Testimony." Biography 29 (2006): 605-614. Discusses various explanations for Ellis's serious ethical lapses and examines his publications to detect whether his classroom fabrications were echoed in his scholarship.

Robinson, Walter V. "Professor's Past in Doubt: Discrepancies Surface in Claim of Vietnam Duty." Boston Globe, June 18, 2001. The article that broke the story of Ellis's years of lies and fabrications.

Wiener, Jon. Historians in Trouble: Plagiarism, Fraud, and Politics in the Ivory Tower. New York: New Press, 2005. A detailed analysis of court documents and other evidence in the fraud scandals of historians. Includes the chapter, "Lying to Students About Vietnam: The Mythic Past of Joseph Ellis."

SEE ALSO: June 5, 1944: Australian Poets Claim Responsibility for a Literary Hoax; Nov. 13, 1969: American Massacre of Vietnamese Civilians at My Lai Is Revealed; Jan. 28, 1972: Clifford Irving Admits Faking Howard Hughes Memoirs; 1978: Roots Author Alex Haley Is Sued for Plagiarism; Dec. 3, 1989: Martin Luther King, Jr.'s, Doctoral-Thesis Plagiarism Is Revealed; Apr., 1998: Scottish Historian Is Charged with Plagiarism; May 11, 1998: Journalist Stephen Glass Is Exposed as a Fraud; Jan. 4, 2002: Historian Stephen E. Ambrose Is Accused of Plagiarism; Jan. 18, 2002: Historian Doris Kearns Goodwin Is Accused of Plagiarism; Oct. 25, 2002: Historian Michael A. Bellesiles Resigns After Academic Fraud Accusations; July 24, 2007: University of Colorado Fires Professor for Plagiarism and Research Falsification.

June 30, 2001

KOREAN RELIGIOUS TEACHER JUNG MYUNG SEOK IS CHARGED WITH RAPE

Jung Myung Seok, a Korean religious teacher whose doctrines reportedly present him as a savior completing the work of Jesus Christ, was sought by Korean police for rape in 2001 after several of his women followers alleged that they were sexually assaulted. Jung was sought by Interpol as well, and in 2007, he was captured by Chinese police and extradited to South Korea.

LOCALES: South Korea; Japan; Taiwan; China

CATEGORIES: Sex crimes; law and the courts; religion; hoaxes, frauds, and charlatanism

KEY FIGURE

Jung Myung Seok (b. 1945), South Korean religious leader

SUMMARY OF EVENT

South Korean religious teacher and self-proclaimed Messiah Jung Myung Seok became the center of controversy in 2001 after being charged with sexually assaulting and raping an unknown number of female followers. Allegations of the spiritual leader's use of religious authority and teachings to abuse the trust and loyalty of his female followers to rape them captured the Eastern world's attention and stirred demands for justice.

Jung's church involvement began when he was a child and intensified during the 1970's, when he became a member of the Unification Church, a Christian sect headed by Messiah figure the Reverend Sun Myung Moon. During the 1980's, Jung left Moon's congregation with several of his own followers and created his own religious sect based on the Unification Church's teachings. Jung's church was named Jesus Morning Star, or JMS (also an acronym for Jung's name), in reference to a New Testament passage from Revelation (2:24-29), which details Jesus' rule over his followers and the rewards given to those who followed him. The JMS religious following also has been known as Setsuri (providence), the International Christian Association (ICA), and the Christian Gospel Mission (CGM). Jung claimed to be the Messiah and referred to his religious movement as the Second Coming of Christ. He asserted to his followers that he was a messenger of God and that their salvation could be obtained only through him.

Jung's following quickly spread throughout South Korea, Japan, and Taiwan. Members of the growing JMS congregation came to include people employed in state and federal organizations, law enforcement agencies, and the military, but the majority of JMS members were young university students. During the early 1990's, JMS members began recruiting intensely from universities in South Korea, Taiwan, and Japan. The group's recruitment strategy consisted of holding membership drives on college campuses to solicit students' participation in their extracurricular activities, such as sports and social clubs. Students were encouraged by JMS members to sign up for these activities without being informed about the religious nature of the clubs. Through these activities, JMS members were able to gain the trust of prospective members and draw them into Jung's following. JMS members also used university students' background and personality profiles in their recruiting processes to more effectively attract them to the church. Many of the students targeted were highly intelligent and expected to become very successful in their careers. New JMS members were encouraged and required to induct other students into the following and to give sizeable monetary donations to the church to further the JMS mission and to increase their status within the cult.

In June, 1999, the Seoul Broadcasting Service in South Korea aired the first public accusations of sexual assault and rape against Jung. Hundreds of female followers came forward to describe how Jung used his self-proclaimed identity as the Messiah to seduce and assault women in the cult. The women explained how prospective female members were often sought out by senior members and handpicked from photographs by Jung. Women within the cult were expected to tend to Jung's needs as servants, to keep him company, and to wear makeup and dress nicely. The women explained that most of the assaults would begin in the form of a health check or bath. Jung would order them to undress and take a bath with him to undergo a spiritual cleansing or healing process that entailed Jung washing their genitals to relieve them of sin and pain. These baths were performed privately with one female member or with several female members at once, and frequently resulted in sexual intercourse with Jung. Many of the women regarded their inclusion in these activities as a blessing and privilege and as a means of achieving a higher rank in the cult. To gain control over his female followers, Jung emphasized that the only way they could atone for their sins was through sexual intercourse with him, the Messiah, and were threatened with damnation if they spoke about having sex with him.

The women also explained how Jung maintained strict control over the marriages of JMS members. Members were allowed to marry other members only and marriages between members were reviewed by Jung for approval. Many prospective brides were required to see Jung for an interview and were frequently forced to have sex with him before they were allowed to marry. Marriages could be performed only by Jung in a mass wedding ceremony, and JMS newlyweds were urged to have children to increase the church's following. The shocking accounts given by JMS victims on the broadcasting network shocked South Korea and led to demands that Jung be held accountable. As the broadcast aired, however, many JMS followers held protests outside the television station in support of Jung.

Jung fled South Korea following the allegations. Dismissing fears of retaliation and spiritual damnation, JMS victims pressed charges against Jung. On June 30, 2001, Korean police officially charged Jung with fraud, rape, and embezzlement (regarding JMS donations and funds) and initiated an international manhunt with Interpol (the International Criminal Police Organization). In 2003, he was detained for visa violations in Hong Kong but fled to China to avoid being extradited to South Korea after being released on bail.

While the search for Jung continued for several years, Japanese police raided several suspected JMS offices. During 2005-2006, Japanese police investigated a forty-four-year-old South Korean woman about an im-

Jung Myung Seok, wearing mask, is extradited to South Korea in early 2008. He was arrested in China in May, 2007, after evading arrest for six years. (AP/Wide World Photos) migrations violation and her suspected involvement with JMS and helping Jung remain a fugitive. The woman, a senior JMS member, reportedly entered Japan in March, 2000, under false pretenses by claiming that she was working as a design planner for a printing company when she was actually conducting business for the cult. The woman also collected JMS members' donations to cover Jung's accommodations and traveling expenses while he was evading capture, and she was responsible for soliciting and sending young women (prospective followers and members) overseas to Jung to have sex with him.

Jung's fugitive status came to an end in May, 2007, after being captured by Chinese police. He was extradited to Seoul in February, 2008, after Chinese police officials confirmed his identity and completed their interrogation. Jung's arrival at a Seoul airport was met by South Korean police and hundreds of JMS followers protesting his arrest. Jung maintained that he was innocent of all charges. On August 12, he was found guilty of rape and sentenced to six years in prison.

IMPACT

The JMS sex scandal provided insight into the inner workings of secretive religious sects and alerted the public to the underlying activities and missions of Jung's church. Despite the knowledge of the rape allegations against Jung, many JMS members remained in the cult and continued to induct new members.

The criminal investigation into the charges against Jung was met with resistance from many JMS followers. In addition to petitions and protests, certain followers infiltrated the criminal justice and legal systems in South Korea by gaining employment in government agencies, and they have been discovered filtering classified information about Jung's case to the church, destroying evidence, and compromising the chance for an untainted and fair trial. The rape charges brought against Jung spotlighted the potential danger for religious fraud, the abuse of power, and the sexual manipulation of members in religious cults.

—Sheena Garitta

FURTHER READING

Buswell, Robert E., and Timothy S. Lee. Christianity in Korea. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 2006. A comprehensive study of the practice of Christianity in Korea. Good for background material that contextualizes Jung's cult.

"China Extradites Chief of Alleged S. Korean Rapist Cult." China Post, February 21, 2008. Provides a brief description of the arrest and extradition of Jung from China to South Korea and a chronology of the criminal allegations that were filed against him.

Daley, Peter. "Jung Myung Seok: How to Spot a Woolly Wolf." Keimyung Gazette (Keimyung University, South Korea), February 1, 2006. Gives a detailed personal account of the cult's recruitment strategies and an inside look at life within the JMS church.

Herskovitz, Jan. "South Korean Religious Sect Leader Jailed for Rape." Reuters, August 12, 2008. A news service wire report of Jung's conviction and sentencing for multiple counts of rape.

SEE ALSO: May 20, 1974: French Cardinal Daniélou Dies in a Prostitute's House; Oct. 31, 1975: Buddhist Teacher Orders His Students to Remove Their Clothes; Aug. 12, 1983-July 27, 1990: McMartin Preschool Is Embroiled in Child-Abuse Case; Oct. 23, 1985: Guru Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh Is Indicted for Immigration Fraud; Apr. 22, 1986: Faith Healer Peter Popoff Is Exposed as a Fraud; May 6, 1992: Irish Bishop Eamonn Casey's Romantic Affair Leads to His Resignation.

August 27, 2001

LITTLE LEAGUE BASEBALL STAR DANNY ALMONTE IS FOUND TO BE OVERAGE

Danny Almonte gained fame for exceptional pitching in the 2001 Little League Baseball World Series. Sports reporters soon discovered that he was fourteen years old, two years over the age limit for players. His team was stripped of its records for the season. Both the team's founder and Almonte's father were banned from Little League for life.

LOCALE: Williamsport, Pennsylvania

CATEGORIES: Hoaxes, frauds, and charlatanism; sports; families and children; publishing and journalism

KEY FIGURES

Danny Almonte (b. 1987), Dominican-born Little League baseball player

Rolando Paulino (fl. early twenty-first century), founder of the Rolando Paulino All Stars

Felipe Almonte (fl. early twenty-first century), Almonte's father

Sonia Rojas Breton (fl. early twenty-first century), Almonte's mother

Ian Thomsen (fl. early twenty-first century), Sports Illustrated writer

Luis Fernando Llosa (fl. early twenty-first century), Sports Illustrated writer

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Pitcher Danny Almonte, a native of the Dominican Republic, and his team, the Rolando Paulino All Stars (also known as the Baby Bronx Bombers), captured the attention of fans and the media after their participation in the 2001 Little League Baseball World Series (LLWS). The team garnered this attention not because it won the LLWS but because of scandal. The Japanese team, Tokyo-Kitasuna, won the series but was kept from the spotlight after rumors began to surface about Almonte's true age.

Reporters pressed Rolando Paulino, the founder and president of the Bronx team, to settle the rumors. He supplied a copy of Almonte's official birth certificate, which had been filed in the Dominican Republic. The certificate indicated that Almonte was born April 7, 1989, which would have made him twelve years old during the 2001 season. Two Sports Illustrated writers, Ian Thomsen and Luis Fernando Llosa, tried to verify the authenticity of the birth certificate but found that there were two "official" certificates in the Dominican Republic. The documents were uncovered by a Dominican reporter.

Almonte, the Bronx team's star player, was an excellent left-handed pitcher who led his team to the LLWS semifinals in South Williamsport, Pennsylvania, for the 2001 season. Almonte's fastballs were clocked at around 70 miles per hour. His team finished third in the series after a 2-0 victory over the team from State College, Pennsylvania; it was a game in which Almonte struck out sixteen. In total, Almonte struck out forty-six batters in Williamsburg.

Almonte seemed mentally sharper than his peers, and he towered above them at 5 feet 8 inches. He was such a phenomenon that coaches in the league grew suspicious of his age. Some even hired private investigators to check on their Bronx rivals. The Associated Press reported on September 4 that these investigations revealed nothing irregular. However, it was revealed that Almonte had not attended school in New York City. Even with the suspicions of rival coaches, Almonte and his teammates received several accolades, including a victory parade in the Bronx and the keys to the city.

The two birth certificates found in the Dominican Republic were identical, except for one fact: the year of birth. Both certificates were for a child named Danny Almonte. Both indicated that he was born to the same parents, had the same government identification numbers, and was born on the same month and day—April 7. One handwritten certificate filed in the town of Moca gave 1987 as the year of birth for the baby boy, weighing six pounds. The later document, which was typed, showed 1989 as the child's birth year. Both documents had been filed by Almonte's father, Felipe Almonte. The maximum age for Little League players is twelve years. To be eligible to play in the 2001 series, players could not have been born before August 1, 1988. Had Almonte been born in 1987, the question on everyone's minds, he would have been too old to play.

The Sports Illustrated writers presented their findings to league officials in late August, 2001. Their article, "One for the Ages," was published in the magazine's September 3 issue but posted to its Web site on August 27. The Almonte scandal officially broke.

Sonia Rojas Breton, Almonte's birth mother, who lived in the Dominican Republic, defended the 1989 date. She provided baby pictures and her copy of the birth certificate to support her story. According to The New York Times, Breton said that she lived in Jamao and that months after Almonte's birth she moved to Moca. She asserted that the 1987 birth certificate was for Danny's brother, Juan, born in 1987. Other records, however, indicate that Juan was born December 15, not April 7, in Jamao al Norte. Danny Almonte's 1987 birth certificate was filed in 1994 and the 1989 birth certificate was filed in early 2000, shortly before Almonte and his father entered the United States. Almonte's family in Moca claimed that the 1987 birth certificate with Danny's name was fraudulent.

Paulino protested that the scrutiny concerning Almonte's age reflected prejudice against foreigners and poor sportsmanship. Furthermore, in what later appeared to be an effort to conceal Almonte's school records, his mother claimed that he had been educated by a friend at that friend's home. However, others in the town were proud to tell reporters that Almonte had attended a local elementary school, Escuela Primaria Andres Bello. The school's vice principal said that Almonte had completed the seventh grade.

A Dominican records official, Victor Romero, also investigated. He interviewed witnesses and examined the birth certificates of both Danny and his older brother Juan and other documents in Moca and Jamao al Norte. Contradictions surfaced regarding the later document. However, Romero did find documentation at Dr. Toribio Bencosme Hospital in Moca to support the 1987 birth date. A Dominican government official in charge of public records announced that the later birth certificates (for both Danny and Juan) were fraudulent. Danny was born April 7, 1987, and Juan was born in 1985. The same official also announced that the Almonte brothers' father would be charged with falsifying a document and that Danny's birth mother also could face charges.

Moca district attorney Juan Alberto Mendez charged Almonte's father and a mayoral staffer with falsifying the birth certificates of the Almonte brothers so that both of them could play baseball.

Danny Almonte pitching in the 2001 Little League World Series. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Felipe Almonte would likely be arrested and given a five-year prison sentence if he returned to the Dominican Republic. He also faced sanctions in the United States for failing to enroll his son in school for more than one year. Furthermore, Felipe's tourist visa, used to enter the United States, had expired in late 2000. Danny Almonte's stepmother appealed to both the United States and Dominican Republic governments for mercy in the case.

In June, 2002, Almonte graduated from Bronx Middle School 52. He attended James Monroe High School, played varsity baseball, and graduated in 2006. Before graduating he married Rosy Perdomo, a thirty-year-old hair stylist and mother of a twelve-year-old son. They initially settled in the South Bronx.

IMPACT

The Little League charter committee required that Almonte's team forfeit its wins, including the team's third place in the series, for the 2001 season. Almonte's no-hitter was struck from the records as well. The Rolando Paulino All Stars were allowed to continue as a team, but became the second team in Little League history to be stripped after reaching the semifinals. The team from Zamboanga City, Philippines, had been disqualified after its 1992 tournament win for including players from another district.

The Little League president at the time of the Almonte scandal avoided blaming Almonte. He instead blamed the adults in his life, including his father. Felipe Almonte and Paulino were banned for life from Little League baseball. Paulino had seen similar trouble years before. In 1988, his Dominican Little League team had been disqualified from a regional tournament when six players were found to be overage. In the Almonte case, however, he claimed that he was not at fault but a victim of deception by the player's father.

After the scandal, Little League Baseball began to closely scrutinize the age and residency of each player or potential player. The league now requires that birth certificates must have been filed within thirty days of a player's date of birth, or that the player provide substantial alternative verification of birth date and place. Also, players must be citizens of the country they represent or be in that country on a legal visa.

—Camille Gibson

FURTHER READING

Hermoso, Rafael, and Lara Petusky Coger. "Almonte Faces Arrest—His Wife Seeks Mercy." The New York Times, September 6, 2001. News story that discusses what happened to Almonte's family after the boy's age was determined.

Llosa, Luis Fernando. "Awkward Age." Sports Illustrated, May 29, 2006. Magazine article that details Almonte's life several years after the scandal. Also reports on his marriage to a thirty-year-old hair stylist, which placed him in the media's spotlight once again.

McFadden, Robert D. "Star Is 14, So Bronx Team Is Disqualified." The New York Times, September 1, 2001. An excellent summary of how events unfolded immediately after the Little League Baseball World Series.

Thomsen, Ian, and Luis Fernando Llosa. "One for the Ages." Sports Illustrated, September 3, 2001. The magazine article that broke the scandal. This article was posted to the Sports Illustrated Web site on August 27.

Wong, Edward, and Jean-Michel Caroit. "Parents of Bronx Ace Insist Their Son Is 12." The New York Times, August 30, 2001. Discusses how Almonte's family lied about the ages of Danny and Juan.

SEE ALSO: Spring, 1947: Baseball Manager Leo Durocher Is Suspended for Gambling Ties; Aug. 19, 1973: Cheating Scandal Shocks Soap Box Derby; Feb. 28, 1986: Baseball Commissioner Peter Ueberroth Suspends Players for Cocaine Use; Aug. 24, 1989: Pete Rose Is Banned from Baseball for Betting on Games; Dec. 14, 2001: Notre Dame Football Coach Resigns for Falsifying His Résumé; May 3, 2003: University of Alabama Fires New Football Coach in Sex Scandal.

December 2, 2001

ENRON BANKRUPTCY REVEALS MASSIVE FINANCIAL FRAUD

When the Texas energy corporation Enron suddenly went bankrupt, it took with it the life savings and pensions of many of its employees and revealed systematic financial corruption and mismanagement that went beyond the company's walls to a respectable accounting firm and the halls of government.

LOCALES: New York, New York; Houston, Texas
CATEGORIES: Banking and finance; corruption; business; law and the courts; ethics

KEY FIGURES

Kenneth Lay (1942-2006), Enron's chief executive officer and chairman of the board

Jeffrey Skilling (b. 1953), Enron's president and chief operating officer

Sherron Watkins (b. 1959), Enron's vice president of corporate development, who urged Lay to investigate Enron's accounting practices

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Enron Corporation began its corporate existence in 1985, when Houston Natural Gas merged with InterNorth, another natural gas company that was based in Omaha, Nebraska. The combined companies controlled a system of natural gas pipelines that stretched the length and breadth of the United States, which in theory should have given it a significant competitive advantage. However, the deregulation of natural gas transmission, part of U.S. president Ronald Reagan's policies of reducing government regulation of corporations, significantly blunted that advantage by eliminating Enron's ability to claim an exclusive right to use its pipelines.

As a result, the new company's chief executive officer (CEO), Kenneth Lay, decided to move out of the traditional areas in which the precursor companies had operated, particularly gas pipelines and power-generating plants, to such areas as telecommunications, pulp and paper, and computers. To chart Enron's new course, Lay retained the consulting firm of McKinsey & Company, which sent consultant Jeffrey Skilling to Houston. Skilling advised Enron executives to leverage the company's vast size to effectively create its own market through buying contracts that locked in both costs and prices, assuring a steady flow of business. Doing this involved creating a number of special purpose entities, or SPEs, that would carry out the transactions, often in joint ventures with other companies. By 1999, Enron even created its own stock-trading company, EnronOnline, which was used by almost all energy companies.

At first the plan worked well enough, and Enron's growth was so spectacular that Skilling was offered a senior executive position, that of chief operating officer, with Enron. However, this growth was almost entirely dependent upon the presence of a strong bull market in the larger economy as well as the rapid growth of the high-tech sector that later came to be known as the dot-com bubble because it lacked fundamentals. Because so much of Enron's growth, and the resulting rapid growth of the value of its stock, had no fundamentals, the use of SPEs became increasingly a sort of shell game, moving money from one part of the company to another to create the illusion of vibrant growth and hide unprofitable ventures. Arthur Andersen, one of the most prestigious accounting firms in the United States, was involved in this systematic deception as well, which was further enabled by lax regulatory oversight.

As the U.S. economy began to slow at the beginning of the twenty-first century, the continued rapid growth of Enron became unsustainable. More desperate financial measures had to be taken to maintain the illusion that enabled Enron's stock to continue climbing. Skilling began to crack under the strain. In one well-publicized event, he used a vulgarism in a sarcastic expression of gratitude to Wall Street analyst Richard Grubman. Although within the corporate culture of Enron the expression was frequently repeated in a way that clearly regarded the wrong to be that of Grubman rather than Skilling, it was a warning sign of upheavals to come.

Former Enron chief executive officer Kenneth Lay reads a prepared statement before the U.S. Senate subcommittee investigating the Enron scandal in February, 2002. (AP/Wide World Photos)

During the middle of 2001, Skilling's mental situation had become sufficiently fragile that he resigned, giving the position of CEO back to Lay on August 14. The next day, Sherron Watkins, Enron's vice president of corporate development, wrote an e-mail to Lay that many consider to be the start of Enron's downfall. In her memo, Watkins expressed reservations about how Skilling's abrupt departure would play in the securities market and identified several key weaknesses in Enron's corporate structure, particularly the Raptor and Condor deals. Raptor and Condor were SPEs that had functioned to hedge risk in particularly tricky areas of the economy. In effect, Watkins was urging Lay to investigate Enron's accounting practices.

Lay then called a meeting with Enron's general counsel, but the wake-up call came too late. Although Enron hired the legal firm Vinson & Elkins to conduct an internal investigation, the damage was already too extensive to be corrected. One day before Enron was scheduled to announce its third-quarter results, Vinson & Elkins returned its report, claiming that while the Raptor and Condor deals were creative, they did not represent a formal conflict of interest.

Even this positive report could not cushion the blow of October 16, when Enron revealed that it had sustained more than $100 million in losses, particularly in its new power company deal and its investment in broadband telecommunications. The news sent Enron's stock prices tumbling, and on October 22 the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) requested information on several key transactions. Further bad news followed when Enron announced it would have to redo a number of key filings as a result of the consolidation of several previously separate entities through which it had accomplished some of its more risky deals.

These filings revealed that many of the SPEs through which Enron had done business were in fact not independent under SEC regulations, but had been treated as though they qualified to avoid consolidating them and their financial losses into Enron's financial statements. The resulting loss of confidence led to further collapse in the value of Enron's stock, until major credit-rating agencies that had previously ranked Enron as a blue-chip-stock company reevaluated it as a junk stock and nearly worthless.

In a desperate attempt to salvage a disintegrating situation, the smaller energy company Dynegy, Inc., attempted a takeover of the collapsing company. However, this deal fell through when Enron revealed that its declining credit rating would result in an additional $690 million of obligations. As a result, Enron filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection in a New York bankruptcy court on December 2. Enron's subsequent corporate activities were directed to the company's dissolution and the satisfaction of its creditors.

IMPACT

Because the complicated financial wheeling and dealing that caused Enron's paper wealth to implode was difficult for people without an extensive background in high finance to understand, most of the public outcry was focused upon the scandal's effect on ordinary people: Millions of American investors, including longtime Enron employees, suddenly lost billions of dollars in savings, investments, and retirement plans. People who had thought their retirements were secure were now looking at the very real possibility of having to work until they could work no more. As a result of this betrayal of trust, employees and investors demanded accountability from the executives who had been involved in the questionable accounting practices.

Both Lay and Skilling were found criminally liable and given long prison sentences, although Lay died of a heart attack shortly before he was supposed to report for incarceration. There were even some questions about whether Lay deliberately indulged in pleasures that were apt to increase his risk of a heart attack, either in an effort to grab a few last bits of pleasure before a sentence that might well be for life or in a cynical effort to cheat prison. The accounting firm Arthur Andersen also was implicated in the financial scandal, and it ultimately went out of business.

Enron Bankruptcy Reveals Massive Financial Fraud

In addition, the scandal raised serious questions about the value of the limited-liability corporation, or LLC, and whether it enabled executives to evade the consequences of their decisions. Calls were made to make it easier to pierce the shield of incorporation and hold executives as individuals financially liable for bad decisions that materially harmed investors and involved a breach of trust. However, many analysts argued that reducing the liability protection afforded by corporate entities could actually do more harm than good by exposing ordinary investors to greater risk and by making executives more wary of taking aggressive action in pursuing business opportunities.

—Leigh Husband Kimmel

FURTHER READING

- Coenen, Tracy. Essentials of Corporate Fraud. Hoboken, N.J.: John Wiley & Sons, 2008. An introductory guide to the white-collar crime of corporate fraud, written by a forensic, or investigative, accountant.
- Fox, Loren. Enron: The Rise and Fall. Hoboken, N.J.: John Wiley & Sons, 2003. A corporate history of Enron, exploring how the scandal developed and spiraled out of control toward bankruptcy and the company's collapse.
- Fusaro, Peter C., and Ross M. Miller. What Went Wrong at Enron: Everyone's Guide to the Largest Bankruptcy in U.S. History. Hoboken, N.J.: John Wiley & Sons, 2002. A detailed account of the corporate greed that led to Enron's collapse.
- Jenkins, Gregory J. The Enron Collapse. Upper Saddle River, N.J.: Pearson Education, 2003. An executive summary of the mechanisms that led to Enron's bankruptcy and collapse. Discusses lessons learned in the scandal.
- Smith, Rebecca, and John R. Meshwiller. Twenty-four Days: How Two "Wall Street Journal" Reporters Uncovered the Lies that Destroyed Faith in Corporate America. New York: Harper-Business, 2003. Focuses upon the investigative reporting that revealed the fatal weaknesses in the management of Enron as a corporation.

Stewart, Bennet. "The Real Reasons Enron Failed." Journal of Applied Corporate Finance 18, no. 2 (2006): 116-119. Argues that Enron failed as a company not because of criminal intent alone but also organizational design: that is, "bonus plans that paid managers to increase reported earnings"; "the use of market-to-market accounting"; and turning the finance department into a "profit center."

Swartz, Mimi, with Sherron Watkins. Power Failure: The Inside Story of the Collapse of Enron. New York: Doubleday, 2003. Offers a firsthand account from the whistle-blower, Sherron Watkins, who courageously stepped forward to unmask Enron's illegal manipulations.

SEE ALSO: 1932: Insull Utilities Trusts Collapse Prompts New Federal Regulation; Mar. 29, 1962: Billie Sol Estes Is Arrested for Corporate Fraud; Aug. 6, 1982: Banco Ambrosiano Collapses Amid Criminal Accusations; May 2, 1984: E. F. Hutton Executives Plead Guilty to Fraud; May 7, 1985: Banker Jake Butcher Pleads Guilty to Fraud; Jan. 15, 1988: ZZZZ Best Founder Is Indicted on Federal Fraud Charges; Mar. 29, 1989: Financier Michael Milken Is Indicted for Racketeering and Fraud; Apr. 5, 1991: George W. Bush Is Investigated for Insider Trading; 2001: Clearstream Financial Clearinghouse Is Accused of Fraud and Money Laundering; June 25, 2002: Internal Corruption Forces Adelphia Communications to Declare Bankruptcy; Sept. 3, 2003: Mutual Fund Companies Are Implicated in Shady Trading Practices; Mar. 5, 2004: Martha Stewart Is Convicted in Insider-Trading Scandal; Oct. 14, 2004: Insurance Brokerage Marsh & McLennan Is Charged with Fraud; Sept. 12, 2005: Westar Energy Executives Are Found Guilty of Looting Their Company; Early 2007: Subprime Mortgage Industry Begins to Collapse; Sept. 20, 2008: American Financial Markets Begin to Collapse.

December 14, 2001

NOTRE DAME FOOTBALL COACH RESIGNS FOR FALSIFYING HIS RÉSUMÉ

George O'Leary, former head football coach for the Georgia Institute of Technology, resigned as head football coach of the University of Notre Dame after only five days on the job. A reporter covering his appointment as Notre Dame's head coach found inaccuracies and falsehoods on his résumé. Upon resigning, O'Leary admitted to including fabricated athletic and academic credentials on his résumé. His resignation, however, did not negatively affect his coaching career, which prospered nonetheless.

LOCALE: Notre Dame, Indiana

CATEGORIES: Hoaxes, frauds, and charlatanism; sports; public morals; ethics

KEY FIGURES

George O'Leary (b. 1946), head football coach at the University of Notre Dame

John Hussey (1943-2008), sportswriter for the Manchester, New Hampshire, Union Leader

Jim Fennell (fl. early twenty-first century), reporter for the Manchester, New Hampshire, Union Leader

Kevin White (b. 1950), athletic director, University of Notre Dame

Louis M. Nanni (b. 1962), vice president of university relations, University of Notre Dame

Edward A. Malloy (b. 1941), president of the University of Notre Dame

SUMMARY OF EVENT

In late 2001, after a turbulent five-season tenure, University of Notre Dame head football coach Bob Davie was asked to resign. On December 9, shortly after Davie's departure, George O'Leary, then head football coach of the Georgia Institute of Technology (Georgia Tech), was hired to replace Davie. Shortly after he accepted the prestigious position, questions began to surface about discrepancies on O'Leary's résumé.

O'Leary stated on his résumé that he earned a master's degree in education from the State University of New York, Stony Brook. He also claimed to have earned three athletic letters playing football at the University of New Hampshire (UNH). Notre Dame officials requested that O'Leary resign as head coach after learning of his faked credentials—athletic and academic.

O'Leary began his football coaching career at Central Islip High School in New York in 1975. He continued as a high school football coach in New York until 1980, when he began coaching college football at Syracuse University. While at Syracuse, he served as the defensive-line coach and assistant head coach for six years. After he left Syracuse, he became the defensive-line coach for the San Diego Chargers of the National Football League (NFL).

In 1994, O'Leary accepted the head coaching position at Georgia Tech. During his eight seasons there, he led the Yellow Jackets to a 52-33 record, which included a five-year run in bowl appearances beginning in 1997. In 1998 and 2000, he was recognized as Coach of the Year by the Atlantic Coast Conference. In 2000, he was honored with the Bobby Dodd Award as national coach of the year. Before leaving for Notre Dame, O'Leary was considered one of Georgia Tech's most prominent and successful coaches. However, he also had a few problems while coaching at Georgia. In 1999, the National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA) sanctioned him for improperly lending money to a former Georgia running back. It was also later revealed that Georgia used eleven ineligible football players between the 1998-1999 and 2004-2005 seasons.

Hearing of Notre Dame's decision to hire O'Leary, John Hussey, a sportswriter for the Manchester, New Hampshire, Union Leader, began his research for a report on O'Leary's accomplishment for the local newspaper. Hussey read O'Leary's résumé, in which the coach claimed to have played football at UNH, and interviewed O'Leary's former coach and teammates from UNH, neither of whom could recall O'Leary playing in a single game for the Wildcats. Upon further investigation, Hussey found that the coach did not play sports at UNH, and he certainly did not earn three letters in football.

Hussey reported his findings to Jim Fennell, another reporter for the Union Leader, who broke the story nationwide. On December 12, administrative officials from Notre Dame approached O'Leary regarding his claim to have received three letters in football at UNH. When questioned, O'Leary admitted to including false information about his early athletic career. Feeling shamed and embarrassed, he offered to immediately resign as the head football coach. Notre Dame officials, however, refused to accept his resignation. The vice president of university relations, Louis M. Nanni, and athletic director Kevin White agreed to overlook the misleading credentials and work with O'Leary to prepare a public apology.

The next day, however, more questions surfaced about O'Leary's résumé, this time concerning his academic background at Stony Brook. Notre Dame officials discovered that O'Leary had completed only two classes during his two semesters at Stony Brook. O'Leary later admitted that he had never earned his master's degree there. Nanni and White met with Notre Dame president Edward A. Malloy and decided that they could no longer allow O'Leary to continue as their head football coach. Without having coached a single game, O'Leary was asked to resign. He presented his formal resignation on December 14, only five days into the job, saying in a statement released by the university, "Due to a selfish and thoughtless act many years ago, I have personally embarrassed Notre Dame, its alumni and fans."

IMPACT

The résumé scandal at Notre Dame did not negatively affect O'Leary's coaching career. Indeed, his career prospered. In 2002, he was hired as the defensive coordinator for the Minnesota Vikings of the NFL. After spending two years coaching Minnesota, O'Leary left the Vikings and accepted the head coaching position at the University of Central Florida (UCF). During his career as the Knights' head coach, O'Leary raised the expectations for the football team and was credited with increasing his players' athletic and academic performances. In 2005, O'Leary was recognized as the Conference USA Coach of the Year and he also signed a new multiple-year contract with UCF.

Notre Dame's termination of O'Leary was one in a series of high-profile firings of college coaches for actual or perceived misconduct. In September, 2000, Bobby Knight, the head coach of the men's basketball team at Indiana University, was fired for a sequence of unacceptable actions that included allegations of choking a player. In March, 2003, Jim Harrick, head men's basketball coach at the University of Georgia, resigned under pressure after accusations surfaced that athletes received credit for classes they did not attend. Also, in May, 2003, Larry Eustachy, head men's basketball coach at Iowa State University, was forced to resign after he was seen in photographs drinking alcohol with students, as well as kissing female students.

—Ryan Patten and Laurel Mae Chang

FURTHER READING

Callahan, David. The Cheating Culture: Why More Americans are Doing Wrong to Get Ahead. Orlando, Fla.: Harcourt, 2004. This book discusses why people choose to cheat to gain an advantage over their competitors. It also devotes a chapter about résumé padding, and discusses the Notre Dame résumé scandal involving George O'Leary. Keyes, Ralph. The Post-Truth Era: Dishonesty and Deception in Contemporary Life. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2004. Examines why individuals falsify information, and discusses the George O'Leary scandal in the chapter "Great Pretenders."

Kidwell, Roland E., Jr. "'Small' Lies, Big Trouble: The Unfortunate Consequences of Résumé Padding, from Janet Cooke to George O'Leary." Journal of Business Ethics 51, no. 2 (2004): 175-184. A historical study of the effects of including inaccurate information on résumés. Also addresses the George O'Leary scandal.

Mandel, Stewart. Bowls, Polls, and Tattered Souls: Tackling the Chaos and Controversy that Reign over College Football. Hoboken, N.J.: John Wiley & Sons, 2007. This book provides a detailed, behind-the-scenes look at notorious university scandals involving athletics, including the O'Leary scandal at Notre Dame.

Staurowsky, Ellen J. "Piercing the Veil of Amateurism: Commercialization, Corruption, and U.S. College Sports." In The Commercialization of Sport, edited by Trevor Slack. New York: Routledge, 2004. Staurowsky discusses how amateur athletics in the United States has become a commercialized and corrupt spectacle.

SEE ALSO: Feb. 25, 1987: NCAA Imposes "Death Penalty" on Southern Methodist University Football; Aug. 27, 2001: Little League Baseball Star Danny Almonte Is Found to Be Overage; Mar. 27, 2002: Georgia Basketball Coach Jim Harrick, Sr., Resigns over Fraud Allegations; May 3, 2003: University of Alabama Fires New Football Coach in Sex Scandal; July 14, 2006: New York Times Exposes Grading Scandal at Auburn University; Aug. 20, 2007: Football Star Michael Vick Pleads Guilty to Financing a Dogfighting Ring; Sept. 13, 2007: New England Patriots Football Team Is Fined for Spying on Other Teams.

January 4, 2002

HISTORIAN STEPHEN E. AMBROSE IS ACCUSED OF PLAGIARISM

The Weekly Standard reported that Stephen E. Ambrose, one of the most widely read scholars of American history, had plagiarized material from a closely related historical work for one of his own best-selling military histories, The Wild Blue (2001). Subsequent investigations revealing that Ambrose had plagiarized other works damaged his reputation as an academic historian but had little negative impact on his popularity with general readers.

LOCALE: United States

CATEGORIES: Cultural and intellectual history; education; hoaxes, frauds, and charlatanism; plagiarism; publishing and journalism

KEY FIGURES

Stephen E. Ambrose (1936-2002), American historian and best-selling author

Thomas Childers (b. 1946), American history professor

Fred Barnes (b. 1934), executive editor of The Weekly Standard

SUMMARY OF EVENT

One of the greatest writers of popular American history, Stephen E. Ambrose became the center of a plagiarism scandal that broke in an article first posted on the Web site of The Weekly Standard on January 4, 2002. The scandal, which sent shock waves through the history profession, also encompassed his colleague Doris Kearns Goodwin the same month. Before the scandal broke, Ambrose, who began his career teaching at the University of New Orleans, had earned fame and fortune writing numerous books on popular topics in military and political history, most of which sold millions of copies. His major works include Undaunted Courage (1996), Band of Brothers (1992), D-Day (1994), and Citizen Soldiers (1997).

As his fame grew, Ambrose retired from his academic position and went into business for himself as Ambrose & Ambrose, Inc., which included his son, Hugh, as his agent and all of his children as research assistants. Ambrose, who saw and promoted himself as a storyteller, increasingly became a cottage industry in the field of popular history, and his publications correspondingly increased during the 1990's. He also served as a tour guide and film consultant and wrote books that included textbooks and personal memoirs. His most famous effort in the area of entertainment was as a consultant for the film Saving Private Ryan (1998) and the television miniseries Band of Brothers (2001).

Fred Barnes, executive editor of The Weekly Standard, revealed in "Stephen Ambrose, Copycat" that the popular writer had closely copied passages from Thomas Childers's Wings of the Morning: The Story of the Last American Bomber Shot Down over Germany in World War II (1995) for The Wild Blue: The Men and Boys Who Flew the B-24s over Germany (2001), a popular book essentially about the same subject. Barnes's story in The Weekly Standard, actually a review of these two books, not only cast a shadow on academic history but also further separated Ambrose from the profession.

The scandal centered on both Ambrose's overuse of quotations from Childers's book—the story of the World War II bomber crew of Childers's uncle—and from Ambrose's failure to properly identify them as quotations. What indicated that Ambrose's work was more than a matter of simple oversight or sloppiness was the frequency with which he appropriated Childers's material without acknowledging the source and his substitution of close paraphrasing for actual quoting of the secondary material.

Because Ambrose had relied heavily on Childers to access the primary sources he indirectly quoted, Ambrose was seen as a popular historian profiting from the hard work and original research of a historian who was less well known. Beyond the immediate issue of plagiarism, the scandal included Ambrose's attempt to defend himself and deflect the issue. He tried to deny that what he did was plagiarism, noting that he gave generous credit to earlier works in his book's acknowledgments, and he insisted that the lifted materials represented a small percentage of all he had written. He also argued that he was not "writing a Ph.D. dissertation" and accused his accusers, particularly academics, of having an agenda against him. At the same time, Ambrose's publishers tried to play down his wrongdoings, suggesting that the issues in question were mere oversights. Furthermore, Ambrose made no offer to search out other errors, even after he conceded those already exposed.

Childers, though outraged, initially chose not to speak publicly against the widely acclaimed Ambrose. A professor of German history at the University of Pennsylvania who had decided to put aside his usual scholarship to write a more personal history based on his uncle's letters, he understood he was in many ways following Ambrose's path. As publicity over the scandal increased, however, Childers spoke out, and Ambrose's scholarly reputation was increasingly called into question.

Eventually, Ambrose would deny that he was an academic writer, although the public would continue to see him as just that. Academic historians, too, considered him an academic writer, although Ambrose initially had the support of prominent academic historians such as Eric Foner, a past president of the American Historical Association. Although Ambrose had not been on the faculty of any university for years, his academic pedigree was widely recognized enough that people began to ask whether he got away with plagiarism because he had no position to lose. However, Ambrose's reputation continued to suffer, as revelations emerged that he had copied sources beyond the Childers book.

Ambrose was soon accused of plagiarism in writing other books, most notably Upton and the Army (1964), which had been based heavily on Peter Michie's The Life and Letters of Emory Upton, published in 1885. These discoveries led to further criticisms of Ambrose's scholarly methods. In Upton and the Army, Ambrose had followed his by-then familiar pattern of giving effusive credit to a source that he then failed to properly cite. Further investigation of Upton and the Army revealed the more egregious lifting of sources that went well beyond Michie.

Ambrose never fully recovered from the scandal. In February, 2002, one month after the story of his plagiarism broke, he announced that he was abandoning his works in progress to focus on his memoirs; six months later he died of lung cancer. Although his books continued to be widely read, his reputation as America's topmost authority on military history was permanently damaged. Remaining is the nagging question of why he did what he did. One possible explanation was the pressure he felt to produce. Also, many have argued that because he was no longer an academic historian—that he was not affiliated with an educational institution—he likely believed that he did not have to abide by the ethics and rules of academia.

IMPACT

The Ambrose scandal had a significant impact on the public's perception of history and on the self-perception of historians as a whole, especially in regard to the line between academic and popular history. In particular, the scandal has raised the question of whether celebrity historians such as Ambrose should be treated differently than their less-famous colleagues.

Aside from the fact that Ambrose was accountable to no academic institution, the success of his plagiarism also raises the issue of the complicity of editors and publishers when dealing with a writer of Ambrose's stature and popularity. Additionally, some commentators have suggested that had the history profession not chosen to make an issue of the plagiarism, Ambrose might have suffered far less consequences.

Finally, beyond the question of plagiarism, the scandal raised the issue of whether history writing, even popular history writing, is about more than simply collecting, arranging, and rehashing established facts. In the end, while academic historians have distanced themselves from Ambrose and his work, his books remain popular with general readers, most likely because they have not heard of the scandal.

—Susan Roth Breitzer

FURTHER READING

Ambrose, Stephen. The Wild Blue: The Men and Boys Who Flew the B-24s over Germany. New York: Simon & Schuster, 2001. Ambrose's popular account of World War II bomber pilots that became the source of the plagiarism scandal.

Barnes, Fred. "Stephen Ambrose, Copycat." The Weekly Standard, January 14, 2002. The article, written as a review of Ambrose's The Wild Blue and Childers's Wings of the Morning, which broke the scandal.

Childers, Thomas. Wings of the Morning: The Story of the Last American Bomber Shot Down over Germany in World War II. New York: Perseus, 1995. The original account of a World War II bomber squadron from which Ambrose copied material for The Wild Blue.

Hoffer, Peter Charles. Past Imperfect: Facts, Fictions, Fraud—American History from Bancroft and Parkman to Ambrose, Bellesiles, Ellis, and Goodwin. New York: PublicAffairs, 2003. A close examination of the state of the American history profession, with a focus on problems of fraud and fabrication and their resultant scandals, including that of Ambrose.

Stephen E. Ambrose Is Accused of Plagiarism

Skinner, David. "Cheating History: Ambrose, Bellesiles, Ellis, and Goodwin—The Historians Who Let Us Down." The Weekly Standard, November 29, 2004. Focuses on a dozen key controversies ranging across the political spectrum and representative of a wide variety of charges of falsifying work or other academic fraud.

Weiner, John. Historians in Trouble: Plagiarism, Fraud, and Politics in the Ivory Tower. New York: New Press, 1995. A study of academic scandals in the fields of history and the humanities. Includes the chapter "The Plagiarists: Doris Kearns Goodwin and Stephen Ambrose."

SEE ALSO: June 5, 1944: Australian Poets Claim Responsibility for a Literary Hoax; Jan. 28, 1972: Clifford Irving Admits Faking Howard Hughes Memoirs; 1978: Roots Author Alex Haley Is Sued for Plagiarism; Dec. 3, 1989: Martin Luther King, Jr.'s, Doctoral-Thesis Plagiarism Is Revealed; Apr., 1998: Scottish Historian Is Charged with Plagiarism; May 11, 1998: Journalist Stephen Glass Is Exposed as a Fraud; June 18, 2001: Historian Joseph J. Ellis Is Accused of Lying; Jan. 18, 2002: Historian Doris Kearns Goodwin Is Accused of Plagiarism; Oct. 25, 2002: Historian Michael A. Bellesiles Resigns After Academic Fraud Accusations; July 24, 2007: University of Colorado Fires Professor for Plagiarism and Research Falsification.

January 6, 2002

BOSTON GLOBE REPORTS ON CHILD SEXUAL ABUSE BY ROMAN CATHOLIC PRIESTS

A series of articles in the Boston Globe revealed the systematic efforts of the Roman Catholic archdiocese to cover up incidents of sexual abuse by priests and to silence victims wishing to bring these crimes to the attention of authorities and the public. The revelations touched off a nationwide flurry of accusations by others claiming of similar abuse, some of whom were molested decades earlier, as children.

LOCALE: Boston, Massachusetts

CATEGORIES: Publishing and journalism; sex crimes; religion; public morals; families and children; law and the courts

KEY FIGURES

Bernard Law (b. 1931), Catholic cardinal and archbishop of Boston, 1984-2002

John Geoghan (1935-2003), Catholic priest

Mitchell Garabedian (b. 1952), Boston attorney
Constance M. Sweeney (b. 1950), Superior Court judge in Massachusetts

Joseph Birmingham (1934-1989), Catholic priest

Paul Shanley (b. 1931), Catholic priest

Wilton D. Gregory (b. 1947), president, U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, 2001-2004

Frank Keating (b. 1944), governor of Oklahoma, 1995-2003

John Paul II (Karol Józef Wojtyła; 1920-2005), Catholic pope, 1978-2005

Benedict XVI (Joseph Alois Ratzinger; b. 1927), Catholic pope, 2005-

SUMMARY OF EVENT

On January 6, 2002, the Boston Globe ran the first of what would be hundreds of news stories detailing sexual abuse by Roman Catholic clergy. The initial story, "Church Allowed Abuse by Priest for Years," focused on John Geoghan, a Catholic priest defrocked in 1998, whose eighty-six known victims accused him of molesting them. Some of his acts dated back more than three decades.

The exposure of an individual member of the clergy as a sex offender was not new to the Church. Cases had been reported in Boston and elsewhere for at least half a century. What made the 2002 story unusual, and what would eventually have a catastrophic impact on the Catholic Church in Boston and indeed throughout the country and the world, was the revelation that Geoghan and other priests had been protected from exposure and prosecution by Church authorities who had frequently reassigned priests from parish to parish, provided clandestine settlements to their accusers in return for keeping incidents secret, and in some cases intimidated victims by threatening retribution if they made their accusations public.

The Boston sexual abuse scandal began during the mid-1990's when attorney Mitchell Garabedian began filing suits on behalf of plaintiffs claiming to have been sexually assaulted by Geoghan. To determine whether other victims or other abusers existed, Garabedian petitioned for access to Church records. Because courts throughout the United States historically considered these records private, Garabedian's request was denied. However, in the course of legal proceedings in July, 2001, Boston's archbishop, Cardinal Bernard Law, admitted he had known of accusations against Geoghan since 1984 and was aware the priest had been transferred among parishes rather than removed from ministry.

Learning of Law's admission and sensing there might be a larger story, the new editor of the Boston Globe set out to have the court grant the newspaper access to Church files. After months of argument, Superior Court judge Constance M. Sweeney ruled that the Church would be required to turn over all relevant documents to the Boston Globe. Although archdiocesan attorneys appealed, Sweeney stood firm by her order that documents be released by January, 2002. Meanwhile, a special investigative unit at the paper began compiling stories based on interviews with alleged victims of Geoghan and others and documenting what it believed was a long-standing systematic attempt by Church authorities to protect pedophiles—alleged and proven—from exposure and prosecution.

When it broke the initial story about Geoghan, the paper invited other victims to contact reporters with additional information. The paper received a flood of correspondence outlining abuses by dozens of priests, some cases dating back into the 1940's. Initially, the activities of two other priests generated significant interest.

The Reverend Paul Shanley, formerly in the Boston archdiocese but at this time working in California, was accused of having sexually molested boys as early as 1966. For years, Shanley was vocal in challenging the Church's position on homosexuality and was associated with the North American Man/Boy Love Association, which advocates for consensual sex between men and boys. Shanley denied all charges, but a chorus of accusers outlined for news media and attorneys the many instances during which he had taken advantage of their trust. An even more egregious case was that involving the Reverend Joseph Birmingham, who had died in 1989. More than one hundred people came forward to relate stories of how, for more than thirty years, Birmingham had molested children.

Investigators poring over Church records discovered that Law and his predecessors had been aware of the criminal acts of Geoghan, Shanley, Birmingham, and others. Instead of removing them from ministry, however, they allowed priests accused of sex offenses to continue serving in parishes. In some cases, these men were given increasingly more important and sensitive assignments while victims were discouraged from pursuing claims against the accused. Technically, Church officials could claim they broke no laws, because priests were exempt from civil statutes requiring officials involved in counseling or health care to report cases of suspected abuse. The Massachusetts legislature moved quickly to close that loophole in February, 2002.

Although Geoghan was tried and convicted of one count of sexual abuse in February, 2002, the Boston Globe continued its series on the scandal, having identified nearly one hundred priests who had at one time been accused of sexually abusing minors. As weeks passed, what started out as a local scandal quickly became a national catastrophe for the Catholic Church. Emboldened by what they saw happening in Boston, victims of clergy abuse in dioceses across the United States began telling their stories publicly. Some had already received compensation and counseling, but the media was able to make a strong case that the problem was endemic throughout the Catholic Church in the United States. The media focused on the behavior of bishops and other Church officials in attempting to keep these incidents secret while allowing known sex offenders to continue in ministries often involving children. These official Church actions bordered on criminal misconduct. One attorney even suggested that Church officials be prosecuted under the federal law designed to root out organized crime in America.

John Geoghan, left, a defrocked Roman Catholic priest, listens in court in January, 2002, after he is convicted of sexually assaulting a boy in 1991. (AP/Wide World Photos)

In Boston, Cardinal Law initially attempted to stonewall attempts by the Boston Globe to pursue its investigation and dealt peremptorily with media and Catholic laypersons who peppered him for additional information. He refused to meet with victims, questioned the veracity of some accusations, repeatedly suggested he had not been aware of many of the incidents, and sought in other ways to deflect blame from the Church hierarchy. His actions seemed only to spur additional media attention and eventually turned many laypersons against the Church. Particularly outraged were victims-rights groups such as the Survivors' Network of those Abused by Priests (SNAP), an organization founded in 1989. While Law was insisting that confidentiality was required to protect both the victim and the accused, a number of influential lay leaders began calling the scandal the American Catholic Church's Watergate. Catholics held protests outside churches in Boston, and calls for Law's resignation began almost immediately.

At the national level, the president of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, Wilton D. Gregory, began working on measures for dealing with the spiraling problem facing his fellow prelates. By the June, 2002, meeting of the American bishops in Dallas, Gregory had managed to draft a document outlining ways bishops should deal with sex offenders under their jurisdiction. Gregory's proposal included participation by the laity in reviewing cases of clergy sexual abuse. After significant debate, the document was approved. Because each bishop in the Catholic Church can act with relative autonomy within his diocese, however, Gregory had no way of enforcing these policies. Similar guidelines had been suggested during the mid-1990's after a scandal in Chicago, but a number of bishops—including Cardinal Law—had argued against them because they infringed on a bishop's discretionary authority. Additionally, before these procedures could be formally adopted, officials in Rome were required to approve them as well.

Despite these barriers, Gregory took the extraordinary step of appointing a thirteen-member lay commission, a national review board, to assist bishops in addressing issues concerning clergy accused of abuse. Frank Keating, the governor of Oklahoma and a strong Catholic, agreed to lead this board. The national review board was not well received by many bishops, though, as some considered it an undue intrusion of the laity into matters that had traditionally been handled by the clergy under the terms of canon law, the documents governing the organization and operation of the Church worldwide.

Prior to the June meeting, Gregory went to Rome to seek assistance from Pope John Paul II. Unfortunately, the Vatican tried to distance itself from the scandal in the United States. Already aware that sexual abuse by clergy was a worldwide problem, in 2001 the pope appointed a commission headed by Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger (the future Pope Benedict XVI), the conservative theologian then serving as prefect of the congregation for the doctrine of the faith, to propose a method for handling the problem. Their solution was a mandate: Rather than permitting reassignment, every accused was to be brought before a secret clerical tribunal.

Although the pope met with Gregory and other American prelates to discuss the growing scandal, he suggested the bishops would have to handle matters themselves. Meanwhile, Vatican officials identified two main causes for the widespread sexual abuse: a lax moral climate in which some priests were seduced to forget their calling, and the presence of gays among the clergy. Some lay Catholics and people outside the Church blamed the problem on the requirement that priests remain celibate, but the Vatican refused to consider this possibility. Neither in the United States or Rome was there any acknowledgment that clerical culture, in which priests tended to protect each other while maintaining the facade of perfection for their actions, might lie at the root of the problem.

Church officials in Rome found guidelines approved in Dallas unacceptable. A new commission consisting of American bishops and representatives of the Vatican drafted a compromise document that curtailed involvement by the laity and instead dictated that accused priests have cases heard by clerical tribunals. The revised policies were approved by the American bishops at a meeting in November.

By the fall of 2002, Law began to see the hopelessness of his position as Boston's Catholic leader. He finally met with victims to learn firsthand of their pain, but his gestures at reconciliation were too late. As the year drew to a close, suits against the Boston archdiocese were mounting. Garabedian was representing eighty-six clients, a Boston law firm was litigating against 135 priests, and other firms were involved in representing dozens of other victims. Many of the plaintiffs were suing not only the offenders but also Church officials. Law worked out a secret deal with Garabedian to settle with Geoghan's victims for somewhere between $35 and $50 million, but the deal was vetoed by his finance council, a group of lay leaders who did not want Church donations paying for priests' crimes. In early December, rumors began spreading that the archdiocese would file for bankruptcy to shield itself from further lawsuits.

Law flew to Rome and offered his resignation to the pope, who accepted it on December 13. By this time nearly every diocese in the United States had been touched by the scandal, and more than twelve hundred priests had been identified as abusers by nearly five thousand alleged victims. The Boston Globe ran its investigative series for more than a year, after publishing nearly nine hundred articles. The paper, which won a Pulitzer Prize in 2003 for the series, also added extensive coverage of the scandal to its Web site (boston.com/globe/spotlight/abuse/).

IMPACT

The effect of the sex abuse scandal on the Church in the United States was devastating, and it extended far beyond a single diocese. Already suffering from a shortage of priests, bishops were forced to remove more than four hundred from active ministry as a result of charges brought against them. Five bishops also were forced to resign. A handful of accused priests were tried for their crimes. Geoghan, who had gone to jail in 2002, was murdered in prison by another inmate the year after he was incarcerated. Shanley was convicted and sentenced to jail in 2005. Across the United States a number of accused priests committed suicide, and one was shot by one of his victims.

Lawsuits from individuals who had been abused in the past were settled for sums running into the hundreds of millions of dollars. For example, the Boston archdiocese eventually paid $85 million to settle claims; the archdiocese of Los Angeles paid more than $600 million, Orange (California) $100 million, Dallas $31 million, and Louisville paid nearly $26 million. Because the Church traditionally considered each diocese an independent financial entity, individual bishops had to meet these financial obligations. As a result, many dioceses filed for bankruptcy protection between 2002 and 2007.

The effect on the Catholic laity was equally devastating. Taught to trust clergy as guides of morality and character, millions were shocked and repulsed by the growing litany of accusations. Church attendance sagged and financial contributions plummeted. Many lay people who wished to help reform the Church organized groups such as Voice of the Faithful, but their efforts were frequently rebuffed by Church officials fearful of giving the laity too strong a role in oversight of Church matters. This rejection led to even further distrust and alienation, and many influential Catholics were vocal in their resentment toward the American bishops and the Vatican.

Outside the Church, many Americans who already possessed anti-Catholic or antireligious sentiments took the opportunity to revel in the predicament Catholics were experiencing. Many people, however, including clergy from other Christian denominations and those from other faiths, expressed regret and sympathy for Catholics.

The stigma attached to the priesthood in the United States prompted John Paul II's successor, Pope Benedict XVI, to speak frequently of the matter and offer numerous apologies during his April, 2008, visit to the United States. Benedict even met with some of the victims to offer the Church's regrets for what had happened to them at the hands of men they trusted.

—Laurence W. Mazzeno

FURTHER READING

Berry, Jason, and Gerald Renner. Vows of Silence: The Abuse of Power in the Papacy of John Paul II. New York: Free Press, 2004. Explores what the authors consider to be a decades-long systematic attempt by the Vatican to cover up or ignore charges of sexual abuse by priests in the United States and elsewhere.

Cozzens, Donald B. The Changing Face of the Priesthood. Collegeville, Minn.: Liturgical Press, 2000. Examines reasons for the difficulties experienced by the Church in the United States in attracting a healthy cross-section of potential priests. Includes a chapter on the priesthood's long-standing problems of pedophilia and molestation.

France, David. Our Fathers: The Secret Life of the Catholic Church in an Age of Scandal. New York: Broadway Books, 2004. Account of the scandal's background and a detailed chronology and analysis of the crisis. Discusses the systematic attempts of Church officials to keep the scandal out of the public eye. Includes a list of principal figures and an extensive bibliography.

Greeley, Andrew M. Priests: A Calling in Crisis. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2004. Systematic examination of the priesthood in the aftermath of the 2002 scandal. Designed to explain the nature of the priesthood, dispel myths about the causes for the unusually large number of pedophiles identified subsequent to initial reports of incidents in Boston, and outline root causes for the problems plaguing the Church in the United States.

Investigative Staff of the Boston Globe. Betrayal: The Crisis in the Catholic Church. Boston: Little, Brown, 2002. Detailed coverage of the unearthing of the sex abuse scandal. Includes victims' graphic stories as well as discussion of the alleged official cover-up and reactions to the scandal.

Jenkins, Philip. Pedophiles and Priests: Anatomy of a Contemporary Crisis. 1996. New ed. Bridgewater, N.J.: Replica Books, 2000. Describes the climate in the Church that fostered reticence among those in authority to deal with matters of sexual abuse. Offers a historical perspective on the issue, which has plagued the Church for decades, if not longer.

SEE ALSO: Feb. 23, 1963: Play Accuses Pope Pius XII of Complicity in the Holocaust; May 20, 1974: French Cardinal Daniélou Dies in a Prostitute's House; Sept. 10, 1981: Chicago Sun-Times Reports That Cardinal Cody Diverted Church Funds; Aug. 6, 1982: Banco Ambrosiano Collapses Amid Criminal Accusations; Aug. 12, 1983-July 27, 1990: McMartin Preschool Is Embroiled in Child-Abuse Case; May 6, 1992: Irish Bishop Eamonn Casey's Romantic Affair Leads to His Resignation; Mar. 4, 1999: Quebec Offers Support for Abused Duplessis Orphans; June 30, 2001: Korean Religious Teacher Jung Myung Seok Is Charged with Rape.

January 18, 2002

HISTORIAN DORIS KEARNS GOODWIN IS ACCUSED OF PLAGIARISM

*Doris Kearns Goodwin, a Harvard University professor and author of several award-winning books, was accused of plagiarizing another author's work for her best-selling and award-winning history The Fitzgeralds and the Kennedys (1987). Goodwin created further scandal when it was revealed that in 1987, she had paid off the author whose work she plagiarized.*

LOCALE: United States

CATEGORIES: Cultural and intellectual history; education; hoaxes, frauds, and charlatanism; plagiarism; publishing and journalism

KEY FIGURES

Doris Kearns Goodwin (b. 1943), professor of American history and author

Lynne McTaggart (b. 1951), journalist and author
Bo Crader (fl. early twenty-first century), Weekly Standard editorial staff member

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Doris Kearns Goodwin, a Harvard University professor, political commentator, and well-regarded historian, is also the author of award-winning books. No Ordinary Time: Franklin and Eleanor Roosevelt—The Home Front in World War II (1994), a history of the Roosevelt White House during the years of World War II, won a Pulitzer Prize in 1995, and The Fitzgeralds and the Kennedys: An American Saga (1987), became the basis for the popular television series The Kennedys of Massachusetts.

Goodwin, whose career began as a White House Fellow and later special assistant to President Lyndon B. Johnson, also served as a Public Broadcasting Service commentator, covering the Democratic and Republican National Conventions and the presidential debates. Considering her professional credentials, it came as a shock when Bo Crader of The Weekly Standard reported on January 18, 2002, that Goodwin had plagiarized some of her most highly regarded books. The article, "A Historian and Her Sources," came just two weeks after the same periodical revealed the plagiarism of American historian Stephen E. Ambrose. The Goodwin scandal also involved earlier efforts by Goodwin to head off potential negative publicity in a hush-money arrangement with the author whom she had plagiarized.

The Fitzgeralds and the Kennedys, Goodwin's book that raised questions of plagiarism, had been on the best-seller list of The New York Times for five months and had won numerous awards after it was published in 1987. It was widely known before the scandal broke that Goodwin relied on an earlier history of the Kennedy family by Lynne McTaggart called Kathleen Kennedy: Her Life and Times (1983) in writing her own book. What remained unnoticed, however, was Goodwin's use of numerous quotations from McTaggart's book without attribution. Furthermore, McTaggart, a journalist by profession, had written her book in a style and format that used few footnotes, which made tracing the book's primary sources difficult and encouraged reliance on the finished work for direct quotations. Nonetheless, Goodwin's plagiarism raised a question that also came up in the Ambrose case: Did Goodwin, a popular historian, profit from the original research of a predecessor? Goodwin's case also brought up the issue of failing to fully acknowledge secondary sources.

Making matters worse was Goodwin's effort to settle her plagiarism without publicity. In 1987, soon after The Fitzgeralds and the Kennedys was published, McTaggart noticed the misappropriation of her work. She contacted Goodwin through an attorney, who threatened a lawsuit for copyright infringement. Goodwin responded by negotiating a deal in which her publisher would pay McTaggart a significant sum in exchange for her silence; Goodwin also promised to add the necessary quotation marks, attributions, or both in future editions of the book. Even as she sought to settle with McTaggart, however, Goodwin insisted that the omissions had been unintentional and few in number. She blamed many of the errors on her poor note-taking skills. McTaggart agreed to the arrangement because she did not want to harm Goodwin's reputation. However, when the 2001 edition of The Fitzgeralds and the Kennedys failed to include many of the agreed-upon changes—Goodwin later claimed that to have done so would have broken the flow of the narrative—McTaggart decided to go public with the story. In an interview with The Weekly Standard, published on January 23, she said, "There is a moral issue in general that needs to be examined. The only reason I'm talking now is just to set the record straight. At least let's have the full story."

Doris Kearns Goodwin speaks at a history forum in St. Paul, Minnesota, in March, 2002. It was her first public appearance since she was accused of plagiarism. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The scandal-breaking Weekly Standard article of January 18 led to great controversy both within the history profession and among American readers. Goodwin's most highly regarded work, No Ordinary Time, also became the center of scandal when it, too, was found to include plagiarized passages. A number of historians rushed to Goodwin's defense, most publicly in a letter to the editor in The New York Times (October 25, 2003) that was signed by prominent historians, including Sean Wilentz, David Halberstam, and Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., a close colleague. The letter denied that she committed plagiarism, a claim that provoked even more scandal. Critics of the letter said it was nothing more than an effort to deny the truth and rewrite the very definition of plagiarism, all for the sake of protecting a famous historian.

The American Historical Association issued a statement rejecting one defense, which claimed that Goodwin's apparent lack of intent meant that she did not plagiarize. The controversy soon took on a political dimension, as Goodwin's supporters accused her accusers of a political conspiracy against her, a charge that was fairly plausible given her prominence in liberal political circles. After the story became fully public, however, Goodwin worked to have errors and omissions corrected as they were identified.

IMPACT

The Goodwin scandal had its greatest impact in its exposure of the problem of plagiarism and cheating at the highest levels of historical scholarship, calling into question the integrity of a prominent historian and the validity of her work. Her defenders raised the issue of intention, arguing that intention matters in the definition of plagiarism.

For a time, the damage was done. Goodwin was dropped as a PBS commentator for the 2004 election season, and she also resigned her position with the Pulitzer Prize selection committee. However, the media-savvy Goodwin worked effectively to rehabilitate her image. She hired a media consultant and even made an appearance on The Late Show with David Letterman to poke fun at herself and explain the scandal. She eventually left her faculty position at Harvard University, although she remained on its board of overseers.

Commentators have reminded readers about the seriousness of both Goodwin's plagiarism and her attempts to cover it up; still, she made a comeback with Team of Rivals: The Political Genius of Abraham Lincoln (2005). She also became a popular public speaker and remains a widely admired historian. Her Web site carefully avoids mention of the scandal, making only the briefest reference to The Fitzgeralds and the Kennedys.

—Susan Roth Breitner

FURTHER READING

Crader, Bo. "A Historian and Her Sources." The Weekly Standard, January 28, 2002. The article that broke the Goodwin scandal to the public. First published on the periodical's Web site on January 18.

Goodwin, Doris Kearns. The Fitzgeralds and the Kennedys: An American Saga. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1987. The nine-hundred-page Kennedy family history that became the center of the plagiarism scandal.

Hoffer, Peter Charles. Past Imperfect: Facts, Fictions, Fraud—American History from Bancroft and Parkman to Ambrose, Belleslies, Ellis, and Goodwin. New York: PublicAffairs, 2003. A history of the American history profession, with a focus on modern problems and scandals.

McTaggart, Lynne. "Fame Can't Excuse a Plagiarist." The New York Times, March 16, 2002. An opinion article, written shortly after the scandal broke, in which McTaggart claims that Goodwin appropriated thousands of her words from Kathleen Kennedy.

Doris Kearns Goodwin Is Accused of Plagiarism

_____. Kathleen Kennedy: Her Life and Times. New York: Dial Press, 1983. The biography of U.S. president John F. Kennedy's sister, from which Doris Kearns Goodwin was accused of stealing material.

Weiner, John. Historians in Trouble: Plagiarism, Fraud, and Politics in the Ivory Tower. New York: New Press, 1995. A study of academic scandals in the fields of history and the humanities. Includes the chapter "The Plagiarists: Doris Kearns Goodwin and Stephen Ambrose."

SEE ALSO: June 5, 1944: Australian Poets Claim Responsibility for a Literary Hoax; Jan. 28, 1972: Clifford Irving Admits Faking Howard Hughes Memoirs; 1978: Roots Author Alex Haley Is Sued for Plagiarism; Dec. 3, 1989: Martin Luther King, Jr.'s, Doctoral-Thesis Plagiarism Is Revealed; Apr., 1998: Scottish Historian Is Charged with Plagiarism; May 11, 1998: Journalist Stephen Glass Is Exposed as a Fraud; June 18, 2001: Historian Joseph J. Ellis Is Accused of Lying; Jan. 4, 2002: Historian Stephen E. Ambrose Is Accused of Plagiarism; Oct. 25, 2002: Historian Michael A. Bellesiles Resigns After Academic Fraud Accusations; July 24, 2007: University of Colorado Fires Professor for Plagiarism and Research Falsification.

February 11, 2002FRENCH JUDGE ADMITS FAVORING RUSSIAN FIGURE SKATERS IN WINTER OLYMPICS

During the 2002 Winter Olympic Games in Utah, judges awarded the Russian figure skating pair the gold medal in a decision that led to major controversy, as many thought the Canadian silver medalists deserved to win gold instead. The French judge soon admitted that her federation had pressured her to vote for the Russians in a deal designed to help the French ice dancing couple. The scandal resulted in the awarding of a second gold medal and the creation of a new judging system for figure skating at the international level of competition.

ALSO KNOWN AS: SkategateLOCALE: Salt Lake City, UtahCATEGORIES: Corruption; sports; international relationsKEY FIGURES

Marie Reine Le Gougne (b. 1961), French pairs-skating judge

Jamie Salé (b. 1977), Canadian pairs skater

David Pelletier (b. 1974), Canadian pairs skater

Elena Berezhnaya (b. 1977), Russian pairs skater

Anton Sikharulidze (b. 1976), Russian pairs skater

Ottavio Cinquanta (b. 1938), president of the International Skating Union

Jacques Rogge (b. 1942), president of the International Olympic Committee

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Figure skating is one of the most popular, visible, and highly anticipated events of the Winter Olympic Games. Scandal erupted at the 2002 Olympics in Salt Lake City, Utah, after judges were accused of fixing the scores of the finals in pairs figure skating. The pairs-skating event featured a rivalry between two teams, the Russians and the Canadians, both of whom had won world championships. Audiences eagerly awaited a great competition for the gold medal. Both teams skated well in the short program, and both had a chance for the gold medal in the decisive long program held several days later. Only one team would win the gold, or so everyone thought.

On February 11, 2002, the final night of the pairs-skating event, Elena Berezhnaya and Anton Sikharulidze of Russia performed a technically difficult program, but not without errors. The Canadian pair of Jamie Salé and David Pelletier followed with a flawless but less technically difficult program set to the music from the film Love Story. The audience cheered the Canadians with great approval. Television commentators Scott Hamilton and Sandra Bezic, both former Olympic medalists in skating, were sure that the Canadians had delivered the gold-medal-winning performance. The judges' marks came up on the scoreboard. The Russian team received first place ordinals from five of the nine judges on the panel, giving them the gold medal in a controversial 5-4 split. The final decision was met by shock and bewilderment from spectators, commentators, and Salé and Pelletier and their coach.

Questions about judging were not new to the sport of figure skating. Judges often have been accused of voting with a bias toward either the Eastern bloc or the Western bloc, Cold War terms that divided nations along geographical and political boundaries. In the 2002 Olympics pairs-skating competition, the judges representing countries in the Eastern bloc—Russia, China, Poland, and Ukraine—placed the Russians first. The judges from the Western bloc—the United States, Canada, Germany, and Japan—placed the Canadians first. The judge from France, a Western bloc nation, placed the Russians first. That judge, Marie Reine Le Gougne, admitted shortly after the event that she had been pressured to vote for the Russian pair. She claimed at the time that the head of the French skating federation, Didier Gailhaguet, made a deal to aid French ice dancers Marina Anissina and Gwenndal Peizerat, scheduled to compete later in the Games. Le Gougne recanted her story after speaking to International Skating Union (ISU) president Ottavio Cinquanta. In a press conference, Cinquanta stated that there was no evidence to prove Le Gougne's original allegations but promised an internal ISU review.

The growing scandal, not the first for these Games, received worldwide media attention. In the face of the scandal, the Canadian pair made multiple television appearances in both the United States and Canada, and the Russian pair made appearances as well. The Games in Salt Lake City already had been tainted with scandal before it had begun. The Salt Lake City Organizing Committee (SLOC) had been accused of bribing International Olympic Committee (IOC) members with cash and gifts to ensure acceptance of the city's bid to host the Olympics. Four IOC officials and two top SLOC executives had resigned during the course of the affair.

The Canadian press dubbed the pairs-skating scandal Skategate. Past instances of cheating and controversial judging decisions resurfaced during the media controversy. The IOC and the ISU were forced to take action amid accusations that figure skating results were determined in backroom deals before events. IOC president Jacques Rogge pressured the ISU to quickly resolve the situation and strongly urged it to award a second pair of gold medals to the Canadian team.

The ISU had no official guidelines on how to resolve cases of cheating in judging. Ultimately, Rogge and Cinquanta announced that the Canadians would receive their gold medals in a new medals ceremony, but the unprecedented solution did not satisfy everyone. The Canadians were happy to receive their gold medals, but they felt cheated of the moment of victory they felt they earned. The French judge was suspended while the investigation continued, but many believed she should have been permanently banned from judging. Meanwhile, the ISU introduced an interim judging system just months after the 2002 Olympics ended, and it developed an entirely new judging system—the Code of Points—for all international competitions beginning in 2006.

IMPACT

The controversial judging and the well-publicized scandal ensured embarrassment for both the sport of figure skating and the Olympics. Because of the subjective nature of its judging, many thought it best to drop figure skating, or certain events in skating, from the Olympic Games. Dropping or curtailing figure skating, however, was unlikely because of the sport's popularity with viewers; skating also is a major source of revenue for the Games. Still, the scandal had to be addressed to restore the sport's credibility, and the credibility of the Olympics.

The ISU developed its new judging system, the Code of Points, to replace the traditional judging system that had been in place for decades. The new system closely resembles those used in the sports of diving and gymnastics. In figure skating's old system, in which judges would mark skaters on a subjective scale of 0.0 to 6.0 and assign ranking ordinals, judges now give skaters set numbers of points for performed jumps, spins, and other elements. Judges also assign points for skating skills, choreography, and other elements that used to fall under the second—artistic—mark in the 6.0 system. These scores are anonymously entered into a computer, which randomly selects the scores of nine judges and eliminates the highest and lowest scores. The judges' anonymity and the assignment of points versus ranks is meant to add more objectivity to the system. The Code of Points was used for the 2006 Winter Olympic Games in Torino, Italy.

The pairs scandal was a turning point, both good and bad, in the sport of figure skating. The new judging system changed how skaters trained and developed their programs, and provided for more objective judging. However, many believe that the damage to the sport's credibility brought on by the scandal contributed to a subsequent decline in public interest in the sport, as measured by television ratings and ticket sales.

—Marcella Bush Trevino

FURTHER READING

Garbato, Sonia Bianchetti. Cracked Ice: Figure Skating's Inner World. Milan, Italy: Libreria dello Sport, 2004. Memoir of a former ISU judge, technical committee member, and council member. Places the 2002 pairs scandal within the context of a sport riddled with scandals and corruption for years before.

Goodwin, Joy. The Second Mark: Courage, Corruption, and the Battle for Olympic Gold. New York: Simon & Schuster, 2004. Stories of the lives and careers of the three pairs medalists from the 2002 Olympics as well as a backstage view of the judging scandal. Emphasis on the subjectivity of the second (artistic) judging mark, formerly used in skating competitions.

Pound, Richard W. Inside the Olympics: A Behind the Scenes Look at the Politics, the Scandals, and the Glory of the Games. New York: John Wiley & Sons, 2004. Insider recounting of the modern history of the International Olympic Committee from a longtime committee member. Smith, Beverley. Gold on Ice: The Salé and Pelletier Story. Toronto, Ont.: Key Porter Books, 2002. A brief work that discusses the early lives and careers of the Canadian pairs team at the heart of the scandal as well as the investigations and politics of the scandal itself.

SEE ALSO: Aug. 19, 1973: Cheating Scandal Shocks Soap Box Derby; June 30, 1994: Tonya Harding Is Banned from Skating After Attack on Rival; Sept. 26, 2000: Gymnast Andreea Răducan Loses Her Olympic Gold Medal Because of Drugs; July 26, 2006: Tour de France Is Hit with a Doping Scandal; Oct. 5, 2007: Olympic Champion Marion Jones Admits Steroid Use.

February 17, 2002

ROTTING HUMAN BODIES ARE FOUND AT GEORGIA CREMATORY

More than three hundred rotting human bodies that should have been cremated were found unceremoniously dumped on the grounds of Tri-State Crematory in Noble, Georgia. Most of the corpses had to be identified using either forensic methods or the shipping records of the funeral homes that worked with Tri-State. Some of the bodies never were identified. At the time of the discovery, Georgia state funeral laws were lax on cremation requirements, licensing, and inspections, thus the dumping went unnoticed.

LOCALE: Noble, Georgia

CATEGORIES: Corruption; business; hoaxes, frauds, and charlatanism; environmental issues; government; public morals

KEY FIGURES

Ray Marsh (1928-2003), co-owner of Tri-State Crematory

Clara Marsh (b. 1931), co-owner of Tri-State Crematory

Tommy Ray-Brent Marsh (b. 1974), crematory manager, son of Ray and Clara Marsh

SUMMARY OF EVENT

In November, 2001, officials in Walker County, Georgia, were alerted by the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency that a neighbor had complained that something was not quite right at the Tri-State Crematory, which was located in a rural area of the county. The caller had reported seeing human body parts in the woods adjacent to the crematory. Sheriff's deputies visited the property but did not find anything amiss.

On February 17, 2002, following additional complaints, Walker County officials again visited the crematory and the homes of owners Ray and Clara Marsh and their son, Tommy Ray-Brent Marsh. Their homes were located on the grounds of the crematory. This time, officials made gruesome discoveries. Within a few days, hundreds of dead bodies were uncovered on the twenty-five-acre property. Some of them had been there only a few days, and others had been there for a number of years. Authorities could not tell why the corpses were dumped and not properly disposed of.

A Georgia law enforcement officer at the entrance to Tri-State Crematory in Noble, Georgia. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

Crematory owners Ray and Clara Marsh were respected members of the Noble community. Ray, whose family was originally from the area, worked for the U.S. Postal Service. He dug ditches and graves with a backhoe in his spare time, a practice he continued for approximately ten years. In 1982, he spent about twenty thousand dollars for cremation equipment, which he housed in a shed on his property, and opened Tri-State Crematory. One of the first minority-owned crematories in the United States, it opened at a time when cremations were relatively rare in the South. Clara was originally from Mullins, South Carolina. She taught English for the local school district for approximately forty years. Also very active in the community, she was the first African American chairman of the local Democratic committee and also was involved in the local chamber of commerce. After Ray had a debilitating stroke in 1996 and was unable to continue operation of the business, the Marsh's son Tommy kept the place running. As a high school football star, coach of the local youth group, and prospective deacon of his church, Tommy also was a respected member of the community.

As the cremation business grew in the South, Tri-State was accepting bodies not only from Georgia but also Tennessee and Alabama. Hearses were a customary sight at the Marsh property a couple of times each week. No questions were asked when Tommy began picking up the bodies himself at the funeral homes; there was no reason to believe that

AMENDING THE LAW ON CREMATION

In May, 2002, Georgia lawmakers amended state law on how funeral homes and crematories treat human corpses before, during, and after cremation. The revised law, excerpted here, was developed in response to the then-recent scandal at Tri-State Crematory.

- This section provides that a person who “throws away or abandons any dead human body or portion of such dead body” commits the crime of abandonment of a dead body. Further, the section makes abandonment of a dead body a felony and imposes a punishment of imprisonment for at least a year, but no more than three. The section excludes medical and other lawful uses from punishment.
- The Act amends Code section 43-18-1 by defining “crematory” as “any place where cremation is performed” excluding hospitals, clinics, laboratories, and other such facilities.
- The Act amends Code section 43-18-8 by requiring funeral directors to place identification tags that include serial numbers identifying prosthesis removed from the body prior to cremation and also requires them to provide a written statement to the person receiving the remains which verifies that the container contains “substantially the remains of the deceased.”
- The Act also amends Code section 43-18-72 by requiring that those who operate crematories maintain a license, have a specific address, provide a room that seats at least thirty people, have a display room with a supply of urns, maintain a hearse, have a processing station for the grinding of cremated remains (retort) and have at least one truck. The Act further amends Code section 43-18-72 by requiring crematories to submit reports that list the names of the people it cremates and the types of containers it uses.

anything unusual was happening. The ashes of the deceased were customarily returned to the funeral homes on the next day. Tri-State charged a very reasonable fee of $200 to $250 for the service, while other crematoriums were charging $600 as a starting rate.

Neighbors began to notice that there was no black smoke coming from the crematory, but no one complained. The furnace in the shed had stopped working and needed a new part, leading to a change in the crematory’s operations. The Marshes purchased the needed part for less than $200. The vendor offered to install the part, but the family indicated that they did not require any assistance. This did not seem unusual to the vendor because the Marsh’s had never requested service from them in all the years they had been in business. Investigators later found that the furnace was operable.

Before the search of the crematory ended, officials discovered more than 330 bodies in various stages of decomposition, strewn all over the property. Bodies were stacked on top of each other. Some were dressed formally, some were dressed in hospital gowns, and some were still in body bags. Most of the corpses did not have identification tags. About fifteen bodies were stored in a burial vault that was intended for only one body. Bodies were stuffed into abandoned vehicles, and more had been thrown into the two-acre lake on the grounds. Neighbors did not complain of the odor of deteriorating bodies because odor from the property was not unusual. However, because human remains were deteriorating at different rates, the stench was likely deplorable.

Officials were forced to deal with a macabre situation. They declared the property a disaster area so that they could receive state funds for its cleanup. After cremation, human remains are returned to family members in temporary containers, if the family did not purchase an urn. The Marshes returned these containers in a timely manner to the funeral homes. However, the urns did not contain the remains of the deceased; they contained sand, ground-up cement, or burned wood-chips mixed with dirt. The families who later discovered that they had been duped by the Marshes felt extreme betrayal, sadness, and anger, and close to seventeen hundred relatives eventually sued.

The case of the rotting bodies was horrifying in itself, but it became even more so when people realized it never should have occurred. Georgia state funeral law at the time was extremely lax in dealing with crematories. Tri-State Crematory apparently had never been inspected, but inspection was limited in the state to begin with. Furthermore, a loophole in Georgia law allowed the business to run without a license for such work. The law did not address a crematory's failure to cremate a human body, mainly because failing to do so was unthinkable. An official with the Georgia Bureau of Investigation said "We have laws against desecrating graves, but we can't find one against desecration of bodies," adding, "I guess nobody in the Legislature ever thought something like this could happen."

State forensic teams had to use a combination of methods to identify the bodies. These methods included matching dental records, DNA testing, and tracking records from the funeral homes where individual bodies originated. The remains that could be identified were cremated and returned to next of kin. About 130 bodies could not be identified and were buried in a mass grave in the fall of 2002. These bodies were not cremated; officials wanted to preserve the DNA of the corpses in case it was needed in future litigation or attempts at identification.

IMPACT

Georgia law could only treat this scandal as a misdemeanor. Tommy Ray-Brent Marsh was eventually convicted of 787 counts of theft, abuse of a corpse, and burial-service fraud. He was sentenced to two twelve-year terms for his crimes—one sentence for the state of Tennessee and one for the state of Georgia. Ray and Clara Marsh were not charged.

Relatives of the deceased filed a class action suit against Tri-State and the funeral homes involved. The award amounted to $36 million from the funeral homes and $18 million from the Marsh's homeowner's insurance policy. In addition, a portion of the Marshes land was set aside in its natural state as a tribute to those who were found there. The Marsh family retains the rights to all the land and the deed remains in their name. The crematorium was destroyed.

Georgia lawmakers rewrote the state's funeral industry laws in the years after the Tri-State scandal broke. The new laws now contain felony provisions for those who abuse them, as well as provisions for the abandonment of a human body.

—Elizabeth Gaydou Miller

FURTHER READING

Firestone, David, with Robert D. McFadden. "Scores of Bodies Strewn at Site of Crematory." The New York Times, February 17, 2002. National newspaper report of the discovery of human remains at Tri-State Crematory.

Iverson, Kenneth V. Death to Dust: What Happens to Dead Bodies. Tucson, Ariz.: Galen Press, 1994. A graphic discussion of the decomposition of the human body after death. Examines embalming, cremation, religious rites, and cultural biases relating to death, funerals, and human remains.

Kitch, Carolyn, and Janice Hume. Journalism in a Culture of Grief. New York: Routledge, 2008. Explores "the cultural meanings of death in American journalism and the role of journalism in interpretations and enactments of public grief." Includes a chapter on media coverage of the Tri-State Crematory scandal.

Prothero, Stephen. Purified by Fire: A History of Cremation in America. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2001. History of cremation in the United States. Includes a historical time line.

Rosen, Fred. Cremation in America. Amherst, N.Y.: Prometheus Books, 2004. A social and cultural history of the cremation industry in the United States. Includes a chapter on the Tri-State scandal. A good introduction, especially for younger readers.

SEE ALSO: Sept. 26, 1979: Love Canal Residents Sue Chemical Company; Jan. 30, 2001: Liverpool Children's Hospital Collects Body Parts Without Authorization.

March 27, 2002

GEORGIA BASKETBALL COACH JIM HARRICK, SR., RESIGNS OVER FRAUD ALLEGATIONS

University of Georgia basketball coach Jim Harrick, Sr., resigned following accusations of fraud and misconduct against himself and his assistant coach Jim Harrick, Jr., his son. Many people were left wondering who to blame for the scandal after the Harricks had been hired to coach at Georgia even though they had a record of misconduct while coaching at two other universities—UCLA and Rhode Island.

ALSO KNOWN AS: Harrick scandal

LOCALE: Athens, Georgia

CATEGORIES: Corruption; sports; law and the courts

KEY FIGURES

Jim Harrick, Sr. (b. 1938), University of Georgia head basketball coach

Jim Harrick, Jr. (b. 1965), University of Georgia assistant basketball coach

Michael F. Adams (b. 1948), president of the University of Georgia

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Following successful careers coaching at three other universities, Jim Harrick, Sr., was hired as head coach of the University of Georgia Bulldogs of the South Eastern Conference (SEC) at the start of the 1999 basketball season. He led Georgia to two NCAA tournament births in four years. However, the misconduct of his son, Georgia assistant coach Jim Harrick, Jr., caused the elder Harrick the most trouble and led to his resignation on March 27, 2002.

Allegations of corruption against Harrick, Jr., began to surface midway through the 2002 season. Harrick, Jr., allegedly paid a phone bill for Georgia player Tony Cole and provided additional income for high-profile players; this last claim was never proven true. The most serious accusation was that Harrick, Jr., developed an examination specifically for Georgia basketball players enrolled in one of his classes. He also was accused of awarding A grades to three student-players—Cole, Chris Daniels, and Rashad Wright—who never attended his class.

Before accepting the job at Georgia, Harrick, Sr., had coached at Pepperdine University between 1979 and 1988 and led the Waves to regular-season championships in 1981, 1982, 1983, 1985, and 1986. He also was named West Coast Athletic Conference (WCAC) coach of the year four times and led Pepperdine to four NCAA national basketball tournaments. Harrick was hired to coach the Bruins of the University of California, Los Angeles (UCLA) in 1988. He had been an assistant coach at UCLA prior to accepting the Pepperdine job.

Harrick, Sr., coached at UCLA from 1988 to 1996. He led the Bruins to Pacific 10 Conference (Pac-10) championships in 1992, 1995, and 1996 and was Pac-10 Coach of the Year in each of these seasons as well. The 1994-1995 season ended with the Bruins winning their eleventh NCAA basketball championship. Harrick was revered as a savior after leading UCLA to its first national championship in more than twenty years. Two seasons later, he was removed as head coach of the Bruins following a National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA) investigation into allegations that he falsified expense records and receipts for a recruiting dinner. Although Harrick was exonerated by the NCAA, officials at UCLA held firm in their decision to fire Harrick because he lied to investigators.

Harrick, Sr., took a one-year break and returned to the game to coach the University of Rhode Island Rams of the Atlantic-10 Conference. He led the Rams to two NCAA tournament bids, an Atlantic-10 Conference Championship, and a major upset of the perennial powerhouse, the University of Kansas, in the 1998 NCAA tournament. Two years were enough for Harrick in Rhode Island. He left for Georgia and, soon, Rhode Island supporters learned why.

Critics claimed that while he was at Rhode Island, Harrick, Sr., changed the grades of players, had others complete course assignments for players, and arranged for travel, cars, small gifts, money, and extravagant parties for players, friends, families, and potential recruits. Harrick, Jr., too, had been accused of similar improprieties while working with his father at Rhode Island. Most notably, Harrick, Jr., was accused of having falsified expense reports, just as his father had been accused of doing while coaching at UCLA. With charges of misconduct remaining charges only, father and son left Rhode Island and settled in Georgia to take the coaching jobs there.

On March 5, 2002, University of Georgia president Michael F. Adams announced that he was firing Jim Harrick, Jr., and suspending Harrick Sr. Adams's announcement followed the television broadcast of an interview with former Georgia player Cole, who alleged coaching and program misconduct. Twenty-two days after his son was fired, Harrick, Sr., resigned. He also announced his retirement from coaching.

Fearing harsh NCAA sanctions such as post-season bans, loss of scholarships, and fines, Adams imposed his own sanctions on the Georgia basketball program. The team was banned from the 2002-2003 NCAA tournament, even though the Bulldogs were ranked twenty-fifth in the nation with a record of 19-8 and were ensured of a place in postseason play. Also, Adams stripped the eligibility of two players involved in the scandal.

IMPACT

In the long run, the self-imposed sanctions likely saved the football program at Georgia, but Adams still had to contend with questions about why he hired the Harricks in the first place, knowing of their corruption-filled backgrounds. Adams said that he trusted Harrick, Sr. The two had worked together at Pepperdine during the 1980's. Adams had entrusted Harrick, Sr., with running the school's football program and maintaining its integrity, which, Adams insisted, Harrick did with success.

The Harrick scandal followed the 2000 firing of another Georgia athletic coach, the highly respected football coach Jim Donnan. After the Donnan scandal, Adams became the fall guy at Georgia. He was booed off the field during a 2003 homecoming football game and was the subject of a petition drive in which sixty thousand students and alumni demanded he be fired as president of the university.

The firing of Harrick, Jr., and Harrick, Sr.'s, retirement did not mark the end of the Harrick scandal. Georgia's athletics program suffered further sanctions after their departure, including additional scholarship reductions and four years of probation. Adams, although unpopular with many students and alumni, remained Georgia president, but several well-known alumni withheld financial contributions to the school as a result. In a poll of faculty, nearly 70 percent had little faith in Adams as president. The poll results reflected little confidence in the school, both in athletics and academics.

The Harrick scandal had little affect on continuing corruption and misconduct at colleges and universities around the United States. Sanctions were imposed on other high-profile programs and coaches. For example, Dave Bliss was forced to resign as head coach of the Baylor Bears basketball team after player Patrick Dennehy was murdered by a

THE HARRICK EXAM

The so-called Harrick exam included a question that asked students to whom they attributed their playing success. The correct answer? Jim Harrick, Jr. Included here is a sampling of other multiple-choice questions from the test.

1. How many goals are on a basketball court? Choices: 1, 2, 3, or 4
2. In what league do the Georgia Bulldogs compete? Choices: ACC, Big Ten, SEC, or Pac10
3. How many points does a 3-point field goal account for in a basketball game? Choices: 1, 2, 3, or 4

former Baylor player. Bliss was heard on audiotape portraying Dennehy as a drug dealer. Ohio State University fired coach Jim O'Brien after he admitted to athletic director Andy Geiger that he paid more than six thousand dollars to a potential player in 1999. In 2008, Indiana University, recognized by many as a top-tier basketball program, fired coach Kelvin Sampson for having improper phone conversations with potential recruits.

High-profile coaches who are successful on the court but losers at playing by the rules still get hired by top programs to help deliver wins. With winning teams comes money—for athletic and academic scholarships, infrastructure, campus development—so questionable pasts are overlooked for the sake of victory and reputation—and cash.

—Keith J. Bell

FURTHER READING

Eitzen, D. Stanley. Fair and Foul: Beyond the Myths and Paradoxes of Sport. Lanham, Md.: Rowman & Littlefield, 1999. Argues that college athletics, and athletics in general, is inherently corrupt and that it breeds hypocrisy.

Harrick, Jim. Basketball's Balanced Offense. Indianapolis, Ind.: Masters Press, 1995. Jim Harrick, Sr., shares his coaching tips and discusses the best methods for coaching college-level basketball.

Kluger, Jeffrey. "The Coach Fouls Out." Time, May 12, 2003. Discusses the scandals that rocked collegiate sports in five high-profile programs in the first years of the twenty-first century. Includes the Harrick scandal.

Staurowsky, Ellen J. "Piercing the Veil of Amateurism: Commercialization, Corruption, and U.S. College Sports." In The Commercialization of Sport, edited by Trevor Slack. New York: Routledge, 2004. Staurowsky discusses how amateur athletics in the United States is a commercialized and corrupt spectacle.

SEE ALSO: Jan. 17, 1951: College Basketball Players Begin Shaving Points for Money; Apr. 27, 1980: Mobster's Arrest Reveals Point Shaving by Boston College Basketball Players; Feb. 25, 1987: NCAA Imposes "Death Penalty" on Southern Methodist University Football; Jan. 28, 2000: John Spano Is Sentenced for Fraudulent Purchase of Ice Hockey Team; Aug. 27, 2001: Little League Baseball Star Danny Almonte Is Found to Be Overage; Dec. 14, 2001: Notre Dame Football Coach Resigns for Falsifying His Résumé; May 3, 2003: University of Alabama Fires New Football Coach in Sex Scandal; July 14, 2006: New York Times Exposes Grading Scandal at Auburn University; Sept. 13, 2007: New England Patriots Football Team Is Fined for Spying on Other Teams; July 29, 2008: NBA Referee Tim Donaghy Is Sentenced to Prison for Betting on Games.

June 25, 2002

INTERNAL CORRUPTION FORCES ADELPHIA COMMUNICATIONS TO DECLARE BANKRUPTCY

At the time of its collapse, Adelphia Communications Corporation was one of the largest cable providers in the United States. In June of 2002, the company declared bankruptcy as a result of the multibillion-dollar defrauding of its own executives. John Rigas, Adelphia founder, and his son, Timothy Rigas, were convicted on charges of conspiracy, bank fraud, and securities violations and were sentenced to prison terms of fifteen and twenty years respectively. The bankruptcy was one of the largest in the history of the United States.

LOCALE: New York, New York

CATEGORIES: Law and the courts; corruption; banking and finance; communications and media

KEY FIGURES

John Rigas (b. 1924), founder and chief executive officer of Adelphia

Timothy Rigas (b. 1956), chief financial officer, board member, and executive vice president of Adelphia

Michael Rigas (b. 1953), Adelphia's vice president in charge of operations

James Rigas (b. 1958), Adelphia executive

Michael Mulcahey (b. 1957), head of internal reporting at Adelphia

SUMMARY OF EVENT

One of the largest cable providers in the United States at the time of its collapse, Adelphia Communications Corporation filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection on June 25, 2002, in the United States bankruptcy court in New York. The declaration of bankruptcy was a result of the mismanagement of the company by its owner and executives, primarily John Rigas and his sons Timothy, Michael, and James. It was alleged that they had hidden more than $2 billion from creditors and Adelphia stockholders for their own use.

Adelphia came from modest origins. Its founder, John Rigas, and his brother Gus, were sons of Greek immigrants. The brothers began buying cable systems during the 1950's in the small Pennsylvania town of Coudersport. They named their company Adelphia, a word derived from the Greek for "brothers." During the 1980's, John Rigas bought his brother's interest in the company. By 2002, Adelphia operated cable systems in more than thirty states, notably in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Florida, and California, and had more than five million cable subscribers. Adelphia was a family-owned and family-operated company, with Rigas and his three sons holding executive positions. John Rigas, an inductee of the Cable Television Hall of Fame, was actively involved in the community and appeared to value family, charity, morals, and a solid work ethic, as evidenced by the exclusion of pornography channels on Adelphia's cable systems. The Rigas family also owned a professional hockey team: the Buffalo Sabres.

Over a three-year period from January, 1999, through May, 2002, members of the Rigas family used $2.3 billion in Adelphia funds for their own personal expenditures. For example, it was reported that company money was used to pay family debt, to buy cable systems for the family's privately owned cable company, to finance the construction of a golf course, to buy Adelphia stock, and to purchase luxuries such as an airplane, automobiles, and real estate. The Rigases used $150 million from Adelphia to buy their hockey team. To conceal the money "borrowed" from Adelphia, family members falsified financial statements and inflated profits and the number of Adelphia cable subscribers. The Rigas family made it appear that Adelphia was in better financial health than it was in truth. The fraud was not discovered until March 27, 2002, when a financial analyst from Merrill Lynch, Oren Cohen, noticed a footnote on the final page of a press release that reported the company's quarterly earnings. The footnote indicated that Adelphia was responsible for the loan of $2.3 billion to the Rigas family.

After declaring bankruptcy, Adelphia lost its sponsorship of the Coliseum in Nashville, Tennessee. The corporate name was stripped from the stadium in August, 2003. (AP/Wide World Photos)

In May, after the corruption came to light, John Rigas, followed soon thereafter by his sons, resigned from the company. The Rigases were arrested in July, along with two other Adelphia executives, arrested for the same offenses: James Brown, former vice president of finance, and Michael Mulcahey, who was in charge of internal reporting. In a plea bargaining arrangement, Brown pleaded guilty and later testified against the Rigases at their trial in federal court.

While awaiting their trial, the Rigas defendants were each freed on $10 million bail. All four defendants were tried together in a single trial. John Rigas disavowed any wrongdoing. On July 8, 2004, after almost five months in court, John and Timothy Rigas (James was not charged in the criminal case) were convicted on charges of conspiracy, securities fraud, and bank fraud. They were acquitted by the jury on charges of wire fraud. Mulcahey was acquitted on all charges. The jury was unable to reach a verdict on the culpability of Michael Rigas. After pleading guilty for his role in concealing debt by falsifying an entry in the company's record, Michael Rigas later received a sentence of home confinement for ten months and probation for two years.

In July, 2005, John Rigas was sentenced to fifteen years in prison and Timothy Rigas was sentenced to twenty years in prison. The judge gave the elder Rigas a lighter sentence because of his ailing health. The octogenarian was suffering from bladder cancer and had cardiac problems. John and Michael Rigas, who appealed their convictions, were free on bail during the years their appeals were reviewed.

All but one count of their convictions was upheld on appeal. After exhausting their appeals, John and Michael Rigas reported to federal prison in August, 2007. The two requested a resentencing hearing in May, 2008.

In addition to criminal penalties, the family forfeited more than $1 billion in assets to their former company. A substantial portion of the funds, more than $700 million, was used to reimburse investors who lost money when the company declared bankruptcy. Most creditors and investors were able to recoup their losses. In addition to criminal charges, the Rigas family also faced a racketeering lawsuit filed by Adelphia, a civil suit brought by the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, and further criminal allegations of tax evasion.

Adelphia's headquarters was relocated from Coudersport to Denver, Colorado. In 2007, the company was sold to Time Warner and Comcast for almost $18 billion and a percentage of Time Warner shares.

IMPACT

The Adelphia corruption scandal was one in a long line of similar scandals of corporate greed and unscrupulous business practices. Other white-collar scandals of the early twenty-first century include those involving Enron, WorldCom, Tyco International, subprime mortgage lenders, and to a lesser extent, Martha Stewart.

Adelphia's bankruptcy proved to be one of the largest in American history. Investors lost more than $60 billion when the company imploded. John and Michael Rigas received comparatively severe punishments for their offenses, likely because of the immense scale of their corruption and because of their adamant denials of any wrongdoing. Also a likely factor was the growing public awareness of and intolerance for white-collar crime, a view best reflected in the sanctions that have been handed down by judges and juries.

The Adelphia case underscores the complexity and depth of white-collar crime. It is possible that the Rigases' crimes remained undetected for so long because family members held several key executive roles, which limited outside scrutiny of their business practices. It was only through the close reading of an Adelphia press release that the criminality of the Rigases was discovered. In addition, this case was multifaceted, involving criminal law, civil law, and violations of business regulations and ethics.

—Margaret E. Leigey and Stephen J. Pelzer

FURTHER READING

Brancato, Carolyn Kay, and Christian A. Plath. Corporate Governance Best Practices: A Blueprint for the Post-Enron Era. New York: Conference Board, 2003. A study that examines corporate leadership, ethics, and responsibility at a time of increased public awareness of corporate fraud and mismanagement.

Cauley, Leslie. "Rigas Tells His Side of the Adelphia Story." USA Today, August 6, 2006. Serving time in a federal prison, John Rigas offers his version of the events that led to his conviction and subsequent incarceration.

Coenen, Tracy. Essentials of Corporate Fraud. Hoboken, N.J.: John Wiley & Sons, 2008. An introductory guide to the white-collar crime of corporate fraud, written by a forensic, or investigative, accountant.

Adelphia Communications Declares Bankruptcy

"Judge Approves Plan by Adelphia to Pay Creditors." Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2007. Provides details regarding the sale of Adelphia and the plan to reimburse investors and creditors.

Leonard, Devin, Ann Harrington, and Doris Burke. "The Adelphia Story: The Sixth-Largest Cable Company Might as Well Have Been Called John Rigas & Sons." Fortune, August 12, 2002. Magazine article that provides a detailed history of the Rigas family and discussion of their criminal mismanagement of Adelphia.

MacDonald, Scott B., and Jane E. Hughes. Separating Fools from Their Money: A History of American Financial Scandals. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 2007. This book provides readers with a detailed history of American financial scandals. Limited discussion of the Adelphia scandal, but still useful for its analysis of corporate fraud in general.

SEE ALSO: 1932: Insull Utilities Trusts Collapse Prompts New Federal Regulation; Mar. 29, 1962: Billie Sol Estes Is Arrested for Corporate Fraud; May 2, 1984: E. F. Hutton Executives Plead Guilty to Fraud; Jan. 15, 1988: ZZZZ Best Founder Is Indicted on Federal Fraud Charges; Mar. 29, 1989: Financier Michael Milken Is Indicted for Racketeering and Fraud; Aug. 27, 1990: Guinness Four Are Found Guilty of Share-Trading Fraud; Dec. 2, 2001: Enron Bankruptcy Reveals Massive Financial Fraud; Sept. 3, 2003: Mutual Fund Companies Are Implicated in Shady Trading Practices; Mar. 5, 2004: Martha Stewart Is Convicted in Insider-Trading Scandal; Oct. 14, 2004: Insurance Brokerage Marsh & McLennan Is Charged with Fraud; Sept. 12, 2005: Westar Energy Executives Are Found Guilty of Looting Their Company.

July, 2002

JOURNALIST ALLEGES RELEASE OF GENETICALLY MODIFIED CORN SEEDS IN NEW ZEALAND

*In his 2002 book Seeds of Distrust, the New Zealand reporter Nicky Hager alleged that genetically modified corn had been illegally released in New Zealand. He further alleged that Prime Minister Helen Clark and her Labour government knew about the release and covered it up. These revelations and the inability of the government to deal forthrightly with the issue diminished the popularity of the Labour government and tarnished its image.*

ALSO KNOWN AS: Corngate

LOCALE: Wellington, New Zealand

CATEGORIES: Environmental issues; corruption; government; international relations; publishing and journalism; science and technology; trade and commerce

KEY FIGURES

Nicky Hager (b. 1958), New Zealand writer and investigative reporter

Helen Clark (b. 1950), prime minister of New Zealand, 1999-

John Campbell (b. 1964), New Zealand television broadcaster

Jeanette Fitzsimmons (b. 1945), member of the New Zealand parliament and Green Party leader

Marian Hobbs (b. 1947), member of the New Zealand parliament and minister of the environment, 1999-2005

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Agricultural products are sources of great national pride in New Zealand and are essential to the island nation's economy. The "naturalness" of New Zealand produce is a primary aspect of the products' appeal on world markets. To maintain that appeal, the country has extremely stringent regulations that prevent the introduction of genetically modified (GM) organisms for commercial purposes. Even the accidental introduction of GM plants would devastate the country's carefully crafted image and potentially hurt the economy.

In early July, 2002, New Zealand investigative reporter Nicky Hager's book Seeds of Distrust: The Story of a GE Cover-up was released, only a few weeks before parliamentary elections. Hager alleges in the book that in September and October, 2000, 5.6 tons of sweet-corn seed was shipped to three New Zealand companies. These seeds were imported from the U.S.-based company Novartis, the second-largest seed producer in the world, and were certified to be free of all genetically engineered modifications. In total, 164 hectares (405 acres) of these corn seeds were planted in the regions of Hawke's Bay, Gisborne, and Marlborough, New Zealand.

Hager further alleged that in November, the New Zealand government was alerted that a 1.7-ton lot from this shipment, designated NC9114, went to Cedenco Foods, which retested the sweet-corn seed for GM contamination. Of the eight seed lines tested, one batch tested positive for the Nos terminator, a sequence not found in healthy plants but in the soil bacterium Agrobacterium tumefaciens. Agrobacterium is a plant pathogen that transfers some of its genes into plants and causes the plant tissue to form a crown gall that overproduces unusual amino acids called opines, which only Agrobacterium can metabolize. Plant geneticists have exploited this ability to make engineered strains of Agrobacterium that can introduce exotic genes into plant genomes. The presence of the Nos terminator in a plant seed genome is an indication that the plant is a GM plant. Novartis informed the ministry of agriculture and forestry (MAF). The MAF and the environmental risk management authority (ERMA) ordered that no more seeds from this consignment be planted.

Further tests were ordered from three different labs, but the results were contradictory, ranging from light contamination to none. In December, 2000, ERMA stated that the contradictory results did not provide definitive evidence that the sweet-corn seed consignment was contaminated with GM seeds, and if there was contamination, it was less than 0.04 percent. Unfortunately, the New Zealand Hazardous Substances and New Organisms Act specified that no GM organisms could enter the country for commercial use. Prime Minister Helen Clark initially wanted the GM-contaminated plants pulled out and burned. However, after meetings with representatives from Novartis, Clark and her ministers changed their minds. The Novartis representatives convinced them that GM plants are ubiquitous and therefore completely GM-free seed shipments were neither practical nor possible. Thus, the Clark government considered a contamination level below 0.5 percent to be virtually GM-free. The seeds from the GM-contaminated consignment were allowed to be grown, harvested, and processed into food products. This also violated the government's own moratorium on the release of GM crops, which was not set to expire until October, 2003. More important, all of this was done with little or no public disclosure.

With the publication of Hager's book, Clark and her government ministers came under increased public pressure to answer Hager's allegations. In a July 10, 2002, television interview with broadcaster John Campbell, Clark responded angrily when asked about the claims made in Hager's book. She called Campbell "a little creep," accused the television station of ambushing her, and appealed to the broadcasting standards authority to discipline Campbell for unethical journalism.

Upon hearing about an apparent government cover-up that allowed GM plants into the country, the Green Party, which up to this point was a close political ally of the Labour Party, criticized the Clark government for violating its own policies on GM plants. Again, Clark responded by attacking the Green Party coleader, Jeanette Fitzsimmons, saying that the "Green Party and its supporters have descended to the gutter."

Genetically Modified Corn Seeds in New Zealand

Even more troubling were the constant denials by government ministers that GM plants had entered the country. For example, in a July 11 interview with Campbell, the minister of the environment, Marian Hobbs, stated that there were no definitive tests that showed that the corn-seed shipment had been contaminated. Two days before, Clark also stated there was no evidence that the corn shipment was contaminated. The press named this scandal Corngate.

The 2002 election was not a disaster for the Labour Party, but it failed to gain a clear majority. The government released seven hundred pages of memos, e-mails, and other documentation, and in November, a select committee was formed to investigate the matter. After examining stacks of official documents and interviewing government officials, the committee could not reconcile the discrepancies between the oral reports given by Labour government officials and the written records provided to the committee. Furthermore, Novartis, now known as Syngenta, refused to share data from the tests it and others had run on the contaminated seed shipment.

A Labour Party billboard featuring Prime Minister Helen Clark was defaced during the early days of the "Corngate" scandal. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

The inquiry, however, did reveal that Clark did not leave the issue to her ministers, as she had strongly intimated, but was involved in the entire affair. Suppressed memos that were damaging to the Labour government's version of events also came to light, as did several conflicts of interest. Even though the country was largely tired of Corngate by this time, the findings of the select committee did tend to show that the Labour government altered the truth.

On July 5, 2003, the Dominion Post, a Wellington-based newspaper, reported that a Japanese pizza company discovered genetically engineered material in one of its toppings that used New Zealand sweet corn. This indicated that GM corn was established in New Zealand farms, despite the government bans on GM plants.

In October, 2004, the select committee completed its investigation but was still unable to ascertain what had actually happened. The presence of GM-contaminated corn or a cover-up could be neither ruled out nor confirmed. Since then, GM plants have been detected in New Zealand fields and imports and food products.

IMPACT

The Corngate scandal opened a seemingly permanent chasm between the Labour and Green parties. Despite the center-left political orientation these two parties hold in common, Corngate revealed the irreconcilable differences between the two parties on the issue of GM plants.

Corngate also marred the otherwise excellent political record of Prime Minister Clark. Normally level-headed and reasonable, Clark often lost her composure when questioned about Corngate. In many ways, Corngate struck at the very substance of Clark's government, since it looked like a murky compromise of principles in the face of pressure from industry, causing citizens who had once trusted her to become suspicious. Overall, Clark's Labour government handled the scandal quite poorly but did not suffer greatly in the end.

More important, this scandal exposed the complicated and multifaceted issues that surround the planting and harvesting of GM plants. Because of the widespread use of GM plants, it is no longer possible to keep agriculture completely GM free. Establishing a total absence of GM seeds would require testing every available seed, which would leave none to plant or eat. Accepting a low level of GM contamination is probably the most realistic policy, even if it is not the most desirable. Communicating this to a public with a poor knowledge of such matters is difficult, but it is the only way to cultivate a reasoned discussion of this issue and eventually to construct a rational and workable GM policy.

—Michael A. Buratovich

FURTHER READING

Espiner, Colin. "Corngate: Lend Me Your Ears." The Press (Christchurch), July 20, 2002. A prominent New Zealand newspaper journalist gives a summary of the political fallout shortly after the release of Hager's book and the attempts by Labour politicians to spin the story.

Hager, Nicky. Seeds of Distrust: The Story of a GE Cover-up. Nelson, New Zealand: Craig Potton, 2002. The book that started Corngate. A well-written exposé of the seed-contamination episode and government attempts to cover it up. Some of Hager's assertions are conspiratorial and not supported by the evidence.

Lurquin, Paul. High Tech Harvest: Understanding Genetically Modified Food Plants. New York: Basic Books, 2004. A user-friendly introduction to the science behind GM crops. Lurquin effectively argues that construction of a sound and reasonable GM policy requires legislators to properly understand the science behind the plant itself.

Steward, Neal C. Genetically Modified Planet: Environmental Impacts of Genetically Engineered Plants. New York: Oxford University Press, 2004. A nicely balanced, somewhat technical, but scientifically erudite examination of the potential benefits, concerns, and risks that surround the cultivation of GM crops. The author is quite fair to both sides.

SEE ALSO: Mar. 29, 1962: Billie Sol Estes Is Arrested for Corporate Fraud; Sept. 26, 1979: Love

Canal Residents Sue Chemical Company; Dec. 16, 1982: Congress Cites Environmental Protection Agency Chief for Contempt; July 10, 1985: French Secret Service Sinks the Greenpeace Ship Rainbow Warrior; Feb. 4, 1996: Whistle-Blower Reveals Tobacco Industry Corruption; Sept. 17, 2006: New Zealand Prime Minister's Husband Is "Outed" as Gay.

August, 2002

IMMUNOLOGIST RESIGNS AFTER BEING ACCUSED OF FALSIFYING RESEARCH

Ranjit Kumar Chandra, a well-respected Canadian immunologist and nutritionist, shocked the scientific world with the revelation that he had falsified data and fabricated research results in several published papers, particularly in papers detailing studies on infant formula and on vitamin therapy in the elderly.

LOCALE: St. Johns, Newfoundland, Canada

CATEGORIES: Hoaxes, frauds, and charlatanism; education; publishing and journalism; medicine and health care; science and technology

KEY FIGURES

Ranjit Kumar Chandra (b. 1938?), Canadian immunologist and nutritionist

Marilyn Harvey (fl. early twenty-first century), Canadian nurse and research assistant

Mark Masor (fl. early twenty-first century), Canadian clinical researcher

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Ranjit Kumar Chandra, a Canadian immunologist and nutrition expert who published more than one hundred scholarly articles, abruptly retired from his research position at Memorial University in St. Johns, Newfoundland, in August, 2002, and moved to Switzerland. Reports soon emerged that Chandra had falsified data for countless studies, including work involving infant formula and vitamin therapy as an aid to memory in the elderly.

At the time of his resignation from the university, Chandra was a major figure in the fields of immunology and human nutrition. Twice nominated for a Nobel Prize, Chandra had been the recipient of numerous research grants from both private industry and the Canadian government. Doubts about the accuracy of Chandra's research first arose following publication of research done during the 1980's into the use of infant formulas. One study, funded by the Nestlé Corporation, supported the industry's claims that artificial formula was an acceptable substitute for breast milk. Nestlé had been under fire for many years for promoting artificial formula in developing nations. As the company's markets overseas dwindled, Nestlé began promoting its Good Start infant formula in the United States. The company's advertising claimed Good Start reduced the risk of allergies. The U.S. Food and Drug Administration was skeptical, and it pressured the corporation to back up the advertising with legitimate scientific data. During the late 1980's, Nestlé hired Chandra to conduct a study to prove their claims were valid, and the study would involve comparing Nestlé's product with that of its competitor, Ross Pharmaceuticals.

Around the same time, Chandra had been hired by Ross to study its infant formula as well. Several persons close to this research project raised questions about Chandra's methods and the reliability of his findings. Mark Masor, a clinical researcher for Ross, said he became curious because Chandra never contacted him to arrange for the large amounts of Ross formula that would have been needed for the Nestlé study. Furthermore, Chandra's published conclusions stated that the number of infants involved in the study had been in the hundreds. Masor later told journalists at the Canadian Broadcasting Company (CBC) that such a study would have required the use of twenty thousand cans of formula. In addition, the time frame for the study seemed unusually short. Masor also noted that Chandra's conclusions contradicted the findings of earlier work done by Ross researchers. Although the infant formulas marketed by Nestlé, Ross, and another competitor, Mead Johnson, had almost identical ingredients, Chandra had concluded the Nestlé and Mead Johnson formulas were effective in reducing the risk of allergies in infants, while the Ross formula was not. Along with Nestlé, Mead Johnson helped to fund Chandra's work; Ross did not.

Marilyn Harvey, a research nurse who worked directly with Chandra, also had doubts about the infant-formula studies. Her job was to enroll infants from the area for both studies. In 1989, while she was still in the process of finding infants, she was shocked to learn Chandra had published results from his Nestlé study, supporting the claims made in Nestlé's advertising.

Even more startling to Harvey was her discovery that Chandra claimed to have finished a similar study for another company, Mead Johnson, which involved two hundred infants. By the early 1990's, Chandra had published results from three separate studies claiming more than seven hundred infants as test subjects, yet Harvey knew she had not recruited more than 25 percent of that number. Sufficiently disturbed by the inconsistencies between what she knew had occurred and what Chandra had reported, she approached administrators at Memorial University. She told university officials that she suspected data fabrication.

A university committee investigated Harvey's allegations and concluded that Chandra's studies included falsified data. However, Chandra was not fired. He later filed suit against Harvey, claiming she had stolen data. Harvey was able to prove her innocence, but she remained convinced that Chandra sued simply to punish her. The suit was, in any case, an action that could have served as a deterrent for other potential whistle-blowers at Memorial University.

Chandra continued his association with Memorial until 2002. After putting the infant-formula studies behind him, he began publishing papers on the effects of multivitamins in preventing dementia in the elderly. Chandra claimed that older people who had been put on a course of vitamin supplements improved their cognitive functions from that of one suffering from dementia to that of one considered to have normal cognitive functions. The multivitamin had been developed and patented by Chandra, and he continued to market it into 2006. It was Chandra's claims about vitamin therapy, and not the controversy concerning falsified data in the infant-formula study, which led to his downfall and retirement.

Chandra had initially submitted a paper, in October, 2000, summarizing his vitamins research to the British Medical Journal (commonly referred to as BMJ). Journal editors found significant flaws in the paper, a follow-up of a study Chandra published in The Lancet in 1992, and were so disturbed by its contents that they asked several experts, including a statistician, to review the work. They concluded the paper presented strong evidence of having been falsified. The journal contacted officials at Memorial University and asked them to investigate.

Although rejected by BMJ, Chandra's paper was published by a less prestigious journal, Nutrition, in September, 2001. Chandra's claims in the article, "Effect of Vitamin and Trace-element Supplementation on Cognitive Function in Elderly Subjects," which focused on the almost miraculous results from using the vitamin supplements, drew the attention of science reporters at The New York Times, who summarized Chandra's conclusions. Skeptics of Chandra's research included Saul Sternberg, a psychology professor at the University of Pennsylvania, who read the newspaper report and then read the article as published in Nutrition. He then contacted a colleague, Seth Roberts of the University of California, Berkeley. They agreed Chandra's article contained glaring errors.

By the summer of 2002, Chandra knew he was under severe scrutiny. In early August, he abruptly resigned and moved to Switzerland. He announced his association with l'Université Internationale des Sciences de la Sante, an institution that investigative journalists from the CBC discovered (in 2006) existed, it seems, but only on paper.

IMPACT

Chandra's fraud forced serious questioning by colleagues and others in academia about what could motivate such unethical acts in a respected and successful physician-scientist. The CBC's investigation suggests the answer was simply greed. When Chandra began his research career at Memorial University, payments were often made directly to the principal investigator on a research project rather than through a university's accounting system. It was the researcher's responsibility to purchase necessary supplies and pay for support, including research assistants and clerks, from the checks they received. This was true for funds received from private companies and from the Canadian national research institutes.

Red flags had been raised during the 1990's when Chandra had been seeking a divorce from his wife. During the proceedings, it was revealed that Chandra had millions of dollars in multiple bank accounts, including several located in offshore tax havens such as the Cayman Islands. In retrospect, questions should have been asked about how a researcher on a university salary could have amassed so much wealth.

The CBC investigation also uncovered evidence that Chandra's falsification of data extended far back into his research career. Although his early work seemed free of fraud, it appears that much if not most of his later work was fraudulent. He was able to publish many papers based on studies that had never occurred. He had no patients to study and he collected no data. Some critics have suggested that Chandra used a fake name to respond to critiques of his original fraudulent articles.

The Chandra research scandal was unusual in the annals of scientific fraud both in its scope and duration. Chandra spent almost two decades building an elaborate structure of lies, the full extent of which may never be known. It seems that he escaped detection through a combination of luck, audacity, and professional status. He was a well-respected senior researcher, which made it difficult for critics to successfully unmask him.

Immunologist Is Accused of Falsifying Research

—Nancy Farm Mannikko

FURTHER READING

Roberts, Seth. "Dealing with Scientific Fraud: A Proposal." Public Health Nutrition 9, no. 5 (2006): 664-665. Discusses the events leading up to the discovery of Chandra's fraudulent research. Asks why it took so many years for his deceptions to come to light.

Sterken, Elizabeth. "The Impact of Scientific Misconduct on Child Health." Public Health Nutrition 9, no. 2 (2006): 273-274. The author deftly summarizes the adverse consequences of Chandra's falsified data being used to justify feeding infants artificial formula.

SEE ALSO: Sept.-Oct., 1937: Prescription Elixir Causes More than One Hundred Deaths; Nov. 21, 1953: Piltdown Man Is Revealed to Be a Hoax; 1956-1962: Prescription Thalidomide Causes Widespread Birth Disorders; July 25, 1972: Newspaper Breaks Story of Abuses in Tuskegee Syphilis Study; Sept. 19, 1988: Stephen Breuning Pleads Guilty to Medical Research Fraud; Mar. 23, 1989: Scientists' "Cold Fusion" Claims Cannot Be Verified; Feb. 4, 1996: Whistle-Blower Reveals Tobacco Industry Corruption; Spring, 1996: Physicist Publishes a Deliberately Fraudulent Article; Nov. 26, 1997: Canadian Health Commissioner Releases Report on Tainted Blood; Mar. 4, 1999: Quebec Offers Support for Abused Duplessis Orphans; Sept. 25, 2002: Inquiry Reveals That Physicist Jan Hendrik Schön Faked His Research; May 12, 2006: Scientist Is Indicted for Faking His Research on Creating Stem Cells; July 24, 2007: University of Colorado Fires Professor for Plagiarism and Research Falsification.

September 25, 2002

INQUIRY REVEALS THAT PHYSICIST JAN HENDRIK SCHÖN FAKED HIS RESEARCH

In one of the biggest scandals in physics in many decades, Jan Hendrik Schön published journal articles—some with coauthors—at an astonishing rate of one every eight days, on average. However, the fact that his research findings could not be replicated by others raised red flags and prompted an investigation by a committee of his peers that found he had faked his data. The ensuing scandal raised a number of controversial questions about the limits of scientists' responsibilities in dealing with intellectual fraud.

ALSO KNOWN AS: Schön affair

LOCALE: Murray Hill, New Jersey

CATEGORIES: Ethics; hoaxes, frauds, and charlatanism; publishing and journalism; science and technology

KEY FIGURES

Jan Hendrik Schön (b. 1970), German physicist employed at Bell Laboratories

Bertram J. R. Batlogg (b. 1950), Schön's mentor at Bell Laboratories and one of his main coauthors

Malcolm R. Beasley (b. 1940), professor of applied physics at Stanford University and chairman of the committee that investigated charges against Schön

Paul M. Solomon (b. 1944), superconductivity expert at IBM

Charles M. Lieber (b. 1959), Harvard University chemist

Paul L. McEuen (b. 1963), physicist at Cornell University

Lydia L. Sohn (b. 1966), Princeton University physicist

SUMMARY OF EVENT

In 1998, German physicist Jan Hendrik Schön went to work for Bell Laboratories in Murray Hill, New Jersey, and began scientific collaborations with his mentor, Bertram J. R. Batlogg, and others. By 2002, their collaboration resulted in more than ninety articles—most of them with Schön as lead author and many of them in leading journals such as Nature and Science. His productivity became legendary: During 2001, an investigative committee determined he had written a new paper—on average—every eight days. Schön came to be viewed in the profession as a star, on the fast track to a Nobel Prize.

Such prolific research and writing would have been remarkable accomplishments for so young a scientist, even if the experiments had been less revolutionary in their implications. Schön's work seemed to show the way forward in the development of an electronics that would use organic (carbon-based) materials rather than the familiar silicon. Though other scientists also explored this area of research, Schön reported breakthrough after breakthrough in molecular electronics and superconductivity, which seemed to promise a short path to a world of nanoscale electronics.

Though many of Schön's fellow scientists were in awe of his achievements, viewing him (in Paul McEuen's phrase) as "the golden boy of condensed matter physics," there also existed an undercurrent of suspicion as his startling results could not be replicated. His work probably would have been less eagerly received had he not worked at such a prestigious laboratory as Bell and with such a distinguished colleague as Batlogg.

As early as November, 2001, IBM scientist Paul M. Solomon had written a letter of profound criticism of Schön's work with molecular field-effect transistors. Nature declined publication of the letter. Then, in April and May of 2002, things began to unravel rapidly for Schön, as his scientific colleagues—including Harvard's Charles M. Lieber, IBM's McEuen, and Princeton's Lydia Sohn—began to notice reused data and graphs among different articles (some even in the same article) written by Schön.

In late May, at the instigation of the management of Bell Labs, a five-member investigative committee was formed; its chairman was Stanford University scientist Malcolm R. Beasley. The committee collected comments, accusations, and concerns about twenty-five papers (involving twenty coauthors) and identified twenty-four “final allegations” to examine in detail. In late July, the committee interviewed individuals at Bell, including Schön. The final report, made public on September 25, announced that a preponderance of evidence had demonstrated scientific misconduct in two-thirds (sixteen) of the cases examined, though Schön’s behavior in most of the remaining cases remained “troubling.”

The committee determined, first, that Schön had repeatedly substituted data; that is, he had reused data, sometimes in distorted form, in purportedly different situations. Second, the committee found Schön’s data often displayed unrealistic precision; that is, not real experimental data. Third, Schön’s results often contradicted known physics; seemingly impossible results demanded an extraordinary level of scientific caution that was absent from Schön’s papers. The revelations of the Beasley Report were shocking.

Responding to the devastating report, Schön acknowledged “various mistakes” and apologized “for these mistakes to the coauthors and the scientific community.” He insisted that he had “observed experimentally the various physical effects reported in these publications,” even though, after two years and considerable expense, others had not been able to duplicate his findings and he, too, had been unable for some months to duplicate them.

Schön’s motives remain unclear. Commentators cite pressure to publish as a direct motive for fabrication (and, by encouraging so many papers, an indirect negative influence on referees). Cordelia Sealy, editor of Materials Today, offered the oddest suggestion—that, for male scientists such as Schön, “publishing papers is a way to attract a mate.”

IMPACT

As a result of the committee’s findings, Schön was immediately fired from Bell Laboratories. His activities since the scandal remain largely unknown. In June, 2004, his doctorate was revoked by the University of Konstanz, Germany, triggering debate over whether a doctorate is a scholarly achievement to which subsequent misconduct is irrelevant or a license to be taken seriously as a scholar worthy of tenure only if one’s behavior is acceptable.

In the wake of the Beasley Report, various retractions followed. Bell Labs withdrew half-a-dozen patent applications. A number of journals retracted papers written by Schön: eight papers in Science in October, 2002; six papers in the Physical Review journals in December; four papers (with seven more flagged for caution) in Applied Physics Letters in February, 2003; and seven papers in Nature in March, 2003.

The issue of coauthor responsibility was intensely debated. The Beasley Report left this issue unresolved, exonerating Schön’s coauthors of scientific misconduct but leaving the question (especially in the case of Batlogg) whether there had been inadequate oversight. Some professional organizations, such as the American Physical Society, revised their codes of ethics to place greater emphasis on collaborator responsibilities—but many issues

THE BEASLEY REPORT

The revelations of the Beasley Report (September 25, 2002), compiled by an investigative committee looking into accusations of research fraud by physicist Jan Hendrik Schön, shocked many in academia. The report included the following comments on Schön’s research:

None of the most significant physical results was witnessed by any coauthor or other colleague.

Proper laboratory records were not systematically maintained. . . . virtually all primary (raw) electronic data files were deleted. . . . No working devices with which one might confirm claimed results are presently available, having been damaged in measurement, damaged in transit or simply discarded. Finally, key processing equipment no longer produces the unparalleled results that enabled many of the key experiments.

remained unresolved. What is the role of trust in collaboration, and who is responsible for what exactly? If coauthors bask in the glory of publication, should they be held responsible when something goes wrong? The debate expanded from coauthors to journal editors, and to referees. Were journals too quick to support trendy research? Was the system of peer review itself flawed?

In 2004, two years after the scandal, questions remained. One big question was, as intellectual property attorney Lawrence B. Ebert reported, the “potential liability of Bell Labs, the coauthors, and the journals which published the fraudulent work to all those who . . . invested resources based on a belief in the work.” He questioned whether scientific journals are liable if they are “aware of problems with their published material, and yet do nothing to correct it.”

After the scandal, several journals publicized the tainted character of the papers they had published. Broader issues of quality control remain. In 2006, Jennifer Couzin and Katherine Unger noted that a paper of Schön, published in 2000 and retracted in 2003, still had been “noted in research papers seventeen times since” the retraction; they pointed out that “scientists often don’t know that the work they are citing has been retracted.” What the chairman of the Physics Department at Schön’s alma mater had characterized, in revoking his degree, as the biggest falsification scandal in physics in half a century was still not enough to prevent citation of bogus science.

—Edward Johnson

FURTHER READING

Baura, Gail D. Engineering Ethics: An Industrial Perspective. New York: Elsevier/Academic Press, 2006. Discusses the Schön affair in the context of other case studies in engineering ethics.

_____. “When Money Wasn’t King.” IEEE Engineering in Medicine and Biology 24, no. 2 (March–April, 2005): 15–16. A former employee reflects on corporate changes at Bell Labs that made the Schön affair possible.

Beasley, M. R., S. Datta, H. Kogelnik, H. Kroemer, and D. Monroe. Report of the Investigation Committee on the Possibility of Scientific Misconduct in the Work of Hendrik Schön and Coauthors. Lucent Technologies and the American Physical Society, September, 2002. This primary document, also known as the Beasley Report, explains the findings of the committee that investigated Schön’s work.

Choy, Tuck, and Marshall Stoneham. “Was Schön Ever Right?” Materials Today 7, no. 4 (April, 2004): 64. Two physicists from London’s University College suggest that some of Schön’s ideas might be right-headed, even if his experiments were misleading.

Couzin, Jennifer, and Katherine Unger. “Cleaning Up the Paper Trail.” Science 312 (April 7, 2006): 38–43. Emphasizes the difficulty, in cases such as the Schön scandal, of keeping the historical record accurate.

Ebert, Lawrence B. “There You Go Again.” Intellectual Property Today, July, 2004. Mentions unresolved issues about liability in the Schön case and reasserts the importance of Solomon’s unpublished letter to Nature (quoted in full in Ebert’s article in the June, 2003, edition of Intellectual Property Today).

Service, Robert F. “Pioneering Physics Papers Under Suspicion for Data Manipulation.” Science, May 24, 2002 “Winning Streak Brought Awe, and Then Doubt,” Science, July 5, 2002; “Bell Lab Fires Star Physicist Found Guilty of Forging Data,” Science, October 4, 2002. A series of reports in one of the leading science journals that provides a good overview of not only the events but also the physics involved.

SEE ALSO: Nov. 21, 1953: Piltdown Man Is Revealed to Be a Hoax; Sept. 19, 1988: Stephen Breuning Pleads Guilty to Medical Research Fraud; Mar. 23, 1989: Scientists’ “Cold Fusion” Claims Cannot Be Verified; Spring, 1996: Physicist Publishes a Deliberately Fraudulent Article; Nov. 5, 2000: Japanese Amateur Archaeologist’s “Discoveries” Are Proven Fakes; Aug., 2002: Immunologist Resigns After Being Accused of Falsifying Research; May 12, 2006: Scientist Is Indicted for Faking His Research on Creating Stem Cells.

September 28, 2002

BRITISH POLITICIAN REVEALS HER AFFAIR WITH PRIME MINISTER JOHN MAJOR

A conservative member of the British parliament, Edwina Currie published her memoirs in 2002, revealing that she had had a romantic affair with former prime minister John Major before working in his government. She served as junior health minister under Margaret Thatcher until she was forced to resign after claiming that British egg producers allowed salmonella to become widespread in Great Britain.

LOCALE: London, England

CATEGORIES: Publishing and journalism; sex; government; politics

KEY FIGURES

Edwina Currie (b. 1946), member of the British parliament, 1983-1997, and junior health minister, 1986-1988

John Major (b. 1943), British prime minister, 1990-1997

SUMMARY OF EVENT

The revelation of an affair between two members (MPs) of the British parliament, fourteen years after it ended, would hardly be considered scandalous in any country, except that one of the MPs, John Major, later became prime minister and was responsible for accepting the resignation of a number of his ministers whose romantic affairs were revealed while he was in office. Major's affair with Edwina Currie also revealed the political danger faced by the prime minister, having to keep the affair secret. The affair is also significant, in retrospect, because it explains why Major was so reluctant at times to fire those ministers.

Currie first published her revealing diaries about her affair with Major in serialized form in The Times of London, a newspaper not usually inclined to publish reports of lurid romantic affairs. She made a great deal of money from the serialization, which ran between September 28 and October 6, 2002, and the well-publicized book, Diaries, 1987-1992, which followed later that year. The diaries suggest a keen interest in making money, and a number of reviews took up this theme, questioning her motives. Some of these reviews were very hostile, although Currie herself was of the opinion that all publicity is good publicity.

Currie was a junior minister for health in Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher's government from 1986 to 1988. Currie was raised in an orthodox Jewish family, though later she distanced herself from any belief or practice of Judaism. A very gifted student, she won a scholarship to St. Anne's College, Oxford University, to study chemistry, but she changed her major to philosophy, politics, and economics. She then earned a master of arts degree from the London School of Economics. As a student, she became politically active in the Conservative Party and later held a seat on the Birmingham City Council. She stood for the South Derbyshire parliamentary constituency in 1983 and was elected. She was soon offered a promotion by Thatcher.

While in office, Currie actively promoted improved screening services for cancer in women, particularly breast and cervical cancer. She was an outspoken proponent in this area and caught the public's attention with her wit and assertiveness. It seemed that she had a good political career ahead of her. However, in 1988, she was forced to resign after she commented on the prevalence of salmonella in eggs produced in Great Britain. Her statement led to a loss of confidence in the British egg industry. Thatcher did not offer Currie a second chance at the job, but Major did when he became prime minister. He offered her a middle-ranking ministerial role, but she declined the offer.

The year 1988 also marked the time Currie and Major ended their four-year romantic affair. When the affair started, she was a back-bench MP and he was a government whip. During the period of the affair, she had several government jobs and he rose to become chief secretary to the treasury, which was a cabinet post. As such, it meant that Major had a security detail with him at all times. Currie claimed that the effort needed to carry out the affair with such a security presence was what finally led her to break off the affair. She claimed to have still loved him for some time after, and it appears they remained friends.

Edwina Currie, c. 1986. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

In her diaries, Currie identifies Major with the initial B, as he was the second man in her life. It was fairly obvious to readers who B really was, and she readily admitted his identity. Her diary is more a series of personal jottings than a considered piece of writing, and it is especially notable because of its character assassinations of fellow politicians. Even Currie's lover receives a certain amount of criticism, and her husband, who had known nothing of the affair, is quickly dismissed in the diaries as well.

Later, Major claimed that he had told his wife, Norma, about the affair and that she had forgiven him. At the time of the disclosure, he commented that it was the one event in his life of which he was most ashamed and in most fear of being made public. When it was finally disclosed, he had long since ended his term as prime minister and was no longer active in politics, so it did little actual harm to his career. However, it did bring his family the shame of public ridicule. In office, he had the image of being decent and moral, but also one with a personality somewhat grey and lackluster.

Currie's career as a politician stalled after the affair ended, though she managed to keep herself in the public eye by making speeches and helping raise funds on behalf of cancer research, especially for the charitable organization Marie Curie Cancer Care. In 1997, Currie lost her seat in Derbyshire to her Labour opponent but was promptly offered a job by the British Broadcasting Corporation as a late-night radio host for a new current-affairs program called Late Night Currie. This led to a television job with a commercial television company, HTV, from which she became a regular television personality. Her first marriage ended in 1997 and she remarried in 1999. She also became a prolific author of sex novels, including A Parliamentary Affair (1994), which are set in the world of politics.

IMPACT

The motives and timing of Currie's revelations about her affair with Major were intensely scrutinized by the press. She said she published the diaries because she believed the truth had to come out. She also believed the diaries would not harm Major, and she hoped the diaries would provoke the Conservative Party to be more realistic in its moral stance. The party at the time had been struggling to modernize itself to match Prime Minister Tony Blair's Labour Party government.

The press, however, latched on to statements in the diaries that suggested revenge at being completely left out of Major's autobiography (2000) and for his failure to offer her a higher government post. The latter seems an unrealistic criticism of her work, however, because she had been offered a job that would have been a stepping stone to higher office. (She had criticized him heavily in the past for the poor representation of women in his cabinet.)

For Major, the revelations led him to reassess his life, but his autobiography does not give the slightest hint of the affair with Currie, or any relationship with her. Currie had the power to harm him at any moment during his tenure as prime minister, but she did not do so, choosing instead to wait until after his tenure ended to reveal their affair.

—David Barratt

FURTHER READING

Clark, Alan. Diaries: In Power. London: Weidenfeld & Nicholson, 2003. Clark's diaries recount the John Major and Margaret Thatcher years of government and give intimate details into the affairs and indiscretions of a number of ministers.

Currie, Edwina. Diaries, 1987-1992. London: Little, Brown, 2002. Currie's memoirs, in which she exposes her affair with John Major and discusses her sense of betrayal for his failure to give her a government post or to mention her in his 2000 autobiography.

Major, John. The Autobiography. New York: HarperCollins, 2000. Major's autobiography, which fails to mention his relationship, sexual or otherwise, with Currie. Instructive for bringing readers to the period in question.

SEE ALSO: 1927: President Warren G. Harding's Lover Publishes Tell-All Memoir; July 10, 1934: Sex Scandal Forces Resignation of Alberta Premier Brownlee; Dec. 10, 1936: King Edward VIII Abdicates to Marry an American Divorcée; Mar. 2-Sept. 25, 1963: John Profumo Affair Rocks British Government; Oct. 14, 1983: British Cabinet Secretary Parkinson Resigns After His Secretary Becomes Pregnant; July 25, 1987: Novelist-Politician Jeffrey Archer Wins Libel Trial Against the Daily Star; Aug. 10, 1989: Japanese Prime Minister Sosuke Resigns After Affair with a Geisha; Sept. 24, 1992: British Cabinet Member David Mellor Resigns over Romantic Affair; Jan. 5, 1994: British Cabinet Member Resigns After Fathering a Child Out of Wedlock; Jan. 21, 2006: British Politician Resigns After Gay-Sex Orgy; Apr. 26, 2006: Britain's Deputy Prime Minister Admits Affair with Secretary.

October 25, 2002

HISTORIAN MICHAEL A. BELLESILES RESIGNS AFTER ACADEMIC FRAUD ACCUSATIONS

Scandal followed the publication of Michael A. Bellesiles's 2000 book Arming America, a study claiming that guns were relatively rare in the American colonies and the United States before the U.S. Civil War. Although he was accused of research falsification and distortion, Bellesiles still received the coveted Bancroft Prize for American history. However, in October, 2002, he was forced to resign his professorship after a panel of historians found him guilty of scholarly misconduct.

LOCALE: Atlanta, Georgia

CATEGORIES: Education; cultural and intellectual history; publishing and journalism

KEY FIGURES

Michael A. Bellesiles (b. 1954), professor of history at Emory University

James Lindgren (b. 1952), professor of law at Northwestern University

Clayton E. Cramer (b. 1956), author

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Michael A. Bellesiles was a respected professor of American colonial history at prestigious Emory University in Atlanta. He was also the director of the Center for the Study of Violence and an expert in gun and frontier culture in early America. He had received fellowships to the Stanford Humanities Institute and the Newberry Library in Chicago. In 1993, he published Revolutionary Outlaws: Ethan Allan and the Struggle for Independence in the Early American Frontier, a book that was well received by historians.

In late 1995, while working on a project on the early American frontier, Bellesiles claimed to have discovered that, contrary to tradition, gun ownership was rare in America during the antebellum period—the period before the American Civil War—even on the frontier, and that arms became widespread only with the mass production of firearms. As part of his research, he examined legal, probate, military, and business records, as well as travel accounts and personal letters. His discovery would soon add even more controversy to the ongoing debate between advocates of gun control and proponents of the right to bear arms, a debate that includes the belief by gun proponents that gun possession is an integral part of America's identity as a nation.

Bellesiles first published his revolutionary thesis in his article "The Origins of Gun Culture in the United States, 1760-1865" in the Journal of American History in 1996. His finding garnered enthusiastic reviews by many influential scholars, including Edmund Sears Morgan, an eminent authority in early American history. Also, the article won the best article of the year prize from the Organization of American Historians. However, other scholars, such as James Lindgren, professor of law at Northwestern University, were skeptical of Bellesiles's thesis, which claimed that for the years 1765 to 1770, very few probate inventories listed guns. During the late summer of 2000, Lindgren requested to see the data used for this groundbreaking theory, but Bellesiles claimed that all his notes were lost in a flood that affected Emory University that same year.

The culmination of Bellesiles's research, Arming America: The Origins of a National Gun Culture, was published in September of 2000. Criticism of the book followed immediately. Clayton Cramer, at the time a master's degree student at Sonoma State University in California, became Bellesiles's most persistent critic. Cramer was the first to claim that Bellesiles had misquoted sources, taken them out of context, and even modified texts so they would fit his thesis. Similarly, in two articles published in 2002, Lindgren claimed that Bellesiles had altered statutes, dates, citations, and counts. In one case, Lindgren claims, Bellesiles provides a count of guns for seventeenth and eighteenth century Providence, Rhode Island, based on wills that did not exist. Bellesiles also claimed to have counted probate inventories that were, in fact, destroyed in the great San Francisco earthquake of 1906. Lindgren argues that Bellesiles, in effect, disregarded accounts and records that did not fit his thesis.

Despite increasing skepticism about the validity of Bellesiles's research, Arming America was granted Columbia University's Bancroft Prize, generally considered the most prestigious award in the field of American history. However, this honor did not stem the criticism. During the months that followed, the book became a favorite theme of academic debate, and of media scrutiny. One point that attracted significant critique was Bellesiles's analysis of the gun culture of Europe, especially in England, as part of his introduction to his investigation into gun use in America. The historian claimed that the English government outlawed the use of guns by commoners, and that all guns owned by the militia were carefully kept in governmental magazines. However, in contrast, Lindgren pointed out that there were laws exhorting commoners to practice with their muskets, and records show that guns were kept in owners' homes for personal defense and hunting.

Bellesiles further claims in the book that in the United States, guns were uncommon, either because they were expensive, inefficient, highly regulated, or simply undesired by civilians. According to Bellesiles, guns were not widely used for hunting either, a claim based on his study of less than one hundred travel accounts. Moreover, he dismisses the militias' status as professionals, remarking that their guns were mostly unusable. He also claims that just over 14 percent of men owned guns between 1765 and 1859, and that this percentage began to increase just before the Civil War, mostly due to the successful mass production of the Colt revolver.

The intense criticism and media attention forced Emory University to initiate an internal inquiry into Bellesiles's scholarship. An external investigative committee examined the matter as well. Both committees found grave errors, some due to the misuse of evidence and some due to the lack of evidence. The external committee issued its report on July 10, 2002. Emory announced Bellesiles's resignation from the university on October 25 (effective December 31).

For the first time since the award was established, Columbia rescinded Bellesiles's Bancroft Prize and asked that he return the $4,000 he was awarded. Also, his book contract with Alfred A. Knopf was dropped. In 2003, Soft Skull Press published a revised edition of Arming America, which was preceded by the seventy-four-page "pamphlet" Weighed in an Even Balance, in which Bellesiles steadfastly defends the validity of his research, pointing out that only one-fourth of his research had been contested.

IMPACT

With the publication of Arming America, Bellesiles found himself at the center of the ongoing debate over gun possession. Hailed as a hero by those opposed to the easy availability of weapons in the United States, Bellesiles was later vilified by proponents of the right to bear arms. He was blacklisted in academia, stripped of his Bancroft Prize, and forced to resign from his position at Emory University.

The Bellesiles scandal came at a time when other similar scandals rocked academia, especially the field of history. Concurrent with this scandal were those of historians Joseph Ellis and Doris Kearns Goodwin, who were accused of academic misconduct as well. The scandal that arose because of the inaccuracies in Arming America was attributed by many to the pressures of writing popular history and by others to postmodern scholarship's tendency to relativize the truth. Bellesiles argues that the scandal arose because of a higher level of scrutiny by the media.

—Concepcion Saenz-Cambra

BELLESILES RESPONDS TO THE OFFICIAL INQUIRY

In an undated letter, excerpted here, historian Michael Bellesiles responded to the final report (July 10, 2002) of an investigative committee of scholars from outside Emory University, convened to inquire into allegations that he committed academic fraud.

I remain convinced that the standard workings of academic discourse remain the best way of correcting errors and increasing our knowledge. . . . It is not evident that launching a sharply focused investigation of one small part of a scholar's work brings us closer to the truth on the subject of that research. Rather, it is my opinion that this debate has actually obscured a much more important consideration of the main issues raised by Arming America. Scholarship must be open to new directions, allowing scholars to build on their own earlier research, to qualify previous generalizations they have made, to correct errors in their work, and even to change their minds in the face of more compelling evidence.

FURTHER READING

Cramer, Clayton E. Armed America: The Remarkable Story of How and Why Guns Became as American as Apple Pie. Nashville, Tenn.: Nelson Current, 2007. Detailed critique of Bellesiles's claims, including diaries, travel accounts, and statistical evidence. Written by a leading critic of the historian's work.

Hoffer, Peter Charles. Past Imperfect: Facts, Fictions, and Fraud—American History from Bancroft and Parkman to Ambrose, Bellesiles, Ellis, and Goodwin. New York: PublicAffairs, 2007. Examination of the key controversies in the historical profession, including the Bellesiles case, as the culmination of the tensions between the New Left scholars and traditional historians.

Lindgren, James. "Fall from Grace: Arming America and the Bellesiles Scandal." Yale Law Journal 111, no. 8 (2002): 2195-2249. A detailed scholarly study of Bellesiles's book, the data he used, and the book's alleged errors. Written by one of his main critics.

Lindgren, James, and Justin L. Heather. "Counting Guns in Early America." William and Mary Law

Review 43, no. 5 (2002): 1777-1842. Another detailed study of Bellesiles's controversial book.

Skinner, David. "Cheating History: Ambrose, Bellesiles, Ellis, and Goodwin—The Historians Who Let Us Down." The Weekly Standard, November 29, 2004. Focuses on a dozen key controversies ranging across the political spectrum and representative of a wide variety of charges.

Wiener, Jon. Historians in Trouble: Plagiarism, Fraud, and Politics in the Ivory Tower. New York: New Press, 2005. Offers a detailed analysis of court documents and other evidence. Less partial when judging the gravity of some historians' work, lessening Bellesiles's acts, and harshly critical of historians Stephen Ambrose and Doris Kearns Goodwin.

SEE ALSO: 1928-1929: Actor Is Suspected of Falsely Claiming to Be an American Indian; Jan. 28, 1972: Clifford Irving Admits Faking Howard Hughes Memoirs; 1978: Roots Author Alex Haley Is Sued for Plagiarism; Spring, 1996: Physicist Publishes a Deliberately Fraudulent Article; Apr., 1998: Scottish Historian Is Charged with Plagiarism; May 11, 1998: Journalist Stephen Glass Is Exposed as a Fraud; June 18, 2001: Historian Joseph J. Ellis Is Accused of Lying; Jan. 4, 2002: Historian Stephen E. Ambrose Is Accused of Plagiarism; Jan. 18, 2002: Historian Doris Kearns Goodwin Is Accused of Plagiarism; July 24, 2007: University of Colorado Fires Professor for Plagiarism and Research Falsification.

December 5, 2002

SENATOR TRENT LOTT PRAISES STROM THURMOND'S 1948 PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN

A speech delivered by Mississippi senator and Senate majority leader Trent Lott on the occasion of the one hundredth birthday of South Carolina senator Strom Thurmond praised Thurmond's 1948 so-called Dixiecrat segregationist campaign for the presidency. The resulting political fallout led to Lott's resignation as majority leader.

LOCALE: Washington, D.C.

CATEGORIES: Politics; social issues and reform; racism; government

KEY FIGURES

Trent Lott (b. 1941), U.S. senator from Mississippi, 1989-2007

Strom Thurmond (1902-2003), U.S. senator from South Carolina, 1956-2003

George W. Bush (b. 1946), president of the United States, 2001-2009

Bill Frist (b. 1952), U.S. senator from Tennessee, 1995-2007

Al Gore (b. 1948), vice president of the United States, 1993-2001

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Trent Lott's political rise as one of the "new breed" of southern conservative Republicans was, by all standards, exceptional. Obtaining his law degree in 1967 from the University of Mississippi, Lott won election to the U.S. House of Representatives at the age of thirty-one and served in the House from 1973 to 1989. Lott was then elected to the U.S. Senate and enjoyed a meteoric rise through the ranks, becoming Senate majority whip in 1995 and then majority leader in 1996 while in his first electoral term of office. He consistently held the post of either majority or minority leader into the year 2002.

Lott strongly identified with the more conservative elements in Congress. He opposed the renewal of significant civil rights bills that had been passed during the 1960's, and he assumed an active role in the impeachment trial of President Bill Clinton, working hand-in-hand with the Senate “managers” and casting his vote in favor of conviction. During the early months of the administration of George W. Bush, Lott served as a staunch, and often decisive, ally of the president—though one who sometimes showed an independent streak. In a great many instances, Lott's influence and political acumen proved to be crucial, as in the case of Bush's tax-cut scheme in 2001 and the U.S. military operations against Iraq that began in 2003. However, during the debate over the latter initiative, Lott's initial misgivings over the theory that Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein was stockpiling weapons of mass destruction indicated that he considered himself to be a power in his own right who could not invariably be expected to accept every White House pronouncement uncritically.

Senator Strom Thurmond, seated, celebrates his one-hundredth birthday with, from left, Vice President Dick Cheney, President George W. Bush, Senator Trent Lott, and Thurmond's daughter, Julie Thurmond Whitmer. (AP/Wide World Photos)

It had been Senator Strom Thurmond of South Carolina who had pioneered the “switch over” of white, southern conservative politicians from the solid South Democratic Party tradition to the Republican Party, and had thus functioned as a role model for people such as Trent Lott, Newt Gingrich of Georgia, George Allen of Virginia, and Bill Frist of Tennessee. Thurmond, then South Carolina's governor, left the 1948 Democratic Party convention out of frustration with President Harry S. Truman's liberal stance on the issue of racial desegregation and had launched a pro-segregationist, states' rights campaign for the presidency under the banner of the States' Rights Party, or Dixiecrat, movement. Thurmond garnered close to 1.2 million popular votes and carried the states of South Carolina, Mississippi, Alabama, and Louisiana to capture thirty-nine electoral votes.

Thurmond had subsequently been elected to the U.S. Senate, where he became a highly visible opponent of integrationist and civil rights legislation: In 1957, he set the record for a congressional filibuster, debating for twenty-four hours and eighteen minutes against the passage of the 1957 Civil Rights Act. During the acrimonious struggle over the Civil Rights Act of 1964, Thurmond was involved in a physical scuffle with liberal Democratic senator Ralph Yarborough of Texas, wherein both men ended rolling on the floor. Shortly thereafter, Thurmond announced his move into the ranks of the Republican Party, where he became instrumental in facilitating the party's rightward political tilt. By December 5, 2002, when he celebrated his one hundredth birthday, Thurmond had become the oldest serving U.S. senator in history.

At a special birthday celebration held that evening in Thurmond's honor, Lott delivered a speech praising the centenarian senator, during which he uttered words referring to Thurmond's 1948 campaign. Lott's words that were to ignite the greatest controversy included the following:

I want to say this about my state: When Strom Thurmond ran for president, we voted for him. We're proud of it. And if the rest of the country had followed our lead, we wouldn't have had all these problems over all these years, either.

IMPACT

Initially, little media reaction followed Lott's December 5 speech, except on Web sites and blogs. However, what the media did bring to light was Lott's voting record and past speeches supporting segregationist causes, and his association with the Sons of Confederate Veterans and the Council of Conservative Citizens (formerly the White Citizens' Councils). The repercussions then came on with a vengeance.

Lott's remarks elicited attacks from all sides. Former Civil Rights movement leaders such as John Lewis and Jesse Jackson, incensed by past memories of Thurmond's speeches and other activities against civil rights and mindful of Lott's voting record, denounced the Mississippi senator's words as a retrograde attack on the progress of civil liberties and racial integration over more than a half century.

Democratic Party legislators, considering Lott's speech a possible electoral issue, weighed in with increasingly emphatic rebuttals. Among the Democrats, Lott's most vocal critic was former vice president Al Gore—a frequent past opponent of Lott in the Senate—who called the senator's speech racist and divisive and who advocated for Lott's censure by the Senate if he failed to deliver an adequate apology.

On December 9, Lott issued an official apology for using what he called a "poor choice of words" and denied that he had indicated support for Thurmond's past segregationist ideas. However, Lott was losing support even among his conservative Republican colleagues, and his remarks were proving to be an embarrassment to the White House, which had previously initiated overtures to African American leaders in an effort to bolster support of the Republican Party among people of color. What was probably the coup de grace was delivered by President Bush in a speech in Philadelphia on December 12, in which he roundly criticized Lott's words as offensive. Throughout the following week, Lott vowed that he would fight to retain the leadership, but as more Republican senators indicated that they favored a change, Senator Frist of Tennessee, who in the wake of the December 5 incident had expressed full support for Lott, made a turnaround and announced on December 19 that he would seek the majority leader's post.

Lott resigned as Senate majority leader on December 20, and Frist, who had obtained tacit support from the Bush administration as a much more diplomatic and pliant conservative, was elected to succeed him on January 6, 2003.

—Raymond Pierre Hylton

FURTHER READING

- Baker, Peter. The Breach: Inside the Impeachment and Trial of William Jefferson Clinton. New York: Berkley Books, 2001. Though this book was written long before Lott's speech, it is nonetheless useful in that it adroitly describes Lott's political style, modus operandi, and the extent of his political influence prior to December, 2002.
- Gregg, Gary L., II, and Mark J. Rozell. Considering the Bush Presidency. New York: Oxford University Press, 2004. Suggests that the Lott-Thurmond incident provided the Bush administration with a pretext for replacing Lott with Bill Frist.
- Kraus, Jon, Kevin J. McMahon, and David M. Rankin. Transformed by Crisis: The Presidency of George W. Bush and American Politics. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004. Focuses on Lott's controversial speech as a crisis, with the Democrats attempting to capitalize and the Bush administration countering with damage control.
- Lott, Trent. Herding Cats: A Political Life. New York: Regan Books, 2005. Lott's career autobiography and apologia, in which he argues that he has been misinterpreted and misunderstood. Castigates the Bush administration for backstabbing.
- Schier, Steven E., ed. High Risk and Big Ambition: The Presidency of George W. Bush. Pittsburgh, Pa.: University of Pittsburgh Press, 2004. Implies that Lott's Thurmond birthday speech frustrated the Bush administration's outreach to African Americans.

Tiefer, Charles. Veering Right: How the Bush Administration Subverts the Law for Conservative Causes. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2004. A slanted account, but one that does give insight on possible preexisting motives behind Bush's quick rejection of Lott.

SEE ALSO: Mar. 1, 1967: Adam Clayton Powell, Jr., Is Excluded from Congress; June 23, 1967: Senator Thomas J. Dodd Is Censured for Misappropriating Funds; Oct. 11, 1979: Senate Denounces

Herman E. Talmadge for Money Laundering; Jan. 25, 1984: Jesse Jackson Calls New York City "Hymietown"; Sept. 23, 1987: Plagiarism Charges End Joe Biden's Presidential Campaign; May 31, 1989: Speaker of the House Jim Wright Resigns in Ethics Scandal; June 1, 1994: Congressman Dan Rostenkowski Is Indicted in House Post Office Scandal; Jan. 17, 1998: President Bill Clinton Denies Sexual Affair with a White House Intern; Dec. 17, 2003: Senator Strom Thurmond's Biracial Daughter Is Revealed; July 9, 2007: Senator David Vitter's Name Is Found in D.C. Madam's Address Book.

January 2, 2003

E-MAIL MESSAGE PROMPTS INQUIRY INTO AIR FORCE ACADEMY SEXUAL ASSAULTS

An e-mail message alleging a pattern of sexual assaults at the U.S. Air Force Academy and official cover-ups of the assaults prompted a series of investigations and changes in academy policy. The response to the scandal, while substantive, was the subject of controversy and drew criticism both from those who found it excessive and those who considered it insufficient.

LOCALE: Colorado Springs, Colorado

CATEGORIES: Sex crimes; military; government; communications and media; education; ethics

KEY FIGURES

Wayne Allard (b. 1943), U.S. senator from Colorado, 1997-

Tillie Fowler (1942-2005), U.S. representative from Florida, 1993-2001

James G. Roche (b. 1940), undersecretary of the U.S. Air Force, 2001-2005

Donald Rumsfeld (b. 1932), U.S. secretary of defense, 2001-2006

Peter B. Teets (b. 1942), acting undersecretary of the U.S. Air Force, January-March, 2005

SUMMARY OF EVENT

On January 2, 2003, the undersecretary of the U.S. Air Force, James Roche, received an e-mail from a person using the name Renee Trindle, alleging a pervasive pattern of sexual assaults at the Air Force Academy. The e-mail, which also claimed the sexual assaults were covered up and ignored by academy leadership, was copied to several prominent government officials and journalists, including the chief of staff of the Air Force and U.S. senator Wayne Allard of Colorado. The media began reporting the assaults. Subsequent investigations by the Air Force and the U.S. Congress revealed that numerous sexual assaults indeed had occurred at the academy and that administrators tried to conceal the offenses by intimidating victims and witnesses and by shielding academy staff.

The allegations, which surfaced nearly twenty-seven years after women were first admitted to the Air Force Academy, closely resembled similar allegations involving other branches of the U.S. military. Female naval officers were sexually assaulted and harassed at the 1991 convention of the Tailhook Association—an organization comprising active and former U.S. Navy pilots—in Las Vegas. At the Aberdeen Proving Ground in Maryland in 1996, twelve male U.S. Army officers were arrested for sexual assault. The Tailhook and Aberdeen scandals had focused upon the conduct of small groups of people over a relatively short duration, whereas the allegations emerging from the Air Force Academy suggested a longstanding and pervasive pattern of institutional corruption that began with the commission of criminal acts and progressed to a conspiracy to conceal those acts.

Following the receipt of the e-mail, Roche directed the Air Force general counsel to form a working group to investigate the matter. The group submitted an interim report to Roche in March, 2003, leading the Air Force to implement its “Agenda for Change” on March 26. The agenda made changes to life at the academy that would make it “consistent with the Air Force concepts of no tolerance for sexual assault.” The working group submitted its final report on June 17.

Roche also directed the Air Force inspector general’s office (IGO) to investigate the allegations. Inquiries formed outside the Air Force as well. The secretary of defense, Donald Rumsfeld, at congressional urging, formed a seven-member panel under the leadership of Allard and former U.S. representative Tillie Fowler of Florida. In February, the Office of the Inspector General (OIG) of the Department of Defense, at the request of the Senate Armed Services Committee, began its inquiry. The complaints reviewed by the Fowler panel, as it came to be called, had been submitted by female cadets who attended the academy between 1993 and 2003. According to these complaints, the assaults took place primarily in student dormitories and typically involved upperclass male cadets and freshman and sophomore female cadets. Male cadets reportedly often provided female cadets with alcohol in violation of academy policy and, following the assaults, would blackmail their victims into remaining silent by threatening to reveal their violations of alcohol policy to administrators. Cadets who reported the attacks allegedly were ignored and then often disciplined for offenses that included alcohol violations and fraternization (with the cadets who also were their assailants). Many who filed complaints had withdrawn from the academy. The Fowler panel issued its report on September 22 and also held that the general counsel’s working group might have shielded top academy staff from accountability in the assaults.

Investigations revealed that approximately 12 percent of the female graduates of the 2003 academy class had reported that they had been sexually assaulted or faced an attempted sexual assault while attending the academy. An estimated 20 percent of all female cadets who attended the academy within the ten-year period in question had been sexually assaulted during their time at the academy. Many of the alleged assailants, like their alleged victims, failed to graduate. In a survey conducted in 2004, more than three hundred respondents reported that they had been sexually assaulted, and nearly two-thirds indicated that they had not reported the assaults.

The investigations produced a wave of negative publicity for the academy, the Air Force, and the military as a whole. Public opinion of the scandal was divided; many believed that the allegations were overblown or that the academy was being unfairly targeted for behavior equally prevalent in civilian colleges and universities; yet others viewed the scandal as a continuation of a pattern of abuse in the U.S. military. Many public officials reacted to the scandal with anger; Allard and other lawmakers harshly criticized Roche when he appeared before the U.S. Senate Armed Services Committee to testify about the allegations. Groups such as the Miles Foundation, which advocates for victims of sexual trauma in the military, were equally adamant in demanding widespread changes in academy and military policy to deter further sexual assaults and hold administrators and supervisors accountable for investigating complaints and disciplining offenders.

Although the investigations confirmed allegations of a longstanding pattern of sexual assaults, the reports issued by the respective investigatory committees stopped short of recommending harsh consequences for academy leadership. The Air Force IGO report, issued on September 14, 2004, and the Defense Department’s OIG report, issued

DEFENSE DEPARTMENT RECOMMENDATIONS

In its December, 2004, report on sexual harassment at the Air Force Academy, the Office of the Inspector General, Department of Defense, recommended that the superintendent of the academy take the following actions:

1. Work with other Service Academy Superintendents and the Office of the Under Secretary of Defense (Personnel and Readiness) to formulate a single survey instrument and testing protocol that can be administered to cadets and midshipmen periodically to measure cultural changes and adherence to core values; upon completing each such survey, brief the Service Secretaries and the Inspector General of the Department of Defense on the results.
2. Increase command attention to eliminating alcohol consumption, prohibited consensual sex, and use of government equipment for pornography at the United States Air Force Academy, thereby furthering good order and discipline among cadets.
3. Ensure that orientation training for cadets includes effective training on clear standards for sexual interaction so all cadets understand clearly the boundaries, penalties for crossing them, individual leadership responsibilities, and reporting options.
4. Maintain a heightened level of command attention aimed at eliminating sexual harassment and negative attitudes toward women at the United States Air Force Academy.
5. Review current admissions criteria and consider adopting changes that emphasize core values as a part of the whole person concept, along with current measures, such as aptitude scores, grades, athletics, and extracurricular activities.
6. Implement Title 10 U.S.C. § 8583 requirements for exemplary leadership behavior into the cadet curriculum and disciplinary system to ensure that graduates possess and enforce the leadership traits essential for future leaders of the United States Air Force.

on December 3, made several recommendations for the prevention of future assaults, including a procedure for confidential reporting, improved access to counseling and medical care, and a strict protocol for investigating sexual assault allegations. Although the committees' findings appeared to confirm allegations that the victim reports had been mishandled, the findings also showed agreement that academy administrators had acted reasonably and legally in their responses to the victim reports. The committees suggested that the mishandling of the victim complaints was due primarily to failures in policy and procedure rather than the negligence or willful misconduct of administrators.

The conclusions of investigators and the response of the Air Force to the scandal met with criticism from within and outside the U.S. military and government. Critics alleged that many of the officials who were disciplined had little or no actual role in the scandal; one officer who was forced into retirement had joined the administration of the academy following the time period under investigation and had been employed at the institution for only two months. Many of the administrators involved retired voluntarily before disciplinary measures could be taken against them. Roche retired in January, 2005, in the light of unrelated allegations of misconduct and was replaced by Peter B. Teets, who in a memorandum to Secretary of Defense Rumsfeld in early 2005 advised against pursuing criminal charges against Air Force officers implicated in the scandal. Teets suggested that the officers had acted in "good faith" and were not derelict in their duties. Although Allard, other members of Congress, and victims' advocacy groups expressed dissatisfaction with the memorandum, neither Rumsfeld nor any other official authorized or initiated additional action against the accused officers.

IMPACT

The scandal and the resulting investigation led to the implementation of new policies on reporting and investigating sexual assaults at the Air Force Academy. Even with these policy changes, lingering questions remain regarding the willingness and ability of the U.S. armed services to adapt to social change and to balance a culture emphasizing loyalty and obedience with the need to address internal problems involving corruption and misconduct.

Although subsequent reports and other evidence indicate that the service academies have made progress in deterring and prosecuting sexual assaults, other evidence, including numerous reports of sexual assaults upon active-duty female troops serving in Iraq and Afghanistan, indicate that sexual assaults still occur in the U.S. military.

—Michael H. Burchett

FURTHER READING

- “Air Force Ignored Academy Abuse.” The New York Times, September 23, 2003. Contains a synopsis of the Fowler panel’s report and reactions to the report immediately following its release.
- Higgins, M. “The Air Force Academy Scandal: Will the ‘Agenda for Change’ Counteract the Academy’s Legal and Social Deterrents to Reporting Sexual Harassment and Assault?” Women’s Rights Law Reporter 26, nos. 2-3 (2005): 121-138. Examines the effect of the academy’s “Agenda for Change,” implemented by the Air Force at the height of the sexual assault scandal.
- Hunter, Mic. Honor Betrayed: Sexual Abuse in America’s Military. Fort Lee, N.J.: Barricade Books, 2007. A social history of the masculinist culture of the U.S. military and that culture’s tolerance for sexual abuse. Begins with “Why It Happens” and includes chapters on “the code of hypermasculinity,” hazing, domestic violence, and women in the military. Ends with first-person accounts.

“Pentagon Sets New Policy on Reporting Sexual Assaults at Academies.” The New York Times, March 19, 2005. Briefly describes changes in the sexual assault policies of U.S. military academies.

Smallwood, William L., and Sue Ross. The Air Force Academy Candidate Book: How to Get In, How to Prepare, How to Survive. Monument, Colo.: Silver Horn Books, 2007. A guide for prospective Air Force cadets that details the academy’s policies and procedures on sexual assault and related issues.

Thomas, Cathy Booth. “The Air Force Academy’s Rape Scandal.” Time, March 6, 2003. Journalistic account of the scandal that provides a synopsis of key events and the perspectives of victims.

SEE ALSO: July 19, 1921: U.S. Senate Rebukes Navy in Homosexuality Investigation; June 26, 1992: U.S. Navy Secretary Resigns in the Wake of Tailhook Sexual Assault Scandal; Apr. 28, 1994: U.S. Naval Academy Expels Midshipmen for Cheating; May 20, 1997: Air Force Prosecution of Female Officer for Adultery Reveals Double Standard; June 2, 2004: U.N. Report Reveals That Secretary-General Kofi Annan Dismissed Sexual Harassment Charges; June 22, 2005: U.S. Air Force Investigates Religious Intolerance at Its Academy.

March 2, 2003

U.S. NATIONAL SECURITY AGENCY IS FOUND TO HAVE SPIED ON U.N. OFFICIALS

According to an investigative report by the British newspaper The Observer, the U.S. National Security Agency had been engaging in wiretapping and other forms of spying on United Nations personnel, including Secretary-General Kofi Annan, in preparation for seeking U.N. Security Council support for the U.S.-British invasion of Iraq in 2003.

LOCALES: London, England; New York, New York

CATEGORIES: Espionage; government; international relations; military; ethics

KEY FIGURES

Frank Koza (fl. early twenty-first century), U.S. National Security Agency, chief of staff of regional targets section

Katharine Gun (b. 1974), translator for Government Communications Headquarters, a British intelligence agency

Clare Short (b. 1946), former British cabinet member and international development secretary

Hans Blix (b. 1928), chief U.N. weapons inspector

Kofi Annan (b. 1938), secretary-general of the United Nations

SUMMARY OF EVENT

On March 2, 2003, the British newspaper The Observer reported that the United States had been using its National Security Agency (NSA) to tap the phones and read the e-mails of select diplomats at U.N. headquarters in New York City. According to a “top secret” internal memorandum, allegedly written by NSA official Frank Koza and sent on January 31, the agency was to conduct electronic surveillance “particularly directed at the U.N. Security Council Members,” excepting those from the United States and Great Britain. The goal of the surveillance was to provide the George W. Bush administration with information to help U.S. policymakers gain international support—particularly from the United Nations—for its planned invasion of Iraq with Britain. The text of Koza’s e-mail accompanied the report by The Observer.

The context of the surveillance was the run-up to the impending U.N. Security Council vote on whether to authorize the use of military force against Iraq. Beginning in April, 1991, under the cease-fire that ended the U.S.-led armed attack against Iraq in response to its invasion of Kuwait, Iraq had been required by Security Council resolution no. 687 to disarm itself of chemical, biological, and nuclear weapons and to allow U.N. weapons inspectors to verify compliance with that requirement. Through the next several years, Iraq failed to comply fully with that resolution, consistently obstructing the weapons inspectors before expelling them in 1998.

After the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks in New York and Washington, D.C., and the subsequent U.S. and British-led invasion of Afghanistan, the Bush administration turned its attention to Iraq. After weeks of negotiating exact language, the Security Council voted 15-0 on September 12, 2002, to adopt resolution no. 1441, which condemned Iraq’s support of terrorist organizations, its grave violations of international human-rights laws, and its failure to comply with past Security Council resolutions, including 687.

In response to resolution 1441, Iraqi president Saddam Hussein agreed to let weapons inspectors return to his country. However, in early 2003, the chief U.N. weapons inspector, Hans Blix, told the United Nations that Iraq was unable to provide evidence and documentation of its destruction of stockpiles of chemical weapons. The United States and Britain argued that Iraq’s breach of resolution 1441 called for further Security Council actions, including authorization of the use of military force against Iraq.

THE E-MAIL MEMO

U.S. National Security Agency official Frank Koza sent the following e-mail to colleagues, urging them to monitor the e-mail and phone communications of U.N. Security Council members for information that could help the United States and Great Britain in their efforts to win international approval for their planned invasion of Iraq in 2003.

To: [Recipients withheld]
 From: FRANK KOZA, Def Chief of Staff (Regional Targets)
 CIV/NSA
 Sent on Jan 31 2003 0:16
 Subject: Reflections of Iraq Debate/Votes at UN-RT Actions +
 Potential for Related Contributions
 Importance: HIGH
 Top Secret//COMINT//X1

All,

As you've likely heard by now, the Agency is mounting a surge particularly directed at the UN Security Council (UNSC) members (minus US and GBR of course) for insights as to how membership is reacting to the on-going debate RE: Iraq, plans to vote on any related resolutions, what related policies/ negotiating positions they may be considering, alliances/ dependencies, etc.—the whole gamut of information that could give US policymakers an edge in obtaining results favorable to US goals or to head off surprises. In RT, that means a QRC surge effort to revive/create efforts against UNSC members Angola, Cameroon, Chile, Bulgaria and Guinea, as well as extra focus on Pakistan UN matters.

We've also asked ALL RT topi's to emphasize and make sure they pay attention to existing non-UNSC member UN-related and domestic comms [home phone and e-mail] for anything useful related to the UNSC deliberations/ debates/ votes. We have a lot of special UN-related diplomatic coverage (various UN delegations) from countries not sitting on the UNSC right now that could contribute related perspectives/ insights/ whatever. We recognize that we can't afford to ignore this possible source.

We'd appreciate your support in getting the word to your analysts who might have similar, more in-direct access to valuable information from accesses in your product lines. I suspect that you'll be hearing more along these lines in formal channels—especially as this effort will probably peak (at least for this specific focus) in the middle of next week, following the SecState's presentation to the UNSC.

Thanks for your help.

those three countries would abstain or vote against the resolution without exercising their vetoes if enough of the nonpermanent members of the Security Council supported military action, the United States and Britain lobbied Cameroon, Guinea, Angola, Pakistan, Bulgaria, and Chile for support. (The remaining members of the Security Council that year were Mexico, Germany, and Syria.) Had those six nations been willing to support a new Security Council resolution authorizing the use of military force, the result would have been no worse than a 9-6 vote.

The perceived need for support from those six nations explains why the NSA was allegedly spying on their delegations to discern their voting intentions, as well as gathering information that could help obtain their support for military action. In the end, when it became clear that the United States and Britain could not secure the support of a majority of the Security Council, those countries did not seek a further resolution authorizing the use of military force. Instead, the United States and Britain initiated armed conflict against Iraq purportedly on the strength of resolution 1441.

In November, 2003, several months after The Observer published its story about the NSA's spying, British officials arrested

The United States and Britain (along with Spain, which also supported aggressive action against Iraq) encountered resistance from other Security Council members, including the other permanent members, France, China, and Russia. Hoping that Katharine Gun, a translator for Government Communications Headquarters, a British intelligence agency, and charged her with violating the Official Secrets Act. According to prosecutors, Gun received a copy of the NSA memorandum through e-mail from its author, Koza, and proceeded to leak the memo to The Observer. Gun pleaded not guilty and stated that she leaked the memo because she wanted to prevent an invasion of Iraq. Her trial began on February 25, 2004, but she was acquitted by the court when the prosecution declined to present evidence against her. Gun became known as the whistle-blower in the scandal and received worldwide attention and support for her efforts.

The next day, Clare Short, a former British cabinet minister who had resigned her position as international development secretary a couple of months after the March, 2003, invasion of Iraq, disclosed that the British government had helped the NSA spy on U.N. diplomats, including Secretary-General Kofi Annan. Short claimed that she had seen transcripts of Annan's conversations about Iraq, drawing criticism from British prime minister Tony Blair and others, who said that Short had endangered British national security. Soon after, Short recanted slightly, saying that the transcripts she had seen may have involved Africa, rather than Iraq.

It should be noted that the NSA surveillance of U.N. diplomats, despite its secretive nature and its implementation without warrants, does not appear to have violated domestic law. The U.S. Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978 (FISA), which regulates domestic surveillance for foreign intelligence gathering (as opposed to criminal prosecution), requires special FISA warrants only where the surveillance is likely to target communications involving a U.S. citizen; where the communications are between nonresident aliens, however, neither FISA nor the U.S. Constitution requires a warrant for surveillance.

IMPACT

The revelation of the NSA's apparent spying on U.N. officials proved embarrassing to the Bush administration, but it did not appear to have affected the outcome of diplomacy after the passage of resolution 1441 in September, 2002. In part, this may be the case because the United States and Britain were far from alone in spying on the United Nations. In late 2004, U.N. officials discovered a hidden listening device in one of its European headquarters' offices; analysis of the device suggested that it was of Russian or East European—and hence, not U.S. or British—design.

In the United States, it is almost an exaggeration to call the spying incident scandalous. Surprisingly, The New York Times and many other major American newspapers did not even report on the spying, an omission that drew scathing criticism from foreign media outlets. Far more controversy ensued with the revelation nearly two years later that the NSA had also been conducting electronic surveillance, without warrants, of U.S. citizens.

—Tung Yin

FURTHER READING

Abrams, Norman. Anti-Terrorism and Criminal Enforcement. 2d ed. St. Paul, Minn.: West Group, 2008. Provides a good introduction to understanding the mechanics of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act and other antiterrorist legislation.

Bright, Martin. "U.S. Stars Hail Iraq War Whistle-Blower." The Observer, January 18, 2004. The reporter who broke the NSA spy scandal with two colleagues reports on the widespread support for Katharine Gun, the intelligence agency staffer who leaked the Koza memo to the press.

Bright, Martin, Ed Vulliamy, and Peter Beaumont. "Revealed: U.S. Dirty Tricks to Win Vote on Iraq War." The Observer, March 2, 2003. Article that broke the story about the NSA spying on U.N. officials. Criticizes the Bush administration for ordering the surveillance.

Conyers, John C., et al. Constitution in Crisis: The High Crimes of the Bush Administration and a Blueprint for Impeachment. New York: Skyhorse, 2007. Although decidedly biased against the Bush administration, this rich work explores thousands of sources to document a pattern of corruption leading up to the invasion of Iraq. Includes discussion of the NSA spy scandal.

SEE ALSO: Jan. 21, 1950: Alger Hiss Is Convicted of Perjury; Sept. 12, 1962: British Civil Servant Is Arrested for Spying; Mar. 2-Sept. 25, 1963: John Profumo Affair Rocks British Government;

Mar. 4, 1966: Munsinger Sex and Spy Scandal Rocks Canada; Feb. 18, 2001: CIA Agent Robert Hanssen Is Arrested for Spying for the Russians; June 2, 2004: U.N. Report Reveals That Secretary-General Kofi Annan Dismissed Sexual Harassment Charges; Jan. 15, 2005: Iqbal Riza Resigns from the United Nations in Oil-for-Food Scandal.

April 29, 2003

NEW YORK TIMES REPORTER JAYSON BLAIR IS EXPOSED AS A FRAUD

The New York Times discovered that reporter Jayson Blair had plagiarized a story about an anguished mother of a missing U.S. soldier in Iraq, setting off an investigation that uncovered four years of Blair's fabrications and deceit. Although Blair was fired, and the newspaper took responsibility, the credibility of not only the newspaper but all news sources was questioned.

LOCALE: New York, New York

CATEGORIES: Communications and media; hoaxes, frauds, and charlatanism; plagiarism; publishing and journalism

KEY FIGURES

Jayson Blair (b. 1976), reporter for The New York Times

Macarena Hernandez (b. 1974), reporter for the San Antonio Express-News

Howell Raines (b. 1943), executive editor of The New York Times

Gerald Boyd (1950-2006), managing editor of The New York Times

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Newspapers are generally regarded as accurate, unbiased sources of information. The New York Times, an American institution since 1851, had achieved an immaculate reputation for printing "all the news that's fit to print." However, the stories submitted by reporter Jayson Blair were found to be fabrications in some instances and outright plagiarism in others. The failure of the Times to oversee verification of Blair's facts and perhaps a too lenient approach to a young reporter led to an examination and restructuring of newsroom procedures. Not only was Blair's career destroyed but also the careers of two high-ranking Times editors. The damage extended beyond the Times to journalism as a whole.

Blair was born on March 23, 1976, in Columbia, Maryland, the son of Thomas Blair, a career civil servant, and Frances Blair, an educator. He grew up in Centreville, Virginia, wrote for his high school paper, and interned for the Centreville Times, a local weekly. In 1994, he enrolled in the journalism school at the University of Maryland. Initially, fellow students and faculty alike were impressed with his charismatic manner and his enthusiasm for finding stories. However, problems began to surface about Blair missing deadlines and concerns that the work submitted might not have been his. At Maryland he rose to the rank of editor of The Diamondback, the student newspaper, but after an alleged plagiarism incident, he resigned.

During summer breaks, Blair interned at the Boston Globe and The Washington Post. In the summer of 1998, he won an internship at The New York Times. Although he was asked to stay on at the end of the summer, he left the paper, stating he had to finish some courses for his December graduation. In June, 1999, Blair returned to the Times and was offered an entry-level reporting job. His extraordinary promise as a reporter-writer and his being African American made his hire a natural for an organization committed to diversity. Had the human resources department checked, it would have discovered that Blair never graduated from the University of Maryland.

Blair was on the fast-track at the Times, scrambling for stories and working long hours. He wrote 137 stories within five months, and only one factual correction was required by editors. Due to his success, he was promoted to a higher level reporter position in November but his work began to slip, and the rate of corrections on his work exceeded that of a typical cub, or rookie, reporter. Blair was warned to be more careful.

Despite problems in his personal life, including substance abuse, and the reservations of many people at the paper, Blair was promoted to staff reporter in January, 2001. The recruiting committee, headed by Gerald M. Boyd, then a deputy managing editor, approved the promotion despite the opposition of Jonathan Landman, metropolitan editor for the paper. Blair's performance at work continued to decline. In early 2002, Landman sent warnings about Blair's work behavior to Boyd, stating, "We have to stop Jayson from writing for the Times. Right now." His advice was not heeded, and between January and April, Blair, who was trying to get his life under control, took two leaves of absence from the paper. When he returned, he was reassigned from the metro desk to the sports section; Landman hoped the "tighter leash" in the sports section would help the young reporter.

The Beltway sniper case in the Washington, D.C., area in October, 2002, gave Blair the opportunity to prove he was a good reporter. Executive editor Howell Raines, wishing to flood the area with reporters, transferred Blair to the national desk in Washington, D.C., especially because Blair knew the area well. He was assigned to an exclusive story, based on information gleaned from five unnamed law enforcement officers, which would be published on the front page. This and other stories on the sniper attacks led to an angry response by law enforcement officials and claims that Blair had not told the truth. Fairfax County, Virginia, prosecutor Robert Horan claimed that 60 percent of a story Blair wrote included misquotes and incorrect information. In meetings with his editors, Blair defended his stories and was allowed to remain on the national desk.

In March, 2003, Blair began filing stories about the families of service personnel in Iraq. Although the reports were often eloquent, they were filled with inaccuracies. Later, it was discovered that Blair, in many cases, had never visited the places in his reports nor interviewed the people mentioned in his articles. He claimed to have visited the home of Army specialist Jessica Lynch, who had been captured and rescued in Iraq, but his so-called firsthand description of Lynch's home was inaccurate. Some who read Blair's stories saw the incorrect details, the fabricated scenes, and the made-up quotations, and then tried to contact the Times about the errors; many gave up after their concerns were not addressed. Others did not bother contacting the paper

Jayson Blair. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

BLAIR UNCOVERED

New York Times national editor Jim Roberts met with reporter Jayson Blair over a two-day period beginning on April 29, 2003. Blair was accused of plagiarizing a San Antonio Express-News story about a missing U.S. soldier in Iraq and his mother's fears. The New York Times published an article, excerpted here, telling its readers of Blair's deception.

In a series of tense meetings over two days, Mr. Roberts repeatedly pressed Mr. Blair for evidence that he had indeed interviewed the mother. . . .

"You've got to come clean with us," he [Roberts] said—and zeroed in on the mother's house in Texas. He asked Mr. Blair to describe what he had seen.

Mr. Blair did not hesitate. He told Mr. Roberts of the red-dish roof on the white stucco house, of the red Jeep in the driveway, of the roses blooming in the yard. Mr. Roberts later inspected unpublished photographs of the mother's house, which matched Mr. Blair's descriptions in every detail.

It was not until Mr. Blair's deceptions were uncovered that Mr. Roberts learned how the reporter could have deceived him yet again: by consulting the newspaper's computerized photo archives.

What haunts Mr. Roberts now, he says, is one particular moment when editor and reporter were facing each other in a showdown over the core aim of their profession: truth.

"Look me in the eye and tell me you did what you say you did," Mr. Roberts demanded. Mr. Blair returned his gaze and said he had.

Source: Dan Barry et al., "Correcting the Record: Times Reporter Who Resigned Leaves Long Trail of Deception." The New York Times, May 11, 2003.

at all, assuming nothing would be done. They also believed that once a story was published, no retraction could make a difference. Blair was filing stories with bylines from places he had never been, was not in contact with his editors, and was not submitting expense reports. The latter should have been a red flag to his supervisors, showing he was not traveling as much as his stories appeared to attest.

A reporter for another newspaper, the San Antonio Express-News, exposed Blair's ongoing deceptions. On April 18, 2003, the Express-News published a story by reporter Macarena Hernandez,

"Valley Mom Awaits News of MIA Son," about a missing U.S. soldier in Iraq and his mother's anguish. The soldier, Sergeant Edward Anguiano, had been part of Specialist Lynch's convoy when it was ambushed in March, 2003. Blair's too-similar story, "Family Waits, Now Alone, for a Missing Soldier," appeared in the Times on April 26. Hernandez read Blair's story, noticed the similarities, and alerted her editor, who in turn contacted editors at the Times. Blair met with his editors on April 29 but had no evidence to substantiate his claim that the story was his. Anguiano's mother in Texas stated that Hernandez had visited her home, but no reporter from the Times had visited.

Unable to prove his story was original, Blair resigned from the Times on May 1. On May 11 the Times published a lengthy front-page account of Blair's acts of fabrication and plagiarism. A staff meeting on May 14 led to extensive criticism of the failure of Raines and Boyd to detect Blair's deceptions, and both editors were forced to resign in June.

IMPACT

The results of Blair's dishonesty were both immediate and far-reaching. He not only lost his job but also destroyed the careers of Raines and Boyd. Both editors were accused of leaning too far to advance affirmative action. Boyd, also African American, denied any favoritism, but Raines admitted that he did give a second chance to Blair because of his race. Although a lengthy article detailing Blair's actions and including corrections was published on May 11, the blow to the credibility of the Times was severe. The scandal quickly became a source of comedy on a number of television shows and, worse still, the work of other Times reporters was questioned. The paper accepted responsibility for Blair's actions, apologized to the public, and sought to repair its reputation.

Corrective measures, to prevent any future violation of basic standards of reporting, included forming a committee to address “what went wrong.” The committee, chaired by assistant managing editor Allan Siegal, recommended in its report of July 28, 2003, that two management-level positions—public editor and standards editor—be created at the paper. The public editor would be an ombudsperson, investigating public complaints concerning accuracy and fairness in news reporting. The standards editor would be an “internal guardian” who ensures quality control.

While Blair’s deceptions led to restructuring at the Times, they also produced a ripple effect, encompassing changes in journalism as a whole. Other newspapers revisited their policies and became more stringent in scrutinizing the work of their reporters. In a survey conducted by the American Society of Newspaper Editors, 350 editors stated they had taken some “specific action” because of the Blair scandal.

Blair published a book in 2004, Burning Down My Masters’ House, which is an attempt to justify his actions. The book, however, was not favorably received. Stephen Pomper, a reviewer for the Washington Monthly, described the book as a “300-page pity party.” Critics were skeptical of the book’s details, given Blair’s history of deception.

—Marcia B. Dinneen

FURTHER READING

Barry, Dan, et al. “Times Reporter Who Resigned Leaves Long Trail of Deception.” The New York Times, May 11, 2003. A lengthy, front-page exposé of Blair’s “frequent acts of journalistic fraud,” published in response to the revelations of his deception.

Blair, Jayson. Burning Down My Masters’ House: My Life at “The New York Times.” Beverly Hills, Calif.: New Millennium Press, 2004. This memoir chronicles Blair’s four years as a reporter and how his manic-depressive illness led to his behavior as a cheat and plagiarist.

Hassan, Adeel. “Blair’s Victims: That Helpless Feeling.” Columbia Journalism Review, July–August, 2003. Details specific examples of Blair’s deceptions and examines the reactions of those directly affected by his fraud.

Mnookin, Seth. Hard News: The Scandals at “The New York Times” and Their Meaning for American Media. New York: Random House, 2004. A former reporter for Newsweek magazine tells the story behind the scandal of Jayson Blair and the effect of the fraud and deception on the staff and readers of The New York Times.

Patterson, Maggie, and Steve Urbanski. “What Jayson Blair and Janet Cooke Say About the Press and the Erosion of Public Trust.” Journalism Studies 7, no. 6 (2006): 828–850. A journal article that details how Blair’s actions subverted the mission of journalism.

SEE ALSO: Apr. 15, 1981: Janet Cooke Admits Fabricating Her Pulitzer Prize-Winning Feature; June 24, 1994: Time Magazine Cover Uses Altered O. J. Simpson Photo; May 11, 1998: Journalist Stephen Glass Is Exposed as a Fraud; Sept. 8, 2004: 60 Minutes II Reports on George W. Bush’s Evasion of Wartime Duty.

May 3, 2003

UNIVERSITY OF ALABAMA FIRES NEW FOOTBALL COACH IN SEX SCANDAL

Four months after agreeing to a seven-year, $10 million contract to become the new head football coach at the University of Alabama, Mike Price was fired for inappropriate behavior. An article in Sports Illustrated magazine one week later revealed that Price—who was in Florida for a golf tournament—had spent lavishly on alcohol and private dances at a strip club and had consensual sex with two of the dancers in his hotel room. In turn, Price sued the university, Time, Inc., and the reporter for libel and defamation, and he won his case.

LOCALE: Tuscaloosa, Alabama

CATEGORIES: Gambling; law and the courts; public morals; publishing and journalism; sex

KEY FIGURES

Mike Price (b. 1946), head football coach at the University of Alabama

Don Yaeger (b. 1962), Sports Illustrated reporter
Lori Boudreaux (b. 1967), dancer at Arety's Angels in Pensacola, Florida

Robert Witt (b. 1941), president of the University of Alabama

SUMMARY OF EVENT

On December 18, 2002, after fourteen years of successful leadership of the football program at Washington State University (WSU), Mike Price accepted the position of head football coach at the University of Alabama, which is arguably one of the most prestigious college football programs in the United States. He was issued, yet never signed, a seven-year, $10 million contract. The contract had a morals clause.

On May 3, 2003, only four months into his new job, Price was fired by University of Alabama president Robert Witt. According to media accounts, Price was in Pensacola, Florida, for an appearance at the Emerald Coast Classic Golf Tournament. After arriving in Pensacola on April 16, Price headed for Arety's Angels, a local strip club. The alleged sequence of events, as well as additional information that surfaced later, was accepted as true by Alabama officials, even though there was a dearth of corroborating evidence. Price was summarily terminated and earned the dubious distinction of losing his job at Alabama without ever coaching a single game.

News of the firing first surfaced on an Auburn University booster club Web site on April 23. The site posted rumors that Price had visited the strip club. Shortly after the Web site posting, radio talk shows, television sports shows, and newspapers across the United States turned the alleged rumors into headlines. They reported that exactly one week earlier, on April 16, Price spent hundreds of dollars on alcoholic beverages and private dances. Most damaging, however, were the accusations that Price also had sex with two dancers from the club that night, one of whom later spent $1,000 for hotel room service on Price's credit card. The accusations came most significantly from a May 12 article by reporter Don Yaeger in Sports Illustrated ("How He Met His Destiny at a Strip Club").

According to the article, Price introduced himself solely as "Mike" at the club, attempting to limit his public exposure. However, in no time, the football fans at the club recognized Price as the newly hired coach at Alabama. Club patrons even began to refer to him as "coach." Witnesses said that Price bought not only many drinks but also private dances from Lori "Destiny" Boudreaux, who had worked at the strip club for fifteen years. Price allegedly broke many of the club's rules during at least one of the dances. Boudreaux would later testify that she was propositioned by Price, who asked her to accompany him to his room at the Crowne Plaza Hotel later in the evening.

Price then left Arety's Angels to attend the sponsors' dinner for the Emerald Coast Classic Golf Tournament. He was professional at the dinner but soon returned to Arety's Angels, after the meal. According to witnesses, Price kissed and fondled a waitress at the bar, which prompted club staff to warn Price that his actions were not permissible. After moving to another table, Price bought more drinks for several dancers, prompting later allegations that he had spent hundreds of dollars at the club. Just before midnight, he headed back to his hotel room, but he was not alone.

As detailed in the Sports Illustrated article, two dancers accompanied Price to his hotel room. The women claimed that they engaged in consensual sex with Price. The next morning, after Price left for the golf tournament, one of the dancers ordered $1,000 worth of room service on Price's credit card, prompting a concerned hotel manager to call Price, who was by this time on the golf course.

Alabama officials were soon informed of the events in Pensacola, but the allegations did not come as a surprise to Alabama athletic director Mal Moore. A few weeks after Price had been hired, several female students at the university claimed that he bought them drinks and propositioned them while dining at Buffalo's American Grille in Tuscaloosa. Moore had spoken to Price about the accusations, stressing that this type of behavior was unacceptable. In turn, Price denied the allegations.

Price was fired on May 3, based solely on unproven allegations. In July, he filed a $20 million libel suit against the University of Alabama, Time, Inc. (which owns Sports Illustrated), and Yaeger, contending that the events described by Yaeger in the Sports Illustrated article were false. On October 10, Price settled the defamation portion of the lawsuit against Time and received an undisclosed amount. He had sued for $10 million in compensatory damages and another $10 million in punitive damages.

Boudreaux confirmed in a sworn affidavit at trial that she was Yeager's source, but she apparently did not tell the truth. Her account of what happened in Price's hotel room was deemed hearsay by the court, so her story was not admissible at trial. The court ruling left nothing but doubt in the case of Price's alleged sexual encounter with the strip-club dancers in Florida.

IMPACT

Alabama's firing of Price sent a clear message that inappropriate behavior, even if only alleged and even if off campus, can end one's career. Furthermore, the university's decision to fire Price based only on uncorroborated allegations harmed the institution's credibility. Also, following Price's dismissal, officials were forced to find their fourth head football coach in as many years but to do so in a negative climate for the university.

Price was one of several high-profile college and university coaches within a period of a few years who were accused of inappropriate behavior and had been terminated as a result. In 2003, Rick Neuheisel, then head football coach at the University of Washington, was fired after a string of transgressions dating back to 1999. Neuheisel had lied to Washington officials about a job interview with the San Francisco 49ers of the National Football League. He also broke the National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA) rules on gambling by betting on college basketball games. In 2005, he settled his wrongful termination lawsuit against the NCAA and Washington for $4.5 million. In 2006, Mike Pressler, then head men's lacrosse coach at Duke University, was forced to resign amid allegations that three of his players had raped a woman at a party. Ultimately, the accusations were found to be untrue and, in 2007, Duke and Pressler reached an undisclosed financial settlement over his forced resignation. In early 2008, Pressler also filed a defamation lawsuit against Duke, claiming that university representatives said he had not adequately supervised his athletes.

In Pullman, Washington, the home of Price's former employer, WSU, the legacy of the famed coach descended from that of a well-respected icon to a person tainted by the fame associated with being fired from Alabama. Price moved on from his infamous night at Arety's Angels to serve as head football coach at the University of Texas—El Paso.

—Ryan Patten and Joseph Hurley

FURTHER READING

Fatsis, Stefan. "Football Coach and Time Inc. Settle Libel Suit." The Wall Street Journal, October 11, 2005. An overview of the lawsuit settlement in Price v. Time Inc. in October, 2005.

Murphy, Kirsten. "The Price of Privilege." News Media and the Law 28, no. 2 (2004): 17-20. A journal article that provides an excellent analysis of the firing of Mike Price.

Yaeger, Don. "How He Met His Destiny at a Strip Club." Sports Illustrated, May 12, 2003. Examines the events that allegedly took place at Arety's Angels and in Mike Price's hotel room.

SEE ALSO: Feb. 25, 1987: NCAA Imposes "Death Penalty" on Southern Methodist University Football; Aug. 27, 2001: Little League Baseball Star Danny Almonte Is Found to Be Overage; Dec. 14, 2001: Notre Dame Football Coach Resigns for Falsifying His Resume; Mar. 27, 2002: Georgia Basketball Coach Jim Harrick, Sr., Resigns over Fraud Allegations; July 14, 2006: New York Times Exposes Grading Scandal at Auburn University; Aug. 20, 2007: Football Star Michael Vick Pleads Guilty to Financing a Dogfighting Ring; Sept. 13, 2007: New England Patriots Football Team Is Fined for Spying on Other Teams.

May 21, 2003

SEXUALLY PROVOCATIVE FILM THE BROWN BUNNY PREMIERES AT CANNES FILM FESTIVAL

The Brown Bunny, a disturbing film by iconoclastic auteur Vincent Gallo that includes a provocative sequence showing fellatio, received a mixed reception from the international film community at the prestigious Cannes Film Festival. Nominated for the Palme d'Or, the film touched off a heated debate over the relationship between filmmakers and critics and ultimately between filmmakers and their audiences.

LOCALE: Cannes, France

CATEGORIES: Film; sex; art movements; publishing and journalism; public morals; popular culture

KEY FIGURES

Vincent Gallo (b. 1961), American actor and experimental film director

Chloë Sevigny (b. 1974), Oscar-nominated American film actor

Roger Ebert (b. 1942), Pulitzer Prize-winning American film critic

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Drawing on the experimental neorealism pioneered by pop artist Andy Warhol nearly a generation earlier, Vincent Gallo's The Brown Bunny tells the bleak story of a motorcycle racer named Bud Clay (played by Gallo) who, desperate to escape a past that includes a passionate relationship with a woman identified only as Daisy (played by Chloë Sevigny), sets out to drive a van loaded with his motorcycle from New Hampshire to California. For most of the nearly hour and a half film, that trip is recorded in unrelieved tedium—restaurant stops, gas fill-ups, and changes of clothes, and miles of highway filmed through bug-splattered windows.

The most significant action in the film is psychological, happening behind Clay's opaque sunglasses. There are chance encounters with three different women, but in each case Clay cannot bring himself to risk the vulnerability of authentic connection, and his character is left decidedly alone. The encounters are distinguished by disjointed conversations, long stares, and cryptic silences. Along the way, Clay visits Daisy's parents, and while there he secures one of Daisy's favorite childhood stuffed animals, a brown bunny. When he finally arrives in Los Angeles, he goes to Daisy's house—but it is empty. At a hotel, however, he is joined by Daisy who coolly performs oral sex on him after smoking crack cocaine. They engage in a steadily heated conversation about her relationships with other men. What is revealed, however, is that Daisy had been gang raped during a party some months earlier; that Clay had failed to help her and had, in fact, left the party; and that she had subsequently choked to death on her own vomit. Clay is haunted (literally) not merely by her memory but by his own shame and is trying to find in his cross-country flight an escape from his sense of responsibility (represented by the grotesque stuffed bunny he now lugs about).

Chloë Sevigny and Vincent Gallo at the premiere of their film The Brown Bunny at Cannes, France, in May, 2003. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

Gallo hesitated when he was approached in early 2003 to premiere his film project (he was the film's producer, director, writer, and star) for consideration for the Palme d'Or at Cannes in France. Although his earlier film, 1998's Buffalo '66, a quirky psychological study of a released convict who kidnaps a beautiful woman to pretend to be his girlfriend when he must visit his parents, had become an award-winning independent film, his experiences at Cannes had always been strained. He knew that to meet the festival's spring deadline, given production difficulties he was facing, he would have to submit an unfinished rough cut. He decided to submit the film.

Even with the edgy experimental nature of the film—its deliberate evocation of tedium; its layers of dense, associational imagery; its dreamlike nonlinearity; its minimal action; and its unsympathetic central character—Gallo was not prepared for the reaction his film ignited. The controversy surrounding its debut on May 21 quickly became the headline of what was an otherwise routine festival. Although the film received appreciative applause, the majority of the Cannes audience was decidedly hostile to the film, booing and jeering and, for most, walking out long before the controversial sex scene. The ten-minute oral-sex sequence, which Seigny actually performed on Gallo, was seen as entirely gratuitous. Gallo tirelessly argued long after the premiere that the scene reenforced the emptiness in the character's soul and, given that the woman was actually dead, was a powerful image for the deep narcissism of his grief.

In the wake of the disastrous showing, the most vocal critic of the film was Roger Ebert, the Pulitzer Prize-winning film critic for the Chicago Sun-Times and cohost of a long-running, nationally syndicated, film-review show. He has been a respected and powerful voice in the industry. He pilloried Gallo's film, not merely because of the sex scene but also the film's poor pace and lack of focus. He famously described it as the worst film Cannes had ever shown. The day after the premiere, a teary and obviously shaken Gallo admitted the film was a rough cut and apologized for wasting the judges' time with an unfinished film. There also was suspicion that the virtually unqualified support of the French press for the film may have reflected less its sensitivity to Gallo's film and more its political motivations: In the heated atmosphere leading up to the U.S. invasion of Iraq when French and U.S. relations were particularly chilly, the French ironically (and gleefully) celebrated what was widely seen as a truly awful American film.

Ebert's words, widely disseminated on the Web, ignited a lengthy and very public war of words between Gallo and Ebert—an exchange that was less a discussion of the merits (or lack thereof) of Gallo's avant-garde film and more an exchange of insults that climaxed with Gallo supposedly putting a hex on Ebert's prostate. Ebert quipped that he had experienced a colonoscopy and watching that was more enjoyable than watching Gallo's film.

Within months of Cannes, Gallo returned to the film. After reediting the work (cutting about 25 minutes, although leaving the sex scene intact), he reissued the film, initially at the 2003 Toronto Film Festival, then in summer, 2004, as a Wellspring Media then Sony Pictures theatrical release, and ultimately on DVD. Not surprisingly, given the enormous attention it had received at Cannes, the film found an immediate audience in its theatrical release, most likely expecting to see one of those celebrated "so-bad-it's-kitschy" films. However, Gallo's sensitive editing had significantly altered the impact, and audiences and critics (most notably Ebert himself) found the reedited film provocative and powerful as an understated, even stark, anatomy of grief that juxtaposed images of escape and fantasy with the hard reality of guilt, doubt, sorrow, and responsibility.

IMPACT

The Brown Bunny created a scandal in itself, but the disturbing fellatio scene—although accounting for barely ten minutes of the entire film—raised difficult (and incendiary) questions about the line between art and pornography. Given that Gallo and Seigny had maintained a high-profile off-screen relationship, the sequence blurred the line between art and voyeurism, its unflinching (and unedited) recording of the act resembling not cinema but salacious hardcore porn footage or a sleazy underground celebrity sex tape for the Web. It did not immediately register with viewers that within the larger argument of the film such a perception of the scene's coldness helped sustain a significant thematic argument about the nature of love. Indeed, the scene was sufficient to have Seigny, an accomplished independent-film actor who had been nominated for an Oscar in 1999 for her work in Boys Don't Cry, summarily dropped by the prestigious William Morris talent agency. Only in its rerelease did the scene's larger argument—the de-glamorization of sex in the face of death and the pain involved in any grieving process that involves a sexual relationship—become clear.

Apart from the response to the sexual content, however, the public dust-up between Gallo and Ebert revealed the fragile nature of egos in that particular dynamic—both with the actors and those who cover their work in the press. Clearly, Gallo, like Warhol before him, crafted a film that was not intended for the general public, a film whose portrayal of the banality and absurdity of life would be inaccessible to those who see films for entertainment and spectacle. That discussion, however, never took place. Rather, the barbs between artist and critic quickly denigrated into personal attacks that could be seen cynically as part of the promotional machinery of Hollywood—indeed, given the controversy surrounding Gallo’s film and the Ebert critique, an otherwise marginal film destined for limited release in art-house theaters eventually played to a much wider audience and, in the end, made far more money for its parent company, Sony Pictures.

—Joseph Dewey

FURTHER READING

Ebert, Roger. Roger Ebert’s Movie Yearbook, 2004.

Riverside, N.J.: Andrews McMeel, 2004. Includes relevant commentary by Ebert on the Gallo-Brown Bunny controversy as well as Ebert’s original scathing review of The Brown Bunny.

_____. “The Whole Truth from Vincent Gallo.” Chicago Sun-Times, August 29, 2004. A candid interview with the filmmaker Ebert had so condemned more than one year earlier after seeing the premiere of The Brown Bunny at Cannes.

Krzywinska, Tanya. Sex and the Cinema. New York: Wallflower/Columbia University Press, 2006. Thorough investigation into the differences between art and pornography that uses numerous contemporary examples (including Gallo’s film) to define the new dimensions of artistic license in the age of the Web.

Sklar, Richard. “Beyond Hoopla: The Cannes Film Festival and Cultural Significance.” Cineaste 22, no. 3 (June, 1996): 18-28. Helpful summary of the importance of Cannes as a promotional tool for maverick filmmakers and independent films.

Winter, Jessica. The Rough Guide to American Independent Film. New York: Rough Guides, 2006. Contextualizes Gallo’s filmmaking by assessing the late twentieth century emergence of low-budget auteur films (and filmmakers) whose limited success was supported by numerous regional film festivals and by the critical press sensitive to the provocative and experimental work.

SEE ALSO: Feb. 17-Mar. 15, 1913: Armory Modern Art Show Scandalizes the Public; Mar. 26, 1922: Hindemith’s Opera Sancta Susanna Depicts a Nun’s Sexual Desires; 1927: Mae West’s Play About Gays Is Banned on Broadway; Dec. 3, 1930: Surrealist Film L’Âge d’or Provokes French Rioting; Jan. 20, 1933: Hedy Lamarr Appears Nude in the Czech Film Exstase; Early Nov., 2003: Paris Hilton Sex-Tape Appears on the Web.

July 1, 2003

BASKETBALL STAR KOBE BRYANT IS ACCUSED OF RAPE

Professional basketball player Kobe Bryant was accused of sexually assaulting a nineteen-year-old concierge at a hotel resort. He denied the accusation and claimed that the sexual encounter was consensual. The prosecution dropped the criminal charges after the accuser, Katelyn Faber, refused to testify on grounds that her sexual history would fuel further media attention. Faber filed a civil suit against Bryant and settled out of court for an undisclosed amount of money.

LOCALE: Edwards, Colorado

CATEGORIES: Law and the courts; public morals; publishing and journalism

KEY FIGURES

Kobe Bryant (b. 1978), professional basketball player

Katelyn Faber (b. 1985), hotel concierge and college student

Vanessa Bryant (b. 1982), Bryant's wife

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Professional basketball player Kobe Bryant, an All-Star guard with the Los Angeles Lakers, was accused on July 1, 2003, of sexually assaulting Katelyn Faber, a nineteen-year-old concierge at a hotel resort in Edwards, Colorado. Bryant had been in Colorado for scheduled knee surgery at the Steadman-Hawkins Clinic in Vail. He checked into the Lodge and Spa at Cordillera, a hotel in Edwards, on June 28.

According to Faber, who remained anonymous throughout the criminal investigation and most of the legal proceedings, Bryant invited her to his room after she gave him a tour of the hotel on the night of July 1, the day before his surgery. She told investigators that she and Bryant flirted with each other and that the flirting led to consensual kissing. She said the kissing led to unwanted groping and that Bryant blocked her exit when she tried to leave the room. She then said that Bryant physically restrained her over a chair and placed his hands around her neck, suggesting strangulation if she resisted. She stated that Bryant then began to penetrate her sexually and that she requested several times that he stop. Faber said that Bryant continued with the sexual assault and tightened his grasp around her neck each time she asked him to stop.

Faber then told investigators that she left the room immediately after the assault and remained at the hotel until the end of her work shift. Her coworkers offered conflicting reports of her demeanor following the incident. One coworker stated that Faber did not appear to be distraught; another coworker told authorities that Faber told him that she had been sexually assaulted. That coworker said that he advised Faber to tell her parents.

The twenty-four-year-old Bryant already was a National Basketball Association veteran and would win the league's Most Valuable Player award for the 2007-2008 season. At the time of the allegations, he was married to Vanessa Bryant and had one daughter. (The couple had a second daughter in 2006.) On July 2, Bryant had his knee surgery as scheduled. On that same day, Faber told authorities at the Eagle County Sheriff's Department that she had been sexually assaulted by Bryant. Faber's allegations were videotaped by investigators. During the interview at the sheriff's station, Faber stated that Bryant used physical force to restrain her during nonconsensual sexual intercourse and that Bryant told her not to tell anyone about the sexual encounter. After her interview with police officials, Faber went to Vail Valley Medical Center for rape-kit testing.

The sheriff's office interviewed Bryant, also on July 2. Bryant told investigators that the sexual encounter with Faber was consensual and added that his wife would be upset upon learning of the allegations. Bryant's legal defense team tried, without success, to have the interview removed as evidence because it was obtained without Bryant's knowledge. On July 4, the Eagle County sheriff issued an arrest warrant for Bryant for felony assault. Already home in Los Angeles, Bryant returned to Colorado. Upon his arrest, he posted a bond of twenty-five thousand dollars and was released the same day. On July 18, Bryant was charged with felony sexual assault. He consistently denied the rape accusation, claimed the sex with Faber was consensual, and added that he was guilty of adultery only. He made several public appearances with Vanessa, including a tearful press conference in Los Angeles on the day he was formally charged.

Faber's sexual history was brought to light after medical tests concluded that her underwear was stained with the DNA of two men other than Bryant. The Colorado rape shield statute, which disallows the presentation of the sexual history of an alleged rape victim during legal proceedings, did not protect Faber in this instance. Her sexual contact with other men around the time of the alleged assault by Bryant was admitted as evidence for the defense. The defense argued that Faber's physical injuries were consistent with having intercourse on more than one occasion in a short period of time.

Prosecutors claimed in the months before trial that Bryant's attorneys were attempting to damage Faber's credibility. In addition, she was subjected to physical threats and faced unrelenting media scrutiny. The media eventually identified her by name. Furthermore, the transcripts of a closed-session hearing were mistakenly released to the media by a court reporter. The court issued an order to try to prevent the transcripts from being released to the public. Several media organizations claimed that because the transcripts were released accidentally and, thus, were obtained through no fault of their own, they were protected by the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution and could release the information to the public. The Colorado Supreme Court ruled in favor of the court on July 19, 2004, but on August 2, the judge in the Bryant case decided to allow the media to publish the transcripts.

After months of preparation by prosecutors and defense attorneys, Faber told her attorneys that she would not testify in court, leading the prosecution to drop the criminal charges against Bryant on September 1. The following day, Bryant issued a statement, apologizing to Faber and her family for the pain they have endured through the months of the case.

Basketball Star Kobe Bryant Is Accused of Rape

Before the criminal charges were dropped, Faber had filed a civil suit against Bryant, on August 10, and the two settled out of court in March, 2005. The conditions of the settlement were not disclosed.

IMPACT

Early in his career, Bryant was an intelligent and well-spoken role model to millions of sports fans. The sexual-assault scandal is now a part of his image and it follows him everywhere. Basketball fans around the United States continue to verbally taunt him in the venues of opposing teams. His MVP award in 2008 matters little to his detractors. However, his supportive fans seemed to have forgiven him for the scandal.

The accusations of rape, nevertheless, stunned American sports fans and others as well, and the accompanying media affair led many to call for a re-examination of sports “heroes.” The infatuation with celebrity resulted in intense media presence at each phase of the case, a case filled with reports of infidelity and marked by public disgrace and disappointment. It featured a battle of words between victim’s rights groups and a powerful sports world that supports its stars at all costs. Through it all, Bryant remains a “most valuable” star, and Faber remains all but forgotten.

Kobe Bryant being searched upon entering the Eagle County, Colorado, courthouse in May, 2004. (AP/Wide World Photos)

—Traqina Q. Emeka

FURTHER READING

Corliss, R. “Say It Ain’t So Kobe.” Time, July 28, 2003. A popular national magazine article that explores the circumstances that led to Bryant’s arrest and the criminal charge against him.

Gibeaut, J. “Celebrity Justice.” ABA Journal 91, no. 1 (2005): 42-49. This American Bar Association journal article discusses the fascination with celebrity and how it influences the justice system.

Kirtley, J. “Gag the Press.” American Journalism Review 26, no. 5 (2004). This journal article ad-resses the issue of First Amendment rights and media access.

Sarche, J. “Bryant Case Moving Forward, sans Headlines, Hearing Looms.” Vail Daily, January 25, 2005. This local-newspaper article provides a chronology of the events, from the time of the alleged assault to civil court proceedings.

SEE ALSO: May 13, 1913: Boxer Jack Johnson Is Imprisoned for Abetting Prostitution; Mar. 30, 1931: “Scottsboro Boys” Are Railroaded Through Rape Trials; July 2, 1963: Muslim Leader Elijah Muhammad Is Sued for Paternity; July 28, 1980: Magazine Reveals Baseball Star Steve Garvey’s Marital Problems; Nov. 28, 1987: Black Teenager Claims to Have Been Gang-Raped by Police Officers; Mar. 30, 1991: William Kennedy Smith Is Accused of Rape; Sept. 22, 1997: Sportscaster Marv Albert Is Tried for Sexual Assault; Mar. 14, 2006: Duke Lacrosse Players Are Accused of Gang Rape; July 29, 2008: NBA Referee Tim Donaghy Is Sentenced to Prison for Betting on Games.

July 14, 2003

COLUMNIST ROBERT NOVAK LEAKS THE NAME OF CIA OPERATIVE VALERIE PLAME

CIA operative Valerie Plame’s husband, Joseph Wilson, was a former U.S. ambassador who had investigated claims of sales of uranium to Iraq before the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003. Wilson publicly claimed that Iraq had not obtained uranium from Niger and that Iraq did not have weapons of mass destruction. Newspaper columnist Robert Novak then identified Plame as a CIA agent. Critics said that Plame’s name was revealed to Novak by a White House official as revenge against Wilson.

ALSO KNOWN AS: Plame affair; Plamegate; CIA leak scandal

LOCALE: Washington, D.C.

CATEGORIES: Espionage; publishing and journalism; ethics; government; international relations; politics

KEY FIGURES

Robert Novak (b. 1931), newspaper columnist and political commentator

Valerie Plame (b. 1963), Central Intelligence Agency operations officer

Joseph Wilson (b. 1949), former U.S. Foreign Service diplomat

Richard Armitage (b. 1945), deputy secretary of state

Lewis “Scooter” Libby (b. 1950), Vice President
Dick Cheney’s chief of staff
Karl Rove (b. 1950), deputy chief of staff to President George W. Bush

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Joseph C. Wilson, the former acting ambassador to Iraq who had diplomatic experience in North Africa, was sent to Niger on February 26, 2002, by the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) to investigate rumors (based upon forged documents) that Iraq had purchased unrefined uranium ore in Niger. Wilson found no evidence to confirm the rumors and reported that such a transaction was highly unlikely. Furthermore, through his knowledge of and contacts in Iraq, Wilson knew of no credible evidence to support contentions that Iraq had a considerable stockpile of WMDs and an ongoing program to develop more WMDs.

On July 6, 2003, The New York Times published an opinion article by Wilson, “What I Didn’t Find in Africa,” that was highly critical of George W. Bush’s administration and the invasion of Iraq in March. Wilson argued that the invasion was approved using extremely shaky evidence. As many later claimed, White House officials leaked the name of Wilson’s wife, Valerie Plame, as a CIA operative as revenge against Wilson and to further justify the invasion.

As early as August of 2002, the administration of U.S. president George W. Bush began zealously to seek justification for invading Iraq and unseating the government of dictator Saddam Hussein. Bush, his closest advisers, and top-level federal officials put forth three arguments to justify their proposed attack on Iraq.

First, according to the Bush administration, Hussein’s close ties to al-Qaeda likely meant that he was involved in planning—or, at a minimum, supporting—the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on the United States. Second, Iraq had a large stockpile of weapons of mass destruction (WMDs) and a vigorous program of WMD development. With this stockpile, it had or soon would have first-strike capabilities against the United States. Third, Iraq had purchased raw uranium from Niger to create its own nuclear weapons program and was continuing to search worldwide for additional nuclear bomb-making materials. Iraq’s WMD development program would be an imminent threat to U.S. security. The administration concluded that, in an act of self-defense, the United States must invade Iraq and remove Hussein from office. Furthermore, Hussein must be returned to the United States and tried for his crimes.

Regardless of the evidence, Bush reported the Niger uranium sale to Iraq as fact to the American public in his state of the union address on January 28, 2003. The CIA even had attempted to remove Bush’s claim from his speech. On October 11, 2002, the U.S. Congress had passed a joint resolution authorizing the president to go to war if he determined that it was necessary to defend the national security of the United States. In Bush’s report to Congress on March 19, 2003, the day before the attack began, he spoke only of Iraq’s weapons of mass destruction and U.S. national security as sufficient motive for the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq.

Within days of Wilson’s New York Times article, columnist Robert Novak learned from Richard Armitage, the deputy assistant secretary of state, that Plame was a CIA operations officer with a classified, covert identity. Novak claims Armitage mentioned her name in passing. Novak then turned to Karl Rove, Bush’s deputy chief of staff, to confirm that she was Wilson’s spouse. Armitage, in October, confirmed with investigators that he was the source of the leak.

On July 11, Novak’s column, “Mission to Niger,” was released by Creators Syndicate and distributed through the Associated Press. The column was not published, however, until July 14. In the column, Novak outed Plame, harming CIA operations and ruining her career. Most significantly, however, the leak gambled with national security. Novak remained adamant that his intent was not to reveal Plame’s covert identity but to investigate why Wilson, a critic of the Bush administration, was selected to investigate possible uranium sales to Iraq by Niger.

On October 31, a federal grand jury was called to investigate the leak. Patrick Fitzgerald, a U.S. attor-

NOVAK'S INFAMOUS ONE-SENTENCE LEAK

An excerpt from columnist Robert Novak's syndicated column of July 14, 2003, in which he revealed Valerie Plame's identity as a CIA operative.

Wilson never worked for the CIA, but his wife, Valerie Plame, is an Agency operative on weapons of mass destruction.

Source: Creators Syndicate.

ney for the northern district of Illinois, was appointed special counsel to pursue the federal inquiry for a possible violation of the Intelligence Identities Protection Act of 1982 and other federal crimes. Fitzgerald attempted to find out if White House officials had already leaked Plame's name to reporters before Novak's column appeared or if they later had simply repeated information already made public by Novak. Later testimony revealed that reporter Bob Woodward was the first person in the media to learn of Plame's identity and that the source of that leak was Armitage.

IMPACT

According to the House Committee on Government Reform, which investigated the leak, there had been a minimum of eleven Plame-related breaches of security by various White House staff. The committee's report, issued on July 22, 2005, also states that the White House did not comply with its obligations to either investigate the security breaches nor did the White House apply administrative sanctions to those who were involved. A number of White House officials broke several federal laws and acts that prohibit sharing classified government information, yet not one person in the Bush administration or in federal office was indicted. The White House itself was guilty of inertia for not carrying out its legal responsibilities. It made no attempt to investigate who had been leaking classified information.

The committee's report adds that the White House also downplayed the importance of Wilson's trip to Niger and that his subsequent report that Iraq did not buy uranium from Niger was dismissed.

Finally, the report said the White House disregarded Wilson's allegations that there was no evidence that Iraq had weapons of mass destruction.

In the end, no person was tried for violations of federal acts or statutes relating to the unauthorized disclosure of classified information. The only trial resulting from the grand jury investigation was that of Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, Lewis "Scooter" Libby, for perjury and for obstructing justice during the grand jury investigation. According to testimony, Libby had been told by Cheney in June, 2003, that Wilson's wife (her name apparently was not yet known) was a CIA employee.

Libby was convicted on March 6, 2007, of two counts of perjury, one count of obstruction of justice, and one count of making a false statement. On July 2, President Bush commuted his thirty-month prison sentence but did not pardon him, leaving much of Libby's sentence, including fines, intact.

The leak scandal also impacted U.S. intelligence. Blowing an agent's cover compromises intelligence-gathering methods and operations, affects the safety of intelligence agents and foreign and domestic informants, and harms recruitment efforts for agents as well as potential informants. Novak's exposure of Plame's identity likely had some significant effect on national security and foreign intelligence gathering, although the exact nature of that harm will likely remain unknown, given that it is counterproductive for the CIA, or any of the other federal intelligence-gathering agency, to admit to any harm. It should be noted, however, that Plame was working in operations related to Iran's development of nuclear weapons.

—Edward J. Schauer

FURTHER READING

Bamford, James. A Pretext for War: 9/11, Iraq, and the Abuse of America's Intelligence Agencies. New York: Doubleday, 2004. An excellent book that examines the prelude to the invasion of Iraq and the CIA leak scandal.

Isikoff, Michael, and David Corn. Hubris: The Inside Story of Spin, Scandal, and the Selling of the Iraq War. New York: Crown, 2006. More than one-third of this book is dedicated to the CIA leak scandal.

Risen, James. State of War: The Secret History of the CIA and the Bush Administration. New York: Free Press, 2006. Draws together the many pieces of information about the CIA and the Bush administration before and during the invasion of Iraq and before and after the CIA leak scandal.

Wilson, Joseph C. The Politics of Truth: Inside the Lies That Led to War and Betrayed My Wife's CIA Identity—A Diplomat's Memoir. New York:

Carroll & Graf, 2004. Wilson discusses his diplomatic career, his family and personal life, and his experiences and recollections of the Valerie Plame scandal.

Wilson, Valerie Plame. Fair Game: My Life as a Spy, My Betrayal by the White House. New York: Simon & Schuster, 2007. Insightful look into the life of a CIA agent, who was exposed as a covert operative by columnist Robert Novak.

SEE ALSO: Feb. 18, 2001: CIA Agent Robert Hanssen Is Arrested for Spying for the Russians; Apr. 28, 2004: CBS Broadcasts Photos of Abused and Tortured Prisoners at Abu Ghraib; Jan. 15, 2005: Iqbal Riza Resigns from the United Nations in Oil-for-Food Scandal.

September 3, 2003

MUTUAL FUND COMPANIES ARE IMPLICATED IN SHADY TRADING PRACTICES

New York State attorney general Eliot L. Spitzer filed a legal complaint against Canary Capital Partners, a hedge fund, for fraudulent late trading and time-zone arbitrage, practices that favored select clients over ordinary customers. Investigators looked at twenty-five fund companies, which led to settlements with regulators totaling over $3.1 billion, private civil lawsuits, congressional hearings and legislative proposals, and U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission oversight reforms.

LOCALE: New York, New York

CATEGORIES: Corruption; banking and finance; law and the courts; business; government

KEY FIGURE

Eliot L. Spitzer (b. 1959), New York State attorney general, 1999-2006, and governor of New York, 2006-2008

SUMMARY OF EVENT

According to the Investment Company Institute, a mutual-fund trade group, nearly 48 percent of U.S. households were mutual-fund shareholders at the end of 2003. The total assets of mutual funds came to $7.4 trillion. Mutual-fund growth paralleled the movement in American retirement plans away from employer-managed and -defined benefits plans and toward employee-managed and -defined contribution plans.

New York State attorney general Eliot L. Spitzer announced in a complaint filed with the New York Supreme Court on September 3, 2003, that his office had obtained evidence of illegal trading practices of New Jersey-based Canary Capital Partners, a hedge fund. According to Spitzer, the company was found to have engaged in fraudulent late trading and time-zone arbitrage with four large mutual fund companies at the expense of its ordinary, long-term mutual-fund investors. Even before this announcement, the mutual-fund industry was being viewed with dissatisfaction. After the technology-stock bubble burst in 2000, the stock market entered a three-year bear market, and funds performed poorly. The following background discussion of the structure and operations of mutual funds will help clarify both the dissatisfaction by 2003 and the scandals that were uncovered.

Mutual funds, also known as open-end investment companies, are not run by fund employees; rather, they are overseen by a board of directors. This board contracts with service providers: the investment adviser (a management company that makes the portfolio decisions), the transfer agent (who administers purchases and redemptions of shares and keeps customer records), and the principal underwriter (who handles distribution of shares). The U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) regulates mutual funds, primarily through rules and through its Office of Compliance Inspections and Examinations. The SEC also regulates the securities markets.

Mutual funds are designed to help their owners (the shareholders) pool their money, diversify their portfolios, and have access to expert management at a lower cost than they could as individuals. The preamble of the Investment Company Act of 1940, which created mutual funds, states that they must be organized, operated, and managed in the interests of shareholders. Thus, mutual funds have a fiduciary duty, or legal duty of care and good faith, to shareholders.

Many analyses of the scandals point to the conflict of interest and objectives inherent in the governing structure of mutual funds. Investors (shareholders) want to maximize their returns on the money held in the funds. The investment adviser (management company) wants to maximize its profits. The investment adviser is paid a percentage of assets under management as its management fee. Prior to the scandals, funds had grown larger and larger. Fees charged to shareholders had increased, even though economies of scale should have reduced fund-management costs. The expense ratio of the average equity (stock) fund rose from 0.77 to 1.56 percent between 1959 and 2004.

Analyses of the scandals also pointed to SEC regulations requiring only that a majority of the fund directors be independent (that is, not connected to the fund adviser in the preceding five years). In addition, the board chair was not required to be independent. Critics pointed out that if a fund wanted to change advisers or negotiate lower fees, having a board chair who is affiliated with the adviser would be an inherent conflict.

Some of these issues were beginning to be investigated just before Spitzer's announcement. In February, 2003, the SEC proposed new rules that would require every mutual fund and adviser to institute compliance policies that would prevent securities law violations and to appoint a chief compliance officer. In March, the U.S. House Subcommittee on Capital Markets held a hearing, the first of ten congressional hearings (none resulting in laws passed) between 2003 and 2005. This one focused on fees, sales practices, disclosure, and fund performance and governance.

The investigations that followed the September 3 complaint were brought (in various combinations) by Spitzer, the SEC, the National Association of Securities Dealers (NASD), and the attorneys general of California, Colorado, and Massachusetts. New York's Martin Act gave Spitzer exceedingly broad powers to investigate and prosecute financial fraud. Some of the most prominent actions, with settlements ranging from $9 million to $515 million, involved the fund advisers Alliance Capital, Invesco, Bank of America/FleetBoston, Janus Capital, MFS, Morgan Stanley, Edward Jones, and Strong Capital Management.

Although several other practices were discussed in the hearings, reports, and media coverage surrounding the scandals, most of the charges brought involved two forms of arbitrage: late trading and stale pricing. Generally, arbitrage involves exploiting short-term price differences in a security to make a profit without risk. Late trading was performed by a small number of high-dollar, sophisticated investors who had a special relationship with intermediaries and the funds themselves. Stale-price, or time-zone, arbitrage, which exploits the prices of international stocks at the time foreign markets close, was well known and widely practiced by both large and small investors.

Coverage of the scandals often used the term “market timing”; this term can also mean rapid trading. By 2003, even many ordinary mutual fund shareholders were beginning to trade frequently. Although it did not reach the level of illegality, it certainly diluted returns for long-term shareholders, adding to the damage done by arbitrage. From 1950 to 1975, the average length of time investors held shares was twelve years; by 2002, it was two and a half years.

Morningstar, a mutual-fund rating and analysis company, identified hedge funds (which use risky investment methods to achieve large gains) as the source of most mutual fund arbitrage money and predicted that the scandals would lead to more regulation of them. Some hedge funds publicly listed “mutual fund timing” as their investment strategy. The SEC’s November, 2003, survey found that 50 percent of the eighty largest fund companies were secretly allowing timing by certain shareholders (undoubtedly including hedge funds) that was forbidden by their own prospectus disclosures.

Because many people were surprised that Spitzer, rather than the SEC or the NASD (which regulates broker-dealers), first uncovered the scandals, the U.S. Government Accountability Office (GAO) conducted an analysis of the SEC’s fund oversight program. Its April, 2005, report found that although the SEC made a good faith effort through its regulations to combat the known risks for arbitrage, it did not conduct examinations that might have uncovered this practice. Examinations are one of the SEC’s two primary oversight methods.

IMPACT

One measure of the impact of the scandals is the gain they afforded violators versus the loss to long-term shareholders. A research study by Eric Zitzewitz on stale-price arbitrage documented that this activity cost long-term shareholders $4.9 billion in 2001 and that the cost had doubled since 1998-1999.

Another measure is the cost to the funds themselves, as investors lost trust and withdrew their money. A research study calculated the losses suffered by the fifteen publicly traded mutual fund families investigated between September 3, 2003, and November 31, 2004. In the three days following the announcement of an investigation, funds lost, on average, $1.35 billion.

Numerous reforms were proposed or enacted as a result of the scandals. The SEC’s new rules required fund boards of directors to designate a chief compliance officer and to conduct annual self-assessments and mandate that funds have written policies and procedures reasonably designed to prevent violations of federal securities law. Other rules relate to the disclosure of expenses as a dollar amount, the prohibition of various forms of directed brokerage using 12b-1 fees, and enhanced disclosure to shareholders of arbitrage policies. The SEC expanded its surveillance program to focus more attention on preventing wrongdoing. It instituted risk-targeted minisweeps to gather information on specific mutual fund practices, which have included soft dollars, 12b-1 fees, and revenue sharing.

The Investment Company Institute’s Mutual Fund Fact Book shows that in 2007, $12.02 trillion was invested in eight thousand mutual funds owned by nearly 300,000 shareholders. Clearly, increasingly large amounts of the retirement and college savings of ordinary Americans are placed in mutual funds. Consumers represent two-thirds of the American economy. Thus, both the risks and the unfairness continue to grow when mutual funds are allowed to place corporate profits above their fiduciary responsibility to shareholders.

—Glenn Ellen Starr Stilling

FURTHER READING

Bogle, John C. “What Went Wrong in Mutual Fund America? The Triumph of Salesmanship over Stewardship.” In The Battle for the Soul of Capitalism. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 2005. Clear, readable, passionate discussion of the scandals and the mechanisms used to perpetrate them.

MacDonald, Scott B., and Jane E. Hughes. Separating Fools from Their Money: A History of American Financial Scandals. New Brunswick,

N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 2007. Explains the often complex business world in an easy-to-read format. Detailed history of American financial scandals and their main players, including Eliot Spitzer, whose work is the focus of an entire chapter.

Smith, Thomas R., Jr. "Mutual Funds Under Fire: A Chronology of Developments Since January 1, 2003." Journal of Investment Compliance 7, no. 1 (2006): 4-33. This comprehensive account describes events initiated by Spitzer, the SEC, the U.S. Congress, mutual fund industry groups, and others.

Swensen, David F. "Hidden Causes of Poor Mutual-Fund Performance." In Unconventional Success: A Fundamental Approach to Personal Investment. New York: Free Press, 2005. Carefully documented explanation of the practices underlying the scandals. Unflinching in its exposure and condemnation of regulators, lobbyists, and the funds themselves.

Zitzewitz, Eric. "Who Cares About Shareholders? Arbitrage-Proofing Mutual Funds." Journal of Law, Economics, and Organization 19, no. 2 (2003): 245-280. Explains the mechanics of stale-price arbitrage and the extent to which it was known before the scandals.

SEE ALSO: Nov., 1929: Banque Oustric et Cie Failure Prompts French Inquiry; 1932: Insull Utilities Trusts Collapse Prompts New Federal Regulation; Nov. 28, 1967: Investor Louis Wolfson Is Convicted of Selling Stock Illegally; May 2, 1984: E. F. Hutton Executives Plead Guilty to Fraud; Jan. 15, 1988: ZZZZ Best Founder Is Indicted on Federal Fraud Charges; Mar. 29, 1989: Financier Michael Milken Is Indicted for Racke-teering and Fraud; Aug. 27, 1990: Guinness Four Are Found Guilty of Share-Trading Fraud; 2001: Clearstream Financial Clearinghouse Is Accused of Fraud and Money Laundering; Dec. 2, 2001: Enron Bankruptcy Reveals Massive Financial Fraud; Mar. 5, 2004: Martha Stewart Is Convicted in Insider-Trading Scandal; Oct. 14, 2004: Insurance Brokerage Marsh & McLennan Is Charged with Fraud; Mar. 12, 2008: New York Governor Eliot Spitzer Resigns in Prostitution Scandal; Sept. 20, 2008: American Financial Markets Begin to Collapse.

October 2, 2003

NEWSPAPER CLAIMS THAT ARNOLD SCHWARZENEGGER GROPED WOMEN

As former bodybuilder and popular film actor Arnold Schwarzenegger was running for governor of California, a number of women told reporters that he had harassed or abused them years before. The Los Angeles Times published a series about the accusations, but Schwarzenegger won the election nevertheless. He promised to have the charges investigated but did not follow through on his plan.

ALSO KNOWN AS: Gropegate

LOCALE: Los Angeles, California

CATEGORIES: Publishing and journalism; politics; sex crimes; sex; public morals; women's issues; Hollywood

KEY FIGURES

Arnold Schwarzenegger (b. 1947), former bodybuilder, film actor, and governor of California, 2003-

John Carroll (b. 1941), editor of the Los Angeles Times

Maria Shriver (b. 1955), broadcast journalist and Schwarzenegger's wife

Susan Estrich (b. 1952), Democratic political commentator who chastised the Los Angeles Times for publishing the claims against Schwarzenegger

SUMMARY OF EVENT

According to biographer Laurence Leamer, the Austrian-born bodybuilder and film actor Arnold Schwarzenegger had a habit of sexual directness with women and, while usually charming, sometimes bullied his companions. Moving to the United States in 1968, Schwarzenegger soon became an American success. He arrived poor and could barely speak English. Through talent, good looks, hard work, business acumen, and skillful promotion, he became a multimillionaire. After breakups with two live-in girlfriends, he married the broadcast journalist Maria Shriver, a Democrat and a niece of former U.S. president John F. Kennedy.

Schwarzenegger, a Republican, held positions on social issues to the left of most members of the party but championed business and befriended the party's elite. During George H. W. Bush's administration, he chaired the President's Council on Physical Fitness and Sports. Then, as age worked against his ability to continue in action films, Schwarzenegger considered running in 2002 against Gray Davis, the incumbent governor of Schwarzenegger's adopted state of California. Schwarzenegger changed his mind, however, after an article in the March, 2001, issue of Premiere magazine reported that Schwarzenegger sexually harassed women and after the National Enquirer published an exposé of a sexual relationship it claimed he had with a former actress.

Nevertheless, Schwarzenegger played such a big role in the 2002 election in campaigning successfully to provide state money for after-school programs that when, in the summer of 2003, the recently re-elected Davis found himself subject to a recall vote scheduled for October 7 of that year, Schwarzenegger had become a prominent figure in California politics. Having received his wife's consent to run for governor, he announced his candidacy on The Tonight Show with Jay Leno on August 6.

Schwarzenegger knew that his fame as an actor would help him in the campaign but that his reputation as a womanizer would hurt, as would his inexperience with the intricacies of California government and the attitude of many voters that a celebrity candidate should not be taken seriously. He tried to keep from verbally stumbling by avoiding questions from the press, which he considered hostile.

Meanwhile, with the announcement of Schwarzenegger's candidacy, John Carroll, editor of the Los Angeles Times, began his newspaper's investigation of Schwarzenegger's alleged misdeeds with women, assigning reporters to determine whether the rumors were true. Carroll said that he believed the newspaper had a responsibility to report accurately the character of a candidate for the state's highest office and that it was better to publish the truth before voters cast their ballots rather than afterward. The newspaper, however, had opposed the recall in a staff editorial, and Carroll knew that supporters of Schwarzenegger would claim reportorial bias if the Los Angeles Times published articles accusing Schwarzenegger of inappropriate conduct against women.

After much effort to discover and substantiate accusations from various women, the Los Angeles Times published the first article of its series on what came to be called Gropegate. That article, "Women Say Schwarzenegger Groped, Humiliated Them," ran on Thursday, October 2, only five days before the election. It referred to incidents alleged to have occurred when Schwarzenegger was single and also when he was married. Several of the women who spoke to reporters did so only after the newspaper agreed to conceal their names; in each of those cases, the reporters received the assurance of a family member or a friend that the alleged victim had revealed the incident long before the campaign for governor began.

One woman claimed that Schwarzenegger stuck his arm under her skirt and grabbed her buttocks without her consent. Other women claimed he made unwelcome, crude sexual suggestions to them. Among the women who claimed that Schwarzenegger had grabbed their breasts were two who allowed their names to be used: E. Laine Stockton, recounting a 1975 incident in California, and Anna Richardson, recounting, as she had for Premiere, an incident she said occurred in England in 2000. Another woman at the scene in England remembered the incident differently, saying that Richardson, and not Schwarzenegger, was the person who was being sexually forward. The article also quoted a spokesperson for Schwarzenegger, who denied any sexual impropriety by the candidate and accused Democrats of trying to wreck his campaign.

The Los Angeles Times article of October 2 was followed by more claims of sexual harassment by Schwarzenegger, and the paper continued its series through the election and in the weeks following. By the time of the election, the newspaper had presented the cases of more than one dozen women who claimed Schwarzenegger harassed or abused them.

IMPACT

Schwarzenegger denied the allegations against him. However, on the morning in which the first Los Angeles Times article appeared, he did acknowledge his poor behavior toward women in the social atmospheres of bodybuilding culture and Hollywood and agreed that he likely hurt the feelings of others. Eager to put his misbehavior as a bodybuilder and actor behind him, he offered a blanket apology to those he offended.

The new governor, however, also called the Los Angeles Times series an act of dirty politics, and many people agreed. One commentator who sided with him was a feminist and a Democrat, Susan Estrich, whose op-ed attacking the paper for its series' original allegations appeared on October 3, 2003, in the same newspaper. A professor of law, Estrich noted that none of the women mentioned as victims had filed charges, and that the alleged incidents from years past did not constitute sexual harassment.

Most conservatives questioned the motivation of the Los Angeles Times in publishing lewd stories about the leading Republican candidate only a few days before the election, even though critics acknowledged that Schwarzenegger deserved his boorish reputation. With the exception of Estrich, liberals, and certainly feminists, rejoiced at what they considered the exposure of sexist villainy. As for the electorate as a whole, however, the scandal seemed irrelevant. According to Leamer, it was Shriver who reassured voters about her husband's character. The vote on October 7 went against Davis, and Californians chose Schwarzenegger as his replacement.

On November 6, eleven days before his inauguration, Schwarzenegger announced that he was hiring a private investigative firm to look into his alleged misconduct. Many observers doubted whether any firm he hired could be impartial. As matters turned out, however, no investigation took place. On December 8, Schwarzenegger announced that he had called it off, asserting that it would solve nothing and would merely provide fodder for his political foes.

In 2006, Schwarzenegger and two of his aides settled a libel suit filed against them by alleged victim Richardson, thus removing from media attention what little remained of the scandal that began in 2003. On November 7, he was reelected governor of California.

In earlier generations, most American political careers would have been ruined by accusations such as those leveled against Schwarzenegger. The situation was reminiscent of the scandal involving Bill Clinton and former White House intern Monica Lewinsky when Clinton had been president during the late 1990's. Schwarzenegger's recovery from the allegations made against him confirmed that public attitudes of voters toward the sexual behavior of political leaders were changing, and sexual misconduct was no longer necessarily a disqualification to holding public office.

—Victor Lindsey

FURTHER READING

Estrich, Susan. "A Deplorable October Surprise." Los Angeles Times, October 3, 2003. Condemns the Los Angeles Times for publishing its scandalous story against Schwarzenegger of the previous day. Estrich's article is especially telling because she is a feminist and a Democrat; Schwarzenegger is a Republican.

Leamer, Laurence. Fantastic: The Life of Arnold

Schwarzenegger. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2005. A well-researched, balanced account of Schwarzenegger's youth and his careers as a bodybuilder, actor, and politician—with much discussion of his behavior with women.

Mathews, Joe. The People's Machine: Arnold Schwarzenegger and the Rise of Blockbuster Democracy. New York: PublicAffairs, 2006. A Los Angeles Times reporter's detailed story, in its historical context, of Schwarzenegger as a political aspirant, gubernatorial candidate, and governor.

Smolkin, Rachel. "The Women." American Journalism Review, December-January, 2004. A sympathetic discussion of how the Los Angeles Times investigated the claims of groping, the standards used by the newspaper, and the decisions of reporters and editors.

Welkos, Robert W., Gary Cohn, and Carla Hall. "Women Say Schwarzenegger Groped, Humiliated Them." Los Angeles Times, October 2, 2003. The article that broke the story of allegations against Schwarzenegger's physical and verbal mistreatment and harassment of women.

SEE ALSO: July 20, 1982: Conservative Politician John G. Schmitz Is Found to Have Children Out of Wedlock; Oct. 11-13, 1991: Justice Clarence Thomas's Confirmation Hearings Create a Scandal; Jan. 17, 1998: President Bill Clinton Denies Sexual Affair with a White House Intern; May 2, 2000: New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani's Extramarital Affair Is Revealed; May 9, 2000: Former Louisiana Governor Edwin Edwards Is Convicted on Corruption Charges; Oct. 13, 2004: Television Producer Files Sex Harassment Suit Against Bill O'Reilly; Dec. 6, 2005: Spokane, Washington, Mayor Recalled in Gay-Sex Scandal; Mar. 12, 2008: New York Governor Eliot Spitzer Resigns in Prostitution Scandal.

Early November, 2003

PARIS HILTON SEX-TAPE APPEARS ON THE WEB

Paris Hilton, an heir to the Hilton Hotels fortune and actor and businessperson in her own right, became a celebrity for her famous name, beauty, and relentless partying in trendy clubs. Rick Salomon, the son of a film studio vice president, was most famous for a brief, tempestuous marriage to actor Shannon Doherty. When clips from an amateur sex tape of Salomon and Hilton appeared on the Web, it generated the first in a long line of scandals for Hilton.

LOCALE: Hollywood, California

CATEGORIES: Sex; communications and media; film; popular culture; Hollywood

KEY FIGURES

Paris Hilton (b. 1981), businesswoman, actor, and former model

Rick Salomon (b. 1968), son of a film executive

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Paris Hilton began her career as a successful model for reputable agencies in New York, Los Angeles, and London, but the very features that led to this success—her famous name and good looks—inevitably made her a favorite of paparazzi and society columnists. Soon the pop-culture cliché “famous for being famous” began to recur in media references to her, as photos and film clips of her smiling coyly at nightclubs and parties became a staple of the tabloids and celebrity television shows from the late 1990's onward.

In early November, 2003, Hilton's image was redefined when clips from a crudely filmed sex tape featuring Hilton and love interest Rick Salomon appeared on a Web site owned by the adult-film company Marvad Corp., which is based in Seattle, Washington. No longer would Hilton be merely annoyingly ubiquitous; for the rest of the decade, she would be infamous, with the sex-tape controversy only the first of numerous scandals that helped to define the new Hilton.

A mutual friend of the former couple, Donald Thrasher, who had once been Salomon's roommate, was thought to have stolen the video from Salomon before selling it to Marvad without either Hilton's or Salomon's knowledge. The tape, filmed in Salomon's Hollywood Hills home in 2001, begins with Hilton demurely primping in a bathroom mirror and beseeching Salomon not to use profanity while he entreats her to reveal herself and have sex with him. Key scenes include Hilton performing oral sex on Salomon and, near the tape's conclusion, close-ups of Hilton's breasts taken by Hilton herself with a camcorder. News of the tape generated headlines and numerous jokes by television comedians.

Hilton was distraught over her public humiliation. One news story showed her upbraiding a clerk at a newsstand for prominently displaying periodicals featuring the scandal and expressing concern about the effect the publicity would have on her young fans. Cynics, though, pointed out that the tape had been made public scarcely a week before the debut of The Simple Life, a reality-television show in which Hilton and best friend Nicole Richie, daughter of R&B singer Lionel Richie, traded their indulgent West coast lifestyles for work on a farm in rural Arkansas. The series became a huge hit for Fox Television and ran for several seasons. Salomon also benefitted from the publicity stirred up by the video. He arranged for adult-film company Red Light District to market copies of the video in DVD format on the Web. Dubbed 1 Night in Paris, the tape became a best seller and won a top award from the adult-film industry.

Despite the intense media blitz surrounding 1 Night in Paris, it is likely that the scandal would have been short-lived; neither Hilton nor Salomon had the sort of sober, conservative reputation that would render their filming of private sex acts surprising or shocking—and by the early twenty-first century, it was not uncommon for American couples to tape themselves having sex. However, just as the initial publicity began to abate, the tape provoked a heated public fight between Salomon and Hilton's parents, Kathy and Richard, who had made a number of angry public statements insinuating that Salomon was exploiting their daughter for his own fame and fortune. These comments prompted Salomon to file a $10 million lawsuit accusing the Hiltons and their daughter's personal assistant of defaming him. Paris Hilton countersued, seeking a share of the profits her former boyfriend was making from video sales.

The legal wrangling kept the controversy alive well into 2004. The pertinent legal matters were settled when Hilton was awarded a cash settlement of $400,000 and a share of the future earnings from sales of the DVD. As soon as these lawsuits were settled, Hilton garnered fresh attention after rumors began to circulate about the existence of a second tape, one alleged to feature Hilton and another model experimenting with sex toys.

Salomon continued to sell and promote 1 Night in Paris, but just as his relationships with Hilton and actor and former girlfriend Shannon Doherty had been his original source of fame, it was his next relationship that kept him in the public eye. In 2007, he embarked on a tumultuous off-and-on-again affair with television actor Pamela Anderson. After much publicity on talk shows and in gossip columns, Anderson and Salomon married in Las Vegas in October of that year. Anderson left Salomon, however, after less than three months of married life, and their union was annulled in March of 2008.

For Hilton, the tape scandal was only the beginning of years of public humiliation and embarrassment. Although she continued to work as a celebrity "spokesmodel" for numerous companies and launched her own successful lines of clothing, jewelry, perfume, and handbags, a series of further misadventures maintained her public image as an indulgent, irresponsible scofflaw. Her license to drive was suspended after a drunk-driving conviction in 2006, and she was sentenced to forty-five days in jail after police stopped her in early 2007 for driving without a proper license and speeding. Television cameras recorded every minute of the resulting debacle: Hilton reporting for her jail term, leaving jail after only a few days for medical reasons, and returning to jail after being ordered there by an angry judge upset about not having been consulted about her early release. The media also captured her crying and screaming in court, returning to jail, leaving jail, claiming to have found religion during incarceration, and claiming interest in helping starving people in the developing world.

Hilton's later attempt to launch a singing career fizzled when her debut album Paris was released in 2006 to poor reviews and sales. Her acting career consisted of cameos in major films and larger roles in B movies and straight-to-video releases. Her only sizeable role in a major film remained that of the character Paige in the 2005 remake of the horror classic House of Wax.

IMPACT

The Hilton-Salomon sex-tape scandal illustrates how celebrities are still defined—scornfully—by a pop-culture audience thought to be open-minded and nonjudgmental. Whatever one thinks about Hilton's and Salomon's lifestyles and choices, they both—especially Hilton—have demonstrated remarkable savvy as business people. Nevertheless, the public images of both Hilton and Salomon continued to be those shaped by this scandal: Hilton as a pampered beauty and “dumb blond” sex object and Salomon as a Lothario and pornographer.

Furthermore, the sex-tape scandal revealed the power of the media, especially the speed and power of the Web. Film celebrities have been subjected to the rumor mill at least since the invention of motion pictures, but these early stories were circulated only by word of mouth, by print, and occasionally by radio and television. However, the Hilton-Salomon scandal was immediate. Because of the Web, millions were able to view clips of the sex-tape on demand. Soon thereafter, anyone could buy the video on the Web as well.

—Thomas Du Bose

FURTHER READING

Angelo, Marty. One Life Matters. Cottesloe, Wash.: Impact, 2006. Inspirational book by the prison minister who counseled Hilton during her brief time in jail. Speculates on what Hilton might have been thinking as she waited for her release.

Fahy, Thomas. “One Night in Paris (Hilton): Wealth, Celebrity, and the Politics of Humiliation.” In Pop-porn: Pornography in American Culture, edited by Ann C. Hall and Mardia J. Bishop. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 2007. Fahy explores the intersection of celebrity status and wealth and how it plays out in a culture of soft porn. The book itself starts with the premise that “Americans are addicted to porn, but are forced to disguise it as fashion, hygiene, class commentary, or other forms of entertainment.” Hilton's life is defined, in part, by these disguises.

Hilton, Paris, with Merle Ginsberg. Confessions of an Heiress: A Tongue-in-Chic Peek Behind the Pose. New York: Fireside, 2004. A combination autobiography and self-help book offering much insight into Hilton's perception of herself. Made The New York Times best-seller list.

Newkey-Burden, Chas. Paris Hilton: Life on the Edge—The Biography. London: John Blake, 2007. A biographical portrait of the infamous former model and tabloid celebrity. Explores the 2003 sex-tape scandal and her time in jail in 2007.

SEE ALSO: July 18, 1988: Actor Rob Lowe Videotapes Sexual Tryst with a Minor; June 27, 1995: Film Star Hugh Grant Is Arrested for Lewd Conduct; Sept. 22, 1997: Sportscaster Marv Albert Is Tried for Sexual Assault; Apr. 7, 1998: Pop Singer George Michael Is Arrested for Lewd Conduct; May 21, 2003: Sexually Provocative Film The Brown Bunny Premieres at Cannes Film Festival; July 28, 2006: Actor Mel Gibson Is Caught Making Anti-Semitic Remarks; June 13, 2008: Singer R. Kelly Is Acquitted on Child Pornography Charges.

December 17, 2003

SENATOR STROM THURMOND'S BIRACIAL DAUGHTER IS REVEALED

U.S. senator Strom Thurmond, a long-time proponent of racial segregation, had a daughter named Essie Mae Washington-Williams with an African American woman in 1925, a revelation made public on the CBS television news show 60 Minutes in late 2003. Correspondent Dan Rather interviewed Washington-Williams, closing the book on decades-long rumors that Thurmond had a biracial child out of wedlock.

LOCALE: New York, New York

CATEGORIES: Radio and television; social issues and reform; families and children; racism

KEY FIGURES

Essie Mae Washington-Williams (b. 1925), retired school teacher and daughter of Strom Thurmond
Strom Thurmond (1902-2003), U.S. senator from South Carolina, 1948-2003

Carrie Butler (1909-1947), Washington-Williams's mother

Dan Rather (b. 1931), CBS Evening News anchor and 60 Minutes correspondent

SUMMARY OF EVENT

After seventy-eight years of silence, a biracial former school teacher named Essie Mae Washington-Williams announced in a television interview with CBS News correspondent Dan Rather that she was the daughter of conservative Republican segregationist Strom Thurmond, a longtime U.S. senator from South Carolina. Her mother was Carrie Butler, an African American woman. Thurmond's reputation as a segregationist made the news both startling and fascinating, although rumors about his paternity of a biracial daughter had existed for decades.

Washington-Williams agreed to be interviewed by Rather because she wished to put the decades of speculation to rest and to clarify for her own children their family legacy. According to Washington-Williams, her mother was a sixteen-year-old maid in the Thurmond household during the 1920's. The future Senator Thurmond was twenty-two years old and soon to be a lawyer. She was conceived in Edgefield, South Carolina, where the Thurmonds lived and where her mother worked. She also revealed that she was born in 1925 in Aiken, South Carolina. At age six months, she was taken to Pennsylvania to be raised by an aunt, Mary Washington, and her husband.

Washington-Williams knew that she had "a dad somewhere," although she did not know his identity. Her mother was the only person who knew the real story about her father. In 1941, when Washington-Williams was sixteen years old, her mother, by then living in Pennsylvania, arranged for her to finally meet her father, who by this time was an attorney about to go into the armed forces. Washington-Williams, who said her mother never told her that her father was white, described her meeting with Thurmond in his law office as "very nice" and that he seemed "glad" to meet her. They talked about a variety of subjects, including what she hoped to do with her life.

After their initial meeting, Thurmond and Washington-Williams stayed in contact. His political career blossomed. He was governor of South Carolina while she was a student at South Carolina State College (later University), an all-black college in Orangeburg that Thurmond recommended she attend. As governor, he regularly visited colleges around the state. In 1947, he visited South Carolina State and met with his daughter but kept secret that she was his child. According to Washington-Williams, it was common knowledge among the black people in Edgefield that she was Thurmond's child. Inasmuch as the climate of the American South before the 1950's accepted that white men and black women had relationships—some consensual, some not—there was no outcry, no backlash, no repercussions for either Thurmond or Washington-Williams.

Thurmond contributed to his daughter's financial needs while she was in college and until she married. He did not automatically send or give her money personally, but funds were always available for tuition and room and board. Many have speculated that Thurmond's financial support amounted to nothing but "hush money," a means to keep her silent about being his daughter and thus to shield the up-and-coming conservative politician from scandal. Washington-Williams insisted she saw no advantage in revealing her relationship to Thurmond, and that she did not want to hurt his political career. She said that in spite of his bigoted, segregationist policies, she believed he had done many good things for her and for all black people in South Carolina. She said that Ebony magazine once sent a reporter for a story about her when she was attending South Carolina State. She refused to be interviewed for what she called a family friendship.

As a strict segregationist, Thurmond fought against racial and social progress, including school desegregation. In what was the longest filibuster in Senate history—24 hours and 18 minutes—he worked to defeat civil rights legislation. He tried to derail the nomination of Thurgood Marshall to be the first African American justice of the United States. To thwart President Harry S. Truman's plan to integrate the armed forces, he ran for president in 1948 as a Dixiecrat. His own hometown newspaper (in Edgefield) ran a front-page story in 1972 that called him "unprincipled" for naming himself a "devout segregationist" while fathering "colored offspring."

Washington-Williams insists that her father did many good things: He served meritoriously in World War II, his election to the Senate in 1954 was by an unheard-of write-in vote, he recommended a black man for a federal judgeship, and he was the first senator to hire a black administrative aide. Washington-Williams said that despite the controversial views about him, he was "very good" to her and was "a great friend."

As for Thurmond, he neither confirmed nor denied that he had a child with a black woman. He usually brushed the questions aside. When he visited Washington-Williams while she was in college, the two would meet in the college president's office. Some witnesses claimed to have seen them sitting together outside in the center court of the college.

Strom Thurmond's Biracial Daughter Revealed

After college, Washington-Williams kept in contact with her father, by this time a U.S. senator, mostly through annual trips either to his Columbia, South Carolina, home or to his Senate office in Washington, D.C. At those times, he would give her money to help her financially, always warning her to be careful. His Senate office secretary arranged their appointments and must have known that there was some familial relationship between the two, although she never discussed that knowledge.

After his daughter married, Thurmond discontinued his financial support, except in cases of emergency. She taught in the Los Angeles Unified School District for thirty years, beginning in the late 1960's. In 1964, when Washington-Williams's husband died at the age of forty-five, Thurmond once again began helping her and her four children. He met the first of his grandchildren when the baby was only six months old. Washington-Williams, who was then living in Pennsylvania, had taken the baby to Washington, D.C., for a visit with Thurmond. Thurmond did not see the other three children, however, until they were in their teens.

Essie Mae Washington-Williams. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

Washington-Williams said she believed that Thurmond "cared something" about her, which made her feel better about their unorthodox relationship. Though never publicly acknowledging her as his daughter, he said at their first meeting, "Well, you look like one of my sisters" and added that she had cheekbones like those of "our family."

By the time Thurmond died, he had slowed down considerably; he was one hundred years old. Washington-Williams, living in Los Angeles since the 1960's, had stopped making annual trips to Washington, D.C., because of her own health issues. Even as his health deteriorated and death seemed imminent, Thurmond kept his biracial daughter a secret. Upon his death in June, 2003, Washington-Williams decided to tell her story, first in an interview with Rather that was broadcast on 60 Minutes on December 17, 2003. She also wrote Dear Senator: A Memoir by the Daughter of Strom Thurmond (2005), a book for her children, so that they would know the truth about their grandfather.

IMPACT

At the time of Washington-Williams's birth and for decades after, the races were segregated in the American South. The Confederate way of life was still very much a reality. Consequently, the revelation that Thurmond, one of the most outspoken defenders of that way of life, had fathered a child with a black woman was scandalous, even as late as 2003, the year of his death. Thurmond built his political career on deception and secrecy. As the public learned of his hypocrisy, reactions ranged from no surprise to criticism of Washington-Williams for having kept quiet for so long, allowing a racist bigot to have a powerful political career while supporting his biracial daughter.

—Jane L. Ball

FURTHER READING

Bass, Jack, and Marilyn W. Thompson. Ol' Strom: An Unauthorized Biography of Strom Thurmond. Atlanta: Longstreet, 1998. An anecdotal, unauthorized biography of Thurmond, the oldest and longest-serving senator of his time.

_____. Strom: The Complicated Personal and Political Life of Strom Thurmond. New York: PublicAffairs, 2005. Discusses his affair with Carrie Butler and his secret relationship with his biracial daughter. Explores the contradictions of his life as a segregationist.

Washington-Williams, Essie Mae, with William Stadiem. Dear Senator: A Memoir by the Daughter of Strom Thurmond. New York: Regan Books, 2005. Describes Washington-Williams's relationship with a generous, even affectionate father who was also a staunch segregationist. Details his support and encouragement even as he kept the relationship secret.

SEE ALSO: May 16, 1934: General Douglas MacArthur Sues Newspaper Columnist for Libel; Jan. 25, 1984: Jesse Jackson Calls New York City "Hymietown"; May, 1999: Civil Rights Leader Jesse Jackson Fathers a Child Out of Wedlock; Dec. 5, 2002: Senator Trent Lott Praises Strom Thurmond's 1948 Presidential Campaign.

December 18, 2003

POP STAR MICHAEL JACKSON IS CHARGED WITH CHILD MOLESTATION

In 2003, pop-music star Michael Jackson was charged with child molestation and administering an intoxicating agent to commit that felony. Jackson was later acquitted, but his career was negatively affected.

LOCALE: Santa Maria, California

CATEGORIES: Law and the courts; families and children; communications and media; music and performing arts

KEY FIGURES

Michael Jackson (b. 1958), American musician and entertainer

Gavin Arvizo (b. 1989), boy who accused Jackson of molestation

SUMMARY OF EVENT

On December 18, 2003, global pop-music star Michael Jackson was charged with seven counts of child molestation and two counts of administering an intoxicating agent to commit that felony. The crime allegedly took place in February and March, 2003, against a thirteen-year old boy, Gavin Arvizo.

In 2000, Arvizo had been diagnosed with cancer and had his spleen and a kidney removed. Jackson paid for Arvizo's medical expenses and made accommodations for Arvizo to be transported to and from chemotherapy sessions. The boy later began to visit Jackson at his home in Santa Maria, California, and he and Jackson had many telephone conversations.

The police investigation into accusations of alleged child molestation by Jackson began after a television documentary featured an interview with the singer. The documentary Living with Michael Jackson, with British journalist Martin Bashir, aired in the United States on February 6, 2003. The film, which included Arvizo, showed the boy holding Jackson's hand and resting his head on Jackson's shoulders. Arvizo told the journalist that he and Jackson often slept in the same room but not in the same bed. Jackson said in the interview that many children, including some actors, have slept in his bed, but he adamantly maintained that nothing inappropriate occurred.

Jackson is one of the most prolific entertainers in modern history. His 1992 album Thriller sold more than 65 million copies and put Jackson in the Guinness Book of World Records for producing the world's best-selling album. Although he has had monumental success in the music and entertainment industries, he has also been one of the most ridiculed entertainers, facing accusations of odd behavior and, most critically, sexual inappropriateness with boys. Some speculate that Jackson fueled the public's perception of him as a bizarre eccentric who is obsessed with recapturing his childhood after he purchased a mansion and large property in Central California and built an amusement park there. The nearly 3,000-acre property is called Neverland Ranch.

Jackson has often stated that he prefers the company of children, adding that children are more honest than adults. Jackson befriended many children and invited many of them to his home to enjoy the amusement-park rides. Some children also slept at his home as part of their visits. Jackson has always denied any sexual contact with any of children. At the time Jackson was charged with child molestation in 2003, many individuals thought he would finally be found guilty and imprisoned. However, this would not happen.

Responding to public concerns after the airing of the documentary, the Santa Barbara County district attorney stated that, under California law, even if Arvizo had slept in the bed with Jackson, such an act would not have been deemed criminal without "affirmative and offensive conduct." On February 19, in response to the Bashir documentary, Jackson produced his own documentary to disprove accusations of child molestation against him. In the video, Arvizo and his mother, Janet Arvizo, insisted that he had not been molested by Jackson, and Arvizo's mother claimed that Jackson was like a father to her son. She also stated that she was thinking about taking legal action against Bashir.

Michael Jackson arriving at the courthouse in Santa Maria, California, in early 2005. (AP/Wide World Photos)

After the rebuttal documentary, Arvizo's mother contacted Larry Feldman, the attorney who in 1993 represented Jordan Chandler, another child who had accused Jackson of child molestation. Feldman sent Arvizo and his family to psychologist Stanley J. Katz, the same psychologist who assisted Chandler's family in determining if their son was molested by Jackson. Arvizo's brother told Katz that he witnessed Jackson touching his brother, and Katz, in return, reported what he heard to authorities, citing that this was protocol for someone of his profession. He stated that he is mandated to report child abuse, although he later testified in court that he did not think Jackson was a pedophile but a regressed ten year old.

In June, 2003, the Santa Barbara County Sheriff's Department started an investigation into the allegations of child abuse. The media began to descend on Santa Maria, a town of about 90,000 residents in Central California, 170 miles north of Los Angeles. In July, the sheriff's department first interviewed Arvizo and his family. On November 18, more than seventy investigators from the district attorney's office and the sheriff's department went to Jackson's home with a search warrant. Along with the warrant to search the property, they also had a warrant for Jackson's arrest. Again, the media were there, recording the entire police action on film. On November 20, Jackson surrendered to authorities.

The felony complaint stated that Jackson had committed a lewd act with Arvizo and, on two occasions, administered an intoxicating agent with the intent to enable Arvizo in the commission of the lewd acts. Jackson was arraigned January 16, 2004, in Santa Maria and pleaded not guilty.

Jackson was indicted on all seven charges following grand jury proceedings in March. Jury selection for the trial began almost one year later, on January 31, 2005. Media from around the globe camped out at the courthouse for the entire trial. Fans and critics of Jackson camped out as well, especially as the trial neared completion. The proceedings included ninety-one prosecution witnesses and fifty defense witnesses, including comedian and late-night talk-show host Jay Leno. The judge in the case allowed Leno to joke about Jackson and the case out of court, but only if the jokes were unrelated to the incident about which Leno would act as a witness during the trial.

Arvizo's claims and those of his family members were contradictory when compared during the trial. Arvizo also stated during testimony that he lied to a school administrator that Jackson had not molested him. He stated that he feared being teased at school and that he was already being teased after the airing of the Bashir documentary.

At the trial, prosecutors introduced several pornographic books and magazines (some of which were taken from Jackson during the 1993 child molestation allegations) that had been seized at Jackson's home. The prosecution argued the periodicals and books amounted to child erotica and thus proved his sexual attraction to boys. The defense, however, argued that the books were legal to possess and that a substantial number of the books and magazines had been taken from Jackson's home long before 2003. While the books featured nudity, none reportedly displayed sexual acts.

Many of the witnesses who were called to testify at trial had problems with credibility. Arvizo's mother had been accused by several celebrities of attempting to extort money from them. One prosecution witness who stated that he had seen Jackson molest children had been accused of robbing several restaurants, a toy store, and an electronics store. Another witness, who was a former maid at Jackson's home, had been convicted of stealing a sketch of Elvis Presley made by Jackson.

IMPACT

On June 13, the jury found Jackson not guilty on all charges. Fans cheered and cried outside the courthouse as the verdicts were read. After trial, the conduct of jurors during deliberations became an issue. One juror admitted to bringing in a medical textbook and stating that Jackson fit the profile of a pedophile. The juror also claimed that she winked at Jackson's mother, Katherine Jackson, even though jurors are instructed to avoid such communication. Several jurors apparently admitted they were fans of Jackson and that they would never convict him.

Even when plagued by rumor and scandal, as Jackson has been for much of his career, the pop singer has managed to translate adversity into greater fame. Some would argue that the continuous media reports on Jackson and his erratic behavior have made him more infamous. While many argue that his work as a musical artist has been uneven, his contribution to modern music and entertainment has been enormous. The sex-abuse scandals have tarnished his reputation only to the point of making him fodder for ridicule. The scandals, however, have not diminished his overall status as one of the greatest entertainers of modern times.

Michael Jackson Charged with Child Molestation

—Ashley M. Miller and Jeffery T. Walker

FURTHER READING

Guest, Lynton. The Trials of Michael Jackson. Vale of Glamorgan, Wales: Aureus, 2006. A look at the unreported or underreported aspects of Michael Jackson's 2005 criminal trial.

Taibbi, Matt. "The Nation in the Mirror." Rolling Stone, June 16, 2005. A scathing critique of the circus atmosphere both outside and inside the Santa Maria courtroom during Michael Jackson's molestation trial.

Taraborrelli, J. Randy. Michael Jackson: The Magic and the Madness. New York: Turtle Point Press, 2004. A book chronicling the life of Michael Jackson. First published in 1991 and updated for this edition.

Wilkinson, Peter. "The Case Against Jackson." Rolling Stone, January 25, 2005. Details the inner workings of Jackson's trial and arguments made by the prosecution and defense.

Williams, Troy M. "The Trial of a Career." Los Angeles Times, June 14, 2005. Gives a detailed analysis of the 2005 trial for child molestation, with a focus on the trial's long-term effect on Jackson's singing career.

SEE ALSO: Feb. 6, 1942: Film Star Errol Flynn Is Acquitted of Rape; Nov. 23, 1946: Tennis Star Bill Tilden Is Arrested for Lewd Behavior with a Minor; Dec. 12, 1957: Rock Star Jerry Lee Lewis Marries Thirteen-Year-Old Cousin; Feb. 1, 1978: Roman Polanski Flees the United States to Avoid Rape Trial; Aug. 12, 1983-July 27, 1990: McMartin Preschool Is Embroiled in Child-Abuse Case; July 18, 1988: Actor Rob Lowe Videotapes Sexual Tryst with a Minor; Jan. 13, 1992: Woody Allen Has Affair with Lover Mia Farrow's Adopted Daughter; Apr. 7, 1998: Pop Singer George Michael Is Arrested for Lewd Conduct; Dec., 2000: Sexual Abuse of Children in France Leads to the Outreau Affair; June 13, 2008: Singer R. Kelly Is Acquitted on Child Pornography Charges.

March 4, 2004

FORMER UNITED WAY CHARITY CHIEF PLEADS GUILTY TO EMBEZZLEMENT

Oral Suer, the former chief executive officer and head of United Way in Washington, D.C., pleaded guilty to having embezzled from the organization for nearly three decades. For many years, Suer stole from the charity, taking about half a million dollars. He was sentenced to federal prison and ordered by a judge to make full restitution to United Way. The scandal led the charity to make policy changes and institute a new code of ethics.

LOCALE: Washington, D.C.

CATEGORIES: Corruption; law and the courts

KEY FIGURES

Oral Suer (b. 1935), former chief executive officer of United Way, Washington, D.C., 1974-2001

Norman Taylor (fl. early twenty-first century), Suer's successor as chief executive officer of United Way

Rodney E. Slater (b. 1955), independent head of United Way's ethics and policy task force

SUMMARY OF EVENT

United Way of the National Capital Area (UWNCA), located in Washington, D.C., was created in 1974. The D.C. agency was conceived when the United Givers Fund, the United Black Fund, and the Health and Welfare Council were merged, creating the twenty-third-largest United Way office in the United States. In roughly five years, UWNCA became the first United Way branch to include national nonprofits in its annual fund-raising campaign. Some of the most noteworthy nonprofits that participated include the American Cancer Society and the American Heart Association. By the early 1990's, UWNCA was managing one of the largest United Way campaigns in the United States.

The chief executive officer (CEO) and co-founder of the UWNCA was Oral Suer. Suer took over as the CEO of the Washington, D.C., office in 1974 and continued in that role until his retirement in 2001. During his twenty-seven year tenure as CEO, Suer helped raise more than $1 billion for local charities in the greater Washington, D.C., area. By the early 1990's, Suer helped to establish UWNCA as the second largest local United Way office in the country. At its peak, the D.C. branch was raising tens of millions of dollars annually from both private sector and federal workers.

Despite nearly three decades of leadership, Suer did not always act in the best interest of the agency and the thousands of people it served. Members of UWNCA's board, along with previous auditors, had learned early on that Suer had taken monies from the agency and that he failed to repay those funds. However, these board members chose not to fully reveal their information on Suer's possible illegal activities, which dated back to 1986. A later audit revealed that at least one United Way director was actually alerted that Suer had not reimbursed the charity an amount over half a million dollars for various items, including sick-leave and vacation cash payments and advances on his base salary. Federal investigators, along with an independent audit of the company, later revealed that Suer's illegal activities might have dated back to 1976, just two years after his start as CEO of the organization.

A federal grand jury began to investigate UWNCA's financial operations in August, 2002, not long after a series of Washington Post articles revealed evidence of illegalities by the recently retired Suer and his successor, Norman Taylor. The news articles claimed that Suer took an early pension payout in which he collected thousands of dollars more than he was entitled to. Additionally, the articles also claimed that Suer charged personal expenses on United Way credit cards, expenses that included vacations and trips to see his children in college. The newspaper also found that during his tenure as CEO, UWNCA purposely withheld from local D.C. charities more than $1 million it had collected for them. UWNCA top officials and board members initially denied the allegations of Suer misconduct and then fired numerous employees and board members who had demanded an internal investigation.

By the end of 2002, UWNCA administrators forced the resignation of CEO Taylor, replaced its governing board of directors, brought in a new CEO, Charles Anderson, and commissioned an outside forensic audit of both Suer and Taylor. The financial investigation was carried out by the accounting firm PricewaterhouseCoopers. Although UWNCA leadership had refused to commission such an audit, the organization's board at the time overruled that decision. In addition, the new board, which was selected in January, 2003, actually expanded the scope and nature of the forensic audit to include a comprehensive look at Suer's entire career with UWNCA.

The investigation determined that Suer had received an estimated $2.4 million from UWNCA in excess of his salary and that he repaid the agency $961,000. More specifically, the audit revealed that Suer had reimbursed himself about $20,000 more than he had actually pledged at various United Way annual fund-raisers. The report also indicated that under the authority of Taylor, Suer took some $230,000 in additional retirement benefits that were not authorized by the pension regulations of the organization.

Suer received close to $694,000 for twenty-seven years' worth of unused sick leave and vacation time, even though evidence shows that he frequently took vacations. It also was discovered that he stole more than $400,000 in cash advances and $180,000 in extra deferred compensation, none of which he was authorized to receive. From 1997 through 2001, estimates show that he charged more than $80,000 in purchases without providing receipts. In fact, it was found that many of those charges were indeed personal in nature, including charges for lavish meals and weekend getaways. For example, in 1991, Suer claimed more than $500 in expenses for a United Way conference in Tampa, Florida; coincidentally—or not—the Super Bowl was in town that same weekend. The audit later discovered that no United Way conference had been held in Tampa for that particular weekend. The investigation concluded that Suer, along with some of his top managers, had absconded with more than $1 million during his period in office.

The results of the forensic audit were passed along to the federal investigators, who had already commenced their own inquiry into Suer's alleged illicit activities. Finally, on March 4, 2004, Suer pleaded guilty to transporting stolen money across state lines, making false statements, and concealing facts relating to an employee retirement plan. Based on his plea, he admitted to stealing close to $500,000 from the charity. In particular, he confessed to charging the organization for personal expenses and vacations, paying himself close to $333,000 for annual leave he had already used, and stealing nearly $94,000 from the charity's pension plan. On May 19, he was given the maximum sentence of twenty-seven months in federal prison and was ordered to pay $497,000 in restitution to United Way.

Suer was not the first executive officer from United Way to be indicted by a federal grand jury. In 1995, former United Way chief executive and president of twenty-two years, William Aramony, was convicted for twenty-five counts of embezzlement and imprisoned. Aramony had taken an estimated $500,000 during his tenure as CEO of the national agency. In total, some thirty United Way top executives over the last twenty years have been involved and subsequently punished for their illegal activities.

IMPACT

Suer's illegal activities had a grave impact on United Way donations. After his corruption became known to the general public in January, 2001, major longtime donors refused to give to the agency. By 2003, annual contributions declined by two-thirds, from $95 million to $34 million. A local workplace fund-raising drive among both private and government employers of the greater D.C. area in 2002 collected contributions totaling only $19 million, a small sum compared to the more than $90 million raised in 2001. Additionally, UWNCA was forced to lay off more than half of its staff. The D.C. office, which formerly employed about ninety people, was reduced to a staff of thirty-five. Furthermore, several regional offices were forced to close, causing a further reduction in charitable offerings.

By the summer of 2002, United Way's national headquarters accepted that its governance structure was partly responsible for the decaying reputation of the organization. In response, United Way appointed Rodney E. Slater, former U.S. secretary of transportation, to lead a task force focused on ethics and policy restructuring of the agency. The task force was asked to create both a new code of ethics along with a set of business and financial procedures that emphasized the essential mission of United Way. By September, 2005, the task force produced its final report, recommending a reduction of board and staff members, stronger financial controls, and the creation of an ethics committee to deal with agency misconduct, all of which were eventually instituted.

—Paul M. Klenowski

FURTHER READING

Coenen, Tracy. Essentials of Corporate Fraud. Hoboken, N.J.: John Wiley & Sons, 2008. An introductory guide to the white-collar crime of corporate fraud, written by a forensic, or investigative, accountant. Although geared to the corporate world, this work is relevant to all types of organizations that rely on sales—and donations—to succeed.

Glaser, John S. The United Way Scandal: An Insider's Account of What Went Wrong and Why. New York: John Wiley & Sons, 1994. An inside-account of the corrupt leadership of United Way, with a particular focus on William Aramony, United Way president who led the organization for more than two decades. Predates the Suer scandal.

Jackson, Peggy M., and Toni E. Fogarty. Sarbanes-Oxley for Nonprofits: A Guide to Building Competitive Advantage. New York: John Wiley & Sons, 2005. Explores the relevant themes and requirements of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, formed to ensure the accountability of nonprofits. Addresses potential unethical actions by employees at all levels.

Zack, Gerard M. Fraud and Abuse in Nonprofit Organizations: A Guide to Prevention and Detection. Hoboken, N.J.: John Wiley & Sons, 2003. A guidebook for those who work in nonprofits. Useful tips on detection and deterrence of fraud.

SEE ALSO: Apr. 9, 1987: Bess Myerson Resigns as New York Commissioner of Cultural Affairs.

March 5, 2004MARTHA STEWART IS CONVICTED IN INSIDER-TRADING SCANDAL

In a stunning, but temporary, fall from grace, home-design guru Martha Stewart was convicted of multiple federal felonies for selling stocks immediately before those stocks were expected to decrease in value. Stewart was convicted not of insider trading but rather of lying to government agents about a trade that was not illegal.

LOCALE: New York, New YorkCATEGORIES: Business; corruption; drugs; law and the courtsKEY FIGURES

Martha Stewart (b. 1941), corporate executive, editor, writer, and television-show host

Peter Bacanovic (b. 1962), financial consultant

Samuel D. Waksal (b. 1947), founder and former chief executive officer of ImClone Systems

Douglas Faneuil (b. 1975), Bacanovic's assistant

Miriam Goldman Cedarbaum (b. 1929), U.S.

district judge who presided over Stewart's trial

SUMMARY OF EVENT

On March 5, 2004, after deliberating for three days, a jury of four men and eight women convicted Martha Stewart, chief executive officer of Martha Stewart Omnimedia, of making false statements to the federal government, obstruction of justice, and conspiracy to make false statements and obstruct justice. Prosecutors argued that Stewart hindered a government investigation of suspected insider trading in a biotechnology firm called ImClone Systems, which was founded and being run by Samuel Waksal.

ImClone's business prospects depended almost entirely on its cancer treatment drug, Erbitux. On December 26, 2001, Waksal learned that the U.S. Food and Drug Administration was not going to approve Erbitux. Waksal tried to sell all of his personal shares of ImClone stock, even attempting to have his stake transferred to a family member to be sold. Stewart, who also had shares in ImClone, sold her entire stake on that same day. The jury found that she lied to government agents about her reasons for selling her shares.

As it turned out, Waksal and Stewart shared the same financial consultant at Merrill Lynch: Peter Bacanovic. Bacanovic was on vacation at the time, but his assistant, Douglas Faneuil, called him on December 27 to inform him of Waksal's attempted sale. According to telephone records, Bacanovic immediately called Stewart's office and left a message at 10:04 A.M., which was recorded in the company's computer system by Stewart's personal assistant, Ann Armstrong, as "Peter Bacanovic thinks ImClone is going to start trading downward." Later that day, Stewart called Bacanovic's office and reached Faneuil, who informed her—as directed by Bacanovic—that Waksal had tried to sell his entire stake of ImClone. Stewart ordered Faneuil to sell all 3,928 of her shares of ImClone, which he did the same day. ImClone stock collapsed in response to the company's announcement on December 28 of the FDA decision not to approve Erbitux. Had Stewart waited until after December 28 to sell her stock, she would have lost close to fifty thousand dollars.

By early 2002, the House Energy and Commerce Committee, the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC), the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), and the U.S. Attorney's Office had all commenced investigations into Waksal's attempted stock sale and, in the process, noticed the timing of Stewart's sale as well. SEC lawyers interviewed Bacanovic on January 7, 2002, at which point Bacanovic explained that in mid-December, 2001, he and Stewart had agreed that they would sell her ImClone stock if were to drop below sixty dollars per share.

A few weeks later, SEC lawyers, FBI agents, and federal prosecutors asked to meet Stewart. However, before that meeting took place, Stewart sat at her assistant's desk, found the record of the December 27 phone message from Bacanovic, and—in her assistant's presence—altered the message to read, “Peter Bacanovic re: ImClone.” Stewart quickly asked her assistant to restore the message to its original state. On February 4, 2002, Stewart, accompanied by legal counsel, met with government lawyers and agents. At this meeting, Stewart said that she and Bacanovic had agreed sometime before early December to sell her ImClone stock if it dropped below sixty dollars per share. She also described her December 27 phone conversation as between herself and Bacanovic, not Faneuil.

Bacanovic testified formally before the SEC on February 13 and essentially repeated his statements from his January interview. SEC lawyers, FBI agents, and federal prosecutors also interviewed Stewart again, by telephone, on April 10; she repeated that she and Bacanovic had agreed on when to sell her ImClone stock, and she said that she did not remember hearing on December 27 that Waksal was trying to dump his ImClone stock.

On June 4, 2003, federal prosecutors indicted Stewart and Bacanovic on nine separate counts. In addition, the SEC charged Stewart with securities fraud. The securities fraud charge was unusual because it was based not on Stewart's sale of ImClone stock but rather on her public statements of innocence. According to the SEC, Stewart made these statements with the intention of deceiving purchasers of her company's stock.

The criminal trial began on January 20, 2004, and lasted for six and a half weeks. Stewart was represented by Robert Morvillo, an experienced criminal defense attorney. The lead prosecutor was Assistant U.S. Attorney Karen Patton Seymour, then head of the criminal division. The key witnesses against Stewart and Bacanovic were Faneuil, Armstrong, and Mariana Pasternak, a friend of Stewart. Pasternak testified that, while vacationing together in Mexico, Stewart mentioned that Waksal's stock was plunging and that she had sold her shares, observing, “Isn't it nice to have brokers who tell you those things?” The jury evidently credited the testimony of these witnesses (although it did acquit Bacanovic of a separate count alleging that he had forged a worksheet to bolster the claim that a prior agreement to sell existed).

On July 17, the trial judge, Miriam Goldman Cedarbaum, sentenced Stewart to five months in prison and five months of home detention, fined her thirty thousand dollars, and ordered nineteen months of supervised release following confinement. Although Stewart was freed on bail pending appeal, she opted to serve her prison sentence nevertheless. On October 8, she reported to Alderson Federal Prison Camp in West Virginia and served her sentence. Following the story outside the minimum-security facility for women was the media, which broadcast from outside the complex for several weeks. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the second circuit rejected her appeal. Upon her release from prison, the media followed her to her home in New York and watched her every move. Stewart embraced the publicity.

THE ORIGINAL INDICTMENT

The grand jury investigating Martha Stewart and Peter Bacanovic for various federal offenses issued its indictment against the two on June 4, 2003, in federal court in New York. The three charges were outlined in a section of the indictment called “The Conspiracy,” excerpted here.

From in or about January 2002 until in or about April 2002, in the Southern District of New York and elsewhere, Peter Bacanovic and Martha Stewart, and others known and unknown, unlawfully, willfully, and knowingly did combine, conspire, confederate and agree together and with each other to commit offenses against the United States, to wit: to obstruct justice . . . ; to make false statements . . . ; and to commit perjury . . .

IMPACT

Stewart's conviction had a mixed impact on her iconic image. Many credited her for accepting responsibility for her actions and requesting she enter prison before her appeals were processed. Her talk show Martha Stewart Living went off the air three days after the guilty verdict, but Stewart resurfaced on daytime television with a new program called The Martha Stewart Show, which made its debut on September 12, 2005.

After Stewart completed her prison term, Mark Burnett, producer of the popular reality television shows Survivor and The Apprentice, approached her to star in a spinoff of the latter to be called The Apprentice: Martha Stewart. That show aired on NBC in the fall of 2005, but its ratings were considered sub-par and it was not renewed.

Because the trial judge dismissed the securities fraud charge, some critics of the prosecution argued that Stewart had been convicted of lying about something that was not itself a crime. Other critics perceived gender bias among prosecutors. Stewart, a powerful businesswoman, was convicted for what many considered a trivial matter, while the federally indicted male executives of scandal-ridden corporations such as Enron, Worldcom, and Tyco remained free. (Within a couple of years, however, state and federal prosecutors obtained convictions in virtually all high-profile cases involving the executive officers of these companies, who would receive prison sentences in excess of twenty years each, but for crimes much more serious and far-reaching than those of Stewart.)

On August 7, 2006, Stewart and Bacanovic agreed to settle insider trading civil charges brought against them by the SEC on June 4, 2003, for the December, 2001, ImClone stock sales. In its press release announcing the agreement, the SEC said,

Under the settlement, Stewart and Bacanovic agree to pay disgorgement and penalties. Stewart also agrees to a five year bar from serving as a director of a public company and a five year limitation on the scope of her service as an officer or employee of a public company. In August 2004, the commission barred Bacanovic from associating with a broker, dealer or investment adviser.

Martha Stewart leaves a federal courthouse in New York City after being sentenced on July 16, 2004, in an insider-trading scandal. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Finally, in an ironic twist, the FDA reversed itself and approved Erbitux in February, 2004, for use as a cancer treatment drug. Had Waksal not panicked in December, 2001, and acted hastily to sell his company shares, neither he nor Stewart would be convicted felons.

—Tung Yin

FURTHER READING

Byron, Christopher M. Martha Inc.: The Incredible Story of Martha Stewart Living Omnimedia. New York: J. Wiley, 2002. Unauthorized biography of Stewart and her company by a reporter with The Wall Street Journal.

Dershowitz, Alan M. "With Lawyers Like These . . ." The Wall Street Journal, March 8, 2004. An editorial that castigates Stewart's legal team, written by a well-known Harvard law professor and legal commentator.

Glater, Jonathan D. "Martha Stewart's Sentence: The Corporate Role—Stewart Likely to Influence Her Company, Even from Jail." The New York Times, July 17, 2004. Examines the legal impact of Stewart's conviction on her ability to run her business from outside the corporate office.

Hays, Constance L., and David Carr. "Before Facing Judge, Stewart Is Out and About." The New York Times, July 15, 2004. Describes Stewart's actions and mental-emotional state before she was sentenced.

Hays, Constance L., and Leslie Eaton. "The Martha Stewart Verdict: The Overview—Stewart Found Guilty of Lying in Sale of Stock." The New York Times, March 6, 2004. A recap of Stewart's trial the day after the jury in the case rendered its verdict of guilty on multiple charges.

Turow, Scott. "Cry No Tears for Martha Stewart." The New York Times, May 27, 2004. An article that supports Stewart's conviction for conspiracy, obstruction of justice, and making false statements to federal authorities.

SEE ALSO: Jan., 1913: British Prime Minister's Staff Is Investigated for Insider Trading; 1932: Insull Utilities Trusts Collapse Prompts New Federal Regulation; Nov. 28, 1967: Investor Louis Wolfson Is Convicted of Selling Stock Illegally; Oct. 9, 1980: Bendix Executive Resigns Amid Rumors of an Affair; May 2, 1984: E. F. Hutton Executives Plead Guilty to Fraud; Jan. 15, 1988: ZZZZ Best Founder Is Indicted on Federal Fraud Charges; Aug. 27, 1990: Guinness Four Are Found Guilty of Share-Trading Fraud; Apr. 5, 1991: George W. Bush Is Investigated for Insider Trading; Apr. 15, 1992: Hotel Tycoon Leona Helmsley Enters Prison for Tax Evasion; Dec. 2, 2001: Enron Bankruptcy Reveals Massive Financial Fraud; Sept. 18, 2006: Newsweek Reveals That Hewlett-Packard Spied on Its Own Board.

April 28, 2004

CBS BROADCASTS PHOTOS OF ABUSED AND TORTURED PRISONERS AT ABU GHRAIB

The CBS news program 60 Minutes II broadcast photographs of U.S. soldiers abusing and humiliating Iraqi prisoners at Abu Ghraib prison. U.S. officials characterized the abuse as the isolated acts of renegade soldiers. Later evidence showed that "enhanced interrogation techniques" had been approved at the highest levels of the U.S. government, leading many to believe that prisoner abuse was common U.S. military practice. Also, critics claim that U.S. officials knew about and tried to cover up the abuse months before the photos were made public.

LOCALE: Near Baghdad, Iraq

CATEGORIES: Communications and media; atrocities and war crimes; human rights; military; violence; government; publishing and journalism

KEY FIGURES

Ricardo Sanchez (b. 1951), U.S. Army lieutenant general and commander of coalition forces in Iraq, 2003-2004

Antonio Taguba (b. 1950), U.S. Army major general, who led the Army's investigation into prisoner abuse

Janis Karpinski (b. 1953), U.S. Army brigadier general, who was commander at Abu Ghraib, 2003-2004

James Schlesinger (b. 1929), former defense secretary and head of investigatory panel

Donald Rumsfeld (b. 1932), secretary of the U.S. Department of Defense, 2001-2006

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Abu Ghraib is an infamous prison near Baghdad, Iraq. It was first used as a torture chamber and execution site during Saddam Hussein's rule of Iraq. After Hussein's regime was toppled by the invasion of Iraq in 2003, the prison was transformed into a U.S. military detention facility. Soldiers from the U.S. Army's Military Police (MP) Corps abused Iraqi prisoners there, photographed their acts of torture and humiliation, and created an international scandal. The abuse came to light on April 28, 2004, when the CBS television news program 60 Minutes II aired a story about the prison's cellblock 1A.

The 60 Minutes II broadcast featured photographs of prisoners who were hooded and stacked in human pyramids; in positions of simulated sexual acts; chained into distorted positions; wearing women's underwear on their heads; leashed; hooded and forced to balance on a box while attached to "electrodes"; and cowering under near-attack by a dog. The photos often include U.S. soldiers smiling and flashing gestures of approval as they posed alongside the prisoners being abused. MPs Charles Graner and Sabrina Harmon, both at the rank of specialist, were shown in photos smiling and flashing an approving "thumbs up" gesture near the bruised face of a dead man on ice in a body bag. The man, Manadel al-Jamadi, died during interrogation by the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) on November 4, 2003. Although a U.S. military autopsy established his death as a homicide, no one was charged with that death.

The compelling and troubling images, however, distinguished Abu Ghraib from other allegations of mistreatment of prisoners by U.S. troops and the CIA in Afghanistan and Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. The Abu Ghraib photos made more real the earlier claims of U.S. military abuse by military watchdog groups and human rights organizations. The photos began their journey to the public eye when a horrified MP stumbled upon them and notified the Army's Criminal Investigation Division of their existence on January 13, 2004.

The military had already been warned of inhu-

Abu Ghraib prison inmates gather outside their cells for traditional Friday prayers in May, 2004. U.S. military tents and guard towers dominate the prison landscape at the facility near Baghdad, Iraq. (AP/Wide World Photos) mane treatment at Abu Ghraib, before the CBS broadcast in April, 2004. Internal documents show several MPs were being investigated for prisoner abuse already in late 2003. The Associated Press reported on the abuse and investigations in October, 2003. The mistreatment also came to the attention of the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC), which sent a team of investigators to cellblock 1A in mid-October, 2003. The team reported its findings to American officials through a confidential report, issued in February, 2004. The ICRC alleged violations of international humanitarian law that included beatings with hard objects

THE TAGUBA REPORT

The commander of coalition forces in Iraq ordered U.S. Army major general Antonio Taguba to conduct a covert internal investigation into alleged abuses at Abu Ghraib. An excerpt from Taguba's March 9 report follows.

Regarding part one of the investigation, I make the following specific findings of fact:

1. That between October and December, 2003, at the Abu Ghraib Confinement Facility (BCCF), numerous incidents of sadistic, blatant, and wanton criminal abuses were inflicted on several detainees. This systemic and illegal abuse of detainees was intentionally perpetrated by several members of the military police guard force . . . in Tier (section) 1-A of the Abu Ghraib Prison (BCCF).

The allegations of abuse were substantiated by detailed witness statements and the discovery of extremely graphic photographic evidence. Due to the extremely sensitive nature of these photographs and videos, the ongoing CID [Army Criminal Investigation Division] investigation, and the potential for the criminal prosecution of several suspects, the photographic evidence is not included in the body of my investigation. . . .

I find that the intentional abuse of detainees by military police personnel included the following acts:

- Punching, slapping, and kicking detainees; jumping on their naked feet
- Videotaping and photographing naked male and female detainees
- Forcibly arranging detainees in various sexually explicit positions for photographing
- Forcing detainees to remove their clothing and keeping them naked for several days at a time
- Forcing naked male detainees to wear women's underwear
- Arranging naked male detainees in a pile and then jumping on them
- Positioning a naked detainee on an MRE [Meal, Ready-to-Eat] Box, with a sandbag on his head, and attaching wires to his fingers, toes, and penis to simulate electric torture
- Writing "I am a Rapist" (sic) on the leg of a detainee alleged to have forcibly raped a 15-year old fellow detainee, and then photographing him naked
- Placing a dog chain or strap around a naked detainee's neck and having a female Soldier pose for a picture
- A male MP guard having sex with a female detainee
- Using military working dogs (without muzzles) to intimidate and frighten detainees, and in at least one case biting and severely injuring a detainee
- Taking photographs of dead Iraqi detainees such as firearms, placing prisoners in stress positions for hours at a time, prolonged exposure to extreme heat or cold, and sleep and sensory deprivation.

After receiving the photos from CID, Lieutenant General Ricardo Sanchez, the commander of coalition forces in Iraq, ordered Major General Antonio Taguba on January 19 to conduct a secret internal investigation. Taguba's March 9 report concluded that between October and December, 2003, "numerous incidents of sadistic, blatant, and wanton criminal abuses" were inflicted on prisoners and that the abuse was "systematic and illegal" and "intentionally perpetrated" by MPs.

The photos of abused and tortured prisoners at Abu Ghraib dominated the world media. Furthermore, both the ICRC Report and the Taguba Report had been leaked to the media in May. In the United States, the Senate opened hearings into the matter. Investigations also were implemented by the Pentagon and the Department of Defense (DOD). James Schlesinger, former defense secretary, chaired the DOD panel; its report was issued on August 24. Testifying before the Senate Armed Services Committee, Schlesinger announced that although there had been evidence of "failures of leadership" at Abu Ghraib and beyond, through the chain of command, the responsibility for the serious mistreatment rested primarily with the MPs on duty at the prison. In a press conference the day the report was released, Schlesinger elaborated the DOD panel's findings: "There was sadism on the night shift at Abu Ghraib, sadism that was certainly not authorized. It was kind of [like the popular teen film] Animal House on the night shift." He added that no top military or government officials bore any direct responsibility, and that "the injunction from the top was to ensure 'humane treatment' of detainees." Furthermore, the DOD panel found “no policy that encouraged or justified abuse.”

The soldiers directly involved in the abuse were charged, tried, convicted, and sentenced by military courts-martial for acts that included assault, battery, conspiracy, and maltreatment of detainees. Graner was sentenced to ten years in prison, Staff Sergeant Ivan Frederick received eight years, and Private Lynndie England received three years. Eight other soldiers received lesser punishments, including imprisonment and administrative penalties such as demotion, discharge, or both. Two officers were reprimanded as well. Brigadier General Janis Karpinski, the commander of Abu Ghraib prison and other detention facilities in Iraq, was removed from that post and demoted to colonel. The commander of the military intelligence brigade, Colonel Thomas Pappas, was fined and removed from his command.

IMPACT

The Abu Ghraib scandal, which became the centerpiece in the debate about fighting the global war against terrorism, provoked inquiries into how prisoners are treated during wartime. Confidential memos were leaked to the press as questions began to mount. One memo, a telling U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) memo from August, 2002, and addressed to White House counsel, surfaced in June, 2004. John Yoo of the Office of Legal Counsel (OLC) at the DOJ, who wrote the memo, interpreted the 1994 federal statute that ratified the United Nations Convention Against Torture and applied it in the “context of the conduct of interrogations outside the United States.” Yoo’s legal analysis held that for an act to be torture, the one inflicting the torture must have intended it to cause severe pain and it must cause pain that is equivalent in

2000's

Former Iraqi prisoners of Abu Ghraib were transported from the prison by the U.S. military after their release from detention in January, 2004. Many had been abused and tortured by U.S. military personnel in a scandal that would come to light less than four months after this photograph was taken. (AP/Wide World Photos) intensity to the pain that would accompany “serious physical injury, such as organ failure.”

The Bybee memo, as it came to be called, gave Donald Rumsfeld, the secretary of the DOD, legal latitude to develop “enhanced interrogation techniques.” The new chief of the OLC, Jack Goldsmith, was shocked to see this secret torture memo in October, 2003, and later stated that it was without legal foundation. The DOJ rescinded the Bybee memo on December 30, 2004.

While the DOD’s enhanced interrogation techniques were not created for Abu Ghraib, it appears that at least some of the practices migrated from Guantanamo Bay to Iraq. Major General Geoffrey Miller, commander of facilities at Guantanamo Bay, visited Abu Ghraib in August and September, 2003. Miller reportedly had been assigned to “Gitmo-ize” (Guantanamo Bay is referred to by the military as Gitmo) Abu Ghraib, specifically referring to the harsh interrogation practices at Gitmo that had been approved by Rumsfeld. Some of Miller’s recommendations were adopted by Sanchez for use at Abu Ghraib. Indeed, the Taguba Report concluded that the mistreatment of prisoners by MPs was a consequence of direct orders from military intelligence and other governmental agencies who “actively requested that MP guards set physical and mental conditions for favorable interrogation of witnesses,” a technique Miller used at Guantanamo.

—Kimberlee Candela

FURTHER READING

Danner, Mark. Torture and Truth: America, Abu Ghraib, and the War on Terror. New York: New York Review of Books, 2004. Follows the paper trail, including policy statements and government reports on the mistreatment. Many original government documents are included, as well as the infamous photographs.

Hersh, Seymour. Chain of Command: The Road from 9/11 to Abu Ghraib. New York: Harper-Collins, 2005. Hersh, a Pulitzer Prize-winning investigative journalist, helped break the Abu Ghraib story with a May 9, 2004, article in The New Yorker.

Jaffer, Jameel, and Amrit Singh. Administration of Torture: A Documentary Record from Washington to Abu Ghraib and Beyond. New York: Columbia University Press, 2007. Jaffer and Singh, both attorneys with the American Civil Liberties Union, discuss the thousands of relevant documents, including government e-mails and autopsy reports, which they obtained for this study of the prisoner-abuse scandal.

McKelvey, Tara. Monsterring: Inside America’s Policy of Secret Interrogations and Torture in the Terror War. New York: Carroll & Graf, 2007. A study of the crimes at Abu Ghraib prison. Includes first-hand interviews with MPs who worked at Abu Ghraib and with former Iraqi prisoners.

Mayer, Jane. The Dark Side: The Inside Story of How a War on Terror Turned into a War on American Ideals. New York: Doubleday, 2008. A staff writer for The New Yorker examines the Bush administration’s response to the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and beyond in this meticulously researched, readable account of the American war on terror.

Zimbardo, P. G. The Lucifer Effect: Understanding How Good People Turn Evil. New York: Random House, 2007. Zimbardo revisits his famous 1971 experiment and applies his research to the torture and humiliation at Abu Ghraib prison, challenging society to think about the situational influences that lead to oppression and abuse.

SEE ALSO: July, 1961: Psychologist Stanley Milgram Begins Obedience-to-Authority Experiments; Mar. 13, 1964: Kitty Genovese Dies as Her Cries for Help Are Ignored; Nov. 13, 1969: American Massacre of Vietnamese Civilians at My Lai Is Revealed; Aug. 20, 1971: Abusive Role-Playing Ends Stanford Prison Experiment.

June 2, 2004

U.N. REPORT REVEALS THAT SECRETARY-GENERAL KOFI ANNAN DISMISSED SEXUAL HARASSMENT CHARGES

United Nations staffer Cynthia Brzak claimed that the U.N. high commissioner for refugees, Ruud Lubbers, had sexually harassed her. Despite the finding of an investigative panel in support of her claim, the U.N. secretary-general, Kofi Annan, overruled the panel's disciplinary recommendations and dismissed the charges against Lubbers, head of one of the United Nations' principal humanitarian divisions.

LOCALE: New York, New York

CATEGORIES: Politics; international relations; law and the courts; sex crimes; women's issues

KEY FIGURES

Kofi Annan (b. 1938), Ghanaian secretary-general of the United Nations, 1997-2007

Ruud Lubbers (b. 1939), former prime minister of the Netherlands, 1982-1994, and U.N. high commissioner for refugees

Cynthia Brzak (b. 1952), American U.N. staff member

Stephen M. Schwebel (b. 1929), American jurist and former president of the International Court of Justice, 1997-2000

Robert W. Sweet (b. 1922), U.S. District Court judge

SUMMARY OF EVENT

The early years of the twenty-first century have in many ways been unkind to established institutions, taking their toll on the reputations of private and public bodies alike. International governmental organizations have not been spared such public tarring. In the world of public institutions at the global level, no image has been tarnished more than that of the United Nations. Indeed, the notoriety surrounding Secretary-General Kofi Annan's response in the Ruud Lubbers sexual harassment case would almost certainly have been much less had it not been for the myriad scandals surrounding the United Nations at the time.

These U.N.-involved scandals ranged from disclosures of massive mismanagement and corruption in the institution's food-for-oil program in Iraq (including charges that the senior officer in charge of that program had taken bribes from Saddam Hussein's government), to charges that U.N. peacekeepers and relief workers have used their positions to coerce sex from local citizens in Africa, East Timor, and elsewhere, to allegations that Annan's son had been handsomely rewarded by the Swiss company for which he helped acquire a lucrative U.N. contract. Sandwiched amid these other scandals is Annan's decision to dismiss the sexual harassment charges against Lubbers, the head of the U.N. refugee relief department, a move that instantly acquired scandal status of its own.

The story behind the scandal began when Cynthia Brzak, a high-ranking aide to Lubbers and a U.N. employee for a quarter of a century, accused Lubbers of having grabbed her and rubbed up against her from behind when leaving a 2003 business meeting in Geneva, Switzerland. The charges were referred to the U.N. Office of Internal Oversight (OIOS), which on June 2, 2004, released an in-house document that supported Brzak's charges. Moreover, although Lubbers's position was that Brzak had misinterpreted a friendly gesture, the OIOS report also noted a pattern of similar, past behavior by Lubbers and recommended his official censure. Lubbers had become the United Nations' ninth high commissioner for refugees in January of 2001 and had paid his own salary while working for the United Nations.

Annan consulted American jurist Stephen M. Schwebel, a former head justice of the International Court of Justice in The Hague, the Netherlands, who found that the evidence against Lubbers did not rise to the legal standard necessary for conviction in a court of law. On July 15, Annan, basing his decision on Schwebel's finding, dismissed the charges against Lubbers as insufficiently substantiated by the evidence. Privately, however, Annan wrote a letter to Lubbers stressing his concern over both Brzak's accusation and the pattern of behavior on Lubbers's part noted in the OIOS report.

Had the matter ended there, the scandal would have never become public knowledge and no blight would have been attached to the generally distinguished public service career of Lubbers. In October, however, evidently dissatisfied with Annan's handling of the matter, the OIOS included in the publicly released summary of the work it completed during the prior year its findings in the investigation into the charges against Lubbers and its recommendations on the matter. The media quickly seized on the story as yet another controversy engulfing the United Nations and its secretary-general. Annan's alleged tolerance of sexual harassment at the highest level in one of the premier humanitarian divisions of the United Nations quickly acquired the proportions of a scandal.

IMPACT

The OIOS report's release, and the subsequent firestorm of criticism that the United Nations received over the Lubbers matter, on the whole produced mixed results for the principal figures involved. Lubbers initially tried to retain his position, but only a few months later, on February 20, 2005, he resigned, arguing that the continuing press coverage of the sexual harassment charge against him made it impossible for him to do his job effectively. More scandalous was Annan's letter to the refugee office staff the following day that called the Lubbers affair an "unwanted distraction" and that Lubbers had "not been found guilty of any offence," a claim that was wholly incorrect. Topping off the scandal were Lubbers's own words, deemed "appalling" by the OIOS. In his "farewell" to office staff, Lubbers said he had been "harassed" and "raped and raped and raped" through the investigations.

Insofar as the refugee office was at the time investigating rumors of sexual abuses committed by U.N. peacekeeping forces, including 150 charges of rape, sexual abuse of children, and the solicitation of sexual acts in Congo alone, Lubbers's continuing status as high commissioner for refugees had by this time become not only untenable but also an institutional embarrassment to the United Nations.

Brzak filed a federal lawsuit against the United Nations on May 4, 2006, on the grounds of sexual harassment and alleged discrimination against her for having raised the issue. On the last day of April, 2008, U.S. District Court judge Robert W. Sweet dismissed her suit on the grounds that the United Nations had a long-established immunity from legal action in U.S. courts in general and in the area of employee-related issues in particular, which outweighed Brzak's claims against the organization.

For Annan, the handling of the case remains another stain on his overall, generally commendable record of overseeing the increasingly vast operations of the United Nations around the world during his years as secretary-general. For the organization itself, however, the Lubbers case, combined with the companion controversies that involved the United Nations during the first decade of the twenty-first century, forced the body to undertake much needed reforms in overseeing the conduct of its permanent and contracted personnel in New York and Geneva and throughout its global operations. Thus, a Swiss consulting firm and other outside evaluators were hired to assess the performance of the United Nations' overseas operations.

Likewise, a zero-tolerance policy was adopted on matters of sexual harassment. The policy was implemented most famously in the case of the December, 2005, dismissal of Carina Perelli, the director of the electoral assistance division of the U.N. Election Services Office, despite the praise that the division had won during her seven-year tenure for its work in such trying locations as East Timor and Afghanistan.

—Joseph R. Rudolph, Jr.

FURTHER READING

Fleck, Fiona, and Warren Hoge. "Annan Clears Refugee Chief of Harassment Accusations." The New York Times, July 16, 2004. News article announcing Annan's controversial decision to dismiss the sexual harassment charges against Lubbers.

Koestler-Grack, Rachel A. Kofi Annan. New York: Chelsea House, 2007. Part of the Modern Peacemakers series, this work provides a brief but useful introduction to Annan's diplomatic career.

Meisler, Stanley. Kofi Annan: A Man of Peace in a World of War. New York: John Wiley & Sons, 2008. As the title suggests, the focus is on Annan's accomplishments as a peacemaker, both before and as the U.N. secretary-general. As such it offers a context for evaluating the place of his role in the Lubbers scandal in the context of his broad, generally distinguished career.

Weiss, Thomas G., et al. The United Nations and Changing World Politics. 5th ed. Boulder, Colo.: Westview Press, 2007. A good overview of United Nations operations from which to judge Lubbers's contributions to the organization's work and against which to evaluate his alleged harassment of Brzak.

SEE ALSO: Mar. 3, 1986: Former U.N. Secretary-General Kurt Waldheim's Nazi Past Is Revealed; Oct. 11-13, 1991: Justice Clarence Thomas's Confirmation Hearings Create a Scandal; June 26, 1992: U.S. Navy Secretary Resigns in the Wake of Tailhook Sexual Assault Scandal; Aug. 21, 1994: Sex Scandal Forces Dismissal of NAACP Chief Benjamin Chavis; Jan. 17, 1998: President Bill Clinton Denies Sexual Affair with a White House Intern; Jan. 2, 2003: E-mail Message Prompts Inquiry into Air Force Academy Sexual Assaults; Mar. 2, 2003: U.S. National Security Agency Is Found to Have Spied on U.N. Officials; Oct. 13, 2004: Television Producer Files Sex Harassment Suit Against Bill O'Reilly; Jan. 15, 2005: Iqbal Riza Resigns from the United Nations in Oil-for-Food Scandal.

August 19, 2004

BLOG "OUTS" ANTIGAY CONGRESSMAN EDWARD SCHROCK

Political activist Michael Rogers claimed on his blog that U.S. representative Edward Schrock was gay or bisexual. The blog entry linked to a recording alleged to be of Schrock speaking on a phone line for men seeking other men for gay sex. The outing led Schrock to end his 2004 reelection bid.

LOCALE: Washington, D.C.

CATEGORIES: Publishing and journalism; sex; politics; public morals

KEY FIGURES

Edward Schrock (b. 1941), U.S. representative from Virginia, 2001-2004

Michael Rogers (c. 1964), political activist and blogger

SUMMARY OF EVENT

When Democrat Owen B. Pickett announced he would leave the U.S. Congress at the end of his eighth term, in 2000, voters elected conservative Republican Edward Schrock to replace him. A former U.S. Navy admiral and Vietnam War veteran, Schrock won his Virginia district largely on the military vote. Already a state senator, Schrock's election to the U.S. House of Representatives came as no surprise to political prognosticators, who noted Pickett was a conservative Democrat. Across the nation, several seats vacated by conservative Democrats were won by Republicans.

On August 19, 2004, political activist Michael Rogers claimed on blogActive.com that Schrock was a closeted homosexual or bisexual. Rogers included on his blog a link to voice data to support the accusation. Rogers, who has been committed to outing gay lawmakers who oppose gay and lesbian rights legislation, claimed Schrock had been placing advertisements on an interactive phone line for men seeking other men for gay sex.

Congress members Edward Schrock, right, and Tom DeLay at the White House in January, 2004. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

It took only two weeks from the time Rogers posted the taped message for Schrock to resign. In that time, Rogers’s blog was accessed by countless politicians and others, who treated the findings like news they might encounter in the popular press. The popular press, in turn, had to scramble to keep up with the story, which grew quickly as people added their own perspectives by posting comments to the blog.

Schrock had made his name in the House as a strong opponent of gay and lesbian rights. Specifically, he cosponsored bills that would have banned same-gender marriage and barred lesbians and gays from openly serving in the military. With the failure of those bills, he strongly supported the official U.S. military policy known as Don’t Ask, Don’t Tell, a so-called compromise on the question of gays in the military. Schrock made public comments to the effect that having gays in the military was sexually dangerous, as they were impossible to recognize.

Schrock was named president of the Republican freshman House in 2001 and won a second term in the House in 2002. The Christian Coalition gave Schrock, an active Baptist, high ratings. However, his ascent came to an abrupt halt in 2004, a year marked by landslide Republican victories in Congress.

Rogers said he wanted to stop Schrock’s hypocrisy, arguing that the gay community as a whole has no obligation to protect gays and lesbians who actively oppose gay rights. When the allegations came to light, the Republican Party was supportive of Schrock, making glowing statements about his congressional record and focusing on his status in the House. Initially, it was believed that the allegations would not affect Schrock’s bid for reelection.

However, Schrock, on August 30, rescinded his bid for reelection, stating only that the allegations against him would prevent him from focusing on the real issues in his constituency. Rogers’s accusations were not supported by any material beyond the phone message, and he could not offer further proof that the voice on the call was, in fact, that of Schrock. However, Schrock’s withdrawal from the congressional race confirmed his guilt in the minds of many.

Republicans remained supportive of Schrock, who was married and had a child, and cited their disappointment that he should have to resign because of the mere suggestion of homosexuality. They claimed that his resignation was caused by Rogers’s intent to push a particular political viewpoint. However, Rogers, who said he was sorry to see Schrock resign, had a slightly different slant on the issue. Although still opposed to Schrock’s conservative politics and believing he was a hypocrite, Rogers had believed that by the year 2004, homosexuality should not have been so much of an issue that it could end any politician’s career.

The Republican Party chose Thelma Drake to run for the post vacated by Schrock, and she won the district that year and was reelected to a second term in 2006. By December of 2004, Schrock was back on Capitol Hill, though in a much less celebrated post, working as staff director for the House Government Reform Committee. In this diminished capacity, he was unable to block gay rights legislation and actively promote antigay legislation.

IMPACT

This scandal illustrates several points about American popular culture. Both the Republican Party and Rogers seem to agree that Schrock resigned because of the rumor that he had sought homosexual sex. Rogers argued that the rumor was true, while Schrock focused on how the claim would prevent him from working on the real issues of his election campaign. In either case, Schrock’s resignation demonstrates that homosexuality remains a political nightmare for those accused of being lesbian or gay or of seeking same-gender sex. The nightmare exists in the United States, even though there are several gay and lesbian politicians who are out. Specifically, that Schrock believed he had to resign indicates the negative implications homosexuality has within the Republican Party. Though the party remained outwardly supportive of Schrock, it did so under the flag of supporting an unfairly accused colleague, not of supporting one who was potentially gay or bisexual.

Rogers’s strategy is opposed by some gay and lesbian activists as well. Groups such as the Log Cabin Republicans, whose members are gay and Republican, disagree with outing closeted government officials, whatever their politics. Opponents of outing point out that no gay rights issues have been decided after outing an official, and they suggest that it is more effective to focus on the issues rather than the politicians. In turn, Rogers argues that conservative gays who oppose gay rights are effectively double dipping, enjoying gay-rights successes in their private lives while condemning those rights publicly. Other groups, such as the Human Rights Campaign, argue that outing often deepens the already entrenched views of conservative opponents of gay and lesbian rights.

Rogers had a different point. The entire purpose of his blog has been to out closeted gay politicians who oppose gay rights legislation. He believes they are hiding behind party dogmas to avoid taking responsibility for their own actions. His purpose in outing Schrock was to expose a man whom he believes was a conservative hypocrite and to demonstrate that gays are everywhere, regardless of political viewpoint. He argues that the gay community has a responsibility to expose gay politicians who hide their sexuality and, most important, do so while actively opposing legislation that harms the community.

Scandals such as the Schrock affair show a growing rift in the type of voters sought by the Republican and Democrat parties in the twenty-first century. For many years, Republicans have targeted right wing fundamentalist Christians, who have considered the Republican Party the only conservative option. Democrats have targeted a more left-wing group, selling themselves as the more liberal political party. Gay and lesbian rights have become so public, with issues such as gay marriage and gay military service regularly coming to Congress, that the Republicans and Democrats have taken largely opposing stances on these issues. In general, the Republicans oppose and the Democrats support gay rights. Thus, a stance in favor of gay rights is perceived as politically liberal, and for a group to be politically conservative and still favor gay rights seems contradictory to many, even though there is no reason the two perspectives cannot coexist. This means groups such as the Log Cabin Republicans are relatively rare and often find themselves on the outside when it comes to politics. Some conservative Republican politicians shun Log Cabin endorsements for fear of alienating other voters.

Finally, the scandal illustrates the importance of the World Wide Web and its influence on the media and politics in modern popular culture. Media influence on popular opinion affects politics and, with the addition of blogs, popular opinion is increasingly influencing the media. This cyclical relationship became even more clear with the Schrock scandal.

—Jessie Bishop Powell

FURTHER READING

- Muzzy, Frank. Gay and Lesbian Washington, D.C. Charleston, S.C.: Arcadia Press, 2005. Double focus on the presence of gays and lesbians in the nation's capital and their impact on politics.
- Rauch, Jonathan. Gay Marriage: Why It Is Good for Gays, Good for Straights, and Good for America. New York: Times Books/Henry Holt, 2004. Summarizes the state of gay and lesbian rights at the time of Schrock's resignation. Primarily supports gay and lesbian marriage rights.
- Shear, Michael D., and Chris L. Jenkins. "Va. Legislator Ends Bid for Third Term." The Washington Post, August 31, 2004. Contemporary account of Schrock's decision not to seek reelection, including his denial of guilt and the political community's support of his legislative efforts. This mainstream media report was published twelve days after Rogers's blog outing of Schrock.

SEE ALSO: Oct. 7, 1964: President Lyndon B. Johnson's Aide Is Arrested in Gay-Sex Sting; 1970: Study of Anonymous Gay Sex Leads to Ethics Scandal; Oct. 25, 1974: Evangelist Billy James Hargis Resigns College Presidency During Gay-Sex Scandal; Jan., 1977: Singer Anita Bryant Campaigns Against Lesbian and Gay Rights; Aug. 4, 1978: British Politician Jeremy Thorpe Is Charged with Attempted Murder; Sept. 3, 1980: Congressman Bauman Is Arrested for Liaison with Teenage Boy; Sept. 19, 2000: Ex-gay Leader John Paulk Is Photographed Leaving a Gay Bar; Sept. 29, 2006: Congressman Mark Foley Resigns in Sex Scandal Involving a Teenage Page; Nov. 2, 2006: Male Escort Reveals Sexual Liaisons with Evangelist Ted Haggard; July 11, 2007: Florida Politician Is Arrested for Soliciting an Undercover Male Police Officer.

September 8, 2004

60 MINUTES II REPORTS ON GEORGE W. BUSH'S EVASION OF WARTIME DUTY

CBS News correspondent Dan Rather presented documents in a 2004 report on 60 Minutes II that questioned U.S. president George W. Bush's Air National Guard service during the 1970's. The Killian documents, as they came to be called, accused Bush of having received favors to make his military record look better than it was. The documents were widely considered fakes, permanently damaging the reputations of both Rather and CBS.

ALSO KNOWN AS: Killian documents scandal; Memogate; Rathergate

LOCALE: New York, New York

CATEGORIES: Radio and television; communications and media; publishing and journalism; politics; military

KEY FIGURES

- Dan Rather (b. 1931), broadcast journalist and CBS Evening News anchor
- George W. Bush (b. 1946), president of the United States, 2001-2009
- Mary Mapes (fl. late twentieth century), 60 Minutes II and CBS Evening News producer
- Bill Burkett (fl. early twenty-first century), retired U.S. Army National Guard lieutenant colonel, who was the source for the Killian documents

SUMMARY OF EVENT

On September 8, 2004, CBS television broadcast a controversial story that was highly critical of U.S. president George W. Bush's military record with the U.S. Army Air National Guard. Almost immediately following the broadcast, reported by long-time news anchor and journalist Dan Rather, competing media sources began to question the validity of the evidence presented in the story and to criticize CBS for broadcasting the report. The Killian documents, as they came to be called, were widely considered to have been fabricated. Following the outpouring of criticism, CBS fired Mary Mapes, the producer of the segment, as well as several others who were involved in the broadcast. Rather resigned from the CBS news desk less than one year later.

At the time of the scandal, Rather was one of the most recognizable journalists of his time. He rose to become the head anchor on CBS Evening News in 1981 and achieved success as a contributing reporter with 60 Minutes. He was at the top of the journalism world already during the 1960's as a hard-hitting correspondent during the Vietnam War and for his unswerving interview with President Richard Nixon during the early 1970's. He covered some of the most significant stories in the United States throughout the 1980's and 1990's, and in 2004, he broke a story that would turn out to be his most controversial yet.

On September 4, Rather decided to report a story on Bush's military record. The report presented several documents that made Bush's time in the armed services seem less than honorable. The memos, believed to be drawn up while Bush was in the National Guard during the early 1970's, documented incidences where Bush blatantly disobeyed orders by failing to report for scheduled physical examinations—leading to the revocation of his flight status—and by asking to be excused from certain activities, such as military drills. The memos also insinuated that the Bush family's political power was used to ensure that the future president's record was devoid of this negative information. In essence, the Killian documents, if real, would have proven that Bush's military record had been made to appear much better than it actually was.

Because the story was aired so close to election time, the broadcast sparked an immediate media frenzy. Many quickly stepped forward to question the validity of the documents themselves as well as the integrity and political bias of CBS and Rather. Initially, CBS stuck by the report, stating that the documents used had been well researched, but as investigations into the origin of the documents continued, it seemed more and more that the military memos were inaccurate, if not fraudulent.

As inquiries grew more tense, 60 Minutes II segment producer Mapes came forward to defend the origin of the story's material. Mapes, an award winning journalist and long-time CBS producer, acquired the memos in question from Bill Burkett, a retired National Guard lieutenant colonel. Burkett claimed he had retrieved the memos from the personal files of the deceased lieutenant colonel Jerry B. Killian, who was President Bush's commander during his time in the National Guard. In the weeks following the story, Mapes and CBS maintained that Burkett was an accurate source and that the information he acquired regarding the president was truly from Killian's personal files.

However, as critical analysis intensified, independent researchers began to repudiate the origin of the memos and the time in which they were created. Before Rather's broadcast on September 8, Mapes and her associates had interviewed several people, in addition to Burkett, to ensure that the documents were legitimate, but this fact ultimately did not help CBS in defending its story, because the documents they had in their possession were only copies of the supposed originals. Unfortunately, Burkett told Mapes that he had burned the original Killian documents after he sent the copies to CBS headquarters, an action that fueled the argument that the documents were fraudulent.

Two weeks after the broadcast, Rather and CBS were forced to retract the story; the evidence in support of the Killian documents was simply not present. However, evidence was also lacking that the documents were faulty. Independent investigators found that the documents had inconsistencies in letterhead, signature, and date of production. Some investigators did conclude, however, that Killian's signature seemed to match the signature on the memos. Ultimately, the investigators could not prove or disprove that the documents were fraudulent because they were copies.

What led investigators and other media sources to discredit the story were the inconsistencies in Burkett's account of how he obtained the documents. Burkett changed his story several times. Initially, he said he received the documents through a warrant officer who had access to Killian's files, but he later claimed to have collected them by other means. In the end, the documents could not be authenticated.

IMPACT

CBS, Mapes, and Rather apologized publicly for reporting the story and said that they recognize their mistakes in not researching the matter fully before its broadcast. However, the damage to CBS's journalistic reputation had already been done. In response to the accusations by outside forces that CBS was operating under a liberal bias and had been trying to sabotage the coming elections, the network fired several employees associated with the production of the story. Less than one year later, Rather resigned from his news anchor position after nearly forty years in journalism.

CBS and Rather have had a difficult time recovering from the harm that was done to their reputations. Rather filed a lawsuit against CBS in 2007, alleging that the network laid the sole blame for the story on him, which permanently damaged his career. However, the greatest damage seems to have been done to the field of journalism itself.

Further investigations have looked into the Killian documents scandal, but none have proved that the documents are real. The controversy has raised many questions about the true motivation behind news reporting in the United States. The debate continues over the scandal, and many questions remain: Was the story politically biased against Bush, and was it aired to harm his campaign? Did CBS make a genuine mistake by airing the report? In any case, investigative journalism in the United States was left with a permanent scar.

—Jennifer L. Titanski

FURTHER READING

Hindman, Elizabeth Blanks. "Black Eye: The Ethics of CBS News and the National Guard Documents." Journal of Mass Media Ethics 23, no. 2 (April, 2008): 90-109. A scholarly case study of the response of mainstream media to the 60 Minutes II broadcast of the Rather story and the resulting Killian documents scandal, with a critical focus on the ethical principles applied by these various media organizations.

Mapes, Mary. Truth and Duty: The Press, the President, and the Privilege of Power. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2005. Mapes tells her side of the controversial story on the Killian documents and scandal and argues that true journalism is coming to an end.

Rieder, Rem. "Breaking All the Rules: CBS' Documents Fiasco Is a Textbook Case of How Not to Do Journalism." American Journalism Review 27, no. 1 (February-March, 2005). A concise look at the effects of the Killian documents scandal on all those involved in the controversy.

Weisman, Alan. Lone Star: The Extraordinary Life and Times of Dan Rather. Hoboken, N.J.: John Wiley & Sons, 2006. Drawing on interviews from some of Dan Rather's biggest fans and most vocal critics, Alan Weisman's book explores the controversial image that Rather developed over his forty-plus years in news broadcasting.

SEE ALSO: June 13, 1971: New York Times Publishes the Pentagon Papers; July 8-22, 1972: Jane Fonda's Visit to North Vietnam Outrages Many Americans; Nov. 13, 1986-May 4, 1989: Iran-Contra Weapons Scandal Taints Reagan's Administration; Apr. 5, 1991: George W. Bush Is Investigated for Insider Trading.

October 13, 2004

TELEVISION PRODUCER FILES SEX HARASSMENT SUIT AGAINST BILL O'REILLY

Bill O'Reilly, a conservative political commentator best known for his Fox News television show The O'Reilly Factor, was sued by his show's producer, Andrea Mackris, for sexual harassment. O'Reilly was first to sue Mackris, however, claiming in his preemptive suit filed the same day that Mackris and her attorney were extorting him. The matter was settled out of court for an undisclosed amount of money. In the long term, the suits had little impact on O'Reilly's or Mackris's careers in broadcasting.

LOCALE: New York, New York

CATEGORIES: Law and the courts; radio and television; communications and media; women's issues

KEY FIGURES

Bill O'Reilly (b. 1949), host of The O'Reilly Factor and conservative political commentator

Andrea Mackris (b. 1971), producer of The O'Reilly Factor

Benedict Morelli (b. 1950), attorney for Andrea Mackris

SUMMARY OF EVENT

On October 13, 2004, Fox News talk-show host Bill O'Reilly was sued by his show's former producer, Andrea Mackris, for sexual harassment. Mackris claimed she had audiotapes of sexually provocative phone calls made to her by O'Reilly. She also claimed that O'Reilly sexually harassed her repeatedly by talking about his own sex life and fantasies and by asking her questions about her sex life, even though she expressed no interest in continuing the conversations. O'Reilly had sued Mackris first earlier on the same day, claiming she and her attorney, Benedict Morelli, a leading employment discrimination lawyer, were trying to extort him.

O'Reilly decided to file suit against Mackris and Morelli after he received a letter from Morelli dated September 29, indicating that his law firm was representing "a young woman employee of Fox" who had "been the victim of constant and relentless" sexual harassment "by one of Fox's most prominent on-air personalities." The letter did not name names, however.

Unfortunately for O'Reilly, the details of the suit against him became readily accessible to the public on the Web. O'Reilly never denied the accusations against him, leading Mackris to amend her lawsuit on October 19. The original lawsuit against O'Reilly, Fox News Channel, News Corporation, Twentieth Century Fox Film Corporation, and Westwood One sought $60 million.

Considered by many to be one of the top-rated cable news hosts, O'Reilly graduated college with a bachelor's degree in history and received a master's degree in broadcast journalism in 1975. He began his career as a high school teacher and then became a news anchor. By 1980, he was an anchor for his own program with WCBS. In 1986, he joined ABC News, and later that year he began working on the entertainment news show Inside Edition. He obtained a second master's degree that year as well and became the host of his own show, O'Reilly Report. In 1996, the show was renamed The O'Reilly Factor.

The O'Reilly Factor, like his other ventures, has been very successful with millions of viewers. On the show, O'Reilly examines highly controversial issues with a conservative bent, even though he considers himself nonpartisan and is registered as an independent. He has described himself as a "traditionalist" commentator. He has never been afraid to state his opinion, regardless of others' perceptions of him. He also has written a newspaper column and published a number of books, including The O'Reilly Factor: The Good, the Bad, and the Completely Ridiculous in American Life (2000), The No Spin Zone (2003), The O'Reilly Factor for

Andrea Mackris, left, with her attorney, Benedict Morelli, announce their sexual harassment lawsuit against television commentator Bill O'Reilly at a news conference in New York City on October 13, 2004. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Kids: A Survival Guide for America's Families (2004), Culture Warrior (2006), and Kids Are Americans Too (2007). He also has done some acting.

Whether the sexual harassment allegations made by Mackris are true or not, the intimate details of her complaint, including eighty-five allegations against O'Reilly, have been made public through the Web. Some of those allegations include claims that he masturbated while on the phone with Mackris, and how she was sickened by this fact. In addition, she claims he gave detailed descriptions of what he would do to her sexually if he was away with her, got her drunk, or showered with her. However, no actual tapes were ever produced in the case as evidence, and Morelli could not confirm their existence.

Initially, the parties to the lawsuits attempted to settle informally, but O'Reilly then attempted to have Mackris fired. On October 28, the case was settled out of court. Each party dropped the charges against the other, but the terms of the agreement were never made public. Mackris's attorney did state, however, that the original offer was too low to be accepted. Experts believe the settlement was probably around $10 million.

IMPACT

Ratings for The O'Reilly Factor jumped after Mackris's lawsuit was filed. Critics argue that the accusations may have cost O'Reilly some of his reputation as a moralist, but viewers have not wavered in their respect for his opinion. In fact, in one of the few discussions he had with his viewers regarding the accusations, he thanked them for their loyalty and support.

Even though O'Reilly claimed that there was no wrongdoing on his part—he never apologized to his viewers, to Mackris, or to his employer—he was publicly humiliated and did cancel some scheduled interviews. Before the lawsuits, O'Reilly received many accolades, including Emmy Awards, for his investigative reporting, and he continued to do so afterward.

Impacting the scandal was the ease with which the public could access the complaint against O'Reilly on the Web, leading to further embarrassment for the commentator. In one unfortunate detail from the lawsuit, Mackris claimed that O'Reilly described how he would massage her with a loofah if they were to shower together. However, O'Reilly did not use the term “loofah”; instead he referred to using a “falafel thing” to massage her. As a consequence, the scandal has been comedically referred to as the falafel scandal by his critics.

It is also difficult to ignore the irony of a sexual harassment lawsuit filed against O'Reilly, the conservative moralist who has written a children's book on sex in popular culture, among other conservative topics. Some consider him a hypocrite. Mackris, too, has been criticized for failing to complain to her employer, Fox, at the time the harassment occurred and for returning to work with O'Reilly after the alleged harassment took place.

—Gina Robertiello

FURTHER READING

Chowthi, Roy. Bill O'Reilly Versus the Truth: Confronting the Propaganda of Bill O'Reilly and the Scam of the “No-Spin” Zone. New York: iUniverse, 2007. Author argues that O'Reilly, who claims he is nonpartisan, is truly a conservative Republican who discredits and despises Democrats and liberals.

Hart, Peter. The Oh Really? Factor: Unspinning

Sex Harassment Suit Filed Against Bill O'Reilly

Fox News Channel's Bill O'Reilly. New York: Seven Stories Press, 2003. Argues that O'Reilly has misguided opinions and that he contradicts himself. Published in cooperation with the media watchdog group Fairness and Accuracy in Reporting.

Marshall, Anna-Maria. Confronting Sexual Harassment: The Law and Politics of Everyday Life. Burlington, Vt.: Ashgate, 2005. Examines law, social change, and the politics of workers' everyday lives, which often includes sexual harassment. Also provides a framework for studying issues of everyday life, especially in the workplace.

O'Reilly, Bill. The No Spin Zone. New York: Broadway Books, 2003. Discussion of current topics and getting to the truth in the context of media “spin” on those topics. Offers advice and opinion.

_____. The O'Reilly Factor: The Good, the Bad, and the Completely Ridiculous in American Life. New York: Broadway Books, 2000. A best-selling book, offering O'Reilly's opinion about what is right and wrong in the United States. O'Reilly gives his assumptions and views on politics, culture, and society in general.

SEE ALSO: Oct. 11-13, 1991: Justice Clarence Thomas's Confirmation Hearings Create a Scandal; June 26, 1992: U.S. Navy Secretary Resigns in the Wake of Tailhook Sexual Assault Scandal; Aug. 21, 1994: Sex Scandal Forces Dismissal of NAACP Chief Benjamin Chavis; Jan. 17, 1998: President Bill Clinton Denies Sexual Affair with a White House Intern; Oct. 2, 2003: Newspaper Claims That Arnold Schwarzenegger Groped Women; June 2, 2004: U.N. Report Reveals That Secretary-General Kofi Annan Dismissed Sexual Harassment Charges; Apr. 11, 2007: Shock Jock Don Imus Loses His Radio Show over Sexist and Racist Remarks.

October 14, 2004INSURANCE BROKERAGE MARSH & MCLENNAN IS CHARGED WITH FRAUD

Marsh & McLennan, an international insurance brokerage and professional services company, was charged with fraud in 2004 by Eliot L. Spitzer, the attorney general of New York. Confronted by pages of testimony affirming its illegal actions, the company settled out of court, paying a fine of $850 million.

LOCALE: New YorkCATEGORIES: Law and the courts; business; corruption; governmentKEY FIGURES

Eliot L. Spitzer (b. 1959), New York State attorney general, 1999-2006

David D. Brown IV (b. 1959), head of the New York State attorney general's Investment Protection Bureau

Jeffrey W. Greenberg (b. 1951), chief executive officer of Marsh & McLennan, 1999-2004

Michael G. Cherkasky (b. 1950), chief executive officer of Marsh & McLennan, 2004-2008

William L. Rosoff (b. 1946), general counsel of Marsh & McLennan

SUMMARY OF EVENT

As attorney general for New York State since 1999, Eliot Spitzer had acquired the nickname Caped Crusader because of his relentless pursuit of white-collar crime. In 2004, his attention turned to insurance giant Marsh & McLennan (MMC) after learning that the company had been condoning inflated bids and taking commissions for steering clients toward specific companies. In other words, it had been price-fixing. Following six months of investigation, Spitzer filed a civil complaint against the company. Media attention and a resultant drop in the price of the company's stock led MMC to fire its chief executive officer. The company also announced it would no longer accept commissions and paid $850 million into a fund to compensate policyholders.

Spitzer's action against MMC was yet another target for the attorney general, who had been waging war against corporate giants that heretofore had been protected by the concept "that's how business is done." Spitzer challenged out-of-state power plants whose emissions were polluting the skies over New York; he went after several big Wall Street investment firms, including Merrill Lynch. His actions against former New York Stock Exchange chairman Dick Grasso and other investigations into hedge funds and after-closing trading established him as a force working for consumer rights and made his name known nationally. In 2002, Time magazine named him its Crusader of the Year.

As the son of wealthy real-estate developer Bernard Spitzer and Anne Goldhaber Spitzer, a literature professor, Eliot was brought up in a life of privilege. He graduated from Princeton in 1981 and Harvard Law in 1984; he married Silda Wall, a fellow law-school student, in 1987. His parents instilled a strong sense of social responsibility and, following some years practicing corporate law, Spitzer ran for attorney general of New York. Following a failed attempt in 1994, he tried again in 1998 and defeated his opponent by a narrow margin.

Spitzer's crusade against MMC began with an anonymous tip. On March 30, 2004, David D. Brown, IV, in charge of the attorney general's Investment Protection Bureau, opened an envelope containing a two-page, single-spaced typed letter addressed to New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer and signed "Concerned." The letter stated that MMC, the world's largest insurance broker, had taken two payments: first, it received commissions from its customers, those businesses it represented seeking insurance; second, it took undisclosed payments from the insurance companies that wrote the policies. Brown thought the second payment looked like a kickback and faxed the letter to Spitzer. To ascertain the truth of the allegations, Spitzer asked Brown to subpoena the company's representatives. The subpoena was sent out three days later, and within a week William L. Rosoff, general counsel for MMC, was in the attorney general's office. Rosoff downplayed the situation and stated that although the company did take a commission, there was no harm since the customers were still getting the best deal. Spitzer was not convinced, and in April, his team began interviewing other insurance brokers and insurance companies and subpoenaed their e-mails.

Spitzer's office hired law students to go through the boxes of e-mails, and by early summer the e-mails suggested the brokers were steering business to particular insurers, not to aid the client but to earn bonuses negotiated by the insurers. On September 9, Craig Winters, a second-year law student, found an e-mail from an MMC executive with specific details concerning a faked bid for the Greenville County, South Carolina, school district: The insurer, California Association of Non-Profits, was asked to bid deliberately high to guarantee that another company, Zurich, would get the bid. The false quotes were a pretext that the bid process had been competitive.

In the course of Spitzer's investigation, two executives from American International Group (AIG), an insurance carrier, testified how the fraud worked; they testified in exchange for a lighter sentence. When a given policy was up for renewal, MMC took the following steps to assure AIG would get the business: First, MMC provided AIG with a target premium and the policy terms for the quote. If AIG agreed to the quote, it got to keep the business, regardless of whether it could have quoted a lower premium. Second, MMC let other carriers know what the winning quote was and asked them to submit backup quotes, or B quotes, that were higher, thus eliminating them from contention for the business.

With evidence of bid-rigging by MMC, in business since 1902, Spitzer and his lawyers met with the firm's lawyers on October 12. Rosoff denied any wrongdoing and failed to understand Spitzer's investigation. Rosoff went on to state that Spitzer did not understand how things worked in the insurance business.

Two days later, on October 14, Spitzer held a press conference. He announced that he had filed a civil complaint in the New York State Supreme Court against MMC, AIG, and other brokers for security fraud and bid-rigging. In addition, Spitzer cited the commissions, called contingent commissions or market service agreements, paid to MMC for steering volume business toward a specific insurer. In 2003, the contingent commissions amounted to $800 million, the equivalent of more than one-half of the company's $1.5 billion yearly income. Spitzer's office had prepared a thirty-one-page complaint and almost one hundred pages of exhibits, and he warned he would be treating the company as a criminal enterprise unless MMC's top leadership stepped down. Initially, MMC planned to fight, but, following the public reaction to Spitzer's charges, saw its stock lose 48 percent of its value in four trading days. After eleven days, MMC chief executive officer Jeffrey W. Greenberg stepped down. The next day the company announced it would stop accepting commissions from insurers.

New York State attorney general Eliot Spitzer displays a copy of e-mails from the insurance brokerage firm Marsh & McLennan during a news conference in New York on October 14, 2004. Spitzer announced that he was suing the firm because of widespread corruption and fraud. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Michael G. Cherkasky, whom Spitzer had once worked for, was installed as MMC's chief executive officer on October 25. Spitzer followed by dropping all criminal charges against the company. On January 31, 2005, MMC agreed to pay $850 million to settle the civil suit.

IMPACT

Following Spitzer's charges against MMC, the company discontinued its policy of charging commissions and fired a number of executives. Eight former MMC executives were charged with felonies for bid-rigging and price-fixing. Other companies that were also indicted by Spitzer scrambled to straighten out their business practices. Spitzer's investigation prompted similar actions by state insurance regulators and attorneys general (the insurance industry is not federally regulated). A review of business practices in the insurance industry was extended to the United Kingdom and other countries in Europe, broadening the investigation by Spitzer and his team.

In addition to inspiring a more ethical way of doing business in the insurance agency, the action against MMC confirmed the general public's view of Spitzer as their hero, fighting for the little guy against the corporate giants. His popularity led to his decision to run for governor of New York in 2006, and he won in a landslide. His first year as governor was filled with conflict and controversy, however, and in 2008, after for so long being the voice of morals and ethics in business, Spitzer was implicated in a Federal Bureau of Investigation prostitution sting. He resigned as governor on March 12.

—Marcia B. Dinneen

FURTHER READING

Coolidge, Carrie, and Neil Weinberg. "Pulling the Plug on Marsh." Forbes, November 15, 2004. Detailed coverage of Spitzer's lawsuit against Marsh & McLennan and the suit's impact on the insurance industry.

Elkind, Peter, and Joan Levinstein. "Spitzer's Crusade." Fortune, November 15, 2004. Focuses on Spitzer's legal work and how he carries out his campaigns against those businesses conducting unethical practices.

Fishman, Steve. "Inside Eliot's Army." New York, January 10, 2005. A step-by-step account of Spitzer's investigation of Marsh & McLennan.

MacDonald, Scott B., and Jane E. Hughes. Separating Fools from Their Money: A History of American Financial Scandals. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 2007. Detailed history of American financial scandals and their main players, including Eliot Spitzer, whose work is the focus of an entire chapter.

Masters, Brooke A. Spoiling for a Fight: The Rise of Eliot Spitzer. New York: Times Books, 2006. Discusses Spitzer's biggest career successes, focusing on his efforts to crack down on financial fraud.

Vickers, Marcia. "The Secret World of Marsh Mac." BusinessWeek, November 1, 2004. This cover story examines Spitzer's legal work against Marsh & McLennan and how the company's management and its attitude contributed to its problems.

SEE ALSO: Nov. 28, 1967: Investor Louis Wolfson Is Convicted of Selling Stock Illegally; May 2, 1984: E. F. Hutton Executives Plead Guilty to Fraud; Dec. 2, 2001: Enron Bankruptcy Reveals Massive Financial Fraud; June 25, 2002: Internal Corruption Forces Adelphia Communications to Declare Bankruptcy; Sept. 3, 2003: Mutual Fund Companies Are Implicated in Shady Trading Practices; Sept. 12, 2005: Westar Energy Executives Are Found Guilty of Looting Their Company; Early 2007: Subprime Mortgage Industry Begins to Collapse; Mar. 12, 2008: New York Governor Eliot Spitzer Resigns in Prostitution Scandal.

January 15, 2005

IQBAL RIZA RESIGNS FROM THE UNITED NATIONS IN OIL-FOR-FOOD SCANDAL

Iqbal Riza, chief of staff to U.N. secretary-general Kofi Annan, resigned his post after U.N. officials were investigated for suspected corruption, mismanagement, and conflict of interest in administering the U.N. Oil-for-Food Programme to help the people of Iraq. Riza had destroyed potentially relevant—and self-incriminating—documents during the investigation.

LOCALE: New York, New York

CATEGORIES: Corruption; international relations

KEY FIGURES

Iqbal Riza (b. 1934), Pakistani chief of staff to the U.N. secretary-general, 1997-2005

Kofi Annan (b. 1938), secretary-general of the United Nations, 1997-2007

Saddam Hussein (1937-2006), Iraqi dictator, 1979-2003

Paul Volcker (b. 1927), chairman of independent inquiry into the Oil-for-Food Programme

SUMMARY OF EVENT

The United Nations launched its Oil-for-Food Programme (OFFP) in 1995 to help the people of Iraq with food, medicine, and other basic necessities of life. As the program continued, questions began to arise about whether it was being managed properly. Allegations of corruption, mismanagement, and even bribery were made against U.N. officials administering the program. In April, 2004, the U.N. launched an independent investigation, and while the United Nations promised full cooperation, certain events led investigators to believe that the organization perhaps had a great deal to hide.

Over several months, Iqbal Riza, the chief of staff to U.N. secretary-general Kofi Annan, ordered the destruction of documents that could have contained information relevant to the investigation. Riza ultimately resigned from his position, which only raised further suspicion about the destroyed documents and the United Nations as a whole.

The United Nations often acts as a peacekeeping force and attempts to use diplomacy and economics to solve problems in the international community. After Iraq invaded Kuwait in 1990, the United Nations placed economic sanctions on Iraq, which prevented the country from selling its oil on the global market. The sanctions were designed to ensure that the Iraqi government did not use its oil revenues for the development of weapons or to pursue military action against its neighbors. However, after the sanctions were in place for a time, U.N. investigators found that years of war, subsequent debt, and bad economic decisions made by the Iraqi government were leaving thousands of its citizens in need of basic amenities, such as food and medical supplies. In 1991, with the support of large nations such as the United States, the United Nations proposed a program that would allow the sale of oil on the global market in exchange for food and necessary supplies to the Iraqi dictator, President Saddam Hussein.

The program proposal indicated that the United Nations would monitor the oil revenues to ensure that all the profits were used either to get humanitarian goods to the Iraqi people or to pay war reparations that Iraq owed to Kuwait. Initially, the Iraqi government refused the proposal. Hussein and others believed the agreement took away too much sovereignty. Several proposals followed, which were all turned down by Hussein. Then, on April 14, 1995, the United Nations Security Council, at the urging of Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali, passed a resolution to create the OFFP, a program that increased the monetary value that was outlined in previously offered programs. Hussein agreed to the program, and Iraq began to export its oil again in late 1996.

The program ran for the next few years and funneled, according to U.N. officials but doubted by many others, billions of dollars in oil sales to the Iraqi people. It also paid Iraq's debts. Annan, U.N. secretary-general since 1997, was forced to suspend the United Nations' operation of the program on November 21, 2003, several months after the United States had invaded Iraq. The program was transferred to the Coalition Provisional Authority. Although the program ran for nearly a decade, it underwent a great deal of criticism from the United States and other countries, who suspected that the program's funds were not being used to alleviate the suffering of the Iraqi people but instead were taken by Iraqi leadership and U.N. officials. Some critics even cast suspicion on Annan, as they questioned what benefits he may have reaped from the program.

On April 21, 2004, Annan responded to these criticisms by launching an investigation into the management of the OFFP. Riza asked the former Federal Reserve chairman Paul Volcker to lead the inquiry into whether or not the program was as corrupt as some feared. Annan and Riza swore to cooperate in full with the investigation.

A Pakistani by nationality, Riza was born in India in 1934, before Pakistan was created. He began his work with the United Nations during the 1970's and had many important assignments, including work with U.N. peacekeeping efforts to stop the Rwandan genocides. He was appointed Annan's chief of staff in 1997. Riza was never directly involved in the management of the OFFP, but he had been criticized earlier for his involvement in Rwanda and in a case of nepotism involving his son, who received a job appointment with the United Nations.

Although the suspected corruption between the United Nations and Iraqi government was scandalous in itself, the alleged corruption involving Riza and the OFFP did not come to light until after the program was terminated. On April 24, soon after empaneling the investigative committee, Riza instructed other U.N. departments to hand over all relevant documentation to the panel. However, Riza would soon order the shredding of years of documentation from his own offices (specifically, the years 1997-1999, when the OFFP was in full swing) over the course of several months.

Riza was the center of suspicion when investigators discovered that these crucial documents had been destroyed. Annan and other U.N. officials were suspect as well. The destruction of the documents led investigators to fear that Riza was hiding incriminating information, but Riza insisted that the destroyed documents were copies of materials that the commission had already seen and that his office assistant had requested that these materials be destroyed simply to make more room in the office. Investigators did not believe Riza, and he was reprimanded.

The Volcker investigation, because it was an informal body, had no legal recourse against any U.N. official, including Riza, for shredding the documents or for mismanagement of the program. On January 15, 2005, Riza stepped down as chief of staff after losing the confidence of his colleagues. However, Annan stood by Riza, even after his resignation, stating that he knew Riza had made a mistake but that he did not believe Riza deliberately interfered with the investigation. The Volcker investigation issued its final report on September 7.

IMPACT

Few doubt that the OFFP was started with the best of intentions: That is, delivering humanitarian aid to the suffering Iraqi citizens. However, Riza's order to destroy potentially critical program documents forever harmed the reputation of the program. The United Nations, too, lost some of the public's confidence. Many began to doubt that the agency could continue in its role as an effective peacekeeping and global governing body without the potential for corruption or scandal, or without independent oversight.

—Jennifer L. Titanski

FURTHER READING

Hsieh, Chang-Tai. Did Iraq Cheat the United Nations? Underpricing, Bribes, and the Oil for Food Program. Cambridge, Mass.: National Bureau of Economic Research, 2005. A statistical analysis of the OFFP that uses straight facts to explain how Iraqi leadership manipulated the United Nations' plans for the program.

Meyer, Jeffrey. Good Intentions Corrupted: The Oil for Food Scandal and the Threat to the U.N. New York: PublicAffairs, 2006. A detailed and critical look at the OFFP. Discusses how the program was supposed to help the Iraqi people, how it was corrupted by financial mismanagement and incompetence, and how its virtual demise harmed the United Nations itself.

Traub, James. The Best Intentions: Kofi Annan and the U.N. in the Era of American World Power. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2006. Examines U.N. policies and programs, specifically the OFFP, instituted during Kofi Annan's first term as secretary-general. Details the U.S. response to these policies and programs.

Weiss, Thomas G., et al. The United Nations and Changing World Politics. 5th ed. Boulder, Colo.: Westview Press, 2007. A good overview of United Nations operations in the context of global politics and rapid changes in peacekeeping and humanitarian work around the world.

SEE ALSO: Mar. 3, 1986: Former U.N. Secretary-General Kurt Waldheim's Nazi Past Is Revealed; Mar. 2, 2003: U.S. National Security Agency Is Found to Have Spied on U.N. Officials; June 2, 2004: U.N. Report Reveals That Secretary-General Kofi Annan Dismissed Sexual Harassment Charges.

January 27, 2005

GERMAN SOCCER REFEREE ADMITS TO FIXING GAMES FOR MONEY

German soccer referee Robert Hoyzer admitted to fixing games by making unnecessary or questionable calls, affecting the outcome of many matches. He also admitted to fixing games during the prestigious German Cup. However, he cooperated with police, leading to the arrests of other referees as well as players. The scandal led German soccer officials to change how referees are promoted and led to heightened monitoring of gambling within the sport.

ALSO KNOWN AS: Bundesliga scandal of 2005

LOCALE: Germany

CATEGORIES: Corruption; gambling; organized crime and racketeering; sports

KEY FIGURES

Robert Hoyzer (b. 1979), German soccer referee

Ante Sapina (b. 1976), Croatian sports gambler

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Soccer is a beloved sport in Germany and a source of great national pride, passionately followed by millions of fans. It is the nation's only major professional sport and is played by almost all school children. Indeed, soccer is the world's most popular sport, so popular that the Germans were able to use their love for the sport to win the good graces of world opinion after the savagery of World War II.

Organized soccer in Germany dates back to 1900 with the creation of the German soccer federation, the Deutscher Fussball-Bund, or DFB. The German professional soccer league, called the Bundesliga and distinguished from the federation, was established under the authority of the DFB in 1962 as a sixteen-team West German professional league. It was the hope of organizers that the Bundesliga would enhance Germany's professional competitiveness, especially in forming World Cup teams. The league more than succeeded in that goal and was credited with helping form a West German team that became the runner-up in the 1966 World Cup.

The professionalization of German soccer also attracted an influx of money. In 1971, several players were caught in a bribery scandal. The affair, known as the Bundesliga scandal of 1971, was considered a national disgrace, which Germany hoped would never be repeated. Since 1974, the Bundesliga has been ranked into a first and second division comprising professional teams from different German cities. The soccer clubs compete against each other in the annual German Cup tournament.

The apex of international soccer is the World Cup tournament sponsored by the Fédération Internationale de Football Association (FIFA), a tournament of national soccer teams from around the globe. The FIFA World Cup is held in a different host country every four years. In 2004, Germans were looking forward to hosting the 2006 World Cup, but that excitement was complicated by an unexpected and scandalous turn of events.

Soccer referee Robert Hoyzer was questioned about his impartiality in refereeing a game in the first round of the 2004 German Cup. In the game between Paderborn and Hamburger SV on August 21, Hoyzer appeared to be favoring Paderborn with his calls. With Hamburg leading 2-0, he called several questionable penalties against Hamburg. Two calls resulted in goals for Paderborn and one expelled a Hamburg player for "insulting" behavior. Paderborn came back to win the game 4-2 and Hamburg was eliminated from the German Cup.

Four other German referees met with the DFB to discuss Hoyzer's calls during the August 21 game. Around the same time, a state-run betting company had detected unusual betting patterns in games Hoyzer officiated. One Berlin gambler had won big on an underdog team. The DFB president announced the finding of evidence that Hoyzer had rigged games, leading German prosecutors to launch their own investigation. They found that Hoyzer had fixed twenty-three soccer games from April to December, 2004.

Hoyzer's youth was filled with soccer. His father was a respected referee in the German soccer leagues, and the young Hoyzer had a brief career as a player. When that ended he became a referee for the DFB in 2001. Handsome, confident, and well-dressed, he also was a popular official. Over the next few years, he rose steadily in the ranks of German referees. By 2004, he had advanced to refereeing in the second division of the Bundesliga.

Hoyzer at first denied the allegations made against him by the DFB. He told the Bild newspaper that he had never bet on a game he refereed and that he was hurt that his refereeing colleagues could think him capable of such behavior. Faced with mounting adverse evidence, however, he confessed on January 27, 2005, that he was involved with a Croatian betting syndicate based in Berlin. He admitted to fixing seven games for $108,350. He was arrested in February and suspended from the league.

On April 29, the DFB banned Hoyzer from the sport for life. Hoyzer also began cooperating with police in establishing the guilt of other referees. He implicated referee Dominik Marks and player Steffen Karl. On March 11, Karl admitted bribing other players and was arrested. Marks was accused of earning about thirty-five thousand euros by manipulating games he was refereeing.

Hoyzer also told police about his connections to the major betting syndicate in Berlin. He said he had met Ante Sapina at Berlin's Café King sports bar, owned by Ante's brother, Milan Sapina. Ante was a shrewd gambler on German soccer, but after meeting Hoyzer, he saw an opportunity to improve his odds. He paid Hoyzer sixty-seven thousand euros and gave him a new television set to rig the games he refereed. In one game in October, Hoyzer manipulated a 1-0 victory by penalizing one team and expelling one of its players. The Sapina brothers, along with several soccer players, were arrested.

The trial of Hoyzer, the Sapina brothers, Marks, and Karl began in October. Hoyzer was charged with eleven counts of fraud. Ante Sapina was charged with forty-two counts. Given that Hoyzer had been cooperating with law enforcement in the investigation, his testimony was not surprising. He admitted to betting on soccer on a small scale until he met Ante, whom, he said, corrupted him. Ante also admitted guilt.

Investigators found that the Sapina brothers made more than two million euros by betting on rigged games. The testimonies of Hoyzer and Sapina differed at points, with the trial revealing that the Sapina brothers cleverly enticed Hoyzer into cheating with a seductive array of bribes. Prosecutors recommended that Hoyzer receive only a two-year suspended sentence, given his confession and his cooperation with their investigation. The judge in the case rejected their recommendation. In a major surprise, on November 21, the judge sentenced Hoyzer to twenty-nine months in prison. Hoyzer's crimes were well-considered, the judge explained, and Hoyzer had violated his duty of neutrality.

Ante Sapina was convicted of fraud and sentenced to thirty-five months in prison. His brothers were given suspended sentences of sixteen and twelve months, respectively. Marks was given an eighteen-month suspended sentence. The sentences of Hoyzer and the other defendants were affirmed on appeal by Germany's highest court. The chief appellate judge condemned the defendants for undermining confidence in Germany's national sport. After the trial and sentencing, German authorities announced that they would continue to investigate other players and referees. The league also ordered that most of the rigged games officiated by Hoyzer and the other implicated referees be replayed.

IMPACT

The Hoyzer scandal impacted German soccer in several ways. First, referees felt their authority and credibility had been undermined. The press began reporting that referees were making calls under a cloud of suspicion, which led to numerous refereeing mistakes. The DFB implemented new rules for referees. They are now required to serve a three-year probationary period in the lower leagues before being eligible for promotion to the higher leagues. The DFB also began using an observer to monitor all calls in games of the German Cup.

Second, the scandal impacted the betting industry in Germany. Betting is a huge business in German soccer, as it is in almost all professional sports. It is estimated that in 2004, betting on soccer amounted to 1.2 billion euros. The Hoyzer scandal made it especially clear that corruption is a part of betting, especially when large amounts of money come into play. Although gambling is unlikely to be eliminated from professional sports, the scandal nevertheless led the FIFA and DFB to initiate stricter controls against gambling on soccer. FIFA decided to monitor betting at all World Cup tournaments, beginning with the 2006 finals in Germany.

Third, the Hoyzer scandal threatened the atmosphere of the FIFA World Cup tournament scheduled to be played in Germany in the summer of 2006. Fortunately for German soccer, its legendary former soccer star, Franz Beckenbauer, had assumed the role of president of the World Cup organizing committee. Beckenbauer was the epitome of professional integrity and success in competitive soccer. With the conclusion of the Hoyzer prosecution and Beckenbauer's adroit management, the 2006 World Cup tournament was a great success.

—Howard Bromberg

FURTHER READING

Brenner, Reuven, Gabrielle A. Brenner, and Aaron Brown. A World of Chance: Betting on Religion, Games, Wall Street. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2008. In this wide-ranging academic study of betting in human society, the authors contend that with widespread gambling in sports, the corruption of referees such as Hoyzer becomes inevitable.

Goldblatt, David. The Ball Is Round: A Global History of Soccer. New York: Riverhead Books, 2008. Comprehensive and readable history of soccer from its earliest days in the context of cultural and international developments. Impressive scope of research.

Hunt, Chris, ed. The Complete Book of Soccer. Buffalo, N.Y.: Firefly Books, 2006. A history of soccer that features biographies of great players and more than five hundred photographs. The Hoyzer scandal figures prominently in the time line of soccer scandals.

Trecker, Jamie. Love and Blood: At the World Cup with the Footballers, Fans, and Freaks. Orlando, Fla.: Harcourt, 2007. An account of fan passion at the 2006 World Cup in Germany. Argues that the impassioned politics of fandom masked the significance of the Hoyzer scandal.

SEE ALSO: Apr. 2, 1915: Players Fix Liverpool-Manchester United Soccer Match; July 1, 1994:

Soccer Star Diego Maradona Is Expelled from World Cup; May 4, 2006: Media Uncover Match-Fixing in Italian Soccer; July 29, 2008: NBA Referee Tim Donaghy Is Sentenced to Prison for Betting on Games.

March 17, 2005

FORMER BASEBALL STAR MARK MCGWIRE EVADES CONGRESSIONAL QUESTIONS ON STEROID USE

After being identified as a steroid user by former teammate José Canseco, Mark McGwire was asked to testify at a U.S. House of Representatives hearing on steroid use in Major League Baseball. At the hearing, McGwire refused to answer questions about his own history with performance-enhancing drugs or their use by baseball players in general.

LOCALE: Washington, D.C.

CATEGORIES: Drugs; government; medicine and health care; sports

KEY FIGURES

Mark McGwire (b. 1963), Major League Baseball player

José Canseco (b. 1964), Major League Baseball player

George J. Mitchell (b. 1933), former U.S. senator from Maine, 1980-1995, and special counsel to the commissioner of Major League Baseball

Bud Selig (b. 1934), commissioner of Major League Baseball, 1992-

Sammy Sosa (b. 1968), Major League Baseball player

SUMMARY OF EVENT

On March 17, 2005, Mark McGwire appeared before the Government Reform Committee of the U.S. House of Representatives to testify on steroid use in Major League Baseball (MLB). Also present at the hearing were MLB commissioner Bud Selig, representatives from the Major League Baseball Players Association (MLBPA), and players José Canseco, Rafael Palmeiro, Curt Schilling, and Sammy Sosa. Player Frank Thomas appeared through video conferencing. Also testifying were medical experts and the families of young amateur baseball players who had suffered physically and emotionally from steroid use.

McGwire's testimony became the lasting symbol of the hearings, which were broadcast on national television. After choking up while reading a written statement expressing his regret that younger players had suffered from steroid abuse, McGwire refused to answer questions asked by the committee. McGwire was asked about his own use of performance-enhancing drugs, the integrity of the game of baseball, and whether steroid use constituted cheating, among other topics. McGwire's responses rarely went beyond variations of his statement "I'm not here to discuss the past." Although he did say that steroids were bad and that players should not use them, he would not answer the question of how he knew that to be true. In the end, McGwire left the hearings disgraced and ridiculed for his failure to make pertinent or revealing statements about steroid use in baseball.

McGwire was not the only casualty of the hearings. Sosa, a native of the Dominican Republic, was criticized for his use of a translator, which many journalists claimed was a ruse by the veteran player. Palmeiro testified that he had never used steroids, but within six months of the hearings, he failed a drug test and was forced to retire. Neither player could shake the taint of having used performance-enhancing drugs.

Canseco and Schilling were also disparaged for their testimony as they recanted previous statements. Canseco renounced the prosteroid rhetoric he had used in previous interviews and writings. Schilling, a vocal critic of steroid use, said that he did not know much about the steroid problem in baseball, despite having earlier estimated that a large number of players were users. Officials for both MLB and MLBPA also had a poor showing at the hearings. Members of Congress harshly condemned the weak drug-testing program that MLB and the player's union had put in place two weeks before the hearings.

McGwire had been one of the most popular Major League Baseball players of the late 1980's and 1990's. In 1987, he set the rookie record for most home runs in a season with 49 and won the American League Rookie of the Year Award. With Oakland A's teammate Canseco, McGwire was part of one of the most productive offensive tandems of the era. Playing for Oakland until 1997 and then with the St. Louis Cardinals until his retirement in 2001, McGwire was the most prolific home-run hitter in baseball from his debut in 1986 to 2001. During those sixteen seasons, only eleven of which he played more than one hundred games, he hit 583 home runs. As spectators became infatuated with home-run hitting during the 1990's, McGwire quickly became a fan favorite. His popularity only increased in 1998, when he and Chicago Cubs slugger Sosa pursued the single-season home-run record. With a total of 70 home runs in the 1998 season, McGwire eclipsed the previous record of 61, set in 1961 by Roger Maris. The excitement surrounding the home-run race between McGwire and Sosa helped baseball recover from the damage done to its popularity by the strike of 1994-1995.

Although McGwire had always been a prodigious home-run hitter, the enormous totals he and others produced during the 1990's led to public suspicion that they were using performance-enhancing drugs, particularly anabolic steroids. As early as 1988, members of the press alleged that Canseco was a steroid user, and he reportedly bragged of that use around his teammates and coaches. Although Canseco later claimed that he and McGwire used steroids together during their time in Oakland, McGwire was not generally suspected by the public of using the drug. During 1998's home-run race, a journalist revealed that McGwire's locker contained a bottle of androstenedione (andro), a legal, muscle-building supplement. When McGwire and Sosa later revealed that they also used creatine, another legal supplement, many fans and sportswriters wondered if the two players had used illegal substances as Former baseball star Mark McGwire (center, with glasses), and other players at a House committee session investigating steroid use in Major League Baseball. From left is Sammy Sosa and his translator, McGwire, Rafael Palmeiro, and Curt Schilling. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Mark McGwire Evades Questions on Steroid Use

THE MITCHELL REPORT

The Mitchell Report on the use of steroids and other performance-enhancing drugs in professional baseball in the United States was issued on December 13, 2007. The report included three final recommendations on the matter to Major League Baseball.

To prevent the illegal use of performance enhancing substances in Major League Baseball, I [Special Counsel George J. Mitchell] make a series of recommendations. Some can be implemented by the Commissioner unilaterally; some are subject to collective bargaining and therefore will require the agreement of the Players Association.

- First, the Commissioner's Office should place a higher priority on the aggressive investigation of non-testing (so-called "non-analytic") evidence of possession or use, enhance its cooperation with law enforcement authorities, and make other improvements designed to keep performance enhancing substances out of major league clubhouses.
- Second, Major League Baseball needs a compelling and greatly enhanced educational program that focuses on real-life stories as well as on all the risks involved in the use of performance enhancing substances. These include health risks, career risks, and the many dangers that can result from associating with drug dealers. This program should also give significant attention to the status that major league players enjoy as role models and how their use affects the decisions of young people throughout the country. I have been warned by a number of former players that some players will use performance enhancing substances no matter what they are told. They may be right. But I also heard from other former players who wrestled long and hard with the decision to use performance enhancing substances. An education program that effectively communicates the messages described above might not deter all players from use, but it surely will deter some.

- Third, although it is clear that even the best drug testing program is, by itself, not sufficient, drug testing remains an important part of a comprehensive approach to combating the illegal use of performance enhancing substances. The Commissioner does not have the authority to act unilaterally on drug testing, however; the agreement of the Players Association is required. The current joint drug program is part of the Basic Agreement that was agreed to in 2006 and will remain in effect until 2011. Any changes to the program therefore must be negotiated with and agreed to by the Players Association. Neither party is obligated to agree to reopen the Basic Agreement to address the program, even though that is what happened in 2005. There is no way for me to know whether that will happen again.

well. Although the story was widely reported at first, it soon lost momentum as many fans accepted that andro and creatine were allowed by MLB and easily purchased over the counter.

In 2005, McGwire was in the center of the steroid maelstrom that prompted the congressional hearings. Early that year, Canseco published his tell-all memoir, Juiced: Wild Times, Rampant 'Roids, Smash Hits, and How Baseball Got Big. In the book, he named numerous steroid-using baseball players, including McGwire. Despite the extraordinary and damaging claims Canseco made, MLB declined to investigate the issue. The press, however, delved deeper into Canseco's allegations and found evidence to support some of his claims. In response to the press investigations, the Government Reform Committee announced it would hold hearings on steroid use in baseball.

IMPACT

McGwire's refusal to "discuss the past" at the congressional hearing destroyed his credibility with baseball fans. Only seven years earlier, he had been one of baseball's most beloved stars. In 2007, when he became eligible for election to the Hall of Fame, many voters and other sportswriters identified suspected steroid use and his testimony at the hearing as reasons they would not support his candidacy. Although McGwire had played at a level that justified his induction in the Hall of Fame, he only received support from 23.5 percent of voters, far short of the 75 percent necessary for inclusion.

McGwire became the only eligible player with more than 500 home runs to not be elected to the Hall of Fame.

The attention the hearings brought to steroid use in baseball forced MLB to become more proactive in preventing the use of performance-enhancing drugs. Although drug testing began three years prior to the hearings, the House Government Reform Committee criticized the lenient penalties that were in place, and at the end of the season, MLB toughened its steroid policy. In a plan proposed shortly before the hearings, players who failed tests would be suspended ten games for the first failure, and a fifth failed test was required before a lifetime suspension was even a possibility. Under the policy instituted in November, 2005, a first-time offender received a fifty-game suspension and a third failed test resulted in a mandatory lifetime ban from baseball. However, many continued to criticize MLB for having a drug policy that is lax when compared to that of the International Olympic Committee and other organizations.

On December 13, 2007, former U.S. senator George J. Mitchell, acting as special counsel to the commissioner of baseball, issued his report on MLB steroid use, naming McGwire and nearly ninety other players (those active in 2007 as well as former players) as suspected steroid users. In the wake of the Mitchell Report, Major League Baseball commissioner Selig announced his intention once again to strengthen MLB's testing program.

—Jacob F. Lee

FURTHER READING

Bryant, Howard. Juicing the Game: Drugs, Power, and the Fight for the Soul of Major League Baseball. New York: Viking Press, 2005. Study of the use of steroids in Major League Baseball from the 1980's through 2005. McGwire is featured prominently both for his suspected use of performance-enhancing drugs and his testimony before the House committee.

Mark McGwire Evades Questions on Steroid Use

Canseco, José. Juiced: Wild Times, Rampant 'Roids, Smash Hits, and How Baseball Got Big. New York: Regan Books, 2005. Canseco's tell-all memoir, which instigated the 2005 hearings on steroid use in MLB.

_____. Vindicated: Big Names, Big Liars, and the Battle to Save Baseball. New York: Simon Spotlight Entertainment, 2008. Canseco's follow-up to the steroids scandal.

Carroll, Will, with William L. Carroll. The Juice: The Real Story of Baseball's Drug Problems. Chicago: Ivan R. Dee, 2005. Analyzes from a medical viewpoint a wide range of performance-enhancing drugs and their effect on players.

Fainaru-Wada, Mark, and Lance Williams. Game of Shadows: Barry Bonds, BALCO, and the Steroids Scandal That Rocked Professional Sports. New York: Gotham Books, 2006. Provides historical context for the problem of steroid use in professional sports, particularly baseball.

Mitchell, George. Report to the Commissioner of Baseball of an Independent Investigation into the Illegal Use of Steroids and Other Performance Enhancing Substances by Players in Major League Baseball. New York: Office of the Commissioner of Baseball, 2007. The official report to the MLB commissioner on the steroids era in professional baseball.

SEE ALSO: Nov. 29, 1979, and Jan. 31, 1983: Baseball Commissioner Suspends Mickey Mantle and Willie Mays for Casino Ties; Feb. 28, 1986: Baseball Commissioner Peter Ueberroth Suspends Players for Cocaine Use; Aug. 24, 1989: Pete Rose Is Banned from Baseball for Betting on Games; July 1, 1994: Soccer Star Diego Maradona Is Expelled from World Cup; Sept. 26, 2000: Gymnast Andreea Răducan Loses Her Olympic Gold Medal Because of Drugs; July 26, 2006: Tour de France Is Hit with a Doping Scandal; Oct. 5, 2007: Olympic Champion Marion Jones Admits Steroid Use.

June 22, 2005

U.S. AIR FORCE INVESTIGATES RELIGIOUS INTOLERANCE AT ITS ACADEMY

Claims that cadets and staff at the U.S. Air Force Academy were pushing cadets to accept evangelical Christianity prompted an official inquiry into the allegations. Investigators concluded that the academy faced religious insensitivity, but not discrimination. These conclusions were controversial, and debate continues over religious diversity in the military.

LOCALE: Colorado Springs, Colorado

CATEGORIES: Military; religion; education; social issues and reform; civil rights and liberties

KEY FIGURES

Michael L. Weinstein (b. 1955), U.S. Air Force Academy graduate, who notified media of religious intolerance at the academy

John A. Weida (b. 1956), U.S. Air Force brigadier general, commandant of cadets at the Air Force Academy, 2003-2005

Melinda Morton (b. 1957), U.S. Air Force captain, chaplain at the Air Force Academy

John W. Rosa (b. 1951), U.S. Air Force lieutenant general, superintendent of the Air Force Academy, 2003-2005

Roger Brady (fl. early twenty-first century), U.S. Air Force lieutenant general, who chaired an investigative panel

Kristen Leslie (fl. early twenty-first century), Yale University professor, who led an independent investigation at the academy

SUMMARY OF EVENT

A report released by a U.S. Air Force panel on June 22, 2005, concluded that even though religious insensitivity existed at the academy, discrimination based on religion did not. The Brady Report, named for Lieutenant General Roger Brady, who chaired the panel, covered the period from April, 2003, through early June, 2005, and was based on about three hundred interviews with staff and cadets. The report, the first official recognition of religious problems at the academy, had nine findings and nine recommendations, but the recommendations were not significant and the report met with mixed reactions.

The religious atmosphere at the academy had long caused unease among some cadets, but the situation deteriorated after Brigadier General John A. Weida was appointed commandant of cadets on April 11, 2003. Weida engaged in a number of acts that upset non-Christian cadets by mixing his personal beliefs with his official duties as commandant. In one case, he told cadets that the Lord was in control, urged cadets to discuss their Christian faith with others, and introduced a "J for Jesus" hand signal to which cadets had to reply.

In December, three hundred academy staff and cadets signed a large advertisement published in the academy's newspaper, urging cadets to contact them to "discuss Jesus." The head football coach, Fisher DeBerry, referred to the football team as Team Jesus Christ. In February, 2004, after the release of Mel Gibson's controversial film The Passion of the Christ, zealous cadets papered the academy cafeteria with flyers that indicated the film was officially sponsored by the academy, flashed images from the film during meals, hung posters in many locations, and heavily promoted the film through e-mails.

Michael L. Weinstein, a 1977 honor graduate of the academy, heard about many discriminatory incidents, including anti-Semitic comments, at the academy and began assembling a dossier. Weinstein, who also is an attorney, a former assistant general counsel in the executive office of U.S. president Ronald Reagan, sent the dossier directly to Lieutenant General John W. Rosa, Jr., who had been appointed superintendent of the academy in July, 2003.

On Thursday, July 29, Weinstein, who is also

Jewish and the father of two cadets then at the academy, drove from his home in Albuquerque, New Mexico, to attend the academy's leadership conference, a special event to update graduates on the academy's accomplishments. At the conference he heard about more uncomfortable incidents, including proselytizing attempts, and about anti-Semitic incidents that included comments about Jews being accused of killing Jesus. He then met Rosa and received a lukewarm response to his concerns. He soon realized that Rosa likely did not receive the dossier.

In late December, an academy Protestant chaplain, Captain Melinda Morton, also alarmed over the fervent emphasis on proselytizing, invited Yale University professor Kristen Leslie to the academy to lead a team evaluating the academy's pastoral-care efforts. The team found, in part, that cadets were being told that faith in Jesus would get them through academy training and that cadets who chose not to attend church services were humiliated as heathens. The team was especially alarmed at the proselytizing of young cadets during vulnerable, severely stressful times, and criticized as divisive the academy's "overarching evangelical emphasis."

In late July, 2004, the team's report, called the Yale Report, was delivered to the academy. The academy responded by establishing the RSVP (Respecting the Spiritual Values of All People) project, with the goal of promoting religious diversity at the academy. However, RSVP was strongly opposed by evangelicals among the staff, and the project made little progress.

In September, Weinstein and Steve Aguilar released The Religious Climate at the United States Air Force Academy, which documented practices that were in clear violation of the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, which guarantees freedom of religion. Weinstein concluded that there was a major power struggle within the academy between fundamentalist evangelicals and other religious persons. He saw no internal resolution in sight, and decided to go public with his concerns.

On November 18, Pam Zubeck, chief military-affairs reporter for the Colorado Springs Gazette, published her first story on the controversy. Her series was picked up by national media. After months of little action, things began to move rapidly. In March, 2005, Weinstein first heard about Chaplain Morton's efforts and about the Yale Report, which had been kept secret. Zubeck found the report, wrote about it, and found herself on television, being interviewed on 60 Minutes II and CNN. Other major national media began to cover the unfolding scandal. In the meantime, on April 28, Americans United for Separation of Church and State (AUSCS) released a report alleging systematic and pervasive religious bias and intolerance at the highest levels at the academy.

A few days after the release of the AUSCS report, the Air Force announced the formation of an investigative task force. The panel was led by Lieutenant General Brady, a born-again Christian. On June 3, Superintendent Rosa publicly acknowledged there were problems with religious diversity at the academy and said that they were so embedded that it would take years to correct. The Brady Report was released on June 22. Weida and DeBerry apologized for their actions and the Air Force chief of staff warned commanders against promoting their personal religious beliefs. The New York Times, in an editorial, criticized the report, arguing that its weak conclusions strained credibility.

IMPACT

The House Armed Services Committee looked into the Brady Report's findings and held a hearing on June 28, but the hearing degenerated into political debate. On July 12, the Air Force deputy chief of chaplains, Major General Cecil Richardson, said that chaplains would not proselytize but that a private chaplains'-association document gave them the right to evangelize the unchurched, ostensibly Jews and other non-Christians. On October 6, Weinstein filed a legal complaint for violations of constitutional rights against the Air Force. The Air Force withdrew the chaplains' document, but neither Weinstein nor the evangelicals were satisfied.

In early 2006, Weinstein took action and founded the Military Religious Freedom Foundation (MRFF). The foundation has received thousands of complaints of religious discrimination from military personnel, and in September, 2007, broadening its scope, Weinstein filed a lawsuit against the secretary of defense for discrimination against non-Christians in the U.S. military.

—Abraham D. Lavender

FURTHER READING

Loveland, Anne C. American Evangelicals and the U.S. Military, 1942-1993. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University, 1996. Examines the changing demographics of the military and traces the history, strategies, and goals of American evangelicalism's tremendous success in increasing its influence on the military since World War II.

United States Congress. House of Representatives. The Religious Climate at the U.S. Air Force Academy: Hearing Before the Military Personnel Subcommittee of the Committee on Armed Services. Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 2005. Report of the June 28, 2005, congressional hearing investigating the Air Force Academy scandal.

Weinstein, Michael L., and Davin Seay. With God on Our Side: One Man's War Against an Evangelical Coup in America's Military. New York: St. Martin's Griffin, 2008. The story of Weinstein's battle with evangelical fundamentalists at the Air Force Academy and his work to keep the military secular and free of religious indoctrination and intimidation. Originally published in 2006.

Welch, Bobby. You the Warrior Leader: Applying Military Strategy for Victorious Spiritual Warfare. Nashville, Tenn.: Broadman and Holman, 2004. The president of the Southern Baptist Convention argues in favor of the concept of evangelical militarism as the basis of U.S. military policy.

Winn, Patrick. "Religion at Issue." Air Force Times, August 5, 2008. A brief but telling report on the state of religion and religious practice at the Air Force Academy in the wake of the scandal and Weinstein's work in changing the academy's policies.

SEE ALSO: Apr. 4, 1976: West Point Cadets Are Caught Cheating on Exams; June 26, 1992: U.S. Navy Secretary Resigns in the Wake of Tailhook Sexual Assault Scandal; Apr. 28, 1994: U.S. Naval Academy Expels Midshipmen for Cheating; May 20, 1997: Air Force Prosecution of Female Officer for Adultery Reveals Double Standard; Jan. 2, 2003: E-mail Message Prompts Inquiry into Air Force Academy Sexual Assaults; Feb. 18, 2007: Washington Post Exposes Decline of Walter Reed Army Hospital.

July 1, 2005

FEDERAL AGENTS RAID CONGRESSMAN RANDALL CUNNINGHAM'S HOME

A raid by federal agents of the home of U.S. representative Randall Cunningham in an exclusive suburb north of San Diego, California, led to Cunningham's resignation from Congress and to his criminal conviction for bribery, mail and wire fraud, and income tax evasion. He pleaded guilty to accepting bribes amounting to at least $2.4 million from several defense contractors. He was sent to prison for eight years and four months, the longest prison sentence ever for a former member of Congress.

LOCALE: Rancho Santa Fe, California

CATEGORIES: Corruption; government; law and the courts; business

KEY FIGURES

Randall Cunningham (b. 1941), U.S. representative from California, 1991-2005
Brent Wilkes (b. 1954), defense contractor
Mitchell Wade (b. 1963), defense contractor
Thomas Kontogiannis (b. 1949), financier
Kyle Dustin Foggo (b. 1954), CIA official

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Political corruption in pursuit of economic gain is nothing new in U.S. politics, but few have carried it to the lengths of U.S. representative Randall Cunningham of California. Duke, as he was known to admirers and critics, received more than two million dollars in bribes from persons hoping to receive lucrative government contracts, the largest bribery amount in congressional history. The money allowed him and his wife to acquire a home in exclusive Rancho Santa Fe in northern San Diego County, California, as well as fine artworks, luxury automobiles, and a yacht in Washington, D.C., along the Potomac River for Cunningham's personal use.

Born in Los Angeles and raised in Fresno, California, and Shelbina, Missouri, Cunningham was one of the authentic aviation heroes of the Vietnam War, credited with shooting down five enemy planes. He thus achieved recognition as the only U.S. Navy ace pilot of the war. He was awarded the Navy Cross, two Silver Stars, fifteen Air Medals, and the Purple Heart. In 1972, he became an instructor with the Navy's fabled top-gun air-combat school near San Diego, and he later claimed that his experiences in Vietnam were the basis for the 1986 film Top Gun, which starred Tom Cruise. After retiring from the Navy in 1987, Cunningham became a Cable News Network commentator.

Narrowly elected to the U.S. Congress in 1990 from a previously Democratic district, Cunningham immediately received adulation and recognition because of his heroic exploits in Vietnam. He subsequently was reelected to Congress by increasing majorities through the 2004 election. In Congress, given his military background and heroic reputation, his initial national prominence came from his participation in the debates leading to the Gulf War. After the Republicans achieved majority status in the 1994 election, Cunningham chaired the House Intelligence Subcommittee on Human Intelligence Analysis and Counterintelligence.

As a member of the Appropriations Education Subcommittee, Cunningham was able to increase federal funds to public schools in San Diego. His voting record was predictably conservative, attacking President Bill Clinton for a lack of patriotism and for appointing judges who were supposedly soft on crime. Cunningham favored the death penalty for major drug dealers, opposed the move to allow gays and lesbians to serve openly in the military, and accused his Democratic opponents of being socialists. Interestingly, he received the designation "conservation hero" from the Audubon Society for his role in banning shark finning, or the removal of shark fins, and dumping the often still-living sharks back into the sea.

Cunningham began to use the power of his congressional position for his own benefit beginning during the mid-1990's, and initially on a fairly small scale. Brent Wilkes, head of ADCS, Inc., a San Diego defense firm, provided Cunningham with limousine service, free meals, the use of a fourteen-foot motorboat, and occasional payments of $500. In turn, the Congress member earmarked millions of dollars for Wilkes's businesses, including a $20 million document-digitization system. Other defense contractors also benefited from Cunningham's endeavors, particularly after the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001.

Mitchell Wade was one of those defense contractors. He provided Cunningham with private jets for holidays and shopping trips, a condominium, antiques, and a Rolls Royce. Cunningham also had the use of a yacht on Washington, D.C.'s Potomac River, where he lived when Congress was in session, paying nothing and reportedly entertaining prostitutes. Because of his influence, which included the bullying of Pentagon officials, Wade's company, MZM, was awarded numerous government contracts, including a noncompetitive $250 million five-year contract in 2002. Wilkes provided Cunningham with $600 prostitutes on a trip to Hawaii.

By 2003, Cunningham's material appetites had increased significantly. Wade purchased Cunningham's residence in Del Mar Heights for $1.675 million, well over its market value, allowing the Congress member to purchase a $2.55 million, 8,000-square-foot home in Rancho Santa Fe, a luxury community twenty-five miles north of San

CUNNINGHAM'S BRIBE MENU

The U.S. government outlined its case against Representative Duke Cunningham in a March 3, 2006, sentencing memorandum to the District Court in San Diego, California. In the following excerpt, prosecutors explain how Cunningham's infamous "bribe menu" worked.

The naked avarice that animated Cunningham's corruption is starkly framed in one of Cunningham's Congressional note cards. Under the very seal of the United States Congress, Cunningham placed this nation's governance up for sale to a defense contractor—detailing the amount of bribes necessary to obtain varying levels of defense appropriations.

In this "bribe menu," the left column represented the millions in government contracts that could be "ordered" from Cunningham. The right column was the amount of the bribes that the Congressman was demanding in exchange for the contracts. For example, Cunningham's menu offered $16 million to Coconspirator No. 2 in government contracts in exchange for the contractor giving up his title to a boat ("BT") for which Coconspirator No. 2 had initially paid $140,000 ("140"). The next four rows indicate that an additional million dollars in funding was "for sale" in exchange for every additional $50,000 that Coconspirator No. 2 was willing to pay Cunningham. Once Coconspirator No. 2 had paid Cunningham $340,000 in bribes, the rates dropped; and, as the final five rows reflect, Cunningham would charge only $25,000 for each additional million dollars that was awarded in additional government contracts.

Diego. Several months later, Wade sold the Del Mar Heights property for $975,000, taking a $700,000 loss on what he paid to Cunningham, in essence a bribe for the Congress member. The mortgage on the new home was paid off by defense contractors in the amount of $1.25 million. It is estimated that the various bribes to Cunningham totaled approximately $3 million, making him, according to one source, the most corrupt Congressman in U.S. history, measured in monetary terms.

In early 2005, a federal grand jury, in conjunction with the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Defense Criminal Investigative Service, and the U.S. Internal Revenue Service, began investigating Cunningham's various financial dealings with Wade. According to the federal government's Defense Information Systems Agency, Wade's firm, MZM, received $163 million in federal contracts (not necessarily all from his dealings with Cunningham). On July 1, federal agents raided Cunningham's home in Rancho Santa Fe, MZM offices in Washington, D.C., and the forty-two-foot Potomac yacht on which Cunningham had been living for the previous year.

A few days before the raids, Cunningham stated that he had used poor judgment when he sold his Del Mar Heights home to Wade, that he had paid $13,000 for docking fees and other expenses connected to his use of Wade's yacht, and that he had never provided any illegal aid to the defense contractor. It also was reported that two weeks before the raids, officials at MZM shredded numerous documents.

IMPACT

On July 14, several days after the raid on his home, Cunningham announced that he would not run for reelection and that he and his wife would sell their Rancho Santa Fe home and donate the profits to charity. In a plea bargain agreement on November 27, Cunningham resigned his seat in Congress and pleaded guilty to accepting bribes amounting to at least $2.4 million from several defense contractors, as well as to mail and wire fraud and income tax evasion. As part of his guilty plea, Cunningham agreed to forfeit $1.8 million in antiques and other items as well as his $2.5 million home. Included as evidence was Cunningham's "bribe menu," in which he demanded $50,000 for each $1 million in value for each contract he steered to a defense contractor. In a tearful statement, Cunningham admitted that he broke the law and that he had disgraced his office, ruined his reputation, and disgraced his family and friends.

Several months later, on March 2, 2006, Cunningham was sentenced to eight years and four months in prison. Sixty-four years old and suffering from prostate problems, he was spared the ten-year term requested by prosecutors, in part because of his military record. Nevertheless, the sentence was one of the longest ever meted out to a former Congressman. After medical examinations, Cunningham was incarcerated in the minimum-security federal prison in Tucson, Arizona. Reporters from the San Diego Union-Tribune and Copley News Service shared a 2006 Pulitzer Prize for their coverage of the Cunningham scandal.

Wade, named as the principal coconspirator, pleaded guilty to numerous charges, including giving Cunningham $1 million in bribes. Wade agreed to testify against Wilkes, who was convicted of bribery in November, 2007, and sentenced to twelve years in prison. In addition to Wade and Wilkes, Long Island businessman Thomas Kontogiannis also was investigated for his role in arranging a second mortgage for Cunningham on the home in Rancho Santa Fe. Kontogiannis was sentenced to eight years in prison in 2008 for money-laundering bribes given to Cunningham. Kyle Dustin Foggo, number-three official with the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency, was indicted because of his relations with Wilkes.

Other scandals surfaced at the time as well. House Majority Leader Tom DeLay of Texas resigned as a result of his connection with the Jack Abramoff bribery affair, and California Congressman Jerry Lewis, one-time head of the House Appropriations Committee, also was investigated for his connections to Cunningham. However, Cunningham's criminal acts were more egregious and blatant.

—Eugene Larson

FURTHER READING

Bachrach, Judy. "Washington Babylon." Vanity Fair, August, 2006. Provides considerable background about Wilkes, Wade, and Foggo and their involvement in the Cunningham affair.

Cunningham, Randy, and Jeffrey L. Ethell. Fox Two: The Story of America's First Ace in Vietnam. 1984. New ed. New York: Warner Books, 1989. Cunningham's own dramatic account of his air-combat exploits in Vietnam, written with the assistance of a noted author who specializes in writing about military air power.

Hettena, Seth. Feasting on the Spoils: The Life and Times of Randy "Duke" Cunningham, History's Most Corrupt Congressman. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2007. A comprehensive journalistic expose of Cunningham's misdeeds, including those of the other major characters in the scandal.

Stern, Marcus, Jerry Kammer, Dean Calbreath, and George E. Condon, Jr. The Wrong Stuff: The Extraordinary Saga of Randy "Duke" Cunningham, the Most Corrupt Congressman Ever Caught. New York: PublicAffairs, 2007. An analysis by the team of reporters who won a Pulitzer Prize in 2006 for their investigations into Cunningham's bribery and fraud.

SEE ALSO: Oct. 22, 1923: U.S. Senate Begins Hearings on Teapot Dome Oil Leases; Nov. 16, 1951: Federal Tax Official Resigns After Accepting Bribes; Oct. 10, 1973: Spiro T. Agnew Resigns Vice Presidency in Disgrace; Sept. 21, 1977: Carter Cabinet Member Resigns over Ethics Violations; Feb. 2, 1980: Media Uncover FBI Sting Implicating Dozens of Lawmakers; Jan. 22, 1987: Pennsylvania Politician Kills Himself at Televised Press Conference.

Beginning August 29, 2005GOVERNMENT INCOMPETENCE MARS HURRICANE KATRINA RELIEF EFFORTS

As Hurricane Katrina came ashore along the Gulf coast—most specifically near the city of New Orleans, Louisiana—an ill-prepared local, state, and federal bureaucracy was deeply criticized for its failed response to the devastation. Because many of the victims were African American, critics also claimed that racism was at the heart of government ineffectiveness and inaction. The incompetence led to reform in emergency management at all levels of government and to further questions about the role of racism in how help is administered.

LOCALES: Louisiana; Mississippi; AlabamaCATEGORIES: Environmental issues; ethics; racism; government; politics; public morals; social issues and reformKEY FIGURES

Ray Nagin (b. 1956), mayor of New Orleans, 2002–

Kathleen Babineaux Blanco (b. 1942), governor of Louisiana, 2004–2008

Michael D. Brown (b. 1954), head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, 2003–2005

George W. Bush (b. 1946), president of the United States, 2001–2009

SUMMARY OF EVENT

On the morning of August 29, 2005, Hurricane Katrina made landfall near Buras, Louisiana, as a category 3 storm on the Saffir-Simpson scale with 135 mile-per-hour winds and a storm surge between eighteen and twenty-five feet. The storm caused catastrophic damage in Louisiana, Mississippi, and Alabama, and led to the deaths of more than eighteen hundred people; the $82 billion in damage made it the costliest hurricane in U.S. history.

Eighty percent of the city of New Orleans was inundated with water up to twenty feet deep when several levees surrounding the city failed. Local, state, and federal governments were not prepared to respond to the widespread destruction, leaving thousands of people in need of critical aid and guidance. The controversy stemmed, in part, from a lack of communication at all levels of government, both before the hurricane and after.

On September 22, the U.S. House of Representatives convened its Committee to Investigate the Preparation for and Response to Hurricane Katrina, having been given a clear mandate by Congress: “gather facts about the preparation for and response to Katrina, at all levels of government. . . . [F]ind out what went right and what went wrong.” The committee issued its scathing, 520-page report to Congress on February 15, 2006. The report was deeply critical of how government agencies failed to anticipate disaster, despite clear warnings from the National Hurricane Center (NHC) and the National Weather Service (NWS), that disaster was imminent, and failed to take care of even the most basic of human needs after the hurricane made landfall along the Gulf coast. The report lauded only two government agencies—the NHC and the NWS—and commended the work of countless private citizens and groups in taking the initiative to help their neighbors.

Singled out for criticism by not only the committee but also critics across the United States were New Orleans mayor Ray Nagin, Louisiana governor Kathleen Babineaux Blanco, U.S. president George W. Bush, and numerous federal agencies, including the U.S. Department of Homeland Security and the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA). Other critics of the preparation and response included politicians, scholars, entertainers, writers, social commentators, and the victims themselves.

During the five-day period between Monday, August 29, when the storm hit, and Friday, September 2, twenty to thirty thousand people were stranded at the Louisiana Superdome (a sporting and entertainment venue that was used as a shelter of last resort during the storm) and the Convention Center, both in downtown New Orleans, with little or no food or medical supplies. For nearly one week, the city of New Orleans was in chaos, and some residents took advantage of a shorthanded and ill-prepared police department and a Louisiana National Guard that was focused on keeping order at the Superdome and Convention Center, by taking food and other needed items from damaged and destroyed stores. (Critics later pointed out that blacks were described by media as looters and whites as victims looking for, finding, and taking food.)

Critics soon accused Mayor Nagin for not having a comprehensive plan to evacuate city residents, especially those with special needs, such as the elderly and disabled. Critics were especially concerned that Nagin, and other officials, failed to make evacuation plans even though NHC and NWS scientists, five years before Katrina, had predicted what would happen if a storm such as Katrina struck in or near New Orleans. Critics also said that Nagin failed to take advantage of the city's bus system to effectively evacuate those who did not have the resources to get out of the city before the storm struck. Many also pointed out that Nagin lost precious time in failing to issue a mandatory evacuation until 9:30 A.M. on Sunday, August 28, twenty-four hours before the storm came ashore. On Thursday, September 1, a tired and frustrated Nagin went on radio and pleaded with Blanco and Bush to send more assistance, imploring them to "get off [their] asses and do something," so that they could all "fix the biggest goddamn crisis in the history of the country."

Governor Blanco was accused of failing to relinquish enough power and authority in time for the federal government to respond to the needs of thou-

Search and rescue staff with the Federal Emergency Management Agency move through a flooded New Orleans, Louisiana, neighborhood on August 31, 2005. (Federal Emergency Management Agency)

Displaced New Orleans residents wait along the side of a closed freeway for FEMA assistance on September 2, 2005, five days after Hurricane Katrina made landfall. (Federal Emergency Management Agency) sands of people. Blanco also was faulted for failing to redeploy hundreds of National Guard soldiers who were stationed in one of the most flood-prone areas of greater New Orleans: Jackson Barracks in Chalmette. Another charge leveled at Blanco was that she allowed personal political antipathy toward Nagin and Bush to affect her ability to work with them during the crisis.

President Bush was accused of failing to appreciate the magnitude of Katrina and its destructive aftermath, and that when he did, he did so too late. Katrina necessitated considerable federal assistance. On August 30, one day after the hurricane made landfall, Bush was posing for photographers with a country music singer at a naval base in Coronado, California.

Michael D. Brown, the Bush-appointed head of FEMA, also was singled out as the head of what turned out to be an inept federal agency. Most critics accused Brown of lacking the proper background and experience to manage FEMA and for not correcting the numerous bureaucratic impediments that prevented the agency from doing its job. Bush clearly showed that he did not understand the magnitude of the disaster, nor FEMA's incompetence, when he publicly praised Brown on Friday, September 2, for "doing a heck of a job." Many also said that Bush had cut funding for the upkeep of the levees that surrounded New Orleans, which the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers helped oversee and maintain.

The worst of the crisis ended on September 2, when Bush, with Blanco's consent, ordered the National Guard to join forces with thirty thousand regular U.S. Army soldiers. They were placed under the command of Lieutenant General Russel Honoré. Thousands of storm victims who were living in the squalid conditions at the Superdome and Convention Center were bused to the Astrodome in Houston, Texas, leaving the two giant buildings nearly empty by Friday. Bush, Nagin, and Blanco met on Friday to discuss the lack of communication among responding agencies, including the local, state, and federal governments. In a heated but ultimately productive exchange, Nagin encouraged Blanco and Bush to “get together on the same page.”

IMPACT

Criticism of the governments’ response to Hurricane Katrina opened up a personal and partisan political debate, mostly involving Nagin, Blanco, and Bush. On September 12, FEMA director Brown resigned. Ten days later, the congressional investigatory committee convened, and hearings proceeded for months.

In addition to government incompetence, racism played a role in the emergency response to Katrina. The hurricane and its aftermath exposed deep socioeconomic and racial divisions in New Orleans. Critics argued that African Americans were largely forgotten in the crisis. The residents of devastated areas such as the Ninth Ward and New Orleans East were mostly black, as were most of the evacuees and those who ended up at the Superdome or Convention Center because their homes were destroyed and had nowhere else to go. Those most in need and most vulnerable, critics argued, were black, and race played a crucial role in why government officials did not move quickly enough to provide assistance. Reflecting these deep divisions, many people even accused white city officials of blowing up the levees to protect white neighborhoods. This fear was a legitimate one. During the 1927 Mississippi River flood, New Orleans city officials had dynamited several levees to save wealthier white neighborhoods at the expense of poorer African American neighborhoods. On September 2, during an NBC television fund-raiser for Katrina victims, singer-entertainer Kanye West claimed that President Bush “doesn’t care” about black people.

The political fallout hurt the careers of some elected officials, including Blanco, who chose not to run for reelection in the fall of 2007. Others, including Nagin, continued their careers amid the controversy. In a January 16 speech, Nagin, who is black, made a racially insensitive remark, referring to the inevitability of New Orleans once again becoming a “chocolate city” (a black majority). Despite widespread criticism, he won a close mayoral election in the fall of 2006.

Three years of thinking about Katrina led to a different response by government officials when Hurricane Gustav, a category 2 storm, made landfall west of New Orleans on the morning of September 1, 2008. This time, evacuation plans were in order. Mayor Nagin and the governor of Louisiana, Bobby Jindal, ordered evacuations days before Gustav came ashore. The order led to the largest evacuation in the history of the state. Although this storm was predicted to be less strong than Katrina, officials would not take chances, especially given that the whole world was watching their response.

—Christopher L. Stacey

FURTHER READING

Brinkley, Douglas. The Great Deluge: Hurricane Katrina, New Orleans, and the Mississippi Gulf Coast. New York: William Morrow, 2006. Excellent detailed analysis of the immediate impact of Katrina, spanning August 27 to September 3, 2005. Brinkley marshals a wide array of sources, including interviews, newspaper articles, magazines, and secondary sources based on the history of hurricanes and the coastal South in general. Illustrated, with endnotes and index.

Dewan, Shaila. “Resources Scarce, Homelessness Persists in New Orleans.” The New York Times, May 28, 2008. A report, nearly three years after Katrina, on the thousands of residents of New Orleans, and other places hit by the hurricane, who remain homeless.

Dyson, Michael Eric. Come Hell or High Water: Hurricane Katrina and the Color of Disaster. New York: Basic Civitas, 2006. Dyson’s work focuses mostly on the racial dynamics of the governments’ response to Katrina. Argues that an insidious racism permeated the incompetence and lack of urgency surrounding the governments’ response. Illustrated, with endnotes.

Horn, Jed. Breach of Faith: Hurricane Katrina and the Near Death of a Great American City. New York: Random House, 2006. Horn based his study mostly on interviews and goes further in time chronologically than Brinkley. Maps, end-notes, index.

Marable, Manning, and Kristen Clarke, eds. Seeking Higher Ground: The Hurricane Katrina Crisis, Race, and Public Policy Reader. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2008. A collection exploring the intersections of public policy, government, and race in the wake of Katrina. Argues that perceptions of the disaster cannot be divorced from perceptions of New Orleans as a black city.

SEE ALSO: Sept. 26, 1979: Love Canal Residents Sue Chemical Company; Dec. 16, 1982: Congress Cites Environmental Protection Agency Chief for Contempt.

September 12, 2005

WESTAR ENERGY EXECUTIVES ARE FOUND GUILTY OF LOOTING THEIR COMPANY

David Wittig, the former chief executive officer of Westar Energy, Inc., was convicted, along with a company vice president, Douglas Lake, of stealing millions of dollars from the company for personal gain. For their crimes, in which they paid themselves millions of dollars in benefits and used company-owned property for personal matters, Wittig and Lake were heavily fined and sent to prison.

LOCALE: Topeka, Kansas

CATEGORIES: Law and the courts; banking and finance; business; corruption

KEY FIGURES

David Wittig (b. 1955), chief executive officer of Westar Energy, Inc.

Douglas Lake (fl. early twenty-first century), corporate vice president of strategy at Westar

Clinton Weidner (fl. early twenty-first century), president of Capital City Bank

SUMMARY OF EVENT

David Wittig was born in the middle-class town of Prairie Village, a suburb of Kansas City, Kansas. At a young age, he excelled in school, especially in the area of advanced mathematics. He eventually won a scholarship to the University of Kansas and earned a bachelor of science degree in business administration and economics in 1977. Wittig then moved to New York City, where he began working as a stockbroker on Wall Street.

Wittig, who began working for the major Kansas-based utility company Westar Energy, Inc., in 1995, was rewarded for his aggressive business tactics with a promotion to chief executive officer (CEO) in 1998 and then chairman in 1999. For his next big acquisition, which ultimately led to his downfall, Wittig purchased 85 percent of the nation's second largest security company, Protection One, Inc., for $1 billion. He then made plans to sell Westar's electric assets to Public Service of New Mexico, a deal that would bring Westar an estimated $1 billion. This plan failed, along with another plan to purchase Kansas City Power & Light in 1999. However, the greatest problem for Westar became Protection One.

The U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) began to investigate Westar's accounting practices. Additionally, Protection One customers began to complain about their services, a direct consequence of Wittig hiring managers who did not understand the businesses they were running. While Westar was losing millions of dollars, Wittig and other company executives were amassing millions of dollars in bonuses and perks. Although these bonuses were brought to light during the second federal criminal case against Wittig, the first case against him, involved an illegal deal with a prominent Topeka, Kansas, banker in 2002.

Wittig's career on Wall Street began with the Kansas-based firm H. O. Peet & Company. Then, in 1978, he took a job with Kidder Peabody & Co. He eventually was noticed by Martin Siegel, Kidder's number-one investment banker. Siegel took Wittig under his wing and began to show him the ways of Wall Street, giving him advice on acquisitions and mergers. Siegel later left Kidder to join Drexel Burnham Lambert, Inc., and was indicted in 1987 for his involvement in the federal case against Wall Street tycoon Ivan Boesky.

Wittig stayed on at Kidder and made a name for himself as an investor. He was featured on the cover of Fortune magazine in November, 1986. The article was about young Wall Street successes who were considered to be the next elite social class in the United States. Wittig began to master the art of medium-size deals in the deregulated utility business of the 1980's. He became close friends with many corporate executives in the Midwest, who helped him on his way to business stardom.

In 1989, Wittig joined Salomon Brothers, Inc., where he shared duties as chief of mergers and acquisitions from 1991 to 1995. In 1995, he became the executive vice president for corporate strategy for Western Resources, Inc. (later named Westar). He quickly became a major player in purchasing businesses that would be free from the regulations of the utility industry. During 1996 alone, he made a hostile takeover bid for Kansas City Power & Light and bought Westinghouse Security Systems for $368 million. Additionally, Wittig attempted a hostile $2.6 billion takeover of ADT, the nation's largest residential-security company. Although Tyco International would purchase ADT, Westar netted $864 million from the sale of the ADT shares that Wittig managed to acquire before the Tyco deal.

The first federal investigation against Wittig occurred in the fall of 2002. The case centered around an illegal business deal between Wittig and the former president of Topeka's Capital City Bank, Clinton Weidner. Weidner needed a $1.5 million loan to invest in a potentially lucrative real estate project in Scottsdale, Arizona. Wittig agreed to loan Weidner the money in return for increasing Wittig's personal credit line by $1.5 million and making another $20 million in loans available to other Westar executives.

Westar Energy Executives Are Guilty of Looting

Wittig and Weidner were tried in 2003 and found guilty on July 14, 2004, of four counts of making false bank entries and one count of money laundering. Weidner was sentenced to six years and six months in federal prison. Wittig was given a lesser sentence of four years and three months and fined $1 million.

During this same time frame, Wittig and one of his vice presidents Douglas Lake, resigned from Westar amid accusations of theft of company assets and funds. Federal investigators alleged that the two former executives had undeservedly paid themselves millions of dollars in benefits and used company-owned property for personal matters. In fact, after becoming CEO of Westar, Wittig leased two luxury jets along with a full-time aviation staff. It was discovered that Wittig had inappropriately used these aircraft to take his family on numerous shopping trips to major U.S. cities and even to Europe on occasion. Westar corporate jets also were used to fly his family and friends to popular summer vacation spots, including Wittig's luxurious rental home in Southampton, New York. Furthermore, Wittig purchased and renovated the mansion of former Kansas governor Alf Landon. The renovations alone for this project cost an estimated $2 million. Additionally, Wittig had his executive office suite redesigned for $6.6 million, a bill paid for, ultimately, by investors.

In late 2004, Wittig and Lake were indicted on thirty-nine counts for looting Westar. The counts included those for conspiracy, forfeiture, circumvention of internal controls, wire fraud, and money laundering. Wittig and Lake's first trial lasted more than two months, but jurors deadlocked on many of the charges, forcing the judge to declare a mistrial in December. In the summer of 2005, a retrial led to guilty verdicts. On September 12, Wittig was convicted of thirty-nine counts and Lake was convicted of thirty. A fortieth count ordered them to forfeit the millions of dollars in stocks and cash they looted from the company.

On April 4, 2006, Wittig was sentenced to eighteen years in prison and ordered to pay a $5 million fine in addition to $14.5 million in restitution. He could have received a maximum sentence of 455 years in prison. Lake was given a fifteen-year sentence and ordered to pay $2.7 million in restitution and was fined $5 million. On January 5, 2007, an appeals court overturned their convictions, citing the government's lack of evidence on the charge that Wittig and Lake failed to comply with federal regulations in using corporate property. The court also ruled that they could not be retried on the most serious charges because of legal protections against double jeopardy. However, the court ordered a retrial on the conspiracy and circumvention charges and on the forfeiture order.

IMPACT

Wittig's crimes had a dramatic impact on the public perception of the company, investors and local citizens alike. Wittig's questionable business deals, coupled with his insatiable greed, put more than an entire company at grave financial risk; it also placed the people of Kansas at risk. Nearly two thousand local citizens worked for Westar, making the company one of the largest employers in Kansas.

Many Westar employees, along with thousands of customers, reported feelings of anger, betrayal, and sadness, the same emotions felt by workers and consumers who were robbed and deceived by corporate executives of other notable companies, such as Enron and Worldcom. However, Wittig and Lake were somewhat different from Kenneth Lay of Enron and Bernard Ebbers of WorldCom. Wittig and Lake were concerned mainly with their own personal gain and not the economic growth of their company.

As a result of the Wittig scandal, Westar implemented debt-reduction and restructuring plans. Furthermore, the company sold non-core-related assets, including Protection One and power plants in China and India, and remains an active utility provider in the Midwest.

—Paul M. Klenowski

FURTHER READING

Brickey, Kathleen. Corporate and White Collar Crime: Cases and Materials. 4th ed. New York: Aspen, 2006. This work offers insight into white-collar-criminal cases, including some that are similar in context to Wittig.

Coenen, Tracy. Essentials of Corporate Fraud. Hoboken, N.J.: John Wiley & Sons, 2008. An introductory guide to the white-collar crime of corporate fraud, written by a forensic, or investigative, accountant.

Rosoff, Stephen, Henry Pontell, and Robert Tillman. Profit Without Honor: White Collar Crime and the Looting of America. 4th ed. Upper Saddle River, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 2003. This text provides an excellent overview of white-collar crime in the United States, especially the numerous noteworthy cases of the early twenty-first century.

Steiner, George, and John Steiner. Business, Government, and Society: A Managerial Perspective. Chicago: McGraw-Hill, 2005. This book offers valuable insight into the many issues facing today's managers. Also discusses the Wittig scandal.

SEE ALSO: Mar. 29, 1962: Billie Sol Estes Is Arrested for Corporate Fraud; May 2, 1984: E. F. Hutton Executives Plead Guilty to Fraud; Jan. 15, 1988: ZZZZ Best Founder Is Indicted on Federal Fraud Charges; Mar. 29, 1989: Financier Michael Milken Is Indicted for Racketeering and Fraud; Jan. 28, 2000: John Spano Is Sentenced for Fraudulent Purchase of Ice Hockey Team; May 9, 2000: Former Louisiana Governor Edwin Edwards Is Convicted on Corruption Charges; June 25, 2002: Internal Corruption Forces Adelphia Communications to Declare Bankruptcy; Oct. 14, 2004: Insurance Brokerage Marsh & McLennan Is Charged with Fraud; Sept. 18, 2006: Newsweek Reveals That Hewlett-Packard Spied on Its Own Board.

September 30, 2005

DANISH NEWSPAPER'S PROPHET MUHAMMAD CARTOONS STIR VIOLENT PROTESTS

In response to self-censorship in Europe by those fearing reprisal for expressing an opinion on Islam, the Danish newspaper Jyllands-Posten published a cartoon feature depicting artists' conceptions of the Prophet Muhammad. Critics declared that the cartoons constituted hate speech and were insulting to Muslims. While scandalized by the publication, many Westerners were scandalized by the violence of the protests as well.

LOCALE: Copenhagen, Denmark

CATEGORIES: Publishing and journalism; religion; violence; popular culture; colonialism and imperialism; public morals

KEY FIGURES

Flemming Rose (b. 1958), editor at the Jyllands-Posten

Kåre Bluitgen (b. 1959), Danish writer

Vebjørn Selbekk (b. 1969), editor who first reprinted the cartoons

Anders Fogh Rasmussen (b. 1953), prime minister of Denmark, 2001-

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Political cartoons have a long history in Western culture, and by the early twenty-first century, almost any aspect of Western culture had become fair game for cartoonists' visual wit. Even Roman Catholic popes, patriarchs, and Jesus Christ were no longer considered sacrosanct. The first decade of the twenty-first century also marked an intensification of conflicts between Western secularism and radical Islamic fundamentalism, particularly after the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center in New York and the Pentagon in Washington, D.C.

On one hand, U.S. president George W. Bush and other Western leaders were careful to avoid any statement related to the global war on terrorism that sounded like an attack on Islam rather than on the terrorists themselves. Western leaders frequently spoke positively about Islam as a religion. By contrast, Islamic fundamentalist leaders such as Osama bin Laden had openly referred to the Islamic struggle as one against not merely Western governments but Western secularism in general, which the fundamentalists condemn as decadent and immoral.

Islamic fundamentalist leaders have a history of reacting to any criticism of Islam or its prophet, Muhammad, in a manner considered to be inappropriately defensive and thin-skinned by Western standards. To leaders such as the Ayatollah Khomeini, who issued a fatwa (Islamic religious pronouncement) of death against Indian-born British novelist Salman Rushdie for his blasphemous novel The Satanic Verses (1988), any reference to Muhammad that was not 100 percent reverential was an insult to Islam. To dare suggest that Muhammad might be imperfect or that Islam has flaws is blasphemous, and any person who does suggest these things should be destroyed.

The potential for violence and even death deeply affected writers and artists, especially those who were Muslim or who were raised in Muslim countries. Many writers and artists felt it necessary to self-censor whenever touching on subjects related to Islam, Muslims, or the Middle East, largely as a result of fear that they too might become targets of the wrath of a radical cleric or clerics. Some people, however, took the chance to voice their opinions, knowing that criticism of Islam was problematic and controversial.

In Denmark on September 17, 2005, the newspaper Jyllands-Posten (Jutland post), concerned about self-censorship among intellectuals, artists, writers, and the media on the topic of Islam, published an article examining the work of writer Kåre Bluitgen and his inability to find an illustrator for his children's book Koranen og profeten Muhammeds liv (2006; the Qur'an and the life of the Prophet Muhammad) because of fears of reprisal. On September 30, the Jyllands-Posten decided to take concrete action against that fear by publishing twelve political cartoons, commissioned by cultural editor Flemming Rose, on Muhammad and Islam. The one-page feature, “Muhammeds ansigt” (the face of Muhammad), included a cartoon that showed the prophet with a bomb in his turban and another that showed him with a crescent hanging over his turban, which could be seen either as a partial halo or a pair of devil’s horns. Other cartoons even mocked the anticipated response to the cartoons.

The text that accompanied the cartoon feature, written by Rose, highlighted an unwillingness by some Muslims to accept the concept of freedom of speech and, in particular, the idea that one must be willing to accept the speech rights of others, even if that person’s speech is offensive. The text also explained that the cartoon feature was a form of integration, that by publishing the cartoons, Muslims were being accepted into Danish society rather than treated as perpetual strangers.

The earliest objections to the cartoon feature, which came from Danish Muslims, were reasoned and peaceful, even after Vebjørn Selbekk, editor of another Danish newspaper, reprinted them in January, 2006. Critics were concerned that the cartoons unfairly stigmatized a Danish minority and placed into danger those Muslims who deplored the terrorism committed by a few coreligionists and those Muslims who wanted only to integrate peacefully into Danish society. They also suggested that the cartoons had imperialist overtones reminiscent of the late nineteenth and early twentieth century, when European great powers carved out colonial empires in the Middle East and ruled with little sensitivity to the cultures and traditions of local peoples.

The response to the cartoons turned violent, however, as some were reprinted in newspapers

Demonstrators march to the Danish embassy in London in February, 2006, months after the Danish newspaper Jyllands-Posten published political cartoons of the Prophet Muhammad. (AP/Wide World Photos) around the world. First, the reactions came in the form of public protest. In Gaza, demonstrators desecrated not only the flag of Denmark but also those of Norway, the Netherlands, and Germany. As more and more demonstrations around the world—namely in the Middle East—turned violent, hundreds of protestors were killed by police. The flames of anger were further fanned by two Danish imams who assembled a dossier of other images they considered offensive to Islam, including doctored photographs of a Muslim being mounted by a dog while praying (dogs are considered unclean animals by most Muslims). Another example in the dossier referred to a contest in France in which participants put on rubber pig snouts and squealed like hogs while wearing turbans and other garments that suggested the participants were Muslim.

The responses to the cartoons then turned official, as Muslim leaders issued death threats against the cartoonists and even offered rewards for their murder. These threats were considered sufficiently serious that the artists went into hiding. In February, 2008, three people were arrested by Danish police for conspiring to murder cartoonist Kurt Westergaard, whose work depicted the Prophet Muhammad with a bomb in his turban. Boycotts against Danish goods were answered with calls to buy Danish products as a way of showing support for free speech. Denmark's prime minister, Anders Fogh Rasmussen, refused to issue a public apology, insisting that he would not compromise Denmark's commitment to freedom of speech.

In January of 2006, the controversy had become so severe that the Jyllands-Posten published an open letter to its readers. In the letter, the editorial staff explained that the cartoons had been presented soberly as a form of political and social commentary, and that they were not intended to insult or offend. The artist who had drawn the cartoon of Muhammad wearing a turban with a bomb explained that his intent was not to attack Islam but to protest that small segment of Muslims who, by committing terrorist attacks in the name of their religion, bring disrepute upon Islam as a whole. The open letter, which Jyllands-Posten put on its Web site to make it available worldwide, failed in its intent. Many considered the letter nothing more than arrogant and self-justifying.

IMPACT

The cartoon feature reinforced perceptions already held by many. Muslims consider the cartoons further evidence that Western secular culture has no respect for the sacred, specifically the sacred in Islam, while Westerners believe the ensuing riots and protests prove that Islam is antithetical to free speech. The scandal nevertheless impacted Western reporting on Islam and representations of the sacred.

In late 2006, on the first anniversary of the publication of the controversial cartoons, related controversy erupted when a videotape of members of a right-wing political youth group showed group members drawing pictures that insulted Muslims. The artists in the group had to go into hiding because they were threatened with death.

In November of 2007, a British primary school teacher in Sudan was arrested and tried for having insulted Islam by allowing her students to name a teddy bear Muhammad as part of a class project. Although the Jyllands-Posten cartoon controversy was not specifically cited in coverage of the Sudan case, the coverage included the same themes of cultural misunderstanding, Muslim outrage, and international political pressure. The issue was further complicated because Muslims do not consider the name Muhammad too sacred for ordinary use, as long as the name is used for a person. Muhammad is believed to be a particularly lucky name (unlike many Christians who believe that the name Jesus is too sacred to be given to any child). Using the name Muhammad for a toy or animal is considered offensive.

Prophet Muhammad Cartoons Stir Violent Protests

—Leigh Husband Kimmel

FURTHER READING

- Armour, Rollin S. Islam, Christianity, and the West: A Troubled History. Maryknoll, N.Y.: Orbis Books, 2002. A Catholic perspective on the volatile history between Islam and Christianity.
- Clark, Lynn Schofield. Religion, Media, and the Marketplace. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 2007. Places the cartoon scandal within the larger context of the conflict between faith, the media, and secular market forces.
- Majid, Anouar. A Call for Heresy: Why Dissent Is Vital to Islam and America. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 2007. A moderate Muslim's critique of the position within Islam that any criticism is blasphemy.
- Muhammad, Tariq Ghazi. The Cartoons Cry. New York: AuthorHouse, 2007. Balances the public's offense at the cartoons with a consideration of how the cartoons might have revealed the fragility of Islamic civilization.
- Rose, Flemming. "Why I Published Those Cartoons." The Washington Post, February 19, 2006. The cultural editor for Jyllands-Posten discusses in this telling opinion article the reasons why he commissioned the cartoons and why the paper published them.

SEE ALSO: Mar. 26, 1922: Hindemith's Opera Sancta Susanna Depicts a Nun's Sexual Desires; Feb. 23, 1963: Play Accuses Pope Pius XII of Complicity in the Holocaust.

November 17, 2005

LIBERIAN WORKERS SUE BRIDGESTONE FIRESTONE OVER SLAVE LABOR

Workers at the world's largest rubber plantation, in Liberia, brought a federal lawsuit against their employer, Bridgestone Firestone, in a U.S. court. Organized by the International Labor Rights Fund on behalf of some six thousand people who lived and worked on the plantation, the suit alleged a litany of abuses including low wages and poor working conditions, forced labor, and the use of children as workers.

LOCALES: Harbel, Liberia; Indianapolis, Indiana

CATEGORIES: Law and the courts; colonialism and imperialism; human rights; environmental issues; business; labor; social issues and reform

KEY FIGURES

Terry Collingsworth (b. 1956), executive director of the International Labor Rights Fund
Daniel J. Adomitis (b. 1955), president of Firestone Natural Rubber Company
David F. Hamilton (b. 1957), U.S. District Court judge

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Bridgestone Firestone, the largest tire manufacturer in the world, is an American-Japanese conglomerate with head offices in Nashville, Tennessee. In addition to its tire manufacturing concerns, the company produces a host of latex products for use in industry and construction. The company was founded in Akron, Ohio, as the Firestone Tire and Rubber Company in 1900. In 1988, Firestone was bought by the Japanese tire manufacturer Bridgestone, and the company was named Bridgestone Firestone (BF) in 1990 after the two entities merged.

At the beginning of the twentieth century, the British government held a global monopoly on rubber. In an effort to supply the growing domestic automobile market with cheaper rubber, Firestone, with the encouragement and full support of the U.S.

government, explored opportunities to break Great Britain's hold on Africa. In 1926, Firestone invested in the West African nation of Liberia. It embarked on a ninety-nine-year lease with the Liberian government for a natural rubber plantation and founded the city of Harbel in Margibi County, near Monrovia. By the early twenty-first century, BF was Liberia's largest employer and held a concession on more than 1 million acres of land throughout the country. The plantation in Harbel alone measured more than 240 square miles and officially employed six thousand people.

The character of natural latex harvesting is highly labor-intensive, requiring the hand tapping of rubber trees with relatively simple tools and the collection of raw latex in portable buckets. Coupled with an impoverished local population and BF's high demand for the natural latex, perhaps it is not surprising that serious charges of abusive labor practices surfaced again in 2005. Each worker, referred to as a "tapper," had to meet a daily quota of 450 pounds of latex.

Acting on information provided by Liberian environmental law activists, Terry Collingsworth, a lawyer and executive director of the International Labor Rights Fund (ILRF; now the International Labor Rights Forum), traveled to Liberia in early October, 2005. The ILRF is a United States-based advocacy organization that focuses on working conditions and workers' rights worldwide, particularly in the developing and least developed world. Collingsworth visited the BF plantation and interviewed more than one hundred laborers about not only working conditions but also housing, sanitation, utilities, and environmental practices. Upon his return to the ILRF's offices in Washington, D.C., Collingsworth filed an Alien Tort Statute (1789) class-action lawsuit against BF on behalf of twelve adult and twenty-three child plaintiffs in the U.S. District Court in Los Angeles on November 17. The Alien Tort Statute allows non-U.S. citizens to file suit in U.S. courts for international law violations, including slavery and forced labor, that are unrecognized as law violations in the country of the plaintiff or plaintiffs.

The twelve-count claim in John Roe I et al. v. Bridgestone alleged that plantation conditions constituted forced labor because tappers labor up to fourteen hours per day and must enlist others (often children as young as six years old) as unpaid help, swelling the workforce to an estimated sixteen thousand people. For their work, the tappers earned the equivalent of $3.19 per day, before deductions. These wages were docked 50 percent if tappers failed to meet their quotas. In addition, because many of the tappers lived on the plantation, they relied upon BF for housing, food, access to water and electricity, education, and health care. If provided at all, these necessities were well below standard. In short, the lawsuit alleged that BF was engaged in modern-day slavery, forcing the Liberians to work in deplorable conditions by the coercion of poverty.

The suit against BF was filed in the United States, not Liberia, for several reasons. Principally, Collingsworth was able to bring suit in the United States not only because of the Alien Tort Statute but also because of the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2003, which, in part, created a civil right of action for human trafficking victims in U.S. courts, irrespective of geographic location of the offense or the nationality of victims or perpetrators. Furthermore, by filing in the United States, Collingsworth hoped to protect the plaintiffs (identified only as John, James, and Jane Roe) and the other plantation workers from retribution and a corrupt legal system in Liberia.

Predictably, BF responded immediately and aggressively to the allegations, employing its substantial legal and public relations resources. In addition to standardized sound bites from a host of BF media liaisons, Firestone Natural Rubber Company president Daniel J. Adomitis was frequently cited in the media not only disputing the veracity of the charges and expostulating on the company's corporate beneficence but also alleging that the ILRF was more interested in generating media attention than in serving the interests of Liberian rubber workers.

On the legal front, BF's team of attorneys simultaneously filed motions to transfer the venue from California to the Southern District of Indiana and to dismiss the case. The court granted the motion to transfer venue based on the case's lack of connection to California and the fact that the company's headquarters are located within the jurisdiction of the Southern District of Indiana. However, the court did not address BF's motion to dismiss.

The case was heard by Judge David F. Hamilton. Again, BF filed a motion to dismiss, for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction. The court denied the motion. On June 26, 2007, the court decided the matter, largely in favor of BF, and dismissed eleven of the twelve counts. In his ruling, Judge Hamilton deemed that the adult workers' principal claim of forced labor in violation of international law was undermined by their allegations that they are afraid of losing the same jobs they claim they are being forced to perform. Furthermore, his decision specified that forced labor cannot be equated only with low wages and difficult working conditions. In short, it was the opinion of the court that the adults' working conditions on the plantation, while harsh, did not violate the specific, universal, and obligatory norms of forced labor under international law.

Workers in Liberia carry buckets of newly tapped rubber over long distances at Firestone's vast estate in 1978. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

In a victory for the ILRF and its plaintiffs, however, the count pertaining to the child workers survived the legal challenge. Hamilton determined that BF actively encouraged parents to require children to work full-time at dangerous jobs on the plantation. The case continued as one of forced child labor.

IMPACT

The allegations that prompted the lawsuit had an immediate impact. Though the treatment of workers on Liberian rubber plantations has been suspect from the early 1930's, when it was first investigated by the League of Nations, the dire conditions have remained largely unknown in North America to all but a small cohort of labor and human rights attorneys, environmentalists, and developing-world solidarity activists.

The ILRF's case has garnered the renewed attention of the United Nations and alerted people in the developed world to the human and social costs of postcolonialism and to cases of corruption and abuse by multinational corporations. More directly, the scrutiny of BF has driven the company to address a host of labor and related issues in Liberia, including better enforcement of the company's own labor regulations, improved basic services on the plantation, and a greater investment in the commitment to provide education and training for the populace. On August 6, 2008, BF signed an agreement with the Firestone Agricultural Workers Union of Liberia to provide incremental wage increases and other benefits. The agreement marked the first such accord between the company and its plantation workers in Liberia.

—Stephen L. Muzzatti

FURTHER READING

Hecht, Susanna B., and Alexander Cockburn. The Fate of the Forest Developers, Destroyers, and Defenders of the Amazon. London: Verso, 1989. Employing an environmental humanism paradigm, the authors address the problems of natural-resource harvesting. Though the focus is on South America, the book does draw upon examples from elsewhere in the developing world.

Mullins, Christopher W., and Dawn L. Rothe. Power, Bedlam, and Bloodshed: State Crime in Post-colonial Africa. New York: Peter Lang, 2008. An overview of violations of international criminal law in postcolonial African states. Focuses on how crimes arise from a postcolonial environment and the potential remedies offered by international social control.

United Nations Mission in Liberia. Human Rights in Liberia's Rubber Plantations: Tapping into the Future. Monrovia, Liberia: United Nations, 2006. The final report of a study conducted by the U.N. human rights and protection section that highlights poverty and human-rights violations in Liberia's agricultural sector.

SEE ALSO: Nov. 15, 1908: Belgium Confiscates Congo Free State from King Leopold II; 1930: Liberia Is Accused of Selling Its Own Citizens into Slavery; Late 1955: British Atrocities in Kenya's Mau Mau Rebellion Are Revealed; Oct. 20, 1978: Firestone Recalls Millions of Defective Car Tires; June 4, 1979: South African President B. J. Vorster Resigns in Muldergate Scandal.

December 6, 2005

SPOKANE, WASHINGTON, MAYOR RECALLED IN GAY-SEX SCANDAL

Spokane mayor James E. West was a conservative Republican Washington State senator and a staunch leader against gay and lesbian rights while in the legislature. In May, 2005, local media reported that West had chatted online with a seventeen-year-old boy about having sex with him. The media also said that West had sexually molested boys years earlier and that he had been having sex with young men whom he met on the Web. West was recalled from office in 2005.

LOCALE: Spokane, Washington

CATEGORIES: Sex crimes; sex; corruption; politics; law and the courts; families and children; public morals; publishing and journalism

KEY FIGURES

James E. West (1951-2006), mayor of Spokane, Washington, 2003-2005

Shannon Sullivan (b. c. 1968), leader of the recall campaign against West

Ryan Oelrich (b. 1980 or 1981), a beneficiary of West's political favors

SUMMARY OF EVENT

In May, 2005, the Spokane Spokesman-Review broke a story that it had been investigating for a considerable time. Mayor James E. West, a conservative Republican, was accused of attempting to elicit sexual favors on the Web from a young man in return for an internship at Spokane City Hall. What made this accusation even more startling was that in his twenty-plus years in the Washington State legislature, West had been a staunch voice against gay and lesbian rights. Among the causes he had championed were barring gays and lesbians from working in schools, day-care centers, and some state agencies, and defining marriage as a union only between a man and a woman.

In his powerful post as Washington senate majority leader, West had effectively killed a bill that would have banned discrimination against gays. He also introduced legislation outlawing sexual intercourse between consenting teenagers. Additionally, as mayor of Spokane, he indicated that he would veto a measure to offer benefits to domestic partners of city employees. Although some of his family-values causes never became law, they were indicative of West's political leanings and presumptive evidence of his hypocrisy.

One of the most shocking aspects of the breaking story was that it involved a boy whom West believed to be only seventeen years old. In reality, the event was a sting; the presumed teenager with whom he had been in contact was someone hired by the Spokesman-Review. During one of their online chats, for which he called himself Right Bi-Guy, the mayor admonished the youth to remember that he was "very closeted" and that no one knew he liked men sexually.

The Spokesman-Review published the Web exchanges in copious detail. Even more seriously, the article accused the mayor of having molested at least two young Cub Scouts (both of whom later became convicted felons) almost twenty-five years earlier when he was a sheriff's deputy. To minimize the damage, West immediately issued a statement apologizing for the "shame" he brought to the city but vigorously denied any molestation. He did resign from a Boy Scouts council and admitted to frequenting gay Web sites and having sexual relations with adult men. Although denying he was gay, he did allow that he might be bisexual. (He had married at a relatively late age, was in that relationship for about five years, and then was divorced.)

Despite the accusations against him, West vowed to complete the mayoral term to which he had been elected in 2003, the same year he was diagnosed with colon cancer. Among the accusations was that he had promised city jobs to those with whom he hoped to have sex. One person who received a city job in exchange for sex was twenty-four-year-old Ryan Oelrich, whom the mayor did appoint to Spokane's Human Rights Commission. Oelrich resigned after six months because he claimed West would not stop pressuring him for sex. Eventually, the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) stepped in to investigate the charges of public corruption.

Although West believed that he was safely closeted, rumors about his sexuality had existed for many years. In general, outrage against the mayor greeted the article, but there were people who questioned its timing. Some thought it had political overtones, and there were those who thought it was unfair entrapment. West threatened to sue the paper for invasion of privacy, but he did not do so. After admitting to the sexual indiscretions, he defended his prior antigay opinions as representing the will of the constituents who had elected him and said they were not necessarily his own beliefs. He also expressed regret about the way he had voted on some of these issues. At a news conference, he averred that the events had "helped me straighten out my personal life" but also complained he had been "brutally outed."

Shortly after the allegations surfaced, Mayor West said he would take a short leave of absence to fight the molestation charges. During an appearance on NBC television's The Today Show, he again claimed that he was just following the will of the voters in his antigay proposals. The city of Spokane began looking into West's use of city computers and e-mail accounts. It hired an independent investigator, who determined that West had violated city policy when he downloaded images from a gay Web site onto his office computer. The police did not immediately comment on any possible criminal charges resulting from his actions. For one thing, the statute of limitations for molestation had expired.

Although fellow Republicans and Spokane city leaders distanced themselves from the mayor, they did not push for his resignation. It was left to a single citizen, Shannon Sullivan, to instigate a recall petition. She gathered more than the required 12,600 valid signatures. The thirty-seven-year-old mother maintained it was not an antigay move but that she just wanted a mayor whom her young son could be proud of. A Superior Court judge ruled against two counts of the petition but left a third intact. West then appealed to the Washington State Supreme Court, which ruled against him. Although not a lawyer, Sullivan herself had made the oral arguments before the court. A special mail-in recall election was then ordered and held on December 6, 2005.

During the recall campaign against him, West had few public defenders, but when a gay rights group offered him a forum to tell his side of the story, he declined. West was recalled from office by a 65 to 35 percent margin (approximately 40,000 votes for the recall and 21,500 against it). Sometime before his death from colon cancer at the age of fifty-five in July, 2006, West told a Seattle newspaper that he no longer visited gay Web sites and had been refraining from gay sex. This revelation could well be related to his hopes to run for office again.

IMPACT

Toward the end of his life, West still hoped to be rehabilitated, but his political career was finished. Although he had characterized being the mayor of Spokane as his "dream job," he apparently harbored ambitions to run for governor. (He did run for lieutenant governor in 1996 but was defeated in his party's primary.) The Republican leadership of Washington State avowed that the scandal would not reflect on their party, but it is possible that some political fallout resulted. Another right-leaning antigay conservative within the party was revealed to be a hypocrite on the issue.

The local lesbian and gay community used the West scandal to demonstrate the damage that being closeted caused to those who felt they had to conceal their sexuality. They also wanted to highlight the hypocrisy of those politicians who espoused family-values rhetoric in public but who lived very different—indeed, deeply opposed—lives in private. This case engendered much discussion in Spokane about the problems that gays and lesbians faced. A gay spokesperson said that the city had learned that "lives lived in dishonesty are lives not well-lived."

Overall, the gay and lesbian communities in Spokane and elsewhere were generally less than sympathetic to West. The Advocate, a leading gay news periodical, decried as “pathetic” those people, including West, who denied their sexuality.

—Roy Liebman

FURTHER READING

Breslau, Karen. “Spokane: A Mom vs. a Mayor.” Newsweek, August 29, 2005. A fuller account of Sullivan’s recall petition drive and her appearance delivering oral arguments before the state supreme court.

Egan, Timothy. “Spokane Mayor, Caught in Sex Sting, Is Ousted in Vote That May Advance Gay Rights.” The New York Times, December 8, 2005. The recall election of December 6 spelled the end of West’s career. Another recap of the scandal.

Kaushik, Umesh Kher. “Exposed in Spokane.” Time, May 23, 2005. A report on the exposé by the Spokane Spokesman-Review, which brought to the public’s attention the sexual hypocrisy of Mayor West and accused him of molesting boys many years earlier.

Saskal, Rich. “Spokane Recall Ruling.” The Bond Buyer, August 26, 2005. News story on the Washington State Supreme Court clearing the way for Shannon Sullivan to begin collecting signatures for a recall election against West.

_____. “West Taking Leave.” The Bond Buyer, May 15, 2005. After a local Spokane newspaper broke a sex scandal implicating Mayor James West, he announced that he would take a leave of absence to prepare his defense.

Spokane Mayor Recalled in Gay-Sex Scandal

Savage, Dan. “No Excuses for West.” The Advocate, January 31, 2006. A gay columnist’s opinion piece about the West scandal and a look back at how gays of his generation coped with being forced to remain in the closet.

Williams, Juliet A., and Paul Apostolidis, eds. Public Affairs: Politics in the Age of Sex Scandals. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 2004. Provides a context for the West case by examining other sex scandals involving political figures.

SEE ALSO: Oct. 7, 1964: President Lyndon B. Johnson’s Aide Is Arrested in Gay-Sex Sting; Oct. 25, 1974: Evangelist Billy James Hargis Resigns College Presidency During Gay-Sex Scandal; Sept. 3, 1980: Congressman Bauman Is Arrested for Liaison with Teenage Boy; July 20, 1982: Conservative Politician John G. Schmitz Is Found to Have Children Out of Wedlock; July 20, 1983: Congress Members Censured in House-Page Sex Scandal; Jan. 18, 1990: Washington, D.C., Mayor Marion Barry Is Arrested for Drug Use; May 2, 2000: New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani’s Extramarital Affair Is Revealed; Oct. 2, 2003: Newspaper Claims That Arnold Schwarzenegger Groped Women; Sept. 29, 2006: Congressman Mark Foley Resigns in Sex Scandal Involving a Teenage Page; Nov. 2, 2006: Male Escort Reveals Sexual Liaisons with Evangelist Ted Haggard; July 11, 2007: Florida Politician Is Arrested for Soliciting an Undercover Male Police Officer; Mar. 12, 2008: New York Governor Eliot Spitzer Resigns in Prostitution Scandal.

January 21, 2006

BRITISH POLITICIAN RESIGNS AFTER GAY-SEX ORGY

Politician Mark Oaten, an up-and-coming Liberal Democrat, was forced to relinquish his seat in the British parliament when it was revealed that he had been linked with male prostitutes and participated in gay orgies. He attributed his behavior to a midlife crisis instigated by the aging process, including the rapid loss of his hair.

LOCALE: London, EnglandCATEGORIES: Prostitution; government; politics; sex; public moralsKEY FIGURES

Mark Oaten (b. 1964), member of the British parliament

Tomasz (b. c. 1980), prostitute and former ballet dancer from Poland

Belinda Oaten (b. 1968), Mark Oaten's wife

SUMMARY OF EVENT

In January of 2006, the British tabloid News of the World published a story about the sexual peccadilloes of forty-one-year-old Mark Oaten, a Liberal Democrat member of Parliament (MP) from the constituency of Winchester, England. The titillating account described his six-month liaison with a "rent boy," the English term for a male prostitute. Identified only as Tomasz, the latter was allegedly a former ballet dancer from Poland.

It was reported that Tomasz also occasionally participated in orgies with the MP along with at least two other rent boys. The article cited "a bizarre sex act too revolting to describe" as one of Oaten's predilections. This bizarre act was later determined to involve coprophilia, a rather extreme form of sexual gratification or humiliation, or both. He also had a predilection for having the rent boys dress in soccer uniforms.

Oaten was an ambitious up-and-coming politician when the scandal broke. Born in the small town of Watford, England, he worked in public relations and as a lobbyist before entering politics when he was elected to the Watford District Council. At the age of twenty-two, he was one of the youngest town council members in England. His eight-year service apparently gave him a taste for higher office. In 1992, he ran unsuccessfully for Parliament, but it was only a temporary setback. Five years later he won a seat for the Liberal Democrats by the very narrowest of margins—two votes—by unseating the Conservative incumbent in his new constituency of Winchester, the home of the famous cathedral.

Not unexpectedly, such a narrow voting margin was challenged, and the election was rerun. This time Oaten triumphed by the convincing margin of more than twenty-one thousand votes. His political career seemed assured. He was reelected in 2001 and 2005, albeit by decreasing margins of victory, and was considered one of the future leading lights of his party's right wing. Among his posts were those as party spokesperson for disabilities and membership on the foreign affairs and defense team.

Ultimately, Oaten became the chairman of the Parliamentary Liberal Democrats. He served in other capacities as well before becoming the party's shadow home secretary, a sign of the esteem in which the party held him. In late 2005, the alcoholism of the Liberal Democrats' leader, Charles Kennedy, was revealed and the party fell into crisis. Oaten, although publicly supporting Kennedy, was seen as maneuvering to succeed him behind the scenes.

In January, 2006, Oaten declared himself in the running for the position of party leader. If successful he would be in line to be prime minister should his perennially also-ran party ever form a government. Just a week later, Oaten withdrew from his leadership quest amid increasing rumors about his private life, although he claimed he withdrew because he did not have adequate support from his party. On January 21 the gathering storm broke with the publication of the News of the World story about Oaten's gay sex life.

The married father of two daughters, Oaten had used his seemingly staid “family man” image to his political advantage. He was now reviled as a hypocrite. Additionally, he had previously criticized a judge who had been fired for cavorting with rent boys. Although he would confess only to “errors in judgment,” Oaten later blamed his misfortune on a midlife crisis, examples of which were the rapid loss of his hair and turning forty years of age. He did not admit to being gay even though he apparently had been a habitué of male prostitutes for at least one and one-half years before being discovered. One of the prostitutes was quoted as saying that the MP was “a very troubled man leading a very dangerous double life.”

For a while after the scandal began developing, Oaten had to weather being the object of scatological jokes. One joke asked how he and Charles Kennedy were alike. The punch line (referring to one’s assumed sexual practice and the other’s alcoholism) was “They both like to get s—t-faced in the evening.” Oaten also was derided a few months after the scandal for apparently trading in on his notoriety by appearing on a daytime-television fitness program.

Oaten apparently rose above his problems and, even though no longer in government, he staged a modest comeback. He became active in prison reform circles and became a member of the Council of Europe and the Western European Union. He also lectured on politics at Oxford University and at universities in the United States. Oaten’s well-received book, Coalition: The Politics and Personalities of Coalition Government from 1850, was published in 2007.

IMPACT

Oaten’s own political career lay in ruins. He resigned his party posts and said he would not run again for his Parliament seat in the next election; he stood very little chance of winning, according to polling data. His disgrace affected his party as well; the so-called “Oaten effect” was blamed for his party’s loss of the majority on the Winchester Council.

This scandal, coming just two weeks after party leader Kennedy’s resignation, greatly harmed the Liberal Democrats. Their ratings in the polls dropped to the lowest level in eight years, and it was reported that the second-place Conservative Party was hoping to gain some defectors from its ranks.

On a personal level, Oaten’s marriage of thirteen years was severely affected, and his wife vented her anguish in public. Unlike many political wives in the United States whose husbands have been involved in scandal—such as the spouse of former New York governor Eliot L. Spitzer—Oaten’s wife, Belinda, at first declined to play the role of the supportive spouse. According to Oaten himself, his statuesque wife threw her wedding rings at him and struck him several times. To journalists she declared that his betrayal had plunged her into “unimaginable horror.” They did reconcile later, but not until after Belinda Oaten had taken the children and left home for a period of time.

The gay community in Great Britain was somewhat energized by this case. Even though Oaten did not actually come out as gay, or even as bisexual, at least one politically active gay organization in England challenged his party. The group stated that other members of the gay-friendly Liberal Democrats should now take the opportunity to go public with their own homosexuality.

—Roy Liebman

FURTHER READING

“Mark Oaten to Withdraw from Lib Dem Leader Race.” Daily Telegraph, January 19, 2006. Just before the story broke about Mark Oaten’s sexual peccadilloes, he announced he was withdrawing from the race to succeed Charles Kennedy as the Liberal Democrat Party leader.

Oaten, Mark. Coalition: The Politics and Personalities of Coalition Government from 1850. Petersfield, England: Harriman House, 2007. Political lessons to be learned from the activities of Great Britain’s coalition governments beginning with the prime ministry of Benjamin Disraeli to the first years of the twenty-first century.

Parris, Matthew. “Oaten May Have Taken a Stupid Risk, but That Doesn’t Mean He’s Stupid.” The Spectator, January 28, 2006. Analysis of why politicians take foolhardy risks. The author concludes that their personalities lend themselves to acts of daring and risk-taking and the belief that they will never be caught.

Thurlbeck, Neville. "Lib-Dem Oaten's Three-in-Bed-Rent-Boy Shame." News of the World, January 21, 2006. The account of Mark Oaten's months-long relationship with a male prostitute and, on occasion, other rent boys, and a veiled but censorious account of the "degrading" sexual practices in which they engaged.

SEE ALSO: Mar. 2-Sept. 25, 1963: John Profumo Affair Rocks British Government; Aug. 4, 1978: British Politician Jeremy Thorpe Is Charged with Attempted Murder; Oct. 14, 1983: British Cabinet Secretary Parkinson Resigns After His Secretary Becomes Pregnant; July 25, 1987: Novelist-Politician Jeffrey Archer Wins Libel Trial Against the Daily Star; Dec. 18, 1989: Prince Charles's Intimate Phone Conversation with Camilla Parker Bowles Is Taped; Aug. 23, 1992: Princess Diana's Phone Conversation with Her Lover Is Made Public; Sept. 24, 1992: British Cabinet Member David Mellor Resigns over Romantic Affair; Jan. 5, 1994: British Cabinet Member Resigns After Fathering a Child Out of Wedlock; Aug. 31, 1997: Princess Diana Dies in a Car Crash; Sept. 28, 2002: British Politician Reveals Her Affair with Prime Minister John Major; Apr. 26, 2006: Britain's Deputy Prime Minister Admits Affair with Secretary.

March 14, 2006

DUKE LACROSSE PLAYERS ARE ACCUSED OF GANG RAPE

The Duke University men's lacrosse team received scandalous national attention when an exotic dancer accused three of the team's players of raping her during a party. The case led to heated public debate about rape, racism, and press coverage. It also led to the firing of the team's head coach, to the cancellation of the lacrosse team's season, to the disbaring and public disgrace of the prosecutor, to the exoneration of the three indicted players, and to civil lawsuits.

LOCALE: Durham, North Carolina

CATEGORIES: Law and the courts; sex crimes; publishing and journalism; women's issues; racism; social issues and reform; education

KEY FIGURES

Crystal Gail Mangum (b. 1979), exotic dancer and North Carolina Central University student Mike Nifong (b. 1950), Durham, North Carolina, district attorney

Reade Seligmann (b. 1985), Duke lacrosse player
Collin Finnerty (b. 1986), Duke lacrosse player
David Evans (b. 1984), Duke lacrosse player
Mike Pressler (b. 1960), Duke lacrosse team head coach
Richard H. Brodhead (b. 1947), president of Duke

SUMMARY OF EVENT

On the evening of March 13, 2006, the student body of Duke University had been enjoying spring break. Remaining on the Durham, North Carolina, campus were members of the university's lacrosse team, which had games scheduled during the break. Players gathered at the rented house of a teammate at 610 West Buchanan Boulevard, opposite Duke's east campus. The house was owned by the university.

Earlier in the day, team member Dan Flannery hired two exotic dancers to provide entertainment for a party scheduled for that evening. Kim Roberts, who was African American-Asian, and Crystal Gail Mangum, who was African American, were set to arrive at the party at 11 p.m. They were scheduled to dance for two hours and were paid eight hundred dollars in advance for their services. Kim (the two dancers used their first names only when working) arrived shortly after the scheduled time and Crystal arrived shortly before midnight. By that time the party was well under way, and many members of the team had been drinking for some time.

Shortly after midnight, Crystal and Kim locked themselves in the house's only bathroom before leaving the house around 12:20 on the morning of March 14. Kim left the property entirely but Crystal, a student at North Carolina Central University, also in Durham, remained in the yard. Perhaps intoxicated, she was photographed lying on her side at 12:37, having fallen down. At 12:41, she was photographed as she entered a car belonging to Kim, who had returned to the property. At 12:53, Kim called 911 complaining that men outside the house were shouting racial epithets at them. Two police cars arrived within five minutes, but because all was quiet, they left the residence.

At 1:22, Kim again called the police because Crystal was drunk and unconscious in her black Honda. The police arrived, removed Crystal from Kim's car, and took her to Duke University Medical Center, where, during initial screening, Crystal answered "yes" when asked whether she had been raped. One hour later, she told a police officer that she had not been raped. He called headquarters to inform the watch commander that Crystal withdrew her rape allegation. However, Crystal then told a sexual-abuse nurse that she had been raped, so her accusation of rape was not withdrawn by police.

Although Crystal's account was inconsistent, the rape charge was investigated nonetheless. On March 16, the accuser was asked to identify the alleged rapists from photographs of all forty-six members of the lacrosse team. She singled out three white men. One of the men, Reade Seligmann, had a persuasive alibi and could prove that he was not in the house at the time the rape allegedly took place. He had left the house and was taped by a surveillance camera using an automatic teller machine (ATM) some distance from Buchanan Boulevard,

Duke Lacrosse Players Are Accused of Gang Rape

Duke University lacrosse player Reade Seligmann, right, speaks with his attorney in court in Durham, North Carolina, on May 18, 2006. Seligmann and two teammates were indicted for rape but were later exonerated. (AP/Wide World Photos) the site of the party. His ATM transaction was made at 12:24 a.m. on March 14.

As the case developed, all forty-six lacrosse players voluntarily provided DNA samples to investigators. These samples were compared to the DNA collected from semen that was in Crystal's vagina and on her underclothing the night of the alleged rape. The samples from the lacrosse players did not match the DNA of the semen, suggesting that Crystal had sexual intercourse—consensual or by means of rape—with someone on the evening in question, but not with any of the accused.

Duke University president Richard H. Brodhead first heard of the accusations on March 20. On March 24, Coach Mike Pressler met with Duke administrators and supported the accused players. The following day, Brodhead met with advisers to discuss how best to handle the case. On March 28, Brodhead suspended the lacrosse team pending the outcome of the investigation.

Mike Nifong, acting Durham County district attorney at the time of the incident, was running for election as district attorney. He was courting the black vote, so he had a personal interest in impressing the black community with his ability to serve their interests. As he became more fully involved in the case, he won increasing support among black voters. He capitalized on the strained relations between Duke, often portrayed as a rich person's school, and the surrounding, somewhat impoverished, black community.

By March 29, the Duke scandal had received national attention when it was reported in a front-page article in The New York Times. On that day, Brodhead met with members of the Duke faculty senate, who urged him to suspend the lacrosse team, dissolve the lacrosse program, and fire coach Pressler. On April 5, Brodhead canceled the team's season and demanded that Pressler resign. The following day, eighty-eight members of the Duke faculty signed a statement condemning the alleged gang rape and published their statement in the Duke Chronicle.

On April 17, players Collin Finnerty and Seligmann were indicted on charges of first-degree forcible rape, first-degree sexual offense, and kidnapping. If found guilty, the two would have received life sentences. Senior player David Evans received his bachelor's degree on May 14 and was indicted the following day on similar charges.

As the case proceeded, Nifong's prosecution turned scandalous. He withheld from defense counsel such items as the surveillance videotape showing Seligmann using the ATM at the time the alleged rape occurred. He minimized the importance of inconsistencies in Crystal's account of the alleged rape. Most critically, he withheld the results of the DNA tests that would have instantly exonerated all three defendants.

Four days before the election, the judge in the case ordered Nifong to turn over the DNA results to the defense, but Nifong ignored this order. On November 7, he won the election. Glaring irregularities in the prosecution's case increasingly became apparent, and the rape charges against the three defendants were dropped on December 22.

On December 28, the North Carolina State Bar filed ethics charges against Nifong, claiming in its report that his conduct in the case was "prejudicial to the administration of justice." The bar's report also said that Nifong had engaged in "conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit, or misrepresentation."

Nifong was sworn in as district attorney on January 2, 2007. Ten days later, he asked North Carolina attorney general Roy Cooper to take over the case. On June 16, Nifong was disbarred. In April, all remaining charges against the players were dropped by Cooper. In August, Nifong was sentenced to one day in jail and fined $500 for criminal contempt of court.

IMPACT

The initial scandal in this case was the gang rape allegations against three Duke lacrosse players. As the case moved forward, the scandal grew to include the university's rush to judgment in canceling the lacrosse season, suspending players, firing the team's head coach, and issuing a statement by its faculty senate that condemned the alleged gang rape. President Brodhead acted precipitously in suspending Finnerty and Seligmann without convincing evidence that they were guilty. The forced resignation of Coach Pressler, who helped raise the team to national prominence during his sixteen years at Duke, was brought about by external pressures and the fear of bad publicity such a case would bring to the university. Even had the three players been found guilty, Pressler's forced resignation would have been unjustified.

Even more scandalous was the self-serving prosecution of the case by a civil servant—acting district attorney Nifong—who was desperately attempting to establish his worth as a politician. His unethical actions came close to destroying the lives of three innocent university students. In the end, Duke University was forced to pay damages to those harmed by the case. Durham County and Nifong were sued for damages as well.

—R. Baird Shuman

FURTHER READING

Bernstein, Viv, and Joe Drape. "Rape Allegation Against Athletes Is Roiling Duke." The New York Times, March 29, 2006. The first national story about the scandal.

Nelson, Michael. "Bad Call." Chronicle of Higher Education, October 6, 2007. An insightful consideration of the role that stereotypes played in the scandal.

Smolkin, Rachel. "Justice Delayed." American Journalism Review, August-September, 2007. An analysis of the news media's response to the gang rape allegations. Critical of the press's rush to condemn and its assumptions of guilt in the case.

Taylor, Stuart, Jr., and K. C. Johnson. Until Proven Innocent: Political Correctness and the Shameful Injustices of the Duke Lacrosse Rape Case.

Deputy Prime Minister Admits Affair with Secretary

New York: St. Martin's Press, 2007. An examination of the accusations of rape and of the refusal of the prosecutor to accept incontrovertible evidence of their innocence.

Yaeger, Don, with Mike Pressler. It's Not About the Truth: The Untold Story of the Duke Lacrosse Case and the Lives It Shattered. New York: Threshold Editions, 2007. An intimate look into the scandal as told by coach Mike Pressler to writer Don Yaeger.

SEE ALSO: Mar. 30, 1931: "Scottsboro Boys" Are Railroaded Through Rape Trials; Mar. 13, 1964: Kitty Genovese Dies as Her Cries for Help Are Ignored; Nov. 28, 1987: Black Teenager Claims to Have Been Gang-Raped by Police Officers; Mar. 30, 1991: William Kennedy Smith Is Accused of Rape; Sept. 22, 1997: Sportscaster Marv Albert Is Tried for Sexual Assault; July 1, 2003: Basketball Star Kobe Bryant Is Accused of Rape; June 13, 2008: Singer R. Kelly Is Acquitted on Child Pornography Charges.

April 26, 2006

BRITAIN'S DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER ADMITS AFFAIR WITH SECRETARY

After Deputy Prime Minister John Prescott admitted that he had a two-year affair with his secretary, Tracey Temple, she went public with her story and maintained that he used his power to get her into a sexual relationship, and that the two often had sex in his office. This abuse of power constituted sexual harassment, but the media focused on the relationship.

LOCALE: London, England

CATEGORIES: Sex; sex crimes; government; politics; public morals; women's issues

KEY FIGURES

John Prescott (b. 1938), British deputy prime minister, 1997-2007

Tracey Temple (b. 1962), Prescott's diary secretary

Tony Blair (b. 1953), British prime minister, 1997-2007

SUMMARY OF EVENT

John Prescott had been a key figure in Tony Blair's Labour Party government since the election of 1997. Before this time, Prescott was a combative figure in union affairs and in public debates with Conservatives. He had moved from old-style Labour to join Blair's New Labour, and for this he was valued by the new prime minister. He had been a senior cabinet minister, first as combined transport and environment minister, then picking up the employment portfolio. In 1997, he succeeded Michael Heseltine as deputy prime minister.

In late 2002, Prescott began an affair with his newly appointed diary secretary, Tracey Temple, an affair that lasted about two years. Temple was thirty-seven years old and Prescott was sixty-one. However, it was not until 2006, some two years after the affair had ended, that Temple decided to go to Max Clifford, a leading British publicist, with her story. Clifford negotiated a $500,000 deal with the Daily Mail to buy her story. It was published on Sunday, April 30. The popular and competitive Sunday papers in Britain have traditionally given themselves over to scandal of all kinds, and they are always prepared to pay large sums for any story about the disgrace of a public figure. The Prescott story filled nine pages.

Prescott discovered the immanent deal between Temple and the newspaper, a deal not completed until Saturday, April 29. He decided to go public first, and on April 26 admitted to his two-year affair. Prescott's admission was followed on the Saturday of the deal with a television interview of Temple, in which she stated that she had to let people know the truth, but added, "But I never, ever thought I would actually have to do anything like this." She claimed that news of the affair was going to break anyway, that she had had minimal support from Prescott, and therefore she had decided to make her move. She claimed to have been manipulated and said that falsehoods about her were circulating.

Prescott himself denounced the publication of her story and the press's raking through details of politicians' private lives, and he also accused Temple of making up much of it. He threatened to sue. Much of this could be seen as typical bluster. More significant, the government immediately announced its continuing support for Prescott, claiming he still had a vital role to play and that the affair was a private matter that had no effect on the course of government.

The material Temple supplied to the Daily Mail was based on a diary she had kept, which was frequently quoted by the newspaper. The most sensational part of the diary was the rendezvous the lovers kept, which were often in government buildings or buildings occupied by Prescott on a "grace and favor" lease as part of his job. Thus, they met in his apartment in Admiralty Arch, just down the road from Whitehall, where Prescott had his office. Some of the affair was conducted in his own office, while his staff were working outside, sometimes even with the door open. More damaging, she claimed they had sex immediately after a significant public event: a memorial service for the war in Iraq, held in St. Paul's Cathedral, London, in October, 2003. They also had sex in a hotel room while Prescott's wife, Pauline, was waiting downstairs.

Prescott had made little attempt to be discreet about the relationship. He invited Temple to escort his wife to the state opening of Parliament in 2002, soon after the affair had begun at a Christmas party. This was an inappropriate invitation, given that Temple was only his diary secretary, a somewhat junior position. He had also engaged in sexual banter with her in front of other colleagues and had caressed her in public elevators in his office building.

Temple stated that she enjoyed the attention. Her boyfriend at the time, Barrie Williams, had more to tell another popular newspaper, the Daily Mirror. He stated that Temple's sexual appetite was large, and after a few drinks she became very adventurous and flirtatious. He had been quite unaware of the affair, even though Temple asked him to marry her just after embarking on the affair with Prescott. He thought Temple had reveled in her power, though she explicitly denied this.

IMPACT

The immediate impact of the scandal for Temple was that she was shifted to a minor position as a gardener for two months. She was then given a low-key post at the University of Westminster. Finally, in January, 2007, she was given back her old job in the deputy prime minister's office, but with no immediate contact with Prescott. In fact, very soon after, Prescott resigned and was not involved with the cabinet of the new prime minister, Gordon Brown.

For Prescott, the scandal could have cost him his job. He held a delicate position in the government, as a sort of point of contact between Blair and his chancellor, Brown. While not in Blair's innermost circle of advisers, Prescott was in a very senior position. Although there was no breach of security, and none suggested, he did become something of a figure of fun as a result of the affair, and he lost a good deal of credibility. Previous displays of inappropriate behavior made Prescott something of a liability for a while, but Blair was typically loyal to old colleagues and was prepared to protect him.

Prescott's forty-four-year marriage remained intact, though there were stories of Pauline Prescott's fury over the affair. Prescott himself asked for privacy for his family, though a television comedy about the affair, Confessions of a Diary Secretary (February, 2007), was hardly the answer he wanted. Rumors of an earlier affair threatened but never came to light. Prescott was thus able to remain in office.

For the government, the affair came on the heels of other embarrassing faux pas, especially the Home Office minister's admission that criminals recommended for deportation at the end of their prison sentence were not being sent back to their country of origin, and earlier sexual scandals involving Robin Cook, a former foreign secretary, and others. Many believed that Blair was losing his grip on his government ministers. However, Blair kept his equilibrium and resigned in 2007, a time of his choosing, after ten years in power.

—David Barratt

FURTHER READING

Brown, Colin. Fighting Talk: Biography of John Prescott. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1997. An account of Prescott's early rise to power, from a ship's steward to union organizer and from Old Labour to New Labour. However, the account predates his rise to deputy prime minister and the Temple affair.

Deputy Prime Minister Admits Affair with Secretary

Mackenzie, Kelvin. The John Prescott Kama Sutra. London: John Blake, 2006. An example of Prescott becoming a figure of fun after the affair. In this spoof, the author revisits the sites where Prescott and Temple had sex.

Seldon, Anthony. Blair's Britain, 1997-2007. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2007. This magisterial work gives the fullest account of the Blair years and Prescott's place within them.

"We Made Love in John's Office." The Mail on Sunday (London), April 29, 2006. The news article that continued the story of Prescott's affair with Temple.

SEE ALSO: Mar. 2-Sept. 25, 1963: John Profumo Affair Rocks British Government; Oct. 14, 1983: British Cabinet Secretary Parkinson Resigns After His Secretary Becomes Pregnant; July 25, 1987: Novelist-Politician Jeffrey Archer Wins Libel Trial Against the Daily Star; Dec. 18, 1989: Prince Charles's Intimate Phone Conversation with Camilla Parker Bowles Is Taped; Aug. 23, 1992: Princess Diana's Phone Conversation with Her Lover Is Made Public; Sept. 24, 1992: British Cabinet Member David Mellor Resigns over Romantic Affair; Jan. 5, 1994: British Cabinet Member Resigns After Fathering a Child Out of Wedlock; Sept. 28, 2002: British Politician Reveals Her Affair with Prime Minister John Major; Jan. 21, 2006: British Politician Resigns After Gay-Sex Orgy.

May 4, 2006MEDIA UNCOVER MATCH-FIXING IN ITALIAN SOCCER

The Italian media revealed wire-tapped conversations between the former team manager of the popular Juventus soccer club, Luciano Moggi, and Italian Football Association officials about appointing particular referees to particular games. Four of the premier clubs in Italian soccer were implicated in the scandal, and several sports executives were convicted and imprisoned. Most shocking was the demotion of Juventus to a lower division of play.

LOCALE: ItalyCATEGORIES: Corruption; sports; organized crime and racketeeringKEY FIGURES

Luciano Moggi (b. 1937), general manager of the Juventus soccer team

Antonio Giraudo (b. 1946), chief executive of the Juventus soccer team

Silvio Berlusconi (b. 1936), owner of AC Milan and prime minister of Italy, 1994-1995, 2001-2006, 2008-

SUMMARY OF EVENT

The corruption scandal that struck Italian soccer in 2006 enveloped four of the most famous and successful teams in the history of the sport. In soccer-crazed Italy, Juventus stands as the most storied team in the country and is the third most successful soccer team in all of Europe. Formed in 1897, the Turin-based club has won more than fifty trophies. Prior to the 2006 scandal, the team spent its entire history in Serie A, the upper division of Italian soccer. Accordingly, it has the largest fan base in all of Italy with about 11 million fans, as well as 28 million registered fans throughout Europe and an estimated 170 million fans worldwide. It is the most popular soccer team in the world.

The soccer club Associazione Calcio Milan, commonly known as AC Milan or Milan, formed in 1899 and also spent most of its history in the top ranks of soccer. It has won eighteen international titles, more than any other soccer team in existence. In 1986, entrepreneur Silvio Berlusconi acquired the team and retained ownership while he served three terms as prime minister of Italy. Berlusconi owned the club during the scandal.

Società Sportiva Lazio, known as SS Lazio or Lazio, formed in Rome in 1900. Although not as successful as Juventus or AC Milan, Lazio has spent most of its history in Serie A and is not a stranger to scandal. A 1980 incident involving illegal betting resulted in the club being temporarily demoted, along with AC Milan, to Serie B. Lazio suffered a loss of season points in 1986 for illegal betting by a player. In 2002, the club's owner, Sergio Cragnotti, was involved in a financial scandal with his food-services company, which forced him to reduce spending and ultimately sell the club. By 2006, Lazio had rebounded and was enjoying a successful season with a roster of inexpensive players.

ACF Fiorentina, generally known as Fiorentina, formed in 1926 in Florence. The club has also spent most of its existence at the Serie A level. The club went bankrupt in 2002 and essentially ceased to exist for two months until being revived by a new owner. Beginning at the Serie C level, Fiorentina worked its way back to Serie A by the end of the 2003-2004 season. By 2006, the club was struggling to avoid being relegated back to Serie B and desperately needed every victory that it could obtain.

On May 4, details of match-fixing between Luciano Moggi, general manager of Juventus, and an official responsible for refereeing assignments were printed on the front page of Italy's largest newspaper. Moggi and Antonio Giraudo, a Juventus chief executive, were accused of creating a network of soccer federation officials, team owners, referees, and journalists to influence refereeing assignments and thus the outcome of league games. Moggi pressured the vice chairman of the Union of European Football Associations (UEFA) referees committee to favor Juventus. He also spoke to Italy's interior minister to persuade him to allow Juventus to play a game with Fiorentina after that game had been postponed following the death of Pope John Paul II.

Moggi and Giraudo also were accused of detaining and berating a referee for not favoring Juventus during a November, 2004, game. Television pundits were implicated for having suppressed discussion of controversial decisions that favored Juventus. Moggi and Giraudo resigned later in the month, along with Juventus's entire board.

The Italian Football Federation (FIGC) began investigating forty-one people. In July, 2006, a FIGC prosecutor charged four teams with sports fraud. Juventus, AC Milan, Lazio, and Fiorentina were ordered before the largest sports tribunal ever held in Italy in an improvised courtroom in Rome's Olympic Stadium. The tribunal, which included a panel of six judges and twenty-six officials, including referees, was not, however, a criminal proceeding.

The prosecutor asked Italian judges to punish the clubs in a way that would deter others from thinking about corrupting soccer. He demanded that Juventus be dropped two divisions and that the other clubs also be demoted. However, justice minister Mario Clemente Mastella declared himself and many other fans to be in favor of amnesty for the clubs as a way of holding on to those star Italian players who would possibly flee abroad. After Mastella's pronouncement, other politicians aligned on the question of amnesty according to their allegiance to the various clubs. Berlusconi lobbied against a demotion for any of the teams.

A team's relegation to a lower division would result in a significant financial setback. Juventus, with stock sold on the Milan stock exchange, faced the risk of bankruptcy, as major sponsors would flee a club that no longer played Serie A. The other teams, less prominent, also would lose sponsorships and the ability to pay the salaries of top players. The four implicated teams included thirteen players from Italy's World Cup team. A number of top European soccer clubs, including England's Chelsea, Arsenal, and Manchester United, and Spain's Real Madrid, eagerly hoped for the opportunity to snag these star players.

IMPACT

On July 14, a sports tribunal announced a verdict that was not as severe as expected, perhaps because Italy defeated France in the World Cup final earlier in the week, thereby sending the entire nation of Italy into euphoria. The sentences fell short of what the prosecutor had sought, yet the fall of Juventus still struck Italy as the collapse of a monarchy.

The tribunal demoted Juventus from Serie A to Serie B for its role in the game-fixing scandal. The club also was docked 30 points, the equivalent of ten losses, which made it very difficult for the team to advance to the championship and move back to Serie A. Juventus also lost the championships it had won in 2004-2005 and 2005-2006. Fiorentina and Lazio also were demoted to Serie B and penalized 12 and 7 points, respectively. AC Milan remained in Serie A but lost 15 points. Moggi and Giraudo received five-year suspensions and fines. The vice president of AC Milan received a one-year ban from the game, and the president and honorary president of Fiorentina were suspended for several years. Lazio's president was banned for three and one-half years. Several referees were suspended.

The teams had three days to appeal the court's decision. With the verdict upheld, Juventus, AC Milan, and Fiorentina would be barred from the Champions League and Lazio would be banned from the UEFA Cup. Milan appealed and had its penalty reduced to 8 points, while keeping its Champions League participation. Milan won the competition in 2006-2007. The other teams also had their punishments reduced. On appeal, Fiorentina won reinstatement to Serie A, with a 15-point penalty. Lazio also remained in Serie A, with a 3-point reduction and a retroactive 30-point deduction that cost them qualification for the UEFA Cup. Juventus played in Serie B in the 2007-2008 season for the first time in the club's history. The team sold many of its players.

—Caryn E. Neumann

FURTHER READING

Agnew, Paddy. Forza Italia: A Journey in Search of Italy and Its Football. London: Ebury Press, 2006. An introduction to Italian soccer that makes the case that corruption is endemic to the sport. Includes coverage of several scandals that occurred prior to the Serie A scandal in 2006.

Foot, John. Winning at All Costs: The Untold Story of Triumph, Tragedy, and Corruption in Italian Soccer. New York: Nation Books, 2007. A general history of Italian soccer dating back to its northern Italian roots during the 1890's. Examines the effects of corruption on the sport.

Goldblatt, David. The Ball Is Round: A Global History of Soccer. New York: Riverhead Books, 2008. Extensive history of soccer that places the sport in its international context. Includes discussion of the 2006 Italian scandal.

Vialli, Gianluca, and Gabriele Marcotti. The Italian Job: A Journey to the Heart of Two Great Footballing Cultures. London: Bantam, 2006. Examines the differences between Italian and English soccer fans, arguably the most passionate soccer fans in the world.

SEE ALSO: Apr. 2, 1915: Players Fix Liverpool-Manchester United Soccer Match; July 1, 1994: Soccer Star Diego Maradona Is Expelled from World Cup; Jan. 27, 2005: German Soccer Referee Admits to Fixing Games for Money; July 29, 2008: NBA Referee Tim Donaghy Is Sentenced to Prison for Betting on Games.

May 12, 2006

SCIENTIST IS INDICTED FOR FAKING HIS RESEARCH ON CREATING STEM CELLS

South Korean biomedical researcher Hwang Woo-suk was charged with faking data in two landmark papers that described the production of the first cloned human embryos, the first embryonic stem cells derived from cloned embryos, and the first patient-specific embryonic stem-cell lines. Furthermore, the unfertilized human eggs used for these experiments were procured through unethical means, and Hwang misused the research funds secured for this work.

LOCALE: Seoul, South Korea

CATEGORIES: Hoaxes, frauds, and charlatanism; publishing and journalism; science and technology

KEY FIGURES

Hwang Woo-suk (b. 1952), stem-cell researcher and a former professor at Seoul National University

Gerald Schatten (b. 1949), stem-cell researcher, University of Pittsburgh School of Medicine

Chung Un-chan (b. 1946), president of Seoul National University

Roh Sung-il (b. 1952), fertility specialist, MizMedi Hospital, Seoul

Roe Jung-hye (b. 1957), dean of research, Seoul National University

Kim Sun-jong (b. 1969), biologist and former Hwang collaborator

Han Hak-soo (b. 1969), producer with the investigative news television show PD Su-cheop

SUMMARY OF EVENT

On February 12, 2004, Seoul National University (SNU) biologist Hwang Woo-suk and his colleagues announced that they had successfully used somatic cell nuclear transfer (SCNT) to generate thirty cloned human embryos and derive an embryonic stem cell line from one of these cloned embryos. Hwang's report represented the first time SCNT was successfully used to make cloned human embryos and derive human embryonic stem cells. The results were published as “Evidence of a Pluripotent Human Embryonic Stem Cell Line Derived from a Cloned Blastocyst” in the March 12, 2004, issue of the renowned journal Science.

SCNT involves the removal of the nucleus (the cellular compartment that houses the chromosomes) from an unfertilized egg, followed by transplantation of a nucleus from another cell into this egg and artificial activation to initiate embryonic development. After growing in an artificial culture medium for approximately six days, surviving cloned embryos grow into semihollow spheres called blastocysts. Blastocyst-stage embryos consist of external trophoctoderm cells and internal inner-cell mass cells; the inner-cell mass cells are isolated and cultured to derive embryonic stem cell lines. The supplementary material to Hwang and colleagues’ Science article stated that the 242 unfertilized human eggs used for these experiments were collected from sixteen female volunteers, who provided them without financial compensation.

In May, 2004, the British scientific journal Nature discovered that some of the eggs used by Hwang’s group were donated by junior members of his own research team. Korean activists for citizens’ rights and bioethicists protested, because it appeared that an overbearing boss coerced his female graduate students to undergo a potentially painful and risky procedure. Nevertheless, Hwang denied any wrongdoing.

Hwang’s group announced yet another landmark advance in May, 2005. They claimed to have established eleven genetically matched patient-specific embryonic stem-cell lines. For SCNT they used nuclei from cultured fibroblasts (a cell from skin biopsies that grows well in culture) taken from nine patients who suffered from spinal cord injury, diabetes, or a disorder of the immune system. The fibroblast nuclei were transferred into nucleus-deprived eggs from female volunteers and grown to the blastocyst stage. These blastocyst-stage embryos were cultured to make patient-specific embryonic stem-cell cultures that were genetically identical to the patients from whom the fibroblasts had been isolated. These patient-specific embryonic stem cells could potentially be used to treat catastrophic diseases that require regeneration of hopelessly damaged tissues, without rejection by the patient’s immune systems. These results, published in the paper “Patient-Specific Embryonic Stem Cells Derived from Human SCNT Blastocysts” on June 17, 2005, in Science, were hailed throughout the international scientific community as a major breakthrough.

Hwang Woo-suk, center, is escorted by members of his research team after a press conference in Seoul in January, 2006. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

Although Hwang was a national hero by the time the article appeared, troubling questions and accusations arose nonetheless. On June 1, an investigative news program from the Seoul-based Munhwa Broadcasting Company (MBC) called PD Su-cheop had received a tip from a former Hwang research associate that there were enormous ethical problems with Hwang’s egg procurements and technical problems that made the production of patient-specific stem cells impossible. Four months later, on October 15, PD Su-cheop producer Han Hak-soo interviewed former Hwang collaborator

Kim Sun-jong, who admitted that he had falsified two of the photographs in the 2005 Science paper under instructions from Hwang.

The following month, on November 12, Hwang's American coauthor, Gerald Schatten of the University of Pittsburgh, announced that he was cutting all ties with Hwang and SNU, citing significant bioethical violations in egg donor recruitment for the 2004 Science paper. On November 21, Roh Sung-il from MizMedi Hospital in Seoul, who supplied eggs for Hwang's research, announced that in 2002 he had paid at least twenty women approximately $1,430 each for eggs that were used in the 2004 study. These egg collections occurred before the South Koreans had passed their bioethics laws that made it a crime to pay for eggs. Roh insisted that Hwang did not know about these payments, but on November 24, Hwang admitted that he had used these eggs with full knowledge of this impropriety. He resigned his directorship of the World Stem Cell Hub but remained at SNU and vowed to continue his research.

On November 22, PD Su-cheop had reported the results of its preliminary analysis of Hwang's 2005 Science paper. MBC had acquired five samples from the patient-specific cell lines allegedly made by Hwang in his 2005 Science paper and sent the samples, along with tissue samples from the patients whose nuclei supposedly were used to construct the patient-specific embryonic cell lines, to an independent lab for corroboration. DNA analyses from this independent lab showed that the DNA from one of the patient-specific cell lines did not match the tissue sample as it should, which raised the distinct possibility that the embryonic stem-cell lines were not made from cloned embryos. For its efforts at exposing Hwang's fraud, the news program was taken off the air for more than one month after the public condemned its report as too harsh against the researcher.

On December 7, thirty SNU faculty members delivered a petition to SNU president Chung Un-chan, requesting that the university launch its own investigation into the results of Hwang's 2005 Science paper. The university began its investigation on December 12 and carefully examined all the materials allegedly generated by Hwang and his colleagues. This inquiry ended on December 29, when Roe Jung-hye, SNU dean of research, announced that "there are neither patient-specific stem-cell lines in Hwang's laboratory nor any scientific evidences to support the claim that such cell lines ever existed."

Further investigations showed that the untruths in Hwang's landmark 2004 and 2005 papers could only be the result of deliberate fabrication. Additionally, it was clear that Hwang had pressured female lab workers to donate their eggs. Science officially published the retraction of Hwang's 2004 and 2005 papers on January 20, 2006.

On March 6, Hwang admitted that he ordered his fellow researchers to falsify data for the 2005 Science paper. On March 20, SNU fired him, and he was indicted on charges of fraud, embezzlement, and violations of bioethics laws on May 12; several of his collaborators were indicted on similar charges. He reportedly opened animal-cloning laboratories near Seoul and in Thailand.

IMPACT

Hwang's faked research stifled international embryonic stem-cell research. Many labs ceased trying to clone human embryos after Hwang announced his success. After news of Hwang's fraud came to light, stem-cell labs were forced to restart the complicated task. Furthermore, the scandal led scientific journals to reevaluate the peer-review system to more effectively detect fraud before it gets published.

Hwang's ethical improprieties with egg donor recruitment also generated extensive discussions about standards for regulating egg procurement for embryonic stem-cell research. Some argue that egg donations, as is the case with organ donations, should be free of financial considerations. Others counter that because the hormonal induction used to hyperstimulate the ovaries during egg donation carries significant short- and long-term health risks, it is inappropriate to ask women to endure such risks without remuneration.

Another effect of Hwang's prevarication was its impact on the public, including investors. For example, the fraud revelation led to the temporary cancellation of PD Su-cheop for airing its exposé and led to the abrupt fall in stock prices of several South Korean biotechnology companies. Also, Hwang's blatant dishonesty—and the dishonesty of his colleagues—will be added to the arsenal of those opposed to embryonic stem-cell research.

—Michael A. Buratovich

FURTHER READING

Chong, Sei, and Dennis Normile. "Stem Cells: How Young Korean Researchers Helped Unearth a Scandal." Science 311 (2006). Discussion of how a South Korean investigative news show and young South Korean scientists launched the inquiry that brought Hwang's fraudulent publications to light.

Cyranoski, David. "Korean Stem-Cell Stars Dogged by Suspicion of Ethical Breach." Nature 429 (2004). The report that initially drew attention to the ethical breaches surrounding Hwang's recruitment of egg donors, by the science reporter who covered the Hwang scandal for this British journal.

Herold, Eve. Stem Cell Wars. New York: Palgrave, 2006. A supportive polemic for discussion of human embryonic stem cells that focuses largely on politics, by a science reporter who interviewed Hwang on several occasions.

Hyun, Insoo. "Fair Payment or Undue Inducement?" Nature 442 (2006). Commentary by a Case Western Reserve University bioethicist on the dangers of egg donation and the case for financially remunerating egg donors.

Wohn, Yvette D., and Dennis Normile. "Prosecutors Allege Elaborate Deception and Missing Funds." Science 312 (2006). A detailed report of the charges brought against Hwang and his associates.

SEE ALSO: July 25, 1972: Newspaper Breaks Story of Abuses in Tuskegee Syphilis Study; Sept. 19, 1988: Stephen Breuning Pleads Guilty to Medical Research Fraud; Mar. 23, 1989: Scientists' "Cold Fusion" Claims Cannot Be Verified; Nov. 5, 2000: Japanese Amateur Archaeologist's "Discoveries" Are Proven Fakes; Aug., 2002: Immunologist Resigns After Being Accused of Falsifying Research; Sept. 25, 2002: Inquiry Reveals That Physicist Jan Hendrik Schön Faked His Research.

Summer, 2006-March 16, 2007

MANUFACTURER RECALLS PET FOOD THAT KILLED THOUSANDS OF AMERICAN PETS

In response to reports of the deaths of thousands of pets in the United States who consumed tainted pet food, the Chinese government and the U.S. Food and Drug Administration identified two Chinese companies that manufactured adulterated food additives with harmful chemicals to maximize their profits.

ALSO KNOWN AS: Menu Foods scandal

LOCALES: China; Canada; United States

CATEGORIES: Trade and commerce; business; law and the courts; government; medicine and health care; international relations

KEY FIGURES

Rosa L. DeLauro (b. 1943), U.S. representative from Connecticut

Richard J. Durbin (b. 1944), U.S. senator from Illinois

Paul Henderson (fl. early twenty-first century), Menu Foods president and chief executive officer

Andrew C. von Eschenbach (b. 1941), commissioner of the U.S. Food and Drug Administration

Zheng Xiaoyu (1944-2007), head of China's food and drug administration

SUMMARY OF EVENT

On March 16, 2007, Menu Foods, a producer of private-label pet foods based in Ontario, Canada, announced that it was recalling sixty million cans and packets of nearly one hundred brands of its products because of the deaths of a reported seventeen animals who were fed the products. Initially, the contaminant was unknown, and the actual number of affected pets remains unknown as well.

For weeks, as the recall continued to grow, both Menu Foods and the U.S. Food and Drug Administration (FDA) could not identify the problem and insisted that there had been no more than a handful of deaths. Veterinarians, however, reported thousands of pet deaths—cats and dogs—from causes such as kidney failure, while bloggers steadily tracked death tolls and developments. Later, two manufacturing plants in China were found to have added the nitrogen-rich chemical melamine, which is used in the production of fertilizer, plastics, and other inedible products, to wheat gluten and rice-protein concentrate to inflate their protein content. Wheat gluten and rice-protein concentrate are used as thickeners for wet pet food. Menu Foods was the leading manufacturer of wet pet-food products in North America at the time the scandal broke.

Lawsuits and mainstream media coverage of the scandal were followed—too late, many thought—by an FDA prohibition against the importation of Chinese wheat gluten and by congressional hearings into the FDA's response to the crisis and its oversight of the food supply. For a time U.S.-Chinese relations seemed threatened, but after the Chinese government identified at least one of the individuals responsible for the melamine contamination, the largest pet food recall in American history subsided.

The scandal began in the summer of 2006, when tainted wheat gluten first reached the United States, according to the FDA. Menu Foods began incorporating some of this contaminated food additive into its products on November 8. Reportedly, within six weeks, the company began receiving reports of pets being sickened by pet food produced at its plants in Streetsville, Ontario, Canada, and Emporia, Kansas, although Menu Foods said it had not received such reports until February 20, 2007. Seven days later, the company began routine feeding trials with forty to fifty cats and dogs; the same day, Menu Foods' chief executive officer, Paul Henderson, sold 12,700 of his shares in the company.

On March 7, the first of nine animals in the feeding trial died from acute renal failure. Further deaths prompted the company to switch wheat gluten suppliers four days later. However, roughly two weeks passed before Menu Foods sent samples of its products to Cornell University for testing. Unable to locate the source of the animal poisoning, Cornell in turn forwarded samples to the New York State Food Laboratory, which soon identified the chemotherapy agent aminopterin as a contaminant.

After sending food samples to Cornell, Menu Foods, on March 16, announced its first giant recall but failed to report the deaths of its test subjects. As Wall Street reacted and pet owners panicked, Menu Foods' stock declined 45 percent and its Web site was shut down. Consumers, unable to reach the company via the Web or by telephone, also were stonewalled by the FDA, which would only officially recognize the deaths of the nine animals in Menu Foods' feeding trials. The official death toll was revised to include a few pets, but it remained at fourteen even as blogs were posting reports of hundreds of deaths and veterinarians were estimating that deaths actually numbered in the thousands. By the end of March, retailers were pulling all Menu Foods products off their shelves, the company's New Jersey plant was under suspicion, and the FDA had announced that melamine was the major contaminant of the pet food.

Within hours of the FDA's announcement, other pet-food makers began announcing recalls. Still, the death toll mounted, and the announcements continued. On March 30, the FDA imposed an import restriction on wheat gluten produced by the Xuzhou Anying Biologic Technology Development Company in Jiangsu province, China. However, the public was not notified of this development until it was discovered days later by bloggers. U.S. senator Richard Durbin and U.S. representative Rosa DeLauro issued a press release on April 1 that criticized the FDA's laxity, but the release stated the obvious. The animal rights group People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals, or PETA, followed the next day with a public demand for the resignation of FDA commissioner Andrew C. von Eschenbach.

Menu Foods president and chief executive officer Paul Henderson, right, and executive vice president Richard Shields listen as a woman questions them at a news conference in March, 2007, about the death of her dog from eating Menu Foods dog food. (AP/Wide World Photos)

On April 3, tensions increased when the mainstream press speculated that tainted wheat gluten had been sold to suppliers of human food. Two days later, Durbin announced congressional hearings into the scandal. China followed with its own investigation into melamine-contaminated wheat gluten. Around April 10, investigators found that rice protein concentrate, another thickener used in food production, had been contaminated with melamine, prompting a new round of pet-food recalls and the identification of a second suspected Chinese manufacturer, in Shandong province. By the end of the month, it was feared that contamination had reached the human food supply through surplus-tainted pet food given to chickens, hogs, and farmed fish.

On April 20, the FDA announced that it had opened a criminal investigation into the crisis. Chinese officials gave FDA inspectors permission to enter China, but they were not allowed to interview anyone involved with exporting the contaminated food products. Also, the suspect production facilities had been shut down before U.S. inspectors arrived. Around the same time, recalls of pet foods were announced in South Africa, after the deaths of animals who had consumed food laced with melamine-contaminated corn gluten. Within two months, melamine contamination was found in European products containing Chinese-produced corn gluten and rice-protein concentrate. On May 29, facing a worldwide problem, the Chinese government announced that the former head of China's food and drug administration, Zheng Xiaoyu, had been sentenced to death for accepting bribes in connection with the approval of faulty products. On June 27, Chinese officials announced a shutdown of 180 food factories accused of having improperly used industrial chemicals and expired food products. Zheng was executed on July 10.

IMPACT

Menu Foods estimated that the 2007 pet-food recall cost the company between forty-five and fifty-five million dollars. The costs to affected pet owners—in the thousands—are far higher, in both financial and emotional terms, leading to changes in U.S. law. Pet owners, both individually and collectively through class-action lawsuits, have filed countless suits against pet-food makers. Traditionally, pets have been accorded little monetary value by the courts, and as a consequence few suits concerning pets have been filed. The courts' valuation of pets—and the courts' realization of the emotional and financial ties of owners—has increased, however, and there appears to be a shift in perspective.

Pet-food manufacturers, too, suffered a major setback: eroded customer confidence. Companies have been building their own manufacturing plants and engaging in greater oversight of imported ingredients. The FDA, which was slow to react to the crisis, now takes seriously the issue of tainted animal food because of possible contamination of the human food supply.

Subsequent revelations of contaminated Chinese-produced medicines and health and beauty aids not only sparked a minor trade war between China and the United States over American products but also led to the realization that inadequate U.S. oversight of imports such as pet-food ingredients signals a possible threat to homeland security.

—Lisa Paddock

FURTHER READING

“Fallout from Recent Pet Food Recall.” Neutraceuticals World 10 (June, 2007). This overview of the pet-food recall discusses how the crisis affected the human food supply and increased the demand for organic food—for people and their pets.

Kearns, Nancy. “Moving on, Moving Up: Pet Food Executives Tell Us How the Industry Has Changed, Post-Recall.” Whole Dog Journal 10 (September, 2007). Although none of the executives interviewed for this piece were affiliated with companies implicated in the 2007 recall, the article describes how the scandal affected pet-food manufacturers, who beefed up not only production facilities but also customer relations.

Martin, Jonathan. “When a Pet Dies of Suspected Food Poisoning—What Is Its Value?” Seattle

Times, March 22, 2006. The first class-action lawsuit filed against Menu Foods was filed in Seattle. This feature explains how the case affects pet-related laws.

Nestle, Marion. Pet Food Politics: The Chihuahua in the Coal Mine. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2008. A noted expert on the politics of food and food consumption investigates the pet-food scandal of 2006-2007.

Swaminathan, Nikhil. “The Poisoning of Our Pets: Scientists and Government Agencies Home in on the Cause of More than One Hundred Pet Deaths from Tainted Food.” Scientific American, March 28, 2007. A good article outlining the course of the tainted-food case and how the scientific community and the federal government have handled the issue.

SEE ALSO: Sept.-Oct., 1937: Prescription Elixir Causes More than One Hundred Deaths; 1956-1962: Prescription Thalidomide Causes Widespread Birth Disorders; Oct. 20, 1978: Firestone Recalls Millions of Defective Car Tires; Sept. 17, 1985: Media Allege Canadian Officials Allowed Sale of Rancid Tuna; Feb. 4, 1996: Whistle-Blower Reveals Tobacco Industry Corruption; Nov. 26, 1997: Canadian Health Commissioner Releases Report on Tainted Blood; Aug. 20, 2007: Football Star Michael Vick Pleads Guilty to Financing a Dogfighting Ring.

July 14, 2006

NEW YORK TIMES EXPOSES GRADING SCANDAL AT AUBURN UNIVERSITY

A sociology professor at Auburn University contacted The New York Times to report that his colleague was granting directed-study classes to athletes so that they could raise their grade point averages and remain eligible to play. The student athletes were given inflated grades in courses with virtually no academic work—a practice that also led to a misleading academic ranking of the university by the NCAA.

LOCALE: Auburn, Alabama

CATEGORIES: Publishing and journalism; education; corruption; hoaxes, frauds, and charlatanism; sports

KEY FIGURES

James Gundlach (fl. early twenty-first century), chairman of the Department of Sociology, Auburn University

Thomas A. Petee (fl. early twenty-first century), professor of sociology at Auburn University

Tommy Tuberville (b. 1954), Auburn University football coach

Pete Thamel (fl. early twenty-first century), reporter for The New York Times

SUMMARY OF EVENT

On July 14, 2006, New York Times reporter Pete Thamel broke the story of a possible grading scandal involving athletes at Auburn University in Alabama. The scandal was brought to Thamel's attention by Professor James Gundlach, chairman of the Sociology Department at the university. Gundlach was reportedly watching a televised football game and heard that one of the players was a scholar-athlete with a sociology major. Because neither he nor two other full-time professors in the department had ever had the player in their respective classes, Gundlach began researching the department's academic records. He discovered that another professor, Thomas A. Petee, was offering an exorbitant number of directed-study classes that required very little course work and no class time. Though Gundlach had attempted to deal with the problem through appropriate institutional channels, reporting the issue to the provost's office months earlier, lack of attention to the problem led him to bring the issue to the media.

Concerns regarding the Auburn athletic department involved primarily the football team, which had eighteen players taking almost one hundred credit hours of Petee's directed-study courses. Though both athletes and nonathletes were enrolled in the courses, approximately 25 percent of Petee's students were athletes. One player even took as many as seven directed-study courses from Petee. Another problem for the athletic department that resulted from the study of these courses was the discovery that these eighteen players were receiving higher grades in Petee's directed-study courses, grades that raised the players' overall grade point averages to acceptable academic standards set by the National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA). Another issue that came to the university's attention was Petee allowing one athlete to join a course two-thirds of the way through the semester and rewarding a high grade to that student for little effort.

Whether the courses were linked specifically to the athletic department was questionable. Despite one athlete's report that the director of Auburn's Student Athlete Support Services had arranged the courses, this was not confirmed. Regardless of the large number of football players who were advanced because of these courses, Coach Tommy Tuberville repeatedly stressed his confidence that the issue was academic rather than one of athletics. He denied the involvement of the athletic department in manufacturing the courses, in advising students to take the courses, or in pressuring professors to inflate the grades of student athletes.

Auburn's academic standing in the NCAA was top for its division for public universities, and it ranked behind only Stanford University, the U.S. Naval Academy, and Boston College in the entire division. The academic standing of Auburn athletes prompted other institutions to question how the NCAA evaluated academic standards and ranked colleges and universities based on those evaluations.

The Auburn directed-study courses were investigated by university officials after the story broke in The New York Times. Despite challenging areas such as statistics and theory that would better be taught in a classroom because of required intensive content, the university discovered that Petee was offering a wide variety of courses in this format. Gundlach reported that Petee had offered directed-reading courses to over 250 students the previous year (2004-2005). This load included fifteen different directed-reading courses, which put Petee's teaching load at three times the normal full-time load. Other professors and department chairs at the university confirmed that the workload Petee carried was ridiculously high, even impossible.

At the orders of university president Edward R. Richardson, Auburn conducted an internal audit. The audit discovered a number of additional problems in the Sociology Department, including alleged grade changes that brought several students' grade point averages to an acceptable level for graduation. In one instance, Professor Paul Starr was contacted about a change of grade he allegedly gave to a scholarship athlete (not a football player) never enrolled in any of his classes. The student's grade was changed from an incomplete to an A, one of four A's given to the student (the other A's were awarded by Petee, Starr's department chairman). The A grades raised this student athlete's grade point average to the university's standard for graduation. The internal audit confirmed that Petee changed approximately thirty-three grades above the average departmental grade changes in a particular semester. He was reprimanded for lack of appropriate record keeping. Auburn did share some findings with the NCAA, but the university did not expect to share the complete results of the audit.

The NCAA agreed that the problems were academic and not with the athletic program.

The internal audit and press coverage of the bogus classes and the grade inflations led to the implementation of several new requirements at Auburn. First, the directed-readings program was overhauled. The curriculum was made more challenging, and fewer courses were allowed in this format. The maximum number of courses and students per professor was limited, with a student requiring multiple signatures before he or she could sign up for more than nine hours of directed-readings and before an individual professor could supervise more than three students per semester in such courses.

Second, Petee and James Witte, the director of adult education who also awarded athletes higher-than-normal grades, lost their departmental leadership positions but not their status as classroom teachers. Petee, however, was later suspended with pay, and he refused to discuss the matter with the media. His only defense for directing so many of the reading courses was that they were necessary because the university lacked departmental resources—teachers—to cover the heavy load of courses that needed to be taught.

Auburn tried to dismiss Petee, who then countersued. He settled with the university, retained his salary, and retained his position as interim chairman of the sociology department. Gundlach had retired shortly after he brought the corruption to the media's attention, citing departmental division as his reason for leaving the university.

IMPACT

The bogus-course and grade-inflation scandal at Auburn, deemed more of an issue of academics rather than of athletics, reinforced concerns over the NCAA's ranking of academics at a given institution. Even with the scandal in the news, the NCAA ranked Auburn fifth in the United States among Division I-A public universities, leading to questions about how the NCAA ranking system worked. After the Auburn affair, the NCAA was encouraged to change its ranking system to account for academic differences among schools, that is, among those that are academically challenging and those that only pretend to be or those whose ranking was based on inflated grades and nonexistent classes.

—Theresa L. Stowell

FURTHER READING

Lipka, Sara. "Auburn Alters Policy on Independent Study." Chronicle of Higher Education, September 1, 2006. Simple overview of Auburn University's revised policies regarding directed-study classes. Especially relevant because the scandal led to academic reform at the university.

Mandel, Stewart. Bowls, Polls, and Tattered Souls: Tackling the Chaos and Controversy That Reign over College Football. Hoboken, N.J.: John Wiley & Sons, 2007. This book provides a detailed, behind-the-scenes look at notorious university scandals involving student athletes and college athletics.

Staurowsky, Ellen J. "Piercing the Veil of Amateurism: Commercialization, Corruption, and U.S. College Sports." In The Commercialization of Sport, edited by Trevor Slack. New York: Routledge, 2004. Staurowsky discusses how amateur athletics in the United States has become a commercialized and corrupt spectacle.

Thamel, Pete. "Top Grades and No Class Time for Auburn Players." The New York Times, July 14,

Tour de France Is Hit with a Doping Scandal

2006. Original article that broke the story. Reports on James Gundlach's concerns over Thomas Petee's directed-study courses offered to athletes at Auburn. Highlights the number of courses offered and specific students involved, and discusses Petee's response to the accusations against him.

Wasley, Paula. "Auburn U. Settles with Professor Who Handed Out Easy Grades to Athletes." Chronicle of Higher Education, August 10, 2007. Brief article detailing the results of Petee's lawsuit against Auburn University and the university's dismissal proceedings against him. Good for studies of the impact of the scandal on student athletics and student-athlete scholarship.

SEE ALSO: Jan. 17, 1951: College Basketball Players Begin Shaving Points for Money; Apr. 27, 1980: Mobster's Arrest Reveals Point Shaving by Boston College Basketball Players; Feb. 25, 1987: NCAA Imposes "Death Penalty" on Southern Methodist University Football; Mar. 27, 2002: Georgia Basketball Coach Jim Harrick, Sr., Resigns over Fraud Allegations; May 3, 2003: University of Alabama Fires New Football Coach in Sex Scandal; Sept. 13, 2007: New England Patriots Football Team Is Fined for Spying on Other Teams.

July 26, 2006

TOUR DE FRANCE IS HIT WITH A DOPING SCANDAL

The Tour de France, a grueling three-week bicycle race that is one of Europe's most popular sporting events, was hit with a major drug scandal in 2006. American cyclist Floyd Landis, who won the race, was stripped of his championship and banned from riding for two years after testing positive for a performance-enhancing drug. Landis maintained his innocence and appealed the rulings, but to no avail.

LOCALE: France

CATEGORIES: Sports; drugs; corruption; medicine and health care ethics

KEY FIGURES

Floyd Landis (b. 1975), American professional cyclist

Oscar Pereiro (b. 1977), Spanish professional cyclist

Tom Simpson (1937-1967), British cyclist whose death led to the implementation of drug testing in professional cycling

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Throughout its more than one-hundred-year history, the Tour de France, competitive cycling's most prestigious event, has been plagued by scandals and doping incidents. Early tour riders were believed to have consumed alcohol and used other substances to dull the pain of competing in endurance cycling. Riders also began using drugs and other substances to increase their performance rather than dull their senses. Organizing bodies, such as the Tour and the International Cycling Union, followed with policies designed to combat the illegal practices. The death of the British champion Tom Simpson on Mount Ventoux during the 1967 tour led to the implementation of drug testing policies.

American professional cyclist Floyd Landis, who joined the Phonak Cycling team after riding for several years with seven-time Tour de France champion Lance Armstrong, another American, started the 2006 season impressively with overall wins in the Amgen Tour in California and the prestigious Paris-Nice race. Landis won for a third time at the Ford Tour de Georgia just prior to start of the Tour de France. Despite these early successes, Landis was not a favorite to win cycling's most prestigious race.

Floyd Landis at a press conference in Madrid, Spain, on July 28, 2006. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

On the eve of the tour's start, July 1, nine riders, including pre-race favorites Jan Ulrich from Germany and Italy's Ivan Basso, were disqualified. Their names turned up on a list of fifty-six cyclists who allegedly had contact with a Spanish doctor at the center of a doping probe in Spain. During the early stages of the tour, Landis was able to keep up with the pace set by the riders of the Rabobank team. Landis positioned himself in the overall lead until stage 13, when he and his team started a breakaway led by his former teammate, Oscar Pereiro of Spain, who took the overall lead by 89 seconds. In stage 15, on the slopes of Alpe d'Huez, Landis out-rode Pereiro by almost two minutes and regained the fabled yellow jersey (worn by the tour leader) and a 10-second overall lead in the standings. Landis performed poorly during stage 16, as he fell from first to eleventh place. Pereiro took the overall lead and was eight minutes ahead of Landis with only three stages remaining.

In the following day's stage 17, Landis amazed the cycling world with a breakaway attack considered "one of the most epic days of cycling ever seen." At one point he led Pereiro by 9 minutes 4 seconds and ultimately won the stage. His win in this stage took more than 7 minutes from Pereiro's overall lead. The next stage was a 57-kilometer individual time trial. Landis's strength in time trials worked for him in this stage as he came well within striking distance of regaining the tour lead. He finished third in the time trial of stage 19, which put him 89 seconds ahead of Pereiro and 3 minutes 31 seconds ahead of Spanish rider Carlos Sastre, reclaiming the yellow jersey with a lead of 59 seconds. On July 23, Landis retained the lead through stage 20, the famous procession into Paris to end the tour, by 57 seconds.

Only days after winning the tour, Landis's team announced that its top rider had tested positive, after stage 17, for an unusually high ratio of the hormone testosterone to the hormone epitestosterone (T/E ratio). Under World Anti-Doping Agency (WDA) regulations, a ratio of testosterone to epitestosterone greater than 4:1 is considered a positive result. Any rider found to have these hormones in their system, at this ratio or greater, is to be disqualified from a race and suspended from racing for two years. Landis denied that he was doping and placed faith in a second test using his backup, or B, sample. Testing had been performed by the French government's antidoping clinical laboratory, the National Laboratory for Doping Detection (LNDD). Following the reported positive result on his A sample on July 26, Landis suggested that the results had been improperly released under the rules of the International Cycling Union (UCI). Phonak Cycling announced that Landis would be dismissed if the backup sample also tested positive. The backup sample did test positive as well, and Landis was fired from his team on August 5.

Under UCI regulations, the determination of whether or not a cyclist violated any rules must be made by the cyclist's national federation, in this case USA Cycling, which ultimately transferred the case to the United States Anti-Doping Agency (USADA). Landis claimed that he was not guilty of using banned performance-enhancing drugs. He argued that the processing of the A and B urine samples did not meet the established WDA criteria for a positive doping offense. Landis maintained the positive results on the B sample came from a sample number not assigned to him. He also claimed that the same two technicians analyzed both the original and the second validating samples. International laboratory standards forbid the same individuals from participating in both tests to prevent them from validating their own findings.

IMPACT

On May 14, 2007, the USADA and Landis began arbitration. In a bitterly contested nine-day hearing, Landis and his lawyers insisted that the French lab did not follow WDA rules in testing his urine samples. A three-person panel agreed with them, in part. The panel's eighty-four-page decision concluded the presence of problems with the way the French lab conducted some of its tests, filled out its paperwork, and handled the urine samples. Nevertheless, two of the three panelists concluded that the lab errors in question were not significant enough to dismiss the positive test. On September 20, Landis was stripped of his Tour de France title and suspended from cycling competition for two years. Second-place rider Pereiro became the official winner of the 2006 tour.

Landis appealed the decision to the Court of Arbitration for Sport, based in Lausanne, Switzerland, for his last chance at appeal. The hearings opened in New York in March, 2008. On June 30, the CAS announced from Switzerland that it was upholding the September decision to ban Landis for two years.

The Landis doping scandal affected the overall popularity of bicycle racing in the United States, placing the world's premier cycling event under a dark cloud. Fans and the media have become more cynical, and businesses are reconsidering whether it is worthwhile to invest in the sport as sponsors of team or events. The governing bodies of cycling around the world have promised more assertiveness in cleaning up the corruption.

—Mary McElroy

FURTHER READING

- Hood, Andrew, and John Wilcockson. The Tour de France 2006: Triumph and Turmoil for Floyd Landis. Boulder, Colo.: Velo Press, 2006. An analysis of the race that covers every aspect of the grueling three-week event with maps, stage reports, and profiles of the riders. Photographs enhance the visual experience of the road race.
- Landis, Floyd, and Loren Mooney. Positively False: The Real Story of How I Won the Tour de France. New York: Simon Spotlight, 2007. Told in Landis's own words, this memoir is a powerful indictment of the unchecked governing bodies of cycling, who he believes have compromised the integrity of the sport as a whole.
- Thompson, Christopher S. The Tour de France: A Cultural History. 2006. New ed. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2008. This new edition, with an updated preface, explores the cultural history of the Tour de France. Includes discussion of the doping scandals that have plagued the tour from its early days into the twenty-first century.

Walsh, David. From Lance to Landis: Inside the American Doping Controversy at the Tour De France. New York: Ballantine Books, 2007. Explores the many facets of the cycling doping scandals in the United States and abroad. Examines how performance-enhancing drugs can infiltrate a premier sports event and why athletes succumb to the pressures to use them. Walsh conducted hundreds of hours of interviews with key figures in international cycling.

SEE ALSO: Feb. 28, 1986: Baseball Commissioner Peter Ueberroth Suspends Players for Cocaine Use; June 30, 1994: Tonya Harding Is Banned from Skating After Attack on Rival; July 1, 1994: Soccer Star Diego Maradona Is Expelled from World Cup; Sept. 26, 2000: Gymnast Andreea Răducan Loses Her Olympic Gold Medal Because of Drugs; Feb. 11, 2002: French Judge Admits Favoring Russian Figure Skaters in Winter Olympics; July 1, 2003: Basketball Star Kobe Bryant Is Accused of Rape; Mar. 17, 2005: Former Baseball Star Mark McGwire Evades Congressional Questions on Steroid Use; Oct. 5, 2007: Olympic Champion Marion Jones Admits Steroid Use.

July 28, 2006

ACTOR MEL GIBSON IS CAUGHT MAKING ANTI-SEMITIC REMARKS

Star film actor Mel Gibson was stopped for erratic driving and speeding and then arrested for drunk driving on Pacific Coast Highway in Malibu. During the traffic stop, he made anti-Semitic remarks to the sheriff's deputy who detained him. Gibson's arrest and vulgar rants were detailed by the media within hours of his arrest. The actor made several public apologies, but the scandal did not affect his career.

LOCALE: Malibu, California

CATEGORIES: Racism; law and the courts; social issues and reform; public morals; Hollywood

KEY FIGURES

Mel Gibson (b. 1956), American film actor and director

James Mee (fl. early twenty-first century), Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department deputy

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Actor and director Mel Gibson's profanity-filled, racially charged rant at Los Angeles County sheriff's deputy James Mee, who had stopped Gibson on Pacific Coast Highway in Malibu, California, for driving erratically and speeding, made headlines around the world in a matter of hours. Although Gibson's career seemed to hang in the balance for the next few days, he ultimately walked away from the incident relatively unscathed. His professional survival stemmed not only from his public expressions of regret but also, ironically, from his reputation as an already rough-edged and somewhat tarnished star long before Mee pulled him over in the predawn hours of July 28, 2006, and arrested him for drunk driving.

Born in New York State to an American father and an Irish-Australian mother, Gibson moved with his family to Australia just as he was about to enter his teenage years, when his father decided to relocate to his wife's homeland. Although he first drew worldwide attention among the so-called Australian New Wave filmmakers and actors of the 1970's and early 1980's, Gibson's success in a science-fiction film series in which he played an antihero named Mad Max, struggling to survive in a post-apocalyptic wasteland, made him a superstar in action films far removed from the art-film dramas favored by his early colleagues.

In addition to the Mad Max films, Gibson also starred with Danny Glover in the wildly popular Lethal Weapon series of seriocomic police movies. In 1990, Gibson surprised his fans with a switch to the most serious sort of drama imaginable—an adaptation of William Shakespeare’s Hamlet directed by Franco Zeffirelli. The film was successful with both critics and viewers, encouraging Gibson to embark on a series of ambitious, serious-minded pictures, sometimes as actor, sometimes as director, and sometimes as both. Each of these films—which constituted an unofficial trilogy of historical epics—created controversy and drew attention to Gibson’s beliefs about and attitudes toward various minority groups.

The hugely popular Braveheart (1995), which Gibson both directed and starred in, was the story of Scottish national hero William Wallace, and it drew accusations of hatred of the English as well as homophobia because of its unsympathetic and stereotyped depiction of the homosexual English king Edward II. Gibson then starred in The Patriot (2000), a revolutionary war drama that again drew accusations of Anglo bashing because of its one-sided portrayal of the English as vicious and wholly despicable. His pet project, The Passion of the Christ (2004), a film detailing the final week in the life of Jesus, incited much debate in the media, as some felt that Gibson, in an age-old slander, was placing the blame for the crucifixion of Jesus on the Jews. The film was also criticized for depicting Jesus receiving far more brutalization at the hands of his captors than is supported by New Testament texts.

All these prior controversies, centered on Gibson’s perceived prejudices, haunted—but perhaps also helped—him in the wake of his drunken encounter with Mee. The deputy wrote in his arrest report that Gibson belligerently demanded to know if Mee was Jewish and subsequently went into a paranoid tirade in which he blamed Jews for every war that had ever occurred in the history of humankind. Also, Gibson allegedly insinuated that he would use his power and influence in California to carry out reprisals against Mee. Gibson refused to cooperate with deputies and, at the Malibu-Lost Hills sheriff’s station, he came close to relieving himself publicly on the station floor. During all this brouhaha, according to Mee, Gibson made frequent use of “the F-word.” Later, rumors circulated that, according to some unnamed source other than Mee, Gibson also made a crude, sexist remark to a female deputy at the sheriff’s station. Despite all this drama, within five hours, Gibson was released on bail. Within twelve hours the story of his arrest and reprehensible behavior had hit the news services, and what seemed to be written copies of Deputy Mee’s original arrest report were posted on the celebrity-news Web site tmz.com.

Los Angeles County Sheriff’s Department booking photograph of Mel Gibson on the morning of his arrest. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

For the next month, debates raged in the media. Was the sheriff’s department report posted on the Web authentic? If so, how was it obtained? Had someone at the sheriff's station leaked the report? Had Gibson been given preferential treatment because he was a celebrity? Had Mee's superiors tried to coerce him into downplaying or denying Gibson's alleged bigoted statements? Is Gibson truly an anti-Semite? Many people in the entertainment industry and prominent Jewish Americans made public statements either attacking or defending Gibson. The actor also found himself being widely spoofed in editorial cartoons, in comic routines, and on television.

Gibson's initial response was to issue a public apology the next day, July 29. However, this statement of shame never specifically addressed the charge of anti-Semitism and seemed to blame the incident on drinking and his long-term problems with alcohol. When public opinion deemed this mea culpa unsatisfactory, Gibson offered another on August 1. In this second attempt at redress, he directly denied his alleged religious bigotry and denounced not only anti-Semitism specifically but all forms of hate and prejudice. He also offered to get together with Jewish people offended by his outburst and discuss the matter openly, a ploy he had used earlier when crude, homophobic remarks he made in an interview with a Spanish reporter outraged gays and lesbians in 1991. Gibson did not contest the charge of driving while intoxicated, and on August 18 he was given three years of probation, fined thirteen hundred dollars, and ordered to take part in various alcohol rehabilitation programs.

IMPACT

In spite of the attention it received and the heated debate it sparked, the inebriated blather that Gibson spewed at Deputy Mee in July of 2006 ultimately did little damage to the star's career. He continued to make and release films and to be a powerful entertainment figure. In part, this outcome derived from the somewhat soiled and tattered reputation that Gibson brought with him to the scandal. He had already been accused of being intolerant. After media scrutiny dissipated, most people retreated to opinions that they had reached long ago about his attitudes and behavior, leaving his fans to decide to accept his excuses and apologies and his detractors to ask themselves if they could expect anything less from him.

No doubt the scandal would have seriously jeopardized the career of a celebrity with a tamer, more level-headed public persona, as the shock would have been far keener and the additional charge of hypocrisy would have been incredibly damaging. In fact, the only concrete outcome of the incident was that it inspired the state of California to pass a law in 2007 making it a crime for law enforcement or court officials to sell or solicit for sale any information, including photographs, about the arrest of a celebrity or other high-profile detainee.

—Thomas Du Bose

FURTHER READING

- Carr, Steven. Hollywood and Anti-Semitism. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2001. Although covering only the time period up to World War II, this book remains the definitive work on its subject and provides cogent background for the incident involving Mel Gibson.
- Clarkson, Wensley. Mel Gibson: Living Dangerously. New York: Thunder's Mouth Press, 1999. Predates the 2006 scandal but provides insight into Gibson's troubled history with ethnic, racial, and sexual minorities.
- Newton, Michael, and John L. French. Celebrities and Crime. New York: Chelsea House, 2008. Written especially for younger readers, this book examines the intersection of celebrity and crime. Discusses how law enforcement handles celebrities accused of criminal acts, as well as celebrities victimized by crime.
- Parish, James Robert. Hollywood Bad Boys: Loud, Fast, and Out of Control. Chicago: Contemporary Books, 2002. A revealing collection of biographies of Hollywood male celebrities who are known for extremes of behavior. No biography of Gibson but helpful for understanding the culture that celebrates rough-edged actors.
- SEE ALSO: Jan. 18, 1923: Actor Wallace Reid's Death in Drug Rehab Shakes Film Industry; Feb. 6, 1942: Film Star Errol Flynn Is Acquitted of Rape; Jan. 14, 1943: Film Star Frances Farmer Is Jailed and Institutionalized; Aug. 31, 1948: Film Star Robert Mitchum Is Arrested for Drug Possession; May, 1955: Scandal Magazine Reveals Actor Rory Calhoun's Criminal Past; Feb. 25, 1977: Film Producer David Begelman Is Found to Have Forged Checks; 1980: Biographer Claims Actor Errol Flynn Was a Nazi Spy; Jan. 25, 1984: Jesse Jackson Calls New York City "Hymietown"; Dec. 1, 1987: Yale Scholar's Wartime Anti-Semitic Writings Are Revealed; July 18, 1988: Actor Rob Lowe Videotapes Sexual Tryst with a Minor; July 26, 1991: Comedian Pee-wee Herman Is Arrested for Public Indecency; June 27, 1995: Film Star Hugh Grant Is Arrested for Lewd Conduct; June 22, 2005: U.S. Air Force Investigates Religious Intolerance at Its Academy.

August 12, 2006

NOVELIST GÜNTER GRASS ADMITS TO YOUTHFUL NAZI TIES

One of Germany's leading writers, Günter Grass was long an outspoken critic of his nation's reluctance to come to terms with its criminal Nazi past. He thus created a scandal when he admitted that when he was a teenager he himself had been a member of a Waffen-SS paramilitary unit, after more than sixty years of silence about this episode in his life.

LOCALE: Germany

CATEGORIES: Publishing and journalism; literature; social issues and reform; military; ethics

KEY FIGURE

Günter Grass (b. 1927), German novelist and writer

SUMMARY OF EVENT

In an interview with the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung (FAZ) about his memoir Beim häuten der Zwiebel (2006; Peeling the Onion, 2007), Günter Grass discussed his revelation in the book that he had been a member of the Waffen-SS, the combat division of the elite Nazi paramilitary force, for a brief period in 1944-1945. The SS was responsible for the majority of the atrocities perpetrated by the Nazi regime, including the Holocaust, and was condemned as a criminal organization at the Nuremberg Trials (1945-1949); the Waffen-SS, however, which included conscripted soldiers, was exempted from prosecution.

Although Grass had never concealed his enthusiasm for the Nazi movement as a teenager, he had always maintained publicly that his involvement in World War II was limited to service with FLAK, Germany's antiaircraft service, in 1944. One biography, Michael Jürgs's Bürger Grass: Biografie eines deutschen Dichters (2002; citizen Grass: biography of a German poet), is based on countless hours of interviews with Grass about his youth, and it perpetuates the story of his wartime service. Jürgs revised the biography and addresses Grass's Waffen-SS service and the attendant scandal in Günter Grass: Eine deutsche Biografie (2007; Günter Grass: a German biography). Within his private circle, Grass had confided the truth only to his wife, though not to his children, and to a small group of colleagues, including Austrian writer Robert Schindel. Schindel affirmed in a statement to the Viennese daily Die Presse that Grass had told him about his Waffen-SS service more than twenty years earlier and talked about it on numerous occasions.

In the FAZ interview, Grass addressed his treatment in Beim häuten der Zwiebel of his childhood in Danzig (now Gdańsk) at the beginning of the war, his involvement in the Hitler Youth, his application to join a submarine mission as a fifteen-year-old boy eager to leave home, and his unexpected summons to active, though fairly uneventful, service two years later in the Frundsberg division of the Waffen-SS. Grass's activity in the Waffen-SS was limited; he never fired a single shot in combat and spent the majority of his time either sick with jaundice or training on outmoded weaponry. Grass has affirmed that he was unaware that his assignment was to be with the Waffen-SS until he arrived in Dresden, yet even then he was willfully blind to the real nature of the organization and felt no sense of guilt or shame for his affiliation until after the war. Since then, however, he had reproached himself heavily for his susceptibility to Nazi propaganda and his failure to ask the necessary questions.

Interestingly, Beim häuten der Zwiebel had been distributed to reviewers several weeks prior to the publication of Grass's interview in FAZ on August 12, 2006. Evidently, none had been eager enough in his or her reading to come across the sparse passages devoted to Grass's recollection of his service in the Waffen-SS. The record of Grass's internment in a U.S. POW camp in Bavaria, undiscovered for over sixty years, was quickly retrieved after his admission had been made public. Similarly, several months after the scandal broke, German biographer Klaus Wagenbach came across his notes from an unfinished Grass biography from 1963 that contained references to the dates, locations, and nature of Grass's military service. It would seem, therefore, that Grass had not elected to conceal his past with the Waffen-SS until after the year 1963. As it was, however, the public was completely unprepared for the "global shock" that was unleashed by the publication of the FAZ interview.

The prevailing immediate reaction was one of anger and disillusionment, particularly in Germany and Poland, Grass's birthplace, where the term "SS-man" is held synonymous in the Polish language with the devil and the incarnation of pure evil. Numerous literary figures and intellectuals felt compelled to speak out in defense or condemnation of their colleague. While some lauded Grass's courage in his voluntary public disclosure of his past, others joined in the general outcry against Grass's protracted silence, attacking his past indictments of Germany's repression of its criminal past—for instance, his vehement denunciation of the visit by Ronald Reagan and German chancellor Helmut Kohl in 1985 to the Bitburg military cemetery, which contained the graves of SS soldiers—as evidence of gross hypocrisy and moral duplicity.

The timing of Grass's revelation likewise gave rise to mistrust and speculation as to his motives. In the FAZ interview, Grass had explained simply that the truth had weighed heavily on him and had to come out, adding that the need to break his silence had, in part, motivated the writing of Beim häuten der Zwiebel. However, the theory that Grass deferred his announcement until after securing the Nobel Prize in Literature quickly gained widespread currency, as did the notion that his interview with FAZ was a publicity stunt to promote his new book. Certainly, whatever damage Grass's revelation may have done to his reputation and standing as a moral authority, it was a boon for the sales of Beim häuten der Zwiebel.

Press photographers swarm Günter Grass during a reading of his revealing book Peeling the Onion in December, 2007, in Prague. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

IMPACT

In the light of the tremendous interest aroused by the FAZ interview, the release date of the memoir was moved from September 1 to August 15. By August 31, all 150,000 copies of the first edition had been sold, and the second printing, consisting of 100,000 copies, was already on its way to bookstores. The memoir immediately soared to the top of the best-seller lists in Der Spiegel and Focus magazines. By the same time, translations for England, the United States, France, and Denmark were already under way, with plans being made for a translation conference in December with the author and the representatives of approximately twenty European and non-European languages.

In view of Grass's admission of his involvement in the Waffen-SS, many critics called for him to be stripped of some of the many honors he had acquired over the course of his long career; most notably, of the Nobel Prize in Literature and of his honorary citizenship in the city of Gdańsk. Both of these campaigns were short-lived, however. The Nobel Foundation in Sweden issued an announcement on August 15 that the conferment of a Nobel Prize was irrevocable. Lech Wałęsa, former president of Poland, a recipient of the Nobel Peace Prize, and one of the first and most outspoken advocates for rescinding Grass's honorary citizenship, changed his position after reading Grass's explanatory and conciliatory letter of August 23 to the mayor of Gdańsk.

Other proposals for Grass's punishment or atonement quickly followed but met with little response. These proposals include those by literary critic Hellmuth Karasek, who suggested to the German broadcaster ZDF that Grass should donate his Nobel Prize money to a charitable organization for the victims of the Waffen-SS regime. Conservative German politician Erika Stein called for Grass to turn over his honorarium for Beim häuten der Zwiebel to Polish victims of Nazism. The Polish vice minister of national education called for Grass to use the book's proceeds to finance the printing of

A SENSE OF SHAME

In his 2006 memoir Beim Häuten der Zwiebel, or Peeling the Onion (2007), Günter Grass introduces readers to his days as a member of the Waffen-SS military unit during the final year of World War II. In this excerpt, he admits to feeling shame but also to the burden of carrying that shame for close to sixty years.

My new marching orders made it clear where the recruit with my name was to undergo basic training: on a drill ground of the Waffen SS, as a Panzer gunner, somewhere far off in the Bohemian Woods. . . .

[F]or decades I refused to admit to the word [Waffen], and to the double letters [SS]. What I had accepted with the stupid pride of youth I wanted to conceal after the war out of a recurrent sense of shame. But the burden remained, and no one could alleviate it.

True, during the tank gunner training . . . there was no mention of the war crimes that later came to light, but the ignorance I claim could not blind me to the fact that I had been incorporated into a system that had planned, organized, and carried out the extermination of millions of people. Even if I could not be accused of active complicity, there remains to this day a residue that is all too commonly called joint responsibility. I will have to live with it for the rest of my life.

Source: Peeling the Onion, translated by Michael Henry Heim (Orlando, Fla.: Harcourt, 2007), pp. 110-111.

history books for Polish children. Grass did, however, voluntarily refuse the prestigious Brückenpreis (Bridge Prize) from the Polish city of Görlitz that was offered to him at the end of August, out of the fear that the conferment would ultimately be revoked under the pressure of public protest.

—Jennifer Driscoll Colosimo

FURTHER READING

Fuchs, Anne. "'Ehrlich, du lügst wie gedruckt': Günter Grass's Autobiographical Confession and the Changing Territory of Germany's Memory Culture." German Life and Letters 60, no. 2 (April, 2007): 261-275. Offers a psychological-literary analysis of Peeling the Onion and addresses the broader issue of collective memory in Germany.

Grass, Günter. "How I Spent the War." The New

Yorker, June 4, 2007. A harrowing account of Grass's wartime experiences in the Waffen-SS, in which he makes no attempts to excuse himself from membership but rather ponders the difficulties in recalling events of his youth.

_____. Peeling the Onion. Translated by Michael Henry Heim. Orlando, Fla.: Harcourt, 2007. English translation of Grass's memoir of his youth, Beim häuten der Zwiebel, which included the revelation of his service in the Waffen-SS in 1944-1945.

Schade, Richard E. "Layers of Meaning, War, Art: Grass's Beim Häuten der Zwiebel." German Quarterly 80, no. 3 (Summer, 2007): 279-301. Provides a valuable critical analysis of Grass's narrative style in the memoir and elucidates its connection to Grass's suppression of painful wartime memories and feelings of personal moral failure.

SEE ALSO: May 26, 1945: Norwegian Writer Knut Hamsun Is Arrested for Treason; Oct. 26, 1962: West German Police Raid Der Spiegel Magazine Offices; Feb. 23, 1963: Play Accuses Pope Pius XII of Complicity in the Holocaust; Nov. 9, 1976: German Generals Must Retire for Supporting a Neo-Nazi Pilot; 1980: Biographer Claims Actor Errol Flynn Was a Nazi Spy; Mar. 3, 1986: Former U.N. Secretary-General Kurt Waldheim's Nazi Past Is Revealed; Dec. 1, 1987: Yale Scholar's Wartime Anti-Semitic Writings Are Revealed.

September 17, 2006

NEW ZEALAND PRIME MINISTER'S HUSBAND IS "OUTED" AS GAY

In 2006, Peter Davis, the husband of New Zealand's prime minister, Helen Clark, was outed as gay when the Star-Times newspaper and the magazine Investigate published pictures of him kissing a gay man. The magazine implied Davis, too, was gay, but Davis and the prime minister both denied the allegations. The slander was likely launched by a right-wing fundamentalist Christian group seeking to smear Clark's political career.

LOCALE: Auckland, New Zealand

CATEGORIES: Publishing and journalism; sex; politics; government; public morals

KEY FIGURES

Peter Davis (b. 1947), professor of sociology at the University of Auckland and husband of Prime Minister Helen Clark

Helen Clark (b. 1950), prime minister of New Zealand, 1999-

Ian Scott (fl. early twenty-first century), medical doctor and longtime friend of Clark and Davis

SUMMARY OF EVENT

On September 17, 2006, not long after her reelection as New Zealand's prime minister, Helen Clark and her husband, Peter Davis, were the foci of a vicious smear campaign that alleged Davis was gay. The controversy was touched off when New Zealand's Star-Times newspaper and an alternative magazine, Investigate, ran photographs of Davis kissing Ian Scott, a medical doctor and longtime friend of Davis and Clark. Scott was out as gay.

Immediately, the couple's entire marriage came under scrutiny, even though they had been typically low key about their private relationships. Over the next several days, their entire marital history was played out in the newspapers, though none of the revelations amounted to anything particularly scandalous. Instead, the press was rehashing old debates about the couple, both of whom are generally regarded as quite unconventional. Davis and Clark met in 1977 and, after four years of dating, married in 1981, not long after Clark's first election to Parliament, largely because they already shared a home and believed they would be inviting moral criticism if they remained unmarried.

Over the years, Clark and Davis spent a good deal of time apart, with one or the other commuting home on weekends. The press, of course, implied that these separations indicated emotional rifts, but Davis and Clark insist they were entirely job related. Socially, they are also opposites, with Clark displaying a composed outer shell in nearly every situation and Davis remaining introverted and awkward. Davis, whose academic work is unquestionably high in quality, is nonetheless stereotyped as a househusband because he tends to more of the domestic matters. Clark also employs several women in her office who are lesbian, leading the press to speculate about her sexuality. Davis and Clark shared an embarrassing public kiss in 1994 that became front-page fodder and was used to imply a bad relationship.

In 2005, the race for the prime minister's seat was extremely tight. The National Party garnered quite a bit of support against Clark's Labour Party by focusing its campaign on tax cuts. However, Labour won a narrow victory at the polls, and Clark celebrated her reelection. However, she remained a controversial figure and retained enemies who wanted to see her ouster. Thus, when the kiss her husband received from Scott reached the press, the media immediately began hinting that Davis was gay. Clark, Davis, and Scott all denied these rumors, explaining that Scott, a family friend attending Clark's postelection victory party in 2005, was drunk and the kiss was celebratory in nature. However, the media storm outlasted the initial articles, and both Clark and Davis had to repeatedly defend their marriage in the press.

Throughout the scandal, the media granted the unspoken acceptance of homosexuality as aberrant. Even though Scott is openly gay, he, Davis, and Clark all found themselves protesting Davis's heterosexuality. In other words, if Scott had been a woman, the scandal would have been less dramatic. A simple extramarital affair would not have garnered so much attention. None of the three devoted any energy to arguing that Davis was not having an affair with Scott. Instead, they were all forced to defend Davis's heterosexuality, just as Clark had been forced to defend her own heterosexuality in the past. By implying that Davis was gay, the press effectively implied that not only was the Clark-Davis home devoid of love, but the entire marriage also was a front to conceal both parties' closet homosexuality.

The slander was probably launched by a right-wing fundamentalist Christian group called the Raven-Taylor-Hales Brethren, seeking to smear Clark's political image. An offshoot of another Christian group called the Exclusive Brethren, the Raven-Taylor-Hales Brethren oppose the Labour Party's liberal politics. Although Brethren members, who support a separatist position, do not vote, they are politically active. For instance, in 2005, they spent between $500,000 and $1 million on anti-Labour Party campaigning that hinted at support for the National Party. They also regularly campaign for conservative candidates.

After the allegations became public, Davis and Clark learned the group probably had hired a private investigator. Clark initially believed the National Party had impelled the Brethren's actions, as the attack came soon after a minor scandal in which a conservative member of Parliament was accused of having an extramarital affair. However, the Nationals adamantly denied any such participation and sympathized with the unfair situation the prime minister and her husband faced. Scott expressed his outrage, as did Davis's colleagues and friends, who maintained that the prime minister and her husband have been a devoted couple, deeply in love.

Even after the scandal had died down, the media were still gleefully looking for evidence of the couple's nontraditional lifestyle. For instance, when Davis turned sixty years old, magazines reported that Clark did not get her a gift, as he did not want one (at least one magazine hinted that her gifts were too practical for him), and that he brought her tea in bed.

IMPACT

In all reality, the scandal was barely a blip on Clark's professional record. From her perspective, it was simply an attack upon a public figure who chooses to keep her private life out of the limelight as much as possible. No charges were filed against the Brethren, and no public hue and cry was raised against Clark. However, the event is nonetheless noteworthy for several reasons.

First, the sexuality of public figures will remain a public topic. Therefore, the speculation about Clark's or Davis's being homosexual, no matter how unfair, represents a form of sport in New Zealand and, indeed, around the world. Other famous and powerful women sometimes perceived as lesbians include former U.S. first lady Eleanor Roosevelt and U.S. senator and former First Lady Hillary Rodham Clinton, among others. Second, both Clark and Davis stand well apart from stereotypical gender roles, which are more politically palatable to some. It is much harder to find potential homosexuality in a family with a domestic wife and an outspoken husband. Therefore, in spite of Clark and Davis's protestations of heterosexuality, their lifestyle will certainly grace the front pages of New Zealand's papers again.

—Jessie Bishop Powell

FURTHER READING

Dorman, Michael. Dirty Politics. New York: Delacorte, 1979. A history of smear campaigns and other dirty political tactics in the United States. A good primer of the nasty tricks politicians regularly play on each other and have played upon them by outside parties.

Edwards, Brian. Helen: Portrait of a Prime Minister. Auckland, New Zealand: Exisle, 2001. Includes discussions about Clark's marriage and the controversial speculations about her sexuality already afloat well before Davis received Scott's infamous kiss.

Hallett, Greg. New Zealand: A Blackmailer's Guide. Auckland, New Zealand: Prince of New Spain, 2007. Covers the Davis-Scott scandal along with other smear campaigns and dirty politics that have plagued the island nation.

SEE ALSO: Dec., 1982: Julie Andrews and Blake Edwards Deny Being Gay; Jan. 12 and May 11, 1987: Media Reports Spark Investigation of Australian Police Corruption.

September 18, 2006

NEWSWEEK REVEALS THAT HEWLETT-PACKARD SPIED ON ITS OWN BOARD

Newsweek magazine revealed that Patricia Dunn, the chairperson of technology giant Hewlett-Packard, had arranged for electronic surveillance of board members and journalists to stop corporate leaks to the press. Through the use of pretexting, company investigators lied to illegally obtain telephone records. The resulting scandal led to a criminal case in California, a congressional investigation, federal criminal charges, and several company resignations.

LOCALE: Palo Alto, California

CATEGORIES: Espionage; publishing and journalism; business and labor; corruption; law and the courts; trade and commerce

KEY FIGURES

Patricia Dunn (b. 1953), chairperson of Hewlett-Packard, 2005-2006

George A. Keyworth II (b. 1939), physicist and HP board member

Tom Perkins (b. 1932), venture capitalist and HP board member

David A. Kaplan (fl. early twenty-first century), Newsweek reporter and attorney

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Founded in 1939 by Stanford University classmates Bill Hewlett and Dave Packard, Hewlett-Packard Corporation (HP) became one of the most successful and admired of American businesses. It grew into a global company dealing in information technology infrastructure, personal computing, and information access. In 2004, HP had revenues of nearly $80 billion, and by 2006 it employed 150,000 people in 170 countries.

Patricia Dunn assumed the chair of HP's board on February 7, 2005, when Carly Fiorina, arguably the most prominent female chief executive officer in the United States at the time, left the company under pressure after accusing two board members of leaking information to the press. Dunn had joined the HP board of directors in 1998 as part of an effort to diversify the firm's board, which was dominated by family members and friends of founders Packard and Hewlett. Dunn had been cochair of Barclays Global Investors, an investment banking firm. She had also served as co-chief executive officer of Wells Fargo Investment Advisers. As chair of HP's audit committee since 2002, she had earned the disdain of board members Tom Perkins and George A. Keyworth II for her detail-oriented style and enthusiastic support of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002, which established standards for corporate boards.

As a non-executive chairperson, Dunn presided over board meetings, recommended board committees and committee chairs, and made herself available for consultation with the interim chief executive officer. Dunn was told by other directors that her most important duties would be to preside over the choice of a new chief executive officer and to stop leaks of information from HP to the media. While leaks of information to the media are nearly impossible to halt, such unauthorized disclosures infuriate corporate leaders concerned about the images of their companies and the impact of such disclosures upon stock prices as well as other business dealings. A series of damaging leaks had preceded Fiorina's departure and had nearly derailed the selection of Mark Hurd, the new chief executive officer who began working in his new position on April 1, 2005. As Fiorina stated when she learned about a Patricia Dunn in a Santa Clara County courtroom in October, 2006.

(Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

leak of information from one board meeting, such disclosures are also a breach of trust—and no management team can operate without trust. Fiorina believed that Perkins and Keyworth had leaked corporate information during her tenure.

Dunn, too, was soon immersed in a leak investigation, in this case a disclosure to The Wall Street Journal. She turned to an HP security manager for help in proceeding, but he referred her to an outside investigator with the Boston-based company Security Outsourcing Solutions (SOS). This company, which had been under contract with HP for ten years, often hired subcontractors to carry out specific investigations, such as obtaining private telephone records. Dunn requested an investigator from SOS, which assigned Ronald R. DeLia to the job.

Dunn code-named the investigation Project Kona. She advised the board of the investigation and obtained support from a majority of the directors, though she did not provide specific details of the inquiry because board members themselves were under investigation.

In the meantime, Dunn and Perkins began to clash over company control issues. Dunn opposed Perkins's nominees to the board while Perkins resented Dunn's focus on governance. Disagreements between the two became so frequent that Dunn coined the phrase "chairman abuse" to describe Perkins's remarks. Supporting Dunn was the chief executive officer, Hurd, who had been informed of the leaks by Dunn. In response, he warned HP managers that they would be summarily terminated for leaking information.

On June 15, private investigator DeLia informed Dunn and Ann Baskins, HP's attorney, that he had obtained the private phone records of reporters from Businessweek and The New York Times. De-Lia said that his investigators had used "pretexting"; that is, they presented themselves, in this case, as board directors to obtain "their own" phone records. Baskins expressed concern over the legality of the tactic, but DeLia informed her that he was aware of no laws banning the practice.

In January, 2006, Keyworth had lunch with reporter Dawn Kawamoto of CNET, a technology-review Web site. The two had become friends, and Keyworth thought that the lunch was purely a social occasion. However, some of Keyworth's discussion with Kawamoto subsequently appeared on CNET, in a piece by Kawamoto that presented Hurd

ACCEPTING RESPONSIBILITY?

Former Hewlett-Packard chair Patricia Dunn testified before a subcommittee of the House Committee on Energy and Commerce on September 28, 2006. Representative Cliff Stearns of Florida wanted to know if Dunn felt any sense of responsibility for the pretexting "fiasco" at Hewlett-Packard. His questions, and her responses, are excerpted here.

Mr. Stearns. Ms. Dunn, your written testimony is 33 pages long. You go into great detail explaining why the investigation was necessary and how you were assured that these aggressive tactics were legal. You even advocate congressional action to produce clear-cut rules on pretexting, a suggestion that this committee has endorsed. However, conspicuous by its absence in your testimony is any degree of contrition or acceptance of responsibility.

And I have listened to this testimony in my office, and you have just indicated it is wrong. You indicated you had been briefed three times, and yet, there is no suggestion that you are going to accept any responsibility and no sense that what you did was wrong. So I get the sense after reading your testimony that you still do not really believe that you did anything wrong here.

And I guess that is a question. Do you feel that you are totally innocent here and with no culpability?

Ms. Dunn. My understanding is that my opening statement is a part of my full submission.

Mr. Stearns. . . . The question I want is yes or no, do you think that your—have any culpability in this whole fiasco? Just yes or no.

Ms. Dunn. I will repeat what I said in my opening statement. I deeply regret that so many people were badly affected.

Mr. Stearns. We are not talking about other people. We are talking about you personally.

Ms. Dunn. Including me, that was said in my opening statement. And I would like to tell you what I would do differently—

Mr. Stearns. But regret is one thing, but culpability that you accept blame is another, and I am just trying to think—and I know, I mean, you could say you are not blamable. You can say that, but I am just trying to put on the record whether you think you are at fault for anything, other than regrets and you are sorry and things like that.

Is it just possible you could say yes or no, that you feel you have some culpability?

Ms. Dunn. If I knew then what I know now, I would have done things very differently and there are some specific things I would have done very differently. . . .

Mr. Stearns. I am interpreting what you say is that knowing what you know today it was wrong?

Ms. Dunn. Absolutely.

Mr. Stearns. And knowing what you do today that you have to accept responsibility, you have to accept personal responsibility for what happened. That is my interpretation of what you are telling me. Is that a correct interpretation?

Ms. Dunn. Sir, I do not accept personal responsibility for what happened.

and HP in a positive light. Keyworth liked the report but Dunn nevertheless launched another investigation to track down the leak. HP employment attorney Kevin Hunsaker headed the investigation, named Kona II, and reported weekly to Dunn and Baskins.

Kona II examined more than ten thousand articles published about HP in the preceding six years. The inquiry included pretexting to obtain telephone records and created a fictitious employee to leak news to Kawamoto. The Kona team also trailed Kawamoto and her daughter, staked out the homes of Kawamoto and Keyworth, and examined Kawamoto's phone records. They discovered several calls from Kawamoto to Keyworth. In May, Keyworth admitted to the board that he was the source of the leak to CNET. He was asked by the board to resign, but he refused. However, Perkins resigned from the board in anger and then sought legal counsel.

In July, Perkins received a letter from AT&T about an online account that he had never established. On August 14, he informed the HP board that he had direct proof of illegal hacking of phone records. He demanded that HP notify the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) because he was legally obliged to publicly disclose the reasons for his resignation. HP refused to notify the SEC. Perkins's legal counsel then notified the SEC, U.S. attorney offices in Manhattan and San Francisco, the California attorney general, the Federal Trade Commission, and the Federal Communications Commission. In response to these notifications, HP amended its SEC filing on September 6 to acknowledge that investigators had engaged in possibly illegal pretexting. On September 18, Newsweek magazine featured a cover story by reporter David A. Kaplan on Dunn and her tactics at HP, bringing the entire affair to the public. Hurd announced Dunn's resignation on September 22, effective on January 18.

IMPACT

Initially, the HP board strongly supported Dunn. The company ordered an independent investigation that concluded that she had acted properly. However, the board then asked Dunn to resign. Several resignations followed, including those of Keyworth, Baskins, and Hunsaker. Perkins charged that the entire investigation was an attempt by Dunn to eliminate the friends of Packard and Hewlett who remained on the board. The board reimbursed Perkins for $1.5 million in legal fees.

On October 4, the California attorney general charged Dunn with four felonies: fraudulent wire communication, wrongful use of computer data, identity theft, and conspiracy. She pleaded not guilty at her arraignment. Hunsaker, DeLia, and two private investigators also were charged. On January 12, 2007, one of the investigators pleaded guilty to federal charges of identity theft and conspiracy. The charges against Dunn were dropped in March, possibly in part because she was diagnosed with advanced ovarian cancer. Charges against Hunsaker, DeLia, and the second investigator were dropped after they completed community service. In December, 2006, HP had paid a $14.5 million civil settlement to the state of California, with most of the money slated to fund investigations into privacy rights and intellectual property violations.

On February 28, 2008, HP announced that it had settled for undisclosed sums the claims brought against the company by the BusinessWeek and New York Times journalists whose phone records were illegally obtained through HP pretexting. Other lawsuits were filed against HP, including one by CNET reporter Kawamoto.

—Caryn E. Neumann

FURTHER READING

Baer, Miriam. "Corporate Governance and Corporate Policing: What Can We Learn from the Hewlett-Packard Pretexting Scandal?" University of Cincinnati Law Review 77 (2009). Using the HP scandal and Dunn's role in that scandal as a starting point, this article looks at the tension between a corporate board's dual mandate to police its own and implement ethical corporate governance.

Kaplan, David A. "The Boss Who Spied on Her Board." Newsweek, September 18, 2006, 40-45. This cover article broke the story of the HP investigations, triggered a debate about pretexting, and led to Dunn's resignation.

Packard, David. The HP Way: How Bill Hewlett and I Built Our Company. New York: Collins Business, 2006. A history of Hewlett-Packard, recommended by the company as a thorough explanation of its approaches to business, people, and processes.

Stewart, James B. "The Kona Files: How an Obsession with Leaks Brought Scandal to Hewlett-Packard." The New Yorker, February 19, 2007, 152-170. A detailed account of the scandal and its aftermath.

SEE ALSO: Feb. 4, 1976: Lockheed Is Implicated in Bribing Foreign Officials; Oct. 9, 1980: Bendix Executive Resigns Amid Rumors of an Affair; May 2, 1984: E. F. Hutton Executives Plead Guilty to Fraud; Feb. 4, 1996: Whistle-Blower Reveals Tobacco Industry Corruption; Dec. 2, 2001: Enron Bankruptcy Reveals Massive Financial Fraud; June 25, 2002: Internal Corruption Forces Adelphia Communications to Declare Bankruptcy; Mar. 5, 2004: Martha Stewart Is Convicted in Insider-Trading Scandal; Sept. 12, 2005: Westar Energy Executives Are Found Guilty of Looting Their Company.

September 29, 2006

CONGRESSMAN MARK FOLEY RESIGNS IN SEX SCANDAL INVOLVING A TEENAGE PAGE

Congressman Mark Foley resigned from the U.S. House of Representatives when it was discovered that he sent sexually explicit e-mails and text messages to at least one teenage boy who was serving as a congressional page. The resignation triggered investigations into how House leadership addressed earlier accusations. Dennis Hastert, Speaker of the House, did not return for another term, and Republican seats in the House may have been lost because of the scandal.

LOCALE: Washington, D.C.

CATEGORIES: Government; politics; sex crimes; public morals

KEY FIGURES

Mark Foley (b. 1954), U.S. representative from Florida, 1995-2006

Jeff Trandahl (b. 1964), clerk of the House of Representatives, 1999-2005

Dennis Hastert (b. 1942), U.S. representative from Missouri, 1987-2007, and Speaker of the House, 1999-2007

SUMMARY OF EVENT

The House Page Program, a unique opportunity for students in their junior year of high school to live in Washington, D.C., allows students to experience the inner workings of the U.S. House of Representatives. Pages run errands for House members, assist with telephone calls in the cloakroom, and assist on the House floor as needed. In addition to working on Capitol Hill, pages also attend academic classes.

The program has been in place for more than two hundred years. At its inception, only males could serve as pages, but in 1973, female pages earned a permanent place in the program. Until the early 1980's, pages were responsible for finding their own lodging and were largely unsupervised after leaving work. In 1982, however, a page commission recommended creating a residence hall near Capitol Hill for all pages so they could be properly supervised. Concurrently, the commission also recommended the establishment of a page board, comprising current members of the House, to oversee the program and to provide adequate supervision and protection for the pages. Approximately seventy-two pages serve in a given year, and the program is administered by the clerk of the House. The daily activities are overseen by the residence-hall staff and school and work staff.

Pages serve on the House floor and are in contact with members on a regular basis. Many members become mentors to the pages, providing a unique glimpse into the life of a representative. As early as 2000, Mark Foley was noted for his involvement with the pages, and there was a general feeling among the staff of the Page Program that Foley was becoming too familiar with the pages. Jeff Trandahl served as clerk of the House from 1999 to 2005. According to a later report of the House Committee on the Standards for Official Conduct, Trandahl testified that Foley “was a distraction and was interfering with the program” and that he “failed to keep a professional distance from the pages.”

Foley also reportedly visited the Page Residence Hall on more than one occasion. One evening, in June, 2000, two or more pages got into Foley’s car and left the grounds of the residence hall. The pages returned not long after. Trandahl warned Foley to stay away from the pages.

In the fall of 2001, a former page (who remained anonymous) appointed by Representative Jim Kolbe contacted Kolbe’s office to report that he had been communicating with Foley via e-mail since the end of his time as a page. The former page viewed the communications as a means of networking, but he had also received an e-mail from Foley that made him uncomfortable. He reported this to Kolbe’s office and asked that someone handle the situation. He subsequently received an e-mail of apology from Foley but continued his communications with the Congress member. However, he was not the only page with whom Foley maintained contact.

In 2005, another former page contacted his sponsor, Representative Rodney Alexander, to report on the nature of the e-mails he was receiving from Foley. The former page told a staff member that Foley’s e-mails were “starting to freak [him] out.” The House Speaker, Dennis Hastert, and clerk were both notified of the e-mails and the parents’ request that the matter be handled quietly.

Mark Foley, right, at a 2003 press conference in Washington, D.C. (AP/Wide World Photos)

After talking with Alexander’s office, Trandahl and Representative John Shimkus, chairman of the Page Board, approached Foley regarding the e-mails. He was told to stop communications with the former page and to cease any involvement in the page program.

On September 29, 2006, ABC News contacted Foley’s office and informed his staff that it was in possession of instant-message exchanges between Foley and a former page that were sexually explicit. Foley’s staff had a meeting regarding the messages. Foley resigned that same day, left Washington, D.C., and admitted himself into rehabilitation for alcoholism. The identity of the page involved in the exchange was not revealed, but the instant messages became widely known after being posted on various blogs and through media outlets.

The exchange of messages was the culmination of years of questionable behavior by Foley. Although he never was found to have had physical contact with current or former House pages, he had clearly crossed a line. A House ethics committee report of December, 2006, stated, "Such conduct is an abuse of power, and an abuse of trust of the pages, their parents or guardians, and the Congress itself." Because Foley resigned from the House, no official action could be taken against him by that government body.

IMPACT

Foley was not the first House member involved in a scandal involving underage pages. In 1982, Daniel Crane and Gerry Studds were both censured by the House following an investigation that revealed they had each engaged in a sexual relationship with pages. Crane apologized for the affair he had with a seventeen-year-old girl but lost his seat in Congress in the 1984 election. Studds admitted to an affair with a male page that occurred in 1973 and announced to the House that he was gay. He was re-elected in 1984 and continued to serve in the House until 1997. On the heels of the 1982 scandal, Speaker of the House Tip O'Neill formed a page commission, leading to major changes to the program in an effort to protect the pages. Positive changes included housing all pages in a dormitory located on Capitol Hill and implementing a page board to oversee activities of the page program. An official page code of conduct was developed, allowing for the immediate dismissal of any page found in violation of program rules.

Following the Foley scandal, the House Page Program was reevaluated and further changes were made to the composition of the page board. Two members from each political party (Democratic and Republican), as well as the House clerk, the sergeant at arms, a page parent, and a page alumnus, now serve on the board. House leadership hoped that making necessary changes would prevent a similar incident from occurring and would improve communication regarding the welfare of pages.

—Tessa Li Powell

FURTHER READING

Abrams, Jim. "House Leaders Investigate Page Program." The Washington Post, December 13, 2007. Amid a new page scandal and the resignation of two members of the page board, the House again called for a reevaluation of the program.

Amer, Mildred. "Pages of the United States Congress: History, Background Information, and Proposals for Change." CRS Report for Congress, February 6, 2007. Describes the page program and highlights changes that have been made or proposed since the Mark Foley scandal of 2006.

Babington, Charles, and Jonathan Weisman. "Rep. Foley Quits in Page Scandal." The Washington Post, September 30, 2006. Follows the resignation of Foley and examines the roles played in the case by congressional leadership.

Long, Kim. The Almanac of Political Corruption, Scandals, and Dirty Politics. New York: Delacorte Press, 2007. A wide-ranging book detailing the various scandals and corrupt practices that have plagued U.S. politics.

Turley, Jonathan. "A Page Protection Act: The Path to Saving a Historic Program." Roll Call, October 5, 2006. Written by a page alum and legal professor. Addresses problems with the page board and discusses possible remedies to maintain the program.

United States Congress. House of Representatives. Committee on the Standards of Official Conduct. Investigation of Allegations Related to Improper Conduct Involving Members and Current or Former House Pages. Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 2006. Committee report written in response to the Foley scandal. Examines whether the lack of response from others in the House was a breach of ethics rules.

SEE ALSO: Oct. 7, 1974: Congressman Wilbur D. Mills's Stripper Affair Leads to His Downfall; Sept. 3, 1980: Congressman Bauman Is Arrested for Liaison with Teenage Boy; July 20, 1983: Congress Members Censured in House-Page Sex Scandal; Jan. 17, 1998: President Bill Clinton Denies Sexual Affair with a White House Intern; Apr. 30, 2001: Washington Intern Chandra Levy Disappears.

October 22, 2006

CHILEAN POLITICIANS USE COMMUNITY FUNDS FOR PERSONAL CAMPAIGNS

Officials of Chiledeportes, the Chilean government's sports agency, were accused of misusing as much as $1 million in funds designated for promoting community sports programs. An e-mail leaked to the media indicated that the Chiledeportes officials had used the money in districts represented by legislators from Concertación, or the Coalition of Parties for Democracy. Opposition legislators charged that the money had been illegally used to help political campaigns.

LOCALE: ChileCATEGORIES: Corruption; government; politicsKEY FIGURES

Michelle Bachelet (b. 1951), president of Chile, 2006-

Ricardo Lagos (b. 1938), president of Chile, 2000-2006

Patricio Aylwin (b. 1918), president of Chile, 1990-1994

SUMMARY OF EVENT

In 2003, the Chilean government of President Ricardo Lagos responded to a series of scandals relating to corruption and influence peddling in the domestic development agency, the ministry of public works, and the central bank. In the wake of the scandals, a series of legal and administrative reforms were enacted to prevent a repeat of these scandals. The reforms clarified payments for public employees, changed campaign financing, established a permanent budget commission to oversee government spending, created a code of ethics for civil servants, and changed the way in which the ministry of public works awarded government contracts. The measures met with general approval both in Chile and abroad for increasing government transparency.

Even with this history of corruption, government corruption in Chile is relatively rare, according to the U.S. Department of State. Chile ranked about twentieth out of 163 countries in 2006 in the annual Corruption Perceptions Index released by the non-governmental group Transparency International, thereby holding a position similar to that of the United States and Belgium.

Concertación (Coalition of Parties for Democracy) had held executive power in Chile since 1990, perhaps contributing to a complacent atmosphere among lawmakers. Despite the scandals, the center-left government remained popular, with President Michelle Bachelet (who began her term on March 11, 2006) ranking as one of the most respected women in the country. Bachelet is Chile's first female president.

On October 22, 2006, a scandal emerged about the use of state funds by officials of Chiledeportes, a government agency that organizes local sporting activities. An audit of the agency revealed that about $1 million (U.S.), or about 90 percent of its budget, had been funneled into the coffers of local, leftist political campaigns. These payments to congressional candidates of the Party for Democracy (PD), which was part of the ruling Concertación, were fraudulently marked on forged invoices as electoral expenses.

The right-wing opposition immediately charged that Concertación had improperly used funds to win the last elections and was attempting a similar maneuver to win the upcoming elections. The main target of this charge appeared to be former president Lagos, who left office with a popularity rating of 70 percent and remained eligible to run again for president in the December, 2009, elections.

On October 30, Bachelet stated that she would not accept corruption in her administration. She was clearly concerned about the impact of the scandal upon Chile's newly positive international image. She assured the public that the scandal would be properly investigated and that changes would be made to avoid new corruption cases. She announced that a number of actions would be taken to reform the direct allocation of public funds to state agencies to ensure that the funds directly benefit the people. Bachelet also announced a restructuring of Chiledeportes to refine the project evaluation process, strengthen internal accounting procedures and institutional oversight mechanisms, and change the sports fund guidelines to disburse money only when projects have met certain requirements as documented in the annual reports of the undersecretary for athletics.

Two former officials of Concertación, Edgardo Boeninger, a Christian Democrat and former ministry general secretariat of the presidency, and Jorge Schaulsohn, founder and former PD president, then blew the whistle in interviews. They stated that members of Concertación felt entitled to take public funds for campaign purposes since private industry generally financed right-wing political parties. Both officials alleged that a culture of corruption existed within the government. Gonzalo Martner, a former president of the Socialist Party, added to the fire by giving an interview to the newspaper El Mercurio, in which he supported Schaulsohn's claims. Martner stated that the governing parties had used discretionary government funds, exempt from public scrutiny, to fund campaigns. Other former government officials supported the charges. Schaulsohn was expelled from the party in December. Schaulsohn, Boeninger, and Martner all opposed Lagos, and their attacks gave further support to the notion that much of the furor over Chiledeportes was part of an effort to block Lagos from again running for president.

Senator Camilo Escalona, Socialist Party president, stated that no members of Concertación had received money from discretionary funds since the establishment of democratic government in 1990. He charged that right-wing parties had received illegal campaign funds during the administration of dictator Augusto Pinochet Ugarte. The charge prompted the right-wing opposition Alliance for Chile to sue and attempt to subpoena more than one hundred people who had held high public office since 1990. The judge in the case blocked the subpoenas.

Emerging next was the claim that candidates for the right-wing National Renewal had used the same company as the PD to inflate their election expenses. Meanwhile, prosecutor Xavier Armendtritz pursued an investigation into Chiledeportes. Bachelet publicly supported the head of Chiledeportes and undersecretary for athletics, Catalina Depassier, and denied that a culture of corruption existed. Patricio Aylwin, president of Chile from 1990 to 1994 and a member of the coalition, stated that no culture of corruption existed, even though some government officials in his cabinet had used public funds for campaign purposes. Depassier resigned after it became known that she had lied about her educational credentials.

On November 23, 2006, Bachelet announced new anticorruption measures by releasing a thirty-two-page report produced by the minister of finance. The measures focus upon combating corruption, improving transparency in the public sector, modernizing government, and reforming campaign finance. A day later, Guillermo Díaz, president of the national railway system, faced fraud charges relating to his employment with the public works ministry under the administration of Lagos. The media charged that Díaz's employment, even after he was suspected of fraud, demonstrated a lack of concern by Concertación-led governments about public corruption. Newspapers called for greater reforms as well as concrete actions to demonstrate the government's willingness to stop abuses.

IMPACT

On November 24, the government established a legislative commission to investigate the scandal. Both progovernment and rightist Alliance for Chile members formed the commission. Nicolás Monckeberg, a deputy from the rightist National Renovation Party, headed the commission. When progovernment legislators presented a vote of no confidence against Monckeberg for allegedly abusing his leadership role by questioning government employees linked to the scandal, the opposition politicians withdrew from the commission. They argued that no credible outcome could be reached if the investigation into the government was led by progovernment politicians. The official report charged one official, Luis Guastavino, with corruption. A separate report issued by the alliance implicated PD officials Rodrigo González, Marco Antonio Núñez, and Laura Soto, as well as Socialist deputy Marco Enríquez-Ominami. Only Soto ultimately faced charges of embezzlement for using state funds.

The opposition's actions stalled when it, too, became the focus of political scandal. In December, Bachelet called for an investigation into the improper use of public funds to create the two major right-wing parties, the Independent Democratic Union and National Renewal, at the end of Pinochet's dictatorship during the late 1980's. Members of Bachelet's Socialist Party argued that the use of public funds in this case should also be examined if the Right was truly interested in reform.

—Caryn E. Neumann

FURTHER READING

Angell, Alan. Democracy After Pinochet: Politics, Parties, and Elections in Chile. Washington, D.C.: Brookings Institution Press, 2007. Examines the political situation in Chile at the time of the sports scandal, which began in October, 2006. Oppenheim, Lois Hecht. Politics in Chile: Socialism, Authoritarianism, and Market Democracy. Boulder, Colo.: Westview Press, 2007. A good study of Chilean politics and economic development through 2006.

Rector, John L. The History of Chile. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2005. An excellent and updated general history of Chile.

SEE ALSO: Jan., 1913: British Prime Minister's Staff Is Investigated for Insider Trading; May 23, 1981: Italian Justice Minister Resigns Because of Crime Connection; Jan. 12 and May 11, 1987: Media Reports Spark Investigation of Australian Police Corruption; Feb. 28, 1995: Former Mexican President Carlos Salinas's Brother Is Arrested for Murder; Nov. 3, 1996: Car Crash Reveals Depth of Government Corruption in Turkey; Jan., 1997: Pyramid Investment Schemes Cause Albanian Government to Fall.

November 2, 2006

EVANGELIST KENT HOVIND IS CONVICTED OF FEDERAL TAX VIOLATIONS

American evangelist Kent Hovind, who founded Creation Science Evangelism in 1989 but never paid payroll or income taxes despite his lucrative income, was found guilty of tax fraud. After an investigation by the U.S. Internal Revenue Service that included a raid of his home and business, he was convicted of fifty-eight tax-related offenses and sentenced to ten years in federal prison.

LOCALE: Pensacola, Florida

CATEGORIES: Law and the courts; corruption; hoaxes, frauds, and charlatanism; religion

KEY FIGURES

Kent Hovind (b. 1953), American evangelist and creationist

Jo Delia Hovind (b. 1956), codefendant in tax-evasion case and Kent Hovind's spouse
Eric Hovind (b. 1978), son of the Hovinds
David Charles Gibbs (b. 1968), attorney

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Kent Hovind was born in East Peoria, Illinois, in 1953. He converted to Christianity at the age of sixteen and graduated from East Peoria Community High School in 1971. After high school, he earned several degrees in Christian education from unaccredited institutions and was ordained as a Baptist minister. Despite having a doctorate from an unaccredited school, Hovind consistently referred to himself as Dr. Dino.

After serving as the pastor of several churches and teaching science at several Christian schools, Hovind moved to Pensacola, Florida, in 1989 and started a ministry called Creation Science Evangelism (CSE). In 2001, he built Dinosaur Adventure Land, a small theme park and small fossil museum that taught creationist principles. He spoke at hundreds of churches and other venues, peddling his unique and offbeat brand of recent creationism called Young Earth creationism, which teaches that the earth and universe are less than 6,000-10,000 years old and were created by God, and that the bulk of the geologic features preserved in the crust of the earth were generated by the flood of Noah. Hovind's presentations were filled with erroneous and demonstrably false statements.

Hovind bluntly stated in his lectures and on his Web site that he did not believe in paying taxes to the government. His CSE ministry employed many people, but it never withheld taxes from their salaries. Because Hovind had never registered CSE as a tax-exempt religious organization, he was obligated to pay taxes on all his earnings and the salaries he paid to his employees. Upon learning about his antitax philosophy and attempts to evade paying taxes, administrators at nearby Pensacola Christian College (PCC) reported Hovind to the U.S. Internal Revenue Service (IRS) and forbade PCC students from working at CSE.

Because the IRS had no record that Hovind had ever filed a tax return, in 1996 it attempted to collect back taxes for 1989-1995. To escape responsibility for paying federal income taxes, Hovind filed bankruptcy on March 1, 1996. In his bankruptcy petition, he argued that because he is a minister of God, everything he owns belongs to God and is not subject to taxation. On June 5, the U.S. Bankruptcy Court rejected the petition, ruling that it had been filed in bad faith. The court found that even though Hovind had stated that he received no income, had no expenses, and owned no property, the IRS investigation revealed that he owned a house (on which he made regular payments) and had several automobiles, and that he had enough disposable income to send his children to a private Christian school (at $4,800 per year in tuition) and install central heating and air conditioning in his home (for $3,265).

As a result of the legal action against him, Hovind agreed to pay the IRS $432.33 per month for sixty months.

In May, 1998, Hovind made another concerted effort to evade paying federal income taxes. He and his wife, Jo Delia Hovind, filed a Power of Attorney and Revocation of Signature form with the Escambia County, Florida, clerk of courts. This document argued that they had been misled and were forced to sign government documents that specified their payment schedule and therefore did not owe the government any more money. They also renounced their U.S. citizenship and declared themselves, individually, as "a natural citizen of 'America' and a natural sojourner." This, in their minds, rescinded their obligation to pay federal income taxes.

In 2002, Hovind was once again delinquent in his tax payments and attempted to sue the IRS for harassment. He referred to his home state of Florida as the "state of Florida Body-Politic Corporation" and argued that he was a citizen of the state of Florida and not of the United States and, therefore, was not required to pay federal income taxes.

An April, 2004, IRS raid of Hovind's home and business showed that he lacked a business license and tax-exempt status. Bank deposits recovered from the raid showed that Hovind had deposited well over one million dollars into various bank accounts since 1997 and had neither reported nor paid taxes on any of this income. On June 3, the IRS filed a tax lien of over half a million dollars against Hovind and his son, Eric Hovind, who helped his father hide income. The lien was placed on their businesses, too.

On July 11, 2006, Hovind was charged in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Florida in Pensacola with twelve counts of failing to pay employee-related taxes; forty-five counts of "smurfing," a banking industry term for evading reporting requirements by making multiple cash withdrawals just under $10,000; and one count of interfering with an IRS investigation. Jo Hovind, who had handled the money for her husband's enterprises, was charged with forty-four related counts.

After his indictment, Hovind vociferously maintained his innocence and stated that he had no idea who was charging him or what his crime was. After stating that he did not recognize the government authority in tax matters, Hovind attempted to enter a plea of “subornation of false muster,” a legally nonsensical phrase that, some have said, is more reminiscent of militia terminology. When U.S. magistrate Gordon Miles Davis offered to enter a plea for him, Hovind switched his plea to not guilty under duress. Davis also confiscated Hovind’s passport because he was a flight risk and his guns because he had threatened IRS agents.

Hovind’s trial began on October 21. At trial, he tried to argue that the approximately thirty people who worked for him were missionaries and not employees. He also maintained that his amusement park, admission, and merchandise sales belonged to God and could not be taxed. Nevertheless, some of Hovind’s workers testified that they punched time cards, took vacation and sick days, and were docked pay if they spent too much time on the phone. Attorney David Charles Gibbs, who provided free legal aid to churches nationwide, testified that Hovind enthusiastically explained to him how he “beat the tax system” and had no obligation to pay taxes. After closing arguments on November 2, the jury deliberated for three hours and found Hovind guilty of all fifty-eight counts and Jo Hovind guilty of all forty-four counts. On January 19, 2007, Hovind was sentenced to ten years in prison and three years probation. He was ordered to pay the court more than one million dollars in restitution and legal fees. Jo Hovind was sentenced in June to one year in prison and three years probation, and was fined $8,000.

IMPACT

Hovind’s conviction was embarrassing to the American creationist movement because Hovind was one of its most visible figures. Even more troubling was Hovind’s reprehensible behavior throughout the IRS investigation and his trial. He filed false lawsuits and criminal charges against the IRS, threatened IRS investigators and those who cooperated with them, and destroyed records. Had he cooperated with the government, he might have avoided prison time, but his avowed recalcitrance precipitated his incarceration.

Furthermore, the bizarre and ridiculous nature of Hovind’s tax-evasion arguments and his inability to accept correction from others revealed a person desperately divorced from reality. Hovind’s deplorable demeanor reflected very badly on the creationist movement as a whole and tended to reinforce the quixotic stereotype already associated with modern creationists. Hovind’s controversial statements and divisive tactics also contributed to the 2005 schism of the largest international creationist organization, Answers in Genesis.

—Michael A. Buratovich

FURTHER READING

Fail, Angela. “Christian College Leader Says Taxes Are Part of Religion: Hovind Argues God’s Workers Are Exempt.” Pensacola News Journal, October 20, 2006. News story about the Pensacola Christian College vice president who reported Hovind’s tax evasion to the IRS.

Huston, Peter. More Scams from the Great Beyond! How to Make Even More Money Off Creationism, Evolution, Environmentalism, Fringe Politics, Weird Science, the Occult, and Other Strange Beliefs. Boulder, Colo.: Paladin Press, 2002. An astonishing collection of scams based on strange religious and other fringe beliefs.

Levicoff, Steve. Name It and Frame It? New Opportunities in Adult Education and How to Avoid Being Ripped Off by “Christian” Degree Mills. 4th ed. Ambler, Pa.: Institute on Religion and Law, 1995. A disturbing survey of Christian diploma mills in the United States. Also examines Patriot University, Hovind’s alma mater.

Martinez, Greg. “Stupid Dino Tricks: A Visit to Kent Hovind’s Dinosaur Adventure Land.” Skeptical Inquirer 26 (November-December, 2004): 47-51. A visitor to Dinosaur Adventure Land describes the park and associated museum and notes the many scientific inaccuracies that pockmark the displays.

Pigliucci, Massimo. Denying Evolution: Creation,

Scientism, and the Nature of Science. Sunderland, Mass.: Sinauer, 2002. A severe critique of creationism by a prominent evolutionary biologist who debated Hovind and marveled at his ignorance of modern evolutionary biology.

Steward, Michael. "Creationist's Fight with Uncle Sam May Evolve into Painful Defeat." Pensacola News Journal, July 19, 2006. A news report detailing the case against Hovind and the risk he took to fight that case.

SEE ALSO: May-June, 1926: Evangelist Aimee Semple McPherson Claims She Was Kidnapped; June 27, 1978: Evangelist Herbert W. Armstrong Excommunicates His Own Son; Oct. 23, 1985: Guru Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh Is Indicted for Immigration Fraud; Apr. 22, 1986: Faith Healer Peter Popoff Is Exposed as a Fraud; Mar. 19, 1987: Jim Bakker Resigns as Head of PTL Television Network; Feb. 21, 1988: Evangelist Jimmy Swaggart Tearfully Confesses His Adultery.

November 2, 2006

MALE ESCORT REVEALS SEXUAL LIAISONS WITH EVANGELIST TED HAGGARD

Ted Haggard, the founder and senior pastor of New Life Church in Colorado, was disgraced after a male escort revealed on television that Haggard had sex with him over a three-year period. Haggard, asked by the church to leave his ministry and the Colorado Springs area, also resigned his leadership position with the influential National Association of Evangelicals. A church overseer claimed Haggard was "completely heterosexual" following three weeks of "restorative" therapy.

LOCALE: Colorado Springs, Colorado

CATEGORIES: Drugs; prostitution; religion; sex; social issues and reform

KEY FIGURES

Ted Haggard (b. 1956), evangelical preacher

Michael Jones (b. 1957), male escort

Tim Ralph (fl. early twenty-first century), pastor and counselor

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Ted Haggard was the lead pastor of New Life Church, which boasted a membership of fourteen thousand people. He had founded the megachurch in 1984 in the basement of his home in Colorado

Michael Jones. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Springs. Haggard also was the head of the thirty-million-member National Association of Evangelicals (NAE). In 2005, Time magazine named him as one of the top twenty-five most influential evangelicals in the United States.

Haggard also openly condemned homosexuality and preached against same-gender marriage, but he reportedly visited gay bars and invited gays to attend his church services. On November 2, 2006, Haggard was outed by a male escort, Michael Jones, who claimed that the popular pastor had paid him for sex and that the encounters occurred during a three-year period. Jones, who made his announcement on a Denver, Colorado, television station, also claimed that Haggard often used the drug crystal methamphetamine when they were together. He also said that Haggard had revealed sexual fantasies to him, one involving a group of young college men.

Initially, Jones knew Haggard by the name Art (Haggard's middle name is Arthur). After learning that Art was the well-known pastor Haggard, who railed against homosexuality and same-gender marriage, Jones decided to come forward about his sexual encounters with Haggard. He believed he should expose Haggard's hypocrisy. Rumors had already been circulating in the gay community in Denver, Colorado, about Haggard's sexuality. When first confronted with the gay-sex allegations, Haggard claimed he did not know Jones and denied having ever used drugs. A few days later, however, he admitted that he had purchased methamphetamine but never used the drug.

On November 4, 2006, the board of the New Life Church issued a statement from its membership, which had concluded that Haggard's alleged actions constituted sexually immoral conduct. Drawing on church bylaws, the board reported that Haggard's conduct compelled them to remove him from his job with the church. Attached to a severance package from the church was the stipulation that Haggard also leave the Colorado Springs area. Haggard already had tendered his resignation from the presidency of the NAE on November 2. The NAE reported that during its more than sixty years of existence, it had never had moral failure in its leadership.

A portrait of Ted Haggard in the prayer center on the campus of New Life Church near Colorado Springs, Colorado. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Haggard issued a statement on November 5 that was read before his church by another pastor. Haggard admitted to having had gay sex but claimed it was a "dark" part of his life. He further expressed sorrow for his behavior and said he was "a deceiver and a liar." He said the church board acted appropriately in removing him from his ministry and that the removal would be permanent.

Haggard also said in his statement that he had been "warring against" his sexual desires for his entire adult life. By all appearances he led a heterosexual life that included a marriage and children, a life choice not uncommon for those with same-gender sexual desires who also are deeply committed to their religion and who fear reprisal. Conservative churches in the United States, as elsewhere, speak harshly about same-gender sexuality and condemn it as immoral. They also severely punish sexual transgressors.

IMPACT

Haggard lost his ministry, church, and evangelical standing. In February, 2007, after three months of silence, he sent an e-mail message to friends, telling them he was moving from Colorado Springs with his wife, Gayle, and family to start a process of personal “restoration.” This process, which involved examining all aspects of his life, included counseling by a team of ministers who were appointed by the New Life Church. Haggard also entered a treatment center in Arizona. Tim Ralph, one of the team counselors, said that Haggard, after three weeks of therapy, was now “completely heterosexual” and that Haggard’s declaration of heterosexuality was supported by evidence. First, no other person had claimed Haggard engaged in gay sex, and second, gay sex was not a constant in Haggard’s life. Haggard’s accuser, Jones, responded to Ralph’s report by saying that he thought Haggard indeed was gay.

In August, Haggard released a statement that asked for monetary donations to help support his family while he and his wife attended college classes. He wanted to pursue a degree in counseling, and his wife was to study psychology. He also reported that his family was moving into the Dream Center, a halfway house based in Phoenix, Arizona, that ministers to recovering convicts, drug addicts, prostitutes, and others. Within days, however, the restoration team reported that Haggard would not be working at the Dream Center or in any ministry, and it advised Haggard to seek employment outside the church. Steering Haggard away from a return to ministry was based, in part, on Haggard’s high profile. The team cited biblical passages about the need to hold influential figures to a higher standard of behavior.

—Ski Hunter

FURTHER READING

Banerjee, Neela. “Accused of Gay Liaison, Head of Evangelical Group Resigns.” The New York Times, November 3, 2006. News of Jones’s out-

HAGGARD AND JONES

The Reverend Ted Haggard apologized to the congregants of the New Life Church. His statement, read by another pastor before the church and published by the Colorado Springs Gazette on November 5, 2006, begins,

To my New Life Church family.

I am so sorry. I am sorry for the disappointment, the betrayal, and the hurt. I am sorry for the horrible example I have set for you. . . . I alone am responsible for the confusion caused by my inconsistent statements. The fact is, I am guilty of sexual immorality, and I take responsibility for the entire problem.

Michael Jones, the male escort who outed Haggard, told The New York Times in a June 7, 2007, interview, I’ve been with some pretty famous people, and I would never out them. This was a unique situation. Here is Ted preaching about being shameful . . . and then he sneaks around with me.

ing and Haggard’s resignation from the newspaper of record.

Goodstein, L. “Minister’s Own Rules Sealed His Fate.” The New York Times, November 19, 2006. Discusses the dismissal of Haggard from his church, a dismissal caused, in part, by Haggard’s own preaching.

“Haggard’s Cure Claim Greeted by Skepticism.” Christian Century, March 6, 2007. Editorial that questions the legitimacy of Haggard’s claim that he had been “cured” and was now completely heterosexual after three weeks of therapy.

Ireland, J. “The Escort Who Spoke Out.” Advocate, December 5, 2006. Focuses on Haggard’s accuser, Jones, and how he decided to out Haggard. Jones says that he outed the pastor because of his hypocrisy.

Jones, Mike, with Sam Gallegos. I Had to Say Something: The Art of Ted Haggard’s Fall. New York: Seven Stories Press, 2007. Jones discusses the Haggard case, focusing on how Haggard’s hypocrisy urged him to out the pastor on a Denver television station.

Miller, Brett A. Divine Apology: The Discourse of Religious Image Restoration. Westport, Conn.:

Praeger, 2002. Analyzes religious figures accused of sexual misconduct. Includes a section on fundamentalist Christian pastors and preachers.

“Reviewing the Fundamentals.” Christianity Today, January, 2007. Focuses on the sex scandal in the context of the biblical teachings of the New Testament. Cites the book of James, which instructs that Christian leaders should be placed under strict standards of conduct.

SEE ALSO: 1970: Study of Anonymous Gay Sex Leads to Ethics Scandal; Oct. 25, 1974: Evangelist Billy James Hargis Resigns College Presidency During Gay-Sex Scandal; Jan., 1977: Singer Anita Bryant Campaigns Against Lesbian and Gay Rights; Aug. 4, 1978: British Politician

Jeremy Thorpe Is Charged with Attempted Murder; Sept. 3, 1980: Congressman Bauman Is Arrested for Liaison with Teenage Boy; Dec., 1982: Julie Andrews and Blake Edwards Deny Being Gay; Mar. 19, 1987: Jim Bakker Resigns as Head of PTL Television Network; Feb. 21, 1988: Evangelist Jimmy Swaggart Tearfully Confesses His Adultery; Sept. 19, 2000: Ex-gay Leader John Paulk Is Photographed Leaving a Gay Bar; Aug. 19, 2004: Blog “Outs” Antigay Congressman Edward Schrock; Dec. 6, 2005: Spokane, Washington, Mayor Recalled in Gay-Sex Scandal; Sept. 29, 2006: Congressman Mark Foley Resigns in Sex Scandal Involving a Teenage Page.

November 20, 2006

NEWS CORP ABANDONS PLAN TO PUBLISH O. J. SIMPSON'S BOOK

News Corp announced plans to publish a book by the notorious former football star O. J. Simpson called If I Did It, an allegedly speculative account of how Simpson would have murdered his former wife, Nicole Brown Simpson, and her friend, Ronald Goldman. Public reaction was so overwhelmingly negative that News Corp canceled both its planned television special and the book's release. Goldman's family received legal title to the book and published it in 2007 as Simpson's actual confession.

LOCALES: New York, New York; Miami, Florida; Los Angeles, California

CATEGORIES: Publishing and journalism; radio and television; public morals; business

KEY FIGURES

O. J. Simpson (b. 1947), former professional football player and actor

Judith Regan (b. 1953), editor and publisher of ReganBooks

Pablo F. Fenjves (b. 1953), ghostwriter and screenwriter

Denise Brown (b. 1957), advocate for victims of domestic violence

Fred Goldman (b. 1940), father of Ronald Goldman

SUMMARY OF EVENT

On November 20, 2006, News Corporation (News Corp) announced that it would cancel publication of O. J. Simpson's book If I Did It. The book, planned for publication by ReganBooks, a News Corp subsidiary, allegedly was a hypothetical confession by Simpson of how he would have murdered his former wife and her friend. Also planned was a two-part television interview O. J. Simpson: If I Did It, Here's How It Happened on Fox Television, also a News Corp subsidiary. The interview special, earmarked to promote the book, was scheduled to be broadcast in the final week of the television ratings sweeps. The announcement was followed by overwhelming public condemnation of ReganBooks and Fox.

Two weeks earlier, on October 30, the gossip tabloid National Enquirer first alleged that Simpson was working secretly on a manuscript in which he would confess to the 1994 murders of Nicole Brown Simpson and Ronald Goldman. That manuscript, If I Did It, was acquired by ReganBooks, an imprint of HarperCollins. Simpson was to receive $3.5 million for the book contract. Pablo F. Fenjves, If I Did It's ghostwriter, was recruited by ReganBooks and led to believe the book was to be the confession of a murderer. Fenjves himself believes that Simpson murdered Brown Simpson and Goldman.

The National Enquirer also suggested that Simpson intended to quickly spend the contract money to avoid paying on the civil judgment against him. Indeed, the $630,000 he was paid in advance, which should have gone to the Goldmans (beneficiaries of the civil judgment), was funneled through a shell corporation, Lorraine Brooke Associates, named for two of his children. He used the money to pay bills, including his mortgage and Internal Revenue Service debts.

On the evening of the announcement by News Corp, Ronald Goldman's father, Fred Goldman, appeared on Larry King Live on CNN and strongly urged people to not buy the book. Ronald's family launched a Web site (dontpayoj.com) the next morning, gathering signatures for a petition to stop the book's publication. The family argued that a killer (Simpson was acquitted of the murders in criminal court but found liable in civil court) should not profit from his or her crime.

On November 15, ReganBooks publisher Judith Regan had called Simpson a killer and claimed the book indeed was his confession. She said she contracted the book to bring further awareness to violence against women, which included herself. She also said that her motive for publishing the book was vengeance. By November 20, more than one dozen stations affiliated with Fox refused to air the special. Also, many bookstores refused to sell the book; those that did donated sales profits to charities.

The public's passionate response to the book and television interview was understandable, given that many considered Simpson's acquittal nothing less than a gross miscarriage of justice. The planned interview was likened to a snuff film, and even Simpson agreed that book earnings would be blood money. Finally, the public, journalists, and other media professionals questioned the ethics of News Corp, Fox, and ReganBooks.

On November 21, Denise Brown, Nicole Brown Simpson's sister, announced that News Corp attempted to buy off the Brown and Goldman families by offering millions of dollars for their silence but that News Corp would still publish the book and air the interview. When the Brown family refused News Corp's offer, the company's chairman, Rupert Murdoch, canceled the book and interview and asked booksellers to return all unsold copies. However, some copies of the book circulated after its first printing, and Vanity Fair magazine got hold of one. It published a detailed book review in its January 22, 2007, issue, and by June 13, the book was available on the Web.

If I Did It reached merchants once again in September, 2007, although in a somewhat different form. Earlier that summer, a federal bankruptcy judge awarded rights to the original manuscript to the Goldman family. The retitled If I Did It: Confessions of the Killer was published as a book of nonfiction—a true O. J. Simpson confession—by Beaufort Books and includes commentary by the ghostwriter, Fenjves, and victim-rights advocate Dominick Dunne. The Goldman family received 90 percent of the profits from sales of the book. Denise Brown responded to the 2007 publication with an online petition, requesting the publisher cancel further printings. By February 14, 2008, the petition's "close" date, more than 6,600 people had signed in support of Brown's campaign.

IMPACT

The scandal surrounding the planned publication of If I Did It and its accompanying television special raised anew many ethical dilemmas. First, critics asked whether a person found liable for human pain, suffering, and death should profit from those acts.

Second, critics asked if a media giant, such as News Corp, should pay a person (Simpson), believed by many to be a murderer, to “confess” on television while hiding behind a criminal court’s finding of his not being guilty, and pay the “interviewer” (Regan) to take part in such a charade. Third, critics questioned whether or not any subject is taboo in a world in which networks are attempting to boost sagging ratings. Fourth, is it ethical for journalists to exploit a miscarriage of justice for personal gain?

Finally, many believe that Simpson decided to write the book not only for the money but also to get back in the limelight: He had enjoyed his celebrity for thirty years before the murders, and he clearly basked in this status. However, if these were Simpson’s intentions, they failed. He did not receive money for the book, short of the advance, and did not regain his positive celebrity status. If anything, he remains a pariah.

—Edward J. Schauer

FURTHER READING

Bugliosi, Vincent T. Outrage: The Five Reasons Why O. J. Simpson Got Away with Murder. New York: W. W. Norton, 1996. Study of the murder case by a well-known felony prosecutor. Includes an explanation of how the abundant and quality evidence pointed solely to Simpson as the murderer. Explains in detail how the murder trial went wrong.

Clark, Marcia, and Teresa Carpenter. Without a Doubt. New York: Viking Press, 1997. Critical appraisal of all major actors and actions in the Simpson trial by Marcia Clark, the deputy district attorney who led the prosecution.

Cochran, Johnnie L., Jr., with Tim Rutten. Journey to Justice. New York: Ballantine Books, 1996. Cochran led the legal team in the successful criminal defense of Simpson. A key to Cochran’s perspective on the trial may be found in the title of chapter 14, “From Seeds of Doubt, Justice Flowers.”

Dunne, Dominick. Justice: Crimes, Trials, and Punishments. New York: Three Rivers Press, 2001. The author, a much-read journalist and major advocate of justice for murder victims, devotes ten chapters to his observations and insight regarding the murder trial of Simpson. Dunne sat through the entire trial and had regular interaction with the families of Nicole Brown Simpson and Ron Goldman after the murders.

The Goldman Family, Pablo F. Fenjves, and Dominick Dunne. If I Did It: Confessions of the Killer. New York: Beaufort Books, 2007. Contains an exact replication of the original manuscript of I Did It, with commentary by the Goldman family, a prologue by ghostwriter Fenjves, and an afterword by Dunne.

SEE ALSO: Summer, 1936: Film Star Mary Astor’s Diary Becomes a Public Sensation; 1978: Actor Joan Crawford’s Daughter Publishes Damning Memoir, Mommie Dearest; June 12, 1994: Double Murder Leads to Sensational O. J. Simpson Trial; June 24, 1994: Time Magazine Cover Uses Altered O. J. Simpson Photo.

November 23, 2006

FORMER RUSSIAN SECURITY SERVICE OFFICER DIES FROM RADIATION POISONING

Alexander Litvinenko was an officer in the Russian federal security service, once assigned to protect billionaire Boris Berezovsky, who later fell out with the Russian government. After Litvinenko accused the Russian government of scheming to kill Berezovsky, he fled to England. There, he developed a strange illness, later found to be radiation poisoning, and died. Many believe Litvinenko was killed by the Russian government, possibly on orders from President Vladimir Putin.

LOCALE: London, England

CATEGORIES: Murder and suicide; politics; corruption; international relations; government; medicine and health care

KEY FIGURES

Alexander Litvinenko (1962-2006), former senior operational officer in the Federal Security Service of the Russian Federation

Boris Berezovsky (b. 1946), Russian businessman, dissident, and former deputy secretary of Russia's security council

Vladimir Putin (b. 1952), president of the Russian Federation, 1999-2008, and prime minister, 2008-

Andrei Lugovoi (b. 1966), Russian politician and businessman

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Alexander Litvinenko's death is largely the story of three men—Litvinenko, Boris Berezovsky, and Vladimir Putin—and the turbulence of political change in postcommunist Russia. The fall of communism created a Wild West type of environment in Russia, which was ready made for profiteers and unscrupulous businessmen willing to exploit the country's political disorganization and breakdown in law and order for their personal gain. Business disagreements were sometimes resolved by competitors being gunned down. One of the country's major tourist cities, St. Petersburg, became its crime capital as well.

Regional governors created their own private fiefdoms across the great Eurasian expanse of Russia, and the country's privatization process allowed politically well-connected, and lucky, private entrepreneurs such as Berezovsky (who survived at least two assassination attempts during the mid-1990's) to gain control of the country's major industries and amass personal fortunes through pyramid schemes, money laundering, smuggling, and other illicit activities.

Once in office in 1999, Vladimir Putin focused his presidency on regaining control of Russia's political process. He pushed through laws that made regional governors appointees of the center and extended government control over its key, privatized industries. The latter efforts led him to target, among others, Berezovsky, who by the time of Putin's presidency had become a billionaire with holdings in Russia's oil industry and substantial investments in Russia's media, its automobile sector, and Aeroflot, the country's airline. One technique that Putin regularly employed to regain control over such sectors was the use of legal proceedings against his targets, and so it was for Berezovsky. Indicted for fraud in Russia, Berezovsky fled to Great Britain and then sought asylum in 2001.

Meanwhile, Litvinenko also became embroiled in a conflict with Russian authorities—in his case, with the Federal Security Service of the Russian Federation (FSB), in which he had been an officer for many years but whose return to the brutal practices of the Soviet Union he publicly attacked in 1998 at a Moscow press conference. In particular, he accused the FSB of conducting assassinations and other illegal acts to maintain its position in the leadership of a post-Soviet Russia, which was then theoretically democratizing under the presidency of Boris Yeltsin. Subsequently imprisoned twice for his comments, Litvinenko fled to Britain in 2000, where he merged into a large colony of Russian expatriates (duly infiltrated by undercover Russian security agents) and where he was granted political asylum in 2001. (He later acquired British citizenship.)

Upon Berezovsky's arrival in London, Litvinenko and Berezovsky resumed a friendship that had begun in 1998, when Litvinenko reputedly refused an order to assassinate Berezovsky while serving as his bodyguard. Rejoined in London, they inaugurated an escalating series of charges against the Putin regime that gained increasing credibility in Western circles. Putin's critics in the Russian media were not just harassed but also began to die either accidentally or in more violent ways, usually without anyone being charged with their murder. Against this backdrop, Litvinenko's 2006 death in London under mysterious circumstances, and by a highly exotic form of poisoning, immediately acquired both a sinister and scandalous aura.

The facts relating to the poisoning itself remained somewhat disputed despite the intensity of investigative efforts. There is, for example, still a small debate over whether Litvinenko had been poisoned prior to November 1, or only once, on the day he fell ill. It is certain that he was poisoned on the first of November and almost certainly while having a drink at the Millennium Hotel in central London with two former associates in the Soviet KGB, Andrei Lugovoi and Dimitri Kovtun. An inspection of the hotel's kitchen area found a highly radioactive tea cup with traces of polonium-210, radioactive material that laboratory findings later confirmed as the poison that killed Litvinenko. After seeing Lugovoi and Kovtun, Litvinenko journeyed to a restaurant for a scheduled meeting with an Italian security specialist (Mario Scaramella), who had offered to provide him with information on the death of a Russian investigative journalist (Anna Politkovskaya) suspected of being poisoned by Russian agents in 2004 and then assassinated in October, 2006.

Subsequent rumors indicated that Litvinenko was poisoned yet again in the hospital where he was taken for treatment. His recovery there was followed by a subsequent sharp decline in his condition; he then died on November 23. Medical evidence has thoroughly discredited that theory, however, with Litvinenko's initial recovery now being credited to his generally good health and his subsequent relapse seen as a normal consequence of the nature of the radioactive poison he had consumed. Significantly, before he died, Litvinenko recovered enough to make a deathbed statement in which he blamed Putin and Russian security forces operating under Putin's command for his murder. Seven months later, in June of 2007, Berezovsky was alerted by British intelligence that he, too, was being targeted for murder. He fled England in fear for his life.

IMPACT

The British media—and not just the London tabloids—were closely reporting on the scandalous story of Litvinenko's poisoning and eventual death and on the clues that seemed to point to Moscow for having a part in his demise. When media accusations continued as the story unfolded, Britain's diplomatic relations with Russia began to suffer. Moscow retaliated for the unwanted media attention, first by disrupting the British Broadcasting Corporation's broadcasts in Russia and later by expelling several British diplomats from Moscow.

London-Moscow relations further worsened in May of 2007, when British authorities narrowed their suspect list to Lugovoi after having found traces of radioactive material in several places where Lugovoi stayed en route to London and after arriving in London prior to his November 1 meeting with Litvinenko (Litvinenko became ill that same day). On May 22—after tracing the polonium-210 radioactive material used to kill Litvinenko to a Russian nuclear plant as well—British authorities formerly charged Lugovoi with Litvinenko's murder. The British Foreign Office requested Lugovoi's extradition to face charges in Britain. In response, Russian authorities, whose own request for Berezovsky's extradition had been previously refused, rejected the British request on the grounds that it would violate Russia's constitution.

—Joseph R. Rudolph, Jr.

FURTHER READING

Goldfarb, Alex, with Marina Litvinenko. Death of a Dissident: The Poisoning of Alexander Litvinenko and the Return of the KGB. New York: Free Press, 2007. Written by a close friend of Litvinenko and by Litvinenko's wife, this work makes the case that Litvinenko's death was a KGB-styled execution intended to send a message to other would-be critics of Putin's Russia.

Litvinenko, Alexander, and Yuri Felshtinsky. Blowing Up Russia: The Secret Plot to Bring Back KGB Terror. New York: Encounter Books, 2007. Part of a three-volume set of articles, interviews, and other materials compiled by Boris Berezovsky, this book focuses on the 1998-2005 period of conflict between Litvinenko and the FSB, whom he suspected would some day kill him.

Litvinenko, Alexander, and Pavel Stroilov. Allegations: Selected Works by Alexander Litvinenko. Slough, England: Aquilion, 2007. Published a year after Litvinenko's death, Stroilov's work as editor and translator offers a carefully selected anthology of Litvinenko's allegations of misconduct at the highest levels in the Russian government.

SEE ALSO: Oct. 25, 1924: Forged Communist Letter Brings Down British Government; Jan. 8, 1934-Jan. 17, 1936: Stavisky's Fraudulent Schemes Rock French Government; June, 1956: George F. Kennan Proves Russian Sisson Documents Are Fakes; Sept. 12, 1962: British Civil Servant Is Arrested for Spying.

Early 2007SUBPRIME MORTGAGE INDUSTRY BEGINS TO COLLAPSE

During the 2000-2006 housing boom, American lenders issued a staggering total of $1.5 trillion in risky subprime mortgages, relying on rapidly appreciating home values to protect their investments. As home prices began declining in 2006, record numbers of debtors defaulted, leading to soaring home foreclosure rates, lender bankruptcies, and a general weakening of the U.S. economy. Mismanagement and outright fraud at all levels created a cascading national and international financial crisis leading to industry and government reform.

LOCALE: United States

CATEGORIES: Banking and finance; business; corruption; government

KEY FIGURES

Ben Bernanke (b. 1953), chairman of the Federal Reserve, 2006-2010

Henry Paulson (b. 1946), secretary of the U.S. Treasury, 2006-2009

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Home ownership has always been considered a bulwark of the American way of life. From the end of World War II until the presidency of Ronald Reagan, most home financing required at minimum a 20 percent down payment and featured fixed interest rates, a payoff period not exceeding thirty years, and strict requirements for income and creditworthiness that ensured a low default rate but priced lower income people out of the market. One of the arguments for deregulation was the claim that the lending industry, if freed from constraints, could supplant government subsidies to those otherwise unable to afford a home. The mortgage lending industry, specifically those companies specializing in subprime mortgages, began collapsing even before New Century Financial Corporation, one of the largest such lenders in the United States, declared bankruptcy in April, 2007. Many believe the collapse began earlier in the year.

During the early 1980's, freed from federal regulations, what emerged was a new class of mortgage lending institutions, whose operations were based on originating large numbers of mortgages and selling them to Wall Street investment firms, which in turn sold bonds backed by mortgage investment portfolios. This process is called securitization. Rating agencies gave such investments their highest (AAA) rating based on high dividend rates and assumptions that the underlying mortgage loans were entirely secured by collateral and the risks of borrower default were low. Both assumptions proved to be false. There is suspicion that the ratings agencies themselves may have colluded with investment firms.

The enormous profitability of home loans to investors led to aggressive marketing of subprime instead of prime mortgages, especially those with adjustable interest rates that rise after two or so years, to risky borrowers. A subprime loan is a loan issued to a risky borrower. According to the federal government, risky borrowers are those with a credit score usually below 650 and who have a lower income, an unstable employment history, or a history of financial problems (such as a previous foreclosure, repossession, or bankruptcy).

Between 2000 and 2006, refinance transactions tapping home equity became much more common as well. The availability of so much credit was one factor in the rapid escalation of home prices between 2000 and 2006, marking the housing bubble. Inflation-adjusted home prices, which on the average increased by 0.4 percent per year between 1980 and 2000, nearly doubled between 2000 and 2006, putting a conventional mortgage beyond the means of most first-time home buyers. This inflationary trend created phantom equity for people who bought homes during the 1990's, equity they were encouraged to tap by refinancing homes to pay off other debts, cope with a financial crisis, or simply indulge themselves.

A foreclosed home for sale in Stockton, California, in April, 2008. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

The essentially fraudulent nature of the subprime mortgage industry is epitomized by Angelo Mozilo, cofounder and chief executive officer of Countrywide Financial Corporation, based in Calabasas, California. Mozilo's annual salary at the height of the housing bubble topped $200 million. He was investigated for deliberately propelling his company toward financial collapse as he withdrew his own investment at the last minute and left ordinary stockholders with huge losses. Bank of America announced its $4 billion purchase of Countrywide in January, 2008. The name Countrywide is now synonymous with the subprime mortgage scandal.

There are many different types of subprime mortgages, and many classes of borrowers, including some who qualified for a conventional mortgage but were steered toward a subprime lender by an unscrupulous broker who collected a hefty commission. Racial minorities and the elderly were frequently singled out for the most predatory loans. Home builders and real estate agents and brokers participated in the subprime scandal by selling properties to buyers who clearly could not afford them. Brokers, who were paid on commission and had no further stake in the loan, told borrowers who worried about repayment terms that they could always refinance at a later date, taking advantage of appreciation in the interim. This proved an empty promise when property values started to decline and lending standards tightened.

One of the commonest types of subprime loan is the adjustable rate mortgage, or ARM. A typical ARM has an artificially low interest rate (often called a teaser rate) and correspondingly low payments for the first few years after issuance, after which interest rates and payments rise rapidly and become unmanageable for many with lower or fixed incomes. In theory, in these first years, the homeowner's property appreciates and the homeowner's credit rating improves, allowing for refinancing to a fixed-rate mortgage. Little known was that the refinancing homeowner would end up paying substantially in additional lender fees and a prepayment penalty.

Another common feature of a subprime loan is the balloon payment. Instead of paying down the loan in regular increments, the borrower pays interest only, or interest plus a small sum, and agrees to make a large lump sum payment at some point in the future. These optional-payment mortgages represent a minefield for the borrower, because they allow the borrower to pay less than the interest amount and add the deficiency to the principal of the loan, up to 110 percent of the original loan amount. This is known as negative amortization.

Another troublesome type of loan, the Alt-A or "liar mortgage," proliferated during the same period. Also called stated-income loans, these were issued to people with good credit but without documentation of income. Carrying high interest rates and other undesirable terms, Alt-A loans appealed to speculators, or investors, who defaulted in large numbers when property values declined. Although the typical Alt-A borrower is perceived by the public and legislators as being undeserving of rescue (in contrast to a lower income borrower whose primary residence is threatened with foreclosure), the consequences of the collapse of this market to financial institutions and communities has been more devastating than that created by classic subprime loans.

In 2006, as interest rates on the large numbers of ARMs from 2004 started to reset to higher rates, a number of problems emerged and the housing bubble began to burst. Credit started to contract, with lenders refusing the most marginal loan requests. Home prices in the most rapidly appreciating markets, which coincided with the highest levels of subprime lending, began to decline. Unable to meet payments or refinance, people put their homes

DEFINING "SUBPRIME"

The board of governors of the U.S. Federal Reserve and other federal financial agencies issued "Expanded Guidance for Subprime Lending Programs" on January 31, 2001. In the document, the term "subprime" is defined.

The term "subprime" refers to the credit characteristics of individual borrowers. Subprime borrowers typically have weakened credit histories that include payment delinquencies, and possibly more severe problems such as charge-offs, judgments, and bankruptcies. They may also display reduced repayment capacity as measured by credit scores, debt-to-income ratios, or other criteria that may encompass borrowers with incomplete credit histories. Subprime loans are loans to borrowers displaying one or more of these characteristics at the time of origination or purchase. Such loans have a higher risk of default than loans to prime borrowers. Generally, subprime borrowers will display a range of credit risk characteristics that may include one or more of the following:

- Two or more 30-day delinquencies in the last 12 months, or one or more 60-day delinquencies in the last 24 months;
- Judgment, foreclosure, repossession, or charge-off in the prior 24 months;
- Bankruptcy in the last 5 years;
- Relatively high default probability as evidenced by, for example, a credit bureau risk score (FICO) of 660 or below (depending on the product/collateral), or other bureau or proprietary scores with an equivalent default probability likelihood; and/or
- Debt service-to-income ratio of 50% or greater, or otherwise limited ability to cover family living expenses after deducting total monthly debt-service requirements from monthly income.

up for sale. This created a feedback loop, especially in Florida, Nevada, and California. More homes on the market, with fewer buyers able to purchase them, meant further price declines.

Lenders began the process of short sales—working with a homeowner to sell a property valued less than the remaining mortgage due—and foreclosures at record levels. In the heyday of subprime lending, foreclosure did not pose a threat to lender profits because property appreciation canceled out foreclosure costs. The lending industry counted on this. When the system started breaking down, investment firms stopped buying securitized subprime mortgages. Primary lenders, cut off from their main source of capital, shut their doors in droves.

In August of 2007, the nation's secondary mortgage market temporarily shut down, leaving private-sector lenders without a source of money for home buyers. Countrywide Financial, the largest originator of subprime loans in the United States, appeared headed for bankruptcy. The Federal Reserve, headed by Ben Bernanke, responded by lowering the prime interest rate. The conduits for funding most home mortgages shifted to institutions with Federal Housing Administration (FHA) backing and to the Government Sponsored Enterprises (GSEs) of Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac. Investors were still willing to buy mortgage-backed securities backed by FHA insurance or the GSE guarantee.

By mid-2008, it was apparent that the collapse of the subprime market had created a ripple effect extending through the home mortgage market to the economy in general. Nationwide, property values were dropping by 7.47 percent per year, and one in 171 homes was involved in foreclosure. Several regional banks heavily invested in the subprime market had failed outright, and many more were in serious trouble. In July, the U.S. government responded by enacting a sweeping housing rescue bill—the Housing and Economic Recovery Act—that included a provision for refinancing subprime mortgages with an FHA guarantee, a bailout of Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac (as recommended by Secretary of the Treasury Henry Paulson) that cost an estimated $25 billion, and grants and loans to communities to buy vacant foreclosed properties. Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac were bailed out by federal regulators in September.

Subprime Mortgage Industry Begins to Collapse

IMPACT

In terms of its impact on the average American, the subprime mortgage crisis must rank near the top of the list of modern economic scandals. The effects are not confined to the United States, however, but have had serious repercussions in Europe and Asia because of heavy investment by foreign companies and sovereign wealth funds in mortgage-backed securities. Although a number of other factors, notably a sharp increase in energy costs, contributed to the overall decline in economic well-being in the United States between mid-2006 and mid-2008, the collapse of the housing market was clearly the triggering event.

Between December, 2007, and July, 2008, unemployment and bankruptcy filings rose significantly, while housing prices (in most areas), retail sales, and stock values continued to decline, leading to increasingly pessimistic predictions of the duration and depth of the recession. Any final assessment of the impact of the mortgage industry collapse must necessarily await the results of remedial legislation and future elections.

Securing a home loan now involves a process similar to that before the 1990's: paying a 20 percent down payment and meeting strict requirements for income and creditworthiness. Furthermore, consumers who qualify for these harder-to-get loans now focus on securing fixed interest rates.

—Martha A. Sherwood

FURTHER READING

DiMartino, Danielle, and John V. Duca. "The Rise and Fall of Subprime Mortgages." Economic Letter: Insights from the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas 2, no. 11 (November, 2007). A good introduction to the subprime mortgage crisis.

Gramlich, Edward M. Subprime Mortgages: America's Latest Boom and Bust. Washington, D.C.: Urban Institute Press, 2006. Written by a member of the Federal Reserve Board. The bulk of the book treats subprime lending as a positive force.

The title and introduction, added just before the book went into print, show how rapidly conditions changed.

Renuart, Elizabeth, and Alys Cohen. Stop Predatory Lending: A Guide for Legal Advocates. Boston: National Consumer Law Center, 2007. A good source of information on lender practices contributing to the subprime mortgage crisis.

Sabry, Faten, and Thomas Schopfloch. "The Subprime Meltdown: A Primer." New York: National Economic Research Associates, June 21, 2007. A brief introductory guide to the crisis in the subprime mortgage industry.

SEE ALSO: May 7, 1985: Banker Jake Butcher Pleads Guilty to Fraud; Mar. 29, 1989: Financier Michael Milken Is Indicted for Racketeering and Fraud; Dec. 2, 2001: Enron Bankruptcy Reveals Massive Financial Fraud; Sept. 3, 2003: Mutual Fund Companies Are Implicated in Shady Trading Practices; Sept. 20, 2008: American Financial Markets Begin to Collapse.

February 18, 2007

WASHINGTON POST EXPOSES DECLINE OF WALTER REED ARMY HOSPITAL

The Washington Post published the first in a series of exposés on the medical neglect and deplorable living conditions of wounded soldiers at Walter Reed Army Medical Center, the Army's major hospital. The exposé led to a national scandal and public condemnation, the resignations of top government and military officials, the formation of a presidential commission to investigate the matter, and new, focused programs for soldier-patients systemwide.

LOCALE: Washington, D.C.

CATEGORIES: Publishing and journalism; military; medicine and health care; government; politics

KEY FIGURES

Dana Priest (b. 1959), staff writer for The Washington Post

Anne Hull (fl. early twenty-first century), staff writer for The Washington Post

George W. Weightman (b. 1951), commander of Walter Reed Army Medical Center, 2006-2007

Francis J. Harvey (b. 1943), secretary of the U.S. Army

Kevin C. Kiley (b. 1950), Army surgeon general and commander of Walter Reed Army Medical Center, 2002-2004

Robert Gates (b. 1943), U.S. secretary of defense

SUMMARY OF EVENT

On February 18, 2007, The Washington Post (The Post) published the first in a series of articles that chronicled inadequate medical care and neglect at Walter Reed Army Medical Center for troops returning from the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. The articles, written by staff writers Dana Priest and Anne Hull, were the result of four months of interviews and countless visits with Walter Reed patients, staff, and family members of troops. Beginning with the first article in the series, "Soldiers Face Neglect, Frustration at Army's Top Medical Facility," Priest and Hull described rampant neglect and bureaucratic bungling at the medical center, as well as deteriorated facilities and poor management.

Walter Reed was once among the military's premier medical facilities. Located only five miles from the White House in Washington, D.C., the hospital has served more than 150,000 active duty, National Guard, reserve, and retired military personnel. With fifty-five hundred rooms and more than twenty-eight acres of floor space, it is one of the world's largest medical facilities. U.S. presidents, members of Congress, and foreign dignitaries also have received treatment at the facility.

Allegations of poor care and bureaucracy had been raised in Web-based features in 2004 and 2005 (on Salon.com). Furthermore, two members of Congress, both Republicans, were briefed about the problems as early as 2004 but failed to investigate for fear of embarrassing the Army. Also, an internal Walter Reed memorandum in September, 2006, had warned of possible "mission failure" because of the privatization and outsourcing of many of its services. However, it was the coverage by The Post that launched a national, public scandal.

The scandal led to the firing of several medical center and military officials. Countless investigations followed, all causing significant embarrassment to George W. Bush and his administration. Moreover, a House of Representatives panel investigating the Walter Reed allegations concluded that the hospital's problems were likely emblematic of the military's health care system in general.

Among the scandal's casualties was the medical center's commander, Major General George W. Weightman, who had claimed to be unaware of the center's shoddy conditions and overwhelming red tape. Weightman was relieved of his command on March 1. Others were forced to resign, including on March 2 Secretary of the Army Francis J. Harvey. Lieutenant General Kevin C. Kiley, the Army's surgeon general and the center's commander from 2002 to 2004, retired on March 12.

Although The Post hailed the inpatient area of the medical center as "a place of scrubbed-down order and daily miracles, with medical advances saving more soldiers than ever," much of the controversy was centered on outpatient treatment. Outpatients at Walter Reed traditionally have been active-duty personnel assigned to special outpatient military units at the center. At the height of the scandal, these patients were housed in base facilities and dozens of nearby hotels and apartments contracted by the military. Such facilities were described as a "holding ground" for hundreds of outpatients—

LIFE AT WALTER REED

A scathing news feature on living conditions for wounded soldiers at Walter Reed Army Medical Center opened with a startling exposé of neglect and filth.

Behind the door of Army Spec. Jeremy Duncan's room, part of the wall is torn and hangs in the air, weighted down with black mold. When the wounded combat engineer stands in his shower and looks up, he can see the bathtub on the floor above through a rotted hole. The entire building, constructed between the world wars, often smells like greasy carry-out. Signs of neglect are everywhere: mouse droppings, belly-up cockroaches, stained carpets, cheap mattresses.

Source: Dana Priest and Anne Hull, "Soldiers Face Neglect, Frustration at Army's Top Medical Facility." The Washington Post, February 18, 2007.

mostly soldiers and Marines—and Walter Reed's staff and facilities became overwhelmed by the legions of injured personnel from years of war in the Middle East.

Although the average stay following inpatient treatment was about ten months, many outpatients were assigned to Walter Reed's outpatient units for two years or more. According The Post, outpatients quickly outnumbered inpatients by a ratio of 17-1. Many were amputees or had suffered head and brain injuries; still others had severe psychological problems. According to an interview with General Weightman, problems at the center stemmed from the Army's intense scrutiny of medical discharges during two concurrent, long-term wars using an all-volunteer force.

Among the biggest complaints waged by those interviewed by The Post was the amount of paperwork and bureaucracy soldiers and their families had to surmount to receive basic services. Investigators reported that the typical soldier filled out twenty-two forms—filed with eight different commands, many of them off post—to enter or exit the military medical system. Furthermore, to process the forms, the Army relied on sixteen incompatible data systems and three incompatible personnel systems. Separate and incompatible pay and medical records systems were used as well. Because of these bureaucratic hurdles, records were frequently lost, forcing injured soldiers to bring in medals, photographs, and personal documents to prove they were injured in war. Soldiers and their families apparently received little guidance in navigating this arcane system.

While paperwork may have frustrated soldiers and their families, public outcry came after The Post described life at Walter Reed's inferior outpatient facilities, particularly a former hotel just outside the gates of the post identified as Building 18. This outpatient building had everything from vermin to mold and stained carpeting. Worse, injured and disfigured soldiers—many of whom also were suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder, paranoid delusional disorders, and schizophrenia—reportedly spent their days wandering aimlessly through the facility. Most were waiting for a bureaucrat's decision on whether they would be discharged from the service or returned to active duty.

Reporters Priest and Hull noted that the alarming conditions were exacerbated because many patients housed in Building 18 subsisted on carry-out food and used hotplates for warming up food because the medical center's mess hall was located far from their barracks. Building 18 lacked adequate security and was located in an area of the city known for drug dealing and other crimes. In addition, noncommissioned officers, themselves with serious psychological disorders, frequently supervised other patients, some at risk of suicide.

Building 18 originally had been slated for renovation, but that project was put on hold because the medical center was scheduled for closure. In addition, a thirty-thousand-dollar grant for upgrades and recreational equipment for the residents was canceled in December, 2006, just before the Christmas holidays, because an official was concerned that such expenditures could trigger an audit. By January, the funds were no longer available. Army vice chief of staff Richard Cody, along with Harvey, walked through the facility and insisted that changes were in order.

Ultimately, medical center leaders were accused of having unqualified military personnel and overworked and undertrained case managers help injured soldiers and their families. In addition to assisting patients with housing and pay, these medical center personnel were tasked with helping soldiers with such apparently simple, but almost insurmountable, issues such as replacing their destroyed uniforms, ruined when the soldiers were injured. The task seemed simple enough. In one case, however, a soldier receiving a medal for his war service was disciplined for showing up for the ceremony in sweat

ARMY'S FIRST RESPONSE

General Richard Cody, the Army's vice chief of staff, announced to the press on February 21, 2007, that he would "personally oversee" the renovations of Building 18, the Walter Reed Army Medical Center facility that had deplorable living conditions.

Many of you have read or have heard reports this past weekend concerning the outpatient care of our Wounded Warriors at Walter Reed Army Medical Center. The Secretary of the Army Francis J. Harvey and I visited one outpatient care building mentioned in those reports yesterday, Building 18, and were absolutely disappointed in the status of the rooms and found the delays and lack of attention to building repairs inexcusable.

I am disappointed that I had to learn of the conditions of that building through media reports. Despite frequent visits to Walter Reed facilities and informal and formal discussion with patients and their families, I have never been made aware of Building 18, its condition, or any complaints our Wounded Warriors may have had.

Clearly, a breakdown in leadership and bureaucratic medical and contractual processes bogged down a speedy solution to these problems. I can assure you that appropriate vigor and leadership is being applied to this issue and we will correct any problems immediately. I will personally oversee the plan to upgrade Building 18 and other facilities and ensure our soldiers and their families, who have sacrificed so much, receive the care and housing they so deserve.

pants and shirt; he had not received replacement uniforms. The Army requires outpatient soldiers, even amputees and personnel using wheelchairs, to wear uniforms during treatment.

IMPACT

Beyond the firings and forced resignations, investigators began to examine the medical care of not only Walter Reed but also the military health care system in general. An independent review panel appointed by Defense Secretary Robert Gates confirmed in April, 2007, that many of the allegations made in The Washington Post and elsewhere were indeed true. The panel's report cited neglect and "virtually incomprehensible" inattention to maintenance at Walter Reed.

On March 6, shortly after the story broke in The Washington Post, President Bush appointed the Task Force on Returning Global War on Terror Heroes and convened the Commission on Care for America's Returning Wounded Warriors to investigate the allegations. The commission, which included former secretary of health and human services Donna Shalala and former Republican senator Bob Dole, issued its findings on April 19. Among its recommendations was that the health care systems of both the departments of Defense and Veterans Affairs be restructured and more closely aligned. In addition, the military's disability and compensation systems needed to be revamped. The commission also recommended that an aggressive incentive package be developed to attract an excellent medical staff.

Although many of the commission's recommendations were mired in bureaucratic red tape, one suggestion made news headlines: assigning so-called recovery coordinators from outside the military to each seriously wounded soldier to help shepherd him or her through the system. Also, as a result of the recommendations, several pieces of so-called wounded-warrior legislation were proposed in Congress.

The Government Accountability Office reported in September that the Pentagon's promised fixes at Walter Reed and elsewhere in the military health care system remained threatened by staff shortages and a lack of clarity on how best to care for wounded troops. Adding to concerns of staff shortages and stalled improvements in medical care was the slated closure of Walter Reed by the Defense Base Realignment and Closure Commission. The commission announced in 2005 that the facility was to be renamed the Walter Reed National Military Medical Center and relocated to the nearby National Naval Medical Center in Maryland. In the face of the scandal, Walter Reed continued to be a major source of care for soldiers returning from the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Decline of Walter Reed Army Hospital Exposed

—Cheryl Pawlowski

FURTHER READING

Priest, Dana, and Anne Hull. "Soldiers Face Neglect, Frustration at Army's Top Medical Facility." The Washington Post, February 18, 2007. The first article in the special investigative report on Walter Reed Army Medical Center. This is the story that broke the scandal.

United States Congress. Senate Armed Services Committee. Care, Living Conditions, and Administration of Outpatients at Walter Reed Army Medical Center. Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 2007. The Senate report of its hearings on the Walter Reed Hospital medical neglect scandal. The hearings began on March 6, 2007.

Vogel, Steve. "Report Says Fixes Slow to Come to Walter Reed." The Washington Post, September 27, 2007. Reporter Vogel follows up on the initial February, 2007, exposé and investigates the progress of promised changes at Walter Reed Hospital.

SEE ALSO: May, 1915: British Government Falls Because of Munitions Shortages and Military Setbacks; July 28, 1932: U.S. Troops Drive World War I Veterans from Washington; May 16, 1934: General Douglas MacArthur Sues Newspaper Columnist for Libel; June 13, 1971: New York Times Publishes the Pentagon Papers; Apr. 15, 1981: Janet Cooke Admits Fabricating Her Pulitzer Prize-Winning Feature; Nov. 26, 1997: Canadian Health Commissioner Releases

Report on Tainted Blood; Jan. 30, 2001: Liverpool Children's Hospital Collects Body Parts Without Authorization; Sept. 8, 2004: 60 Min- utes II Reports on George W. Bush's Evasion of Wartime Duty; June 22, 2005: U.S. Air Force Investigates Religious Intolerance at Its Academy.

April 11, 2007

SHOCK JOCK DON IMUS LOSES HIS RADIO SHOW OVER SEXIST AND RACIST REMARKS

On his morning radio show, notorious shock jock Don Imus referred to members of the Rutgers University women's basketball team as "nappy-headed hos" after his cohost said they were "hardcore hos," creating a national furor. The scandal cost Imus his job, temporarily, and prompted a nationwide discussion of racist and sexist speech on the radio.

LOCALE: New York, New York

CATEGORIES: Racism; radio and television; sports; social issues and reform; women's issues; civil rights and liberties; popular culture

KEY FIGURES

Don Imus (b. 1940), radio talk-show host

Bernard McGuirk (fl. early twenty-first century), radio show producer and Imus's cohost

Al Sharpton (b. 1954), civil rights leader and syndicated radio talk-show host

C. Vivian Stringer (b. 1948), coach of the Rutgers University women's basketball team

Kia Vaughn (b. 1987), Rutgers University basketball player

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Don Imus, one of the most notorious radio hosts in the United States, is best known for his syndicated radio and television show Imus in the Morning. The show began as a local broadcast in New York, where it reached about one-half million listeners on the radio station WFAN. The show became nationally syndicated in 1993 and began simulcasting on paid television—on MSNBC—in 1996. The radio show was broadcast on more than sixty CBS Radio stations across the United States and had generated millions of dollars in revenue.

On April 4, 2007, the morning after the Rutgers University women's basketball team lost to the University of Tennessee in the finals of the National Collegiate Athletic Association's (NCAA) championship series, Imus commented on the appearance of the Rutgers basketball players, most of whom were African American, and called them "rough girls," apparently in reference to their tattoos. Imus's executive producer and sidekick, Bernard McGuirk, referred to the players as "hardcore hos." Imus continued the derogatory conversation and described the young women as "nappy-headed hos."

Leaders from women's groups and, most particularly, the African American community were outraged. The National Association of Black Journalists called for a national boycott of the show. Imus responded by dismissing the incident as nothing more than amusing. Two days later, following a barrage of calls demanding that he be fired, Imus issued an apology, but his expression of regret for his words was not enough. His many critics pointed to a pattern of insensitive remarks voiced on his network show over the years.

The Reverend Al Sharpton, a leader in the African American community, called Imus's comments abominable, racist, and sexist and demanded that Imus be fired immediately. In an attempt to remedy the situation, Imus appeared on Sharpton's syndicated radio talk show on April 9 to address the controversy and provide a more complete apology for what he said. Despite the appearance on Sharpton's radio show, a growing number of black leaders called for Imus's dismissal and continued to threaten to organize a boycott of his show's sponsors. Critics also called upon the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) to take action against him and radio stations that carry his program. As a result of intensifying public pressure, numerous sponsors of his morning show, including American Express, Sprint Nextel, Staples, Procter & Gamble, and General Motors, pulled their advertising. The FCC would not get involved in the matter.

MSNBC was the first to act. On April 11, NBC News announced that MSNBC would no longer simulcast Imus in the Morning. In announcing the decision, NBC News president Steve Capus said Imus's "comments were deeply hurtful to many, many people." The next day, CBS Radio canceled Imus in the Morning as well. Leslie Moonves, CBS Corporation president and chief executive officer, said the network made the decision to help change a media "culture that permits a certain level of objectionable expression that hurts and demeans a wide range of people."

Several days after the incident, Rutgers players held a news conference attended by players' parents, coaches, Rutgers administrators, religious leaders, and Imus himself at the New Jersey governor's mansion in Princeton. The three-hour meeting was arranged by Buster Soaries, a former New Jersey secretary of state and the pastor of Rutgers basketball coach C. Vivian Stringer. New Jersey's governor, Jon Corzine, was injured in a car accident on his way to the meeting, so he could not attend.

Players were deeply hurt by Imus's words. Team captain Essence Carson said Imus had "stolen a moment of pure grace from the team." At the New Jersey news conference, Coach Stringer said Imus's words affected not her team alone but all women and all persons of color. Several days after the news conference, Stringer said her players had accepted Imus's personal apology and that the team was in the process of forgiving.

Prior to his termination from the airways, Imus had signed a five-year, $40 million contract extension with CBS Radio. Upon notification of his firing, Imus hired a prominent attorney, Martin Garbus, to pursue a wrongful termination lawsuit against CBS, threatening to sue for $120 million. On August 14, he reached a settlement with CBS for an undisclosed amount of money, leaving him free to pursue other media opportunities.

Imus also faced a lawsuit from one of the Rutgers players. Kia Vaughn sued Imus for libel, slander, and defamation. The lawsuit alleged that his use of the slanderous terms was intentional and motivated by greed and financial gain. The lawsuit claimed that the insults were made purely to increase ratings for Imus and his show. Vaughn requested monetary damages of an unspecified amount, but she decided to drop the lawsuit because she wanted to focus on her university studies and basketball.

Don Imus. (AP/Wide World Photos)

IMPACT

The scandal caused by Imus's racist and sexist comments proved that such behavior is facing growing condemnation, yet such vulgar talk is widespread in American popular culture, including in the lyrics of rap, hip-hop, rock, and other musical genres. Imus's derogatory remarks, scandalous as they were, also reignited the debate over freedom of speech, a debate that moved the focus from racism and sexism—the primary reason for the scandal—to individual rights. Imus's supporters argued that it was within his First Amendment rights to express his opinions on the air, regardless of how controversial, and that he should not have been fired. The FCC determined that Imus had been fired by a private employer who believed his remarks were objectionable, and thus the case was not technically one of censorship or a violation of free speech rights.

In the end, Imus's career suffered little after his dismissal. Eight months after being fired, he launched a return to radio. On November 1, Citadel Broadcasting announced it had agreed to what was reportedly a multiyear syndication contract with Imus. The new Imus in the Morning program was distributed nationally by ABC radio networks and was based at Citadel, which owned WABC in New York City. It started broadcasting in December. Imus introduced two African American comedians, Karith Foster and Tony Powell, as cast members of his show.

—Mary McElroy

FURTHER READING

Goldstein, Hilary. "Tuning into Democracy: Community Radio, Free Speech, and the Democratic Promise." Alternate Routes 20 (2004): 59-106. Investigation into the connection between free speech and democracy using case studies of two radio networks.

Leets, Laura. "Disentangling Perceptions of Subtle Racist Speech: A Cultural Perspective." Journal of Language and Social Psychology 22, no. 2 (2003): 145-148. An experimental study that examines how racist slurs made by dominant groups in society cause harm to others.

Reed, James. Everything Imus: All You Ever Wanted to Know About Don Imus. New York: Birch Lane Press, 1999. A profile of one of radio's most controversial personalities. Covers more than thirty years of the career of the shock jock. Includes discussion of his propensity to use racial and sexist slurs and his battle with drugs and alcohol.

SEE ALSO: Mar. 14, 1960: FCC Chairman John C. Doerfer Resigns for Accepting Gifts from Networks; Oct. 4, 1976: Agriculture Secretary Earl Butz Resigns After Making Obscene Joke; Sept. 22, 1997: Sportscaster Marv Albert Is Tried for Sexual Assault; Oct. 13, 2004: Television Producer Files Sex Harassment Suit Against Bill O'Reilly.

May 28, 2007

JAPANESE POLITICIAN CHARGED WITH CORRUPTION HANGS HIMSELF

Japanese agricultural minister Toshikatsu Matsuoka received months of publicity for claiming questionable reimbursements and expenses and for connections with business executives arrested for rigging bids for public works projects. After he was found dead, hanging from a dog leash in an apparent suicide, Prime Minister Shinzo Abe's administration was subjected to even greater public scrutiny and suffered loss of support, culminating in the prime minister's resignation in September, 2007.

LOCALE: Tokyo, Japan

CATEGORIES: Murder and suicide; corruption; government; politics

KEY FIGURES

Toshikatsu Matsuoka (1945-2007), Japanese minister of agriculture, forestry, and fisheries, 2006-2007

Shinzo Abe (b. 1954), prime minister of Japan, 2006-2007

Norihiko Akagi (b. 1959), Japanese minister of agriculture, 2007

Taku Yamamoto (b. 1952), Japanese politician

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Toshikatsu Matsuoka was a six-time elected member of Japan's house of representatives for Kumamoto Prefecture's third district. He served as the minister of agriculture, forestry, and fisheries in the Shinzo Abe cabinet. The sixty-two-year-old Matsuoka committed suicide on May 28, 2007, during the middle of a financial scandal, marking the first time a Japanese cabinet minister killed himself since World War II. (Army minister Anami Korechika committed suicide on news of Japan's surrender.)

Matsuoka's duties included work on free-trade agreements with Australia and on diplomacy with the United States over beef-import concerns, but he received the most attention when he announced a plan to certify Japanese food restaurants outside Japan. He wanted certification to help distinguish pseudo-Japanese food restaurants from those that are "genuine." Many foreign media criticized the system, and Matsuoka was forced to retract his plan.

The real political damage to Matsuoka sprang from questions he faced over high utility expenses, for which he had claimed more than 28 million yen ($236,600) from government funds. Similarly high expenses ($42,000) for utilities had been claimed as far back as 2005. Matsuoka tried to quiet the scandal by saying that the money had been spent on purified water. One oft-quoted line from Matsuoka, "Nobody drinks tap water anymore," led The New York Times to suggest that he made statements "bordering on the absurd." Matsuoka had become the butt of national and international ridicule, prompting television crews and opposition politicians to visit his office to request tastings of the costly purified water.

In addition to the utilities expenses, public records also show that Matsuoka claimed another $1.2 million as "office costs" from 2001 to 2005, even though his office in a parliamentary building was rent-free. Opposition members of Parliament called for his resignation over these expenses, though Prime Minister Abe vigorously defended his minister, often against the advice of some within his own party, saying Matsuoka had fulfilled his legal responsibilities in making these declarations and that he had detailed knowledge of agricultural policy. In response to the growing public outcry, the governing Liberal Democratic Party proposed new rules requiring receipts for every expense exceeding 50,000 yen, or about $410. However, the proposal backfired, drawing attention to the policy that lawmakers are not required to file receipts for many of the expenses they report to the government. Opposition parties responded by calling for receipts for all expenses, a requirement the governing party traditionally had resisted.

The utilities debacle was just one of a series of money scandals and policy missteps that plagued the Abe administration. Critics pointed to Abe's weak management skills and poor political judgment. Matsuoka was embroiled in other financially related scandals, having been forced to apologize shortly after taking office for failing to declare political donations amounting to $75,000. In a parallel investigation by Tokyo prosecutors that was coming to a head the week prior to Matsuoka's suicide, a company was linked to a bid-rigging scandal involving road construction projects administered by Matsuoka's ministry. Six construction-industry executives and consultants were arrested and accused of violating antimonopoly laws by colluding on bids.

The Japanese press reported that the vice farm minister, Taku Yamamoto, had said during a speech that Matsuoka might have used the money on geishas in the Asakusa entertainment district of Tokyo, but Yamamoto later retracted his statement, saying that he intended it as a joke. The accusation has never been proved.

Matsuoka took his own life in his apartment, hours before scheduled questioning in the national parliament by an audit committee in connection with political donations and allegations of misappropriation of government funds. He was discovered unconscious, hanging by his dog leash, in his pajamas, from the hinge of a door in his living room. He died at Keio University hospital in Tokyo shortly afterward. A police postmortem examination confirmed that he died after he had hanged himself. Police refused to comment on reports in the Japanese press that he had left a number of suicide notes in his apartment, including ones addressed to Japan's prime minister and the public apologizing for his actions. "He was certainly under pressure in Parliament," Abe said of Matsuoka after his death. "He was giving his all to the job, and I had very high expectations of him, so this is really too bad."

Suicides have a longstanding tradition in Japan, where they are seen as a face-saving move to avoid public humiliation. The suicide of someone who has disgraced him- or herself, or his or her office, is likely to be seen not as a means of escape from the situation but rather as a way of rectifying that problem. Japan's suicide rate is among the highest in the industrialized world and reached a record high in 2007. In 2004, more than thirty-two thousand Japanese nationals killed themselves.

IMPACT

"The effects on the cabinet will be great," a visibly shaken Prime Minister Abe declared as he left to attend a wake for the deceased minister. "I feel deeply conscious of my responsibility as prime minister, and as the one who appointed him."

Political analysts such as Minoru Morita, who runs an independent research institute in Tokyo, said the suicide could hurt Abe by drawing still more scrutiny to the scandals. After Matsuoka's suicide, Abe's approval rating dropped from 43 percent to remain below 30 percent for months. Abe's ruling Liberal Democratic Party consequently suffered great losses in the election to the upper house of councillors on July 29, losing its majority, while the Democratic Party of Japan managed to gain the largest margin since its formation in 1996. Matsuoka's replacement, Norihiko Akagi, who was suspected of unethical conduct similar to that of Matsuoka, resigned after the election. Abe was free from leadership contests from within the ruling party but was nevertheless obliged to resign as a result of the mounting pressures on his administration.

—Stefan Halikowski Smith

FURTHER READING

Fackler, Martin. "Facing Inquiry, Japanese Official Commits Suicide." The New York Times, May 28, 2007. Next-day reportage in the international press of Matsuoka's suicide and its political ramifications.

Mamoru, Iga. The Thorn in the Chrysanthemum: Suicide and Economic Success in Modern Japan. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1986. Examines the problem of suicide in Japan; discusses Japanese values, culture, and pressures for economic success; and describes the suicides of five prominent authors.

“Political Suicide.” The Economist, June 6, 2007.

An article suggesting that Matsuoka’s suicide had deep consequences for Japanese politics, turning a rising Abe administration into one with serious problems.

Shinzo, Abe. “For a Beautiful Country: The New Prime Minister of Japan Speaks Out.” Vertical Inc., October 23, 2007. Offers a rare inside look at one of the most controversial and lauded prime ministers to be put in office, explaining the Japanese prime minister’s pro-United States stand on world politics.

SEE ALSO: Feb. 3, 1975: Honduras’s “Bananagate” Bribery Scandal Leads to Executive’s Suicide; Jan. 22, 1987: Pennsylvania Politician Kills Himself at Televised Press Conference; June, 1988-June, 1989: Insider-Trading Scandal Rocks Japanese Government; Aug. 10, 1989: Japanese Prime Minister Sosuke Resigns After Affair with a Geisha.

June 4, 2007

CONGRESSMAN WILLIAM J. JEFFERSON IS INDICTED FOR CORRUPTION

In March, 2005, the Federal Bureau of Investigation began investigating Louisiana congressman William J. Jefferson for corrupt business dealings. Jefferson had been videotaped receiving $100,000 from an investor-informer to establish business contacts in Nigeria. The FBI searched Jefferson’s home and found $90,000 of the cash in his refrigerator freezer. The agency later raided his office in Washington, D.C., which provoked intense debate about the right of law enforcement to search congressional offices.

LOCALES: Washington, D.C.; New Orleans, Louisiana

CATEGORIES: Law and the courts; corruption; civil rights and liberties; government; politics

KEY FIGURES

William J. Jefferson (b. 1947), U.S. representative from Louisiana, 1991-2009

Lori Mody (fl. early twenty-first century), business investor

SUMMARY OF EVENT

A Democratic congressman from Louisiana, William J. Jefferson became the subject of one of the largest criminal and legal scandals to strike the U.S. Congress in modern times. On June 4, 2007, a federal grand jury indicted him for a pattern of corruption. According to the ninety-four-page indictment, Jefferson solicited thousands of dollars in bribes, sometimes in the form of stock and retainer fees, in the years between 2000 and 2005. While the indictment proved shocking, the discovery of thousands of dollars in Jefferson’s refrigerator freezer at his home by agents with the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) grabbed the public’s attention. Furthermore, a subsequent search of his congressional office infuriated members of Congress and all concerned with search-and-seizure rights.

Jefferson was elected to Congress in 1991, becoming the first African American Congress member from Louisiana since the days of Reconstruction. Jefferson, one of ten children of poor sharecroppers, grew up in Lake Providence, Louisiana. He earned a degree from Southern University A&M College before graduating from Harvard University Law School in 1972. He arrived in Washington, D.C., after serving three terms in the Louisiana senate. While serving in Congress, Jefferson earned a master’s degree in taxation laws from Georgetown University. He established a reputation as an expert on trade and tax issues, serving on the House Committees on Ways and Means and Small Business as well as with the Congressional Black Caucus and the Africa Trade and Investment Caucus.

However, Jefferson, who was nicknamed Dollar Bill by his opponents in New Orleans, also gained a reputation for being eager to make a buck. He broke with his mentor, Ernest N. Morial, New Orleans's first black mayor, during the late 1970's over a large bill for legal work that Morial had assumed was free. Political observers suggested that Jefferson did not want to leave his family in the financial straits from which he began life. Jefferson and his wife, Andrea Jefferson, had five daughters.

In March, 2005, business investor Lori Mody of McLean, Virginia, approached the FBI to complain about dealings over the previous nine months with Jefferson and several of his associates. Mody had initially sought to use Jefferson's influence to win contracts to install telephone and Internet service in the African nations of Nigeria and Ghana. At the request of U.S. government officials, she agreed to wear a hidden microphone for subsequent meetings with Jefferson.

Meeting at a restaurant in May, Jefferson and the informant negotiated, on paper, the percentage of the company that Jefferson wanted for his children: 30 percent. On July 12, following a trip to Ghana, Jefferson informed Mody that she now co-owned a Ghanaian company, International Broad Band Services, with the Jeffersons. On July 30, Jefferson met Mody for breakfast at the Ritz-Carlton Hotel near the Pentagon. As they left the restaurant, Jefferson took from Mody's car a reddish-brown leather briefcase, which contained $100,000 in cash to bribe Nigerian officials. While the FBI videotaped him, Jefferson put the money in his vehicle and drove away. Four days later, the FBI raided his home and found $90,000 of the marked bills hidden in frozen-food containers in the freezer of his north-east Washington, D.C., home. The remaining $10,000 was recovered from his office assistant and his lawyer.

On May 20-21, 2006, the FBI spent eighteen hours searching Jefferson's office at the Rayburn House Office Building in Washington, D.C. Seized documents were submitted to an independent team of two U.S. Justice Department lawyers and an FBI agent for evaluation. This search marked the first time that the office of a member of Congress was searched in a criminal inquiry, and the incident touched off a firestorm of protest from both Republican and Democratic lawmakers, who argued that the search interfered with their legislative prerogatives. Justice Department officials countered that members of Congress were not above the law and that congressional offices should not be turned into sanctuaries or places for members to engage in illegal conduct. On May 25, U.S. president George W. Bush ordered the attorney general's office to seal the materials seized from Jefferson's office for forty-five days until the dispute between the House and prosecutors was resolved; some documents, however, were used to prepare an indictment against Jefferson. Meanwhile, Jefferson went to federal court in a futile effort to force the return of his documents.

The Times-Picayune of New Orleans called for Jefferson to resign before he inflicted even more pain on a district traumatized by Hurricane Katrina. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, a fellow Democrat, recommended that Jefferson resign from the House Ways and Means Committee, which writes tax laws. She stated that the charges, if true, constituted an abuse of public trust and power. On June 8, House Democratic leaders endorsed an effort to oust Jefferson from his post on the committee. The Congressional Black Caucus opposed the decision on the grounds that Jefferson was presumed innocent and that removing him from his committee post before any criminal charges had been filed would be unprecedented. Jefferson viewed efforts to force him from the committee as discriminatory.

Meanwhile, the government prosecuted two persons who were closely associated with Jefferson. In January, 2006, Brett M. Pfeffer, once a top aide to Jefferson, pleaded guilty to federal bribery charges and said his boss (Jefferson) had demanded kick-backs for facilitating business deals in Nigeria. A Kentucky businessman, Vernon L. Jackson, pleaded guilty on May 3 to paying between $400,000 and

$1 million to Jefferson's family in exchange for Jefferson's help in obtaining Nigerian business deals for iGate, a telecommunications company that Jackson headed and that Jefferson and Mody were negotiating to purchase. The FBI alleged that Jefferson tried to conceal his involvement by funneling the payments to his daughters. Pfeffer and Jackson cooperated with the government's investigation of the congressman.

On December 9, Jefferson surprised most observers by winning reelection to Louisiana's Second Congressional District. He received 57 percent of the vote, cast by only about 16 percent of eligible voters in a hotly contested election. Political analysts suggested that the voters in the district, which spans most of New Orleans and the west bank of neighboring Jefferson Parish, were more concerned with maintaining the status quo than with change. The district was flooded after Hurricane Katrina made landfall on August 29, 2005, and many voters believed that Jefferson could better help residents than his less experienced opponent.

Jefferson's reelection did not stop the Justice Department from pursuing the Congress member. On June 4, 2007, he was indicted by a federal grand jury on sixteen corruption-related felony counts, including bribery, racketeering, conspiracy, money laundering, and obstruction of justice. In particular, investigators claimed that he targeted companies involved in oil, communications, satellite transmission, and sugar, all of which sought to do business in Africa. In exchange for money, Jefferson used his official position as a member of the House Ways and Means subcommittee on trade to promote these ventures. The indictment stated that Jefferson led official delegations to Africa, wrote letters to U.S. and foreign officials, and assigned members of his staff to promote ventures in Nigeria, Ghana, and Equatorial Guinea, ventures in which he had a financial interest. Jefferson pleaded not guilty on June 8 and faced trial in January, 2009.

IMPACT

The investigation into Jefferson's activities undercut efforts by Democrats to link the Republican-controlled Congress to a culture of corruption. In the 2006 elections, Republicans frequently invoked the Jefferson case to defend their party from charges of corruption. Louisiana voters appeared blasé about the investigation, perhaps because the state has a long history of corrupt politicians. During the 1990's and into the twenty-first century, Louisiana saw the convictions of an attorney general, Congress member, a state senate president, a federal judge, and numerous local officials. Jefferson's own brother-in-law, a judge, was imprisoned for mail fraud.

—Caryn E. Neumann

FURTHER READING

Long, Kim. The Almanac of Political Corruption, Scandals, and Dirty Politics. New York: Delacorte Press, 2007. A wide-ranging book detailing the various scandals and corrupt practices that have plagued U.S. politics. A good general study of political scandals.

Murray, Shailagh, and Allan Lengel. "Lawmakers Demand FBI Return Raid Files: Capitol Hill Search Stirs Constitution Fight." The Washington Post, May 25, 2006. News story reporting on the scandal provoked by the FBI's raid on Jefferson's office in Congress.

Parent, Wayne. Inside the Carnival: Unmasking Louisiana Politics. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 2006. Although this book does not focus specifically on Jefferson, it describes the problematic and troublesome atmosphere of Louisiana politics.

Wolfensberger, Don. "Punishing Disorderly Behavior in Congress: The First Century—An Introductory Essay." Washington, D.C.: Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars, 2006. A wide-ranging discussion of corruption in Congress. Based on a paper prepared for the seminar Congressional Ethics Enforcement: Is Congress Fulfilling Its Constitutional Role?

SEE ALSO: Jan. 23, 1904: Senator Joseph R. Burton Is Convicted of Bribery; May 12, 1924: Kentucky Congressman John W. Langley Is Convicted of Violating the Volstead Act; Aug. 4, 1948: Columnist Drew Pearson Exposes Congressman's Corruption; Mar. 1, 1967: Adam Clayton Powell, Jr., Is Excluded from Congress; June 23, 1967: Senator Thomas J. Dodd Is Censured for Misappropriating Funds; Dec. 11, 1997: HUD Secretary Henry Cisneros Is Indicted for Lying to Federal Agents; May 9, 2000:

Former Louisiana Governor Edwin Edwards Is Convicted on Corruption Charges; Beginning Aug. 29, 2005: Government Incompetence Mars Hurricane Katrina Relief Efforts; July 9, 2007: Senator David Vitter's Name Is Found in D.C. Madam's Address Book.

July 9, 2007

SENATOR DAVID VITTER'S NAME IS FOUND IN D.C. MADAM'S ADDRESS BOOK

Deborah Jeane Palfrey was convicted of racketeering for running a Washington, D.C., prostitution ring. One of her clients was David Vitter, a conservative Republican senator from Louisiana famed for long-time public dedication to traditional family values. His name, and the names of her other clients, was released by Palfrey, and Vitter admitted to having sinned. The scandal embarrassed Vitter but cost Palfrey her life; Palfrey committed suicide in 2008.

LOCALE: Washington, D.C.

CATEGORIES: Prostitution; sex; sex crimes; organized crime and racketeering; politics; law and the courts; murder and suicide

KEY FIGURES

David Vitter (b. 1961), U.S. senator from Louisiana, 2005-

Deborah Jeane Palfrey (1956-2008), owner of the escort agency Pamela Martin & Associates

SUMMARY OF EVENT

American history is replete with scandals involving politicians and women engaged in marginalized, sexually oriented businesses such as prostitution and escort services. The case of U.S. senator David Vitter in 2007 and 2008 was in many ways typical. He was a rising figure in the Republican Party who made a name for himself in his home state of Louisiana and in Washington, D.C., stumping for conservative causes. He found his career endangered by an alleged connection to an upscale prostitution ring while party to a highly publicized court case. What distinguished this case from many others of the same ilk was the apparent ease with which Vitter managed to weather the scandal and the aspects of his character, history, and conduct that allowed him to survive politically.

Vitter was a young Republican senator from Louisiana who had devoted most of his political career to socially conservative causes such as public prayer in schools, abstinence-based sex education, and opposition to abortion and same-gender marriage. Despite his dedication to these family-values issues, rumors that he patronized prostitutes plagued him from as early as 2002, when the rumors effectively sank his hopes for becoming governor of Louisiana in 2002.

Deborah Jeane Palfrey was an enigmatic figure who came from a background not unlike that of Vitter. She grew up in Pennsylvania and Florida in a religious, working-class family. (Upon her death in the spring of 2008, a haunting image of her smiling beatifically in her communion dress was used in newspaper and magazine photos accompanying the story.) Like Vitter (and his wife, Wendy), Palfrey initially intended to become a lawyer. However, after obtaining an undergraduate degree in criminal justice and enrolling in law school, she at some point lost focus and drifted into the demimonde of high-class call girls, cultured women elegantly coiffed and garbed and who were paid enormous fees for their sexual services. Later, Palfrey tried to suggest that her entering the sex-for-hire business was in large part an attempt at social reform. She wanted to provide escorts with a healthy and safe work environment free of the violence and substance abuse that traditionally characterized the business.

Palfrey also made huge profits from her endeavors in this field, and her enterprise soon grew to such proportions that it attracted the attention of the law. In 1992, after two years of legal wrangling and trials, she was found guilty of pimping and pandering and imprisoned for one and one-half years. Her experiences behind bars so traumatized her that she vowed never to return to prison, a remark that would soon come back to haunt her. However unpleasant was her jail time, it did not discourage her from reentering the escort business after her release, and she founded her next venture, Pamela Martin & Associates (PMA), in Washington, D.C.

Using small-venue newspapers aimed at specialized readerships (such as campus newspapers), Palfrey recruited women from all walks of life, including college students and women already earning high salaries in respected professions. Soon, PMA had profits of hundreds of thousands of dollars per year—and yet again, Palfrey's successful sex business grew so large that it attracted the attention of the police and other legal authorities.

Palfrey first revealed her business in an interview that aired on ABC's 20/20 on May 4, 2007. She released her list of clients, which included Senator Vitter, on July 9. She was arrested in the fall of 2007 for prostitution, using the U.S. mail service for illegal purposes, and other crimes. American news media began to cover the story closely when it was revealed that many of the clients of the call-girl ring included prominent politicians, business executives, lobbyists, military officers, and international

David Vitter and his wife, Wendy Vitter, at a news conference in Metairie, Louisiana, on July 16, 2007. The senator was making his first public appearance since acknowledging that his name and phone number were in the address book of the D.C. Madam. (AP/Wide World Photos) officials and that PMA had kept meticulous records of its contacts with clients, including their telephone numbers. (Palfrey estimated that the number of clients listed on the agency's records topped ten thousand.) Two on the list were Deputy Secretary of State Randall L. Tobias and military strategist-columnist Harlan K. Ullman; Tobias resigned because of the scandal.

Initially, Palfrey and her lawyers released only an abridged list of clients that titillated the public's prurient interest but elicited little shock or surprise. However, on July 9, when she at last provided on her Web site an exhaustive roster of the men who had patronized her agency, the name of the ultra-conservative senator from Louisiana surprised many who were unfamiliar with earlier rumors about Vitter's behavior. In the months that followed the release of the phone records, the names of Vitter and Palfrey—who was variously dubbed the D.C. madam, the Washington madam, and the Beltway madam by the media—were staples in the media.

To complicate matters, a New Orleans brothel owner also contended in print that the senator had been a client of hers years earlier. Vitter denied these latter allegations.

Vitter and his family and staff acted quickly. On the day Palfrey released her complete list of clients, Vitter, with his wife by his side, made a public announcement that he had indeed used PMA's services five times during the late 1990's and in early 2000 when he first came to Washington, D.C., and was a member of the House of Representatives—but not during his term as senator. Wording his announcement in religious terms, he confessed that he had sinned, that God and his wife had forgiven him, and that he hoped that the rest of the country could do likewise. This modest, apparently humble reaction to Palfrey's scandalous revelation seemed to placate his party and his constituents in Louisiana. In fact, he seemed to suffer little in the wake of the revelation, even managing to avoid having to testify during Palfrey's criminal trial, during which she was convicted, on April 15, of a number of charges including racketeering and money laundering.

Determined not to return to prison, Palfrey hanged herself in a shed outside her mother's home in Tarpon Springs, Florida, on May 1. Her conviction was abated—that is, dismissed—on May 20.

IMPACT

The fallout from Vitter's association with PMA failed to scuttle his political career for a number of reasons. First, his quickly arranged press conference was a masterstroke of media spin. By couching his admission in religious terms, he turned the conference into a public act of confession and contrition, thereby strengthening his image as a devout Christian at the very moment he was most liable to accusations of patent hypocrisy. Furthermore, his open, low-keyed demeanor before the cameras was a refreshing contrast to that of other public figures in similar situations, for example, the brazen denials of Bill Clinton during the Monica Lewinsky scandal and the maudlin hysterics of evangelist Jimmy Swaggart, who wept copiously on national television when his own dalliance with a prostitute was made public.

Furthermore, to many in Louisiana, the mistakes Vitter made in his personal life, however much they might have contradicted his public persona, were outweighed by his accomplishments, as he was seen by many in his home state as a champion against foes to Louisiana far more serious than prostitution: David Duke and Hurricane Katrina. When former Ku Klux Klan member and neo-Nazi sympathizer Duke tried to make a political comeback in 1999 in the congressional race that Vitter ultimately won, Vitter emerged as a veritable representative of the New South who was cultured and well-spoken and who had attended Harvard and Oxford. More important, though, was his record as a tireless campaigner for his state in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina in 2005, often expressing the anger and resentment that many people in the state felt about the abysmally inadequate and incompetent response of the federal government to the disaster.

—Thomas Du Bose

FURTHER READING

Benjamin, Mark. "Fall Girls." Ms., Summer, 2008.

Investigative reporter Mark Benjamin examines the circumstances of Deborah Jeane Palfrey's indictment for prostitution as her johns, "including sanctimonious U.S. senator David Vitter—walked away uncensured and unscathed."

Duggan, Paul. "Four Former Call Girls Testify at Palfrey Trial." The Washington Post, April 9, 2008. A brief but interesting news story about the testimony of four former escorts who worked for Palfrey at Pamela Martin & Associates.

Meadows, Bob, et al. "D.C. Madam: Suicide." People, May, 2008. A touching account of Palfrey's troubled life and her suicide upon being convicted.

Murray, Shailagh. "Senator's Number on 'Madam' Phone List." The Washington Post, July 10, 2007. A thoroughly detailed news report of the scandal as it was first breaking.

SEE ALSO: Dec. 7, 1980: Rita Jenrette's "Diary of a Mad Congresswife" Scandalizes Washington; July 20, 1982: Conservative Politician John G. Schmitz Is Found to Have Children Out of Wedlock; July 20, 1983: Congress Members Censured in House-Page Sex Scandal; Jan. 17, 1998: President Bill Clinton Denies Sexual Affair with a White House Intern; Beginning Aug. 29, 2005: Government Incompetence Mars Hurricane Katrina Relief Efforts; June 4, 2007: Congressman

William J. Jefferson Is Indicted for Corruption; July 11, 2007: Florida Politician Is Arrested for Soliciting an Undercover Male Police Officer; Mar. 12, 2008: New York Governor Eliot Spitzer Resigns in Prostitution Scandal.

July 11, 2007

FLORIDA POLITICIAN IS ARRESTED FOR SOLICITING AN UNDERCOVER MALE POLICE OFFICER

Elected to the Florida House of Representatives in 2000, Bob Allen attempted to pay a male undercover police officer twenty dollars to perform oral sex on the officer in a public restroom at a Florida park. The arrest drew national attention for its tawdriness and hypocrisy, and for Allen's connections to Republican presidential candidate John McCain.

LOCALE: Titusville, Florida

CATEGORIES: Prostitution; sex crimes; law and the courts; politics; government; public morals

KEY FIGURES

Bob Allen (b. 1958), member of the Florida House of Representatives, 2000-2008

Daniel Kavanaugh (fl. early twenty-first century), Titusville police officer

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Bob Allen gained national notoriety as one of several socially conservative politicians involved in sex scandals in 2007. Allen was elected to the Florida House of Representatives in 2000. Essentially a professional politician, most of his income came from his government salary, although he also earned $15,000 from his marketing company, the Allen Florida Group. A graduate of Valencia Community College, he lived with his wife and daughter in Merritt Island.

Allen spent seven years in the legislature, focusing chiefly on the economic development of the state and gaining a reputation as a confrontational legislator devoid of finesse but with a sense of humor. He did little of lasting impact. Allen joined Enterprise Florida, a part of the legislature, in 2002 to attract businesses to Florida. His district, in a part of Florida known as the space coast, included NASA's Kennedy Space Center. Accordingly, in 2002, Allen received an appointment to serve with the Florida Space Authority (now part of Space Florida), which is responsible for expanding and diversifying the state's aerospace industry. Allen put $100,000 in the budget for improvements to the Space Walk of Fame at Riverfront Park, but this effort was vetoed by Governor Charlie Crist. In 2007, Allen became chairman of the house energy committee. He also served as a cochairman of U.S. senator John McCain's Florida campaign for U.S. president.

Notably, especially in the light of later developments, Allen sponsored legislation that toughened penalties for lewd or lascivious conduct in public, such as in or near a park, from a misdemeanor to a felony. The bill (HB 1475) did not pass. Allen also was instrumental in creating a new provision in Florida law that gave some sexual predators life imprisonment for their offenses. Allen had dubbed the bill the sexual predator elimination act. For his record of socially conservative voting, Allen received a 92 percent rating from the Christian Coalition of Florida prior to his 2006 reelection bid. In 2007, about two weeks before his arrest, the Florida Police Benevolent Association named Allen its Legislator of the Year for his support of law enforcement.

On July 11, Allen parked his car and entered the men's restroom at Titusville's Space View Park. Titusville police officer Daniel Kavanaugh, who was conducting a plainclothes stakeout of a nearby condominium in the hope of catching a burglar, observed Allen enter the park on foot, walk into the restroom, exit the restroom, and walk toward a park bench. Kavanaugh, concerned about possible countersurveillance, then entered the restroom to adjust his police radio. On his way out of the men's room, Kavanaugh almost bumped into Allen, who was reentering the room. Allen changed his course of direction and went back toward a park bench. Kavanaugh spoke with two other plainclothes officers sitting on a bench, then entered the restroom and began washing his hands. Allen entered the restroom and went into the first stall. Realizing that there were no paper towels to dry his hands, Kavanaugh walked into the stall marked for the disabled to find paper. As he stood in the stall drying his hands, the police officer observed Allen peering over the door of the stall and attempting to make eye contact. Allen then stepped away, returned to the door of the stall, and again made eye contact. The officer said "hey buddy," to which Allen replied "hi," and then stepped back.

According to the officer's report, about five seconds later, Allen pushed open the door to Kavanaugh's stall and stepped inside. Kavanaugh was standing against the far wall of the stall and said "what's up?" Allen said, "hi, this is kind of a public place isn't it?" Kavanaugh replied, "Do you have somewhere else we can go?" Allen answered, "How about across the bridge? It's quiet over there." The two men then had a conversation in which Kavanaugh said, "I'm looking to get some money. Can you hook me up with $20?" Allen agreed to pay $20 to perform oral sex on the officer. Allen stated that he wanted to travel with the officer across the river before performing the act and turning over the money. Before entering Allen's vehicle, Kavanaugh identified himself as a police officer and arrested Allen. Allen was later released after posting $500 bail.

Allen subsequently explained that he was intimidated by the presence of a "stocky black guy" in the restroom and was worried that other "stocky black guys" in the park might rob him. Although the statement was excluded from his trial, Allen's statement became fodder for late-night talk-show hosts and political cartoonists. The McCain campaign forced his resignation.

In the wake of the arrest, Allen held a press conference in which he proclaimed his innocence and warned his constituents to not jump to conclusions. He stated that the incident brought him closer to his wife and teenage daughter, and he described the event as the worst thing that had happened to his family. He also plowed ahead with his campaign for a Brevard County senate seat that was expected to be vacant in 2008. However, Republican leadership in the Florida house immediately stripped Allen of his chairship of the energy committee and began to isolate him.

On November 9, 2007, a jury convicted Allen of soliciting a sex act. He faced up to sixty days in jail and a five-hundred-dollar fine. He became the first sitting house member to be convicted of a crime since 1998, when Lake City Democrat Randy Mackey was convicted of tax fraud and resigned three months later. Allen's fellow Republicans immediately pressured him to resign to spare the legislature from political damage, but Allen proclaimed his innocence and resolved to continue to fight the charge. The house majority leader, Adam Hasner, announced plans to force Allen from office. However, house rules mandate the removal of a member only upon a felony conviction. Allen was convicted of a second-degree misdemeanor. To remove him, the house could form a select committee to review the case and make a recommendation to the entire house. Removing him would require a vote of two-thirds of the members at a time when Republicans held seventy-seven seats in the legislature while Democrats held forty-two; one seat remained vacant.

Allen was sentenced on November 15. He received six months probation and a $250 fine. The judge required him to pay $245 in restitution to the Titusville Police Department for the initial investigation, to pay court costs, to attend an awareness class on sexually transmitted diseases (STDs), and to undergo STD testing. Allen also was banned from returning to Space View Park. On November 16, he resigned from the state legislature, effective February 15, 2008.

IMPACT

The Allen scandal may have had little long-term impact. Anthony P. Sasso III, a Cocoa Beach ship inspector and former marine engineer, replaced Allen in a special election. Sasso became the first Democratic legislator to be elected from Brevard County since 1996, defeating Republican rival Sean Campbell despite being heavily outspent. The Democrats did not give Allen credit for Sasso's victory because voters and campaign workers did not appear to be especially interested in the scandal, regarding it as old news.

However, 2008 was not a good year for Republican candidates across the United States. It is not clear whether Sasso's election reflected strong support for the candidate, a backlash against the Republican Party for being the party of Allen, or part of a nationwide reaction against the Republicans.

—Caryn E. Neumann

FURTHER READING

Colburn, David R. From Yellow Dog Democrats to Red State Republicans: Florida and Its Politics

Since 1940. Gainesville: University of Florida Press, 2007. A good history of state politics in Florida in the modern era.

Williams, Juliet A., and Paul Apostolidis, eds. Public Affairs: Politics in the Age of Sex Scandals. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 2004. Although the Allen case is not examined in this book, the text does help set the scandal in the context of other sex scandals involving political figures.

SEE ALSO: 1970: Study of Anonymous Gay Sex Leads to Ethics Scandal; Oct. 25, 1974: Evangelist Billy James Hargis Resigns College Presidency During Gay-Sex Scandal; Sept. 3, 1980: Congressman Bauman Is Arrested for Liaison with Teenage Boy; July 20, 1982: Conservative Politician John G. Schmitz Is Found to Have Children Out of Wedlock; Sept. 19, 2000: Ex-gay Leader John Paulk Is Photographed Leaving a Gay Bar; Aug. 19, 2004: Blog "Outs" Anti-gay Congressman Edward Schrock; Dec. 6, 2005: Spokane, Washington, Mayor Recalled in Gay-Sex Scandal; Sept. 29, 2006: Congressman Mark Foley Resigns in Sex Scandal Involving a Teenage Page; Nov. 2, 2006: Male Escort Reveals Sexual Liaisons with Evangelist Ted Haggard.

July 24, 2007

UNIVERSITY OF COLORADO FIRES PROFESSOR FOR PLAGIARISM AND RESEARCH FALSIFICATION

Under intense public and academic scrutiny for writing an inflammatory essay about the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks in the United States, university professor Ward Churchill was subjected to an academic misconduct investigation and subsequently fired for plagiarism and for fabricating and falsifying information. He filed a lawsuit seeking reinstatement.

LOCALE: Boulder, Colorado

CATEGORIES: Cultural and intellectual history; education; ethics; plagiarism; publishing and journalism

KEY FIGURES

Ward Churchill (b. 1947), professor and former chairman of the ethnic studies department at the University of Colorado, Boulder
Phil DiStefano (b. 1946), interim chancellor of Churchill's university

Marianne Wesson (b. 1948), a university law professor and chairman of the university's investigative committee

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Known for his incendiary criticism of the mistreatment of American Indians and political dissidents by the U.S. government, author and University of Colorado, Boulder, professor Ward Churchill drew condemnation and intense scrutiny after public attention focused on his essay about the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks in the United States. In the essay, which circulated on the World Wide Web beginning on September 12, Churchill argued that the workers at the World Trade Center had deserved to die in the attacks.

The essay, and Churchill, began to attract widespread attention and condemnation, but not until early 2005. Old criticisms of Churchill's academic work resurfaced as well. The University of Colorado began an investigation into allegations that Churchill had engaged in academic misconduct, including fabrication, falsification, and plagiarism in his scholarly work. Subsequently, the university fired Churchill, who responded by filing a lawsuit against the university for reinstatement.

The September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks ("9/11") in the United States brought to mind for many Americans the question, "Why do they hate us enough to do something like this?" In "Some People Push Back," circulated on the Web, Churchill addressed this question by arguing that the answer lay primarily in U.S. foreign policy. Churchill was not alone in making this argument. Other notable figures who made the same point include linguist and writer Noam Chomsky and 2008 Republican presidential candidate Ron Paul (who later clarified his remarks). What made Churchill stand out, many believe, was his apparent lack of compassion—his sheer contempt—for those who died on September 11.

Although the essay was on the Web in September, 2001, it did not gain widespread attention until January, 2005. Churchill had been scheduled to participate on a panel at Hamilton College in Clinton, New York. In advance of the panel, which planned to discuss the "limits of dissent," the editor of Hamilton's student newspaper researched Churchill on the Web and found the 2001 essay. Soon, political conservatives such as Bill O'Reilly heard of the essay and quickly condemned Churchill. Goaded by O'Reilly and other conservatives, viewers complained to Hamilton College about Churchill's invitation. In the end, Hamilton canceled the event, citing death threats against the college community and against Churchill.

The interim chancellor of the University of Colorado, Phil DiStefano, publicly condemned Churchill on January 25, and by January 31, Churchill had resigned as chairman of the Ethnic Studies Department. Nevertheless, he remained on the university's faculty and continued to draw scrutiny.

On March 29 the university received a formal research-misconduct complaint against Churchill, who had been subject to academic criticism long before the Hamilton College controversy. Earlier in his career he had been accused of plagiarism, fabrication of research data, and lying about his ethnic background as an American Indian. However, as far as the university was concerned, March 29 marked the first time it had received a formal complaint about Churchill that required a response.

The university's Standing Committee on Research Misconduct appointed an investigative committee chaired by law professor Marianne Wesson. The committee included four other professors in law, American and English literature, history, and sociology; in total, three of the five committee members were CU professors, one was from Arizona State University, and another was from the University of Texas at Austin.

The complaint against Churchill listed nine different grounds of misconduct, but the investigative committee elected not to proceed with two of the charges: that Churchill "had misrepresented his ethnicity in order to gain greater credibility and scholarly 'voice,'" and that Churchill "had violated copyrights in his use of certain articles." The investigative committee considered these allegations outside the CU definition of academic misconduct.

The remaining charges included the following: that Churchill misrepresented the General Allotment Act of 1887 and the Indian Arts and Crafts Act of 1990, fabricated the allegation that the U.S. Army had spread disease among American Indians by giving them smallpox-infected blankets, fabricated his description of a smallpox epidemic at Fort Clark in 1837-1840, plagiarized a pamphlet by Dam the Dams, plagiarized work by Rebecca Robbins, and plagiarized work by Fay Cohen.

The investigative committee concluded that Churchill had falsified the evidence supporting his claims about the General Allotment Act and the Indian Arts and Crafts Act. It further concluded that he had falsified and fabricated his claims about the smallpox epidemics. It also concluded that while he had plagiarized work by Dam the Dams and by Professor Cohen, he had not plagiarized Professor Robbins, but only because he had written the work under Robbins's name—itself a violation of the university's academic standards. Finally, the committee determined that Churchill's violations were serious and deliberate.

The committee did not reach agreement, however, on how to proceed against Churchill. Three members concluded that Churchill's misconduct was serious enough to justify being fired, though only one of the three actually recommended dismissal. Two members recommended a five-year suspension without pay, and the other two members recommended a two-year suspension without pay. The Standing Committee on Research Misconduct was similarly split, with six members voting for dismissal, two voting for a five-year suspension without pay, and one voting for a two-year suspension without pay. On June 26, 2006, Chancellor DiStefano announced that he would recommend that university regents fire Churchill. A year later, on July 24, 2007, the university terminated his employment.

Churchill condemned the investigative committee's report, attacking it as flawed and biased. According to Churchill, the committee should have included a Native American or an American Indian studies expert. (One of the committee members was Arizona State University law professor Robert Clinton, an expert on American Indian law.) Churchill

“LITTLE EICHMANNS”

Ward Churchill wrote a deeply critical article following the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks in New York City and at the Pentagon. His supporters claimed that outrage over the article, which circulated on the Web just days after the attacks, led to later investigations into Churchill's credibility and, ultimately, led to his dismissal from the University of Colorado.

As to those in the World Trade Center . . . Let's get a grip here, shall we? True enough, they were civilians of a sort. But innocent? Gimme a break. They formed a technocratic corps at the very heart of America's global financial empire—the “mighty engine of profit” to which the military dimension of U.S. policy has always been enslaved—and they did so both willingly and knowingly. . . . If there was a better, more effective, or in fact any other way of visiting some penalty befitting their participation upon the little Eichmanns inhabiting the sterile sanctuary of the twin towers, I'd really be interested in hearing about it.

Source: Ward Churchill, “Some People Push Back” (2001).

also raised procedural objections to the investigation, arguing that he was not provided with clear information about “the standards being applied” or “which allegations were at issue.” With respect to the academic misconduct findings themselves, Churchill dismissed the committee's focus on his citations, arguing that his work consisted of a synthesis of other material and that it was not feasible to “delve into minute detail with respect to each piece or the ‘big picture’ will be lost.” Finally, regarding the plagiarism charges, Churchill argued that he had either ghostwritten the allegedly plagiarized materials or that he had merely copyedited the volume.

The day after he was fired, Churchill filed a lawsuit against the university in a Colorado state court. His suit claims that his dismissal violated his First Amendment rights and that he should be reinstated.

IMPACT

The Churchill case revealed deep divisions, both in American society and in academia. Throughout the controversy, Churchill supporters have argued that the case amounts to the censoring of an outspoken, radical critic of the U.S. government. His opponents, however, consider him an academic fraud whose hire, tenure, and promotion reflect a liberal bias in the academy. In any case, the scandal that ensued has yet to abate, and the divisions reflect a strong, unyielding politics at the heart of commentary in the United States.

—Tung Yin

FURTHER READING

Churchill, Ward. On the Justice of Roosting Chickens: Reflections on the Consequences of U.S. Imperial Arrogance and Criminality. Oakland, Calif.: AK Press, 2003. Expanded version of Churchill's original 2001 essay, "Some People Push Back," which argued that the United States brought the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on itself, in part because of its unilateral foreign policy.

_____. Struggle for the Land: Native North American Resistance to Genocide, Ecocide, and Colonization. New ed. San Francisco, Calif.: City Lights Books, 2002. A series of essays on American Indian resistance to the federal government. Includes "The Water Plot," which was used as an example of academic misconduct in the Churchill investigation.

Healy, Patrick D. "College Cancels Speech by Professor Who Disparaged 9/11 Attack Victims." The New York Times, February 2, 2005. A news report about Hamilton College canceling Churchill's speech on its campus following death threats and a barrage of e-mails to college officials.

SEE ALSO: 1928-1929: Actor Is Suspected of Falsely Claiming to Be an American Indian; 1978: Roots Author Alex Haley Is Sued for Plagiarism; Dec. 3, 1989: Martin Luther King, Jr.'s, Doctoral-Thesis Plagiarism Is Revealed; Spring, 1996: Physicist Publishes a Deliberately Fraudulent Article; Apr., 1998: Scottish Historian Is Charged with Plagiarism; May 11, 1998: Journalist Stephen Glass Is Exposed as a Fraud; June 18, 2001: Historian Joseph J. Ellis Is Accused of Lying; Jan. 4, 2002: Historian Stephen E. Ambrose Is Accused of Plagiarism; Jan. 18, 2002: Historian Doris Kearns Goodwin Is Accused of Plagiarism; Oct. 25, 2002: Historian Michael A. Bellesiles Resigns After Academic Fraud Accusations.

August 20, 2007

FOOTBALL STAR MICHAEL VICK PLEADS GUILTY TO FINANCING A DOGFIGHTING RING

Michael Vick, a star quarterback in the National Football League, and three other men were convicted and imprisoned for their roles in a dogfighting ring on property owned by Vick in rural Virginia. Vick was suspended from the NFL, lost lucrative commercial contracts, was sued for millions of dollars by his creditors, and was ordered to pay for the long-term care of the dogs rescued from his property.

LOCALE: Richmond, Virginia

CATEGORIES: Sports; gambling; law and the courts; organized crime and racketeering; violence; public morals; ethics

KEY FIGURES

Michael Vick (b. 1980), professional football player

Purnell A. Peace (fl. early twenty-first century), coconspirator

Tony Taylor (fl. early twenty-first century), coconspirator

Quanis Phillips (fl. early twenty-first century), coconspirator

SUMMARY OF EVENT

On August 20, 2007, National Football League (NFL) quarterback Michael Vick pleaded guilty to one count of criminal conspiracy to operate a dogfighting ring across state lines. The case also involved the abuse and killing of dogs. Vick, who played for the Atlanta Falcons, faced state felony charges in Virginia as well for his role in the dogfighting ring and related gambling activities.

Vick had been a standout quarterback at Virginia Tech University and then was drafted in 2001 by Atlanta. His early NFL career included setting many new records, multiple playoff appearances, and high-paying commercial endorsements. In 2004, he became the NFL's highest-paid player with a long-term contract for $130 million.

On April 25, 2007, law enforcement officials, searching for evidence in a drug case involving Vick's cousin, found dogfighting and dog-training facilities on Vick's fifteen-acre property near Smithfield, Virginia. The facilities were known as Bad Newz Kennels. Officials also found more than fifty pit bulls (and other dogs), treadmills modified for dogs, and other dogfighting paraphernalia.

Dogfighting is generally regarded as a cruel, brutal, and inhumane practice. So gruesome is the practice that even experienced investigators have been horrified by what they discovered at raids. Dogs used for fighting are trained to kill using a variety of methods. To ensure the animals' aggression, the dogs are beaten, chained, and even fed gunpowder, illegal drugs, and live animals; often they are not fed at all for long periods. Dogs are also trained through the use of bait dogs, which are non-pit-trained animals used strictly as a target to kill. Bait dogs are tied to a chain while the pit fighter is free to roam, or the pit dog is duct-taped around the muzzle or legs, or both, so its cannot run or fight back. If a trained fighting dog fails to win in the ring, it is beaten, shot, or electrocuted to death, or it is fed to other dogs and killed or otherwise left to die.

On July 2, prosecutors alleged that Bad Newz Kennels had operated on Vick's property for five years. On July 17, the U.S. district attorney's office announced the federal grand-jury indictments of Vick and three coconspirators—Purnell A. Peace, Tony Taylor, and Quanis Phillips. On July 26, Peace, Taylor, and Phillips all pleaded guilty and were convicted for dogfighting conspiracy. Vick, who initially pleaded not guilty, admitted in a plea bargain that he paid for the dog fights and for the operation of the ring. He denied personally killing any dogs deemed unfit for fighting, although he admitted to being part of the effort to kill those dogs. He also denied placing side bets to profit from individual dog fights.

Michael Vick leaving federal court in Richmond, Virginia, on July 26, 2007, following his arraignment on dogfighting charges. (AP/Wide World Photos)

At the federal trial, U.S. District Court judge Henry E. Hudson found that Vick had been fully involved in the dogfighting ring, stating "You were instrumental in promoting, funding, and facilitating this cruel and inhumane sporting activity,” and he also noted Vick’s lack of cooperation during the inquiry. The judge also cited him for using drugs while free on bail and awaiting sentencing. In December, Vick was sentenced to twenty-three months in prison and three years probation and was fined five thousand dollars. He also was indicted by prosecutors in Surry County, Virginia, on two felony counts—dogfighting and animal cruelty. His state trial was postponed until his release from prison on the federal conviction.

In August, 2007, Vick was suspended from the NFL indefinitely by league commissioner Roger Goodell, who stated in a letter to Vick, “Your admitted conduct was not only illegal, but also cruel and reprehensible. Your team, the NFL, and NFL fans have all been hurt by your actions.” The Falcons sought to reclaim bonus money the team paid to Vick, and an arbitrator ruled the team was entitled to recoup $19.9 million. Vick also lost most of his product-endorsement contracts, leaving him virtually bankrupt.

Several companies, beginning with Nike on July 19 and including Upper Deck, Donruss, Rawlings, and Reebok, canceled their contracts with Vick. Nike announced that it suspended the release of a product bearing his name. Retail businesses removed products related to the player—even those products he endorsed—from their store shelves and Web sites, hoping to avoid any connection to Vick, Bad Newz Kennels, animal cruelty, or criminality in any form. Furthermore, Vick was forced to liquidate some of his real estate assets to pay his bills, and several banks sued him to recover about $5 million in loans on which he defaulted.

IMPACT

The dogfighting and animal cruelty scandal was met with widespread public disapproval and condemnation of Vick and his coconspirators. Especially shocking was the mistreatment and killing of the dogs. Federal authorities asked the judge to order Vick to set aside nearly $1 million of his own money to care for the dogs rescued from his property. The judge issued that order. A court-appointed veterinary specialist said that many of the dogs required long-term special care. By July, 2008, some of the more aggressive dogs were in the care of an animal sanctuary in Utah and others had been adopted or fostered. A documentary, “Saving the Michael Vick Dogs,” aired on the series DogTown on the National Geographic Channel in September.

Like many professional athletes, Vick had been a role model, and he even started a foundation in 2006 to help at-risk youth and help fund after-school programs. After his arrest, fund-raisers and other organizers canceled his scheduled appearance at their respective events.

Also following Vick’s arrest was the passage of a federal law against dogfighting. The Animal Fighting Prohibition Enforcement Act, signed into law in May, made organizing a dog fight a felony. Also prohibited under the new law is the transport of animals for fighting. The law also bans the use of the U.S. Postal Service to mail dogfighting paraphernalia, and it includes a civil-lawsuit provision.

—Karen L. Hayslett-McCall

FURTHER READING

Adut, Ari. On Scandal: Moral Disturbances in Society, Politics, and Art. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2008. A comprehensive analysis of scandals of all types. The author explores the contexts in which “wrong-doings generate scandals and when they do not.” Focuses on how people experience scandals emotionally and cognitively.

Evans, Rhonda, Deann K. Gauthier, and Craig J. Forsyth. “Dog Fighting: Symbolic Expression and Validation of Masculinity.” Sex Roles 39, nos. 11/12 (December, 1998). A scholarly study of dogfighting as a means to validate one’s masculinity.

Ledbetter, D. Orlando. “Vick Enters Drug Program: Rehab, Move to Kansas May Cut Prison Time.” Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 1, 2008. An updated news report that details Vick’s enrollment in a drug-rehabilitation program in prison.

Maske, Mark. “Falcons’ Vick Indicted in Dog Fighting Case: Star QB Alleged to Have Been Highly Involved.” The Washington Post, July 18, 2007. A news report that discusses Vick’s indictment in the dogfighting ring case.

Smith, Stephen A. “Falls from Grace: What Young Black Athletes Should Learn from the Michael Vick and Marion Jones Dramas.” Ebony, January 1, 2008. Magazine feature on Michael Vick and Olympic sprinter Marion Jones and their fall from the top of their respective sports.

SEE ALSO: Feb. 28, 1986: Baseball Commissioner Peter Ueberroth Suspends Players for Cocaine

Use; Feb. 25, 1987: NCAA Imposes “Death Penalty” on Southern Methodist University Football; June 30, 1994: Tonya Harding Is Banned from Skating After Attack on Rival; Dec. 14, 2001: Notre Dame Football Coach Resigns for Falsifying His Résumé; May 3, 2003: University of Alabama Fires New Football Coach in Sex Scandal; Mar. 17, 2005: Former Baseball Star Mark McGwire Evades Congressional Questions on Steroid Use; Sept. 13, 2007: New England Patriots Football Team Is Fined for Spying on Other Teams.

September 13, 2007

NEW ENGLAND PATRIOTS FOOTBALL TEAM IS FINED FOR SPYING ON OTHER TEAMS

The National Football League levied the highest fines in league history against the New England Patriots after collecting evidence that Patriots coaches had violated league rules against videotaping opponents’ private signals. Coach Bill Belichick and the team were fined. The unprecedented penalties underlined the severity of the misconduct, damaged the credibility of three league championships, and helped foster public cynicism about ethics in professional sports.

ALSO KNOWN AS: Spygate

LOCALE: Foxboro, Massachusetts

CATEGORIES: Sports; corruption; espionage; communications and media; public morals

KEY FIGURES

Bill Belichick (b. 1952), head coach of the New England Patriots

Roger Goodell (b. 1959), commissioner of the National Football League

Eric Mangini (b. 1971), head coach of the New York Jets

Matt Walsh (fl. early twenty-first century), former Patriots video assistant

SUMMARY OF EVENT

On September 9, 2007, assistant coaches for the New England Patriots were caught illegally videotaping signals being sent from the New York sideline to their defensive players on the field during the first game of the 2007 season. The incident was reported to the National Football League (NFL) and its commissioner, Roger Goodell, who acted swiftly in levying the largest penalties in league history. The September 13 sanction was meant to punish the Patriots and warn other teams not to break league rules. Critics wanted stronger penalties, and conspiracy theorists were roused when it was learned that the NFL destroyed the evidence after issuing the penalty. The whole situation became a media storm that raged through the season and off-season.

The NFL allows teams to use two cameras to videotape games from the end zones and other specified areas and had sent multiple memorandums to all teams reiterating these rules. These end-zone angles are wide enough to see the entire field and to see how offensive and defensive players are deployed. The tapes are referred to as coaches film. The Patriots were taping the end-zone angles but they were also taping from their sideline across the field to the Jets defensive coaches and to the scoreboard that was recording ball placement and time. Offensive signals are verbally transmitted to a team's quarterback via timed, one-way, encrypted wireless communications monitored by the NFL. Defensive signals, though, are sent either verbally by a substituting player who can relay the information or by hand signals and signs using gestures, numbers, and colors. Officials with the Jets noticed this action, confiscated the videotape, and filed a complaint with the NFL.

The Jets knew at first hand that Patriots head coach Bill Belichick had a penchant for videotaping and intelligence gathering; Jets head coach Eric Mangini had worked for Belichick for more than ten years, mostly with the Patriots, until he took the Jets job. Mangini violated many of the unwritten rules in NFL coaching circles, which prohibited poaching other players, coaching a rival team, and snitching. Belichick and Mangini reportedly had a great friendship that was obliterated. Now they were archenemies.

The NFL penalized the Patriots just four days later. It demanded all other videotapes from the team and spoke with coach Belichick and team owner Robert Kraft. "This episode represents a calculated and deliberate attempt to avoid longstanding rules designed to encourage fair play and promote honest competition on the playing field," commissioner Goodell wrote in a letter to the Patriots.

Belichick released a statement following the punishment, stating "Part of my job as head coach is to ensure that our football operations are conducted in compliance of the league rules and all accepted interpretations of them. My interpretation of a rule in the constitution and bylaws was incorrect."

The infraction, punishment, and apology should have ended the cycle but only fueled the controversy. The NFL destroyed the videotape evidence, citing security reasons, as a leaked tape was aired on a Fox Sports NFL telecast the following Sunday. Conspiracy theorists believed the league was hiding something or even coddling the immensely popular Patriots. Critics claimed the Patriots had so much recent success because of the taped defensive signals, which they in turn deciphered and used during the same game; that claim, however, was unfounded by the NFL investigation. Belichick stated that he was not taping a game to help the team in the same game; implementing such a task, he added, would be nearly impossible.

The scandal was a scandal because, first, it involved the Patriots, the dominant team of the decade, and second, sports, in general, had been under a cloud of suspicion for the use by athletes of performance-enhancing drugs such as steroids and human growth hormone. The scandal was even more compelling because it featured the Boston and New York sports markets, the deteriorating relationship between Belichick and Mangini, and a Patriots team that was on a ruthless winning streak.

The Patriots advanced to Super Bowl XLII against the New York Giants, and the scandal developed a new twist. Accusations were made by former Patriots video assistant Matt Walsh were printed in the Boston Herald, which stated the Patriots videotaped the St. Louis Rams' final practice before the Super Bowl.

Walsh met with NFL commissioner Goodell and Specter separately in May, and the NFL stated that no further discipline was coming to the Patriots. Specter, however, believed the idea of an independent investigation similar to former Senator George Mitchell's report on steroids in Major League Baseball might be effective in understanding the Patriots scandal.

The Boston Herald used the entire front and back pages of its May 14 edition to apologize to the Patriots and their fans, stating the columnist who reported the Patriots had videotaped the Rams' final practice before the Super Bowl did not have credible sources. The Patriots accepted the apology but noted that the damage was already done when the article was published on the eve of the Super Bowl, usually the top television draw of the year.

IMPACT

After being caught cheating, fined by the league, and vilified by most after the first game of the season, the Patriots and their beleaguered coach went on an unprecedented undefeated streak, ending their season in a loss to the New York Giants in Super Bowl XLII. The Patriots had a 16-0 record during the 2007 regular season. Players and coaches, approached and pressed by the media after every practice and game, played on the field like no other team in history, breaking a number of long-standing NFL records. Belichick was voted NFL Coach of the Year by the Associated Press, his second time winning the award. Many of the same writers who criticized Belichick in print and across electronic media had no choice but to award the coach of one of the greatest professional football teams in history.

The NFL owners voted in early 2008 to allow defensive signals to be radioed in to a team's defensive captain, in a manner similar to how quarterbacks are given plays. Quarterback communications are proven to be secure. This new method of communication will eliminate the interception of signals because radio usage is tightly controlled by the NFL.

The Patriots cheating scandal and actions taken by the league will likely never be forgotten. The legacy of the great Patriots franchise, once thought of as the model franchise in the league, was irreparably tarnished, and many believe that the team's three Super Bowl victories in the first decade of the twenty-first century should have asterisks denoting the victories came during a cheating scandal.

—Jonathan E. Dinneen

FURTHER READING

Callahan, David. The Cheating Culture: Why More Americans Are Doing Wrong to Get Ahead. Orlando, Fla.: Harcourt, 2004. This book discusses why people choose to cheat to gain an advantage over their competitors.

Crossman, Matt. "Tricks, Spies, and Videotapes." Sporting News, September 24, 2007. The author reports on the potential long-term fallout of the taping scandal. Discusses the various theories on why Patriot coach Bill Belichick recorded opposing-team signals and includes reactions to the scandal from National Football League representatives.

King, Peter. "The NFL's Mob Mentality." Sports Illustrated, September 24, 2007. Article argues that in making public the accusation against Belichick, Jets coach Eric Mangini broke a code of silence observed by NFL coaches.

Lupica, Mike. "Patriot Act Not New to Belichick." Daily News (New York), September 16, 2007. A senior columnist discusses how Belichick thinks he is above the law and how his actions tarnish the near-perfect image owner Robert Kraft has created for the Patriots.

Sandomir, Richard. "Goodell Defends Punishment and Warns of Other Sanctions." The New York Times, September 17, 2007. Includes quotations from NFL commissioner Goodell justifying fines levied against the Patriots and Coach Belichick.

Tomase, John. "How It Went Wrong." Boston Herald, May 16, 2008. The story behind the Boston Herald's report of the scandal on the eve of the Super Bowl in 2008.

SEE ALSO: Aug. 19, 1973: Cheating Scandal Shocks Soap Box Derby; Feb. 25, 1987: NCAA Imposes "Death Penalty" on Southern Methodist University Football; Dec. 14, 2001: Notre Dame Football Coach Resigns for Falsifying His Résumé; Mar. 27, 2002: Georgia Basketball Coach Jim Harrick, Sr., Resigns over Fraud Allegations; May 3, 2003: University of Alabama Fires New Football Coach in Sex Scandal; Mar. 17, 2005: Former Baseball Star Mark McGwire Evades Congressional Questions on Steroid Use; July 14, 2006: New York Times Exposes Grading Scandal at Auburn University; Aug. 20, 2007: Football Star Michael Vick Pleads Guilty to Financing a Dogfighting Ring.

October 5, 2007OLYMPIC CHAMPION MARION JONES ADMITS STEROID USE

Olympic track star Marion Jones admitted in court to having lied to federal investigators in 2003 about her use of performance-enhancing drugs and about her knowledge of the involvement of a former boyfriend and former coach in a scheme to cash millions of dollars worth of stolen and forged checks. Jones was jailed and ordered to forfeit her Olympic medals.

LOCALE: United StatesCATEGORIES: Drugs; law and the courts; medicine and health care; public morals; sportsKEY FIGURES

Marion Jones (b. 1975), American Olympic track-and-field medalist

Victor Conte (b. 1954), self-taught pharmacist and founder of Bay Area Laboratory Co-operative, or Balco

C. J. Hunter (b. 1968), American Olympic shot putter who was briefly married to Jones

Tim Montgomery (b. 1975), American Olympic runner who is the father of Jones's eldest son

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Marion Jones was the premier female runner of her generation. In 1997, after a four-year absence from track-and-field competition and after only a few months of serious training, she won the U.S. championship in the 100-meter sprint. That victory earned for her instant recognition as the fastest woman in the world. During the next season, she participated in a world tour that was unprecedented for its ambition. She entered meets at a frenzied pace, returning home just long enough to become the first woman in fifty years to win three events at the U.S. championships in New Orleans, Louisiana.

In 1998, Jones participated in thirty-seven different running and long-jumping events and won thirty-six of them. By the time the year ended, she held the number one position in the world in the 100 meters, 200 meters, and long jump. She capped off the year by marrying shot put champion C. J. Hunter, a future Olympic athlete.

A charismatic and attractive woman, Jones quickly became a media favorite and one of the most famous female athletes in the world. Reporters and fans speculated that she would win five gold medals—more than any other woman ever in track and field—at the 2000 Sydney Olympics. Jones came close, winning the 100-meter race by the second-widest margin in Olympic history—among both men and women. She won the 200-meter race by the largest margin since Wilma Rudolph's victory at Rome in 1960. Jones took a third gold medal, as part of the U.S. 1,600-meter relay team. In the 400-meter relay, the U.S. team botched the baton handoff between the second and third legs. Jones made up some ground, but the Americans took the bronze for third place. The long jump, traditionally Jones's weakest event, left her with a fifth medal, a second bronze. In recognition of her achievements, Jones was named the Associated Press Female Athlete of the Year.

The track-and-field world, as with other sports, had long been dogged by allegations that athletes use performance-enhancing drugs. Jones stated repeatedly throughout her career that she wanted a drug-free sport and that she never used illegal drugs. However, there were persistent rumors that she used drugs. On September 26, 2000, her husband, Hunter, tested positive for steroid use. He was suspended for two years, and then he retired. The couple divorced in 2002. In the autumn of 2003, Jones testified before a federal grand jury in San Francisco, California, that was investigating athlete steroid use and those athletes' possible connections with a local company, Bay Area Laboratory Co-operative (Balco). The grand jury found a calendar at Balco with the initials "MJ" written on it, seeming to indicate a schedule for steroid use by Marion Jones ("MJ") in 2001. Hunter also reportedly told investigators that he had injected Jones with banned substances and witnessed her doing the same.

On May 16, 2004, Jones insisted that she was drug free and stated her intent to sue if the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency barred her from competing in that year's Athens Olympics without a positive drug test. In August at Athens, Jones finished fifth in the long jump, and her 4 × 100 relay team failed to finish after a bad baton handoff. By this time, sponsors had begun to drop Jones because of the rumors of drug use.

On December 7, the International Olympic Committee (IOC) opened an investigation into doping allegations against Jones after Balco founder Victor Conte alleged that he supplied her with an array of banned drugs before and after the Sydney Olympics. One year later, on December 13, 2005, an American Olympic sprinter and former boyfriend of Jones, Tim Montgomery, received a two-year ban from the sport based on evidence gathered in the Balco investigation. Jones was now linked to a second athlete convicted of using steroids. (Montgomery and Jones had a son together in 2003.)

Nevertheless, Jones remained adamant that she was drug free. On February 5, 2006, she settled a $25 million federal defamation lawsuit against Conte for damaging her reputation by declaring on ABC's 20/20 that he supplied her and Montgomery with performance-enhancing drugs. Five days later, the IOC announced that it would continue to investigate whether Jones took illegal substances at the 2000 Sydney Games. On June 23, Jones's "A" sample from the U.S. Track and Field Championships tested positive for the banned endurance-boosting hormone erythropoietin (EPO), a lab result that could lead to a possible two-year ban from the sport. However, on September 6, Jones's backup, or "B," sample came back from the lab negative. She was therefore cleared of any wrongdoing and allowed to return to competition. Observers later noted that it is very rare for a "B" sample to fail to confirm the "A" sample and speculated that any EPO in the "B" sample could have deteriorated beyond recognition.

While she had once planned to compete until she was in her forties, Jones soon declared that she had grown weary of defending herself. She married Barbadian sprinter Obadele Thompson in 2007 and retired to raise a family. However, the steroid scandal would not go away. On October 5, Jones tearfully admitted in federal court that she had used the performance-enhancing drug known as "the clear" from September, 2000, through July, 2001, and asked for forgiveness. She was on trial for providing false statements to federal investigators in the Balco case and in a check fraud case involving Montgomery and her former coach, StevenRIDdick. Montgomery cashed stolen and forged checks, and Jones had received one of those checks, which was deposited into her checking account but never cleared. Jones pleaded guilty to lying to investigators at the October 5 trial.

In January, 2008, Jones received a six-month jail sentence and was ordered to perform four hundred hours of community service in each of the two years

Marion Jones at an October 5, 2007, news conference admitting that she had used steroids to enhance her athletic performance. (AP/Wide World Photos) following her release. On March 7, Jones began her sentence at the Federal Medical Center Carswell, located at the Naval Air Station, Joint Reserve Base, in Fort Worth, Texas. Although the facility specializes in medical and mental health services, it also has inmates (including Jones) who do not require such care. She was released on September 5.

IMPACT

On April 10, after Jones was sentenced, the women who won Olympic medals in 2000 by running relays with Jones were ordered by Olympic officials to forfeit their victories and return their medals. The IOC stripped gold medals from Jearl-Miles Clark, Monique Hennagan, LaTasha Colander-Richardson, and Andrea Anderson. Runners Chryste Gaines, Torri Edwards, Nanceen Perry, and Passion Richardson were ordered to forfeit their bronze medals. The women were not accused of any wrongdoing, but the Jones scandal tainted their victories. However, they refused to surrender their medals, arguing it would be unfair to punish them for Jones's actions, and challenged the IOC through the Court of Arbitration for Sport.

In July, Jones asked U.S. president George W. Bush to commute her sentence. A commutation reduces or eliminates a sentence but does not remove civil liabilities stemming from a criminal conviction. Doug Logan, the chief executive officer of U.S. Track and Field, publicly opposed commutation because to do so would send a terrible message to youths. Logan added that a commutation would send the wrong message to the international community as well. By cheating and lying, Jones had violated the principles of track and field as well as international Olympic competition. Logan was especially angry that Jones had challenged anyone who doubted her purity, talent, and work ethic, and that she had successfully duped many people into giving her the benefit of the doubt.

Bush did not commute Jones's sentence, leading some observers to wonder if the harshness of the sentence Jones received, including not receiving a commutation, and the demonizing of her in the media had more to do with race than justice, given that champion black athletes have historically been targets of suspicion and doubt.

—Caryn E. Neumann

FURTHER READING

Cazeneuve, Brian. "Running on Empty: With Funds and Friends in Short Supply, Marion Jones May Face Prison." Sports Illustrated, January 14, 2008. Details the consequences of Jones's steroid use and continued deceptions.

Gutman, Bill. Marion Jones. New York: Simon Pulse, 2004. A standard athletic biography that glorifies Jones's quest to become the fastest woman in the world.

Jones, Marion, and Kate Sekules. Marion Jones: Life in the Fast Lane. New York: Warner Books, 2004. In this heavily illustrated autobiography, Jones discusses Hunter's steroid use but is not entirely forthcoming about her own involvement with performance-enhancing drugs.

Rapoport, Ron. See How She Runs: Marion Jones and the Making of a Champion. Chapel Hill, N.C.: Algonquin Books, 2000. Standard biography of a champion athlete, written to capitalize on Jones's success at the 2000 Olympics.

Smith, Stephen A. "Falls from Grace: What Young Black Athletes Should Learn from the Michael Vick and Marion Jones Dramas." Ebony, January 1, 2008. Magazine feature on Marion Jones and former professional football quarterback Michael Vick and their falls from the top of their respective sports.

SEE ALSO: July 1, 1994: Soccer Star Diego Maradona Is Expelled from World Cup; Sept. 26, 2000: Gymnast Andreea Răducan Loses Her Olympic Gold Medal Because of Drugs; Feb. 11, 2002: French Judge Admits Favoring Russian Figure Skaters in Winter Olympics; Mar. 17, 2005: Former Baseball Star Mark McGwire Evades Congressional Questions on Steroid Use; July 26, 2006: Tour de France Is Hit with a Doping Scandal; Aug. 20, 2007: Football Star Michael Vick Pleads Guilty to Financing a Dogfighting Ring.

March 12, 2008

NEW YORK GOVERNOR ELIOT SPITZER RESIGNS IN PROSTITUTION SCANDAL

Eliot L. Spitzer a former New York attorney general who built his reputation by crusading aggressively against Wall Street corruption, resigned as the governor of New York following news reports that he had spent tens of thousands of dollars patronizing prostitutes with an escort service.

LOCALE: New York, New York

CATEGORIES: Prostitution; sex crimes; government; politics; publishing and journalism

KEY FIGURES

Eliot L. Spitzer (b. 1959), governor of New York, 2006-2008, and former state attorney general, 1999-2006

Silda Wall Spitzer (b. 1957), Spitzer's wife and a former lawyer

Ashley Alexandra Dupré (b. 1985), waitress, aspiring musician, and prostitute

SUMMARY OF EVENT

On March 12, 2008, two days after every major media outlet reported that he had paid for a sexual encounter in Washington, D.C., with a New York prostitute, Eliot Spitzer announced his resignation as the governor of New York. As the New York attorney general, Spitzer had built a national reputation by aggressively pursuing Wall Street corporations he accused of corrupt business practices, and he had successfully catapulted himself into the governorship on the strength of that reputation.

To his supporters, Spitzer was a tenacious reformer who enforced the law against the rich and powerful. Critics, however, saw Spitzer as a bully who tried his cases in the press instead of the courtroom and who essentially coerced his targets into settling for large financial contributions to the state of New York by threat of indictment. Therefore,

Spitzer's shocking downfall was seen either as government overreaching to stifle a powerful reformer or just deserts, depending on one's initial view of Spitzer.

The impetus for the press reports was a federal indictment against four men and women accused of running a high-class prostitution ring called the Emperors Club VIP. Although the Emperors Club was based in New York, it provided prostitutes to clients in Washington, D.C., San Francisco, and Los Angeles. Federal authorities had jurisdiction over the investigation because of the interstate nature of the criminal enterprise, which involved possible violations of the Mann Act of 1910, which prohibits interstate transportation of women for prostitution.

According to an affidavit prepared by Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) special agent Kenneth Hosey in connection with the government's investigation of the Emperors Club VIP, a "Client-9"—later identified by The New York Times and other media outlets as Spitzer—spent two days arranging advance payment before setting up an encounter with a prostitute named "Kristen" in a Washington, D.C., hotel room, on February 13. The conversations arranging the encounter were recorded on a federal wiretap. Client-9 also paid for Kristen's train ride from New York to Washington, D.C. The affidavit contained salacious details such as the fact that other Emperors Club prostitutes considered Spitzer to be a "difficult" client in that he preferred "unsafe" activities—perhaps a reference to unprotected intercourse. Kristen, according to the affidavit, disagreed with that assessment and indicated in a text message to her supervisor that she liked Client-9, who identified himself to the Emperors Club as George Fox. Spitzer had registered for his hotel room under the name Fox, which, it turned out, is the name of an actual friend of Spitzer who contributed to his campaign.

Eliot Spitzer, with his wife, Silda Spitzer, announces his resignation on March 12, 2008. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The New York Times subsequently revealed Kristen to be a twenty-two-year-old waitress and aspiring musician named Ashley Alexandra Dupré. Dupré later received immunity in exchange for her testimony before the grand jury. Federal investigators ultimately concluded that Spitzer may have paid the Emperors Club as much as eighty thousand dollars over the past few years, including time when he was serving as the attorney general and directing prosecution of other prostitution rings.

Spitzer's use of the escort service was not the initial focus of the federal investigation that would end up catching him. What spurred the inquiry was Spitzer's large cash transactions in 2007, which, it was later revealed, were used to pay the Emperors Club. His bank was mandated to report the transactions to the U.S. Internal Revenue Service (IRS). Under federal law, financial transactions in excess of ten thousand dollars generate currency transaction reports (CTRs) to the IRS that are designed to help that agency keep track of the movement of U.S. funds as well as to help the federal government fight money laundering. Spitzer was no doubt aware of these regulations, as he apparently structured his transactions so as to bring them each below the reporting threshold. (Structuring done with the intent to evade the reporting requirements can itself be a federal crime, but is difficult to prove.) After federal investigators began looking into the transactions, they wondered whether Spitzer was the victim of extortion or identity theft. It was while investigating Spitzer that they discovered his patronage of the Emperors Club.

Spitzer's scandal had superficial similarities to President Bill Clinton's sexual scandal with former White House intern Monica Lewinsky in that both involved male politicians involved with women young enough to be their daughters, and Spitzer repeatedly emphasized, as Clinton had, that this was a "private" matter. In his first public statement on March 10, accompanied by his wife, Silda Wall Spitzer, the governor said, “I have acted in a way that violates my obligation to my family and violates my sense of right or wrong,” without specifying the conduct in question. Whereas Clinton remained popular, however, Spitzer’s aggressive political character appeared to leave him with few political allies, even among Democrats, willing to stand by him. Moreover, Clinton had never been a prosecutor; Spitzer, as noted, had prosecuted prostitution rings, thus leaving himself vulnerable to criticism of hypocrisy and worse, such as placing himself above the law. Meanwhile, numerous Wall Street personalities positively delighted in the news that Spitzer had been brought down by a scandal, and Spitzer’s Republican foes increased the pressure on him, calling for impeachment hearings if he did not resign.

On March 12, again accompanied by his wife, Spitzer stated publicly at a press conference that I cannot allow for my private failings to disrupt the people’s work. Over the course of my public life, I have insisted—I believe correctly—that people take responsibility for their conduct. I can and will ask no less of myself. For this reason, I am resigning from the office of governor.

Following Spitzer’s announcement, speculation increased that he had reached an agreement with federal prosecutors, perhaps resigning in exchange for the U.S. attorney’s forbearance from prosecution. On November 6, prosecutors announced that Spitzer would not be charged in the case, citing a lack of evidence to support claims that Spitzer misused public funds.

IMPACT

Once considered a rising star in the Democratic Party and a potential future U.S. presidential candidate, Spitzer now had a political future that appeared to be fatally wounded by the prostitution scandal. He had been a prominent supporter of U.S. senator Hillary Rodham Clinton’s bid for nomination as the Democratic Party’s presidential candidate. Had Clinton won the White House, he would have been an obvious contender for the position of U.S. attorney general. However, after his resignation, the Clinton campaign removed all references to Spitzer from its Web site.

Taking Spitzer’s place was David Paterson, who became the first African American and first blind governor of New York. Paterson immediately disclosed publicly that both he and his wife had a history of extramarital affairs. Perhaps because the press was still focusing on Spitzer, or perhaps because there were no illegal acts, Paterson’s disclosure resulted in no apparent backlash.

—Tung Yin

FURTHER READING

Apostolidis, Paul, and Juliet A. Williams, eds. Public Affairs: Politics in the Age of Sex Scandals. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 2004. A study of politics and political culture in the context of sex scandals.

Federal Bureau of Investigation. Eliot Spitzer and the Prostitution Ring: The FBI Files. Minneapolis, Minn.: Filibust, 2008. A compilation of government documents related to the case, including the federal indictment against the Emperors Club defendants and Eliot Spitzer.

Feuer, Alan, and Ian Urbina. “Client 9 in Room 871: Notes on a Rendezvous.” The New York Times, March 11, 2008. Discusses the identification of Eliot Spitzer as Client 9 in an FBI agent’s affidavit.

Hakim, Danny, and William K. Rashbaum. “Spitzer Is Linked to Prostitution Ring.” The New York Times, March 10, 2008. The initial story that broke the scandal. Includes Spitzer’s first public statement on the matter.

Lucchetti, Aaron. “Wall Street Cheers as Its Nemesis Falls from Grace.” The Wall Street Journal, March 11, 2008. A roundup of Wall Street’s reaction to news of the Spitzer prostitution-ring scandal.

Masters, Brooke A. Spoiling for a Fight: The Rise of Eliot Spitzer. New York: Henry Holt 2006. A largely favorable biography written with Spitzer’s cooperation.

SEE ALSO: Dec. 7, 1980: Rita Jenrette's "Diary of a Mad Congresswife" Scandalizes Washington; July 20, 1982: Conservative Politician John G. Schmitz Is Found to Have Children Out of Wedlock; July 20, 1983: Congress Members Censured in House-Page Sex Scandal; July 19, 1985: Mayflower Madam Pleads Guilty to Promoting Prostitution; Jan. 17, 1998: President Bill Clinton Denies Sexual Affair with a White House Intern; May 2, 2000: New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani's

Extramarital Affair Is Revealed; Oct. 2, 2003: Newspaper Claims That Arnold Schwarzenegger Groped Women; Oct. 14, 2004: Insurance Brokerage Marsh & McLennan Is Charged with Fraud; Beginning Aug. 29, 2005: Government Incompetence Mars Hurricane Katrina Relief Efforts; June 4, 2007: Congressman William J. Jefferson Is Indicted for Corruption; July 9, 2007: Senator David Vitter's Name Is Found in D.C. Madam's Address Book.

June 13, 2008

SINGER R. KELLY IS ACQUITTED ON CHILD PORNOGRAPHY CHARGES

American singer Robert Kelly, better known as R. Kelly, was indicted for sexual molestation and child pornography after a videotape surfaced that appeared to show him having sex with an underage girl. The tape was widely circulated. The sexual molestation charges were dropped and Kelly was ultimately found not guilty on charges of soliciting a minor for child pornography.

LOCALE: Chicago, Illinois

CATEGORIES: Law and the courts; music and performing arts; sex crimes; publishing and journalism; families and children; communications and media; popular culture

KEY FIGURE

R. Kelly (b. 1967), musician, songwriter, and music producer

SUMMARY OF EVENT

R. Kelly experienced success as a rhythm and blues (R&B) musician from the mid-1990's through the first few years of the twenty-first century. His fame was highlighted by hit songs and Grammy Awards. He sold more than 36 million albums worldwide and recorded more Top 40 hits and more number one hits than any other male R&B solo artist of the 1990's. Music critics referred to Kelly as an R&B superstar, "The king of Seductive R and B," and the hip-hop generation's greatest singer-songwriter. His career was overshadowed in 2000 by allegations of sex with underage girls and in 2002 with producing child pornography by videotaping himself having sex with a minor.

Kelly's legal troubles began in 1994, when he married a fifteen-year-old singer, Aaliyah, using a falsified marriage certificate claiming she was eighteen years old. The marriage was annulled six months later when Aaliyah's parents found out about the union. Kelly's legal troubles continued in 1996, when Tiffany Hawkins filed suit claiming she and Kelly were involved sexually in 1991, when she was fifteen years old. Hawkins's lawsuit was settled out of court in 1998 for $250,000. In 2001, Tracy Sampson filed a lawsuit against Kelly claiming that in 2000, when she was seventeen years old, she and Kelly had a sexual relationship. Sampson's lawsuit was later settled for $50,000. In 2002, a lawsuit was filed by Patrice Jones, who claimed that in 1998, when she was sixteen years old, she became pregnant by Kelly and that he later persuaded her to have an abortion.

In February, 2002, the Chicago Sun Times reported that police were investigating a twenty-six-minute video allegedly showing Kelly involved in sexual acts with a girl investigators believed to be fourteen or fifteen years old. The video was anonymously sent to the Chicago Sun Times, which had earlier published a series of investigative reports on Kelly, beginning in December, 2000. The newspaper claimed in that series that it found “a pattern of R. Kelly abusing his wealth and fame as a pop star to enter into sexual relationships with underage girls.” The newspaper turned over the anonymously sent video to Chicago police. The video was believed to have been made in Kelly’s home in Chicago sometime between 1997 and 2002. A former protégé of Kelly, known as Sparkle, identified the girl on the sex tape as her niece. Copies of the tape began surfacing on the Web, through Internet file sharing, and through street vendors across the United States.

Chicago police then sent the tape to the Federal Bureau of Investigation’s crime lab, which identified Kelly through vein patterns in his hands. The police also conducted interviews with more than fifty people. On June 6, 2002, Kelly was charged with twenty-one counts of having sex with a minor. The charges were later reduced to soliciting a minor for child pornography. Kelly denied the charges, stating that he was not in the video. He called the tape bogus and the charges blackmail. Kelly further suggested that the video was a fabrication from a disgruntled former manager. If found guilty, Kelly could have received a fifteen-year prison sentence and a fine of up to $100,000.

The girl alleged to be in the video reported to a grand jury that she was not in the videotape, leaving prosecutors without a victim. Prosecutors then attempted to link the girl to the video through witness testimony. In early 2003, while Kelly was free on bond, he was facing additional child pornography charges in Florida after he was found in possession of a digital camera that allegedly showed him having sex with minors. The new felony charges were dismissed because the search was deemed illegal. In 2006, Kelly’s brother, Kerry Kelly, claimed his brother had offered him a record deal of $50,000 and a house if he would say the man in the video was not Kelly but himself.

After several delays, Kelly’s trial finally began on May 20, 2008. Shortly before the trial began, the Chicago Sun Times claimed that a woman would come forward who had reported to authorities that she and the girl in the video had performed a threesome with Kelly in the past. She testified to the identity of the girl in the video as well as to the girl being underage at the time of its taping. Nevertheless, a jury took less than one day to determine that Kelly was not guilty on all counts of soliciting a minor for child pornography. The verdict came on June 13, six years after he was initially indicted.

IMPACT

Kelly’s legal troubles did not impact his career in the long term. Critics had predicted, especially after the child pornography allegations, that Kelly’s career would suffer greatly, but after an initial negative phase, in which a tour with hip-hop artist Jay-Z was canceled and album sales reached only 610,000, his career rebounded. Jive Records, Kelly’s record label, continued to support and endorse him through the allegations. Kelly sold 12 million albums and produced either platinum or multiplatinum albums from 2002 to 2008. His 2006 tour earned millions of dollars.

Cases such as Kelly’s continue to influence public opinion about the criminal justice system and its treatment of celebrities. Cynics believe the legal system provides celebrity offenders preferential treatment, and that Kelly was acquitted only adds legitimacy to their claims.

The Kelly scandal also exposed the growing problem of child pornography on the Web. The videotape was widely distributed, bringing new concerns for lawmakers and law enforcement. Additionally, the wide circulation of the video before the trial presented difficulties in finding an impartial jury.

Other critics of the Kelly indictment argued that the case highlighted the low status of girls and women in the music industry and the unaffected careers of those who perpetuate—even celebrate—that status. Kelly’s career is accompanied by a history of legal issues involving underage girls and jokes about child pornography, but he is still regarded as the king of R&B.

—J. Bradley McSherry and Jeffery T. Walker

FURTHER READING

Brown, Jake. Your Body's Calling Me: Music, Love, Sex, and Money—The Story and the Life and Times of "Robert" R. Kelly. Phoenix, Ariz.: Colossus Books, 2004. An unauthorized biography of R. Kelly. Explores his childhood, which included abuse and poverty. Also examines the child pornography allegations against the singer.

Gillespie, Alisdair A. "Indecent Images of Children: The Ever Changing Law." Child Abuse Review 14 (2005): 430-443. Discusses the nature and difficulties in enacting child pornography legislation.

Kitzinger, Jenny, and Paul Skidmore. "Playing Safe: Media Coverage of Child Sexual Abuse Prevention Strategies." Child Abuse Review 4 (1995): 47-56. Examines the influence of the media's coverage on criminal justice in cases of child sexual abuse and molestation.

Newton, Michael, and John L. French. Celebrities and Crime. New York: Chelsea House, 2008. Written especially for younger readers, this book examines the intersection of celebrity and crime. Discusses how law enforcement handles celebrities accused of criminal acts and celebrities victimized by crime.

SEE ALSO: July 18, 1988: Actor Rob Lowe Videotapes Sexual Tryst with a Minor; June 27, 1995: Film Star Hugh Grant Is Arrested for Lewd Conduct; Sept. 22, 1997: Sportscaster Marv Albert Is Tried for Sexual Assault; Apr. 7, 1998: Pop Singer George Michael Is Arrested for Lewd Conduct; Early Nov., 2003: Paris Hilton Sex-Tape Appears on the Web; Dec. 18, 2003: Pop Star Michael Jackson Is Charged with Child Molestation.

July 29, 2008

NBA REFEREE TIM DONAGHY IS SENTENCED TO PRISON FOR BETTING ON GAMES

A veteran referee, Tim Donaghy put the integrity of the National Basketball Association at risk by gambling on basketball games, including those in the postseason, and making calls that may have affected games. Professional basketball referees in the United States are not permitted to gamble, except at racetracks during the NBA off-season. Donaghy was sentenced to fifteen months in federal prison.

LOCALE: United States

CATEGORIES: Gambling; corruption; ethics; law and the courts; sports

KEY FIGURES

Tim Donaghy (b. 1967), National Basketball Association referee, 1994-2007

David Stern (b. 1942), NBA commissioner, 1984-

SUMMARY OF EVENT

Gambling is a mixed blessing for organized sports. While betting by fans increases interest in spectator sports, some gamblers may seek to influence the outcomes of games to win money. The professional leagues have strict rules that protect the integrity of their particular sport by prohibiting gambling by players and officials. Professional baseball's 1919 Chicago Black Sox scandal is perhaps the best-known episode of players throwing a game for money. A 1951 collegiate basketball scandal over point shaving almost killed the sport at the college level. Players and coaches at the professional level have been fined or suspended for betting on games, but no official had been caught in a betting scandal before referee Tim Donaghy was caught in 2007.

Donaghy, a referee with a stellar background, was respected by National Basketball Association

(NBA) administrators. He officiated in 772 regular season games and 20 playoff games in a career that spanned thirteen seasons. He played college basketball at Villanova University and is the son of a respected former college basketball referee, Jerry Donaghy, and the nephew of former NBA referee Bill Oakes. Donaghy worked his way into the NBA, serving apprenticeships as a Pennsylvania high school referee and, for seven seasons, as an official with the Continental Basketball Association, a lesser-known professional league in the United States. In 1994, he became one of only sixty NBA referees.

Donaghy had two previous brushes with scandal during his officiating career, but he could not be blamed for either incident. In 2003, he called a technical foul on Rasheed Wallace of the Portland Trail Blazers for throwing a ball at another official during a game. Wallace subsequently confronted Donaghy after the game, screamed obscenities, and issued threats. The NBA suspended Wallace for seven games. On November 19, 2004, Donaghy was one of three referees who worked the infamous Detroit Pistons-Indiana Pacers contest that ended with players from Indiana fighting Pistons fans in the stands.

By 2007, Donaghy earned $260,000 annually. He also had an addiction to gambling and gained a reputation among his peers as someone who was unusually eager to make a few more dollars. In 2003, he reportedly punched former high school classmate and fellow referee Joe Crawford in the face during an NBA referees' camp in New Jersey. It appears Donaghy did so because Crawford did not invite him to a morning television show that paid $500 for an appearance. Furthermore, although respected for his officiating, Donaghy apparently had few friends among his colleagues.

In 2003, Donaghy began placing bets on NBA games with a friend. In mid-December, 2006, James Battista, a professional gambler with the nicknames Baba and Sheep, confronted Donaghy about betting on NBA games and suggested that Donaghy be paid for his correct pick. Donaghy began calling Thomas Martino, who would then call Battista to give him inside information, including what crew would officiate a particular game and how officials and players interacted. Cell phone records indicate hundreds of calls among Donaghy, Battista, and Martino between October 1, 2006, and May 1, 2007.

Tim Donaghy leaves federal court in Brooklyn, New York, after his sentencing on July 29, 2008. (AP/Wide World Photos)

On June 20, 2007, the FBI contacted the NBA to discuss allegations that a referee was gambling on games—charges that reportedly surfaced in a separate investigation of organized-crime activities. Donaghy resigned in July amid rumors that the FBI was investigating him for betting on games that he officiated during the prior four seasons and that he made calls affecting the point spread in those games. NBA commissioner David Stern called Donaghy a rogue who betrayed the league. He stated that the situation was the worst that he had experienced as an NBA fan, NBA lawyer, or NBA commissioner. Stern also stated that he would have fired Donaghy but was advised not to by the FBI because of the ongoing investigation.

In subsequent court papers, the FBI did not specify games in which Donaghy officiated and also allegedly placed bets. The court documents did indicate that Donaghy provided a tip about an NBA game on December 13, 2006, during which he officiated—Boston Celtics-76ers game in Philadelphia. The point spread moved 2 points before tip-off—a sizable swing—with Boston going from a 1.5-point favorite to a 3.5-point choice. Boston ultimately won by 20 points. The next day, Donaghy met with coconspirators to receive a $5,000 cash payment for his tip. He also was rumored to have improperly influenced the outcome of game three of the Western Conference semifinal match between the Phoenix Suns and the San Antonio Spurs in 2007.

On August 15, 2007, Donaghy pleaded guilty in a Brooklyn, New York, federal court to two felony charges involving conspiracy to commit wire fraud as part of a scheme to defraud the NBA and conspiracy to transmit wagering information across state lines. The first charge carried a penalty of up to twenty years in prison while the second could bring an additional five years. Donaghy admitted taking cash payoffs from gamblers and betting on games that he officiated. He told the court that between December, 2006, and April, 2007, he had used “nonpublic information” to pick the winners of particular NBA games and to cover the point spread set by professional bookmakers. Other individuals would then use Donaghy’s picks to place bets. He admitted making phone calls to communicate his picks, often using a coded language. If a pick did not win, Donaghy would not be paid, but he would not lose money either.

Donaghy also agreed to turn over the names of about twenty former colleagues who bet at golf courses, racetracks during the season, and casinos, and who also participated in football betting pools. The activities are not illegal in themselves but do violate the letter of the referees’ contract with the NBA. Donaghy was released on a $250,000 bond and was sentenced on July 29, 2008, to fifteen months in federal prison and three years of supervised release.

To the public, Donaghy offered a general apology, claiming he was the victim of pressure from the Gambino Mafia crime family. At his sentencing, he told the judge, “I’ve brought shame on myself, my family, and the profession.” Two others also were sentenced. Battista and Thomas Martino, a friend of Battista, were sentenced to fifteen months and to twelve months, one day in prison, respectively. All three were ordered jointly to pay $217,000 in restitution to the federal government. On September 23, 2008, Donaghy reported to the federal prison in Pensacola, Florida, to begin serving his term.

IMPACT

Donaghy’s actions badly damaged the reputation of NBA referees and officiating. In the wake of the case, fans upset by calls began to yell “fix” or “How much do you have on the game?” at referees. Hurt and confused by the scandal, many referees sharply condemned Donaghy for betraying his friends in the league. Some referees pointed out that a zero-tolerance approach to gambling by the NBA would result in about 75 percent of referees being fired for doing everything from playing in a $5 card game to pulling the levers on slot machines in casinos. Officials are allowed to attend shows at casinos during the off-season, but they are not permitted to enter gambling areas. NBA officials acknowledged that casual gambling existed among their ranks, but they feared that Donaghy would exaggerate the extent of the gambling to better his own situation. The NBA stated that it had received no evidence that any referee other than Donaghy bet on games.

A number of NBA fans charged that the league conspired to fix games. Such allegations infuriated NBA commissioner David Stern, who resented claims that he and the league were engaged in criminal activity. Donaghy’s betting embarrassed the league and gave support to conspiracy-minded fans. Both the league and the referees sought to prevent a repeat of the Donaghy scandal for the sake of the future of the sport. The NBA opened a review into its gambling policies and how it hires, trains, and monitors officials. In August, 2007, an attorney with the National Basketball Referees Association represented the union in connection with the NBA's review of its basketball operations and officiating programs. Referee crews and supervisors afterward had to review all games on videotape. Every late call that impinges on the point spread is apt to be red-flagged for additional review, a practice that did not exist before the Donaghy scandal.

—Caryn E. Neumann

FURTHER READING

Brenner, Reuven, Gabrielle A. Brenner, and Aaron Brown. A World of Chance: Betting on Religion, Games, Wall Street. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2008. In this wide-ranging academic study of betting in human society, the authors contend that with widespread gambling in sports, the corruption of referees such as Donaghy becomes inevitable.

Kirchberg, Connie. Hoop Lore: A History of the National Basketball Association. Jefferson, N.C.:

McFarland, 2007. This exhaustive study presents a history of the National Basketball Association.

Schwarz, Alan, and William K. Rashbaum. "N.B.A. Referee Is the Focus of a Federal Inquiry." The New York Times, July 21, 2007. A brief but helpful news report outlining the details of the Donaghy gambling scandal.

SEE ALSO: Jan. 17, 1951: College Basketball Players Begin Shaving Points for Money; Sept. 23, 1977: Horse-Swapping Fraud Staggers Belmont Park Raceway; Apr. 27, 1980: Mobster's Arrest Reveals Point Shaving by Boston College Basketball Players; Mar. 27, 2002: Georgia Basketball Coach Jim Harrick, Sr., Resigns over Fraud Allegations; July 1, 2003: Basketball Star Kobe Bryant Is Accused of Rape; Jan. 27, 2005: German Soccer Referee Admits to Fixing Games for Money; Aug. 20, 2007: Football Star Michael Vick Pleads Guilty to Financing a Dogfighting Ring.

September 7, 2008

FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS AND MARKETS BEGIN TO COLLAPSE

Led by a complex web of actions that included a drive to maximize profits and an abandonment of prudence and responsibility, major financial institutions in the United States began to fail. By September, 2008, excessive risk-taking, inadequate cash reserves, excessive debt levels, and the subprime mortgage crisis led to financial collapse. The dire financial condition, coupled with an economic recession in the United States, forced U.S. government interventions that, by November 24, totaled $7.7 trillion in bailouts for these financial institutions.

LOCALE: United States

CATEGORIES: Banking and finance; economics; government

KEY FIGURES

Ben Bernanke (b. 1953), chairman of the U.S. Federal Reserve, 2006-2010

Henry Paulson (b. 1946), U.S. secretary of the Treasury, 2006-2009

Phil Gramm (b. 1942), U.S. senator from Texas, 1985-2002

SUMMARY OF EVENT

On September 7, 2008, the U.S. government took control of the institutions known as Fannie Mae (Federal National Mortgage Association) and Freddie Mac (Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation). These government sponsored entities, whose purpose was to guarantee and purchase mortgages for low- and moderate-income applicants for home loans, had funded nearly two-thirds of all mortgages sold in the United States.

Following the takeover of Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac was the collapse of the investment bank Lehman Brothers on September 15, amounting to the largest bankruptcy filing in U.S. history. The following day, the U.S. Federal Reserve, led by Ben Bernanke, loaned AIG (American International Group), one of the world's largest insurance companies, $85 billion in exchange for nearly 80 percent of its stock. By September 22, all five Wall Street investment banks (including Lehman Brothers, Merrill Lynch, Morgan Stanley, and Goldman Sachs) had either gone bankrupt, been sold, or been restructured.

On October 3, a $700 billion government rescue plan was signed into law. On October 14, the U.S. Treasury Department, led by Henry Paulson, said it would spend $250 billion to purchase stock in banks, hoping to unfreeze credit markets. The first $125 billion would be spent on forced purchases in the nine largest depository banks, a move that amounted to partial nationalization. By October 27, fifteen smaller banks had taken funding from this federal allocation. On November 23, the U.S. government agreed to guarantee $306 billion in troubled assets held by Citigroup, one of the world's largest financial services firms.

All financial systems have a measure of risk built into them, but in healthy economies these risks are balanced by the prudent management of assets in the private sector and an effective set of public sector (governmental) regulatory practices that control risk while encouraging innovation. However, between 2000 and 2008, this ideal of balance disappeared as regulators lost power and financial managers found themselves with new freedoms to design and market risky new financial instruments.

Between 2001 and 2007, securitization (the process of pooling debt—such as mortgages—then packaging it and selling it to investors) produced sales for U.S. financial firms of $27 trillion, almost twice the 2007 U.S. gross domestic product. Part of this process of securitization was the use of so-called structured finance to create complex investments. However, there were dangers inherent in these investments. On October 21, 2008, Joseph E. Stiglitz, who had been awarded the 2001 Nobel Prize in Economics, told a congressional hearing on financial services regulation that Securitization was based on the premise that a “fool was born every minute.” Globalization meant that there was a global landscape on which they could search for those fools—and they found them everywhere. Mortgage originators didn't have to ask, Is this a good loan? but only, Is this a mortgage I can somehow pass on to others?

These structured finance products would not have been sold in such vast quantities had they not been portrayed as safe and high quality. The financial firms that put together these products also ensured buyers that the products were triple-A rated and insured. Unfortunately, both of these protections proved to be flawed.

The excesses and failures of the credit rating companies (Moody's; Standard and Poor's, or S&P; and Fitch) played a crucial role in the financial crisis. Both Moody's and S&P testified before the U.S. Congress that they accepted raw data on the securitized mortgages underlying these products without checking that data. The two companies testified that they had revised their ratings models in 2004 in ways that eased the rigor of the ratings and kept the companies competitive in giving top ratings. Perhaps the most troubling issue, however, was that the credit rating companies were paid by the financial firms whose products they were rating. Moody's analysts admitted that on several occasions they raised their ratings on pools of mortgage-backed securities issued by Countrywide Financial Corporation after Countrywide complained about initial ratings.

Investor protection, through insurance, also was flawed. Structured finance products are insured by what are called credit default swaps (CDS). CDS are private contracts protecting parties, usually banks, against defaults on debts, and they have a global reach. The financial products unit of insurance giant AIG began in 1998 to sell CDS that were tied to mortgage-backed structured finance products put together by Citigroup, Merrill Lynch, and others. The deals earned AIG around $750,000 each. Over time, more and more of these products contained subprime mortgages. The Commodity Futures Modernization Act of 2000, sponsored by U.S. senator Phil Gramm, had ensured that CDS would remain unregulated. As a result, the CDS market grew from over $100 billion in 2000 to $62 trillion at the end of 2007. The sheer size of this global market led to concerns that financial firms issuing a large volume of CDS might set off a chain reaction if they failed. These concerns, however, went unheeded, and the financial system began to collapse.

By the time AIG stopped all of its CDS and subprime mortgage-related business in the summer of 2005, it had insured 420 structured finance deals, making $315 to $400 million but assuming a debt of $63 billion. The U.S. government bailout of AIG provided $85 billion to the failing company on September 16, 2008, but later increased the amount to $123 billion.

Another critical U.S. regulatory change in the early 2000's had allowed banks to keep mortgage-related structured finance products off their balance sheets (that is, they were not required to include them in their financial report that summarizes their total assets, liabilities, and shareholders' ownership stakes). Investors were thus left uninformed about the nature and amount of risk that banks held. Also, the U.S. Office of Thrift Supervision, which regulates thrifts (also called savings and loans), including Countrywide, IndyMac, Washington Mutual, and Downey—all heavily involved in mortgage lending—permitted these institutions to take excessive risks. These risks included allowing the companies' reserves to decline to the lowest level in two decades. The thrifts also were allowed to expand risky forms of loans, such as option adjustable-rate mortgages. By 2008, several of these companies had been seized by regulators or forced to sell themselves to avoid failure.

A protestor holds up a sign behind Treasury secretary Henry Paulson, left, and Federal Reserve chair Ben Bernanke at a hearing of the Senate Housing and Urban Affairs Committee on September 23, 2008, in Washington, D.C. The committee began hearing arguments from federal officials for a $700 billion government bailout of American financial institutions. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

Excesses and risk also were at the root of Fannie Mae's and Freddie Mac's failure. During the subprime mortgage boom, mortgage lenders, including Countrywide, threatened to sell directly to Wall Street firms (including Goldman Sachs, Lehman Brothers, and Bear Stearns) unless Fannie Mae would buy some of its riskier loans. Thus, between 2005 and 2007, Fannie Mae took on more and more subprime and Alt-A loans (those for which applicants did not have conventional documentation of their income or assets). Risk officers and other officials warned of the dangers involved in these practices, but by December, 2008, the two owned or guaranteed one in three subprime mortgages and almost one in two Alt-A loans, comprising 34 percent of their single-family mortgage holdings.

IMPACT

Criminal investigations began quickly, and by late September, 2008, the Federal Bureau of Investigation had opened twenty-six preliminary fraud investigations, including investigations of Fannie Mae, Freddie Mac, Lehman Brothers, and AIG. The U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) opened more than fifty investigations of insurers, banks, and credit rating firms. The SEC charged Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac with having committed accounting fraud in 2006 and 2007, and the two paid $450 million in penalties. On December 11, 2008, the trustee in charge of the liquidation of Lehman Brothers (already the subject of other investigations) asked the bankruptcy court for subpoena power to investigate the collapse of Lehman Brothers.

Several class action lawsuits were filed against the financial firms for violations of securities law. Securities are financial instruments that may be publicly traded, such as stocks, bonds, and mutual funds. On December 4, 2008, a class action lawsuit was filed against Citigroup on behalf of investors who had purchased Citigroup stock between January, 2004, and November 21, 2007. One successful lawsuit was filed on the principle of breach of fiduciary duty, which is a legal duty of care and good faith to act only in the interests of the beneficiary (for example, a company's shareholders). The Teachers' Retirement System of Louisiana sued four former executives of AIG for breach of fiduciary duty. On September 30, 2008, parties to the suit announced a settlement of $115 million.

By the end of September, government leaders from around the world were openly blaming the United States, particularly the federal government, for allowing the crisis to fester and thus threaten markets and economies worldwide. World leaders denounced everyone from financial speculators to managers of global financial firms who took huge risks out of greed.

The financial crisis, combined with the global recession, had a startling impact on not only the U.S. financial markets and economy but also the world economy. By late October, overall U.S. stock market losses amounted to $8 trillion for the preceding fifteen months, affecting savings and retirement accounts as well as endowments, pension funds, and international investments. By November 21, the S&P 500 stock index was down 46 percent from its peak.

On November 15, leaders of the Group of 20 (the largest developed and emerging-market world economies), which had been meeting in Washington, D.C., issued a lengthy, detailed statement on what they believed caused the financial collapse. The statement included many suggestions for reform (both immediate and medium-term) to prevent another collapse. The size of the U.S. government's intervention showed that these reforms were clearly needed. By November 24, the day after the U.S. government guarantee of Citigroup's debt, the combined amount of government funding pledged in the various parts of the financial bailout was $7.7 trillion. This equaled $24,000 for each person in the United States.

—Glenn Ellen Starr Stilling

FURTHER READING

Mizen, Paul. "The Credit Crunch of 2007-2008: A Discussion of the Background, Market Reactions, and Policy Responses." Review (Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis), September/October, 2008. A detailed, scholarly examination of the financial crisis, with special attention to its global dimensions.

Roubini, Nouriel. "The Rising Risk of a Systemic Financial Meltdown: The Twelve Steps to Financial Disaster." RGEmonitor, February 5, 2008. Predicts several of the events of the financial crisis. Explains in detail the conditions that contribute to each step in such a crisis.

Roush, Chris. "Unheeded Warnings." American Journalism Review 30, no. 6 (December/January, 2009). Documents extensive coverage, beginning in 2000, of the conditions that led to the financial crisis. Includes discussion of coverage by The New York Times, The Wall Street Journal, the Washington Post, Fortune, and Business Week.

United States Congress. House of Representatives. Committee on Financial Services. The Future of Financial Services Regulation. Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, October 21, 2008. Offers clear and wide-ranging testimony by Joseph E. Stiglitz on the regulatory causes of the financial crisis. Stiglitz discusses topics such as transparency, securitization of mortgages, excessive corporate risk-taking, executive compensation, off-balance-sheet accounting, exploitive lending practices, and credit rating agencies.

Zandi, Mark. Financial Shock: A Three-Hundred-Sixty Degree Look at the Subprime Mortgage Implosion, and How to Avoid the Next Financial Crisis. Upper Saddle River, N.J.: Financial Times Press, 2008. Readable, thoroughly documented, comprehensive examination of the roots of the financial crisis. Discusses the Federal Reserve's policy of extremely low lending rates, the roles of various types of mortgage buyers (first-time, trade-up, investors, and flippers), overseas investors, mortgage bankers and brokers, structured finance, the credit crunch, and more.

SEE ALSO: August 6, 1982: Banco Ambrosiano Collapses Amid Criminal Accusations; May 7, 1985: Banker Jake Butcher Pleads Guilty to Fraud; March 29, 1989: Financier Michael Milken Is Indicted for Racketeering and Fraud; December 2, 2001: Enron Bankruptcy Reveals Massive Financial Fraud; September 3, 2003: Mutual Fund Companies Are Implicated in Shady Trading Practices; Early 2007: Subprime Mortgage Industry Begins to Collapse.

Appendixes

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Contents

General Studies	1183	Marriage, Family, and Children	1187
Academia	1183	News Media and Journalism.	1187
Business and Economics.	1184	Organized Crime.	1187
Celebrities	1185	Religion	1187
Crime—General Studies.	1185	Science and Medicine	1187
Ethics	1185	Sex and Sex Crimes	1188
Government and Politics.	1186	Sports	1188

GENERAL STUDIES

Adut, Ari. On Scandal: Moral Disturbances in Society, Politics, and Art. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2008.

Caldero, M. A., and J. P. Crank. Police Ethics: The Corruption of Noble Cause. 2d ed. Cincinnati, Ohio: Anderson, 2004.

Callahan, David. The Cheating Culture: Why More Americans Are Doing Wrong to Get Ahead. Orlando, Fla.: Harcourt, 2004.

Dabney, Dean A., ed. Crime Types: A Text/Reader. Belmont, Calif.: Thomson/Wadsworth, 2004.

Farquhar, Michael. A Treasury of Deception: Liars, Misleaders, Hoodwinkers, and the Extraordinary True Stories of History's Greatest Hoaxes, Fakes, and Frauds. New York: Penguin Books, 2005.

Fernandez, Justin. Victimless Crimes: Crime, Justice, and Punishment. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2002.

Great Stories of the Century: The Major Events of the Twentieth Century as Reported in the Pages of "The New York Times." New York: Galahad Books, 1999.

Knappman, Edward W., ed. Great American Trials: Two Hundred and One Compelling Courtroom Dramas from Salem Witchcraft to O. J. Simpson. New York: Barnes & Noble, 2004.

Kohn, George Childs. The New Encyclopedia of American Scandal: More than Four Hundred Fifty Famous Incidents from the 1600's to the Present. New York: Facts On File, 2001.

Lipset, Seymour M., and Earl Raab. The Politics of Unreason: Right-Wing Extremism in America, 1790-1970. New York: Harper & Row, 1970.

Mallon, Thomas. Stolen Words. Rev. ed. New York: Harcourt, 2001.

Payne, Robert. The Corrupt Society: From Ancient Greece to Present-Day America. New York: Praeger, 1975.

Sherwin, Richard K. When Law Goes Pop: The Vanishing Line Between Law and Popular Culture. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2002.

Sifakis, Carl. Frauds, Deceptions, and Swindles. New York: Checkmark Books, 2001.

Spiegel, James S. Hypocrisy: Moral Fraud and Other Vices. Grand Rapids, Mich.: Baker Books, 1999.

Wilson, Colin, and Donald Seaman. Scandal! An Encyclopedia. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1986.

Wright, Ed. History's Greatest Scandals: Shocking Stories of Powerful People. New York: Barnes & Noble, 2007.

Zinn, Howard. The Twentieth Century: A People's History. New York: HarperPerennial, 2003.

ACADEMIA

Anderson, Judy. Plagiarism, Copyright Violation, and Other Thefts of Intellectual Property: An Annotated Bibliography with a Lengthy Introduction. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 1998.

Ellen, David. The Scientific Examination of Docu-

- ments: Methods and Techniques. 2d ed. Boca Raton, Fla.: CRC Press, 1997.
- Hauptman, Robert. Documentation: A History and Critique of Attribution, Commentary, Glosses, Marginalia, Notes, Bibliographies, Works-cited Lists, and Citation Indexing and Analysis. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 2008.
- LaFollette, Marcel C. Stealing into Print: Fraud, Plagiarism, and Misconduct in Scientific Publishing. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2007.
- McCabe, Donald L., L. K. Trevino, and K. D. Butterfield. "Academic Integrity in Honor Code and Non-Honor Code Environments." Journal of Higher Education 70 (1999): 211-234.
- Yanikoski, Charles S. "When the Trial Is the Punishment: The Ethics of Plagiarism Accusations." Journal of Information Ethics 3, no. 1 (Spring, 1994): 83-88.
- BUSINESS AND ECONOMICS
- Berend, Ivan T. An Economic History of Twentieth-Century Europe: Economic Regimes from Laissez Faire to Globalization. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2006.
- Blackburn, John D., Elliott I. Klayman, and Martin H. Malin. The Legal Environment of Business. 6th ed. Boston: Pearson, 2003.
- Block, Alan A., and Constance A. Weaver. All Is Clouded by Desire: Global Banking, Money Laundering, and International Organized Crime. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 2004.
- Coenen, Tracy. Essentials of Corporate Fraud. Hoboken, N.J.: John Wiley & Sons, 2008.
- Coleman, James William. The Criminal: Understanding White-Collar Crime. 5th ed. New York: Worth, 2002.
- De George, Richard T. "Whistle-Blowing." In Business Ethics. 6th ed. Upper Saddle River, N.J.: Pearson/Prentice Hall, 2006.
- Derber, Charles. The Wilding of America: Money, Mayhem, and the American Dream. 3d ed. New York: Worth, 2004.
- Dunn, Donald H. Ponzi: The Incredible True Story of the King of Financial Cons. 1975. Reprint. New York: Broadway Books, 2004.
- Ermann, M. D., and R. L. Lundman, eds. Corporate and Governmental Deviance: Problems of Organizational Behavior in Contemporary Society. New York: Oxford University Press, 2002.
- Fraser, Steve. Every Man a Speculator: A History of Wall Street in American Life. San Francisco, Calif.: HarperCollins, 2005.
- Geisst, Charles R. Wall Street: A History—From Its Beginnings to the Fall of Enron. Rev. ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2004.
- Gerber, Jurg, and Eric L. Jensen. Encyclopedia of White-Collar Crime. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2007.
- Gup, Benton E., ed. Too Big to Fail: Policies and Practices in Government Bailouts. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 2004.
- Heald, Morrell. The Social Responsibilities of Business: Company and Community, 1900-1960. 1970. Reprint. New Brunswick, N.J.: Transaction Books, 2005.
- Ingham, Geoffrey. Capitalism. Malden, Mass.: Polity Press, 2008.
- Jeter, Lynne. Disconnected: Deceit and Betrayal at WorldCom. Hoboken, N.J.: Wiley & Sons, 2003.
- Katz, L. Ill-Gotten Gains: Evasion, Blackmail, Fraud, and Kindred Puzzles of the Law. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1996.
- Kindleberger, Charles P., Robert Z. Aliber, and Robert Solow. Manias, Panics, and Crashes: A History of Financial Crises. New ed. New York: John Wiley & Sons, 2006.
- Levi, Michael, and Andrew Pithouse. Victims of White Collar Crime: The Social and Media Construction of Business Fraud. New York: Oxford University Press, 2005.
- Lu, Shen-Shin. Insider Trading and the Twenty-four Hour Securities Market: A Case Study of Legal Regulation in the Emerging Global Economy. Hanover, Mass.: Christopher Publishing House, 1999.
- MacDonald, Scott B., and Jane E. Hughes. Separating Fools from Their Money: A History of American Financial Scandals. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 2007.
- Podgor, Ellen S., and Jerold H. Israel. White Collar

Crime in a Nutshell. 3d ed. St. Paul, Minn.: West, 2004.

Rosoff, Stephen, Henry Pontell, and Robert Tillman. Looting America: Greed, Corruption, Villains, and Victims. Upper Saddle River, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 2003.

_____. Profit Without Honor: White Collar Crime and the Looting of America. 4th ed. Upper Saddle River, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 2003.

Salinger, Lawrence M. Encyclopedia of White-Collar and Corporate Crime. Thousand Oaks, Calif.: Sage, 2005.

Shapiro, Susan P. Wayward Capitalists: Target of the Securities and Exchange Commission. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1984.

Shichor, David, Larry Gaines, and Richard Ball, eds. Readings in White-Collar Crime. Prospect Heights, Ill.: Waveland Press, 2002.

Von Drehle, David. Triangle: The Fire That Changed America. New York: Atlantic Monthly Press, 2003.

CELEBRITIES

Anger, Kenneth. Hollywood Babylon: The Legendary Underground Classic of Hollywood's Darkest and Best Kept Secrets. New York: Dell, 1981.

Jacobson, Laurie. Dishing Hollywood: The Real Scoop on Tinseltown's Most Notorious Scandals. Nashville, Tenn.: Cumberland House, 2003.

Kast, Marlise Elizabeth. Tabloid Prodigy: Dishing the Dirt, Getting the Gossip, and Selling My Soul in the Cutthroat World of Hollywood Reporting. Philadelphia: Running Press, 2008.

Newton, Michael, and John L. French. Celebrities and Crime. New York: Chelsea House, 2008.

Parish, James Robert. Hollywood Bad Boys: Loud, Fast, and Out of Control. Chicago: Contemporary Books, 2002.

_____. The Hollywood Book of Death: The Bizarre, Often Sordid, Passings of More than One Hundred Twenty-Five American Movie and TV Idols. Chicago: Contemporary Books, 2001.

Porter, Dawn, and Danforth Prince. Hollywood Babylon—It's Back. New York: Blood Moon, 2008.

Shiach, Don. At the Movies: Behind the Big Screen—The History, Scandals, Directors, Studios, and Stars. London: Southwater, 2005.

CRIME—GENERAL STUDIES

Blanche, Tony, and Brad Schreiber. Death in Paradise: An Illustrated History of the Los Angeles County Department of Coroner. New York: Four Walls Eight Windows, 2001.

Chermak Steven M., and Frankie Y. Bailey, eds. Crimes and Trials of the Century. 2 vols. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2007.

Fox, James Alan, and Jack Levin. The Will to Kill: Making Sense of Senseless Murder. Boston: Allyn and Bacon, 2001.

Hornberger, Francine. Mistresses of Mayhem: The Book of Women Criminals. Indianapolis, Ind.: Alpha, 2002.

Law Commission of Canada, ed. What Is a Crime? Defining Criminal Conduct in Contemporary Society. Vancouver: University of British Columbia Press, 2004.

Parrish, Michael. For the People: Inside the Los Angeles District Attorney's Office, 1850-2000. Santa Monica, Calif.: Angel City Press, 2001.

Regan, Tom, and Peter Singer, eds. Animal Rights and Human Obligations. 2d ed. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1989.

Renzetti, C. M., D. J. Curran, and P. J. Carr, eds. Theories of Crime: A Reader. Boston: Allyn & Bacon, 2003.

Theoharis, Athan. The FBI and American Democracy: A Brief Critical History. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2004.

Waddell, Terrie, ed. Cultural Expressions of Evil and Wickedness: Wrath, Sex, Crime. New York: Rodopi, 2003.

ETHICS

Arthur, John, ed. Morality and Moral Controversies: Readings in Moral, Social, and Political Philosophy. 6th ed. Upper Saddle River, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 2002.

Best, Geoffrey. Honour Among Men and Nations: Transformations of an Idea. Toronto, Ont.: University of Toronto Press, 1981.

- Bok, Sissela. Lying: Moral Choice in Public and Private Life. 2d ed. New York: Vintage Books, 1999.
- Caldwell, Mark. A Short History of Rudeness: Manners, Morals, and Misbehavior in Modern America. New York: Picador USA, 1999.
- Cohen, Martin. One Hundred One Ethical Dilemmas. New York: Routledge, 2003.
- Cook, Fred J. The Corrupted Land: The Social Morality of Modern America. New York: Macmillan, 1966.
- Childs, James M., Jr. Greed: Economics and Ethics in Conflict. Minneapolis, Minn.: Fortress Press, 2000.
- Goldberg, M. Hirsh. The Book of Lies: Schemes, Scams, Fakes, and Frauds That Have Changed the Course of History and Affect Our Daily Lives. New York: Morrow, 1990.
- Gould, David B. L. A Handbook for Developing and Sustaining Honor Codes. Atlanta: Council for Spiritual and Ethical Education, 1999.
- Hinde, Robert A. Why Good Is Good: The Sources of Morality. New York: Routledge, 2002.
- Hospers, John. Human Conduct. 3d ed. Fort Worth, Tex.: Harcourt Brace College, 1996.
- Kane, Robert, ed. The Oxford Handbook of Free Will. New York: Oxford University Press, 2002.
- Owen, Nicholas, ed. Human Rights, Human Wrongs: The Oxford Amnesty Lectures, 2001. New York: Oxford University Press, 2003.
- Ross, William D. The Right and the Good. New ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2002.
- Singer, Peter, ed. A Companion to Ethics. Cambridge, Mass.: Blackwell Reference, 1993.
- Tangney, June Price, and Rhonda L. Dearing. Shame and Guilt. New York: Guilford Press, 2002.
- GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS
- Bull, Martin J., and James L. Newell, eds. Corruption in Contemporary Politics. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2003.
- Carter, John J. Covert Operations and the Emergence of the Modern American Presidency, 1920-1960. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 2002.
- Dudley, William. Political Scandals: Opposing Viewpoints. San Diego, Calif.: Greenhaven Press, 2000.
- Grant, Ruth W. Hypocrisy and Integrity: Machiavelli, Rousseau, and the Ethics of Politics. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1997.
- Grossman, Mark. Political Corruption in America: An Encyclopedia of Scandals, Power, and Greed. 2d ed. Millerton, N.Y.: Grey House, 2008.
- Jeffreys-Jones, Rhodri. Cloak and Dollar: A History of American Secret Intelligence. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 2002.
- Kessler, Ronald. The Bureau: The Secret History of the FBI. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2002.
- Long, Kim. The Almanac of Political Corruption, Scandals, and Dirty Politics. New York: Delacorte Press, 2007.
- Melanson, Philip H., and Peter F. Stevens. The Secret Service: The Hidden History of an Enigmatic Agency. New York: Carroll & Graf, 2002.
- Murray, Robert K. The Harding Era: Warren G. Harding and His Administration. 1969. Reprint. Newtown, Conn.: American Political Biography Press, 2000.
- Roberts, Robert North. Ethics in U.S. Government: An Encyclopedia of Investigations, Scandals, Reforms, and Legislation. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2001.
- Rose-Ackerman, Susan. Corruption and Government: Causes, Consequences, and Reform. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1999.
- _____. International Handbook on the Economics of Corruption. Northampton, Mass.: Edward Elgar, 2006.
- Scherer, Randy. Political Scandals. Detroit, Mich.: Greenhaven Press, 2008.
- Schultz, Jeffrey D. Presidential Scandals. Washington, D.C.: CQ Press, 1999.
- West, Nigel. Historical Dictionary of Cold War Counterintelligence. Lanham, Md.: Scarecrow Press, 2007.
- Williams, Juliet A., and Paul Apostolidis, eds. Public Affairs: Politics in the Age of Sex Scandals. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 2004.

MARRIAGE, FAMILY, AND CHILDREN

Shapiro, Michael J. For Moral Ambiguity: National Culture and the Politics of the Family. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 2001.

Simon, Rita J., and Howard Alstein. Global Perspectives on Social Issues: Marriage and Divorce. Lanham, Md.: Lexington Books, 2003.

Vieth, Victor I., Bette L. Bottoms, and Alison Perona, eds. Ending Child Abuse: New Efforts in Prevention, Investigation, and Training. Binghamton, N.Y.: Haworth Press, 2006.

Yalom, Marilyn. A History of the Wife. New York: HarperCollins, 2001.

NEWS MEDIA AND JOURNALISM

Bisbort, Alan. Media Scandals. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2008.

Chiasson, Lloyd, ed. The Press on Trial: Crimes and Trials as Media Events. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1997.

Fox, Richard, and Robert Van Sickel. Tabloid Justice. Boulder, Colo.: Lynne Rienner, 2001.

Gorman, Lyn, and David McLean. Media and Society in the Twentieth Century. Malden, Mass.: Blackwell, 2003.

Levy, Beth, and Denis M. Bonilla, eds. The Power of the Press. New York: H. W. Wilson, 1999.

Lipschultz, Jeremy H., and Michael L. Hilt. Crime and Local TV News: Dramatic, Breaking, and Live from the Scene. Mahwah, N.J.: Lawrence Erlbaum, 2002.

Pavlik, John V. Journalism and New Media. New York: Columbia University Press, 2001.

Surette, Raymond. Media, Crime, and Criminal Justice. 2d ed. Pacific Grove, Calif.: Brooks Cole, 1997.

Tebbel, John, and Mary Ellen Zuckerman. The Magazine in America, 1741-1990. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.

ORGANIZED CRIME

Abadinsky, Howard. Organized Crime. 8th ed. Belmont, Calif.: Thomson/Wadsworth, 2007.

Cressey, Donald Ray. Theft of the Nation: The Structure and Operations of Organized Crime in America. New York: Harper & Row, 1969.

Ryan, Patrick J., and George E. Rush, eds. Understanding Organized Crime in Global Perspective: A Reader. Thousand Oaks, Calif.: Sage, 1997.

Witwer, David Scott. Shadow of the Racketeer: Scandal in Organized Labor. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2009.

RELIGION

France, David. Our Fathers: The Secret Life of the Catholic Church in an Age of Scandal. New York: Broadway Books, 2004.

Frykholm, Amy. Rapture Culture: Left Behind in Evangelical America. New York: Oxford University Press, 2004.

Galli, Mark. Jesus Mean and Wild: The Unexpected Love of an Untamable God. Grand Rapids, Mich.: Baker Books, 2006.

Hadden, Jeffrey K., and Anson Shupe. Televangelism: Power and Politics on God's Frontier. New York: Henry Holt, 1988.

Marsden, George. Fundamentalism and American Culture. 2d ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2006.

Martin, William. With God on Our Side: The Rise of the Religious Right in America. New York: Broadway Books, 1996.

SCIENCE AND MEDICINE

Bell, Robert. Impure Science: Fraud, Compromise, and Political Influence in Scientific Research. New York: John Wiley & Sons, 1992.

Blass, Thomas, ed. Obedience to Authority: Current Perspectives on the Milgram Paradigm. Mahwah, N.J.: Lawrence Erlbaum, 2000.

Clouthier, Shawn G. "Institutionalized Plagiarism: Honor Among Thieves Remains an Impediment to Purging Misconduct from Scientific Inquiry." Scientist 18, no. 15 (2004).

Erling, Jonathon, and Joseph Spillane, eds. Federal Drug Control: The Evolution of Policy and Practice. Binghamton, N.Y.: Pharmaceutical Products Press, 2004.

Foster, Claire. The Ethics of Medical Research on Humans. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2001.

Hawthorne, Fran. Inside the FDA: The Business and Politics Behind the Drugs We Take and the Food We Eat. New York: John Wiley & Sons, 2005.

Hilts, Philip J. Protecting America's Health: The FDA, Business, and One Hundred Years of Regulation. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2003.

Krimsky, Sheldon. Science in the Private Interest: Has the Lure of Profits Corrupted Biomedical Research? Lanham, Md.: Rowman & Littlefield, 2003.

SEX AND SEX CRIMES

Amann, Joseph Minton, and Tom Breuer. The Brotherhood of the Disappearing Pants: A Field Guide to Conservative Sex Scandals. New York: Nation Books, 2007.

Blackburn, Simon. Lust: The Seven Deadly Sins. New York: Oxford University Press, 2004.

Goodwin, Robin, and Duncan Cramer, eds. Inappropriate Relationships: The Unconventional, the Disapproved, and the Forbidden. Mahwah, N.J.: Lawrence Erlbaum, 2002.

Holmes, Stephen T., and Ronald M. Holmes. Sex Crimes: Patterns and Behavior. 2d ed. Thousand Oaks, Calif.: Sage, 2002.

Plummer, Kenneth. Intimate Citizenship: Private

Decisions and Public Dialogues. Seattle: University of Washington Press, 2003.

Schueler, G. F. Desire: Its Role in Practical Reason and the Explanation of Action. Cambridge, Mass.: MIT Press, 1995.

SPORTS

Brenner, Reuven, Gabrielle A. Brenner, and Aaron Brown. A World of Chance: Betting on Religion, Games, Wall Street. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2008.

Ginsberg, Daniel E. The Fix Is In: A History of Baseball Gambling and Game Fixing Scandals. New York: McFarland, 2004.

Kalb, Elliott. The Thirty Greatest Sports Conspiracy Theories of All-Time: Ranking Sports' Most Notorious Fixes, Cover-Ups, and Scandals. New York: Skyhorse, 2009.

Newton, David E. Drug Testing: An Issue for School, Sports, and Work. Springfield, N.J.: Enslow, 1999.

Pound, Richard W. Inside the Olympics: A Behind-the-Scenes Look at the Politics, the Scandals, and the Glory of the Games. Etobicoke, Ont.: John Wiley & Sons Canada, 2004.

—Desiree Dreeuws

CHRONOLOGICAL LIST OF ENTRIES

1901-1910

1904: Theodore Roosevelt Is Accused of Accepting Corporate Funds
January 23, 1904: Senator Joseph R. Burton Is Convicted of Bribery
December, 1904: Boston Alderman Is Reelected
While in Jail for Fraud
1906-1909: Emperor William II's Homosexual
"Circle" Scandalizes Germany
March 2, 1906: Psychoanalyst Ernest Jones Is Accused of Molesting Mentally Disabled Children
June 25, 1906: Millionaire Heir Murders
Architect Stanford White
July 12, 1906: French Court Declares Alfred Dreyfus Innocent of Treason

December 8, 1906: Former U.S. Senator Arthur
Brown Is Murdered by Lover
1907: Elinor Glyn's Novel Three Weeks Shocks
Readers
June 13, 1907: San Francisco Mayor Schmitz Is Found Guilty of Extortion
November 15, 1908: Belgium Confiscates Congo
Free State from King Leopold II
1909-1916: Dancer Isadora Duncan Begins Affair with Millionaire Heir
1910: Nobelist Marie Curie Has Affair with Physicist Paul Langevin

1911-1920

March 25, 1911: Nearly 150 Workers Die in Triangle Shirtwaist Factory Fire
January, 1913: British Prime Minister's Staff Is Investigated for Insider Trading January 13, 1913: Federal Judge Is Impeached for Profiting from His Office
February 17-March 15, 1913: Armory Modern Art Show Scandalizes the Public
May 13, 1913: Boxer Jack Johnson Is Imprisoned
for Abetting Prostitution

April 2, 1915: Players Fix Liverpool-Manchester
United Soccer Match
May, 1915: British Government Falls Because of Munitions Shortages and Military Setbacks
July 27, 1917: Millionaire Socialite Dies Under Suspicious Circumstances
1919-1920: Ponzi Schemes Are Revealed as Investment Frauds
September 21, 1919: White Sox Players Conspire to Lose World Series in "Black Sox" Scandal

1921-1930

July 19, 1921: U.S. Senate Rebukes Navy in Homosexuality Investigation
 February 1, 1922: Director Taylor's Murder Ruins Mabel Normand's Acting Career
 March 26, 1922: Hindemith's Opera Sancta Susanna Depicts a Nun's Sexual Desires
 April 12, 1922: Film Star Fatty Arbuckle Is Acquitted of Manslaughter
 June 22, 1922: British Prime Minister David Lloyd George Is Accused of Selling Honors
 January 18, 1923: Actor Wallace Reid's Death in Drug Rehab Shakes Film Industry
 March 2, 1923: U.S. Senate Investigates Veterans Bureau Chief for Fraud
 May 30, 1923: U.S. Attorney General Harry M. Daugherty's Aide Commits Suicide
 October 22, 1923: U.S. Senate Begins Hearings on Teapot Dome Oil Leases
 January 1, 1924: Film Star Mabel Normand's Chauffeur Shoots Millionaire Courtland S. Dines
 May 12, 1924: Kentucky Congressman John W. Lingley Is Convicted of Violating the Volstead Act
 October 25, 1924: Forged Communist Letter Brings Down British Government
 November 19, 1924: Film Producer Thomas H. Ince Dies After Weekend on Hearst's Yacht

July, 1925: Nosferatu Is Found to Have Violated Dracula Copyright
 May-June, 1926: Evangelist Aimee Semple McPherson Claims She Was Kidnapped
 December 26, 1926: Ty Cobb and Tris Speaker Are Accused of Fixing Baseball Games
 1927: Mae West's Play About Gays Is Banned on Broadway
 1927: President Warren G. Harding's Lover Publishes Tell-All Memoir
 Early 1928: Joseph P. Kennedy Begins an Affair with Gloria Swanson
 1928-1929: Actor Is Suspected of Falsely Claiming to Be an American Indian March 21, 1928: Alberta Government Sterilizes Thousands Deemed Genetically and Mentally Unfit
 June 6, 1929: Luis Buñuel's Un Chien Andalou Shocks Parisian Audience
 November, 1929: Banque Oustric et Cie Failure Prompts French Inquiry
 1930: Liberia Is Accused of Selling Its Own Citizens into Slavery
 May, 1930: Postmaster's Division of Airmail Routes Creates a Scandal
 December 3, 1930: Surrealist Film L'Âge d'or Provokes French Rioting

1931-1940

March 30, 1931: "Scottsboro Boys" Are Railroaded Through Rape Trials
 1932: Insull Utilities Trusts Collapse Prompts New Federal Regulation
 July 28, 1932: U.S. Troops Drive World War I Veterans from Washington
 September 4, 1932: Film Star Jean Harlow's Husband Is an Apparent Suicide

January 20, 1933: Hedy Lamarr Appears Nude in the Czech Film Extase
 March 31, 1933: New York Times Reporter Denies Reports of a Soviet Famine
 January 8, 1934-January 17, 1936: Stavisky's Fraudulent Schemes Rock French Government
 May 16, 1934: General Douglas MacArthur Sues Newspaper Columnist for Libel

July 10, 1934: Sex Scandal Forces Resignation of Alberta Premier Brownlee
December 16, 1935: Film Star Thelma Todd's Death Cannot Be Explained
May 20, 1936: British Cabinet Member Resigns After Budget Information Leak
Summer, 1936: Film Star Mary Astor's Diary Becomes a Public Sensation
December 10, 1936: King Edward VIII Abdicates to Marry an American Divorcée

March 17, 1937: Atherton Report Exposes San Francisco Police Corruption
September-October, 1937: Prescription Elixir Causes More than One Hundred Deaths
October 11-22, 1937: Duke and Duchess of Windsor Visit Nazi Germany
May 22, 1939: Kansas City's Boss Pendergast Pleads Guilty to Income Tax Evasion

1941-1950

February 6, 1942: Film Star Errol Flynn Is Acquitted of Rape
February 19, 1942: President Roosevelt Orders Internment of Japanese Americans
April 22, 1942: French Prime Minister Pierre Laval Wants Germany to Win World War II
December 5, 1942: Industrialist Charles Bedaux Is Arrested for Nazi Collaboration
January 14, 1943: Film Star Frances Farmer Is Jailed and Institutionalized
February 23, 1943: Irish Orphan School Fire Kills Thirty-five Girls
June 4, 1943: Actor Charles Chaplin Is Sued for Paternity
June 5, 1944: Australian Poets Claim Responsibility for a Literary Hoax
May 9, 1945: Norwegian Politician Quisling Is Arrested for Nazi Collaboration
May 26, 1945: Norwegian Writer Knut Hamsun Is Arrested for Treason
August 14, 1945: French War Hero Pétain Is Convicted of Nazi Collaboration
December 14, 1945: Poet Ezra Pound Is Charged with Treason and Institutionalized

November 23, 1946: Tennis Star Bill Tilden Is Arrested for Lewd Behavior with a Minor
Spring, 1947: Baseball Manager Leo Durocher Is Suspended for Gambling Ties
July 5, 1948: Actor Carole Landis Commits Suicide During Affair with Rex Harrison
August 4, 1948: Columnist Drew Pearson Exposes Congressman's Corruption
August 31, 1948: Film Star Robert Mitchum Is Arrested for Drug Possession
May 27, 1949: Actor Rita Hayworth Marries Aly Khan After Adulterous Affair
August 26, 1949: Viet Minh Broadcasts French General's Damaging Report
January 21, 1950: Alger Hiss Is Convicted of Perjury
February 7, 1950: Swedish Film Star Ingrid Bergman Has a Child Out of Wedlock
February 9, 1950: U.S. Senator Joseph McCarthy Launches Communist Witch Hunt
May 3, 1950: U.S. Senate Committee Begins Investigating Organized Crime

1951-1960

January 17, 1951: College Basketball Players
Begin Shaving Points for Money
July 16, 1951: Belgium's Disgraced King
Leopold III Abdicates
November 16, 1951: Federal Tax Official Resigns
After Accepting Bribes
September 19, 1952: Actor Charles Chaplin
Cannot Reenter the United States
September 23, 1952: Richard Nixon Denies Taking Illegal Campaign Contributions
December 1, 1952: George Jorgensen Becomes Christine Jorgensen
November 21, 1953: Piltdown Man Is Revealed to Be a Hoax
May, 1955: Scandal Magazine Reveals Actor
Rory Calhoun's Criminal Past
Late 1955: British Atrocities in Kenya's Mau
Mau Rebellion Are Revealed
1956-1962: Prescription Thalidomide Causes
Widespread Birth Disorders
March 9, 1956: British Conductor-Composer Is Arrested for Possessing Pornography

June, 1956: George F. Kennan Proves Russian
Sisson Documents Are Fakes
June 25, 1956: President Truman's Appointments
Secretary Is Convicted of Tax Conspiracy
December 12, 1957: Rock Star Jerry Lee Lewis Marries Thirteen-Year-Old Cousin
April 4, 1958: Actor Lana Turner's Daughter
Kills Turner's Gangster Lover
September 22, 1958: President Eisenhower's
Chief of Staff Resigns for Influence Selling
May, 1959: Teamsters Leader Dave Beck Is Convicted of Tax Fraud
November 2, 1959: Charles Van Doren Admits to Being Fed Answers on Television Quiz Show
February 7, 1960: President Kennedy's Romantic Affair Links Him to Organized Crime
February 8, 1960: U.S. Congress Investigates
Payola in Pop Music Industry
March 14, 1960: FCC Chairman John C. Doerfer
Resigns for Accepting Gifts from Networks

1961-1970

July, 1961: Psychologist Stanley Milgram Begins
Obedience-to-Authority Experiments
March 29, 1962: Billie Sol Estes Is Arrested for Corporate Fraud
May 19, 1962: Marilyn Monroe Sings "Happy Birthday, Mr. President"
September 12, 1962: British Civil Servant Is Arrested for Spying
October 26, 1962: West German Police Raid Der Spiegel Magazine Offices
February 23, 1963: Play Accuses Pope Pius XII of Complicity in the Holocaust
March 2-September 25, 1963: John Profumo
Affair Rocks British Government

July 2, 1963: Muslim Leader Elijah Muhammad
Is Sued for Paternity
August 14, 1963: Madame Nhu Derides Self-Immolation of Vietnamese Buddhists
October 7, 1963: Vice President Lyndon B.
Johnson Aide Resigns over Crime Connections
March 13, 1964: Kitty Genovese Dies as Her
Cries for Help Are Ignored
October 7, 1964: President Lyndon B. Johnson's Aide Is Arrested in Gay-Sex Sting
October 29, 1965: Moroccan Politician Mehdi
Ben Barka Disappears in Paris
March 4, 1966: Munsinger Sex and Spy Scandal
Rocks Canada

March 1, 1967: Adam Clayton Powell, Jr., Is Excluded from Congress
 June 23, 1967: Senator Thomas J. Dodd Is Censured for Misappropriating Funds
 September 5, 1967: Socialite Nancy Wakeman Shoots Her Politician-Husband
 November 28, 1967: Investor Louis Wolfson Is Convicted of Selling Stock Illegally
 May 9, 1969: Supreme Court Justice Abe Fortas Is Accused of Bribery
 July 18, 1969: Senator Edward Kennedy's Driving Accident Kills Mary Jo Kopechne

Fall, 1969-Winter, 1971: Japanese Baseball Players Are Implicated in Game Fixing
 November 13, 1969: American Massacre of Vietnamese Civilians at My Lai Is Revealed
 December 30, 1969: United Mine Workers Leader Joseph Yablonski Is Murdered
 1970: Study of Anonymous Gay Sex Leads to Ethics Scandal
 May 4, 1970: National Guardsmen Kill Protesting Kent State Students
 May 28, 1970: Irish Politicians Are Tried for Conspiring to Import Weapons

1971-1980

June 13, 1971: New York Times Publishes the Pentagon Papers
 August 20, 1971: Abusive Role-Playing Ends Stanford Prison Experiment
 January 28, 1972: Clifford Irving Admits Faking Howard Hughes Memoirs
 June 17, 1972-August 9, 1974: Watergate Break-in Leads to President Nixon's Resignation
 June 22, 1972: Police Arrest Architect John Poulson for Bribery and Fraud
 July 8-22, 1972: Jane Fonda's Visit to North Vietnam Outrages Many Americans
 July 25, 1972: Newspaper Breaks Story of Abuses in Tuskegee Syphilis Study
 July 31, 1972: Thomas F. Eagleton Withdraws from Vice Presidential Race
 August 19, 1973: Cheating Scandal Shocks Soap Box Derby
 October 10, 1973: Spiro T. Agnew Resigns Vice Presidency in Disgrace
 April 15, 1974: Kidnapped Heir Patty Hearst Helps Rob a Bank
 May 14, 1974: Washington Post Reveals That the Nixons Received Jewelry Gifts
 May 20, 1974: French Cardinal Daniélou Dies in a Prostitute's House
 Summer, 1974: Dalkon Shield Contraceptive Is Removed from the Market

October 7, 1974: Congressman Wilbur D. Mills's Stripper Affair Leads to His Downfall
 October 25, 1974: Evangelist Billy James Hargis Resigns College Presidency During Gay-Sex Scandal
 November 20, 1974: British Politician John Stonehouse Fakes His Suicide
 February 3, 1975: Honduras's "Bananagate" Bribery Scandal Leads to Executive's Suicide
 October 31, 1975: Buddhist Teacher Orders His Students to Remove Their Clothes
 1976: Peace Corps Conceals Murder of Volunteer in Tonga
 1976-1977: U.S. Congress Members Are Implicated in Koreagate Scandal
 February 4, 1976: Lockheed Is Implicated in Bribing Foreign Officials
 March 21, 1976: Actor Claudine Longet Kills Ski Champion Vladimir Sabich
 April 4, 1976: West Point Cadets Are Caught Cheating on Exams
 May 23, 1976: Washington Post Exposes Congressman Wayne L. Hays's Affair
 September 1, 1976: Former Beatle George Harrison Loses Plagiarism Lawsuit
 September, 1976: Jimmy Carter Admits Committing Adultery in His Heart

October 4, 1976: Agriculture Secretary Earl Butz Resigns After Making Obscene Joke
 November 9, 1976: German Generals Must Retire for Supporting a Neo-Nazi Pilot
 January, 1977: Singer Anita Bryant Campaigns Against Lesbian and Gay Rights
 February 25, 1977: Film Producer David Begelman Is Found to Have Forged Checks
 September 21, 1977: Carter Cabinet Member Resigns over Ethics Violations
 September 23, 1977: Horse-Swapping Fraud Upsets Belmont Park Raceway
 1978: Actor Joan Crawford's Daughter Publishes Damning Memoir, Mommie Dearest
 1978: Roots Author Alex Haley Is Sued for Plagiarism
 February 1, 1978: Roman Polanski Flees the United States to Avoid Rape Trial
 June 27, 1978: Evangelist Herbert W. Armstrong Excommunicates His Own Son
 July 23, 1978: Utah Millionaire Is Murdered by His Grandson
 August 4, 1978: British Politician Jeremy Thorpe Is Charged with Attempted Murder
 October 20, 1978: Firestone Recalls Millions of Defective Car Tires
 January 26, 1979: Former Vice President Nelson Rockefeller Dies Mysteriously
 April 18, 1979: Actor Lee Marvin Is Ordered to Pay Palimony to Former Lover

June 4, 1979: South African President B. J. Vorster Resigns in Muldergate Scandal
 September 26, 1979: Love Canal Residents Sue Chemical Company
 October 10, 1979: French President Giscard d'Estaing Is Accused of Taking a Bribe
 October 11, 1979: Senate Denounces Herman E. Talmadge for Money Laundering
 November 29, 1979, and January 31, 1983: Baseball Commissioner Suspends Mickey Mantle and Willie Mays for Casino Ties
 1980: Biographer Claims Actor Errol Flynn Was a Nazi Spy
 February 2, 1980: Media Uncover FBI Sting Implicating Dozens of Lawmakers
 March 10, 1980: Scarsdale Diet Doctor Is Killed by His Lover
 April 27, 1980: Mobster's Arrest Reveals Point Shaving by Boston College Basketball Players
 Late July, 1980: President's Brother, Billy Carter, Registers as a Paid Agent for Libya
 July 28, 1980: Magazine Reveals Baseball Star Steve Garvey's Marital Problems
 September 3, 1980: Congressman Bauman Is Arrested for Liaison with Teenage Boy
 October 9, 1980: Bendix Executive Resigns Amid Rumors of an Affair
 December 7, 1980: Rita Jenrette's "Diary of a Mad Congresswife" Scandalizes Washington

1981-1990

April 15, 1981: Janet Cooke Admits Fabricating Her Pulitzer Prize-Winning Feature
 April 28, 1981: Tennis Star Billie Jean King Is Sued for Palimony
 May 23, 1981: Italian Justice Minister Resigns Because of Crime Connection
 May 29, 1981: Court Finds That Ford Ignored Pinto's Safety Problems
 September 10, 1981: Chicago Sun-Times Reports That Cardinal Cody Diverted Church Funds

May 11, 1982: Philippine President Marcos Forces the Entire Supreme Court to Resign
 July 20, 1982: Conservative Politician John G. Schmitz Is Found to Have Children Out of Wedlock
 August 6, 1982: Banco Ambrosiano Collapses Amid Criminal Accusations
 October 19, 1982: Car Manufacturer John De Lorean Is Arrested in a Drug Sting

- December, 1982: Julie Andrews and Blake Edwards Deny Being Gay
- December 16, 1982: Congress Cites Environmental Protection Agency Chief for Contempt
- April 25, 1983: German Magazine Publishes Faked Hitler Diaries
- July 20, 1983: Congress Members Censured in House-Page Sex Scandal
- August 12, 1983-July 27, 1990: McMartin Preschool Is Embroiled in Child-Abuse Case
- August 21, 1983: Filipino Opposition Leader Aquino Is Assassinated on Return Home
- October 14, 1983: British Cabinet Secretary Parkinson Resigns After His Secretary Becomes Pregnant
- January 25, 1984: Jesse Jackson Calls New York City "Hymietown"
- May 2, 1984: E. F. Hutton Executives Plead Guilty to Fraud
- July 23, 1984: Vanessa Williams Is the First Miss America to Resign
- December 22, 1984: Subway Vigilante Bernhard Goetz Shoots Four Black Youths
- 1985-1986: Westland Affair Shakes Prime Minister Thatcher's Government
- May 7, 1985: Banker Jake Butcher Pleads Guilty to Fraud
- July 10, 1985: French Secret Service Sinks the Greenpeace Ship Rainbow Warrior
- July 19, 1985: Mayflower Madam Pleads Guilty to Promoting Prostitution
- August 19, 1985: West German Counterintelligence Chief Defects to East Germany
- September 17, 1985: Media Allege Canadian Officials Allowed Sale of Rancid Tuna
- October 23, 1985: Guru Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh Is Indicted for Immigration Fraud
- February 28, 1986: Baseball Commissioner Peter Ueberroth Suspends Players for Cocaine Use
- March 3, 1986: Former U.N. Secretary-General Kurt Waldheim's Nazi Past Is Revealed
- April 22, 1986: Faith Healer Peter Popoff Is Exposed as a Fraud
- November 13, 1986-May 4, 1989: Iran-Contra Weapons Scandal Taints Reagan's Administration
- January 12 and May 11, 1987: Media Reports Spark Investigation of Australian Police Corruption
- January 22, 1987: Pennsylvania Politician Kills Himself at Televised Press Conference
- February 25, 1987: NCAA Imposes "Death Penalty" on Southern Methodist University Football
- March 19, 1987: Jim Bakker Resigns as Head of PTL Television Network
- April 9, 1987: Bess Myerson Resigns as New York Commissioner of Cultural Affairs
- July 25, 1987: Novelist-Politician Jeffrey Archer Wins Libel Trial Against the Daily Star
- September 23, 1987: Plagiarism Charges End Joe Biden's Presidential Campaign
- November 28, 1987: Black Teenager Claims to Have Been Gang-Raped by Police Officers
- December 1, 1987: Yale Scholar's Wartime Anti-Semitic Writings Are Revealed
- January 15, 1988: ZZZZ Best Founder Is Indicted on Federal Fraud Charges
- February 21, 1988: Evangelist Jimmy Swaggart Tearfully Confesses His Adultery
- June, 1988-June, 1989: Insider-Trading Scandal Rocks Japanese Government
- July 18, 1988: Actor Rob Lowe Videotapes His Sexual Encounter with a Minor
- September 19, 1988: Stephen Breuning Pleads Guilty to Medical Research Fraud
- March 23, 1989: Scientists' "Cold Fusion" Claims Cannot Be Verified
- March 29, 1989: Financier Michael Milken Is Indicted for Racketeering and Fraud
- May 31, 1989: Speaker of the House Jim Wright Resigns in Ethics Scandal
- August 10, 1989: Japanese Prime Minister Sosuke Resigns After Affair with a Geisha
- August 24, 1989: Pete Rose Is Banned from Baseball for Betting on Games
- December 3, 1989: Martin Luther King, Jr.'s, Doctoral-Thesis Plagiarism Is Revealed

December 15-25, 1989: Harassment of a Christian Minister Sparks the Romanian Revolution
 December 18, 1989: Prince Charles's Intimate Phone Conversation with Camilla Parker Bowles Is Taped
 January 18, 1990: Washington, D.C., Mayor Marion Barry Is Arrested for Drug Use

March, 1990: Menendez Brothers Are Arrested for Murdering Their Parents
 August 27, 1990: Guinness Four Are Found Guilty of Share-Trading Fraud
 November 19, 1990: Lip-Synching Duo Milli Vanilli Lose Grammy Award

1991-2000

March 30, 1991: William Kennedy Smith Is Accused of Rape
 April 5, 1991: George W. Bush Is Investigated for Insider Trading
 July 26, 1991: Comedian Pee-wee Herman Is Arrested for Public Indecency
 October 11-13, 1991: Justice Clarence Thomas's Confirmation Hearings Create a Scandal
 January 13, 1992: Woody Allen Has Affair with Lover Mia Farrow's Adopted Daughter
 April 15, 1992: Hotel Tycoon Leona Helmsley Enters Prison for Tax Evasion
 May 6, 1992: Irish Bishop Eamonn Casey's Romantic Affair Leads to His Resignation
 May 19, 1992: Amy Fisher Shoots Mary Jo Buttafuoco
 June 26, 1992: U.S. Navy Secretary Resigns in the Wake of Tailhook Sexual Assault Scandal
 August 23, 1992: Princess Diana's Phone Conversation with Her Lover Is Made Public
 September 24, 1992: British Cabinet Member David Mellor Resigns over Romantic Affair
 June 23, 1993: Lorena Bobbitt Severs Her Husband's Penis
 January 5, 1994: British Cabinet Member Resigns After Fathering a Child Out of Wedlock
 April 28, 1994: U.S. Naval Academy Expels Midshipmen for Cheating
 June 1, 1994: Congressman Dan Rostenkowski Is Indicted in House Post Office Scandal
 June 12, 1994: Double Murder Leads to Sensational O. J. Simpson Trial

June 24, 1994: Time Magazine Cover Uses Altered O. J. Simpson Photo
 June 30, 1994: Tonya Harding Is Banned from Skating After Attack on Rival
 July 1, 1994: Soccer Star Diego Maradona Is Expelled from World Cup
 August 5, 1994: Kenneth Starr Is Appointed to the Whitewater Investigation
 August 21, 1994: Sex Scandal Forces Dismissal of NAACP Chief Benjamin Chavis
 February 28, 1995: Former Mexican President Carlos Salinas's Brother Is Arrested for Murder
 June 27, 1995: Film Star Hugh Grant Is Arrested for Lewd Conduct
 November 18, 1995: Former Canadian Premier Brian Mulroney Is Exposed in Airbus Scandal
 February 4, 1996: Whistle-Blower Reveals Tobacco Industry Corruption
 Spring, 1996: Physicist Publishes a Deliberately Fraudulent Article
 August 16, 1996: Belgian Media Reveal How Police Bungled Serial Murder Case
 November 3, 1996: Car Crash Reveals Depth of Government Corruption in Turkey
 January, 1997: Pyramid Investment Schemes Cause Albanian Government to Fall
 February 26, 1997: Teacher Mary Kay Letourneau Is Arrested for Statutory Rape
 March 12, 1997: Prize-Winning Aborigine Novelist Revealed as a Fraud
 May 20, 1997: Air Force Prosecution of Female Officer for Adultery Reveals Double Standard

June 25, 1997: Swiss Banks Admit to Holding Accounts of Holocaust Victims
 August 31, 1997: Princess Diana Dies in Car Crash
 September 22, 1997: Sportscaster Marv Albert Is Tried for Sexual Assault
 November 26, 1997: Canadian Health Commissioner Releases Report on Tainted Blood
 December 11, 1997: HUD Secretary Henry Cisneros Is Indicted for Lying to Federal Agents
 January 17, 1998: President Bill Clinton Denies Sexual Affair with a White House Intern
 April, 1998: Scottish Historian Is Charged with Plagiarism
 April 7, 1998: Pop Singer George Michael Is Arrested for Lewd Conduct
 May, 1998: Police Corruption Is Revealed in Los Angeles's Rampart Division
 May 11, 1998: Journalist Stephen Glass Is Exposed as a Fraud
 December 23, 1998: Prominent Belgians Are Sentenced in Agusta-Dassault Corruption Scandal

March 4, 1999: Quebec Offers Support for Abused Duplessis Orphans
 May, 1999: Civil Rights Leader Jesse Jackson Fathers a Child Out of Wedlock
 May 7, 1999-March 2, 2001: Ethics Counselor Exonerates Canadian Prime Minister Jean Chrétien
 January 28, 2000: John Spano Is Sentenced for Fraudulent Purchase of Ice Hockey Team
 May 2, 2000: New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani's Extramarital Affair Is Revealed
 May 9, 2000: Former Louisiana Governor Edwin Edwards Is Convicted on Corruption Charges
 September, 2000: American Scientists Are Accused of Starting a Measles Epidemic in the Amazon
 September 19, 2000: Ex-gay Leader John Paulk Is Photographed Leaving a Gay Bar
 September 26, 2000: Gymnast Andreea Răducan Loses Her Olympic Gold Medal Because of Drugs
 November 5, 2000: Japanese Amateur Archaeologist's "Discoveries" Are Proven Fakes
 December, 2000: Sexual Abuse of Children in France Leads to the Outreau Affair

2001-2010

2001: Clearstream Financial Clearinghouse Is Accused of Fraud and Money Laundering
 January 30, 2001: Liverpool Children's Hospital Collects Body Parts Without Authorization
 February 18, 2001: CIA Agent Robert Hanssen Is Arrested for Spying for the Russians
 April 30, 2001: Washington Intern Chandra Levy Disappears
 June 18, 2001: Award-Winning Historian Joseph J. Ellis Is Accused of Lying
 June 30, 2001: Korean Religious Teacher Jung Myung Seok Is Charged with Rape
 August 27, 2001: Little League Baseball Star Danny Almonte Is Found to Be Overage

December 2, 2001: Enron Bankruptcy Reveals Massive Financial Fraud
 December 14, 2001: Notre Dame Football Coach Resigns for Falsifying His Résumé
 January 4, 2002: Historian Stephen E. Ambrose Is Accused of Plagiarism
 January 6, 2002: Boston Globe Reports on Child Sexual Abuse by Roman Catholic Priests
 January 18, 2002: Historian Doris Kearns Goodwin Is Accused of Plagiarism
 February 11, 2002: French Judge Admits Favoring Russian Figure Skaters in Winter Olympics

February 17, 2002: Rotting Human Bodies Are Found at Georgia Crematory
 March 27, 2002: Georgia Basketball Coach Jim Harrick, Sr., Resigns over Fraud Allegations
 June 25, 2002: Internal Corruption Forces Adelphia Communications to Declare Bankruptcy
 July, 2002: Journalist Alleges Release of Genetically Modified Corn Seeds in New Zealand
 August, 2002: Immunologist Resigns After Being Accused of Falsifying Research
 September 25, 2002: Inquiry Reveals That Physicist Jan Hendrik Schön Faked His Research
 September 28, 2002: British Politician Reveals Her Affair with Prime Minister John Major
 October 25, 2002: Historian Michael A. Bellesiles Resigns After Academic Fraud Accusations
 December 5, 2002: Senator Trent Lott Praises Strom Thurmond's 1948 Presidential Campaign
 January 2, 2003: E-mail Message Prompts Inquiry into Air Force Academy Sexual Assaults
 March 2, 2003: U.S. National Security Agency Is Found to Have Spied on U.N. Officials
 April 29, 2003: New York Times Reporter Jayson Blair Is Exposed as a Fraud
 May 3, 2003: University of Alabama Fires New Football Coach in Sex Scandal
 May 21, 2003: Sexually Provocative Film The Brown Bunny Premieres at Cannes Film Festival
 July 1, 2003: Basketball Star Kobe Bryant Is Accused of Rape
 July 14, 2003: Columnist Robert Novak Leaks the Name of CIA Operative Valerie Plame
 September 3, 2003: Mutual Fund Companies Are Implicated in Shady Trading Practices
 October 2, 2003: Newspaper Claims That Arnold Schwarzenegger Groped Women
 Early November, 2003: Paris Hilton Sex-Tape Appears on the Web
 December 17, 2003: Senator Strom Thurmond's Biracial Daughter Is Revealed

December 18, 2003: Pop Star Michael Jackson Is Charged with Child Molestation
 March 4, 2004: Former United Way Charity Chief Pleads Guilty to Embezzlement
 March 5, 2004: Martha Stewart Is Convicted in Insider-Trading Scandal
 April 28, 2004: CBS Broadcasts Photos of Abused and Tortured Prisoners at Abu Ghraib
 June 2, 2004: U.N. Report Reveals That Secretary-General Kofi Annan Dismissed Sexual Harassment Charges
 August 19, 2004: Blog "Outs" Antigay Congressman Edward Schrock
 September 8, 2004: 60 Minutes II Reports on George W. Bush's Evasion of Wartime Duty
 October 13, 2004: Television Producer Files Sex Harassment Suit Against Bill O'Reilly
 October 14, 2004: Insurance Brokerage Marsh & McLennan Is Charged with Fraud
 January 15, 2005: Iqbal Riza Resigns from the United Nations in Oil-for-Food Scandal
 January 27, 2005: German Soccer Referee Admits to Fixing Games for Money
 March 17, 2005: Former Baseball Star Mark McGwire Evades Congressional Questions on Steroid Use
 June 22, 2005: U.S. Air Force Investigates Religious Intolerance at Its Academy
 July 1, 2005: Federal Agents Raid Congressman Randall Cunningham's Home
 Beginning August 29, 2005: Government Incompetence Mars Hurricane Katrina Relief Efforts
 September 12, 2005: Westar Energy Executives Are Found Guilty of Looting Their Company
 September 30, 2005: Danish Newspaper's Prophet Muhammad Cartoons Stir Violent Protests
 November 17, 2005: Liberian Workers Sue Bridgestone Firestone over Slave Labor
 December 6, 2005: Spokane, Washington, Mayor Recalled in Gay-Sex Scandal
 January 21, 2006: British Politician Resigns After Gay-Sex Orgy
 March 14, 2006: Duke Lacrosse Players Are Accused of Gang Rape

April 26, 2006: Britain's Deputy Prime Minister Admits Affair with Secretary
 May 4, 2006: Media Uncover Match-Fixing in Italian Soccer
 May 12, 2006: Scientist Is Indicted for Faking His Research on Creating Stem Cells
 Summer, 2006-March 16, 2007: Manufacturer Recalls Pet Food That Killed Thousands of American Pets
 July 14, 2006: New York Times Exposes Grading Scandal at Auburn University
 July 26, 2006: Tour de France Is Hit with a Doping Scandal
 July 28, 2006: Actor Mel Gibson Is Caught Making Anti-Semitic Remarks
 August 12, 2006: Novelist Günter Grass Admits to Youthful Nazi Ties
 September 17, 2006: New Zealand Prime Minister's Husband Is "Outed" as Gay
 September 18, 2006: Newsweek Reveals That Hewlett-Packard Spied on Its Own Board
 September 29, 2006: Congressman Mark Foley Resigns in Sex Scandal Involving a Teenage Page
 October 22, 2006: Chilean Politicians Use Community Funds for Personal Campaigns
 November 2, 2006: Evangelist Kent Hovind Is Convicted of Federal Tax Violations
 November 2, 2006: Male Escort Reveals Sexual Liaisons with Evangelist Ted Haggard
 November 20, 2006: News Corp Abandons Plan to Publish O. J. Simpson's Book
 November 23, 2006: Former Russian Security Service Officer Dies from Radiation Poisoning

Early 2007: Subprime Mortgage Industry Begins to Collapse
 February 18, 2007: Washington Post Exposes Decline of Walter Reed Army Hospital
 April 11, 2007: Shock Jock Don Imus Loses His Radio Show over Sexist and Racist Remarks
 May 28, 2007: Japanese Politician Charged with Corruption Hangs Himself
 June 4, 2007: Congressman William J. Jefferson Is Indicted for Corruption
 July 9, 2007: Senator David Vitter's Name Is Found in D.C. Madam's Address Book
 July 11, 2007: Florida Politician Is Arrested for Soliciting an Undercover Male Police Officer
 July 24, 2007: University of Colorado Fires Professor for Plagiarism and Research Falsification
 August 20, 2007: Football Star Michael Vick Pleads Guilty to Financing a Dogfighting Ring
 September 13, 2007: New England Patriots Football Team Is Fined for Spying on Other Teams
 October 5, 2007: Olympic Champion Marion Jones Admits Steroid Use
 March 12, 2008: New York Governor Eliot Spitzer Resigns in Prostitution Scandal
 June 13, 2008: Singer R. Kelly Is Acquitted on Child Pornography Charges
 July 29, 2008: NBA Referee Tim Donaghy Is Sentenced to Prison for Betting on Games
 September 7, 2008: Financial Institutions and Markets Begin to Collapse

GEOGRAPHICAL INDEX

List of Geographical Regions

Africa	1200	Kenya	1207
Albania.	1201	Liberia	1207
Algeria	1201	Libya.	1207
Argentina	1201	Luxembourg	1207
Asia	1201	Mexico.	1207
Australasia	1201	Middle East	1207
Australia	1201	Morocco	1207
Austria	1201	New Zealand.	1207
Belgium	1202	Nicaragua	1207
Canada	1202	Northern Ireland	1207
Central African Republic	1202	Norway	1208
Central and South America	1202	Pakistan	1208
Chile	1202	Philippines	1208
China.	1202	Romania	1208
Congo, Democratic Republic of the	1202	Russia	1208
Czech Republic	1202	Scotland	1208
Denmark	1202	South Africa	1208
Dominican Republic	1202	South Korea	1208
Egypt.	1203	Soviet Union.	1208
England	1203	Spain	1208
Europe	1203	Sweden.	1208
France	1205	Switzerland	1208
Germany	1206	Tonga	1208
Honduras.	1206	Turkey	1209
Iran.	1206	United States.	1209
Iraq.	1206	Vatican City	1215
Ireland	1206	Venezuela	1215
Italy	1207	Vietnam	1215
Japan	1207

AFRICA

Nov. 15, 1908: Belgium Confiscates Congo Free State from King Leopold II, 31
1930: Liberia Is Accused of Selling Its Own Citizens into Slavery, 142
Dec. 5, 1942: Industrialist Charles Bedaux Is Arrested for Nazi Collaboration, 212
Late 1955: British Atrocities in Kenya's Mau Mau Rebellion Are Revealed, 298

Oct. 29, 1965: Moroccan Politician Mehdi Ben Barka Disappears in Paris, 374
June 4, 1979: South African President B. J. Vorster Resigns in Muldergate Scandal, 543
Oct. 10, 1979: French President Giscard d'Estaing Is Accused of Taking a Bribe, 550
Nov. 17, 2005: Liberian Workers Sue Bridgestone Firestone over Slave Labor, 1078

ALBANIA

Jan., 1997: Pyramid Investment Schemes Cause Albanian Government to Fall, 846

ALGERIA

Dec. 5, 1942: Industrialist Charles Bedaux Is Arrested for Nazi Collaboration, 212

ARGENTINA

July 1, 1994: Soccer Star Diego Maradona Is Expelled from World Cup, 815

ASIA. See also MIDDLE EAST

Aug. 26, 1949: Viet Minh Broadcasts French General's Damaging Report, 257

Aug. 14, 1963: Madame Nhu Derides Self-Immolation of Vietnamese Buddhists, 362

Fall, 1969-Winter, 1971: Japanese Baseball Players Are Implicated in Game Fixing, 398

Nov. 13, 1969: American Massacre of Vietnamese Civilians at My Lai Is Revealed, 401

July 8-22, 1972: Jane Fonda's Visit to North Vietnam Outrages Many Americans, 434

Feb. 4, 1976: Lockheed Is Implicated in Bribing Foreign Officials, 482

May 11, 1982: Philippine President Marcos Forces the Entire Supreme Court to Resign, 600

Aug. 21, 1983: Filipino Opposition Leader Aquino Is Assassinated on Return Home, 628

June, 1988-June, 1989: Insider-Trading Scandal Rocks Japanese Government, 714

Aug. 10, 1989: Japanese Prime Minister Sosuke Resigns After Affair with a Geisha, 733

Nov. 5, 2000: Japanese Amateur Archaeologist's "Discoveries" Are Proven Fakes, 919

June 30, 2001: Korean Religious Teacher Jung Myung Seok Is Charged with Rape, 939

May 12, 2006: Scientist Is Indicted for Faking His Research on Creating Stem Cells, 1094

Summer, 2006-Mar. 16, 2007: China Recalls Pet Food That Has Killed Thousands of American Pets, 1097

May 28, 2007: Japanese Politician Charged with Corruption Hangs Himself, 1145

AUSTRALASIA

June 5, 1944: Australian Poets Claim

Responsibility for a Literary Hoax, 223

Mar. 9, 1956: British Conductor-Composer Is Arrested for Possessing Pornography, 304

Nov. 20, 1974: British Politician John Stonehouse Fakes His Suicide, 468

1976: Peace Corps Conceals Murder of Volunteer in Tonga, 476

July 10, 1985: French Secret Service Sinks the Greenpeace Ship Rainbow Warrior, 651

Jan. 12 and May 11, 1987: Media Reports Spark Investigation of Australian Police Corruption, 681

Mar. 12, 1997: Prize-Winning Aborigine Novelist Revealed as a Fraud, 852

Sept. 26, 2000: Gymnast Andreea Răducan Loses Her Olympic Gold Medal Because of Drugs, 916

July, 2002: Journalist Alleges Release of Genetically Modified Corn Seeds in New Zealand, 974

Sept. 17, 2006: New Zealand Prime Minister's Husband Is "Outed" as Gay, 1112

AUSTRALIA

June 5, 1944: Australian Poets Claim

Responsibility for a Literary Hoax, 223

Mar. 9, 1956: British Conductor-Composer Is Arrested for Possessing Pornography, 304

Nov. 20, 1974: British Politician John Stonehouse Fakes His Suicide, 468

Jan. 12 and May 11, 1987: Media Reports Spark Investigation of Australian Police Corruption, 681

Mar. 12, 1997: Prize-Winning Aborigine Novelist Revealed as a Fraud, 852

Sept. 26, 2000: Gymnast Andreea Răducan Loses Her Olympic Gold Medal Because of Drugs, 916

AUSTRIA

Mar. 3, 1986: Former U.N. Secretary-General

Kurt Waldheim's Nazi Past Is Revealed, 669

BELGIUM

- Nov. 15, 1908: Belgium Confiscates Congo Free State from King Leopold II, 31
 July 16, 1951: Belgium's Disgraced King Leopold III Abdicates, 276
 Aug. 16, 1996: Belgian Media Reveal How Police Bungled Serial Murder Case, 840
 Dec. 23, 1998: Prominent Belgians Are Sentenced in Agusta-Dassault Corruption Scandal, 889

CANADA

- 1928-1929: Actor Is Suspected of Falsely Claiming to Be an American Indian, 130
 Mar. 21, 1928: Alberta Government Sterilizes Thousands Deemed Genetically and Mentally Unfit, 133
 July 10, 1934: Sex Scandal Forces Resignation of Alberta Premier Brownlee, 176
 Mar. 4, 1966: Munsinger Sex and Spy Scandal Rocks Canada, 377
 Sept. 17, 1985: Media Allege Canadian Officials Allowed Sale of Rancid Tuna, 660
 Nov. 18, 1995: Former Canadian Premier Brian Mulroney Is Exposed in Airbus Scandal, 830
 Nov. 26, 1997: Canadian Health Commissioner Releases Report on Tainted Blood, 868
 Mar. 4, 1999: Quebec Offers Support for Abused Duplessis Orphans, 892
 May 7, 1999-Mar. 2, 2001: Ethics Counselor Exonerates Canadian Prime Minister Jean Chrétien, 898
 Aug., 2002: Immunologist Resigns After Being Accused of Falsifying Research, 977
 Summer, 2006-Mar. 16, 2007: China Recalls Pet Food That Has Killed Thousands of American Pets, 1097

CARIBBEAN. See CENTRAL AND SOUTH AMERICA

CENTRAL AFRICAN REPUBLIC

- Oct. 10, 1979: French President Giscard d'Estaing Is Accused of Taking a Bribe, 550

CENTRAL AND SOUTH AMERICA

- Feb. 3, 1975: Honduras's "Bananagate" Bribery Scandal Leads to Executive's Suicide, 471

- Nov. 13, 1986-May 4, 1989: Iran-Contra Weapons Scandal Taints Reagan's Administration, 676
 July 1, 1994: Soccer Star Diego Maradona Is Expelled from World Cup, 815
 Feb. 28, 1995: Former Mexican President Carlos Salinas's Brother Is Arrested for Murder, 824
 Sept., 2000: American Scientists Are Accused of Starting a Measles Epidemic in the Amazon, 910
 Aug. 27, 2001: Little League Baseball Star Danny Almonte Is Found to Be Overage, 942
 Oct. 22, 2006: Chilean Politicians Use Community Funds for Personal Campaigns, 1121

CHILE

- Oct. 22, 2006: Chilean Politicians Use Community Funds for Personal Campaigns, 1121

CHINA

- Summer, 2006-Mar. 16, 2007: China Recalls Pet Food That Has Killed Thousands of American Pets, 1097

CONGO, DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC OF THE

- Nov. 15, 1908: Belgium Confiscates Congo Free State from King Leopold II, 31

CZECH REPUBLIC

- Jan. 20, 1933: Hedy Lamarr Appears Nude in the Czech Film Exstase, 163

DENMARK

- Dec. 1, 1952: George Jorgensen Becomes Christine Jorgensen, 289
 Sept. 30, 2005: Danish Newspaper's Prophet Muhammad Cartoons Stir Violent Protests, 1075

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC

- Aug. 27, 2001: Little League Baseball Star Danny Almonte Is Found to Be Overage, 942

EGYPT

Aug. 31, 1997: Princess Diana Dies in a Car Crash, 861

ENGLAND

Mar. 2, 1906: Psychoanalyst Ernest Jones Is Accused of Molesting Mentally Disabled Children, 12
 1907: Elinor Glyn's Novel Three Weeks Shocks Readers, 25
 Jan., 1913: British Prime Minister's Staff Is Investigated for Insider Trading, 43
 Apr. 2, 1915: Players Fix Liverpool-Manchester United Soccer Match, 55
 May, 1915: British Government Falls Because of Munitions Shortages and Military Setbacks, 58
 June 22, 1922: British Prime Minister David Lloyd George Is Accused of Selling Honors, 83
 Oct. 25, 1924: Forged Communist Letter Brings Down British Government, 105
 July, 1925: Nosferatu Is Found to Have Violated Dracula Copyright, 111
 May 20, 1936: British Cabinet Member Resigns After Budget Information Leak, 181
 Dec. 10, 1936: King Edward VIII Abdicates to Marry an American Divorcée, 187
 Oct. 11-22, 1937: Duke and Duchess of Windsor Visit Nazi Germany, 196
 Nov. 21, 1953: Piltdown Man Is Revealed to Be a Hoax, 292
 Dec. 12, 1957: Rock Star Jerry Lee Lewis Marries Thirteen-Year-Old Cousin, 313
 Sept. 12, 1962: British Civil Servant Is Arrested for Spying, 347
 Mar. 2-Sept. 25, 1963: John Profumo Affair Rocks British Government, 355
 June 22, 1972: Police Arrest Architect John Poulson for Bribery and Fraud, 431
 Nov. 20, 1974: British Politician John Stonehouse Fakes His Suicide, 468
 Aug. 4, 1978: British Politician Jeremy Thorpe Is Charged with Attempted Murder, 531
 Oct. 14, 1983: British Cabinet Secretary Parkinson Resigns After His Secretary Becomes Pregnant, 631

1985-1986: Westland Affair Shakes Prime Minister Thatcher's Government, 645
 July 25, 1987: Novelist-Politician Jeffrey Archer Wins Libel Trial Against the Daily Star, 696
 Dec. 3, 1989: Martin Luther King, Jr.'s, Doctoral-Thesis Plagiarism Is Revealed, 739
 Dec. 18, 1989: Prince Charles's Intimate Phone Conversation with Camilla Parker Bowles Is Taped, 745
 Aug. 27, 1990: Guinness Four Are Found Guilty of Share-Trading Fraud, 753
 Aug. 23, 1992: Princess Diana's Phone Conversation with Her Lover Is Made Public, 789
 Sept. 24, 1992: British Cabinet Member David Mellor Resigns over Romantic Affair, 792
 Jan. 5, 1994: British Cabinet Member Resigns After Fathering a Child Out of Wedlock, 798
 Aug. 31, 1997: Princess Diana Dies in a Car Crash, 861
 Jan. 30, 2001: Liverpool Children's Hospital Collects Body Parts Without Authorization, 927
 Sept. 28, 2002: British Politician Reveals Her Affair with Prime Minister John Major, 983
 Jan. 21, 2006: British Politician Resigns After Gay-Sex Orgy, 1084
 Apr. 26, 2006: Britain's Deputy Prime Minister Admits Affair with Secretary, 1089
 Nov. 23, 2006: Former Russian Security Service Officer Dies from Radiation Poisoning, 1132

EUROPE

1906-1909: Emperor William II's Homosexual "Circle" Scandalizes Germany, 9
 Mar. 2, 1906: Psychoanalyst Ernest Jones Is Accused of Molesting Mentally Disabled Children, 12
 July 12, 1906: French Court Declares Alfred Dreyfus Innocent of Treason, 19
 1907: Elinor Glyn's Novel Three Weeks Shocks Readers, 25
 Nov. 15, 1908: Belgium Confiscates Congo Free State from King Leopold II, 31
 1909-1916: Dancer Isadora Duncan Begins Affair with Millionaire Heir, 34

- 1910: Nobelist Marie Curie Has Affair with Physicist Paul Langevin, 37
- Jan., 1913: British Prime Minister's Staff Is Investigated for Insider Trading, 43
- Apr. 2, 1915: Players Fix Liverpool-Manchester United Soccer Match, 55
- May, 1915: British Government Falls Because of Munitions Shortages and Military Setbacks, 58
- Mar. 26, 1922: Hindemith's Opera Sancta Susanna Depicts a Nun's Sexual Desires, 76
- June 22, 1922: British Prime Minister David Lloyd George Is Accused of Selling Honors, 83
- Oct. 25, 1924: Forged Communist Letter Brings Down British Government, 105
- July, 1925: Nosferatu Is Found to Have Violated Dracula Copyright, 111
- June 6, 1929: Luis Buñuel's Un Chien Andalou Shocks Parisian Audience, 136
- Nov., 1929: Banque Oustric et Cie Failure Prompts French Inquiry, 139
- 1930: Liberia Is Accused of Selling Its Own Citizens into Slavery, 142
- Dec. 3, 1930: Surrealist Film L'Âge d'or Provokes French Rioting, 147
- Jan. 20, 1933: Hedy Lamarr Appears Nude in the Czech Film Exstase, 163
- Mar. 31, 1933: New York Times Reporter Denies Reports of a Soviet Famine, 167
- Jan. 8, 1934-Jan. 17, 1936: Stavisky's Fraudulent Schemes Rock French Government, 170
- May 20, 1936: British Cabinet Member Resigns After Budget Information Leak, 181
- Dec. 10, 1936: King Edward VIII Abdicates to Marry an American Divorcée, 187
- Oct. 11-22, 1937: Duke and Duchess of Windsor Visit Nazi Germany, 196
- Apr. 22, 1942: French Prime Minister Pierre Laval Wants Germany to Win World War II, 209
- Feb. 23, 1943: Irish Orphan School Fire Kills Thirty-five Girls, 217
- May 9, 1945: Norwegian Politician Quisling Is Arrested for Nazi Collaboration, 226
- May 26, 1945: Norwegian Writer Knut Hamsun Is Arrested for Treason, 229
- Aug. 14, 1945: French War Hero Pétain Is Convicted of Nazi Collaboration, 232
- Dec. 14, 1945: Poet Ezra Pound Is Charged with Treason and Institutionalized, 236
- May 27, 1949: Actor Rita Hayworth Marries Aly Khan After Adulterous Affair, 254
- Aug. 26, 1949: Viet Minh Broadcasts French General's Damaging Report, 257
- Feb. 7, 1950: Swedish Film Star Ingrid Bergman Has a Child Out of Wedlock, 263
- July 16, 1951: Belgium's Disgraced King Leopold III Abdicates, 276
- Dec. 1, 1952: George Jorgensen Becomes Christine Jorgensen, 289
- Nov. 21, 1953: Piltdown Man Is Revealed to Be a Hoax, 292
- 1956-1962: Prescription Thalidomide Causes Widespread Birth Disorders, 301
- June, 1956: George F. Kennan Proves Russian Sisson Documents Are Fakes, 307
- Dec. 12, 1957: Rock Star Jerry Lee Lewis Marries Thirteen-Year-Old Cousin, 313
- Sept. 12, 1962: British Civil Servant Is Arrested for Spying, 347
- Oct. 26, 1962: West German Police Raid Der Spiegel Magazine Offices, 349
- Feb. 23, 1963: Play Accuses Pope Pius XII of Complicity in the Holocaust, 353
- Mar. 2-Sept. 25, 1963: John Profumo Affair Rocks British Government, 355
- Oct. 29, 1965: Moroccan Politician Mehdi Ben Barka Disappears in Paris, 374
- Mar. 4, 1966: Munsinger Sex and Spy Scandal Rocks Canada, 377
- May 28, 1970: Irish Politicians Are Tried for Conspiring to Import Weapons, 413
- June 22, 1972: Police Arrest Architect John Poulson for Bribery and Fraud, 431
- May 20, 1974: French Cardinal Daniélou Dies in a Prostitute's House, 456
- Nov. 20, 1974: British Politician John Stonehouse Fakes His Suicide, 468
- Nov. 9, 1976: German Generals Must Retire for Supporting a Neo-Nazi Pilot, 503
- Feb. 1, 1978: Roman Polanski Flees the United States to Avoid Rape Trial, 522

- Aug. 4, 1978: British Politician Jeremy Thorpe Is Charged with Attempted Murder, 531
- Oct. 10, 1979: French President Giscard d'Estaing Is Accused of Taking a Bribe, 550
- May 23, 1981: Italian Justice Minister Resigns Because of Crime Connection, 591
- Aug. 6, 1982: Banco Ambrosiano Collapses Amid Criminal Accusations, 606
- Oct. 19, 1982: Car Manufacturer John De Lorean Is Arrested in a Drug Sting, 609
- Apr. 25, 1983: German Magazine Publishes Faked Hitler Diaries, 618
- Oct. 14, 1983: British Cabinet Secretary Parkinson Resigns After His Secretary Becomes Pregnant, 631
- 1985-1986: Westland Affair Shakes Prime Minister Thatcher's Government, 645
- Aug. 19, 1985: West German Counterintelligence Chief Defects to East Germany, 657
- Mar. 3, 1986: Former U.N. Secretary-General Kurt Waldheim's Nazi Past Is Revealed, 669
- July 25, 1987: Novelist-Politician Jeffrey Archer Wins Libel Trial Against the Daily Star, 696
- Dec. 3, 1989: Martin Luther King, Jr.'s, Doctoral-Thesis Plagiarism Is Revealed, 739
- Dec. 15-25, 1989: Harassment of a Christian Minister Sparks the Romanian Revolution, 742
- Dec. 18, 1989: Prince Charles's Intimate Phone Conversation with Camilla Parker Bowles Is Taped, 745
- Aug. 27, 1990: Guinness Four Are Found Guilty of Share-Trading Fraud, 753
- May 6, 1992: Irish Bishop Eamonn Casey's Romantic Affair Leads to His Resignation, 779
- Aug. 23, 1992: Princess Diana's Phone Conversation with Her Lover Is Made Public, 789
- Sept. 24, 1992: British Cabinet Member David Mellor Resigns over Romantic Affair, 792
- Jan. 5, 1994: British Cabinet Member Resigns After Fathering a Child Out of Wedlock, 798
- Aug. 16, 1996: Belgian Media Reveal How Police Bungled Serial Murder Case, 840
- Nov. 3, 1996: Car Crash Reveals Depth of Government Corruption in Turkey, 843
- Jan., 1997: Pyramid Investment Schemes Cause Albanian Government to Fall, 846
- June 25, 1997: Swiss Banks Admit to Holding Accounts of Holocaust Victims, 858
- Aug. 31, 1997: Princess Diana Dies in a Car Crash, 861
- Apr., 1998: Scottish Historian Is Charged with Plagiarism, 879
- Dec. 23, 1998: Prominent Belgians Are Sentenced in Agusta-Dassault Corruption Scandal, 889
- Dec., 2000: Sexual Abuse of Children in France Leads to the Outreau Affair, 922
- 2001: Clearstream Financial Clearinghouse Is Accused of Fraud and Money Laundering, 925
- Jan. 30, 2001: Liverpool Children's Hospital Collects Body Parts Without Authorization, 927
- Feb. 18, 2001: CIA Agent Robert Hanssen Is Arrested for Spying for the Russians, 931
- Feb. 11, 2002: French Judge Admits Favoring Russian Figure Skaters in Winter Olympics, 962
- Sept. 28, 2002: British Politician Reveals Her Affair with Prime Minister John Major, 983
- May 21, 2003: Sexually Provocative Film The Brown Bunny Premieres at Cannes Film Festival, 1004
- Jan. 27, 2005: German Soccer Referee Admits to Fixing Games for Money, 1055
- Sept. 30, 2005: Danish Newspaper's Prophet Muhammad Cartoons Stir Violent Protests, 1075
- Jan. 21, 2006: British Politician Resigns After Gay-Sex Orgy, 1084
- Apr. 26, 2006: Britain's Deputy Prime Minister Admits Affair with Secretary, 1089
- May 4, 2006: Media Uncover Match-Fixing in Italian Soccer, 1092
- Aug. 12, 2006: Novelist Günter Grass Admits to Youthful Nazi Ties, 1109
- Nov. 23, 2006: Former Russian Security Service Officer Dies from Radiation Poisoning, 1132
- FRANCE
- July 12, 1906: French Court Declares Alfred Dreyfus Innocent of Treason, 19
- 1909-1916: Dancer Isadora Duncan Begins Affair with Millionaire Heir, 34

1910: Nobelist Marie Curie Has Affair with Physicist Paul Langevin, 37
 May, 1915: British Government Falls Because of Munitions Shortages and Military Setbacks, 58
 June 6, 1929: Luis Buñuel's Un Chien Andalou Shocks Parisian Audience, 136
 Nov., 1929: Banque Oustric et Cie Failure Prompts French Inquiry, 139
 Dec. 3, 1930: Surrealist Film L'Âge d'or Provokes French Rioting, 147
 Jan. 8, 1934-Jan. 17, 1936: Stavisky's Fraudulent Schemes Rock French Government, 170
 Apr. 22, 1942: French Prime Minister Pierre Laval Wants Germany to Win World War II, 209
 Aug. 14, 1945: French War Hero Pétain Is Convicted of Nazi Collaboration, 232
 May 27, 1949: Actor Rita Hayworth Marries Aly Khan After Adulterous Affair, 254
 Aug. 26, 1949: Viet Minh Broadcasts French General's Damaging Report, 257
 Oct. 29, 1965: Moroccan Politician Mehdi Ben Barka Disappears in Paris, 374
 May 20, 1974: French Cardinal Daniélou Dies in a Prostitute's House, 456
 Feb. 1, 1978: Roman Polanski Flees the United States to Avoid Rape Trial, 522
 Oct. 10, 1979: French President Giscard d'Estaing Is Accused of Taking a Bribe, 550
 July 10, 1985: French Secret Service Sinks the Greenpeace Ship Rainbow Warrior, 651
 Aug. 31, 1997: Princess Diana Dies in a Car Crash, 861
 Dec., 2000: Sexual Abuse of Children in France Leads to the Outreau Affair, 922
 Feb. 11, 2002: French Judge Admits Favoring Russian Figure Skaters in Winter Olympics, 962
 May 21, 2003: Sexually Provocative Film The Brown Bunny Premieres at Cannes Film Festival, 1004

GERMANY

1906-1909: Emperor William II's Homosexual "Circle" Scandalizes Germany, 9
 Mar. 26, 1922: Hindemith's Opera Sancta Susanna Depicts a Nun's Sexual Desires, 76

July, 1925: Nosferatu Is Found to Have Violated Dracula Copyright, 111
 Oct. 11-22, 1937: Duke and Duchess of Windsor Visit Nazi Germany, 196
 1956-1962: Prescription Thalidomide Causes Widespread Birth Disorders, 301
 Oct. 26, 1962: West German Police Raid Der Spiegel Magazine Offices, 349
 Feb. 23, 1963: Play Accuses Pope Pius XII of Complicity in the Holocaust, 353
 Nov. 9, 1976: German Generals Must Retire for Supporting a Neo-Nazi Pilot, 503
 Apr. 25, 1983: German Magazine Publishes Faked Hitler Diaries, 618
 Aug. 19, 1985: West German Counterintelligence Chief Defects to East Germany, 657
 Jan. 27, 2005: German Soccer Referee Admits to Fixing Games for Money, 1055
 Aug. 12, 2006: Novelist Günter Grass Admits to Youthful Nazi Ties, 1109

GREAT BRITAIN. See ENGLAND; SCOTLANDHONDURAS

Feb. 3, 1975: Honduras's "Bananagate" Bribery Scandal Leads to Executive's Suicide, 471

IRAN

Nov. 13, 1986-May 4, 1989: Iran-Contra Weapons Scandal Taints Reagan's Administration, 676

IRAQ

July 14, 2003: Columnist Robert Novak Leaks the Name of CIA Operative Valerie Plame, 1010
 Apr. 28, 2004: CBS Broadcasts Photos of Abused and Tortured Prisoners at Abu Ghraib, 1034

IRELAND. See also NORTHERN IRELAND

Feb. 23, 1943: Irish Orphan School Fire Kills Thirty-five Girls, 217
 May 6, 1992: Irish Bishop Eamonn Casey's Romantic Affair Leads to His Resignation, 779

ITALY

- Dec. 14, 1945: Poet Ezra Pound Is Charged with Treason and Institutionalized, 236
- Feb. 7, 1950: Swedish Film Star Ingrid Bergman Has a Child Out of Wedlock, 263
- May 23, 1981: Italian Justice Minister Resigns Because of Crime Connection, 591
- Aug. 6, 1982: Banco Ambrosiano Collapses Amid Criminal Accusations, 606
- May 4, 2006: Media Uncover Match-Fixing in Italian Soccer, 1092

JAPAN

- Fall, 1969-Winter, 1971: Japanese Baseball Players Are Implicated in Game Fixing, 398
- Feb. 4, 1976: Lockheed Is Implicated in Bribing Foreign Officials, 482
- June, 1988-June, 1989: Insider-Trading Scandal Rocks Japanese Government, 714
- Aug. 10, 1989: Japanese Prime Minister Sosuke Resigns After Affair with a Geisha, 733
- Nov. 5, 2000: Japanese Amateur Archaeologist's "Discoveries" Are Proven Fakes, 919
- May 28, 2007: Japanese Politician Charged with Corruption Hangs Himself, 1145

KENYA

- Late 1955: British Atrocities in Kenya's Mau Mau Rebellion Are Revealed, 298

LIBERIA

- 1930: Liberia Is Accused of Selling Its Own Citizens into Slavery, 142
- Nov. 17, 2005: Liberian Workers Sue Bridgestone Firestone over Slave Labor, 1078

LIBYA

- Late July, 1980: President's Brother, Billy Carter, Registers as a Paid Agent for Libya, 571

LUXEMBOURG

- 2001: Clearstream Financial Clearinghouse Is Accused of Fraud and Money Laundering, 925

MEXICO

- May-June, 1926: Evangelist Aimee Semple McPherson Claims She Was Kidnapped, 115

- Feb. 28, 1995: Former Mexican President Carlos Salinas's Brother Is Arrested for Murder, 824

MIDDLE EAST. See also AFRICA; ASIA

- Oct. 29, 1965: Moroccan Politician Mehdi Ben Barka Disappears in Paris, 374
- Nov. 13, 1986-May 4, 1989: Iran-Contra Weapons Scandal Taints Reagan's Administration, 676
- Nov. 3, 1996: Car Crash Reveals Depth of Government Corruption in Turkey, 843
- Aug. 31, 1997: Princess Diana Dies in a Car Crash, 861
- July 14, 2003: Columnist Robert Novak Leaks the Name of CIA Operative Valerie Plame, 1010
- Apr. 28, 2004: CBS Broadcasts Photos of Abused and Tortured Prisoners at Abu Ghraib, 1034

MOROCCO

- Oct. 29, 1965: Moroccan Politician Mehdi Ben Barka Disappears in Paris, 374

NEW ZEALAND

- July 10, 1985: French Secret Service Sinks the Greenpeace Ship Rainbow Warrior, 651
- July, 2002: Journalist Alleges Release of Genetically Modified Corn Seeds in New Zealand, 974
- Sept. 17, 2006: New Zealand Prime Minister's Husband Is "Outed" as Gay, 1112

NICARAGUA

- Nov. 13, 1986-May 4, 1989: Iran-Contra Weapons Scandal Taints Reagan's Administration, 676

NORTH AMERICA. See CANADA; UNITED STATESNORTHERN IRELAND

- May 28, 1970: Irish Politicians Are Tried for Conspiring to Import Weapons, 413
- Oct. 19, 1982: Car Manufacturer John De Lorean Is Arrested in a Drug Sting, 609

NORWAY

May 9, 1945: Norwegian Politician Quisling Is Arrested for Nazi Collaboration, 226

May 26, 1945: Norwegian Writer Knut Hamsun Is Arrested for Treason, 229

PACIFIC ISLANDS. See AUSTRALASIA

PAKISTAN

May 27, 1949: Actor Rita Hayworth Marries Aly Khan After Adulterous Affair, 254

Jan. 15, 2005: Iqbal Riza Resigns from the United Nations in Oil-for-Food Scandal, 1053

PHILIPPINES

May 11, 1982: Philippine President Marcos Forces the Entire Supreme Court to Resign, 600

Aug. 21, 1983: Filipino Opposition Leader Aquino Is Assassinated on Return Home, 628

ROMANIA

Dec. 15-25, 1989: Harassment of a Christian Minister Sparks the Romanian Revolution, 742

Sept. 26, 2000: Gymnast Andreea Răducan Loses Her Olympic Gold Medal Because of Drugs, 916

RUSSIA. See also SOVIET UNION

Mar. 31, 1933: New York Times Reporter Denies Reports of a Soviet Famine, 167

June, 1956: George F. Kennan Proves Russian Sisson Documents Are Fakes, 307

Sept. 12, 1962: British Civil Servant Is Arrested for Spying, 347

Mar. 4, 1966: Munsinger Sex and Spy Scandal Rocks Canada, 377

Feb. 18, 2001: CIA Agent Robert Hanssen Is Arrested for Spying for the Russians, 931

Feb. 11, 2002: French Judge Admits Favoring Russian Figure Skaters in Winter Olympics, 962

Nov. 23, 2006: Former Russian Security Service Officer Dies from Radiation Poisoning, 1132

SCOTLAND

Apr., 1998: Scottish Historian Is Charged with Plagiarism, 879

SOUTH AFRICA

June 4, 1979: South African President B. J. Vorster Resigns in Muldergate Scandal, 543

SOUTH AMERICA. See CENTRAL AND SOUTH AMERICA

SOUTH KOREA

1976-1977: U.S. Congress Members Are Implicated in Koreagate Scandal, 479

June 30, 2001: Korean Religious Teacher Jung Myung Seok Is Charged with Rape, 939

May 12, 2006: Scientist Is Indicted for Faking His Research on Creating Stem Cells, 1094

SOVIET UNION. See also RUSSIA

Mar. 31, 1933: New York Times Reporter Denies Reports of a Soviet Famine, 167

Sept. 12, 1962: British Civil Servant Is Arrested for Spying, 347

SPAIN

1930: Liberia Is Accused of Selling Its Own Citizens into Slavery, 142

SWEDEN

Feb. 7, 1950: Swedish Film Star Ingrid Bergman Has a Child Out of Wedlock, 263

SWITZERLAND

1930: Liberia Is Accused of Selling Its Own Citizens into Slavery, 142

1956-1962: Prescription Thalidomide Causes Widespread Birth Disorders, 301

June 25, 1997: Swiss Banks Admit to Holding Accounts of Holocaust Victims, 858

TONGA

1976: Peace Corps Conceals Murder of Volunteer in Tonga, 476

TURKEY

Nov. 3, 1996: Car Crash Reveals Depth of Government Corruption in Turkey, 843

UNITED KINGDOM. See ENGLAND; NORTHERN IRELAND; SCOTLANDUNITED STATES

1904: Theodore Roosevelt Is Accused of Accepting Corporate Funds, 1

Jan. 23, 1904: Senator Joseph R. Burton Is Convicted of Bribery, 4

Dec., 1904: Boston Alderman Is Reelected While in Jail for Fraud, 6

June 25, 1906: Millionaire Heir Murders Architect Stanford White, 16

Dec. 8, 1906: Former U.S. Senator Arthur Brown Is Murdered by Lover, 22

1907: Elinor Glyn's Novel Three Weeks Shocks Readers, 25

June 13, 1907: San Francisco Mayor Schmitz Is Found Guilty of Extortion, 28

Mar. 25, 1911: Nearly 150 Workers Die in Triangle Shirtwaist Factory Fire, 40

Jan. 13, 1913: Federal Judge Is Impeached for Profiting from His Office, 46

Feb. 17-Mar. 15, 1913: Armory Modern Art Show Scandalizes the Public, 49

May 13, 1913: Boxer Jack Johnson Is Imprisoned for Abetting Prostitution, 52

July 27, 1917: Millionaire Socialite Dies Under Suspicious Circumstances, 60

1919-1920: Ponzi Schemes Are Revealed as Investment Frauds, 63

Sept. 21, 1919: White Sox Players Conspire to Lose World Series in "Black Sox" Scandal, 66

July 19, 1921: U.S. Senate Rebukes Navy in Homosexuality Investigation, 70

Feb. 1, 1922: Director Taylor's Murder Ruins Mabel Normand's Acting Career, 73

Apr. 12, 1922: Film Star Fatty Arbuckle Is Acquitted of Manslaughter, 79

Jan. 18, 1923: Actor Wallace Reid's Death in Drug Rehab Shakes Film Industry, 86

Mar. 2, 1923: U.S. Senate Investigates Veterans Bureau Chief for Fraud, 89

May 30, 1923: U.S. Attorney General Harry M. Daugherty's Aide Commits Suicide, 92

Oct. 22, 1923: U.S. Senate Begins Hearings on Teapot Dome Oil Leases, 95

Jan. 1, 1924: Film Star Mabel Normand's Chauffeur Shoots Millionaire Courtland S. Dines, 100

May 12, 1924: Kentucky Congressman John W. Langley Is Convicted of Violating the Volstead Act, 103

Nov. 19, 1924: Film Producer Thomas H. Ince Dies After Weekend on Hearst's Yacht, 108

May-June, 1926: Evangelist Aimee Semple McPherson Claims She Was Kidnapped, 115

Dec. 26, 1926: Ty Cobb and Tris Speaker Are Accused of Fixing Baseball Games, 118

1927: Mae West's Play About Gays Is Banned on Broadway, 122

1927: President Warren G. Harding's Lover Publishes Tell-All Memoir, 124

Early 1928: Joseph P. Kennedy Begins an Affair with Gloria Swanson, 127

1928-1929: Actor Is Suspected of Falsely Claiming to Be an American Indian, 130

May, 1930: Postmaster's Division of Airmail Routes Creates a Scandal, 144

Mar. 30, 1931: "Scottsboro Boys" Are Railroaded Through Rape Trials, 150

1932: Insull Utilities Trusts Collapse Prompts New Federal Regulation, 154

July 28, 1932: U.S. Troops Drive World War I Veterans from Washington, 156

Sept. 4, 1932: Film Star Jean Harlow's Husband Is an Apparent Suicide, 160

May 16, 1934: General Douglas MacArthur Sues Newspaper Columnist for Libel, 173

Dec. 16, 1935: Film Star Thelma Todd's Death Cannot Be Explained, 178

Summer, 1936: Film Star Mary Astor's Diary Becomes a Public Sensation, 184

Mar. 17, 1937: Atherton Report Exposes San Francisco Police Corruption, 191

Sept.-Oct., 1937: Prescription Elixir Causes More than One Hundred Deaths, 193

May 22, 1939: Kansas City's Boss Pendergast Pleads Guilty to Income Tax Evasion, 199

Feb. 6, 1942: Film Star Errol Flynn Is Acquitted of Rape, 202
 Feb. 19, 1942: President Roosevelt Orders Internment of Japanese Americans, 205
 Jan. 14, 1943: Film Star Frances Farmer Is Jailed and Institutionalized, 214
 June 4, 1943: Actor Charles Chaplin Is Sued for Paternity, 220
 Dec. 14, 1945: Poet Ezra Pound Is Charged with Treason and Institutionalized, 236
 Nov. 23, 1946: Tennis Star Bill Tilden Is Arrested for Lewd Behavior with a Minor, 239
 Spring, 1947: Baseball Manager Leo Durocher Is Suspended for Gambling Ties, 242
 July 5, 1948: Actor Carole Landis Commits Suicide During Affair with Rex Harrison, 245
 Aug. 4, 1948: Columnist Drew Pearson Exposes Congressman's Corruption, 248
 Aug. 31, 1948: Film Star Robert Mitchum Is Arrested for Drug Possession, 251
 Jan. 21, 1950: Alger Hiss Is Convicted of Perjury, 259
 Feb. 9, 1950: U.S. Senator Joseph McCarthy Launches Communist Witch Hunt, 266
 May 3, 1950: U.S. Senate Committee Begins Investigating Organized Crime, 270
 Jan. 17, 1951: College Basketball Players Begin Shaving Points for Money, 274
 Nov. 16, 1951: Federal Tax Official Resigns After Accepting Bribes, 279
 Sept. 19, 1952: Actor Charles Chaplin Cannot Reenter the United States, 283
 Sept. 23, 1952: Richard Nixon Denies Taking Illegal Campaign Contributions, 286
 Dec. 1, 1952: George Jorgensen Becomes Christine Jorgensen, 289
 May, 1955: Scandal Magazine Reveals Actor Rory Calhoun's Criminal Past, 295
 June, 1956: George F. Kennan Proves Russian Sisson Documents Are Fakes, 307
 June 25, 1956: President Truman's Appointments Secretary Is Convicted of Tax Conspiracy, 310
 Dec. 12, 1957: Rock Star Jerry Lee Lewis Marries Thirteen-Year-Old Cousin, 313
 Apr. 4, 1958: Actor Lana Turner's Daughter Kills Turner's Gangster Lover, 317

Sept. 22, 1958: President Eisenhower's Chief of Staff Resigns for Influence Selling, 320
 May, 1959: Teamsters Leader Dave Beck Is Convicted of Tax Fraud, 323
 Nov. 2, 1959: Charles Van Doren Admits to Being Fed Answers on Television Quiz Show, 326
 Feb. 7, 1960: President Kennedy's Romantic Affair Links Him to Organized Crime, 329
 Feb. 8, 1960: U.S. Congress Investigates Payola in Pop Music Industry, 332
 Mar. 14, 1960: FCC Chairman John C. Doerfer Resigns for Accepting Gifts from Networks, 335
 July, 1961: Psychologist Stanley Milgram Begins Obedience-to-Authority Experiments, 338
 Mar. 29, 1962: Billie Sol Estes Is Arrested for Corporate Fraud, 341
 May 19, 1962: Marilyn Monroe Sings "Happy Birthday, Mr. President," 344
 July 2, 1963: Muslim Leader Elijah Muhammad Is Sued for Paternity, 359
 Oct. 7, 1963: Vice President Lyndon B. Johnson Aide Resigns over Crime Connections, 365
 Mar. 13, 1964: Kitty Genovese Dies as Her Cries for Help Are Ignored, 369
 Oct. 7, 1964: President Lyndon Johnson's Aide Is Arrested in Gay-Sex Sting, 371
 Mar. 1, 1967: Adam Clayton Powell, Jr., Is Excluded from Congress, 380
 June 23, 1967: Senator Thomas J. Dodd Is Censured for Misappropriating Funds, 384
 Sept. 5, 1967: Socialite Nancy Wakeman Shoots Her Politician-Husband, 386
 Nov. 28, 1967: Investor Louis Wolfson Is Convicted of Selling Stock Illegally, 389
 May 9, 1969: Supreme Court Justice Abe Fortas Is Accused of Bribery, 391
 July 18, 1969: Senator Edward Kennedy's Driving Accident Kills Mary Jo Kopechne, 394
 Dec. 30, 1969: United Mine Workers Leader Joseph Yablonski Is Murdered, 404
 1970: Study of Anonymous Gay Sex Leads to Ethics Scandal, 407
 May 4, 1970: National Guardsmen Kill Protesting Kent State Students, 410

- June 13, 1971: New York Times Publishes the Pentagon Papers, 416
- Aug. 20, 1971: Abusive Role-Playing Ends Stanford Prison Experiment, 420
- Jan. 28, 1972: Clifford Irving Admits Faking Howard Hughes Memoirs, 422
- June 17, 1972-Aug. 9, 1974: Watergate Break-in Leads to President Nixon's Resignation, 425
- July 25, 1972: Newspaper Breaks Story of Abuses in Tuskegee Syphilis Study, 437
- July 31, 1972: Thomas F. Eagleton Withdraws from Vice Presidential Race, 440
- Aug. 19, 1973: Cheating Scandal Shocks Soap Box Derby, 444
- Oct. 10, 1973: Spiro T. Agnew Resigns Vice Presidency in Disgrace, 447
- Apr. 15, 1974: Kidnapped Heir Patty Hearst Helps Rob a Bank, 450
- May 14, 1974: Washington Post Reveals That the Nixons Received Jewelry Gifts, 453
- Summer, 1974: Dalkon Shield Contraceptive Is Removed from the Market, 459
- Oct. 7, 1974: Congressman Wilbur D. Mills's Stripper Affair Leads to His Downfall, 462
- Oct. 25, 1974: Evangelist Billy James Hargis Resigns College Presidency During Gay-Sex Scandal, 465
- Feb. 3, 1975: Honduras's "Bananagate" Bribery Scandal Leads to Executive's Suicide, 471
- Oct. 31, 1975: Buddhist Teacher Orders His Students to Remove Their Clothes, 474
- 1976-1977: U.S. Congress Members Are Implicated in Koreagate Scandal, 479
- Feb. 4, 1976: Lockheed Is Implicated in Bribing Foreign Officials, 482
- Mar. 21, 1976: Actor Claudine Longet Kills Ski Champion Vladimir Sabich, 485
- Apr. 4, 1976: West Point Cadets Are Caught Cheating on Exams, 488
- May 23, 1976: Washington Post Exposes Congressman Wayne L. Hays's Affair, 491
- Sept. 1, 1976: Former Beatle George Harrison Loses Plagiarism Lawsuit, 494
- Sept., 1976: Jimmy Carter Admits Committing Adultery in His Heart, 497
- Oct. 4, 1976: Agriculture Secretary Earl Butz Resigns After Making Obscene Joke, 500
- Jan., 1977: Singer Anita Bryant Campaigns Against Lesbian and Gay Rights, 506
- Feb. 25, 1977: Film Producer David Begelman Is Found to Have Forged Checks, 509
- Sept. 21, 1977: Carter Cabinet Member Resigns over Ethics Violations, 511
- Sept. 23, 1977: Horse-Swapping Fraud Upsets Belmont Park Raceway, 514
- 1978: Actor Joan Crawford's Daughter Publishes Damning Memoir, Mommie Dearest, 517
- 1978: Roots Author Alex Haley Is Sued for Plagiarism, 520
- Feb. 1, 1978: Roman Polanski Flees the United States to Avoid Rape Trial, 522
- June 27, 1978: Evangelist Herbert W. Armstrong Excommunicates His Own Son, 525
- July 23, 1978: Utah Millionaire Is Murdered by His Grandson, 528
- Oct. 20, 1978: Firestone Recalls Millions of Defective Car Tires, 534
- Jan. 26, 1979: Former Vice President Nelson Rockefeller Dies Mysteriously, 537
- Apr. 18, 1979: Actor Lee Marvin Is Ordered to Pay Palimony to Former Lover, 540
- Sept. 26, 1979: Love Canal Residents Sue Chemical Company, 546
- Oct. 11, 1979: Senate Denounces Herman E. Talmadge for Money Laundering, 553
- Nov. 29, 1979, and Jan. 31, 1983: Baseball Commissioner Suspends Mickey Mantle and Willie Mays for Casino Ties, 556
- 1980: Biographer Claims Actor Errol Flynn Was a Nazi Spy, 559
- Feb. 2, 1980: Media Uncover FBI Sting Implicating Dozens of Lawmakers, 561
- Mar. 10, 1980: Scarsdale Diet Doctor Is Killed by His Lover, 565
- Apr. 27, 1980: Mobster's Arrest Reveals Point Shaving by Boston College Basketball Players, 568
- Late July, 1980: President's Brother, Billy Carter, Registers as a Paid Agent for Libya, 571
- July 28, 1980: Magazine Reveals Baseball Star Steve Garvey's Marital Problems, 574

- Sept. 3, 1980: Congressman Bauman Is Arrested for Liaison with Teenage Boy, 577
- Oct. 9, 1980: Bendix Executive Resigns Amid Rumors of an Affair, 580
- Dec. 7, 1980: Rita Jenrette's "Diary of a Mad Congresswife" Scandalizes Washington, 582
- Apr. 15, 1981: Janet Cooke Admits Fabricating Her Pulitzer Prize-Winning Feature, 585
- Apr. 28, 1981: Tennis Star Billie Jean King Is Sued for Palimony, 588
- May 29, 1981: Court Finds That Ford Ignored Pinto's Safety Problems, 594
- Sept. 10, 1981: Chicago Sun-Times Reports That Cardinal Cody Diverted Church Funds, 597
- July 20, 1982: Conservative Politician John G. Schmitz Is Found to Have Children Out of Wedlock, 603
- Oct. 19, 1982: Car Manufacturer John De Lorean Is Arrested in a Drug Sting, 609
- Dec., 1982: Julie Andrews and Blake Edwards Deny Being Gay, 612
- Dec. 16, 1982: Congress Cites Environmental Protection Agency Chief for Contempt, 615
- July 20, 1983: Congress Members Censured in House-Page Sex Scandal, 621
- Aug. 12, 1983-July 27, 1990: McMartin Pre-school Is Embroiled in Child-Abuse Case, 624
- Jan. 25, 1984: Jesse Jackson Calls New York City "Hymietown," 633
- May 2, 1984: E. F. Hutton Executives Plead Guilty to Fraud, 636
- July 23, 1984: Vanessa Williams Is the First Miss America to Resign, 638
- Dec. 22, 1984: Subway Vigilante Bernhard Goetz Shoots Four Black Youths, 641
- May 7, 1985: Banker Jake Butcher Pleads Guilty to Fraud, 648
- July 19, 1985: Mayflower Madam Pleads Guilty to Promoting Prostitution, 654
- Oct. 23, 1985: Guru Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh Is Indicted for Immigration Fraud, 662
- Feb. 28, 1986: Baseball Commissioner Peter Ueberroth Suspends Players for Cocaine Use, 666
- Apr. 22, 1986: Faith Healer Peter Popoff Is Exposed as a Fraud, 673
- Nov. 13, 1986-May 4, 1989: Iran-Contra Weapons Scandal Taints Reagan's Administration, 676
- Jan. 22, 1987: Pennsylvania Politician Kills Himself at Televised Press Conference, 684
- Feb. 25, 1987: NCAA Imposes "Death Penalty" on Southern Methodist University Football, 687
- Mar. 19, 1987: Jim Bakker Resigns as Head of PTL Television Network, 690
- Apr. 9, 1987: Bess Myerson Resigns as New York Commissioner of Cultural Affairs, 693
- Sept. 23, 1987: Plagiarism Charges End Joe Biden's Presidential Campaign, 698
- Nov. 28, 1987: Black Teenager Claims to Have Been Gang-Raped by Police Officers, 702
- Dec. 1, 1987: Yale Scholar's Wartime Anti-Semitic Writings Are Revealed, 705
- Jan. 15, 1988: ZZZZ Best Founder Is Indicted on Federal Fraud Charges, 708
- Feb. 21, 1988: Evangelist Jimmy Swaggart Tearfully Confesses His Adultery, 711
- July 18, 1988: Actor Rob Lowe Videotapes His Sexual Encounter with a Minor, 717
- Sept. 19, 1988: Stephen Breuning Pleads Guilty to Medical Research Fraud, 720
- Mar. 23, 1989: Scientists' "Cold Fusion" Claims Cannot Be Verified, 723
- Mar. 29, 1989: Financier Michael Milken Is Indicted for Racketeering and Fraud, 726
- May 31, 1989: Speaker of the House Jim Wright Resigns in Ethics Scandal, 730
- Aug. 24, 1989: Pete Rose Is Banned from Baseball for Betting on Games, 735
- Jan. 18, 1990: Washington, D.C., Mayor Marion Barry Is Arrested for Drug Use, 748
- Mar., 1990: Menendez Brothers Are Arrested for Murdering Their Parents, 750
- Nov. 19, 1990: Lip-Synching Duo Milli Vanilli Lose Grammy Award, 756
- Mar. 30, 1991: William Kennedy Smith Is Accused of Rape, 759
- Apr. 5, 1991: George W. Bush Is Investigated for Insider Trading, 762
- July 26, 1991: Comedian Pee-wee Herman Is Arrested for Public Indecency, 765

- Oct. 11-13, 1991: Justice Clarence Thomas's Confirmation Hearings Create a Scandal, 768
- Jan. 13, 1992: Woody Allen Has Affair with Lover Mia Farrow's Adopted Daughter, 773
- Apr. 15, 1992: Hotel Tycoon Leona Helmsley Enters Prison for Tax Evasion, 776
- May 19, 1992: Amy Fisher Shoots Mary Jo Buttafuoco, 781
- June 26, 1992: U.S. Navy Secretary Resigns in the Wake of Tailhook Sexual Assault Scandal, 784
- June 23, 1993: Lorena Bobbitt Severs Her Husband's Penis, 795
- Apr. 28, 1994: U.S. Naval Academy Expels Midshipmen for Cheating, 800
- June 1, 1994: Congressman Dan Rostenkowski Is Indicted in House Post Office Scandal, 803
- June 12, 1994: Double Murder Leads to Sensational O. J. Simpson Trial, 806
- June 24, 1994: Time Magazine Cover Uses Altered O. J. Simpson Photo, 810
- June 30, 1994: Tonya Harding Is Banned from Skating After Attack on Rival, 812
- July 1, 1994: Soccer Star Diego Maradona Is Expelled from World Cup, 815
- Aug. 5, 1994: Kenneth Starr Is Appointed to the Whitewater Investigation, 818
- Aug. 21, 1994: Sex Scandal Forces Dismissal of NAACP Chief Benjamin Chavis, 821
- June 27, 1995: Film Star Hugh Grant Is Arrested for Lewd Conduct, 827
- Feb. 4, 1996: Whistle-Blower Reveals Tobacco Industry Corruption, 833
- Spring, 1996: Physicist Publishes a Deliberately Fraudulent Article, 837
- Feb. 26, 1997: Teacher Mary Kay Letourneau Is Arrested for Statutory Rape, 849
- May 20, 1997: Air Force Prosecution of Female Officer for Adultery Reveals Double Standard, 855
- Sept. 22, 1997: Sportscaster Marv Albert Is Tried for Sexual Assault, 865
- Dec. 11, 1997: HUD Secretary Henry Cisneros Is Indicted for Lying to Federal Agents, 872
- Jan. 17, 1998: President Bill Clinton Denies Sexual Affair with a White House Intern, 874
- Apr. 7, 1998: Pop Singer George Michael Is Arrested for Lewd Conduct, 881
- May, 1998: Police Corruption Is Revealed in Los Angeles's Rampart Division, 884
- May 11, 1998: Journalist Stephen Glass Is Exposed as a Fraud, 887
- May, 1999: Civil Rights Leader Jesse Jackson Fathers a Child Out of Wedlock, 895
- Jan. 28, 2000: John Spano Is Sentenced for Fraudulent Purchase of Ice Hockey Team, 901
- May 2, 2000: New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani's Extramarital Affair Is Revealed, 904
- May 9, 2000: Former Louisiana Governor Edwin Edwards Is Convicted on Corruption Charges, 907
- Sept. 19, 2000: Ex-gay Leader John Paulk Is Photographed Leaving a Gay Bar, 913
- Feb. 18, 2001: CIA Agent Robert Hanssen Is Arrested for Spying for the Russians, 931
- Apr. 30, 2001: Washington Intern Chandra Levy Disappears, 933
- June 18, 2001: Award-Winning Historian Joseph J. Ellis Is Accused of Lying, 936
- Dec. 2, 2001: Enron Bankruptcy Reveals Massive Financial Fraud, 945
- Dec. 14, 2001: Notre Dame Football Coach Resigns for Falsifying His Résumé, 948
- Jan. 4, 2002: Historian Stephen E. Ambrose Is Accused of Plagiarism, 951
- Jan. 6, 2002: Boston Globe Reports on Child Sexual Abuse by Roman Catholic Priests, 954
- Jan. 18, 2002: Historian Doris Kearns Goodwin Is Accused of Plagiarism, 959
- Feb. 11, 2002: French Judge Admits Favoring Russian Figure Skaters in Winter Olympics, 962
- Feb. 17, 2002: Rotting Human Bodies Are Found at Georgia Crematory, 964
- Mar. 27, 2002: Georgia Basketball Coach Jim Harrick, Sr., Resigns over Fraud Allegations, 968
- June 25, 2002: Internal Corruption Forces Adelphia Communications to Declare Bankruptcy, 971
- Sept. 25, 2002: Inquiry Reveals That Physicist Jan Hendrik Schön Faked His Research, 980

- Oct. 25, 2002: Historian Michael A. Bellesiles Resigns After Academic Fraud Accusations, 985
- Dec. 5, 2002: Senator Trent Lott Praises Strom Thurmond's 1948 Presidential Campaign, 988
- Jan. 2, 2003: E-mail Message Prompts Inquiry into Air Force Academy Sexual Assaults, 991
- Mar. 2, 2003: U.S. National Security Agency Is Found to Have Spied on U.N. Officials, 995
- Apr. 29, 2003: New York Times Reporter Jayson Blair Is Exposed as a Fraud, 998
- May 3, 2003: University of Alabama Fires New Football Coach in Sex Scandal, 1002
- July 1, 2003: Basketball Star Kobe Bryant Is Accused of Rape, 1008
- July 14, 2003: Columnist Robert Novak Leaks the Name of CIA Operative Valerie Plame, 1010
- Sept. 3, 2003: Mutual Fund Companies Are Implicated in Shady Trading Practices, 1013
- Oct. 2, 2003: Newspaper Claims That Arnold Schwarzenegger Groped Women, 1016
- Early Nov., 2003: Paris Hilton Sex-Tape Appears on the Web, 1019
- Dec. 17, 2003: Senator Strom Thurmond's Biracial Daughter Is Revealed, 1022
- Dec. 18, 2003: Pop Star Michael Jackson Is Charged with Child Molestation, 1025
- Mar. 4, 2004: Former United Way Charity Chief Pleads Guilty to Embezzlement, 1028
- Mar. 5, 2004: Martha Stewart Is Convicted in Insider-Trading Scandal, 1031
- June 2, 2004: U.N. Report Reveals That Secretary-General Kofi Annan Dismissed Sexual Harassment Charges, 1039
- Aug. 19, 2004: Blog "Outs" Antigay Congressman Edward Schrock, 1041
- Sept. 8, 2004: 60 Minutes II Reports on George W. Bush's Evasion of Wartime Duty, 1044
- Oct. 13, 2004: Television Producer Files Sex Harassment Suit Against Bill O'Reilly, 1047
- Oct. 14, 2004: Insurance Brokerage Marsh & McLennan Is Charged with Fraud, 1050
- Jan. 15, 2005: Iqbal Riza Resigns from the United Nations in Oil-for-Food Scandal, 1053
- Mar. 17, 2005: Former Baseball Star Mark McGwire Evades Congressional Questions on Steroid Use, 1058
- June 22, 2005: U.S. Air Force Investigates Religious Intolerance at Its Academy, 1062
- July 1, 2005: Federal Agents Raid Congressman Randall Cunningham's Home, 1064
- Beginning Aug. 29, 2005: Government Incompetence Mars Hurricane Katrina Relief Efforts, 1068
- Sept. 12, 2005: Westar Energy Executives Are Found Guilty of Looting Their Company, 1072
- Nov. 17, 2005: Liberian Workers Sue Bridgestone Firestone over Slave Labor, 1078
- Dec. 6, 2005: Spokane, Washington, Mayor Recalled in Gay-Sex Scandal, 1081
- Mar. 14, 2006: Duke Lacrosse Players Are Accused of Gang Rape, 1086
- Summer, 2006-Mar. 16, 2007: China Recalls Pet Food That Has Killed Thousands of American Pets, 1097
- July 14, 2006: New York Times Exposes Grading Scandal at Auburn University, 1101
- July 28, 2006: Actor Mel Gibson Is Caught Making Anti-Semitic Remarks, 1106
- Sept. 18, 2006: Newsweek Reveals That Hewlett-Packard Spied on Its Own Board, 1114
- Sept. 29, 2006: Congressman Mark Foley Resigns in Sex Scandal Involving a Teenage Page, 1118
- Nov. 2, 2006: Evangelist Kent Hovind Is Convicted of Federal Tax Violations, 1123
- Nov. 2, 2006: Male Escort Reveals Sexual Liaisons with Evangelist Ted Haggard, 1126
- Nov. 20, 2006: News Corp Abandons Plan to Publish O. J. Simpson's Book, 1129
- Early 2007: Subprime Mortgage Industry Begins to Collapse, 1134
- Feb. 18, 2007: Washington Post Exposes Decline of Walter Reed Army Hospital, 1138
- Apr. 11, 2007: Shock Jock Don Imus Loses His Radio Show over Sexist and Racist Remarks, 1142
- June 4, 2007: Congressman William J. Jefferson Is Indicted for Corruption, 1147
- July 9, 2007: Senator David Vitter's Name Is Found in D.C. Madam's Address Book, 1150

July 11, 2007: Florida Politician Is Arrested for Soliciting an Undercover Male Police Officer, 1153
July 24, 2007: University of Colorado Fires Professor for Plagiarism and Research Falsification, 1155
Aug. 20, 2007: Football Star Michael Vick Pleads Guilty to Financing a Dogfighting Ring, 1158
Sept. 13, 2007: New England Patriots Football Team Is Fined for Spying on Other Teams, 1161
Oct. 5, 2007: Olympic Champion Marion Jones Admits Steroid Use, 1164
Mar. 12, 2008: New York Governor Eliot Spitzer Resigns in Prostitution Scandal, 1167
June 13, 2008: Singer R. Kelly Is Acquitted on Child Pornography Charges, 1170
July 29, 2008: NBA Referee Tim Donaghy Is Sentenced to Prison for Betting on Games, 1172
Sept. 7, 2008: Financial Institutions and Markets Begin to Collapse, 1175

VATICAN CITY

Feb. 23, 1963: Play Accuses Pope Pius XII of Complicity in the Holocaust, 353
Aug. 6, 1982: Banco Ambrosiano Collapses Amid Criminal Accusations, 606

VENEZUELA

Sept., 2000: American Scientists Are Accused of Starting a Measles Epidemic in the Amazon, 910

VIETNAM

Aug. 26, 1949: Viet Minh Broadcasts French General's Damaging Report, 257
Aug. 14, 1963: Madame Nhu Derides Self-Immolation of Vietnamese Buddhists, 362
Nov. 13, 1969: American Massacre of Vietnamese Civilians at My Lai Is Revealed, 401
July 8-22, 1972: Jane Fonda's Visit to North Vietnam Outrages Many Americans, 434

CATEGORY INDEX

List of Categories

Art movements	1216	Literature	1238
Atrocities and war crimes	1216	Medicine and health care	1238
Banking and finance	1217	Military	1239
Business	1217	Murder and suicide	1240
Business and labor	1219	Music and performing arts	1241
Civil rights and liberties	1219	Organized crime and racketeering	1241
Colonialism and imperialism	1219	Performing arts	1242
Communications and media	1219	Plagiarism	1242
Corruption	1220	Politics	1242
Cultural and intellectual history	1223	Popular culture	1245
Drugs	1223	Prostitution	1246
Economics	1224	Psychology and psychiatry	1246
Education	1224	Public morals	1246
Environmental issues	1225	Publishing and journalism	1248
Espionage	1225	Racism	1251
Ethics	1225	Radio and television	1251
Families and children	1226	Religion	1252
Film	1227	Royalty	1252
Forgery	1227	Science and technology	1253
Gambling	1228	Sex	1253
Government	1228	Sex crimes	1255
Hoaxes, frauds, and charlatanism	1232	Social issues and reform	1256
Hollywood	1233	Space and aviation	1257
Human rights	1233	Sports	1257
International relations	1234	Trade and commerce	1258
Labor	1234	Violence	1258
Law and the courts	1234	Women's issues	1259

ART MOVEMENTS

Feb. 17-Mar. 15, 1913: Armory Modern Art Show Scandalizes the Public, 49
 June 6, 1929: Luis Buñuel's Un Chien Andalou Shocks Parisian Audience, 136
 Dec. 3, 1930: Surrealist Film L'Âge d'or Provokes French Rioting, 147
 Jan. 20, 1933: Hedy Lamarr Appears Nude in the Czech Film Exstase, 163
 May 21, 2003: Sexually Provocative Film The Brown Bunny Premieres at Cannes Film Festival, 1004

ATROCITIES AND WAR CRIMES

Nov. 15, 1908: Belgium Confiscates Congo Free State from King Leopold II, 31
 Dec. 5, 1942: Industrialist Charles Bedaux Is Arrested for Nazi Collaboration, 212
 May 9, 1945: Norwegian Politician Quisling Is Arrested for Nazi Collaboration, 226
 May 26, 1945: Norwegian Writer Knut Hamsun Is Arrested for Treason, 229
 Late 1955: British Atrocities in Kenya's Mau Mau Rebellion Are Revealed, 298
 Nov. 13, 1969: American Massacre of

Vietnamese Civilians at My Lai Is Revealed, 401
 May 28, 1970: Irish Politicians Are Tried for Conspiring to Import Weapons, 413
 Mar. 3, 1986: Former U.N. Secretary-General Kurt Waldheim's Nazi Past Is Revealed, 669
 Dec. 15-25, 1989: Harassment of a Christian Minister Sparks the Romanian Revolution, 742
 June 25, 1997: Swiss Banks Admit to Holding Accounts of Holocaust Victims, 858
 Apr. 28, 2004: CBS Broadcasts Photos of Abused and Tortured Prisoners at Abu Ghraib, 1034

BANKING AND FINANCE

1904: Theodore Roosevelt Is Accused of Accepting Corporate Funds, 1
 1919-1920: Ponzi Schemes Are Revealed as Investment Frauds, 63
 Nov., 1929: Banque Oustric et Cie Failure Prompts French Inquiry, 139
 1932: Insull Utilities Trusts Collapse Prompts New Federal Regulation, 154
 Jan. 8, 1934-Jan. 17, 1936: Stavisky's Fraudulent Schemes Rock French Government, 170
 May 20, 1936: British Cabinet Member Resigns After Budget Information Leak, 181
 Mar. 29, 1962: Billie Sol Estes Is Arrested for Corporate Fraud, 341
 Nov. 28, 1967: Investor Louis Wolfson Is Convicted of Selling Stock Illegally, 389
 Feb. 3, 1975: Honduras's "Bananagate" Bribery Scandal Leads to Executive's Suicide, 471
 Feb. 25, 1977: Film Producer David Begelman Is Found to Have Forged Checks, 509
 Sept. 21, 1977: Carter Cabinet Member Resigns over Ethics Violations, 511
 Oct. 11, 1979: Senate Denounces Herman E. Talmadge for Money Laundering, 553
 Aug. 6, 1982: Banco Ambrosiano Collapses Amid Criminal Accusations, 606
 May 2, 1984: E. F. Hutton Executives Plead Guilty to Fraud, 636
 May 7, 1985: Banker Jake Butcher Pleads Guilty to Fraud, 648
 Jan. 15, 1988: ZZZZ Best Founder Is Indicted on Federal Fraud Charges, 708

June, 1988-June, 1989: Insider-Trading Scandal Rocks Japanese Government, 714
 Mar. 29, 1989: Financier Michael Milken Is Indicted for Racketeering and Fraud, 726
 Aug. 27, 1990: Guinness Four Are Found Guilty of Share-Trading Fraud, 753
 Apr. 5, 1991: George W. Bush Is Investigated for Insider Trading, 762
 June 25, 1997: Swiss Banks Admit to Holding Accounts of Holocaust Victims, 858
 May 7, 1999-Mar. 2, 2001: Ethics Counselor Exonerates Canadian Prime Minister Jean Chrétien, 898
 Jan. 28, 2000: John Spano Is Sentenced for Fraudulent Purchase of Ice Hockey Team, 901
 2001: Clearstream Financial Clearinghouse Is Accused of Fraud and Money Laundering, 925
 Dec. 2, 2001: Enron Bankruptcy Reveals Massive Financial Fraud, 945
 June 25, 2002: Internal Corruption Forces Adelphia Communications to Declare Bankruptcy, 971
 Sept. 3, 2003: Mutual Fund Companies Are Implicated in Shady Trading Practices, 1013
 Sept. 12, 2005: Westar Energy Executives Are Found Guilty of Looting Their Company, 1072
 Early 2007: Subprime Mortgage Industry Begins to Collapse, 1134
 Sept. 7, 2008: Financial Institutions and Markets Begin to Collapse, 1175

BUSINESS

Jan. 23, 1904: Senator Joseph R. Burton Is Convicted of Bribery, 4
 Jan., 1913: British Prime Minister's Staff Is Investigated for Insider Trading, 43
 Oct. 22, 1923: U.S. Senate Begins Hearings on Teapot Dome Oil Leases, 95
 Nov., 1929: Banque Oustric et Cie Failure Prompts French Inquiry, 139
 May, 1930: Postmaster's Division of Airmail Routes Creates a Scandal, 144
 1932: Insull Utilities Trusts Collapse Prompts New Federal Regulation, 154
 Dec. 5, 1942: Industrialist Charles Bedaux Is Arrested for Nazi Collaboration, 212

- Nov. 16, 1951: Federal Tax Official Resigns After Accepting Bribes, 279
- June 25, 1956: President Truman's Appointments Secretary Is Convicted of Tax Conspiracy, 310
- Sept. 22, 1958: President Eisenhower's Chief of Staff Resigns for Influence Selling, 320
- Nov. 2, 1959: Charles Van Doren Admits to Being Fed Answers on Television Quiz Show, 326
- Feb. 8, 1960: U.S. Congress Investigates Payola in Pop Music Industry, 332
- Mar. 29, 1962: Billie Sol Estes Is Arrested for Corporate Fraud, 341
- Nov. 28, 1967: Investor Louis Wolfson Is Convicted of Selling Stock Illegally, 389
- June 22, 1972: Police Arrest Architect John Poulson for Bribery and Fraud, 431
- Summer, 1974: Dalkon Shield Contraceptive Is Removed from the Market, 459
- Feb. 3, 1975: Honduras's "Bananagate" Bribery Scandal Leads to Executive's Suicide, 471
- Feb. 4, 1976: Lockheed Is Implicated in Bribing Foreign Officials, 482
- Feb. 25, 1977: Film Producer David Begelman Is Found to Have Forged Checks, 509
- Sept. 23, 1977: Horse-Swapping Fraud Upsets Belmont Park Raceway, 514
- July 23, 1978: Utah Millionaire Is Murdered by His Grandson, 528
- Oct. 20, 1978: Firestone Recalls Millions of Defective Car Tires, 534
- Sept. 26, 1979: Love Canal Residents Sue Chemical Company, 546
- Oct. 9, 1980: Bendix Executive Resigns Amid Rumors of an Affair, 580
- May 29, 1981: Court Finds That Ford Ignored Pinto's Safety Problems, 594
- Aug. 6, 1982: Banco Ambrosiano Collapses Amid Criminal Accusations, 606
- Oct. 19, 1982: Car Manufacturer John De Lorean Is Arrested in a Drug Sting, 609
- Dec. 16, 1982: Congress Cites Environmental Protection Agency Chief for Contempt, 615
- May 2, 1984: E. F. Hutton Executives Plead Guilty to Fraud, 636
- 1985-1986: Westland Affair Shakes Prime Minister Thatcher's Government, 645
- May 7, 1985: Banker Jake Butcher Pleads Guilty to Fraud, 648
- July 19, 1985: Mayflower Madam Pleads Guilty to Promoting Prostitution, 654
- Sept. 17, 1985: Media Allege Canadian Officials Allowed Sale of Rancid Tuna, 660
- Apr. 22, 1986: Faith Healer Peter Popoff Is Exposed as a Fraud, 673
- Jan. 15, 1988: ZZZZ Best Founder Is Indicted on Federal Fraud Charges, 708
- June, 1988-June, 1989: Insider-Trading Scandal Rocks Japanese Government, 714
- Mar. 29, 1989: Financier Michael Milken Is Indicted for Racketeering and Fraud, 726
- Aug. 27, 1990: Guinness Four Are Found Guilty of Share-Trading Fraud, 753
- Apr. 5, 1991: George W. Bush Is Investigated for Insider Trading, 762
- Apr. 15, 1992: Hotel Tycoon Leona Helmsley Enters Prison for Tax Evasion, 776
- Nov. 18, 1995: Former Canadian Premier Brian Mulroney Is Exposed in Airbus Scandal, 830
- Feb. 4, 1996: Whistle-Blower Reveals Tobacco Industry Corruption, 833
- Jan., 1997: Pyramid Investment Schemes Cause Albanian Government to Fall, 846
- Nov. 26, 1997: Canadian Health Commissioner Releases Report on Tainted Blood, 868
- Dec. 23, 1998: Prominent Belgians Are Sentenced in Agusta-Dassault Corruption Scandal, 889
- 2001: Clearstream Financial Clearinghouse Is Accused of Fraud and Money Laundering, 925
- Dec. 2, 2001: Enron Bankruptcy Reveals Massive Financial Fraud, 945
- Feb. 17, 2002: Rotting Human Bodies Are Found at Georgia Crematory, 964
- Sept. 3, 2003: Mutual Fund Companies Are Implicated in Shady Trading Practices, 1013
- Mar. 5, 2004: Martha Stewart Is Convicted in Insider-Trading Scandal, 1031
- Oct. 14, 2004: Insurance Brokerage Marsh & McLennan Is Charged with Fraud, 1050
- July 1, 2005: Federal Agents Raid Congressman Randall Cunningham's Home, 1064
- Sept. 12, 2005: Westar Energy Executives Are Found Guilty of Looting Their Company, 1072

Nov. 17, 2005: Liberian Workers Sue Bridgestone Firestone over Slave Labor, 1078
 Summer, 2006-Mar. 16, 2007: China Recalls Pet Food That Has Killed Thousands of American Pets, 1097
 Nov. 20, 2006: News Corp Abandons Plan to Publish O. J. Simpson's Book, 1129
 Early 2007: Subprime Mortgage Industry Begins to Collapse, 1134

BUSINESS AND LABOR

Sept. 18, 2006: Newsweek Reveals That Hewlett-Packard Spied on Its Own Board, 1114

CIVIL RIGHTS AND LIBERTIES

July 12, 1906: French Court Declares Alfred Dreyfus Innocent of Treason, 19
 Mar. 21, 1928: Alberta Government Sterilizes Thousands Deemed Genetically and Mentally Unfit, 133
 July 28, 1932: U.S. Troops Drive World War I Veterans from Washington, 156
 Feb. 19, 1942: President Roosevelt Orders Internment of Japanese Americans, 205
 Feb. 9, 1950: U.S. Senator Joseph McCarthy Launches Communist Witch Hunt, 266
 Sept. 19, 1952: Actor Charles Chaplin Cannot Reenter the United States, 283
 Oct. 26, 1962: West German Police Raid Der Spiegel Magazine Offices, 349
 May 4, 1970: National Guardsmen Kill Protesting Kent State Students, 410
 July 25, 1972: Newspaper Breaks Story of Abuses in Tuskegee Syphilis Study, 437
 Apr. 18, 1979: Actor Lee Marvin Is Ordered to Pay Palimony to Former Lover, 540
 Jan. 25, 1984: Jesse Jackson Calls New York City "Hymietown," 633
 Oct. 23, 1985: Guru Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh Is Indicted for Immigration Fraud, 662
 June 22, 2005: U.S. Air Force Investigates Religious Intolerance at Its Academy, 1062
 Apr. 11, 2007: Shock Jock Don Imus Loses His Radio Show over Sexist and Racist Remarks, 1142

June 4, 2007: Congressman William J. Jefferson Is Indicted for Corruption, 1147

COLONIALISM AND IMPERIALISM

Nov. 15, 1908: Belgium Confiscates Congo Free State from King Leopold II, 31
 May, 1915: British Government Falls Because of Munitions Shortages and Military Setbacks, 58
 1930: Liberia Is Accused of Selling Its Own Citizens into Slavery, 142
 Aug. 26, 1949: Viet Minh Broadcasts French General's Damaging Report, 257
 Late 1955: British Atrocities in Kenya's Mau Mau Rebellion Are Revealed, 298
 Feb. 3, 1975: Honduras's "Banagate" Bribery Scandal Leads to Executive's Suicide, 471
 June 4, 1979: South African President B. J. Vorster Resigns in Muldergate Scandal, 543
 Sept. 30, 2005: Danish Newspaper's Prophet Muhammad Cartoons Stir Violent Protests, 1075
 Nov. 17, 2005: Liberian Workers Sue Bridgestone Firestone over Slave Labor, 1078

COMMUNICATIONS AND MEDIA

June 25, 1906: Millionaire Heir Murders Architect Stanford White, 16
 Sept. 23, 1952: Richard Nixon Denies Taking Illegal Campaign Contributions, 286
 Mar. 14, 1960: FCC Chairman John C. Doerfer Resigns for Accepting Gifts from Networks, 335
 Oct. 26, 1962: West German Police Raid Der Spiegel Magazine Offices, 349
 June 27, 1978: Evangelist Herbert W. Armstrong Excommunicates His Own Son, 525
 Apr. 15, 1981: Janet Cooke Admits Fabricating Her Pulitzer Prize-Winning Feature, 585
 Apr. 22, 1986: Faith Healer Peter Popoff Is Exposed as a Fraud, 673
 Jan. 22, 1987: Pennsylvania Politician Kills Himself at Televised Press Conference, 684
 July 18, 1988: Actor Rob Lowe Videotapes His Sexual Encounter with a Minor, 717
 Dec. 18, 1989: Prince Charles's Intimate Phone Conversation with Camilla Parker Bowles Is Taped, 745

Mar., 1990: Menendez Brothers Are Arrested for Murdering Their Parents, 750
 May 19, 1992: Amy Fisher Shoots Mary Jo Buttafuoco, 781
 Aug. 23, 1992: Princess Diana's Phone Conversation with Her Lover Is Made Public, 789
 June 24, 1994: Time Magazine Cover Uses Altered O. J. Simpson Photo, 810
 Aug. 31, 1997: Princess Diana Dies in a Car Crash, 861
 May 11, 1998: Journalist Stephen Glass Is Exposed as a Fraud, 887
 June 25, 2002: Internal Corruption Forces Adelphia Communications to Declare Bankruptcy, 971
 Jan. 2, 2003: E-mail Message Prompts Inquiry into Air Force Academy Sexual Assaults, 991
 Apr. 29, 2003: New York Times Reporter Jayson Blair Is Exposed as a Fraud, 998
 Early Nov., 2003: Paris Hilton Sex-Tape Appears on the Web, 1019
 Dec. 18, 2003: Pop Star Michael Jackson Is Charged with Child Molestation, 1025
 Apr. 28, 2004: CBS Broadcasts Photos of Abused and Tortured Prisoners at Abu Ghraib, 1034
 Sept. 8, 2004: 60 Minutes II Reports on George W. Bush's Evasion of Wartime Duty, 1044
 Oct. 13, 2004: Television Producer Files Sex Harassment Suit Against Bill O'Reilly, 1047
 Sept. 13, 2007: New England Patriots Football Team Is Fined for Spying on Other Teams, 1161
 June 13, 2008: Singer R. Kelly Is Acquitted on Child Pornography Charges, 1170

CORRUPTION

1904: Theodore Roosevelt Is Accused of Accepting Corporate Funds, 1
 Jan. 23, 1904: Senator Joseph R. Burton Is Convicted of Bribery, 4
 Dec., 1904: Boston Alderman Is Reelected While in Jail for Fraud, 6
 June 13, 1907: San Francisco Mayor Schmitz Is Found Guilty of Extortion, 28
 Jan., 1913: British Prime Minister's Staff Is Investigated for Insider Trading, 43

Jan. 13, 1913: Federal Judge Is Impeached for Profiting from His Office, 46
 Apr. 2, 1915: Players Fix Liverpool-Manchester United Soccer Match, 55
 Sept. 21, 1919: White Sox Players Conspire to Lose World Series in "Black Sox" Scandal, 66
 June 22, 1922: British Prime Minister David Lloyd George Is Accused of Selling Honors, 83
 Mar. 2, 1923: U.S. Senate Investigates Veterans Bureau Chief for Fraud, 89
 May 30, 1923: U.S. Attorney General Harry M. Daugherty's Aide Commits Suicide, 92
 Oct. 22, 1923: U.S. Senate Begins Hearings on Teapot Dome Oil Leases, 95
 May 12, 1924: Kentucky Congressman John W. Lingley Is Convicted of Violating the Volstead Act, 103
 Dec. 26, 1926: Ty Cobb and Tris Speaker Are Accused of Fixing Baseball Games, 118
 May, 1930: Postmaster's Division of Airmail Routes Creates a Scandal, 144
 Mar. 31, 1933: New York Times Reporter Denies Reports of a Soviet Famine, 167
 Jan. 8, 1934-Jan. 17, 1936: Stavisky's Fraudulent Schemes Rock French Government, 170
 May 20, 1936: British Cabinet Member Resigns After Budget Information Leak, 181
 Mar. 17, 1937: Atherton Report Exposes San Francisco Police Corruption, 191
 Sept.-Oct., 1937: Prescription Elixir Causes More than One Hundred Deaths, 193
 May 22, 1939: Kansas City's Boss Pendergast Pleads Guilty to Income Tax Evasion, 199
 Spring, 1947: Baseball Manager Leo Durocher Is Suspended for Gambling Ties, 242
 Aug. 4, 1948: Columnist Drew Pearson Exposes Congressman's Corruption, 248
 Aug. 26, 1949: Viet Minh Broadcasts French General's Damaging Report, 257
 Feb. 9, 1950: U.S. Senator Joseph McCarthy Launches Communist Witch Hunt, 266
 Jan. 17, 1951: College Basketball Players Begin Shaving Points for Money, 274
 Nov. 16, 1951: Federal Tax Official Resigns After Accepting Bribes, 279

- June 25, 1956: President Truman's Appointments Secretary Is Convicted of Tax Conspiracy, 310
- Sept. 22, 1958: President Eisenhower's Chief of Staff Resigns for Influence Selling, 320
- May, 1959: Teamsters Leader Dave Beck Is Convicted of Tax Fraud, 323
- Nov. 2, 1959: Charles Van Doren Admits to Being Fed Answers on Television Quiz Show, 326
- Feb. 8, 1960: U.S. Congress Investigates Payola in Pop Music Industry, 332
- Mar. 14, 1960: FCC Chairman John C. Doerfer Resigns for Accepting Gifts from Networks, 335
- Mar. 29, 1962: Billie Sol Estes Is Arrested for Corporate Fraud, 341
- Oct. 7, 1963: Vice President Lyndon B. Johnson Aide Resigns over Crime Connections, 365
- June 23, 1967: Senator Thomas J. Dodd Is Censured for Misappropriating Funds, 384
- Nov. 28, 1967: Investor Louis Wolfson Is Convicted of Selling Stock Illegally, 389
- May 9, 1969: Supreme Court Justice Abe Fortas Is Accused of Bribery, 391
- Fall, 1969-Winter, 1971: Japanese Baseball Players Are Implicated in Game Fixing, 398
- May 28, 1970: Irish Politicians Are Tried for Conspiring to Import Weapons, 413
- June 17, 1972-Aug. 9, 1974: Watergate Break-in Leads to President Nixon's Resignation, 425
- June 22, 1972: Police Arrest Architect John Poulson for Bribery and Fraud, 431
- Aug. 19, 1973: Cheating Scandal Shocks Soap Box Derby, 444
- Oct. 10, 1973: Spiro T. Agnew Resigns Vice Presidency in Disgrace, 447
- Feb. 3, 1975: Honduras's "Bananagate" Bribery Scandal Leads to Executive's Suicide, 471
- 1976: Peace Corps Conceals Murder of Volunteer in Tonga, 476
- 1976-1977: U.S. Congress Members Are Implicated in Koreagate Scandal, 479
- Feb. 4, 1976: Lockheed Is Implicated in Bribing Foreign Officials, 482
- Apr. 4, 1976: West Point Cadets Are Caught Cheating on Exams, 488
- Feb. 25, 1977: Film Producer David Begelman Is Found to Have Forged Checks, 509
- Sept. 21, 1977: Carter Cabinet Member Resigns over Ethics Violations, 511
- Sept. 23, 1977: Horse-Swapping Fraud Upsets Belmont Park Raceway, 514
- June 4, 1979: South African President B. J. Vorster Resigns in Muldergate Scandal, 543
- Oct. 10, 1979: French President Giscard d'Estaing Is Accused of Taking a Bribe, 550
- Oct. 11, 1979: Senate Denounces Herman E. Talmadge for Money Laundering, 553
- Nov. 29, 1979, and Jan. 31, 1983: Baseball Commissioner Suspends Mickey Mantle and Willie Mays for Casino Ties, 556
- Feb. 2, 1980: Media Uncover FBI Sting Implicating Dozens of Lawmakers, 561
- Apr. 27, 1980: Mobster's Arrest Reveals Point Shaving by Boston College Basketball Players, 568
- Late July, 1980: President's Brother, Billy Carter, Registers as a Paid Agent for Libya, 571
- Dec. 7, 1980: Rita Jenrette's "Diary of a Mad Congresswife" Scandalizes Washington, 582
- May 23, 1981: Italian Justice Minister Resigns Because of Crime Connection, 591
- Sept. 10, 1981: Chicago Sun-Times Reports That Cardinal Cody Diverted Church Funds, 597
- May 11, 1982: Philippine President Marcos Forces the Entire Supreme Court to Resign, 600
- Aug. 6, 1982: Banco Ambrosiano Collapses Amid Criminal Accusations, 606
- Dec. 16, 1982: Congress Cites Environmental Protection Agency Chief for Contempt, 615
- May 2, 1984: E. F. Hutton Executives Plead Guilty to Fraud, 636
- May 7, 1985: Banker Jake Butcher Pleads Guilty to Fraud, 648
- Aug. 19, 1985: West German Counterintelligence Chief Defects to East Germany, 657
- Sept. 17, 1985: Media Allege Canadian Officials Allowed Sale of Rancid Tuna, 660
- Feb. 28, 1986: Baseball Commissioner Peter Ueberroth Suspends Players for Cocaine Use, 666

- Nov. 13, 1986-May 4, 1989: Iran-Contra Weapons Scandal Taints Reagan's Administration, 676
- Jan. 12 and May 11, 1987: Media Reports Spark Investigation of Australian Police Corruption, 681
- Jan. 22, 1987: Pennsylvania Politician Kills Himself at Televised Press Conference, 684
- Feb. 25, 1987: NCAA Imposes "Death Penalty" on Southern Methodist University Football, 687
- Apr. 9, 1987: Bess Myerson Resigns as New York Commissioner of Cultural Affairs, 693
- Jan. 15, 1988: ZZZZ Best Founder Is Indicted on Federal Fraud Charges, 708
- June, 1988-June, 1989: Insider-Trading Scandal Rocks Japanese Government, 714
- Mar. 29, 1989: Financier Michael Milken Is Indicted for Racketeering and Fraud, 726
- May 31, 1989: Speaker of the House Jim Wright Resigns in Ethics Scandal, 730
- Aug. 24, 1989: Pete Rose Is Banned from Baseball for Betting on Games, 735
- Jan. 18, 1990: Washington, D.C., Mayor Marion Barry Is Arrested for Drug Use, 748
- Aug. 27, 1990: Guinness Four Are Found Guilty of Share-Trading Fraud, 753
- Apr. 5, 1991: George W. Bush Is Investigated for Insider Trading, 762
- Apr. 15, 1992: Hotel Tycoon Leona Helmsley Enters Prison for Tax Evasion, 776
- Apr. 28, 1994: U.S. Naval Academy Expels Midshipmen for Cheating, 800
- June 1, 1994: Congressman Dan Rostenkowski Is Indicted in House Post Office Scandal, 803
- June 30, 1994: Tonya Harding Is Banned from Skating After Attack on Rival, 812
- Aug. 5, 1994: Kenneth Starr Is Appointed to the Whitewater Investigation, 818
- Feb. 28, 1995: Former Mexican President Carlos Salinas's Brother Is Arrested for Murder, 824
- Nov. 18, 1995: Former Canadian Premier Brian Mulroney Is Exposed in Airbus Scandal, 830
- Feb. 4, 1996: Whistle-Blower Reveals Tobacco Industry Corruption, 833
- Aug. 16, 1996: Belgian Media Reveal How Police Bungled Serial Murder Case, 840
- Nov. 3, 1996: Car Crash Reveals Depth of Government Corruption in Turkey, 843
- Jan., 1997: Pyramid Investment Schemes Cause Albanian Government to Fall, 846
- June 25, 1997: Swiss Banks Admit to Holding Accounts of Holocaust Victims, 858
- Dec. 11, 1997: HUD Secretary Henry Cisneros Is Indicted for Lying to Federal Agents, 872
- May, 1998: Police Corruption Is Revealed in Los Angeles's Rampart Division, 884
- May 11, 1998: Journalist Stephen Glass Is Exposed as a Fraud, 887
- Dec. 23, 1998: Prominent Belgians Are Sentenced in Agusta-Dassault Corruption Scandal, 889
- Mar. 4, 1999: Quebec Offers Support for Abused Duplessis Orphans, 892
- May 7, 1999-Mar. 2, 2001: Ethics Counselor Exonerates Canadian Prime Minister Jean Chrétien, 898
- Jan. 28, 2000: John Spano Is Sentenced for Fraudulent Purchase of Ice Hockey Team, 901
- May 9, 2000: Former Louisiana Governor Edwin Edwards Is Convicted on Corruption Charges, 907
- 2001: Clearstream Financial Clearinghouse Is Accused of Fraud and Money Laundering, 925
- Jan. 30, 2001: Liverpool Children's Hospital Collects Body Parts Without Authorization, 927
- Feb. 18, 2001: CIA Agent Robert Hanssen Is Arrested for Spying for the Russians, 931
- Dec. 2, 2001: Enron Bankruptcy Reveals Massive Financial Fraud, 945
- Feb. 11, 2002: French Judge Admits Favoring Russian Figure Skaters in Winter Olympics, 962
- Feb. 17, 2002: Rotting Human Bodies Are Found at Georgia Crematory, 964
- Mar. 27, 2002: Georgia Basketball Coach Jim Harrick, Sr., Resigns over Fraud Allegations, 968
- June 25, 2002: Internal Corruption Forces Adelphia Communications to Declare Bankruptcy, 971
- July, 2002: Journalist Alleges Release of Genetically Modified Corn Seeds in New Zealand, 974

Sept. 3, 2003: Mutual Fund Companies Are Implicated in Shady Trading Practices, 1013

Mar. 4, 2004: Former United Way Charity Chief Pleads Guilty to Embezzlement, 1028

Mar. 5, 2004: Martha Stewart Is Convicted in Insider-Trading Scandal, 1031

Oct. 14, 2004: Insurance Brokerage Marsh & McLennan Is Charged with Fraud, 1050

Jan. 15, 2005: Iqbal Riza Resigns from the United Nations in Oil-for-Food Scandal, 1053

Jan. 27, 2005: German Soccer Referee Admits to Fixing Games for Money, 1055

July 1, 2005: Federal Agents Raid Congressman Randall Cunningham's Home, 1064

Sept. 12, 2005: Westar Energy Executives Are Found Guilty of Looting Their Company, 1072

Dec. 6, 2005: Spokane, Washington, Mayor Recalled in Gay-Sex Scandal, 1081

May 4, 2006: Media Uncover Match-Fixing in Italian Soccer, 1092

July 14, 2006: New York Times Exposes Grading Scandal at Auburn University, 1101

July 26, 2006: Tour de France Is Hit with a Doping Scandal, 1103

Sept. 18, 2006: Newsweek Reveals That Hewlett-Packard Spied on Its Own Board, 1114

Oct. 22, 2006: Chilean Politicians Use Community Funds for Personal Campaigns, 1121

Nov. 2, 2006: Evangelist Kent Hovind Is Convicted of Federal Tax Violations, 1123

Nov. 23, 2006: Former Russian Security Service Officer Dies from Radiation Poisoning, 1132

Early 2007: Subprime Mortgage Industry Begins to Collapse, 1134

May 28, 2007: Japanese Politician Charged with Corruption Hangs Himself, 1145

June 4, 2007: Congressman William J. Jefferson Is Indicted for Corruption, 1147

Sept. 13, 2007: New England Patriots Football Team Is Fined for Spying on Other Teams, 1161

July 29, 2008: NBA Referee Tim Donaghy Is Sentenced to Prison for Betting on Games, 1172

CULTURAL AND INTELLECTUAL HISTORY

Mar. 2, 1906: Psychoanalyst Ernest Jones Is Accused of Molesting Mentally Disabled Children, 12

Feb. 17-Mar. 15, 1913: Armory Modern Art Show Scandalizes the Public, 49

June 6, 1929: Luis Buñuel's Un Chien Andalou Shocks Parisian Audience, 136

July, 1961: Psychologist Stanley Milgram Begins Obedience-to-Authority Experiments, 338

Oct. 31, 1975: Buddhist Teacher Orders His Students to Remove Their Clothes, 474

Sept. 1, 1976: Former Beatle George Harrison Loses Plagiarism Lawsuit, 494

May 11, 1982: Philippine President Marcos Forces the Entire Supreme Court to Resign, 600

Mar. 23, 1989: Scientists' "Cold Fusion" Claims Cannot Be Verified, 723

Dec. 3, 1989: Martin Luther King, Jr.'s, Doctoral-Thesis Plagiarism Is Revealed, 739

Mar. 12, 1997: Prize-Winning Aborigine Novelist Revealed as a Fraud, 852

Apr., 1998: Scottish Historian Is Charged with Plagiarism, 879

Nov. 5, 2000: Japanese Amateur Archaeologist's "Discoveries" Are Proven Fakes, 919

June 18, 2001: Award-Winning Historian Joseph J. Ellis Is Accused of Lying, 936

Jan. 4, 2002: Historian Stephen E. Ambrose Is Accused of Plagiarism, 951

Jan. 18, 2002: Historian Doris Kearns Goodwin Is Accused of Plagiarism, 959

Oct. 25, 2002: Historian Michael A. Bellesiles Resigns After Academic Fraud Accusations, 985

July 24, 2007: University of Colorado Fires Professor for Plagiarism and Research Falsification, 1155

DRUGS

June 25, 1906: Millionaire Heir Murders Architect Stanford White, 16

Jan. 18, 1923: Actor Wallace Reid's Death in Drug Rehab Shakes Film Industry, 86

Jan. 1, 1924: Film Star Mabel Normand's

Chauffeur Shoots Millionaire Courtland S. Dines, 100

Sept.-Oct., 1937: Prescription Elixir Causes More than One Hundred Deaths, 193

Aug. 31, 1948: Film Star Robert Mitchum Is Arrested for Drug Possession, 251

1956-1962: Prescription Thalidomide Causes Widespread Birth Disorders, 301

May 19, 1962: Marilyn Monroe Sings "Happy Birthday, Mr. President," 344

Mar. 21, 1976: Actor Claudine Longet Kills Ski Champion Vladimir Sabich, 485

Feb. 1, 1978: Roman Polanski Flees the United States to Avoid Rape Trial, 522

Apr. 27, 1980: Mobster's Arrest Reveals Point Shaving by Boston College Basketball Players, 568

Apr. 15, 1981: Janet Cooke Admits Fabricating Her Pulitzer Prize-Winning Feature, 585

Oct. 19, 1982: Car Manufacturer John De Lorean Is Arrested in a Drug Sting, 609

July 20, 1983: Congress Members Censured in House-Page Sex Scandal, 621

Feb. 28, 1986: Baseball Commissioner Peter Ueberroth Suspends Players for Cocaine Use, 666

Nov. 13, 1986-May 4, 1989: Iran-Contra Weapons Scandal Taints Reagan's Administration, 676

July 18, 1988: Actor Rob Lowe Videotapes His Sexual Encounter with a Minor, 717

Sept. 19, 1988: Stephen Breuning Pleads Guilty to Medical Research Fraud, 720

Jan. 18, 1990: Washington, D.C., Mayor Marion Barry Is Arrested for Drug Use, 748

July 1, 1994: Soccer Star Diego Maradona Is Expelled from World Cup, 815

Feb. 28, 1995: Former Mexican President Carlos Salinas's Brother Is Arrested for Murder, 824

Nov. 3, 1996: Car Crash Reveals Depth of Government Corruption in Turkey, 843

Nov. 26, 1997: Canadian Health Commissioner Releases Report on Tainted Blood, 868

Apr. 7, 1998: Pop Singer George Michael Is Arrested for Lewd Conduct, 881

Sept. 26, 2000: Gymnast Andreea Răducan Loses

Her Olympic Gold Medal Because of Drugs, 916

Mar. 5, 2004: Martha Stewart Is Convicted in Insider-Trading Scandal, 1031

Mar. 17, 2005: Former Baseball Star Mark McGwire Evades Congressional Questions on Steroid Use, 1058

July 26, 2006: Tour de France Is Hit with a Doping Scandal, 1103

Nov. 2, 2006: Male Escort Reveals Sexual Liaisons with Evangelist Ted Haggard, 1126

Oct. 5, 2007: Olympic Champion Marion Jones Admits Steroid Use, 1164

ECONOMICS

Sept. 7, 2008: Financial Institutions and Markets Begin to Collapse, 1175

EDUCATION

Feb. 23, 1943: Irish Orphan School Fire Kills Thirty-five Girls, 217

Nov. 21, 1953: Piltdown Man Is Revealed to Be a Hoax, 292

July, 1961: Psychologist Stanley Milgram Begins Obedience-to-Authority Experiments, 338

1970: Study of Anonymous Gay Sex Leads to Ethics Scandal, 407

May 4, 1970: National Guardsmen Kill Protesting Kent State Students, 410

Aug. 20, 1971: Abusive Role-Playing Ends Stanford Prison Experiment, 420

Oct. 25, 1974: Evangelist Billy James Hargis Resigns College Presidency During Gay-Sex Scandal, 465

Apr. 4, 1976: West Point Cadets Are Caught Cheating on Exams, 488

Aug. 12, 1983-July 27, 1990: McMartin Preschool Is Embroiled in Child-Abuse Case, 624

Feb. 25, 1987: NCAA Imposes "Death Penalty" on Southern Methodist University Football, 687

Dec. 1, 1987: Yale Scholar's Wartime Anti-Semitic Writings Are Revealed, 705

Sept. 19, 1988: Stephen Breuning Pleads Guilty to Medical Research Fraud, 720

Mar. 23, 1989: Scientists' "Cold Fusion" Claims Cannot Be Verified, 723
 Dec. 3, 1989: Martin Luther King, Jr.'s, Doctoral-Thesis Plagiarism Is Revealed, 739
 Apr. 28, 1994: U.S. Naval Academy Expels Midshipmen for Cheating, 800
 Spring, 1996: Physicist Publishes a Deliberately Fraudulent Article, 837
 Nov. 5, 2000: Japanese Amateur Archaeologist's "Discoveries" Are Proven Fakes, 919
 June 18, 2001: Award-Winning Historian Joseph J. Ellis Is Accused of Lying, 936
 Jan. 4, 2002: Historian Stephen E. Ambrose Is Accused of Plagiarism, 951
 Jan. 18, 2002: Historian Doris Kearns Goodwin Is Accused of Plagiarism, 959
 Aug., 2002: Immunologist Resigns After Being Accused of Falsifying Research, 977
 Oct. 25, 2002: Historian Michael A. Bellesiles Resigns After Academic Fraud Accusations, 985
 Jan. 2, 2003: E-mail Message Prompts Inquiry into Air Force Academy Sexual Assaults, 991
 June 22, 2005: U.S. Air Force Investigates Religious Intolerance at Its Academy, 1062
 Mar. 14, 2006: Duke Lacrosse Players Are Accused of Gang Rape, 1086
 July 14, 2006: New York Times Exposes Grading Scandal at Auburn University, 1101
 July 24, 2007: University of Colorado Fires Professor for Plagiarism and Research Falsification, 1155

ENVIRONMENTAL ISSUES

Sept. 26, 1979: Love Canal Residents Sue Chemical Company, 546
 Dec. 16, 1982: Congress Cites Environmental Protection Agency Chief for Contempt, 615
 July 10, 1985: French Secret Service Sinks the Greenpeace Ship Rainbow Warrior, 651
 Feb. 4, 1996: Whistle-Blower Reveals Tobacco Industry Corruption, 833
 Feb. 17, 2002: Rotting Human Bodies Are Found at Georgia Crematory, 964
 July, 2002: Journalist Alleges Release of Genetically Modified Corn Seeds in New Zealand, 974

Beginning Aug. 29, 2005: Government Incompetence Mars Hurricane Katrina Relief Efforts, 1068
 Nov. 17, 2005: Liberian Workers Sue Bridgestone Firestone over Slave Labor, 1078

ESPIONAGE

July 12, 1906: French Court Declares Alfred Dreyfus Innocent of Treason, 19
 Feb. 19, 1942: President Roosevelt Orders Internment of Japanese Americans, 205
 Feb. 9, 1950: U.S. Senator Joseph McCarthy Launches Communist Witch Hunt, 266
 June, 1956: George F. Kennan Proves Russian Sisson Documents Are Fakes, 307
 Sept. 12, 1962: British Civil Servant Is Arrested for Spying, 347
 Mar. 2-Sept. 25, 1963: John Profumo Affair Rocks British Government, 355
 Mar. 4, 1966: Munsinger Sex and Spy Scandal Rocks Canada, 377
 June 13, 1971: New York Times Publishes the Pentagon Papers, 416
 June 17, 1972-Aug. 9, 1974: Watergate Break-in Leads to President Nixon's Resignation, 425
 Aug. 19, 1985: West German Counterintelligence Chief Defects to East Germany, 657
 Feb. 18, 2001: CIA Agent Robert Hanssen Is Arrested for Spying for the Russians, 931
 Mar. 2, 2003: U.S. National Security Agency Is Found to Have Spied on U.N. Officials, 995
 July 14, 2003: Columnist Robert Novak Leaks the Name of CIA Operative Valerie Plame, 1010
 Sept. 18, 2006: Newsweek Reveals That Hewlett-Packard Spied on Its Own Board, 1114
 Sept. 13, 2007: New England Patriots Football Team Is Fined for Spying on Other Teams, 1161

ETHICS

Jan., 1913: British Prime Minister's Staff Is Investigated for Insider Trading, 43
 Sept.-Oct., 1937: Prescription Elixir Causes More than One Hundred Deaths, 193
 June 13, 1971: New York Times Publishes the Pentagon Papers, 416

Aug. 20, 1971: Abusive Role-Playing Ends Stanford Prison Experiment, 420
 May 14, 1974: Washington Post Reveals That the Nixons Received Jewelry Gifts, 453
 Apr. 4, 1976: West Point Cadets Are Caught Cheating on Exams, 488
 Oct. 20, 1978: Firestone Recalls Millions of Defective Car Tires, 534
 Sept. 17, 1985: Media Allege Canadian Officials Allowed Sale of Rancid Tuna, 660
 May 31, 1989: Speaker of the House Jim Wright Resigns in Ethics Scandal, 730
 Apr. 28, 1994: U.S. Naval Academy Expels Midshipmen for Cheating, 800
 June 24, 1994: Time Magazine Cover Uses Altered O. J. Simpson Photo, 810
 Apr., 1998: Scottish Historian Is Charged with Plagiarism, 879
 May, 1999: Civil Rights Leader Jesse Jackson Fathers a Child Out of Wedlock, 895
 May 7, 1999-Mar. 2, 2001: Ethics Counselor Exonerates Canadian Prime Minister Jean Chrétien, 898
 June 18, 2001: Award-Winning Historian Joseph J. Ellis Is Accused of Lying, 936
 Dec. 2, 2001: Enron Bankruptcy Reveals Massive Financial Fraud, 945
 Dec. 14, 2001: Notre Dame Football Coach Resigns for Falsifying His Résumé, 948
 Sept. 25, 2002: Inquiry Reveals That Physicist Jan Hendrik Schön Faked His Research, 980
 Jan. 2, 2003: E-mail Message Prompts Inquiry into Air Force Academy Sexual Assaults, 991
 Mar. 2, 2003: U.S. National Security Agency Is Found to Have Spied on U.N. Officials, 995
 July 14, 2003: Columnist Robert Novak Leaks the Name of CIA Operative Valerie Plame, 1010
 Beginning Aug. 29, 2005: Government Incompetence Mars Hurricane Katrina Relief Efforts, 1068
 July 26, 2006: Tour de France Is Hit with a Doping Scandal, 1103
 Aug. 12, 2006: Novelist Günter Grass Admits to Youthful Nazi Ties, 1109
 July 24, 2007: University of Colorado Fires

Professor for Plagiarism and Research Falsification, 1155
 Aug. 20, 2007: Football Star Michael Vick Pleads Guilty to Financing a Dogfighting Ring, 1158
 July 29, 2008: NBA Referee Tim Donaghy Is Sentenced to Prison for Betting on Games, 1172

FAMILIES AND CHILDREN

Mar. 2, 1906: Psychoanalyst Ernest Jones Is Accused of Molesting Mentally Disabled Children, 12
 Dec. 8, 1906: Former U.S. Senator Arthur Brown Is Murdered by Lover, 22
 Mar. 25, 1911: Nearly 150 Workers Die in Triangle Shirtwaist Factory Fire, 40
 Feb. 23, 1943: Irish Orphan School Fire Kills Thirty-five Girls, 217
 June 4, 1943: Actor Charles Chaplin Is Sued for Paternity, 220
 May 27, 1949: Actor Rita Hayworth Marries Aly Khan After Adulterous Affair, 254
 Feb. 7, 1950: Swedish Film Star Ingrid Bergman Has a Child Out of Wedlock, 263
 1956-1962: Prescription Thalidomide Causes Widespread Birth Disorders, 301
 Dec. 12, 1957: Rock Star Jerry Lee Lewis Marries Thirteen-Year-Old Cousin, 313
 Aug. 19, 1973: Cheating Scandal Shocks Soap Box Derby, 444
 1978: Actor Joan Crawford's Daughter Publishes Damning Memoir, Mommie Dearest, 517
 Feb. 1, 1978: Roman Polanski Flees the United States to Avoid Rape Trial, 522
 June 27, 1978: Evangelist Herbert W. Armstrong Excommunicates His Own Son, 525
 July 23, 1978: Utah Millionaire Is Murdered by His Grandson, 528
 Sept. 26, 1979: Love Canal Residents Sue Chemical Company, 546
 July 28, 1980: Magazine Reveals Baseball Star Steve Garvey's Marital Problems, 574
 July 20, 1982: Conservative Politician John G. Schmitz Is Found to Have Children Out of Wedlock, 603
 July 20, 1983: Congress Members Censured in House-Page Sex Scandal, 621

Aug. 12, 1983-July 27, 1990: McMartin Pre-school Is Embroiled in Child-Abuse Case, 624
 Oct. 14, 1983: British Cabinet Secretary Parkinson Resigns After His Secretary Becomes Pregnant, 631
 Nov. 28, 1987: Black Teenager Claims to Have Been Gang-Raped by Police Officers, 702
 Jan. 13, 1992: Woody Allen Has Affair with Lover Mia Farrow's Adopted Daughter, 773
 May 6, 1992: Irish Bishop Eamonn Casey's Romantic Affair Leads to His Resignation, 779
 May 19, 1992: Amy Fisher Shoots Mary Jo Buttafuoco, 781
 Jan. 5, 1994: British Cabinet Member Resigns After Fathering a Child Out of Wedlock, 798
 Aug. 16, 1996: Belgian Media Reveal How Police Bungled Serial Murder Case, 840
 Feb. 26, 1997: Teacher Mary Kay Letourneau Is Arrested for Statutory Rape, 849
 Mar. 4, 1999: Quebec Offers Support for Abused Duplessis Orphans, 892
 May, 1999: Civil Rights Leader Jesse Jackson Fathers a Child Out of Wedlock, 895
 May 2, 2000: New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani's Extramarital Affair Is Revealed, 904
 Dec., 2000: Sexual Abuse of Children in France Leads to the Outreau Affair, 922
 Jan. 30, 2001: Liverpool Children's Hospital Collects Body Parts Without Authorization, 927
 Aug. 27, 2001: Little League Baseball Star Danny Almonte Is Found to Be Overage, 942
 Jan. 6, 2002: Boston Globe Reports on Child Sexual Abuse by Roman Catholic Priests, 954
 Dec. 17, 2003: Senator Strom Thurmond's Biracial Daughter Is Revealed, 1022
 Dec. 18, 2003: Pop Star Michael Jackson Is Charged with Child Molestation, 1025
 Dec. 6, 2005: Spokane, Washington, Mayor Recalled in Gay-Sex Scandal, 1081
 June 13, 2008: Singer R. Kelly Is Acquitted on Child Pornography Charges, 1170

FILM

Feb. 1, 1922: Director Taylor's Murder Ruins Mabel Normand's Acting Career, 73

Jan. 18, 1923: Actor Wallace Reid's Death in Drug Rehab Shakes Film Industry, 86
 July, 1925: Nosferatu Is Found to Have Violated Dracula Copyright, 111
 Early 1928: Joseph P. Kennedy Begins an Affair with Gloria Swanson, 127
 June 6, 1929: Luis Buñuel's Un Chien Andalou Shocks Parisian Audience, 136
 Dec. 3, 1930: Surrealist Film L'Âge d'or Provokes French Rioting, 147
 Jan. 20, 1933: Hedy Lamarr Appears Nude in the Czech Film Exstase, 163
 1978: Actor Joan Crawford's Daughter Publishes Damning Memoir, Mommie Dearest, 517
 May 21, 2003: Sexually Provocative Film The Brown Bunny Premieres at Cannes Film Festival, 1004
 Early Nov., 2003: Paris Hilton Sex-Tape Appears on the Web, 1019

FORGERY

Oct. 25, 1924: Forged Communist Letter Brings Down British Government, 105
 Summer, 1936: Film Star Mary Astor's Diary Becomes a Public Sensation, 184
 Nov. 21, 1953: Piltdown Man Is Revealed to Be a Hoax, 292
 June, 1956: George F. Kennan Proves Russian Sisson Documents Are Fakes, 307
 Jan. 28, 1972: Clifford Irving Admits Faking Howard Hughes Memoirs, 422
 Feb. 25, 1977: Film Producer David Begelman Is Found to Have Forged Checks, 509
 Oct. 10, 1979: French President Giscard d'Estaing Is Accused of Taking a Bribe, 550
 Apr. 25, 1983: German Magazine Publishes Faked Hitler Diaries, 618
 May 7, 1985: Banker Jake Butcher Pleads Guilty to Fraud, 648
 June 24, 1994: Time Magazine Cover Uses Altered O. J. Simpson Photo, 810
 Jan. 28, 2000: John Spano Is Sentenced for Fraudulent Purchase of Ice Hockey Team, 901
 Nov. 5, 2000: Japanese Amateur Archaeologist's "Discoveries" Are Proven Fakes, 919

GAMBLING

Apr. 2, 1915: Players Fix Liverpool-Manchester United Soccer Match, 55
 Sept. 21, 1919: White Sox Players Conspire to Lose World Series in "Black Sox" Scandal, 66
 Dec. 26, 1926: Ty Cobb and Tris Speaker Are Accused of Fixing Baseball Games, 118
 Jan. 8, 1934-Jan. 17, 1936: Stavisky's Fraudulent Schemes Rock French Government, 170
 May 20, 1936: British Cabinet Member Resigns After Budget Information Leak, 181
 Mar. 17, 1937: Atherton Report Exposes San Francisco Police Corruption, 191
 May 22, 1939: Kansas City's Boss Pendergast Pleads Guilty to Income Tax Evasion, 199
 Spring, 1947: Baseball Manager Leo Durocher Is Suspended for Gambling Ties, 242
 May 3, 1950: U.S. Senate Committee Begins Investigating Organized Crime, 270
 Jan. 17, 1951: College Basketball Players Begin Shaving Points for Money, 274
 Fall, 1969-Winter, 1971: Japanese Baseball Players Are Implicated in Game Fixing, 398
 Nov. 29, 1979, and Jan. 31, 1983: Baseball Commissioner Suspends Mickey Mantle and Willie Mays for Casino Ties, 556
 Apr. 27, 1980: Mobster's Arrest Reveals Point Shaving by Boston College Basketball Players, 568
 Aug. 24, 1989: Pete Rose Is Banned from Baseball for Betting on Games, 735
 May 3, 2003: University of Alabama Fires New Football Coach in Sex Scandal, 1002
 Jan. 27, 2005: German Soccer Referee Admits to Fixing Games for Money, 1055
 Aug. 20, 2007: Football Star Michael Vick Pleads Guilty to Financing a Dogfighting Ring, 1158
 July 29, 2008: NBA Referee Tim Donaghy Is Sentenced to Prison for Betting on Games, 1172

GOVERNMENT

1904: Theodore Roosevelt Is Accused of Accepting Corporate Funds, 1
 Jan. 23, 1904: Senator Joseph R. Burton Is Convicted of Bribery, 4

Dec., 1904: Boston Alderman Is Reelected While in Jail for Fraud, 6
 June 13, 1907: San Francisco Mayor Schmitz Is Found Guilty of Extortion, 28
 Nov. 15, 1908: Belgium Confiscates Congo Free State from King Leopold II, 31
 Jan., 1913: British Prime Minister's Staff Is Investigated for Insider Trading, 43
 Jan. 13, 1913: Federal Judge Is Impeachd for Profiting from His Office, 46
 May, 1915: British Government Falls Because of Munitions Shortages and Military Setbacks, 58
 June 22, 1922: British Prime Minister David Lloyd George Is Accused of Selling Honors, 83
 Mar. 2, 1923: U.S. Senate Investigates Veterans Bureau Chief for Fraud, 89
 May 30, 1923: U.S. Attorney General Harry M. Daugherty's Aide Commits Suicide, 92
 Oct. 22, 1923: U.S. Senate Begins Hearings on Teapot Dome Oil Leases, 95
 May 12, 1924: Kentucky Congressman John W. Langlely Is Convicted of Violating the Volstead Act, 103
 Oct. 25, 1924: Forged Communist Letter Brings Down British Government, 105
 1927: President Warren G. Harding's Lover Publishes Tell-All Memoir, 124
 Nov., 1929: Banque Oustric et Cie Failure Prompts French Inquiry, 139
 1930: Liberia Is Accused of Selling Its Own Citizens into Slavery, 142
 May, 1930: Postmaster's Division of Airmail Routes Creates a Scandal, 144
 Mar. 30, 1931: "Scottsboro Boys" Are Railroaded Through Rape Trials, 150
 1932: Insull Utilities Trusts Collapse Prompts New Federal Regulation, 154
 July 28, 1932: U.S. Troops Drive World War I Veterans from Washington, 156
 July 10, 1934: Sex Scandal Forces Resignation of Alberta Premier Brownlee, 176
 May 20, 1936: British Cabinet Member Resigns After Budget Information Leak, 181
 Dec. 10, 1936: King Edward VIII Abdicates to Marry an American Divorcée, 187

- Feb. 19, 1942: President Roosevelt Orders Internment of Japanese Americans, 205
- Apr. 22, 1942: French Prime Minister Pierre Laval Wants Germany to Win World War II, 209
- Dec. 5, 1942: Industrialist Charles Bedaux Is Arrested for Nazi Collaboration, 212
- June 4, 1943: Actor Charles Chaplin Is Sued for Paternity, 220
- May 9, 1945: Norwegian Politician Quisling Is Arrested for Nazi Collaboration, 226
- May 26, 1945: Norwegian Writer Knut Hamsun Is Arrested for Treason, 229
- Aug. 14, 1945: French War Hero Pétain Is Convicted of Nazi Collaboration, 232
- Aug. 4, 1948: Columnist Drew Pearson Exposes Congressman's Corruption, 248
- Aug. 26, 1949: Viet Minh Broadcasts French General's Damaging Report, 257
- Jan. 21, 1950: Alger Hiss Is Convicted of Perjury, 259
- Feb. 9, 1950: U.S. Senator Joseph McCarthy Launches Communist Witch Hunt, 266
- May 3, 1950: U.S. Senate Committee Begins Investigating Organized Crime, 270
- July 16, 1951: Belgium's Disgraced King Leopold III Abdicates, 276
- Nov. 16, 1951: Federal Tax Official Resigns After Accepting Bribes, 279
- Sept. 19, 1952: Actor Charles Chaplin Cannot Reenter the United States, 283
- Sept. 23, 1952: Richard Nixon Denies Taking Illegal Campaign Contributions, 286
- Late 1955: British Atrocities in Kenya's Mau Mau Rebellion Are Revealed, 298
- June, 1956: George F. Kennan Proves Russian Sisson Documents Are Fakes, 307
- June 25, 1956: President Truman's Appointments Secretary Is Convicted of Tax Conspiracy, 310
- Sept. 22, 1958: President Eisenhower's Chief of Staff Resigns for Influence Selling, 320
- Nov. 2, 1959: Charles Van Doren Admits to Being Fed Answers on Television Quiz Show, 326
- Feb. 7, 1960: President Kennedy's Romantic Affair Links Him to Organized Crime, 329
- Feb. 8, 1960: U.S. Congress Investigates Payola in Pop Music Industry, 332
- Mar. 14, 1960: FCC Chairman John C. Doerfer Resigns for Accepting Gifts from Networks, 335
- Mar. 29, 1962: Billie Sol Estes Is Arrested for Corporate Fraud, 341
- Sept. 12, 1962: British Civil Servant Is Arrested for Spying, 347
- Mar. 2-Sept. 25, 1963: John Profumo Affair Rocks British Government, 355
- Aug. 14, 1963: Madame Nhu Derides Self-Immolation of Vietnamese Buddhists, 362
- Oct. 7, 1963: Vice President Lyndon B. Johnson Aide Resigns over Crime Connections, 365
- Oct. 7, 1964: President Lyndon Johnson's Aide Is Arrested in Gay-Sex Sting, 371
- Oct. 29, 1965: Moroccan Politician Mehdi Ben Barka Disappears in Paris, 374
- Mar. 4, 1966: Munsinger Sex and Spy Scandal Rocks Canada, 377
- Mar. 1, 1967: Adam Clayton Powell, Jr., Is Excluded from Congress, 380
- June 23, 1967: Senator Thomas J. Dodd Is Censured for Misappropriating Funds, 384
- May 9, 1969: Supreme Court Justice Abe Fortas Is Accused of Bribery, 391
- July 18, 1969: Senator Edward Kennedy's Driving Accident Kills Mary Jo Kopechne, 394
- Nov. 13, 1969: American Massacre of Vietnamese Civilians at My Lai Is Revealed, 401
- May 28, 1970: Irish Politicians Are Tried for Conspiring to Import Weapons, 413
- June 13, 1971: New York Times Publishes the Pentagon Papers, 416
- June 17, 1972-Aug. 9, 1974: Watergate Break-in Leads to President Nixon's Resignation, 425
- June 22, 1972: Police Arrest Architect John Poulson for Bribery and Fraud, 431
- July 25, 1972: Newspaper Breaks Story of Abuses in Tuskegee Syphilis Study, 437
- July 31, 1972: Thomas F. Eagleton Withdraws from Vice Presidential Race, 440
- Oct. 10, 1973: Spiro T. Agnew Resigns Vice Presidency in Disgrace, 447

- May 14, 1974: Washington Post Reveals That the Nixons Received Jewelry Gifts, 453
- Oct. 7, 1974: Congressman Wilbur D. Mills's Stripper Affair Leads to His Downfall, 462
- Nov. 20, 1974: British Politician John Stonehouse Fakes His Suicide, 468
- 1976-1977: U.S. Congress Members Are Implicated in Koreagate Scandal, 479
- Feb. 4, 1976: Lockheed Is Implicated in Bribing Foreign Officials, 482
- May 23, 1976: Washington Post Exposes Congressman Wayne L. Hays's Affair, 491
- Sept., 1976: Jimmy Carter Admits Committing Adultery in His Heart, 497
- Oct. 4, 1976: Agriculture Secretary Earl Butz Resigns After Making Obscene Joke, 500
- Nov. 9, 1976: German Generals Must Retire for Supporting a Neo-Nazi Pilot, 503
- Sept. 21, 1977: Carter Cabinet Member Resigns over Ethics Violations, 511
- Aug. 4, 1978: British Politician Jeremy Thorpe Is Charged with Attempted Murder, 531
- Oct. 20, 1978: Firestone Recalls Millions of Defective Car Tires, 534
- June 4, 1979: South African President B. J. Vorster Resigns in Muldergate Scandal, 543
- Oct. 10, 1979: French President Giscard d'Estaing Is Accused of Taking a Bribe, 550
- Oct. 11, 1979: Senate Denounces Herman E. Talmadge for Money Laundering, 553
- Feb. 2, 1980: Media Uncover FBI Sting Implicating Dozens of Lawmakers, 561
- Late July, 1980: President's Brother, Billy Carter, Registers as a Paid Agent for Libya, 571
- Sept. 3, 1980: Congressman Bauman Is Arrested for Liaison with Teenage Boy, 577
- May 23, 1981: Italian Justice Minister Resigns Because of Crime Connection, 591
- May 11, 1982: Philippine President Marcos Forces the Entire Supreme Court to Resign, 600
- July 20, 1982: Conservative Politician John G. Schmitz Is Found to Have Children Out of Wedlock, 603
- Dec. 16, 1982: Congress Cites Environmental Protection Agency Chief for Contempt, 615
- July 20, 1983: Congress Members Censured in House-Page Sex Scandal, 621
- Aug. 21, 1983: Filipino Opposition Leader Aquino Is Assassinated on Return Home, 628
- Oct. 14, 1983: British Cabinet Secretary Parkinson Resigns After His Secretary Becomes Pregnant, 631
- 1985-1986: Westland Affair Shakes Prime Minister Thatcher's Government, 645
- July 10, 1985: French Secret Service Sinks the Greenpeace Ship Rainbow Warrior, 651
- Aug. 19, 1985: West German Counterintelligence Chief Defects to East Germany, 657
- Sept. 17, 1985: Media Allege Canadian Officials Allowed Sale of Rancid Tuna, 660
- Oct. 23, 1985: Guru Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh Is Indicted for Immigration Fraud, 662
- Mar. 3, 1986: Former U.N. Secretary-General Kurt Waldheim's Nazi Past Is Revealed, 669
- Nov. 13, 1986-May 4, 1989: Iran-Contra Weapons Scandal Taints Reagan's Administration, 676
- Jan. 12 and May 11, 1987: Media Reports Spark Investigation of Australian Police Corruption, 681
- Jan. 22, 1987: Pennsylvania Politician Kills Himself at Televised Press Conference, 684
- Apr. 9, 1987: Bess Myerson Resigns as New York Commissioner of Cultural Affairs, 693
- July 25, 1987: Novelist-Politician Jeffrey Archer Wins Libel Trial Against the Daily Star, 696
- Sept. 23, 1987: Plagiarism Charges End Joe Biden's Presidential Campaign, 698
- June, 1988-June, 1989: Insider-Trading Scandal Rocks Japanese Government, 714
- May 31, 1989: Speaker of the House Jim Wright Resigns in Ethics Scandal, 730
- Aug. 10, 1989: Japanese Prime Minister Sosuke Resigns After Affair with a Geisha, 733
- Dec. 15-25, 1989: Harassment of a Christian Minister Sparks the Romanian Revolution, 742
- Jan. 18, 1990: Washington, D.C., Mayor Marion Barry Is Arrested for Drug Use, 748
- Apr. 5, 1991: George W. Bush Is Investigated for Insider Trading, 762
- Oct. 11-13, 1991: Justice Clarence Thomas's Confirmation Hearings Create a Scandal, 768

- June 26, 1992: U.S. Navy Secretary Resigns in the Wake of Tailhook Sexual Assault Scandal, 784
- Sept. 24, 1992: British Cabinet Member David Mellor Resigns over Romantic Affair, 792
- Jan. 5, 1994: British Cabinet Member Resigns After Fathering a Child Out of Wedlock, 798
- Apr. 28, 1994: U.S. Naval Academy Expels Midshipmen for Cheating, 800
- June 1, 1994: Congressman Dan Rostenkowski Is Indicted in House Post Office Scandal, 803
- Aug. 5, 1994: Kenneth Starr Is Appointed to the Whitewater Investigation, 818
- Feb. 28, 1995: Former Mexican President Carlos Salinas's Brother Is Arrested for Murder, 824
- Nov. 18, 1995: Former Canadian Premier Brian Mulroney Is Exposed in Airbus Scandal, 830
- Jan., 1997: Pyramid Investment Schemes Cause Albanian Government to Fall, 846
- June 25, 1997: Swiss Banks Admit to Holding Accounts of Holocaust Victims, 858
- Nov. 26, 1997: Canadian Health Commissioner Releases Report on Tainted Blood, 868
- Dec. 11, 1997: HUD Secretary Henry Cisneros Is Indicted for Lying to Federal Agents, 872
- Jan. 17, 1998: President Bill Clinton Denies Sexual Affair with a White House Intern, 874
- May, 1998: Police Corruption Is Revealed in Los Angeles's Rampart Division, 884
- Dec. 23, 1998: Prominent Belgians Are Sentenced in Agusta-Dassault Corruption Scandal, 889
- Mar. 4, 1999: Quebec Offers Support for Abused Duplessis Orphans, 892
- May 7, 1999-Mar. 2, 2001: Ethics Counselor Exonerates Canadian Prime Minister Jean Chrétien, 898
- May 9, 2000: Former Louisiana Governor Edwin Edwards Is Convicted on Corruption Charges, 907
- Jan. 30, 2001: Liverpool Children's Hospital Collects Body Parts Without Authorization, 927
- Feb. 18, 2001: CIA Agent Robert Hanssen Is Arrested for Spying for the Russians, 931
- Feb. 17, 2002: Rotting Human Bodies Are Found at Georgia Crematory, 964
- July, 2002: Journalist Alleges Release of Genetically Modified Corn Seeds in New Zealand, 974
- Sept. 28, 2002: British Politician Reveals Her Affair with Prime Minister John Major, 983
- Dec. 5, 2002: Senator Trent Lott Praises Strom Thurmond's 1948 Presidential Campaign, 988
- Jan. 2, 2003: E-mail Message Prompts Inquiry into Air Force Academy Sexual Assaults, 991
- Mar. 2, 2003: U.S. National Security Agency Is Found to Have Spied on U.N. Officials, 995
- July 14, 2003: Columnist Robert Novak Leaks the Name of CIA Operative Valerie Plame, 1010
- Sept. 3, 2003: Mutual Fund Companies Are Implicated in Shady Trading Practices, 1013
- Apr. 28, 2004: CBS Broadcasts Photos of Abused and Tortured Prisoners at Abu Ghraib, 1034
- Oct. 14, 2004: Insurance Brokerage Marsh & McLennan Is Charged with Fraud, 1050
- Mar. 17, 2005: Former Baseball Star Mark McGwire Evades Congressional Questions on Steroid Use, 1058
- July 1, 2005: Federal Agents Raid Congressman Randall Cunningham's Home, 1064
- Beginning Aug. 29, 2005: Government Incompetence Mars Hurricane Katrina Relief Efforts, 1068
- Jan. 21, 2006: British Politician Resigns After Gay-Sex Orgy, 1084
- Apr. 26, 2006: Britain's Deputy Prime Minister Admits Affair with Secretary, 1089
- Summer, 2006-Mar. 16, 2007: China Recalls Pet Food That Has Killed Thousands of American Pets, 1097
- Sept. 17, 2006: New Zealand Prime Minister's Husband Is "Outed" as Gay, 1112
- Sept. 29, 2006: Congressman Mark Foley Resigns in Sex Scandal Involving a Teenage Page, 1118
- Oct. 22, 2006: Chilean Politicians Use Community Funds for Personal Campaigns, 1121
- Nov. 23, 2006: Former Russian Security Service Officer Dies from Radiation Poisoning, 1132
- Early 2007: Subprime Mortgage Industry Begins to Collapse, 1134

Feb. 18, 2007: Washington Post Exposes Decline of Walter Reed Army Hospital, 1138
 May 28, 2007: Japanese Politician Charged with Corruption Hangs Himself, 1145
 June 4, 2007: Congressman William J. Jefferson Is Indicted for Corruption, 1147
 July 11, 2007: Florida Politician Is Arrested for Soliciting an Undercover Male Police Officer, 1153
 Mar. 12, 2008: New York Governor Eliot Spitzer Resigns in Prostitution Scandal, 1167
 Sept. 7, 2008: Financial Institutions and Markets Begin to Collapse, 1175

HOAXES, FRAUDS, AND CHARLATANISM

1919-1920: Ponzi Schemes Are Revealed as Investment Frauds, 63
 Oct. 25, 1924: Forged Communist Letter Brings Down British Government, 105
 May-June, 1926: Evangelist Aimee Semple McPherson Claims She Was Kidnapped, 115
 Dec. 26, 1926: Ty Cobb and Tris Speaker Are Accused of Fixing Baseball Games, 118
 1928-1929: Actor Is Suspected of Falsely Claiming to Be an American Indian, 130
 Mar. 31, 1933: New York Times Reporter Denies Reports of a Soviet Famine, 167
 Jan. 8, 1934-Jan. 17, 1936: Stavisky's Fraudulent Schemes Rock French Government, 170
 June 5, 1944: Australian Poets Claim Responsibility for a Literary Hoax, 223
 Jan. 17, 1951: College Basketball Players Begin Shaving Points for Money, 274
 Nov. 21, 1953: Piltdown Man Is Revealed to Be a Hoax, 292
 June, 1956: George F. Kennan Proves Russian Sisson Documents Are Fakes, 307
 Nov. 2, 1959: Charles Van Doren Admits to Being Fed Answers on Television Quiz Show, 326
 Mar. 14, 1960: FCC Chairman John C. Doerfer Resigns for Accepting Gifts from Networks, 335
 Mar. 29, 1962: Billie Sol Estes Is Arrested for Corporate Fraud, 341
 Jan. 28, 1972: Clifford Irving Admits Faking Howard Hughes Memoirs, 422

Feb. 25, 1977: Film Producer David Begelman Is Found to Have Forged Checks, 509
 Sept. 23, 1977: Horse-Swapping Fraud Upsets Belmont Park Raceway, 514
 Apr. 15, 1981: Janet Cooke Admits Fabricating Her Pulitzer Prize-Winning Feature, 585
 May 11, 1982: Philippine President Marcos Forces the Entire Supreme Court to Resign, 600
 Apr. 25, 1983: German Magazine Publishes Faked Hitler Diaries, 618
 Aug. 12, 1983-July 27, 1990: McMartin Preschool Is Embroiled in Child-Abuse Case, 624
 May 2, 1984: E. F. Hutton Executives Plead Guilty to Fraud, 636
 Apr. 22, 1986: Faith Healer Peter Popoff Is Exposed as a Fraud, 673
 Nov. 28, 1987: Black Teenager Claims to Have Been Gang-Raped by Police Officers, 702
 Jan. 15, 1988: ZZZZ Best Founder Is Indicted on Federal Fraud Charges, 708
 Sept. 19, 1988: Stephen Breuning Pleads Guilty to Medical Research Fraud, 720
 Dec. 3, 1989: Martin Luther King, Jr.'s, Doctoral-Thesis Plagiarism Is Revealed, 739
 Nov. 19, 1990: Lip-Synching Duo Milli Vanilli Lose Grammy Award, 756
 June 1, 1994: Congressman Dan Rostenkowski Is Indicted in House Post Office Scandal, 803
 Spring, 1996: Physicist Publishes a Deliberately Fraudulent Article, 837
 Jan., 1997: Pyramid Investment Schemes Cause Albanian Government to Fall, 846
 Mar. 12, 1997: Prize-Winning Aborigine Novelist Revealed as a Fraud, 852
 Apr., 1998: Scottish Historian Is Charged with Plagiarism, 879
 May 11, 1998: Journalist Stephen Glass Is Exposed as a Fraud, 887
 Jan. 28, 2000: John Spano Is Sentenced for Fraudulent Purchase of Ice Hockey Team, 901
 Nov. 5, 2000: Japanese Amateur Archaeologist's "Discoveries" Are Proven Fakes, 919

2001: Clearstream Financial Clearinghouse Is Accused of Fraud and Money Laundering, 925

June 18, 2001: Award-Winning Historian Joseph J. Ellis Is Accused of Lying, 936

June 30, 2001: Korean Religious Teacher Jung Myung Seok Is Charged with Rape, 939

Aug. 27, 2001: Little League Baseball Star Danny Almonte Is Found to Be Overage, 942

Dec. 14, 2001: Notre Dame Football Coach Resigns for Falsifying His Résumé, 948

Jan. 4, 2002: Historian Stephen E. Ambrose Is Accused of Plagiarism, 951

Jan. 18, 2002: Historian Doris Kearns Goodwin Is Accused of Plagiarism, 959

Feb. 17, 2002: Rotting Human Bodies Are Found at Georgia Crematory, 964

Aug., 2002: Immunologist Resigns After Being Accused of Falsifying Research, 977

Sept. 25, 2002: Inquiry Reveals That Physicist Jan Hendrik Schön Faked His Research, 980

Apr. 29, 2003: New York Times Reporter Jayson Blair Is Exposed as a Fraud, 998

May 12, 2006: Scientist Is Indicted for Faking His Research on Creating Stem Cells, 1094

July 14, 2006: New York Times Exposes Grading Scandal at Auburn University, 1101

Nov. 2, 2006: Evangelist Kent Hovind Is Convicted of Federal Tax Violations, 1123

HOLLYWOOD

Feb. 1, 1922: Director Taylor's Murder Ruins Mabel Normand's Acting Career, 73

Jan. 18, 1923: Actor Wallace Reid's Death in Drug Rehab Shakes Film Industry, 86

Jan. 1, 1924: Film Star Mabel Normand's Chauffeur Shoots Millionaire Courtland S. Dines, 100

Nov. 19, 1924: Film Producer Thomas H. Ince Dies After Weekend on Hearst's Yacht, 108

Early 1928: Joseph P. Kennedy Begins an Affair with Gloria Swanson, 127

Sept. 4, 1932: Film Star Jean Harlow's Husband Is an Apparent Suicide, 160

Dec. 16, 1935: Film Star Thelma Todd's Death Cannot Be Explained, 178

Summer, 1936: Film Star Mary Astor's Diary Becomes a Public Sensation, 184

Feb. 6, 1942: Film Star Errol Flynn Is Acquitted of Rape, 202

Jan. 14, 1943: Film Star Frances Farmer Is Jailed and Institutionalized, 214

June 4, 1943: Actor Charles Chaplin Is Sued for Paternity, 220

July 5, 1948: Actor Carole Landis Commits Suicide During Affair with Rex Harrison, 245

Aug. 31, 1948: Film Star Robert Mitchum Is Arrested for Drug Possession, 251

May, 1955: Scandal Magazine Reveals Actor Rory Calhoun's Criminal Past, 295

Apr. 4, 1958: Actor Lana Turner's Daughter Kills Turner's Gangster Lover, 317

May 19, 1962: Marilyn Monroe Sings "Happy Birthday, Mr. President," 344

Feb. 25, 1977: Film Producer David Begelman Is Found to Have Forged Checks, 509

1978: Actor Joan Crawford's Daughter Publishes Damning Memoir, Mommie Dearest, 517

Feb. 1, 1978: Roman Polanski Flees the United States to Avoid Rape Trial, 522

Apr. 18, 1979: Actor Lee Marvin Is Ordered to Pay Palimony to Former Lover, 540

July 18, 1988: Actor Rob Lowe Videotapes His Sexual Encounter with a Minor, 717

June 27, 1995: Film Star Hugh Grant Is Arrested for Lewd Conduct, 827

Oct. 2, 2003: Newspaper Claims That Arnold Schwarzenegger Groped Women, 1016

Early Nov., 2003: Paris Hilton Sex-Tape Appears on the Web, 1019

July 28, 2006: Actor Mel Gibson Is Caught Making Anti-Semitic Remarks, 1106

HUMAN RIGHTS

Nov. 15, 1908: Belgium Confiscates Congo Free State from King Leopold II, 31

Mar. 21, 1928: Alberta Government Sterilizes Thousands Deemed Genetically and Mentally Unfit, 133

1930: Liberia Is Accused of Selling Its Own Citizens into Slavery, 142

Late 1955: British Atrocities in Kenya's Mau Mau Rebellion Are Revealed, 298
 July 25, 1972: Newspaper Breaks Story of Abuses in Tuskegee Syphilis Study, 437
 1976-1977: U.S. Congress Members Are Implicated in Koreagate Scandal, 479
 Jan., 1977: Singer Anita Bryant Campaigns Against Lesbian and Gay Rights, 506
 Mar. 4, 1999: Quebec Offers Support for Abused Duplessis Orphans, 892
 Apr. 28, 2004: CBS Broadcasts Photos of Abused and Tortured Prisoners at Abu Ghraib, 1034
 Nov. 17, 2005: Liberian Workers Sue Bridgestone Firestone over Slave Labor, 1078

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

Oct. 25, 1924: Forged Communist Letter Brings Down British Government, 105
 1930: Liberia Is Accused of Selling Its Own Citizens into Slavery, 142
 Oct. 11-22, 1937: Duke and Duchess of Windsor Visit Nazi Germany, 196
 Apr. 22, 1942: French Prime Minister Pierre Laval Wants Germany to Win World War II, 209
 Sept. 19, 1952: Actor Charles Chaplin Cannot Reenter the United States, 283
 Sept. 12, 1962: British Civil Servant Is Arrested for Spying, 347
 Aug. 14, 1963: Madame Nhu Derides Self-Immolation of Vietnamese Buddhists, 362
 Oct. 29, 1965: Moroccan Politician Mehdi Ben Barka Disappears in Paris, 374
 May 14, 1974: Washington Post Reveals That the Nixons Received Jewelry Gifts, 453
 1976-1977: U.S. Congress Members Are Implicated in Koreagate Scandal, 479
 Feb. 4, 1976: Lockheed Is Implicated in Bribing Foreign Officials, 482
 Oct. 10, 1979: French President Giscard d'Estaing Is Accused of Taking a Bribe, 550
 Late July, 1980: President's Brother, Billy Carter, Registers as a Paid Agent for Libya, 571
 Aug. 19, 1985: West German Counterintelligence Chief Defects to East Germany, 657
 Mar. 3, 1986: Former U.N. Secretary-General Kurt Waldheim's Nazi Past Is Revealed, 669

Nov. 13, 1986-May 4, 1989: Iran-Contra Weapons Scandal Taints Reagan's Administration, 676
 June 25, 1997: Swiss Banks Admit to Holding Accounts of Holocaust Victims, 858
 Feb. 11, 2002: French Judge Admits Favoring Russian Figure Skaters in Winter Olympics, 962
 July, 2002: Journalist Alleges Release of Genetically Modified Corn Seeds in New Zealand, 974
 Mar. 2, 2003: U.S. National Security Agency Is Found to Have Spied on U.N. Officials, 995
 July 14, 2003: Columnist Robert Novak Leaks the Name of CIA Operative Valerie Plame, 1010
 June 2, 2004: U.N. Report Reveals That Secretary-General Kofi Annan Dismissed Sexual Harassment Charges, 1039
 Jan. 15, 2005: Iqbal Riza Resigns from the United Nations in Oil-for-Food Scandal, 1053
 Summer, 2006-Mar. 16, 2007: China Recalls Pet Food That Has Killed Thousands of American Pets, 1097
 Nov. 23, 2006: Former Russian Security Service Officer Dies from Radiation Poisoning, 1132

LABOR

Mar. 25, 1911: Nearly 150 Workers Die in Triangle Shirtwaist Factory Fire, 40
 1930: Liberia Is Accused of Selling Its Own Citizens into Slavery, 142
 May, 1959: Teamsters Leader Dave Beck Is Convicted of Tax Fraud, 323
 Dec. 30, 1969: United Mine Workers Leader Joseph Yablonski Is Murdered, 404
 Nov. 17, 2005: Liberian Workers Sue Bridgestone Firestone over Slave Labor, 1078

LAW AND THE COURTS

Jan. 23, 1904: Senator Joseph R. Burton Is Convicted of Bribery, 4
 Mar. 2, 1906: Psychoanalyst Ernest Jones Is Accused of Molesting Mentally Disabled Children, 12
 June 25, 1906: Millionaire Heir Murders Architect Stanford White, 16

- July 12, 1906: French Court Declares Alfred Dreyfus Innocent of Treason, 19
- Dec. 8, 1906: Former U.S. Senator Arthur Brown Is Murdered by Lover, 22
- 1907: Elinor Glyn's Novel Three Weeks Shocks Readers, 25
- Mar. 25, 1911: Nearly 150 Workers Die in Triangle Shirtwaist Factory Fire, 40
- Jan., 1913: British Prime Minister's Staff Is Investigated for Insider Trading, 43
- Jan. 13, 1913: Federal Judge Is Impeached for Profiting from His Office, 46
- May 13, 1913: Boxer Jack Johnson Is Imprisoned for Abetting Prostitution, 52
- Apr. 2, 1915: Players Fix Liverpool-Manchester United Soccer Match, 55
- 1919-1920: Ponzi Schemes Are Revealed as Investment Frauds, 63
- July 19, 1921: U.S. Senate Rebukes Navy in Homosexuality Investigation, 70
- Apr. 12, 1922: Film Star Fatty Arbuckle Is Acquitted of Manslaughter, 79
- Mar. 2, 1923: U.S. Senate Investigates Veterans Bureau Chief for Fraud, 89
- Jan. 1, 1924: Film Star Mabel Normand's Chauffeur Shoots Millionaire Courtland S. Dines, 100
- May 12, 1924: Kentucky Congressman John W. Langley Is Convicted of Violating the Volstead Act, 103
- July, 1925: Nosferatu Is Found to Have Violated Dracula Copyright, 111
- May-June, 1926: Evangelist Aimee Semple McPherson Claims She Was Kidnapped, 115
- Mar. 21, 1928: Alberta Government Sterilizes Thousands Deemed Genetically and Mentally Unfit, 133
- Nov., 1929: Banque Oustric et Cie Failure Prompts French Inquiry, 139
- Mar. 30, 1931: "Scottsboro Boys" Are Railroaded Through Rape Trials, 150
- 1932: Insull Utilities Trusts Collapse Prompts New Federal Regulation, 154
- May 16, 1934: General Douglas MacArthur Sues Newspaper Columnist for Libel, 173
- July 10, 1934: Sex Scandal Forces Resignation of Alberta Premier Brownlee, 176
- Mar. 17, 1937: Atherton Report Exposes San Francisco Police Corruption, 191
- Feb. 6, 1942: Film Star Errol Flynn Is Acquitted of Rape, 202
- Feb. 19, 1942: President Roosevelt Orders Internment of Japanese Americans, 205
- Dec. 5, 1942: Industrialist Charles Bedaux Is Arrested for Nazi Collaboration, 212
- Jan. 14, 1943: Film Star Frances Farmer Is Jailed and Institutionalized, 214
- June 4, 1943: Actor Charles Chaplin Is Sued for Paternity, 220
- June 5, 1944: Australian Poets Claim Responsibility for a Literary Hoax, 223
- May 26, 1945: Norwegian Writer Knut Hamsun Is Arrested for Treason, 229
- Dec. 14, 1945: Poet Ezra Pound Is Charged with Treason and Institutionalized, 236
- Nov. 23, 1946: Tennis Star Bill Tilden Is Arrested for Lewd Behavior with a Minor, 239
- Aug. 31, 1948: Film Star Robert Mitchum Is Arrested for Drug Possession, 251
- Jan. 21, 1950: Alger Hiss Is Convicted of Perjury, 259
- Jan. 17, 1951: College Basketball Players Begin Shaving Points for Money, 274
- Mar. 9, 1956: British Conductor-Composer Is Arrested for Possessing Pornography, 304
- May, 1959: Teamsters Leader Dave Beck Is Convicted of Tax Fraud, 323
- Sept. 12, 1962: British Civil Servant Is Arrested for Spying, 347
- Oct. 26, 1962: West German Police Raid Der Spiegel Magazine Offices, 349
- July 2, 1963: Muslim Leader Elijah Muhammad Is Sued for Paternity, 359
- Oct. 7, 1964: President Lyndon Johnson's Aide Is Arrested in Gay-Sex Sting, 371
- Mar. 1, 1967: Adam Clayton Powell, Jr., Is Excluded from Congress, 380
- Nov. 28, 1967: Investor Louis Wolfson Is Convicted of Selling Stock Illegally, 389
- May 9, 1969: Supreme Court Justice Abe Fortas Is Accused of Bribery, 391

- July 18, 1969: Senator Edward Kennedy's Driving Accident Kills Mary Jo Kopechne, 394
- May 28, 1970: Irish Politicians Are Tried for Conspiring to Import Weapons, 413
- June 13, 1971: New York Times Publishes the Pentagon Papers, 416
- June 22, 1972: Police Arrest Architect John Poulson for Bribery and Fraud, 431
- Oct. 10, 1973: Spiro T. Agnew Resigns Vice Presidency in Disgrace, 447
- Apr. 15, 1974: Kidnapped Heir Patty Hearst Helps Rob a Bank, 450
- Summer, 1974: Dalkon Shield Contraceptive Is Removed from the Market, 459
- 1976: Peace Corps Conceals Murder of Volunteer in Tonga, 476
- Feb. 4, 1976: Lockheed Is Implicated in Bribing Foreign Officials, 482
- Mar. 21, 1976: Actor Claudine Longet Kills Ski Champion Vladimir Sabich, 485
- Sept. 1, 1976: Former Beatle George Harrison Loses Plagiarism Lawsuit, 494
- Oct. 4, 1976: Agriculture Secretary Earl Butz Resigns After Making Obscene Joke, 500
- Feb. 25, 1977: Film Producer David Begelman Is Found to Have Forged Checks, 509
- 1978: Roots Author Alex Haley Is Sued for Plagiarism, 520
- Feb. 1, 1978: Roman Polanski Flees the United States to Avoid Rape Trial, 522
- Aug. 4, 1978: British Politician Jeremy Thorpe Is Charged with Attempted Murder, 531
- Apr. 18, 1979: Actor Lee Marvin Is Ordered to Pay Palimony to Former Lover, 540
- Sept. 26, 1979: Love Canal Residents Sue Chemical Company, 546
- Feb. 2, 1980: Media Uncover FBI Sting Implicating Dozens of Lawmakers, 561
- Mar. 10, 1980: Scarsdale Diet Doctor Is Killed by His Lover, 565
- Apr. 27, 1980: Mobster's Arrest Reveals Point Shaving by Boston College Basketball Players, 568
- Late July, 1980: President's Brother, Billy Carter, Registers as a Paid Agent for Libya, 571
- Sept. 3, 1980: Congressman Bauman Is Arrested for Liaison with Teenage Boy, 577
- Apr. 28, 1981: Tennis Star Billie Jean King Is Sued for Palimony, 588
- May 29, 1981: Court Finds That Ford Ignored Pinto's Safety Problems, 594
- Sept. 10, 1981: Chicago Sun-Times Reports That Cardinal Cody Diverted Church Funds, 597
- May 11, 1982: Philippine President Marcos Forces the Entire Supreme Court to Resign, 600
- Aug. 6, 1982: Banco Ambrosiano Collapses Amid Criminal Accusations, 606
- Oct. 19, 1982: Car Manufacturer John De Lorean Is Arrested in a Drug Sting, 609
- Aug. 12, 1983-July 27, 1990: McMartin Preschool Is Embroiled in Child-Abuse Case, 624
- May 2, 1984: E. F. Hutton Executives Plead Guilty to Fraud, 636
- Dec. 22, 1984: Subway Vigilante Bernhard Goetz Shoots Four Black Youths, 641
- May 7, 1985: Banker Jake Butcher Pleads Guilty to Fraud, 648
- July 19, 1985: Mayflower Madam Pleads Guilty to Promoting Prostitution, 654
- Oct. 23, 1985: Guru Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh Is Indicted for Immigration Fraud, 662
- Feb. 28, 1986: Baseball Commissioner Peter Ueberroth Suspends Players for Cocaine Use, 666
- Jan. 12 and May 11, 1987: Media Reports Spark Investigation of Australian Police Corruption, 681
- Mar. 19, 1987: Jim Bakker Resigns as Head of PTL Television Network, 690
- Apr. 9, 1987: Bess Myerson Resigns as New York Commissioner of Cultural Affairs, 693
- July 25, 1987: Novelist-Politician Jeffrey Archer Wins Libel Trial Against the Daily Star, 696
- Nov. 28, 1987: Black Teenager Claims to Have Been Gang-Raped by Police Officers, 702
- Jan. 15, 1988: ZZZZ Best Founder Is Indicted on Federal Fraud Charges, 708
- Mar. 29, 1989: Financier Michael Milken Is Indicted for Racketeering and Fraud, 726
- Aug. 24, 1989: Pete Rose Is Banned from Baseball for Betting on Games, 735

- Jan. 18, 1990: Washington, D.C., Mayor Marion Barry Is Arrested for Drug Use, 748
- Mar., 1990: Menendez Brothers Are Arrested for Murdering Their Parents, 750
- Aug. 27, 1990: Guinness Four Are Found Guilty of Share-Trading Fraud, 753
- Mar. 30, 1991: William Kennedy Smith Is Accused of Rape, 759
- Apr. 5, 1991: George W. Bush Is Investigated for Insider Trading, 762
- Oct. 11-13, 1991: Justice Clarence Thomas's Confirmation Hearings Create a Scandal, 768
- Jan. 13, 1992: Woody Allen Has Affair with Lover Mia Farrow's Adopted Daughter, 773
- Apr. 15, 1992: Hotel Tycoon Leona Helmsley Enters Prison for Tax Evasion, 776
- May 19, 1992: Amy Fisher Shoots Mary Jo Buttafuoco, 781
- June 23, 1993: Lorena Bobbitt Severs Her Husband's Penis, 795
- June 1, 1994: Congressman Dan Rostenkowski Is Indicted in House Post Office Scandal, 803
- June 12, 1994: Double Murder Leads to Sensational O. J. Simpson Trial, 806
- June 30, 1994: Tonya Harding Is Banned from Skating After Attack on Rival, 812
- Aug. 5, 1994: Kenneth Starr Is Appointed to the Whitewater Investigation, 818
- Aug. 21, 1994: Sex Scandal Forces Dismissal of NAACP Chief Benjamin Chavis, 821
- Feb. 28, 1995: Former Mexican President Carlos Salinas's Brother Is Arrested for Murder, 824
- June 27, 1995: Film Star Hugh Grant Is Arrested for Lewd Conduct, 827
- Aug. 16, 1996: Belgian Media Reveal How Police Bungled Serial Murder Case, 840
- Feb. 26, 1997: Teacher Mary Kay Letourneau Is Arrested for Statutory Rape, 849
- May 20, 1997: Air Force Prosecution of Female Officer for Adultery Reveals Double Standard, 855
- Aug. 31, 1997: Princess Diana Dies in a Car Crash, 861
- Sept. 22, 1997: Sportscaster Marv Albert Is Tried for Sexual Assault, 865
- Nov. 26, 1997: Canadian Health Commissioner Releases Report on Tainted Blood, 868
- Dec. 11, 1997: HUD Secretary Henry Cisneros Is Indicted for Lying to Federal Agents, 872
- Apr. 7, 1998: Pop Singer George Michael Is Arrested for Lewd Conduct, 881
- May, 1998: Police Corruption Is Revealed in Los Angeles's Rampart Division, 884
- Dec. 23, 1998: Prominent Belgians Are Sentenced in Agusta-Dassault Corruption Scandal, 889
- Jan. 28, 2000: John Spano Is Sentenced for Fraudulent Purchase of Ice Hockey Team, 901
- May 9, 2000: Former Louisiana Governor Edwin Edwards Is Convicted on Corruption Charges, 907
- Dec., 2000: Sexual Abuse of Children in France Leads to the Outreau Affair, 922
- Feb. 18, 2001: CIA Agent Robert Hanssen Is Arrested for Spying for the Russians, 931
- Apr. 30, 2001: Washington Intern Chandra Levy Disappears, 933
- June 30, 2001: Korean Religious Teacher Jung Myung Seok Is Charged with Rape, 939
- Dec. 2, 2001: Enron Bankruptcy Reveals Massive Financial Fraud, 945
- Jan. 6, 2002: Boston Globe Reports on Child Sexual Abuse by Roman Catholic Priests, 954
- Mar. 27, 2002: Georgia Basketball Coach Jim Harrick, Sr., Resigns over Fraud Allegations, 968
- June 25, 2002: Internal Corruption Forces Adelphia Communications to Declare Bankruptcy, 971
- May 3, 2003: University of Alabama Fires New Football Coach in Sex Scandal, 1002
- July 1, 2003: Basketball Star Kobe Bryant Is Accused of Rape, 1008
- Sept. 3, 2003: Mutual Fund Companies Are Implicated in Shady Trading Practices, 1013
- Dec. 18, 2003: Pop Star Michael Jackson Is Charged with Child Molestation, 1025
- Mar. 4, 2004: Former United Way Charity Chief Pleads Guilty to Embezzlement, 1028
- Mar. 5, 2004: Martha Stewart Is Convicted in Insider-Trading Scandal, 1031
- June 2, 2004: U.N. Report Reveals That

Secretary-General Kofi Annan Dismissed Sexual Harassment Charges, 1039
 Oct. 13, 2004: Television Producer Files Sex Harassment Suit Against Bill O'Reilly, 1047
 Oct. 14, 2004: Insurance Brokerage Marsh & McLennan Is Charged with Fraud, 1050
 July 1, 2005: Federal Agents Raid Congressman Randall Cunningham's Home, 1064
 Sept. 12, 2005: Westar Energy Executives Are Found Guilty of Looting Their Company, 1072
 Nov. 17, 2005: Liberian Workers Sue Bridgestone Firestone over Slave Labor, 1078
 Dec. 6, 2005: Spokane, Washington, Mayor Recalled in Gay-Sex Scandal, 1081
 Mar. 14, 2006: Duke Lacrosse Players Are Accused of Gang Rape, 1086
 Summer, 2006-Mar. 16, 2007: China Recalls Pet Food That Has Killed Thousands of American Pets, 1097
 July 28, 2006: Actor Mel Gibson Is Caught Making Anti-Semitic Remarks, 1106
 Sept. 18, 2006: Newsweek Reveals That Hewlett-Packard Spied on Its Own Board, 1114
 Nov. 2, 2006: Evangelist Kent Hovind Is Convicted of Federal Tax Violations, 1123
 June 4, 2007: Congressman William J. Jefferson Is Indicted for Corruption, 1147
 July 9, 2007: Senator David Vitter's Name Is Found in D.C. Madam's Address Book, 1150
 July 11, 2007: Florida Politician Is Arrested for Soliciting an Undercover Male Police Officer, 1153
 Aug. 20, 2007: Football Star Michael Vick Pleads Guilty to Financing a Dogfighting Ring, 1158
 Oct. 5, 2007: Olympic Champion Marion Jones Admits Steroid Use, 1164
 June 13, 2008: Singer R. Kelly Is Acquitted on Child Pornography Charges, 1170
 July 29, 2008: NBA Referee Tim Donaghy Is Sentenced to Prison for Betting on Games, 1172

LITERATURE

1907: Elinor Glyn's Novel Three Weeks Shocks Readers, 25
 July, 1925: Nosferatu Is Found to Have Violated Dracula Copyright, 111

June 5, 1944: Australian Poets Claim Responsibility for a Literary Hoax, 223
 May 26, 1945: Norwegian Writer Knut Hamsun Is Arrested for Treason, 229
 Dec. 14, 1945: Poet Ezra Pound Is Charged with Treason and Institutionalized, 236
 Nov. 21, 1953: Piltdown Man Is Revealed to Be a Hoax, 292
 Jan. 28, 1972: Clifford Irving Admits Faking Howard Hughes Memoirs, 422
 1978: Roots Author Alex Haley Is Sued for Plagiarism, 520
 Mar. 12, 1997: Prize-Winning Aborigine Novelist Revealed as a Fraud, 852
 Aug. 12, 2006: Novelist Günter Grass Admits to Youthful Nazi Ties, 1109

MEDICINE AND HEALTH CARE

Jan. 18, 1923: Actor Wallace Reid's Death in Drug Rehab Shakes Film Industry, 86
 Mar. 21, 1928: Alberta Government Sterilizes Thousands Deemed Genetically and Mentally Unfit, 133
 Sept.-Oct., 1937: Prescription Elixir Causes More than One Hundred Deaths, 193
 Dec. 1, 1952: George Jorgensen Becomes Christine Jorgensen, 289
 1956-1962: Prescription Thalidomide Causes Widespread Birth Disorders, 301
 July 25, 1972: Newspaper Breaks Story of Abuses in Tuskegee Syphilis Study, 437
 Summer, 1974: Dalkon Shield Contraceptive Is Removed from the Market, 459
 Sept. 26, 1979: Love Canal Residents Sue Chemical Company, 546
 Sept. 17, 1985: Media Allege Canadian Officials Allowed Sale of Rancid Tuna, 660
 Feb. 28, 1986: Baseball Commissioner Peter Ueberroth Suspends Players for Cocaine Use, 666
 Sept. 19, 1988: Stephen Breuning Pleads Guilty to Medical Research Fraud, 720
 July 1, 1994: Soccer Star Diego Maradona Is Expelled from World Cup, 815
 Feb. 4, 1996: Whistle-Blower Reveals Tobacco Industry Corruption, 833

Nov. 26, 1997: Canadian Health Commissioner Releases Report on Tainted Blood, 868
 Sept., 2000: American Scientists Are Accused of Starting a Measles Epidemic in the Amazon, 910
 Sept. 26, 2000: Gymnast Andreea Răducan Loses Her Olympic Gold Medal Because of Drugs, 916
 Jan. 30, 2001: Liverpool Children's Hospital Collects Body Parts Without Authorization, 927
 Aug., 2002: Immunologist Resigns After Being Accused of Falsifying Research, 977
 Mar. 17, 2005: Former Baseball Star Mark McGwire Evades Congressional Questions on Steroid Use, 1058
 Summer, 2006-Mar. 16, 2007: China Recalls Pet Food That Has Killed Thousands of American Pets, 1097
 July 26, 2006: Tour de France Is Hit with a Doping Scandal, 1103
 Nov. 23, 2006: Former Russian Security Service Officer Dies from Radiation Poisoning, 1132
 Feb. 18, 2007: Washington Post Exposes Decline of Walter Reed Army Hospital, 1138
 Oct. 5, 2007: Olympic Champion Marion Jones Admits Steroid Use, 1164

MILITARY

1906-1909: Emperor William II's Homosexual "Circle" Scandalizes Germany, 9
 July 12, 1906: French Court Declares Alfred Dreyfus Innocent of Treason, 19
 May, 1915: British Government Falls Because of Munitions Shortages and Military Setbacks, 58
 July 19, 1921: U.S. Senate Rebukes Navy in Homosexuality Investigation, 70
 May, 1930: Postmaster's Division of Airmail Routes Creates a Scandal, 144
 July 28, 1932: U.S. Troops Drive World War I Veterans from Washington, 156
 Feb. 19, 1942: President Roosevelt Orders Internment of Japanese Americans, 205
 Apr. 22, 1942: French Prime Minister Pierre Laval Wants Germany to Win World War II, 209

May 9, 1945: Norwegian Politician Quisling Is Arrested for Nazi Collaboration, 226
 Aug. 14, 1945: French War Hero Pétain Is Convicted of Nazi Collaboration, 232
 Aug. 26, 1949: Viet Minh Broadcasts French General's Damaging Report, 257
 July 16, 1951: Belgium's Disgraced King Leopold III Abdicates, 276
 Late 1955: British Atrocities in Kenya's Mau Mau Rebellion Are Revealed, 298
 June, 1956: George F. Kennan Proves Russian Sisson Documents Are Fakes, 307
 Nov. 13, 1969: American Massacre of Vietnamese Civilians at My Lai Is Revealed, 401
 May 4, 1970: National Guardsmen Kill Protesting Kent State Students, 410
 June 13, 1971: New York Times Publishes the Pentagon Papers, 416
 Apr. 4, 1976: West Point Cadets Are Caught Cheating on Exams, 488
 Nov. 9, 1976: German Generals Must Retire for Supporting a Neo-Nazi Pilot, 503
 Mar. 3, 1986: Former U.N. Secretary-General Kurt Waldheim's Nazi Past Is Revealed, 669
 Nov. 13, 1986-May 4, 1989: Iran-Contra Weapons Scandal Taints Reagan's Administration, 676
 Dec. 15-25, 1989: Harassment of a Christian Minister Sparks the Romanian Revolution, 742
 June 26, 1992: U.S. Navy Secretary Resigns in the Wake of Tailhook Sexual Assault Scandal, 784
 Apr. 28, 1994: U.S. Naval Academy Expels Midshipmen for Cheating, 800
 May 20, 1997: Air Force Prosecution of Female Officer for Adultery Reveals Double Standard, 855
 Jan. 2, 2003: E-mail Message Prompts Inquiry into Air Force Academy Sexual Assaults, 991
 Mar. 2, 2003: U.S. National Security Agency Is Found to Have Spied on U.N. Officials, 995
 Apr. 28, 2004: CBS Broadcasts Photos of Abused and Tortured Prisoners at Abu Ghraib, 1034
 Sept. 8, 2004: 60 Minutes II Reports on George W. Bush's Evasion of Wartime Duty, 1044

June 22, 2005: U.S. Air Force Investigates Religious Intolerance at Its Academy, 1062
 Aug. 12, 2006: Novelist Günter Grass Admits to Youthful Nazi Ties, 1109
 Feb. 18, 2007: Washington Post Exposes Decline of Walter Reed Army Hospital, 1138

MURDER AND SUICIDE

June 25, 1906: Millionaire Heir Murders Architect Stanford White, 16
 Dec. 8, 1906: Former U.S. Senator Arthur Brown Is Murdered by Lover, 22
 July 27, 1917: Millionaire Socialite Dies Under Suspicious Circumstances, 60
 Feb. 1, 1922: Director Taylor's Murder Ruins Mabel Normand's Acting Career, 73
 Apr. 12, 1922: Film Star Fatty Arbuckle Is Acquitted of Manslaughter, 79
 May 30, 1923: U.S. Attorney General Harry M. Daugherty's Aide Commits Suicide, 92
 Jan. 1, 1924: Film Star Mabel Normand's Chauffeur Shoots Millionaire Courtland S. Dines, 100
 Nov. 19, 1924: Film Producer Thomas H. Ince Dies After Weekend on Hearst's Yacht, 108
 1928-1929: Actor Is Suspected of Falsely Claiming to Be an American Indian, 130
 Sept. 4, 1932: Film Star Jean Harlow's Husband Is an Apparent Suicide, 160
 Jan. 8, 1934-Jan. 17, 1936: Stavisky's Fraudulent Schemes Rock French Government, 170
 Dec. 16, 1935: Film Star Thelma Todd's Death Cannot Be Explained, 178
 Dec. 5, 1942: Industrialist Charles Bedaux Is Arrested for Nazi Collaboration, 212
 July 5, 1948: Actor Carole Landis Commits Suicide During Affair with Rex Harrison, 245
 Apr. 4, 1958: Actor Lana Turner's Daughter Kills Turner's Gangster Lover, 317
 July 2, 1963: Muslim Leader Elijah Muhammad Is Sued for Paternity, 359
 Mar. 13, 1964: Kitty Genovese Dies as Her Cries for Help Are Ignored, 369
 Oct. 29, 1965: Moroccan Politician Mehdi Ben Barka Disappears in Paris, 374
 Sept. 5, 1967: Socialite Nancy Wakeman Shoots Her Politician-Husband, 386
 Dec. 30, 1969: United Mine Workers Leader Joseph Yablonski Is Murdered, 404
 May 4, 1970: National Guardsmen Kill Protesting Kent State Students, 410
 May 20, 1974: French Cardinal Daniélou Dies in a Prostitute's House, 456
 Feb. 3, 1975: Honduras's "Bananagate" Bribery Scandal Leads to Executive's Suicide, 471
 1976: Peace Corps Conceals Murder of Volunteer in Tonga, 476
 Mar. 21, 1976: Actor Claudine Longet Kills Ski Champion Vladimir Sabich, 485
 July 23, 1978: Utah Millionaire Is Murdered by His Grandson, 528
 Aug. 4, 1978: British Politician Jeremy Thorpe Is Charged with Attempted Murder, 531
 Mar. 10, 1980: Scarsdale Diet Doctor Is Killed by His Lover, 565
 Aug. 6, 1982: Banco Ambrosiano Collapses Amid Criminal Accusations, 606
 Aug. 21, 1983: Filipino Opposition Leader Aquino Is Assassinated on Return Home, 628
 July 10, 1985: French Secret Service Sinks the Greenpeace Ship Rainbow Warrior, 651
 Jan. 22, 1987: Pennsylvania Politician Kills Himself at Televised Press Conference, 684
 Mar., 1990: Menendez Brothers Are Arrested for Murdering Their Parents, 750
 June 12, 1994: Double Murder Leads to Sensational O. J. Simpson Trial, 806
 Feb. 28, 1995: Former Mexican President Carlos Salinas's Brother Is Arrested for Murder, 824
 Aug. 16, 1996: Belgian Media Reveal How Police Bungled Serial Murder Case, 840
 May, 1998: Police Corruption Is Revealed in Los Angeles's Rampart Division, 884
 Dec. 23, 1998: Prominent Belgians Are Sentenced in Agusta-Dassault Corruption Scandal, 889
 Apr. 30, 2001: Washington Intern Chandra Levy Disappears, 933
 Nov. 23, 2006: Former Russian Security Service Officer Dies from Radiation Poisoning, 1132
 May 28, 2007: Japanese Politician Charged with Corruption Hangs Himself, 1145
 July 9, 2007: Senator David Vitter's Name Is Found in D.C. Madam's Address Book, 1150

MUSIC AND PERFORMING ARTS

- Mar. 26, 1922: Hindemith's Opera Sancta Susanna Depicts a Nun's Sexual Desires, 76
- Mar. 9, 1956: British Conductor-Composer Is Arrested for Possessing Pornography, 304
- Dec. 12, 1957: Rock Star Jerry Lee Lewis Marries Thirteen-Year-Old Cousin, 313
- Feb. 8, 1960: U.S. Congress Investigates Payola in Pop Music Industry, 332
- May 19, 1962: Marilyn Monroe Sings "Happy Birthday, Mr. President," 344
- Sept. 1, 1976: Former Beatle George Harrison Loses Plagiarism Lawsuit, 494
- Jan., 1977: Singer Anita Bryant Campaigns Against Lesbian and Gay Rights, 506
- Nov. 19, 1990: Lip-Synching Duo Milli Vanilli Lose Grammy Award, 756
- Apr. 7, 1998: Pop Singer George Michael Is Arrested for Lewd Conduct, 881
- Dec. 18, 2003: Pop Star Michael Jackson Is Charged with Child Molestation, 1025
- June 13, 2008: Singer R. Kelly Is Acquitted on Child Pornography Charges, 1170

ORGANIZED CRIME AND RACKETEERING

- June 13, 1907: San Francisco Mayor Schmitz Is Found Guilty of Extortion, 28
- Apr. 2, 1915: Players Fix Liverpool-Manchester United Soccer Match, 55
- Sept. 21, 1919: White Sox Players Conspire to Lose World Series in "Black Sox" Scandal, 66
- Mar. 17, 1937: Atherton Report Exposes San Francisco Police Corruption, 191
- May 22, 1939: Kansas City's Boss Pendergast Pleads Guilty to Income Tax Evasion, 199
- Spring, 1947: Baseball Manager Leo Durocher Is Suspended for Gambling Ties, 242
- May 3, 1950: U.S. Senate Committee Begins Investigating Organized Crime, 270
- Apr. 4, 1958: Actor Lana Turner's Daughter Kills Turner's Gangster Lover, 317
- May, 1959: Teamsters Leader Dave Beck Is Convicted of Tax Fraud, 323
- Feb. 7, 1960: President Kennedy's Romantic Affair Links Him to Organized Crime, 329

- Oct. 7, 1963: Vice President Lyndon B. Johnson Aide Resigns over Crime Connections, 365
- Fall, 1969-Winter, 1971: Japanese Baseball Players Are Implicated in Game Fixing, 398
- Dec. 30, 1969: United Mine Workers Leader Joseph Yablonski Is Murdered, 404
- June 17, 1972-Aug. 9, 1974: Watergate Break-in Leads to President Nixon's Resignation, 425
- Sept. 23, 1977: Horse-Swapping Fraud Upsets Belmont Park Raceway, 514
- Feb. 2, 1980: Media Uncover FBI Sting Implicating Dozens of Lawmakers, 561
- Apr. 27, 1980: Mobster's Arrest Reveals Point Shaving by Boston College Basketball Players, 568
- May 23, 1981: Italian Justice Minister Resigns Because of Crime Connection, 591
- Aug. 6, 1982: Banco Ambrosiano Collapses Amid Criminal Accusations, 606
- Oct. 19, 1982: Car Manufacturer John De Lorean Is Arrested in a Drug Sting, 609
- Oct. 23, 1985: Guru Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh Is Indicted for Immigration Fraud, 662
- Feb. 28, 1986: Baseball Commissioner Peter Ueberroth Suspends Players for Cocaine Use, 666
- Jan. 15, 1988: ZZZZ Best Founder Is Indicted on Federal Fraud Charges, 708
- Mar. 29, 1989: Financier Michael Milken Is Indicted for Racketeering and Fraud, 726
- Nov. 3, 1996: Car Crash Reveals Depth of Government Corruption in Turkey, 843
- Dec. 23, 1998: Prominent Belgians Are Sentenced in Agusta-Dassault Corruption Scandal, 889
- Feb. 18, 2001: CIA Agent Robert Hanssen Is Arrested for Spying for the Russians, 931
- Jan. 27, 2005: German Soccer Referee Admits to Fixing Games for Money, 1055
- May 4, 2006: Media Uncover Match-Fixing in Italian Soccer, 1092
- July 9, 2007: Senator David Vitter's Name Is Found in D.C. Madam's Address Book, 1150
- Aug. 20, 2007: Football Star Michael Vick Pleads Guilty to Financing a Dogfighting Ring, 1158

PERFORMING ARTS

- 1909-1916: Dancer Isadora Duncan Begins Affair with Millionaire Heir, 34
 1927: Mae West's Play About Gays Is Banned on Broadway, 122
 Feb. 23, 1963: Play Accuses Pope Pius XII of Complicity in the Holocaust, 353

PLAGIARISM

- Jan. 28, 1972: Clifford Irving Admits Faking Howard Hughes Memoirs, 422
 Sept. 1, 1976: Former Beatle George Harrison Loses Plagiarism Lawsuit, 494
 1978: Roots Author Alex Haley Is Sued for Plagiarism, 520
 Sept. 23, 1987: Plagiarism Charges End Joe Biden's Presidential Campaign, 698
 Dec. 3, 1989: Martin Luther King, Jr.'s, Doctoral-Thesis Plagiarism Is Revealed, 739
 Apr., 1998: Scottish Historian Is Charged with Plagiarism, 879
 Jan. 4, 2002: Historian Stephen E. Ambrose Is Accused of Plagiarism, 951
 Jan. 18, 2002: Historian Doris Kearns Goodwin Is Accused of Plagiarism, 959
 Apr. 29, 2003: New York Times Reporter Jayson Blair Is Exposed as a Fraud, 998
 July 24, 2007: University of Colorado Fires Professor for Plagiarism and Research Falsification, 1155

POLITICS

- 1904: Theodore Roosevelt Is Accused of Accepting Corporate Funds, 1
 Jan. 23, 1904: Senator Joseph R. Burton Is Convicted of Bribery, 4
 Dec., 1904: Boston Alderman Is Reelected While in Jail for Fraud, 6
 1906-1909: Emperor William II's Homosexual "Circle" Scandalizes Germany, 9
 June 13, 1907: San Francisco Mayor Schmitz Is Found Guilty of Extortion, 28
 Jan., 1913: British Prime Minister's Staff Is Investigated for Insider Trading, 43
 Jan. 13, 1913: Federal Judge Is Impeached for Profiting from His Office, 46

- June 22, 1922: British Prime Minister David Lloyd George Is Accused of Selling Honors, 83
 Mar. 2, 1923: U.S. Senate Investigates Veterans Bureau Chief for Fraud, 89
 May 30, 1923: U.S. Attorney General Harry M. Daugherty's Aide Commits Suicide, 92
 Oct. 22, 1923: U.S. Senate Begins Hearings on Teapot Dome Oil Leases, 95
 May 12, 1924: Kentucky Congressman John W. Langley Is Convicted of Violating the Volstead Act, 103
 Oct. 25, 1924: Forged Communist Letter Brings Down British Government, 105
 1927: President Warren G. Harding's Lover Publishes Tell-All Memoir, 124
 Nov., 1929: Banque Oustric et Cie Failure Prompts French Inquiry, 139
 May, 1930: Postmaster's Division of Airmail Routes Creates a Scandal, 144
 July 28, 1932: U.S. Troops Drive World War I Veterans from Washington, 156
 Mar. 31, 1933: New York Times Reporter Denies Reports of a Soviet Famine, 167
 July 10, 1934: Sex Scandal Forces Resignation of Alberta Premier Brownlee, 176
 Dec. 10, 1936: King Edward VIII Abdicates to Marry an American Divorcée, 187
 Oct. 11-22, 1937: Duke and Duchess of Windsor Visit Nazi Germany, 196
 May 22, 1939: Kansas City's Boss Pendergast Pleads Guilty to Income Tax Evasion, 199
 Apr. 22, 1942: French Prime Minister Pierre Laval Wants Germany to Win World War II, 209
 May 26, 1945: Norwegian Writer Knut Hamsun Is Arrested for Treason, 229
 Aug. 14, 1945: French War Hero Pétain Is Convicted of Nazi Collaboration, 232
 Dec. 14, 1945: Poet Ezra Pound Is Charged with Treason and Institutionalized, 236
 Aug. 4, 1948: Columnist Drew Pearson Exposes Congressman's Corruption, 248
 Aug. 26, 1949: Viet Minh Broadcasts French General's Damaging Report, 257
 Jan. 21, 1950: Alger Hiss Is Convicted of Perjury, 259

- Feb. 9, 1950: U.S. Senator Joseph McCarthy Launches Communist Witch Hunt, 266
- July 16, 1951: Belgium's Disgraced King Leopold III Abdicates, 276
- Nov. 16, 1951: Federal Tax Official Resigns After Accepting Bribes, 279
- Sept. 19, 1952: Actor Charles Chaplin Cannot Reenter the United States, 283
- Sept. 23, 1952: Richard Nixon Denies Taking Illegal Campaign Contributions, 286
- June, 1956: George F. Kennan Proves Russian Sisson Documents Are Fakes, 307
- June 25, 1956: President Truman's Appointments Secretary Is Convicted of Tax Conspiracy, 310
- Sept. 22, 1958: President Eisenhower's Chief of Staff Resigns for Influence Selling, 320
- Feb. 7, 1960: President Kennedy's Romantic Affair Links Him to Organized Crime, 329
- Mar. 29, 1962: Billie Sol Estes Is Arrested for Corporate Fraud, 341
- May 19, 1962: Marilyn Monroe Sings "Happy Birthday, Mr. President," 344
- Sept. 12, 1962: British Civil Servant Is Arrested for Spying, 347
- Oct. 26, 1962: West German Police Raid Der Spiegel Magazine Offices, 349
- Mar. 2-Sept. 25, 1963: John Profumo Affair Rocks British Government, 355
- Aug. 14, 1963: Madame Nhu Derides Self-Immolation of Vietnamese Buddhists, 362
- Oct. 7, 1963: Vice President Lyndon B. Johnson Aide Resigns over Crime Connections, 365
- Oct. 7, 1964: President Lyndon Johnson's Aide Is Arrested in Gay-Sex Sting, 371
- Oct. 29, 1965: Moroccan Politician Mehdi Ben Barka Disappears in Paris, 374
- Mar. 4, 1966: Munsinger Sex and Spy Scandal Rocks Canada, 377
- Mar. 1, 1967: Adam Clayton Powell, Jr., Is Excluded from Congress, 380
- June 23, 1967: Senator Thomas J. Dodd Is Censured for Misappropriating Funds, 384
- May 9, 1969: Supreme Court Justice Abe Fortas Is Accused of Bribery, 391
- July 18, 1969: Senator Edward Kennedy's Driving Accident Kills Mary Jo Kopechne, 394
- May 28, 1970: Irish Politicians Are Tried for Conspiring to Import Weapons, 413
- June 13, 1971: New York Times Publishes the Pentagon Papers, 416
- June 17, 1972-Aug. 9, 1974: Watergate Break-in Leads to President Nixon's Resignation, 425
- July 8-22, 1972: Jane Fonda's Visit to North Vietnam Outrages Many Americans, 434
- July 31, 1972: Thomas F. Eagleton Withdraws from Vice Presidential Race, 440
- Oct. 10, 1973: Spiro T. Agnew Resigns Vice Presidency in Disgrace, 447
- Apr. 15, 1974: Kidnapped Heir Patty Hearst Helps Rob a Bank, 450
- May 14, 1974: Washington Post Reveals That the Nixons Received Jewelry Gifts, 453
- Oct. 7, 1974: Congressman Wilbur D. Mills's Stripper Affair Leads to His Downfall, 462
- Nov. 20, 1974: British Politician John Stonehouse Fakes His Suicide, 468
- May 23, 1976: Washington Post Exposes Congressman Wayne L. Hays's Affair, 491
- Sept., 1976: Jimmy Carter Admits Committing Adultery in His Heart, 497
- Oct. 4, 1976: Agriculture Secretary Earl Butz Resigns After Making Obscene Joke, 500
- Nov. 9, 1976: German Generals Must Retire for Supporting a Neo-Nazi Pilot, 503
- Jan., 1977: Singer Anita Bryant Campaigns Against Lesbian and Gay Rights, 506
- Sept. 21, 1977: Carter Cabinet Member Resigns over Ethics Violations, 511
- Aug. 4, 1978: British Politician Jeremy Thorpe Is Charged with Attempted Murder, 531
- Jan. 26, 1979: Former Vice President Nelson Rockefeller Dies Mysteriously, 537
- June 4, 1979: South African President B. J. Vorster Resigns in Muldergate Scandal, 543
- Oct. 11, 1979: Senate Denounces Herman E. Talmadge for Money Laundering, 553
- Late July, 1980: President's Brother, Billy Carter, Registers as a Paid Agent for Libya, 571
- Sept. 3, 1980: Congressman Bauman Is Arrested for Liaison with Teenage Boy, 577
- Dec. 7, 1980: Rita Jenrette's "Diary of a Mad Congresswife" Scandalizes Washington, 582

- May 23, 1981: Italian Justice Minister Resigns Because of Crime Connection, 591
- May 11, 1982: Philippine President Marcos Forces the Entire Supreme Court to Resign, 600
- July 20, 1982: Conservative Politician John G. Schmitz Is Found to Have Children Out of Wedlock, 603
- Dec. 16, 1982: Congress Cites Environmental Protection Agency Chief for Contempt, 615
- Aug. 21, 1983: Filipino Opposition Leader Aquino Is Assassinated on Return Home, 628
- Oct. 14, 1983: British Cabinet Secretary Parkinson Resigns After His Secretary Becomes Pregnant, 631
- Jan. 25, 1984: Jesse Jackson Calls New York City "Hymietown," 633
- 1985-1986: Westland Affair Shakes Prime Minister Thatcher's Government, 645
- July 10, 1985: French Secret Service Sinks the Greenpeace Ship Rainbow Warrior, 651
- Mar. 3, 1986: Former U.N. Secretary-General Kurt Waldheim's Nazi Past Is Revealed, 669
- Nov. 13, 1986-May 4, 1989: Iran-Contra Weapons Scandal Taints Reagan's Administration, 676
- Jan. 12 and May 11, 1987: Media Reports Spark Investigation of Australian Police Corruption, 681
- Jan. 22, 1987: Pennsylvania Politician Kills Himself at Televised Press Conference, 684
- Apr. 9, 1987: Bess Myerson Resigns as New York Commissioner of Cultural Affairs, 693
- July 25, 1987: Novelist-Politician Jeffrey Archer Wins Libel Trial Against the Daily Star, 696
- Sept. 23, 1987: Plagiarism Charges End Joe Biden's Presidential Campaign, 698
- June, 1988-June, 1989: Insider-Trading Scandal Rocks Japanese Government, 714
- May 31, 1989: Speaker of the House Jim Wright Resigns in Ethics Scandal, 730
- Aug. 10, 1989: Japanese Prime Minister Sosuke Resigns After Affair with a Geisha, 733
- Dec. 15-25, 1989: Harassment of a Christian Minister Sparks the Romanian Revolution, 742
- Dec. 18, 1989: Prince Charles's Intimate Phone Conversation with Camilla Parker Bowles Is Taped, 745
- Jan. 18, 1990: Washington, D.C., Mayor Marion Barry Is Arrested for Drug Use, 748
- Oct. 11-13, 1991: Justice Clarence Thomas's Confirmation Hearings Create a Scandal, 768
- June 26, 1992: U.S. Navy Secretary Resigns in the Wake of Tailhook Sexual Assault Scandal, 784
- Sept. 24, 1992: British Cabinet Member David Mellor Resigns over Romantic Affair, 792
- Jan. 5, 1994: British Cabinet Member Resigns After Fathering a Child Out of Wedlock, 798
- June 1, 1994: Congressman Dan Rostenkowski Is Indicted in House Post Office Scandal, 803
- Aug. 5, 1994: Kenneth Starr Is Appointed to the Whitewater Investigation, 818
- Feb. 28, 1995: Former Mexican President Carlos Salinas's Brother Is Arrested for Murder, 824
- Nov. 3, 1996: Car Crash Reveals Depth of Government Corruption in Turkey, 843
- May 20, 1997: Air Force Prosecution of Female Officer for Adultery Reveals Double Standard, 855
- Dec. 11, 1997: HUD Secretary Henry Cisneros Is Indicted for Lying to Federal Agents, 872
- Jan. 17, 1998: President Bill Clinton Denies Sexual Affair with a White House Intern, 874
- Dec. 23, 1998: Prominent Belgians Are Sentenced in Agusta-Dassault Corruption Scandal, 889
- May, 1999: Civil Rights Leader Jesse Jackson Fathers a Child Out of Wedlock, 895
- May 7, 1999-Mar. 2, 2001: Ethics Counselor Exonerates Canadian Prime Minister Jean Chrétien, 898
- May 2, 2000: New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani's Extramarital Affair Is Revealed, 904
- May 9, 2000: Former Louisiana Governor Edwin Edwards Is Convicted on Corruption Charges, 907
- Sept. 19, 2000: Ex-gay Leader John Paulk Is Photographed Leaving a Gay Bar, 913
- Apr. 30, 2001: Washington Intern Chandra Levy Disappears, 933
- Sept. 28, 2002: British Politician Reveals Her Affair with Prime Minister John Major, 983

Dec. 5, 2002: Senator Trent Lott Praises Strom Thurmond's 1948 Presidential Campaign, 988

July 14, 2003: Columnist Robert Novak Leaks the Name of CIA Operative Valerie Plame, 1010

Oct. 2, 2003: Newspaper Claims That Arnold Schwarzenegger Groped Women, 1016

June 2, 2004: U.N. Report Reveals That Secretary-General Kofi Annan Dismissed Sexual Harassment Charges, 1039

Aug. 19, 2004: Blog "Outs" Antigay Congressman Edward Schrock, 1041

Sept. 8, 2004: 60 Minutes II Reports on George W. Bush's Evasion of Wartime Duty, 1044

Beginning Aug. 29, 2005: Government Incompetence Mars Hurricane Katrina Relief Efforts, 1068

Dec. 6, 2005: Spokane, Washington, Mayor Recalled in Gay-Sex Scandal, 1081

Jan. 21, 2006: British Politician Resigns After Gay-Sex Orgy, 1084

Apr. 26, 2006: Britain's Deputy Prime Minister Admits Affair with Secretary, 1089

Sept. 17, 2006: New Zealand Prime Minister's Husband Is "Outed" as Gay, 1112

Sept. 29, 2006: Congressman Mark Foley Resigns in Sex Scandal Involving a Teenage Page, 1118

Oct. 22, 2006: Chilean Politicians Use Community Funds for Personal Campaigns, 1121

Nov. 23, 2006: Former Russian Security Service Officer Dies from Radiation Poisoning, 1132

Feb. 18, 2007: Washington Post Exposes Decline of Walter Reed Army Hospital, 1138

May 28, 2007: Japanese Politician Charged with Corruption Hangs Himself, 1145

June 4, 2007: Congressman William J. Jefferson Is Indicted for Corruption, 1147

July 9, 2007: Senator David Vitter's Name Is Found in D.C. Madam's Address Book, 1150

July 11, 2007: Florida Politician Is Arrested for Soliciting an Undercover Male Police Officer, 1153

Mar. 12, 2008: New York Governor Eliot Spitzer Resigns in Prostitution Scandal, 1167

POPULAR CULTURE

Feb. 17-Mar. 15, 1913: Armory Modern Art Show Scandalizes the Public, 49

Jan. 18, 1923: Actor Wallace Reid's Death in Drug Rehab Shakes Film Industry, 86

Nov. 19, 1924: Film Producer Thomas H. Ince Dies After Weekend on Hearst's Yacht, 108

Dec. 3, 1930: Surrealist Film L'Âge d'or Provokes French Rioting, 147

Jan. 20, 1933: Hedy Lamarr Appears Nude in the Czech Film Exstase, 163

June 4, 1943: Actor Charles Chaplin Is Sued for Paternity, 220

July 5, 1948: Actor Carole Landis Commits Suicide During Affair with Rex Harrison, 245

May 3, 1950: U.S. Senate Committee Begins Investigating Organized Crime, 270

Aug. 19, 1973: Cheating Scandal Shocks Soap Box Derby, 444

1978: Actor Joan Crawford's Daughter Publishes Damning Memoir, Mommie Dearest, 517

July 28, 1980: Magazine Reveals Baseball Star Steve Garvey's Marital Problems, 574

Feb. 28, 1986: Baseball Commissioner Peter Ueberroth Suspends Players for Cocaine Use, 666

July 18, 1988: Actor Rob Lowe Videotapes His Sexual Encounter with a Minor, 717

Nov. 19, 1990: Lip-Synching Duo Milli Vanilli Lose Grammy Award, 756

Sept. 22, 1997: Sportscaster Marv Albert Is Tried for Sexual Assault, 865

Apr. 7, 1998: Pop Singer George Michael Is Arrested for Lewd Conduct, 881

May 21, 2003: Sexually Provocative Film The Brown Bunny Premieres at Cannes Film Festival, 1004

Early Nov., 2003: Paris Hilton Sex-Tape Appears on the Web, 1019

Sept. 30, 2005: Danish Newspaper's Prophet Muhammad Cartoons Stir Violent Protests, 1075

Apr. 11, 2007: Shock Jock Don Imus Loses His Radio Show over Sexist and Racist Remarks, 1142

June 13, 2008: Singer R. Kelly Is Acquitted on Child Pornography Charges, 1170

PROSTITUTION

- May 13, 1913: Boxer Jack Johnson Is Imprisoned for Abetting Prostitution, 52
- Mar. 17, 1937: Atherton Report Exposes San Francisco Police Corruption, 191
- Nov. 23, 1946: Tennis Star Bill Tilden Is Arrested for Lewd Behavior with a Minor, 239
- Mar. 4, 1966: Munsinger Sex and Spy Scandal Rocks Canada, 377
- May 20, 1974: French Cardinal Daniélou Dies in a Prostitute's House, 456
- Sept. 3, 1980: Congressman Bauman Is Arrested for Liaison with Teenage Boy, 577
- July 19, 1985: Mayflower Madam Pleads Guilty to Promoting Prostitution, 654
- Feb. 21, 1988: Evangelist Jimmy Swaggart Tearfully Confesses His Adultery, 711
- June 27, 1995: Film Star Hugh Grant Is Arrested for Lewd Conduct, 827
- Jan. 21, 2006: British Politician Resigns After Gay-Sex Orgy, 1084
- Nov. 2, 2006: Male Escort Reveals Sexual Liaisons with Evangelist Ted Haggard, 1126
- July 9, 2007: Senator David Vitter's Name Is Found in D.C. Madam's Address Book, 1150
- July 11, 2007: Florida Politician Is Arrested for Soliciting an Undercover Male Police Officer, 1153
- Mar. 12, 2008: New York Governor Eliot Spitzer Resigns in Prostitution Scandal, 1167

PSYCHOLOGY AND PSYCHIATRY

- Mar. 2, 1906: Psychoanalyst Ernest Jones Is Accused of Molesting Mentally Disabled Children, 12
- Mar. 21, 1928: Alberta Government Sterilizes Thousands Deemed Genetically and Mentally Unfit, 133
- Jan. 14, 1943: Film Star Frances Farmer Is Jailed and Institutionalized, 214
- Dec. 14, 1945: Poet Ezra Pound Is Charged with Treason and Institutionalized, 236
- July, 1961: Psychologist Stanley Milgram Begins Obedience-to-Authority Experiments, 338
- Mar. 13, 1964: Kitty Genovese Dies as Her Cries for Help Are Ignored, 369

- Aug. 20, 1971: Abusive Role-Playing Ends Stanford Prison Experiment, 420
- July 31, 1972: Thomas F. Eagleton Withdraws from Vice Presidential Race, 440
- Apr. 15, 1974: Kidnapped Heir Patty Hearst Helps Rob a Bank, 450
- Sept. 19, 1988: Stephen Breuning Pleads Guilty to Medical Research Fraud, 720
- May 19, 1992: Amy Fisher Shoots Mary Jo Buttafuoco, 781
- June 23, 1993: Lorena Bobbitt Severs Her Husband's Penis, 795
- Mar. 4, 1999: Quebec Offers Support for Abused Duplessis Orphans, 892

PUBLIC MORALS

- 1907: Elinor Glyn's Novel Three Weeks Shocks Readers, 25
- 1909-1916: Dancer Isadora Duncan Begins Affair with Millionaire Heir, 34
- 1910: Nobelist Marie Curie Has Affair with Physicist Paul Langevin, 37
- Jan., 1913: British Prime Minister's Staff Is Investigated for Insider Trading, 43
- May 13, 1913: Boxer Jack Johnson Is Imprisoned for Abetting Prostitution, 52
- July 19, 1921: U.S. Senate Rebukes Navy in Homosexuality Investigation, 70
- Mar. 26, 1922: Hindemith's Opera Sancta Susanna Depicts a Nun's Sexual Desires, 76
- May-June, 1926: Evangelist Aimee Semple McPherson Claims She Was Kidnapped, 115
- 1927: Mae West's Play About Gays Is Banned on Broadway, 122
- 1927: President Warren G. Harding's Lover Publishes Tell-All Memoir, 124
- Early 1928: Joseph P. Kennedy Begins an Affair with Gloria Swanson, 127
- June 6, 1929: Luis Buñuel's Un Chien Andalou Shocks Parisian Audience, 136
- Jan. 20, 1933: Hedy Lamarr Appears Nude in the Czech Film Exstase, 163
- July 10, 1934: Sex Scandal Forces Resignation of Alberta Premier Brownlee, 176
- Summer, 1936: Film Star Mary Astor's Diary Becomes a Public Sensation, 184

- Feb. 6, 1942: Film Star Errol Flynn Is Acquitted of Rape, 202
- Jan. 14, 1943: Film Star Frances Farmer Is Jailed and Institutionalized, 214
- Aug. 14, 1945: French War Hero Pétain Is Convicted of Nazi Collaboration, 232
- Nov. 23, 1946: Tennis Star Bill Tilden Is Arrested for Lewd Behavior with a Minor, 239
- Aug. 31, 1948: Film Star Robert Mitchum Is Arrested for Drug Possession, 251
- May 27, 1949: Actor Rita Hayworth Marries Aly Khan After Adulterous Affair, 254
- Feb. 7, 1950: Swedish Film Star Ingrid Bergman Has a Child Out of Wedlock, 263
- May, 1955: Scandal Magazine Reveals Actor Rory Calhoun's Criminal Past, 295
- Mar. 9, 1956: British Conductor-Composer Is Arrested for Possessing Pornography, 304
- Dec. 12, 1957: Rock Star Jerry Lee Lewis Marries Thirteen-Year-Old Cousin, 313
- Feb. 7, 1960: President Kennedy's Romantic Affair Links Him to Organized Crime, 329
- Mar. 2-Sept. 25, 1963: John Profumo Affair Rocks British Government, 355
- Oct. 7, 1964: President Lyndon Johnson's Aide Is Arrested in Gay-Sex Sting, 371
- July 18, 1969: Senator Edward Kennedy's Driving Accident Kills Mary Jo Kopechne, 394
- July 8-22, 1972: Jane Fonda's Visit to North Vietnam Outrages Many Americans, 434
- Oct. 7, 1974: Congressman Wilbur D. Mills's Stripper Affair Leads to His Downfall, 462
- Oct. 25, 1974: Evangelist Billy James Hargis Resigns College Presidency During Gay-Sex Scandal, 465
- Oct. 31, 1975: Buddhist Teacher Orders His Students to Remove Their Clothes, 474
- Sept., 1976: Jimmy Carter Admits Committing Adultery in His Heart, 497
- 1978: Roots Author Alex Haley Is Sued for Plagiarism, 520
- Feb. 1, 1978: Roman Polanski Flees the United States to Avoid Rape Trial, 522
- Nov. 29, 1979, and Jan. 31, 1983: Baseball Commissioner Suspends Mickey Mantle and Willie Mays for Casino Ties, 559
- Sept. 3, 1980: Congressman Bauman Is Arrested for Liaison with Teenage Boy, 577
- July 20, 1982: Conservative Politician John G. Schmitz Is Found to Have Children Out of Wedlock, 603
- July 20, 1983: Congress Members Censured in House-Page Sex Scandal, 621
- Oct. 14, 1983: British Cabinet Secretary Parkinson Resigns After His Secretary Becomes Pregnant, 631
- Apr. 22, 1986: Faith Healer Peter Popoff Is Exposed as a Fraud, 673
- Mar. 19, 1987: Jim Bakker Resigns as Head of PTL Television Network, 690
- Feb. 21, 1988: Evangelist Jimmy Swaggart Tearfully Confesses His Adultery, 711
- July 18, 1988: Actor Rob Lowe Videotapes His Sexual Encounter with a Minor, 717
- Dec. 18, 1989: Prince Charles's Intimate Phone Conversation with Camilla Parker Bowles Is Taped, 745
- Jan. 18, 1990: Washington, D.C., Mayor Marion Barry Is Arrested for Drug Use, 748
- Mar., 1990: Menendez Brothers Are Arrested for Murdering Their Parents, 750
- July 26, 1991: Comedian Pee-wee Herman Is Arrested for Public Indecency, 765
- Jan. 13, 1992: Woody Allen Has Affair with Lover Mia Farrow's Adopted Daughter, 773
- May 6, 1992: Irish Bishop Eamonn Casey's Romantic Affair Leads to His Resignation, 779
- Aug. 23, 1992: Princess Diana's Phone Conversation with Her Lover Is Made Public, 789
- Jan. 5, 1994: British Cabinet Member Resigns After Fathering a Child Out of Wedlock, 798
- June 27, 1995: Film Star Hugh Grant Is Arrested for Lewd Conduct, 827
- Feb. 26, 1997: Teacher Mary Kay Letourneau Is Arrested for Statutory Rape, 849
- June 25, 1997: Swiss Banks Admit to Holding Accounts of Holocaust Victims, 858
- Apr., 1998: Scottish Historian Is Charged with Plagiarism, 879
- Apr. 7, 1998: Pop Singer George Michael Is Arrested for Lewd Conduct, 881

May, 1999: Civil Rights Leader Jesse Jackson Fathers a Child Out of Wedlock, 895
 May 2, 2000: New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani's Extramarital Affair Is Revealed, 904
 Sept. 19, 2000: Ex-gay Leader John Paulk Is Photographed Leaving a Gay Bar, 913
 Nov. 5, 2000: Japanese Amateur Archaeologist's "Discoveries" Are Proven Fakes, 919
 Dec., 2000: Sexual Abuse of Children in France Leads to the Outreau Affair, 922
 Jan. 30, 2001: Liverpool Children's Hospital Collects Body Parts Without Authorization, 927
 Apr. 30, 2001: Washington Intern Chandra Levy Disappears, 933
 Dec. 14, 2001: Notre Dame Football Coach Resigns for Falsifying His Résumé, 948
 Jan. 6, 2002: Boston Globe Reports on Child Sexual Abuse by Roman Catholic Priests, 954
 Feb. 17, 2002: Rotting Human Bodies Are Found at Georgia Crematory, 964
 May 3, 2003: University of Alabama Fires New Football Coach in Sex Scandal, 1002
 May 21, 2003: Sexually Provocative Film The Brown Bunny Premieres at Cannes Film Festival, 1004
 July 1, 2003: Basketball Star Kobe Bryant Is Accused of Rape, 1008
 Oct. 2, 2003: Newspaper Claims That Arnold Schwarzenegger Groped Women, 1016
 Aug. 19, 2004: Blog "Outs" Antigay Congressman Edward Schrock, 1041
 Beginning Aug. 29, 2005: Government Incompetence Mars Hurricane Katrina Relief Efforts, 1068
 Sept. 30, 2005: Danish Newspaper's Prophet Muhammad Cartoons Stir Violent Protests, 1075
 Dec. 6, 2005: Spokane, Washington, Mayor Recalled in Gay-Sex Scandal, 1081
 Jan. 21, 2006: British Politician Resigns After Gay-Sex Orgy, 1084
 Apr. 26, 2006: Britain's Deputy Prime Minister Admits Affair with Secretary, 1089
 July 28, 2006: Actor Mel Gibson Is Caught Making Anti-Semitic Remarks, 1106

Sept. 17, 2006: New Zealand Prime Minister's Husband Is "Outed" as Gay, 1112
 Sept. 29, 2006: Congressman Mark Foley Resigns in Sex Scandal Involving a Teenage Page, 1118
 Nov. 20, 2006: News Corp Abandons Plan to Publish O. J. Simpson's Book, 1129
 July 11, 2007: Florida Politician Is Arrested for Soliciting an Undercover Male Police Officer, 1153
 Aug. 20, 2007: Football Star Michael Vick Pleads Guilty to Financing a Dogfighting Ring, 1158
 Sept. 13, 2007: New England Patriots Football Team Is Fined for Spying on Other Teams, 1161
 Oct. 5, 2007: Olympic Champion Marion Jones Admits Steroid Use, 1164

PUBLISHING AND JOURNALISM

1906-1909: Emperor William II's Homosexual "Circle" Scandalizes Germany, 9
 Mar. 2, 1906: Psychoanalyst Ernest Jones Is Accused of Molesting Mentally Disabled Children, 12
 June 25, 1906: Millionaire Heir Murders Architect Stanford White, 16
 1907: Elinor Glyn's Novel Three Weeks Shocks Readers, 25
 Jan., 1913: British Prime Minister's Staff Is Investigated for Insider Trading, 43
 July 27, 1917: Millionaire Socialite Dies Under Suspicious Circumstances, 60
 Feb. 1, 1922: Director Taylor's Murder Ruins Mabel Normand's Acting Career, 73
 Oct. 25, 1924: Forged Communist Letter Brings Down British Government, 105
 Nov. 19, 1924: Film Producer Thomas H. Ince Dies After Weekend on Hearst's Yacht, 108
 May-June, 1926: Evangelist Aimee Semple McPherson Claims She Was Kidnapped, 115
 1927: President Warren G. Harding's Lover Publishes Tell-All Memoir, 124
 1928-1929: Actor Is Suspected of Falsely Claiming to Be an American Indian, 130
 Sept. 4, 1932: Film Star Jean Harlow's Husband Is an Apparent Suicide, 160

- Mar. 31, 1933: New York Times Reporter Denies Reports of a Soviet Famine, 167
- May 16, 1934: General Douglas MacArthur Sues Newspaper Columnist for Libel, 173
- Summer, 1936: Film Star Mary Astor's Diary Becomes a Public Sensation, 184
- June 5, 1944: Australian Poets Claim Responsibility for a Literary Hoax, 223
- May 26, 1945: Norwegian Writer Knut Hamsun Is Arrested for Treason, 229
- Aug. 4, 1948: Columnist Drew Pearson Exposes Congressman's Corruption, 248
- Aug. 26, 1949: Viet Minh Broadcasts French General's Damaging Report, 257
- May 3, 1950: U.S. Senate Committee Begins Investigating Organized Crime, 270
- Dec. 1, 1952: George Jorgensen Becomes Christine Jorgensen, 289
- May, 1955: Scandal Magazine Reveals Actor Rory Calhoun's Criminal Past, 295
- Mar. 9, 1956: British Conductor-Composer Is Arrested for Possessing Pornography, 304
- May 19, 1962: Marilyn Monroe Sings "Happy Birthday, Mr. President," 344
- Oct. 26, 1962: West German Police Raid Der Spiegel Magazine Offices, 349
- Feb. 23, 1963: Play Accuses Pope Pius XII of Complicity in the Holocaust, 353
- Aug. 14, 1963: Madame Nhu Derides Self-Immolation of Vietnamese Buddhists, 362
- Mar. 4, 1966: Munsinger Sex and Spy Scandal Rocks Canada, 377
- May 9, 1969: Supreme Court Justice Abe Fortas Is Accused of Bribery, 391
- Nov. 13, 1969: American Massacre of Vietnamese Civilians at My Lai Is Revealed, 401
- 1970: Study of Anonymous Gay Sex Leads to Ethics Scandal, 407
- June 13, 1971: New York Times Publishes the Pentagon Papers, 416
- Jan. 28, 1972: Clifford Irving Admits Faking Howard Hughes Memoirs, 422
- June 17, 1972-Aug. 9, 1974: Watergate Break-in Leads to President Nixon's Resignation, 425
- July 25, 1972: Newspaper Breaks Story of Abuses in Tuskegee Syphilis Study, 437
- May 14, 1974: Washington Post Reveals That the Nixons Received Jewelry Gifts, 453
- May 20, 1974: French Cardinal Daniélou Dies in a Prostitute's House, 456
- May 23, 1976: Washington Post Exposes Congressman Wayne L. Hays's Affair, 491
- Sept., 1976: Jimmy Carter Admits Committing Adultery in His Heart, 497
- 1978: Actor Joan Crawford's Daughter Publishes Damning Memoir, Mommie Dearest, 517
- Jan. 26, 1979: Former Vice President Nelson Rockefeller Dies Mysteriously, 537
- June 4, 1979: South African President B. J. Vorster Resigns in Muldergate Scandal, 543
- Oct. 10, 1979: French President Giscard d'Estaing Is Accused of Taking a Bribe, 550
- Nov. 29, 1979, and Jan. 31, 1983: Baseball Commissioner Suspends Mickey Mantle and Willie Mays for Casino Ties, 559
- July 28, 1980: Magazine Reveals Baseball Star Steve Garvey's Marital Problems, 574
- Dec. 7, 1980: Rita Jenrette's "Diary of a Mad Congresswife" Scandalizes Washington, 582
- Apr. 15, 1981: Janet Cooke Admits Fabricating Her Pulitzer Prize-Winning Feature, 585
- Sept. 10, 1981: Chicago Sun-Times Reports That Cardinal Cody Diverted Church Funds, 597
- Dec., 1982: Julie Andrews and Blake Edwards Deny Being Gay, 612
- Apr. 25, 1983: German Magazine Publishes Faked Hitler Diaries, 618
- Jan. 25, 1984: Jesse Jackson Calls New York City "Hymietown," 633
- July 23, 1984: Vanessa Williams Is the First Miss America to Resign, 638
- July 19, 1985: Mayflower Madam Pleads Guilty to Promoting Prostitution, 654
- Mar. 3, 1986: Former U.N. Secretary-General Kurt Waldheim's Nazi Past Is Revealed, 669
- Jan. 12 and May 11, 1987: Media Reports Spark Investigation of Australian Police Corruption, 681
- Jan. 22, 1987: Pennsylvania Politician Kills Himself at Televised Press Conference, 684
- July 25, 1987: Novelist-Politician Jeffrey Archer Wins Libel Trial Against the Daily Star, 696

Sept. 23, 1987: Plagiarism Charges End Joe Biden's Presidential Campaign, 698
 Dec. 1, 1987: Yale Scholar's Wartime Anti-Semitic Writings Are Revealed, 705
 Aug. 10, 1989: Japanese Prime Minister Sosuke Resigns After Affair with a Geisha, 733
 Dec. 3, 1989: Martin Luther King, Jr.'s, Doctoral-Thesis Plagiarism Is Revealed, 739
 Mar., 1990: Menendez Brothers Are Arrested for Murdering Their Parents, 750
 Mar. 30, 1991: William Kennedy Smith Is Accused of Rape, 759
 Jan. 13, 1992: Woody Allen Has Affair with Lover Mia Farrow's Adopted Daughter, 773
 Aug. 23, 1992: Princess Diana's Phone Conversation with Her Lover Is Made Public, 789
 Sept. 24, 1992: British Cabinet Member David Mellor Resigns over Romantic Affair, 792
 June 12, 1994: Double Murder Leads to Sensational O. J. Simpson Trial, 806
 June 24, 1994: Time Magazine Cover Uses Altered O. J. Simpson Photo, 810
 June 27, 1995: Film Star Hugh Grant Is Arrested for Lewd Conduct, 827
 Nov. 18, 1995: Former Canadian Premier Brian Mulroney Is Exposed in Airbus Scandal, 830
 Feb. 4, 1996: Whistle-Blower Reveals Tobacco Industry Corruption, 833
 Spring, 1996: Physicist Publishes a Deliberately Fraudulent Article, 837
 Mar. 12, 1997: Prize-Winning Aborigine Novelist Revealed as a Fraud, 852
 Aug. 31, 1997: Princess Diana Dies in a Car Crash, 861
 Jan. 17, 1998: President Bill Clinton Denies Sexual Affair with a White House Intern, 874
 Apr., 1998: Scottish Historian Is Charged with Plagiarism, 879
 Apr. 7, 1998: Pop Singer George Michael Is Arrested for Lewd Conduct, 881
 May 11, 1998: Journalist Stephen Glass Is Exposed as a Fraud, 887
 Sept., 2000: American Scientists Are Accused of Starting a Measles Epidemic in the Amazon, 910

Sept. 19, 2000: Ex-gay Leader John Paulk Is Photographed Leaving a Gay Bar, 913
 Nov. 5, 2000: Japanese Amateur Archaeologist's "Discoveries" Are Proven Fakes, 919
 2001: Clearstream Financial Clearinghouse Is Accused of Fraud and Money Laundering, 925
 June 18, 2001: Award-Winning Historian Joseph J. Ellis Is Accused of Lying, 936
 Aug. 27, 2001: Little League Baseball Star Danny Almonte Is Found to Be Overage, 942
 Jan. 4, 2002: Historian Stephen E. Ambrose Is Accused of Plagiarism, 951
 Jan. 6, 2002: Boston Globe Reports on Child Sexual Abuse by Roman Catholic Priests, 954
 Jan. 18, 2002: Historian Doris Kearns Goodwin Is Accused of Plagiarism, 959
 July, 2002: Journalist Alleges Release of Genetically Modified Corn Seeds in New Zealand, 974
 Aug., 2002: Immunologist Resigns After Being Accused of Falsifying Research, 977
 Sept. 25, 2002: Inquiry Reveals That Physicist Jan Hendrik Schön Faked His Research, 980
 Sept. 28, 2002: British Politician Reveals Her Affair with Prime Minister John Major, 983
 Oct. 25, 2002: Historian Michael A. Bellesiles Resigns After Academic Fraud Accusations, 985
 Apr. 29, 2003: New York Times Reporter Jayson Blair Is Exposed as a Fraud, 998
 May 3, 2003: University of Alabama Fires New Football Coach in Sex Scandal, 1002
 May 21, 2003: Sexually Provocative Film The Brown Bunny Premieres at Cannes Film Festival, 1004
 July 1, 2003: Basketball Star Kobe Bryant Is Accused of Rape, 1008
 July 14, 2003: Columnist Robert Novak Leaks the Name of CIA Operative Valerie Plame, 1010
 Oct. 2, 2003: Newspaper Claims That Arnold Schwarzenegger Groped Women, 1016
 Apr. 28, 2004: CBS Broadcasts Photos of Abused and Tortured Prisoners at Abu Ghraib, 1034
 Aug. 19, 2004: Blog "Outs" Antigay Congressman Edward Schrock, 1041
 Sept. 8, 2004: 60 Minutes II Reports on George W. Bush's Evasion of Wartime Duty, 1044

Sept. 30, 2005: Danish Newspaper's Prophet Muhammad Cartoons Stir Violent Protests, 1075
 Dec. 6, 2005: Spokane, Washington, Mayor Recalled in Gay-Sex Scandal, 1081
 Mar. 14, 2006: Duke Lacrosse Players Are Accused of Gang Rape, 1086
 May 12, 2006: Scientist Is Indicted for Faking His Research on Creating Stem Cells, 1094
 July 14, 2006: New York Times Exposes Grading Scandal at Auburn University, 1101
 Aug. 12, 2006: Novelist Günter Grass Admits to Youthful Nazi Ties, 1109
 Sept. 17, 2006: New Zealand Prime Minister's Husband Is "Outed" as Gay, 1112
 Sept. 18, 2006: Newsweek Reveals That Hewlett-Packard Spied on Its Own Board, 1114
 Nov. 20, 2006: News Corp Abandons Plan to Publish O. J. Simpson's Book, 1129
 Feb. 18, 2007: Washington Post Exposes Decline of Walter Reed Army Hospital, 1138
 July 24, 2007: University of Colorado Fires Professor for Plagiarism and Research Falsification, 1155
 Mar. 12, 2008: New York Governor Eliot Spitzer Resigns in Prostitution Scandal, 1167
 June 13, 2008: Singer R. Kelly Is Acquitted on Child Pornography Charges, 1170

RACISM

May 13, 1913: Boxer Jack Johnson Is Imprisoned for Abetting Prostitution, 52
 Mar. 30, 1931: "Scottsboro Boys" Are Railroaded Through Rape Trials, 150
 Feb. 19, 1942: President Roosevelt Orders Internment of Japanese Americans, 205
 Late 1955: British Atrocities in Kenya's Mau Mau Rebellion Are Revealed, 298
 Mar. 1, 1967: Adam Clayton Powell, Jr., Is Excluded from Congress, 380
 July 25, 1972: Newspaper Breaks Story of Abuses in Tuskegee Syphilis Study, 437
 Oct. 4, 1976: Agriculture Secretary Earl Butz Resigns After Making Obscene Joke, 500
 Jan. 25, 1984: Jesse Jackson Calls New York City "Hymietown," 633

July 23, 1984: Vanessa Williams Is the First Miss America to Resign, 638
 Dec. 22, 1984: Subway Vigilante Bernhard Goetz Shoots Four Black Youths, 641
 Nov. 28, 1987: Black Teenager Claims to Have Been Gang-Raped by Police Officers, 702
 Dec. 1, 1987: Yale Scholar's Wartime Anti-Semitic Writings Are Revealed, 705
 Oct. 11-13, 1991: Justice Clarence Thomas's Confirmation Hearings Create a Scandal, 768
 June 12, 1994: Double Murder Leads to Sensational O. J. Simpson Trial, 806
 June 24, 1994: Time Magazine Cover Uses Altered O. J. Simpson Photo, 810
 Mar. 12, 1997: Prize-Winning Aborigine Novelist Revealed as a Fraud, 852
 May, 1998: Police Corruption Is Revealed in Los Angeles's Rampart Division, 884
 Dec. 5, 2002: Senator Trent Lott Praises Strom Thurmond's 1948 Presidential Campaign, 988
 Dec. 17, 2003: Senator Strom Thurmond's Biracial Daughter Is Revealed, 1022
 Beginning Aug. 29, 2005: Government Incompetence Mars Hurricane Katrina Relief Efforts, 1068
 Mar. 14, 2006: Duke Lacrosse Players Are Accused of Gang Rape, 1086
 July 28, 2006: Actor Mel Gibson Is Caught Making Anti-Semitic Remarks, 1106
 Apr. 11, 2007: Shock Jock Don Imus Loses His Radio Show over Sexist and Racist Remarks, 1142

RADIO AND TELEVISION

Dec. 14, 1945: Poet Ezra Pound Is Charged with Treason and Institutionalized, 236
 May 3, 1950: U.S. Senate Committee Begins Investigating Organized Crime, 270
 Sept. 23, 1952: Richard Nixon Denies Taking Illegal Campaign Contributions, 286
 Nov. 2, 1959: Charles Van Doren Admits to Being Fed Answers on Television Quiz Show, 326
 Feb. 8, 1960: U.S. Congress Investigates Payola in Pop Music Industry, 332
 Mar. 14, 1960: FCC Chairman John C. Doerfer

Resigns for Accepting Gifts from Networks, 335

June 27, 1978: Evangelist Herbert W. Armstrong Excommunicates His Own Son, 525

Apr. 22, 1986: Faith Healer Peter Popoff Is Exposed as a Fraud, 673

Jan. 12 and May 11, 1987: Media Reports Spark Investigation of Australian Police Corruption, 681

Jan. 22, 1987: Pennsylvania Politician Kills Himself at Televised Press Conference, 684

Mar. 19, 1987: Jim Bakker Resigns as Head of PTL Television Network, 690

Feb. 21, 1988: Evangelist Jimmy Swaggart Tearfully Confesses His Adultery, 711

Nov. 19, 1990: Lip-Synching Duo Milli Vanilli Lose Grammy Award, 756

July 26, 1991: Comedian Pee-wee Herman Is Arrested for Public Indecency, 765

Oct. 11-13, 1991: Justice Clarence Thomas's Confirmation Hearings Create a Scandal, 768

June 12, 1994: Double Murder Leads to Sensational O. J. Simpson Trial, 806

Feb. 4, 1996: Whistle-Blower Reveals Tobacco Industry Corruption, 833

Sept. 22, 1997: Sportscaster Marv Albert Is Tried for Sexual Assault, 865

Dec. 17, 2003: Senator Strom Thurmond's Biracial Daughter Is Revealed, 1022

Sept. 8, 2004: 60 Minutes II Reports on George W. Bush's Evasion of Wartime Duty, 1044

Oct. 13, 2004: Television Producer Files Sex Harassment Suit Against Bill O'Reilly, 1047

Nov. 20, 2006: News Corp Abandons Plan to Publish O. J. Simpson's Book, 1129

Apr. 11, 2007: Shock Jock Don Imus Loses His Radio Show over Sexist and Racist Remarks, 1142

RELIGION

Mar. 26, 1922: Hindemith's Opera Sancta Susanna Depicts a Nun's Sexual Desires, 76

May-June, 1926: Evangelist Aimee Semple McPherson Claims She Was Kidnapped, 115

Dec. 3, 1930: Surrealist Film L'Âge d'or Provokes French Rioting, 147

May 27, 1949: Actor Rita Hayworth Marries Aly Khan After Adulterous Affair, 254

Feb. 23, 1963: Play Accuses Pope Pius XII of Complicity in the Holocaust, 353

July 2, 1963: Muslim Leader Elijah Muhammad Is Sued for Paternity, 359

Oct. 25, 1974: Evangelist Billy James Hargis Resigns College Presidency During Gay-Sex Scandal, 465

Oct. 31, 1975: Buddhist Teacher Orders His Students to Remove Their Clothes, 474

Jan., 1977: Singer Anita Bryant Campaigns Against Lesbian and Gay Rights, 506

June 27, 1978: Evangelist Herbert W. Armstrong Excommunicates His Own Son, 525

Sept. 10, 1981: Chicago Sun-Times Reports That Cardinal Cody Diverted Church Funds, 597

Oct. 23, 1985: Guru Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh Is Indicted for Immigration Fraud, 662

Apr. 22, 1986: Faith Healer Peter Popoff Is Exposed as a Fraud, 673

Mar. 19, 1987: Jim Bakker Resigns as Head of PTL Television Network, 690

Feb. 21, 1988: Evangelist Jimmy Swaggart Tearfully Confesses His Adultery, 711

May 6, 1992: Irish Bishop Eamonn Casey's Romantic Affair Leads to His Resignation, 779

Mar. 4, 1999: Quebec Offers Support for Abused Duplessis Orphans, 892

June 30, 2001: Korean Religious Teacher Jung Myung Seok Is Charged with Rape, 939

Jan. 6, 2002: Boston Globe Reports on Child Sexual Abuse by Roman Catholic Priests, 954

June 22, 2005: U.S. Air Force Investigates Religious Intolerance at Its Academy, 1062

Sept. 30, 2005: Danish Newspaper's Prophet Muhammad Cartoons Stir Violent Protests, 1075

Nov. 2, 2006: Evangelist Kent Hovind Is Convicted of Federal Tax Violations, 1123

Nov. 2, 2006: Male Escort Reveals Sexual Liaisons with Evangelist Ted Haggard, 1126

ROYALTY

1906-1909: Emperor William II's Homosexual "Circle" Scandalizes Germany, 9

1907: Elinor Glyn's Novel Three Weeks Shocks Readers, 25
 Nov. 15, 1908: Belgium Confiscates Congo Free State from King Leopold II, 31
 June 22, 1922: British Prime Minister David Lloyd George Is Accused of Selling Honors, 83
 Dec. 10, 1936: King Edward VIII Abdicates to Marry an American Divorcée, 187
 Oct. 11-22, 1937: Duke and Duchess of Windsor Visit Nazi Germany, 196
 May 27, 1949: Actor Rita Hayworth Marries Aly Khan After Adulterous Affair, 254
 July 16, 1951: Belgium's Disgraced King Leopold III Abdicates, 276
 Dec. 18, 1989: Prince Charles's Intimate Phone Conversation with Camilla Parker Bowles Is Taped, 745
 Aug. 23, 1992: Princess Diana's Phone Conversation with Her Lover Is Made Public, 789
 Aug. 31, 1997: Princess Diana Dies in a Car Crash, 861

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

Mar. 21, 1928: Alberta Government Sterilizes Thousands Deemed Genetically and Mentally Unfit, 133
 Sept.-Oct., 1937: Prescription Elixir Causes More than One Hundred Deaths, 193
 Nov. 21, 1953: Piltdown Man Is Revealed to Be a Hoax, 292
 1956-1962: Prescription Thalidomide Causes Widespread Birth Disorders, 301
 July, 1961: Psychologist Stanley Milgram Begins Obedience-to-Authority Experiments, 338
 Aug. 20, 1971: Abusive Role-Playing Ends Stanford Prison Experiment, 420
 Sept. 19, 1988: Stephen Breuning Pleads Guilty to Medical Research Fraud, 720
 Mar. 23, 1989: Scientists' "Cold Fusion" Claims Cannot Be Verified, 723
 Sept., 2000: American Scientists Are Accused of Starting a Measles Epidemic in the Amazon, 910
 July, 2002: Journalist Alleges Release of

Genetically Modified Corn Seeds in New Zealand, 974
 Aug., 2002: Immunologist Resigns After Being Accused of Falsifying Research, 977
 Sept. 25, 2002: Inquiry Reveals That Physicist Jan Hendrik Schön Faked His Research, 980
 May 12, 2006: Scientist Is Indicted for Faking His Research on Creating Stem Cells, 1094

SEX

1906-1909: Emperor William II's Homosexual "Circle" Scandalizes Germany, 9
 Dec. 8, 1906: Former U.S. Senator Arthur Brown Is Murdered by Lover, 22
 1907: Elinor Glyn's Novel Three Weeks Shocks Readers, 25
 1909-1916: Dancer Isadora Duncan Begins Affair with Millionaire Heir, 34
 1910: Nobelist Marie Curie Has Affair with Physicist Paul Langevin, 37
 July 19, 1921: U.S. Senate Rebukes Navy in Homosexuality Investigation, 70
 Mar. 26, 1922: Hindemith's Opera Sancta Susanna Depicts a Nun's Sexual Desires, 76
 1927: Mae West's Play About Gays Is Banned on Broadway, 122
 1927: President Warren G. Harding's Lover Publishes Tell-All Memoir, 124
 Early 1928: Joseph P. Kennedy Begins an Affair with Gloria Swanson, 127
 Jan. 20, 1933: Hedy Lamarr Appears Nude in the Czech Film Exstase, 163
 May 16, 1934: General Douglas MacArthur Sues Newspaper Columnist for Libel, 173
 July 10, 1934: Sex Scandal Forces Resignation of Alberta Premier Brownlee, 176
 Summer, 1936: Film Star Mary Astor's Diary Becomes a Public Sensation, 184
 July 5, 1948: Actor Carole Landis Commits Suicide During Affair with Rex Harrison, 245
 May 27, 1949: Actor Rita Hayworth Marries Aly Khan After Adulterous Affair, 254
 Feb. 7, 1950: Swedish Film Star Ingrid Bergman Has a Child Out of Wedlock, 263
 Feb. 7, 1960: President Kennedy's Romantic Affair Links Him to Organized Crime, 329

- May 19, 1962: Marilyn Monroe Sings "Happy Birthday, Mr. President," 344
- Sept. 12, 1962: British Civil Servant Is Arrested for Spying, 347
- Mar. 2-Sept. 25, 1963: John Profumo Affair Rocks British Government, 355
- Oct. 7, 1963: Vice President Lyndon B. Johnson Aide Resigns over Crime Connections, 365
- Oct. 7, 1964: President Lyndon Johnson's Aide Is Arrested in Gay-Sex Sting, 371
- Mar. 4, 1966: Munsinger Sex and Spy Scandal Rocks Canada, 377
- Sept. 5, 1967: Socialite Nancy Wakeman Shoots Her Politician-Husband, 386
- 1970: Study of Anonymous Gay Sex Leads to Ethics Scandal, 407
- May 20, 1974: French Cardinal Daniélou Dies in a Prostitute's House, 456
- Oct. 7, 1974: Congressman Wilbur D. Mills's Stripper Affair Leads to His Downfall, 462
- Oct. 25, 1974: Evangelist Billy James Hargis Resigns College Presidency During Gay-Sex Scandal, 465
- Nov. 20, 1974: British Politician John Stonehouse Fakes His Suicide, 468
- May 23, 1976: Washington Post Exposes Congressman Wayne L. Hays's Affair, 491
- Sept., 1976: Jimmy Carter Admits Committing Adultery in His Heart, 497
- Jan., 1977: Singer Anita Bryant Campaigns Against Lesbian and Gay Rights, 506
- Jan. 26, 1979: Former Vice President Nelson Rockefeller Dies Mysteriously, 537
- Mar. 10, 1980: Scarsdale Diet Doctor Is Killed by His Lover, 565
- Oct. 9, 1980: Bendix Executive Resigns Amid Rumors of an Affair, 580
- Dec. 7, 1980: Rita Jenrette's "Diary of a Mad Congresswife" Scandalizes Washington, 582
- Apr. 28, 1981: Tennis Star Billie Jean King Is Sued for Palimony, 588
- July 20, 1982: Conservative Politician John G. Schmitz Is Found to Have Children Out of Wedlock, 603
- Dec., 1982: Julie Andrews and Blake Edwards Deny Being Gay, 612
- July 20, 1983: Congress Members Censured in House-Page Sex Scandal, 621
- Oct. 14, 1983: British Cabinet Secretary Parkinson Resigns After His Secretary Becomes Pregnant, 631
- July 23, 1984: Vanessa Williams Is the First Miss America to Resign, 638
- July 19, 1985: Mayflower Madam Pleads Guilty to Promoting Prostitution, 654
- Mar. 19, 1987: Jim Bakker Resigns as Head of PTL Television Network, 690
- July 25, 1987: Novelist-Politician Jeffrey Archer Wins Libel Trial Against the Daily Star, 696
- Feb. 21, 1988: Evangelist Jimmy Swaggart Tearfully Confesses His Adultery, 711
- Aug. 10, 1989: Japanese Prime Minister Sosuke Resigns After Affair with a Geisha, 733
- Dec. 18, 1989: Prince Charles's Intimate Phone Conversation with Camilla Parker Bowles Is Taped, 745
- Oct. 11-13, 1991: Justice Clarence Thomas's Confirmation Hearings Create a Scandal, 768
- Jan. 13, 1992: Woody Allen Has Affair with Lover Mia Farrow's Adopted Daughter, 773
- May 6, 1992: Irish Bishop Eamonn Casey's Romantic Affair Leads to His Resignation, 779
- Aug. 23, 1992: Princess Diana's Phone Conversation with Her Lover Is Made Public, 789
- Sept. 24, 1992: British Cabinet Member David Mellor Resigns over Romantic Affair, 792
- Jan. 5, 1994: British Cabinet Member Resigns After Fathering a Child Out of Wedlock, 798
- Aug. 5, 1994: Kenneth Starr Is Appointed to the Whitewater Investigation, 818
- Dec. 11, 1997: HUD Secretary Henry Cisneros Is Indicted for Lying to Federal Agents, 872
- Jan. 17, 1998: President Bill Clinton Denies Sexual Affair with a White House Intern, 874
- May, 1999: Civil Rights Leader Jesse Jackson Fathers a Child Out of Wedlock, 895
- May 2, 2000: New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani's Extramarital Affair Is Revealed, 904
- Sept. 19, 2000: Ex-gay Leader John Paulk Is Photographed Leaving a Gay Bar, 913
- Apr. 30, 2001: Washington Intern Chandra Levy Disappears, 933

Sept. 28, 2002: British Politician Reveals Her Affair with Prime Minister John Major, 983
 May 3, 2003: University of Alabama Fires New Football Coach in Sex Scandal, 1002
 May 21, 2003: Sexually Provocative Film The Brown Bunny Premieres at Cannes Film Festival, 1004
 Oct. 2, 2003: Newspaper Claims That Arnold Schwarzenegger Groped Women, 1016
 Early Nov., 2003: Paris Hilton Sex-Tape Appears on the Web, 1019
 Aug. 19, 2004: Blog "Outs" Antigay Congressman Edward Schrock, 1041
 Dec. 6, 2005: Spokane, Washington, Mayor Recalled in Gay-Sex Scandal, 1081
 Jan. 21, 2006: British Politician Resigns After Gay-Sex Orgy, 1084
 Apr. 26, 2006: Britain's Deputy Prime Minister Admits Affair with Secretary, 1089
 Sept. 17, 2006: New Zealand Prime Minister's Husband Is "Outed" as Gay, 1112
 Nov. 2, 2006: Male Escort Reveals Sexual Liaisons with Evangelist Ted Haggard, 1126
 July 9, 2007: Senator David Vitter's Name Is Found in D.C. Madam's Address Book, 1150

SEX CRIMES

Mar. 2, 1906: Psychoanalyst Ernest Jones Is Accused of Molesting Mentally Disabled Children, 12
 June 25, 1906: Millionaire Heir Murders Architect Stanford White, 16
 Apr. 12, 1922: Film Star Fatty Arbuckle Is Acquitted of Manslaughter, 79
 Feb. 6, 1942: Film Star Errol Flynn Is Acquitted of Rape, 202
 Nov. 23, 1946: Tennis Star Bill Tilden Is Arrested for Lewd Behavior with a Minor, 239
 Mar. 9, 1956: British Conductor-Composer Is Arrested for Possessing Pornography, 304
 Oct. 7, 1964: President Lyndon Johnson's Aide Is Arrested in Gay-Sex Sting, 371
 Feb. 1, 1978: Roman Polanski Flees the United States to Avoid Rape Trial, 522
 Sept. 3, 1980: Congressman Bauman Is Arrested for Liaison with Teenage Boy, 577

July 20, 1983: Congress Members Censured in House-Page Sex Scandal, 621
 Aug. 12, 1983-July 27, 1990: McMartin Preschool Is Embroiled in Child-Abuse Case, 624
 July 19, 1985: Mayflower Madam Pleads Guilty to Promoting Prostitution, 654
 July 18, 1988: Actor Rob Lowe Videotapes His Sexual Encounter with a Minor, 717
 Mar. 30, 1991: William Kennedy Smith Is Accused of Rape, 759
 July 26, 1991: Comedian Pee-wee Herman Is Arrested for Public Indecency, 765
 June 26, 1992: U.S. Navy Secretary Resigns in the Wake of Tailhook Sexual Assault Scandal, 784
 Aug. 21, 1994: Sex Scandal Forces Dismissal of NAACP Chief Benjamin Chavis, 821
 June 27, 1995: Film Star Hugh Grant Is Arrested for Lewd Conduct, 827
 Feb. 26, 1997: Teacher Mary Kay Letourneau Is Arrested for Statutory Rape, 849
 May 20, 1997: Air Force Prosecution of Female Officer for Adultery Reveals Double Standard, 855
 Sept. 22, 1997: Sportscaster Marv Albert Is Tried for Sexual Assault, 865
 Apr. 7, 1998: Pop Singer George Michael Is Arrested for Lewd Conduct, 881
 Dec., 2000: Sexual Abuse of Children in France Leads to the Outreau Affair, 922
 June 30, 2001: Korean Religious Teacher Jung Myung Seok Is Charged with Rape, 939
 Jan. 6, 2002: Boston Globe Reports on Child Sexual Abuse by Roman Catholic Priests, 954
 Jan. 2, 2003: E-mail Message Prompts Inquiry into Air Force Academy Sexual Assaults, 991
 Oct. 2, 2003: Newspaper Claims That Arnold Schwarzenegger Groped Women, 1016
 June 2, 2004: U.N. Report Reveals That Secretary-General Kofi Annan Dismissed Sexual Harassment Charges, 1039
 Dec. 6, 2005: Spokane, Washington, Mayor Recalled in Gay-Sex Scandal, 1081
 Mar. 14, 2006: Duke Lacrosse Players Are Accused of Gang Rape, 1086

Apr. 26, 2006: Britain's Deputy Prime Minister Admits Affair with Secretary, 1089
 Sept. 29, 2006: Congressman Mark Foley Resigns in Sex Scandal Involving a Teenage Page, 1118
 July 9, 2007: Senator David Vitter's Name Is Found in D.C. Madam's Address Book, 1150
 July 11, 2007: Florida Politician Is Arrested for Soliciting an Undercover Male Police Officer, 1153
 Mar. 12, 2008: New York Governor Eliot Spitzer Resigns in Prostitution Scandal, 1167
 June 13, 2008: Singer R. Kelly Is Acquitted on Child Pornography Charges, 1170

SOCIAL ISSUES AND REFORM

Dec., 1904: Boston Alderman Is Reelected While in Jail for Fraud, 6
 July 12, 1906: French Court Declares Alfred Dreyfus Innocent of Treason, 19
 Mar. 25, 1911: Nearly 150 Workers Die in Triangle Shirtwaist Factory Fire, 40
 May 13, 1913: Boxer Jack Johnson Is Imprisoned for Abetting Prostitution, 52
 1928-1929: Actor Is Suspected of Falsely Claiming to Be an American Indian, 130
 Mar. 30, 1931: "Scottsboro Boys" Are Railroaded Through Rape Trials, 150
 July 28, 1932: U.S. Troops Drive World War I Veterans from Washington, 156
 Feb. 19, 1942: President Roosevelt Orders Internment of Japanese Americans, 205
 Dec. 1, 1952: George Jorgensen Becomes Christine Jorgensen, 289
 Late 1955: British Atrocities in Kenya's Mau Mau Rebellion Are Revealed, 298
 July 2, 1963: Muslim Leader Elijah Muhammad Is Sued for Paternity, 359
 Aug. 14, 1963: Madame Nhu Derides Self-Immolation of Vietnamese Buddhists, 362
 Mar. 13, 1964: Kitty Genovese Dies as Her Cries for Help Are Ignored, 369
 May 4, 1970: National Guardsmen Kill Protesting Kent State Students, 410
 July 8-22, 1972: Jane Fonda's Visit to North Vietnam Outrages Many Americans, 434

July 31, 1972: Thomas F. Eagleton Withdraws from Vice Presidential Race, 440
 Apr. 15, 1974: Kidnapped Heir Patty Hearst Helps Rob a Bank, 450
 Oct. 4, 1976: Agriculture Secretary Earl Butz Resigns After Making Obscene Joke, 500
 Jan., 1977: Singer Anita Bryant Campaigns Against Lesbian and Gay Rights, 506
 Apr. 18, 1979: Actor Lee Marvin Is Ordered to Pay Palimony to Former Lover, 540
 June 4, 1979: South African President B. J. Vorster Resigns in Muldergate Scandal, 543
 Apr. 28, 1981: Tennis Star Billie Jean King Is Sued for Palimony, 588
 Jan. 25, 1984: Jesse Jackson Calls New York City "Hymietown," 633
 July 23, 1984: Vanessa Williams Is the First Miss America to Resign, 638
 Dec. 22, 1984: Subway Vigilante Bernhard Goetz Shoots Four Black Youths, 641
 Oct. 23, 1985: Guru Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh Is Indicted for Immigration Fraud, 662
 Feb. 28, 1986: Baseball Commissioner Peter Ueberroth Suspends Players for Cocaine Use, 666
 Jan. 12 and May 11, 1987: Media Reports Spark Investigation of Australian Police Corruption, 681
 Nov. 28, 1987: Black Teenager Claims to Have Been Gang-Raped by Police Officers, 702
 Dec. 15-25, 1989: Harassment of a Christian Minister Sparks the Romanian Revolution, 742
 Oct. 11-13, 1991: Justice Clarence Thomas's Confirmation Hearings Create a Scandal, 768
 June 24, 1994: Time Magazine Cover Uses Altered O. J. Simpson Photo, 810
 Mar. 12, 1997: Prize-Winning Aborigine Novelist Revealed as a Fraud, 852
 June 25, 1997: Swiss Banks Admit to Holding Accounts of Holocaust Victims, 858
 Sept. 19, 2000: Ex-gay Leader John Paulk Is Photographed Leaving a Gay Bar, 913
 Dec., 2000: Sexual Abuse of Children in France Leads to the Outreau Affair, 922
 Dec. 5, 2002: Senator Trent Lott Praises Strom Thurmond's 1948 Presidential Campaign, 988

Dec. 17, 2003: Senator Strom Thurmond's
Biracial Daughter Is Revealed, 1022
June 22, 2005: U.S. Air Force Investigates
Religious Intolerance at Its Academy, 1062
Beginning Aug. 29, 2005: Government
Incompetence Mars Hurricane Katrina Relief
Efforts, 1068
Nov. 17, 2005: Liberian Workers Sue Bridgestone
Firestone over Slave Labor, 1078
Mar. 14, 2006: Duke Lacrosse Players Are Accused of Gang Rape, 1086
July 28, 2006: Actor Mel Gibson Is Caught
Making Anti-Semitic Remarks, 1106
Aug. 12, 2006: Novelist Günter Grass Admits to Youthful Nazi Ties, 1109
Nov. 2, 2006: Male Escort Reveals Sexual Liaisons with Evangelist Ted Haggard, 1126
Apr. 11, 2007: Shock Jock Don Imus Loses His Radio Show over Sexist and Racist Remarks, 1142

SPACE AND AVIATION

May, 1930: Postmaster's Division of Airmail
Routes Creates a Scandal, 144
Feb. 4, 1976: Lockheed Is Implicated in Bribing
Foreign Officials, 482
1985-1986: Westland Affair Shakes Prime Minister Thatcher's Government, 645
June 26, 1992: U.S. Navy Secretary Resigns in the Wake of Tailhook Sexual Assault Scandal, 784
Nov. 18, 1995: Former Canadian Premier Brian
Mulroney Is Exposed in Airbus Scandal, 830
May 20, 1997: Air Force Prosecution of Female Officer for Adultery Reveals Double Standard, 855

SPORTS

May 13, 1913: Boxer Jack Johnson Is Imprisoned
for Abetting Prostitution, 52
Apr. 2, 1915: Players Fix Liverpool-Manchester
United Soccer Match, 55
Sept. 21, 1919: White Sox Players Conspire to Lose World Series in "Black Sox" Scandal, 66
Dec. 26, 1926: Ty Cobb and Tris Speaker Are Accused of Fixing Baseball Games, 118

Nov. 23, 1946: Tennis Star Bill Tilden Is Arrested for Lewd Behavior with a Minor, 239
Spring, 1947: Baseball Manager Leo Durocher Is Suspended for Gambling Ties, 242
Jan. 17, 1951: College Basketball Players Begin
Shaving Points for Money, 274
Fall, 1969-Winter, 1971: Japanese Baseball
Players Are Implicated in Game Fixing, 398
Aug. 19, 1973: Cheating Scandal Shocks Soap
Box Derby, 444
Sept. 23, 1977: Horse-Swapping Fraud Upsets
Belmont Park Raceway, 514
Nov. 29, 1979, and Jan. 31, 1983: Baseball
Commissioner Suspends Mickey Mantle and Willie Mays for Casino Ties, 556
Apr. 27, 1980: Mobster's Arrest Reveals Point
Shaving by Boston College Basketball Players, 568
Feb. 28, 1986: Baseball Commissioner Peter
Ueberroth Suspends Players for Cocaine Use, 666
Feb. 25, 1987: NCAA Imposes "Death Penalty" on Southern Methodist University Football, 687
Aug. 24, 1989: Pete Rose Is Banned from Baseball for Betting on Games, 735
June 30, 1994: Tonya Harding Is Banned from Skating After Attack on Rival, 812
July 1, 1994: Soccer Star Diego Maradona Is Expelled from World Cup, 815
Jan. 28, 2000: John Spano Is Sentenced for Fraudulent Purchase of Ice Hockey Team, 901
Sept. 26, 2000: Gymnast Andreea Răducan Loses
Her Olympic Gold Medal Because of Drugs,
916
Aug. 27, 2001: Little League Baseball Star Danny Almonte Is Found to Be Overage, 942
Dec. 14, 2001: Notre Dame Football Coach
Resigns for Falsifying His Résumé, 948
Feb. 11, 2002: French Judge Admits Favoring Russian Figure Skaters in Winter Olympics, 962
Mar. 27, 2002: Georgia Basketball Coach Jim Harrick, Sr., Resigns over Fraud Allegations, 968

Jan. 27, 2005: German Soccer Referee Admits to Fixing Games for Money, 1055
 Mar. 17, 2005: Former Baseball Star Mark McGwire Evades Congressional Questions on Steroid Use, 1058
 May 4, 2006: Media Uncover Match-Fixing in Italian Soccer, 1092
 July 14, 2006: New York Times Exposes Grading Scandal at Auburn University, 1101
 July 26, 2006: Tour de France Is Hit with a Doping Scandal, 1103
 Apr. 11, 2007: Shock Jock Don Imus Loses His Radio Show over Sexist and Racist Remarks, 1142
 Aug. 20, 2007: Football Star Michael Vick Pleads Guilty to Financing a Dogfighting Ring, 1158
 Sept. 13, 2007: New England Patriots Football Team Is Fined for Spying on Other Teams, 1161
 Oct. 5, 2007: Olympic Champion Marion Jones Admits Steroid Use, 1164
 July 29, 2008: NBA Referee Tim Donaghy Is Sentenced to Prison for Betting on Games, 1172

TRADE AND COMMERCE

Jan., 1913: British Prime Minister's Staff Is Investigated for Insider Trading, 43
 1930: Liberia Is Accused of Selling Its Own Citizens into Slavery, 142
 Nov. 28, 1967: Investor Louis Wolfson Is Convicted of Selling Stock Illegally, 389
 Feb. 3, 1975: Honduras's "Bananagate" Bribery Scandal Leads to Executive's Suicide, 471
 Feb. 4, 1976: Lockheed Is Implicated in Bribing Foreign Officials, 482
 May 29, 1981: Court Finds That Ford Ignored Pinto's Safety Problems, 594
 1985-1986: Westland Affair Shakes Prime Minister Thatcher's Government, 645
 Aug. 27, 1990: Guinness Four Are Found Guilty of Share-Trading Fraud, 753
 Nov. 18, 1995: Former Canadian Premier Brian Mulroney Is Exposed in Airbus Scandal, 830
 July, 2002: Journalist Alleges Release of Genetically Modified Corn Seeds in New Zealand, 974

Summer, 2006-Mar. 16, 2007: China Recalls Pet Food That Has Killed Thousands of American Pets, 1097
 Sept. 18, 2006: Newsweek Reveals That Hewlett-Packard Spied on Its Own Board, 1114

VIOLENCE

July 12, 1906: French Court Declares Alfred Dreyfus Innocent of Treason, 19
 Dec. 3, 1930: Surrealist Film L'Âge d'or Provokes French Rioting, 147
 July 28, 1932: U.S. Troops Drive World War I Veterans from Washington, 156
 Late 1955: British Atrocities in Kenya's Mau Mau Rebellion Are Revealed, 298
 Aug. 14, 1963: Madame Nhu Derides Self-Immolation of Vietnamese Buddhists, 362
 Nov. 13, 1969: American Massacre of Vietnamese Civilians at My Lai Is Revealed, 401
 Aug. 20, 1971: Abusive Role-Playing Ends Stanford Prison Experiment, 420
 Apr. 15, 1974: Kidnapped Heir Patty Hearst Helps Rob a Bank, 450
 Aug. 21, 1983: Filipino Opposition Leader Aquino Is Assassinated on Return Home, 628
 Dec. 22, 1984: Subway Vigilante Bernhard Goetz Shoots Four Black Youths, 641
 July 10, 1985: French Secret Service Sinks the Greenpeace Ship Rainbow Warrior, 651
 Dec. 15-25, 1989: Harassment of a Christian Minister Sparks the Romanian Revolution, 742
 May 19, 1992: Amy Fisher Shoots Mary Jo Buttafuoco, 781
 June 23, 1993: Lorena Bobbitt Severs Her Husband's Penis, 795
 June 30, 1994: Tonya Harding Is Banned from Skating After Attack on Rival, 812
 Aug. 16, 1996: Belgian Media Reveal How Police Bungled Serial Murder Case, 840
 Nov. 3, 1996: Car Crash Reveals Depth of Government Corruption in Turkey, 843
 Jan., 1997: Pyramid Investment Schemes Cause Albanian Government to Fall, 846
 May, 1998: Police Corruption Is Revealed in Los Angeles's Rampart Division, 884

Apr. 28, 2004: CBS Broadcasts Photos of Abused and Tortured Prisoners at Abu Ghraib, 1034
 Sept. 30, 2005: Danish Newspaper's Prophet Muhammad Cartoons Stir Violent Protests, 1075
 Aug. 20, 2007: Football Star Michael Vick Pleads Guilty to Financing a Dogfighting Ring, 1158

WOMEN'S ISSUES

1907: Elinor Glyn's Novel Three Weeks Shocks Readers, 25
 1909-1916: Dancer Isadora Duncan Begins Affair with Millionaire Heir, 34
 1910: Nobelist Marie Curie Has Affair with Physicist Paul Langevin, 37
 Mar. 25, 1911: Nearly 150 Workers Die in Triangle Shirtwaist Factory Fire, 40
 Dec. 1, 1952: George Jorgensen Becomes Christine Jorgensen, 289
 July 2, 1963: Muslim Leader Elijah Muhammad Is Sued for Paternity, 359
 Mar. 13, 1964: Kitty Genovese Dies as Her Cries for Help Are Ignored, 369
 Summer, 1974: Dalkon Shield Contraceptive Is Removed from the Market, 459
 Apr. 18, 1979: Actor Lee Marvin Is Ordered to Pay Palimony to Former Lover, 540
 July 28, 1980: Magazine Reveals Baseball Star Steve Garvey's Marital Problems, 574
 Oct. 9, 1980: Bendix Executive Resigns Amid Rumors of an Affair, 580
 Oct. 14, 1983: British Cabinet Secretary Parkinson Resigns After His Secretary Becomes Pregnant, 631
 July 23, 1984: Vanessa Williams Is the First Miss America to Resign, 638
 Nov. 28, 1987: Black Teenager Claims to Have Been Gang-Raped by Police Officers, 702
 Mar. 30, 1991: William Kennedy Smith Is Accused of Rape, 759
 Oct. 11-13, 1991: Justice Clarence Thomas's Confirmation Hearings Create a Scandal, 768
 June 26, 1992: U.S. Navy Secretary Resigns in the Wake of Tailhook Sexual Assault Scandal, 784
 June 23, 1993: Lorena Bobbitt Severs Her Husband's Penis, 795
 Aug. 21, 1994: Sex Scandal Forces Dismissal of NAACP Chief Benjamin Chavis, 821
 May 20, 1997: Air Force Prosecution of Female Officer for Adultery Reveals Double Standard, 855
 Oct. 2, 2003: Newspaper Claims That Arnold Schwarzenegger Groped Women, 1016
 June 2, 2004: U.N. Report Reveals That Secretary-General Kofi Annan Dismissed Sexual Harassment Charges, 1039
 Oct. 13, 2004: Television Producer Files Sex Harassment Suit Against Bill O'Reilly, 1047
 Mar. 14, 2006: Duke Lacrosse Players Are Accused of Gang Rape, 1086
 Apr. 26, 2006: Britain's Deputy Prime Minister Admits Affair with Secretary, 1089
 Apr. 11, 2007: Shock Jock Don Imus Loses His Radio Show over Sexist and Racist Remarks, 1142

Indexes

PERSONAGES INDEX

- Aaliyah, 1170
 Abe, Shinzo, 1145-1147
 Abernathy, Ralph, 740
 Abetz, Otto, 210
 Adams, Elmer Bragg, 4
 Adams, Michael F., 968
 Adams, Sherman, 320-322
 Adenauer, Konrad, 349-352
 Adomitis, Daniel J., 1078-1080
 Aga Khan III, 254
 Aĝar, Mehmet, 843
 Agee, William, 580-582
 Agnew, Spiro T., 455; resignation of vice presidency, 447-450, 454
 Ahlers, Conrad, 349-352
 Akagi, Norihiko, 1145
 Albert, Carl, 479
 Albert, Laura, 424
 Albert, Marv, 865-868
 Alcorn, Meade, 320
 Allard, Wayne, 991-994
 Allen, Bob, 1153-1155
 Allen, George, 989
 Allen, Herbert, Jr., 509
 Allen, Joseph C., 63
 Allen, Woody, 773-775
 Allende, Salvador, 482
 Almonte, Danny, 942-944
 Almonte, Felipe, 942
 Ambrose, Stephen E., 951-953, 959
 Ancia, Véronique, 889
 Anderson, Jack, 175, 384
 Anderson, Pamela, 1020
 Andrews, Julie, 612-614
 Angeli, Claude, 550
 Annan, Kofi, 995-998, 1039-1041,
 1053-1055
 Anslinger, Harry J., 251
 Aquino, Benigno, Jr., 628-630
 Aquino, Corazón, 628
 Arafat, Yasser, 634
 Arbuckle, Fatty, 79-82, 88, 100,
 186
 Archer, Jeffrey, 696-698
 Archibald, Robert W., 46-48
 Arena, Dominick James, 395
 Armitage, Richard, 1010-1013
 Armstrong, Garner Ted, 525-528
 Armstrong, Herbert W., 525-528
 Armstrong, Lance, 1104
 Armstrong, Robert, 645
 Arnold, Ervin, 70-72
 Aronowitz, Stanley, 837
 Arvizo, Gavin, 1025-1027
 Asquith, H. H., 43-46, 58-60
 Astor, Mary, 184-187
 Atherton, Edwin, 191-193
 Atkinson, Rick, 633
 Attell, Abe, 67
 Augstein, Rudolf, 349-352
 Aylwin, Patricio, 1121-1123
 Babbitt, Bruce, 873
 Bacanovic, Peter, 1031-1034
 Bachelet, Michelle, 1121-1123
 Backes, Ernest, 925-927
 Baels, Lilian, 276-279
 Bailey, Charles W., 175
 Baker, Bobby, 365-368
 Baker, Scott, 861
 Baker, Terence, 696
 Bakker, Jim, 690-693
 Bakker, Tammy Faye, 690-693
 Balanchine, George, 528
 Baldwin, Stanley, 187-190
 Ball, Edward, 521
 Ball, George L., 636
 Barclay, Arthur, 142
 Baring, Sir Evelyn, 298-301
 Barker, Frank A., 401
 Barker, Lex, 317
 Barnes, Fred, 951
 Barnett, Marilyn, 588-591
 Barrett, David M., 872-874
 Barron, Clarence, 63
 Barrows, Sydney, 654-657
 Barry, Joan, 220, 283
 Barry, Marion, 748-750
 Bates, Alfred, 181
 Bates, Ruby, 150
 Batista y Zaldívar, Fulgencio, 560
 Batlogg, Bertram J. R., 980
 Battista, James, 1173
 Baudouin I, 276-279
 Bauman, Robert E., 577-579
 Bayley, John, 852-854
 Beall, George, 447-450
 Beasley, Malcolm R., 980
 Beaudoin, François, 898
 Beck, Dave, 323-325
 Bedaux, Charles, 196, 212-214
 Bedaux, Fern, 212
 Begelman, David, 509-511
 Belichick, Bill, 1161-1163
 Bell, Alexander Graham, biography of, 879-881
 Bell, Griffin, 636
 Bellesiles, Michael A., 985-988
 Belloc, Hilaire, 44
 Ben Barka, Mehdi, 374-376
 Benedict XVI, 954
 Bengzon, Cesar, 601
 Bennett, Robert S., 803
 Berezhnaya, Elena, 962-964
 Berezovsky, Boris, 1132-1134
 Bergman, Ingrid, 263-265
 Bergman, Lowell, 833
 Berisha, Sali, 846-849
 Berlusconi, Silvio, 591, 1092-1094
 Bern, Paul, 160-163
 Bernanke, Ben, 1134-1138, 1175-
 1179
 Bernardin, Joseph Louis, 597
 Bernhard, Prince of Lippe-
 Biesterfeld, 482
 Bernstein, Carl, 425-431
 Berra, Dale, 666-669
 Berry, Sidney B., 488-490
 Berry, William, 514
 Besen, Wayne, 913
 Bettman, Gary, 901-903
 Biden, Joe, 698-701
 Bingham, Barry, Sr., 60-62
 Bingham, Mary Lily Kenan, 60-62
 Bingham, Robert Worth, 60-62
 Birmingham, Joseph, 954
 Bjelke-Petersen, Johannes, 682
 Black, Eli M., 471-473

MODERN SCANDALS

- Black, Hugo L., 418
 Black, Roy, 865
 Blaesing, Elizabeth Ann, 124-127
 Blair, Jayson, 888, 998-1001
 Blair, Tony, 1089-1091
 Blanco, Kathleen Babineaux, 1068-1072
 Blaney, Neil, 413-415
 Blix, Hans, 995-998
 Bluitgen, Kåre, 1075-1077
 Bobbitt, John Wayne, 795-797
 Bobbitt, Lorena, 795-797
 Bodkin, Archibald, 12
 Boesky, Ivan, 726-729, 753-756
 Bokassa, Jean-Bédél, 550-552
 Boland, Kevin, 413-415
 Boone, Pat, 500-502
 Borer, Thomas, 858
 Bork, Robert, 680
 Borman, Frank, 488
 Bouchard, Lucien, 892-895
 Boudreaux, Lori, 1002-1004
 Bowles, Andrew Parker, 745
 Bowles, Camilla Parker, 745-747, 791
 Bowman, Patricia, 759-762
 Boyd, Gerald, 998-1001
 Boyd, James, 384
 Boyle, W. A., 404-406
 Bradley, Anne, 22-25
 Bradshaw, Berenice Jewett, 528-530
 Bradshaw, Franklin James, 528-530
 Brady, Matthew A., 79, 191-193
 Brady, Roger, 1062
 Brawley, Tawana, 702-705
 Breen, Joseph, 163
 Brennan, Christine, 814
 Breton, André, 136, 147
 Breton, Sonia Rojas, 942
 Breuning, Stephen, 720-723
 Bricmont, Jean, 837
 Briggs, John V., 507
 Brittan, Leon, 645-647
 Britton, Nan, 124-127
 Brodhead, Richard H., 1086
 Brominski, Bernard C., 397
 Bronson, Charles, 642
 Brooks, Louise Cromwell, 173
 Brooks, Stephen K., 401
 Brown, Arthur, 22-25
 Brown, David D., IV, 1050-1052
 Brown, Denise, 1129
 Brown, Divine, 827-829
 Brown, Michael D., 1068-1072
 Brown, Ronald H., 873
 Brown, Walter Folger, 144-147
 Brownlee, John Edward, 176-178
 Bruce, Robert V., 879
 Bryan, William Jennings, 1
 Bryant, Anita, 506-509
 Bryant, Kobe, 1008-1010
 Bryant, Vanessa, 1008
 Brzak, Cynthia, 1039-1041
 Bucak, Sedat, 843-845
 Buckey, Peggy Ann, 624
 Buckey, Peggy McMartin, 624
 Buckey, Raymond, 624
 Buckley, Sheila, 468-470
 Buffalo Child Long Lance, 130-133
 Buñuel, Luis, 136-139, 147-150
 Burden, William Douglas, 130-133
 Burgaud, Fabrice, 922
 Burke, James, 568-570
 Burkett, Bill, 1044
 Burns, William J., 28, 60
 Burton, Joseph R., 4-6
 Bush, George H. W., 208, 762, 787, 888; Iran-Contra, 678; and Clarence Thomas, 768-772
 Bush, George W.; and Hurricane Katrina, 1068-1072; insider trading investigation, 762-765; and Iraq, 1011; and Trent Lott, 988-991; military service of, 1044-1046
 Butcher, Cecil H., Jr., 648-650
 Butcher, Sir Herbert, 431
 Butcher, Jake, 648-650
 Butler, Carrie, 1022-1024
 Butler, Smedley, 156
 Butt, Sir Alfred, 181-184
 Buttafuoco, Joey, 781-784
 Buttafuoco, Mary Jo, 781-784
 Butterfield, Alexander, 428
 Butz, Earl L., 500-502
 Buxton, Peter, 437
 Byrnes, Jack, 274-276
 Cabey, Darrell, 641
 Cabon, Christine Huguette, 651
 Caldwell, John, 176
 Calhoun, John, 449
 Calhoun, Rory, 295-298
 Calley, William, 401-404
 Calvi, Roberto, 591, 606-609
 Cameron, Lucille, 52
 Campbell, Helen, 248
 Campbell, John, 974
 Campbell, Judith, 329-332
 Campbell, Walter, 193
 Canseco, José, 1058-1061
 Capasso, Carl, 693-695
 Cardin, Lucien, 377-379
 Carey, Hugh Leo, 546
 Carmen, Leon, 852-854
 Carroll, John, 1016
 Carson, Clayborne, 739-741
 Carson, Rachel, 547
 Carter, Billy, 571-574
 Carter, Jimmy, 546; and Billy Carter, 571-574; and “Koreagate,” 479-482; and Bert Lance, 511-514, 571; personal confessions, 497-500
 Cary, Walter E., 104
 Casement, Roger, 31-33
 Casey, Eamonn, 779-781
 Casey, Robert P., 684
 Casey, William J., 676
 Cassone, Michelle, 759
 Castle, Barbara, 298
 Castro, Fidel, 331, 560
 Çatli, Abdullah, 843-845
 Cattier, Félicien, 33
 Caudle, T. Lamar, 279-282, 310-313
 Ceaușescu, Nicolae, 742-745
 Cecil, Robert, 142-144
 Cedarbaum, Miriam Goldman, 1031
 Celler, Emanuel, 380
 Cerrini, Daniel, 815-818
 Chagnon, Napoleon A., 910-912
 Chamberlain, Neville, 182
 Chambers, Whittaker, 259-262
 Chandler, Happy, 242-244
 Chandra, Ranjit Kumar, 977-979

PERSONAGES INDEX

- Chaplin, Charles, 108, 283-285; paternity suit, 220-222
- Chaplin, Oona O'Neill, 220, 283-285
- Charles, Count of Flanders, 277
- Charles, Prince of Wales, 745-747, 789-792
- Charles, Suzette, 638
- Chautemps, Camille, 170-172
- Chavis, Benjamin, 821-823
- Cheney, Dick, 1012
- Cherkashin, Victor, 931
- Cherkasky, Michael G., 1050
- Cheshire, Maxine, 453
- Chesterton, Cecil, 43-46
- Chiapel, Tom, 638
- Chiappe, Jean, 170-172
- Childers, Thomas, 951
- Chomsky, Noam, 1156
- Choynski, Joe, 53
- Chrétien, Jean, 898-901
- Christensen, Hayden, 888
- Christy, Cuthbert, 142
- Chung Un-chan, 1094-1097
- Church, Frank, 482
- Churchill, Ward, 1155-1158
- Cicotte, Eddie, 66-70
- Ciller, Tansu, 843
- Cinquanta, Ottavio, 962
- Cisneros, Henry, 872-874
- Civiletti, Benjamin, 571
- Claes, Willy, 889-890
- Clark, Dick, 332-335
- Clark, Helen, 974-977, 1112-1114
- Clark, Joe, 898-901
- Clark, Taliaferro, 437-440
- Clark, Thomas C., 279-282
- Clements, Bill, 687-689
- Clinton, Bill; and Henry Cisneros, 872-873; impeachment, 874-878, 988; and Jesse Jackson, 896; and Monica Lewinsky, 126, 820, 874-878, 896, 1168; Lewinsky affair confession, 876; pardons of, 452, 805; and Tuskegee Syphilis Study, 439; and Whitewater investigation, 818-821
- Clinton, Hillary Rodham, 874, 904-905, 1114; and Eliot Spitzer, 1169; and Whitewater investigation, 818-821
- Cobb, Ernie, 568
- Cobb, Ty, 118-121
- Cochran, Johnnie, 808
- Cochran, W. E., 5
- Cody, John Patrick, 597-599
- Cody, Lew, 102
- Cody, Richard, 1140
- Coelho, Tony, 732
- Coghlan, Monica, 696-698
- Coleman, Milton, 633
- Collingsworth, Terry, 1078-1080
- Colosio, Luis Donaldo, 824-826
- Comiskey, Charles, 66-70
- Concepcion, Roberto, 601
- Condit, Gary, 933-936
- Connelly, Matthew J., 281, 310-313
- Connolly, Cyril, 136
- Conrad, Joseph, 32
- Constable, Anne, 465
- Conte, Victor, 1164-1166
- Cooke, Janet, 585-588
- Coolidge, Calvin, 104, 200; and Teapot Dome scandal, 95-99
- Cools, André, 889-892
- Cooper, Isabel, 173-175
- Copp, Harley, 594
- Cornell, Julien, 236
- Cortelyou, George B., 1
- Cosby, Bill, 703
- Cosgrave, Liam, 413
- Coughlin, Paula, 785
- Courlander, Harold, 520-522, 525-528
- Cox, Archibald, 428
- Cox, Tricia Nixon, 453
- Crader, Bo, 959
- Cramer, Clayton E., 985
- Crane, Cheryl, 317-319
- Crane, Daniel, 621-624
- Crane, Stephen, 317
- Crane, Stephen G., 641
- Crawford, Christina, 517-519
- Crawford, Joan, 517-519
- Creighton, Joanne V., 936-938
- Cunningham, Mary, 580-582
- Cunningham, Randall, 1064-1067
- Curie, Marie, 37-39
- Curley, James Michael, 6-9
- Curley, Thomas, 6
- Curnin, Tom, 636-638
- Currie, Edwina, 983-985
- Curzon, George Nathaniel, 25
- Cushing, Richard, 397
- Dacko, David, 550
- Dalí, Salvador, 136-139, 147-150
- Dalton, John H., 800
- Daly, Augustin, 34
- Daniélou, Alain, 456-459
- Daniélou, Jean, 456-459
- Daniels, Josephus, 70
- Darden, Christopher, 808
- Dardenne, Sabine, 840
- Dassault, Serge, 889-892
- Daugherty, Harry M., 92-95
- Davenport, Dorothy, 86-89
- Davies, Arthur B., 49-52
- Davies, Marion, 108-111
- Davis, Gray, 1017
- Davis, Hugh J., 459-462
- Davis, John W., 46
- Davis, Oscar, 313
- Davis, Peter, 1112-1114
- Dawson, Charles, 292
- Day, Laraine, 242
- Deakin, George, 531
- Dean, John W., 425-431, 500-502
- DeBartolo, Edward J., Jr., 907-909
- DeFreeze, Donald, 450
- DeLauro, Rosa L., 1097-1100
- Delay, Myriam, 922-924
- Delay, Thierry, 922-924
- Delhez, Laetitia, 840
- Delmont, Margaret Maude, 79
- De Lorean, John, 609-612
- Delpey, Roger, 550
- Delplanque, David, 922
- Dennis, Hugh C., 5
- Derrida, Jacques, 705
- DeWitt, John L., 205
- DeWolf, L. Harold, 739
- Diana, Princess of Wales, 745-747, 789-792, 861-865
- Dickie, Phil, 681

MODERN SCANDALS

- Diefenbaker, John G., 377-379
 Dies, Martin, 248
 DiFederico, Mario A., 534
 Dines, Courtland S., 100-102
 Dingell, John, 615-617
 Dinis, Edmund S., 395
 DiStefano, Phil, 1155
 Dobson, James, 913
 Dockweiler, John F., 202
 Doctorow, E. L., 18
 Dodd, Thomas J., 384-386
 Doerfer, John C., 335-337
 Doheny, Laurence E., 95-99
 Dole, Bob, 1141
 Donaghy, Tim, 1172-1175
 Donaldson, Liam, 927
 Doren, Charles Van, 326-329
 Douglas, William O., 382
 Dowd, John M., 735
 Doyle, Arthur Conan, 33
 Dresnick, Ronald, 765
 Dreyfus, Alfred, 19-22
 Du Bois, W. E. B., 142
 Duhaime, Yvon, 898-901
 Dukakis, Michael, 698-701
 Dunaway, Faye, 518
 Duncan, Isadora, 34-36
 Dunleavy, Richard M., 784
 Dunn, John, 341
 Dunn, Patricia, 1114-1118
 Duplessis, Maurice, 892-895
 Dupré, Ashley Alexandra, 1167-1170
 Duranty, Walter, 167-169
 Durbin, Richard J., 1097-1100
 Durocher, Leo, 242-244
 Dutroux, Marc, 840-842
 Dwyer, Budd, 684-686

 Eagleton, Thomas F., 440-443
 Ebbers, Bernard, 764, 909, 1074
 Ebert, Roger, 1004-1007
 Eckardt, Shawn, 812
 Edward II, 1107
 Edwards, Blake, 612-614
 Edwards, Edwin, 907-909
 Eisenhower, Dwight D.; and Sherman Adams, 320-322; and John Doerfer, 336; film censorship, 252; and Joseph McCarthy, 266-270; and Richard Nixon, 286-288
 Eisenhower, Julie Nixon, 453
 Eisenstein, Serge, 149
 Eisler, Hanns, 284
 Eizenstat, Stuart, 858
 Elliott, Brian Robinson, 223
 Ellis, Joseph J., 936-938
 Ellsberg, Daniel, 416-419
 Elsnor, Edward, 122
 Éluard, Paul, 148
 Endo, Mitsuye, 205
 Enright, Dan, 326-329
 Enrile, Juan Ponce, 629
 Erben, Hermann F., 559
 Ericta, Vicente, 600
 Errichetti, Angelo, 561-564
 Esenin, Sergei, 36
 Espy, Mike, 873
 Estes, Billie Sol, 341-343
 Estevez, Emilio, 718
 Estrich, Susan, 1017
 Eulenburg-Hertefeld, Philipp, Prince of, 9-12
 Eustachy, Larry, 950
 Evans, David, 1086
 Evers-Williams, Myrlie, 823
 Exner, Dan, 331
 Ezoe, Hiromasa, 714-717

 Faber, Katelyn, 1008-1010
 Fahd, 453
 Fairfoul, Tom, 55
 Faisal, 453
 Fall, Albert B., 95-99, 125
 Falwell, Jerry, 506-509, 690, 709
 Faneuil, Douglas, 1031-1034
 Fard, Wallace Dodd, 359
 Farian, Frank, 756
 Farmer, Frances, 214-217
 Farmer, Lillian Van Ornum, 214
 Farrakhan, Louis, 361, 633, 635
 Farrow, Mia, 773-775
 Fastow, Andrew, 909
 Fayed, Dodi al-, 861-865
 Fayed, Mohamed al-, 861
 Feleppa, Anselmo, 881
 Felt, W. Mark, 425

 Fenjves, Pablo F., 1129-1131
 Fennell, Jim, 948
 Fernando, Enrique, 600
 Fields, William J., 104
 Finnerty, Collin, 1086
 Fiorina, Carly, 1115
 Fischer, Bobby, 525
 Fish, Stanley, 838
 Fisher, Amy, 781-784
 Fiske, Robert B., 818
 Fitzgerald, Patrick, 1011
 Fitzgerald, Tony, 681
 Fitzsimmons, Jeanette, 974
 Fleischmann, Martin, 723-726
 Flinn, Kelly, 855-858
 Flynn, Errol, 202-205, 559-561
 Flynn, Maurice, 280
 Fogel, Moshe, 860
 Foggo, Kyle Dustin, 1064
 Foley, Mark, 1118-1120
 Fomon, Robert M., 636-638
 Fonda, Jane, 434-436
 Forbes, Charles R., 89-92
 Ford, Betty, 454
 Ford, Frederick W., 337
 Ford, Gerald R., 449, 497-498; and Earl Butz, 500-502; pardon of Dave Beck, 324; pardon of Richard Nixon, 429, 455, 499; and Nelson Rockefeller, 537; and Watergate, 429, 455
 Ford, Harold E., Sr., 649
 Ford, Harrison, 524
 Ford, Robin, 251-253
 Forlani, Arnaldo, 591-593
 Fortas, Abe, 367, 371, 389-394
 Fowler, Tillie, 991-994
 Foxe, Fanne, 462-465
 France, Anatole, 33
 Francis, Ted, 696-698
 Franke, Karl Heinz, 503-505
 Fraser, Donald M., 479
 Fraser, John, 660-662
 Freed, Alan, 332-335
 Freedman, Albert, 326-329
 Freeh, Louis, 931
 Freeman, Helene, 638
 French, John, 58-60
 Freud, Sigmund, 13, 74, 137

PERSONAGES INDEX

- Frey, James, 424
 Frist, Bill, 988-989
 Frohnmayer, David, 662
 Fualaau, Vili, 605, 849-852
 Fujimura, Shinichi, 919-921
 Furesz, John, 868
- Gabel, Hortense W., 693-695
 Gailey, Samantha, 522-524
 Gaines, James R., 810
 Gaines, Kevin, 884-886
 Galbraith, T. G. D., 347
 Galeen, Henrik, 111
 Gallagher, Willie, 182
 Gallo, Vincent, 1004-1007
 Galman, Rolando, 628
 Gandil, Chick, 66-70
 Garabedian, Mitchell, 954
 García Lorca, Federico, 136
 Gardner, Deborah, 476-478
 Gargan, Joseph F., 394
 Garrett, H. Lawrence, III, 784-788
 Garvey, Cyndy, 574-577
 Garvey, Steve, 574-577
 Gates, Henry Louis, Jr., 521
 Gates, Robert, 1138
 Gaulle, Charles de, 209, 232
 Geller, Uri, 674
 Gelli, Licio, 591
 Genovese, Kitty, 369-371
 Geoghan, John, 954-958
 George, Mary, 476
 George V, 84
 George VI, 187
 Gerard, Mark, 514-516
 Gerbert, Elkin B., 389
 Getty, J. Paul, 220
 Giamatti, A. Bartlett, 735-738
 Giancana, Sam, 330
 Gibbs, David Charles, 1123
 Gibbs, Lois, 546-550
 Gibson, Mel, 1106-1109
 Giesler, Jerry, 202-205
 Gilbey, James, 789-792
 Gillars, Mildred, 435
 Gillooly, Jeff, 812
 Gingrich, Newt, 731, 989
 Giraudo, Antonio, 1092-1094
- Giscard d'Estaing, Valéry, 550-552
 Giuliani, Donna Hanover, 904
 Giuliani, Judith Nathan, 904-906
 Giuliani, Rudy, 726, 904-906
 Glass, Stephen, 887-889
 Glassford, Pelham D., 158
 Glyn, Elinor, 25-27
 Goebbels, Josef, 197, 231
 Goerlitzer, Artur, 197
 Goetz, Bernhard, 641-644
 Goldfine, Bernard, 320-322
 Goldman, Fred, 1129
 Goldman, Judy, 765-768
 Goldman, Larry, 765
 Goldman, Ronald, 806-809
 Goldwater, Barry, 371, 386
 Golitsin, Anatoli, 347
 Goodell, Roger, 1160-1163
 Goodpaster, Andrew J., 488
 Goodwin, Doris Kearns, 959-961
 Goossens, Eugène, 304-306
 Gore, Al, 988
 Göring, Hermann, 196-197
 Gorman, Marvin, 711-714
 Gorsuch, Anne, 615-617
 Graef, Ortwin de, 705
 Graham, Philip, 270
 Grant, Hugh, 827-829
 Grass, Günter, 1109-1112
 Grau, Albin, 111
 Gravel, Mike, 416
 Gray, Fred, 437
 Gray, L. Patrick, III, 428
 Gray, Lily, 594-596
 Graziano, Rocky, 243
 Greeley, Andrew M., 597-599
 Greenberg, Jeffrey W., 1050-1052
 Gregory, Wilton D., 954
 Grenon, Aurelie, 922
 Grimshaw, Richard, 594-596
 Gronen, Jimmy, 444-446
 Grozier, Richard, 63
 Gruenberger, Peter, 509
 Guagenti, Peter, 781
 Guccione, Bob, 638-641
 Guest, Frederick, 83-86
 Gun, Katharine, 995-998
 Gundlach, James, 1101-1103
- Hager, Nicky, 974-977
 Haggard, Ted, 1126-1129
 Hahn, Jessica, 690
 Haig, Alexander, 416
 Halberstam, David, 362
 Haley, Alex, 520-522
 Hall, Camilla, 450
 Hamburger, Christian, 289-291
 Hamilton, David F., 1078-1080
 Hammerman, I. H., 447
 Hamsun, Knut, 229-232
 Hamsun, Marie, 229
 Han Hak-soo, 1094
 Hanna, Richard T., 479
 Hanover, Donna, 904
 Hansen, Betty, 202-205
 Hanssen, Robert, 931-933
 Harden, Maximilian, 9-12
 Harding, Florence, 89
 Harding, Tonya, 812-815
 Harding, Warren G., 89-95, 124-127, 200; and Teapot Dome scandal, 91, 95-99, 125
 Hardy, Carlos S., 117
 Hargis, Billy James, 465-467
 Harlow, Jean, 160-163
 Harper, Samuel N., 307
 Harrick, Jim, Jr., 968-970
 Harrick, Jim, Sr., 950, 968-970
 Harriman, E. H., 2
 Harrington, Margaret, 217-219
 Harris, Jean, 565-567
 Harris, Maxwell Henley, 223-225
 Harris, Oren, 332-335
 Harrison, George, 494-497
 Harrison, Rex, 245-247
 Hartery, Don, 765
 Harvey, Francis J., 1138
 Harvey, Marilyn, 977
 Hasner, Adam, 1154
 Hassan II, 374
 Hastert, Dennis, 1118
 Haughey, Charles James, 413-415
 Hayden, Tom, 434
 Hays, Wayne L., 491-493
 Hays, William H., 86
 Hayter, William, 347
 Hayworth, Rita, 254-256
 Hearst, Patricia, 450-453

MODERN SCANDALS

- Hearst, William Randolph, 74, 81, 108-111, 450
 Heidemann, Gerd, 618-621
 Heimann, John G., 511
 Hellenbroich, Heribert, 657
 Heller, Jean, 437-440
 Helmsley, Harry, 776
 Helmsley, Leona, 776-778
 Hempel, Régis, 925
 Henderson, Ian, 298
 Henderson, Paul, 1097-1100
 Herman, Alexis M., 873
 Herman, Pee-wee (Paul Reubens), 765-768, 829
 Hernandez, Macarena, 998-1001
 Herrera, Ameurфина Melencio, 600
 Herrschaft, Daryl, 913
 Hersh, Seymour, 401
 Hervey, Ramon, II, 638
 Heseltine, Michael, 645-647
 Hess, Dean E., 252
 Hess, Rudolph, 197
 Hetrick, William Morgan, 610
 Higham, Charles, 559-561
 Hill, Anita, 768-772
 Hill, Henry, 568-570
 Hilton, Paris, 1019-1021
 Hindemith, Paul, 76-79
 Hirabayashi, Gordon Kiyoshi, 205
 Hirschfield, Alan, 509-511
 Hiss, Alger, 259-262; and J. Edgar Hoover, 261
 Hitler, Adolf, 213, 230, 352, 503; and Charles Chaplin, 284; faked diaries, 618-621; film censorship, 164; and Errol Flynn, 560; and France, 210; and Knut Hamsun, 231; and Norway, 226-229; purges, 11; and the Windsors, 189, 196-198
 Ho Chi Minh, 257
 Hobbs, Marian, 974
 Hochhuth, Rolf, 353-355
 Hodge, Sir Rowland, 83
 Hoffman, James, 609
 Hoffman, Martin R., 488
 Hogan, Frank, 274-276
 Holland, Al, 667
 Holmes, David, 531
 Hons, Emile, 476
 Hoover, Herbert, 94, 99, 144; and Bonus Army, 156-160
 Hoover, J. Edgar; and Charles Chaplin, 220-222, 283-285; and domestic communism, 261; and John F. Kennedy, 329-332; and Profumo affair, 357
 Horrigan, Aldine, 798
 Hotchner, A. E., 524
 Hovind, Eric, 1123
 Hovind, Jo Delia, 1123
 Hovind, Kent, 1123-1126
 Howard, J. Daniel, 785
 Hoyzer, Robert, 1055-1058
 Hubbell, Webster, 819
 Hubble, Ava, 852
 Huddleston, Silous, 404
 Hudson, Erastus, 70
 Hudson, Rock, 295-298
 Hughes, Howard, 160, 251-253, 422-425
 Hull, Anne, 1138-1142
 Humphreys, Laud, 407-409
 Hunt, E. Howard, 425-431
 Hunter, C. J., 1164-1166
 Hurley, Elizabeth, 827
 Hurley, Patrick, 158
 Hussein, Saddam, 989, 995, 1035, 1039, 1053-1055
 Hussey, John, 948-950
 Huth, M. E., 104
 Hwang Woo-suk, 1094-1097
 Ikenaga, Masaaki, 398-400
 Iliescu, Ion, 742
 Imus, Don, 1142-1144
 Ince, Thomas H., 108-111
 Ingrassia, Angelo J., 704
 Insull, Samuel, 154-156
 Irving, Clifford, 422-425
 Irving, David, 619
 Irving, Edith, 422-425
 Isaacs, Godfrey, 43
 Isaacs, Rufus, 43
 Isorni, Jacques, 232
 Jackson, Ashley, 895
 Jackson, Jesse, 633-636, 640, 699, 895-897, 990
 Jackson, Michael, 1025-1027
 Jackson, Shoeless Joe, 66-70, 399
 Jackson, Vernon L., 1148
 Jameson, J. Franklin, 307
 Janszen, Paul, 735
 Jefferson, Thomas, 200, 936
 Jefferson, William J., 1147-1150
 Jenkins, Walter, 371-374
 Jenks, Anton Shrewsbury, 125
 Jenrette, John W., Jr., 561-562, 582-585
 Jenrette, Rita, 582-585
 John Paul I, 606
 John Paul II, 606-609, 954
 Johnson, Charles, 521
 Johnson, Charles S., 142
 Johnson, Frank, 739
 Johnson, Jack, 52-55
 Johnson, Judy, 624-627
 Johnson, Lyndon B.; and Bobby Baker, 365-368; T. Lamar Caudle, 281, 312; and Billie Sol Estes, 341-343; and Abe Fortas, 392; and Doris Kearns Goodwin, 959; and Walter Jenkins, 371-374; and Vietnam, 364
 Jones, Ernest, 12-15
 Jones, Gareth, 167-169
 Jones, Marion, 1164-1166
 Jones, Michael, 1126-1129
 Jones, Paula, 875
 Jones, Steven E., 723
 Jordan, Everett, 367
 Jordan, Pat, 574-577
 Jorgensen, Christine, 289-291
 Jung Myung Seok, 939-941
 Kamata, Toshiaki, 919-921
 Kamenev, Leo, 106
 Kanaly, John J., 296
 Kaplan, David A., 1114
 Karpinski, Janis, 1034
 Kaufman, George S., 184-187
 Kavanaugh, Daniel, 1153
 Kawamoto, Dawn, 1116
 Keally, Charles, 919-921
 Kearney, Nancy, 810
 Keating, Frank, 954

PERSONAGES INDEX

- Keays, Sara, 631-633
 Keeler, Christine, 355-358
 Kefauver, Estes, 270-273
 Keith, Minor C., 472
 Kelley, Joe, 100-102
 Kelly, James, 413
 Kelly, John, 413
 Kelly, R., 1170-1172
 Kelly, Richard, 561-562
 Kelsey, Frances Oldham, 193, 301-304
 Kelso, Frank B., Jr., 784, 800
 Kennan, George F., 307-310
 Kennedy, Charles, 1084-1085
 Kennedy, Edward M., 364, 439-440; and Chappaquiddick, 367, 394-398; and William Kennedy Smith, 759
 Kennedy, John F.; assassination of, 343; and Bobby Baker, 367; and Judith Campbell, 329-332; and Matthew J. Connelly, 281, 312; extramarital affairs, 126; and J. Edgar Hoover, 329-332; and Marilyn Monroe, 344-346; and Ellen Rometsch, 367; and Vietnam, 362
 Kennedy, Joseph P., 127-130
 Kennedy, Mildred Pearce, 115
 Kennedy, Patrick, 759
 Kennedy, Robert F., 329, 700; and Dave Beck, 323-325; and Marilyn Monroe, 344
 Kennedy, Rose Fitzgerald, 127
 Kent, Samuel Neal, 70-72
 Kenyatta, Jomo, 298
 Kerr, James, 12
 Kerr, Robert S., 365-368
 Kerrigan, Nancy, 812-815
 Kershaw, Elinor, 108-111
 Keyworth, George A., II, 1114-1118
 Khan, Prince Aly, 254-256
 Khrushchev, Nikita S., 330, 373
 Kiley, Kevin C., 1138
 Kim Sun-jong, 1094
 King, Billie Jean, 588-591
 King, Cecil R., 279-282
 King, Charles D. B., 142-144
 King, Coretta Scott, 739
 King, Don, 703
 King, John, 93
 King, Larry (lawyer), 588
 King, Larry (talk show host), 390, 711, 828, 1130
 King, Martin Luther, Jr., 381, 739-741, 822, 896
 King, Wanda, 748
 Kinnock, Neil, 698-701
 Kinte, Kunta, 520
 Kirstein, Lincoln, 528
 Kissinger, Henry, 416, 538, 551
 Kitchener, Lord, 58-60
 Klein, Allen, 494-497
 Knebel, Fletcher, 175
 Knight, Bobby, 950
 Knight, Suge, 884
 Knox, Howard J., 290
 Kocadağ, Hüseyin, 843-845
 Koch, Edward I., 642, 693-695, 778
 Koch, Kevin, 666
 Kohl, Helmut, 1110
 Koller, Arnold, 858, 860
 Kontogiannis, Thomas, 1064
 Koolmatrie, Wanda (Leon Carmen), 852-854
 Kopechne, Mary Jo, 367, 394-398
 Korematsu, Fred, 205
 Kotchian, Carl, 482-485
 Kovtun, Dimitri, 1133
 Koza, Frank, 995-998
 Krause, Allison, 410-413
 Krever, Horace, 868-871
 Krupinski, Walter, 503-505
 Kuhlmeier, Harry L., Jr., 626
 Kuhn, Bowie, 556-558
 Kuhn, Rick, 568-570
 Kuhn, Walt, 49-52
 Kujau, Konrad, 618-621
 LaCroix, Larry, 401
 Lacy, Lee, 667
 La Falaise, Henri de, 127
 Lagos, Ricardo, 1121-1123
 Lake, Douglas, 1072-1074
 Lamarr, Hedy, 163-166
 Lambert, William G., 391
 Lamont, Daniel, 1
 Lance, Bert, 511-514, 571
 Landis, Carole, 245-247
 Landis, Floyd, 1103-1106
 Landis, Kenesaw Mountain, 66-70, 118-121, 242, 399, 556, 737
 Lane, Charles, 887
 Lang, Robert Todd, 509
 Lange, Robert Brookings, Sr., 444-446
 Langevin, Jeanne, 37
 Langevin, Paul, 37-39
 Langfeldt, Gabriel, 229
 Langley, John W., 103-105
 Larson, Charles R., 800
 Lasky, Jesse L., 86-89
 Lategano, Cristyne, 904
 Laval, Pierre, 209-211
 Lavelle, Rita, 615-617
 Law, Bernard, 954-958
 Lawford, Peter, 344
 Laws, Bolitha J., 236
 Lay, Kenneth, 945-948, 1074
 Leber, Georg, 503-505
 Lederer, Raymond, 561-562
 Leeds, Lila, 251-253
 Le Gougne, Marie Reine, 962-964
 Le Gros Clark, Wilfrid, 292
 Leibowitz, Samuel, 150-153
 Leisure, Peter K., 262
 Le Mesurier, John, 531
 Lenin, Vladimir Ilich, 106, 168, 307
 Lennix, Harry, 382
 Lenz, Widukind, 301
 Leonard, Dutch, 118-121
 Leopold II, 31-33
 Leopold III, 276-279
 LeRoy, J. T., 424
 Leslie, Kristen, 1062
 Le Thuy, Ngo Dinh, 362
 Letourneau, Mary Kay, 605, 849-852
 Levy, Chandra, 933-936
 Levy, Susan, 933-936
 Lewinsky, Monica, 818-821, 888; and Bill Clinton, 874-878, 896, 1168
 Lewis, Jane Mitcham, 313

MODERN SCANDALS

- Lewis, Jerry Lee, 313-316
 Lewis, John, 191
 Lewis, Myra Brown, 313-316
 Lewis, Terence, 682
 Ley, Robert, 196
 Libby, Lewis "Scooter," 1010-1013
 Liddy, G. Gordon, 425-431
 Lieber, Charles M., 980
 Lincoln, Abraham, 443
 Linderman, Lawrence, 612
 Lindgren, James, 985
 Lindstrom, Petter, 263
 Lindstrom, Pia, 263
 Lipschutz, Milton, 104
 Litvinenko, Alexander, 1132-1134
 Llosa, Luis Fernando, 942
 Lloyd George, David, 43, 59, 83-86
 Lodge, Henry Cabot, Jr., 362
 Lombard, Fern, 212
 Long, Russell, 384
 Longet, Claudine, 485-487
 López Arellano, Oswaldo, 471
 Lott, Trent, 988-991
 Lowe, Rob, 717-720
 Lowell, Francis Cabot, 6
 Lubbers, Ruud, 1039-1041
 Lubonja, Fatos, 846-849
 Ludwig, F. G., Jr., 786
 Lugovoi, Andrei, 1132-1134
 Luykx, Albert, 414
 Lyga, Frank, 884-886
 Lynch, Jack, 413-415
 Lynch, Thomas C., 800-803
 Lyons, Eugene, 167
 Lyons, Jack, 753-756
 Lyttleton, Oliver, 298
- McAdoo, William G., 97
 MacArthur, Douglas, 173-175; and
 Bonus Army, 156-160
 McAuley, James, 223-225
 McCain, John, 54, 906, 1153-1154
 McCarthy, Joseph, 266-270; and Alger Hiss, 261
 McClellan, John, 323
 McCord, James W., Jr., 425-431
 McCormack, John W., 380
 MacDonald, Ramsay, 105-108
 McDonough, Peter, 191
- McDonough, Tom, 191
 McDougal, Jim, 818
 McDougal, Susan, 818
 MacEachran, John W., 133
 McEntee, Sean, 217
 McEuen, Paul L., 980
 McFarlane, Bud, 676
 MacFarlane, Kee, 624
 McGovern, George, 440-443, 463
 McGrath, J. Howard, 279-282
 McGuirk, Bernard, 1142-1144
 McGwire, Mark, 1058-1061
 Machatý, Gustav, 163
 Mack, David Anthony, 884-886
 Mackay, James A., 879-881
 Mackey, Randy, 1154
 Mackris, Andrea, 1047-1049
 MacLeish, Archibald, 236
 Macleod, Iain, 298
 McMartin, Virginia, 624-627
 Macmillan, Allan D., 176
 Macmillan, Harold, 355
 MacMillan, Vivian, 176-178
 McNab, Gavin, 79
 McNamara, Robert, 416
 MacPhail, Larry, 242-244
 McPherson, Aimee Semple, 115-
 118
 McPherson, Rolf, 115
 McTaggart, David, 651
 McTaggart, Lynne, 959-961
 Maddox, Alton H., Jr., 702
 Mafart, Alain, 651
 Mahaney, W. B., 5
 Mahurin, Matt, 810
 Main, Pamela, 304-306
 Major, John, 647, 697, 983-985;
 and David Mellor, 792-794; and Tim Yeo, 798-800
 Makalintol, Querube, 601
 Malcolm X, 359
 Mallick, Bill, 730-732
 Malloy, Edward A., 948
 Man, Paul de, 705-708
 Mandel, Marvin, 447
 Mandl, Fritz, 163
 Mangini, Eric, 1161-1163
 Mangum, Crystal Gail, 1086-1089
 Manson, Charles, 523
- Mantle, Mickey, 556-558
 Mapes, Mary, 1044-1046
 Maradona, Diego, 815-818
 Marcinkus, Paul, 592, 606-609
 Marconi, Guglielmo, 43-46
 Marcos, Ferdinand, 600-602, 628-
 630
 Marcos, Imelda, 628
 Markham, Paul F., 395
 Marks, Albert A., 638
 Marriott, Reginald, 181
 Marsh, Clara, 964-967
 Marsh, Ray, 964-967
 Marsh, Tommy Ray-Brent, 964-967
 Marshak, Megan, 537-539
 Martino, Thomas, 1173
 Marvin, Lee, 540-542, 589
 Mason, C. Vernon, 702
 Masor, Mark, 977
 Massengill, Samuel Evans, 193-
 195
 Mast, Charles Emmanuel, 257-259
 Masters, Christopher, 681
 Mathias, Philip, 830-833
 Matsuoka, Toshikatsu, 1145-1147
 Maudling, Reginald, 431
 Mauresmo, Amélie, 590
 Mauroy, Pierre, 375
 Mayer, Louis B., 163
 Mays, Willie, 556-558
 Mazzei, Paul, 568
 Medina, Ernest, 401
 Medlar, Linda Jones, 872-874
 Mee, James, 1106-1109
 Meese, Edwin, III, 669, 678
 Meili, Christophe, 858-861
 Meksi, Aleksander, 846-849
 Mellor, David, 792-794
 Menem, Carlos, 815
 Menendez, Erik, 750-753
 Menendez, Jose, 750-753
 Menendez, Kitty, 750-753
 Menendez, Lyle, 750-753
 Merhige, Robert, Jr., 459-462
 Merwin, W. S., 474
 Meyer, Ron, 687-689
 Mfume, Kweisi, 823
 Michael, George, 881-883

PERSONAGES INDEX

- Mikhailsky, Sigmund, 347-349
 Milburn, Alan, 927-930
 Milea, Vasile, 742
 Milgram, Stanley, 338-340
 Milk, Harvey, 507
 Milken, Michael, 726-729
 Miller, Jeffrey, 410-413
 Miller, Thomas W., 92
 Miller, Tom, 55-58
 Millette, Dorothy, 160
 Milligan, Maurice M., 200
 Mills, Elizabeth Shown, 520
 Mills, Gary, 520
 Mills, Wilbur D., 462-465
 Milner, Alfred, 25
 Minchew, Daniel, 553
 Minkow, Barry, 708-710
 Minow, Newton, 335-337
 Minter, Mabel Miles, 73-76
 Mitchell, George J., 1058, 1162
 Mitchell, John, 390-391, 425-431
 Mitchell, Margaret, 521
 Mitchelson, Marvin, 540-542
 Mitchum, Robert, 251-253
 Miyazawa, Kiichi, 714-717
 Mody, Lori, 1147-1150
 Mog, Aribert, 163
 Moggi, Luciano, 1092-1094
 Moltke, Kuno von, 9
 Monckeberg, Nicolás, 1122
 Monckton, Walter, 187
 Monroe, Marilyn, 246, 344-346
 Montgomery, Tim, 1164-1166
 Moon, Sun Myung, 479
 Moore, Carlos, 731
 Moore, Demi, 718
 Moore, Rasheeda, 748
 Moores, Frank, 830-833
 Morel, Edmund Dene, 31-33
 Morelli, Benedict, 1047-1049
 Morgan, Jack, 514
 Morgenthau, Robert M., 641
 Morissette, Pierre, 892
 Morley, John J., 389
 Morley, Thomas, 636-638
 Morris, Joe, 304-306
 Morrison, Toni, 521
 Mortimer, Elias, 89, 104
 Morton, Desmond, 105-108
 Morton, Melinda, 1062
 Morvan, Fab, 756-758
 Morze, Mark, 708
 Moseley, Winston, 369
 Muggeridge, Malcolm, 167
 Muhammad, Elijah, 359-361
 Muhammad, Prophet, 1075-1077
 Muir, Leilani, 133-136
 Mulcahey, Michael, 971
 Mulder, Connie, 543-545
 Mulroney, Brian, 830-833; and “Tunagate,” 660-662
 Munsinger, Gerda, 377-379
 Murnau, F. W., 111
 Murphree, Debra, 711
 Murphy, Annie, 779-781
 Murphy, Frank, 281
 Murphy, Peter, 779
 Murray, Alexander, 43
 Murtha, John, 563
 Mussolini, Benito, 117, 164, 213,
 231, 592, 706; and Ezra Pound,
 237
 Myers, Michael, 561-562
 Myerson, Bess, 693-695
 Nagayasu, Masayuki, 398-400
 Nagin, Ray, 1068-1072
 Nanni, Louis M., 948
 Naone, Dana, 474
 Nathan, Judith, 904-906
 Navratilova, Martina, 590
 Neel, James V., 910-912
 Nelson, Judd, 718
 Nesbit, Evelyn, 16-19
 Newton, Andrew, 531
 Ngo Dinh Diem, 362
 Ngo Dinh Nhu, 362
 Ngo Dinh Nhu, Madame, 362-365
 Nguyen Duy Trinh, 434
 Nicholson, Jack, 523
 Nifong, Mike, 1086-1089
 Nihoul, Michel, 840
 Nixon, Pat, 453-456
 Nixon, Richard, 286-288; and Spiro
 T. Agnew, 447-450; gifts received, 453-456; and Alger Hiss, 261; Nixon tapes, 428; and Pentagon Papers, 416-419; and
 Watergate, 312, 418, 425-431,
 448-449, 455, 493, 497
 Noailles, Charles de, 148
 Noailles, Marie-Laure de, 148
 Nobile, Philip, 520
 Noebel, David A., 465
 Norgrove, Jane, 789
 Normand, Mabel, 73-76, 100-102
 Norris, Clarence, 150-153
 North, Oliver, 676-681
 Norton, Rosaleen, 304-306
 Nosenko, Yuri, 347
 Novak, Robert, 1010-1013
 Oakley, Kenneth, 292-295
 Oană, Ioachim, 916-918
 Oaten, Belinda, 1084-1086
 Oaten, Mark, 1084-1086
 Obama, Barack, 701
 O’Connell, William Henry, 128
 Oelrich, Ryan, 1081
 Ogawa, Kentaro, 398-400
 O’Leary, George, 948-950
 Oliphant, Charles, 310
 O’Morain, Michael, 413
 Onassis, Jacqueline Kennedy, 694
 O’Neill, Tip, 621-624, 730
 O’Reilly, Bill, 1047-1049
 O’Reilly, Bridget, 217-219
 Ormiston, Kenneth G., 115
 Ossendowski, Anton Martynovich,
 307
 Oufkir, Mohammad, 374
 Oustric, Albert, 139-141
 Overholser, Winfred, 236
 Owen, Richard, 494-497
 Pacepa, Ion Mihai, 353
 Pach, Walter, 49-52
 Padgett, Tom, 708
 Pagnam, Fred, 55
 Pagones, Steven, 702
 Palfrey, Deborah Jeane, 1150-1153
 Palmer, Lilli, 245
 Panny, William, 580
 Panov, V. A., 309
 Papon, Maurice, 375
 Park, Tongsun, 479-482
 Park Chung Hee, 479

MODERN SCANDALS

- Parker, Alton B., 1
Parker, Dave, 666-669
Parkinson, Cecil, 631-633
Parks, Bernard, 884
Parnes, Anthony, 753-756
Parsons, Jan, 717-720
Pass, Albert, 404
Patterson, Haywood, 150-153
Patton, George S., 156
Paul, Henri, 861
Paul VI, 606
Paulino, Rolando, 942-944
Paulk, Anne, 913
Paulk, John, 913-915
Paulson, Henry, 1134-1138, 1175-1179
Peace, Purnell A., 1158
Pearson, Drew, 173-175, 248-250, 384
Pearson, Lester B., 377-379
Pelletier, David, 962-964
Pelosi, Nancy, 623, 1148
Pelossi, Giorgio, 830
Pendergast, James, 199
Pendergast, Thomas Joseph, 199-201
Penenberg, Adam, 887
Peppiatt, Angela, 696
Pereira, Fernando, 651-654
Péret, Raoul Adolphe, 139-141
Perez, Rafael Antonio, 884
Perhach, Vanessa, 865
Perkins, Tom, 1114-1118
Perla, Anthony, 568
Perla, Rocco, 568
Perrault, Roger, 868
Perry, Nancy Ling, 450
Pétain, Philippe, 209-211, 232-236
Petee, Thomas A., 1101-1103
Petrovich Semenov, Evgeni, 307
Philbin, Regis, 574, 828
Phillips, Carrie, 124
Phillips, Jud, 313
Phillips, Quanis, 1159
Phipps, Ogden Mills, 514
Pickett, John O., 901-903
Picquart, Georges, 19
Pierce, Ponchitta, 537
Pierlot, Hubert, 277
Pilatus, Rob, 756-758
Pius XII, 164, 353-355
Plame, Valerie, 1010-1013
Poindexter, John M., 676
Polanski, Roman, 522-524
Polozola, Frank, 907
Pons, Stanley, 723-726
Ponzi, Charles, 63-66
Pope, Barbara S., 785
Popoff, Elizabeth, 673
Popoff, Peter, 673-675
Poppe, Henry, 274-276
Pottinger, George, 431
Poulson, John, 431-433
Pound, Dorothy Shakespear, 236
Pound, Ezra, 236-239
Powell, Adam Clayton, Jr., 380-383
Prescott, John, 1089-1091
Pressler, Larry, 563
Pressler, Mike, 1003, 1086
Preston, Billy, 494-497
Prevert, Jacques, 148
Previn, Soon-Yi, 773-775
Price, Mike, 1002-1004
Price, Victoria, 150
Priest, Dana, 1138-1142
Prieur, Dominique, 651
Prince, Jonas, 898
Privat, Maurice, 140
Priven, Dennis, 476-478
Profumo, John, 348, 355-358, 378
Purcell, Bob, 55-58
Purviance, Edna, 100
Putin, Vladimir, 1132-1134
Qaddafi, Muammar al-, 679
Quisling, Vidkun, 226-229
Radcliffe, Cyril, 347
Rader, Stanley, 525
Răducan, Andreea, 916-918
Rahman, Kambir Abdul, 562
Raines, Howell, 998-1001
Rajneesh, Bhagwan Shree, 662-665
Ralph, Tim, 1126-1129
Ramos, Fidel V., 629
Randi, James, 673-675
Raphael, Adam, 696
Rappe, Virginia, 79-82
Rasmussen, Anders Fogh, 1075
Rather, Dan, 1022-1024, 1044-1046
Rathom, John R., 70
Rauh, Carl, 803
Rauh, Joseph L., Jr., 404-406
Ray, Elizabeth, 491-493
Reagan, Marilyn Bradshaw, 529
Reagan, Ronald; Abscam, 563; and deregulation, 945; and Environmental Protection Agency, 615-616; Iran-Contra, 312, 676-681, 780; and Ku Klux Klan, 635; at Nazi cemetery, 1110; and Religious Right, 577
Reardon, David C., 795
Red Fox, 424
Redfern, Michael, 927-930
Reed, John, 223
Reenan, Cyril, 789
Rees-Jones, Trevor, 861
Regan, Judith, 1129-1131
Reguly, Robert, 377
Reid, Wallace, 86-89
Reilly, Sidney, 105-108
Replogle, Hartley L., 68
Reubens, Paul, 765-768, 829
Revers, Georges, 257-259
Reynaud, Paul, 233
Reynolds, Don, 365-368
Rhodes, James A., 410
Rhodie, Eschel, 543
Ribbentrop, Joachim von, 197
Ribicoff, Abraham A., 384, 511
Rice-Davies, Mandy, 356
Richardson, Elliot, 447-450
Richie, Nicole, 1020
Ridenhour, Ronald, 401
Rigas, James, 971-973
Rigas, John, 971-973
Rigas, Michael, 971-973
Rigas, Timothy, 971-973
Riggs, Bobby, 589
Rivers, Eunice, 437
Riza, Iqbal, 1053-1055
Roach, Hal, 178-181
Robbins, Bruce, 837
Robert, Denis, 925-927

PERSONAGES INDEX

- Roberts, Jim, 1000
 Roberts, Seth, 978
 Robertson, Cliff, 509-511
 Robertson, Pat, 713
 Robertson, Thomas A., 534
 Robins, E. Claiborne, Sr., 459
 Robinson, Jackie, 639
 Robinson, Sir Joseph, 83
 Robinson, Walter V., 936-938
 Roche, James G., 991
 Rockefeller, Nelson A., 537-539
 Rodriguez, Marcelo, 881
 Roe Jung-hye, 1094
 Rogers, Michael, 1041-1044
 Rogers, William D., 473
 Rogge, Jacques, 962
 Roh Sung-il, 1094
 Röhm, Ernst, 11
 Roman, Ed, 274
 Rometsch, Ellen, 367
 Ronson, Gerald, 753-756
 Roosevelt, Eleanor, 159, 194, 205, 1114
 Roosevelt, Franklin D., 62, 70, 128, 155, 159, 194, 200-201; and airmail scandal, 144; and Japanese American internment, 205-209; and Ezra Pound, 236
 Roosevelt, Theodore, 1-3, 26, 50; and Joseph R. Burton, 4-6
 Rosa, John W., 1062
 Rose, Flemming, 1075-1077
 Rose, Pete, 735-738
 Roselli, John, 330
 Rosenberg, Alfred, 226, 230
 Rosoff, William L., 1050
 Ross, Andrew, 837
 Ross, Karl, 369
 Rossellini, Roberto, 263-265
 Rossellini, Roberto Ingmar, 263
 Rostenkowski, Dan, 803-806
 Rota, Robert V., 803
 Roth, Al, 274
 Rothstein, Arnold, 66-70
 Rove, Karl, 1011
 Ruckelshaus, William, 615
 Rudel, Hans-Ulrich, 503-505
 Rudge, Olga, 236
 Ruef, Abraham, 28-30
 Ruiz Massieu, José Francisco, 824-826
 Rumsfeld, Donald, 991, 1034
 Rushmore, Howard, 296
 Ryan, Thomas Fortune, 2
 Sabich, Vladimir, 485-487
 Sachs, Irving, 310-313
 Salé, Jamie, 962-964
 Salinas de Gortari, Carlos, 824-826
 Salinas de Gortari, Raúl, 824-826
 Salomon, Rick, 1019-1021
 Salter, Roberta Semple, 115
 Samuel, Herbert, 43
 Sancha, Antonia de, 792
 Sanchez, Ricardo, 1034-1038
 Santoni, Mimi, 456-459
 Sapina, Ante, 1055-1058
 Sarsgaard, Peter, 888
 Sarti, Adolfo, 591-593
 Sasso, Anthony P., 1155
 Satterlee, Peggy, 202-205
 Saud, Sultan bin Abdul Aziz al-, 453
 Saunders, Ernest, 753-756
 Sawyer, Charles E., 89
 Sawyer, Steve, 651-654
 Schatten, Gerald, 1094-1097
 Scheer, Robert, 497
 Scheuer, Sandra, 410-413
 Schindel, Robert, 1109
 Schledwitz, Karl A., 649
 Schlesinger, James, 1034
 Schmidlapp, W. Horace, 246
 Schmidt, Hermann, 503-505
 Schmitz, Eugene E., 28-30
 Schmitz, John G., 603-605
 Schmitz, Joseph E., 605
 Schön, Jan Hendrik, 980-982
 Schreiber, Belle, 52
 Schreiber, Karlheinz, 830-833
 Schreuder, Frances, 528-530
 Schreuder, Marc, 528
 Schrock, Edward, 1041-1044
 Schroeder, William, 410-413
 Schwartzkoppen, Max von, 20
 Schwarzenegger, Arnold, 1016-1019
 Schwebel, Stephen M., 1039
 Schwimmer, Harry I., 310-313
 Scott, Ian, 1112
 Scott, Norman, 531-534
 Secord, Richard V., 676
 Selbekk, Vebjørn, 1075-1077
 Seles, Monica, 814
 Selig, Bud, 1058
 Seligmann, Reade, 1086
 Sentelle, David B., 818
 Sevigny, Chloë, 1004-1007
 Sévigny, Pierre, 377-379
 Shalala, Donna, 1141
 Shanley, Paul, 954
 Sharpton, Al, 702-705, 1142
 Shaw, Artie, 317
 Shaw, Steven, 673
 Sheehan, Neil, 416
 Sheela, Ma Anand, 662-665
 Sheldon, Jackie, 55-58
 Sheppard, William Henry, 32
 Sherwood, Carlton, 597-599
 Shinto, Hisashi, 714-717
 Short, Clare, 995-998
 Shriver, Maria, 1016
 Shuler, Robert P., 117
 Siebert, Tara, 717-720
 Siegelman, Don, 909
 Signorini, Fernando, 816
 Sikharulidze, Anton, 962-964
 Sills, Beverly, 694
 Silvey, Joyce, 509
 Simpson, Nicole Brown, 806-809
 Simpson, O. J., 806-812, 1129-1131
 Simpson, Tom, 1103
 Simpson, Wallis, 187-190, 196-198, 213
 Sin, Jaime, 629
 Sinatra, Frank, 329
 Sinclair, Harry F., 95-99
 Sindona, Michele, 591, 606-609
 Singer, Isaac Merritt, 34
 Singer, Paris, 34-36
 Singer, Patrick, 34
 Sisson, Edgar, 307-310
 Skilling, Jeffrey, 945-948
 Slaton, Lewis, 717
 Slotnick, Barry, 641
 Smith, Jesse W., 92-95
 Smith, Lonnie, 666

MODERN SCANDALS

- Smith, Thomas Daniel, 431
 Smith, William Kennedy, 759-762, 866
 Smuts, Jan, 84
 Snyder, John W., Jr., 785
 Sohn, Lydia L., 980
 Sokal, Alan, 837-840
 Solomon, Paul M., 980
 Soltysik, Patricia, 450
 Sorensen, Larry, 667
 Sosa, Sammy, 1058
 Spaak, Paul-Henri, 276-279
 Spano, John A., Jr., 901-903
 Speaker, Tris, 118-121
 Spence, Wishart, 377
 Spitzer, Eliot L., 1013-1016, 1050-1052, 1167-1170
 Spitzer, Silda Wall, 1167
 Sprague, Richard, 404
 Sprague, Robert, 720-723
 Springer, Jerry, 828
 Stacpoole, Michael, 696-698
 Stalin, Joseph, 106, 167-169; and picture forgery, 811
 Stammberger, Wolfgang, 349
 Stanford, Karin, 895
 Stanley, David, 687
 Stanley, Henry Morton, 31-33
 Stansel, Mary E., 821
 Stant, Shane, 812
 Stark, Ray, 509
 Starr, Kenneth, 818-821, 874-878
 Stavisky, Alexandre, 170-172
 Stearns, Cliff, 1116
 Stein, Gertrude, 51
 Stempel, Herb, 326-329
 Stennis, John, 384
 Stent, Julia, 798-800
 Stern, David, 1172-1175
 Stern, Howard, 828
 Sternberg, Saul, 978
 Stevenson, Andrew, 852
 Stewart, Harold, 223-225
 Stewart, Martha, 1031-1034
 Stiglitz, Joseph E., 1176
 Stimson, Henry L., 205
 Stoker, Bram, 111-114
 Stoker, Florence, 111-114
 Stokes, Louis, 621
 Stompanato, Johnny, 317-319
 Stonehouse, John, 468-470
 Storer, George, 335-337
 Stramm, August, 76-79
 Strauss, Franz Josef, 349-352
 Stringer, C. Vivian, 1142
 Stuckle, Carla, 603-605
 Studds, Gerry, 621-624
 Suer, Oral, 1028-1030
 Sullivan, Joseph, 66
 Sullivan, Shannon, 1081-1083
 Suskind, Richard, 422-425
 Swaggart, Jimmy, 711-714, 1152
 Swanson, Gloria, 127-130
 Sweeney, Constance M., 954
 Sweeney, James, 568
 Sweet, Robert W., 1039
 Sykes, Roberta, 852
 Taft, William Howard, 46
 Taguba, Antonio, 1034-1038
 Takeoka, Toshiki, 919-921
 Takeshita, Noboru, 714-717, 733-735
 Talmadge, Betty, 553
 Talmadge, Herman E., 553-555
 Talmadge, Robert S., 553
 Tanaka, Kakuei, 482-485
 Tanaka, Tsutomu, 398-400
 Tardieu, André, 139-141
 Tarleton, Donald, 511
 Tarnower, Herman, 565-567
 Tate, Sharon, 246, 522
 Taylor, Norman, 1028-1030
 Taylor, Tony, 1158
 Taylor, William Desmond, 73-76, 88
 Teets, Peter B., 991
 Teilhard de Chardin, Pierre, 293, 457
 Temple, Tracey, 1089-1091
 Terboven, Josef, 226
 Teti, Raffaello, 889
 Thamel, Pete, 1101
 Thatcher, Margaret, 645-647, 696, 792, 798; and Edwina Currie, 983; and Cecil Parkinson, 631-633; and Westland Aircraft, 645-647
 Thaw, Harry Kendall, 16-19
 Thomas, Clarence, 768-772
 Thomas, Frank, 431
 Thomas, J. Parnell, 248-250, 260
 Thomas, James Henry, 181-184
 Thomas, Sir Leslie, 181
 Thompson, Frank, 561-562
 Thompson, Hugh, Jr., 401
 Thompson, Margaret W., 133
 Thomsen, Ian, 942
 Thornburgh, Dick, 684
 Thorpe, Franklyn, 184-187
 Thorpe, Jeremy, 531-534
 Thrasher, Donald, 1020
 Thring, G. Herbert, 111
 Thurmond, Strom, 384, 988-991, 1022-1024
 Tiedge, Hans-Joachim, 657-659
 Tierney, Patrick, 910-912
 Tilden, Bill, 239-242
 Tillman, Benjamin, 3
 Timony, James, 122
 Tiriach, Ion, 916
 Tisa, Benedict, 609
 Tobias, Randall L., 1151
 Todd, Thelma, 178-181
 Tokes, Laszlo, 742-745
 Tolstoy, Ilia, 130-133
 Tomasz, 1084-1086
 Topping, Henry, 317
 Tower, John, 384
 Trandahl, Jeff, 1118-1120
 Trevenar, Bert, 304-306
 Trevor-Roper, Hugh, 618
 Trindle, Renee, 991
 Triola, Michelle, 540-542
 Tripp, Linda, 874-878
 Trotsky, Leon, 106, 226
 Truman, Harry S., 8, 989, 1023; and T. Lamar Caudle, 280; and Matthew J. Connelly, 310-313; and Douglas MacArthur, 175; and Joseph McCarthy, 266-270; and Thomas Joseph Pendergast, 199-201
 Trungpa, Chögyam, 474-476
 Tryforos, Lynne, 565
 Tuberville, Tommy, 1101-1103
 Turcotte, Jean-Claude, 892-895

PERSONAGES INDEX

- Turnbull, Sandy, 55
 Turner, Lana, 317-319
 Twain, Mark, 33
 Tyler, Nancy Carole, 365
 Tyson, Mike, 703
- Ueberroth, Peter, 556, 666-669, 737
 Ullman, Harlan K., 1151
 Ulmer, Walter F., 488
 Uno, Sosuke, 733-735
 Us, Gonca, 843
- Vander Schaaf, Derek, 785
 Vassall, John, 347-349
 Vaughn, Kia, 1142
 Velzen, Dick van, 927-930, 936-938
 Ver, Fabian, 628
 Vermeersch, Arthur, 33
 Vick, Michael, 1158-1161
 Vincent, Fay, 735-738
 Vitter, David, 1150-1153
 Volcker, Paul, 858-861, 1053-1055
 Von Eschenbach, Andrew C., 1097
 Vorster, B. J., 543-545
- Wade, Mitchell, 1064
 Wagner, Robert F., 40-43
 Wakeman, Nancy, 386-388
 Wakeman, William T., 386-388
 Waksal, Samuel D., 1031-1034
 Waldheim, Kurt, 669-672
 Wałęsa, Lech, 1111
 Walker, Margaret, 520
 Wallace, George, 604
 Wallace, Mike, 424, 833-836
 Walsh, Matt, 1161
 Walsh, Thomas J., 95
 Walters, Walter W., 156-160
 Ward, Stephen, 355-358
 Warner, Ed, 274
 Warren, Earl, 380-383, 393
- Washington, Claudell, 667
 Washington, George, 938
 Washington-Williams, Essie Mae, 1022-1024
 Watkins, Harold Cole, 193-195
 Watkins, Sherron, 945-948
 Wehner, Herbert, 503
 Wehner, John, 626
 Weida, John A., 1062-1064
 Weidenreich, Franz, 292-295
 Weidner, Clinton, 1072-1074
 Weightman, George W., 1138-1142
 Weinberg, Melvin, 561
 Weinberger, Caspar, 676
 Weiner, Joseph, 292
 Weinstein, Bernard, 840
 Weinstein, Michael L., 1062-1064
 Welch, Joseph Nye, 266-270
 Welles, Orson, 110, 165, 254
 Wesson, Marianne, 1156
 West, Enoch, 55
 West, James E., 1081-1083
 West, Mae, 122-124
 West, Roland, 178-181
 Westmoreland, William, 937
 Whalen, Robert P., 546
 Whaley, Arthur, 55
 White, Kevin, 948
 White, Stanford, 16-19
 Widnall, Sheila, 855-858
 Wiesenthal, Simon, 669-672
 Wigand, Jeffrey, 833-836
 Wilcox, Breckenridge, 720
 Wilkes, Brent, 1064
 William II, 9-12
 Williams, Edward Bennett, 365, 368
 Williams, George Washington, 32
 Williams, Harrison A., 561
 Williams, Lefty, 66-70
 Williams, Vanessa, 382, 638-641
 Wills, Frank, 425
- Willson, Henry, 295-298
 Wilson, David, 597
 Wilson, Harold, 468-470
 Wilson, Helen Dolan, 597
 Wilson, Howard, 898-901
 Wilson, Joseph, 1010-1013
 Windsor, Duke of, 187-190, 196-198, 213
 Witt, Robert, 1002-1004
 Wittig, David, 1072-1074
 Wolf, Markus, 657
 Wolfson, Louis, 389-391
 Woodward, Arthur Smith, 292-295
 Woodward, Bob, 425-431
 Wörner, Manfred, 503
 Wright, Betty, 730
 Wright, Jim, 730-732
 Wright, Roy, 150-153
 Wronker-Flatow, Manfred, 111
- Yablonski, Joseph, 404-406
 Yaeger, Don, 1002-1004
 Yamamoto, Taku, 1145
 Yancy, Allen, 142-144
 Yasui, Minoru, 205
 Yellow Robe, Chauncey, 130
 Yeo, Tim, 798-800
 Yoshinaga, Yusuke, 714-717
 Young, Andrew, 634
 Younger, George, 83
- Zamsky, Linda, 933
 Zedillo Ponce de León, Ernesto, 824-826
 Zheng Xiaoyu, 1097-1100
 Zigo, Marc, 855-858
 Zihlman, Frederick N., 103
 Zimbardo, Philip, 420-422
 Zinovyev, Grigory Yevseyevich, 106, 108-111
 Zola, Émile, 19-22
 Zwicker, Ralph W., 266-270

SUBJECT INDEX

- A. H. Robins Company, 459-462
Aaliyah, 1170
ABA. See American Bar Association
Abe, Shinzo, 1145-1147
Aberdeen Proving Ground, 992
Abernathy, Ralph, 740
Abetz, Otto, 210
Abscam, 561-564
Abu Ghraib prison, 340, 421, 1034-1038
Academia. See Category Index under Cultural and intellectual history; Education
Adams, Elmer Bragg, 4
Adams, Michael F., 968
Adams, Sherman, 320-322
Adelphia Communications, 971-973
Adenauer, Konrad, 349-352
Adjusted Compensation Payment Act of 1936, 159
Adomitis, Daniel J., 1078-1080
Africa. See Geographical Index
Aga Khan III, 254
Ağar, Mehmet, 843
Agee, William, 580-582
Agnew, Spiro T., 455; resignation of vice presidency, 447-450, 454
Agrava Fact-Finding Commission, 602
Agusta scandal, 889-892
AHA. See American Historical Association
Ahlers, Conrad, 349-352
AIG (American International Group), 1176
Air Canada scandal, 830-833
Air Force, U.S.; and Kelly Flinn, 855-858
Air Force Academy, U.S., 802, 855, 991-994, 1062-1064; sexual harassment, 993
Air Mail Act of 1930, 144-147
Air National Guard, 1044-1046
Airbus affair, 830-833
Airmail scandal, 144-147
Akagi, Norihiko, 1145
Albania, 846-849
Albert, Carl, 479
Albert, Laura, 424
Albert, Marv, 865-868
Alberta, Canada; Brownlee scandal, 176-178; sterilization law, 133-136
Alcatraz Island, 434
Alcorn, Meade, 320
Alder Hey inquiry, 927-930
Algeria, 212-214; Sand Wars, 374
Allard, Wayne, 991-994
Allen, Bob, 1153-1155
Allen, George, 989
Allen, Herbert, Jr., 509
Allen, Joseph C., 63
Allen, Woody, 773-775
Allende, Salvador, 482
Almonte, Danny, 942-944
Almonte, Felipe, 942
al-Qaeda, 1011
AMA. See American Medical Association
Amazon measles epidemic, 910-912
Ambassador College, 525
Ambrose, Stephen E., 951-953, 959
American Anthropological Association, 911
American Bank and Trust Company, 637
American Bar Association, 769
American Christian College, 465-467
American Historical Association, 937, 952, 960
American Independent Party, 604
American Medical Association, 194
American Psychiatric Association, 506
American Psychological Association, 506
American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers, 333
Ancia, Véronique, 889
Andalusian Dog, An (film), 136-139, 147
Anderson, Jack, 175, 384
Anderson, Pamela, 1020
Andrews, Julie, 612-614
Angeli, Claude, 550
Angelus Temple, 115
Animal cruelty, 1158-1161
Annan, Kofi, 995-998, 1039-1041, 1053-1055
Anslinger, Harry J., 251
Antibiotics, 193, 438, 911
Anti-Doping Agency, U.S., 1165
Anti-Semitism, 44, 147-150, 603, 694, 705-708; at Air Force Academy, 1062; Austrian, 671; and Alfred Dreyfus, 19-22; and Errol Flynn, 560; French, 211, 235; and Mel Gibson, 1106-1109; and Jesse Jackson, 633-636; and Richard Nixon, 429; Russian, 309
Aquino, Benigno, Jr., 628-630
Aquino, Corazón, 628
Arafat, Yasser, 634
Arbuckle, Fatty, 79-82, 88, 100, 186
Archaeology, 292-295, 919-921
Archer, Jeffrey, 696-698
Archibald, Robert W., 46-48
Arena, Dominick James, 395
Argentina, 815-818
Arming America (Bellesiles), 985-988
Armitage, Richard, 1010-1013
Armory Modern Art Show, 49-52
Armstrong, Garner Ted, 525-528
Armstrong, Herbert W., 525-528
Armstrong, Lance, 1104
Armstrong, Robert, 645
Army, U.S.; military police, 1036

MODERN SCANDALS

- Arnold, Ervin, 70-72
 Aronowitz, Stanley, 837
 Art movements. See Category Index
 Artists' Front to Win the War, 221
 Arvizo, Gavin, 1025-1027
 Asia. See Geographical Index
 Asquith, H. H., 43-46, 58-60
 Association of American Painters and Sculptors, 49
 Astor, Mary, 184-187
 Atherton, Edwin, 191-193
 Atherton Report, 191-193
 Atkinson, Rick, 633
 Atrocities and war crimes. See Category Index
 Attell, Abe, 67
 Auberge Grand-Mère scandal, 898-901
 Augstein, Rudolf, 349-352
 Australasia. See Geographical Index
 Australian Broadcasting Commission, 305
 Austria, 197, 669-672
Autobiography of Malcolm X, The (Haley), 521
 Automobile safety; Ford Pinto, 594-596; tires, 534-536
 "Axis Sally," 435
 Aylwin, Patricio, 1121-1123

 Babbitt, Bruce, 873
 Bacanovic, Peter, 1031-1034
 Bachelet, Michelle, 1121-1123
 Backes, Ernest, 925-927
 Bad Newz Kennels, 1158-1161
 Baels, Lilian, 276-279
 Bailey, Charles W., 175
 Bailouts, 1175-1179
 Baker, Bobby, 365-368
 Baker, Scott, 861
 Baker, Terence, 696
 Bakker, Jim, 690-693
 Bakker, Tammy Faye, 690-693
 Balanchine, George, 528
 Baldwin, Stanley, 187-190

 Ball, Edward, 521
 Ball, George L., 636
 "Banagate," 471-473
 Banco Ambrosiano, 606-609
Band of Brothers (television), 951
 Bank fraud; and Adelphia Communications, 971-973; and Jake Butcher, 648-650; and Linda Jones Medlar, 873; and John Spano, 903
 Bank of Albania, 846-849
 Bank robbery, 450-453
 Banking and finance. See Category Index
 Banque Oustric et Cie, 139-141
 Barclay, Arthur, 142
 Baring, Sir Evelyn, 298-301
 Barker, Frank A., 401
 Barker, Lex, 317
 Barnes, Fred, 951
 Barnett, Marilyn, 588-591
 Barrett, David M., 872-874
 Barron, Clarence, 63
 Barrows, Sydney, 654-657
 Barry, Joan, 220, 283
 Barry, Marion, 748-750
 Baseball; and drugs, 666-669; and gambling, 242-244, 556-558, 735-738; game fixing, 66-70, 118-121, 398-400; Steve Garvey, 574-577; Japanese, 398-400; Little League, 942-944; Major League Baseball Players Association, 1058; and steroids, 1058-1061, 1162
 Basketball, 865; Kobe Bryant, 1008-1010; college, 274-276, 950, 968-970, 1142-1144; and gambling, 243, 1003, 1172-1175; game fixing, 274-276, 568-570; professional, 1008-1010, 1172-1175
 Bates, Alfred, 181
 Bates, Ruby, 150
 Batista y Zaldívar, Fulgencio, 560
 Batlogg, Bertram J. R., 980
 Battista, James, 1173
Battle Hymn (film), 252
 Baudouin I, 276-279

 Bauman, Robert E., 577-579
 Bayley, John, 852-854
 BBC. See British Broadcasting Corporation
 Beall, George, 447-450
 Bear Stearns, 1178
 Beasley, Malcolm R., 980
 Beasley Report, 981
 Beatles, 494-497
 Beaudoin, François, 898
 Beck, Dave, 323-325
 Bedaux, Charles, 196, 212-214
 Bedaux, Fern, 212
 "Begelgate," 509-511
 Begelman, David, 509-511
 Belgium. See Geographical Index
 Belichick, Bill, 1161-1163
 Bell, Alexander Graham, biography of, 879-881
 Bell, Griffin, 636
 Bellesiles, Michael A., 985-988
 Belloc, Hilaire, 44
 Belmont Park Raceway, 514-516
Beloved (Morrison), 521
 Ben Barka, Mehdi, 374-376
 Bendix Corporation, 580-582
 Benedict XVI, 954
 Bengzon, Cesar, 601
 Bennett, Robert S., 803
 Berezhnaya, Elena, 962-964
 Berezovsky, Boris, 1132-1134
 Bergman, Ingrid, 263-265
 Bergman, Lowell, 833
 Berisha, Sali, 846-849
 Berlin Conference of 1884-1885, 31
 Berlusconi, Silvio, 591, 1092-1094
 Bern, Paul, 160-163
 Bernanke, Ben, 1134-1138, 1175-1179
 Bernardin, Joseph Louis, 597
 Bernhard, Prince of Lippe-Biesterfeld, 482
 Bernstein, Carl, 425-431
 Berra, Dale, 666-669
 Berry, Sidney B., 488-490
 Berry, William, 514
 Besen, Wayne, 913
 "Bess mess," 693-695

SUBJECT INDEX

- Betting Houses Act of 1853, 56
 Bettman, Gary, 901-903
 Biden, Joe, 698-701
 "Billygate," 573
 Bingham, Barry, Sr., 60-62
 Bingham, Mary Lily Kenan, 60-62
 Bingham, Robert Worth, 60-62
 Birmingham, Joseph, 954
 Birth disorders, 135, 301-304, 434, 548
 Bjelke-Petersen, Johannes, 682
 Black, Eli M., 471-473
 Black, Hugo L., 418
 Black, Roy, 865
 Black Mist scandal, 398-400
 Black Sox scandal, 66-70, 120-121, 399-400, 556, 737, 1172
 Blaesing, Elizabeth Ann, 124-127
 Blair, Jayson, 888, 998-1001
 Blair, Tony, 1089-1091
 Blanco, Kathleen Babineaux, 1068-1072
 Blaney, Neil, 413-415
 Blix, Hans, 995-998
 Blood, tainted, 868-871
 Bluitgen, Kåre, 1075-1077
 Bobbitt, John Wayne, 795-797
 Bobbitt, Lorena, 795-797
 Bodkin, Archibald, 12
 Boesky, Ivan, 726-729, 753-756
 Bokassa, Jean-Bédél, 550-552
 Boland, Kevin, 413-415
 Bolshevik revolution. See Russian Revolution
 "Bonus Army," 156-160
 Boone, Pat, 500-502
 Borer, Thomas, 858
 Bork, Robert, 680
 Borman, Frank, 488
 Borman Commission, 488-490
 Boston; James Michael Curley, 6-9
 Boston College, 1102; basketball scandal, 275, 568-570
Boston Globe, 936-938, 954-958, 998
 Bouchard, Lucien, 892-895
 Boudreaux, Lori, 1002-1004
 Bowles, Andrew Parker, 745
 Bowles, Camilla Parker, 745-747, 791
 Bowman, Patricia, 759-762
 Boxing, 52-55, 93; Tonya Harding, 814
 Boyd, Gerald, 998-1001
 Boyd, James, 384
 Boyle, W. A., 404-406
 Bradley, Anne, 22-25
 Bradshaw, Berenice Jewett, 528-530
 Bradshaw, Franklin James, 528-530
 Brady, Matthew A., 79, 191-193
 Brady, Roger, 1062
 Brawley, Tawana, 702-705
 Breen, Joseph, 163
 Brennan, Christine, 814
 Breton, André, 136, 147
 Breton, Sonia Rojas, 942
 Breuning, Stephen, 720-723
 "Bribe menu" and Duke Cunningham, 1066
 Bribery, 103, 569; Spiro T. Agnew, 447-450; Australian police, 681-683; "Bananagate," 471-473; Belgian politicians, 889-892; Joseph R. Burton, 4-6; and campaign contributions, 1; T. Lamar Caudle, 279-282; Congress members, 562, 583, 1064-1067, 1147-1150; Randall Cunningham, 1064-1067; Budd Dwyer, 684-686; Albert Fall, 125; Abe Fortas, 391-394; Valéry Giscard d'Estaing, 550-552; Iraqi government, 1039; Japanese politicians, 715; William J. Jefferson, 1147-1150; "Koreagate," 479-482; Lockheed Corporation, 482-485; Bess Myerson, 693-695; and payola, 333; John Poulson, 431-433; Eugene E. Schmitz, 28-30; Jesse W. Smith, 92-95; soccer players, 1056; and Teapot Dome scandal, 98; Harrison A. Williams, 562; Louis Wolfson, 390. See also Payola scandal; Point shaving in basketball
 Bricmont, Jean, 837
 Bridgestone Firestone, 1078-1080
 Briggs, John V., 507
Bright Tunes Music v. Harrisongs Music (1976), 495
 British Broadcasting Corporation, 187, 532-533, 560
 Brittan, Leon, 645-647
 Britton, Nan, 124-127
 Broadcast Music, Inc., 333
 Broadway theater, 122-124, 246, 353, 386, 434
 Brodhead, Richard H., 1086
 Brominski, Bernard C., 397
 Bronson, Charles, 642
 Brooks, Louise Cromwell, 173
 Brooks, Stephen K., 401
 Brown, Arthur, 22-25
 Brown, David D., IV, 1050-1052
 Brown, Denise, 1129
 Brown, Divine, 827-829
 Brown, Michael D., 1068-1072
 Brown, Ronald H., 873
 Brown, Walter Folger, 144-147
Brown Bunny, The (film), 1004-1007
Brown v. Board of Education (1954), 208
 Brownlee, John Edward, 176-178
 Bruce, Robert V., 879
 Bryan, William Jennings, 1
 Bryant, Anita, 506-509
 Bryant, Kobe, 1008-1010
 Bryant, Vanessa, 1008
 Brzak, Cynthia, 1039-1041
 Bucak, Sedat, 843-845
 Buckey, Peggy Ann, 624
 Buckey, Peggy McMartin, 624
 Buckey, Raymond, 624
 Buckley, Sheila, 468-470
 Buddhism; and self-immolation, 362-365; and Chögyam Trungpa, 474-476; in Vietnam, 362-365
 Buena Vista oil reserves, 96
 Buffalo Child Long Lance, 130-133
Buffalo '66 (film), 1005
 Bundesliga scandal of 2005, 1055-1058

MODERN SCANDALS

- Buñuel, Luis, 136-139, 147-150
 Burden, William Douglas, 130-133
 Bureau of Internal Revenue; and T. Lamar Caudle, 279-282; and Tom Pendergast, 200; and Irving Sachs, 311. See also Internal Revenue Service
 Burgaud, Fabrice, 922
 Burke, James, 568-570
 Burkett, Bill, 1044
 Burns, William J., 28, 60
 Burton, Joseph R., 4-6
 Bush, George H. W., 208, 762, 787, 888; Iran-Contra, 678; and Clarence Thomas, 768-772
 Bush, George W.; and Hurricane Katrina, 1068-1072; insider trading investigation, 762-765; and Iraq, 1011; and Trent Lott, 988-991; military service of, 1044-1046
 Business. See Category Index
 Business Development Bank of Canada, 898
 Butcher, Cecil H., Jr., 648-650
 Butcher, Sir Herbert, 431
 Butcher, Jake, 648-650
 Butler, Carrie, 1022-1024
 Butler, Smedley, 156
 Butt, Sir Alfred, 181-184
 Buttafuoco, Joey, 781-784
 Buttafuoco, Mary Jo, 781-784
 Butterfield, Alexander, 428
 Butz, Earl L., 500-502
 Buxton, Peter, 437
 Byrnes, Jack, 274-276
- Cabey, Darrell, 641
 Cabon, Christine Huguette, 651
 Cachet, 654
 Caldwell, John, 176
 Calhoun, John, 449
 Calhoun, Rory, 295-298
 Calley, William, 401-404
 Calvi, Roberto, 591, 606-609
 Cameron, Lucille, 52
 "Camillagate," 745-747
 Campaign contributions, 1, 93, 388, 482, 1167; and bribery, 1; foreign, 481, 875; illegal, 286-288, 384-386; Richard Nixon, 454; Herman E. Talmadge, 553-555. See also Presidential campaigns
 Campbell, Helen, 248
 Campbell, John, 974
 Campbell, Judith, 329-332
 Campbell, Walter, 193
 Canada. See Geographical Index
 Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, 378, 660-662, 978
 Canary Capital Partners, 1013-1016
 Canseco, José, 1058-1061
 Capasso, Carl, 693-695
 Capital City Bank, 1073
 Cardin, Lucien, 377-379
 Carey, Hugh Leo, 546
 Carmen, Leon, 852-854
 Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, 259
 Carroll, John, 1016
 Carson, Clayborne, 739-741
 Carson, Rachel, 547
 Carter, Billy, 571-574
 Carter, Jimmy, 546; and Billy Carter, 571-574; and "Koreagate," 479-482; and Bert Lance, 511-514, 571; personal confessions, 497-500
 Cartoons, 11, 140, 378, 498, 828, 1108, 1154; of Prophet Muhammad, 1075-1077
 Cary, Walter E., 104
 Casement, Roger, 31-33
 Casey, Eamonn, 779-781
 Casey, Robert P., 684
 Casey, William J., 676
 Cassone, Michelle, 759
 Castle, Barbara, 298
 Castro, Fidel, 331, 560
 Catholic Church. See Roman Catholic Church
 Catholic Youth Organization of Brooklyn, 243
 Çatli, Abdullah, 843-845
- Cattier, Félicien, 33
 Caudle, T. Lamar, 279-282, 310-313
 CBC. See Canadian Broadcasting Corporation
 Ceaușescu, Nicolae, 742-745
 Cecil, Robert, 142-144
 Cedarbaum, Miriam Goldman, 1031
 Cedel International, 925
 Celler, Emanuel, 380
 Censorship in film, 165
 Central African Republic, 550
 Central and South America. See Geographical Index
 Central Intelligence Agency, Korean, 479
 Central Intelligence Agency, U.S., 376, 670, 1067; and Cuba, 426; and Guatemala, 471; Robert Hanssen, 931-933; Iran-Contra scandal, 676-681; and Iraq, 1010-1013, 1035; and Italy, 592; Valerie Plame, 1010-1013
 Cerrini, Daniel, 815-818
 Chagnon, Napoleon A., 910-912
 Chamberlain, Neville, 182
 Chambers, Whittaker, 259-262
 Chandler, Happy, 242-244
 Chandra, Ranjit Kumar, 977-979
 Chaplin, Charles, 108, 283-285; paternity suit, 220-222
 Chaplin, Oona O'Neill, 220, 283-285
 Chappaquiddick incident, 367, 394-398
 Charles, Count of Flanders, 277
 Charles, Prince of Wales, 745-747, 789-792
 Charles, Suzette, 638
 Chautemps, Camille, 170-172
 Chavis, Benjamin, 821-823
 "Checkers" speech (Nixon), 286-288
 Chemical waste in Love Canal, 548
 Cheney, Dick, 1012
 Cherkashin, Victor, 931
 Cherkasky, Michael G., 1050
 Cheshire, Maxine, 453

SUBJECT INDEX

- Chesterton, Cecil, 43-46
 Chiapel, Tom, 638
 Chiappe, Jean, 170-172
 Chicago White Sox, 66-70, 399, 557, 737
Chien Andalou, Un (film), 136-139
 Child abuse, 841; and Joan Crawford, 517-519; false allegations, 625; in France, 922-924; and Michael Jackson, 1025-1027; and Ernest Jones, 12-15; at McMartin Preschool, 624-627; and Rajneesh movement, 664; and Roman Catholic priests, 954-958. See also Pornography, child
 Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act of 1974, 625
 Childers, Thomas, 951
 Chile, 482, 1121-1123
 Childeportes, 1121-1123
 China; and Richard Nixon, 603; nuclear weapons, 373; pet food scandal, 1097
 Chomsky, Noam, 1156
 Choynski, Joe, 53
 Chrétien, Jean, 898-901
 Christensen, Hayden, 888
 Christian Crusade, 465
 Christian Gospel Mission, 939
 Christy, Cuthbert, 142
 Christy Commission, 142-144
 Chung Un-chan, 1094-1097
 Church, Frank, 482
 Churchill, Ward, 1155-1158
 CIA. See Central Intelligence Agency
 Cicotte, Eddie, 66-70
 Ciller, Tansu, 843
 Cinquanta, Ottavio, 962
 Cisneros, Henry, 872-874
 Citigroup, 1176
Citizen Kane (film), 165
 Citizenship, 283, 377-379
 Citizenship Education Fund, 896
 Civil Liberties Act (1988), 208
 Civil Rights Act of 1964, 989
 Civil rights and liberties. See Category Index
 Civiletti, Benjamin, 571
 Claes, Willy, 889-890
 Clark, Dick, 332-335
 Clark, Helen, 974-977, 1112-1114
 Clark, Joe, 898-901
 Clark, Taliaferro, 437-440
 Clark, Thomas C., 279-282
 Clearstream International, 925-927
 Clements, Bill, 687-689
 Clinton, Bill; and Henry Cisneros, 872-873; impeachment, 874-878, 988; and Jesse Jackson, 896; and Monica Lewinsky, 126, 820, 874-878, 896, 1168; Lewinsky affair confession, 876; pardons of, 452, 805; and Tuskegee Syphilis Study, 439; and Whitewater investigation, 818-821
 Clinton, Hillary Rodham, 874, 904-905, 1114; and Eliot Spitzer, 1169; and Whitewater investigation, 818-821
 Cloning, 1094-1097
 CNET, 1116-1117
 Coaches; baseball, 243, 400, 557; basketball, 968-970, 1172; football, 687-689, 948-950, 1002-1004, 1101-1103, 1161-1163; lacrosse, 1086-1089; track and field, 1165
 Cobb, Ernie, 568
 Cobb, Ty, 118-121
 Cochran, Johnnie, 808
 Cochran, W. E., 5
 Cody, John Patrick, 597-599
 Cody, Lew, 102
 Cody, Richard, 1140
 Coelho, Tony, 732
 Coghlan, Monica, 696-698
 Cold fusion, 723-726
 Cold War; and film industry, 251; and Germany, 657-659; and McCarthyism, 266-270; and Soviet espionage, 259; and Vietnam, 258. See also Communism; Communist Party; Soviet Union
 Coleman, Milton, 633
 Collingsworth, Terry, 1078-1080
 Colonialism and imperialism. See Category Index
 Colosio, Luis Donaldo, 824-826
 Comerica Bank, 902
 Comiskey, Charles, 66-70
 Commission on Care for America's Returning Wounded Warriors, 1141
 Commission on Wartime Relocation and Internment of Civilians, 207
 Committee on Public Information, 307, 309
 Commodity Futures Modernization Act of 2000, 1177
 Common Cause, 731
Commonwealth v. Buckley (1909), 26
 Communications Act of 1934, 329, 334, 336
 Communications and media. See Category Index
 Communism; and Christian fundamentalism, 465; in Nicaragua, 676-681; in Romania, 742-745; Soviet, 167-169, 307-310; Vietnamese, 257-259, 362; "witch hunts," 266-270. See also Cold War; KGB; Soviet Union
 Communist International, 106
 Communist Party, 105-108; and Bonus Army, 158; and Charles Chaplin, 220, 284; and government infiltration, 259-262; and J. Edgar Hoover, 220; Italian, 591; outlawing of, 259; and "Scottsboro Boys," 152. See also Cold War
 Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act of 1980, 549, 615-617
 Concepcion, Roberto, 601
 Condit, Gary, 933-936
Confidential magazine, 295-298
 Congo Free State, 31-33

MODERN SCANDALS

- Congo Reform Association, 32-33
Congress, U.S.; Robert E. Bauman, 577-579; Black Caucus, 1148; Joseph R. Burton, 4-6; and Bill Clinton, 874-878, 988; Randall Cunningham, 1064-1067; Thomas J. Dodd, 384-386; Mark Foley, 1118-1120; Wayne L. Hays, 491-493; William J. Jefferson, 1147-1150; and "Koreagate," 479-482; Trent Lott, 988-991; Wilbur D. Mills, 462-465; and Navy, 70-72; page sex scandal, 621-624; and payola, 332-335; Post Office scandal, 803-806; Adam Clayton Powell, Jr., 380-383; Dan Rostenkowski, 803-806; Edward Schrock, 1041-1044; Special Committee to Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce, 270-273; steroid investigation, 1058-1061; and Herman E. Talmadge, 553-555; J. Parnell Thomas, 248-250; David Vitter, 1150-1153; Jim Wright, 730-732. See also House Committee on Government Reform; House Committee on Standards of Official Conduct; House Committee on Un-American Activities
Congress of Vienna, 277
Connelly, Matthew J., 281, 310-313
Connolly, Cyril, 136
Conrad, Joseph, 32
Constable, Anne, 465
Conte, Victor, 1164-1166
Contergan (drug), 301
Continental Enterprise, 389-391
Contraceptive, 459-462
Cooke, Janet, 585-588
Coolidge, Calvin, 104, 200; and Teapot Dome scandal, 95-99
Cools, André, 889-892
Cooper, Isabel, 173-175
Copp, Harley, 594
Cornell, Julien, 236
"Corngate," 974-977
"Correcting the Record: Times Reporter Who Resigned Leaves Long Trail of Deception" (May 11, 2003), 1000 Corruption. See Category Index
Cortelyou, George B., 1
Cosby, Bill, 703
Cosgrave, Liam, 413
Costa Rica, 473
Coughlin, Paula, 785
Countess from Hong Kong, A (film), 285
Countrywide Financial Corporation, 1134-1138, 1176
Courlander, Harold, 520-522, 525-528
Cox, Archibald, 428
Cox, Tricia Nixon, 453
Crader, Bo, 959
Cramer, Clayton E., 985
Crane, Cheryl, 317-319
Crane, Daniel, 621-624
Crane, Stephen, 317
Crane, Stephen G., 641
Crawford, Christina, 517-519
Crawford, Joan, 517-519
Creation Science Evangelism, 1123-1126
Creighton, Joanne V., 936-938
Cremation, Georgia state law, 966
Crematories, 964-967
Crime and Misconduct Commission, 682
Crime of the Congo, The (Doyle), 33
Criminal Justice Commission, 682
Cuba, 4, 331, 374; and Central Intelligence Agency, 426; and Errol Flynn, 560; Guantanamo Bay, 1035, 1038
Cultural and intellectual history. See Category Index
Cunningham, Mary, 580-582
Cunningham, Randall, 1064-1067
Curie, Marie, 37-39
Curley, James Michael, 6-9
Curley, Thomas, 6
Curnin, Tom, 636-638
Currie, Edwina, 983-985
Curzon, George Nathaniel, 25
Cushing, Richard, 397
Customs Act of 1901, 305
Cycling, 1103-1106
Czechoslovakia, 163-166

Dacko, David, 550
Daily Star, 696-698
Dalí, Salvador, 136-139, 147-150
Dalkon Shield, 459-462
Dalton, John H., 800
Daly, Augustin, 34
Daniélou, Alain, 456-459
Daniélou, Jean, 456-459
Daniels, Josephus, 70
Darden, Christopher, 808
Dardenne, Sabine, 840
D.A.R.E. See Drug Abuse Resistance Education
Dassault, Serge, 889-892
Daugherty, Harry M., 92-95
Davenport, Dorothy, 86-89
Davies, Arthur B., 49-52
Davies, Marion, 108-111
Davis, Gray, 1017
Davis, Hugh J., 459-462
Davis, John W., 46
Davis, Oscar, 313
Davis, Peter, 1112-1114
Dawson, Charles, 292
Day, Laraine, 242
Deakin, George, 531
Dean, John W., 425-431, 500-502
Death Row Records, 884
Death Wish (film), 642
DeBartolo, Edward J., Jr., 907-909
Defense Base Realignment and Closure Commission, 1141
Defense Information Systems Agency, 1066
DeFreeze, Donald, 450
DeLauro, Rosa L., 1097-1100
Delay, Myriam, 922-924
Delay, Thierry, 922-924

SUBJECT INDEX

- Delhez, Laetitia, 840
 Delmont, Margaret Maude, 79
 De Lorean, John, 609-612
 Delpey, Roger, 550
 Delplanque, David, 922
 Denmark, 289-291, 1075-1077
 Dennis, Hugh C., 5
 Department of Agriculture, 96
 Department of Commerce and Labor, U.S., 1
 Department of Defense, U.S.; sexual harassment, 993
 Department of the Interior, U.S., 96
 Department of Trade and Industry (U.K.), 754
Deputy, The (play), 353-355
 Derrida, Jacques, 705
 Deutsche Börse Clearing, 925
 DeWitt, John L., 205
 DeWolf, L. Harold, 739
 Diana, Princess of Wales, 745-747, 789-792, 861-865
 “Dianagate,” 789-792
 Diaries; Jeffrey Archer, 697; Mary Astor, 184-187; John Earl Brownlee, 177; Edwina Currie, 983; Alfred Dreyfus, 21; Elinor Glyn, 25; Adolf Hitler, 618-621; Rita Jenrette, 582-585; Claudine Longet, 486; John Prescott, 1089-1091
 “Diary of a Mad Congresswife” (Jenrette), 582-585
 Dickie, Phil, 681
 Diefenbaker, John G., 377-379
 Dies, Martin, 248
 Dies Committee, 248
 DiFederico, Mario A., 534
 Dines, Courtland S., 100-102
 Dingell, John, 615-617
 Dinis, Edmund S., 395
 DiStefano, Phil, 1155
 Distillers Company, 750-753
 Dobson, James, 913
 Dockweiler, John F., 202
 Doctorow, E. L., 18
 Dodd, Thomas J., 384-386
 Doerfer, John C., 335-337
 Dogfighting, 1158-1161
 Doheny, Laurence E., 95-99
 Dole, Bob, 1141
 Dominican Republic, 366, 942-944
 Donaghy, Tim, 1172-1175
 Donaldson, Liam, 927
 Doren, Charles Van, 326-329
 Douglas, William O., 382
 Dowd, John M., 735
 Downey Savings and Loan, 1177
 Doyle, Arthur Conan, 33
Dracula (novel), 111-114
Drag, The (play), 122-124
 Dresnick, Ronald, 765
 Dreyfus, Alfred, 19-22
 Drug Abuse Resistance Education, 888
 Drugs; and birth disorders, 301.
 See also Category Index
 Du Bois, W. E. B., 142
 Duhaime, Yvon, 898-901
 Dukakis, Michael, 698-701
 Dunaway, Faye, 518
 Duncan, Isadora, 34-36
 Dunleavy, Richard M., 784
 Dunn, John, 341
 Dunn, Patricia, 1114-1118
 Duplessis, Maurice, 892-895
 Duplessis orphans, 892-895
 Dupré, Ashley Alexandra, 1167-1170
 Duranty, Walter, 167-169
 Durbin, Richard J., 1097-1100
 Durocher, Leo, 242-244
 Dutroux, Marc, 840-842
 Dwyer, Budd, 684-686
 E. F. Hutton, 636-638
 Eagleton, Thomas F., 440-443
 Ebbers, Bernard, 764, 909, 1074
 Ebert, Roger, 1004-1007
 Eckardt, Shawn, 812
 Economic bailouts, 1175-1179
 Education. See Category Index
 Edward II, 1107
 Edward VIII. See Windsor, Duke of
 Edwards, Blake, 612-614
 Edwards, Edwin, 907-909
 EEOC. See Equal Employment Opportunity Commission
 Egypt, 861-865
 Eisenhower, Dwight D.; and Sherman Adams, 320-322; and John Doerfer, 336; film censorship, 252; and Joseph McCarthy, 266-270; and Richard Nixon, 286-288
 Eisenhower, Julie Nixon, 453
 Eisenstein, Serge, 149
 Eisler, Hanns, 284
 Eizenstat, Stuart, 858
 El Salvador, 473
 Elixir sulfanilamide, 193-195
 Elk Hills oil reserve, 95-99
 Elliott, Brian Robinson, 223
 Ellis, Joseph J., 936-938
 Ellsberg, Daniel, 416-419
 Elsner, Edward, 122
 Éluard, Paul, 148
 Emory University, 985-988
 Emperors Club, 1167-1170
 Endo, Mitsuye, 205
 England. See Geographical Index
 Enright, Dan, 326-329
 Enrile, Juan Ponce, 629
 Enron Corporation, 599, 764, 945-948
 Environmental issues. See Category Index
 Environmental Protection Agency, 547, 615-617, 964
 “Environmental racism,” 822
 EPA. See Environmental Protection Agency
 Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, 769
 Erasmus Commission, 545
 Erben, Hermann F., 559
 Erbitux, 1031
 Ericta, Vicente, 600
 Ern Malley hoax, 223-225
 Errichetti, Angelo, 561-564
 Esenin, Sergei, 36
 Espionage. See Category Index
 Espy, Mike, 873
 Estes, Billie Sol, 341-343

MODERN SCANDALS

- Estevez, Emilio, 718
 Estrich, Susan, 1017
 Ethics. See Category Index
 Eugenics, 20, 133-136
 Eulenburg-Hertefeld, Philipp, Prince of, 9-12
 Europe. See Geographical Index
 European Convention on Human Rights, 891
 European Court of Human Rights, 755
 Eustachy, Larry, 950
 Evangelists; at Air Force Academy, 1062-1064; Herbert W. Armstrong, 525-528; Jim Bakker, 690-693; Ted Haggard, 1126-1129; Billy James Hargis, 465-467; Kent Hovind, 1123-1126; Aimee Semple McPherson, 115-118; Peter Popoff, 673-675; Jimmy Swaggart, 711-714
 Evans, David, 1086
 Evers-Williams, Myrlie, 823
 Exclusion, U.S. Supreme Court on, 382
 Exner, Dan, 331
 Exner, Judith. See Campbell, Judith
 Exodus International, 913-915
 "Expanded Guidance for Subprime Lending Programs" (2001), 1136
 Experiments; cold fusion, 723-726; faked, 980, 1094-1097; medical, 134, 437-440, 894; pharmaceutical, 216; psychological, 338-340, 370, 420-422
 Expulsion, U.S. Supreme Court on, 382
Exstase (film), 163-166
 Ezoe, Hiromasa, 714-717

 Faber, Katelyn, 1008-1010
Fabulist, The (film), 888
 Factory Investigating Commission, New York, 40-43
 Fahd, 453
 Fairfoul, Tom, 55
 Faisal, 453
 Faith healing, 673-675
 Fall, Albert B., 95-99, 125
 Falwell, Jerry, 506-509, 690, 709
 Families and children. See Category Index
 Family Protection Act of 1977, 578
 Faneuil, Douglas, 1031-1034
 Fannie Mae, 1175
 Fard, Wallace Dodd, 359
 Farian, Frank, 756
 Farmer, Frances, 214-217
 Farmer, Lillian Van Ornum, 214
 Farrakhan, Louis, 361, 633, 635
 Farrow, Mia, 773-775
 Fastow, Andrew, 909
 Fayed, Dodi al-, 861-865
 Fayed, Mohamed al-, 861
 FBI. See Federal Bureau of Investigation
 FCC. See Federal Communication Commission
 Federal Bureau of Investigation, 30, 191, 368; and Abscam, 561-564; and Charles Chaplin, 220-222, 283-285; and John De Lorean, 609-612; and Billie Sol Estes, 342; and financial markets collapse of 2008, 1178; and Alger Hiss, 260; and Walter Jenkins, 372; and John F. Kennedy, 329-332; and Elijah Muhammad, 360; and Ezra Pound, 237; and Watergate, 371-374
 Federal Bureau of Prisons, 933
 Federal Communication Commission, 334-337
 Federal Corrupt Practices Act of 1910, 3
 Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971, 3
 Federal Emergency Management Agency, 1068-1072
 Federal Housing Administration, 1137
 Federal Reserve, U.S., 1136, 1176
 Fédération Internationale de Football Association, 816, 1056
 Feleppa, Anselmo, 881
 Felt, W. Mark, 425
 FEMA. See Federal Emergency Management Agency
 Fenjves, Pablo F., 1129-1131
 Fennell, Jim, 948
 Fernando, Enrique, 600
 Fernando Pó, 142
 FHA. See Federal Housing Administration
 Fields, William J., 104
 FIFA. See Fédération Internationale de Football Association
Fifth Estate, The (magazine), 660-662
 Figure skating, 812-815, 962-964
 Figure Skating Association, U.S., 812 Film. See Category Index
 Film production code, 165
 Financial industry, collapse of, 1175-1179
 Finnerty, Collin, 1086
 Fiorentina soccer club, 1092
 Fiorina, Carly, 1115
 Firestone, 534-536; and Liberia, 143, 1078-1080
 First Amendment, and Watergate, 418
 FISA. See Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978
 Fischer, Bobby, 525
 Fish, Stanley, 838
 Fisher, Amy, 781-784
 Fiske, Robert B., 818
 Fitch, 1176
 Fitzgerald, Patrick, 1011
 Fitzgerald, Tony, 681
 Fitzgerald inquiry, 681-683
Fitzgeralds and the Kennedys: An American Saga, The (Goodwin), 959-961
 Fitzsimmons, Jeanette, 974
 Flanders, 276-279
 Fleet Bank, 902-903
 Fleischmann, Martin, 723-726

SUBJECT INDEX

- Flinn, Kelly, 855-858
 Flynn, Errol, 202-205, 559-561
 Flynn, Maurice, 280
 Focus on the Family, 913-915
 Fogel, Moshe, 860
 Foggo, Kyle Dustin, 1064
 Foley, Mark, 1118-1120
 Fomon, Robert M., 636-638
 Fonda, Jane, 434-436
 Food and Drug Act of 1906, 193
 Food and Drug Administration, U.S.; and elixir scandal, 194; and thalidomide, 301-304
 Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act of 1938, 195, 303; amendment of, 461
 Football, 807; college, 687-689, 801, 948-950, 969, 1002-1004, 1062, 1101-1103; and gambling, 243, 1174; professional, 1158-1163
 Football, Association. See Soccer
 Forbes, Charles R., 89-92
 Ford, Betty, 454
 Ford, Frederick W., 337
 Ford, Gerald R., 449, 497-498; and Earl Butz, 500-502; pardon of Dave Beck, 324; pardon of Richard Nixon, 429, 455, 499; and Nelson Rockefeller, 537; and Watergate, 429, 455
 Ford, Harold E., Sr., 649
 Ford, Harrison, 524
 Ford, Robin, 251-253
 Ford Foundation, 822
 Ford Motor Company, 535, 594-596, 694
 Ford Pinto, 594-596
 Foreign Gifts and Decorations Act of 1881, 453
 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978, 997
 Forest Service, U.S., 96
 Forgery. See Category Index
 Forlani, Arnaldo, 591-593
 Fortas, Abe, 367, 371, 389-394
 Foursquare Gospel Church, 115
 Fowler, Tillie, 991-994
 Fox Television, 1020, 1129
 Foxe, Fanne, 462-465
 France. See Geographical Index
 France, Anatole, 33
 Francis, Ted, 696-698
 Franke, Karl Heinz, 503-505
 Fraser, Donald M., 479
 Fraser, John, 660-662
 Fraud Discovery Institute, 709
 Freddie Mac, 1175
 Freed, Alan, 332-335
 Freedman, Albert, 326-329
 Freedom of Information Act of 1966, 283, 429, 559, 764
 Freeh, Louis, 931
 Freeman, Helene, 638
 French, John, 58-60
 French restaurants, and city corruption, 29
 Freud, Sigmund, 13, 74, 137
 Frey, James, 424
 Frist, Bill, 988-989
 Frohnmayer, David, 662
 Fualaau, Vili, 605, 849-852
 Fujimura, Shinichi, 919-921
 Furesz, John, 868
 Gabel, Hortense W., 693-695
 Gailey, Samantha, 522-524
 Gaines, James R., 810
 Gaines, Kevin, 884-886
 Galbraith, T. G. D., 347
 Galeen, Henrik, 111
 Gallagher, Willie, 182
 Gallo, Vincent, 1004-1007
 Galman, Rolando, 628
 Gambling. See Category Index
 Game shows, 326-329
 Gandil, Chick, 66-70
 Garabedian, Mitchell, 954
 García Lorca, Federico, 136
 Gardner, Deborah, 476-478
 Gargan, Joseph F., 394
 Garner Ted Armstrong Evangelistic Association, 527
 Garrett, H. Lawrence, III, 784-788
 Garvey, Cyndy, 574-577
 Garvey, Steve, 574-577
 Gates, Henry Louis, Jr., 521
 Gates, Robert, 1138
 Gaulle, Charles de, 209, 232
 Gay and Lesbian Alliance Against Defamation, 590
 Geishas, 483, 733-735, 1146
 Geller, Uri, 674
 Gelli, Licio, 591
 Gender reassignment. See Transsexualism
 General Allotment Act of 1887, 1157
 General Motors, 535, 1143
 Generals' affair, 257-259
 Genesee County Bank, 637
 Genetic engineering, 974-977, 1094-1097
 Genovese, Kitty, 369-371
 Geoghan, John, 954-958
 George, Mary, 476
 George V, 84
 George VI, 187
 Georgia Institute of Technology, 724
 Gerard, Mark, 514-516
 Gerbert, Elkin B., 389
 Germany. See Geographical Index
 Getty, J. Paul, 220
 Giamatti, A. Bartlett, 735-738
 Giancana, Sam, 330
 Gibbs, David Charles, 1123
 Gibbs, Lois, 546-550
 Gibson, Mel, 1106-1109
 Giesler, Jerry, 202-205
 Gilbey, James, 789-792
 Gillars, Mildred, 435
 Gillooly, Jeff, 812
 Gingrich, Newt, 731, 989
 Giraudo, Antonio, 1092-1094
 Giscard d'Estaing, Valéry, 550-552
 Giuliani, Donna Hanover, 904
 Giuliani, Judith Nathan, 904-906
 Giuliani, Rudy, 726, 904-906
 GLAAD. See Gay and Lesbian Alliance Against Defamation
 Glass, Stephen, 887-889
 Glassford, Pelham D., 158
 Glyn, Elinor, 25-27
 Goebbels, Josef, 197, 231
 Goerlitzer, Artur, 197

MODERN SCANDALS

- Goetz, Bernhard, 641-644
Golden Age, The (film), 147
 Goldfine, Bernard, 320-322
 Goldman, Fred, 1129
 Goldman, Judy, 765-768
 Goldman, Larry, 765
 Goldman, Ronald, 806-809
 Goldman Sachs, 1176
 Goldwater, Barry, 371, 386
 Golitsin, Anatoli, 347
Gone with the Wind (Mitchell), 521
 Good Government Association, 8
 Goodell, Roger, 1160-1163
 Goodpaster, Andrew J., 488
 Goodwin, Doris Kearns, 959-961
 Goossens, Eugène, 304-306
 Gore, Al, 988
 Göring, Hermann, 196-197
 Gorman, Marvin, 711-714
 Gorsuch, Anne, 615-617
 Government. See Category Index
 Government in the Sunshine Act of 1976, 429
 Graef, Ortwin de, 705
 Graham, Philip, 270
 Grammy Awards, 756-758
 Grant, Hugh, 827-829
 Grass, Günter, 1109-1112
 Grau, Albin, 111
 Gravel, Mike, 416
 Gray, Fred, 437
 Gray, L. Patrick, III, 428
 Gray, Lily, 594-596
 Graziano, Rocky, 243
Great Dictator, The (film), 284
 Greeley, Andrew M., 597-599
 Greenberg, Jeffrey W., 1050-1052
 Greenpeace, 651-654
 Gregory, Wilton D., 954
 Grenon, Aurelie, 922
 Grey Wolves, 843-845
 Grimshaw, Richard, 594-596
Grimshaw v. Ford Motor Co. (1981), 594-596
 Gronen, Jimmy, 444-446
 "Gropegate," 1016-1019
 Grozier, Richard, 63
 Gruenberger, Peter, 509
 Grüenthal, 301
 Guagenti, Peter, 781
 Guantanamo Bay, 1035, 1038
 Guccione, Bob, 638-641
 Guest, Frederick, 83-86
 Guinness Four, 753-756
 Gun, Katharine, 995-998
 Gundlach, James, 1101-1103
 Gymnastics, 916-918, 963
 Hager, Nicky, 974-977
 Haggard, Ted, 1126-1129
 Hahn, Jessica, 690
 Haig, Alexander, 416
 Haile Selassie, 454
 Halberstam, David, 362
 Haley, Alex, 520-522
 Hall, Camilla, 450
 Hamburger, Christian, 289-291
 Hamilton, David F., 1078-1080
 Hammerman, I. H., 447
 Hamsun, Knut, 229-232
 Hamsun, Marie, 229
 Han Hak-soo, 1094
 Hanna, Richard T., 479
 Hanover, Donna, 904
 Hansen, Betty, 202-205
 Hanssen, Robert, 931-933
 "Happy Birthday" (song), 344-346
 Harden, Maximilian, 9-12
 Harding, Florence, 89
 Harding, Tonya, 812-815
 Harding, Warren G., 89-95, 124-127, 200; and Teapot Dome scandal, 91, 95-99, 125
 Hardy, Carlos S., 117
 Hargis, Billy James, 465-467
 Harlow, Jean, 160-163
 Harper, Samuel N., 307
 Harrick, Jim, Jr., 968-970
 Harrick, Jim, Sr., 950, 968-970
 Harrick exam, 969
 Harriman, E. H., 2
 Harrington, Margaret, 217-219
 Harris, Jean, 565-567
 Harris, Maxwell Henley, 223-225
 Harris, Oren, 332-335
 Harrison, George, 494-497
 Harrison, Rex, 245-247
 Hartery, Don, 765
 Harvey, Francis J., 1138
 Harvey, Marilyn, 977
 Hasner, Adam, 1154
 Hassan II, 374
 Hastert, Dennis, 1118
 Haughey, Charles James, 413-415
 Hayden, Tom, 434
 Hays, Wayne L., 491-493
 Hays, William H., 86
 Hayter, William, 347
 Hayworth, Rita, 254-256
 Hazardous and Solid Waste Act of 1984, 617
 Health Management Associates scandal, 868-871
 Hearst, Patricia, 450-453
 Hearst, William Randolph, 74, 81, 108-111, 450
Heart of Darkness (Conrad), 32
 Heidemann, Gerd, 618-621
 Heimann, John G., 511
 Hellenbroich, Heribert, 657
 Heller, Jean, 437-440
 Helmsley, Harry, 776
 Helmsley, Leona, 776-778
 Hempel, Régis, 925
 Henderson, Ian, 298
 Henderson, Paul, 1097-1100
 Heritage USA, 690
 Herman, Alexis M., 873
 Herman, Pee-wee (Paul Reubens), 765-768, 829
 Hernandez, Macarena, 998-1001
 Herrera, Ameurфина Melencio, 600
 Herrschaft, Daryl, 913
 Hersh, Seymour, 401
 Hervey, Ramon, II, 638
 Heseltine, Michael, 645-647
 Hess, Dean E., 252
 Hess, Rudolph, 197
 Hetrick, William Morgan, 610
 Hewlett-Packard Corporation, 1114-1118
 Higham, Charles, 559-561
 Hilfswerk für Behinderte Kinder, 302
 Hill, Anita, 768-772

SUBJECT INDEX

- Hill, Henry, 568-570
Hilton, Paris, 1019-1021
Hindemith, Paul, 76-79
Hirabayashi, Gordon Kiyoshi, 205
Hirabayashi v. United States (1943), 206
Hirschfield, Alan, 509-511
Hiss, Alger, 259-262; and J. Edgar Hoover, 261
Hitler, Adolf, 213, 230, 352, 503; and Charles Chaplin, 284; faked diaries, 618-621; film censorship, 164; and Errol Flynn, 560; and France, 210; and Knut Hamsun, 231; and Norway, 226-229; purges, 11; and the Windsors, 189, 196-198
Hitler Youth, 1109
Ho Chi Minh, 257
Hoaxes, frauds, and charlatanism. See Category Index
Hobbs, Marian, 974
Hochhuth, Rolf, 353-355
Hodge, Sir Rowland, 83
Hoffman, James, 609
Hoffman, Martin R., 488
Hogan, Frank, 274-276
Hola massacre, 298-301
Holland, Al, 667
Hollywood. See Category Index; Los Angeles
"Hollywoodgate," 509-511
Holmes, David, 531
Holocaust, 235, 340, 1109; and Adolf Hitler, 619; and Jesse Jackson, 634; and Pius XII, 353-355; and Swiss banks, 858-861
Homosexuality; and Julie Andrews, 612-614; anonymous sex, 408; and Anita Bryant, 506-509; and Blake Edwards, 612-614; Emperor William II, 9-12; Philipp Eulenburg, 11; in opera, 1084-1086; "outing," 1041-1044, 1112-1114; and palimony, 588-591; research on, 407-409; U.S. Navy, 70-72; John Vassall, 347-349; James E. West, 1081-1083
Honduras, 471-473
Honor code, U.S. Naval Academy, 801
Hons, Emile, 476
Hooker Chemical, 546-550
Hoover, Herbert, 94, 99, 144; and Bonus Army, 156-160
Hoover, J. Edgar; and Charles Chaplin, 220-222, 283-285; and domestic communism, 261; and John F. Kennedy, 329-332; and Profumo affair, 357
Horrigan, Aldine, 798
Horse racing, 200, 390, 557, 736; fraud, 514-516
Hotchner, A. E., 524
House Committee on Government Reform, 1012
House Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, 492, 731
House Committee on Un-American Activities, 222; and Charles Chaplin, 284; and Alger Hiss, 259-262; and Thomas J. Parnell, 248-250
House of Representatives, U.S. See Congress, U.S.
House Un-American Activities Committee. See House Committee on Un-American Activities
Housing and Urban Development, U.S. Department of, 872-874
Hovind, Eric, 1123
Hovind, Jo Delia, 1123
Hovind, Kent, 1123-1126
Howard, J. Daniel, 785
Hoyzer, Robert, 1055-1058
HUAC. See House Committee on Un-American Activities
Hubbell, Webster, 819
Hubble, Ava, 852
Huddleston, Silous, 404
Hudson, Erastus, 70
Hudson, Rock, 295-298
Hughes, Howard, 160, 251-253, 422-425
Hull, Anne, 1138-1142
Human rights. See Category Index
Human Rights Campaign, 1043
Human Tissue Act of 1961, 929
Humphreys, Laud, 407-409
Hunt, E. Howard, 425-431
Hunter, C. J., 1164-1166
Hurley, Elizabeth, 827
Hurley, Patrick, 158
Hussein, Saddam, 989, 995, 1035, 1039, 1053-1055
Hussey, John, 948-950
Huth, M. E., 104
Hwang Woo-suk, 1094-1097
"Hymietown," 633-636
I Was Wrong (Bakker), 692
ICC. See Interstate Commerce Commission
Ice hockey, 901-903
If I Did It (Simpson), 1129-1131
Ikenaga, Masaaki, 398-400
Iliescu, Ion, 742
ILRF. See International Labor Rights Fund
ImClone Systems, 1031-1034
Immigration; Charles Chaplin, 283-285
Immigration and Naturalization Service, U.S., 284, 563, 664, 671
Immigration fraud, 563, 940; Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh, 662-665
Impeachment; of Bill Clinton, 820, 874-878, 988; of judges, 46, 117; Liberian cabinet, 143; and Richard Nixon, 429; and Eliot Spitzer, 1169
Imus, Don, 1142-1144
Ince, Thomas H., 108-111
Independent Committee of Eminent Persons, 859
Indian Arts and Crafts Act of 1990, 1157
Indochina Peace Campaign, 435
IndyMac, 1177
"Infogate," 543-545
Ingrassia, Angelo J., 704
Inside Sports magazine, 574-577
Insider trading; and H. H. Asquith, 43-46; and George W. Bush,

MODERN SCANDALS

- 762-765; definition, 45, 763; in Japan, 714-717; and Michael Milken, 726-729; and Martha Stewart, 1031-1034
- Insull, Samuel, 154-156
- Insull Utilities Trusts, 154-156
- Intellectual History. See Category Index under Cultural and intellectual history
- Internal Revenue Code, 464
- Internal Revenue Service, 213, 385; and Spiro T. Agnew, 449; and churches, 481, 691; and Randall Cunningham, 1066; and Billie Sol Estes, 341-343; and Billy James Hargis, 465; and Heritage USA, 691; and Kent Hovind, 1123-1126; and Lockheed Corporation, 483; and Pete Rose, 737; and Eliot Spitzer, 1168; and Herman E. Talmadge, 553. See also Bureau of Internal Revenue
- Internal Security Act of 1950, 267
- International Association of the Congo, 31
- International Christian Association, 939
- International Exhibition of Modern Art, 49-52
- International Labor Rights Fund, 1078-1080
- International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, 42
- International relations. See Category Index
- Interstate Commerce Act of 1887, 46
- Interstate Commerce Commission, 46
- Investment Company Act of 1940, 1014
- Iran, 676-681; hostage crisis, 573; nuclear weapons, 1012
- Iran-Contra weapons scandal, 312, 481, 676-681, 780, 820
- "Irangate," 430
- Iraq, 481; arms purchases, 793; Kurds, 697; war with Iran, 676
- Iraq War, 340, 421, 989, 994-999, 1006, 1034-1038, 1090, 1138; and Central Intelligence Agency, 1010-1013
- Ireland, 106, 779-781; orphan school fire, 217-219; weapon imports, 413-415
- IRS. See Internal Revenue Service
- Irving, Clifford, 422-425
- Irving, David, 619
- Irving, Edith, 422-425
- Isaacs, Godfrey, 43
- Isaacs, Rufus, 43
- Islam, 254-256, 359-361, 1075-1077
- Isorni, Jacques, 232
- Israel, 21, 312, 634; and Iran-Contra, 677; secret service, 376; and Kurt Waldheim, 669
- Italian Football Federation, 1092-1094
- Italy. See Geographical Index
- Jackson, Ashley, 895
- Jackson, Jesse, 633-636, 640, 699, 895-897, 990
- Jackson, Michael, 1025-1027
- Jackson, Shoeless Joe, 66-70, 399
- Jackson, Vernon L., 1148
- Jameson, J. Franklin, 307
- Janszen, Paul, 735
- Japan. See Geographical Index
- Japanese American internment, 205-209; Roosevelt's order, 206; U.S. government apology for, 208
- Japanese Archaeology Association, 920
- Japanese paleolithic hoax, 919-921
- Jefferson, Thomas, 200, 936
- Jefferson, William J., 1147-1150
- Jenkins, Walter, 371-374
- Jenks, Anton Shrewsbury, 125
- Jenrette, John W., Jr., 561-562, 582-585
- Jenrette, Rita, 582-585
- Jesus Morning Star, 939-941
- Jim Bakker Show* (television), 692
- JMS. See Jesus Morning Star
- John Paul I, 606
- John Paul II, 606-609, 954
- John Roe I et al. v. Bridgestone* (2005), 1078-1080
- Johnson, Charles, 521
- Johnson, Charles S., 142
- Johnson, Frank, 739
- Johnson, Jack, 52-55
- Johnson, Judy, 624-627
- Johnson, Lyndon B.; and Bobby Baker, 365-368; T. Lamar Caudle, 281, 312; and Billie Sol Estes, 341-343; and Abe Fortas, 392; and Doris Kearns Goodwin, 959; and Walter Jenkins, 371-374; and Vietnam, 364
- Jokes, 500-502
- Jones, Ernest, 12-15
- Jones, Gareth, 167-169
- Jones, Marion, 1164-1166
- Jones, Michael, 1126-1129
- Jones, Paula, 875
- Jones, Steven E., 723
- Jones v. Daly* (1981), 590
- Jordan, Everett, 367
- Jordan, Pat, 574-577
- Jorgensen, Christine, 289-291
- Jubilee* (Walker), 520
- Jung Myung Seok, 939-941
- Juventus soccer club, 1092-1094
- Jyllands-Posten*, 1075-1077
- Kamata, Toshiaki, 919-921
- Kamenev, Leo, 106
- Kanally, John J., 296
- Kane and Abel* (Archer), 696
- Kaplan, David A., 1114
- Karpinski, Janis, 1034
- Kaufman, George S., 184-187
- Kavanaugh, Daniel, 1153
- Kawamoto, Dawn, 1116
- Keally, Charles, 919-921
- Kearney, Nancy, 810
- Keating, Frank, 954
- Keays, Sara, 631-633
- Keeler, Christine, 355-358
- Kefauver, Estes, 270-273

SUBJECT INDEX

- Kefauver-Harris Amendment (1962), 303
 Keith, Minor C., 472
 Kelley, Joe, 100-102
 Kelly, James, 413
 Kelly, John, 413
 Kelly, R., 1170-1172
 Kelly, Richard, 561-562
 Kelsey, Frances Oldham, 193, 301-304
 Kelso, Frank B., Jr., 784, 800
 Kennan, George F., 307-310
 Kennedy, Charles, 1084-1085
 Kennedy, Edward M., 364, 439-440; and Chappaquiddick, 367, 394-398; and William Kennedy Smith, 759
 Kennedy, John F.; assassination of, 343; and Bobby Baker, 367; and Judith Campbell, 329-332; and Matthew J. Connelly, 281, 312; extramarital affairs, 126; and J. Edgar Hoover, 329-332; and Marilyn Monroe, 344-346; and Ellen Rometsch, 367; and Vietnam, 362
 Kennedy, Joseph P., 127-130
 Kennedy, Mildred Pearce, 115
 Kennedy, Patrick, 759
 Kennedy, Robert F., 329, 700; and Dave Beck, 323-325; and Marilyn Monroe, 344
 Kennedy, Rose Fitzgerald, 127
 Kent, Samuel Neal, 70-72
 Kent State massacre, 410-413, 491
 Kenya, 298-301
 Kenyatta, Jomo, 298
 Kerr, James, 12
 Kerr, Robert S., 365-368
 Kerrigan, Nancy, 812-815
 Kershaw, Elinor, 108-111
 Keyworth, George A., II, 1114-1118
 KGB, 347-349, 353-354, 931, 1133
 Khan, Prince Aly, 254-256
 Khrushchev, Nikita S., 330, 373
 Kidnapping; of Mehdi Ben Barka, 374-376; and Duke lacrosse team, 1088; by Marc Dutroux, 840-842; of Elinor Glyn, 27; of Patricia Hearst, 450-453; by Jack Jackson, 54; of Aimee Semple McPherson, 115-118
 Kiley, Kevin C., 1138
 Killian documents scandal, 1044-1046
 Kim Sun-jong, 1094
 Kimball Sanitarium, 215
 King, Billie Jean, 588-591
 King, Cecil R., 279-282
 King, Charles D. B., 142-144
 King, Coretta Scott, 739
 King, Don, 703
 King, John, 93
 King, Larry (lawyer), 588
 King, Larry (talk show host), 390, 711, 828, 1130
 King, Martin Luther, Jr., 381, 739-741, 822, 896
 King, Wanda, 748
King in New York, A (film), 285
King Leopold's Soliloquy (Twain), 33
King v. Mister Maestro, Inc. (1963), 740
 Kinnock, Neil, 698-701
 Kinte, Kunta, 520
 Kirstein, Lincoln, 528
 Kissinger, Henry, 416, 538, 551
 Kitchener, Lord, 58-60
 Klein, Allen, 494-497
 Knebel, Fletcher, 175
 Knight, Bobby, 950
 Knight, Suge, 884
 Knox, Howard J., 290
 Kocadağ, Hüseyin, 843-845
 Koch, Edward I., 642, 693-695, 778
 Koch, Kevin, 666
 Kohl, Helmut, 1110
 Koller, Arnold, 858, 860
 Kontogiannis, Thomas, 1064
 Koolmatrie, Wanda (Leon Carmen), 852-854
 Kopechne, Mary Jo, 367, 394-398
 "Koreagate," 430, 479-482
 Korean War, 175, 289
 Korematsu, Fred, 205
Korematsu v. United States (1944), 207
 Kotchian, Carl, 482-485
 Kovtun, Dimitri, 1133
 Koza, Frank, 995-998
 Krause, Allison, 410-413
 Krever, Horace, 868-871
 Krever Commission, 868-871
 Krupinski, Walter, 503-505
 Kuhlmeier, Harry L., Jr., 626
 Kuhn, Bowie, 556-558
 Kuhn, Rick, 568-570
 Kuhn, Walt, 49-52
 Kujau, Konrad, 618-621
 Labor. See Category Index
 LaCroix, Larry, 401
 Lacy, Lee, 667
 La Falaise, Henri de, 127
L'Âge d'or (film), 138, 147-150
 Lagos, Ricardo, 1121-1123
 Lake, Douglas, 1072-1074
 Lamarr, Hedy, 163-166
 Lambert, William G., 391
 Lamont, Daniel, 1
 Lance, Bert, 511-514, 571
 Landis, Carole, 245-247
 Landis, Floyd, 1103-1106
 Landis, Kenesaw Mountain, 66-70, 118-121, 242, 399, 556, 737
 Landrum-Griffin Act of 1959, 405
 Lane, Charles, 887
 Lang, Robert Todd, 509
 Lange, Robert Brookings, Sr., 444-446
 Langevin, Jeanne, 37
 Langevin, Paul, 37-39
 Langfeldt, Gabriel, 229
 Langley, John W., 103-105
 Larson, Charles R., 800
 Lasky, Jesse L., 86-89
 Lategano, Cristyne, 904
 Laval, Pierre, 209-211
 Lavelle, Rita, 615-617
 Law, Bernard, 954-958

MODERN SCANDALS

- Law and the courts. See Category Index
- Lawford, Peter, 344
- Lawrence v. Texas* (2003), 508
- Laws, Bolitha J., 236
- Lay, Kenneth, 945-948, 1074
- League of Nations, 142-144, 1080
- Leber, Georg, 503-505
- Lederer, Raymond, 561-562
- Leeds, Lila, 251-253
- Le Gougne, Marie Reine, 962-964
- Le Gros Clark, Wilfrid, 292
- Lehman Brothers, 1176
- Leibowitz, Samuel, 150-153
- Leisure, Peter K., 262
- Le Mesurier, John, 531
- Lend-Lease Act of 1941, 248
- Lenin, Vladimir Ilich, 106, 168, 307
- Lennix, Harry, 382
- Lenz, Widukind, 301
- Leonard, Dutch, 118-121
- Leopold II, 31-33
- Leopold III, 276-279
- LeRoy, J. T., 424
- Leslie, Kristen, 1062
- Le Thuy, Ngo Dinh, 362
- Letourneau, Mary Kay, 605, 849-852
- Levy, Chandra, 933-936
- Levy, Susan, 933-936
- Lewinsky, Monica, 818-821, 888; and Bill Clinton, 874-878, 896, 1168
- Lewis, Jane Mitcham, 313
- Lewis, Jerry Lee, 313-316
- Lewis, John, 191
- Lewis, Myra Brown, 313-316
- Lewis, Terence, 682
- Ley, Robert, 196
- Libby, Lewis "Scooter," 1010-1013
- Libel cases, 10, 32, 793; and Jeffrey Archer, 696-698; and Cecil Chesterton, 44; and Clearstream, 926; and Steve Garvey, 574-577; and Stephen Glass, 888; and Sara Keays, 632; and Douglas MacArthur, 173-175; and Brian Mulroney, 831; and Mabel Normand, 101; and Drew Pearson, 173-175; and Roman Polanski, 524; and John L. Poulson, 432; and Mike Price, 1003; and John G. Schmitz, 604; and Arnold Schwarzenegger, 1018; and Émile Zola, 21
- Liberia, 142-144, 1078-1080
- Libya, 571-574
- Lichtenstein, 606
- Liddy, G. Gordon, 425-431
- Liebenberg circle, 9-12
- Lieber, Charles M., 980
- Limelight* (film), 284
- Lincoln, Abraham, 443
- Linderman, Lawrence, 612
- Lindgren, James, 985
- Lindstrom, Petter, 263
- Lindstrom, Pia, 263
- "Lingerie Bowl," 783
- Lipschutz, Milton, 104
- Literature. See Category Index
- Little League Baseball, 942-944
- Litvinenko, Alexander, 1132-1134
- Liverpool; children's hospital, 927-930; soccer team, 55-58
- Llosa, Luis Fernando, 942
- Lloyd George, David, 43, 59, 83-86
- Lockheed Corporation, 482-485
- Lodge, Henry Cabot, Jr., 362
- Lombard, Fern, 212
- Long, Russell, 384
- "Long Island Lolita," 781-784
- Longet, Claudine, 485-487
- López Arellano, Oswaldo, 471
- Los Angeles; Hugh Grant arrest, 827-829; police corruption, 884-886; Simpson/Goldman murders, 806-809
- Los Angeles Lakers, 1008
- Los Angeles Times*, 109, 498, 576, 604, 709, 876; and Arnold Schwarzenegger, 1016-1019
- Lott, Trent, 988-991
- Louisiana, 1150-1153; Edwin Edwards, 907-909; Hurricane Katrina, 1068-1072; William J. Jefferson, 1147-1150
- Love Canal, 546-550
- Lowe, Rob, 717-720
- Lowell, Francis Cabot, 6
- Lubbers, Ruud, 1039-1041
- Lubonja, Fatos, 846-849
- Ludwig, F. G., Jr., 786
- Lugovoi, Andrei, 1132-1134
- Luxembourg; banks, 606; financial scandal, 925-927
- Luykx, Albert, 414
- Lyga, Frank, 884-886
- Lynch, Jack, 413-415
- Lynch, Thomas C., 800-803
- Lyons, Eugene, 167
- Lyons, Jack, 753-756
- Lyttleton, Oliver, 298
- McAdoo, William G., 97
- MacArthur, Douglas, 173-175; and Bonus Army, 156-160
- McAuley, James, 223-225
- McCain, John, 54, 906, 1153-1154
- McCarthy, Joseph, 266-270; and Alger Hiss, 261
- McClellan, John, 323
- McCord, James W., Jr., 425-431
- McCormack, John W., 380
- MacDonald, Ramsay, 105-108
- McDonough, Peter, 191
- McDonough, Tom, 191
- McDougal, Jim, 818
- McDougal, Susan, 818
- MacEachran, John W., 133
- McEntee, Sean, 217
- McEuen, Paul L., 980
- McFarlane, Bud, 676
- MacFarlane, Kee, 624
- McGovern, George, 440-443, 463
- McGrath, J. Howard, 279-282
- McGuirk, Bernard, 1142-1144
- McGwire, Mark, 1058-1061
- Machatý, Gustav, 163
- Mack, David Anthony, 884-886
- Mackay, James A., 879-881

SUBJECT INDEX

- Mackey, Randy, 1154
 Mackris, Andrea, 1047-1049
 MacLeish, Archibald, 236
 Macleod, Iain, 298
 McMartin, Virginia, 624-627
 McMartin Preschool, 624-627
 Macmillan, Allan D., 176
 Macmillan, Harold, 355
 MacMillan, Vivian, 176-178
MacMillan v. Brownlee (1934), 176-178
 McNab, Gavin, 79
 McNamara, Robert, 416
 McNary-Watres Act. See Air Mail Act of 1930
 MacPhail, Larry, 242-244
 McPherson, Aimee Semple, 115-118
 McPherson, Rolf, 115
 McTaggart, David, 651
 McTaggart, Lynne, 959-961
 Maddox, Alton H., Jr., 702
 Mafart, Alain, 651
 Mafia, 607; and Banco Ambrosiano, 606-609; Gambino family, 1174; and Jimmy Hoffa, 325; and Diego Maradona, 816; and Adolfo Sarti, 591-593; and John Stonehouse, 469
 Mahaney, W. B., 5
 Mahurin, Matt, 810
 Mail fraud, 1149; A. Gordon Boone, 447; James Michael Curley, 8; Budd Dwyer, 684; E. F. Hutton Company, 636; Edwin Edwards, 907; Leona Helmsley, 776-777; Webster Hubbell, 819; Michael Milken, 728; Tongsun Park, 481; Dan Rostenkowski, 803-806; Karl A. Schledwitz, 649
 Main, Pamela, 304-306
Mainichi Shimbun (newspaper), 733-735, 920
 Major, John, 647, 697, 983-985; and David Mellor, 792-794; and Tim Yeo, 798-800
 Makalintol, Querube, 601
 Malcolm X, 359
 Mallick, Bill, 730-732
 Malloy, Edward A., 948
 Mammoth Oil Company, 96
 Man, Paul de, 705-708
 Man/Boy Love Association, 955
 Manchester United, 55-58, 1093
 Mandel, Marvin, 447
 Mandl, Fritz, 163
 Mangini, Eric, 1161-1163
 Mangum, Crystal Gail, 1086-1089
 Manhattan Beach Police Department, 626
 Manhattan College, 274-276
Manifesto of Surrealism (Breton), 148
 Mann Act of 1910, 52-55, 221, 1167; excerpt, 53
 Manson, Charles, 523
 Mantle, Mickey, 556-558
 Mapes, Mary, 1044-1046
 Maradona, Diego, 815-818
 Marcinkus, Paul, 592, 606-609
 Marconi, Guglielmo, 43-46
 Marcos, Ferdinand, 600-602, 628-630
 Marcos, Imelda, 628
 Markham, Paul F., 395
 Marks, Albert A., 638
 Marriage; Blake Andrews, 612-614; Ingrid Bergman, 263-265; Lorena Bobbitt, 795-797; Jimmy Carter, 497; Charles Chaplin, 283; Charles, Prince of Wales, 745; Helen Clark, 1112-1114; and community property, 540; Leo Durocher, 242-243; Edward VIII, 187-190, 213; Mia Farrow, 773; Steve Garvey, 574-577; Rudy Giuliani, 904-906; Jean Harlow, 160-163; Rita Hayworth, 254-256; and homosexuality, 122, 296, 508, 713, 913, 1042, 1127; Rock Hudson, 296; Jack Johnson, 54; Christine Jorgensen, 290; Jung Myung Seok, 940; R. Kelly, 1170; John F. Kennedy, 346; and Kennedy family, 129; Aly Khan, 254-256; Hedy Lamarr, 165; Carole Landis, 245-247; Leopold III, 278; Mary Kay Letourneau, 850; Jerry Lee Lewis, 313-316; Amy Semple McPherson, 116; and palimony, 540-542; Cecil Parkinson, 631; Roberto Rossellini, 263-265; sham, 664; Lana Turner, 317; underage, 313-316; Nancy Wakeman, 386-388; Stanford White, 16-19
 Marriott, Reginald, 181
 Marsh, Clara, 964-967
 Marsh, Ray, 964-967
 Marsh, Tommy Ray-Brent, 964-967
 Marsh & McLennan, 1050-1052
 Marshak, Megan, 537-539
Martha Stewart Living (television), 1032
 Martino, Thomas, 1173
 Marvin, Lee, 540-542, 589
Marvin v. Marvin (1979), 540-542, 589
 Mason, C. Vernon, 702
 Masor, Mark, 977
 Massengill, Samuel Evans, 193-195
 Mast, Charles Emmanuel, 257-259
 Masters, Christopher, 681
 Mathias, Philip, 830-833
 Matsuoka, Toshikatsu, 1145-1147
 Mau Mau rebellion, 298-301
 Maudling, Reginald, 431
 Mauresmo, Amélie, 590
Maurice (film), 827
 Mauroy, Pierre, 375
 Mayer, Louis B., 163
 "Mayflower Madam," 654-657
 Mays, Willie, 556-558
 Mazzei, Paul, 568
 Measles epidemic, Amazonian, 910-912
 Medicine and health care. See Category Index
 Medina, Ernest, 401
 Medlar, Linda Jones, 872-874

MODERN SCANDALS

- Mee, James, 1106-1109
 Meese, Edwin, III, 669, 678
 Meili, Christophe, 858-861
 Meksi, Aleksander, 846-849
 Mellor, David, 792-794
 "Memogate," 1044-1046
Memoirs of Chief Red Fox, The (Red Fox), 424
 Memorandum from Commissioner Peter V. Ueberroth to All Clubs Re: Baseball's Drug Education & Prevention Program (May 14, 1986), 668
 Menem, Carlos, 815
 Menendez, Erik, 750-753
 Menendez, Jose, 750-753
 Menendez, Kitty, 750-753
 Menendez, Lyle, 750-753
 Menu Foods scandal, 1097-1100
 Merhige, Robert, Jr., 459-462
 Merrill Lynch, 1176
 Merwin, W. S., 474
 Mexico, 824-826
 Meyer, Ron, 687-689
 Mfume, Kweisi, 823
 Michael, George, 881-883
 Middle East. See Geographical Index
Middle Passage (Johnson), 521
 MI5, 348, 533, 791
 Mikhailsky, Sigmund, 347-349
 Milan soccer club, 1092-1094
 Milburn, Alan, 927-930
 Milea, Vasile, 742
 Milgram, Stanley, 338-340
 Milgram experiments, 338-340
 Military. See Category Index
 Military Academy, U.S. See West Point
 Military police, U.S. Army, 1036
 Milk, Harvey, 507
 Milken, Michael, 726-729
 Miller, Jeffrey, 410-413
 Miller, Thomas W., 92
 Miller, Tom, 55-58
 Millette, Dorothy, 160
 Milli Vanilli, 756-758
 Milligan, Maurice M., 200
 Mills, Elizabeth Shown, 520
 Mills, Gary, 520
 Mills, Wilbur D., 462-465
 Milner, Alfred, 25
 Minchew, Daniel, 553
 Minkow, Barry, 708-710
 Minow, Newton, 335-337
 Minter, Mabel Miles, 73-76
 Miss America; Anita Bryant, 506; Bess Myerson, 693; Vanessa Williams, 638-641
 Mitchell, George J., 1058, 1162
 Mitchell, John, 390-391, 425-431
 Mitchell, Margaret, 521
 Mitchell Report, 1060
 Mitchelson, Marvin, 540-542
 Mitchum, Robert, 251-253
 Miyazawa, Kiichi, 714-717
Modern Times (film), 284
 Mody, Lori, 1147-1150
 Mog, Aribert, 163
 Moggi, Luciano, 1092-1094
 Moltke, Kuno von, 9
Mommie Dearest (Crawford), 517-519
 Monarchy. See Category Index under Royalty
 Monckeberg, Nicolás, 1122
 Monckton, Walter, 187
 Money laundering, 271, 1132, 1149, 1152, 1168; and Abscam, 562, 583; and Clearstream International, 925-927; and Randall Cunningham, 1067; and John De Lorean, 610; Edwin Edwards, 907-909; and Italian criminals, 593; and Mafia, 606; and Raúl Salinas, 825-826; and Herman E. Talmadge, 553-555; and Watergate, 427; and Westar Energy, 1073
 "Monicagate," 874-878
 Monroe, Marilyn, 246, 344-346
 Monseigneur affair, 377-379
Monsieur Verdoux (film), 284
 Montgomery, Tim, 1164-1166
 Moody's, 1176
 Moon, Sun Myung, 479
 Moore, Carlos, 731
 Moore, Demi, 718
 Moore, Rasheeda, 748
 Moores, Frank, 830-833
 Morel, Edmund Dene, 31-33
 Morelli, Benedict, 1047-1049
 Morgan, Jack, 514
 Morgan Stanley, 1176
 Morgenthau, Robert M., 641
 Morissette, Pierre, 892
 Morley, John J., 389
 Morley, Thomas, 636-638
 Morocco, 374-376; Sand Wars, 374
 Morris, Joe, 304-306
 Morrison, Toni, 521
 Mortgage Guaranty Insurance Company, 367
 Mortgage industry, 367, 973, 1134-1138, 1175-1179
 Mortimer, Elias, 89, 104
 Morton, Desmond, 105-108
 Morton, Melinda, 1062
 Morvan, Fab, 756-758
 Morze, Mark, 708
 Moseley, Winston, 369
 Motion Picture Association of America, 88
 Motion Picture Producers and Distributors of America, 88
 Motion Picture Production Code (1930), 165
 MPAA. See Motion Picture Association of America
 MTV, 756, 767, 882
 Muggeridge, Malcolm, 167
 Muhammad, Elijah, 359-361
 Muhammad, Prophet, 1075-1077
 Muir, Leilani, 133-136
Muir v. Alberta (1996), 135
 Mulcahey, Michael, 971
 Mulder, Connie, 543-545
 "Muldergate," 543-545
 Mulroney, Brian, 830-833; and "Tunagate," 660-662
 Munsinger, Gerda, 377-379
 Murder and suicide. See Category Index
 Murnau, F. W., 111
 Murphree, Debra, 711
 Murphy, Annie, 779-781

SUBJECT INDEX

- Murphy, Frank, 281
 Murphy, Peter, 779
 Murray, Alexander, 43
 Murtha, John, 563
 Music and performing arts. See
 Category Index
 Music Television. See MTV
 Muslims. See Islam; Nation of Islam
 Mussolini, Benito, 117, 164, 213,
 231, 592, 706; and Ezra Pound,
 237
 My Lai massacre, 401-404, 937
My Own Sweet Time (novel), 852-854
My Wicked, Wicked Ways (Flynn), 560
 Myers, Michael, 561-562
 Myerson, Bess, 693-695

 NAACP. See National Association for the Advancement of Colored People
 Nagayasu, Masayuki, 398-400
 Nagin, Ray, 1068-1072
 Nanni, Louis M., 948
 Naone, Dana, 474
 Naropa Institute, 474-476
 Nasjonal Samling, 226, 230
 Nathan, Judith, 904-906
 Nation of Islam, 635, 822-823; and Elijah Muhammad, 359-361
 National Association for the Advancement of Colored
 People, 152, 642, 768, 821-823
 National Association of Black Journalists, 810
 National Association of Evangelicals, 527, 1127
 National Association of Securities
 Dealers, 1014
 National Bank of Georgia, 511-
 514, 571
 National Basketball Association,
 275, 867, 901; Kobe Bryant,
 1008-1010; Tim Donaghy,
 1172-1175
 National Basketball Referees
 Association, 1175

 National Broadcasting Company,
 326
 National Collegiate Athletic Association; academic standards, 1101; basketball, 274,
 569, 968; "death penalty," 687-689; football, 687-689, 949; and
 gambling, 1003
National Enquirer, 895-897, 1017,
 1130
 National Football League, 949,
 1003; New England Patriots,
 1161-1163; Michael Vick, 1158-
 1161
 National Guard; and Hurricane Katrina, 1069-1070; Kent State shootings, 410-413, 491; and
 "Scottsboro Boys," 151
 National Hockey League, 901-903
 National Labor Relations Act of 1935, 42
 National Press Photographers
 Association, 811
 National Research Act of 1974, 439
 National Security Agency, 932,
 995-998
 Native Americans, 130-133, 434,
 1155-1158
 NATO. See North Atlantic Treaty Organization
 Naval Academy, U.S., 1102; cheating scandal, 800-803;
 honor code, 801; sexual harassment at, 788
 Navratilova, Martina, 590
 Navy, U.S.; homosexuality investigation, 70-72; Tailhook scandal, 784-788; and Teapot
 Dome scandal, 96
 Nazi collaborators and sympathizers; Charles Bedaux,
 212-214; Errol Flynn, 559-561;
 Günter Grass, 1109-1112; Knut
 Hamsun, 229-232; Pierre Laval,
 209-211; Philippe Pétain, 232-
 236; Vidkun Quisling, 226-229;
 Kurt Waldheim, 669-672
 NBA. See National Basketball
 Association

 NCAA. See National Collegiate Athletic Association
 Neel, James V., 910-912
 Nelson, Judd, 718
 Nesbit, Evelyn, 16-19
 New England Patriots, 1161-1163
 New Life Church, 1126-1129
 New Orleans, Louisiana, 1068-
 1072
New Republic, The, 887-889
 New South Wales Fraud
 Enforcement Agency, 853
 New York City; Armory Modern Art Show, 49-52; Broadway theater, 122-124; called
 "Hymietown," 633-636;
 Genovese murder, 369-371;
 Rudy Giuliani, 904-906; Goetz shootings, 641-644; "Mayflower Madam," 654-657; Myerson
 scandal, 693-695; Stonewall Rebellion, 506; "Subway
 Vigilante," 641-644; Triangle
 Shirtwaist factory fire, 40-43
New York Daily News, 289
 New York Islanders, 901-903
 New York Racing Association,
 514-515
New York Times, 8, 24, 50, 167-
 169, 218, 362, 488; and Abscam, 562; and Fatty
 Arbuckle, 81; and Auburn
 University, 1101-1103; and Joe Biden, 700; and Jayson Blair,
 888, 998-1001; and cold fusion,
 724; and Duke lacrosse team,
 1088; and Doris Kearns
 Goodwin, 959-960; and Jesse
 Jackson, 896; and "Koreagate," 480; and James Mackey, 879;
 and Paul de Man, 705-708; and Madame Nhu, 363; and
 Pentagon Papers, 416-419; and
 Eliot Spitzer, 1167; and U.S. Air Force Academy, 1063; and U.S.
 Naval Academy, 801; and Kurt
 Waldheim, 669
New York Times Co. v. United States (1971), 417

MODERN SCANDALS

- New Zealand. See Geographical Index
- Newport sex scandal, 70-72
- News Corp, 1129-1131
- News of the World, The*, 696-697, 828, 1084-1086
- Newsweek* magazine, 576, 1114-1118; and O. J. Simpson, 810-812
- Newton, Andrew, 531
- NFL. See National Football League
- Ngo Dinh Diem, 362
- Ngo Dinh Nhu, 362
- Ngo Dinh Nhu, Madame, 362-365
- Nguyen Duy Trinh, 434
- NHL. See National Hockey League
- Nicaragua, 676-681
- Nicholson, Jack, 523
- Nifong, Mike, 1086-1089
- Night of the Long Knives, 11
- Nihoul, Michel, 840
- 9/11. See September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks
- Nixon, Pat, 453-456
- Nixon, Richard, 286-288; and Spiro T. Agnew, 447-450; gifts received, 453-456; and Alger Hiss, 261; Nixon tapes, 428; and Pentagon Papers, 416-419; and Watergate, 312, 418, 425-431, 448-449, 455, 493, 497
- Nixon tapes, 428
- Noailles, Charles de, 148
- Noailles, Marie-Laure de, 148
- Nobile, Philip, 520
- Noebel, David A., 465
- Norgrove, Jane, 789
- Normand, Mabel, 73-76, 100-102
- Norris, Clarence, 150-153
- Norris v. Alabama* (1935), 152
- North, Oliver, 676-681
- North Atlantic Treaty Organization, 350, 357, 490-491, 658, 744, 890
- Northern Ireland, 413-415, 609
- Norton, Rosaleen, 304-306
- Norway, 226-232
- Nosenko, Yuri, 347
- Nosferatu* (film), 111-114
- Notre Dame University, 598; football, 948-950
- Novak, Robert, 1010-1013
- Nuclear weapons, 442; China, 373; Iraq, 995; testing, 651-654
- Nude Descending a Staircase* (Duchamp), 50
- Nudity, 17, 584, 767, 774, 1027; in art, 50; Hedy Lamarr, 163-166; Vanessa Williams, 638-641
- Oakley, Kenneth, 292-295
- Oană, Ioachim, 916-918
- Oaten, Belinda, 1084-1086
- Oaten, Mark, 1084-1086
- Obama, Barack, 701
- Obedience to Authority* (Milgram), 339
- Occupational Health and Safety Administration, and 1911 Triangle fire, 42
- O'Connell, William Henry, 128
- Oelrich, Ryan, 1081
- Office of Management and Budget, U.S., 511-514
- Office of Thrift Supervision, U.S., 1177
- OFFP. See Oil-for-Food Programme
- Ogawa, Kentaro, 398-400
- Oil-for-Food Programme, 481, 1053-1055
- Oil reserves scandal, 95-99
- O'Leary, George, 948-950
- Oliphant, Charles, 310
- Olympics; 1994, 812-815; 2000, 916-918, 1164-1166; 2002, 962-964; doping, 916-918, 1164-1166; figure skating, 812-815, 962-964; gymnastics, 916-918; track and field, 1164-1166
- O'Morain, Michael, 413
- Onassis, Jacqueline Kennedy, 694
- 1 Night in Paris* (video), 1020
- O'Neill, Tip, 621-624, 730
- Opera, 76-79
- Operation PUSH, 896
- Operation White Snow, 479-482, 534-536
- Order of internment (Roosevelt), 206
- O'Reilly, Bill, 1047-1049
- O'Reilly, Bridget, 217-219
- O'Reilly Factor, The* (television), 1047-1049
- Organization of Afro-American Unity, 360
- Organization of American Historians, 986
- Organized crime and racketeering. See Category Index
- Ormiston, Kenneth G., 115
- Orphans; Duplessis, 892-895; Irish school fire, 217-219
- Ossendowski, Anton Martynovich, 307
- Oufkir, Mohammad, 374
- Oustric, Albert, 139-141
- Outreau affair, 922-924
- Overholser, Winfred, 236
- Owen, Richard, 494-497
- Pacepa, Ion Mihai, 353
- Pach, Walter, 49-52
- Padgett, Tom, 708
- Page sex scandal, 621-624
- Pagnam, Fred, 55
- Pagones, Steven, 702
- Pakistan, 254-256, 1053-1055
- Paleontology, 292-295
- Palestine Liberation Organization, 634, 793
- Palfrey, Deborah Jeane, 1150-1153
- Palimony, 540-542, 588-591
- Palmer, Lilli, 245
- Panama, 473, 606
- Pan-American Oil and Transport Company, 96
- Panny, William, 580
- Panov, V. A., 309
- Paparazzi, 81, 254, 746, 861, 882, 1019; and Princess Diana, 861-865
- Papon, Maurice, 375
- Park, Tongsun, 479-482

SUBJECT INDEX

- Park Chung Hee, 479
 Parker, Alton B., 1
 Parker, Dave, 666-669
 Parkinson, Cecil, 631-633
 Parks, Bernard, 884
 Parnes, Anthony, 753-756
 Parsons, Jan, 717-720
 Partnership for a Drug-Free America, 767
 Pass, Albert, 404
Passion of the Christ, The (film), 1107
 Paternity suits; Charles Chaplin, 220-222, 283; Steve Garvey, 574-577; Elijah Muhammad, 359-361; John G. Schmitz, 603-605
 Patterson, Haywood, 150-153
 Patton, George S., 156
 Paul, Henri, 861
 Paul VI, 606
 Paulino, Rolando, 942-944
 Paulk, Anne, 913
 Paulk, John, 913-915
 Paulson, Henry, 1134-1138, 1175-1179
 Payola scandal, 332-335
 Peace, Purnell A., 1158
 Peace Corps, 476-478
 Pearson, Drew, 173-175, 248-250, 384
 Pearson, Lester B., 377-379
 Pedophilia, 315, 842; and Michael Jackson, 1025-1027; and Ernest Jones, 15; and Outreau affair, 922-924; and Roman Catholic priests, 954-958
Peeling the Onion (Grass), 1111
Pee-wee's Playhouse, 765
 Peking man, 292
 Pelletier, David, 962-964
 Pelosi, Nancy, 623, 1148
 Pelossi, Giorgio, 830
 Pendergast, James, 199
 Pendergast, Thomas Joseph, 199-201
 Penenberg, Adam, 887
 Penis severing, 795-797
 Pensacola Christian College, 1124
 Pentagon Papers, 416-419
Penthouse magazine, 638-641, 828
People, The (newspaper), 793
People v. Goetz (1984), 641-644
 Peppiatt, Angela, 696
 Pereira, Fernando, 651-654
 Péret, Raoul Adolphe, 139-141
 Perez, Rafael Antonio, 884
 Perhach, Vanessa, 865
 Perjury, 885; Jeffrey Archer, 697; Hillary Clinton, 820, 876; Alger Hiss, 259-262; Lewis "Scooter" Libby, 1012; Charles Van Doren, 328; Caspar Weinberger, 679
 Perkins, Tom, 1114-1118
 Perla, Anthony, 568
 Perla, Rocco, 568
 Perrault, Roger, 868
 Perry, Nancy Ling, 450
 Pesticides, 547
 Pet food, 661; China, 1097-1100; Chinese, 1097
 Pétain, Philippe, 209-211, 232-236
 Petee, Thomas A., 1101-1103
 Petrovich Semenov, Evgeni, 307
Peyton Place (television), 773
 Pharmaceuticals, 193
Phil Donahue Show, The (television), 583
 Philbin, Regis, 574, 828
 Philippines, 1, 173, 175, 600-602, 628-630
 Phillips, Carrie, 124
 Phillips, Jud, 313
 Phillips, Quanis, 1159
 Phipps, Ogden Mills, 514
 Photography, Abu Ghraib prison, 1036
Pianist, The (film), 524
 Pickett, John O., 901-903
 Picquart, Georges, 19
 Pierce, Ponchitta, 537
 Pierlot, Hubert, 277
 Pilatus, Rob, 756-758
 Piltdown man, 292-295
 Pinto, Ford, 594-596
 Pius XII, 164, 353-355
 Plagiarism. See Category Index
 Plame, Valerie, 1010-1013
 "Plamegate," 1010-1013
Playboy magazine, 497-500, 584, 612, 614, 639
 Poetry, 474-476; Koolmatrie hoax, 223-225; Ezra Pound, 236-239
 Poindexter, John M., 676
 Point shaving in basketball, 274-276, 568-570, 1172
 Poisoning, diethylene glycol, 194
 Polanski, Roman, 522-524
 Police corruption, 656, 702-705; Australia, 681-683; Belgium, 840-842; Los Angeles, 884-886; San Francisco, 191-193; Turkey, 843-845
 Political contributions. See Campaign contributions Politics. See Category Index
 Polozola, Frank, 907
 Pons, Stanley, 723-726
 Ponzi, Charles, 63-66
 Ponzi schemes, 63-66, 708-710. See also Pyramid schemes
 Pope, Barbara S., 785
 Popoff, Elizabeth, 673
 Popoff, Peter, 673-675
 Poppe, Henry, 274-276
 Popular culture. See Category Index
 Pornography, 640; and Adelphia Communications, 971; and Mary Astor, 184; and John Wayne Bobbitt, 796; and Divine Brown, 828; child, 625, 922, 1170-1172; films, 1004-1007; and Eugène Goossens, 304-306; and Paris Hilton, 1019-1021; and Michael Jackson, 1027; and Paul Reubens, 765-768; and Clarence Thomas, 770
 Post Office scandal, 803-806
 Pottinger, George, 431
 Poulson, John, 431-433
 Pound, Dorothy Shakespear, 236
 Pound, Ezra, 236-239
 Powell, Adam Clayton, Jr., 380-383

MODERN SCANDALS

- Powell v. Alabama* (1932), 152
Powell v. McCormack (1969), 381-382
 Prescott, John, 1089-1091
 Presidential campaigns, U.S.; 1904, 1-3; 1920, 90, 93; 1924, 98; 1932, 159; 1948, 988-991; 1952, 271, 281, 286-288; 1956, 312, 320; 1960, 331, 344; 1964, 371-374, 386; 1968, 454; 1972, 425-431; 1976, 480, 497-501; 1980, 571-574; 1984, 633-636, 680; 1988, 680, 698-701, 713, 718; 1992, 874; 1996, 875; 2000, 764, 877; Joe Biden, 698-701; George H. W. Bush, 680; George W. Bush, 764; Jimmy Carter, 480, 497-500, 571-574; Bill Clinton, 874; Hillary Clinton, 1169; Michael Dukakis, 718; Thomas F. Eagleton, 440-443; Dwight D. Eisenhower, 312, 320; Gerald R. Ford, 501; Barry Goldwater, 371-374, 386; Warren G. Harding, 90; Herbert Hoover, 159; Jesse Jackson, 633-636; Lyndon B. Johnson, 371-374; Richard Nixon, 286-288, 425-431, 454; Ronald Reagan, 680; Pat Robertson, 713; Theodore Roosevelt, 1-3; Al Smith, 93; Strom Thurmond, 988-991. See also Campaign contributions
 President's Commission on Campus Unrest, 412
President's Daughter, The (Britton), 124-127
 Pressler, Larry, 563
 Pressler, Mike, 1003, 1086
 Preston, Billy, 494-497
 Prevention of Abuses Act of 1925, 85
 Prevert, Jacques, 148
 Previn, Soon-Yi, 773-775
 Price, Mike, 1002-1004
 Price, Victoria, 150
 Priest, Dana, 1138-1142
 Prieur, Dominique, 651
Prime Time Live (television), 761
 Prince, Jonas, 898
 Privacy Act of 1974, 429
 Privat, Maurice, 140
 Priven, Dennis, 476-478
 Profumo, John, 348, 355-358, 378
 Prohibition, 75, 90, 93, 100, 102-105, 110
 Propaganda Due, 591-593
 Prostitution, 53. See Category Index
 Psalm 51, 713
 Psychology and psychiatry. See Category Index
 PTL Television Network, 690-693
 Public morals. See Category Index
 Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935, 155 Publishing and journalism. See Category Index
 Purcell, Bob, 55-58
 Purviance, Edna, 100
 Putin, Vladimir, 1132-1134
 Pyramid schemes, 846-849, 1132. See also Ponzi schemes
 Qaddafi, Muammar al-, 679
 Qaeda, al-. See al-Qaeda
 Quebec, 898; Duplessis orphans, 892-895
 Quisling, Vidkun, 226-229
 Racism. See Category Index under Social issues and reform
 Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act of 1970, 728
 Radcliffe, Cyril, 347
 Rader, Stanley, 525
 Radio and television. See Category Index
 Răducan, Andreea, 916-918
Ragtime (Doctorow), 18
 Rahman, Kambir Abdul, 562
Rainbow Warrior (ship), 651-654
 Raines, Howell, 998-1001
 Rajneesh, Bhagwan Shree, 662-665
 Ralph, Tim, 1126-1129
 Ramos, Fidel V., 629
 Rampart scandal, 884-886
 RAND, 416
 Randi, James, 673-675
 Rape; and Fatty Arbuckle, 74, 79-82, 88; and Jimmy Bakker, 690; of Lorena Bobbitt, 795-797; of Tawana Brawley, 702-705; and Kobe Bryant, 1008-1010; and Joey Buttafuoco, 781-784; of children, 922-924; and Duke lacrosse team, 1086-1089; and Marc Dutroux, 840-842; of Francis Farmer, 216; of Amy Fisher, 781; and Errol Flynn, 202-205; of Kitty Genovese, 369-371; and Jung Myung Seok, 939-941; and Mary Kay Letourneau, 849-852; of Menendez brothers, 752; at My Lai massacre, 401; in opera, 77; and Roman Polanski, 522-524; and "Scottsboro Boys," 150-153; and William Kennedy Smith, 759-762; spousal, 795-797; and Stanford White, 17
 Raphael, Adam, 696
 Rappe, Virginia, 79-82
 Rasmussen, Anders Fogh, 1075
 Rather, Dan, 1022-1024, 1044-1046
 Rathom, John R., 70
 Rauh, Carl, 803
 Rauh, Joseph L., Jr., 404-406
 Ray, Elizabeth, 491-493
 Reagan, Marilyn Bradshaw, 529
 Reagan, Ronald; Abscam, 563; and deregulation, 945; and Environmental Protection Agency, 615-616; Iran-Contra, 312, 676-681, 780; and Ku Klux Klan, 635; at Nazi cemetery, 1110; and Religious Right, 577
 Reardon, David C., 795
 Recession, U.S., 1175-1179
 Recruit scandal, 714-717
 Red Cross, American, 778
 Red Cross, Canadian, 869
 Red Cross, International, 1035
 Red Fox, 424
Red Rubber (Morel), 32

SUBJECT INDEX

- Red Scare, 71, 81, 285
 Redfern, Michael, 927-930
 Redfern Report, 927-930
 Reed, John, 223
 Reenan, Cyril, 789
 Rees-Jones, Trevor, 861
Reflections of a Public Man
 (Wright), 731
 Regan, Judith, 1129-1131
 Reguly, Robert, 377
 Reid, Wallace, 86-89
 Reilly, Sidney, 105-108
 Religion. See Category Index
 Replogle, Hartley L., 68
 Résumé falsification, 587, 948-950
 Reubens, Paul, 765-768, 829
Révélation (Robert and Backes),
 925-927
 Revers, Georges, 257-259
 Revers Report, 257-259
 Reynaud, Paul, 233
 Reynolds, Don, 365-368
 Rhodes, James A., 410
 Rhoodie, Eschel, 543
 "Rhodiegate," 543-545
 Rialto Grain and Securities
 Company, 4-6
 Ribbentrop, Joachim von, 197
 Ribicoff, Abraham A., 384, 511
 Rice-Davies, Mandy, 356
 Richardson, Elliot, 447-450
 Richardson-Merrell, 302
 Richie, Nicole, 1020
 RICO Act. See Racketeer
 Influenced and Corrupt
 Organizations Act of 1970
 Ridenhour, Ronald, 401
 Rigas, James, 971-973
 Rigas, John, 971-973
 Rigas, Michael, 971-973
 Rigas, Timothy, 971-973
 Riggs, Bobby, 589
 "Rinkagate," 531-534
Rise of Mr. Ponzi, The (Ponzi),
 64
 Rivers, Eunice, 437
 Riza, Iqbal, 1053-1055
 Roach, Hal, 178-181
 Robbins, Bruce, 837
 Robert, Denis, 925-927
 Roberts, Jim, 1000
 Roberts, Seth, 978
 Robertson, Cliff, 509-511
 Robertson, Pat, 713
 Robertson, Thomas A., 534
 Robertson affair, 509-511
 Robins, E. Claiborne, Sr., 459
 Robinson, Jackie, 639
 Robinson, Sir Joseph, 83
 Robinson, Walter V., 936-938
 Roche, James G., 991
 Rockefeller, Nelson A., 537-539
 Rodriguez, Marcelo, 881
 Roe Jung-hye, 1094
Roe v. Wade (1973), 604, 769
 Rogers, Michael, 1041-1044
 Rogers, William D., 473
 Rogge, Jacques, 962
 Roh Sung-il, 1094
 Röhm, Ernst, 11
 Roman, Ed, 274
 Roman Catholic Church, 456-459;
 and Banco Ambrosiano, 606-609; and Belgian Congo, 33;
 and Eamonn Casey, 779-781;
 and John Patrick Cody, 597-599;
 and film censorship, 164; and Rita Hayworth, 254-255; and Holocaust, 353-355; and homosexuality, 577-579; and Ireland, 413-415; and orphans,
 892-895; priests scandal, 954-
 958; and Sancta Susanna, 78
 Romania, 742-745, 916-918
 Rometsch, Ellen, 367
 Ronson, Gerald, 753-756
 Roosevelt, Eleanor, 159, 194, 205,
 1114
 Roosevelt, Franklin D., 62, 70, 128,
 155, 159, 194, 200-201; and airmail scandal, 144; and Japanese American internment,
 205-209; and Ezra Pound, 236
 Roosevelt, Theodore, 1-3, 26, 50;
 and Joseph R. Burton, 4-6
Roots (Haley), 520-522
 Rosa, John W., 1062
 Rose, Flemming, 1075-1077
 Rose, Pete, 735-738
 Roselli, John, 330
 Rosenberg, Alfred, 226, 230
 Rosoff, William L., 1050
 Ross, Andrew, 837
 Ross, Karl, 369
 Rossellini, Roberto, 263-265
 Rossellini, Roberto Ingmar, 263
 Rostenkowski, Dan, 803-806
 Rota, Robert V., 803
 Roth, Al, 274
 Rothstein, Arnold, 66-70
 Rove, Karl, 1011
 Royal Commission of Inquiry on the Blood System, 868-871
 Royal Institute of British
 Architects, 431
 Royalty. See Category Index
 Rubber; automobile tires, 534-536;
 in Congo Free State, 31-33; in Liberia, 143, 1078-1080
 Ruckelshaus, William, 615
 Rudel, Hans-Ulrich, 503-505
 Rudge, Olga, 236
 Ruef, Abraham, 28-30
 Ruiz Massieu, José Francisco, 824-
 826
 Rumsfeld, Donald, 991, 1034
 Rural Electrification Act of 1936,
 155
 Rushmore, Howard, 296
 Russia. See Geographical Index;
 Soviet Union
 Russian Civil War, 106, 226
 Russian Revolution, 75, 106, 167;
 and Sisson documents, 307-310
 Rutgers University women's basketball team, 1142-1144
 Ryan, Thomas Fortune, 2
 S. E. Massengill Company, 193-195
 Sabich, Vladimir, 485-487
 Sachs, Irving, 310-313
 Safe Drinking Water Act of 1986, 617
 Salé, Jamie, 962-964
 Salinas de Gortari, Carlos, 824-826
 Salinas de Gortari, Raúl, 824-826

MODERN SCANDALS

- Salmonella, 664, 983
 Salomon, Rick, 1019-1021
 Salter, Roberta Semple, 115
 Samuel, Herbert, 43
San Antonio Express-News, 1000
 San Francisco; Fatty Arbuckle trial, 79-82; city graft, 28-30; Warren Harding's death, 125; police corruption, 191-193; SLA bank robbery, 450-453
 Sancha, Antonia de, 792
 Sanchez, Ricardo, 1034-1038
Sancta Susanna (opera), 76-79
 Santoni, Mimi, 456-459
 Sapina, Ante, 1055-1058
 Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002, 1115
 Sarsgaard, Peter, 888
 Sarti, Adolfo, 591-593
 Sasso, Anthony P., 1155
 Satterlee, Peggy, 202-205
 Saud, Sultan bin Abdul Aziz al-, 453
 Saunders, Ernest, 753-756
 Save Our Children, 506
Saving Private Ryan (film), 951
 Sawyer, Charles E., 89
 Sawyer, Steve, 651-654
 Scarsdale diet, 565-567
 Schatten, Gerald, 1094-1097
 Scheer, Robert, 497
 Scheuer, Sandra, 410-413
 Schindel, Robert, 1109
 Schledwitz, Karl A., 649
 Schlesinger, James, 1034
 Schmidlapp, W. Horace, 246
 Schmidt, Hermann, 503-505
 Schmitz, Eugene E., 28-30
 Schmitz, John G., 603-605
 Schmitz, Joseph E., 605
 Schön, Jan Hendrik, 980-982
 Schreiber, Belle, 52
 Schreiber, Karlheinz, 830-833
 Schreuder, Frances, 528-530
 Schreuder, Marc, 528
 Schrock, Edward, 1041-1044
 Schroeder, William, 410-413
 Schwartzkoppen, Max von, 20
 Schwarzenegger, Arnold, 1016-1019
 Schwebel, Stephen M., 1039
 Schwimmer, Harry I., 310-313
 Science and technology. See Category Index
 Scotland, 879-881; Distillers Co., 754
 Scott, Ian, 1112
 Scott, Norman, 531-534
 "Scottsboro Boys," 150-153
 SEC. See Securities and Exchange Commission
 Secord, Richard V., 676
 Securities Act of 1933, 155, 389
 Securities and Exchange Commission, U.S., 320-322, 483, 510, 649; and Eli M. Black, 471-473; and George W. Bush, 762-765; Enron investigation, 945-948; and financial markets collapse of 2008, 1178; and Hewlett-Packard, 1117; and Michael Milken, 726-729; mutual fund investigation, 1013-1016; and Martha Stewart, 1031-1034; and Westar Energy, 1072-1074; and Louis Wolfson, 389-391
 Security Outsourcing Solutions, 1115
 Seduction Act of 1922 (Alberta), 176
Seeds of Distrust (Hager), 974-977
 Selbekk, Vebjørn, 1075-1077
 Seles, Monica, 814
 Selig, Bud, 1058
 Seligmann, Reade, 1086
 Senate, U.S. See Congress, U.S.
 Sentelle, David B., 818
 September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, 778, 906, 995, 1065, 1075, 1155-1158
Seven Days in May (Knebel and Bailey), 175
 Sevigny, Chloë, 1004-1007
 Sévigny, Pierre, 377-379
 Sex. See Category Index
 Sex change. See Transsexualism
 Sex crimes. See Category Index
 Sexism. See Category Index under Social issues and reform
 Sexual harassment; and Kofi Annan, 1039-1041; and Benjamin Chavis, 821-823; and Bill Clinton, 820, 875; at military academies, 801-802, 991-994; in Navy, 784-788; and Bill O'Reilly, 1047-1049; and John Prescott, 1089-1091; and Arnold Schwarzenegger, 1016-1019; and Clarence Thomas, 768-772; in workplaces, 502
 Sexual Sterilization Act of 1928 (Alberta), 133-136
 Sexuality in film, 165
 Shalala, Donna, 1141
 Shanley, Paul, 954
 Sharpton, Al, 702-705, 1142
Shattered Glass (film), 888
 Shaw, Artie, 317
 Shaw, Steven, 673
 "Shawinigate," 898-901
 Sheehan, Neil, 416
 Sheela, Ma Anand, 662-665
 Sheldon, Jackie, 55-58
 Shell crisis of 1915, 58-60
 Sheppard, William Henry, 32
 Sherwood, Carlton, 597-599
 Shinto, Hisashi, 714-717
 Short, Clare, 995-998
 Shriver, Maria, 1016
 Shuler, Robert P., 117
 Siebert, Tara, 717-720
 Siegelman, Don, 909
 Signorini, Fernando, 816
 Sikharulidze, Anton, 962-964
Silent Spring (Carson), 547
 Sills, Beverly, 694
 Silvey, Joyce, 509
Simple Life, The (television), 1020
 Simpson, Nicole Brown, 806-809
 Simpson, O. J., 806-812, 1129-1131
 Simpson, Tom, 1103
 Simpson, Wallis, 187-190, 196-198, 213
 Sin, Jaime, 629

SUBJECT INDEX

- Sinatra, Frank, 329
 Sinclair, Harry F., 95-99
 Sindona, Michele, 591, 606-609
 Singer, Isaac Merritt, 34
 Singer, Paris, 34-36
 Singer, Patrick, 34
Sirens (film), 827
 Sisson, Edgar, 307-310
 Sisson documents, 307-310
Six Crises (Nixon), 261
60 Minutes, 424, 436, 835, 888;
 Abu Ghraib prison, 1034-1038;
 Strom Thurmond, 1022-1024;
 Tobacco industry corruption,
 833-836
60 Minutes II, 1063; George W.
 Bush, 1044-1046
 Sixty-ninth Regiment Armory, 49
 "Skategate," 962-964
 Skilling, Jeffrey, 945-948
 SLA. See Symbionese Liberation
 Army
 Slaton, Lewis, 717
 Slavery; African slave trade, 31; in Congo, 32; Jesse Jackson on,
 634; in Liberia, 142-144, 1078-
 1080; and orphans, 893
Slaves in the Family (Ball), 521
 Slotnick, Barry, 641
 Smith, Jesse W., 92-95
 Smith, Lonnie, 666
 Smith, Thomas Daniel, 431
 Smith, William Kennedy, 759-762,
 866
 SMU. See Southern Methodist University
 Smuts, Jan, 84
 Snyder, John W., Jr., 785
 Soap Box Derby, 444-446
 Soccer, 815-818; game fixing, 55-
 58, 1055-1058, 1092-1094
 Social issues and reform. See
 Category Index
Social Text (journal), 837-840
 Society for the Suppression of Vice, 122
 Sohn, Lydia L., 980
 Sokal, Alan, 837-840
 "Soldiers Face Neglect, Frustration at Army's Top Medical Facility"
 (February 18, 2007), 1139
 Solomon, Paul M., 980
 Soltysik, Patricia, 450
 "Some People Push Back" (Ward Churchill), 1157
 Sonderbund Exhibition, 49
 Song My massacre, 401-404
 Sorensen, Larry, 667
 Sosa, Sammy, 1058
 South Africa, 84, 543-545
 South Korea. See Geographical
 Index
 Southern Methodist University football, 687-689
 Soviet Union, 105-108, 167-169,
 266, 307; atheism in, 465, 673;
 espionage, 347-349, 355-358,
 377-379, 931-933; and space race, 320-321; and the Vatican, 353; wheat purchases, 501;
 World War II, 210
 Spaak, Paul-Henri, 276-279
 Space and aviation. See Category
 Index
 Spain, 136-139
 Spanish Civil War, 559
 Spano, John A., Jr., 901-903
Speak Out (television), 605
 Speaker, Tris, 118-121
 Special Committee on Un-
 American Activities, 248
 Special Committee to Investigate
 Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce, 270-273
 Spence, Wishart, 377
Spiegel, Der (magazine), 349-352,
 504, 658, 1111
 Spitzer, Eliot L., 1013-1016, 1050-
 1052, 1167-1170
 Spitzer, Silda Wall, 1167
 Spokane, Washington, 1081-1083
 Sports. See Category Index; individual sports
Sports Illustrated (magazine), 736,
 942-943, 1002-1004
 Sprague, Richard, 404
 Sprague, Robert, 720-723
 Springer, Jerry, 828
 "Spygate," 1161-1163
 Spying. See Category Index under Espionage
 "Squidgygate," 789-792
 Stacpoole, Michael, 696-698
 Stalin, Joseph, 106, 167-169; and picture forgery, 811
 Stammberger, Wolfgang, 349
 Standard and Poor's, 1176
 Standard Oil; campaign contributions, 1
 Stanford, Karin, 895
 Stanford University, 1102; King
 Papers Project, 739; prison experiment, 420-422
 Stanley, David, 687
 Stanley, Henry Morton, 31-33
 Stansel, Mary E., 821
 Stant, Shane, 812
 Stark, Ray, 509
 StarKist Canada, 660
 Starr, Kenneth, 818-821, 874-878
 State Department, U.S., 455; and
 "Bananagate," 471-473; and Alger Hiss, 259-262; and
 "Koreagate," 479, 481; and
 Joseph McCarthy, 266-270; and
 Peace Corps murder, 476-478
 Stavisky, Alexandre, 170-172
 Stearns, Cliff, 1116
 Stein, Gertrude, 51
 Stem cell research, 1094-1097
 Stempel, Herb, 326-329
 Stennis, John, 384
 Stent, Julia, 798-800
 Stern, David, 1172-1175
Stern, Der (magazine), 618-621
 Stern, Howard, 828
 Sternberg, Saul, 978
 Stevenson, Andrew, 852
 Stewart, Harold, 223-225
 Stewart, Martha, 1031-1034
 Stiglitz, Joseph E., 1176
 Stimson, Henry L., 205
 Stoker, Bram, 111-114
 Stoker, Florence, 111-114
 Stokes, Louis, 621
 Stompanato, Johnny, 317-319
 Stonehouse, John, 468-470

MODERN SCANDALS

- Stonewall Rebellion, 506
 Storer, George, 335-337
 Stramm, August, 76-79
 Strauss, Franz Josef, 349-352
 Street Betting Act of 1906, 56
 Stringer, C. Vivian, 1142
 Stuckle, Carla, 603-605
 Studds, Gerry, 621-624
 Subprime, definition of, 1136
 Subprime mortgage industry, 1134-1138
 "Subway Vigilante," 641-644
 Suer, Oral, 1028-1030
 Suicide. See Category Index under Murder and suicide
 Sulfanilamide, 193-195
 Sullivan, Joseph, 66
 Sullivan, Shannon, 1081-1083
 Superfund Act. See Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act of 1980
 Superfund Act of 1986, 617
 Supreme Court, U.S., 47; Clinton impeachment, 877; Abe Fortas, 390-394; and Japanese American internment, 206; and Pentagon Papers, 417; and Adam Clayton Powell, Jr., 381; and "Scottsboro Boys," 152-153; and Teapot Dome scandal, 98; Clarence Thomas, 768-772; and Watergate scandal, 429, 448. See also individual cases
 Supreme Court of Canada, 176, 378, 870
 Supreme Court of the Philippines, 600-602
Surreal Life, The (television), 692
 Surrealism, definition of, 148
 Surrealist films, 136-139, 147-150
 Surrealist painting, 138
 Suskind, Richard, 422-425
 Swaggart, Jimmy, 711-714, 1152
 Swanson, Gloria, 127-130
 Sweden, 263-265
 Sweeney, Constance M., 954
 Sweeney, James, 568
 Sweet, Robert W., 1039
 Swiss Bankers Association, 859
 Switzerland. See Geographical Index
 Sykes, Roberta, 852
 Symbionese Liberation Army, 450-453
 Taft, William Howard, 46
 Taguba, Antonio, 1034-1038
 Taguba Report, 1036
 Tailhook Association, 785, 991
 Tailhook sexual assault scandal, 784-788
 Takeoka, Toshiki, 919-921
 Takeshita, Noboru, 714-717, 733-735
 Talk shows, 583, 828, 1032; Don Imus, 1142-1144
 Talmadge, Betty, 553
 Talmadge, Herman E., 553-555
 Talmadge, Robert S., 553
 Tanaka, Kakuei, 482-485
 Tanaka, Tsutomu, 398-400
 Tardieu, André, 139-141
 Tarleton, Donald, 511
 Tarnower, Herman, 565-567
 Tarriff Act of 1930, 164
 Task Force Barker, 401
 Tate, Sharon, 246, 522
 Taung child, 292
 Tax conspiracy, 310-313
 Tax evasion, 84; Sherman Adams, 322; Adelphia Communications, 972; Spiro T. Agnew, 447, 449; Bobby Baker, 368; Dave Beck, 324; Earl Butz, 502; Cal Caprasso, 694; Clearstream Financial Clearinghouse, 925; Randall Cunningham, 1066; John De Lorean, 611; Leona Helmsley, 776-778; Kent Hovind, 1123-1126; Webster Hubbell, 819; Michael Milken, 728; Sun Myung Moon, 481; Tom Pendergast, 199-201; Pete Rose, 737; Irving Sachs, 312; Karlheinz Schreiber, 832
 Taylor, Norman, 1028-1030
 Taylor, Tony, 1158
 Taylor, William Desmond, 73-76, 88
 "Tea-rooming," 407
 Teamsters Union, 323-325
 Teapot Dome scandal, 91, 95-99, 125
Tearoom Trade (Humphreys), 407-409
 Teets, Peter B., 991
 Teilhard de Chardin, Pierre, 293, 457
 Television; game shows, 326-329
 Temple, Tracey, 1089-1091
 Tennis, 239-242, 588-591
 Terboven, Josef, 226
 Teti, Raffaello, 889
 Thalidomide, 301-304
 Thamel, Pete, 1101
 Thatcher, Margaret, 645-647, 696, 792, 798; and Edwina Currie, 983; and Cecil Parkinson, 631-633; and Westland Aircraft, 645-647
 Thaw, Harry Kendall, 16-19
 Thomas, Clarence, 768-772
 Thomas, Frank, 431
 Thomas, J. Parnell, 248-250, 260
 Thomas, James Henry, 181-184
 Thomas, Sir Leslie, 181
 Thompson, Frank, 561-562
 Thompson, Hugh, Jr., 401
 Thompson, Margaret W., 133
 Thomsen, Ian, 942
 Thornburgh, Dick, 684
 Thorpe, Franklyn, 184-187
 Thorpe, Jeremy, 531-534
 Thrasher, Donald, 1020
Three Weeks (Glyn), 25-27
 Thring, G. Herbert, 111
 Thurmond, Strom, 384, 988-991, 1022-1024
 Tidal Basin incident, 462-465
 Tiedge, Hans-Joachim, 657-659
 Tierney, Patrick, 910-912
 Tilden, Bill, 239-242
 Tillman, Benjamin, 3
 Tillman Act of 1907, 3
Time magazine, 154, 289, 376, 526, 569, 740, 757; and Ted

SUBJECT INDEX

- Haggard, 1127; "Man of the Year," 209; and O. J. Simpson, 810-812; and Eliot Spitzer, 1050; and Whitewater investigation, 811
Times of London, 59, 293, 618, 983
 Timony, James, 122
 Tiriak, Ion, 916
 Tisa, Benedict, 609
 Tobacco industry corruption, 833-836
 Tobias, Randall L., 1151
 Todd, Thelma, 178-181
 Tohoku Paleolithic Institute, 919-921
 Tokes, Laszlo, 742-745
 Tolstoy, Ilia, 130-133
 Tomasz, 1084-1086
 Tonga, 476-478
Tonight Show, The (television), 673-675, 828, 1017
 Topping, Henry, 317
 Torture, 340, 840, 922; Abu Ghraib prison, 1034-1038
 Tour de France, 1103-1106
 Tower, John, 384
 Tower Commission, 678
 Trade and commerce. See Category Index
 Trandahl, Jeff, 1118-1120
 Transsexualism, 289-291
 Treason; Charles and Fern Bedaux, 212-214; Alfred Dreyfus, 19-22; Errol Flynn, 559-561; Jane Fonda, 434-436; Knut Hamsun, 229-232; Robert Hanssen, 931-933; Pierre Laval, 209-211; Philippe Pétain, 232-236; Ezra Pound, 236-239; Vidkun Quisling, 226-229; and Der Spiegel, 349-352; Hans-Joachim Tiedge, 657-659
 Treasury Department, U.S., 1176
 Trevenar, Bert, 304-306
 Trevor-Roper, Hugh, 618
 Triangle Shirtwaist factory fire, 40-43, 219
 Trindle, Renee, 991
 Triola, Michelle, 540-542
 Tripp, Linda, 874-878
 Tri-State Crematory, 964-967
 Trotsky, Leon, 106, 226
 Truman, Harry S., 8, 989, 1023; and T. Lamar Caudle, 280; and Matthew J. Connelly, 310-313; and Douglas MacArthur, 175; and Joseph McCarthy, 266-270; and Thomas Joseph Pendergast, 199-201
 Truman Committee, 311
 Trungpa, Chögyam, 474-476
 Tryforos, Lynne, 565
 Tuberville, Tommy, 1101-1103
 "Tunagate," 660-662
 Turcotte, Jean-Claude, 892-895
 Turkey, 843-845
 Turnbull, Sandy, 55
 Turner, Lana, 317-319
 Tuskegee Syphilis Study, 437-440
 Twain, Mark, 33
Twenty-One (television), 326-329
 291 Gallery, 49
 Tyler, Nancy Carole, 365
 Tyson, Mike, 703
 Ueberroth, Peter, 556, 666-669, 737
 Ullman, Harlan K., 1151
 Ulmer, Walter F., 488
 UMW. See United Mine Workers of America
 U.N. See United Nations
Uncle Tom's Cabin (Stowe), 521
 Unification Church, 479, 939
 Union of European Football Associations, 1093
 United American Bank, 648-650
 United Fruit Company, 471
 United Mine Workers of America, 404-406
 United Nations; Kofi Annan, 1039-1041; Convention Against Torture, 1037; and Liberia, 1080; Oil-for-Food Programme, 481, 1053-1055; and South Korea, 479; spying on, 995-998; Kurt Waldheim, 669-672
 United Nations War Crimes Commission, 670
 United Penn Bank, 637
 United States. See Geographical Index
 United Way, 1028-1030
 University of Alabama football, 1002-1004
 University of Colorado, 1155-1158
 University of Georgia, 389; basketball, 950, 968-970
 University of Pittsburgh, 720-723
 Uno, Sosuke, 733-735
Upton and the Army (Ambrose), 952
 Us, Gonca, 843
 Vander Schaaf, Derek, 785
 Vassall, John, 347-349
 Vatican Bank, 606-609
 Vatican City, 353-355, 606-609
 Vaughn, Kia, 1142
 Velzen, Dick van, 927-930, 936-938
 Venezuela measles epidemic, 910-912
 Ver, Fabian, 628
 Vermeersch, Arthur, 33
 Veterans Bureau, 89-92, 95, 103
 Vick, Michael, 1158-1161
Victor/Victoria (film), 612
 Video evidence, 527, 562, 583, 674, 715, 920, 1008, 1077, 1088; and Marion Barry, 748-750; and Joe Biden, 698-701; and Paris Hilton, 1019-1021; and Michael Jackson, 1026; and William J. Jefferson, 1147-1150; and R. Kelly, 1170-1172; and Rob Lowe, 717-720; and McMartin Preschool, 625-626; and New England Patriots, 1161-1163; and Paul Reubens, 766
 Viet Minh, 257-259
 Vietnam. See Geographical Index
 Vietnam War, 257, 269, 362-365, 442, 490, 936, 1065; and Jane

MODERN SCANDALS

- Fonda, 434-436; My Lai massacre, 401-404, 937; and Pentagon Papers, 416-419; protests against, 410-413
 Vigilantism, 641-644
 Vincent, Fay, 735-738
 Violence. See also Category Index; types of violence
Viridiana (film), 138, 149
 Vitter, David, 1150-1153
 Volcker, Paul, 858-861, 1053-1055
 Volcker Commission, 858-861
 Volkswagen, 860
 Volstead Act of 1919, 93, 103-105
 Von Eschenbach, Andrew C., 1097
 Vorster, B. J., 543-545
- Wade, Mitchell, 1064
 Wagner, Robert F., 40-43
 Wagner Act. See National Labor Relations Act of 1935
 Wakeman, Nancy, 386-388
 Wakeman, William T., 386-388
 Waksal, Samuel D., 1031-1034
 Waldheim, Kurt, 669-672
 Wałęsa, Lech, 1111
 Walker, Margaret, 520
 Wall Street investment banks, 1176
 Wallace, George, 604
 Wallace, Mike, 424, 833-836
 Wallonia, 276-279
 Walsh, Matt, 1161
 Walsh, Thomas J., 95
 Walter Reed Army Hospital, 249, 1138-1142
 Walters, Walter W., 156-160
 Wanda Koolmatrie hoax, 852-854
 Ward, Stephen, 355-358
 Warner, Ed, 274
 Warren, Earl, 380-383, 393
 Washington, Claudell, 667
 Washington, D.C.; Marion Barry, 748-750; Bonus Army, 156-160
 Washington, George, 938
Washington Merry-Go-Round, 174, 248-250, 384-386
- Washington Mutual, 1177
Washington Post, 97, 385, 463, 733, 801, 998, 1028; and Janet Cooke, 585-588; and Wayne L. Hays, 491-493; and Jesse Jackson, 633-636; and Rita Jenrette, 583; and Richard Nixon, 286, 425-431, 453-456; and organized crime, 271; Pentagon Papers, 417; and J. Parnell Thomas, 248-250; and Walter Reed Army Hospital, 1138-1142; and Watergate, 425-431; and Whitewater investigation, 818; and Jim Wright, 732
 Washington-Williams, Essie Mae, 1022-1024
 Watch and Ward Society, 26
 Water Quality Act of 1987, 617
 Watergate scandal, 312, 418-419, 425-431, 448, 482, 497; and Spiro T. Agnew, 449; and First Amendment, 418; and later reforms, 553
 Watkins, Harold Cole, 193-195
 Watkins, Sherron, 945-948
 Wehner, Herbert, 503
 Wehner, John, 626
 Weida, John A., 1062-1064
 Weidenreich, Franz, 292-295
 Weidner, Clinton, 1072-1074
 Weightman, George W., 1138-1142
 Weinberg, Melvin, 561
 Weinberger, Caspar, 676
 Weiner, Joseph, 292
 Weinstein, Bernard, 840
 Weinstein, Michael L., 1062-1064
 Welch, Joseph Nye, 266-270
 Welles, Orson, 110, 165, 254
 Wesson, Marianne, 1156
 West, Enoch, 55
 West, James E., 1081-1083
 West, Mae, 122-124
 West, Roland, 178-181
 West Point, 173, 937; cheating scandal, 488-490
 Westar Energy, 1072-1074
- Western Defense Command, 205
 Western State Hospital, 216
 Westland Aircraft, 645-647
 Westmoreland, William, 937
 Whalen, Robert P., 546
 Whaley, Arthur, 55
 White, Kevin, 948
 White, Stanford, 16-19
 White-Slave Traffic Act of 1910. See Mann Act of 1910
 White slavery, 52
 Whitewater investigation, 818-821, 874
 WHO. See World Health Organization
 Widnall, Sheila, 855-858
 Wiesenthal, Simon, 669-672
 Wigand, Jeffrey, 833-836
 Wilcox, Breckenridge, 720
Wild Blue, The (Ambrose), 951-953
 Wilhelm II. See William II
 Wilkes, Brent, 1064
 William II, 9-12
 Williams, Edward Bennett, 365, 368
 Williams, George Washington, 32
 Williams, Harrison A., 561
 Williams, Lefty, 66-70
 Williams, Vanessa, 382, 638-641
 Wills, Frank, 425
 Willson, Henry, 295-298
 Wilson, David, 597
 Wilson, Harold, 468-470
 Wilson, Helen Dolan, 597
 Wilson, Howard, 898-901
 Wilson, Joseph, 1010-1013
 Windsor, Duke of, 187-190, 196-198, 213
 Witch hunts, 9, 627, 900
 Witt, Robert, 1002-1004
 Wittig, David, 1072-1074
 WJC. See World Jewish Congress
 Wolf, Markus, 657
 Wolfson, Louis, 389-391
 Women's issues. See Category Index
 Woodward, Arthur Smith, 292-295
 Woodward, Bob, 425-431

SUBJECT INDEX

- Works Progress Administration, 248
- World Cup, 815-818, 1055-1057, 1093
- World Health Organization, 910
- World Jewish Congress, 669, 858-861
- World Jewish Restitution Organization, 859
- World Trade Center, 1157
- World War I, 84, 90, 93, 103, 139; and British royal family, 196-198; Canadian Expeditionary Force, 131; and Marie Curie, 38; and Alfred Dreyfus, 21; and European currencies, 64; and Leopold III, 277; and Douglas MacArthur, 173; and oil reserves, 96; and Russia, 309; Shell crisis, 58-60; veterans, 156-160, 174, 188; and William II, 9-12
- World War II, 503-505; and British royal family, 189; and France, 209-211; German atrocities, 338; and Germany, 209-211; Japanese American internment, 205-209; and Carole Landis, 245; and Leopold III, 276; and Douglas MacArthur, 175; Nazi collaborators, 209-214, 226-236, 559-561, 1109-1112; and Pius XII, 353-355; and Ezra Pound, 236-239; in Southeast Asia, 257; Truman Committee, 311. See also Holocaust; Nazi collaborators and sympathizers
- Worldwide Church of God, 525-528
- Wörner, Manfred, 503
- “Wounded warriors,” 1140
- Wright, Betty, 730
- Wright, Jim, 730-732
- Wright, Roy, 150-153
- Wronker-Flatow, Manfred, 111
- Yablonski, Joseph, 404-406
- Yaeger, Don, 1002-1004
- Yale University, 338, 705-708
- Yamamoto, Taku, 1145
- Yancy, Allen, 142-144
- Yasui, Minoru, 205
- Yasui v. United States* (1943), 206
- Yellow Robe, Chauncey, 130
- Yeo, Tim, 798-800
- Yoshinaga, Yusuke, 714-717
- Young, Andrew, 634
- Younger, George, 83
- Zamsky, Linda, 933
- Zedillo Ponce de León, Ernesto, 824-826
- Zheng Xiaoyu, 1097-1100
- Zigo, Marc, 855-858
- Zihlman, Frederick N., 103
- Zimbardo, Philip, 420-422
- Zinovyev, Grigory Yevseyevich, 106, 108-111
- Zinovyev letter; excerpt, 107
- “Zippergate,” 874-878
- Zola, Émile, 19-22
- Zwicker, Ralph W., 266-270
- ZZZZ Best Company, 708-710